* In the Title prefixed to this Article, at p. 267, he is erroneously called "Beaumont." He was second son of John of Gaunt, by Catherine Roet, Rowet, or Ruet, a French woman, widow of Sir Thomas Swinford. This Cardinal, as well as John of Gaunt's other children by Catherine Swinford, was illegitimate, being born while John of Gaunt was the husband of another woman. In 1396, John of Gaunt, being a widower, married Catherine Swinford, and in the next year their children were legitimated by act of parliament. The Cardinal died in 1447. His Will is published in Nicholl's Collection of Royal Wills.

MR. SALMON'S PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION OF THE STATE TRIALS, IN FOUR VOLUMES FOLIO: PRINTED IN THE YEAR 1719.

SINCE 'tis observable that the best and bravest of mankind are far from being exempted from Criminal Prosecutions, and that potent malice, or prevailing faction, have too often attempted the most consummate merit; that Learning which shews how life, honour, and innocence are to be defended, when they shall happen to be injuriously attack'd, will not, 'tis presum'd, be thought inferior to that, which instructs us how to defend our less important rights.—And as the Common Law is nothing else but immemorial Custom, and the custom and methods of Trial, and bringing offenders to Punishment, is no inconsiderable branch of that law; and since these, as other Customs, are only to be collected from former Precedents, 'tis something strange, that amongst the numerous Authors of Reports and Institutes, not one has hitherto thought fit to make any considerable Collection of this kind, or thorowly to methodize or digest this sort of Learning: nor can any probable reason be assign'd for this neglect, unless they have been deterr'd by the vast trouble and expence it must have been to any private undertaker.—As to the Crown Law already extant, 'tis so far from being a compleat Direction, even in the most ordinary Trials, that it affords little more than some imperfect Hints of what the Authors intended. And as to the Doctrine of Impeachments, Trials of Peers by Commission, or in Parliament, Bills of Attainder, and the Customs and Usage of Parliaments, in relation to these Matters: this is a Learning that remains entirely untouch'd, and is only to be collected from Precedents of this nature.

The Undertakers of this Work therefore have spar'd no pains or expence to procure whatever is valuable of this kind: they have had recourse to every library public and private, where they had intimation there was any thing worth inserting; and they have for some time since offer'd large encouragement to those who should contribute either Manuscripts or printed Trials, towards rendering the Design compleat. And having at length finish'd their Collection, they have added a Table to the whole, wherein all the various Learning the Work contains is reduc'd under proper Heads. And that which before lay dispers'd in many Volumes, very difficult to be obtain'd, and several valuable Manuscripts that have been perfectly buried in private hands, are here brought to light; and so dispos'd, that the studious Reader may make himself master of the subject, with much less labour and expence than has hitherto been requisite.

And as to the Manuscripts, such care has been taken to avoid all mistakes, that the Judges and Counsel, who were concern'd in such Trials, and are still living, have been attended with their respective Arguments, and have been pleas'd so far to encourage the Undertaking, as to correct whatever was amiss.

Nor are the Publishers conscious they have omitted one remarkable Trial that could possibly be obtain'd, unless that of Mr. Hampden in the Case of Ship-Money, and that of my lord Strafford; both which being to be found in Mr. Rushworth, are already in the hands of most gentlemen, who are suppos'd to purchase these: and the inserting them could be of no other use than to increase the bulk, and enhance the price of the Book. There is indeed another Account of my lord Strafford's Trial, which differs in some instances from Mr. Rushworth's, and is more concise; and this it has been thought proper to insert.

And as the Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland is so near compleated, and there remains little else to distinguish us at present but the municipal laws of the respective kingdoms, it has been thought advisable to add some remarkable Scots Trials: in which (to do that nation right) are discovered great learning, eloquence, and strong reasoning. And indeed as the Civil Law prevails very much there, they have at least as large a field to exercise their parts and learning as our more Southern orators, who are so unalterably attach'd to their Common Law; and it must be admitted, that the Party accus'd has in Scotland all the fair play imaginable: he has what Counsel he thinks fit; he has a Copy of his Charge in his own language; his Counsel are permitted to inspect the very Depositions against him before he is brought to Trial; and they are so little in haste to dispatch a State-Prisoner, that the Trial often lasts some months. This specimen of Scots Trials, as it will at present be acceptable to the curious; so as we have one Senate, and one Legislature, it may hereafter give birth to the introducing such Methods of Trial in each kingdom, as in either shall appear to be founded on the greatest reason and justice.

As to any Partiality in this Undertaking, it seems almost needless to disclaim it; for the Reader has the Evidence and Arguments entire, without any alteration or diminution. It is true, as it falls out in History, so it will do here: the farther we search into Antiquity, and the higher we go, the less perfect will our Accounts be; the same exactness cannot be expected there as in Trials of a more modern date: but thus much may be said for the more antient Trials, that they are the most perfect and compleat that could possibly be procur'd.—We shall detain the Reader no longer than to observe, that this Collection will not only be useful to the Learned in the Law, and to those whose misfortune it may be to fall under a criminal Prosecution, but in many instances it corrects as well as illustrates our English History: and there is scarce a controverted point in Divinity or Politics, but the Reader will find has been fully debated here by the greatest men our nation has bred. And if Justness of Argument and true Eloquence have any attraction, and these are talents worth improving, here will be found the greatest collection of fine Speeches, and Arguments, on the most important subjects, that have hitherto been exhibited to the world.

TO THE

CASE OF SHIP-MONEY,

WHICH WAS PRINTED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME, BY WAY OF SUPPLEMENT TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE Collection of STATE TRIALS in four Volumes in Folio, being a Work very useful and necessary, to make it more complete, it was thought fitting (at the desire of several persons of eminency and distinction in the law) to add to it the remarkable Trial of Mr. Hampden, in the Great Case of Ship-Money (between his majesty king Charles I. and that gentleman). For that reason therefore we caused it to be printed of the same size, and on the same paper: tho' it would have been inserted in the Collection, could the Proprietors of this Copy have been prevailed upon to have parted with their property to the Undertakers, on their terms, which were very unreasonable. It is true, there are some of the Speeches in Rushworth, (a Book very scarce, and in few hands) but then their number is very small, and without the Records and other material Process herein contained, which are carefully printed from such authentic Manuscripts, that envy itself cannot detract from their intrinsic worth and value: and those who would vainly endeavour to impose on mankind, That this Trial is in Rushworth, not only discover their ignorance, but shew themselves guilty of most scandalous and invidious reflections.

We shall therefore say nothing of the excellency of this Work, which is so useful for all English gentlemen in general, as well as for those of the Long Robe in particular; those who will take the pains to peruse it, will be convinced of this truth. The Twelve Judges, before whom this Case was argued in the Exchequer-Chamber, and the Council on both sides unanimously agreed, that no Case like this ever was argued in any Court of Judicature; they all declared it to be a matter of the highest concern and importance, and there was such a multitude of Cases, Precedents, and Records (above three hundred) quoted on both sides, and so many excellent Arguments made, of the greatest Learning, that the whole would seem almost incredible, but to those who will read them with attention.

How this Great Case went is well known to every one who has the least acquaintance with History; the Times were then troublesome, and some people took hence occasion to blow up the coals of dissension, which at last broke out into that dreadful conflagration, as ended in the destruction of an Unfortunate Monarch, and compleated the ruin of the best Constitution in the world. All the Judges (long before this Case was argued in the Exchequer-Chamber) gave their opinions in writing under their hands for the King; but whether, in this Affair, those sages in the law acted like Faithful Counsellors, must be left to the learned in that profession to determine. Every man will think as he is inclined; however, most certainly, it is of the greatest concernment and importance, for a Prince to have about him Faithful Counsellors; for after all, let them be never so wise, good, and just, it is an undoubted truth, that Princes see with others eyes, and hear with others ears.

MR. EMLYN'S PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION OF THE STATE TRIALS, IN SIX VOLUMES FOLIO: PRINTED IN THE YEAR 1730.

THE favourable reception which the First Impression of this Work has met with from the Public, is a sufficient recommendation of it in general; but perhaps it may not be unacceptable to the Reader to point out some of the particular Uses and Advantages of it.

The usefulness of the work to the Study of the Law,

Collections are chiefly intended for the preservation of separate Pieces, which by being scattered up and down, are often in length of time either quite lost, or hard to be come at: this, indeed, is a care not worth bestowing on those which are of little or no use; but the Pieces here preserv'd are evidently such, as a Collection of them must appear at first sight very beneficial to all studious inquirers into the Laws of this nation, especially into that principal branch of them, which concerns the Life and Liberty of the Subject: for since the Laws of England are in a great measure grounded upon immemorial Customs and Usages, the Precedents and Examples of former times must be singularly useful, if not absolutely necessary to a right understanding of them.—And tho' Criminal Cases do very much depend upon Statute Law, either the Crimes themselves, or the Punishments of them, being for the most part declar'd by act of parliament: yet the Method of Practice in the Trials of those Crimes is in the main govern'd by Common Law rules, and consequently not to be known, but by the Usage in former cases: and even in those instances, which fall under the direction of the Statute Law, the best Expositor of those Statutes is the constant received Practice, ever since they were made, optima legum interpret consuetudo. (a)

History,

The Professors and Students of the Law will not be the only persons, who may receive benefit from this Work: here will be matter also of Instruction and Entertainment to all who are delighted with History, or inquisitive after the transactions of the former or present times; many parts of History will here be illustrated and set in a true light; the Reader may here see, as it were, with his own eyes, not needing to trust to the representations of others, which are often full of partiality or prejudice, according to the party and disposition of the Historians. But the nature of this Work admits not of such turns and disguises, as other general accounts are but too justly chargeable with; the following Trials being plain Narrations of Sayings and Facts, for the most part published by Authority of the respective Courts, or by indifferent Hands; where it happens to be otherwise, the Reader is informed of it in the Title at the Head of the Trial.

And Eloquence.

Such as are taken with fluency of Style, or luxuriancy of Fancy, may here be entertain'd with a variety of eloquent Speeches and learned Arguments on many very important subjects; tho' it must be own'd, intermixed with some others, which do not altogether deserve that character.

And since Scotland is now become a part of this Kingdom, it has been thought proper to insert some of the Proceedings in that country, in which (to do that Nation right) are discovered great learning and eloquence:

and it must be admitted, that very considerable advantages are there allowed to the Prisoner, which we in England do not enjoy; he has what Counsel he thinks fit, and a Copy of the Charge in his own language; his Counsel are permitted to inspect the Depositions against him before he is brought to his Trial; and they are so little in haste to dispatch a State-Prisoner, that the Trial often lasts some months.

Another Use of this Work, will be the doing justice to those Judges and Counsel, who respectively presided or practis'd at these Trials: the Names of such as behav'd impartially on the Bench, without prejudicing the rightful Prerogatives of the Crown on the one hand, or betraying the legal Privileges of the Subject on the other; without bearing hard upon the Innocent, or shewing any unallowable favour to the Guilty, will by this means be remember'd with honour, and left upon record to their lasting praise and commendation.

right charac-

But it has not always been the good fortune of England to have the Bench adorn'd with such excellent persons; the Reader will in the course of these Trials light upon certain periods, wherein the Judges, who ought by the duty of their place to be the great Barrier, and to act impartially between Prince and People, have notwithstanding deliver'd Opinions in direct contradiction to the known fundamental Laws of the nation, and as far as in them lay, sacrificed the Constitution and Liberties of the kingdom to the pride and ambition of an arbitrary monarch. This generally ended in the downfall of such Judges, and the Ministers, whose tools they were; the Politics of those times not being arrived at that height, to know how to influence the representative Body of the Nation: for what need could Ministers have to corrupt the Interpreters of the Law, if the Makers of it were intirely at their devotion?

Others there have been, (as the Reader will have too frequent occasion to remark) who regardless of Right and Wrong, and all the solemn Oaths they had sworn, have under colour of Law, but yet in open defiance of natural Justice, made no scruple to murder the Innocent, and by foul unwarrantable practices to acquit the Guilty, just as they received their directions from, or thought it would be best pleasing to those above them: to such a monstrous pitch of bare-faced iniquity were they arrived, that they stuck not to determine the same Point different ways at different times, making the Law a mere nose of wax, but usually turning it to the destruction of the person tried before them (b). These Volumes will impartially transmit their memory to posterity, with that reproach and infamy, so deservedly attendant upon Traitors and Murderers; and this not by general characters, which are scarce to be rely'd on, being oft according to the inclinations of the Writer, but by real Facts; their Behaviour will here appear just as it was, in its own true colours: by which the Reader, without the help of names, will easily distinguish the calm and sedate Judge, willing to hear and receive right Information, and desirous to determine according to Truth and Justice, from the hectoring bully, who, without any regard to the decency of his character, uses his authority to no other end, than to silence Reason and Truth, and by blustering and clamour to worry the Innocent to death.

The like Distinction will readily occur with respect to those, whose Office was at the Bar. Some he will find, pressing nothing illegal against the Prisoner, nothing hard and unreasonable (however in strictness legal) using no artifices to deprive him of his just Defence, treating his Witnesses with decency and candour; being not so intent upon convicting the Prisoner, as upon discovering Truth, and bringing real Offenders to Justice; looking upon themselves, according to that famous Saying of queen Elizabeth, not so much retained pro Domina Regina, as pro Domina Veritate (c).

And Counsel.

These will appear in a different light from others, who with rude and boisterous language abuse and revile the unfortunate Prisoner; who stick not to take all advantages of him, however hard and unjust, which either his ignorance, or the strict rigour of Law may give them; who by force or stratagem endeavour to disable him from making his Defence; who brow-beat his Witnesses as soon as they appear, tho' ever so willing to declare the whole truth; and do all they can to put them out of countenance, and confound them in delivering their Evidence: as if it were the duty of their place to convict all who are brought to Trial, right or wrong, guilty or not guilty; and as if they, above all others, had a peculiar dispensation from the obligations of Truth and Justice. Such methods as these should be below men of honour, not to say men of conscience: yet in the perusal of this Work, such persons will too often arise to view; and I could wish for the credit of the Law, that that great Oracle of it, the Lord Chief Justice Coke, (d) had given less reason to be numbered among this sort.

The Gentlemen of that Profession, whether employ'd in criminal Prosecutions or civil Actions, are not to blame for doing their best in sifting out the Truth, and making all just Observations in favour of their Clients; yet if after having done so, they should at last find the merits of the Cause to lie on the other side, I am sure it would be no disparagement to them to desist from attempting any thing to the prejudice of Truth and Justice: for how just and reasonable soever it may be to undertake the defence of a cause while nothing appears but that it may be right, yet when in the course of the Evidence it proves manifestly otherwise, it is then high time to desert it; for they must needs think, that no Fees or Retainers will be a just Excuse, either in this world or another, for being wilfully instrumental in promoting injustice and wrong: and tho' it be no part of their province to determine either the Law or the Fact, the former of which belongs to the Court, and the latter generally to the Jury; yet if either the one or the other be misled by the artful turns and insinuations of the Pleader, or any material truth suppress'd or misunderstood by his baffling of the Witnesses, the Guilt will and ought to lie at his door.

A further Advantage of this Collection is, that it will afford frequent opportunities to the careful Reader of observing the excellency of our Laws, and the advantage an Englishman thereby enjoys above his neighbours. When I meet with an Author extolling our laws above those of other countries, and representing us upon that, as well as other accounts, as the envy of all around us, I presume it is meant chiefly with regard to Criminal Procedures: for as to CIVIL SUITS, when I consider the tediousness and delays of such Suits, necessarily arising from our Methods and Forms of Law; the various Offices, and sometimes Courts, they must pass thro', before they are finally decided; the exorbitant Fees to Counsel, whereto the Costs recovered bear no proportion; the duties arising to the crown from many incidents in every cause; and above all the nicety of special Pleadings, whereby the justest cause in the world, after having with great trouble and expense been conducted almost to a period, may thro' the mistake of a letter (often occasioned by an Attorney's Clerk) be irreticvably lost, or at least turned round to begin again, and that not without payment of costs to him, who has all the while been the unjust invader and detainer of another's property: when these things, I say, are considered, it is hard to imagine, that any one can in good earnest believe, we have in this respect any great matter to boast of.

Nor can I suppose they are our ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS, which make us the envy of our neighbours: the petty but chargeable Suits, which are there often instituted to the no small damage of both sides, only to indulge the private passions of those who institute them; the constant practice of denouncing Excommunication for the minutest contempts (c), (a punishment originally designed only for such flagrant vices, as render'd a man unfit for Christian communion, which formerly was greatly dreaded, but is now by these means slighted and despised;) and the pecuniary commutations avowedly permitted for Penances (f), are things, which will not allow me to make any such supposal.

The excellency therefore of our Laws above others, I take chiefly to consist in that part of them, which regards CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS: here indeed it may with great truth and justice be said, That we have by far the better of our neighbours, and are deservedly their admiration and envy.

This might be made to appear in many particulars. In other Countries the Courts of Justice are held in secret; with us publicly (g) and in open view: there the Witnesses are examined in private, and in the Prisoner's absence; with us they are produced face to face, and deliver their Evidence in open court, the Prisoner himself being present, and at liberty to cross-examine them: there the Judges determine both Law and Fact; with us, if the Fact be denied by the Prisoner, it must be tried by twelve men of his own rank and condition, (h) who are sworn to go according to Truth and Evidence, and are therefore called a Jury; to any of these the Prisoner may except for just cause, and in capital Cases to a large number without cause: and unless this Jury declare him guilty of the Charge, the Judges can proceed no further against him. If the Prisoner be a peer of the land, his Trial on all Indictments for Treason, Felony, or Misprision of either, must be by other peers not fewer than twelve. In other countries, Racks and Instruments of Torture (i) are applied to force from the Prisoner a Confession, sometimes of more than is true; but this is a practice which Englishmen are happily unacquainted with, enjoying the benefit of that just and reasonable Maxim, Nemo tenetur accusare seipsum: in other countries the Criminals are often executed in private; with us always openly and in public, it being necessary to answer the end of Justice, that a public example be made of Offenders in order to deter others from the like crimes; but where the Trial and Execution are in private, it not only defeats the end of Justice, but affords an opportunity of secretly destroying innocent men, which must needs expose the subject to a variety of fears and dangers inconsistent with the liberties of a free people.—These are great and noble Privileges, which we may justly value ourselves upon, and should be very unworthy of, if we did not highly prize them.

Particularly in cases of High Treason.

In Cases of HIGH-TREASON the English subject has peculiar advantages : This is a Charge of a general nature, and therefore more difficult to make a Defence to (k) ; it subjects the offender to a severer punishment, than other crimes ; the crown is more nearly concerned, by reason whereof the Prisoner has a more powerful adversary to contend with : this is the fatal engine so often employed by corrupt and wicked ministers against the noblest and bravest patriots, whose laudable opposition to their pernicious schemes those ministers are very ready to construe into Treason and Rebellion against the Prince ; thereby confounding their own and the Prince's interest together, as if the one could not be opposed without the other. Our ancestors therefore thought this a case, wherein the Subject needed more than ordinary assistance ; lest therefore too great a latitude should be left to the arbitrary determinations of a Judge, who is the creature of the crown, they took care to particularize the several species of Treasons by an express law (l) : and to guard against all forced constructions and innuendos, it was by the same law farther provided, that all Treason should be proved by some manifest plain act or deed ; and that no innocent person might be in danger of suffering thro' the perjury of a single witness, it was afterwards provided (m), that none should be convicted without two positive Witnesses.

provisions for the Liberty of the Subject.

Nor does our Law excel others only in defending the Life of the subject against any injurious attacks, but also in its care and concern for the Liberty and Freedom of his person. How absolute sœver the sovereigns of other nations may be, the king of England cannot take up or detain the meanest subject at his mere will and pleasure (n) : it is one of the privileges confirmed by Magna Charta (o), that no man shall be restrained of his liberty, but by the law of the land ; that is, says lord Coke (p), by Indictment or Presentment of good and lawful men, or by the king's Writs out of his ordinary courts of justice (q), or by lawful Warrant. Now every lawful Warrant (r) must be grounded upon oath ; must plainly and specially express the cause of commitment (s) ; must be under the hand and seal of one, who is authorized to do it, expressing his office, place and authority (t), whereby he committeth, and must conclude, "until he be delivered by due course of law," and not "until further order," or with such like conclusions. Nor has the law only prescribed what shall be necessary to a legal Commitment, but it has also provided divers Remedies (u) in case any one should be illegally committed, or detained ; the party injured may have an Action or Indictment founded on Magna Charta, an Action of false Imprisonment, a Writ de homine replegiando, and a Writ de odio et atin (x).

But so precious is the Liberty of a man's person in the eye of the law, that none of these Remedies was thought sufficient, not giving so speedy (k) How great a latitude was taken in this matter may appear from the antient Law-Books, where the lying with the nurses of the king's children, or the killing a man sent on an errand by the king, were adjudged Treason. 1 Assiz. 22 Ed. 3. pl. 49. Briton. p. 43.

(l) 25 Edw. 3. Stat. 5. cap. 2. That this was the occasion of this Law appears from the Petition of the Commons on which it was founded, wherein they complain the Justices did adjudge several to be Traitors, for causes which they did not own to be Treason. This Petition is entered in the Parliament Rolls of that year. No. 171.

a relief as the urgency of the case requires; another Remedy is therefore provided, viz. the Writ of Habeas Corpus (y), which is called festinum remedium. By this Writ the gaoler is obliged immediately to bring the body of his prisoner before the Lord Chancellor, or one of the twelve Judges, and to certify by whom and for what cause he stands committed; whereupon the Lord Chancellor or Judge is requir'd (unless he be legally committed for an offence notailable by law) to discharge or bail him, except in case of Treason or Felony plainly and specially expressed in the Warrant (z); and even in those cases, that the innocent may not be worn and wasted with long imprisonment (a), the prisoner must be brought to his trial within a reasonable time; for if he be not indicted the next term or sessions after his commitment, having duly enter'd his Prayer, he shall on the last day of the term or sessions be admitted to bail, unless it appear to the Court upon oath, that the Witnesses for the king could not then be produced: and then, if he be not indicted and tried the second term or sessions after his commitment, he shall be quite discharged (b).

But because all these precautions in favour of liberty may be rendered useless by sending the Subject to remote or private prisons (c), whereby he may lose the benefit of the king's Commission of Gaol Delivery (d), and the king's writs be rendered ineffectual for want of knowing whom to direct them to (e); to prevent this inconvenience, the law has further provided, that no subject of England shall be sent prisoner into any part beyond the seas, either within or without the king's dominions (f); nor shall any be compelled against his will to serve the king out of the realm, lest under pretence of service, as ambassador or the like, he should be sent into real banishment (g): nor can any be regularly imprisoned within the realm in any other place than the common County Gaol or other publick accustomed gaol (h); for which reason a gaoler cannot be authorized by any warrant to deliver his prisoner into the custody of an unknown person (i): Nor can any new gaol, according to the opinion of lord Coke (k), be erected, but by act of parliament; one statute (l) ordains, that none shall be imprisoned by Justices of the Peace, (some say this extends to all other judges and justices, (m) but in the common County Gaol, saving to lords and others, who have gaols, their franchises.

Some will be ready to object, if these laws were in force, that a Subject shall not be compelled to serve the king out of the realm, how comes it to pass that divers subjects (not only mariners, but others) have been taken up by virtue of Press-Warrants (n), and by force put aboard a ship and carried beyond sea? If it be not lawful to commit to any but antient accustomed gaols, how comes it about that so many persons have been taken up by messengers (o), who have imprisoned them in their own houses, detaining them there not for two or three days only, (the time allowed by law to take their examinations) (p), but for weeks or months, thereby making gaols of their houses, though they have neither the grant of such a franchise, nor any act of parliament to make them so? These are questions to which I will not undertake to give a satisfactory answer; but shall leave that to others, who are more nearly concern'd and better able to do it: I can only say, that whatever may in fact have been practised, I do not know that such practices have ever had the sanction of one judicial determination, and for my part must confess myself unable to reconcile them to the laws of the land.

It must be owned that the guards and fences of the Law have not always proved an effectual security for the Subject; the Reader will in the course of these Trials find many instances, wherein they, who held the sword of justice, did not employ it as they ought, to the punishment of evil-doers, but to the oppression and destruction of men more righteous than themselves. Indeed, it is scarce possible to frame a Body of Laws, which a tyrannical prince, influenced by wicked counsellors and corrupt judges, may not be able to break through; they may sometimes check, but will never be able to stop the career of violent and furious men. The Law itself is a dead letter, Judges are the interpreters of it, and if they prove men of no conscience nor integrity, will give what sense they will to it, however different from the true one: and when they are supported by superior authority, will for a while prevail, till by repeated iniquities they grow intolerable, and throw the State into those convulsions, which may at last end in their own ruin. This shews how valuable a blessing an upright and learned judge is, and of what great concern it is to the public, that none be prefer'd to that office, but such whose ability and integrity may be safely depended on: Ignorantia iudicis est calamitas innocentiis (q).

Further provisions in cases of Treason.

However, amidst all the mischiefs caused by the arbitrary proceedings of these wicked and unjust Judges, there is one good effect has follow'd from them; it is to them we owe those additional provisions, which have been since made for the security of the Subject: Ex malis moribus bona oriuntur leges (r); Leges egregiæ apud bonos ex delictis aliorum gignuntur (s). In all cases of Treason, wherein the crown is more immediately interested, the party accused may now demand a Copy of the whole Indictment (t), five days at least, and of the names of the Jurors (u) two days at least before his trial; he has a right to the assistance of counsel (x), not only in matters of law, but in matters of fact; he may now have the benefit of the usual process (y) to compel the appearance of his Witnesses; who, when produced, are to be examined on oath (z), as well as those on the part of the crown (this last privilege has been since (a) extended to all treasons and felonies). Each species of treason must be prov'd by some overt-act (b), and there must be at least two witnesses to each species (c). If the accused be a peer, not only some pick'd out of the whole body, but all the peers must be summon'd to the Trial, at least twenty days before (d).

There are other Alterations (e) made in favour of the Subject, which the legislature has not thought fit should take place during the life of the present Pretender. After his decease no Attainder for Treason will work a disherison of the heir, or affect any other right, than only that of the offender during his life: the prisoner will then be entitled to have a List, not only of the Jury, but of the Witnesses to be produced against him at the Trial, with the addition of their respective professions and places of abode, delivered to him along with the copy of the Indictment, in the presence of two witnesses, ten days before his trial. The first of these Alterations being to mitigate the punishment of those, who shall by the law be adjudged guilty, might be thought an unseasonable relaxation, while there should be any apprehensions of immediate danger: but why the others should be defer'd so long, which are intended only as the proper guards of innocence against violent prosecutions, I will not pretend to guess; for the heinousness or mischief of the crime charged is so far from being a reason, why the prisoner should want assistances, that it is a very strong reason to the contrary: it being as easy a matter to impose a false charge of a great, as of a small crime.

These are some of the Privileges of a British Subject, which no other subject in the world can boast of. But after all it must not be said, that our Laws will admit of no Alterations for the better.

1. Even in that darling and deservedly esteem'd Privilege of being tried by JURIES, some change might, I was going to say, ought to be made: the law requires, that the twelve men, of which a Jury consists, shall all agree before they give in a Verdict; if they don't, they must undergo a greater punishment than the criminal himself; they are to be confin'd in one room without meat, drink, fire or candle, till they are starv'd. It would be pretty hard to assign any tolerable reason for this usage: if it has seldom or never happen'd, I'm afraid it has sometimes been prevented only by the unjust compliance of some of the Jurors against their own consciences. For however plain some cases may be, others there are, wherein they cannot avoid differing in their judgments; nor do they deserve any censure for so doing; many men, many minds; all can't see things in the same light. To what end therefore are they to be restrained in this manner? It may indeed force them to an outward seeming agreement against the dictates of their consciences; but can never be a means of informing their judgment, or convincing their understanding. I have known, when a Juror being afterwards asked, how he could join in such an unjust Verdict, could give no better reason for it, than that the others were of that opinion; which, I fear, is the best reason a great many are able to give.— If it be said, that otherwise one stubborn fellow may stand it out against all the rest, even contrary to the convictions of his own mind, it is very true he may do so; and if his body be as stubborn as his mind, starve them out too. But why then is his voice regarded? Why can't the others give a sufficient Verdict without him? Or, if a man must not be convicted without the agreement of all, why then is not the Prisoner acquitted, when they can't all agree? But why must the Jurors be compelled to an agreement one way or other? After all, a forced agreement (as all agreements procured by restraint are) is no better than none. If the consent of him, who stands it out against the rest, be of any regard, it ought to be free; if of none, then why can't a Verdict be given without it? If twelve must agree, the better way would be to have twenty-three on a Jury, and the Verdict be given by the majority; for sure 'tis an odd way of deciding a cause, that it should be left to the determination of him, who can fast the longest. But suppose it should be thought requisite, that two-thirds should be of a mind, and if so many could agree to find the Prisoner guilty, he should be convicted; and if they did not, he should be acquitted: would not this be a sufficient security for innocence? Sure it would be much better to make a provision in case of non-agreement, than by forcible methods to extort the appearance of one; for it is the same thing to the prisoner, whether he be convicted without the concurrence of all, or by a concurrence which is not sincere but forced.

2. Another thing not to be counted among the Excellencies of our Law is, the Indictments and other Proceedings being in the Latin tongue. Every body knows, that not one prisoner in a great many understands that language; and tho' the Indictment is generally explained to him in the vulgar tongue, yet it is to the original he must take his Exceptions, and upon that the arguments must be founded. In the days of Oliver Cromwell all Proceedings were in the vulgar tongue;

*Observations

ceedings being

and tho' it has not been thought proper to continue a practice introduced by an Usurper, yet if the thing be really fit and right, it matters not, who introduced it: fus est et ab hoste doceri. The same might be said with respect to the Writing it in a peculiar hand, not generally understood. It is a maxim in Law, Ignorantia juris non excusat (e); ignorance of the Law is no good plea; it is indeed necessary that it should not, for if it were, the laws would always be evaded by a pretended ignorance; but then it must be very unreasonable to use any methods, which tend to conceal that law, and keep the people in ignorance of it: Misera servitus est, ubi jus est vagum aut incognitum (f). The inconvenience of this will appear more plainly, if we consider that every Indictment must be assented to by a Grand-Jury; and another Jury must afterwards declare whether the Charge therein contained be true or not. Now how can it be expected they should declare their consent to what they cannot understand? So that I verily believe, the greater part may very safely return Ignoramus to every Bill that comes before them.

On the form of Indictments.

3. Here it may not be amiss to take notice of one thing relating to the Form of our Indictments. It is very common to insert words, which are never intended to be proved: as for instance, the Words vi et armis (g) in Indictments for writing or publishing Libels, and in many other cases, where there is no pretence or colour of truth in them; e. g. Juratores presentant, quod J. S. VI ET ARMIS falso et malitiose scripsit quendam libellum (h); which not only is an absurdity in the nature of the thing, but tends to insnare the consciences of Jurymen; who in giving a general Verdict against the Defendant, do not always consider whether that part of the Indictment be proved. When a Jurymen gives a general Verdict against the Defendant, he does in effect declare upon oath, that he believes the entire charge as laid in the Indictment, to be true; how therefore can he find a man guilty generally, when there is one part of the charge, which he either believes to be false, or at least has no reason to believe to be true? It is said that these are words of course; if they be, yet still they have a natural and proper meaning (else why are they inserted?); and if they are not true, I don't see how any one can upon oath honestly declare they are, unless it can be thought an excuse for giving a rash (not to say a false) Verdict, that it is a thing of course. The words of course are generally the most material words in an Indictment; proditorie (i) is a word of course in an Indictment for Treason, burglariter (k) in Burglary, and felonice (l) in Felony; but if any of those words be omitted in their respective cases, the Indictment will be naught.

In blasphemous

It is greatly to be feared, that Jurymen do sometimes overlook the most essential Words of an Indictment, under the notion of their being words of course. Thus in the case of a blasphemous Libel, it is customary to insert the words falso et malitiose scripsit, &c. and indeed they are the very gist of the Indictment, and absolutely necessary to constitute the offence: for as no words can be Blasphemy (i. e. a reproachful reflection upon God or Religion) which are true, for Truth can be no reflection on the God of Truth; so no opinions, however erroneous, can merit that denomination, unless uttered with a wicked malicious design of reviling God or Religion (m). And yet how often have persons been found guilty upon these Indictments, without any proof either of the falshood of the positions, or of the malice of him who wrote them? Nay sometimes, when there is a great deal of reason to think they were published from no other principle, but a sincere love and regard for Truth? These are things not always sufficiently attended to by Juries; it often satisfies them, if the Defendant be proved to have done the fact (i. e. wrote the Book) whether with the circumstances falso et malitiosè, as charged in the Indictment, or not; and yet when the Defendant comes to move in Arrest of Judgment, that what he has done cannot amount to Blasphemy, because it was not done with an evil intent; he is then told, that that is found by the Verdict, and must be taken to be true; and so indeed it must: but then this should be a caution to Juries, how they find a man guilty of an Indictment generally without due proof of every part of it; since every thing, which was proper for their consideration, will after verdict be supposed to have been considered by them, whether in reality it was so or not.

(g) These words are not necessary in these cases. See 37 H. 8. c. 8. it is therefore the more inexcusable to insert them, when they are not true.

Thus in the Case of defamatory Libels, or of Scandalum Magnatum, when the word falso is inserted, the Defendant ought not to be found guilty, if the assertion be true. Whether it be necessary to insert the word falso, is another question, (tho' I believe it would be difficult to maintain an Indictment without it;) yet certainly where the Indictment charges a man with falsly writing a Libel, he cannot justly be found guilty of that Indictment so laid, if the words be true. and defamatory Libels.

4. Hitherto the Law allows not a copy of the Indictment, nor of the names of the Jurors, nor the assistance of Counsel (n) as to matter of fact on any Indictments for FELONY, yet it is the opinion of many it would be never the worse if it did; for it seems very strange to allow a man these assistances in defence of his property, and deny them to him, when his life lies at stake. Perhaps it will be said, that the prisoner would by these means be enabled to make captious Exceptions to the proceedings, whereby public justice might be either protracted or evaded; but this objection would be removed, if the law did not allow of such exceptions; for either they relate to the merits of the cause, or they do not; if they do, they are not captious, but he ought to have the benefit of them; if they do not, there will be no wrong done in disallowing them. On Trials for Felony.

But still there is one reason why, as the law now stands, the Prisoner ought not to be wholly deprived of the means of making even these captious Exceptions; and that is, because otherwise he may be brought into jeopardy of his life divers times for one and the same offence, a thing very unreasonable in itself, and contrary to the Maxims of Common Law (o); for if he be found Not Guilty on a faulty Indictment, his Acquittal shall avail him nothing, but he may still be indicted again for the same fact. This is founded on a supposition (p), that his life was in no danger on the first Indictment, because of the Exceptions which might be taken to it; and yet it is apparent, that the generality of prisoners, unless they may be informed by counsel of such Exceptions, and advised how to make them, are like to be but little the better for them.

Le Peine fort et dure.

5. There is one thing in our Laws which is very singular, and comes the nearest of any thing to the Tortures used in other countries, viz. le Peine fort et dure, or, pressing to death: 'Tis true, this is not used to force the Prisoner to confess, but to plead one way or other; but yet even this seems a needless piece of severity. In High-Treason, if the party refuse to plead, the Charge is taken pro confesso; nor would it be any inconvenience if it were so in other cases, or rather if it amounted to a plea of Not Guilty, and the court thereupon proceeded to hear the Proofs of the Fact; for it is as unreasonable to press a man to death without a trial, as it would be to hang him without one: nor can a plea extorted by such methods give any credit to the proceeding of the Court more than if they had proceeded without one, which yet would be no injustice to the prisoner, who will not plead, when he may: nor, on the other hand, is it reasonable, that the hardness of a Criminal, if he should be able to endure such a lingering death, should exempt him from the forfeitures the law has thought his crime to deserve: if this advantage were taken away, the only temptation of standing mute would be taken away too.

On the punishments of Crimes,

6. It has been esteemed an advantage of our Law, that it does not inflict various and cruel Deaths; that which is inflicted for Treason is the only one, which has any appearance of severity; and even there in the execution it is generally the same with other capital cases: but yet it must be also observed, that our laws are very liberal of the lives of offenders (r), making no distinction between the most atrocious and heinous Felonies, and those of a less degree. If a man commit a single Robbery, hanging is the punishment inflicted by law; if he commit Robbery and Murder with never so many cruel circumstances, the punishment is still the same, and no more: so little regard is had in proportioning the punishment to the offence, that the letter of the law makes no difference between picking a man's pocket (s) and cutting his throat; between stealing his horse (t), and firing his house about his ears. How far this is either just or prudent, is left to every one's own reason to determine; it is certainly a strong temptation to an highwayman to add murder to robbery, when by that means he runs less danger of a discovery, and no danger of a severer punishment.

Theft,

The Law of God to the Israelites required, that a person convicted of Theft should restore two-fold (u), and in some cases four or five-fold (x); (thus it was also by the Civil Law (y)) and in cases where personal violence was offered, the Punishment was retaliation; "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, and stripe for stripe (z):" and tho' this law may not in strictness be binding on other nations, yet undoubtedly where the reason holds the same, it is the best pattern for our imitation (a).

Murder,

Murder is indeed a crime, which even by the Law of Retaliation calls for a capital punishment; it is so peremptorily enjoined by the law given to Noah, (and therefore binding on all his posterity) "Whosoever sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (b), that some have questioned (a), whether any prince or power on earth can lawfully dispense with it in any case of a plain notorious Murder (d): most certainly they ought not without some very important and peculiar reasons, and not merely for favour or interest. The Law of God forbids, "that any satisfaction shall be taken for the life of a Murderer, but he shall surely be put to death (e)."

As to other less Offenders, it would be a more equitable and effectual Punishment to confine them to hard (f) labour at home; or, if they deserve it, to sell them to the Moors or Spaniards abroad: it is Idleness which is the source of their guilt, and generally draws them into the commission of their crimes, and therefore nothing more proper to reclaim and deter them, than hard work and labour: however, they have by their guilt incurred a forfeiture of their natural liberty, so that no wrong will be done them in disposing of them in that manner. I am sure it is a much more lawful method of making slaves than the practice of kidnapping and stealing innocent men from off the African shore, and forcibly carrying them away from all their friends and relations into a miserable Slavery in America, without any better title, than what arises from the difference of complexions.

However, not to enter into a discussion of the lawfulness or justice of taking away Life for every kind of offence, a consideration which the learned Spelman observes has not had its due weight in later ages (g), yet methinks so long experience might have taught us how ineffectual it is to answer the purposes for which it is designed. Death is ultimum supplicium, and is therefore intended, only for crimes of the highest rank; but when it is indiscriminately inflicted, it leaves no room to difference the punishments of crimes widely different in their own nature. The lower part of mankind are apt in dubious cases to judge of the heinousness of the Offence by the severity of the Punishments; but yet, when they see the same punishment annexed, where the difference of Guilt is manifest and apparent, they soon lose the sense of that extraordinary guilt, and instead of conceiving worse of the crime, they only blame the cruelty of the law. Further, when such numbers are continually ordered for Execution, (as must be the case where Death is made the common punishment for ordinary crimes) the frequency of the example destroys the terror of it, and makes it less dreaded than going to the Gallies or any place of hard labour. Besides, when the punishments are so very disproportionate to the offence, it defeats the end of them, forasmuch as those, who have any tenderness or humanity in their temper, will much rather forbear wholly to prosecute, than be made the Instruments of putting such severe laws in execution; instead therefore of being a means of bringing the Offenders to punishment, it is oftentimes the very reason, why they escape with impunity.

This severity of our Law in inflicting capital punishments upon the lighter crimes of Pilfering and Thieving seems the more extraordinary, when one considers the great indulgence shewn to one of the first magnitude, and which is productive of much more mischievous consequences; I mean Adultery, which it is holden (h), does not by our law and Adultery; admit of any prosecution in a criminal way; yet whether we consider the guilt of the offender, or the mischief done to the injured party, there is no comparison between the one and the other. What proportion is there between a private Theft, perhaps of some trifle, which may soon be repaired, and the invasion of our neighbour's bed, (i) irreparably robbing him of all the satisfaction and comfort of his family, confounding relations, and imposing upon him the charge of maintaining a spurious issue as his own? The one is often done only to allay the violence of a pressing hunger, but the other always to gratify an irregular and ungovern'd lust. Nor can it with reason be pretended, that the one is a crime of a public, the other of a private nature: if the public be concerned in the preservation of the Property of Goods, it cannot be less so in the preservation of the more valuable Rights, which affect the peace and quiet of families. Is private stealing an offence against the community? The other is much more so, having a greater tendency to promote frays, and quarrels, public disturbances and breaches of the peace, from whence bloodshed and murders often ensue (k).—What may be the reason why our laws make so light of this enormous Crime, whether it be the countenance it receives from great examples and the commonness of the fault, or some other reason, I will not take upon me to say; but most certain it is, that the laws of other nations (l) had a different sense of it, and treated it in a severer manner: by the Mosaic law it was always punished with Death (m); and long before that law it was esteemed “an Iniquity to be punished by the Judges (n).”—By an old law of Romulus (o) the Adulteress was to be put to death; Adulteri convictam vir & cognati, uti volent, necant: and tho' afterwards the Civil Law, Lex Julia de Adulteriis, punish'd it only [per relegationem (p)] with banishment, or [per deportationem (q)] with transportation into some remote island; yet the father of the adulteress was permitted to kill both his daughter and the adulterer (r), and in some instances the husband had the same power (s); and if he chanced to use that power in a case not allow'd, even then he was not to be punished with severity, but only to undergo a milder sort of punishment (t): but at length when the empire became Christian, under the reign of Constantine, Adultery was made capital, Sacrilegus nuptiarum gladio puniri oportet (u), and so it continued to Justinian's (x) time and long after. Some are of opinion that it was so even while the empire was Heathen, under the reign of Diocletian and Maximian, it being enumerated in one of their laws (y) among the capital Crimes.

As to smaller Crimes and Misdemeanors, they are differenced with such a variety of extenuating or aggravating circumstances, that the law has not, nor indeed could affix to each a certain and determinate Penalty, this is left to the discretion and prudence of the Judge, who may punish it either with Fine or Imprisonment (z), Pillory or Whipping, as he shall think the nature of the crime deserves: but though he be intrusted with so great power, yet he is not at liberty to do, as he lists, and inflict what arbitrary punishments he pleases; due regard is to be had to the quality and degree, to the estate and circumstances of the offender, and to the greatness or smallness of the offence; that Fine, which would be a mere trifle to one man, may be the utter ruin and undoing of another; and those marks of ignominy and disgrace, which would be shocking and grievous to a person of a liberal education, would be slighted and despised by one of the vulgar sort (a). A Judge therefore who uses this discretionary power to gratify a private revenge, or the rage of a party, by inflicting indefinite and perpetual Imprisonment, excessive and exorbitant Fines, unusual and cruel Punishments, is equally guilty of perverting justice and acting against law, as he, who in a case, where the law has ascertained the penalty, wilfully and knowingly varies from it. If no measures were to be observed in these discretionary Punishments, a man who is guilty of a Misdemeanor might be in a worse condition than if he had committed a capital crime; he might be exposed to an indefinite and perpetual Imprisonment, a punishment not at all favoured by law, as being worse than death itself (b): nor does an extravagant Fine, which is beyond the power of the offender ever to pay or raise, differ much from it; for if his Imprisonment depend upon a condition, which will never be in his power to perform, it is the same as if it were absolute and unconditional; if the offender be not able to pay such a Fine as his offence deserves, he must then submit to a corporal punishment in lieu of it, according to the old Rule, Qui non habet in crumena, luat in cute (c). It is true, that Clause of Magna Charta (d) which requires the saving every man's contentment, (viz. his means of livelihood) extends only to Amerciaments, which are ascertained by a Jury, and not to Fines, which are imposed by the Court; but nevertheless those Fines ought to be moderate and within bounds; where a court has a power of setting Fines, that must be understood of setting reasonable Fines (e): "an excessive Fine," says lord Coke, (f). "is against law," (g), and so it is declared to be by the Act (h) "for declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject," &c. The same Statute declares the Illegality of unusual and cruel Punishments.

lution of the Star Chamber (i) ; a Court, which lord Coke (k) calls the most honourable in the Christian world, consisting of the chief officers of the kingdom, but as he observes (l) was of such a nature as most of all needed to be kept within its proper bounds ; it might indeed have served to very good purposes, if rightly managed, being chiefly intended for the correction of scandalous Indecencies and Immoralities, which did not fall under the cognizance of ordinary jurisdictions (m) : but when once its authority was abused to wreak the malice of particular persons, and prostituted to the base ends of a Court-Faction ; when no limits were observed in the exercise of its Jurisdiction, nor humanity in its Sentences ; when the Judges thereof, however dignified by their posts, became a disgrace to human nature by their barbarous and cruel butchering, punishing pretended Libels not only with perpetual Imprisonments, but with brandings in the face and mutilation of members ; when the case was thus (as it appears to have been from some instances (n) in this Collection), it was then high time to tear it up by the roots, as a Grievance no longer to be borne with. A Judge therefore ought to be strictly careful that he conform to the rules of law not only as to the nature of the Punishment, but likewise as to the degrees thereof.

It is indeed no easy matter to settle the precise limits, how far a Court of Justice may go ; every case must depend upon its own particular circumstances. But some Fines and some Punishments are so monstrously extravagant, that no body can doubt their being so ; such were the Fines of sir Samuel Barnardiston and Mr. Hampden, such were the repeated Pilloryings and barbarous Whippings of Oates, Dangerfield, and Johnson.

Whipping,

These Punishments may no doubt be properly inflicted, where they are in a moderate degree and proportioned to the offence ; only it were to be wished, that some better care were taken in the execution of them. How unreasonable is it that a Criminal sentenced to be whipt should lie at the mercy of a vile executioner, and that it should be left in the power of a common hangman to make that Whipping as severe or as favourable as he pleases ? In this respect it must be owned we are excelled by foreign countries, where the magistrate, who is the best judge of the Offender's guilt, is present at the execution of the Sentence, and gives the proper directions about it.

and Pillory ;

As to the Pillory, that is intended only to expose the Offender to shame and infamy, and to mark him out to the public, as a person not fit to be trusted, but to be shunned and avoided by all creditable and honest men : never did the law design that he should be exposed to the peltings of a mob, or the assaults and injuries of a furious rabble, whereby the prisoner is so disguised as to defeat one main design of setting him there, which was, that he might be publicly known and observed. It is indeed a surprizing neglect, that no effectual care has hitherto been taken to suppress these practices, especially considering the fatal consequences which have sometimes ensued from them, even to the loss of the poor man's life. It is not sufficient that whoever injures him in this manner may be punished for so doing ; for how is it possible that a man in his condition should observe who it is that does him the injury, or secure him if he did ? He is at that time in the hands of justice, and justice ought to protect him : when a man is at liberty, he is in many cases able to defend himself ; but when he is in the custody of the law, and is thereby disabled from being his own defender, the law ought to be his security and defence against any injurious treatment. It cannot be pretended that this is altogether impracticable; experience shows us, how effectually it may be done, when the officers find an advantage by it; nor would there be any harm in it, if the officers were obliged by proper penalties to take the same care without money, which they are so well able to do with it.

7. Another thing in which our Law seems defective is the want of some further guard against the Packing of JURIGS, and the Oppressions and Extortions of GAOLERS; but these are now under the consideration of the legislature, who, it is hoped, will apply proper Remedies to these growing evils (o). As to the latter of these, I fear no Remedy will be effectual while they are suffer'd to buy and sell their places; for while that is permitted, they will be under stronger temptations than men of their character and function usually resist, to exact more than is their due; the thing itself has an appearance of hardship, to force a man into gaol against his will, and yet oblige him to pay for his admission into it: if he be guilty, the punishment of the law should be deem'd sufficient; but if innocent, the hardship is still the greater, especially where it falls upon the indigent and necessitous. It is chiefly owing to this that our Gaols swarm with multitudes of miserable objects, who lie there year after year without any hope of redemption; so that when they have suffer'd the penalty of the law, they have a severer punishment still to undergo for the non-payment of Fees (p), a debt which is forc'd upon them against their consent, and is often out of their power ever to discharge, whereby the poor wretches are in effect condemned to perpetual imprisonment; a thing very odious in the eye of the law, even for great and heinous crimes. How much better would it be for the public to allow the Gaoler a reasonable salary, instead of these perquisites, which arise from the miseries of the unfortunate, who are thereby often necessitated to take dishonest and unlawful methods to enable themselves to pay them? By the common Law (q), to avoid all extortion and grievance of the subject, no sheriff, coroner, gaoler or other of the king's ministers ought to take any fee or reward for any matter touching their offices, but of the king only. This extended to all whose offices did any ways concern the administration or execution of justice, or the common good of the subject, or the king's service (r).—Fortescue (s) relates it as part of the Sheriff's Oath upon entering into his office, "That he shall receive or take nothing of any other man than the king by colour or means of his office." Divers acts of parliament (t) have been made in affirmance of this, which Lord Coke (u) calls "a fundamental Maxim of the Common Law;" he adds further, "that while Officers could take no Fee at all for doing their office, but of the king, then had they no colour to exact any thing of the subject, who knew that they ought to take nothing of them; but after this rule of the Common Law was alter'd by some acts of parliament, which gave to the said ministers of the king Fees in some particular cases to be taken of the subject, it is not credible what Extortions and Oppressions have thereupon ensued; whereas before without any taking at all their office was done, now no office at all was done without taking, the Officers being fetter'd with golden Fees, as fetters to the suppression or subversion of Justice" (x).

On Gaolers,

and their Fees.

(o) Both these Grievances have been since remedied in some measure, the former by the 3 Geo. 2. cap. 25. and the latter by 2 Geo. 2. cap. 22. (p) Mirror of Justices, c. 5. § 1. n. 53. says, It is an Abuse that Prisoners, or any for them, should pay any thing for their entrance into or coming out of Gaol.

The true Design of Gaol-deliveries;

While Prisoners are thus long detained, the true design of Gaol-Deliveries can never be answer'd: This is a Commission, says lord Coke (y), instituted by the law of the land, ne homines diu detineantur in prisona, but that they might receive plenam et celerem justitiam: he adds, that Gaols ought to be delivered thrice a year, or oftner, if need be. Of so much consequence does the law esteem it to be, that the Abbot of St. Albans (z) who had a grant of a Gaol and Gaol-delivery, was adjudged to have forfeited his franchise for an unreasonable delay in making Delivery of his Gaol. But what are the Prisoners benefited by Gaol-deliveries, if after the law has done with them, they may still be detained for Fees, which they will never be able to pay?—Another design of Gaol-deliveries was by clearing the Prisons to make room for new comers; but the Discharge of the old Prisoners being by these means prevented, the continual addition of new ones renders the croud so great, that the place becomes too strait for its inhabitants: this, together with the filth and nastiness occasion'd by their miserable poverty and want of conveniences, is the cause of those contagious distempers which are wont so violently to rage in many of our prisons, not confining themselves within the prison-walls, but sometimes spreading their infection in the very court where the prisoners are brought to Trial, to the no small hazard of judges, juries, counsel, and all who attend there. A dreadful instance of this is recorded in History (a) to have happen'd in the twentieth year of queen Elizabeth at Oxford assizes, when the Prisoners brought such a stench with them into court, that the Lord Chief Baron Bell, the Sheriff, several Counsel, almost all the jurors, and near three hundred others, died within the space of forty hours after it. I could wish our own times had not furnished us with a fresher instance of this kind.

The ill consequences of the common Management of Gaols.

A further Mischief arising from this long Detention of Prisoners is, that it defeats the principal end of all law and justice. All Punishments below capital are intended to reform the criminal, and deter him from offending again: but as our Gaols are commonly managed, it is to be fear'd, they breed up and harden more rogues, than the law either reclaims or removes. The prisoners are indulged so great a liberty in rioting and debauchery, which the keepers, who have the advantage arising from the sale of the liquors, find their account in promoting; the young novices are permitted to contract so intimate an acquaintance and familiarity with the old offenders, that our Gaols are rather the schools and nurseries of all manner of roguery and wickedness; than proper places for correction and amendment. It is generally observed, that they who enter in raw and unexperienc'd offenders, with some sense of shame and modesty, soon grow to be impudent and harden'd villains, entering themselves members of a gang, wherein they are not only instructed in the theory, but experienc'd in the practice of their wicked arts. This may seem strange to some, who think they are restrained, (at least while they are prisoners) from doing mischief without doors; yet it is not without reason apprehended by others, that they sometimes find means to make excursions, which is hard to be accounted for without the connivance or permission of their keepers, who no doubt take care to be no losers by it: and though this may be a favour not usually shown to any but inferior rogues, who are detained for smaller crimes; yet I could mention an instance (attested by a person of undoubted credit) of one who was committed to Newgate for breaking open an house in the night-time, and while he was in suppos'd custody for that offence, was apprehended committing a fact of the like kind in a remote part of the town.

(y) 4 Instit. p. 168. (z) 2 Co. Instit. 43. (a) See Baker's Chronicle, p. 353.

Another matter of complaint is, that intolerable and inhuman practice of many Gaolers, who to extort from their unhappy guests such sums as they shall think fit to exact, thrust them as soon as they arrive within their dominions, into stinking dungeons, loading them with Fetters and Irons till they can bring them to a compliance with their unjust demands (b): the pretence indeed is, that they are answerable for their prisoners, and therefore ought to be allowed the use of proper means to secure them. That this is nothing but pretence is sufficiently plain, money being generally able to procure a release from these shackles, which do then become no longer necessary for the safeguard of the Prisoner, having already answered their real design. Though Gaolers are indeed answerable for their Prisoners, yet neither the law of England nor common humanity esteems such means as proper in ordinary cases; Severos quidem facit justitia, inhumanos non facit (c): they may make their Prisons as strong as they can, may set what guards and keepers they will to watch them, but must use no force or violence to their persons, no tortures or pains, while the Prisoners quietly submit themselves to the process of the law; Carcer ad continendos homines, non ad puniendos haberi debet (d). Prisons are designed only for the custody of the Prisoners, not for their punishment, unless when it becomes part of the Sentence; and even then it is no otherwise intended as a punishment, than by way of confinement to the prison, not as a justification of any ill usage in it. Custodes gaolarum penam sibi commissis non augeant, nec eos torquant, vel redimant, sed omni severitâ remotâ pietateque adhibita judicâ debite exequantur (e). If a prisoner is boisterous and unruly, or makes any attempt to escape, or perhaps if he only threatens to do so; in such case it may be allowable to use a stricter discipline. Lord Chief Justice Coke says (f), "That Shackles about the feet ought not to be, but for fear of escape." If these words have any meaning, they must import, that unless a prisoner has given just cause to apprehend an Escape, he ought not to be fettered: otherwise it may be pretended of all prisoners, let them behave never so peaceably and civilly, who will by these means lie at the mercy of gaolers, whose very mercies often are cruelties (g). The same Author says in another place (h), "Where the law requireth, that the Prisoner should be kept in salva et arcta custodia, yet that must be without pain or torment to the Prisoner," which Chains and Fetters undoubtedly are. And again in his Comment (i) on the Statute of Westm. 2. cap. 11. by which Statute the Gaoler is permitted in a particular case there mentioned to lay his prisoner in irons, he makes this observation, "That by the Common law it might not be done." There is one great absurdity in this practice, that by these means the prisoner often suffers more before he is tried, than the law inflicts on him when he is found guilty; but yet I know not how it comes to pass, it is too generally and too notoriously practised to be either conceal'd or deny'd. This method of proceeding is resembled by lord Coke (k) to that of Rhadamanthus the Judge of Hell, who first punisheth and then heareth; like as the chief Captain did by St. Paul (l), first ordering him to be bound with chains, and then demanding of him who he was, and what he had done.

Voluminous-ness of the Laws.*

8. There is one thing more which ought not to be wholly passed over, and that is, the Multiplicity and Voluminousness of our Laws: If what lies scattered in so many various (some obsolete) Acts, were (so much of them as should be judged fit to be continued) collected under their several Heads into so many distinct acts, the law would be much more plain and easy; whereas now, considering the variety of subjects, which are often thrown together into one act, and the various acts relating to one and the same subject, it is no easy matter to find out the whole relating to one particular head; and when it is found, many difficulties arise from the clashings and inconsistencies of the several acts, the old ones not being always sufficiently consulted when the new ones are made; so that it is to be wished we may never feel the inconvenience which Tacitus (m) complains of in his time, Antehac flagitiis laborabatur, nunc legibus.

I thought these short Observations upon the Laws of England, so far as they relate to public Crimes and the incidents thereto, would not be altogether unsuitable to a Work, consisting chiefly of the Histories of Criminal Prosecutions.

The Conclusion naturally resulting from the whole is, That as our Laws have many Excellencies and Advantages which we have just reason to value them for, so they have also their defects and blemishes: such a blind veneration for them, as will not allow this, does not only suppose a perfection which all human contrivances are incapable of, but is the greatest obstruction to all attempts for an amendment: that some things need to be mended, no experienc'd lawyer can deny; and that they should be so, every honest one will heartily desire.

Whether the Particulars here mentioned be of that number, is submitted to the judgment of all true lovers of their country, who it is hoped will be so far from being offended hereat, that they will use their utmost endeavours to promote the amendment of whatever shall appear to need it. I pretend not to have taken notice of every particular in our Crown Law which may deserve it; my design was only to give a few hints, wherein I might evince the necessity of a reformation; and if I can be any way instrumental in bringing it about by stirring up others of more capacity and influence to undertake the task, I shall answer my end.

*An Account
tion.*

The reader will by this time expect some Account of the Improvements and Alterations in this Second Edition. When the first Edition was preparing for the press, the Undertakers were at great pains and expence, and offered large encouragements to procure whatever was proper and suitable to their design; but as they were sensible there must needs be many defects and omissions in the first attempt of a Work of this nature, so they have continued their pains to supply those defects, and have offered the same encouragements to any who should furnish them with such material Trials as were then omitted. How they have succeeded in their endeavours may be seen from the large number of Additional Trials: These, together with the Additions interspersed thro' the other Trials, have swell'd the Work to five Volumes; to which there is added a Sixth, containing the most remarkable Trials from the reign of queen Anne, where the first edition ended, to the end of the reign of king George 1. The larger Trial of the earl of Strafford is here purposely omitted, as being an entire Volume in Rushworth's Collections, which is to be had by itself.

To make this Collection more generally acceptable, the Reader is informed at the end of each Trial, where the Prisoner was convicted of a capital crime, whether he was executed or not; and (where it could be had) an Account also is added of his Behaviour and Speech at the place of Execution.

And whereas in the former Edition some Trials were inserted out of the order of time, and parts of others transpos'd, they are here reduced to their proper places; the names of the Judges, Attorney-General, &c. are here generally, if not always, inserted; several Notes are added to explain and illustrate the text, and divers References made to the Books of Reports and Historians of the times: and for the ease and conveniency of referring, each Trial is distinctly number'd; the several Titles are render'd uniform, containing the Date when, the crime for which, and the court before whom the Prisoner was try'd; all which are continued where there was room for them throughout the running title; the omission whereof in some places 'tis hoped the candid reader will excuse, since in a work of this nature, where such a variety of printers are employ'd, it can scarce be expected that all parts of it should be performed with equal care and exactness.—To render this Work the more useful, especially to the Gentlemen of the Law, there is subjoin'd by way of Appendix a Collection of Records relating to the said Trials. The undertakers wish they could say they had had the same success in this part of the work as in the other; but hope the fault will not be imputed to them, who have inserted all they could procure, and done their endeavours to procure the rest.—That the whole might be the better fitted for use, there are added two Alphabetical Tables; the one containing the Names of the Persons tried or proceeded against, together with the Times and Places of their Trial, and also their Crimes and Punishments; the other of the several Matters contained in all the Six Volumes.

P R E F A C E

TO THE SEVENTH AND EIGHTH VOLUMES OF THE STATE TRIALS: PRINTED IN THE YEAR 1735:

AFTER the publication of a Collection of State-Trials, which consists of Six Volumes in folio; the Reader may possibly be surprised at the appearance of two Volumes more of Collections on the same subject. For this reason it may be proper to premise some particulars prefatory to the Work, concerning the inducements there were to it, and the method wherein it has been pursued. And here we would by no means be understood to lay an imputation on the gentleman who prepared the last Edition of that Work for the press. The judicious Preface he prefixed to it, plainly shewed him to be entirely master of the subject; and he performed with eminent sufficiency the part he undertook, which was, to prepare and methodize such Tracts, printed or manuscript, as were brought to him; to insert them in their proper places, and to make Remarks and References where ever there was occasion. The business of collecting the several pieces was by no means his province, nor was it to be expected from one who had daily avocations in the way of his profession.

And tho' it were admitted that the then Undertakers did every thing they possibly could, to render the Work entire and complete, and spared neither pains nor expence to procure materials fit for the purpose; yet it is no wonder, that in so fruitful a field, they should after all their diligence leave some gleanings to reward the industry of those that came after them. They proceed in the first Edition upon a very scanty plan, proposing to take in no Trials, but what were really State-Trials, and were taken at length and entire; and to this plan they adhered strictly, except in a few instances: but in preparing the second Edition, by the advice of several gentlemen of learning and curiosity, a greater latitude was taken, and as well several Cases heard before the Court of Star-Chamber were inserted, as other Proceedings at Law, which could not properly be called State-Trials; and Trials which were well taken, tho' not of a Criminal nature, were inserted, together with the dying Behaviour and Speeches of such unfortunate persons as suffered death upon their convictions.

In almost every of these particulars, these Supplemental Volumes will appear to have received many Additions and Improvements. The Cases here inserted, which were debated in the Star-Chamber, are such only as were considerable for the curiosity of the fact enquired into; as the Case of Davidson for sending down the Warrant for beheading the queen of Scots, contrary to queen Elizabeth's order; or for the figure and station of the Persons concerned, as lord Chancellor Bacon and others. The Trial for a large Estate in Shadwell, wherein the lady Ivy was a party; that of Mr. Denew and others, for assaulting Mr. Colepeper; the Proceedings between the duke and dutchess of Norfolk, and his grace's Trial with Mr. Germaine; and some others, were taken from printed pieces, which, for their price and scarcity, were almost equivalent to Manuscripts: and we can with truth say, that most of the printed Tracts here made use of, cost above ten times the price, that an ordinary piece of the same size is commonly sold for.

As for the Trials in these Volumes which were never before printed, we are not at liberty to give the reasons why we believe them to be authentick; but we conceive the intrinsick marks they bear will be so evident and convincing, to every one that reads them, of their being genuine, as to make any proofs on that head to be absolutely unnecessary.

We have been obliged in a few places to transcribe here and there some passages from larger works: but in this particular we have been as sparing as possible, having inserted no more than was absolutely necessary to preserve the connexion, and to make the whole more intelligible. The greatest freedom taken in that kind has been in the Collection of Arguments and Debates upon the Habeas Corpus Act and Liberty of the Subject, between the years 1627 and 1640; in which we were obliged to be sometimes beholden (but as little as possible) to Mr. Rushworth's Historical Collections. As these contests, between the crown and the subject, were one of the greatest causes of the fatal confusions which afterwards followed, and of that surprising Revolution which was the astonishment of all Christendom, every Proceeding in that affair, warranted by sufficient authority, was thought worth preserving, especially as it related to what, next to the Life of the Subject, is deemed most precious in the eye of the law, his Liberty.

Some gentlemen may perhaps think that Mr. Rushworth's Collection are so full on this head, that it would be a presumption to add any thing to them: but it will appear that most of the Speeches and Proceedings here printed are not taken notice of by Mr. Rushworth. How they came to be omitted, we will not pretend to determine; only we cannot forbear observing, as a strange instance of partiality in that Editor, that after inserting the Articles against the earl of Strafford at large in his Trial, he has abridged the Answer put in by him to his Articles, with this Introduction: "The Answer held three hours, being above 200 sheets of paper, too long to be here inserted; yet take an Abstract of the said Answer to the Articles exhibited against him, which are as followeth." Which Abstract is so vastly short, as not to contain above ten pages.

For fear of being thought prolix, in order to swell the price of the Book, we have omitted the Trial at large of the earl of Strafford, it being to be had separate at a moderate price. We don't doubt but his Answer at large would have been a great ornament to this Collection, and would have enabled the world to judge more clearly of his Case, than it is now likely to do. But as all the Proceedings against him were strictly ordered to be obliterated; so, with the utmost enquiry, we have been unable to find any Copy thereof remaining with the Descendants of his family, or in any other hands.

The Case of Monopolies, between the East-India Company and Mr. Sandys, does not, it must be confest, strictly speaking, come under the description of a State-Trial; but as the publishing the Proceedings between the King and the City of London, upon a Quo Warranto, in the last Edition of the State-Trials, met with general approbation, we hope the like candid construction will be put upon the step we have taken in this Case. The Question of the Power of the Crown to grant an exclusive Charter, and the Distinction to be made between a criminal Monopoly, the regal Prerogative, and legal Property, are undoubtedly of the highest importance. The point is debated upon this occasion by the most knowing and eminent lawyers of the time, and their Arguments are now first published from Manuscripts, which have not been taken notice of in any of the Law-Books now extant, (except a very short Abstract of some of the Speeches, which is printed in Mr. Serjeant Skinner's Reports) to which are added, the learned Arguments and Reasons of the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffreys.

There are some instances where we have not been able to procure complete Trials, and yet have obtained either Speeches made in them by gentlemen of note at that time, or large and particular Relations, though not in so minute and exact a manner, as in Trials taken in Short-hand in Court. Where any thing of this kind has occurred, which we judged worth notice, we have chose to preserve them from the oblivion they would otherwise sink under, by inserting them in this Collection. And tho' they are not so valuable as entire Trials, yet they may serve to give a more clear account of the Facts there tried, than is to be found in a general History; which, as the learned Editor of the State-Trials well observes, is one considerable Benefit arising from Collections of this kind.

Concerning the other Pieces contained in this Collection, we need be the less particular in this place, as we have before most of the Articles, or in Notes at the bottom, given our reasons for inserting them: only lest it should be thought that the remarkable Case of Ashby and White, in the last Volume, contains no more than the small Book, published under that name in octavo in the year 1705, it may be proper to observe, That the whole Proceedings and Debates of that memorable Affair are deduced in order of time from the first Complaint made in the House of Commons ; containing not only the Proceedings, Reports, Representations, Conferences and Resolutions, of both Houses, as published by their order ; but also the Proceedings and Arguments in the Court of King's-Bench.

In fine, as no pains or expence has been spared to make this Collection complete, useful and instructive ; so we must submit the whole to the judgment of the Publick, and rely upon the candour of the Readers, for a kind acceptance of our endeavours.

P R E F A C E

TO THE NINTH AND TENTH VOLUMES OF THE STATE TRIALS: PRINTED IN THE YEAR 1766.

THE Public may be surpriz'd at finding a Ninth and Tenth Volume of STATE TRIALS publish'd after so voluminous a Collection already set forth; yet, if they consider it is above thirty years since the Seventh and Eighth Volumes were printed, and the great number of Trials for Treason, Murder, Perjury, Forgery, &c. which have happened since that time, likewise a Rebellion within that period (always productive of many Trials) their admiration must cease.

Besides, gentlemen must have observed, in the course of their reading, a great many Trials have happen'd for different Crimes and Offences, which have never yet appear'd in print, but have been lock'd up in the studies of those who either took them, or had them taken in Short hand: those falling into other hands, by deaths or otherways, have either been purchased, procur'd, or generously sent in towards compleating this useful Work; such as Matthews's Trial for High Treason, in printing "Vox Populi, Vox Dei," in 1719, which has lain dormant near fifty years; Hales and Kinnersley's Trials in 1728, for forging promissory Notes, in the names of Robert Gibson and Samuel Edwards, esquires (both members of parliament), and publishing them as true ones, for large sums of money, wrote on frank'd covers given them to send into the country; Huggins and Bambridge's Trials, who were Wardens of the Fleet, with Corbett the Tipstaff, and Acton the Keeper of the Marshalsea Prison, who were all prosecuted in 1729, for Murder, by order of his majesty, on an Address from the House of Commons for that purpose; Mr. Franklin's Trial, in 1730, for printing and publishing a Libel entitled, "A Letter from the Hague;" with several other Trials which were taken at large, with the Speeches of the Court and Counsel, are now first printed from Manuscripts, and inserted in this Collection.

All the printed Trials at full length, that we could hear of (and we have frequently advertised to procure them) published since the Seventh and Eighth Volumes, are brought into this Work, with great Additions to most of them, either by Arguments on the special Verdicts, Counsel's Opinion on some of the Cases, or Accounts of the Prisoners Behaviour and dying Speeches, &c. and though several small Trials, or Parts of Trials and Proceedings, have been printed or procur'd in Manuscript, and were too minute to be inserted in the body of it; yet, in order to preserve even them from being buried in oblivion, we have given them a place in the Appendix; for these scarce Pieces are of value, and not to be collect'd but with great difficulty and expence; and it is hop'd some gentlemen of the Law, on reading them, will furnish some Speeches or Arguments towards compleating them, in case this Work comes to another edition. In this Appendix are likewise inserted two Trials in Corporation Causes, now first printed from Manuscript, viz. New Romney and the port of Hastings, which were argued by some of the most eminent Counsel then at the Bar; the first before the lord chief-justice Eyre, and the latter before lord Hardwicke; which were not procur'd time enough to be inserted in the body of the Work.

Some Trials in this Collection cannot, properly speaking, be call'd State Trials, yet may be deem'd good precedents, and determine many points of law; therefore have their use, and were thought too material to be omitted; and it would be confining the Collection in too narrow a compass, to insert only STATE TRIALS. But as the former Collection, in Six Volumes, published by Sollom Emlyn, esq. (who wrote that admirable Preface prefix'd to the first Volume, and published Hale's Pleas of the Crown in folio) met with general approbation, we have endeavour'd to follow his steps, and take in such Trials, for Murder, Perjury, Forgery, &c. as have been published at large ; for all Trials, even in these Cases, are Helps to History, setting forth the true state of the case on both sides, and are useful to the Gentlemen of the Law as well as Historians, as they give the Opinions of the greatest lawyers on the different points brought before them.

This Work will receive considerable Addition from that upright Judge Mr. Justice Foster, who, in his Cases on the Crown Law, has given the Public several Resolutions and Determinations of the Court on some of the Trials of the Rebels, which are added after each of their Trials ; but the greatest use made of that judicious Author, is his Speech on pronouncing the Judgment of the Court, in the Case of the King and Macdaniel, and his Gang of Thief-takers (which is inserted after the Arguments of Mr. Hume and others on their special Verdict, which Arguments were never before printed) ; and also on the Question put to the Judges, by the House of Lords in Earl Ferrers's Case, " 1. Whether a Peer, indicted of Felony and Murder, and tried and convicted thereof before the Lords in Parliament, ought to receive Judgment for the same, according to the provisions of the act of parliament of the twenty-fifth year of his majesty's reign, intituled, ' An Act for better preventing the horrid Crime of Murder ?' 2. Supposing a Peer, so indicted and convicted, ought by law to receive such Judgment as aforesaid, and the day appointed by the Judgment for Execution should lapse before such execution done, whether a new time may be appointed for the execution, and by whom ?"

As the Affair of Mr. Annesley and lord Anglesea made a great noise, some years ago, and occasioned four Trials, carried on at a vast expence, we have inserted them here. 1. Mr. Annesley's for the Murder of Mr. Egglestone at Staines in Middlesex ; 2. that of lord Anglesea, and others, tried in Ireland, for an Assault on Mr. Annesley, Mr. Mac Kercher, and others ; 3. So much of the Trial in ejectment, in Ireland, between Mr. Annesley and lord Anglesea (which Trial at large is in almost every hand) as will make the Reader entire master of the whole affair ; with the Speeches and Opinions of the lord chief baron Bowes, and the other Judges, at full length, in that remarkable Cause ; which will serve for an Introduction to the Trial of Mrs. Mary Heath, lady Altham's woman, who was tried for Perjury, for the Evidence she gave on that Trial in Ejectment. The Acquittal of this woman seems to have put a stop to the further proceedings at that time ; and since Mr. Annesley's death, we do not hear they are as yet revived. The Trial of Elizabeth Canning, for Perjury, is here printed, though in a much fuller and larger manner than it ever appeared in before this publication.

As Scotland is part of the United Kingdoms, and their Trials are conducted in a very sensible manner, though their method of Proceedings are different from ours, (in not bringing their Witnesses into court to be examined, only reading their Depositions taken in writing on oath) yet we shall insert three or four of the most principal of them, to shew their method of proceeding, and the reasoning and learning of their advocates.

Some people may wonder we have not obtained some of the modern Trials, as Dr. Henzie for High Treason ; the Cock Lane Ghost, &c. Our Answer is, we should have been very glad to have obtained them ; they would have been a great addition to the Work from the great learning of the Judge that tried them ; but we never could hear they were ever printed or taken in Short-hand ; and as to the former, he made no Defence or called any Evidences ; so it could not be a Trial of any consequence ; but if any one has a mind to peruse the Law Proceedings against him, in the Court of King's Bench, he may find them in Mr. Burrow's Reports, vol. I. part iv. p. 642.

We hope the candid Reader will excuse such Errors as he may find in this Work occasioned by the Editor's distance from the press, and judge favourably of this Collection (made more for amusement than profit), which, in all probability, had never seen the light, if the Editor had not, at great trouble and expence, undertaken it.

MR. HARGRAVE'S PREFACE

TO THE FOURTH EDITION OF THE STATE TRIALS, IN TEN VOLUMES FOLIO: PRINTED IN THE YEAR 1775.

IT is become too frequent a practice to republish the most valuable works, with such a perfect silence as to former Editions and the Variations from them, or at least with such a slight notice, that the Reader is left in a profound ignorance of many particulars both useful and necessary to be known. This omission may be very well excused in the instances of ordinary trash, with which the press too much abounds; for it would be an intolerable waste of time to descend into minute details about every insignificant production, which happens to gratify the false taste of the times, and runs through a number of editions. But works of genius, of erudition, or of science, and all which furnish important information or instruction, and are therefore worthy of being preserved from oblivion, ought to be treated in a more formal and respectful manner; and a loose and undistinguishing mode of newly editing such books is not less inconvenient and dissatisfactory to the Reader, than discreditable to the Publisher. Nor should this mark of distinction be confined to original works; compilations and collections, when they relate to very interesting subjects, being also fully intitled to the same attention. This observation strongly applies to a Collection like that of the STATE TRIALS. In the case of a Work so connected with the jurisprudence and history of the country; it is of the utmost consequence to fix the comparative value and authority of the several editions; which cannot be done effectually, without a knowledge of their dates, their principal differences in point of Contents, and the names and characters of the respective editors. With a view therefore to supply that sort of previous information, the want of which may be objected to so many other modern republications, we shall proceed to lay before the Reader the best account we are able to give of the former Editions of the STATE TRIALS, and shall then explain the Plan of the present Edition.

The First Edition of the STATE TRIALS came out in the year 1719, and was comprized in four volumes folio. It began with the Trial of William Thorpe for Heresy in the 8th of Henry the 4th, and ended with that of Dr. Sacheverell in the latter end of queen Anne's reign. The name of the gentleman, who prepared this Edition, is omitted; but in 1720 the same person published an abridgment of the Work with some additional Trials in eight volumes octavo, under the title of 'Trials for High Treason and other Crimes;' and in 1738 he published a "Critical Review of the State Trials," in one volume folio, which, though it includes a kind of abridgement, is quite a different work from the former: and from the title to this last book it appears, that Mr. Salmon was the first editor of the State Trials at large. As we have had occasion to take notice of Mr. Salmon's Critical Review, and some readers may not be apprized of his character as an author, it may be of use to observe, that however indebted to him the public may be for his industry in first forming a Collection of State Trials, and in afterwards abridging them, there is little obligation to him for some of his remarks upon them. In his political principles apparently an inveterate enemy to the Revolution, he is frequently betrayed by an intemperate zeal into a false notion of characters and opinions, and too often disguises both when the demon of party demands a sacrifice. Thus, a work, which, if it had been executed by one with a mind too liberal to be governed by violent prejudices, and at the same time endowed with the requisite knowledge and judgment, would be a source of the most important instruction, by being prostituted to particular views loses great part of its value, and in some measure becomes a vehicle for the poison of misrepresentation. To this censure of Mr. Salmon, candor and justice require us to add, that, notwithstanding the faults which may be justly imputed to his Critical Review, it is in many respects a very useful work. Considered as a short historical abridgment of the Trials, it is not without a considerable share of merit. Sometimes also he points out the sources, from which various parts of the State Trials are drawn, where the notes to the collection at large are not sufficiently explicit. This kind of information, so very requisite for ascertaining the credit due to each Trial, was such as his situation as first editor of the State Trials must have enabled him to furnish more readily and accurately than almost any other person; and it is to be wished, that he had enlarged further on this head, many explanations being still wanting. Nor should we wholly reject his remarks; for it must be confessed, that those on Trials, which were foreign to the bias of his political tenets, are frequently pertinent, and accompanied with suitable illustrations from the history of the times. Nay, even some of the animadversions, which he makes under the malignant influence of party-spirit, may be deemed not altogether without foundation; and therefore, though it is always necessary to receive them with distrust and caution, yet they ought not to be wholly disregarded, where it is possible to discriminate the shades of truth from the tinge of exaggeration with which they are disguised.

The First Edition of the State Trials was succeeded in the same year by a separate volume, which contained the famous Case of Ship-money, and Harrison's Trial for falsely accusing judge Hutton of High Treason on account of his Opinion against the Crown. In the Preface to the Collection, Mr. Salmon excuses the omission of the former Case by observing, that it was to be found in Rushworth; but many of the Speeches and Arguments are not in his work, and the true reason for the omission appears to have been, that the publishers of the Collection and the proprietors of the Manuscripts from which part of the separate volume was printed, could not agree about the terms.

A Second Edition of the State Trials was published in 1730; and in consequence of the great accession of new matter, the Work became swelled into six volumes folio. The first five volumes comprized the same period as the First Edition, with the exception only of the Proceedings in Parliament against Lord Chief Justice Tresilian and others, in the reign of Richard II. for High Treason, which are a few years earlier in date than the Trial with which the first edition begins. But the differences in other respects were more considerable; for several Trials were transposed in order to render the arrangement more conformable to the due order of time, some additions were made to the Trials in the former Collection, many Trials not contained in that (particularly the Case of Ship-money and Harrison's Trial before mentioned) were interspersed, and the Work was still further augmented by a number of new notes and references. As to the Sixth Volume, it consisted intirely of new matter; being a continuation of the Trials from the death of queen Anne to the end of the reign of George I. with an Appendix of Records relative to the whole Work. Some few other particulars, in which the Second Edition was improved, will be found stated at the end of the very sensible Preface, with which it was introduced to the public. In this Preface, the Editor, after extipiating on the great utility of the State Trials, enters into a consideration of the excellence of our Criminal Law; compares it with the Laws of other European states; and having evinced its superiority by a selection of the most striking instances, he proceeds to point out some of its principal faults and defects; several of which, such as those concerning the peine fort et dure, the summoning of Juries, the use of Latin in our Criminal proceedings, and the Fees of gaolers, have been since corrected by the Legislature, as the intelligent reader will easily recollect. This Preface is much admired, and certainly deserves great commendation, as well in respect of the learning displayed in it, as on account of the spirit and judgment of most of the remarks, which, in general, do equal credit to the author's humanity and understanding. However, the Preface is not wholly without exceptionable passages. It distinguishes the civil from the criminal part of our law, in terms highly disrespectful to the former, and with a degree of prejudice unworthy of so good a writer; for whilst he is studious to expose the faults of the civil branch of the English law, he appears quite forgetful of its excellencies. His treatment of our ecclesiastical courts is of the same kind. He points out some particular abuses of their proceedings, and thence seems to infer a general imperfection in their jurisdiction. But this is an inadequate way of deciding upon the merit of any system of laws, or of any species of judicature. The most excellent institutions could not stand the test of such a partial view; and should it be applied, it would necessarily lead us to a condemnation of that criminal law, which the learned writer himself so highly and so properly extols. These animadversions on the Preface to the Second Edition of the State Trials do not proceed from the least wish to depreciate the merit of its author, being in truth extorted by the occasion; for had they been suppressed, the generality of praise might be extended by some into a concurrence with opinions, from which in fact we cannot withhold our dissent. To this account of the Second Edition of the State Trials, it should be added, that though no name is prefixed either to the title of the work or the preface, the editor is known to have been Mr. Emllyn, the same gentleman, to whose labours the public is so much obliged, for the care and accuracy with which he edited Sir Matthew Hale's History of the Pleas of the Crown, and for the valuable Notes with which he enriched that great work.

The Second Edition of the State Trials was in 1735 followed with two Supplemental Volumes; to the first of which is prefixed a Preface, fully explaining the reasons of this addition, and the materials of which it is composed. In these two volumes there are many important Cases, particularly the Case of Monopolies between the East India Company and Mr. Sandys in the latter end of the reign of Charles II. in which the chief question was, as to the legality of the Company's patent for an exclusive trade to the East Indies. The period of the two volumes is described in their title pages to be from the reign of Edward VI. to the time in which they are published; but in fact, they do not contain any Trial later than the tenth of George I. and therefore should be considered, not as a continuation of the Collection of Trials in the Second Edition, but merely as supplying its omissions. It was not till two or three years after the coming out of the 7th and 8th volumes, that Mr. Salmon published his Critical Review, on which we have already observed so much; and consequently they fall within the compass of his Remarks. A Second Edition of these two supplemental volumes was reprinted in 1766, but without any alteration.

In 1742 a Third Edition of the State Trials was published in six volumes folio. The Trials and Cases in the supplemental volumes to the Second Edition are not comprized in this Third Edition; nor are we aware of any other difference between the two, than a very small addition of Notes, a new disposition of Sir Richard Spotiswood's Trial, the Quo Warranto Case, and perhaps a few other Trials, and in the pages.

In 1766 appeared two other volumes of State Trials, being the 9th and 10th. These in point of time principally follow the former Collection, and bring it down to the year 1760; though amongst these Trials there are some of an antecedent period. The first of the two volumes contains a Preface, to which we refer the Reader for a fuller account of their contents.

Having finished our account of the former Editions of the State Trials, we shall now exhibit the outline of the plan of the present Edition.

I. The whole Work will consist nominally of eleven, but will be so printed as to be fit for binding in six volumes folio. The first six will be printed exactly from the Third Edition, and the four next from the four supplemental volumes; with no other difference, than that each of the two columns, into which every page of the present Edition will be divided, will comprize one page of the book from which it is printed, and will be numbered accordingly. By this mode of printing the publishers are enabled to consult cheapness, without sacrificing convenience; for in consequence of it, there will be only one half of the number of sheets, which would be otherwise necessary, and two volumes may be commodiously bound in one; and yet the references to the Third will entirely correspond with the present Edition. It is to be wished, that the pages of all the Editions, so far as they respectively go, had been the same; but this attention to convenience having been hitherto neglected, the most eligible course seems to be to follow the Third Edition, that being the last; and all that can now be done to prevent disappointment, when a reference happens not to answer, is to remind the Reader, that books published before 1730, such as the First Edition of Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, necessarily refer to the First Edition of the State Trials; those published after 1730, such as Hales's History of the Pleas of the Crown, usually refer to the Second Edition; and those published after 1742, such as Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries, to the Third Edition; with which last the present one will intirely agree. As to the eleventh volume, it is reserved wholly for additional matter; the design being, that one part of it shall be occupied with a continuation of Trials to the present time; and that the other part shall consist of such materials, as shall seem best calculated to supply any omissions in the former part of the Collection. II. In the present Edition, the Preface to the First Edition, which was afterwards omitted, will be restored; together with that to the Case of Ship-money; and the Preface to the Second Edition, as it was re-printed with the name of Mr. Emlyn to it in the third, will be continued, as will also the Prefaces to the supplemental volumes. The history of a publication is best preserved by inserting all the Prefaces in their due order of time; though they are often omitted in modern editions of books, much to the dissatisfaction of nice and accurate readers. III. The two Alphabetical Tables to this Edition, the one of the Persons tried, of the times and places of their Trial, and of their crimes and punishments, and the other of the matter in general, will extend to all the eleven volumes. This will render a search for any thing in the present Edition less tedious and troublesome, than it is in the Second and Third Editions and their supplemental volumes; to which, in consequence of their being published at different times, there are not less than three distinct sets of tables instead of one.

From this view of the Plan, on which it is determined to conduct the present Edition, it is evident, that it must have very considerable advantages over the best of the former editions. It will be much less chargeable in the purchase; and yet equally commodious in the form, more various and valuable in the contents.

It only remains for the author of this Preface to add a few lines concerning himself, lest he should be deemed further responsible than he means to be. The undertakers of the Edition requested his assistance in suggesting a plan for the conduct of the Work, and in furnishing a Preface. With this request he hath cheerfully complied in the best manner he was able; and the result of his endeavours, he readily submits to the correction of the candid reader. But as to the superintendance, revision, and correction of the Work in the printing, they are unavoidably devolved upon others; the writer of this Preface having avocations, which would not leave him at liberty for such a laborious office, even though he was inclined to undertake it. However, the same desire of promoting an important and useful publication, which induced him to give his aid in its first commencement, will secure to the undertakers his advice in its progress and conclusion.

FRANCIS HARGRAVE.

MR. HARGRAVE'S PREFACE

THE YEAR 1781.

MY Preface prefixed to the first Volume of this edition of the STATE-TRIALS promised, that the present volume should consist wholly of Trials not contained in any former edition; and I was understood to be the person, who would point out what were the materials proper to be adopted. In conformity to this engagement, I used considerable diligence to discover what Trials were omitted in the period of the former editions, and what Trials of importance have occurred since. But the result of my pursuit for new matter proved very inadequate to my expectation; the industry of former collectors having scarce left any deficiencies, which I could supply without too far passing the line I had prescribed to myself of merely selecting additional Trials. Yet the few, which I have gleaned, may suffice to convince the Reader, that I have not been sparing of research.

In the course of my enquiries for new Trials, I resorted to the British Museum, in hopes, that the immense Collection of Manuscripts in that repository of learning and science would supply me with some new materials of importance; and I was particularly encouraged in this expectation by the promising Titles of various Articles in the Catalogue of Harleian Manuscripts. But I was wholly disappointed; for on examination, the few Trials I met with proved, either too meagre and insignificant to be made use of, or nothing more than mere transcripts from some of our old printed Chronicles. And here I take great pleasure in bearing testimony of the exemplary conduct of those Gentlemen, who by their offices have the superintendance of the Manuscripts and printed Books in the British Museum. Though I have had frequent occasion to give several of those gentlemen much trouble; yet I have ever found them uniformly studious to render the access to the valuable Collections entrusted to them easy and agreeable. I have also had the full opportunity of noticing, that their deportment and attentions to others are of the same obliging kind. So honourable a discharge of their duty well entitles them to some rewards beyond the small emoluments of their respective offices; and I heartily wish, that they may in future attract a greater share of patronage from the great, than they have hitherto experienced.

There is one very striking and capital defect in the former Editions of this Collection; I mean, in the article of Parliamentary Trials, under which head may be included, not only Trials on Impeachments, but Proceedings on Bills of Attainder, and on Bills inflicting Pains and Penalties. In the ten volumes, which constitute the Work as it was before the present Edition, there are not, as I calculate, thirty articles which fall under such a description. Yet from a very imperfect list, which I formed on a slight examination of the Rolls of Parliament; and various other books of Parliamentary information, I found, that many more than a hundred such Trials might be extracted. It was my wish to have supplied this omission; more especially as by so doing, infinite light would be thrown on a subject most interesting to all Lawyers and Politicians; namely, the Criminal Judicature of Parliament. But such a vast undertaking would not only have far exceeded the limits of my engagements to the Proprietors of this Edition of State Trials, but would also have swelled the present Collection greatly beyond the terms of the Proposals to the Subscribers.

Before each Trial in this volume, I have given notice to the Reader whence it is extracted, with such other explanations, as were necessary to enable the forming a judgment on the authority of the Trial. It would have been of no small advantage to the readers, if the Collectors of the former Volumes had been equally explanatory. My introductory Note to some of the Trials in this volume is extended into an illustration of the subject of the Trial; and occasionally I have interspersed similar Notes elsewhere. The fullest annotations of this kind are those prefixed to the Case of Impositions, the Case of the Postnati, the Bankers Case, and the respective Cases of Mr. Whitlock and Mr. Oliver St. John. These and the other Notes I commit to the candid construction of the Reader, with an assurance, that I have endeavoured to form and express my opinions with the utmost impartiality and moderation; and that I shall even think myself obliged by a good-humoured correction of any errors into which I may have fallen.

In the Trials and Cases in this volume, the Reader will find an ample discussion of various great constitutional questions. The Case of Impositions furnishes a profusion of learning on the point so long controverted, 'Whether the king could by prerogative impose Duties at the ports.' In the course, too, of the Arguments on that head, the learned Reader will be pleased to see some important Remarks on the King's Power of laying Embargoes. Some persons, justly of high authority in the present times, have been inclined to restrict the exercise of this power to time of war. But I confess, that I do not see, why the Prerogative should be thus limited. The safety of the state, which is the ground of entrusting the king with the power of laying Embargoes, may require an exercise of it in times both of war and peace; and on the eve of a war-it is obviously as necessary as in a war itself. Also, from what I remember having formerly read on the subject, I have little doubt, but that the Precedents and Authorities, whenever they shall be well collected, will be found greatly to preponderate against the distinction I have stated. That profound parliamentary lawyer, Mr. Hakewill, when he was arguing in the House of Commons against the claimed prerogative of Impositions at the ports, candidly admitted the prerogative of Embargoes to the full extent of its principle, and consequently, as I conceive, without restricting its exercise to times of war. Yet he well knew, that the power of shutting up the Ports was one great branch of the argument for the power of taxing at the ports; and also, that the power of laying Embargoes had been often exercised under special acts of parliament. Nor did Mr. St. John, in his Argument against Ship-Money, scruple to admit the power of laying Embargoes, and that it was exerciseable, not merely in times of war, but generally in times of imminent danger, whether arising from war, from dearth, or from any other cause. Perhaps some readers may wonder, that I should be thus unreserved in contending for the prerogative of Embargoes. But I refer such to my Note before the Case of Impositions. They will there find a short but connected view of the various means practised to establish in the crown a power of taxing out of parliament from the Accession of James the first to the Restoration; and I presume to hope, that on a consideration of the freedom, with which I have in that Note animadverted on such unconstitutional attempts, I shall be sufficiently guarded against any suspicion of the least wish to extend the royal prerogative beyond its due limits.—The Irish Case of Præmissæ must be interesting to every person, who wishes to be informed, in a summary and accurate way, how the Church of Rome gradually encroached on the king's ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and how at length the English church and kingdom were compleatly exonerated from the expence, tyranny, and disgrace of foreign usurpation. My Note at the end of that Case is intended to assist the inquiries of such as may be curious to pursue the subject more in detail.—In the Case of the Postnati, the doctrine of Allegiance to the crown is enlarged upon, with a surprizing variety of learning and historical information; tending to explain the relation between England and the countries which at any time before the Accession of the first James had been dependant upon England, or connected with it by being under the dominion of the same prince. To render this great political Case more intelligible, I have prefixed a fuller account of its origin, and all the proceedings in it, than is commonly to be met with; to which I have added a reference to almost every book of consequence likely to supply the least farther information about the case. The Case of Mr. Oliver St. John for writing against Benevolences, deserves attention on account of its connection with the Case of Ship Money and the Case of Impositions. In my Note on Mr. St. John's Case, I have pointed out this connection; and I have therein risqued some remarks on the subject of Benevolences to the crown; with a view to shew, how far they have been condemned and are clearly unlawful.—In the Case of the Bankers, some curious subjects are discussed; more especially the general power of the Crown to alienate its Revenues before the restraining statute of queen Anne: whether some particular Revenues, on account of their special nature, were not privileged and exempt from the Crown's general power of alienating; and whether the Barons of the Exchequer could compel the Lord Treasurer to issue money for payment of the King's Debts, or, in other words, whether the Receipt of the Exchequer is under the controul of the Barons. The most remarkable of the arguments in this famous Case, or, at least, of those which have reached the present times, is lord Somers. It not only unfolds the constitution of the Exchequer with great minuteness; but in other respects is most excellent, having a scope and compass, which will ever render it of infinite value to the profession of the law. So anxious, indeed, was his lordship to sustain his opinion by the most authentic materials, that the Records referred to and stated in his Argument are said to have cost him several hundred pounds. My Note on this Case, explains how it arose, the progress of it, and how the Claims of the Bankers and their Creditors were finally adjusted by act of parliament, with some other particulars, which I thought might be conducive to a thorough understanding of the case, and of the points decided by it.—In respect to the remainder of the Cases in this Volume, most of them relate to very interesting subjects; amongst which the chief are, the effect of Matrimonial Sentences of the Ecclesiastical courts, the extent of the Privilege of Parliament, the question of General Warrants, the question on the Seizure of Papers, the powers claimed by Secretaries of State and Privy Counsellors, the question on the Slavery of Negroes in England, and the power of pressing Mariners. However, some of the early cases I have introduced do, I confess, require an apology; being certainly too loose and imperfect in the statement to deserve the name of Trials. My inducement to insert them was, that I wished to give the reader some proof, how very extensive I was in my enquiries and researches for new matter, to supply the omissions of former collectors; and I do hope, that the Notes which precede short these Accounts of Trials, will be received as a full testimony of my industry in that respect.—Thus much may suffice to apprise the Reader what he is to expect from the contents of the present Volume.

In my Preface to the first Volume of this Edition of STATE TRIALS, I thought, that I had sufficiently explained myself to guard against any responsibility beyond what really belongs to me. But from the manner of placing my name in the title to the Collection, which I now think might have been less ambiguous, a very erroneous notion has prevailed, as to the extent of my very limited share in the undertaking. I therefore deem it proper to be more explicit on this head; and with that view, I here take the opportunity of declaring, that the only parts of the Work for which I am in any respect accountable, exclusive of the present preface, are the preface with my name in the first volume; and the selection of the Trials and Cases for this Volume, with such annotations as I have given in the course of it, particularly those before the several Trials. As to the Trials in the ten preceding Volumes, they were printed literally from the last of the former Editions; nor did I see so much as one sheet of those Volumes before it was printed and published, except only the sheet containing my Preface and the Title to the first volume. I am equally free from responsibility for the Alphabetical and Chronological Tables of all the Trials in this Collection, and for the General Index of Matter; all of which are placed at the end of this Volume. These Tables and Index were prepared by another gentleman. The Chronological Table of the Trials is quite a new accession to the Work; there being no such Table to the former Editions; though the utility of it is apparent, as it in great measure obviates the disadvantage from the disorderly arrangement of many of the Trials in point of time. This disorder was a necessary consequence of continuing the first six Volumes of the Work by Supplemental volumes. The merit of lessening this inconvenience belongs wholly to the framer of the Tables and Index to this edition; that is, both the proposal of such an improvement and the execution of it originated from him. All that I can pretend to say further concerning the Tables and Index is, that the latter has been executed at a much greater expence than would have been incurred, if I had not made it a particular request to the proprietors of the edition to be liberal in their allowance for so useful and laborious a part of the undertaking; and further, that I have every reason to believe, that the gentleman who compiled the General Index of Matter, has been extremely diligent in endeavouring to render it acceptable.

1. Proceedings against THOMAS BECKET, Archbishop of Canterbury, for High Treason. 9 Henry II. A. D. 1163. [1 Brady's Complete History, 383. 2 Tyrrell, 312.]

THE most satisfactory narrative of these Proceedings is in Brady's History of England. After a short account of the previous life of Becket, he relates several instances of his oppressive, mischievous, and intolerable insolence and usurpation, after he was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He then proceeds thus :

“ The king, suspecting he might escape unpunished, commanded the Bishops and great men to meet at Northampton, the 3d day before the feast of Calixtus the Pope (which was the 12th of Oct. Fitz-Stephan (p. 21. col. 1.) says it was on the octaves of St. Michael, that is, on the 6th of October, and that he was there with the Archbishop, Octava Sancti Michaelis, feria tertia, Concilii dicta die Rex aderat; ipsa die venimus Northamptonam.— In this Council the Archbishop was accused upon the occasion of a Controversie between him and John Marshall (or the Marshall). This John demanded of the Archbishop a manor or farm, which was a member of one of his towns called Pageham: He came with the king's writ into the Archbishop's Court (to remove the suit, it may be supposed) where he could gain nothing, (as having no right, saith mine Author) and as the law then was, he proved the defect of the Archbishop's Court (that he had not right done him, as may be supposed) and swore upon a Tropaz, or Book of Old Songs (as Gervase of Canterbury calls it) which he drew from under his coat; and the Justices of the Archbishop's Court accused him for swearing upon that Book, whereas he ought to have sworn upon the Gospels.—John comes to the king and procures his Writ, by which the Archbishop was required to answer him in the King's Court, and the day appointed for his appearance was

Holy-rood Day, or the 14th of September. The Archbishop came not at the day, but sent to the king four knights, with his Letters, and the Letter of the Sheriff of Kent, attesting the injury of John, and the imperfection of his proof (that is, because he had sworn upon the Tropaz, and not upon the Gospels.)—The Monk of Canterbury reports he sent, duos legales homines per quos excusatus est, Quod citatus non venit ad Regis presentiam; non enim contemptus fuit, sed infirmitate valida invitus retentus est. Two lawful men to make his Excuse that he appeared not before the king, that it was not out of contempt, but by reason he was unwillingly detained by great sickness.

“ However it was, the king was very angry, that he came not in his own person, to make the Allegations the knights brought, whom he treated with threats, as such that against the king's citation, brought into his Court false and frivolous excuses, and scarce let them go free though they had given security.—At the request of John he appointed another day, to wit, the first day of the Council, and sent his Writ to the Sheriff of Kent to cite the Archbishop, for the king would not write to him, because he would not salute him. Nor had he any other solemn Summons to the Council by Letter, according to ancient Custom. The Archbishop appeared, and said he was come by the king's command for the cause of John. The king replied that John was in his service at London, and would be there on the morrow, and then their cause should be discussed. Erat siquidem Johannes ille cum Thesauriis, & ceteris fiscalibus pecunie & publici eris Receptoribus Londoniis ad Scaccarium, &c. Ubi etiam placita Coronæ Regis tractantur; for this John was amongst the Officers of the Receipt of the Chequer in London, where also pleas of the king's Crown were handled or holden. That first day there was nothing more done between the king and archbishop, the king bad him go home, and return to his cause on the morrow.

"On the second day, before all the Bishops, except the bishop of Rochester and another which were not then come, and all the earls and barons of England, and many of Normandy, Archiepiscopus lese Majestatis, Corona Regie arguitur. The Archbishop was accused of Treason, because as is said before, he was cited by the king in the Cause of John, and neither came, nor made a sufficient excuse. The Archbishop's defence signified nothing; yet he alledged the foresaid Injury of John, the proper Jurisdiction of the Cause, and the Integrity of his Court.

"The king demanded Judgment; no Reason of the Archbishop was approved: it seemed to all, out of reverence to royal majesty, and the bond of liege homage, that the Archbishop made to the king, and from the fidelity and observance of terrene honor, which he had sworn to the king, that he made small Defence; because when cited by the king he neither came, nor by his messengers alledged any corporal infirmity, or necessary administration of any ecclesiastical office, that could not be deferred. And they condemned him, to be in the king's mercy for all his moveable goods.—There was a Difference between the Bishops and Barons, who should pronounce Judgment, each of them imposed it upon other, excusing themselves. The Barons said, you Bishops ought to pronounce sentence, it belongs not to us, we are lay-men, you ecclesiastical persons. So he, you are his fellow priests, and fellow bishops.

"To these things one of the Bishops answered, Yea it is rather your office than ours; for this is not an ecclesiastic Sentence, but a secular, we sit not here as Bishops, but Barons, we are barons, and you are barons; we are peers or equals here, (pares hic sumus). You cannot rely upon our Order, for if you have respect to that in us, you must also have regard to it in him, and then as we are Bishops, we cannot judge our Archbishop and lord.

"The king bearing of this controversie about pronouncing Sentence: it was soon ended, and imposed upon the bishop of Winchester, who unwillingly pronounced it. Archiepiscopus autem qui sententia, vel Recordationi Curia Regis Anglie non licet contradicere, sustinuit, Consilio Episcoporum: addacta ut mitigandum & honorandum regem solenni in manum ejus missione, quasi Concessionis Judicii; ut moris est. The Archbishop, because no man might contradict a Sentence, or Record made in the king of England's court, by advice of the bishops, submitted to it, and by a forced compliance, for the honour and mitigation of the king, solemnly put himself under his power, as it were granting and acknowledging the Judgment, as the custom was.

"Afterwards, on the same day, he was prosecuted for 300*l.* he had received, as he was Castellain, or Constable of the Castles of Eye in Suffolk, and Berkamstead in Hertfordshire. The Archbishop first wared the Action, by saying he was not cited for that matter. And further said, That he had expended that money, and much more, in the reparations of the Palace of London, and those Castles, as might be seen. The king would not admit he had done this, and exacts Judgment. The Archbishop ready to please the king, and not willing such a sum of money should be the cause of anger between them; gave security by three lay-men, distinctly and severally, the earl of Gloucester, William de Eynesford, and another, all his tenants.

"On the third day, he was prosecuted at the king's suit for 500 marks lent him in the Army of Tholose; and for other 500 which he borrowed of a Jew upon the king's security; he was also prosecuted for all the profits of the Archbishoprick and other Bishopricks and Abbeyes that were void during his Chancellorship: of all which he was commanded to make an account to the king. The Archbishop said he came not prepared to Answer this matter, nor was he cited concerning it, yet in time and place he would do to his lord the king according to right. The king exacts security upon that; he answered he ought to have the advice of his Suffragans and Clerks about it. The king yielded to it, and he departed. And from that day, neither Barons, nor Knights, came to his house or hostel, to visit him, having understood the king's mind by these proceedings.

"On the fourth day, all the ecclesiastical persons came to the Archbishop's house, where he treated with the Bishops severally and apart, and with the Abbots severally and apart. The bishop of Winchester advised him to offer a Composition in Money, and try the king that way; 2,000 marks were offered but refused. Others encouraged him to maintain bravely the Liberties of the Church, but most persuaded a compliance with the king.

"It is said they consulted very closely on the fifth day, which was Sunday, but the result of their Debates and Counsels not mentioned. On the sixth day the Archbishop fell sick, and the king hearing of it, sent all his earls and many barons, to demand of him his Resolution after these Consultations and Advices, and to know of him whether he would give Security to render an Account of what he received from the vacant Churches in the time of his Chancellorship, and stand to the Judgment of his Court in that matter. The Archbishop answered by the Bishops, That if he was not hindered by sickness, he would on the morrow come to the Court and do what he ought.

"He came next day, and found the king in an inward chamber with the Bishops, who staid with him a long time, and with them

Roger archbishop of York, who came last, that he might not be suspected to be one of the king's private counsellors, and advisers. The Archbishop sat in an outward room with his cross in his own hand, while all his suffragans, and the earls and barons, were called to the king.—The Bishops in this Conference told the king, that the Archbishop when he advised with them, told them, they had used him very ill, and with the Barons treated him as an enemy, and not judged him justly, but after an unheard of manner, because for one absence (pro una absentia, quam supersisam dicunt) which they call a Delay or Default, and was not to be judged a Contumacy, they ought not to have condemned him in such a pecuniary mulct as that he should forfeit all his moveable goods to the king, or they should be in his mercy. The Bishops also told him that he had appealed to the Pope against this Sentence, and by the authority of the Pope forbidden them for the future to judge him in any secular accusation.

“The king was very much moved at this relation, and sent the Earls and many Barons, to know of him whether he was the author of this appeal, and prohibition, especially seeing he was his Leige-man, and bound to him by a common and special Oath at Clarendon, ‘That he would sincerely and legally observe his legal dignities, amongst which this was one, That the Bishops should be present at all his Trials or Sentences, except at Sentences of Blood. Ut Episcopi, omnibus ejus assint Judiciis, preterquam Judiciis Sanguinis. They were also to know of him whether he would give pledges to stand to the Judgment of the king's Court concerning the Account of his Chancellorship. To which demands, this was his Answer, ‘That he was indeed bound to the king by leige homage, fidelity, and oath, but the oath was chiefly sacerdotal; That in respect of God, he was in all due obedience and subjection, obliged to observe honour and fidelity toward him. Saving his obedience to God, his ecclesiastical dignity, and the episcopal honor of his person. That he declined the Suit, because he was not cited to yield an Account upon any other Cause, than that of John; neither was he bound to make Answer, or hear Judgment in any other. He confessed he had received many Administrations and Dignities from the king, in which he had faithfully served him, as well in England, as beyond sea, and had spent his own revenue in his service, and for the same contracted many debts. As to his putting in pledges or fidejussors to render an Account, he ought not to be compelled to that, because he was not adjudged to do it; nor had he any citation in the cause of Account, or any other except that of John the Marshal. And as to the Prohibition he that day made to the Bishops, and Appeal, he did acknowledge, that he said to his fellow bishops, That for one Absence, but not Contumacy, they had unjustly condemned him, contrary to the custom and example of antiquity, wherefore he appealed and forbad them,

That depending the Appeal, they should not judge him in a Secular Accusation, or cause of things done, before he was Archbishop. And that he did then appeal, and put his person and the Church of Canterbury under the protection of God, and the lord the Pope.

“The king having received this Answer, urged the Bishops, by the homage they had done, and the fealty they had sworn to him, that together with the Barons, They would dictate to him a Sentence concerning the Archbishop, Ut simul cum Baronibus de Archiepiscopo ubi dicent Sententiam. They began to excuse themselves by reason of his Prohibition; the king was not satisfied, and said this his simple Prohibition ought not to hold against what was done and sworn at Clarendon. They reply, if they should not obey his Prohibition, he would censure them, and that for the good of the king and kingdom, they should obey the Prohibition. At length by the king's persuasion they went to the Archbishop.—And the Bishop of Chichester told him that lately at Clarendon, they were by the king called together, concerning the observation of his Royal Dignities, and lest they might doubt what they were, he shewed them those very Royal Customs of which he spake, in writing, and that they promised their assent to, and observation of them. He first, and afterwards his suffragans, by his command. And when the king pressed them to swear to what they promised, and set to their seals for the confirmation of it, they answered; it ought to suffice for a Sacerdotal Oath, That they said ‘in the Word of Truth, in good faith, without deceit, and lawfully,’ they would observe them. Why do you now forbid us to be present at that Sentence, which he commands us? Upon this Grievance, and lest you may add any thing to our injury, we will appeal to the Pope, and for this time give obedience to your Prohibition.

“The Archbishop answered him he would be present at the prosecution of the Appeal, and that there was nothing done at Clarendon by them or him. (nisi salvo honore Ecclesiastico) in which their Ecclesiastic honor was not saved. 'Twas true, he said, that they promised, in good faith, without deceit, and lawfully, to observe those Determinations, and by those words, the Dignities of their Churches, which they received by the Pontifical law, were safe. For whatsoever was against the true faith of the Church, and against the laws of God, could not in bona fide, & legitime observari; in good faith, and lawfully be observed. Also a Christian king hath no Dignity, by the use whereof the liberty of the Church, which he hath sworn to maintain, must perish. Further, those which you call Royal Dignities, were sent to the Pope to be confirmed, and brought back, rather disallowed than allowed by him: he hath shewn us an example, and taught us that we should do so, being ready with the Roman Church, to receive what that receives, and to refuse what that refuseth. Yet further, if we failed in any thing at Clarendon, ‘for the flesh is weak,’ we ought to take courage, and by the virtue of the Holy Spirit to strive against the old Eemy, who endeavours, 'that he which stands may fall, and that he which hath fallen may not rise.' If we promised any unjust things there, or confirmed them in the Word of Truth, you know, such unlawful stipulations do not oblige.

"The Bishops return to the king in peace, being excused from judging the Archbishop; they sit apart from the Barons; nevertheless, the king exacts Judgment of the Earls and Barons concerning him. Evocantur quidam Viccomites, & secunde dignitatis Barones, antiqui dierum, ut addantur eis, & assistat Judicio. Certain Sheriffs are called, and ancient Barons of a second Rank or Dignity, to be added to them, and to sit in Judgment, after a little while, Proceres ad Archiepiscopum redeunt. The noblemen return to the Archbishop, and the earl of Leicester pressing some of them to pronounce Sentence, who refused it; began to repeal the business of Clarendon very particularly, as the Bishop of Chichester had done before. Quasi inde manifesta erat regie majestatis lesio, & promissionis in verbo veritatis ibi facte transgressio, as if he had been guilty of manifest Treason, or had broken his promise in verbo veritatis there made, and bad the Archbishop hear his Sentence.—But the Archbishop not willing to forhear any longer, said, 'What is it that ye will do? Come ye to judge me? ye ought not. Judicium est sententia lata post Contraversium. Ego hodie nichil dixi ut in Causa. Judgment is Sentence given after the Controversie or Tryal. I said nothing this day as to the Cause. I have been cited for no Cause except that of John, who tried it not with me, and therefore you cannot judge me. I am your father, ye are noblemen of the Court, of lay power, secular persons, I will not hear your Judgment.' The noblemen retired, and the Archbishop went his way to the Monastery of St. Andrews in Northampton, and Herbert and William Fitz-Stephan with him.

"The king hearing of his departure, caused proclamation to be made in the streets, That no man should give him, or any of his retinue ill language, or molest them any ways. After supper that night, he sent three Bishops to ask licence and safe conduct from the king for his departure, who told them they should have his Answer in the morning; but he fearing some ill from that delay, dare not stay.—This was the seventh day of his appearing in Court, and that night, he went away without Licence, only accompanied with two servants, without either clerk or knight. On the morrow, when his flight was known to the king and all the council, they considered what was needful to be done, and the Archbishop was permitted to enjoy all the revenues of the Church of Canterbury, because both sides had appealed. The king sent presently beyond sea to the pope, the archbishop of York, and four bishops, Gilbert of London, Hilary of Chichester, Bartholomew of Exeter, Roger of Worcester, and two earls, and two Barons with three of his domestic clerks. The rest of that day was spent about raising some foot to be sent against Rese king of Wales, and there was a certain number promised by every ecclesiastic, and lay person, for the king's assistance, which was written down; and so the Council was dissolved.—The king sent after him to Dover and other ports, but he lay still in the day time amongst his friends in several Monasteries, and travelled in the night, and it was from 15 days after the Feast of St. Michael until the 2nd of November, before he took ship at Sandwich (say most of the Historians) and landed at Graveling."

"Quadrilogus or the Quadripartite History doth not in all things agree with this relation of Thomas the Archbishop's Trial. And the reasons of the discord between the king and him. The chief whereof was, That several lewd irregular Clerks were accused of divers crimes, and one of Murther in the diocese of Salisbury, who was taken and delivered to the bishop thereof, the king's officers, and the kindred of the defunct, call for Justice. The priest denies the fact; which, not being proved by his Accusers, he was put upon Canonical purgation, in which he failed. The Bishop of the diocese, sent to the Archbishop to know the law in that case, who commanded he should be deprived of his benefice, and all his life perform strict penance in a Monastery. And thus all debauched, infamous Clerks, by Decree of the Archbishop, confirmed by the sanction of Canons, were to be punished in his Province, and the Punishment to be greater or less according to the quantity of the crime, the degree and order of the person, and the manner and cause of perpetration.

"At the same time one Philip de Lydrois a Canon (of what Church it is not said) reproached the king's Justiciarie, for which he was not only exasperated against him, but the whole clergy. The Archbishop punished this Clerk, by causing him to be whipped with rods, and he was suspended from his benefice for some years. But this satisfied not the king, who was as zealous for the peace of his people, as the Archbishop was for the liberty of the clergy, who grew every day more disolute all the kingdom over. For which cause, the king calls the Archbishop, Bishops and Clergy to London.—And having told them the cause of their being called together, and urgently pressed, that Clerks taken for, or accused of enormous crimes, might be left to his officers, and not have the protection of the Church. He most earnestly required, by advice of such as had skill in both laws, That such Clerks might presently be degraded and delivered to the Court, whence some very learned men by reason of the king's favour did affirm, That they were not to be sent into exile, or thrust into a monasterie, by the Canon Law, but rather were to be delivered to the Court, that is, they were to be punished by Secular Judgment.

"The Archbishop with the Bishops of his province, having consulted their learned men, being much concerned for the Liberty of the Clergy, answered to these things, clearly and probably, or perhaps by proof (acculenter satis & probabiliter respondet) according to the Canonical Institution of antient Fathers. And in the end of his Speech with much devotion, beseeched his royal clemency, 'That he would not under a new king Christ, and under a new law of Christ, introduce into a new and peculiar Lot of the Lord, contrary to the Decrees of the Antient Fathers, a new way of coercion into his own kingdom, and this he begged for the king's sake, and the quiet and stability of his kingdom, often humbly inculcating, that he neither could or would bear it.—But the king, not moved with his importunity, demanded more earnestly whether he and the Bishops would observe his royal laws and customs, adding that in his grandfather's time they were observed by the archbishops, bishops, chief men, and privileged persons, and that now they ought not to be set aside. The Archbishop, after Consultation with his brethren, answered they would observe them, salvo ordine suo; and the bishops being asked one by one, gave the same answer, only Hilary bishop of Chichester changed the phrase, saying, he would observe the king's customs or laws (bona fide) in good faith; the king was angry at the Answer, and reservation of the Archbishop and other Bishops, and departed from them.—Most of the Bishops desert the Archbishop, and he a long time persists in his denial, notwithstanding all the exhortations of them, and persuasions of the secular great men; yet at length he came to the king at Oxford, and promised to change those words (salvo ordine suo) saving his Order, which gave him so much trouble.

"Hereupon the king called the Bishops and great men to Clarendon, where he exacted the promises of the Archbishop and Bishops, and by the persuasion of the bishop of Man and Norwich, and two of the greatest earls of the nation, and other great persons sent from the king, he promised, bona fide, and in verbo veritatis, in good faith, and in the word of truth, to observe the king's laws, leaving out the words, salvo ordine suo, and all the Bishops did the like, and then those Royal Customs were drawn up in form, and caused to be written by the great men, and recognized by them.—In this Council the king requires the Archbishop and Bishops to confirm their acknowledgment of his laws, by putting thereunto their seals: the Archbishop repents him of his promise, and refuseth to do it, and resolved to go privately unto the Pope, which he attempted, and having been twice at sea, was both times driven back.—This attempt much heightened the king's displeasure against him, and he caused him peremptorily to be cited, at a certain day to answer such things as should be objected against him. The king also by a strict Edict called together all the Bishops and great men of the kingdom to meet at Northampton, where the Archbishop appeared not in person, according to his Citation, though he sent his Answer and Excuse; for which cause, by the Judgment of all those Bishops and great men, all his movables were confiscated. This he said was a new form of Judgment, according to the new Canons, or Laws made at Clarendon, for it was never heard of before, that the Archbishop of Canterbury should be tried in the king's Court for any cause whatsoever, both in respect of the dignity of his church and person, and that because he was spiritual father of the king, and of all in the kingdom; but he complained more of his brethren and fellow-bishops, than he did of the Judgment, or the lay persons judging of him, &c. veruntamen multo magis quam de judicio, vel de proceribus judicantibus, de consfratribus suis & coepiscopis querebatur, novam formam & ordinem judiciorum dictos invenisse; ut Archipræsul à suis suffraganeis, aut pater à filiis judicaretur.

"The king in the second day of this Council required 500*l.* of the Archbishop, which he said he had borrowed of him: the Archbishop affirmed the king gave him the money, which notwithstanding, when he could not prove it, was adjudged against him, and the king exacted caution, and the Archbishop making some delay, it was told him, he must either pay the money or go to prison. But some men seeing his friends and suffragans forsake him, voluntarily offered themselves as sureties for him, and five (not there named) became bound, every one in an hundred pounds.

"On the last day of the Council before he entered into the Court, the Bishops came to him astonished, and affrighted at the things they had heard, whence they did not openly for any enormity, but as it were by way of insinuation artificially persuade him, That he should in all things, even to what belonged to the Archbishopric submit himself to the king's pleasure, if he could so appease his wrath and indignation. Adding, That unless he did it, he would be accused of Perjury, and judged as a Traytor, because he had not observed his Oath of Fealty or Fidelity he had sworn to the king, by which he was bound to maintain his terrene honor; nor had observed the king's customs or laws, to which he had specially bound himself by a new oath. He was not much dismayed, that the world so frowned on him, but that which was to him most detestable above all things was, that he collected from the words of the bishops, that they were ready to judge him not only in civil, but also in criminal causes in a secular court. And therefore he forbade them all, by virtue of holy Obedience, and under peril of their Order, That they for the future should not be present in Court when his person was judged. And that they might not do it, he appealed to their Mother the Roman Church, the refuge of all oppressed. But notwithstanding what he said, all the bishops hastened to the court except two, London, and Winchester, who privately staid behind and comforted him.

"After this he went into the king's Chamber carrying the Cross himself erected, expecting the king's coming: The Bishops dissuaded this, as an undecent posture, and would not that he should have proceeded after this manner. The king took notice of it, and by Out-Cries or Proclamation made by an Herald, called together all the Bishops and great men, to whom he made a great and grievous complaint, that the Archbishop had in reproach of himself, and the kingdom or government, so entered the Court as a notable Traitor, and so insolently, as no Christian prince had ever seen or heard of the like behaviour. All were of the king's opinion, declaring him always a vain and proud man, and that such ignominy not only reflected upon the king and kingdom, but upon themselves also, and said it had worthily happened to him, who had made such a man the second person in the kingdom; to whom all were subject and none his equal. Therefore they all declared him a manifest Traitor, and to be punished accordingly, who had not according to his Oath observed terrene honor toward his prince, from whom he had received so many and so great advantages, but rather in this fact, had impressed upon the king and kingdom, a perpetual mark of Treason, sed potius in hoc facto, & Regi & Regno perpetuum proditionis Maculam impressisset, (they are the Author's words) and therefore he ought to be punished as the king's perjured man, and Traitor, and this was the voice of them all, & propterea in eum tanquam in Regis perjurum, & proditorem animadvertendum, & super hoc clamor omnium invalescebat.

"The Bishops, by leave from the king, consulted apart, for they were either to incur his indignation, or with the great men, in a Criminal Cause, to condemn their Archbishop, which for the manifest violation of holy Sanctions or Canons, they dare not do. At length the matter was thus patch'd up by common council or contrivance of the Bishops; That they would appeal the Archbishop of perjury in the court of Rome, and bound themselves to the king in the word of truth, That they would use their utmost endeavour to depose him. Having thus obliged themselves to the king, they all went from him to the Archbishop, and Hilary bishop of Chichester, in the name, of the rest, told him, That he had been their Archbishop, and then they were bound to obey him. But because he had sworn fealty to the king, and did endeavour to destroy his laws and customs, especially such as belonged to his terrene dignity and honor, therefore they declared him Guilty of perjury, and that for the future they were not to obey a perjured Archbishop. And therefore put themselves, and what was theirs, under the Pope's protection, and appealed to his presence, and appointed him a day to answer these matters.

"The king and chief men, (without the Bishops) sitting in Judgment, Rege cum principibus (pontificibus substractis) sedente pro Tribunali, it was most certainly believed, the Archbishop would have been imprisoned, or somewhat worse have been done to him; for the king and all the great men that were present, judged him perjured and a traitor. And the Earls and Barons and much company went from the king to the Archbishop, of whom the chiefest person, Robert earl of Leicester, told him, he was to come and answer what was objected against him, as he had promised to do the day before, or he must hear his Sentence; he rising up said, 'Sentence! yea son Earl, hear you, when the Church of Canterbury was given to me, I asked what manner of person that would make me, and it was answered free and exempt from the King's Court. Et responsum est, liberum & quietum ab omni serui Curiali me redderet. Free therefore and absolute as I am, I will not, nor am I bound to answer to those things from which I am exempt.' And then added, 'My son Earl, observe, by how much the soul is more worthy than the body, by so much the more I am to obey God than a terrene prince. But neither law nor reason, permits that children or sons should condemn or judge their fathers, and therefore I decline the sentence of the king, yourself, and others, as being to be judged under God alone, by the Pope.' Unde Regis et tuum et aliorum Judicium declino, sub Deo solo a Domino Papa judicandum. To whose presence I do, before you all, appeal, putting both the dignity and order of the Church of Canterbury, and my own, with all things belonging unto them, under God's protection and his. Nevertheless you my Brethren and fellow-Bishops, because you obey man rather than God, I call you to the Audience and Judgment of the Pope; and as from the enemies of the Catholic Church, by authority of the Apostolic See, I retire from hence.—And so made his Escape, as hath been before related."

The severe and lasting evils to the King, the Archbishop, and the English nation, which followed these transactions, are circumstantially related in lord Lyttleton's History of the Reign of Henry 2.

2. Articles of Accusation against HUBERT DE BURGH, with the Answers of Master Laurence, clerk, of St. Albans, on behalf of Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, against whom our Lord the King had advanced certain very heavy Charges. 23 Hen. III. A. D. 1239. [Matth. Paris's Hist. 516, and Additamenta, 151. 1 Brady, Appendix, No. 152.]

WHEREAS, a day had been assigned to Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, on the eighth day after the day of St. John the Baptist, in the 23rd year of his majesty's reign, to answer to our lord the king, what amends he should make to him for not having delivered him the money received for the marriage of Richard de Clare, on the day by the said lord the king to him given, according to the Agreement between them made, or according to the judgment of his peers. And that our lord the king had required of him, that he should pay to him the said amends; and he had not done the same. The underwritten trespasses, together with those aforesaid, were, on the behalf of our lord the king, laid before him that he might make Answer thereunto. To which the said earl made answer, That, as to these matters, no day had been given to him. And farthermore he asked that, on any reasonable day to be fixed, he would give satisfaction to his lord the king, or would abide by the judgment of his peers concerning the premises. And he prayed that the lord the king would set forth before him, in writing, the several Articles to which he is required to make Answer.

[Here seems to be some omission.]

As to this, the Earl answers, that he appeared on each of the days assigned to him by his lord the king, and in no respect sought delay; but always observed the day appointed unto him by the will of our lord the king. Whereby it appears to him, all the days assigned to him for appearance, after his being at Kenentone, should be taken as to his case to be as one day. And he is still ready to submit to the judgment of his peers, that neither he, nor any one on his behalf, ever interfered concerning the said marriage, after the oath which he made at Gloster, that he would not interfere in the same; nor doth he know, nor hath he ever known, any thing about the said marriage, other than by the mere information of the Countess, his wife, who informed him, that the said marriage was contracted at St. Edmund's, while the earl was at Mertone. And if this shall not be sufficient he will make further answer; and he is ready to do herein whatever his peers shall think fit.

1. The first Article is, "That his lord the king requires of him, An account of all the revenue of the kingdom, for the 14 years next following the death of king John, his father, from which time he took upon him the keeping and management of the same, without any authority from his father the lord John the king, and without the assent of the lord Gwalla, then legate, who, by the common consent and provision of the whole realm, after the death of the Marshall, was first counsellor and chief administrator of the whole realm of England."—To this he made Answer, That certain persons were deputed to answer concerning the profits of the realm; to wit, the treasurer and chamberlains, wherefore, after the death of Eustace de Faucumberg, bishop of London, and treasurer, it was required, that his Account should be answered to, and it was answered to. Afterwards, an account of the whole profits of the realm was required from the bishop of Carlisle, as being receiver-general, and he accordingly sat down and gave the said Account.—Afterwards, an Account was required from Peter de Rivalis; but from the Justiciar an Account should never be required, because he is not the receiver of the profits of the realm. Whereby it appears, that he who receives nothing, is in nothing held answerable. And he says, that the lord king John committed to him the office of Justiciar at Runnengemedede, in presence of the lord Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, earl of Warren, earl de Ferrars, and other great men of the nation; and he continued Justiciar throughout the whole time of king John. But it happened, that the castle of Dover, at the time of the invasion of king Louis, was esteemed to be untenable. Into this castle he entered, when few were found who were willing so to do, unless he would place his own person there; and, during the continuance of that war, he was unable to leave that castle, or to execute the office of Justiciar.—But, king John dying in time of war, Marshall was appointed governor of the king, and of the kingdom, by the advice of Gwalla, then legate, and of the great men of the kingdom, who, at that time, were with our lord the king. And after the return of peace, the said Marshall remained governor of the king and kingdom, and the said Hubert Justiciar, without any opposition. And after the death of Marshall, by the advice of Gwalla, then legate, of Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, of the bishops and great men of the land, he continued Justiciar without any opposition; and our lord the Pope always wrot to him as Justiciar, and so he was always esteemed by the church, and by the kingdom, as Justiciar couattituted by John the lord the king. And so it plainly appears, that he did not take the office of Justiciar but by the commission of his lord king John, and the assent of lord Gwalla; and if this be not sufficient, he will make farther Answer; and upon this he is ready to do what his peers shall adjudge; and moreover, if he ought to make Answer, he has the charter of our lord the king, absolving him from the premises, which he proffers, and which was made in the 15th year of the reign of king Henry.

2. "Concerning the collection of a whole Fifteenth, which, according to the great council of the whole kingdom, ought to have been kept and held in deposit, and so that no part of it should have been taken until the arrival at age of our lord the king, unless under the inspection of six bishops and six earls specially appointed for the purpose; nor so but for the defence of the kingdom; the amount of which was about 89,000 marks of silver."—Answer. The lords bishops of Salisbury and Bath received the said money by direction of the great council of the kingdom, and gave in their account concerning the same, and were discharged therefrom by the letters of our lord the king. By which it doth not appear that he ought to answer at all as to this matter, since other persons have been acquitted for the same, as appears by the rolls of the exchequer and by the letters patent of our lord the king, which are in the treasury; and therefore, as he has received no part of the said money, he is not bound to answer concerning the same; and if this, &c. and upon, &c. and moreover, he has the charter of our lord the king, which &c.

3. "Concerning the territory in Poitou, of which king John died seized, and of which our lord the king, that now is, had seisin, when the said earl took upon him the custody of the realm; to wit, the territory of Rochelle, Niort, and St. John, who, when he ought, for the rescue of those territories, to have sent treasure and corn, sent barrels filled with stones and sand, so that when the barons and great men of our lord the king, and the burghesses, perceived that default, they abandoned the homage and service of our lord the king, and turned themselves to the enemies of our lord the king, by means whereof our lord the king lost Poitou."—Answer. He never sent such barrels as are spoken of, and this he will maintain in a manner that his peers shall adjudge; but by the advice of the great men of England there were sent to the defence of Rochelle upwards of one hundred knights, and very many attendants, who were there with our lord the king, until the citizens and people of that land revolted from the homage of our lord the king, so that Rochelle was not lost by his negligence, or the negligence of the soldiers there being, because, against their will, the citizens delivered up the territory to the king of the French. And this manifestly appears, because, though the knights of our lord the king were in the town, the citizens removed them from their council, and made peace, without the soldiers, upon condition that the soldiers should be at liberty to retire with safety to their persons and with their harness. Moreover, Rochelle was lost through the excesses of Falco, (Falcaus de Breaut,) which Falco and his people rose against our lord the king while Rochelle was besieged; which Falco also, by his brother William, caused Henry of Braybroc, Justiciar in eye of our lord the king, to be seized; on account of whose seizure and other unjust doings of the said Falco, it became necessary that the king and nobles should besiege the castle of Bedford (according to Brady, Bedford) by the advice of the archbishops, bishops, and nobles of the land, which bishops also there excommunicated Falco, whereby the guilt of the said Falco manifestly appears; otherwise they would not have excommunicated him. And if Falco had escaped with impunity, and the castle had not been taken, the kingdom would have been more disturbed than it was; and if, &c. and upon, &c.

4. "That while our lord the king was under age, and it was necessary to succour Poitou, and the king's army should have gone to Poitou, the earl caused the castle of Bedford to be besieged, where our lord the king and his great men of England expended a very large quantity of money before it was taken. And when it was taken, he caused it to be polled down and given to William de Beauchamp, from whom our lord king John had taken that castle in war, and whereof the said king John was seized when he died."—Answer. The said castle was not besieged by him only, but by the direction of the great council of the kingdom, and by reason of the misconduct of Falco and his adherents, because he caused Henry de Braybroc, the Justiciar of our lord the king, to be seized by William de Breaute, his brother. By reason whereof our lord the king sent his letters often and again to the said Falco for the release of his Justiciar, and his brother would not do any thing in obedience to these letters. The king also sent his letters to William de Breaute, who answered, that he would not restore the said Henry without his brother, and that his brother would well avow what he did. Wherefore the lord the king, having holden a council with his great men, proceeded as far as Bedford, and sent Peter Fitz-Herbert, and Alan Basset, to those who were in the castle, desiring that they would deliver Henry de Braybroc, his Justiciar, whom they kept imprisoned, and that they would come to make amends for the offence in the caption of the said Justiciar of the lord the king; and they answered, that they would do nothing for the lord the king, and that they would detain the said Henry, and would seize more if they could; wherefore, by the advice of the great men of England, the castle was besieged, taken, and destroyed. And, being destroyed, the site of the castle was given to William de Beauchamp by the advice of the great men of England for this reason, that in the treaty of peace, made between the lord the king and the lord Louis and barons, it was agreed, that each should hold the same possessions which he had at the beginning of the war; and the lord Gwalla the legate, the archbishop and bishops, excommunicated all who should violate that treaty of peace; and because the said William had always claimed from the said Falco the said castle as his right, but could not obtain the same, until it was taken by the lord the king; the same lord the king, on account of the treaty of peace which had been made, and through fear of the sentence which had been pronounced, restored to him the scite of the castle to be held in the same manner as his ancestors had held it, as appears in the Rolls of the lord the king; and the said William gave of his property to the lord the king, that he might have such seisin; and if this, &c. and upon this, &c.

5. "That he had sent messengers to Rome, and before the lord the king was of full age, had obtained that he should be of full age, as if this had been for the advantage of the lord the king, and by authority of this his age, had caused to be granted, by charter to himself, lands which had been of Henry de Essex, and many other lands, dignities, and franchises, of which, by his own authority, he took possession after the death of king John, and of which the said king John died seized, as he also caused to be given and confirmed to religious persons, ecclesiastics and others, many lauds and franchises and other things, to the lessening and great detriment of the dignity of the lord the king and his crown."—Answer. He did not send messengers to Rome, but the bishop of Winchester sent to Rome William de St. Albans for the said business, more to the damage of the said Hubert than to his advantage, that he and others might render up their charges, and so it was done at Northampton. Afterwards, by the common advice of the archbishops and bishops, it was provided, that the king should have a seal, and that writs should run in his name, that so he might be of more awe and greater authority in the kingdom. Afterwards, licence of his age was obtained at the suggestion of the archbishops, bishops, earls, and barons, from pope Honorius, for they suggested to the pope, that his prudence and discretion supplied his age, as is contained in the permission of pope Honorius, which begins thus: "Although, to this time, the youth of our most dear son in Christ, Henry, the illustrious king of England, is computed by his years, yet, because, as we have heard and rejoice at, he has acquired a manly mind, and because his prudence exceeds his age, so that he seems to make up in the virtue of discretion what he wants in number of years; from this time he is not to be forbidden to make useful dispositions concerning his kingdom, and the affairs of his kingdom; and, therefore, we command by this apostolic writing, as with our venerable brother, the bishop of Winchester, and the noble persons, the Justiciar of England and William de Bruwera, we give in command by our letters, that henceforward they commit to him the full and quiet government of his kingdom;" and to the earl of Chester he wrote in this manner: "By this apostolic writing we order and command, that now you commit to him the government of his kingdom, and, without any difficulty, resign to him, and procure to be resigned by others, the lands and castles which you hold in the name of guardianship." In the same words he wrote to the bishop of Winchester: but to the chancellor he wrote thus: "By this apostolic writing we command, for as much as you have the seal of the said king, and the custody thereof, that from henceforward you will use the same according to his good pleasure, and with respect to it, only follow and obey him; and for the future cause no letters to be sealed with the royal seal, but according to his will." As to the laud of Henry de Essex, he says, that the lord the king of his grace, when he was of full age, and after the chancellor, by the direction of the lord the Pope, obeyed him, only gave him, by charter, that land, and also restored him the land as his right after he came to his peace; and if this, &c. and upon this, &c.

6. "That whereas the lord William, king of Scotland, formerly delivered to the lord king John his two daughters, the elder (a) of whom was to be married to the lord the king, or to earl Richard, if the lord the king should die; and for which marriage the same king William released king John all his right which he had in the lands of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Northumberland; and besides, gave to him 15,000 marks in silver; he, before the lord the king was of such age as to be able to determine whether he would take her to wife or not, married her; so that, when the lord the king came of age, he was obliged to give the king of Scotland who now is, 800 oxgangs of land for the release of the lands aforesaid, because the first agreement had not been observed, and thus, notwithstanding he had before married the countess of Gloster, who had formerly been betrothed to the lord king John while he was earl, and whom king John had committed to his custody, and whose marriage he had formerly sold to G. de Mandeville for 20,000 marks, whereby each of them was connected in a certain degree of consanguinity."—Answer. He never knew of the agreement entered into by the two kings; to wit, about the marriage to be had with the lord the king, or earl Richard; but that she ought to be disposed of in marriage by the lord the king, with the advice of his great men; and that she was disposed of in marriage by their advice, appears as well by the letters of the lord Pandulph, then legate of England, as by the letters of the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops, earls, and barons. Nor could the agreement, if it were made, hinder this, because, when she was married, the king was of such age that he could have contracted marriage with her or with another if he would. About the consanguinity between the countess of Gloster, and the daughter of the king of Scotland, he knows nothing. About the 800 oxgangs of land, offered to the king of Scotland, nothing was done by the earl of Kent as to the countess of Gloster; he says, that she was not in the custody of Hubert, but was mistress of herself, and had a right to marry herself to whom she would, after the death of G. de Mandeville, since the lord king John had before sold the marriage of the said countess to the said G. and if this, &c. and upon this, &c.

7. "Whereas the lord the pope commanded that, on account of the said relationship, a divorce should be made between him and the countess, his wife, whom he now hath; he caused all the corn in the ear, belonging to the Romans, to be threshed out by those who were called Lewytlicil. In consequence whereof, a general sentence of excommunication was passed against all those offenders, and those who favoured them; and this he did while he was Justiciar and bound to keep the peace, and so that by these means the peace continues disturbed to this time."—Answer. He knows nothing of it, because the thing was not done by him, which plainly appears, because the lord the pope caused an inquisition to be made into this matter by the bishop of Winchester and the abbot of St. Edmund's. And the inquisition made was transmitted to the pope, by which inquisition it plainly appeared that he was not in fault, because, if he had been, the pope would have punished him, which he did not; and if, &c. and upon this, &c.

8. "Whereas he had placed himself in the prison of the lord the king, and by the agreement made between them, he was to be taken to be an outlaw, if he should ever escape from that prison without the licence of the lord the king. He did escape from that prison; and whereas, by that agreement, and by the suit of those from whose custody he had escaped, he was become an outlaw; and afterwards the lord the king had received him into his favour, he would not accept any writ of the lord the king for the remission of that outlawry. And when he was afterwards received into the favour of the lord the king, with the condition, that the grants which the lord the king had before made of the lands, which, by the aforesaid agreement, should stand good; he nevertheless afterwards, contrary to that agreement, impleaded John de Gray, Masty, Besly, Anketill, Malure, Robert Passelewe, Alan Urry, and many others, and recovered against them, by reason whereof the lord the king exchanged with some of them, parts of his own demesne to his great damage; wherefore it appears to the lord the king, that he is not obliged to observe his agreement with the said earl, who, in no respect, has observed the same on his part."

—Answer. He made no such agreement; and he says, that, when he was in the custody of four earls of England, who had it in command that no danger should happen to his person, those keepers who were bound to defend him from harm were afterwards removed, and he knows not by whom, so that he was reasonably in fear for himself, and particularly since the bishop of Winchester was the counsellor of the lord the king, who had threatened him, as England knows, and the castle of Devizes was in the custody of Peter de Rivall. As therefore the guard which, by agreement, should have protected him while he was so in custody, was removed from him, it was no wonder if he fled to the church; and this he would on no account have done, if the agreement had been kept with him in his safe custody. As to what is said of the outlawry, he says, that he did not make such an agreement, and that such an agreement ought not to be held of any force, because no good and true man can be outlawed by agreement, for outlawry is a punishment of an evil-doer, and not of a well-doer, and follows from the misconduct of one who will not stand to the right; but he was not such, for he always desired and offered to stand to the judgment of his peers. Afterwards, when he returned to the peace of the lord the king, all the premises were pardoned him, and the outlawry was adjudged and proclaimed null by all the earls of England by the letters of the lord the king, and that judgment was made at Gloster, by the mouth of the lord W. de Radleghe, before the archbishops, the bishops, earls, and barons. To what is said of his refusing to accept a writ for reversal of the outlawry, he answers, that he did this that it might not seem that he confessed himself to have been outlawed justly as a malefactor. And he says, that he impleaded no one contrary to agreement, because he had made no agreement with the lord the king, except about the office of Justiciar of England, and about the castle of Dover, which he held, by charter, for his life; and this well appears, because he recovered against those whom he impleaded by the will of the lord the king, and in his court, and by the judgment of his court: wherefore he is not to blame as to this. And if, &c. and upon this, &c.

8. "That he spake base (b) and scandalous

(b) According to M. Paris, it was alleged against Hubert, that, in order to prevent the marriage of the king with some great lady, probably the daughter of the duke of Austria, he had said, that the king squinted, and was foolish and worthless, had a leprosy appearance, was deceitful and perjured, weak, ex-wards of the lord the king, in the presence of the lord Ralph, son of Nicholas, Godfrey de Cramcumbe, the brother of G. and others; and the lord the king still has many things to be proposed and alledged against him, which, for the perusal, he reserves in his mind to propose when it shall please him and occasion shall serve." This he positively denies, as against his lord, and against all others, who shall say it, and this he will maintain in any manner that his peers shall adjudge, and all the premises at the restoration of peace were pardoned to him, and remitted in law; wherefore it does not appear that he is liable to be questioned at law, concerning the premises; and if, in any of the matters aforesaid, he has answered insufficiently, the earl is ready to make further answer. Moreover it appears to him, that he is not liable to answer, unless restitution be made to him, of all his goods whereof he has been disseised, since no man is held liable to answer in a secular or ecclesiastical court, while disseised of his property.

A day was given to the same Hubert, before our lord the king, for hearing his Sentence on the morrow of the beheading of St. John.—M. Paris says, that Hubert sufficiently proved his innocence, to all who heard him, in spite of all the exertions, on the part of the king, to establish his guilt; but yet that, to appease the king's anger and rancour against the Earl, it was adjudged, that the Earl should resign to the king four of his castles of which he was particularly fond; namely, Blanch, Grosmund, in Walce, Skenefrith, and Hatfield.—For more particulars of the history of this Hubert de Burgh, Brady's History may be consulted. 3. Proceedings against PIERS GAVESTON, 35 Ed. I. 5 Ed. II. A. D. 1307. [Cl. 35 Ed. I. M. 13. Dors. Rot. Parl. 5 Ed. II. Brady's Hist.]

IN the time of the last parliament of king Edward the 1st, held at Carlisle in the last year of his reign, notice being taken of the great familiarity there was between the prince and Piers de Gaveston, and what influence he had upon, and power over the prince; but whether upon the king's own observation, or their pressing him to it (I find not) nor for what particular reasons, on the 26th of February at Lanercost by the king's order and command (not on his death-bed as commonly storied) he was banished England, and to be ready to quit it at Dover, three weeks after the tournament or justs, which should be 15 days after Easter next coming, and not to return without the king's leave, and calling him back; and for the performance of this order, monsieur Piers at the day and place aforesaid, made oath upon the Body of God, (i. e. the consecrated host) the old cross, and the king's other reliques; and the prince of Wales made oath in like manner, That he would not receive, retain, or permit the said Piers to be with him contrary to this order, unless he was recalled by, and had leave from his father to return; and for his subsistence beyond sea, so long as he staid there, monsieur Piers had allowed him an 100 marks sterling by the year out of the revenues of Gascony. On the death of Edward the 1st he returned to England, and was received with great favour by king Edward the 2nd, who made him earl of Cornwall, constituted him his guardian and lieutenant of the kingdom, for the better conservation of the peace and quiet thereof, while he should be beyond the seas, or during his pleasure. And he gave him power to grant Licences of choosing pastors of cathedral and conventual churches, to take their sealries when elected and confirmed, and restore the temporalities, to give prebends and vacant benefices, which were of his collation or presentation, and dispose of wardships and marriages which might happen in his absence. The king's partiality to Gaveston occasioned great discontent and many contests between the king and his barons. In the fifth year of his reign, it was, among other ordinances against Gaveston, ordained in parliament and confirmed by the king:

"For that by the examination of prelates, earls, barons, knights, and other good people of the realm, it was found that Piers de Gaveston had evilly counselled the king, and had inticed him to do ill in divers manners; that he cheated the king of his treasure, and sent it beyond sea; that he accroached to himself royal power and dignity, in making alliances with people upon oath, to live and die with him against all men; that he put from the king good officers, and placed about him those of his covin and party, as well strangers as others; that he estranged the king's heart from his liege people, so as he despised their counsels; that he caused the king to grant lands, tenements, and offices to himself and his heirs, and divers other people, to the great damage and injury of the king and his crown; that he caused blank charters to be sealed with the great seal, in deceit and disinheritance of the king and crown; that he maintained robbers and murderers, causing the king to pardon them; that king Edward, the father of the present king, ordered him to forswear the realm of England, and directed that his son the present king should for ever forswear his company; and for several other reasons, as the nourishing of concord between the king and his people, and the eschewing of many perils and discords, it was ordained the said Piers should for ever be exiled out of England, Scot-and, Wales, and Ireland, and all the king's dominions either on this side or beyond the sea, between that time and the feast of All-Saints next following (having Dover assigned him for his port to pass from, and no other) and if he should be found in England, or any other part of the king's dominions beyond that day, then he should be treated as an enemy to the king, kingdom, and people."

He accordingly quitted the kingdom, but was soon afterwards recalled by the king, and falling into the hands of the earl of Warwick, was by him put to death.

4. Proceedings against HUGH and HUGH LE DESPENCER, 13 Edw. II. A. D. 1320. [Brady's History, 128.]

SHORTLY after the fall of Gaveston, the two Despensers, father and son, acquired a very great ascendancy over king Edward 2. The manner in which they exercised the power with which he invested them, so exasperated the nobles, that they took up arms to obtain justice against the Despensers; and after many violent proceedings they entered into the following Confederacy at Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, in 1320.

"The CONFEDERACY of the earls and barons against Hugh and Hugh le Despenser.

"This Indenture Witnesseth, That on the Sunday next after the feast of St. John Baptist, in the 14th year of the king, at Sherborn in Eledede, in the presence of the archbishop of York, the bishops of Durham and Carlisle, the earls of Lancaster and Ænegos, it was considered, That Hugh le Despenser, the father and the son, had ill counselled and moved the king, to the dishonour and damage of him and of his kingdom; and having heard and understood the reasons of the earl of Hereford, Roger de Mortimer the nephew and uncle, Hugh de Audely the father and son, Roger Dammory, John de Mowbray, Maurice de Berkeley, Roger de Clifford, Henry de Teys, John Giffard, Thomas Mauduit, Gilbert Talbot, and other great men, and others of the Marches (i. e. of Wales.) And notice of Information having been given to the earls of Lancaster and Ænegos, Monsieur Robert de Holland, Fonk de Estrange, Stephen de Segrave, William le Latimer, John Devcry, John de Harrington, Adam de Swington, William de Kyme, Marmaduke de Tweng, Richard Walleys, Robert Pierpount, Ranulph Dacre, Edmund Deyncourt, Thomas Willeby, William de Penington, Ralph de Nevill, Giles de Trumpton, John de Beker, Adam de Hodeleston, Michael de Haverington, Adam de Everingham, William Trussel, Robert de Rigate, Robert de Richer, John de Clifford, Henry de Bradbourn, Nicholas de Langeford, John de Brekeworth, Thomas Wycher, John de Cliff, Thomas de Longuevillers, Edmund de Nevill, Gaslein Daniel: That the earl of Hereford, Monsieur Roger de Mortimer, and other great men of the Marches, and others above-named, have begun quarrels and complaints against monsieur Hugh the father and son; and that 'tis done to the honour of God, the honour and profit of the king and of his kingdom. And it seemed to them all, that the oppressions could not be taken off from the people, until they had Hugh the father and son in their possession, or they were banished: And it was with one Assent of them all there, whoever they were, That the quarrels or complaints before named, should be maintained to the honour of God and of holy Church, to the profit of the king, the queen, and their children, and the safety of the crown and people. And so as the earl of Lancaster and other great men which began this quarrel will maintain it, so the earl of Ænegos, and all named after him, with them will maintain it with all their power. And whenever the earl of Lancaster and other great men shall leave the quarrel, the earl of Ænegos, and all those named after him, may leave it, without being accused or questioned for it. And to maintain these things, the earl of Ænegos and all others after him, put to their seals." This was the part of the Indenture agreed and sealed to by the earl of Ænegos.

From whence they march to St. Albans, plundering victuals every where in their march, and oppressing the poor. Per viam diripientes ubique victualia & pauperes terre gratantes; from whence they sent the bishops of London, Salisbury, Ely, Hereford, and Chichester (then at St. Albans, to make peace) to the king at London; not only to send Hugh and Hugh the two traitors from his court, but also out of the kingdom. The king's answer was, That Hugh the father was beyond sea in his service, and Hugh the son was at sea for the guarding of the Cinque Ports according to his duty; and that according to right and custom, they ought not to be banished without answering for themselves. The king had summoned a parliament on the 15th of May, to meet three weeks after Midsummer, on the 15th of July, at Westminster. The barons, upon the receipt of the king's Answer, go to London with horse and arms, notwithstanding the king had commanded them to come to the parliament in due manner; there they held a council by themselves, and came not to Westminster as they were summoned, but remained in London with horse and arms fifteen days after the king had begun and holden his parliament, when they made the Award against the two Spencers, and concealed it from the king, who knew nothing of it, until the hour they came with it to Westminster with force and arms, so as the king could not hinder the passing of it, which was to this effect:

"To the honour of God and Holy Church, and of our lord the king, for the profit of him and his realm, and to maintain peace amongst his people and the estate of the crown, the prelates, earls, barons, and other peers of the land and commons of the realm, do shew against sir Hugh le Despenser, father and son, That Whereas sir Hugh the son at the parliament at York was named, and it was there agreed he should be chamberlain to the king; in which parliament it was agreed, That certain prelates and other great men should be with the king by turns, at several seasons of the year, the better to advise him, without whom no great business ought to pass. The said sir Hugh the son, drawing to him his father, who was not by order of parliament to be near the king, or to be one of those counsellors, between them both have usurped royal power over the king and his ministers, and the government of the kingdom, to the dishonour of the king, the injury of the crown, and destruction of the kingdom, great men, and people; and have done the wickednesses under-written, in contriving to turn the heart of the king from the peers of the land, that they may have the sole government thereof.—1. That sir Hugh the son made a Bill or writing, whereby he would have had sir John Gifford of Brimmesfield, sir Richard de Greye, and others, entered into a Confederacy to have forced the king to do what he would have him; and had almost done it. The tenour of the Bill is under-written.—2. Homage and the oath of allegiance is more by reason of the crown than of the person of the king, and bound him more to the crown than the person; and this appeared, for that before the crown descends, there is no allegiance due to the person expectant. Wherefore in case the king carries not himself by reason, in right of the crown, his lieges are bound by oath made to the crown to remove the king and the state of the crown by reason; and otherwise the oath ought not to be kept. Then it was demanded, whether the king was to be dealt with by suit of law, or by rigour (par suit de ley ou par aspertee;) by suit of law it could not be, for he had no judge. In which case, if the king's will be not according to reason, and that he maintains nothing but error; therefore to save their oath, and when the king will not redress what is injurious to the people, they must proceed with rigour; for he is bound by oath to govern his lieges, and his lieges are bound to govern in aid of him, and in default of him.—3. Also upon the application of the great men and people unto him, his answer was according to the pleasure of these two, in turning the king from his duty against his oath, and the hearts of the great men and people against their liege lord.—4. Also by their evil contrivance, they will not suffer the great men of the realm nor good counsellors to speak with, or come near the king to advise him, nor the king to speak to them, unless in their presence and hearing, or of one of them, and when they please; they usurping royal power and sovereignty over the person of the king, to the great dishonour and peril of him, the crown and the kingdom.—5. Also to attain to their wickedness, covetousness, and disinheriting the great men, and destruction of the people, they put out good and agreeable ministers placed by assent, and put in others false and wicked of their party, who will not suffer right to be done as sheriffs, escheators, constables of castles, and make justices not understanding the law, as sir Hugh the father, sir Ralph Basset, sir Ralph Camois, and sir John Inge, and others their friends; who caused to be indicted, by false jurors of their alliance, the peers of the land, as the earl of Hereford, M. Giffard of Brimmesfield, and M. Robert de Monshall, and other good people, to get their lands.—6. Also they falsely and maliciously advised the king to raise arms against his people in Gloucestershire, contrary to the Great Charter, and the award of the peers of the land, and by their false and evil counsel, would have made war in the land for their own proper quarrel, to the destruction of Holy Church and the people.—7. Also whereas the earl of Hereford, and the lord of Wigmore (i. e. Mortimer) by the king's command were assigned to make war upon Lhwelin Bren, who had levied war against him in Glamorganshire, when the earl of Gloucester's lands, by reason of his death, were in the king's hand; and Lhwelin had rendered himself into the lords hands to the king's grace and pleasure, and upon that condition delivered him to the king, who received him accordingly; but when these lords were out of the country, these two, the father and son, usurping royal power, took Lhwelin and carried him to Cardiff, after that sir Hugh the younger was seized thereof (as of his share of the earl of Gloucester's estate, one of whose daughters and heirs he had married) pretending to a jurisdiction, where none was in this case; and there caused him to be drawn, hanged, beheaded, and quartered, feloniously for things done in the time of king Henry: and also took upon them royal power and jurisdiction, which was appendant to the crown, in disinheritance of the crown, and dishonour of the king, the said lords of Hereford and Mortimer, and in ill example and great peril in the like case in time to come.—8. Also they ill advised the king to take into his hands the lands and goods of sir Hugh Audely the son, who was fore-judged without due process, contrary to the law of the land, by the covetousness of the said Hugh to get some of those lands; and by other false compassments contrived to have the lands of sir Roger Dammory, and for having him attainted for entering into Gloucestershire, in disinheritance of the peers of the land.—9. Also that whereas the king had granted by his letters patents to the earl of Warwick in full parliament at Westminster, That after his death his executors should have his lands until his heir was of age; which grant, after the earl's death, was confirmed by the king at Lincoln, at the request and assent of the peers of the land in parliament, the said sir Hugh the father procured his son to cause the king to repeal

this grant without cause, and to give to the said Hugh the father, for his own profit, the guard of those lands; and also had defeated by evil counsel what the king had granted in his parliaments by good advice, and by assent of the peers of the land, to the dishonour of the king, and against right and reason.—10. Also, that they would not suffer the king to take reasonable fines of the peers of the land and others, when they entered and received their fees, as it had been used before that time: but by covetousness, to get such lands by the royal power they had gained, they caused undue impeachments to be brought, surmising the land was forfeit, as of sir John de Mowbray for the lands of Gower, and of others, to the damage and dishonour of the king, and contrary to the law of the land, in disinheritance of the great men and others. Also making the king do against his oath in parliament.—11. Also by wicked covetousness and power royal they will not suffer the king to hear or do right to the great men, upon what they presented to him, for himself and themselves touching the disheriting the crown and them touching the lands which were the Templers. Also by usurped power royal they governed the king, his council, and his prelates, that in matters concerning them and their friends, or which they undertook, no right could be obtained but according to their pleasure; to the damage and dishonour of the king, the peril of his oath, and disinheritance and destruction to the people of his realm.—12. Also bishops, abbots, and priors elect, who ought to be received of the king when duly elected, cannot come near him, nor speak with him to obtain his favour, until they have agreed and made fine with sir Hugh the son according to his pleasure; nor any that had any grant to ask of the king could obtain it, before they had made fine with him.—Which wickednesses are notorious and true, as it is found by the examination of the earls, barons, and other peers of the land: Wherefore we peers of the land, earls and barons, in the presence of our lord the king, do award, That Hugh le Despenser the son, and Hugh le Despenser the father, shall be disinherited for ever, as disinheritors of the crown, and enemies to the king and his people, and to be banished the kingdom of England, never to return again, 'unless it be by the assent of the king, and by the assent of the prelates, earls, and barons in parliament duly summoned;' to avoid the realm between that time and the feast of the decollation of St. John Baptist, or 29th of August next coming; and if found in England after that day, or if they returned after that day, then to be done unto as to the enemies of the king and kingdom."—This in the printed copy is called, Exilium Hugonis le Despenser, patri & filii; the Banishment of Hugh Despenser, father and son.

These Articles appear to have been admitted and taken for granted, without any direct proof, as the manner then was to proceed in parliament.

After they had by force obtained these things, and in this manner, they bethought themselves of some security for what they had done, setting forth, That they could not be obtained by process of law, for that the two Despensers usurping royal power, and having the king and his ministers, and the direction of the law at their devotion, or in their power, the great men of the land made a Confederacy by oath, writing, and in other manner, without the king's leave; and then they and others, with horse and arms, marched against others, with the king's and their own arms displayed, and took and seized upon castles, towns, manors, lands, tenements, goods and chattels of the king's liege subjects; and others of them they took and imprisoned, others they ransomed, and some they killed, and did many other things, in destroying the said Hugh and Hugh, and their allies and others, in England, Wales, and the Marches, of which some may be called felonies; which things having been so done by necessity, ought not to be taken notice of, or punished by law, nor can be without great trouble or hazard of war. These great men pray the king for peace sake, for the assuaging of anger and rancour, and making unity in the land, and that he may more entirely have the hearts and good will of his people to defend his own countries, and offend his enemies; that it might be accorded and assented to in full parliament, by the king, prelates, earls, barons, and common (& la comon de royaum) that no great men of the realm, Prelate, Earl, Baron, Knight, Clerk, or Esquire for the Confederacy made by oath, writing, or in other manner, or for riding with the king's, or other arms displayed, nor for the taking, possessing, or detaining of castles, towns, manors, lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, the taking, imprisoning, and ransoming the king's liege-people, or for killing of men, other robberies, felonies, or other things done against the king's peace, which may be judged trespasses or felonies, from the beginning of the world to that day; and other people of what condition soever they were, for the trespasses and felonies aforesaid committed since Candlemas last past to that day, should not be impeached, grieved, or molested at the suit of the king or any other. But of all such things, by this statute and accord should be quit for ever, saving to every one, except the said Hugh and Hugh, their right to demand and recover their frank tenement, and their right, without punishment from the king, or giving damages to the party. And also, That it may be granted by the king in the said parliament, that if any earl, baron, or any great man, for themselves or others, whom they shall name to the chancellor, between this and St. Michael next coming, will have the king's pardon of sute of the peace, or what pertains to him, of all manner of felonies and trespasses done contrary to the peace; or of disobediences, contempts, conspiracies, confederations, privy covenants, and obligations, made against the king, should have their charter of pardon, without paying fees in the Chancery; and that all such writings where-ever found to be null. This was granted, and hath this title in print, Ne quis occisionetur pro felonis seu transgressionibus factis in prosecutione Hugonis le Despenser, patris & filii. That no man may be prosecuted for the felonies and transgressions committed in the prosecution of Hugh Despenser father and son: and there follows a charter of pardon granted to the earl of Hereford, according to this accord; dated the 20th of August next following, then in the 15th year of his reign.

In December following, Hugh Despenser, the younger, applied himself to the king for the repeal of his exile, who committed him to prison, and sent his petition to the archbishop of Canterbury, the other bishops and clergy being then in a provincial synod at London, to advise about, and give him their sense upon it, who judged the award, as to the exile and disinheritance, erroneous, against right, and obtained by force, without their consent, as peers of the land, and therefore advised and prayed the king to repeal, and make it null for ever; which was done, and the king granted him his protection and safe conduct, for his person and estate, by his letters patents, dated at Westminster, the 8th of December in the 15th of his reign.

On the 14th of March, in the 15th of his reign, the king at Derby issued his summons for a parliament to be holden at York three weeks after Easter next coming, into which parliament upon the petitions of Hugh Despenser, the father and son, (notwithstanding the son's had been reversed before) was brought before the king, the process and award for their disinheritance and exile, and upon shewing the errors in them, they were both revoked and made null.—“Whereas lately at our parliament summoned at Westminster to meet three weeks after the nativity of St. John Baptist last past, an award was made against sir Hugh le Despenser the son, and sir Hugh le Despenser the father, by certain great men of the realm, and then after the feast of St. Andrew next following, Hugh the son petitioned Us, shewing, That while he was in our service in the office of Chamberlain, and so appointed in full parliament, the earl of Hereford, M. Roger de Mortimer the nephew, M. Roger de Mortimer the uncle, M. Roger Damory, M. John de Mowbray, M. Hugh d'Audele the father, M. Hugh d'Audele the son, M. Roger de Clifford, M. John Giffard of Brimmesfield, M. Maurice de Berkeley, M. Henry de Tyes, M. John Maltravers, and many others, made a Confederacy by oaths and writing to pursue and destroy him, and upon this agreement all the above-named, with their retainues, came the Wednesday after the feast of the invention of Holy Cross, in the 14th year of the king, to Newport in Wales, with force and arms, that is, to wit, with 800 men at arms, with the banner of the king's arms displayed, and with 500 Hobelors, and 10,000 foot, to enter upon all his lands to destroy them, and with the same power and force to besiege his towns and castles, and took them by force, and killed part of his people, sir John Iwayn, Matthew de Gorges, and about 15 other Welshmen; and part they maimed, as sir Philip Joce; and part they took and imprisoned, as sir Ralph de Gorges, who was then in prison, M. Philip Joce, sir John de Fresingfield, sir John de Dunstable, William de Dunstable, and many others, which they freed upon ransom; and they took, carried, and drove away his goods and chattels found in his towns and castles; that is to say, 40 war horses, and armour for 200 men completely armed, and other warlike engines and implements, and victuals, wheat, wine, honey, salt, flesh, fish, and other victuals, to the value of 2,000*l.* and burnt all his charters, remembrances, and monuments they could find, to his loss 2,000*l.* They also burnt part of the gates of his castles, and houses, and took the irons out of the windows, and leads of the houses, &c. and carried them away, to the damage of 2,000*l.* and then sames ten castles in Wales, and the Marches, which they took and destroyed; and with the same force and power, they stayed in his lands totally to destroy them about 15 days, in which time they forced the greatest part of all the country to swear to be of their party, and those that would not, they imprisoned, put to ransom, and burnt their houses and goods; and in the same time they robbed and plundered him of all the moveables in and upon his manors, 60 large working mares with colts and foals of two years, 160 heifers, 400 oxen, 500 cows, with their breed for two years, 10,000 sheep, 400 hogs, and all other necessary things found upon them, as carts, ploughs, vessels, all these they took, drove, and carried away (without leaving any thing) from his manors, lands, and towns in Wales, which were 24 in number, to his damage of 2,000*l.* They burnt his granges, and destroyed his crop upon the ground, to his damage of 2,000*l.* and the debts which were owing him there, by force and cruelty they made his debtors pay unto them, to the value of near 3,000*l.* with fee-farm rents, and other customs, which amounted to near 1,000*l.* And from Wales with the same power and force they came into England, upon his castles, towns and manors there, and cut up his woods, unchaced his chaces, disparked his parks, pulled down his houses, robbed and rifled as much as they could any where find, to his damage of 10,000*l.* and then seized upon his friends, and his people, whereof some they put to ransom, some they rifled, and some they imprisoned, to the great grievance of them, and then by the same cruelties and hardships, they made the greatest part of the people against their wills, to be of their party, and sworn to them. And also with their force and power they came to the parliament at Westminster, and there upon false accusations, without calling the said Hugh to answer, against all manner of right and reason, and against the law of the land, erroneously awarded him to be disherited and exiled England, wherefore he prays the king, as he is bound by right of his crown, and by the oath he made at his coronation, to maintain all people in their rights, That he would please to cause to be brought before him the process of the award made against him, that it may be examined, and that the said Hugh may be received to shew the errors in it, and if there shall be any found, he would please to repeal and redress them, and to do further according to right and reason: and the said Hugh afterward shall be ready to stand to right, and to answer every complaint and accusation according to reason. And he sheweth the errors of the said process, for that the great men who pursued and destroyed him, prayed pardon of the king for all those things, which might be judged felonies or trespasses in that pursuit, which they made by their own authority, by which wrongfully they made themselves judges of him, where they could not, or ought not to be judges; also error, in that the said Hugh was not called into court, or to answer where the award was made; also error, in that the award was made without the assent of the prelates who were peers in parliament; Item, error, in that there was no record of their pursuit, or the causes contained in the award; also error, in that the award was made against the form of the Great Charter, wherein is contained, That no man shall be forejudged, nor in other manner destroyed, unless by judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; with request to the king to take notice, that the great men were summoned to come duely to the parliament, but did not, when they came with horse and arms, and all their force; Whereupon the said Hugh came and rendered himself prisoner to the king, praying he would receive him into his protection to prosecute his complaint, and that right might be done him in these matters; and the king received him as he ought to do, (sicome faire devions) and caused his petition to be carried to the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops, and other prelates, and the clergy of the province of Canterbury, then being in a provincial council at London, charging them by the faith they ought him, to advise about the petition, and let him know their thoughts concerning it; and when they had well advised concerning it, they answered, That it seemed to them, that the process and award of the exile, and disinheritation of Hugh the son, and father, were erroneous and wrongfully made, wherefore they agreed and unanimously assented, as peers of the land, and prayed as peers spiritual, That the award which was made wickedly and wrongfully against God, and all manner of right, (contre Dieu & tote manere de droit) might be by the king repealed and annulled for ever; and said further, That they nor none of them ever assented to the award: but that every one of them at the time when the award was made, in writing made protestation, That they could not or would assent to it for many causes; and the earl of Kent the king's brother, the earls of Richmond, Pembroke, and Arundel, before the king and prelates, said the award was wrongful, and against law and right, and prayed him, with the prelates, and as they had done before, to null and make void the award; and the earls affirmed, That for fear of the force, which the great men suddenly brought to the parliament to make the award, which was to them unknown and unexpected, they gave their assent to it, and also advised the king to suffer it to pass, for which offence and mistake they prayed his pardon."

And then afterwards another petition was delivered to the king, on behalf of Hugh the father, setting forth, That the same great men before named, and their adherents and confederates with force and arms, on the day of St. Barnaby, in the 14th year of the king, came to his manor of Fastern in Wiltshire, and twelve others in that shire, six in the county of Gloucester, four in Dorsetshire, five in Hampshire, two in Berkshire, six in Oxfordshire, three in Buckinghamshire, four in Surrey, one in Cambridgeshire, two in Huntingdonshire, five in Leicestershire, one in Yorkshire, one in Lincolnshire, five in Cheshire, and five in Warwickshire; in all 63 manors there named, where they made the same havoc, committed the same spoils, devastations, and destructions upon his houses and lands they had done upon his son's, and used his debtors, tenants, friends and people as those of his son; except that the loss of his goods, moveable and immoveable, in and upon his manors and lands, were greater: as namely, two crops of corn, one in the barns or granges, the other upon the ground; 28000 sheep, 1000 oxen and heifers, 1200 cows, with their breed for two years, 40 mares, with their breed for two years; 500 cart-horses, 2000 hogs, 400 kids, 40 ton of wine, 600 bacons, 80 carcasses of beef, 600 muttons in the larder, and 10 tons of cyder; Armour for 200 men, and other warlike engines and provisions, with the destruction of his houses, to his damage 30,000*l*. And at the same time they entered the Abbey of Langley in Wiltshire, broke up his coffers, and carried away 1000*l*. in silver, also his charters, evidence, and bond, cups of gold and silver, and other silver vessels and jewels, to his damage of 10,000*l*. And at the same time with force and arms entered the king's castle of Marlborough (where he was the constable) and took his goods there found, 36 sacks of wool, 6 pair of rich vestments, a library, a golden chalice for the sacrament, one cross of gold, another of ivory and ebony, and other ornaments belonging to the chapel; cloths of gold, carpets, coverings, and many other things, and his whole wardrobe entirely, to his damage of 5000*l*. Excepting these differences of losses, the petition is the same with his son's verbatim, and the errors assigned in the process and award, are the very same; his rendering himself prisoner to the king, and his reception into the king's protection the same, and expressed in the same words. And then it follows by the king (et nous apres, a nostre parlement summons a Everwyk as treis semaines de Pasch an en nostre regne quintisme feisems devant nous le proces del dit Egard a la suite les dix Hugh le fitz. & Hugh le pere, en cestes paroles, a l'honneur de Dieu & seinte eglise, &c.) And we afterwards, at our parliament at York, three weeks after Easter, in the 15th year of our reign, caused to come before us the process of the award, at the petition of the said Hugh the son and Hugh the father in these words: To the honour of God and holy Charch, &c. the whole award being cited in this record. After which recital it follows, (a quem parlement, &c.) At which parliament at York, the said Hugh the son and Hugh the father being brought before us in court, prosecuting their complaints, and praying us to do them right; and the said Hugh the son for himself shewed and alledged the errors in the process as abovesaid; and also Hugh the father alledged the same errors, and prayed severally and jointly, That as the award was made erroneously and wrongfully against the laws and usages of the realm, and against common right and reason, that we would annul and defeat the said award, and that they might be remitted and reconciled to our faith, and to such estate as they had and were in before the award: And hereupon hearing the reasons of the said Hugh and Hugh, we caused the process to be examined in full parliament, in the presence of the prelates, earls, barons, knights of counties, and the people that were come, by reason of the parliament (en presence des prelates, countes, barons, cheualers des countes, & le peuple & estoit venutz pur encheson du dit parlement) And we found the said award was made without calling them to answer, and without the assent of the prelates, which are peers of the realm in parliament, and against the great charter of the franchises of England, which says no freeman shall be banished, or other way destroyed, but by lawful judgment of his peers, of the law of the land, and for that they were not called in court to make answer, and for these errors, and for that the causes in the said award were not duly proved (& pur ceo que les causes contenues en la dit agard ne furent pas duement approuvets;) And further having regard to that, that we caused the parliament at Westminster to be summoned in due manner, and commanded by our writs the said great men (who made the award) not to make assemblies and alliances, or come with armed men, yet they came with all their force to that parliament, notwithstanding our command: and when they came to London in that manner, they held their councils and assemblies at London, without coming to us at Westminster according to summons; and then we sent to them to come to the parliament at Westminster as they ought, yet they would not come, nor let us know their mind, nor the cause of the award, though we had begun and held the parliament for 15 days and more, and caused to come before us the prelates, and some earls and barons, knights of counties, and others which came for the commons of the realm (& avions fait venir, devant nous prelates, & aucunes countes & barons, cheualers des countes, & autres que vindrent pur la commune du royuln) and caused it to be published, That those that had petitions to promote should deliver them. And after proclamation thus made, no petition was delivered, or complaint made against the said Hugh and Hugh, until they came as aforesaid: and the contrivance of the said award they wholly concealed and kept from us, unto the very hour they came to Westminster with force and arms, and made their award against reason, as a thing treated and agreed on amongst themselves, on their own authority, in our absence, and encroached upon the royal power, jurisdiction, and consance of process and judgment of those things, which belong to our royal dignity; wherefore we could not at that time stop the said award, nor do right to the said Hugh and Hugh, as it belonged to us. And further taking notice that those great men, after the award made, prayed our pardon and release for confederating themselves by oath, writing, or in other manner without our leave, in pursuing them, and trooping with banners of ours and their own arms displayed, and taking and possessing castles, towns, manors, lands, tenements, goods, and chattels, and also taking and imprisoning people of our allegiance and others, and some they wounded, and some they killed; and many other things they did, in order to destroy the said Hugh and Hugh, in England, Wales, and other where, of which some might be called trespasses, and other felonies; also it appeared, those great men were enemies to, and hated them at the time of the award and before, wherefore they ought not to be their judges, in their own prosecution of them, nor have record (ne record aver) upon the causes of the said award. And we are bound by the oath we made at our coronation, and obliged to do right to all our subjects, and to redress and cause to be amended all wrongs done to them when we are required, according to the Great Charter, by which we are not to sell or delay right and justice to any one; and at the pressing advice and request of the prelates, given us for the safety of our soul, and to avoid danger, and for to take away an ill example for the time to come of such undertakings and judgments, in the like case, against reason. Wherefore we seeing and knowing the said process and award, made in the manner aforesaid, to be as well to the prejudice of us, the blemishment, (or hurt) of our crown and royal dignity, against us and our heirs, as against the said Hugh and Hugh, and for other reasonable causes, of our royal power, in a full parliament at York, by the advice and assent of the prelates, earls, barons, knights of counties, the commons of the realm, and others being at our parliament at York (pur le conseil & l'assent des prelatz, countes, barons, cheualers des coun- tez le commun du royaume, & autres a nostre dit parlement a Eweyck Estautz) do wholly null and defeat (de tut acentissoms & defesons) the said award of the exile and disinheri- tance of the said Hugh and Hugh, and all things in the award (& quant que cil award touche) and do fully remit and reconcile the said Hugh the son, and Hugh the father, to our faith and peace, and to the estate they had and were in before the making of the award in all points. And we award, that they have again (recient) seisin of their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, &c. And we will and command, that where this award is enrolled in any places in our court, it be canceled and annulled for ever.' And so the roll was cancelled and crossed, and remains so at this day, with this memorandum written under the Award. 'These things above written are nulled and cancelled by force of an Award made in the parliament at York held three weeks after Easter in the 16th year of the reign of our lord, as it is contained in a roll sowed to, and hanging at this roll in the month of May.'

After this, the Despensers soon regained their power, and queen Isabel having taken arms against her husband, king Edward, assigned the misconduct of these Despensers as the cause of her doing so, in the following Proclamation :

"Isabel, by the grace of God, queen of Eng- land, dame of Ireland, countess of Pontif, or Ponthieu; and we Edward, eldest son to the noble king of England, duke of Guyen, earl of Chester, Pontif, and Monstroil, or Monstrevil; and we Edmond, son to the noble king of Eng- land, earl of Kent, to all those to whom these letters shall come, greeting : Whereas it is no- toriously known, that the state of Holy Church and the Realm of England, are many ways blemished and abased, by the evil counsel and abett of Hugh le Despenser, who by pride and a desire to lord it, and set himself over all others, hath taken upon him royal power against right, reason, and his allegiance; and in like manner made use of all the evil counsel of Robert Baldock and others his adherents, so as Holy Church is reviled, and shamefully put under great subjection, and the prelates of Holy Church spoiled of their goods against God and right; Holy Church defamed and dis- honoured many ways, and the crown of Eng- land destroyed in divers manners, in disherit- ance of our lord the king, and his heirs, the great men of the realm, by the envy and wicked cruelty of the said Hugh; many of them, with- out fault and without cause, put to shameful death; some disherited, others imprisoned, banished, and exiled; widows and orphans wrongfully forejudged of their right, and the people of the land, by divers tallages and undue exactions very often burthened, and by divers oppressions grieved without mercy. By which offences the said Hugh hath shewn himself an open tyrant and enemy to God and Holy Church, to our most dear lord the king, and to the whole realm. And we, and many others with us, and in our company, who have long been estranged from the good pleasure of our lord the king, by the false suggestions and evil procurement of the aforesaid Hugh and Robert, and their adherents, are come into the land to raise the state of Holy Church and the realm, and to defend the people from these mischiefs and grievous oppressions, and to maintain to our power the honour and profit of Holy Church, and our lord the king and the whole realm, as abovesaid. Wherefore we command and pray you for the common profit of you and every one of you, to be aidant to us at all times and in all places, and by all the ways you know or can, that the things abovesaid may be speedily brought to a good effect and end. For know certainly, that all we, and all those with us, will not undertake any thing that shall not be for the honour and profit of Holy Church, and of the whole kingdom, as in time you will see and find, if God please. Given at Walling- ford the 15th day of October, in the twentieth year of the reign of our most dear lord the king."

From Wallingford she marched to Oxford, and so in a short time to Bristol, which she besieged, and soon took; and the next day after she came thither, Hugh Despenser the father, earl of Winchester, was drawn and hanged upon the common gallows, without hearing or trial, on the 27th of October.

Hugh Despenser the son was soon after taken, and, as Knighton reports, was arraigned before sir William Trussel, a justiciary, in the form there mentioned, which was by way of a speech made against him, as it is here contracted :

"Hugh le Despenser. In the parliament at Westminster, in the 15th of the king, your father and you Hugh were awarded traitors and enemies of the realm, and banished as such, never to return without the assent of the king in full parliament duly summoned. Con- trary to which award, your father and you Hugh were found in the court without warrant; and you Hugh, as you returned into the king- dom, feloniously spoiled and robbed two do- mands (merchant-ships so called) of goods to the value of forty thousand pounds. Hugh, after this felony, you came to the king and caused him to go with force against the peers of the realm, and other his liege people, to destroy and disherit them, contrary to the Great Char- ter: and also taking upon you royal power, you Hugh and your assistants, with force and arms, robbed feloniously the good people of the realm; and by Andrew Harlepe, and other traitors your adherents, murdered the good earl of Hereford, M. William Sullye, and M. Roger de Berfelde (at Borough-bridge) and caused to be taken my most honourable lord Thomas the good earl of Lancaster, and caused him to be judged by a false record, against law, reason, and the Great Charter, and also to be murdered, mar- tyred, and put to a cruel death. Also in the same march (in the French, 'journey') to Bo- rough-bridge, you caused many of my lord's (the earl of Lancaster) barons and knights to be drawn and hanged, by false record against law and reason, and caused other great men to be put in prison and murdered to get their estates, as Roger Mortimer the nephew and uncle, Hugh Audeley father and son, and the earl of Hereford. Hugh, after this destruction of the nobility, you Hugh, your father, and Robert Baldock, usurping royal power over the king, led him and his people into Scotland against his enemies, where you Hugh by your traitorous conduct caused him to lose 20,000 of his people, to his great dishonour, and damage of the realm, and to return without doing any thing.—Hugh, this treason nor this tyranny would satisfy you, until by royal power gained over the king, you destroyed the franchises of Holy Church and the prelates, as the bishops of Hereford, Lincoln, and Norwich, taking their goods out of their churches: and whereas you knew God had done great things by my lord (the earl of Lancaster) you caused to be murdered, you placed armed guards, and shut the church-doors, that none should enter to honour God and his Saints. Hugh, after these mischiefs, you advised the king to give unto the false traitor the earl of Winchester, Andrew Harkley, and self, lands properly belonging to the crown, in disherison thereof. Hugh, whereas the queen and her son passed beyond sea by the king's command to save the country of Guyen, in point to be lost by your traitorous counsel, you sent over a great sum of money to some of your wicked adherents, to destroy the queen and her son, (q'est droit heir del realm) who is right heir of the kingdom, and to hinder their coming over. Hugh, your father, Robert Baldock, and self, and other false traitors your adherents, taking upon you royal power, made great and small by force to swear to, and assure you, to maintain you in your false quarrels or pretences (en vous faux querelles) not having regard that such confederacies were false and traitorous, against legience and the state of the king and his crown. And forasmuch as you Hugh, and other traitors, knew that the queen and her son were arrived in the nation, by your evil counsel you caused the king to withdraw himself, and go from them, and carried him out of the kingdom, to the danger of his body, and dishonour to him and his people, feloniously taking with you the treasure of the realm, contrary to the Great Charter.—Hugh, you are found traitor, wherefore all the good people of the kingdom, great and small, rich and poor, by common assent, do award, That you are found as a thief, and therefore shall be hanged; and are found as a traitor, and therefore shall be drawn and quartered; and for that you have been outlawed by the king, and by common assent, and returned to the court without warrant, you shall be beheaded (vous serrez decollés) and for that you abetted and procured discord between the king and queen, and others of the realm, you shall be embowelled, and your bowels burnt. Withdraw, traitor, tyrant, and so go take your judgment, attainted wicked traitor."

He was at this time earl of Gloucester; and no trial by common jury, or his peers appears; and the attaint was only this speech made against him, and most of what was objected to him had been pardoned by act of Parliament. On the 24th of Nov. he was drawn and hanged upon a gallows 50 feet high, and then quartered, and his head fixed upon London-bridge. Those who brought him to the queen had for their reward 2000*l.* as she had promised.

The annullment of the Exile and Disherison of the Despensers, 15 Edw. 2. was made void in parliament, 1 Edw. 3. And afterwards in the parliament summoned 21 Rd. 2, Thomas le Despenser petitioned the king in full parliament, reciting the petitions of Hugh the father, and Hugh the son, to the king in full parliament holden at York three weeks after Easter, in the 15th year of Edward 2.—In which parliament the Exile and Disherison of both were annulled for these Reasons: 1st, they were not appealed, or called to answer, nor due process made against them according to law. 2nd, Because the prelates who were peers of the realm did not consent to the exile and disherison. 3rd, Because it was against Magna Charta, that any man should be exiled or tried, or otherways destroyed, without judgment of his peers. This annullation was afterwards made void, in 1 Edw. 3. He prayed that statute might be made void, and all the articles and things contained in it, for the reasons abovesaid.—And hereupon the king caused the prelates, dukes, barons and commons, summoned to his parliament, to be diligently examined, what they thought, whether the statute of Edward 3, was defeasable? Who upon good deliberation said it was, for the causes before expressed; also considering that the repeal made by king Edward 3 was at such time as his father Edward 2 was living, being very king, and in prison, that he could not resist the same.—And accordingly the same was made void.

5. Proceedings against ADAM DE ORLETON, Bishop of Hereford, for Treason, 16 Edw. II. A. D. 1323. [1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 77. 2 Brady's Hist. 147. Claus. 1 Edw. III. p. 1. M. 13.]

IN the parliament summoned to meet at London the beginning of Lent 1323, Adam de Orleton, or Torleton, bishop of Hereford, was arrested of high treason, and was examined before the king and lords, on divers Articles. It was laid to his charge, 'That he had entertained certain of the king's enemies, had appeared in the field with them, had furnished them with arms, and had given them his assistance, favour, and advice.' The bishop being a shrewd and learned man, said little at first to this accusation, but being further urged, he answered, 'My lord the king, saving all due reverence to your majesty, I being an humble minister of God's church, and a consecrated bishop, though unworthy, ought not to answer such high matters without the licence and authority of my lord the archbishop of Canterbury, who next to the pope is my proper judge; as also with the consent of the rest of my fellow-bishops.' The archbishop of Canterbury with his suffragans, rising up, implored the king's mercy for him; and he was delivered to the custody of the archbishop till the king should resolve when to summon him again, to answer to what might be farther laid to his charge. Soon after the king summoned him again to answer in his court of justice, which the archbishops, &c. hearing of, they came in great form, with their crosses, and took him away from the bar, threatening to excommunicate all that withstood them. Upon which Edward caused a bill of indictment to be preferred against him to the grand jury of Herefordshire, which being found, the king immediately seized on all his temporal possessions.

The record by which he was restored to his temporalities in the 1st of Edward 3, reciting the record of his trial in the country, gives a more particular account of his crimes, and informs us, That by inquisition taken at Hereford before the justices of the King's-Bench, it was presented, 'That Adam bishop of Hereford was of the confederacy of Roger de Mortimer of Wigmore, who was then reputed an enemy and rebel to the king his father, and that he sent certain men at arms to his assistance; and then being accused for these things before the justices, and his father, he alleged, that without offending God, and holy church, and without leave of the pope, he could not, or ought to answer, nor ought the justices to proceed to take the inquisition; and though the bishop submitted not to the inquisition, yet the justices went on, and for that it was found by that inquisition that the bishop was of the confederacy of the said Roger, and sent to his assistance men at arms: it was adjudged by the justices, he should as convict remain in the custody of the archbishop of Canterbury, and that his lands and tenements, goods, and chattels, should be seized into the king's hands, and remained so seized, until the date of this record, by which they were restored. Witness the king at Westminster, the 16th of February, in the 1st of his reign.'

6. Proceedings against THOMAS Earl of LANCASTER, for Treason, 15 Edw. II. A. D. 1322, 1 Edw. III. A. D. 1327. [Parl. II. E. 3. p. 1. M. 17. Stat. 1. Edw. III.]

THOMAS earl of Lancaster, first cousin of king Edward 2, had been one of the chief opposers of that king's misgovernment, and his favourites Gaveston and the Despenchers. He repeatedly took up arms against the king, and finally, in 1322, was taken at Boroughbridge, and being impeached of Treason, &c. before the king at Pontefract, was sentenced to be drawn, hanged and beheaded, but by the favour of the king was only beheaded.

By the same Judgment, and for the same crimes, suffered these barons, Warin Lisle, William Loket, Thomas Manduit, Henry de Bradborn, William Fitz-William, William Cheyny, Roger Clifford, John de Mowbray, Gocelin D'Enynvill, Henry Teyes, and Bartholomew de Bailesemer who was beheaded at Canterbury, only Roger de Damory died of his natural death.

In the first parliament of Edward 3, the Judgment against the earl of Lancaster was reversed, as appears by the following Record:

"The king, to all to whom, &c. Greeting. We have inspected the records and proceedings had in our last parliament called at Westminster, in these words: Henry of Lancaster, brother and heir of Thomas, formerly earl of Lancaster, came to this parliament, and exhibited before the lord the king himself, the nobles, and great men of the kingdom, and the council of the said lord the king there then being, a certain Petition in these words: 'To our lord the king and his council prayeth Henry of Lancaster, brother and heir of Thomas heretofore earl of Lancaster, That whereas the said Thomas was formerly, before the lord Edward heretofore king of England, father of our lord the king, that now is, and his council, at Pon-tefract, in the 15th year of his reign, unreasonably adjudged to death by an erroneous proceeding against him at that time had, by reason of which judgment he was put to death, and, in consequence of the same judgment, his heirs were disinherited, the record and proceedings whereof are in Chancery, it would please our lord the king to command the Chaucellor that he should cause the record and proceedings of the aforesaid judgment to be brought hither into parliament, and that they be recited and examined, to the end, that if any error be therein, the same may be duly redressed, and right in the premises done to the said Henry, as brother and heir of the said earl, and his inheritance delivered to him.' In consideration of which Petition, it was commanded to the Chaucellor by the said lord the king, that having examined the Rolls of the year aforesaid of the lord king Edward, father of the lord the now king, in his Chancery, he should cause the record and proceedings aforesaid to be brought hither into parliament, &c. which said chancellor afterwards brought hither the record and proceedings aforesaid in these words: "Pleas of the Crown of the lord king Edward, son of the lord king Edward, held in the presence of the said lord the king, at Pontefract, on Monday next after the feast of the Annunciation of the blessed Virgin Mary, in the 15th year of his reign. Whereas Thomas earl of Lancaster was taken, and for treasons, homicides, burnings, depredations and divers other felonies brought before the said lord the king, in the presence of Edmund earl of Kent, John earl of Richmond, Adomer of Valence earl of Pembroke, John de Warren earl of Surrey, Edmund earl of Arundel, David earl of Athol, Robert earl Danegos, the Barons, and other great men of the kingdom: The lord the king causes it to be recorded, that the said Thomas, being a liegeman of the said lord the king, came to Burton-upon-Trent, together with Humphrey de Bohun, late earl of Hereford, a traitor to the king and kingdom, found in war against the lord the king, with banners displayed, at Boroughbridge, and there slain; and Roger Damory, a convicted traitor, and other traitors and enemies to the king and kingdom, with banners displayed, so that in war he hostilely, for three successive days, resisted the lord the king, his people and attendants, and prevented them passing the bridge of the said town of Burton, as they should have done, and then feloniously slew some of the men of the said lord the king, by reason whereof the said lord the king, in order to repress the aforesaid malice and resistance of the said earl and others, and for the maintenance of the peace and tranquillity of his kingdom and people, and of the rights of his royal crown, and for the repelling and removing of the aforesaid force so seditiously collected, sought elsewhere a passage over the river Trent, and from thence powerfully rode against the said earl and others, and the aforesaid earl Thomas taking notice of this, together with the other traitors aforesaid, as a traitor and enemy to the king and kingdom, set fire to the town of Burton aforesaid, and feloniously burned part of the houses and goods of the same town; and after that the said earl with the other traitors aforesaid, went out of the said town to the plain thereto adjoining, with banners displayed, and hostilely disposed his military forces to fight against the said lord the king, against his homage, fealty, and allegiance, by which he was bound to the said lord the king, awaiting on the same plain the approach of the lord the king, and thereupon when the said earl Thomas observed that the said lord was coming and drew near to him with a great power, the said earl Thomas, together with all the other traitors aforesaid, in confusion betook himself to flight and fled, and in such flight, while the lord the king pursued them with a great force, committed divers depredations and robberies, until the said earl Thomas together with the traitors aforesaid, with arms and horses and banners displayed, came to Boroughbridge, where in support of the lord the king were certain faithful subjects of the lord the king, having full authority from the lord the king to resist in all ways and by all means in their power, the enemies and traitors to the lord the king, and the aforesaid earl Thomas, together with the other traitors with horses and arms, and banners displayed, hostilely made an attack upon the aforesaid faithful subjects of the lord the king there being, and feloniously slew some of them and fought against them, until the said earl Thomas, together with the other traitors aforesaid, was routed and taken, and some of those traitors were taken, and some were slain, and some took to flight; and so there remained as to the said earl Thomas, no doubt but that he together with his other traitors, wished to get the better of and to conquer the same lord the king. All which treasons, homicides, burnings, depredations, and hostile fightings, with horses and arms and banners displayed, are manifest and notorious, and known to the earls, barons, and other great men, and to the people of the kingdom; and therefore it was adjudged that the said earl Thomas for the treason aforesaid should be drawn, and for the homicides, depredations, burnings, and robberies aforesaid, should be hanged, and for the [offences committed in the] flight aforesaid, on this behalf should be beheaded. And more than this, although the aforesaid earl Thomas in time past, wickedly and maliciously against his homage, fealty, and allegiance, often conducted and behaved himself ill towards the lord the king, to wit, Whereas the lord the king had at Newcastle upon Tyne, victuals, horses, and armour, jewels, and divers other goods to a great quantity and value, which goods the said earl Thomas, with horses and arms, and a great multitude of armed men, took, stole, and carried away, whose said stealing and trespass the lord the king, of his special grace, remitted and pardoned to the said earl Thomas, and the other offenders in the said stealing, in the hope of bringing the said earl Thomas to a better way of thinking. And moreover the aforesaid earl Thomas, having collected to himself divers men with an armed force, came to different parliaments of the lord the king, and oftentimes hindred the same lord the king from holding parliaments, as it pertained to him and to his crown to hold them, and oftentimes took no heed to attend such parliaments according to the commands of the lord the king, but contemptuously disobeyed the same, and also often held different, larger and smaller, illegal meetings against the lord the king in different places, and against the prohibition of the lord the king. Also, whereas many offenders and disturbers of the peace of the lord the king, whom the said earl Thomas had drawn to him and got together, had committed homicides, thefts, and divers other felonies, by means whereof they deserved to receive judgment of death; and the said earl Thomas in like manner, according to the law and custom of the realm, deserved to receive judgment of death for supporting and harbouring the said offenders: Also, whereas earl Thomas afterwards coming, with a great multitude of armed men, to the parliament of the lord the king, held at York, prevailed on the lord the king to remit the prosecution on account of the breach of his peace, against the said earl Thomas and the offenders aforesaid, to the number of about a thousand persons, notwithstanding the said earl Thomas had before that time sworn to the observance of certain ordinances that the lord the king should not remit a prosecution for breach of his peace in cases of this sort, arising out of the death of a man: Also, whereas the said lord the king, in order to bring the said earl Thomas to a good course, as is before said, had voluntarily, at various times, given to him, who, with all his might was acting in opposition to the lord the king, divers large gifts of the lands and franchises of his demesne, and by his charters had granted to the said earl Thomas certain gifts, different favours and pardons; nevertheless the same Earl, always persisting in his evil doings, with all his might stood forward rebellious and disobedient to the lord the king: Also, the said earl Thomas sent to the city of York certain knights of his family in order to draw the commonalty of that city, and the custody thereof into the hands of the said Earl; and also the said earl Thomas, in different manners, usurped to himself, and strove to usurp kingly power to the disinherison, so far as in him lay, of the lord the king in this respect: Also, whereas the lord the king, being lately at York, had commanded divers great men, and others of the kingdom, with whom he was desirous to consult, that they should come to York, to treat concerning the journey of the said lord the king into parts of Scotland, the said earl Thomas, then being in his castle at Pontefract with a great multitude of armed men, sent his people to obstruct their passage in the neighbourhood of Pontefract, as well along the roads as over the bridges, whereby the counsellors of the lord the king could not, in obedience to his command, come to York to be near the said lord the king: And whereas the lord the king had removed from the neighbourhood of York towards the south, and had proceeded with his followers near to Pontefract, the said earl Thomas and his people came out of the aforesaid castle, and to insult the lord the king, most basely and contemptuously shouted against the lord the king with a great tumult, to the great contempt of the said lord the king, as if the lord the king had been their enemy, and not their king and lord: Also, whereas the said earl Thomas, together with the aforesaid earl of Hereford, and the other traitors conspiring with him, endeavoured to obtain and effect a confederacy and alliance with Robert de Brus, Thomas Randolph, James Douglas, and other Scotsmen, enemies of the lord the king and of the kingdom, concerning the manner and form of which confederacy and alliance certain indenture was found upon the said earl of Hereford when he was slain as aforesaid, in these words: 'The credential which John de Denum is to communicate to Robert, king of Scotland, and to Monsieur Thomas Randolph, earl of Murryf, steward of Scotland, and to monsieur James Douglas, or to which ever of them shall be first met with by the earl of Lancaster, and earl of Hereford, and their allies; that is to say, that the said king of Scotland, and the said earl of Murryf, the steward, and monsieur James with their forces, shall come to the said earls of Lancaster and of Hereford, and their allies, as soon as they shall be fortified in any place, where the whole may be able to assemble together, and will to the utmost of their power harm all those whom the earls of Lancaster and Hereford, and their allies, wish to be harmed, and save from harm all those whom they wish to have saved; and also will come to the said earls of Lancaster and of Hereford in all places where they may wish that they should come in England, in Wales, and in Ireland, and with them live and die in maintenance of their quarrel, saving any claim, conquest, or lordship in the said lands of England, of Wales, and Ireland. And the said king of Scotland, and the said earl of Murryf, the steward, and monsieur James, for themselves and their forces, will engage to do this thing, or if the said king of Scotland should be himself afflicted by sickness, or by other great impediment, whereby he should not be able to come in his own person, then in case the aforesaid earl of Murryf, the steward, and monsieur James, with their power aforesaid, make good and perform what is above said, the said earls of Lancaster and of Hereford, and their allies, would engage that they would never in aid of the king of England, invade them; and whenever the earls of Lancaster and of Hereford, and their allies, have finished their contest, they will sincerely exert themselves that a good peace may be made between the two countries of England and Scotland, to the utmost of their power, to the end that they shall hold their land of Scotland as peaceably as they their's in England.—And finally, whereas the aforesaid traitors, adhering to the same earl Thomas, had lately, with his army with force and arms, entered the lord the king's castle and town of Gloster, and against the will of the lord the king, occupied the same castle and town; and there and at Bridgenorth had committed depredations, burnings, and homicides, and other crimes; and the same traitors, fearing the near approach of the lord the king to them, quitted the said castle and town of Gloster, and from thence betaking themselves to flight, hastened to the said earl Thomas as their principal refuge and chief maintenance, which said earl Thomas notoriously manifesting his treason and maintenance in that respect, received those his fellow-traitors, and joined himself to them for the purpose of carrying on hostilities against the lord the king, and exciting war in the kingdom as is aforesaid, and sent his own people, together with his fellow-traitors aforesaid, to besiege the lord the king's castle of Tykhill; and also sent in engines for throwing large stones upon the aforesaid castle and upon the men therein being on the part of the lord the king; which traitors moreover besieged the said castle for three weeks, continually making assaults, and carrying on hostilities against the same, and there slew some of the lord the king's men; and afterwards the aforesaid earl Thomas, having perpetrated the aforesaid iniquities, crimes, and offences, fled, forcing his way towards the said Scottish enemies of the lord the king and the kingdom, until he came to Boroughbridge aforesaid, where he was taken as aforesaid; Wherefore the lord the king, having regard to the so great crimes and iniquities of the said earl Thomas, and his most gross ingratitude, hath no reason to shew any favour in the premises to the said earl Thomas, by pardoning any of the aforesaid punishments adjudged against him; nevertheless, because the said earl Thomas is descended of an excellent and most noble parentage, the lord the king, from respect to the said parentage, of his special favour remits to the aforesaid earl Thomas the execution of two of the punishments adjudged as is aforesaid; to wit, that the said earl Thomas be not drawn nor hanged; but that, upon the said earl Thomas, execution alone be done, that he be beheaded." And upon this the aforesaid record and proceeding having been recited and read in the presence of the lord the King, and of the nobles and great men of the kingdom, here in parliament, &c. being, it was demanded of the aforesaid Henry, for what reason he caused the aforesaid record and proceeding to come hither, who says, That he is brother and heir of the aforesaid Earl, and he caused the record and proceeding aforesaid to come hither, on account of errors occurring in the same record and proceeding, which he prays may be corrected, &c. and he is told to shew the errors, &c. who says, that there is error in this, that every liege man of the lord the king, taken up in time of peace for seditions, homicides, robberies, burnings, and other felonies, into whatever court of the king he shall be brought, concerning such seditions and other felonies laid to his charge, ought, by the law and custom of the realm, to be arraigned and put to answer, and thereof by law to be convicted before he should be adjudged to die; although the aforesaid earl Thomas, a liegeman of the aforesaid lord the king's father, &c. was taken up in time of peace, and brought before the same lord the king, the said lord the king's father, &c. caused it to be recorded, that the same Thomas was guilty of the seditions and felonies in the said record and proceeding contained, without this, that he thereof arraigned him, or put him to answer, as is the custom according to law, &c. and so, without arraignment and answer, the said Thomas erroneously and against the law of the land, in time of peace, was sentenced to death; by reason whereof, because it is notorious and manifest that the whole time in which it was charged against the said Earl, that he committed the aforesaid offences and crimes in the aforesaid record and proceeding contained, and also the time when he was taken, and when the said lord the king's father, &c. caused it to be recorded that he was guilty, and when he was sentenced to death, was time of peace; in particular because, throughout the whole time aforesaid, the chancery and other places of the courts of the lord the king were open, and in them law was done to every one as it used to be done, nor did the same lord the king ever in that time ride forth with banners displayed; the aforesaid lord the king's father, &c. ought not, in such time of peace, to have caused such record to be made against the said Earl, nor to have sentenced him to death, without arraignment and answer: Also, he says, that there is error in this, that whereas the aforesaid earl Thomas was one of the peers and great men of this kingdom, and in the Great Charter of the Liberties of England it is contained, that no free-man shall be taken, imprisoned, or disseised of his freehold or franchises, or his free customs, or outlawed, or banished, or in any manner destroyed, nor shall the lord the king, by himself or others, proceed against him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land, the aforesaid earl Thomas was by the record of the lord the king as aforesaid, in time of peace, erroneously sentenced to death without arraignment or answer, or the lawful judgment of his peers, against the law, &c. and against the tenor of the aforesaid Great Charter; Wherefore that the errors aforesaid may be corrected, and the aforesaid Judgment annulled, as erroneous, &c. and that he, as brother and heir of the said Thomas, may be admitted to his inheritance, &c.; and because, upon inspecting and more fully understanding the record and proceeding aforesaid, it is, on account of the aforesaid errors, and others found in the same record and proceeding, adjudged by the same lord the king, the nobles, great men, and all the commonalty of the kingdom in the same parliament, that the aforesaid Judgment given against the aforesaid earl Thomas be reversed and annulled as being erroneous; and that the aforesaid Henry, as brother and heir of the same earl Thomas, be admitted to claim and to have his inheritance by due proceeding in that behalf to be had as is customary, and that he have writs to the chancellor and justices, in whose courts the said record and proceeding are enrolled, that they cause the same record and proceeding to be made void and annulled, &c.; And we, for the greater security of the same Henry, have brought the aforesaid record and proceeding to be exemplified according to the tenor of these presents.—In testimony, &c. Witness the king at York the third day of March."

7. Proceedings against KING EDWARD II. 20 Edw. II. A. D. 1327.
20 Edw. II. M. 3. Dors. M. 4. Dors.]

THE earl of Lancaster having taken king Edward 2 prisoner, made no great haste with him towards Kenelworth, for in thirteen days time he was got no further from Monmouth than Ledbury in Herefordshire, at which place the writ for proroguing a parliament that was pretended to have been summoned by the king to meet fifteen days after St. Andrew, was dated the 3d of December. Witness the king at Ledbury the 3d of December. The writ for this parliament, which was to meet fifteen days after St. Andrew, I believe can no where be found, which was to be holden by Isabel queen-consort of England, and Edward his eldest son, guardian of England, he then being out of the kingdom, as it is said in the writ, dated the 3d of December, &c. for proroguing that parliament to the morrow of Epiphany, or Twelfth-day; to be holden by him if personally present, or in his absence by his said consort and son. But the miserable king knew nothing of this summons dated at Ledbury on the 3d of December, with his teste; for the great seal was that day in the keeping of the bishop of Norwich at Woodstock, and the next day delivered to Roger Mortimer and the duke of Aquitan (i. e. Edward the king's son) at the same place.

The parliament (as it is called) met on the 7th of January: The first thing moved by the bishop of Hereford, and many other bishops joining with him, was, Whether king Edward the father, or his son Edward, should reign over them? They were not long before they agreed the son should have the government of the kingdom, and be crowned king, for the causes following:

"1. First, For that the person of the king was not sufficient to govern; for in all his time he was led and governed by others, who gave him evil counsel, to the dishonour of himself, and destruction of holy church and all his people, not considering or knowing whether it was good or evil; nor would remedy these things, when he was requested by the great and wise men of his realm, or suffer them to be amended.—2. Also, In all his time he would not give himself to good counsel, nor take it, nor to the good government of his kingdom; but always gave himself to works and employments not convenient, neglecting the business of his realm.—3. Also, For want of good government he lost the kingdom of Scotland, and other lands and dominions in Gascoigne and Ireland, which his father left him in peace and amity with the king of France, and many other great persons.—4. Also, By his pride and cruelty he destroyed holy church, and the persons of holy church, putting some in prison, and others in distress; and also put to shameful death, and imprisoned, banished, and disherited many great and noble men of the land.—5. Also, Whereas he was bound by his oath to do right to all, he would not do it for his own profit, and the covetousness of him and his evil counsellors which were with him; neither regarded the other points of the oath which he made at his coronation, as he was obliged.—6. Also, He abandoned his realm, and did as much as he could to destroy it and his people; and what is worse, by his cruelty and the default of his person, he is found incorrigible without hopes of amendment. All which things are so notorious, they cannot be gainsaid."

These Articles were conceived and dictated by John Stratford bishop of Winchester and treasurer of England, and written by William Mees, clerk, his secretary and a public notary. Having approved the Articles, they were by common agreement sent to the king, then prisoner in Kenelworth-castle, three bishops, two earls, two barons, two abbots, and two justices, amongst whom was sir William Trussell before noted, Proxy to the whole parliament, to resign their homage and fealty to the king, which he did in this manner: "I William Trussell, procurator of the prelates, earls, and barons, and other people in my procuracy named, having for this full and sufficient power, do resign and deliver up to you Edward king of England, as to the king before this hour, the homage and fealty of the persons in my procuracy named, and do return them upon you Edward, and make quit or free the persons aforesaid, in the best manner that law and custom may do it; and do make protestation in the name of those that will not for the future be in your fealty, or allegiance, nor claim to hold any thing of you as king, but shall hold you as a private person, without any manner of royal dignity." The ceremony ended by sir Thomas Blunt, the high steward, breaking his staff and declaring all the king's officers discharged from his service as though he were dead.—Sir Thomas de la Moor tells us who the three bishops were; John Stratfort, bishop of Winchester, Adam de Torleton, bishop of Hereford, and Henry Burwash, bishop of Lincoln: three principal companions in transacting this affair. The bishops of Winchester and Lincoln came before the rest to the king, who with his keeper the earl of Lancaster, persuaded him to resign his crown to his son, and circumvented the king, promising him as much honour after his resignation as before; and on the other hand, threatened him if he would not, the people should yield up their homage and fealty, and repudiate his sons, and choose one not of royal blood. With these and other importune promises and threats, they obtained their desires. And then the bishop of Hereford brought in all the other commissioners, sent by the parliament, into the king's chamber, where the whole matter they came for was dispatched, not without great grief and reluctancy from the king, who swooned away.

Walsingham reports, all the nobility met at London, on the morrow of, or day after Twelfth-day, in parliament, and judged the king unfit to rule, and for several reasons to be deposed, and his son prince Edward to be chosen king. Of which when the queen had notice, she was full of grief outwardly. But the prince affected with this outward passion of his mother, would not accept the title against his father's will and consent. The king, when he received this news by the commissioners, was much disturbed, and said since it could be no otherwise, he thanked them for choosing his first born son, making his resignation, and delivering up the royal ensigns and tokens of sovereignty. The commissioners returning to the parliament at London, with the king's answer and the royal ensigns, made the rabble rejoice; and presently the whole community of the kingdom admitted Edward, a youth of fourteen years of age, to be their king, on the 20th day of January, which they would have to be the first day of his reign. And from that time he acted as king before his coronation, as may appear by the writ to all the sheriffs of England to proclaim his peace.—“The king to the sheriff of Yorkshire, greeting: Because Edward, late king of England, our father, by common council and assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and other great men, and also of the communities of the said kingdom, of his own free will removed himself from the government of the said kingdom, willing and granting, That we as his first-born and heir of the kingdom, should take upon us the rule and government:

And we yielding to the good pleasure of our father, by the counsel and advisement of the prelates, earls, barons, great men, and communities aforesaid, have taken upon us the government of the said kingdom, and received the homages and fealties of the said prelates and great men according to custom. Therefore desiring our peace for the quiet and tranquillity of our people to be inviolably observed, we command, That presently after sight of these presents, you cause our peace publicly to be proclaimed through your whole bailiwick, forbidding all and singular, under the pain of dismembering, and losing life and member, that they presume not to infringe or violate our peace, but that all men do prosecute their suits and actions without violence, according to the laws and customs of the land, &c. Witness the king at Westminster the 29th of January.”—On the first of February, being Sunday, he was crowned.

The deposed king was for some time kept prisoner in Kenelworth castle, not knowing what was transacted. The nation observing what had been done, seeing the queen engaged, and the prince carried along with them, began to be sensible of the king's condition, and to consider the pretences of his enemies, and to think how they might be kind to him, and prevent further mischief. His keeper also, the earl of Lancaster, began to be every way obliging to him, much pitying and commiserating his deplorable case. Many lords and others began to think how they might deliver him out of captivity; the notice, or rather suspicion thereof, much startled Mortimer, the bishop of Hereford, the queen, and chief actors in this tragedy, reflecting upon what they had done, and fearing if the king should get his liberty they could not be safe, or at least their designs must come to nothing, and caused them to think of removing him from Kenelworth, and appointing him new keepers. They hurried him up and down the nation, that it might not be known where he was; and at last brought him to Berkley castle in Gloucestershire, where he was inhumanly treated by his keepers, attempting to destroy him by all ways of horrid indignities, brutish usages, and before uncontrived and unthought of affronts: but having been frustrated in their intentions, by his natural strength of body and fortitude of mind, on the 22nd of September, at night in his bed, they stifled and smothered him, with large and heavy bolsters and pillows, and put up a red-hot iron, through a ductil-pipe, into his guts at his fundament; and in this most cruel manner murdered him, that no wound or mark of a violent death might be found upon him.

8. Impeachment of ROGER MORTIMER, Earl of MARCH, for Treason, 3rd Edward III. A. D. 1330. [Knighton, Coll. 2556. Walsingham. 3 Rapin, 419. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 84.]

AT the parliament assembled at Westminster, on the 13th of March, 1330, the following Articles of Impeachment translated from the French original now on the Rolls in the Tower, were exhibited against Roger Mortimer, earl of March: viz.

“ These are the treasons, felonies, and mischiefs done to our lord the king, and his people, by Roger Mortimer, and others of his company. —1st. Whereas in the parliament holden at Westminster next after the king's coronation, it was ordained, that four bishops, four earls, and six barons should remain with the king to advise him, and that four should still be with him, viz. one bishop, one earl, two barons at least, and that no great business should be done without their assent; after which parliament the said Roger not having regard to the said assent, usurped to himself royal power, and the government of the realm, above the state of the king, and put out and placed officers in the king's house, and elsewhere throughout the kingdom at his pleasure, such as were of his party, and set John Wyward and others about the king, to observe his actions and words; so as he was encompassed by his enemies, that he could do nothing as he would, but only as a man under guard or restraint.—2nd. Whereas the king's father was at Kenelworth, by order and assent of the peers of the land, to stay there for his ease, and to be served as such a great person ought to be; the said Roger by his usurped power, which he exercised over him at his pleasure, ordered that he should be sent to Berkley castle, where, by him and his confederates, he was traiterously, feloniously, and falsely murdered and killed.—3rd. The said Roger by his usurped royal power, forbad by the king's writ under the great seal, that any should come to the parliament at Salisbury with force and arms, under pain of forfeiting whatever they had to the king; yet thither he came with others of his party with force and arms to the said parliament contrary to the prohibition aforesaid; wherefore divers peers of the land, as the earl of Lancaster and others, knowing the manner of his coming, would not be there: and whereas the prelates were assembled in one house, to consult about the business of the king and realm, the said Roger broke open the doors of the said house with armed men, upon the prelates, and threatened them with life and member, if any of them should be so hardy as to speak or do any thing contrary to his pleasure in any point. And in the same parliament by the said usurped power, he caused the king to make him earl of March, and to give him and his heirs several lands in disherison of the crown; and afterwards the said Roger, and those of his party, led the king armed against the said earl of Lancaster, and other peers of the land, as far as Winchester, when they were coming to the parliament at Salisbury, so that the earl and other peers, to avoid the evils that might have happened, out of regard to the king, departed and went toward their own countries, grieving that they could not speak with, or advise their liege lord as they ought to do.—4th. The said Roger, by the said usurped power, caused the king to march forcibly against the earl, and other peers of the land, who were appointed to be with the king, to advise him; and so prosecuted them with force, that the said earl and some others of his company, that wished well to the kingdom, submitted to the king's grace, saving to them life and member, and that they might not be disinherited, nor have too great a fine set upon them; yet he caused them to be fined so grievously, that half their lands, if sold outright, would only pay it; and others he caused to be driven out of the nation, and their lands to be seized, against the form of the Great Charter, and law of the land.—5th. Whereas the said Roger knew well the king's father was dead and buried, he by others of his party in deceivable manner, informed the earl of Kent that he was alive; wherefore the earl being desirous to know whether it was so or not, used all the good ways he could to discover the truth, and so long, till the said Roger by his usurped royal power, caused him to be apprehended in the parliament holden at Westminster and so pursued him, as in that parliament he procured his death.—6th. The said Roger, by his usurped royal power, caused the king to give to him and his children, and confederates, castles, towns, manors, and franchises in England, Ireland, and Wales, in decrease of the revenues of the crown.—7th. The said Roger in deceivable manner caused the knights of shires, at the parliament at Winchester, to grant to the king one man at arms out of every town of England, that answered in the court of the Eyre by four men, and the provost, (i. e. the rieve or bailiff of the lord of the manor) to serve at their own cost, for a year in his war in Gascoigne; which charge he contrived for the advantage of himself and party, in destruction of the people.—8th. The said Roger, by his said usurped royal power, caused summons to be sent to many great knights and others, that they should come to the king wherever he was; and when they came, he caused them to be charged to prepare themselves to go into Gascoigne, or fine at his pleasure; which fines were for the benefit of him and his party.—9th. The said Roger falsely and maliciously made discord between the king's father and his queen; and possessed her, that if she went to him, she should certainly be killed with a dagger, or otherwise murdered; and by this way, and his other subtleties, he so ordered it, that she would not come to her liege lord and king, to the great dishonour of her son and self, and great damage of the whole realm per chance in time to come, which God forbid.—10th. The said Roger by his said usurped royal power, had caused to be taken for him and his party, the king's treasure, as much as he pleased, without tale, in money and jewels, in destruction of the king, so that he had not wherewithal to pay for his victuals.—11th. The said Roger, by the said usurped power, caused to be shared between him and his confederates, the 20,000 marks which came out of Scotland, for the articles of peace, without any thing received by the king.—12th. The said Roger, by his above-mentioned royal power, received the king's duties and purveyance through the kingdom, as if he had been king: and he and his party had with them double the company of men and horse that were with the king, in destruction of the people, not paying for their quarters any more than they themselves pleased.—13th. The said Roger, by his said royal power caused the king to agree to the mounting of 200 Irish chevaliers, or horse, being of those that killed the great men of Ireland and others, who were in the king's faith; whereas the king ought immediately to have revenged their deaths, rather than pardoned them, contrary to the statute and assent of parliament.—14th. The said Roger contrived to have destroyed the king's secret friends, in whom he had most confidence; and he surmised to the king, in the presence of the queen his mother, the bishops of Lincoln and Salisbury, and others of his council, that his said secret friends had excited him to combine with his (the said Roger's) enemies beyond sea, in destruction to the queen his mother, and of him the said Roger; and this he affirmed so impudently to the king, that he could not be believed against what he had said: and for these things and many others, not as yet fit to be declared, he had been apprehended; wherefore the king charged the earls and barons, the peers of the land, as these things concerned himself, themselves, and all the people of the realm, to do right and true judgment upon him for the crimes above written, as being notorious and known to be true, to themselves, and all the people of the kingdom."

Then the earls, barons, and peers, having examined these articles, came into parliament before the king, and they all delivered their opinion, by one of their body, 'that all things contained in the said articles were notorious, and known to themselves, and all the people; wherefore they, as judges in parliament by assent of the king did award and judge the said Roger

as a traitor and enemy to the king and kingdom, to be drawn and hanged, and commanded the earl mareschal to execute the judgment, and the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, with the constable of the Tower, and those who had the guard of him, to be aiding and assisting with the earl mareschal at the execution; which was performed accordingly on the 29th of November at a place then called the Elms, and afterwards Tyburn.*—He was not brought to answer, but condemned without hearing, and for that reason this Judgment was reversed as erroneous, and made void by act of parliament, and his grandchild Roger restored to his title and estate, 28 Ed. 3.

The king, also, in his parliament charged the earls, barons and peers, to give right and true judgment against Simon de Beresford, kt. who had been aiding and advising with Roger Mortimer in all the treasons, felonies, &c for which he was afterwards adjudged to die, as was notoriously known to the said peers; whereupon they came before the king in parliament and said all with one voice, 'that the said Simon was not their peer, and therefore they were not bound to judge him as a peer of the land:' but since it was a thing so notorious and known to all, that he was advising, aiding and assisting the said Roger in all the felonies, &c. aforesaid; and that he was guilty of divers other felonies and robberies, and a principal maintainer of robbers and felons; they as peers and judges of parliament by assent of the king, do award and adjudge him, as a traitor and enemy to the king and realm, to be drawn and hanged; and the earl mareschal was commanded to do execution; which was done accordingly. But it appears by the same parliament roll, that it was then also declared, that though the lords and peers in parliament had for this time, in the king's presence, proceeded as judges to give judgment upon those that were no peers; yet hereafter this should be no precedent to draw them to give judgment on any other but their peers, in case of treason or felony.

* "The earl of March left four sons, of whom Edmund, his eldest, died in the flower of his age, and left his son Roger, who was restored to his grandfather's estates and honours. The earl had also seven daughters, Katherine wife of Thomas de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick; Joan married to James lord Audley; Agnes to Lawrence de Hastings earl of Pembroke, Margaret to Thomas son and heir of Maurice lord Berkley: Maude, to John son and heir of John de Charleton lord Powis; Blanche to Peter de Grandison; and Beatrix first to Edward son and heir to Thomas of Brotherton, earl marshal, son of Edward 2, and afterwards to sir Thomas de Broose." Dugdale's Baron. 146.

9. Proceedings against THOMAS DE BERKELE, for the Murder of King Edward II. A. D. 1331. [Rot. Parl. 4 Edw. III. M. 16.]

PLEAS of the crown held before the lord king Edward, the 3d since the conquest, in his full parliament at Westminster on Monday next after the feast of St. Katharine the virgin, in the 4th year of the reign of the same king Edward.

“Thomas de Berkele, knight, comes before the lord the king in his full parliament assembled, and being spoken to concerning this, That whereas the lord Edward late king of England, father of the lord the now king, lately was in the custody of the same Thomas, and of a certain John Mautravers, being delivered to be safely kept in the castle of the same Thomas at Berkele, in the county of Gloucester, and, in the same castle, in the custody of the same Thomas and John, was murdered and killed, how he would acquit himself of the death of the same king? He says, That he never was consenting to, assisting to, or procuring his death, nor did he even know any thing of his death, until that present parliament; and of this he is ready to acquit himself as the king's court shall adjudge.—And upon that it is enquired of him, Since he is lord of the castle aforesaid, and the said lord the king was delivered into the custody of them, Thomas and John, to be safely kept, and they took and accepted the custody of the same king, how he can excuse himself, that he should not answer for the death of the same king? And the aforesaid Thomas says, That true it is that he is lord of the castle aforesaid, and that he together with John Mautravers, took the custody of the same king, to keep him safely as is aforesaid; but he says, that at the time when it is said that the said lord the king was murdered and killed, he himself was detained at Bradelye without the castle aforesaid, by such and so great sickness, that he hath no recollection of what happened.—And upon this it is said to him, That since he has acknowledged that he, together with the said John, obtained the custody of the said king to keep him safely as is aforesaid, and he placed keepers and servants under him, for such custody, can he by any sickness excuse himself that he should not answer in this respect? And the aforesaid Thomas says, That he placed under him such keepers and servants in the castle aforesaid, for maintaining such custody, in whom he confided as in himself; and who together with the aforesaid John Mautravers, had, by reason thereof, the custody of the same king; Wherefore he says, That concerning the death of the same lord the king, by assistance, assent, or procurement of his death, he is in nothing guilty thereof; And as to this for good and bad he puts himself upon the country:—Therefore in this behalf let a jury come before the lord the king in his parliament at Westminster, in 8 days of St. Hilary next to be, &c: At which day came the aforesaid Thomas before the lord the king in his full parliament, and also a jury, to wit, John Darcy, John de Wysham, William de Trussell, Roger de Swynnerton, Constantine de Mortimer, John de St. Philibert, Richard de Rivers, Peter Huser, John de Brynnton, Richard de la Revere, Roger de Debenhale, and Richard de Croupes, all knights, who, on their oath, say, That the aforesaid Thomas de Berkele is in nothing guilty of the death of the aforesaid lord the king, father of the lord the now king, nor of assenting to, assisting in, or procuring his death: And they say, That at the time of the death of the same lord king Edward, father of the lord the now king, he was afflicted with such a sickness at Bradelye, without his castle aforesaid, that his life was despaired of: Therefore the said Thomas is acquitted thereof.—And the jurors being asked whether the said Thomas ever withdrew himself on the aforesaid occasion? say, That he did not.—And because the aforesaid Thomas placed keepers and servants under him, to wit, Thomas de Guroey and William de Ocle, for the custody of the said lord the king, by whom the said lord the king was murdered and killed, therefore, a day is given to him before the lord the king, now in his next parliament, to bear his Judgment, &c. And the aforesaid Thomas de Berkele in the mean time is committed to Ralph de Neville, steward of the household of the lord the king, &c.”

What was done further concerning this Thomas de Berkele I do not find, but judgment to be drawn, hanged, and beheaded, was in this same parliament given against Thomas de Gurney and William de Ocle, for the death of king Edward, father of the king that then was, That they falsely, and traiterously murdered him; and he that could take Thomas alive was to have 100*l.* or bring his head, 100 marks; he that could bring William Ocle alive was to have 100 marks, or his head, 40*l.*

10. Proceedings against JOHN STRATFORD, Archbishop of Canterbury, for Treason, 14 Edw. III. A. D. 1341. [Rot. Parl. 14 Ed. III. 17 Ed. III. 2 Brady, 211. 1 Cobb. Par. Hist. 100.]

IN the year 1340, king Edw. 3, finding himself distressed for money to carry on his war in France, and thinking that those who had the care of his revenues were in fault, suddenly returned from Ghent into England, on St. Andrew's day; about midnight he arrived at the Tower, and next morning he sent for the archbishop of Canterbury to Lambeth, but found him not there. He also sent for the bishop of Chichester his chancellor, the bishop of Lichfield and Coventry lord treasurer, and several others his great officers, clerks of chancery, and justices, and imprisoned them in the Tower, except the bishops, whom, says Robert of Avesbury, for fear of the Clementine Constitution, That bishops ought not to be imprisoned, he permitted to have their liberty. On the 3d of December, the archbishop went to Canterbury, and secured himself in his church, to escape future dangers. Thither the king sent Nicholas de Cantelupe with letters of credence, That he would come to him to London, where he might personally speak with him; but he came not, pretending some about the king had threatened to kill him. Yet though he came not, he wrote to the king, and admonished him to take good advice, and make use of good and wise counsellors, and to remember that by evil counsel his father had, contrary to the laws of the land and Magna Charta, imprisoned some great men and others, adjudged them to death, seized their goods, or put them to grievous ransom: and what happened to him for this cause. He also put him in mind, That by the circumspection and discretion of the prelates, the great and wise men of the nation, his own affairs had prospered, so as he possessed the hearts of the people; and had met more assistance from the clergy and laity than any of his progenitors. But at present, by the evil counsel of some English and others, who loved their own profit more than his honour, or the safety of the people, he had imprisoned clerks and others, against the laws of the land, his Coronation-oath, and against the Great Charter; the infringers whereof were, by the prelates of England and the Pope's bull, which he had by him, excommunicated. Which things he had done to the great danger of his soul, and detriment of his state and honour. He tells him, he had pronounced excommunicate all such about him that were favourers of Treason, flatterers of, and imposed upon him; and as his spiritual father beseecheth him to hold them as such, some of which by their sloth, and wicked service and advice, lost Tournay. And requested him to call together the prelates, great men, and peers of the land, to see and enquire in whose hands the Wool, Moneys, and other things then remained, which since the beginning of the war had been granted to him for maintaining thereof; and by what means, and whose default he lost Tournay; and punish the offenders in all things according to law. And as to what concerned him, saving always the estate of Holy Church, and his own order, he was ready in all points to submit to the judgment of his peers. This letter was dated at Canterbury the first of January.—In the same month, he wrote to Robert Bouser (a lay-man) late made chancellor of England, in the place of the bishop of Chichester, to preserve the liberties of Holy Church, and the laws of the land entire: And to let him know, that the ninth had levied and distrained for it, upon prelates and others of the clergy, who were not bound to pay it, as those that paid the tenth granted to the clergy, and had nothing of the king by barony, or were obliged to come to parliament; and also exacted the tenth of such as were bound to pay the ninth, oppressing the clergy contra Deum & Justitiam, against God and justice: Exhorting and requiring him in the Lord not to permit the religious and clergy to pay otherwise than according to the form of the grant of the taxes, nor give his advice or assent to any thing in prejudice of the Great Charter, or that might tend to the subversion of church-liberties, declaring if he should make out any writ, commission, or precept to that purpose, he should not omit to exercise such power as Holy Church had permitted him.—He wrote also to the king and his council after this manner: 'To our lord the king and his council, to all and every one of them; We John, by Divine permission archbishop of Canterbury, and the pope's legate, do declare all those that do arrest clerks, put them in prison, and detain them against their wills, are excommunicated by canon.' Which sentence he published in the church of Canterbury, and caused it to be published by all his brother suffragans, or bishops of that province. After the denunciation of which sentence, several clerks (there named) were taken and imprisoned in prejudice of God and Holy Church, against the law and privileges of all clerks, and to the danger of their souls, who did such things, or gave advice or assent to the doing of them. Wherefore he beseeched the king to preserve untouched the rights and privileges of Holy Church, and forthwith release the clerks, and others, that had been imprisoned against the Great Charter, the laws of the land, and privileges of such as were detained. And further beseeched all of the king's council, who had presumed to advise the king to commit such things, not to hinder the release of those that were kept in prison. He also declared, That the king's ministers or officers, of what condition soever, who entered the granges, houses, and other places of archbishops, bishops, ecclesiasticks, or other religious without the consent of their bailiffs, and took and carried away their goods; and all those that commanded these things to be done, were involved in the same sentence of excommunication. He wished the king would vouchsafe to apply a fit remedy, for he could not dissemble; but that against such, as his pastoral office required it of him, by his brother bishops of the province, he should execute what was his and their bounden duty. Yet it was not his intention, that the king, queen, or their children, should be comprehended in this judgment or sentence of excommunication, as far as by law or right they might be excused.

As he had resolved, he wrote to all the bishops of his province, and commanded them to declare excommunicate all such as deprived churches of their rights, or by malice infringed or disturbed their liberties or free customs; and those especially that violated the ancient liberties and free customs of his church of Canterbury, or in any manner diminished them, or did any thing contrary to its privileges. Also those that disturbed the peace and quiet of the kingdom, or that gave advice or assistance to, or favoured them. Also those who by any art or trick whatsoever should violate, break, diminish, or change any of the liberties and free customs contained in the Great Charter, or Charter of the Forest, privately or openly, by word, deed, or advice, or the ancient liberties and free customs granted by them to the City of London, should be declared excommunicate. And then he directs them to proceed in the same manner against all such as imprisoned clerks, or entered into the houses, granges, &c. of archbishops, bishops, &c. as above.—The king, moved with this behaviour of the archbishop, wrote to the bishop of London, and the prior and chapter of Canterbury, in harsh and severe language, how he had been used by the archbishop, and charged him with many great crimes; as, that being exalted to the throne in his nonage, desiring to be directed by sound counsel, believing him in fidelity and discretion to exceed all men, and using him as the director of his soul, and likewise the affairs of his kingdom, and receiving him into great familiarity; and seeing the kingdom of France devolved to him by right of succession, and was usurped by Philip of Valois, he with great importunity persuaded him to make a confederacy against Philip with the German princes, exposing us and our affairs to the charge and hazard of war; promising and affirming, That he would cause abundantly to be supplied the necessary expences from the revenue of our lands, and subsidies; adding further, That we need only take care to have ready expert and stout soldiers. Then he tells how he went beyond sea, and entered into a war at a vast expence, obliging himself to his confederates in great sums of money upon the promised aid; but trusting to a broken reed, and his assistance in money not coming to him, he was forced to contract improfitable debts under the greatest usury; and so as he could not prosecute his expedition, but must of necessity return into England: where declaring to the archbishop his streights and misfortunes, he called a parliament, which gave him the ninth as above, and the clergy a tenth; which if fully collected, and in due time, had probably been sufficient for the carrying on his war, and the payment of his debts, to the no small confusion of his enemies. Then he says the archbishop promised again to assist him effectually toward collecting the subsidy, and administering other necessaries: whence trusting to his promised assistance, he again passed over sea, and obtained his sea-victory, as before related; and afterwards besieged Tournay, as aforesaid; when every day expecting by the archbishop's management to be relieved, in so great necessities, with what had been promised him, his hopes failed: and though by many letters and messengers he had signified to him, and others of his counsellors his adherents, the wants and dangers he was in for want of money, being put off with frivolous excuses and fine words, by which they palliated their fraud and malice, he was forced unwillingly to consent to a truce, to his shame, and the hindrance of his expedition. At length his faithful friends, companions, and participants in his adventure and tribulation, with whom he discoursed how he might most aptly be delivered from his present misfortunes, all agreed the fault was the archbishop's, either by sloth or negligence, if not malice; murmuring against him, that he had not corrected the insolence of the archbishop and officers, which if he should not do speedily, they threatened to quit his service, and withdraw themselves from the confederacy. Whence thinking of the discipline and correction of his officers, he removed some from their offices for male-administration, by subversion of justice, oppressing the people, and taking bribes: others of less note he committed to prison; and believing he might have a more full account of the actions of his officers from the archbishop, to whom he had committed for a long time all the administration of all his affairs, he sent Nicholas Cantilupe to command him to come speedily to London, that he might have personal discourse with him; but being always proud, and fearful in adversity, he pretended danger from some about him, if he should stir out of the church of Canterbury. The second time he sent to him Ralph Stafford or Stratford, steward of his household, with letters of safe conduct, to come to, and inform him about the business of the kingdom: but contemning his requests and messages, with an haughty look he answered, That he would not meet, come to, or confer with him, but in full parliament; which at that time it was not rationally expedient to convene: then recounting his great bounty and beneficence toward him, his extraordinary respect and affection to him, and the mighty trust and confidence he had in him, declares how ungrateful he was, and how he had deceived him, wounding his innocence, by railing at, and reproaching the justice, fidelity, and diligence of his officers, by preaching publicly, and sending letters into divers parts, That by royal power and against justice, the people had lately been oppressed, the clergy confounded, the kingdom over-burdened with exactions, taxes, and tallages. And because he falsely endeavoured to obtain the name of a good pastor, which he always wanted, yet truly he was a notorious mercenary by common opinion, and his own public confession; he applied himself to assert the liberty of the church; which if it had been injured or grieved, either in persons or things, it was only and truly to be ascribed to the remissness, crafty intentions, and reprobate counsels of the archbishop wickedly pretending he had certain sentences and articles of excommunication, made in general against the violators of church-liberty and the Great Charter, to blacken the good opinion the people then had of the king, to defame his ministers, traitorously to raise sedition amongst the people, and to withdraw the affections of the earls, barons, and great men from him. Wherefore being willing, as he was bound, to secure the integrity of his fame, to obviate the malice of the archbishop, and to avoid the snares laid for him and his, he desired to publish some other of his actions, besides those above repeated; to wit, That by his improvident advice in his nonage, he had made so many prodigal prohibited gifts and alienations, and done so many excessive favours, that his treasury was exhausted, and his crown rents beyond measure diminished; and that corrupted by bribes, he had without reasonable cause remitted great sums of money due to him, and had given much of his rents and revenue, which ought to have been applied to his own use, to persons not deserving, or converted it to his own use; and presumed to attempt other things to the detriment of his estate, damage of his royal dignity, and grievance of his subjects, abusing the power committed to him. Commanding those to whom this letter was directed, to publish it, and cause others to publish it, in such places as they should think convenient.—Witness his self at Westminster, the 19th of February, in the 15th of his reign.

On Ash-Wednesday, being the 21st of February, the archbishop preached in the cathedral of Canterbury, and at the end of his sermon he told the people, there were letters directed by the king to the prior and convent against him, which he desired might be read: which was done by order of the prior, and the contents of them published in the English tongue. Against which the archbishop in every point defended his innocence; and then admonished the people to pray for the king, queen, and their children; and to those that should do so devoutly, and also pray for the state of holy church, being penitent, and sorry for their sins, he granted forty days indulgence from purgatory. And the next day, being the chair of St. Peter at Antioch, or the 22d of that month, the abbot of St. Augustine's in Canterbury, to whom and his convent the like letters had been sent, published them to the people, expounding them in hatred to the archbishop, that so the people might have an ill opinion of him.—The very same complaints against this archbishop the king sent to the pope, though in somewhat smoother language in some parts of the epistle; and requests he might be by him removed out of the kingdom, for preserving the peace of it, and preventing other dangers that might be feared to ensue, if he staid there. Dat. apud Langele 14 die Martii.

The archbishop wrote an answer to the king's letter, which bears this title, The Excuse or Answer of the archbishop to the slanderous Libel; addressing himself by way of preface to the king, telling him there were two things by which the world was governed, the holy pontifical authority, and the royal ordained power; of which the charge of the priests was the greatest and highest, inasmuch as they were in the last judgment to give an account of kings: wherefore he ought to know, that they depend upon the judgment of priests, who might not be directed by their wills; for who could doubt but Christ's priests were to be thought the fathers and masters of kings, princes, and all faithful people. And he proceeds to inform him, that many bishops had excommunicated kings and emperors; and also to inform him what good kings were to do, and how to behave themselves toward bishops, and what reverence, honour, and respect was due to them. And he complains, that the honour due to him, in regard of his dignity, and as he was his father, was turned into disgrace, devotion into reviling, and reverence into contempt; whilst his epistles sealed with the royal seal, but more truly slanderous libels, dictated and written by his enemies, containing many crimes falsely imputed to him, were sent to the bishops of his province, deans, abbots, priors, their convents and chapters, to be published to his, and would to God not to the injury of him too; by which unthought of, that he might not say detestable fact, royal power presumed to judge the Lord God in his servants and priests; and he seemed to condemn him his spiritual father, and greatest peer of the land, against the order of God, human law, and natural reason, not called, not convicted by record, and unheard, to the danger of his soul, and as an ill example to the manifest prejudice of all the peers of England. At last, making great profession of his affection to him, and the great services he had done him, he comes to his answer, here following: that whereas he accused him, that when the kingdom of France was devolved to him by right of succession, he importuned him to make a league with the Almain to recover his rights, and was only to find expert soldiers, and he would find money; which failing, you were, you say, forced to contract great debts upon usury. To this he said, That in the beginning of his government, when he was bishop of Winchester, it was known by whose counsel he was governed. That when the kingdom had devolved to him by hereditary right, and so judged in the parliament at Northampton, the two bishops of Worcester, (Adam Orleton) Coventry and Litchfield, were sent into France to claim that kingdom in your name, and to hinder the coronation of Philip de Valois; which Embassy was the greater occasion of the war. We at that time were not employed in any of your affairs, but were hated at court, for what cause God knows. Afterwards, when it pleased your majesty to call me, with others of your privy council, to transact the public affairs, we considering the danger of mens souls, bodies, and goods by a devouring war, endeavoured with all our power to make peace between the two kingdoms; but after all endeavours for peace proved unsuccessful, and Philip had made war upon you, then in a parliament at Westminster, called for that purpose, seeing the obstinacy of Philip, it was agreed you should league with the Germans or Almans, and others. As for the payment of the expences of this war, there were agreements made with certain merchants in a council at Stamford, which are to be found in Chancery; which if observed, together with other subsidies granted both by clergy and laity, and the great customs of wool, not only in our own, but in the opinion of all the council, had been sufficient for the whole war, if well managed. And your majesty knows well, that these agreements were not broken or changed by us, nor did the subsidies come to our hands; because after your first passage we staid not in this kingdom, but with the reverend fathers the cardinals and bishop of Durham, went into France to treat of peace, often going backward and forward from and to yourself, then in Brabant; and afterward, when there was no hopes of peace, staid some time with you there, and were made partakers of your necessities, and with other prelates and great men of England, became bound with you for great sums upon usury.—The second thing charged upon him in the king's letters, he says, was yet more wonderful (that when the ninth was granted, he promised effectually to assist in the levying of it; but that by reason of the non-performance of that promise, when before Tournay, he was forced to consent to a truce, contrary to his mind;) to this he said, the whole subsidy for the ninth for the first year, was assigned to his creditors before his second passage, as might appear by the assignments themselves; and therefore it was manifest, that he neither promised to send, nor could send any thing to the siege of Tournay, especially not knowing when it began.—To the third thing, (that the necessities and great straits he was in were brought upon him by his fault, negligence, and malice, as also of his other officers, some of whom he was forced to remove, and imprison others, lest his friends that were with him, and allies beyond sea, should leave him: and when desiring to have a better information of his affairs, he sent for him, &c.) The archbishop affirms, he made no promise to send money to him; and therefore such as warred in his service, could not complain of his fraud or negligence. And professing again how diligent he had been, and faithful, both then and at all times in his service, he says, as concerning his faithful friends, and those that accompanied him in his enterprises beyond sea, who desired a fit remedy to be applied to those ill services, that brought him into those inconveniences and misfortunes; it was to be believed, according to their words, that as culpable or guilty of any fault, they were to be punished by just, not arbitrary process. Then as to his two messengers, first Nicholas Cantilupe, bringing the king's letters of credence, he only cited and enjoined him to go into Brabant to pay the king's debts, and stay there while they were paid; so that if he had been summoned to have been at London with the king, as his letters intimated, he must have been here and beyond sea at the same time. As to Ralph de Stafford, he came without letters, and by bare word cited him to come to the king, affirming he ought not to fear any treachery, and says (this notwithstanding that though the king's letters of conduct at first view seemed sufficient for his coming to, staying at, and returning from his councils, if he had been summoned, as he was not; yet the same day he received these letters of conduct, the sheriff of Canterbury brought him the king's writ to appear at London before the king and council upon a contempt: so as though the king's letter gave him free liberty of returning, yet by the king's writ he was of necessity to fall into his enemies hands; which became not, nor could become royal majesty: nevertheless, he was, and should always be ready to answer what should be objected against him, before the prelates and peers, saving his state and order.—As to what was charged upon him (for publishing sentence of excommunication, and commanding it to be published, against the violators of ecclesiastic liberty and the Great Charter, to blacken the king's reputation, defame his ministers, and traiterously move sedition amongst the people, and to withdraw the affections of the earls, barons, nobles, and great men, from the king) because it seemed to affix the crime of treason upon him, in which case no king or temporal lord could be his competent judge, he protested openly and publicly, by these presents, that what he said, or should say, he intended not to prejudice his state in any thing, but wholly to decline trial by any secular judge whatever. At last, as to his prodigality in giving away the revenues of the crown to undeserving persons, and wasting the product of them, and converting the king's treasure to his own use, he utterly denies it, asserting again his innocence, and the great service he had done, the labour and expences he had been at for the crown. And near his conclusion he says, This may suffice for answer to the seardalous Libel at present, and wisheth for the king's honour it had neither been wrote or published.

The king replied very briefly to this Answer; reproves him for his insolent and undutiful language; tells him how much he honoured and revered his spiritual fathers, and that he ought not to overlook their offences, when he saw them tending to the danger of him and his government: and shews him his mistake, when he complained he was condemned of capital crimes, being absent and unheard, as if he in those letters wrote in his own vindication: only, had proceeded criminally against him; and forbids him and all other bishops to publish any sentences of excommunication, or other things, against the rights of his crown, or derogatory to his royal dignity and prerogative, as they had been always used by his progenitors.

During this controversy between the king and archbishop, there was a parliament called to meet at Westminster, on Monday next after the 15 days of Easter, the writ of summons in ordinary bearing date March 9, at Wedestoke.

To this parliament the archbishop of Canterbury came, though he had no writ of summons; attended with a great company of his clergy, and many knights. Upon his entrance into the house, the high steward and chamberlain met him, who in the king's name forbade him to enter the parliament until he had undergone a trial in the exchequer, for divers things laid to his charge. The archbishop, lest he should move the king too much, vouchsafed to go into that court, and there took a copy of the Articles, of which his accusation consisted, and to these he promised to return an Answer. Upon which he was suffered by the king to come into parliament, and there, before the whole assembly, he declared the cause of his coming to be, 'for the honour, rights and liberties of the church, for the profit and commodity of the realm, and for the interest and honour of the king: and, lastly, that he might clear himself in parliament of several crimes laid to his charge, and published all over England to his prejudice.' This occasioned a great debate amongst the lords on this question, 'whether the nobility of the land should be put to answer, except before their peers in open parliament?' A committee of twelve peers was appointed to draw up a representation to his majesty; and they were, also, to enquire concerning the crimes laid against the archbishop's charge, and fairly to represent how far they thought him blameable. Joshua Barnes is so particular in the sequel of the controversy, betwixt the king and the prelate, that we cannot do better than give it in his own words.

"Whereupon are named four bishops, four earls, and four barons, to draw up the platform for the king's view. These being also to enquire concerning the crimes laid against the archbishop, and to prepare them for the king, among other things determined, that the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, and other high officers of state, should be included under the names of peers; and set down a request, that all conditions and estates might enjoy their proper and peculiar liberties. By that time these things were thus forwarded, the archbishop came again to the parliament, but was forbid by the captain of the king's guard, sir William Attewood, to enter: whereupon he spake thus to the people that flocked about him, 'My friends, the king by his writ of summons hath called me to this parliament, and I, who am the chief peer of the realm, and who next the king have the first voice in parliament, claim the rights of my church of Canterbury, and therefore require entrance into parliament.' Tyrrel says, the archbishop was not summoned to this parliament. But when for all this being kept out by the guard, he could not enter, he took his cross in his own hands, and solemnly protested that he would not stir from that place, till the king gave him leave to come into parliament, or a sufficient reason why he should not: while he stood there in this manner, some that were by, began to revile him, telling him, that he was a traitor, and he deceived the king, and betrayed the realm. To whom the archbishop said, 'the curse of Almighty God, and of his blessed mother, and of saint Thomas and nine also, be upon the heads of them that inform the king so. Amen. Amen.' In this hurry certain noblemen chancing to come out, he besought them to request the king in his behalf, and for the right of his church of Canterbury; this they kindly promised him to do. And accordingly by the intercession and favour of the lords, the king gave leave for his admission into the house, where he offered to purge himself lawfully in parliament of the crimes objected against him: but he was referred to the consideration of the twelve peers, who had his cause in hand at that time. On the nineteenth of April, being Thursday, the king came into saint Edward's chamber, commonly called the painted chamber, before whom, in sight of the lords and commons, the archbishop humbled himself, and required his gracious pardon; which upon the whole parliament's general suit and entreaty, his majesty granted. After which the archbishop desired, that whereas he was publicly defamed through the realm, he might now be arraigned in open parliament before his peers: but the king answered, he would first attend to the common affairs, and after that examine lighter matters.

The next parliament was in the 17th of Edward 3, when the king commanded, that the things touching the Arraignment of the archbishop, which remained in the hands of sir William de Kildesby, to be advised upon this parliament, should be annulled and totally outed or laid aside, as such as were neither reasonable or true: and master John de Urford was commanded to bring them into parliament, to be vacated there.

11. Proceedings against JOHN WICKLIFFE, for Heresy, 51 Edw. III.
A. D. 1377. 6 Rd. II. A. D. 1383, [Fox's Acts and Monum. 562.]

THE bishops now seeing the aged king to be taken away, during the time of whose old age all the government of the realme depended vpon the duke of Lancaster; and now the said bishops againe seeing the said duke, with the lord Percy, the lord marshall, to giue ouer their offices, and to remaine in their priuate houses without intermeddling, thought now the time to serue them, to haue some vantage against John Wickliffe; who hitherto, vnder the protection of the foresaid duke and lord marshall, had some rest and quiet. Concerning the story of which Wickliffe, I trust (gentle reader) it is not out of thy memory what went before, how he being brought before the bishops, by the meanes of the duke and lord Henry Percy, the counsell was interrupted, and brake before nine of the clocke. By reason whereof, Wickliffe at that time escaped without any further trouble. Who notwithstanding, being by the bishops forbid to deale in that doctrine any more, continued yet with his fellowes going barefoote, and in long frise gownes, preaching diligently vnto the people. Out of whose sermons these articles most chiefly at that time were collected.—That the holy Eucharist, after the consecration, is not the very body of Christ, but figuratiuely.—That the church of Rome, is not the head of all churches more than any other church is: Nor that Peter hath any more power giuen of Christ, than any other Apostle hath.—Item, that the pope of Rome hath no more in the keyes of the church, then hath any other within the order of priesthood.—Item, if God be, the lords temporall may lawfully and meritoriously take away their temporalities from the churchmen offending habitualiter.—Item, if any temporall lord doe know the church so offending, he is bound, vnder paine of damnation, to take the temporalities from the same.—Item, that the Gospel is a rule sufficient of it selfe to rule the life of euery christian man beere, without any other rule.—Item, that all other rules, vnder whose obseruances diuers religious persons be gouerned, doe adde no more perfection to the Gospell, than doth the white colour to the wall.—Item, that neither the pope, nor any other prelate of the church, ought to haue prisons wherein to punish transgressors.

Beside these Articles, diuers other Conclusions afterward were gathered out of his writings and preachings by the bishops of England, which they sent diligently to pope Gregory at Rome; Where the said articles being read and perused, were condemned for hereticall and erroneous by three and twenty cardinals.

In the meane time, the archbishop of Canturbury, sending forth his citations, as is aforesaid, called before him the said John

Wickliffe in the presence of the duke of Lancaster, and lord Percie; who, vpon the declaration of the pope's letters made, bound him to silence, forbidding him not to entreate any more of those matters. But then through the disturbance of the bishop of London and the duke, and lord Percy, that matter was soone dispatched, as hath beene aboue recorded. And all this was done in the daies and last yeere of king Edward the third and pope Gregory the eleuenth.

The next yeere following, which was the yeere of our Lord 1378, being the first yeere of king Richard the second, the said pope Gregory taking his time, after the death of king Edward, sendeth his bull by the hands and meanes (peradventure) of one master Edmund Stafford, directed vnto the vniuersity of Oxford, rebuking them sharply, imperiously and like a pope, for suffering so long the doctrine of John Wickliffe to take roote, and not plucking it vp with the crooked sickle of their catholike doctrine. Which Bull when it came to be exhibited vnto their hands, by the pope's messenger aforesaid; the proctors and masters of the Vniuersity, ioyning together in consultation, stood long in doubt, deliberating with themselves whether to receiue the pope's Bull with honour, or to refuse and reiect it with shame.

The copy of this wilde Bull, sent to them from the pope, was this:

"Gregory the bishop, the seruant of Gods seruants, to his well beloued sonnes, the Chancellor and Vniuersity of Oxford, in the diocesse of Lincolne, greeting, and apostolicall benediction.—We are compelled not onely to maruell, but also to lament, that you, considering the apostolicall seate hath giuen vnto your Vniuersity of Oxford so great fauour and priuilege, and also for that you flow as in a large sea in the knowledge of the holy Scriptures, and ought to be champions and defenders of the ancient and catholike faith (without the which there is no saluation,) by your great negligence and sloth will suffer wild cockle, not onely to grow vp among the pure wheate of the flourishing field of your Vniuersity, but also to waxe strong and choke the corne. Neither haue ye any care (as we are enforced) to extirpe and plucke the same vp by the rootes, to the great blemishing of your renowned name, the perill of your soules, the contempt of the church of Rome, and to the great decay of the ancient faith. And further (which grieueth vs) the encrease of that filthie weed was more sharply rebuked and iudged of, in Rome than in England where it sprang. Wherefore let there bee meanes sought by the helpe of the faithfull, to roote out the same. Griuously it is come to our eares, that one Iohn Wickliffe, parson of Lutterworth in Lincolne diocese, a professour of diuinitie (would God he were not rather a master of errorrs) is runne into a kind of detestable wickednesse, not onely and openly publishing, but also vomiting out of the filthy dungeon of his breast, diuers professions, false and erroneous conclusions, and most wicked and damnable heresies. Whereby he might defile the faithfull sort, and bring them from the right path headlong into the way of perdition, ouerthrow the state of the church, and vtterly subuert the secular policie. Of which his mischieuous heresies some seeme to agree (only certaine names and termes changed) with the peruerse opinions, and vnlearned doctrine of Marailus of Padua, and of Iohn Gandune, of vnworthe memory, whose bookes were vtterly abolished in the realme of England, by our predecessour of happy memory Iohn 22. which kingdome doth not onely flourish in power, and abundance of faculties, but is much more glorious and shining in purenesse of faith; Accustomed alwaies to bring forth men excellently learned in the true knowledge of the holy scriptures, ripe in grauity of maners, men notable in deuotion, and defenders of the catholike faith. Wherefore we will and command you by our writing apostolicall in the name of your obedience, and vpon paine of priuation of our fauour, indulgences and priuiledges granted vnto your and your vniuersity from the said see apostolicall; that hereafter ye suffer not those pestilent heresies, and those subtill and false conclusions and propositions, misconstruing the right sense of faith and good workes (how-soeuer they tearme it, or what curious implication of words soeuer they vse) any longer to be disputed of, or brought in question: Lest if it bee not withstood at the first, and plucked vp by the roots, it might perhaps be too late hereafter to prepare medicines when a greater number is infected with the contagion. And further that ye apprehend immediatly or cause to be apprehended the said Iohn Wickliffe, and deliuer him to be detained in the safe custody of our well-beloued brethren, the archbishop of Canturbury, and the bishop of London, or either of them. And if you shall find any gainesayers, corrupted with the said doctrine (which God forbid) in your said vniuersity within your iurisdiction, that shall obstinately stand in the said errorrs; that then in like maner ye apprehend them, and commit them to safe custody, and otherwise to doe in this case as it shall appertaine vnto you: So as by your carefull proceedings herein, your negligence past concerning the premisses may now fully be supplied and recompensed with present diligence. Whereby you shall not onely purchase vnto you the fauour and beneuolence of the seate apostolicall, but also great reward and merit of almighty God. Yeuen at Rome at S. Maries the greater, xj. Kalend. of Iune, and in the 7 yeere of our consecration."

Besides this bull sent to the vniuersity of Oxford, the said pope Gregory directed moreouer his letters the same time to the archbishop of Canturbury Simon Sudbury, to the bishop of London named William Courtney, with the Conclusions of Iohn Wickliffe therein inclosed, commanding them, by vertue of those his letters apostolicall, and straitly enioying them to cause the said Iohn Wickliffe to be apprehended, and cast into prison; and that the king and the nobles of England should be admonished by them, not to giue any credit to the said Iohn Wickliffe, or to his doctrine in any wise.—Beside this bill or Bull of the Pope, sent vnto the archbishop of Canturbury and to the bishop of London, bearing the date, 11 calend. Iun. and the 7th yere of the reigne of the pope; I find, moreover, in the said story two other Letters of the pope concerning the same matter, but differing in forme, sent vnto the same bishops and all bearing the same date both of the day, yeere, and moneth of the reigne of the said pope Gregory. Whereby it is to be supposed, that the pope either was very exquisite and solicitous about the matter, to haue Wickliffe to be apprehended, which wrote three diuers letters to one person, and al in one day, about one businesse; or else that he did suspect the bearers thereof; the scruple whereof I leaue to the iudgment of the reader.—Furthermore, besides these Letters written to the vniuersity, and to the bishops, he directeth also another Epistle bearing the same date vnto king Edward; as one of my stories saith, but as another saith, to king Richard, which soundeth more neere to the truth, forasmuch as in the 7th yeere of pope Gregory the xi, which was the yeere of our Lord 1378, king Edward was not aliue. The copy of his Letters to the king here followeth:

The copy of the Epistle sent by the bishop of Rome to Richard king of England, to persecute Iohn Wickliffe.

" Vnto his well-beloued sonne in Christ, Richard the most noble king of England, health, &c.—The kingdome of England, which the most highest hath put vnder your power and gouernance, being so famous and renowned in valiancy and strength, so abundant and flowing in all kind of wealth and riches, but much more glorious, resplendent and shining through the brightnesse and cleerenesse of all godlinesse and faith, hath accustomed alwaies to bring forth men endued with the true knowledge and vnderstanding of the holy scriptures, graue in yeeres, feruent in deuotion, and defenders of the catholike faith: the which haue not only directed and instructed their owne people through their wholesome doctrine and precepts into the true path of God's commandements; but also we haue heard by the report and information of many credible persons (to our great grief and heart sorrow) that Iohn Wickliffe parson of Lutterworth, in the diocese of Lincolne, professor of diuinitie (I would to God he were no author of heresie) to be fallen into such a detestable and abominable madnesse, that he hath propounded and set forth diuers and sundry conclusions full of errorrs, and containing most mainfest heresie, the which doe tend vtterly to subuert and ouerthrow the state of the whole church. Of the which, some of them (albeit vnder coloured phraec and speech) seeme to smell and saour of peruerse opinions, and the foolish doctrine of condemned memory of Marsilius of Padua, and Iohn of Ganduno, whose bookes were by pope Iohn the 22, our predecessor, a man of a most happy memory, reprinted and condemned, &c."

¶ Hitherto gentle reader, thou hast heard how Wickliffe was accused by the bishop. Now you shall also heare the pope's mighty reasons and arguments, by the which he did confute him, to the king. It followeth:

"Therefore, forsomuch as our reuerend brethren the archbishop of Canturbury, and the bishop of London haue received a speciall commandement from vs, by our authority to apprehend and commit the forenamed Iohn Wickliffe vnto prison, and to transport his confession vnto vs: if they shall seeme in the prosecution of this their businesse to lacke your fauour or helpe, we require and most earnestly desire your maiesty, euen as your most noble predecessors haue alwayes bene most earnest louers of the catholike faith (whose case or quarrell in this matter is chiefly handled) that you would vouchsafe (euen for the reuerence of God, and the faith aforesaid, and also of the apostolike seate, and of our person) with your helpe and fauour to assist the said archbishop and all other that shal goe about to execute the said businesse. Whereby besides the praise of men, you shal obtaine a heauenly reward and great fauour and good will at our hand, and of the see aforesaid. Dated at Rome at S. Mary the greater, the 11 cal. of Iune, in the 7th yeere of our bishoprike, an. 1378."

The Articles included in the pope's letters, which he sent to the bishops, and to the king against Wickliffe, were these which in order doe follow.

The Conclusions of Iohn Wickliffe, exhibited in the Conuocation of certaine bishops at Lambeth.

"1. All the whole race of mankinde here on earth, besides Christ, hath no power simply to ordaine that Peter and all his offspring should politickly rule ouer the world for euer. 2. God cannot giue to any man for him and his heires any ciuill dominion for euer. 3. All writings inuented by men, as touching perpetual heritage, are impossible. 4. Euerie man, being in grace iustifying, hath not only right vnto the thing, but also for his time hath right indeede aboue all the good things of God. 5. A man cannot onely ministratoriously giue any temporall or continuall gift; either as well to his naturall sonne, as to his sonne by imitation. 6. If God be, the temporall lords may lawfully and meritoriously take away the riches from the church when they doe offend habitualiter. 7. We know that Christs vicar cannot, neither is able by his bulls, neither by his owne will and consent, neither by the consent of his colledge, either to make able or disable any man. 8. A man cannot be excommunicated to his hurt or vndoing, except he be first and principally excommunicate by himselfe. 9. No man ought, but in Gods cause alone, to excommunicate, suspend, or forbid, or otherwise to proceede to reuenge by any ecclesiasticall censure. 10. A curse or excommunication doth not simply binde, but in case it be pronounced and giuen out against the aduersary of Gods law. 11. There is no power giuen by any example, either by Christ or by his apostle, to excommunicate any subiect, specially for denying of any temporalities, but rather contrariwise. 12. The disciples of Christ haue no power to exact, by any ciuill authority, temporalities by censures. 13. It is not possible by the absolute power of God, that if the pope or any other christian doe pretend by any meanes to bind or to loose, that thereby hee doth so bind and loose. 14. We ought to beleuee that the vicar of Christ doth at such times onely binde and loose, when as he worketh conformably by the law and ordinance of Christ. 15. This ought vniuersally to be beleueed, that euery priest rightly and duly ordered, according vnto the law of grace, hath power according to his vocation, whereby he may minister the sacraments, and consequently absolue any man confessing his fault, being contrite and penitent for the same. 16. It is lawfull for kings (in causes licensed by the law to take away the temporalities from the spirituall, sinning habitualiter, that is, which continue in the custome of sinne, and will not amend. 17. Whether they be temporall lords, or any other men whatsoever they be, which haue endowed any church with temporalities; it is lawfull for them to take away the same temporalities, as it were by way of medicine, to auoid sinne notwithstanding any excommunication or other ecclesiasticall censure; forsomuch as they are not giuen but vnder a condition. 18. An ecclesiasticall minister, and also the bishop of Rome, may lawfully be rebuked of his subiects, and for the profit of the church be accused either of the clergie or of the laitie." ¶ These Letters with the Articles inclosed being thus receiued from the pope, the bishops tooke no little heart, thinking and fully determining with themselves, and that in open profession before their prouinciall councill, that all manner respects of feare or fauour set apart, no person neither high nor low should let them, neither would they be seduced by the intreaty of any man, nor by any threatenings or rewards, but that in this cause they would execute most surely vpright iustice and equitie: yea albeit present danger of life should follow thereupon. But these so fierce bragges, and stout promises, with the subtil practices of these bishops, which thought them so sure before: the Lord (against whom no determination of man's counsell can preuaile) by a small occasion did lightly confound and ouerthrow. For the day of the examination being come; a certaine personage of the princes court, and yet of no great noble birth, named

Lewes Clifford, entering in among the bishops, commanded them that they should not proceed with any definitive sentence against Iohn Wickliffe. With which words all they were so amazed and their combes so cut, that (as in the story is mentioned) they became so mute and speechlesse, as men hauing not one word in their mouthes to answer. And thus by the wonderous worke of God his providence, escaped Iohn Wickliffe the second time out of the bishops hands; and was by them clearly dismissed vpon his declaration made of his articles, as anon shall follow.—Moreouer, here is not to be passed ouer, how at the same time, and in the said chappell of the archbishop at Lambeth, where the bishops were sitting vpon Iohn Wickliffe, the story writing of the doing thereof, addeth these words, saying: "Non dico ciues tantum Londinenses, sed viles ipsius ciuitatis se impudenter ingerere presumpserunt in eandem capellam & verba facere pro eodem, & istud negotium impedire, confisi, et reor, de ipsorum premissa negligentia prelatorum, &c." That is, I say not onely, that the citizens of London, but also the vile abiects of the citie presumed to bee so bold in the same chappell at Lambeth, where the bishops were sitting vpon Iohn Wickliffe, both to intreat for him, and also to let and stop the same matter; trusting, as I suppose, vpon the negligence which they saw before in the bishops, &c.—Ouer and beside, here is not to be forgotten, how the said Iohn Wickliffe, the same time of his examination, offered and exhibited vnto the bishops in writing a protestation, with a declaration or exposition of his owne minde, vpon the said his articles, the effect hereof followeth:

The Protestation of Iohn Wickliffe.

"1. I protest (as I haue often before done) that I doe minde and intend with my whole heart (by the grace of God) to be a true Christian, and as long as breath shall remaine in me, to profess and defend the law of Christ. And if it shall happen that through ignorance or otherwise I shall faile therein: I desire my Lord God of pardon and forgiuenesse. And now againe as before also, I doe reuoke and make retractation; most humbly submitting my selfe vnder the correction of our holy mother the Church. And forso much as the sentence of my faith, which I haue holden in the schooles and elsewhere, is reported euen by children, and moreouer is carried by children euen vnto Rome: therefore lest my deare beloued brethren should take any offence by me, I will set forth in writing the sentence and articles, for the which I am now accused and impeached: the which also euen vnto the death I will defend: As I beleeeue all Christians ought to doe, and specially the bishop of Rome and all other priests and ministers of the Church. For I doe vnderstand the conclusions after the sense and manner of speaking of the Scriptures and holy doctors, the which I am ready to expound: And if they shall be found contrary vnto the faith, I am ready to reuoke, and speedily to call them backe againe."

An Exposition vpon the conclusions of Iohn Wickliffe, exhibited by him to the bishop.

"All the race of mankinde here in earth beside Christ, hath no power simply to ordaine, that Peter, &c.—This conclusion of it selfe is euident, inasmuch as it is not in mans power to stoppe the coming of Christ to his finall iudgement, but he must needs come, according to the article of our Creed, to iudge both the quicke and the dead. And then (as the Scripture teacheth) shall surcease all ciuill and politike rule here; I vnderstand the temporall and secular dominion pertaining to men here dwelling in this mortall life. For so doth the philosophers speake of ciuill dominion. And although the thing which is terminable, and hath an end, is called sometimes perpetuall: yet because in holy Scripture, and in vse of the Church, and in the bookes of philosophers most commonly that is taken to bee perpetuall, which hath no end of time hereafter to come: according to the which sense the Church singeth Gloria patri, &c. Nunc, & in perpetuum; I also after the same signification do take here this word (perpetuall) and so is this conclusion consonant to the principles of the Scripture, that it is not in mans power to ordaine the course and voyage of the Church, here perpetuall to last.

2. God cannot giue to any man, &c.—To the second conclusion I answer, vnderstanding ciuill dominion, as in the conclusion before. And so I hold, that God first by his ordinate power cannot giue to any person ciuill dominion here for euer: Secondly, by his absolute power it is not probable that he will so doe: forso much as hee cannot euer detain his spouse in perpetuall prison of this life, nor alwaies deferre the finall beatitude of his Church.

3. To the third conclusion. Many writings or charts inuented by men, as touching perpetuall heritage ciuill, be vnpossible.—The verity of this conclusion is incident. For we must not canonize all manner of charts whatsoeuer, as catholike, or vniuersall: for then it were not lawfull by any meanes to take away or sequester things giuen by chart or charter, when any doth vniustly occupy the same. And so if that stand confirmed and ratified by the faith of the Church, great occasion thereby should be ministred to men so chartered, to trust to their temporall charts; and so might grow thereby much liberty and licence to sinne. For like as by some supposition euery truth is necessary: so by the same supposition euery false thing is possible, as it is plaine by the testimony of the Scripture, and of holy doctors speaking of necessity of things to come.

4. Euery man being in grace iustifying finallic, hath not onelie right vnto the thing, but also for his time hath right indeede ouer all the good things of God.—The veritie hereof is euident, by holy Scripture, Mat. 24. Where verity promiseth to euery man entering into his ioy: verily (saith he) I tell you, he shall set and place him ouer all the goods he hath. For the right and title belonging to the communion of saints in their country (hee meaneth in the kingdome of heauen). Fundatur obiectiue super universitatem bonorum Dei: that is, hath his relation, as vnto his obiect, to al the goods and possession of God.

5. A man can but onely ministratoriously giue any temporall dominion or gift perpetuall, as well to his owne naturall sonne, as to his sonne by imitation.—It is euident. For euery man ought to recognise himselfe in all his workes and doings, as an humble seruant and minister of God. As the words of Scripture doe teach vs. Let a man so esteeme of vs as the ministers of Christ. Yea, so Christ himselfe did teach his chiefe apostles to minister; but in their country the saints shall giue vnto their fellow bretheren the dominion of their goods, "Et patet de suis corporibus & bonis eis inferioribus in natura," according to the words of Luke 6. They shall giue you, and put into your bosomes a good measure and perfect, well filled and heaped vp, and running ouer.

6. If God bee, temporall lords may lawfully and meritoriously take away the goods of fortune from the Church when they doe offend habitualiter.—This conclusion is correlative with the first article of our faith: I beleuee in God the Father Almighty, &c. Where I vnderstand this word (may) in this conclusion after the manner of autentike Scripture, which saith and granteth, that God is able of these stones to raise vp children to Abraham; for otherwise all Christian princes were heretikes. For this conclusion thus standeth the reason: If God be, hee is omnipotent: and if hee be Almighty, hee is able to commaund the lords temporall so to doe: and if he may so commaund, then may they lawfully so take away such goods, &c. And so by the vertue of the same principle, Christian princes haue practised the said sentence upon the churchmen heeretofore, as did William Rufus, &c. But God forbid that any should beleue heereby my intention to haue beene, that secular lords may lawfully take away what goods soeuer, and by what meanes soeuer, by their owne naked authority at their pleasure: but onely by the authority of the Church they may so doe, in cases and forme limited by the law.

7. We know that it is not possible that the vicar of Christ is able by his pure bulls, &c.—This is manifest by the catholike faith; forasmuch as the Church doth fully beleuee that the enabling of any man ought first to proceede and come of God; wherefore no man being Christ his vicar, hath any power in this matter, but onely as vicar in the name of the Lord, so farre forth as hee is enabled of the Lord, to notifie vnto the Church whom God hath enabled. Wherefore if any man doe any thing, not as vicar in the name of the Lord, whom he ought to forethinke to be his author and head; it is a presumption of Lucifer, forsomuch as Christ by his Apostle saith, 1 Cor. 3. All our abilitie or sufficiency commeth of God. And so consequently, it commeth not purely by the ministry of his vicarship, that he is enabled; but the ablenesse or vnablenesse of him, being the vicar of Christ, commeth to him another way from aboue.

8. A man cannot be excommunicate to his hurt or vndoing, except he be excommunicate first and principally of himselfe.—It is euident, forasmuch as all such excommunication ought to proceede and begin originally of his owne sin which is damned: whereupon Augustin saith, De verbis Domini Sermons 51. Doe not thou conculcate thy selfe, and man ouercommeth thee not. And moreover the faith of the Church doth teach, quod nulla ei nocabit aduersitas, si nulla dominetur iniquitas: that is to say; No aduersitie shall hurt, if no iniquitie hath the ypperhand. And yet notwithstanding, euery excommunication for many causes is also to be feared, although that the excommunication of the Church, to the humble man being excommunicated, be not damnable but wholesome.

9. No man ought but in God's cause alone to excommunicate, suspend, &c.—It is cleare, forasmuch as euery iust cause is the cause of God, whose respect ought chiefly to bee weighed and pondred. Yea, the loue of the person excommunicate, ought to surmount the zeale of reuengement, and the desire of all temporall goods whatsoever; for otherwise he that doth excommunicate, doth damnifie himselfe. To this 9. conclusion notwithstanding it is congruent, that a prelate may excommunicate in the cause also of man, so that his principall respect in so doing bee had to the iniury done to his God, as appeareth 13. quest. 4. Inter querelas.

10. No curse or excommunication can bind simply, but in case it be giuen out against the aduersarie of Christ's law.—And it appeareth thus, because that God doth binde simply euery one that is bound, who cannot excommunicate but onely for transgression of his law. Whereunto it is consonant notwithstanding, that the censure of the Church doth not binde simply, but secondarily in that case and respect, as it is denounced against the aduersary of the members of the Church.

11. There is no example of Christ, which giueth power to his disciples to excommunicate any subject (especially for denying of any temporalities) but contrary.—Which is thus declared by the faith, whereby wee beleuee that God is to be beloued aboue all things, and our neighbour and enemy are to bee beloued aboue all temporall goods of this world necessarily; for the law of God cannot be contrary vnto it selfe.

12. The disciples of Christ haue no power by any ciuil coercion to exact temporal things by their censures.—This appeareth by the faith of the Scripture, Luke 23. Where Christ did forbid his Apostles ciuilly to raigne or to beare any lordship. The kings (saith hee) of the Gentiles beare rule ouer them; but you not so. And after this sense it is expounded of S. Bernard, of S. Chrysostome, and other holy men: which conclusion notwithstanding, yet may they exact temporall things by ecclesiastical censures incidently, if case be that it appertaine to the reuengement of their God.

13. It is not possible by the absolute power of God, that if the pope or any other Christian do pretend to binde or loose at their pleasure by what meanes soeuer, that thereby he doth so binde and loose.—The contrary of this conclusion will destroy the whole Catholike faith, importing no lesse but him to be a blasphemour which so vsurpeth such absolute power of the Lord. And yet by this conclusion I intend not to derogate from the power of the pope, or of any other prelate of the Church, but that he may by the vertue of the head so binde and loose: But doe vnderstand the conditionall of this negatiue (to be impossible) after this sense, that it cannot be that the pope or any other prelate of the Church can pretend by himselfe to binde or loose (how and after what manner hee list himselfe) except in such sort, that hee doe indeede so binde and loose before God, as hee doth pretend to doe.

14. We ought to beleuee, that the vicar of Christ doth at such times onely binde and loose, when as he worketh conformably by the law and ordinance of Christ, &c.—The reason thereof is this, because otherwise it is vnlawfull for him so to doe, except he should do it in the vertue of that law? and so consequently, vnlesse it be conformable to the law and ordinance of Christ.

15. To this conclusion, this ought vniuersally to be beleueed, that euery priest rightly and duely ordered hath power according to his vocation, &c.—The reason hereof is this, because that the order of priesthood in his owne nature and substance receiueth no such degrees, either of more or lesse. And yet notwithstanding, the power of inferiour priests in these dayes, is vpon due consideration restrained, and sometimes againe, in time of extreme necessitie, released. And thus according to the doctors, a prelate hath a double power, to wit, the power of order, and the power of iurisdiction or regiment. And according to this second power, the prelates are in a higher maiesty, and regiment.

16. It is lawfull for princes and kings (in cases by the law limited) to withdraw temporall commodities from churchmen, abusing the same habitualiter. The reason thereof is plaine, for that temporall lords ought rather to leane to spirituall almes, which bringeth with it great fruites, than to corporall almes the case so standing, that sometime it were a necessary worke of spirituall almes, to chastise such clerks by taking from them their temporall liuings, which vse to abuse the same to the damnyning both of their soule and body. The cases which the law doth limit in this matter, were the defect of correcting his spirituall head, or else for lacke of correcting the faith of the clerke which so offendeth, as appeareth, 16. q. 7. filijs Dist. 40. cap. Si papa.

17. Whether they be temporall lords, or any other men whatsoever, which haue endued any church with temporalities, &c.—The truth thereof is evidently seene, for that nothing ought to stop a man from the principall works of charitie necessarily, because in euery action and worke of man is to be vnderstood a priuie condition necessary of God, his good will concurring withall, as it is in the ciuill law de c. Conradi cap. 5. in fine collat. x. And yet God forbid, that by these words occasion should bee giuen to the lords temporall to take away the goods of fortune from the Church.

18. An ecclesiasticall minister, yea, the bishop of Rome may lawfully be rebuked of his subiects, and for the profit of the church be accused, either of the clergie, or of the laitie.—The prooue of this is manifest hereby, because the said bishop of Rome is subiect to fall into the sinne against the Holy Ghost, as may be supposed, sauing the sanctitude, humilitie and reuerence due to such a father. For so long as our brother is subiect vnto the infirmities of falling, hee lyeth vnder the law of brotherly correction. And when the whole codelge of cardinals may be slothfull in ministring due correction for the necessary prosperitie of the Church: it is apparent that the residue of the body of the Church, which possibly may stand most of lay men, may wholly correct the same, accuse and bring him to a better way. The possibilitie of this case is touched, Dist. 40. Si Papa. If the pope doe erre from the right faith, &c. For like as such a great fall ought not to be supposed in the lord pope without manifest euidence: so againe, such an obstinacie ought not to bee supposed in him, possibly being fallen, but that hee will humbly receiue the wholesome medicine of his superior, correcting him in the Lord. The practice of which conclusion also is testified in many Chronicles. Farre bee it from the Church of Christ, that veritie should be condemned which soundeth euil to transgressors and other slothfull persons, for then the whole faith of the Scripture were in a damnable case.—Thus Iohn Wickliffe in giuing his Exposition vnto his foresaid propositions and conclusions, as is aboue prefixed, through the fauour and diligence of the Londoners, either shifted off the bishops, or else satisfied them so, that for that time he was dismissed and scaped clearly away, onely being charged and commanded by the said bishops, that hee should not teach or preach any such doctrine any more, for the offence of the lay people."

About the same time also, about 3 yeeres after, there fell a cruell dissention in England, betweene the common people and the nobility, the which did not a little disturbe and trouble the commonwealth. In this tumult Simon of Sudbury archbishop of Canturbury, was taken by the rusticall and rude people, and was beheaded. In whose place after succeeded William Courtney, which was no lesse diligent than his predecessor had bene before him, in doing his diligence to roote out heretikes. Notwithstanding in the meane season Wickliffe's sect increased priuily, and dayly grew to greater force, vntill the time that William Barton vicechancellor of Oxford, about the yeeres of our Lord 1380, had the whole rule of that Vni-versitie: who calling together eight monastical doctors, and four other, with the consent of the rest of his affinitie, putting the common seale of the Vniuersitie vnto certaine writings, set forth an edict, declaring vnto euery man, and threatening them vnder a grieuous penaltie, that no man should be so hardy, hereafter to associate themselves with any of Wickliffe's fautors or fauourers: and vnto Wickliffe himselfe he threatened the greater excommunication, and further imprisonment, and to all his fautors, vnlesse that they after three dayes canonical admonition or warning, or as they call it, peremptorie, did repent and amend. The which thing when Wickliffe vnderstood, forsaking the pope and all the clergy, hee thought to appeale vnto the kings maiesty: but the duke of Lancaster comming between, forbade him that he should not hereafter attempt or begin any such matters, but rather submit himselfe vnto the censure and iudgement of his ordinary. Whereby Wickliffe being beset with troubles and vexations, as it were in the midst of the waues, he was forced once againe to make confession of his doctrine: in the which his confession, to auoide the rigor of things, hee answered as is aforesaid, making his declaration, and qualifying his assertions after such a sort, that he did mitigate and asswage the rigor of his enemies.—The next yeere after, which was 1382, by the commandement of William archbishop of Canturbury, there was a conuocation holden at London, where as Iohn Wickliffe was also commanded to be present. But whether he there appeared personally or not, I finde it not in story certainly affirmed. The mandate of the archbishop William Courtney (sent abroad for the conuening together of this councell) here followeth vnder written, truly copied out of his owne registers.—Memorandum, that where as well amongst the nobles as commons of this realme of England; there hath a certaine brute bin spread of diuers conclusions both erroneous, and also repugnant to the determination of the Church, which tend to the subuersion of the whole Church, and to our prouince of Canturburie, and also to the subuersion of the whole realme, being preached in diuers and sundrie places of our said prouince, generally, commonly, and publikely: Wee William by Gods permission Archbishop of Canturbury, Primate of all England, and Legate of the Sea Apostolicall, being minded to execute our office and duty herein; haue conuocated or called together certaine our fellow brethren and others a great many, as well doctors and batchelers of diuinity, as doctors of the canon and ciuill law, and those whom we thought to be the most famous men, skilfullest men, and men of soundest iudgement in religion, that were in all the realme, whose names hereunder ensue. And the same being (the 17 day of the moneth of May) in the yeere of our Lord 1382, in a certaine chamber within the territories of the priorie of the friers preachers of London, before vs and our foresaid fellow brethren assembled, then and there personally present:

After that the said conclusions (the tenor whereof hereunder ensueth) were openly proposed, and distinctly and plainly read: Wee burthened our foresaid fellow brethren, doctors, and batchelers, in the faith wherein they stood bound to our Lord Jesus Christ, and as they would answer before the high Judge in the day of Judgement, that they should speake their opinions touching the said conclusions, and what euery of them thinketh therein.

And at length, after good deliberation had vpon the premisses, the foresaid our brethren the bishops, doctors and batchelers, reassembled before vs the 21 day of the same moneth in the foresaid chamber, the foresaid Conclusions being againe and againe repeated and plainly read; by vs and by the common consents of vs all it remaineth published and declared, that some of the said conclusions are hereticall, and othersome erroneous and contrary to the determination of the Church, as hereafter most manifestly shall appeare. And forasmuch as by sufficient information we find and perceiue, that the said conclusions in many places of our said prouince haue beene, as is said, both taught and preached; and that diuers other persons doe hold and maintaine the same, and be of heresie vehemently and notoriously suspected: wee haue thought good, as well generally as specially, to send out this processe vnderwritten.

The names of the Iurers were these.—Imprimis, 7 Bishops, Canturbury, Winchester, Durham, Exeter, Hereford, Sarum, Rochester, and Frier, Botlesham, B.—Item, 3 friers preachers, Siward, Paris, Langley.—Item, 4 minorites, Foluile, Carlel, Frisly, Bernwel.—Item, Augustins friers foure, Ashborne, Bowkin, Woldley, Hornington.—Item, Carmelites 4, Glanule, Dis, Loney, Kiningham.—Item, Monkes 4, Wels, Ramsey, Bloxam, Maxton.—Item, doctors of the canon and ciuill law 14, Appelby, Waltrom, Baketon, Chadeseu, Tregison, Stow, Blanchard, Rocombey, Lidford, Welbourne, Flaineburgh, Motrum, Brandon and Prophet.—Item, Batchelers of Diuinitie 6, Humbleton, Pickwech, Lindlow, Wich, Chiseldon, Tomson.—The articles of Iohn Wickliffe here aboue specified, whereof there were 10, which were by these friers condemned as hereticall, the rest as erroneous, here in order follow, and are these. Although it may be thought, that some of them were made worse by their sinister collecting, than he meant them in his owne workes and writings.

The Articles of Iohn Wickliffe, condemned as hereticall. 1. The substance of material bread and wine, doth remaine in the Sacrament of the Altar after the consecration. 2. The accidents doe not remaine without the subject in the same sacrament, after the consecration. 3. That Christ is not in the sacrament of the altar truly and really, in his proper and corporall person. 4. That if a bishop or a priest be in deadly sin, hee doth not order, consecrate, nor baptize. 5. That if a man be duly and truly contrite and penitent, all exterior and outer confession is but superfluous and unprofitable unto him. 6. That it is not found or established by the Gospell, that Christ did make or ordaine masse. 7. If the pope be a reprobate and euill man, and consequently a member of the Diuell; hee hath no power by any manner of meanes giuen unto him ouer faithfull Christians, except peraduenture it be giuen him from the emperour. 8. That since the time of Urban the 6, there is none to be receiued for pope, but euery man is to liue after the manner of the Greeks, vnder his own law. 9. That it is against the Scripture, that ecclesiasticall Ministers should haue any temporall possessions.

The other Articles of Iohn Wickliffe, condemned as erroneous. 10. That no prelate ought to excommunicate any man, except hee knew him first to be excommunicate of God. 11. That he, which doth so excommunicate any man, is thereby himselfe either an heretike or excommunicated. 12. That a prelate or bishop excommunicating any of the clergy, which hath appealed to the king or the councell, is thereby himselfe a traitor to the king and realme. 13. That all such, which doe leaue off preaching or hearing the Word of God or preaching of the Gospell, for feare of excommunication; they are already excommunicated, and in the day of iudgement shall be counted as traitors vnto God. 14. That it is lawfull for any man, either deacon or priest, to preach the Word of God without the authoritie or licence of the Apostolike Sea or any other of his catholickes. 15. (a) That so long as a man is in deadly sin, hee is neither bishop nor prelat in the Church of God. 16. (b) Also that the temporall lords may, according to their own will and discretion take away the temporall goods from the churchmen whensoever they doe offend. 17. That tenths are pure almes, and that the parishioners may, for offence of their Curats, detainee and keepethem back, and bestow them vpon others, at their owne will and pleasures. 18. Also that all speciall prayers applied to any priuate or particular person, by any prelat or religious man, doe no more profit the same person, than generall or vniuersall prayers doe profit others, which bee in like case or state vnto him. 19. Moreover, in that any man doth enter into any priuate religion, whatsoever it bee, hee is thereby made the more vnapt and vnable to obserue and keepe the Commandements of God. 20. That holy men which haue instituted priuate religions, whatsoever they be (as well such as are indued and possessed, as also the order of begging friers hauing no possessions) in so doing, haue grievouly offended. 21. That religious men, being in their priuate religions, are not of the Christian religion. 22. That friers are bounden to get their liuing by the labour of their hands, and not by begging. 23. That whosoever doth giue any almes vnto friers, or to any begging obseruant, is accursed, or in danger thereof.

The letter of the Archbishop directed to the Bishop of London, against Iohn Wickliffe and his adherents.—William by Gods permission Archbishop of Canturburie, Metropolitan of all England, and of the apostolickall Sea legate; To our reuerend brother by the grace of God bishop of London, salutation. The prelates of the Church ought to bee so much the more vigilant and attentiuie about the charge of the Lords flocke committed vnto them: how much the more they shall vnderstand the Wolues, being clothed in sheepes apparell, fraudulently to go about to worrie and scatter the sheepe. Truly by the continuall crie and bruted fame (which it grieueth me to report) it is come to our knowledge that although by the canonickall sanctions, no man being forbidden or not admitted, should either publicly or priuily without the authoritie of the apostolickall Sea or bishop of that place, vsurpe or take vpon him the office of a preacher: Some notwithstanding, such as are the children of damnation, being vnder the vale of blinde ignorance, are brought into such a dotting minde, that they take vpon them to preach, and are not afraid to affirme and teache diuers and sundrie propositions and conclusions here vnder recited, both hereticall, erroneous and false, condemned by the Church of God, and repugnaut to the decree of holy Church, which tend to the subuerting of the whole state of the same, of our prouince of Canturburie, and to the destruction and weakening of the tranquillitie of the same; and that as well in the churches, as in the streets, as also in manie other prophane places of our said prouince, generally, comonly and publikly, do preach the same, infecting very many good christians, causing them lamentably to wander out of the way, and from the catholike Church, without which there is no saluation. We therefore, considering that so pernicious a mischief, which may creepe amongst manie, we ought not to suffer, and by dissimulation to passe ouer, which may with deadly contagion slay the soules of men, lest their blood be required at our hands; are willing so much as God will permit vs to doe, to extirpate the same. Wherefore, by the counsell and consent of many of our bretheren and Suffragans, wee haue conuened diuers and sundrie doctors of diuinitie, as also professors and other clerks of the canon and ciuill lawes, the best learned within the realme, and of the most soundest opinion and iudgement in the catholike faith, to giue their opinions and iudgements concerning the foresaid conclusions. But forasmuch as the said conclusions and assertions, being in the presence of vs, and our fellow bretheren and other conuocates, openly expounded, and diligently examined, were in the end found by common counsell and consent as well of them as of vs, and so declared that some of those conclusions were hereticall, and some of them erroneous, and repugnant to the determination of the Church, as hereunder are described. We will and command your brotherhood and by vertue of holy obedience straitly inioine all and singular our brethren, and suffragans of our bodie and Church of Canturburie, that with all speedie diligence you possibly can you likewise enioine them (as we haue enioined you) and euerie of them. And that euerie one of them in their Churches and other places of their cite and diocesse, doe admonish and warne, and that you, in your Church and other Churches of your cite and dioces doe admonish and warne, as we by the tenor of these presents doe admonish and warne the first time, the second time, and the third time; and yet more straitly doe warne, assigning for the first admonition one day, for the second admonition another day, and for the third admonition canonical and peremptorie, another day; That no man from henceforth of what estate or conditioun soeuer, doe hold, preach, or defend the foresaid heresies and errors or any of them; nor that he admit to preach any one that is prohibited or not sent to preach, nor that he heare or hearken to the heresies or errors of him or any of them, or that hee fauour or leane vnto him either publikely or priuily; but that immediately hee shur him, as he would auoid a serpent putting forth most pestiferous poison, vnder paine of the greater curse, the which wee command to bee thundered against all and euerie one which shall be disobedient in this behalfe, and not regarding these our monitions, after that those three daies be past which are assigned for the canonical monition, and that their delay, fault or offence committed require the same: And then according to the tenour of these writings, we command both by euerie one of our fellow bretheren and our suffragans in their cities and dioces, and by you in your cite and diocesse (so much as belongeth both to you and them) that to the vttermost both ye and they cause the same excommunications to be pronounced. And furthermore wee will and command our foresaid fellow bretheren, and all and singular of you apart by your selues, to bee admonished and by the aspersion of the blood of Iesus Christ wee likewise admonish you; that according to the institution of the Sacred Canons, euery one of them in their cities and dioces, bee a diligent inquisitor of this hereticall prauitie; and that euery one of you also in your cities and dioces bee the like inquisitor of the foresaid hereticall prauitie: And that of such like presumption they and you carefully and diligently inquire, and that both they and you (according to your duties and office in this behalfe) with effect doe proceede against the same, to the honour and praise of his name that was crucified, and for the preservation of the Christian faith and religion.

Here is not to be passed ouer the great miracle of Gods diuine admonition or warning; for when as the archbishop and suffragans, with the other doctors of diuinitie, and lawyers with a great company of babling friers, and religious persons were gathered together to consult as touching Iohn Wicklifes books, and that whole sect; when as I say, they were gathered together at the gray friers in London, to begin their businesse, vpon saint Dunstons day after dinner, about two of the clocke, the very houre and instant that they should goe forward with their businesse, a wonderfull and terrible earthquake fell throughout all England: whereupon diners of the suffragans, being feared by the strange and wonderfull demonstration, doubting what it should meane, thought it good to leaue off from their determinate purpose. But the archbishop (as chiefe captaine of that army, more rash and bold than wise) interpreting the chance which had happened cleane contrary to another meaning or purpose, did confirme and strengthen their hearts and minds, which were almost daunted with feare, stoutly to proceede and goe forward in their attempted enterprise. Who then discoursing Wicklifes articles, not according vnto the Sacred Canons of the holy Scripture, but vnto their owne priuate affections and traditions, pronounced and gaue sentence, that some of them were simply and plainly hereticall, other some halfe erroneus, other irreligious, some seditious, and not consonant to the Church of Rome.—Item, the twelfth day of June, in the yeere aforesaid, in the chamber of the friers preachers, the foresaid master Robert Rigge, Chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, and Thomas Brightwell professors of diuinitie (being appointed the same day and place, by the foresaid reuerend father in God archbishop of Canturburie) appeared before him in the presence of the reuerend father in God, lord William by the grace of God bishop of Winchester and diuers other doctors and bachelors of diuinitie and of the canon ciuill and law, whose names are before recited. And first the said Chancellor by the said lord Archbishop of Canturbury, being examined what his opinion was touching the foresaid articles, publikely affirmed and declared, that certain of those conclusions were hereticall, and certaine erroneus, as the other doctors and clerkes afore mentioned had declared. And then immediately next after him, the foresaid Thomas Brightwell was examined, which vpon some of the conclusions at first somewhat staggered, but in the end, being by the said Archbishop diligently examined vpon the same, did affirme and repute the same to bee hereticall and erroneus, as the foresaid Chancellor had done. Another Bachelor of Diuinitie also there was named N. stammering also at some of those conclusions, but in the end affirmed that his opinion therein was, as was the iudgement of the foresaid Chancellor and Thomas as is aboue declared. Whereupon, the said lord Archbishop of Canturbury, willing to let and hinder the perill of such heresies and errors, deliuered vnto the foresaid Chancellor, there being publikely read, his letters patents to be executed, the tenor whereof in these words doth follow.

William by the grace of God archbishop of

Cantuarburie, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolicall See: To our welbeloued sonne in Christ the Chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, within the diocesse of Lincolne, greeting, grace, and benediction. The prelates of the Church, about the Lords stocke committed to their charge, ought to be so much more vigilant as that they see the Wolfe, clothed in sheeps attire, fraudulently go about to worrie and scatter the sheepe. Doublesse, the common fame and brute is come vnto our eares, &c. Vi in mandato precedenti. Wee will therefore and command, straitly inioyning you, that in the Church of our blessed Ladie in Oxford, vpon those daies in the which accustomed the sermon is made, as also in the schooles of the said Vniuersitie vpon those daies the Lectures bee read, yee publish and cause by others to bee published to the clergie and people, as well in their vulgar tongue, as in the Latine tongue, manifestly and plainly without any curious implication, the same hereticall and erroneous conclusions, so repugnant to the determination of holy Church, as is aforesaid; to haue bene and be condemned; which conclusions wee also declare by these our letters to bee vtterly condemned. And that furthermore you forbid, and canonically admonish and cause to bee admonished, as wee by the tenour of these presents doe forbid and admonish you, once, twice, and thrice, and that peremptorily that none hereafter bold, teach, and preach, or defend the heresies and errors abouesaid, or any of them, either in schoole or out of schoole by any sophisticall cauillation or otherwise: or that any admit to preach, here or hearken vnto Iohn Wickliffe, Nicholas Herford, Philip Repington, canon regular, or Iohn Ashton, or Laurence Redman, which be vehemently and notoriously suspected of heresie, or else any other whatsoever, so suspected or defamed; or that either priuately or publicly they either aide or fauour them or any of them, but that incontinently they slun and auoide the same as a Serpout which putteth forth most pestiferous poysou. And furthermore we suspend the said suspected persons from all scholasticall act, till such time as they shall purge themselues before vs in that behalfe: and that you denounce the same publicly by vs to haue bene and be suspended; and that yee diligently and faithfully enquire of all their fautors and fauourers, and cause to bee enquired throughout all the halls of the said Vniuersitie. And that when you shall haue intelligence of their names and persons, that ye compell all and euerie of them to abiure their outrages by ecclesiasticall censures and other paines canonically whatsoever, vnder paine of the greater curse, the which against all and singular the rebellious in this behalfe, and disobeying our monitions, wee pronounce: so that their fault, deceit, and offence in this behalfe deserue the same (the said monition of ours being first sent) which in this behalfe we esteeme and allow canonically, that then and againe according to the effect of these our letters, &c. The absolutioun of all and singular such, which shall incurre the sentence of this instrument by vs sent forth (which God forbid) wee specially reserue vnto our selues: exhorting you the Chancellor by the aspersion of the blood of Iesus Christ, that to the vttermost of your power hereafter you doe your endeaour, that the clergie and people being subiect vnto you, if there bee any which haue straid from the catholike faith by such errors, may bee brought home againe to the laud and honour of his name that was crucified, and preseruation of the true faith. And further our will is, that whatsoever you shall doe in the premises, in manner and forme of our processe in this behalfe it be had and done: and that you for your part, when you shall be required thereunto, plainly and distinctly doe certifie vs by your letters patents, hauing the tenour hereof.

The archbishop not yet contented with this, doth moreouer by all meanes possible sollicite the king to ioyne withall the power of his temporall sword; for that hee well perceiued, that hitherto as yet the popish clergie had not authoritie sufficient, by any publike law or statute of this land, to procede vnto death against any person whatsoever, in case of religion, but onely by the vsurped tyranny and example of the court of Rome. Whers note (gentle reader) for thy better vnderstanding, the practice of the Romish prelates in seeking the king's helpe to further their bloody purpose against the good saints of God. Which king being but young, and vnder yeeres of ripe iudgement, partly induced, or rather seduced by importune sute of the foresaid archbishop, partly also either for feare of the bishops (for kings cannot alwayes doe in their realmes what they will) or else perhaps inticed by some hope of subsidie to be gathered by the clergy, was content to adioyne his priuat assent (such as it was) to the setting downe of an ordinance, which was indeede the very first law that is to bee found made against religion and the professours thereof, bearing the name of an act made in the parliament holden at Westminster, anno 5. Rich. 2, where among sundry other statutes then published, and yet remaining in the printed bookes of statutes, this supposed statute is to bee found, cap. 5. & vltimo, as followeth.

Item, forsomuch as it is openly known that there be diuers euill persons within the realm, going from county to county, and from towne to towne, in certaine habits vnder dissimulation of great holinesse, and without the licence of the ordinaries of the places, or other sufficient authoritie, preaching daily not onely in Churches and Church-yards, but also in markets, faires, and other open places where a great congregation of people is, diuers sermons containing heresies and notorious errors, to the great embleshing of Christian faith and destruction of the lawes, and of the estate of Holy Church, to the great perill of the soules of the people, and of all the realme of England, as more plainly is found, and sufficiently prouced before the reuerend father in God the archbishop of Cantuarbury, and the bishops and other prelates, masters of divinitie, and doctors of canon and of ciuill law, and a great part of the clergy of the said realme, specially assembled for this great cause; which persons doe also preach diuers matters of slander, to ingender discord and dissention betwixt diuers estates of the said realme, as well spirituall as temporall, in exciting of the people to the great perill of all the realme: which preachers being cited or summoned before the ordinaries of the places, there to answer to that wherof they be impeached, they will not obey to their summons and commandements, nor care not for their monitions nor censures of the Holy Church, but expressly despise them; and moreover, by their subtle and ingenious words, doe draw the people to heare their sermons, and doe maintaine them in their errors by strong hand, and by great routs: It is ordained and assented in this present parliament, that the king's commissions bee made and directed to the shiriffes and other ministers of our soueraigne lord the king, or other sufficient persons learned, and according to the certifications of the prelates thereof, to bee made in the Chancery from time to time, to arrest all such preachers, and also their fautors, maintainers and abettors, and to hold them in arrest and strong prison, till they will iustifie themselves according to the law and reason of Holy Church. And the king willet and commandeth, that the Chancellor make such commissions at all times, that hee by the prelates, or any of them shall be certified and thereof required, as is aforesaid.

-An Examination of the foresaid supposed Statute, and of the inualidity thereof.—Which supposed statute forasmuch as it was the principall ground whereupon proceeded all the persecution of that time; it is therefore not impertinent to examine the same more particularly, whereby it shal appeare, that as the same was fraudulently and vnduely devised by the prelates only, so was it in like maner most iniuriously and vnorderly executed by them. For immediately vpon the publishing of this law, without further warrant either from the king or his counceil, commissions vnder the great seale of England were made in this forme: Richard by the grace of God, &c. vt patet act. pag. 541. Witnesse my selfe at Westminster the 26 day of Iune, in the sixth yeare of our raigne. Without more words of warrant vnder written, such as in like cases are both vsuall and requisite; viz. per ipsum regem: per rege & concilium: or per breue de priuato sigillo. All or any which words being vtterly wanting in this place, as may bee scene in the king's records of that time; it must therefore be done either by warrant of this foresaid statute, or els without any warrant at all. Whereupon it is to be noted, that whereas the said statute appointed the commissions to be directed to the shiriffe, or other ministers of the king's, or to other sufficient persons learned for the arresting of such persons; the said commissions are directed to the archbishop and his suffragans, being as it appeareth parties in the case, authorizing them further without either the words, or reasonable meaning of the said statute, to imprison them in their owne houses, or where else pleased them.

Besides also, what manner of law this was, by whom devised, and by what authority the same was first made and established, iudge by that that followeth: viz.

In the Utas of Saint Michael next following, at a parliament summoned and holden at Westminster, the sixth yeere of the said king, among sundery petitions made to the king by his commons, whereunto hee assented, there is none in this forme, article 52.

Item, prayen the commons, that whereas an estatute was made the last parliament in these words: It is ordained in this present parliament, that commissions from the king bee directed to the shiriffes and other ministers of the king, or to other sufficient persons skilfull, and according to the certificats of the prelates thereof, to bee made vnto the Chancery from time to time, to arrest all such preachers, and their fautors, maintainers and abettors: and them to detain in strong prison, vntill they will iustifie themselves according to reason, and law of Holy Church: and the king willet and commandeth that the Chancellor make such commissions at all times, as he shall be by the prelates or any of them certified, and thereof required, as is aforesaid. The which was neuer agreed nor granted by the commons: but whatsoeuer was moued therein, was without their assent: that the said statute be therefore disannulled. For it is not in any wise their meaning, that either themselves, or such as shall succede them, shall bee further iustified or bound by the prelates, than were their ancestors in former times, whereunto is answered, il plust a Roy. 1. the king is pleased.

Hereby notwithstanding the former vniust law of an. 5. was repealed, and the fraud of the framers thereof sufficiently discovered: yet such meanes was there made by the prelates, that this act of repeale was neuer published, nor euer sithence imprinted with the rest of the statutes of that parliament. Insomuch as the said repeale being concealed, like commissions and other processe were made from time to time, by vertue of the said bastard statute, as well during all the raigne of this king, as euer sithence against the professors of religion.

Meane while what became of J. Wickliffe it is not certainly knowne. Albeit, so farre as may bee gathered out of Walden, it appeareth that he was banished and driuen to exile. In the meane time it is not to bee doubted, but he was aliove during all this while, wheresoeuer he was, as by his letter may appeare, which he about this time wrote to pope Urbane the sixth. In the which letter he doth purge himselfe, that being commanded to appeare before the pope at Rome, hee came not; declaring also in the same a brieue confession of his faith. The copie of which epistle here followeth.

The epistle of John Wickliffe sent vnto pope Urbane the sixth. Anno 1382.—Verily I doe reioyce to open and declare vnto euery man the faith which I doe hold, and specially vnto the bishop of Rome; the which forsomuch as I doe suppose to bee sound and true, he will most willingly confirme my said faith, or, if it bee erroneous, amend the same. First, I suppose, that the Gospell of Christ is the whole body of Gods law; and that Christ, which did giue the same law himselfe, I beleene to be a very man, and in that point, to exceed the law of the Gospell, and all other parts of the Scripture. Againe, I doe giue and hold the bishop of Rome, forsomuch as he is the vicar of Christ, here in earth, to be bound most of all other men vnto that law of the Gospell. For the greatnesse amongst Christs disciples did not consist in worldly dignitie, or honours, but in the neere and exact following of Christ in his life and manners: whereupon I doe gather out of the heart of the law of the Lord, that Christ for the time of his pilgrimage here was a most poore man, abiecting and casting off all worldly rule and honour, as appeareth by the Gospell of Matth. the 8. and the 2 Cor. 8. chap.—Hereby I doe fully gather, that no faithfull man ought to follow, either the pope himselfe, or any of the holy men, but in such points as he hath followed the Lord Jesus Christ. For Peter and the sonnes of Zebede, by desiring worldly honour contrary to the following of Christs steps, did offend, and therefore in those errors they are not to be followed.—Hereof I doe gather, as a counsell, that the pope ought to leaue vnto the secular power all temporall dominion and rule, and thereunto effectually to moue and exhort his whole clergy; for so did Christ, and specially by his Apostles. Wherefore if I haue erred in any of these points, I will most humbly submit my selfe vnto correction, euen by death if necessitie so require: and if I could labour according to my will or desire in mine owne person, I would surely present myselfe before the bishop of Rome; but the Lord hath otherwise visited me to the contrary, and hath taught me rather to obey God than men. Forsomuch then as God hath giuen vnto our pope iust and true euangelicall instinctions: we ought to pray that those motions be not extinguished by any subtile or crafty deuice.—And that the pope and cardinals be not moued to doe any thing contrary vnto the law of the Lord. Wherefore let vs pray vnto our God, that hee will so stirre vp our pope Vrbane the sixth, as he began, that he with his clergy may follow the Lord Jesus Christ in life and manners: and that they may teach the people effectually, and that they likewise may faithfully follow them in the same. And let vs specially pray that our pope may be preserued from all maligne and euill counsell, which we doe know that euill and euious men of his household would giue him. And seeing the Lord will not suffer vs to be tempted aboue our power, much lesse then will hee require of any creature to doe that thing which they are not able; forsomuch, as that is the plaine condition and manner of Antichrist.

Which John Wickliffe returning againe with in short space, either from his banishment, or from some other place where he was secretly kept, repaired to his parish of Lutterworth, where he was parson: and there, quietly departing this mortall life, slept in peace in the Lord, in the beginning of the yeere 1384, vpon Siluesters day.

12. PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT against Alexander Nevil, archbishop of York, Robert Vere, duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian, lord chief justice of England, and Nicholas Brambre some time mayor of London, and others, for High-Treason: 11 Richard II. A.D. 1388. [3 Hol. Chron. 453. Grafton, 377. Walsing. 334. 3 Tyrrel, 895. Brady, 307. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 188.]

THESE men being raised from mean estates by the favour of the king, and advanced to the degree of Privy-Counsellors, were the men who had the only rule of the Commonwealth, which under the king they governed for some small space with careful diligence, acquiring thereby deserved commendations: but not long did they thus steer the ship of the kingdom, for many of them being of inferior rank by birth, not having their veins dignified with noble blood, they were the sooner enticed with the libidinous baits of voluptuousness, and infected with the insatiable itch of avarice; insomuch that despising the authority of the king, and neglecting the commodity of the realm, and only desiring to keep up the Revenues of the kingdom, they so wrought by their policy, that the king is impoverished, and the treasury exhausted: upon which the Commons murmur at the multiplicity of Tenths, Levies and Subsidies; the Peers repine to see themselves disgraced and their inferiors honoured; and in a word, the whole kingdom endures an universal misery.—The nobility, seeing the miserable estate wherein the whole kingdom lay, bleeding as it were to death, urged the king to summon a Parliament, to the end the Grievances of the nation might be inquired into and redressed. A Parliament was shortly after held, October 4, 1386, in which, among many other Acts, John Fortham bishop of Durlham was discharged of his office of Treasurer, and John Gilbert bishop of Hereford appointed in his place; and Michael de la Pole (a) earl of Suffolk and Chancellor of England was dismissed from his chancellorship, and immediately after was impeached of high Crimes and Misdemeanors by the Commons, as follows :

1. "That the said earl being Chancellor, and sworn to act for the just profit of the king, hath purchased of our lord the king, lands, tenements and rents to a great value, as appears by the Record in the Rolls of Chancery; and that against his Oath, not regarding the great necessity of the king and realm, being Chancellor at the time of such purchase made, did cause the said lands and tenements to be set at a much smaller value than really they were worth by the year, in deceit of the king." [Rot. Par. 10 Rich. 2. No. 1. &c.]

To this first Article the earl answered to this effect: That while he was Chancellor, he neither purchased any lands of the king, nor did he give any to him, unless when he made him an earl, he had 400 marks per ann. from the king by way of exchange, for so much as he had by inheritance out of the Customs of Kingston-upon-Hull, whereof some part was assigned to him by one Tydeman of Limburgh and others before he was Chancellor, and some part since that time; which exchange was for the king's annual advantage; as also because of the sum of 1000 marks paid by the earl upon that consideration. And he further endeavoured to prove, that the Oath he had taken, when he was made Chancellor, had another intent than what they (the commons) would put upon it: and yet notwithstanding that Oath, he might lawfully take, or purchase from the king.

But the Commons not being satisfied with this Answer, replied thereto, and shewed the lords the copy of his (the Chancellor's) Oath, when he took the Great Seal into his custody, being in manner following, viz. 'You shall swear that you will well and truly serve our lord the king and his people, in the office of Chancellor, and will do right to all persons both poor and rich, according to the laws and customs of the realm, and shall faithfully advise the king, and conceal his counsels; and you shall not know of, nor permit any damage or disherison to the king, nor that the rights of his crown shall by any ways be destroyed, if you can hinder it; and if you cannot hinder it, you shall then clearly and expressly make it known to the king, together with your faithful Advice and Counsel thereupon: and you shall always act for, and procure the profit of the king, in all things where you may reasonably do it. So help you God and the Holy Gospels.'—Wherefore the Commons prayed, that this being read and well understood, and the circumstances of his said Answer considered, to wit, that he had not denied to have received of the gift of the king since he was made an earl, and being then in the office of Chancellor, divers lands and tenements, as is contained in the Impeachment, and it is openly known that he had received from the king other lauds and tenements, that are certain and sure, to the value of 400 marks per annum, in exchange for 400 marks yearly, which he had upon the Customs of Kingston upon Hull, that are casual, and not so sure, without informing the king of his damage in that particular: and whereas he the said Chancellor has alledged, that he received part of the said lands and tenements so taken in exchange before he was Chancellor: the Commons reply that he was then sworn of the king's privy council, and that afterwards at his being made Chancellor, was again obliged by oath; and that being in the said office, he had agreed to the exchanges by him before desired, and had received from the king the remainder of the said lands and tenements in full performance of the said exchanges; and therefore they demand Judgment of the parliament upon his aforesaid Answer; which being thought insufficient by the Lords, the following Judgment was given, being to this effect: That since the said earl had not alledged in his Answer, that he had observed his Oath, when he swore 'that he would not know of, or suffer any damage or disherison of the king, nor that the right of his crown should any ways be destroyed if he could hinder it,' with the rest of the clause in the said Oath, as is above recited; yet that he being the principal minister of the king, and knowing his estate, and the necessity of the realm, had taken such lands and tenements as are laid in the said Impeachment, and are recited in the first Article: and though he hath alledged in his Answer, that the gifts so bestowed upon him, were confirmed in full parliament; yet since he hath produced no such Record enrolled in parliament, therefore it was adjudged, 'That all manors, lands, tenements, and their appurtenances, so received by him from the king, should be seized and taken into his hands, to have and to hold them to him, and his heirs, as fully as ever they had been before the gift so made of them to the said earl, with the issues and mesne profits of the same from the time of the said grant, and which were to be levied out of the rest of the said earl's lands elsewhere; yet that it was not the intention of the king, nor of the lords, that this Judgment so given should make him lose the title of earl, nor yet the 20 marks yearly, which he was to receive out of the issues and profits of the county of Suffolk, by reason of the said title.

2. The second Article is, "That whereas nine lords were assigned by the last parliament to view and examine the State of the King and Realm, and to deliver their advice how the same might be improved and amended and put into better order and governance; and thereupon such Examination to be delivered to the king, as well by word of mouth as in writing; and although the said late Chancellor did say in full parliament, that the said Advice and Ordinances should be put in due execution, yet it was not done, and that by the default of him who was the principal officer or minister."—The earl's Answer to this being not very material, is omitted.

3. Item, "Whereas a Tax was granted by the Commons in the last parliament to be expended according to a certain form demanded by the said Commons, and assented to by the king and lords, and not otherwise; yet the monies thence arising were expended in another manner, so that the Sea was not guarded as it was ordered to have been; whence many mischiefs have already happened, and more are like to ensue to the realm, and all this by the default of the said Lord Chancellor"—This Article the earl denied, and it does not appear that it was proved.

4. Item, "Whereas one Tydeman of Limburgh having had granted to him and his heirs a gift of 50*l.* per annum by the king's grand-father, out of the Customs of Kingston upon Hull, which the said Tydeman had forfeited to the king, so that the payment of the said 50*l.* per annum was discontinued for 35 years and upwards; yet the said Chancellor knowing the premises, purchased to him and his heirs of the said Tydeman, the said 50*l.* per annum, and prevailed with the king to confirm the said purchase, whereas the king ought to have had the whole profit."—For this Purchase the said earl was adjudged to make fine and ransom, and the said 50*l.* were to go to the king and his heirs, with the manor of Flordece, and ten marks of rent, which were exchanged for the 50*l.* per annum out of the customs or profits, with the issues aforesaid.

5. "And whereas the master of St. Anthony is a schismatic, and for that cause the king ought to have the revenues (being to the value of 400 marks yearly) which appertain to him in England; the said late Chancellor, who ought to advance and procure the profit of the king, took to farm the said profits at 20 marks per annum, and so got to his own use above 300 marks; and afterwards when the true master nominated by the Pope, ought to have had the possession and livery of the said profits, he could not obtain the same, till he and two persons with him became bound by recognizance in chancery of 3,000*l.* to pay yearly to the said Chancellor, and his son, John 100*l.* per annum for the term of their two lives."—As to this, it is adjudged, that the king shall have all the Profits belonging to the said master of St. Anthony's at the time of the purchase; and that for the recognizance, so made, the said earl shall be awarded to prison, and fined and ransomed at the pleasure of the king.

6. Item, "That in the time of the late Chancellor, there were granted and made divers charters, and patents of pardon for murders, treasons, felonies, &c. against the laws of the land; and that before the commencement of this present parliament, there was made and sealed a charter of certain Franchises granted to the castle of Dover, in disheription of the crown, and to the subversion of the pleas and courts of the king, and of his laws."—To this the Judgment was, The king awards that those Charters be repealed.

7. Item, "Whereas by an Ordinance made in the last parliament, that 10,000 marks should be raised for the relief of the city of Gaunt, yet by the default of the said late Chancellor the said city of Gaunt was lost, and also a thousand marks of the said money." (b) The sum of the earl's Answers to the rest of these Articles, were either by denying some of them, or confessing and excusing others; but for all that he was soon after cast into the castle of Windsor, and all his lands, which were of no small revenue, confiscated.

Neither did the Parliament stop here, but to provide further for the whole state, they did by the unanimous consent of the king, prelates, barons, and commons, constitute and give plenary and absolute power to certain Commissioners as well of the spirituality as of the temporality for the ordering and disposing of the public affairs, according as to them should seem best and most necessary for the desperate estate of the Commonwealth, to depress civil dissensions, and to pacify and appease the grudgings of the people.

These (c) Commissioners were 13 in number, and were as follows; Of the Spirituality; 1, William Courtney archbishop of Canterbury. 2, Alexander Nevil archbishop of York. 3, Thomas Arundel bishop of Ely, lately made Chancellor of England. 4, William Wickham bishop of Winchester. 5, John Gilbert bishop of Hereford, lord treasurer. 6, Thomas Brentingham bishop of Exeter. 7, Nicholas abbot of Waltham, lord keeper of the privy seal.—Of the Laity. 8, Edmond Langley duke of

(b) Walsingham relates, that all these Articles abovementioned were so fully proved, that the earl could not deny them; inasmuch that when he stood upon his Defence, he had nothing to say for himself: whereupon the king blushing for him, shook his head and said, 'Alas, alas, Michael, see what thou hast done.'

(c) The Commission, which is among the Parliament Rolls, 10 Rd. 2. part 1. M. 7. mentions but eleven Commissioners, omitting the bishops of Ely and Hereford, and was in substance as follows: "That the king of his own free-will, and at the request of his Lords and Commons had changed the Great Officers of the crown abovementioned, for the good government of the kingdom, the good and due execution of the laws, and in relief of his own state, and ease of his people; and had appointed eleven Commissioners, viz. William archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander archbishop of York, Edmond duke of York, and Thomas duke of Gloucester (the king's uncle,) William bishop of Winchester, Thomas bishop of Exeter, Nicholas abbot of Waltham, Richard earl of Arundel, John lord Cobham, Richard le Scrope and John Devereux, to be his great and continual Council for one year next com-

York. 9, Thomas of Woodstock duke of Gloucester. 10, Richard earl of Arundel. 11, John lord Cobham. 12, Richard lord Scrope. 13, John Devereux, knight.

These, as men eminent in virtue, were chosen by the general suffrage, and confirmed by the king under the great seal; and sworn to carry themselves as dutiful and obedient subjects in all their actions: and it was farther enacted, 'That if any should refuse or disobey the Ordinances so made for the public good, the punishment for the first offence should be the confiscation of all his goods, and for the second the loss of his life.' Thus all things being disposed for the best, the Parliament was dissolved, [20 Nov. 1386] and every man returned to his own home.—Soon after [1387] the said Michael de la Pole, with others of his confederates, being moved with implacable fury against the late Statute, buzzed into the king's ears, that the statutes lately enacted were very prejudicial to the honour of his crown, and derogatory to his princely prerogative; that if they were in force he was no king, but rather resembled the shadow of one; and earnestly moved the king against the other lords, and to disannul all that was done in the late parliament. The king gave credit to these tales, and therefore had the lords in great jealousy; but he released Michael de la Pole earl of Suffolk out of the castle of Windsor, and suffered him to go at large: notwithstanding which the said earl of Suffolk, the duke of Ireland, and Robert Tresilian lord chief justice, doubtful of their own safeguards, did what they could to move the king forward to the destruction of the duke of Gloucester, the earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham, ing, after the date of these letters patent: by which he gave them power to survey and examine all his Officers, Courts, Household, and the Government of the whole kingdom, to receive all his Revenue, as also all Subsidies, Taxes, and other Payments; to do what they would in the kingdom, and to amend all things according to their discretions. And these powers were given to any six of them, with his three great officers, willing, that if any difference in opinion should happen between his Councillors and those officers, that the matter should be determined by the major part of them; commanding and charging all prelates, dukes, earls, barons, the steward, treasurer, and comptroller of his household, the justices of one bench or the other, and other his justices whatsoever, barons and chamberlains of the exchequer, sheriffs, escheators, mayors, bailiffs, and all other his officers, ministers, and lieges whatsoever, that they should be attending, obedient, counselling and assisting to the said councillors and officers, so often and in what manner they should direct. Dated at Westminster the 19th day of November." Upon this Commission a Statute was made, and the whole recited in it, which may be seen in the Statute Book, 10 Rich. 2. cap. 1.

with others of that party; and accordingly they conspired together with Alexander archbishop of York, and sir Nicholas Brambre, to devise means how they might dispatch the said lords; and for that purpose wrote letters to the king of France to aid and assist them in seizing on the said lords, and further prevailed with the judges to declare the said lords guilty of High-Treason for procuring the said late statutes.—But the said duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, seeing the heap of ills that daily did arise by the practices of those conspirators, set almost in every part of the kingdom Intelligencers, who should apprehend all messengers, and intercept all letters, which went under the king's name, and send them to the Commissioners. And thus did they come to have intelligence of the whole Plot of the Conspirators, all their Letters being indorsed, 'Glory be to God on High, on Earth Peace and Good Will towards Men:' and by coming to the knowledge of each circumstance, they found that the kingdom was at the point of destruction, wherefore they sought for a Remedy, for by the law of nature it is lawful to repel violence by violence; every man according to his ability levied a power for the preservation of the king and kingdom; part of which forces being committed to the earl of Arundel, he marched away by night, and pitched his tents near London; and in the mean time he used such discipline in his camp, that he lacked nothing, but all things were sold at reasonable rates as if it had been a market.

On the other side, the Conspirators intending to prevent their purpose, caused it to be proclaimed throughout the city of London, 'That none should upon pain of the forfeiture of all their goods, either sell, give, or communicate any necessaries to the army of the earl of Arundel, but should treat them as Rebels to the king and country.' Further, they counselled the king to absent himself from the Parliament (which was to begin on Candlemas next, according as the king and Commissioners had appointed it) unless the duke of Gloucester, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and the rest of the Commissioners would swear, 'That neither they nor any in their name should accuse them, or urge any Accusation against them.' In the mean time, the three noblemen, viz. the duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, having muster'd their troops on the 14th of November in the same year [1388] at Waltham-Cross in the county of Hertford, sent for the Commissioners that were at Westminster in parliament, and sent the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord John Lovel, lord Cobham, and sir John Devereux, with an Accusation in writing against the aforesaid Conspirators, viz. the archbishop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian and Nicholas Brambre, wherein they accused them of High-Treason; which their Appellation they did offer to maintain, and that they were willing to prosecute the same, and to prove it to be true; they caused also the rest of the Commissioners to subscribe as parties to their Appellation. When these things came to the ears of the king, he sent unto them requiring to know what their request was, and what they wished to have done: They returned answer thus, 'That they did desire, that the Traitors which were always about him filling his ears with false reports, and daily committed insufferable crimes and injuries, might be rewarded with condign punishment; for it were better some few should die for the people, than the whole nation should perish.' The king being advised by the archbishop of Canterbury, and bishop of Ely, lord chancellor, sent to them, willing them to come to him to Westminster on the Sunday then next following; which the lords would not agree to, till the lord chancellor, with divers other noblemen of good credit, had undertaken upon their oaths on the king's behalf, that no fraud, deceit, peril or evil pretence should be put in practice against them, whereby they might come to loss of life, limbs, goods, or otherwise, through the king's means.

When therefore the lords were ready according to covenant to come to Westminster, they were secretly advertised that there was an ambush laid in a place called the Mews, and so they staid and came not at the appointed hour: whereupon when the king demanded 'how it fortuned that the lords kept not their promise;' the bishop of Ely made answer, 'because there is an ambush of a thousand armed men or more laid in such a place (and named it) contrary to covenant,' and 'therefore they neither come, nor hold you for faithful to your word.' The king hearing this was astonished, and said with an oath, 'that he knew of no such thing;' and withal sent to the sheriffs of London, commanding them to go to the Mews, and if upon search made they found any force of men there assembled, to take and kill all such as they could lay hands on: but sir Thomas Trivet (d) and sir Nicholas Brambre, who had indeed assembled such a number of men, when they understood what order the king had given therein, sent their men back to London.

The Lords after this receiving a Safe-Conduct from the king, and perceiving all to be safe and clear, came to Westminster with a gallant troop of gentlemen; and entering the Hall, as soon as they had sight of the king (who was seated on a throne apparelled in his kingly robes, with his sceptre in his hand) made to him their humble obeisance, and went on till they came to the nether steps going up to the king's seat of state, where they made their second obeisance, and then the king gave them countenance to come nearer to him; and they so did, kneeling down before him: and forthwith he rose from his place, and lovingly welcoming them, took each of them by the hand, and then sat him down again; when the aforesaid lords again appealed (e) the archbishop, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian that false justice, and Nicholas Brambre that dishonourable knight (f) (for so they termed them) of High-Treason, according as they had done before at Waltham Cross; and to prove their accusations to be true, they threw down their gloves, protesting by their oaths to prosecute it to battle: 'Nay,' saith the king, 'not so, but in the next parliament, which we do appoint beforehand to begin the morrow after the Purification of our Lady, both they and you appearing shall receive according to law all that which reason doth appoint.' And finally, it was concluded they should all meet together at the next parliament, and each one receive according to justice; and in the mean time the king commanded them upon their honours, not any party to molest the other until the next parliament.

In the mean time the earl of Suffolk fled to Calais, and the archbp. of York (g) fled along with the bishop of Durham, it was not known whither; and the duke of Ireland going into Cheshire, Lancashire and Wales, raised forces to withstand the Appellants, (to whom were now joined the earls of Derby and Nottingham) with which forces he marched towards London; but meeting with the Appellants forces at Ratcote-bridge near Chipping-Norton in Oxfordshire, he was stopt in his march, and his men revolting from him, was constrained to save himself by flight in swimming cross the river Thames (h).

On the other side, Nicholas Brambre, in the king's name caused all the gates of the city of London to be shut against the Appellants, and to be guarded with a sufficient watch: nevertheless the lords Appellants marched towards London to confer with the king; but when they heard that Nicholas Brambre had caused the gates of the City to be shut against them, they encamped themselves on the 27th of Dec. in Clerkenwell, and sent two knights and two esquires to the mayor and aldermen of London to desire entrance: then came the mayor of London [sir Nicholas Exton] and certain of the chief citizens, and brought the keys of the City with them, and submitted themselves to (f) He, together with Walworth the mayor, and other aldermen, was knighted for his services against Wat Tyler.

(g) He was afterwards translated by Pope Urban 5, to the see of St. Andrews in Scotland; but the kingdom being under obedience to the Anti-Pope, the translation was of no service to him, so that he was constrained to be a parish priest at Lovain, where he continued three years, till the time of his death.

the lords, and offered them entrance into their City with all their people at their pleasures.—The next day there happened an Interview between the king and the Appellants so far, that they opened their minds one to another: but because the king was loth to speak to them before such a rabble of men, and on the other side refused to go out of the Tower to speak with them, and the Appellants feared some violence or wrong to be offered them, they would not go into the Tower without a strong guard of valiant warriors; therefore the most wise of the Appellants after divers consultations resolved to go and confer with the king, but first they sent a strong troop well armed to search all the corners and caves of the Tower, and relation being made of the safety of the place, with a selected band of valiant cavaliers, they entered the Tower, and seizing the gates and placing a guard, they appeared before the king, who was set in a pavillion richly arrayed; and after their humble salutations done, they a third time appealed the aforesaid Conspirators in the same sort and form as afore: which Appellation being ended, the king swore that he would do justice so far as the rule of law, reason and equity did require.—These things being accomplished, they departed from the Tower to their own homes; and then it was published in the presence of the king, and throughout his dominions, That on the morrow after Candlemas-day, a Parliament (i) should be held, and the aforesaid Conspirators should personally appear there to answer the Appellation whereby they were charged with so many Treasons.—In the mean while the king, by consent of the said Commissioners and Appellants, issued out several (k) Orders for the apprehending and seizing all suspected folks, and for keeping them in safe custody till the parliament should assemble: accordingly divers Officers of the Household were expelled their office, and together with several others apprehended and committed to prison, viz. sir Simon Burleigh, sir Wm. Elman, sir John Beauchamp, sir Tho. Trivet, sir John Salisbury, and divers others; and there was also taken sir Nicholas Brambre, but he found surety for his forth-coming; but the duke of Ireland, archbishop of York, earl of Suffolk, and Robert Tresilian were no where to be found.—Shortly after, that is to say, the morrow after Candlemas-day, the Parliament began; and the first day, by the joint consent of all the Commissioners, were arrested sitting in their places, all the Justices [sir Rogar Fulthorp, sir Robert Balknap, sir John Carey, sir John Holt, sir Wm. Burleigh, and John Locton, the king's Serjeant at Law,] (except sir Wm. Skipworth, who had been hindered by sickness from being along with the other Judges, when the Commissioners were declared guilty of High-Treason, and Tresilian who was fled) who were all immediately displaced from their Offices, and sent prisoners to the Tower, and there kept in separate places.

All the Peers as well of the spirituality as the temporality being assembled in the great hall at Westminster, [Feb. 3.] the king soon after came and sat down on his throne; and after him the five noblemen Appellants (the fame of whose aduired worth echoed through all the land) entered the house in their costly robes, leading one another hand in hand, with an innumerable company following them; and beholding where the king sat, they all at once with submissive gestures revered the king. The Hall was so full of spectators, that the very roofs were covered with them; but amongst this infinite multitude there could not be found any of the Conspirators; Brambre, who had attempted to flee away, had been taken a little before, and was cast into Gloucester goal.—The Clergy then placing themselves on the right-hand, and the nobility on the left-hand of the king, according to the ancient custom of the high Court of Parliament, the Lord Chancellor standing with his back towards the king, by the king's command declared the cause of their summons to parliament; which was to consider by what means the distraction of the realm, through evil management, might for the future be composed, the king better advised, the nation better governed, misdemeanors more severely punished, and good men more encouraged; how the kingdom also might be best defended, the sea best kept, the marches of Scotland securely guarded, Guyenne preserved, and lastly how the charges of these things may most easily be borne; and then gave notice that whoever would complain in parliament of such things as could not well be redressed by the common law, might carry their Petitions to the Clerk in Chancery, there named and appointed to receive them. Which being ended, the aforesaid five Appellants arising, declared their Appellation by the mouth of Robert Pleasington, their Speaker, who thus spoke: 'Behold the duke of Gloucester comes to purge himself of Treasons which are laid to his charge by the Conspirators.' To whom the Lord Chancellor by the king's commandment answered: 'My lord duke, the king conceiveth so honourably of you, that he cannot be induced to believe that you, who are of affinity to him in a collateral line, should attempt any Treason against his majesty.' The duke, with his four companions upon their knees, humbly gave thanks to the king for his gracious opinion of their fidelity.—The lords spiritual and temporal there present then claimed as their liberty and franchise, that all great matters moved in that parliament, and to be moved in other parliaments in time to come touching the peers of the land, should be discussed and judged by the course of parliament, and not by the law civil, or by the common law of the land used in the inferior courts of the kingdom; which claim, liberty and franchise, the king allowed and granted in full parliament.

Then after silence proclaimed the Appellants arose; and accused the aforesaid Conspirators of High-Treason, and delivered in certain Articles in writing, wherein were contained the particularities of their Treasons; which were as follow:

1. "That as false traitors and enemies to the king and kingdom, taking advantage of his tender age, and the innocency of his person, they informed and put upon him for truth divers false things of their own invention, against all loyalty and good faith, and made him intirely their own; so that they had his love, firm faith and credit, while he hated and suspected his loyal lords and lieges, by whom he ought to have been governed: That these false Traitors had encroached to themselves royal power, by enslaving the king, blemishing his sovereignty, and lessening his prerogative and royalty; and made him so obedient to their will, that he was sworn to be governed, counselled and conducted by them: by virtue of which oath they kept him in obedience to their false imaginations and mischievous deeds contained in the following articles.

2. "Also whereas the king is not bound to take any oath, but on the day of his coronation, or for the common profit of himself and kingdom, the aforesaid Alexander, Robert, and Michael, as false Traitors and enemies to the king and realm, made him to swear, and assure them, that he would maintain, support, and live and die with them; and also whereas the king ought to be of more free condition than any other of his kingdom, they have put him more in servitude than any one, against his honour, estate and royalty, against their ligeance, as traitors to him.

3. "Also the said Robert, Michael, and Alexander, by the assent and counsel of Robert Tresilian that false justice, and Nicholas Brambre that false knight of London, by their wicked contrivance would not permit the great men of the kingdom, nor good counsellors, to come near the king, nor would suffer him to speak to them unless in their presence and hearing, encroaching to themselves royal power, lordship and sovereignty over the person of the king, to the great dishonour and peril of the king, the crown and his realm.

4. "Also the aforesaid Alexander, Robert de Vere, Michael de la Pole, Robert Tresilian, and Nicholas de Brambre, by their false wickedness evilly advised the king, so that his personal presence which he ought to make to the great lords, and his liege people, and the favours and rights to which they requested his answer, were not to be obtained but at their pleasure and allowance, in staying the king from his duty, and against his oath, and turning the hearts of the great lords from him, with design to estrange his heart from the peers of the land, to have amongst them the sole government of the kingdom.

5. "Also by the said Encroachment of Robert de Vere, duke of Ireland, and Michael de la Pole, with the Advice and Counsel of Alexander archbishop of York, they caused the king without assent of the kingdom, by their abetments, without any deserts of the persons, to give divers lordships, castles, towns and manors as well annexed to his crown as others, as the whole realm of Ireland, the town of Okeham, and the forest thereof, and the lands which were the lord Audley's and other great estates, to the said Robert de Vere, and others, whereby they were mightily enriched, and the king became so poor, that he had not wherewith to support and bear the charges of the kingdom, unless by imposition, taxes, and tributes put upon his people, in disherison of his crown, and to the undoing of the realm.

6. "Also by the Encroachment of the said Alexander, Robert, and Michael, by the assent and advice of the aforesaid Robert Tresilian and Nicholas Brambre, they caused the king to give divers lands, manors, tenements, rents, offices and bailiwicks to people of their kindred and other persons of whom they received great bribes; and also to make them of their party in their false quarrels and purposes, as in the case of sir Robert Mansel, clerk, John Blake, Thomas Usk, and others, to the destruction of the king and kingdom.

7. "Also Robert de Vere, Michael de la Pole, Alexander archbishop of York, with the rest of the persons above-named, by assent and counsel of the said Nicholas Brambre, &c. encroaching to themselves royal power, caused the king to give very great sums of gold and silver as well of his own goods and jewels as the treasure of the kingdom, besides Tenths, Fifteenths, and other Taxes granted by divers parliaments to be expended in defence and safeguard of the kingdom, and otherwise, which amounted to the sum of one hundred thousand marks and more, to the said Robert, and others. And further they caused many good ordinances and purposes made and ordained in parliament, as well for the wars as defence of the kingdom, to be interrupted, to the great injury of the king and kingdom.

8. "Also by the said Encroachment and great Bribes taken by the said Robert, Michael, and Alexander, divers not sufficient nor fit had the guard and government of divers lordships, castles and countries, as in Guyenne and elsewhere, as well on this side as beyond the sea; whereby the people and countries of those territories being loyal to the king, for the most part were destroyed, and great dominions of late rendered into the hands and possession of the enemy, without assent of the realm, which were never in the hands of the enemy since the conquest of them; as also in the marches of Scotland, and elsewhere, in disherison of the crown, and great injury to the realm; as in the case of Harpeden, Craddock, and others.

9. "Also by the Encroachment of the aforesaid Alexander, Robert, Michael, Robert and Nicholas, divers people have been hindered of the benefit of the common law of England, and put to great delays, losses and costs; while statutes and judgments justly made upon necessary causes in parliament have been reversed and annulled by the procurement of the said misdoers, and traitors, and this by reason of the large bribes by them extorted, to the great prejudice of the kingdom.

10. "Also the five aforesaid, encroaching to themselves royal power, as false traitors to the king and kingdom, caused and counselled the king to grant Charters of pardon for horrible felonies and treasons, as well against the state of the king, as of the party, against the law and oath of the king.

11. "Also, Whereas the great lordship and land of Ireland hath been beyond memory parcel of the crown of England, and the people thereof for all that time have been the king's lieges without any mesne lord, to him and his royal progenitors, and our lord and his noble progenitors kings of England have in all their charters, writs, letters and patents, and also under their seals, in augmentation of their names and royalty, styled themselves lords of Ireland: the aforesaid Robert, duke of Ireland, Alexander, and Michael, &c. as false traitors to the king by the said encroachment, gave advice that the king, as much as was in him, had granted that Robert de Vere should be king of Ireland: and to accomplish this wicked purpose, the aforesaid traitors counselled and excited the king to send letters to the pope to ratify and confirm their traitorous intention, without the knowledge and assent of the kingdom of England, or land of Ireland, in parting the king's liegance in respect to both nations, in decrease of the honourable name of the King, and in open disherison of his crown of England, and full destruction of his loyal lieges and the nation of Ireland.

12. "Also, Whereas the Great Charter and other good laws and usages of the kingdom, no man ought to be taken, put in prison, or to death without due process of law, the aforesaid Nich. Brambre, false knight of London, took by night certain persons out of the prison of Newgate, chaplains, and others, to the number of 92; some debtors and others accused of felony, and some approvers in the case of felony, and some taken and imprisoned there upon suspicion of felony; and led them into Kent to a place called the Foul Oak, and there encroaching to himself royal power as a traitor to the king, and without warrant or process of law, caused all their heads to be cut off but one, who was appealed of felony by an approver, and him he suffered to go at large at the same time.

13. "Also, The aforesaid Alexander, Robert, Michael, Nicholas, &c. traitors of the king and kingdom, took great bribes in many cases in the name of the king for maintainance of quarrels, of suits; and once took bribes of both sides or parties.

14. "Also, These five caused some lords and others, loyal lieges, to be put out of the king's council; so as they dared not to speak in parliament about the good government of the king's person or kingdom.

15. "Also, Whereas in the last parliament all the lords, sages and commons there assembled, seeing the imminent ruin of the king and kingdom by the perils and mischiefs aforesaid, and for that the king had forsaken the council of the kingdom, and holden himself altogether to the council of the said five evil doers and traitors; and also for that the king of France, with his royal power, was then slipped ready to have landed in England, to have destroyed the kingdom and language thereof, and there was no Ordinance then made, or care taken for the safety of the king and kingdom; they knew no other remedy than to slay the king fully how he was ill-governed, left and counselled by the traitors and ill doers aforesaid; requiring him most humbly, as his loyal lieges, for the safety of him and his whole realm, and for avoiding the perils aforesaid; to remove from his presence the said evil-doers and traitors, and not to do any thing after their advice, but according to the counsel of the loyal and discreet sages of the realm: and hereupon the said traitors and evil-doers, seeing the good and honourable opinion of the parliament, to undo this good purpose by their false counsel, caused the king to command the mayor of London to kill and put to death all the said lords and commons, except such as were of their party; to the doing whereof, these great traitors and evil-doers should have been parties, and present, to the undoing of the king and the kingdom.

16. "Also, That those five Traitors above-mentioned, when the mayor and good people of London utterly refused in the presence of the king to murder the lords and commons; they by their said traitorous accroachment falsely counselled the king, and prevailed with him to leave the parliament for many days, and caused him to certify that he would not come to the parliament, nor treat with the lords and commons concerning the business of the kingdom, for any peril, ruin or mischief whatsoever that might happen any ways to him, or the realm, if he were not first assured by the lords and commons, that they would not speak nor do in that parliament any thing against any of the misdoers, saving that they might proceed on in the process, which was then commenced against Michael de la Pole, to the great ruin of the king and kingdom, and against the ancient Ordinances and Liberties of parliaments.

17. "Also, The said lords and commons, after they understood that the king's mind (through the wicked excitation and counsel of the said five, &c. above-mentioned) was such, that he would not suffer any thing to be commenced, pursued or done against the said evil-doers, so that they durst not speak or proceed against the king's will; upon consideration of the former counsel and advice of the lords and justices, with other sages and commons of parliament, how the estate of the king and his royalty might be best saved against the perils and mischiefs aforesaid, knew not how to find out any other remedy than to ordain, That twelve (1) loyal lords of the land should be the king's council for one year, and that there should be made such a commission and statute, by which they should have full and sufficient power to ordain, &c. according to the effect of the said commission and statute; by both which no man was to advise the king against them, under forfeiture, for the first offence, of his goods and chattels: and for the second offence, of life and member: which Ordinance, Statute, and Commission being made by the assent of the king, the lords, judges, and other sages and commons, assembled in the said parliament, to preserve to the king his royalty and realm, the said traitors and misdoers, by their evil, false, and traitorous informations, inaundered to the king, that the said Ordinance, Statute and Commission were made to defeat his royalty; and that all those who procured and counselled the making of them, and those who excited the king to consent to them, were worthy to be put to death, as traitors to the king.

18. "Also, after this, the aforesaid five misdoers and traitors caused the king to assemble a council of certain lords justices and others, many times without the assent and presence of the lords of the said great council; and made divers demands of them very suspicious, concerning divers matters, by which the king, lords and common people were in great trouble with the whole realm.

19. "Also, to accomplish the said high-treason, the said misdoers and traitors, Alexander, Robert, Michael, &c. by the assent and counsel of Robert Tresilian and Nicholas Brambre, caused the king to ride through the kingdom with some of them into Wales, and caused him to make come before him the lords, knights, and esquires, and other good people of those parts, as well of cities and burghs, as other places; and made some to enter into bond; and obliged others by their oaths to stand by him, against all people, and to effect his purpose, which at that time was the will and purpose of the said misdoers and traitors, by their false imaginations, deceits and accroachments above said; which securities and oaths were against the good laws and usages of the land, and against the oath of the king, to the great ruin and dishonour of the king and kingdom.

20. "Also, by force of such bonds and oaths, all the realm was put into great trouble by the said evil-doers and traitors; and in peril, to have suffered many intolerable mischiefs.

(1) There were thirteen Commissioners, but only twelve of them were peers.

21. "Also, to bring about their traitorous purposes, the said five caused the king to go into several other parts of the kingdom for some time; whereby the lords assigned by the said Ordinances, Statute and Commission could not advise with him about the business of the kingdom; so as the purport and effect of the Ordinances, Statute and Commission were defeated, to the great ruin of the king and kingdom.

22. "Also, the said Robert de Vere, duke of Ireland, by the counsel and abetment of the other four traitors, accroaching to himself royal power, without the king's commission, or other sufficient or usual warrant, made himself chief justice of Chester, and by himself and deputies held all manner of pleas, as well common as of the crown, and gave judgments upon them, and made execution thereof; and also caused many original and judicial writs to be sealed with the great seal used in those parts; and also by such accroachment of royal power, he caused to rise with him great part of the people of that country; some by threats, others by imprisonments of their bodies; some by seizing of their lands, others by many dishonest ways, by colour of the said office; and all this to make war upon and destroy the loyal lords and others the king's liege subjects, to the undoing of the king and the whole realm.

23. "Also, the said traitors, Robert de Vere, Alexander, Michael, &c. by the counsel and abetment of Robert Tresilian and Nicholas Brambre, accroaching to themselves royal power, caused to be delivered John de Blois, heir of Bretagne, who was prisoner, and security to the king and kingdom, without assent of parliament, or the king's great council, and without any due warrant, to the great strengthening the adversary of France, the ruin of the king and realm, and against the statutes and ordinances aforesaid made in the last parliament.

24. "Also, the said five traitors caused the king to have a great retinue of late of divers people, to whom he gave badges, which was not done in ancient time, by any king his progenitor, that they might have power to perform their false treasons aforesaid.

25. "Also, the aforesaid five Misdoers and Traitors, in full accomplishment of all their treasons aforesaid, and to make the king give credit to them and their counsel, and hold them more loyal and greater sages than others of the kingdom; and the more to colour their false treasons, caused the king to make come before him to the castle of Nottingham, divers justices and lawyers on the morrow after St. Bartholomew's-Day last past, and there (m)

(m) Divers of the Justices refused to subscribe, but yet they were obliged to do as the rest did; among whom was Robert Belknap, who utterly refused, till the duke of Ireland and the earl of Suffolk compelled him thereto; for if he had persisted in his refusal he had not escaped their hands; and yet when he had set constrained the said justices to set their hands to the Answers to certain Questions then propounded and delivered to them, that by means thereof those persons who were about the king might have colour to put to death the duke of Gloucester and other lords, who in the last parliament were ordered to have the governance of the realm.—Which Questions and Answers were as follow : 1. It was asked of them, whether the new Statute, Ordinance, and Commission, made in the last parliament held at Westminster, be hurtful to the king's prerogative? Whereunto all of one mind answered, That they were hurtful, and especially because they be against the king's will.—2. It was inquired of them how they ought to be punished that procured the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission to be made? Whereunto with one assent they answered, That they deserved death, except the king of his grace would pardon them.—3. It was inquired how they ought to be punished which moved the king to consent to the making of the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission? Whereunto they answered, That unless the king would give them his pardon they ought to lose their lives.—4. It was inquired of them what Punishment they deserved that compelled the king to making of that Statute, Ordinance and Commission? Whereunto they gave Answer, That they ought to suffer as Traitors.—5. It was demanded of them how they ought to be punished that interrupted the king, so that he might not exercise those things that appertained to his regality and prerogative? Whereunto answer was made, that they ought to be punished as Traitors.—6. It was enquired of them, whether, that after the Affairs of the realm, and the cause of the calling together of the States of the Parliament, were once by the king's commandment declared and opened, and other Articles on the king's behalf limited, upon which the lords and commons of the realm ought to treat and proceed if the lords nevertheless would proceed upon other Articles, and not meddle with those Articles which the king had limited, till the time the king had answered the Articles proposed by them, notwithstanding the king enjoined them to the contrary : whether in this case the king might rule the parliament, and cause them to proceed upon the Articles by him limited before they proceeded any further? To which Question it was answered, That the king should have in this part the rule for order of all such Articles to be prosecuted until the end of the parliament; and if any presumed to go contrary to this rule, he was to be punished as a

to his seal, he burst out into these words : ' Now here lacketh nothing but a rope, that I may receive a reward worthy my desert; and I know if I had not done this I should not have escaped your hands; so that for your pleasures and the king's I have done it, and thereby deserve death at the hands of the lords.' Holin. vol. iii. p. 456.

traitor.—7. It was asked, whether the king, whensoever it pleased him, might not dissolve the parliament, and command the lords and commons to depart from thence, or not? Whereunto it was answered, that he might.—8. It was inquired, that for so much as it was in the king to remove such Justices and Officers as offended, and to punish them for their offences, whether the lords and commons might without the king's will impeach the same Officers and Justices upon their Offences in Parliament, or not? To this answer was made, That they might not; and he that attempted contrary was to suffer as a Traitor.—9. It was inquired how he is to be punished that moved in the parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward, the son of king Edward, great-grandfather to the king that now is, was indicted in parliament, might be sent for; by inspection of which Statute, the said new Statute, or Ordinance and Commission, were conceived and devised in the parliament? To which Question, with one accord, as in all the residue, they answered, that as well he that so summoned, as the other, which by force of the said motion brought the said Statute into the Parliament House, be as public Offenders and Traitors to be punished.—10. It was inquired of them, whether the Judgment given in the parliament against Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, were erroneous, and revocable or not? To which Question likewise with one assent they said, that if the same Judgment were now to be given, the Justices and Serjeants aforesaid would not give the same, because it seemeth to them that the said Judgment is erroneous and revocable in every part.—In witness of the premises, the Justices and Serjeants aforesaid to these presents have set their seals; there being Witnesses, Alexander archbishop of York, Robert archbishop of Dublin, John bishop of Durham, Thomas bishop of Chester, John bishop of Bangor, Robert duke of Ireland, Michael earl of Suffolk, John Rippon clerk and John Blake.

26. " These five Evil-doers and Traitors are also farther accused, that they drew away the heart and goodwill of the king from the said lords and others, who had agreed to make the said Commission and Ordinances in the last parliament, and he thereupon accounted them Enemies and Traitors: and being sure the said Justices favoured their designs, contrived that those lords and others should be arrested, indicted, and attainted by false Inquests of Treason, and put to death, and they and their issue disinherited; and these false arrests, indictments, and attainders, were to be made in London or Middlesex; and for that purpose they had procured a false and wicked person called Thomas Husk, to be under-sheriff of Middlesex: who by their assent, procurement and command, undertook the said false Indictments and Attainders should be made and accomplished: and for the more complete effecting of their Treason, they caused the king to send his Letters of Credence by one John Rippon, a false clerk, and one of their crew, to the mayor of London to arrest the duke of Gloucester, and others therein named; and by force of those Letters one John Blaks carried to the mayor a Bill of Information against them, by which they were to be indicted and attained. The effect of which bill was, 'That it seemed for the better that certain of the lords, knights, and commons of the last parliament which were notoriously impeachable, should be privately indicted in London and Middlesex of Conspiracy and Confederacy, for that they at a certain day mentioned, falsely and traiterously had conspired and confederated between themselves to make in the same parliament a Statute and Commission against the royalty of our lord the king, and in derogation of his crown, and procured the same Statute there afterwards at a certain day to be passed; and also had procured, nay constrained our lord the king to assent against his will to have it made; and they traiterously against their allegiance hindered the king from using his royalty, to the great disherison of him, and derogation to his crown, against their allegiance, swearing to maintain each other in this matter.'—And further, The said Evil-doers and Traitors set a watch to give notice of the duke of Lancaster's landing in England, that he might be arrested upon his arrival.

27. "Also the above-named five Evil-doers and Traitors, after having informed the king that he should believe that the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission were made in derogation of his royalty and prerogative, they strongly possessed him that all those who made or caused to be made the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission, had thereby a purpose to degrade, and finally to oppose him, and that they would not give over that purpose until they had perfected it; for which cause the king held them as Enemies and Traitors.

28. "Also, after this false and traiterous Information, when the five aforesaid had procured the king to hold the loyal lords as Enemies and Traitors; the said Misdoers and Traitors advised him by every way possible, as well by the power of his own people, as by the power of his enemies of France and others, to destroy and put to death the said lords, and all others who assented to the making of the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission; and that it might be done so privately, as none might know of it till it was done.

29. "Also, to accomplish the High-Treason aforesaid, Alexander, &c. Robert de Vere, &c. and Michael, &c. by their advice, caused the king to send his Letters of Credence to the adversary the king of France; some by one Nicholas Southwell, a groom of the chamber, and others by other persons of small account, as well strangers as English, requesting and praying the king of France that he would with all his power and advice be aiding and assisting him to destroy and put to death the said lords and other English which the king held to be his Enemies and Traitors as above, to the great disturbance and dissatisfaction of the whole realm.

30. "Also the three last named persons encroaching to themselves royal power, caused the king to promise the king of France, by his Letters Patent and Messages, that for such his aid and power to accomplish the same, he would grant and surrender unto him the town and castle of Calais, and all other castles and fortresses in the marches and confines of Picardy and Artois, with the castles and towns of Cherburg and Brest; to the great dishonour, trouble, and ruin of the king and kingdom.

31. "Also, after the last named three were sure of having aid and assistance from the king of France, by instigation and contrivance of the said Traitors, a conference was to have been in the marches of Calais about a truce for five years between the two nations; at which conference both kings were to be present, as likewise the English lords whom the king then held to be his Traitors; and there Thomas duke of Gloucester, constable of England, Richard earl of Arundel and Surrey, and Thomas earl of Warwick, and divers others, were to have been put to death by treachery.

32. "Also for performance of this High-Treason, the last named three caused the king to send for Safe-Conducts to the king of France; some for himself and for the duke of Ireland, and others for John Salisbury and John Lancaster, knights, with other people with them, who were to go into France, to put in execution this wicked purpose and treason, which Safe-Conducts were ready to be produced.

33. "Also the aforesaid Nicholas Brambre false knight of London, by the assent and advice of the said Alexander, &c. Robert de Vere, &c. Michael, &c. and Robert Tresilian false Justice, encroaching to themselves royal power (as before) some of them went personally into London, and without the assent and knowledge of the king, there openly in his name made all the crafts or trades of that city to be sworn, to hold and perform divers matters not lawful, as is contained in the said Oath upon record in Chancery: and amongst other things, that they should keep and maintain the king's will and purpose to their power, against all such as were, or should be rebels against the king's person or his royalty, and that they should be ready to live and die with him in destruction of all such who did or should design Treason against the king in any manner; and that they should be ready and come speedily to their mayor for the time being, or that afterwards should be, when and at what hour they should be required, to resist, so long as they lived, all such as did or should design any thing against the king in any of the points abovesaid: at which time the king, by evil Information of the said Misdoers and Traitors, and by the false Answers of the Justices, firmly held the said lords and others who con-drived the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission, to be rebels, enemies, and traitors, which false Information was then unknown to the people of London; and also by obscure words contained in the said Oath, the intent of the Misdoers and Traitors being to engage the people of London to raise their power to destroy the said loyal lords and others.

34. "Also the said Nicholas, Alexander, Robert de Vere, and Michael, as Traitors to the king and kingdom, encroaching to themselves royal power, did of their own authority, without warrant from the king, or his great council, cause to be proclaimed through the city of London, that none of the king's lieges should aid or comfort Richard earl of Arundel and Surrey, a peer of the land, and one of the lords of the king's great council during the Commission; nor should sell him armour, victuals, or other things necessary, but should avoid all of his party as rebels, upon pain of being proceeded against as rebels, and on forfeiture of all they were worth; shewing letters patent from the king for making such Proclamation, being to the destruction of the king's liege subjects.

35. "Also the said Nicholas Brambre, by assent and council of the said Alexander, Robert de Vere, and Michael, caused it to be proclaimed in the city of London, That no person should be so hardy as to presume to speak any ill of the said Misdoers and Traitors, upon pain of forfeiting to the king whatever they were worth.

36. "Also the said five Traitors to the king and kingdom caused the king to make certain persons to be sheriffs through the kingdom, named and recommended to him by the said Evil-doers and Traitors, to the intent that they might get such persons as they should name returned for knights of the shire to serve in parliament; to the undoing of the loyal lords and commons, and also the good laws and customs of the kingdom.

37. "Also the said five Misdoers and Traitors, during the time of protection, to hinder the Appeal against them, falsely counselled and prevailed with the king to command by his letters divers knights and esquires, sheriffs, and other ministers of several counties, to levy and assemble all the power they could to join with the duke of Ireland against the Lord Appellants, to make sudden war upon and destroy them.

38. "Also during the time of the said protection of the said Robert de Vere, Michael, &c. Alexander, Nicholas, &c. they caused the king by his letters, to signify to the duke of Ireland, that they were all appealed of Treason by Thomas duke of Gloucester, constable of England, Richard earl of Arundel and Surrey, and Thomas earl of Warwick, and how he had given them day until the next parliament, and how he had taken into his special protection both parties, with all their goods and chattels: And it was further contained in the king's letters, That if the duke of Ireland should have sufficient power, he should not cease to march on with all his force to come to him. And soon after they caused the king to write to the said duke that he should take the field with all the force he could get together; and that he would meet him with all his troops, and that he would adventure his royal person with him, and that he was in great danger, as also the whole nation, if he was not relieved by him: and this the duke ought to declare to all the people with him, and that the king would pay the wages and costs of the said duke, and all the people assembled with him. By virtue of which Letters, and the wicked and traitorous instigations, as well of the duke and his adherents, as of all the other Misdoers and Traitors, he raised a great number of men at arms, and archers, as well in the counties of Lancaster and Chester, as in Wales and other places of the kingdom, to destroy and put to death the said loyal lords, and all others who had assented to the making of the said Statute, Ordinance and Commission, in defence of the king and his kingdom.

39. "Also the said Robert de Vere, duke of Ireland, as a false traitor to the king and kingdom, assembled a great power of men at arms and archers in Lancashire, Cheshire, Wales, and many other places, to the intent to have traitorously destroyed with all his power the said lords, Thomas duke of Gloucester, constable of England, Henry earl of Derby, Richard earl of Arundel and Surrey, Thomas earl of Warwick, and Thomas earl marshal, with divers others the king's lieges, to the undoing and ruin of the king and the whole kingdom; and so rode and marched with a great force of men at arms, and archers, from the county of Chester to Ratcot Bridge, accroaching to himself royal power, and displaying the king's banner in his army, against the state of the king and his crown."

This Impeachment was exhibited on Monday the 3rd of February, being the first day of the parliament; when the Lords Appellants also affirmed they were ready to prove every Article of it as should be awarded in parliament, to the honour of God, and the advantage and profit of the king and the whole realm.—Whereupon all the persons appealed, were by command of the king and lords solemnly summoned in the great Hall at Westminster, as also at the Gate of the said Palace, to come and answer the said Appellants; but upon their non-appearance, the said duke and Lords Appellants prayed, That their default might be recorded. Then upon the said Appellants alleging, that the accused had full notice of the said Appeal, and the king and lords being satisfied it was so, by reason they did not appear, their default was recorded accordingly: Whereupon the said duke and earls Appellants prayed the king and lords, that they might be adjudged and convicted of the Treasons contained in the said Appeal. Then the king and lords took time to consider and examine the Articles, after which they would give such Judgment in this case, as should be to the honour of God, the advantage and profit of the king and the whole kingdom. Then the king commanded the said lords to examine the Articles severally, which they did with great labour and diligence, until Thursday the 13th of February.

During this interval, the Justices, Serjeants, and other sages of the law, both of the realm and law civil, were charged by the king to give their faithful Advice to the lords of parliament how they ought to proceed in the aforesaid Appeal. Then the said Justices, Serjeants, and sages of both laws having taken these matters into their deliberation, answered the said lords of parliament, that they had seen and well understood the tenor of the said Appeal, and affirmed that it was not made nor brought according as the one law or other required. Upon which the said lords of parliament, having taken deliberation and advice, it was by the assent of the king with their common accord declared, That in so high a crime as is laid in this Appeal, and which touches the person of the king and the estates of this realm, and is perpetrated by persons who are peers thereof, together with others, the cause cannot be tried elsewhere but in parliament, nor by any other law or court, except that of parliament; and that it belongs to the lords of parliament, and to their free choice and liberty, by ancient custom of parliament, to be judges in such cases, and to judge of them by the assent of the king; and thus it shall be done in this case by award of parliament, because the realm of England is not, nor ever was (neither is it the intent of the king and lords of parliament that it shall ever be) ruled and governed by the civil law; and therefore it is not their intent otherwise to proceed in so high a case as this Appeal, which cannot be tried or determined any where else than in parliament, since the process or order used in inferior courts is only as they are intrusted with the execution of the ancient laws and customs of the realm, and the Ordinances and establishments of parliament: and it was the Judgment of the lords of parliament, by assent of the king, that this Appeal was well and duly brought, and the process upon the same was good and effectual, according to the laws and course of parliament, and by which they will award and judge it. Upon this the Appellants again moved the king and lords to record their Default; and that Nicholas Brambre (who was the only person in custody) might be brought to answer.

Then the other persons appealed were again summoned to come in and make Answer, but they did not appear; nevertheless the king and lords took time to deliberate till the next day, being the 5th of February; at which time the said Appellants again prayed that the Default of the appealed might be recorded, which was done accordingly. After which the lord chancellor, [The bishop of Ely; Tyrrel says, the archbishop of Canterbury], in the name of the clergy, in open parliament, made an oration, shewing, 'That they could not by any means be present at proceedings where any censure of death is to be passed;' for the confirmation whereof the Clergy delivered in a Protestation, which being read, they declared, 'That neither in respect of any favour, nor for fear of any man's hate, nor in hope of any reward, they did desire to absent themselves; but only that they were bound by the Canon not to be present at any man's arraignment or condemnation.'—They likewise sent their Protestation to the Chapel of the Abbey where the commons sate, which was allowed of.

And then, on the 13th of February, the king and lords of parliament being met again in the Whitehall, the said Appellants prayed that the last Default of the said archbishop, duke, and earl, and Robert Tresilian, should be recorded. Then the persons accused being again summoned (the third time) and not appearing, the lords proceeded to judgment, and declared, that divers of the Articles therein contained were Treason; as the 1st, 2nd, 11th, 12th, 15th and 17th; as also the 18th, 20th, 30th, 31st, 32nd, 37th, 38th, and 39th Articles: and then upon due information of their consciences, they pronounced the said archbishop, duke, and earl, with Robert Tresilian, to be notoriously guilty of each of the said Articles that concerned them, and that they were also culpable of all the rest of the Articles contained in the said Appeal, not yet declared treason.

Then in presence of the king, and lords, assembled at the day and place aforesaid, the said duke and earls Appellants prayed the king, and the lords there present, that the persons so appealed as aforesaid should be adjudged convicted of the High-Treasons contained in the said Appeals. Wherefore the said lords of parliament there present, as judges in parliament in this case, by assent of the king pronounced their Sentence; and did adjudge the said archbishop, duke, and earl, with Robert Tresilian, so appealed as aforesaid, to be Guilty and convicted of Treason, and to be drawn and hanged as Traitors and Enemies to the king and kingdom; and that their heirs should be disinherited for ever, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels forfeited to the king, and that the temporalities of the archbishop of York should be taken into the king's hands.

On this day [Feb. 17], sir Nicholas Brambre was brought by the constable of the Tower into parliament; and being charged with the aforesaid Articles of Treason, he desired longer time, that he might advise with counsel learned in the law, and might make a more full Answer to his Accusation; but he was refused, in that he required a thing not usual, nor allowable by law in a case of this nature, whereupon the Judges required him then to answer severally and distinctly to every point in the Articles of Treason contained. Whereunto Brambre answered, 'Whosoever hath branded me with this ignominious mark, with him I am ready to fight in the lists to maintain my innocency, whenever the king shall appoint.' And thus he spake with such a fury, that his eyes sparkled with rage, and he breathed as if an Aتنا lay hid in his breast, chusing rather to die gloriously in the field, than disgracefully on a gibbet.

The Appellants hearing this courageous challenge, with resolute countenance answered, That they would readily accept of the combat, and thereupon flung down their gages before the king; and on a sudden the whole company of lords, knights, esquires, and commons flung down their gages so thick, that they seemed like snow in a winter's day, crying, out, 'We also will accept of the combat, and will prove these Articles to be true to thy head, most damnable Traitor.' But the lords resolved that Battle (n) did not lie in that case, and that they would examine the Articles touching the said Nicholas, and take due Information by all true, necessary, and convenient ways, that their consciences might be truly directed what Judgment to give in this case, to the honour of God, the advantage and profit of the king and his kingdom, and as they would answer it before God, according to the course and law of parliament.

This day, [Feb. 19,] to aggravate the Appellation against the Conspirators, there came divers Companies of the City of London, complaining of the manifold injuries they had suffered from Brambre, and other Extortions and Exactions wherewith they had been daily charged; and yet they protested, that they did not accuse him either for hate to his person, or for love, fear, or hope of reward from his enemies, but they charged him only with the truth. — Before they could proceed with his Trial, they were interrupted by unfortunate Tresilian, who being got upon the top of an apothecary's house adjoining to the Palace, and descended into a gutter to look about him and observe who went into the Palace, was discovered by certain of the peers, who presently sent some of the Guard to apprehend him: who entering into the house where he was, and having spent long time in vain in looking for him, at length one of the guard stepped to the master of the house, and taking him by the shoulder with his dagger drawn, said thus, 'Shew us where thou hast hid Tresilian, or else resolve thy days are accomplished.' The master trembling and ready to yield on the ghost for fear, answered, 'Yonder is the place where he lies;' and showed him a round table covered with branches of bays, under which Tresilian lay close covered. When they had found him they drew him out by the heels, wondering to see him wear his hair and beard overgrown, with old clouted shoes and patched hose, more like a miserable poor beggar than a judge.—When this came to the ears of the peers, the five Appellants suddenly rose up, and going to the gate of the Hall, (n) In appeals of Treason, battle does not lie, if it can be proved by witnesses. See Proceedings against the earl of Clarendon, A. D. 1667.

they met the guard leading Tresilian bound, crying as they came, 'We have him, we have him.' (o) — Tresilian being come into the Hall,

(o) Froisart's Chron. part 2. fol. 110, relates the manner of his discovery thus: "Understanding that the king's uncles and the new Council at England would keep a secret Parliament at Westminster, he (Tresilian) thought to go and lie there to learn what should be done; and so he came and lodged at Westminster the same day their Council began, and lodged at an ale-house right over-against the Palace Gate, and there he was in a chamber looking out of a window down into the court, and there he might see them that went in and out to the Council, but none knew him because of his apparel. At last on a day, a squire of the duke of Gloucester's knew him, for he had oftentimes been in his company: and as soon as sir Robert Tresilian saw him he knew him well, and withdrew himself out of the window. The squire had suspicion thereof, and said to himself, 'methinks I see yonder sir Robert Tresilian;' and to the intent to know the truth, he entered into the lodging, and said to the wife, 'Dame, who is that, that is above in the chamber? is he alone or with company?' 'Sir,' quoth she, 'I cannot shew you, but he has been here a long space?' Therewith the squire went up the better to advise him, and saluted him, and saw well it was true; but he feigned himself, and turned his tale, and said, 'God save you, good man, I pray you be not discontented, for I took you for a farmer of mine in Essex, for you are like him.' 'Sir,' quoth he, 'I am of Kent, and a farmer of sir John of Hollands, and there be men of the bishop of Canterbury's that would do me wrong; and I am come hither to complain to the Council.' 'Well,' quoth the squire, 'if you come into the palace I will help to make your way, that you shall speak with the lords of the Council.' 'Sir, I thank you,' quoth he, 'and I shall not refuse your aid.' Then the squire called for a pot of ale, and drank with him, and paid for it, and bad him farewell, and departed; and never ceased till he came to the Council Chamber door, and called the usher to open the door. Then the usher demanded what he would, because the lords were in Council: he answered and said, 'I would speak with my lord and master the duke of Gloucester, for a matter that right near toucheth him and all the Council.' Then the usher let him in, and when he came before his master, he said, 'Sir, I have brought you great tidings,' 'What be they?' quoth the duke. 'Sir,' quoth the squire, 'I will speak aloud, for it toucheth you and all my lords here present. I have seen sir Robert Tresilian disguised in a villain's habit, in an alehouse here without the gate.' 'Tresilian!' quoth the duke. 'Yea, truly, sir,' quoth the squire, 'you shall have him ere you go to dinner, if you please.' 'I am content,' quoth the duke, 'and he shall show us some news of his master the duke of Ireland; go thy way and fetch him, but look was asked what he could say for himself, why execution should not be done according to the Judgment passed upon him for his Treasons so often committed; but he became as one struck dumb, he had nothing to say, and his heart was hardened to the very last, so that he would not confess himself guilty of any thing. Whereupon he was without delay led to the Tower, that he might suffer the Sentence passed against him: his wife and his children did with many tears accompany him to the Tower; but his wife was so overcome with grief, that she fell down in a swoon as if she had been dead.—Immediately Tresilian is put upon an hurdle, and drawn through the streets of the city, with a wonderful concourse of people following him. At every furlong's end he was suffered to stop, that he might rest himself, and to see if he would confess or acknowledge any thing; but what he said to the frier his confessor, is not known. When he came to the place of execution, he would not climb the ladder, until such time as being soundly beaten with bats and staves, he was forced to go up; and when he was up, he said, 'So long as I do wear any thing upon me, I shall not die;' wherefore the executioner stript him, and found certain images painted like to the signs of the heavens, and the head of a devil painted, and the names of many of the devils wrote in parchment; these being taken away he was hanged up naked, and after he had hanged some time, that the spectators should be sure he was dead, they cut his throat, and that thou be strong enough so to do that thou fail not.' The squire went forth and took four serjeants with him, and said, 'Sirs, follow me afar off; and as soon as I make to you a sign, and that I lay my hand on a man, that I go for, take him and let him not escape.' Therewith the squire entered into the house where Tresilian was, and went up into the chamber; and as soon as he saw him, he said, 'Tresilian, you are come into this country on no goodness; my lord the duke of Gloucester commandeth, that you come and speak with him.' The knight would have excused himself, and said, 'I am not Tresilian, I am a farmer of sir John of Hollands.' 'Nay, nay,' quoth the squire, 'your body is Tresilian, but your habit is not?' and therewith he made tokens to the serjeants that they should take him. Then they went up into the chamber and took him, and so brought him to the palace. Of his taking the duke of Gloucester was right joyful, and would see him, and when he was in his presence the duke said, 'Tresilian, what thing makes you here in this country? where is the king? where left you him?' Tresilian, when he saw that he was so well known, and that none excusation could avail him, said, 'Sir, the king sent me hither to learn tidings, and he is at Bristol, and hunteth along the river Severn.' 'What,' quoth the duke, 'you are not come like a wise man, but rather like a spy; if you would have come to have learnt tidings, you should have come in because the night approached, they let him hang till the next morning, and then his wife having obtained a licence of the king, took down his body, and carried it to the Gray-Friars, where it was buried.

On this day [Feb. 20], Brambre was brought again before the parliament; but not being able to make any Answer to the Articles wherewith he was charged, the like Sentence was pronounced against him, as had been before against the other conspirators. After which he was drawn upon an hurdle from the Tower to Tyburn, through the city, when he shewed himself very penitent, humbly craving mercy and forgiveness at the hands of God and men, whom he had so grievously offended, and so injuriously wronged in times past, earnestly desiring all persons to pray for him: when the rope was about his neck, and he was ready to be turned off, a certain young man, the son of one Northampton, asked him if he had done justice to his father or not [for Northampton was in 1385 mayor of the city of London, more wealthy and substantial than any else in the City; him did Brambre and Tresilian accuse of Treason and Conspiracy against the State, and condemned him to die, being despoiled of his estate, he himself at length hardly escaped, Holin. vol. 3. p. 446.] To whom Brambre answered and confessed with bitter tears, that what he did was most vile and wicked, and with an intent only to murder and overthrow the said Northampton; for which craving pardon of the young man, the state of a knight.' 'Sir,' quoth Tresilian, 'if I have trespassed, I ask pardon, for I was caused this to do?' 'Well, sir,' quoth the duke, 'and where is your master the duke of Ireland?' 'Sir,' quoth he, 'of a truth he is with the king.' 'It is shewed us here,' quoth the duke, 'that he assembleth much people, and the king for him; whither will he lead that people?' 'Sir,' quoth he, 'it is to go into Ireland.' 'Into Ireland!' quoth the duke of Gloucester. 'Yea, sir, truly,' quoth Tresilian: and then the duke studied a little, and said, 'Ah, Tresilian! Tresilian! your business is neither fair nor good; you have done great folly to come into this country: for you are not beloved here, and that shall well be seen: you and such other of your affinity have done great displeasure to my brother and me, and you have troubled to your power, and with your counsel, the king, and divers others, nobles of the realm; also you have moved certain good towns against us. Now is the day come, that you shall have your payment; for he that doth well, by reason shall find it. Think on your business, for I will neither eat nor drink till you be dead.' That word greatly abashed Tresilian; he would fain have excused himself with fair language, in lowly humbling himself; but he could do nothing to appease the duke. So sir Robert Tresilian was delivered to the hangman, and so led out of Westminster, and there beheaded, and after hanged on a gibbet.

he was suddenly turned off, and the executioner cutting his throat he died (p).

Robert Belknap, John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, William Burleigh, John Carey, and John Locton, being impeached [March 2.] by the Commons, were called to answer for their Conspiracy against the Commissioners at Nottingham. They could not gainsay, but that the Questions were such as were then asked them, but denied 'the Answers' to be so: and sir Robert Belknap pleaded in particular, that the archbishop of York, in his Chamber at Windsor, told him that he had devised and drawn up the Commission and Statute, whereby the government was wholly taken out of the king's hands, and that he therefore hated him above all men; and that if he found not some way to make void the said Statute and Commission, he should be slain as a Traitor. He answered, that the intention of the lords, and such as assisted at the making of them, was, that they should be for the honour and good government of the state of the king and kingdom: that he twice parted from the king dissatisfied, and was in doubt of his life; and said these Answers proceeded not from his good-will, but were made against his mind, and were the effects of the threats of the archbishop of York, duke of Ireland, and earl of Suffolk; and that he was sworn, and commanded in the presence of the king, upon pain of death, to conceal this matter, as the counsel of the king; and prayed for the love of God that he might have a gracious and merciful judgment.

Sir John Holt alledged the same matter of excuse, and made the same prayer, so did sir William Burleigh, and sir John Carey; who all made the same excuse, and made the same requests, as did also sir Roger Fulthorpe, and John Locton, serjeant at law.

To all which the commons answered, That they were taken and holden for sages in the law; and the king's will was, that they should have answered the Question as the law was, and not otherwise, as they did, with design, and under colour of law, to murder and destroy the lords, and loyal lieges, who were aiding and assisting in making the Commission and Statute in the last parliament, for the good Government of the State of the king and Kingdom; and therefore the Commons prayed they might be adjudged, convicted, and attainted as Traitors. Upon which the lords temporal took time by good deliberation to examine the matter and circumstances of it, and for that they were present at the making of the said Statute and Commission, which they knew were contrived for the honour of God, and for the good government of the state of the king and whole kingdom, and that it was the king's will, that they should not have otherwise answered them, than according to law, and had answered as before, they were by the lords temporal, by the assent of the king, adjudged to be 'drawn and hanged as Traitors,' their heirs disherited, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels to be forfeited to the king.

Whilst the Peers were trying them, the Clergy were retired into the King's Chamber; but when word was brought to them of the Condemnation of the Judges, the abp. of Canterbury, the bishop of Winchester, the chancellor, the Treasurer, the Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal, arose hastily and went into the parliament house, pouring forth their complaints before the king and peers, humbly upon their knees beseeching them, that for the love of God, the Virgin Mary, and all the Saints, even as they hoped to have mercy at the Day of Judgment, they should shew favour, and not put to death the said Judges then present.—The duke of Gloucester likewise, with the earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, and Nottingham, whose hearts began to be mollified, joined with them in their Petition. At length through their intercession, the execution upon their persons was spared, and their lives granted them; but they were sent back to the Tower to be kept close prisoners, and afterwards were sent into Ireland, there to remain for term of life (q).

On Tuesday, March 3, John Blake and Thomas Uske were brought into parliament: and first John Blake was impeached by the commons, That being retained of council for the king, he drew up the questions, to which the Justices made Answer, and contrived with the persons appealed, that the lords, and other the king's loyal lieges that caused the said Commission and Statute to be made in the last parliament, should be indicted in London and Middlesex, for treason, and that they should be arrested, and traitorously and wickedly murdered: and that he was aiding and advising in the treasons aforesaid, with the appealed already executed.—Then Thomas Uske was accused for procuring himself to be made Under-Sheriff of Middlesex, to the end to cause the said lords, and loyal lieges, to be arrested and indicted, as had been said before; and was aiding and counselling the Appealed in the Treasons aforesaid.—John Blake answered, ‘That he was retained of council for the king, by his command, and sworn to keep secret his Advice, and whatever he did, it was by the king’s command, whom he ought to obey.’ And Thomas Uske gave the same answer. Whereupon the lords temporal took deliberation till the morrow, being the 4th of March, when the said John and Thomas were again brought into parliament; and good advice and deliberation having been taken by the lords, they pronounced them Guilty of the things whereof they were accused. And whereas they alledged for their excuse the king’s command, it made the crime the greater, for that they knew well the persons appealed and condemned, had encroached to themselves royal power, as is said before, and it was their command, and not the king’s; then the lords awarded, by assent of the king, that they should both be ‘Hanged and Drawn as Traitors,’ as open enemies to the king and kingdom, and their heirs disherited for ever, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels forfeited to the king: and they were executed the same day.

(q) They were thus distributed; Robert Belknap and John Holt in the village of Dro-more in Ireland; not to live as Justices but as banished offenders, nor to go out of town above the space of two miles upon pain of death. But the king out of his bounty was pleased to give a yearly annuity of 40*l.* to Robert Belknap, and of 20 marks to John Holt, during their lives.—Roger Fulthorpe, and Wm. Burleigh, in the city of Dublin, with the yearly allowance of 40*l.* to each during life, with the liberty of going two miles to Burleigh, and of three to Fulthorpe, for their recreation.—John Cary and John Locton, in Waterford, with the yearly allowance of 20*l.* to each during life, with the like liberty, and like penalty.

On the 6th of March, Thomas bishop of Chichester was impeached and accused by the Commons, that he was present at the places and times when the said Questions were put to the Justices, &c. and the Answers made; and excited them by threats to answer as they did, and knew the false purposes and Treason designed by the Traitors adjudged, and aided and assisted them, and would not make discovery to any of the lords, that caused the said Commission to be made last parliament, whereby Remedy might have been had for the safety of the king and kingdom. To which the bishop answered, ‘That of his own freewill, he had not excited them to do or say any thing; and further said, they were not excited or charged to say any thing but what the law was: and touching the concealment of the Treason, he had made such assurance as he could not discover: and said further, that the traitors were about the king; and had such power over him before, that he had not so great interest in the king as to prevent those mischiefs, that now came upon him. The commons replied, He had upon the matter confessed himself Guilty, and prayed he might be attainted. Upon this Answer of the bishop, the Replication of the Commons, and all circumstances of the Accusation, the lords took time to give such Judgment, as might be for the honour of God, and profit of the king and kingdom.

Simon de Burleigh, John de Beauchamp, James Baroverse and John Salisbury, were brought into the Parliament House, where they were impeached at the instance of the Commons. The Articles exhibited against them were sixteen; the first Article was the first Article in the former impeachment; in the second Article they were accused as Traitors and enemies of the kingdom, for that they knew of all the treasons in the Appeal mentioned, and that they were aiding, assisting, counselling and assenting to all the Traitors attainted; and that Simon Burleigh, and John Beauchamp were principal actors in all the said Treasons. In the eighth Article they were accused for conspiring and designing with the five persons appealed, to destroy and put to death those who were assenting to the making of the said Commission and Statute in the last parliament. Another Article was, That the said Simon Burleigh being King’s Chamberlain, and being obliged to counsel the king for the best, to the advantage of him and his realm, he the said Simon by his wicked contrivance and procurement advised the king to entertain in his household great numbers of aliens, Bohemians and others, and to give them large gifts out of the revenues and profits of the realm, whereby the king was greatly impoverished, and the people otherwise oppressed.—The other Articles are of less moment, but all relating to the articles of the appeal, to which they all pleaded ‘Not Guilty.’—The Commons replied they were Guilty, and the lords took time to examine and consider the Impeachment. Upon this and the bishop of Chichester’s Impeachment, the lords adjourned until the 20th of March, on which day the whole parliament was adjourned until the 13th of April, on which day the lords further adjourned till the 5th of May; the time between was taken up with the Affair of sir Simon Burleigh: for three appellants, viz. the duke of Gloucester, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, with the whole house of commons, urged that Execution should be performed according to the law: on the other side, the king and queen, the earls of Derby and Nottingham, and the Prior of St. John his uncle, with the major part of the house of lords, did labour to have him saved.—There was also some muttering among the common people, and it was reported to the parliament that the Commons did rise in divers parts of the realm, but especially about Kent, in favour of sir Simon Burleigh; which when they heard, those that before spake and stood for him, now clean left him.—By joint consent of the king and the lords, Sentence was pronounced (May 5.) against the said sir Simon Burleigh, That he should be drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, and there be hanged till he be dead, and then have his head struck from his body: but because he was a Knight of the Garter, a gallant courtier, powerful, and once a (r) favourite of the king’s, and much respected of all the court, the king was pleased to mitigate his doom, that he should only be led to Tower-Hill, and there be beheaded.—John Beauchamp, steward of the household to the king, James Baroverse, and John Salisbury, knights, gentlemen of the privy-chamber, were in like manner condemned; May 12, the two first were beheaded on Tower-Hill, but John Salisbury was drawn from Tower-Hill to Tyburn and there hanged. On the same day also was condemned the bishop of Chester, the king's Confessor; but because of his great dignity he was pardoned, but was banished to Cork in Ireland (s).

(s) The judgments were afterwards reversed in the parliament held the 21st Rd. 2. but that parliament is declared to have been held by force in the Parliament Rolls, 1 Hen. 4. Nos. 21, 22, and No. 48, and is therefore entirely repealed by 1 Hen. 4. cap. 3. and the parliament of 11 Rd. 2. confirmed and approved of, as for the honour and profit of the realm, 1 Hen. 4. cap. 4.

13. Impeachment of THOMAS FITZ-ALAN, archbishop of Canterbury, of High Treason: 21 Richard II. A. D. 1397. [Cotton, 368. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 224.]

ON the 20th of September 1397, the commons came before the king, in full parliament, and made Protestation by their Speaker, that though they intended to shew and declare certain matters and Articles, which they had taen advised of and agreed amongst themselves; yet, nevertheless it was and is their intent and will, with leave of the king, to accuse or impeach any person or persons, as oft as they should think fit, during the time of this parliament; they prayed the king that he would please to accept this Protestation, and, that it might be entered as a Record on the Roll of Parliament; which the king granted and commanded to be done accordingly.

On the same day, the commons came again before the king, in parliament, and impeached Thomas Arundel, then archbishop of Canterbury, of High Treason; "For that he, being the chief officer of the king, his chancellor, when he was bishop of Ely, was traiterously aiding, procuring and advising in making a commission, directed to Thomas duke of Gloucester, Richard earl of Arundel, and others, in the 10th of his majesty's reign; and made and procured himself, as chief officer, to be put into it, to have power, with the other commissioners, to see it put in execution; which commission was made in prejudice to the king, and openly against his royalty, crown and dignity; and that the said Thomas actually put the said commission in execution." "Also, that the said archbishop, in the 11th of the king, procured and advised the duke of Gloucester, with the earls of Warwick and Arundel, to take upon them royal power, and to arrest the king's liege subjects, viz. Simon Burley and James Berners, knights, and adjudge them to death, contrary to the king's will and without his consent; thereupon, the said commons prayed the king that the said archbishop might be put into safe custody."

The king answered; "Because the accusation and impeachment touched so high a person, and a peer of the realm, he would be advised."

The next day the commons prayed the king, "That as they had impeached and accused the archbishop of Canterbury of assenting and being in the contrivance of making the commission on the 19th of November, in the 10th of the king, and agreed to the execution of the same, which was expressly against his state and dignity, that he would please to ordain such judgment against the said archbishop as the cause required." Hereupon the king commanded it to be recorded in parliament, "That the archbishop had been before him, in the presence of certain lords, and confessed that he was mistaken, or erred in the exercise of the commission, and therefore put himself upon the king's grace and mercy." Upon this, the king and the lords temporal, with sir Thomas Peircy, the proctor for the prelates, who, as it appears upon record, had full power from the whole body of the clergy to act for them, adjudged and declared the said article, which the archbishop had confessed, to be treason, and that it touched the king himself; for which they, also, adjudged and declared him a traitor. And it was awarded in parliament, "That he should be banished out of the kingdom, have his temporalities seized, and his goods and chattels forfeited to the king, who was, also, to appoint the time of his exile." Whereupon, the king assigned him a time of passage,—which was from the eve of St. Michael, until six weeks next ensuing; to pass from the port of Dover into France; and further, that he should forfeit all his lands, tenements, and possessions, which he had in fee simple by descent, or purchase, or otherwise, at the day of the treason committed, or after, or that any one held to his use, to the king and his heirs for ever.

14. Impeachment of THOMAS duke of GLOUCESTER, RICHARD earl of ARUNDEL, THOMAS earl of WARWICK, THOMAS MORTIMER, and sir JOHN COBHAM, knight, of High Treason: 21 Richard II. A. D. 1397. [Cotton, 377. Froissart, l. 4. c. 90. Walsing. 354. 3 Tyrrel, 968. Brady, 411. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 225.]

IN the Parliament assembled at Westminster the 17th of September 1397, came on the proceedings against the duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, contained in several Articles of Impeachment then brought against them, by way of bill, by the Lords Appellants, mentioned in the Council of Nottingham. The bill, as appears by the Record itself, was directed to the king in parliament, and is to this effect. First, it sets forth, "That the duke of Gloucester, and the earl of Arundel, designing to encroach, and have the government of your royal person and kingdom, with the liberties and dignities thereof, as well within this kingdom, as without; when the parliament sat at Westminster, in the 10th of your reign, they sent a peer of the land to you, who on their behalf, and by their command, told your majesty, that if you would not consent to make to them, and others whom they should name, such a Commission, whereby they might have the government in the manner as is above related, you should be in danger of your life, and the lords and commons of parliament would depart without your leave; and then you should see in what a miserable condition you would be; so that in very fear of their power, you then granted such a Commission as they desired." Next follows the Commission itself; viz.

"Richard, king, &c. to all those to whom these letters shall come to be seen or heard, greeting. We being duly conscious of the grievous complaints of the lords and commons of our realm in this present parliament assembled, that our profits and rents, and the revenues of our realm, by private and insufficient council, and the ill governance as well of certain of our late great officers, as of divers other people being near our person, are so much consumed, wasted, embezzled, given away, granted, and aliened, destroyed, and evilly disposed of and expended: that we are so much impoverished and stripped of treasure and means, and the substance of our crown so diminished and destroyed; that we are neither able to sustain honourably, as we ought, the state of our household, nor maintain and manage those wars wherewith our realm is environed, without great and outrageous oppressions and charges on our people, greater than they can bear: and also that the good laws, statutes and customs of our said realm, to which we are bound by oath, and obliged to maintain, are not, nor have been duly observed and executed, nor full justice or right done to our said people:

but many disinherisons and other most great mischiefs and damages have happened, as well to us, as to our people and whole realm. Now we, for the honour of God, and for the good of us and our realm, and for the quiet and relief of our people, willing against the said mischiefs to establish a good and meet remedy, as we have already of our free will, at the request of the lords and commons, ordained and assigned such persons for our great officers; that is to say, our chancellor, treasurer, and keeper of our privy seal, as we esteem good, faithful, and sufficient, for the honour and profit of us and our realm: so also of our real authority, certain knowledge, good pleasure, and free will; and by the advice and assent of the prelates, lords, and commons in full parliament in aid of the good governance of our realm, and the well and due execution of our laws, and for the relief in time of that miserable condition under which both we and our subjects have long laboured, having full confidence in the good advice, sense, and discretion of the most honorable fathers in God, William archbishop of Canterbury, and Alexander archbishop of York; our most dear uncles, Edmund, duke of York, and Thomas, duke of Gloucester; the honorable fathers in God William, bishop of Winchester, Thomas, bishop of Exeter, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham; our beloved and faithful Richard earl of Arundel, John lord Cobham, Richard le Scroop, and John Devereux, have ordained, assigned and deputed, and do ordain, assign and depute them to be of our great and continual council, for one whole year next after the date hereof, to survey and examine, together with our said great officers, as well the estate, condition, and government of our whole realm, and of all our officers and ministers of whatever estate, degree, or condition they be, within our household or without; and to inquire and take information by all such ways as they shall think meet, of all rents, revenues, and profits belonging to us, or which are due and ought to appertain to us, either within the realm or without: and of all gifts, grants, alienations, and confirmations by us made, of any lands, tenements, rents, annuities, profits, revenues, wards, marriages, escheats, forfeitures, franchises, liberties; voidances of archbishoprics, bishoprics, abbeys, priories, farms of houses, possessions of aliens, &c. And also of all revenues and profits, as well of our said realm, as of our lands, lordships, cities, villages, and other possessions beyond the sea; and of the benefices and possessions, and other revenues of all that are in rebellion against the pope: and of the carrying monies out of the realm by the collectors of the pope, or the procurators of cardinals, Lombards, or other persons: and likewise of the profits of our customs, and all subsidies granted to us by the clergy and laity, since the day of our coronation, to that time: and of all fees, wages, and rewards of our officers and ministers great and small, and of annuities and other rewards granted; and gifts made to any persons in fee or for term of life, or in any other manner; and of lands, tenements, rents, revenues, and forfeitures, bargained or sold to the prejudice and damage of our crown: and also touching the jewels and goods which were our grandfather's at the time of his death, and of charters and general pardons: and how general payments have been levied and expended; how garrisons and forts have been maintained: and of all defaults and misprisions as well in our household, as in our courts, and all other places of our realm: and by what persons our revenues and the substance of our crown have been withdrawn or diminished; or the common law interrupted or delayed, or any other damage that hath happened to us. Giving, and by these presents granting, of our authority, and by the advice and assent of our said subjects, unto our said counsellors, or any six of them, and to our great officers aforesaid, full power and authority general and special, to enter our palace and household, and to call before them all our officers, and to command all rolls, records, and other monuments and evidences; and all defaults, wastes, and excesses found in our said household, and in other courts and places; and all deceits, extortions, oppressions, damages, and grievances whatsoever, that are to the prejudice, damage, and distress of us and our crown, and the estate of our said realm in general (though not herein particularly expressed and specified) to amend, correct, repair, redress, reform, and put into good and due order and establishment: and also to hear and receive the complaints of all our liege people, as well for us as themselves, against our said officers and counsellors: and all oppressions, wrongs, and injuries, which cannot so well be amended and determined in the courts of the common law; and to discuss and finally determine all the matters aforesaid, and full execution thereof to award, as to them shall seem most meet, for the honour and profits of us and our estate, and to the redintegration of the rights and profits of our crown, and the better governance of the peace and laws of our kingdom, and the relief of our said people. In which proceedings, if difference of opinion happen amongst our said counsellors, the same shall be concluded by majority of votes: and we command and charge all prelates, dukes, earls, barons, sheriffs, the treasurer, and comptroller, and all other officers of our household, justices de banco, and other officers, ministers, and liege subjects whatsoever, that to our said counsellors and officers in manner aforesaid, they be obedient, aiding and assisting. In witness whereof, &c. Given under our great seal the 19th day of November 1386.

The Articles of Impeachment go on thus: 1. "The said duke and earl of Arundel, to accomplish their traitorous purposes, and to have your royal person in their power, ordered, as they pleased, the government of your whole state, with the laws and dignities thereof, and prevailed with Thomas earl of Warwick, and Thomas Mortimer to join with them in their traitorous design; who, by agreement, as traitors to the king and kingdom, all met and assembled on the 13th of November in the 11th of your reign, at Haringay-Park in Middlesex, with a great number of people armed and arrayed, and made divers of your liege-people in several parts of your realm, to rise, and march with them against your royal person, contrary to their legiance, and would not come before your presence, until they were secured by your oath that they might come, and return safely; and then they all appeared before you in your palace at Westminster with a great force of armed men, and traitorously constrained you to take them into your safe protection, against your will and pleasure."—2. "The said duke, the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Thomas Mortimer, continuing their traitorous purposes, by force and violence, did take, and imprison divers of your liege people and amongst others, sir Simon Burley, and brought him to your parliament held on the morrow of the purification, in the 11th of your reign, and there suggested divers points of high crimes and treason against him, and the advice of every lord then present was asked, concerning the crimes of the said Simon, and afterwards the duke and earl would know your advice and opinion; and you answered plainly, he was not Guilty in any point objected against him. And after that, the duke and earls caused you to come into a secret place at Westminster, and there showed you the particulars of the crimes abovesaid. To whom you then answered likewise, that the said Simon was not Guilty in any of those points. And there they took upon them traitorously to have you by force consent to the judgment they had designed against him; and yet you would not consent to any judgment to be given against the said Simon. Yet nevertheless, the said duke and earls took upon them royal power, in prejudice of you, and in derogation to your crown, and without your assent, and contrary to your will, in your absence, and in the absence of many other peers of parliament without their assent, and against their wills, they awarded that the said Simon should be drawn, hanged and beheaded; and thereupon they traitorously caused his head to be struck off, against your peace, crown, majesty and dignity."—3. "The aforesaid duke, earls, and Thomas Mortimer, continuing their malicious, false and traitorous purposes and force, at Huntingdon, on Thursday the 6th of December in the said 11th year, traitorously agreed, and intended to have gone with their forces to any place of the kingdom, where they might have found your royal person, to have surrendered to you their homage-liche, and to have deposed you; and this they would have done, had they not been hindered by Henry of Lancaster earl of Derby, and Thomas Mowbray earl of Nottingham. And the said duke and earls continuing their traitorous intention and force, by agreement between them, caused the records in your treasury, of the time of your great grandfather king Edward to be searched, how he demised his crown; and they shewed to you in writing the causes of the demise of his crown in your palace at Westminster in the time of parliament in the said 11th year, and they said falsely and traitorously that they had cause sufficient to depose you, but for the reverence they had for your most noble grandfather and father; and they said also, that in hopes of your better government they would suffer you to continue in your royal estate and regality."—4. "Which treasons so imagined, done and perpetrated by the aforesaid duke, earls, and Thomas Mortimer, against your royal person, estate, majesty and dignity, as is above declared: We the Appellants (there named) your loyal lieges, have been and are ready to prove against the said duke, the earls of Arundel, and Warwick, and Thomas Mortimer as you, our most dread lord, and this high and honourable court, your parliament, shall order."

These Articles having been read, the Lords Appellants prayed the king that the accused might be brought before him, in parliament to make their answer. Accordingly, Ralph lord Nevil, constable of the Tower, there present, had orders to bring before them Richard earl of Arundel, his prisoner, which he did, on the 4th day of this session of parliament. The duke of Lancaster, being constituted lord high steward of England, pro hac vice, told the prisoner, that he was impeached of divers acts of High-Treason, and the appeal being read to him, his answer was, "That he had a general pardon in the parliament held in the 11th of the king; as also a charter of pardon made to him within 6 years last past, both which he prayed might be allowed." The lord high steward told the earl, by command of the king and consent of parliament, that, "The pardon granted in the 11th year, was made by constraint upon the king, by the said duke, earls and others of their party, assuming to themselves royal power, in prejudice to the king, his royal estate, crown and dignity; and that the charter of pardon was made in deceit of the king, and expressly against him and his royal dignity; wherefore, upon the request of the commons by consent of the king and all the estates of parliament, the said pardon and charter had been in this parliament repealed and made void." The earl was asked if he had any thing more to say, and he being silent, sir William Clopton, chief justice of the king's bench, by the king's command, declared to him the law, and the punishment he must undergo, if he pleaded nothing else, for if he did not, he would be convict and attainted of all the matters objected against him. But upon the earl's still insisting on his charter and pardon, and demanding the allowance of them, the Lords Appellants, in their proper persons, prayed the king, "That it would please him to give judgment upon him as convict of all the points on which he was accused.

The Earl of Arundel convicted.

Then the lord high steward, by command of the king, all the lords temporal, and sir Thomas Piercy, proctor for the clergy, as before taken notice of, adjudged the said earl of Arundel, "Guilty and convict of all the points on which he stood appealed, and as a traitor to the king and realm, to be drawn, hanged, beheaded, and quartered. And farther, because his treasons were of so high a nature, as to have gone about to surrender their liege homage, and depose the king, and that his levying war was so notorious, the said lord high steward, by the authority aforesaid, awarded that all his castles, manors, lands, tenements, reversions, fees, and every other manor of inheritance, as well in fee-tail as fee-simple, which were the said earl of Arundel's on the 19th of Nov. in the 10th of the king, or afterwards; and also all the lands and tenements of which other persons were infeoffed to his use, the said 19th of Nov. or afterwards, with all his goods and chattels, should be forfeited to the king and his heirs for ever." But the king graciously remitted that part of his sentence of being drawn, hanged, and quartered; and to shew equity as well as rigour, the king and lords, both spiritual and temporal, declared, that it was not their intention that the lands and tenements, fees or any other inheritance of which the said earl stood infeoffed, to the use of another, should in any manner be forfeited by reason of this judgment.

The Duke of Gloucester, though dead, declared Guilty of High Treason.

On the same day that the earl of Arundel was brought into parliament and tried and convicted, the king directed his warrant to Thomas earl marshal, governor of the town of Calais, or to his lieutenant, signifying that he should bring over the body of Thomas duke of Gloucester, with all the speed he could, to answer to divers Articles of Treason objected against him in parliament by the Appellants, according to the law and custom used in England; and further to receive the orders of the king and parliament concerning him. This writ bears date at Westminster, September 21. The return of the earl marshal to this warrant, was, "That he could not bring the said duke before the king and his council in that parliament for that, being in his custody, in the king's prison at Calais, he there died." This return was made Sept. 24. Upon the reading of this warrant and return in parliament the Lords Appellants prayed the king, "That the said duke of Gloucester might be declared a traitor and an enemy to him; as having levied war in this kingdom against his person and contrary to his allegiance. And that all his lands, tenements, goods and chattels might be forfeited; as, in this case, notwithstanding his death, they ought to be." Then the commons prayed the king and lords, "That since it was notoriously known to his majesty and all the estates of this parliament, and to all the kingdom, that the said duke and others of his party assembled at Haringway, in the county of Middlesex, with a great number of people armed and arrayed to make war against the king, contrary to their allegiance, and came with those forces into the king's presence, which was levying war against their liege-lord, that he might thereupon be adjudged as a traitor, and his lands, tenements, &c. notwithstanding his death before, forfeited." Whereupon, all the lords temporal, and the aforesaid sir Tho. Piercy, proctor for the clergy, declared that the said crime and treason was notoriously known to them and the whole kingdom; wherefore they, with the king's assent, declared him guilty of levying war as a traitor, and adjudged "all his castles, lands, manors, &c. which he was possessed of on the 13th of Nov. in the 11th year of this reign, to be forfeited to the king and his heirs; and that none of his issue, or heirs of his body, or their issue or heirs in time to come, should ever bear the royal arms of England entire, or with difference; or in any other manner whatsoever, should inherit the crown of England."

The Duke's Confession while in Prison.

On the 25th of Sept. the said Appellants prayed the king in full parliament that if there was any thing upon record, either by Confession of any person accused, or any other person whatsoever touching their appeal, that it might be openly known and declared in full parliament. Upon which petition, by the advice of the lords temporal, the king commanded that a Commission bearing date the 17th of August last past, directed to sir William Rickhill, one of the justices of the Common bench, together with a Confession made before him, by Thomas late duke of Gloucester, by virtue of the aforesaid Commission, with the return of that Commission, be read in parliament. The duke's Confession is in old English, and deserves particular notice, as a specimen of the elegance of the English tongue in those days:

"This is the Answer of William Rickhill to the Commission of his liege lord the king. Thomas duke of Gloucester, be the name of Thomas Woodstock, the zear of the king Richard 21, in the castle of Caleys, by virtue of a commission of the king, as it is more plainly declared in the same, directed to William Rickhill, justice, hath I know and confessed to fore the same William all the matters and points I wrote in this great roll annexed to this schedule, the which schedule and great roll both sealed under the seal of the aforesaid William, and all the matters and points I know and confessed by the aforesaid duke in the castle of Caleys, the foresaid duke be his own hand fully and plainly I wrote, and delivered it to the same Wm. Rickhill touching this matter as it was done in the presence of John Lancaster, and John Lovetoft, and in none other manner."

"I Thomas of Woodstock, the zear of my lord the king 21, be the vertue of a commission of my lord the king, the same zear directed to Wm. Rickhill, justice, the which is comprehended more plainly in the aforesaid commission, knowleche that I was one with aertynge of other men, to assent to the making of a commission, in the which commission I among other, restrained my lord of his freedom, and took upon me among others power regal, truly not knowing ne witting, that time that I did against his estate, nor his royaltie, as I did after, and do now; and forasmuch as I knew afterward that I had done wrong, and take upon me more than I ought to do, I submitted me to my lord, and cried him mercy and grace, and yet do as truly and as meekly as any man may, and put me high and low in his mercy and grace, as he hath always been full of mercy and grace to all other. Also, in that time, that I came armed into my lord's presence, and into his palace, howsoever that I did it for drede of my life, I knowleche for certain, that I did evil, and against his regalitie, and his estate, wherefore I submit me lowly and meekly to his mercy, and to his grace. Also, in that I took my lord's letters of his messages, and opened them against his leave, I knowleche that I did evil, wherefore I put me lowly in his grace. Also, in that, that I sclaudered my lord, I knowlech, that I did evil and wickedly, in that, that I spake to him in sclauderous wise, in audience of other folk; but by the way, that my soul shall too, I meant none evil therein, nevertheless I wot and knowleche that I did evil and unkindly, wherefore I submit me high and low in his grace. Also, in that I among other, communed and asked of certain clerks, whether that we might give up our homage for drede of our livs or not, and whether that we were assentid thereto for to do it, trewly and by my troth, I ne have how none full mind thereof but I trowe rather yes, than nay, wherefore I submit me high and low evermore in his grace. Also, in that, that I was in place, where it was communed, and spoken in manner of deposal of my liege lord, truly I knowlech well, that we were assentid thereto for two days or three, and then were for to have done our homage and our othes, and put him as highly in his estate as ever he was; but forsouth there I knowlech that I did untruly, and unkindly as to him, that is my liege lord, and hath been so good and kind lord to me, wherefore I beseech to him, notwithstanding myn unkindness, evermore of his mercy and of his grace, as lowly as any creature may beseech it unto his liege lord. And as of any new thing or ordenance, that ever I should have witting or known, ordained or assentid, privy or appert, that should have been against my lord's estate, or his will or any that longeth about him, syth that day I swore unto him at Langely, on God's body truly, and by that othe that I there made, I never knew of gathering against him, ne none other that longeth unto him. And as touching these points, that I have made confession of to sir Wm. Rickhill, justice, in the which I wot well, that I have offended my lord unkindly and untruly, as I have said before, how that I have in all these points offended him, and done against him, trewly and as I will answer before God it was my meaning and my weaning to do the best for his person and for his estate; nevertheless I wot well, and know well now, that my deeds and my workings were against my intent; but by the way that my soul shall too, of these points and of all other the which that I done of negligence and of unkindness, it was never myne intent ne my will, ne for my thought for to do a thing that should have been distresse or harming against the safety of my liege lord's persone, as I will answer before God at the day of judgment. And therefore I beseech my liege and sovereign lord the king, that he will of his grace and benignity accept me to his mercy and his grace, as I that put my life, my body and my goods, wholly at his will, as lowly as meekly as any creature can do or may do to his liege lord; beseeching to his high lordship, that he will for the passion of him that suffered for all mankind, and the compassion that he had for his mother on the crosse, and the pity he had of Mary Magdalen, that he will vouchsafe for to have compassion and pity, and to accept me to his mercy and to his grace; as he that hath ever been full of mercy and of grace to all his lieges, and to all other that have nought been so nigh unto him as I have been, though I been unworthy."

After this return to the Commission had been read, the Appellants prayed, that sir Wm. Rickhill, approved for his loyalty and discretion, might be commanded by the king upon his allegiance to declare the truth touching this Confession; who, in the presence of the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament said and declared, "That about 8 o'clock before noon, he came within the castle of Calais, to the duke of Gloucester, who was then of good memory and out of prison. That he shewed him his commission, and the cause of his coming, in the presence of John Lancaster and John Lovetost; and desired that what he, the said duke, had to say to it he would put down in writing, and then he departed. Returning to him about 9 of the clock, in the afternoon of the same day, the duke read in writing the said Confession, with his own mouth, and gave the same to Wm. Rickhill with his own hand. Farther; Wm. Rickhill said to the said duke, that if there was any thing more touching this matter, that he would speak it for the king's satisfaction, and the knowledge of the whole truth of the affair. Whereupon the duke said he had forgot one thing that then came into his memory, that he said to his majesty, 'if he designed to be king, he must not intercede for sir Simon Burley, to save him from death.' And he desired the said William Rickhill to shew this to the king by word of mouth." See Brady, p. 411.

The Earl of Warwick convicted.

On the 20th of September, the constable of the Tower brought before the parliament Thomas earl of Lancaster, who was told by the duke of Lancaster, that he was accused by Edward earl of Rutland, and the other Appellants, there named, of divers High-Treasons, which were all comprehended in two articles: that of assembling with force and armed men at Haringay, &c. and the charge about sir Simon Burley, which were drawn up in the same words as in the case of the earl of Arundel. To all which he answered with tears, 'that he well understood those treasons and wicked deeds; that he was guilty of them, and put himself upon the king's mercy and grace.' Upon which the duke of Lancaster pronounced the very same sentence against him, in all things, as he had done against the earl of Arundel. But, adds the record, the king, moved with pity, to the reverence and honour of God, at the prayer of the Appellants, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament, remitted part of the said judgment, and granted him his life; so that his sentence was "to remain prisoner in the Isle of Man during his life, upon condition that if any means were made use of to the king or his heirs, to gain him any further favour, or if he should make his escape, then the judgment should be put in execution, and the king's grace should be void." This done, the commons before the king in parliament affirmed the said Appeals to be all good and lawful.

Thomas Mortimer makes his escape.

Afterwards, the Lords Appellants impeached Thomas Mortimer of the Treasons comprised in the said accusation; but he, being then in Ireland, fled into the mountains to the Irish rebels for protection. A proclamation was thereupon ordered in parliament to be made throughout Ireland, that he should surrender himself in England within three months, to answer to the impeachment, or else be declared a traitor; and all his manors, castles, lands, and tenements, &c. which he was possessed of on the 13th of November, as in the former cases, should be forfeited to the king.—In the next session, Thomas Mortimer had time given him to make his appearance and take his Trial, which he not doing, the duke of Lancaster, as lord high steward, with the consent of the lords temporal, and the earl of Wiltshire, then proctor for the prelates and clergy, gave Sentence and Judgment against him, according to the tenor of the proclamation.

Sir John Cobham convicted.

On the 28th of January following, came on the Trial of John de Cobham, knight, who had been impeached by the commons in the last session for the same crimes that Thomas Mortimer was, viz. that he, sitting in judgment, awarded Simon Burley and James Berners, knights, to be executed as before, without the king's assent, in his absence, and in the absence of many peers of parliament who arose and would not sit in such judgment, &c. against the peace of the king, his crown and dignity. The duke of Surrey, in whose custody this sir John Cobham was, brought him into parliament to answer to the Articles alledged against him, and the duke of Lancaster told him, that he was accused and impeached by the commons for the Treasons afore-said, and commanded him to answer at his peril. Upon hearing the Impeachment read, the knight said, "That as to the making of the Commission he was not guilty; and as to the use and exercise of the same, he said he did not meddle with it without the king's command, and that he went to the king and told him, he, with others, were made commissioners, but that he would not act ac-

ording to the commission without the king's licence, who thereupon commanded him to act." To this the king himself answered, "That he was under such government at that time, that he could say no otherwise, by reason of such as were then about him; but that the commission was made against his will the said John Cobham could not deny." As to the judgment and award made against the said Simon and James, the prisoner said, "He was told by those who were then masters, that it was the king's will such judgment and award should be made."—Upon these Answers, the commons prayed the king to give Judgment against him, as convict and attainted of the use and exercise of the commission, &c. Whereupon, the lord high steward, by consent as aforesaid, gave Judgment against the said John de Cobham, as in the case of the earl of Arundele. But all those judgments the king graciously pardoned; yet so that he was to be a prisoner in the isle of Jersey during his life.

15. Articles of Accusation against RICHARD II. King of England; 1 Henry IV. A. D. 1399. [Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. IV. N. 10. 4 Rapin, 76. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 251.]

ON Monday, the 6th of Oct. 1399, the peers, with the bishops and commons, of England, being assembled in the great Hall at Westminster, and the new king placed in the royal throne; by his command, Thomas Arundele, archbishop of Canterbury, declared, "That this parliament was summoned by king Richard, to be held the Tuesday next before. Which summons was annulled and made void by the accepting of the Renunciation of the said king Richard, and deposing of him; which was done the same day in the presence of the king, lords and commons, as by the process hereafter to be read would appear."—He then told them, "That this most famous realm, abounding in all felicities, had been long governed by children and young counsellors, and would utterly have been ruined and wasted, had not God sent a wise and discreet man to govern the same, who meant by God's help, to be governed himself by the wise and old heads of the realm."—After this he took for his text these words out of Maccabees, incumbit nobis ordinare pro regno, i. e. it is the king's will to be governed by the honourable, discreet, and sage men of the realm, and by their common consent; and not by his will or humour, to rule the same. He further laid great stress on this, "That this nation, of any under the sun, might best support and live within itself, alledging for authority this adage, Quod inter regna, hoc principatum tenet." To these he added, "That to every good government three things were required; 1st, justice: next, that the laws should be duly observed; and lastly, that every degree of men, in their several vocations, should be encouraged and protected."

He brought many reasons why this nation ought to be well governed, and said, "That their new king intended strictly to observe these three points." He concluded with acquainting them, "That Henry, their king and lord, meant to be crowned on the Monday following, after which he would wholly addict himself to the care of the Commonwealth; and desired the commons that they would consent to have the parliament continued to the Tuesday following." After this harangue was ended, Henry Percie, earl of Northumberland, and constable of England, demanded of the lords and commons, whether they would agree to his continuance, who, being all and severally examined, consented thereto.

The next thing they went upon, was to read the record of the Renunciation of king Richard II. with their acceptance of the same, and the Deposition of the said king, as follows:

The Record and Process of Renunciation of king Richard 2 after the conquest, and likewise the acceptance of the same Renunciation, with the Deposition of the same king Richard afterwards ensuing.

"Be it remembered, that on Monday the feast of saint Michael the archangel, in the 23rd year of the reign of king Richard 2, the lords spiritual and temporal, and other persons of note; that is to say, the lord Richard le Scroop, archbishop of York, John bishop of Hereford, Henry earl of Northumberland, and Ralph earl of Westmoreland; the lord Hugh de Burnel, Thomas lord de Berkeley, the prior of Canterbury with the abbot of Westminster,

William Thyrning, knight, and John Markham, justices; Thomas Stow and John Burbache, doctors of laws, Thomas de Erpingham and Thomas Gray, knights, Wm. de Feryby and Dionysius Lapham, public notaries, first deputed to the act under-written, by the assent and advice of several of the lords spiritual and temporal, and of the judges and others, skilful as well in the civil and canon law, as in the laws of the realm, assembled at Westminster in the usual place of council; did about nine of the clock come to the presence of the said king, being within the Tower of London: and it being recited before the said king, by the said earl of Northumberland, in the behalf of all the rest before-named, so as aforesaid joined with him: how the said king heretofore at Conway in North-Wales, being at liberty, did promise unto the lord Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, and the earl of Northumberland, that he would yield up and renounce the crown of England and France, and his regal majesty, for causes of his inability and insufficiency, there by the said king himself confessed, and that in the best manner and form the same could be done, as counsel learned should best order; the said king before the said lords and others above-named, herewith benignly answered, "That he would with effect accomplish, what before in that behalf he had promised," but desired to have some discourse with his cousins, Henry duke of Lancaster, and the said lord archbishop of Canterbury, before he fulfilled such his promise. Afterwards the same day after dinner, the said king much affecting the coming of the said duke of Lancaster, and having long waited for him, at last the said duke of Lancaster, the lords, and others above-named, and also the said archbishop of Canterbury, did come to the presence of the said king in the Tower aforesaid: the lords de Roos, de Willoughby, and de Bergavenny, and very many others being then present; and after the said king had had discourse with the said duke of Lancaster and archbishop, exhibiting a merry countenance here and there amongst them to part thereof, as appeared to those that stood round about; at last the said king calling to him all that were there present, did publicly say before them, "That he was ready to make the renunciation, and to renounce and recede, according to the promise by him made as aforesaid." And so forthwith, although, as was said unto him, he might have made some deputy to have served as the organ of his voice, for avoiding so tedious a labour as the reading of the said cession and renunciation, reduced by others into a schedule of parchment; yet the said king, very willingly as appeared, and with a pleasant countenance, holding the said schedule in his hand, said, "That he himself would read it," and distinctly read the same through: and also did absolve all his liege people, and renounce, and recede and swear, and other things did say and pronounce in reading, and did subscribe it with his own hand, as is more fully contained in the said schedule; the tenor whereof is such:"

"In the name of God. Amen. I, Richard, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, do absolve the archbishops, bishops and other prelates of churches, secular or regular, of whatsoever dignity, degree, state, or condition; the dukes, marquises, earls, barons, vassals, and valvasors, and all and every my liege people whatsoever, ecclesiastics or seculars of all the said kingdoms and dominions, by what name soever they are known, from the oath of fealty and homage, and other oaths whatsoever to me made, and from all bond or tie of legiance, royalty, and dominion, whereby they have been or are obliged, or otherwise in any manner bound unto me. And I do free, release, and acquit them and their heirs and successors for ever, from the said oaths and other obligations whatsoever. And I do dismiss them free, unloosen, quit and in full immunity, as far as relates to my person, to every effect of law which may follow from the premises, or any of them. And I do purely, of my own accord, simply and absolutely, in and by the best manner, way, and form that may be in these writings, renounce and totally resign all kingly dignity and majesty, and the crown and dominion and power of the said kingdom and dominions, and all other my dominions and possessions, or any way belonging or appertaining unto me, by what name soever they may be reckoned up within the aforesaid kingdoms, or elsewhere: and all right and colour of right and title, possession, and dominion, which at any time I have had, now have, or by any means shall have in or to the same, or any of them, with their universal rights and appurtenances, or any dependencies however, on them or any of them: and also the rule and government of the said kingdoms and dominions, and their administration, and all manner of meer and mixt empire and jurisdiction to me in the said kingdoms belonging, or that may be belonging; and to the name of king, and the honour, regality, and celsitude royal, purely, voluntarily, simply, and absolutely, by the best manner, way, and form that the same can be done in these writings, I do renounce, and them do totally resign, and in deed and in word dismiss and quit the same, and from them do recede for ever. Saving to my successors kings of England, the rights to them or any of them belonging, or that shall any way belong, in the said kingdoms or dominions, and all other the premises for ever. And I do confess, acknowledge, repute, and truly and out of certain knowledge, do judge myself to have been and to be utterly insufficient and unuseful for the rule and government of the said kingdoms and dominions, with all their appurtenances: and that for my notorious demerits I deserve to be deposed. And I do swear upon these holy gospels of God, by me corporally touched, that I will never act contrary to the said resignation, renunciation, dismission, and cession; nor any way oppose the same in deed or in word, by myself or any other or others: nor will, as much as in helies, permit the same publicly or privately to be contraried or opposed; but the said renunciation, resignation, dismission, and cession will for ever esteem ratified and well-pleasing, and firmly hold and observe the same in the whole and in every part; so God me help, and these holy gospels of God. I the before-named king Richard do here subscribe myself with my own hand."

"And presently to the said Renunciation and cession, the said king added by word of mouth, 'That if it lay in his power, the said duke of Lancaster should succeed him in his kingdom.' But, because, as he said, this did not depend on his pleasure, he did request the said archbishop of York, and bishop of Hereford, whom he for that time had constituted his procurators, to declare and intimate such his cession and renunciation to the states of the kingdom, 'That they would be pleased to signify to the people, his will and intention in that behalf.' And in token of such his will and intention, did then and there openly pluck off the golden ring of his signet from his own finger, and put it upon the finger of the said duke of Lancaster, desiring as he affirmed, that the same might be made known to all the states of the kingdom. Which being done, taking their leaves on both sides, they all went out of the said Tower to return to their lodgings.

"But on the morrow, viz. Tuesday the feast of saint Jerome, in the great hall at Westminster, in the place honourably prepared for holding the parliament, the said archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the duke of Lancaster, and other dukes and lords, as well spiritual as temporal, whose names are underwritten, and the commons of the said kingdom, assembled in a great multitude in parliament being present, and the said duke of Lancaster being seated in a place due to his quality, and the chair of state being solemnly adorned with cloth of gold, but then empty, without any person whatever presiding therein; the above-named archbishop of York, in the name of himself, and of the said bishop of Hereford, according to the order of the said king, did publicly declare the Cession, and Renunciation, to have been so made by him as aforesaid, with the subscription of his royal hand, and delivery of his signet. And the said Cession and Renunciation, did there cause to be read by another, first in Latin and then in English.

"Immediately after which, it was demanded of the estates and people there present, to wit, first of the archbishop of Canterbury, to whom, by reason of the dignity and prerogative of his metropolitan church of Canterbury, it belongs in this behalf to have the first voice, amongst the rest of the prelates, and nobles of the realm, 'whether for their interest and the utility of the kingdom, they would be pleased to admit such Renunciation and Cession.' And the said states and people, judging from the causes by the said king himself, in his Renunciation and Cession aforesaid, signified, that the same was very expedient, did each man singly by himself, and in common with the people, unanimously admit the said Cession and Renunciation. After which admission, it was then and there publicly declared, that besides such Cession and Renunciation so as aforesaid admitted, it would be very expedient and profitable to the kingdom, for the removing of all scorples, and taking away sinister suspicions, that every many crimes and defects, by the said king about the ill governance of his kingdom very often committed, reduced into writing by way of articles, by reason of which, as himself affirmed in the Cession by him made, he was deservedly to be deposed, should be publicly read, and declared to the people. And so the greatest part of the said articles were then and there read through. The tenour of all which Articles is such:"

"Imprimis, It is objected against king Richard, that whereas by reason of his ill government, viz. his giving away his goods and possession belonging to his crown, and that to persons unworthy: and his indiscreet squandering the same away otherwise, and to that end imposing, without cause, collections and other grievous burthens on his people, more than they were able to bear: and also innumerable other evils by his assent and command perpetrated; there were by the whole parliament certain prelates, and others, temporal lords, elected and assigned, who might with all their power, and at their own charges, faithfully labour about the just government of the realm: yet the king causing a conventicle to be held by him, with his accomplices, the said lords, as well spiritual as temporal, so occupied about the safety and profit of the kingdom, did propose to impeach of high treason; and did violently draw the judges of the kingdom, for fear of death and corporal tortures, to such his wicked purpose, most vigorously striving to destroy the said lords.—2. The said king lately at Shrewsbury, caused several, and the greater part of the judges, to come before him and his favourites privately in a chamber, and by menaces, and various terrors, and such affrightments as might fall even upon men of constant resolutions, did induce, cause, and compel them severally to answer certain questions there propounded, on the behalf of the king; concerning the laws of his kingdom, besides, and against their will, and otherwise than they would have answered, had they been at liberty and unforced. By colour of which answers, the said king purposed to have proceeded afterwards to the destruction of Thomas duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, and other lords, against whose deeds and behaviour the said king was much incensed, chiefly because they desired the said king to be under good guidance; but Providence withstanding it, by the resistance and power of the said lords, the king was not able to bring such his design to effect.—3. When the lords temporal defending themselves, had withstood his malice and fraud, and the said king had prefixed a day for holding his parliament to do them and other inhabitants of the realm, justice in that behalf, and the said temporal lords were quietly and peaceably gone home, and at rest in their houses, in hope and confidence of the said parliament, the king secretly sent the duke of Ireland with his letters and standard towards Chester, and there gathered multitudes in arms, and caused them to rise against the said lords, the nobles of the kingdom, and servants of the state, publicly erecting his standard against the peace which he had sworn to keep. From whence slaughters of men, captivities, dissensions, and other infinite mischiefs, did ensue throughout the whole kingdom; by which act he became guilty of perjury.—4. Although the said king had in full parliament and by the assent thereof, pardoned the said duke of Gloucester, and earls of Arundel and Warwick, and all their assistants, and others, all offences; and had for many years shewn signs of peace and love, to the said duke and earls, and to the rest appeared with a pleasant and benign countenance. Yet the said king always and continually bearing gall in his heart, did at last, taking an opportunity, cause the said duke of Gloucester, the uncle of him, the said king, and also the son of Edward the late king of England, of happy memory, and constable of England, then humbly going to meet the said king, in solemn procession; and the said earls of Arundel, and Warwick, to be taken and arrested; and him the said duke out of the kingdom of England, to the town of Calais, did cause to be led, and there imprisoned, and under the custody of the earl of Nottingham, one of the appellors of the said duke, detained, and without answer, or any lawful process whatsoever, did inhumanly and cruelly cause to be suffocated, strangled, and murdered. And the earl of Arundel, though he pleaded as well the general pardon, as a pardon afterwards to him specially granted, and desired justice to be done him, yet in his parliament encompassed with armed men, and innumerable archers of the people by him gathered to that purpose by pressing, did damnably cause to be beheaded. And the earl of Warwick, and lord Cobham, did commit to perpetual imprisonment; wickedly and against justice, and the laws of his kingdom, and his express oath, confiscating their lands and tenements, as well fee-simple, as fee-tail, from them and their heirs, and giving the same to their appellors.—5. At the same time, that the king in his parliament caused the duke of Gloucester, and earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be adjudged, that he might more freely exercise his cruelty upon them, and accomplish his injurious will in other matters, he gathered to himself a great multitude of malefactors of the county of Chester; of whom some passing with the king through the kingdom, as well within the king's palace as without, did cruelly kill the liege subjects of the kingdom, and some they beat and wounded, and did plunder the goods of the people, and refuse to pay for their victuals, and did ravish and violate their wives, and other women; and though there were grievous complaints, of such their excesses, brought to the hearing of the said king, yet the said king did not regard to cause justice to be done, or any remedy thereupon, but did favour the said troops in such their evil-doings, trusting in them and their guard, against all others of his kingdom; for which cause, the faithful people of his kingdom had great matter of commotion and indignation.—6. Although the said king by his writs, caused proclamation to be made throughout the whole kingdom, that he had caused his uncle the duke of Gloucester, and the earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be taken and arrested, not for any assemblings or troopings by them formerly made within the kingdom of England, but for very many extortions, oppressions, and other things by them afterwards done, and perpetrated, against his royalty, and kingly majesty; and that it was not his intention, that any of the family of the said duke, and earls, or of their followers at the time of such assembling, and trooping, should for that occasion be molested, or aggrieved; yet the said king, at last, in his parliament, did not impeach the said lords for extortions, oppressions, or any such matters, but for the assemblings and troopings aforesaid did adjudge them to death; and very many of the family of the said lords, and others, who were following them at the time of such their assembling, and trooping, he did, for fear of death, force to make fine and ransom, as traitors or rebels, to the great destruction of a great number of his people. And so he did subtly, fraudulently, and maliciously deceive the said lords, and their domestics, and the people of his kingdom.—7. After very many of those persons so making fine and ransom, had obtained of the king his letters patent of full pardon in the premises, they could not reap any commodity by such letters of pardon, till they had made new fines, and ransoms, for saving of their life, whereby very many were impoverished; which was a great derogation and dishonour to the name and state of a king.—8. In the last parliament held at Shrewsbury, the said king purposing to oppress his people, subtly procured, and caused it to be granted, "that the power of the parliament by the consent of the states of this kingdom, should remain in certain persons, to determine, after the dissolution of the parliament, certain petitions in the said parliament exhibited, but then not dispatched." By colour of which grant, the persons so deputed proceeded to other things generally touching that parliament. And this with the will of the king; in derogation of the state of parliament and the great damage of the whole kingdom, and pernicious example. And that they might seem to have some colour and authority for such their doings, the king caused the Parliament Rolls to be altered and blotted at his pleasure, against the effect of the said grant.—9. Notwithstanding the said king at his coronation had sworn, "that in all his judgments, he would cause to be done equal and right justice and discretion, in mercy and truth, according to his power;" yet the said king, rigorously, without all mercy, did, amongst other things, ordain, under grievous penalties, that none should sue for any favour, or intercede with the said king, for Henry duke of Lancaster being banished, whereby the said king did act against the bond of charity, rashly violating his oath aforesaid.—

10. Although the crown of the kingdom of England, and the rights of the said crown, and the kingdom itself, have in all time past been so free, that our lord the pope, nor any other without the kingdom, ought to concern himself about the same; yet the aforesaid king, for the corroboration of such his erroneous statutes, did make supplication to our lord the pope, that he would confirm the statutes ordained in his last parliament; whereupon our lord the pope granted his Apostolic Letters, in which grievous censures are denounced against any that should presume in any thing to act contrary to the said statutes; all which are well known to tend against the crown and royal dignity, and against the statutes and liberties of the said kingdom.—

11. Although the lord Henry, now duke of Lancaster, by the king's command, had preferred his bill touching the "State and Honour of the King" against the duke of Norfolk, and the same had duly prosecuted; so that, according to the king's order, he had exhibited himself in all points prepared for the combat; and the said king had declared, that the said duke of Lancaster had honourably performed his devoir as much as in him lay; and this by a decree publicly proclaimed before all the people assembled at the said combat: yet the said king, without any legal reason whatsoever, did cause and command the said duke to be banished for ten years, against all justice, and the laws and customs of this kingdom, and the law of war in that behalf, thereby damnably incurring perjury.—

12. After the said king had graciously granted by his letters patent, to the lord Henry, now duke of Lancaster, that in his absence, whilst he was banished, his general attorneys might prosecute for livery to him to be made of all manner of inheritance or successions belonging unto him; and that his homage should be respited, paying a certain reasonable fine; he injuriously did revoke the said letters patent, against the laws of the land, thereby incurring the crime of perjury.—

13. Notwithstanding that it was enacted, that every year the officers of the king, with his justices, and others of the king's council, should choose sheriffs for all the counties of England, and name them to our lord the king, according as to their discretion and conscience should seem expedient, for the good and utility of the kingdom, the said king hath caused persons to be made sheriffs, not so nominated or elected; but others, according to the caprices of his pleasure, sometimes his favourites or creatures, and sometimes such as he knew would not oppose his humour, for his own and others private advantage, to the great grievance of his people, and against the laws of his kingdom, thereby notoriously incurring perjury.—

14. At such time as the aforesaid king requested, and had of very many lords and others of his kingdom, divers sums of money by way of loan, to be paid against a certain term, notwithstanding the said king faithfully promised by his several letters patent to the several persons of whom he borrowed the said monies, that at the term limited as aforesaid, he would repay the same; yet he did not fulfil such his promise, nor are they yet satisfied the said monies, whereby such creditors are much aggrieved; and not only they, but many others of the kingdom, repute the king unfaithful.—

15. Whereas the king of England, by the revenue of his kingdom, and the patrimony belonging to his crown, is able to live honestly, without the oppression of his people, as long as the kingdom is not burdened with the charge of wars; yet the said king, in a manner, for his whole time, during the truces between the kingdom of England and its adversaries, hath not only given away a great, yea indeed the greatest part of the said patrimony, and this to unworthy persons; but also hath further imposed on his subjects so many burdens of money granted, as it were, every year of his reign, that thereby he hath extremely and too excessively oppressed his people, to the impoverishment of his kingdom; not converting the goods so levied to the commodity and profit of the kingdom of England, but prodigally squandering it away for the ostentation of his name, and in pomp and vain-glory; whilst great sums of money are owing in his kingdom, for the victuals of his household, and other things bought, though he hath abounded with riches and treasures more than any of his progenitors.—

16. The said king, not willing to keep or protect the just laws and customs of his kingdom, but according to his arbitrary will to do whatsoever should occur to his desires; sometimes, and very often, when the laws of his kingdom have been expounded and declared to him by the judges and others of his council, and that they have desired that he would do justice according to those laws, hath expressly and with an angry and haughty countenance said, "that his laws were in his mouth," and sometimes, "that they were in his breast," and that "he himself alone could make and change the laws of his kingdom." and being seduced with that opinion, did not suffer justice to be done to very many of his liege people, but by threats and terrors hath forced very many to cease from the prosecution of common justice.

17. That after certain statutes had been made in parliament, which always bind till they are specially revoked by the authority of another parliament, the said king, desiring to enjoy such liberty that no such statutes should so bind him, but that he might do and execute his pleasure, subtilly procured a petition to be preferred in parliament on behalf of the commonalty of his kingdom, and to be granted to him in general, "that he might be as free as any of his progenitors were before him." By colour of which petition and concession, the said king hath very often commanded very many things to be done against such statutes unrepealed; acting therein expressly and knowingly against his oath taken in coronation, as aforesaid.—18. Although it was enacted and ordained, that no sheriff should hold his office above one year together, but that 3 years should pass before he should be again admitted to that office; the said king Rd. sometimes for his own single commodity, and sometimes at the instance of others for their advantage, hath permitted and caused certain sheriffs to stand and remain continually in their offices, sometimes two, sometimes three years, against the tenor and effect of the statute aforesaid, thereby incurring perjury; and this is notorious, public, and generally ill spoken of.—19. Although by the statute and custom of his realm, in the calling together of every parliament, his people in the several counties of the kingdom ought to be free in choosing and deputing two knights to be present in such parliament, for each respective county, and to declare their grievances, and to prosecute such remedies thereupon, as to them shall seem expedient; yet the aforesaid king, that in his parliaments he might be able more freely to accomplish the effects of his head-strong will, did very often direct his commands to his sheriffs, that they should cause to come to his parliaments, as knights of the shire, certain persons by the said king named; which knights, being his favourites, he might lead, as often he had done; sometimes by various menaces and terrors, and sometimes by gifts, to consent to those things as were prejudicial to the kingdom, and exceedingly burdensome to the people; and especially to grant to the said king a subsidy on wool for the "term of his life," and another subsidy for certain years, thereby too grievously oppressing his people.—20. The said king, that he might more freely fulfil and follow in every thing his own arbitrary will, did unlawfully cause and command, that the sheriffs, throughout his whole realm, besides their ancient accustomed oath, should swear that they would obey all his commands, as often as they should be directed to them, under his great and privy seal, and also his letters under his signet; and that in case the said sheriffs should come to know that any within their bailiwicks, of whatsoever condition they were, had publicly or secretly said or spoken any ill, that might tend to the disgrace or scandal of his royal person, they should arrest and imprison them, there safely to be kept till they should receive command from the king to the contrary, as may be found in the record; which fact may probably tend to the destruction of many of the liege people of the said kingdom.—21. The said king, striving to trample under foot his people, and subtly to acquire their goods to himself, that he might abound in superfluous riches, did cause the people of seventeen counties of the realm to submit themselves to the king as traitors, by letters under their seals; by colour whereof he got mighty sums of money to be granted him, by the clergy and people of those counties, for obtaining his royal good-will and favour: and though, to please the people, the king had caused those obligatory letters to be restored; yet the procurators of the people, having full power granted them to oblige themselves and their heirs to the said king; he, the said king, caused them under their seals, to be bound to him in the name of the said people; and so deceived his people, and subtly extorted from them their goods.—22. Although the said king, at his coronation, had sworn to keep the liberties granted to the Church of England; yet the said king, by reason of his voyage into Ireland, did by his letters command very many religious persons, viz. abbots and priors of his kingdom, strictly requiring that some of them should send to him certain horses; and some of them not only horses, but also waggons and carriages for his said voyage, or in lieu thereof great sums of money in the said letters expressed: by which manner of writing, he forced many of such religious out of fear to fulfil his will and command; whereby they were heavily impoverished and oppressed, in manifest derogation of ecclesiastical liberty; by which pretext the said king did incur perjury.—23. In most of the great royal councils, when the lords of the realm, the judges and others, being charged that they would faithfully counsel the king in matters relating to his state and that of his kingdom; the said lords, justices, and others, very often in giving counsel, according to their best discretion, have been by the king suddenly and so fiercely chidden and reproved, that they have not dared to speak the truth, in giving their advice for the state of the king and kingdom.—24. The treasure, crowns, reliques, and other jewels, viz. the goods of the kingdom, which time out of mind have been repositied in the treasury of the kingdom, for the honour of the king, and preservation of his kingdom against any sudden event or exigency; the said king going out of his kingdom into Ireland, did take away, and caused the same to be carried with him "without the consent of the states of the kingdom:" whereby this kingdom had been vastly impoverished, if God by the retaking of the said goods against the said king's will had not otherwise provided. And furthermore the said king did cause the Rolls of Records touching the state and government of his kingdom to be destroyed and rased, to the great prejudice of his people, and disinheriting of the crown of the said kingdom: and all this, as it is probably believed, in favour and support of his evil governance.—25. The said king was wont, as it were perpetually, to be so variable and dissembling in his words and writings, and so contrary to himself, and especially in writing to the pope, and to kings, and other lords out of the kingdom, and within it, and also to others his subjects, that no man living that knew his conditions could or would confide in him; nay, he was reputed so unfaithful and unconstant, that it became scandalous not only to his own person, but also to the whole kingdom, and especially amongst foreigners of all the world who came to know the same.—26. Although the lands and tenements, the goods and chattels of every freeman, by the laws of the realm used from all time heretofore, ought not to be taken from him, unless they be forfeited: yet the said king purposing and longing to weaken such laws, in the presence of very many lords, and others of the commonalty of the kingdom, hath frequently said and affirmed, “That the life of every one of his subjects, and his lands, tenements, goods, and chattels, are his, the said king’s, at his will and pleasure, without any forfeiture.”—Which is utterly against the laws and customs of the kingdom aforesaid.—27. Although it was enacted and ordained, and is hitherto confirmed, that no freeman shall be taken, nor any way destroyed; and that the king shall not pass, nor send any to pass upon him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the laws of the land: yet by the will, command and order of the said king, very many of his liege people being maliciously accused for having publicly or secretly said something that might tend to the dispraise, scandal, or disgrace of the person of the said king, have been taken and imprisoned, and brought before the constable and marshal of England in the court military, in which court the said liege people being accused would not be admitted to make any other answer, than that they were no way guilty, and would justify the same, and defend themselves by their bodies, and not otherwise; notwithstanding their appellors were young men, stout and lusty, and those so accused, ancient and impotent, maimed or infirm; whereby not only destruction of the lords and grantees of the kingdom, but also of all and singular persons of the commonalty of the same may probably ensue: since therefore the said king hath wilfully acted contrary to such a statute of this kingdom, ’tis not to be doubted but he hath thereby incurred the crime of perjury.—28. Although the people of the realm of England, by virtue of their legiance, are fully enough bound to their king; and the said king, by the laws and customs of his kingdom, is enabled to correct and punish his people, if in any kind they transgress; yet the said king desiring to trample on, and too much oppress his people, that he might the more freely execute and follow the humour of his foolish and unlawful will, by his letters to all the counties of his kingdome, did enjoin and command, that all his subjects, as well spiritual as temporal, should take certain oaths in general, which were too grievous to them, and which might probably cause the final destruction of his people; and that they should confirm such their oaths under their letters and seals. To which royal command, the people of his kingdom did submit and pay obedience, that they might not incur his indignation or displeasure, and also for fear of death.—29. When parties contending in the ecclesiastical court in causes merely ecclesiastical and spiritual, had endeavoured to obtain from the chancellor of England, prohibitions to hinder the lawful process in the said courts, and the said chancellor had justly refused to grant the same: yet the said king by letters under his signet, has frequently prohibited the ecclesiastical judges to proceed in such causes, thereby evilly infringing the liberties of the church in the Grand Charter approved, to the conservation whereof he was sworn, and damnably incurring perjury, and the sentence of excommunication against such violaters thereof by the holy fathers pronounced.—30. The said king without any reasonable or lawful cause whatsoever, or any other process of law, did in his parliament encompassed in warlike manner by armed men, adjudge Thomas of Arundel, lord archbishop of Canterbury, (primate of all England, his spiritual father, absenting himself by the treacherous counsel of the said king) to banishment, against the laws of his kingdom, so by him sworn to as aforesaid.—31. By inspection of the testament of the said king, sealed with the great and privy seal, and also with his signet, among other things there is contained this clause or article. “Item, we will that the residue of our gold, (the true debts of our household, chamber and wardrobe, being paid, for payment whereof we bequeath 20,000 marks, reserving to our executors, 5 or 6000 marks; which we will by them to be expended towards the more plentiful maintenance of the lepers, and chaplains, to celebrate before them, by us founded at Westminster and Bermondsey,) shall remain to our successor, provided always that he approve, ratify and confirm, and hold, and cause to be holden, and firmly observed, all and singular the statutes, ordinances, and judgments, made, given, and rendered in our parliament begun at Westminster the 17th of Sept. in the 21st year of our reign, and in the same parliament continued at Shrewsbury, and there holden; and also all the ordinances, judgments, and establishments, of the 16th Sept. in the 22d of our reign, at Coventry; and afterwards at Westminster, the 8th of March, in the year aforesaid, by the authority of the said parliament, and likewise all other ordinances and judgments, which shall hereafter happen to be made by authority of the said parliament. But otherwise, if our said successor shall refuse to perform the premises, (which we do not believe) then we will that Thomas duke of Surrey, Edward duke of Albemarle, John duke of Exeter, and William le Scroop earl of Wiltshire, paying first the debts of our household, our chamber, and our wardrobe, and reserving 5 or 6000 marks, as aforesaid, shall have and hold all the said residue abovementioned; for to support and defend the said statutes, establishments, ordinances and judgments, to their utmost power, even unto death, if it be necessary; upon all which, and every part, we do hereby charge and burden their consciences as they will answer in the day of judgment." By which article it may evidently enough appear, that the said king did obstinately strive to maintain and defend those statutes and ordinances, which are erroneous and unjust, and repugnant to all law and reason. And this not only during his life, but after his death too; neither regarding the peril of his own soul, nor yet the utter destruction of his said kingdom or liege people.—32. In the 11th year of the said king Richard he the said king, in the chapel of his manor of Langley, in the presence of the dukes of Lancaster and York, and very many other lords, desiring, as it hath appeared, that his uncle the duke of Gloucester, then there present, should fully confide in the good will of him the said king; did voluntarily and of his own accord, swear before the venerable Sacrament of the Lord's body there placed, upon the altar, that thenceforwards he would never endamage, trouble, or grieve him, the said duke of Gloucester, for any of his deeds which were said to have been committed against the person of him the said king, but did cheerfully and totally forgive him all his offences, if any were. Yet afterwards, notwithstanding such oath, the said king did horribly and cruelly cause the said duke to be murdered, for such the before pretended offences, thereby incurring the guilt of damnable perjury.—33. After one of the knights of the shires of the said kingdom, having a voice in parliament, had impeached the said Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, upon certain defaults, committed against the king's majesty, as was untruly suggested; and the said archbishop presently then and there offered himself ready to answer the matters charged upon him; and desired that he might be thereunto admitted by the king, not doubting, as he said, but he should be able sufficiently to shew his innocence: yet the said king, contriving by all the ways and means he could, to oppress the said archbishop of Canterbury, and ruin his estate, as the event of the matter has declared, speaking graciously, and with a cheerful countenance, to the said archbishop, from his royal seat, did advise, and very earnestly request him, that at that time, he would hold his peace, and expect a better and more fit time to make his defence; which day being passed, the said king from day to day, for five days or more, did fraudulently and treacherously deceive the said archbishop, counselling him, and persuading him, that he should not come to the parliament but wait at home without any fear; because, as the said king faithfully did promise him, there should not in his absence any loss or prejudice be done or happen to him. Notwithstanding all which, the said king, in his parliament aforesaid, did in the mean time, adjudge the said archbishop to be banished, during the king's pleasure, though absent, and never any way called to answer, and without any reasonable cause whatsoever; and also voluntarily, against the laws of the kingdom and all justice, confiscated all his goods, whereby he likewise became guilty of perjury. But furthermore, the said king being willing to palliate his malice and subtilty, by flattering discourses which he oftentimes had with the said archbishop, did endeavour to clear himself of such injury done, and make as if it were the doings of others; insomuch that the archbishop discoursing with the king, and with the duke of Norfolk, and other lords, and great men of the kingdom; happened to say, by way of lamenting his own condition, "That he was not the first that had suffered banishment, nor should he be the last; for he thought in a short time the duke of Norfolk, and other lords would follow him; and confidently averred to the king, that all the rigour of these proceedings would finally be returned back on his own head." To which the said king, as astonished, hastily replied, "That he verily thought it might so happen; and that he himself might and indeed ought to be expelled his kingdom by his liege people." And further, the said king said, "That if the same should happen, he would convey himself to the same place, where the said archbishop should be." And that the archbishop might the rather credit his words, he shewed him a certain great jewel, curiously formed, underneath the skirt of his outward vestment; intimating for certain, to the said archbishop, that whenever he should send that jewel for a token, he would not delay to come thither, where the said archbishop should be resident: and that the said archbishop might more confide in him, the said king sent to him, advising him, that he should privately send all his jewels, and other things of value, belonging to his chapel, unto him the said king, for the safe keeping thereof; lest by colour of the before-mentioned judgment, any one should wrongfully seize the same. Which, under the greatest confidence in the world, being done, the said king caused him to repose the said goods in certain coffers; and the said coffers to be locked up, and sealed by one of the archbishop's clerks; and keeping the said coffers by him, returned the keys thereof by the said clerk to the archbishop: yet afterwards, unknown to the said archbishop caused the said coffers to be broken open, and disposed of the goods therein, at his will and pleasure. Furthermore, the said king faithfully promised the said archbishop that if he would but repair to the port of Hampton, in order to go out of the realm, he would at last, by the intercession of the queen, yet him recalled. And if it should happen, that he the said archbishop should go out of the realm, he should without fail return into England, before Easter next following; nor should in any kind lose his archbishopric: and this he faithfully promised, swearing upon the cross of the late martyr St. Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, by him the said king corporally touched: all which promises notwithstanding, the said king forced the said archbishop to depart the realm; and forthwith transmitted special letters to the apostolical see, to have him translated. And so, and by other frauds, and deceitful tricks of the said king, the said archbishop being a well-meaning believing man, was subtilly circumvented."

After the recital of the foregoing Articles, the Record proceeds thus; "And because it seemed to all the estates of the realm, being asked their judgments thereupon, as well severally as jointly; that these causes of crimes and defaults were sufficient and notorious to depose the said king; considering also his own confession of his insufficiency, and other things contained in his said renunciation and cession, openly delivered; all the said states did unanimously consent, that ex abundanti, they should proceed unto a deposition of the said king for the greater security and tranquillity of the people, and benefit of the kingdom. Whereupon the said states and commons unanimously constituted, and publicly deputed certain commissioners, viz. the bishop of saint Asaph, the abbot of Glastonbury, the earl of Gloucester, the lord Berkeley, sir Thomas Erpyngham, and sir Thomas Grey, knights, and sir William Thirnyng, one of the justices, to pass such sentence of deposition; and to depose the said king Richard, from all kingly dignity, majesty, and honour, on the behalf and in the name, and by the authority of all the said states, as in like cases, from the ancient custom of the said kingdom had been observed. and forthwith the said commissioners taking upon themselves the burthen of the said commission, and sitting on a tribunal before the said royal chair of state, having first had some debate of the matter, did on the behalf, and in the name, and by the authority aforesaid, pass the said Sentence of Deposition, being reduced into writing; and caused such their sentence to be read and recited by the said bishop of Saint Asaph, their colleague, by the will and command of the rest of the said commissioners, in these words:—"In the name of God, amen. We John bishop of saint Asaph, John abbot of Glastonbury, Thomas earl of Gloucester, Thomas lord Berkeley, Thomas de Erpyngham, and Thomas Grey, knights, and William Thirnyng justice, commissioners specially deputed to the matters under-written, by the peers and lords spiritual and temporal of the kingdom of England, and the commons of the said kingdom, representing all the estates of the said realm, sitting in tribunal: and having considered the multiplied perjuries, cruelty, and very many other crimes of the said Richard, touching his government committed and perpetrated in his kingdoms and dominions aforesaid, during the time of his governance; all of them before the said states, openly and publicly propounded, exhibited, and recited: which have been and are so public, notorious, manifest, and scandalous, that they could not nor can be concealed with denial or excuse. And considering likewise the confession of the said Richard acknowledging and reputing, and truly, and of his own certain knowledge, judging himself to have been and to be utterly insufficient and unmeet for the rule and government of the said kingdoms and dominions, and their appurtenances, and for such his notorious demerits worthy to be deposed; as by him the said Richard was before declared, and by his will and command, published before the said states, and made known and exposed to them in the vulgar tongue; having already had diligent deliberation upon these things and all others, transacted in this affair before the said states and us, we do, on the behalf, and in the name, and by the authority to us in this matter committed, ex abundanti and for caution, pronounce, decree, and declare him the said Richard to have been, and to be unfit, unable, and utterly insufficient for, and unworthy of the rule and government of the said kingdoms, and the dominion, and rights, and appurtenances of the same; and for and by reason of the premises, to be deservedly deposed, of and from all royal dignity and honour, if any thing of such dignity and honour were yet remaining in him. And with the same caution we do depose him by this our definitive sentence in writing, expressly forbidding all and singular the lords, archbishops, bishops, and prelates, dukes, marquisses, earls, barons, knights, vassals, and valvasors, and other subjects, and liege people of the said kingdoms and dominion, and other places to the said kingdoms and dominion belonging, that henceforth none of them shall any way obey or regard the said Richard, as king or lord of the said kingdom and dominion.

"Furthermore, the said states willing that nothing should be wanting which might be of value, or ought to be required touching the premises, being severally interrogated thereupon, did constitute the same persons that were before nominated commissioners, to be their procurators, jointly and severally to resign and give back to the said king Richard the homage and fealty to him before made, and to intimate to him, if it should be requisite, all the premises touching such his deposition and renunciation. —And then presently, as soon as it appeared by the premises, and the occasion of them, that the crown of England, with its appurtenances, was vacant; the aforesaid Henry duke of Lancaster rising up from his place, and standing so erected as he might conveniently be seen by the people, and humbly fortifying himself with the sign of the cross on his forehead, and on his breast, having also first called upon the name of Christ, did claim the said kingdom, so vacant as aforesaid, with its crown and all its members and appurtenances; in this form of words in his mother tongue:—"In the name of Fader, Son, and Holy Ghost, I Henry of Lancaster, challenge this rewme of Ynglonde, and the crown with all the members, and the appurtenances, als I that am descendit, be right line of the blode, comyng fro the gude lord king Henry therde, and thorge that right that

' God of his graces hath sent mee, with helpe of my kyn, and of my frendes to recover it; the which rewme was in poynt to be ondore for default of governance, and undoyng of the gude laws.'—After which claim and challenge, as well the lords spiritual as temporal, and all the states there present, being severally and jointly interrogated, what they thought of that claim; the said states with the whole people, without any difficulty or delay, did unanimously consent that the said duke should reign over them. And forthwith, as the said king shewed to the states of the kingdom the signet of king Richard, delivered to him as a token of his will, that he should succeed him as aforesaid; the said archbishop taking the said king Henry by the right hand, led him to the royal chair of state; and after the said king, kneeling down before it, had prayed a little while, the said archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the archbishop of York, did place the said king, and cause him to sit in the said royal seat; and the people wonderfully shouting for joy. All by and by the said archbishop of Canterbury, having with much ado procured silence from the over-joyed multitude, made a short discourse, or oration in these words:—Vir dominabitur populo; ' A man shall reign over my people,' 1 Sam. ix. 17.—These are the words of the King of Kings, speaking to Samuel, and teaching him how a person should be qualified to rule, since the people desired to have a king given. And not unfitly may they be said of our lord the king, whom we behold this day; and if we but intimately consider these words, they afford us matter of great consolation; for God does not threaten us, as he did formerly his people by Isaiah, saying, Isaiah iii. ' I will make children to rule over them.' But according to his compassion, who in his wrath remembereth mercy, he hath visited his people, and now children no more, as heretofore, shall lord it over them; for the Lord saith to them, " a man shall rule." Of the late rules of this kingdom or any of them, one might have fitly said that of the apostle, Cor. xiii. ' I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child.' The apostle repeats it thrice. ' As a child I spake, I understood and thought.' As to speech, tis certain that a child is unconstant in speaking, he easily speaks true, and as easily false, is ready in words to promise, but what he promises he presently forgets. Now these are things very inconvenient and dangerous in a king; nor is it possible than any realm shall stand long in happiness where these conditions bear sway. But from such mischiefs a kingdom is freed, whose sceptre is swayed by a man, for it belongs to a man to set a watch before his tongue; and such is our present happiness, over whom not a child, but a man is set, and such an one, as I hope we may say of him, that in Eccles. ix. ' Blessed is the man that hath not erred with his tongue.' Then saith the apostle, ' I understood as a child: ' now a child relishes nothing but flatteries and pleasing things, and understands only baubles and trifls, and loves not one that argues according to truth, yea indeed hates him beyond all measure. But heretofore amongst us truth was trampled under foot, so that none durst speak it; and therefore tis plain and apparent enough, that he, that then reigned understood as a child. For a man is not addicted to such things, but understands wisdom, so that by the grace of God it may be said of him, as it is written Eccles. ix. ' Blessed is the man that abideth in wisdom.' For as a child is delighted in vanity, so a man has regard to truth and wisdom. Truth therefore shall enter and vanity depart, which has done so much mischief in our nation; for now a man shall rule, who seeks after truth, and not vanity or flattery. Thirdly, it is said, I thought as a child, for a child thinks and studies only how to have his humour and do things according to his own will, and not according to reason; therefore when a child reigns, there only self-will reign, and reason is banished, and constancy is put to flight, and great danger ensues; from which danger we are delivered, for a man shall rule over us; to wit, one that speaks not like a child; but thus as one that has the perfection of reason.—' I come not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me; ' to wit, of God; and therefore of such a man we will say not only that he will abide in wisdom, but also that as a man, not a child, he will meditate on the circumspection of God; that is, he will every way diligently observe that God's will, not his own, be done; and so in the stead of a child wantoning in foolish stubborn humours, a man shall reign, and such a man that it shall be said of him—a king shall reign in wisdom, and he shall execute judgment, and do justice in the earth."

Henry's Declaration of Thanks.

Which harangue being ended, the said lord king Henry, to appease the minds of his subjects, did then and there utter these words:

" Sirs, I thank God and zowe spiritual and temporal, and all the states of the lond, and do zowe to wyte, it es noight my will that no man thyne that be way of conquest I wold disherit any man of his heritage, franchises, or other ryghts that hym oght to have, no put hym out of that that he has, and has had by the gude laws and customs of the rewme: except those persons that has been agan the gude purpose and the commune profit of the rewme."

And forthwith considering, that by the former vacancy of the royal throne, by the Cession and Deposition aforesaid, all power of justices, sheriffs, and other officers, throughout the kingdom, was ceased: therefore, to the end that there might be no failure nor delay in the administration of justice, to the grievance of the people, he caused principal officers and justices to be made and sworn to him with the usual oaths. And it was immediately proclaimed by the king's command, that on Monday next, after the said feast of St. Michael, a parliament should be held. And that on the Monday following, should be the coronation of the said king at Westminster, and that all those that could claim any service in the said coronation should come to the White-hall of the palace, before the steward, constable, and marshal of England, on Saturday next, before the day of the said parliament to make their just demands in that behalf, and receive right therein. But as for the shortening the day assigned to the parliament there was a Protestation made by the king, 'That it was not his intent that thereby any prejudice should be brought upon the states of his kingdom; nor that the same for the future should be drawn into example; but that such abbreviation of time was only made for the benefit and profit of the kingdom, and especially to save the labour and expences of several of his people, and that the grievances of the people might be the sooner remedied.' After which the king arising from his royal throne, and beholding the people with a cheerful and benign countenance, retired himself from thence, all the people rejoicing. And the same day, in the Whitehall aforesaid, made a solemn feast to the nobles and gentry, there in a vast multitude assembled.

And afterwards, viz. on Wednesday next following, the before-named Procurators so deputed as aforesaid, did, according as they were commanded, repair into the presence of the said late king Richard, being within the Tower aforesaid; and the said sir William Thirnyng the justice, for himself and his companions and fellow procurators, in the name of all the states and people aforesaid, did notify and fully declare unto the said Richard, their admission of his said Renunciation, and the manner, cause, and form of such sentence of Deposition, and presently did resign and give back to the said late king Richard, the homage and fealty formerly to him made as aforesaid. With these words:—

"The Words which William Thirnyng spake to monsire Richard, late king of England, at the Tower of London, in his chamber, on Wednesday next after the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, were as follow :

"Sire, it is wele know to zow, that ther was a parlement somoun'd of all the states of the reume for to be at Westmynstre, and to begin on the Tuesday in the morn of the fest of St. Michel the Archangel, that was zesterday; by cause of the which summons all the states of this lond were there gadyr'd, the which states hole made the same persunes that ben couen here to zowe now, her procurators, and gaven hem full autorite and power, and charged hem for to say the words that we shall say to zowe in her name, and on their behalve; that is to wyttyn, the bishop of Seint Assa for ersbishops and bishoppes, the abbot of Glastenbury for abbots and priours, and all other men of holy chirche, seculars and rewclers, the earle of Gloucestre for dukes and erls, the lord of Berkeley for barons and banerettes, sir Thomas Ippyngham, chamberleyn, for all the bachilers and commons of this lond be south; sir Thomas Grey for all the bachilers and commons by north, and my felawe Johan Markham and me fur to come with hem for all thes states. And so, sire, these words, and the doing that we shall say to zowe, is not onlych our wordes but the doyngs of all the states of this lond, and our charge in her name.—And he answered and said, that he wyste wele that he wold nought say but as we were charged.—Sire, ze remembre zowe wele that on Moneday in the fest of Seint Michel the archaungel, ryght here in this chamber, and in what presence ze renounced and cessed of the state of kyng and of lordship, and of all the dignite and wyrship that longed thereto, and assoiled all zour leiges of her leigance and obeisance that longed to zowe uppe the fourne that is contened in the same renunciation and cession, which ze redde zour self by zour mouth, and affirmed it by zour othe, and by zour owne writing. Upon which ze made and ordeined your procurators the ersbishop of Zork and the bishop of Hereford for to notify and declare in zour name thes renunciation and cession at Westmynstre to all the states, and all the people that was there gadyr'd, bycause of the summons aforesaid, the which thus don yesterday by thes lords zour procuratours, and wele herde and understouden, thes renunciation and cession were pleinelich and frelich accepted, and fullich agreed by all the states and people aforesaid. And over this, sire, at the instance of all thes states and people, there ware certain articles of defautes in zour governance zedde there, and tho wele herd and pleinelich understouden to all the states foresaid, hem thought hem so trewe, and so notorie, and knowen, that by tho causes and by no other, as thei sayd, and havyn consideration to zour own wordes in zour own renunciation and cession, that ze were not worthy, no sufficient ne able for to governe, for zour owne demerites, as it is more pleinelich contened therein; hem thought that was resonable and cause fur to depose zow, and her commissaries that they made and ordein'd, os it is of record, ther declared and decrred and adjudged zow for to be deposed, and pryed zowe of the astate of king, and of the lordship contened in the renunciation and cession forsaid, and of all the dignite and wyrshippe, and of all the administration that longed thereto. And we procurators to all thes states and people forsaid os we be charged by hem, and by her autorite gyffen us, and in her name zelde zow uppe for all the states and people forsaid, homage, leige and feaute, and all leigance, and all other bondes, charges, and services thar long thereto, and that non of all thes states and people fro thys tyne forward ne bere zowe feyth, ne do zowe obeisance os to that king.—And he answered and seyde, that he loked not ther after, but he seyde, that after all this he hoped that is cosyne wolde be gude lord to hym."

Richard's Speech to the Committee.

So far the Record. Sir John Hayward tells us that when the committee appointed to receive Richard's resignation assembled at the Tower for that purpose, the day before the parliament was to begin, the unhappy monarch was brought forth, apparelled in his royal robe, the diadem on his head and the scepter in his hand; and was placed amongst them in a chair of state. He adds, that after a little pause and expectation, the king arose from his seat, and spake to the assembly these words, or the very like in effect:

"I assure myself that some at this present, and many hereafter, will account my case lamentable; either that I have deserved this dejection, if it be just; or if it be wrongful, that I could not avoid it. Indeed I do confess, that many times I have shewed myself both less provident and less painful for the benefit of the commonwealth, than I should, or might, or intended to do hereafter; and have in many actions more respected the satisfying of my own particular humour, than either justice to some private persons, or the common good of all; yet I did not at any time either omit duty or commit grievance, upon natural dulness or set malice; but partly by abuse of corrupt counsellors, partly by error of my youthful judgment. And now the remembrance of these oversights is so unpleasant to no man as to myself; and the rather because I have no means left, either to recompence the injuries which I have done, or to testify to the world my reformed affections, which experience and stayedness of years had already corrected, and would daily have framed to more perfection. But whether all the imputations wherewith I am charged be true, either in substance, or in such quality as they are laid; or whether, being true, they be so heinous as to enforce these extremities; or whether any other prince, especially in the heat of youth, and in the space of 22 years, the time of my unfortunate reign, doth not sometimes, either for advantage, or upon displeasure, in as deep manner grieve some particular subject, I will not now examine: it helpeth not to use defence, neither booteth it to make complaint; there is no place left for the one, nor pity for the other: and therefore I refer it to the judgment of God, and your less distempered considerations. I accuse no man, I blame no fortune, I complain of nothing; I have no pleasure in such vain and needless comforts; and if I listed to have stood upon terms, I know I have great favourers abroad; and some friends, I hope, at home, who would have been ready, yea forward on my behalf, to set up a bloody and doubtful war; but I esteeme not my dignity at so high a price, as the hazard of so great valour, the spilling of so much English blood, and the spoil and waste of so flourishing a realm, as thereby might have been occasioned. Therefore, that the commonwealth may rather rise by my fall, than I stand by the ruin thereof, I willingly yield to your desires; and am here come to dispossess myself of all public authority and title, and to make it free and lawful for you to create for your king, Henry duke of Lancaster, my cousin german, whom I know to be as worthy to take that place, as I see you willing to give it to him."

Richard's Imprisonment and Death.

A very important affair still remained, concerning which the king was desirous to have the advice of the parliament before they broke up. The commons, not satisfied with the bare deposing of Richard, after a very irregular manner, would have had him tried in form, and petitioned the king for that purpose. (a) It was therefore to know how Richard was to be disposed of, that the king wanted the advice of the two houses. The archbishop of Canterbury, who was charged with his orders, having exacted an oath of secrecy from all the members, made the first motion. It may well be thought that Richard had not many friends in the house, and if any disapproved of the proceedings against him, they were too much awed to venture to speak in his behalf. There was one however bold enough to say publicly, what others only thought, namely, Thomas Merks, bishop of Carlisle, who, without regarding the motives which might induce him, as well as the rest of Richard's friends, to keep silence, made a long speech, wherein he alledged every thing that could with any plausibleness he said for the king deposed, and against the king on the throne.—The bishop undertook to prove three things. "First, that there was no authority which could lawfully depose a king of England. Secondly, that the offences Richard was accused of, deserved not deposition, and besides were not proved. Thirdly, that the crown was unjustly adjudged to the duke of Lancaster.—He enlarged very much on the first, showing the great difference between the several kinds of government established in the world. He confessed that in some, the prince or head might be deposed, because the supreme authority was not solely lodged in his person, but the people, or noble, had a share. Of this sort he reckoned the republics, the ancient government of Rome, the empire of Germany, the kingdoms of Swedeland and Denmark, the earldom of Flanders, and some other states. But he maintained, it was otherwise in the governments where the supreme authority resides in the single person of the sovereign. In this class, he ranked the kingdom of Israel, among the ancients, with the three first empires; and among the moderns, England, France, Spain, Scotland, Muscovy, Turkey, Persia, and in general all the kingdoms of Asia and Africa. With regard to these he alledged, that though the vices of a sovereign should be not only detrimental, but even intolerable to his subjects, he could not be lawfully deposed by any means whatever: that force could not be used, without incurring the crime of rebellion and treason; and much less authority, since there was not in the state any lawful authority but what was derived from him. He produced arguments and precedents from the holy scriptures and prophane authors, which cannot be repeated without being excessively tedious.—Upon the second Article, he boldly asserted, 'That the crimes for which Richard was deposed, were either false or aggravated; that indeed, he might be guilty of some errors or oversights, but his faults could not be styled tyranny: that if his failings afforded just cause to depose him, how many sovereigns would daily be treated as tyrants, and deposed by their subjects? every tax, execution of rebels, in a word, whatever was not relished by the people, would furnish a pretence to dethrone the most lawful prince. He passed over the more slightly the proofs of this second head, as the parliament itself seemed to question the truth of the crimes alledged against Richard, since there was no step taken to prove them in a legal manner. By the way, it is very likely that for fear of this reproach, the commons wanted to proceed in form against the deposed king.—Upon the third Article the bishop maintained, 'that even supposing Richard guilty, and granting the nation had authority to depose him, there was not the least colour of justice to give the crown to the duke of Lancaster. That if the duke was the true heir of Richard, as he pretended, he must wait his death before he could inherit. But that it was known to all there was a nearer heir, whose father was declared successor of Richard by act of parliament.' As for Henry's pretended right from Edmund Crouchback, son of Henry 3, the bishop disdained to consider it, affirming, 'he was very certain, that people of sense were ashamed of a right, built upon so slender a foundation.'—After that the orator proceeded to examine the other two titles contained in the king's proclamation, namely, conquest and Richard's resignation. To the first he said, 'That a subject could never pretend to a right of conquest against his sovereign, since the victory itself was high and heinous treason.' As for the resignation, he said, 'it was not only extorted by force, but supposing it voluntary, could be of no validity: that in Richard's situation, it was not in his power to make a valid act: that besides, since by the laws of the land the king could not alienate the crown jewels, much less surely could he give away the crown itself.' Then he spoke of the general consent of the people, though Henry had not thought proper to insist upon it, 'That the kingdom of England having never been elective, it was ridiculous to ascribe to the people the power of disposing of the crown.' Lastly, he replied to the objection, which might be alledged from the deposing of Edward 2. 'That wise men must be guided by law, and not by examples and precedents. That however, the deposing of Edward 2, was no more to be urged, than the poisoning of king John, or the murder of any other prince: but even in the deposing of Edward 2 care was taken to preserve the rights of the lawful successor.' What the bishop had hitherto said, might pass for reasons to question whether Richard 2, could be lawfully deposed. At most, it might be considered as the private opinion of the speaker. But towards the conclusion of his speech, he launched out strangely against Henry, and expressed a passion very injurious to the reasons he had alledged. He said, 'It was to be feared the people of England would soon find themselves in the case of Æsop's frogs, boldly adding, as long as Richard was alive, the English could not with justice own any other sovereign. In fine, he maintained, that the person whom they called king had committed much more heinous crimes than those for which Richard was deposed: that he had, after his banishment, entered the kingdom, contrary to his oath, and without being legally recalled: that, not content with disturbing the quiet of the land, by an unjust and impious insurrection against his sovereign, he had moreover dispossessed him: that he had also demanded judgment against him, without offering to prove his accusation, or permitting the party accused to make his defence, contrary to the express laws of the realm.' He concluded with saying, 'That if the wrong done Richard was not capable of moving the hearts of the English, at least their common and manifest danger ought to stop the course of these violent proceedings.' (b)

This Speech produced not the effect the Speaker expected. It was so unseasonable, that, supposing the majority had been of his mind, it was impossible to recede from what had been done. But most of the members persisted in the same maxims they had followed when Richard was deposed. Accordingly, the bishop reaped no other fruit from his harangue than to be confined in the abbey of Saint Albans, from whence, however, he was shortly released without further punishment (c).—The bishop of Carlisle's opinion being unanimously rejected, the parliament came, with regard to Richard, to a resolution seemingly so extraordinary, that there is some reason to suspect that history is defective in this place. However, all the historians agree, that it was resolved, Richard should be kept in confinement during life, with a princely allowance: but in case any person should attempt his deliverance, Richard should be the first that should suffer death. If this be true, it cannot be denied that he was really condemned to die, since his life was only granted him on a condition not in his power. Besides, such a condition cannot be annexed to the sentence of a criminal, but on supposition that he is already condemned.

There is some diversity among the historians concerning the manner of Richard's death, though all agree it was unnatural. Some affirm he was starved to death. Others, pretending to be better informed, relate his death with these circumstances. After the troubles were appeased, by the death of the principal conspirators, sir Piers Exton (d) came to Pontefract, with eight attendants. On the day of his arrival, Richard perceived at dinner, that the victuals were not tasted as usual. He asked the reason of the taster, and upon his telling him that Exton had brought an order forth from the king, took up a carved knife, and struck him on the face, Exton coming in, with his eight attendants, at the noise, Richard found he was a lost man, and resolving to sell his life dearly, wrung a pole axe out of one of their hands, and defended himself so bravely, that he slew four of them. But at length, standing accidentally near Exton, who was got upon a chair, the villain discharged such a blow on his head, as laid him dead at his feet. (e)

(e) This is Fabian's account. Walsingham says, he fasted himself to death for grief, at the miscarriage of the plot, and died on Feb. 14. p. 363. Stow says, he was kept fifteen days together in hunger, thirst, and cold, till he

Thus died this unfortunate prince, thirty three years old, of which he had reigned twenty-two. (f) A melancholy reward for the many signal services his father had done England! he was carried to London in a coffin, with his face uncovered, to be seen of all persons. His funeral was solemnized at Saint Paul's, the king himself being present. After that, he was carried to Langley abbey, and buried (g) without any ceremony. Henry 5 ordered his body to be removed to Westminster abbey, and laid among his ancestors (h). Though it was reported all over the kingdom, that he was murdered, no inquiry was made. This neglect confirmed the people in their belief, that the king was not innocent. Indeed, if Richard had died a natural death, it would have been necessary to undeceive the public. But if his life was taken away by violence, it was difficult to do it without the king's knowledge (i).

died, p. 325. Polydore Virgil says, he was not suffered to touch or taste the victuals which lay before him. Hector Boethius will have it, that Richard fled in disguise into Scotland, where giving himself up wholly to contemplation, he lived and died, and was buried at Sterling. Perhaps this was true of some counterfeit Richard.

16. Proceedings against JOHN HALL for the Murder of Thomas Duke of Gloucester, 1 Hen. IV. A. D. 1399. [Hollingshed. Cotton. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 283.]

THE last thing which we shall mention in the proceedings of this parliament is some farther enquiry made there in relation to the murder of Thomas duke of Gloucester. Sir John Baggot, then a prisoner in the Tower, was brought to the bar of the house of commons, and examined on the affair of that Murder; who there declared, in a bill, then delivered in, "That it was by the advice and instigation of the duke of Albemarle, that the lords were apprehended by the king, and that the duke of Gloucester was inhumanely murdered at Calais. That the duke of Norfolk did keep the duke of Gloucester alive three weeks against the king's will; but for fear of the king's displeasure, the said duke and himself, with several of the king's servants, went over to Calais, and saw him put to death." After this Declaration was openly read, the duke of Albemarle rose up and said, "That he utterly denied the charge to be true against him, and offered to justify his innocence by combat, in such manner as should be thought requisite." But Baggot, not being at liberty to accept the challenge, the lord Fitz-Walter, and twenty other lords, offered to make it good by their bodies, that he was the cause of the duke of Gloucester's death. The duke of Surrey stood up against the lord Fitz-Walter, and having affirmed that what the duke of Albemarle had done against the duke of Gloucester, was by constraint, he offered to vindicate him by fight; and all their hoods, which they flung down as pledges of their intentions, were delivered to the constable and marshal to be kept. But all these differences the king thought proper to accommodate, in a way more politic and more consistent with the exigency of the times, than suffering them to go on to a martial trial. Baggot, in one of his Examinations before the house, mentioned one John Hall, then a prisoner in Newgate, who could say much more than he, relating to the death of the duke of Gloucester. Which Hall, being sent for and examined, confessed the whole matter; whose Examination, Confession, and Sentence passed against him, being on the Rolls, we shall give from sir Robert Cotton's own account of it.

“ John Hall, a servant of the duke of Norfolk, being examined by sir Walter Clopton, chief justice, in full parliament, confessed upon his oath, that in the month of September, 21st Richard 2, the duke of Norfolk charged the said John among others, to murder the duke of Gloucester, there being present one John Colfox, an esquire of the said duke of Norfolk; and that they two then being at Calais, went together to Our Ladies church, where they found William Hemsley, esquire, as aforesaid, — Bradshaw, esquire, as aforesaid, William Servadlet, of the chamber of the late king Richard, Francis Vadlett, of the chamber of the duke of Albemarle; William Rogers, William Dennice, and — Cockle, servants to the said duke of Norfolk; all whom were sworn upon the body of Christ, before one sir William Chaplain, of saint George's, in the church of Our Lady, that they should not disclose the said fact or murder. That after this oath made, they altogether went with the duke of Norfolk, towards the house called the Princes Inn, and when they were come, the said duke of Norfolk caused the persons aforesaid to enter into a lodging within the same house, and so departed. After which John Lovetoft, with sundry other esquires, brought the duke of Gloucester, and delivered him to the said Searl and Francis, in an inner parlour, and said, ‘ There is Searl and Francis;’ whereupon the duke of Gloucester said, ‘ Now I see I shall do well,’ and so asked Searl how the king did? who said, ‘ well;’ and sent to him commendations, and so the said John Lovetoft departed. Whereupon the said Searl and Francis took the said duke of Gloucester into an upper chamber, saying, ‘ That they would speak with him;’ unto whom when they were come there, they said ‘ That the king's will was, that he should be slain;’ the duke answered thereto, ‘ If it be so it is welcome;’ that Searl and Francis willed the duke to take a chaplain, whom the duke there took, and was confessed. After which confession they caused the duke to lye upon a bed, upon whom so lying, the said Searl and Francis threw a feather-bed, the sides whereof the said William Rogers, Dennice, and Cockle of the chamber held; and Searl and Francis lay on the mouth of the said duke until he was dead; Colfox, Hemsley, and Bradshaw, sat that night by the duke on their knees, weeping, and praying for the soul of the said duke; and Hall, this examinant, kept the door until the duke was slain. After the death of which duke, the duke of Norfolk came in, and seeing him dead, said, ‘ It were a great matter to have the said duke living again.’ By whose confession it seemed to the lords, that he the said John Hall, had deserved a grievous death; whereupon they adjudged, by the assent of the king, that the same Hall should be drawn from Tower-Hill to Tyburn, his bowels to be burned before him, his body to be hanged, beheaded, and quartered, and his head to be sent and set upon Calnis, and his quarters at the king's pleasure; and the marshal the same day did execution accordingly.”

THE next yeere after, 1400, followed a parliament holden at Westminster: in which parliament one William Sautre, a good man and a faithfull priest, inflamed with zeale of true religion, required hee might bee heard for the commodity of the whole realme. But the matter being smelt before by the bishops, they obtained that the matter should bee referred to the conuocation; where the said William Sautre being brought before the bishops and notaries thereunto appointed, the conuocation was deferred to the Saturday next ensuing.— When Saturday was come, that is to say, the twelfth day of Februarie, Thomas Arundell archbishop of Canturburie, in the presence of his counsell prouincially, being assembled in the said Chapter-House, against one sir William Sautre, otherwise called Chatris chaplaine, personally then and there appearing by the commandement of the foresaid archbishop of Canturbury, objected; that the said sir William before the bishop of Norwich had once renounced and abiured diuers and sundry Conclusions hereticall and erroneous; and that after such aburation made, he publickly and priuily held, taught, and preached the same conclusions, or else such like, disagreeing to the catholike faith, and to the great perill and pernicious example of others. And after this he caused such like conclusions holden and preached, as is said, by the said sir William without renunciation, then and there to be read vnto the said archbishop, by master Robert Hall, chancellor vnto the said bishop, in a certaine scrole written, in tenor of words as followeth:

virgin in London, publicly and priuily doth hold these Conclusions vnder written.—Imprius, he saith, that he will not worship the crosse on which Christ suffered, but onely Christ that suffered vpon the crosse. 2. Item, that he would sooner worship a temporall king, than the foresaid wooden crosse. 3. Item, that he would rather worship the bodies of the saint, than the very crosse of Christ on which he hung, if it were before him. 4. Item, that he would rather worship a man truly contrite, than the crosse of Christ. 5. Item, that he is bound rather to worship a man that is predestinate, than an angell of God. 6. Item, that if any man would visite the monuments of Peter and Paul, or goe on pilgrimage to the tombe of saint Thomas, or else any whither else, for the obtaining of any temporall benefit; hee is not bound to keepe his vow, but hee may distribute the expences of his vow vpon the almes of the poore. 7. Item, that euery priest and deacon is more bound to preach the word of God, than to say the caonicall houres. 8. Item, that after the pronouncing of the sacramentall words of the bodie of Christ, the bread remaineth of the same nature that it was before, neither doth it cease to be bread.—To which Conclusions or Articles being thus read, the archbishop of Canturbury required the same sir William to answer. And then the said William asked a copie of such articles or conclusions, and a competent space to answer vnto the same. Whereupon the said archbishop commanded a copie of such articles or conclusions to bee deliuered then and there vnto the said sir William, assigning the Thursday then next ensuing to him to deliberate and make answer in. When Thursday the said day of appearance was come, master Nicolas Rishton, auditor of the causes and businesse belonging to the said archbishop (then being in the parliament house at Westminster, otherwise let) continued the said conuocation with all matters rising, depending, and appertinent thereunto, by commandement of the said bishop, vntill the next morrow at eight of the clocke. When the morrow came, being Friday, the foresaid sir William Sautre, in the chapter house before the said bishop and his councill prouinciall then and there assembled, making his personall appearance, exhibited a certain scrole, containing the Answeres vnto certaine articles or conclusions giuen vnto him, as is aforesaid, by the said bishop; and said, that vnto the foresaid archbishop he deliuered the same as his answer in that behalfe, vnder the tenor of such words as follow. “ I William Sautre, priest vnworthy, say and answer, that I will not, nor intend not to worship the crosse whereon Christ was crucified, but onely Christ that suffered vpon the crosse; so vnderstanding me, that I will not worship the materiall crosse or the grosse corporall matter: yet notwithstanding I will worship the same as a signe, token, and memoriall of the passion of Christ, adoratione vicaria. And that I will rather worship a temporall king, than the foresaid wooden crosse, and the materiall substance of the same. And that I will rather worship the bodies of saints, than the very crosse of Christ whereon he hung: with this addition, that if the very same crosse were afore mee as touching the materiall substance. And also, that I will rather worship a man truly confessed and penitent, than the crosse on which Christ hung as touching the materiall substance.—And that also I am bound, and will rather worship him whom I know to be predestinate, truly confessed and contrite, than an angell of God: for that the one is a man of the same nature with the humanity of Christ, and so is not a blessed angell. Notwithstanding I will worship both of them, according as the will of God is I should.—Also, that if any man hath made a vow to visit the shrines of the apostles Peter and Paul, or to goe on pilgrimage vnto saint Thomas tombe, or any whither else to obtaine any temporall benefit or commoditie; hee is not bound simple to keepe his vow vpon the necessitie of saluation; but hee may giue the expences of his vow in almes amongst the poore, by the prudent counsell of his superiour, as I suppose.—And also I say, that euery deacon and priest is more bound to preach the word of God, than to say the canonicall houres, according to the primitiue order of the church.—Also, touching the interrogation of the sacrament of the altar, I say, that, after the pronouncing of the sacramentall words of the body of Christ, there ceaseth not to be very bread simply, but remains bread, holy, true, and the bread of life; and I beleue the said sacrament to bee the very body of Christ, after the pronouncing of the sacramentall words.”

When all these Answeres were throughly by master Robert Hall directly and publickly there read, the foresaid archbishop of Canturbury inquired of the said sir William, whether hee had abiured the foresaid heresies and errors objected against him, as before is said, before the bishop of Norwich, or not; or else had reuoked and renounced the said or such like conclusions or articles, or not? To which he answered and affirmed that he had not. And then consequently (all other articles, conclusions, and answers aboue written immediatly omitted) the said archbishop examined the same sir William Sautre, especially vpon the sacrament of the altar.—First, whether in the sacrament of the altar after the pronouncing of the sacramentall words, remaineth very materiall bread, or not. Vnto which interrogation, the same sir William somewhat waueringly said, and answered, that hee knew not that. Notwithstanding, hee said, that there was very bread, because it was the bread of life which came downe from Heauen.—After that the said archbishop demanded of him, whether in the Sacrament after the sacramentall words, rightly pronounced of the priest, the same bread remaineth, which did before the words pronounced, or not. And to this question the foresaid William answered in like manner as before, saying, that there was bread, holy, true, and the bread of life, &c.—After that, the foresaid archbishop asked him, whether the same material bread before consecration, by the sacramentall words of the priest rightly pronounced, he transubstantiated from the nature of bread into the very body of Christ, or not? Whereunto sir William said, that he knew not what that matter meant.—And then the said archbishop assigned vnto the said sir William time to deliberate, and more fully to make his answer till the next day; and continued this conuocation then and there till the morrow, which morrow, to wit, the 19 day of Februarie being come, the foresaid archbishop of Canturbury, in the said Chapter-house of Saint Paul in London, before his councill prouinciall then and there assembled, specially asked and examined the same sir William Sautre there personally present vpon the Sacrament of the altar, as before. And the same sir William againe, in like maner as before, answered.—After this, amongst other things the said bishop demanded of the same William, if the same material bread being vpon the altar, after the sacramentall words being of the priest rightly pronounced, is transubstantiated into the very bodie of Christ, or not? And the said sir William said he vnderstood not what he meant.—Then the said archbishop demanded, whether that material bread being round and white, prepared and disposed for the Sacrament of the bodie of Christ vpon the altar, wanting nothing that is meete and requisite thereunto, by the vertue of the sacramentall words being of the priest rightly pronounced, bee altered and changed into the very body of Christ, and ceaseth any more to bee material and very bread, or not? Then the said sir William, deridingly answering, said, he could not tell.—Then consequently the said archbishop demanded, whether he would stand to the determination of the Holy Church or not, which affirmeth, that in the Sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration being rightly pronounced of the priest, the same bread, which before in nature was bread, ceaseth any more to be bread. To this interrogation the said sir William said, that hee would stand to the determination of the Church, where such determination was not contrary to the will of God.—This done, he demanded of him againe, what his iudgement was concerning the Sacrament of the altar: Who said and affirmed, that after the words of consecration, by the priest duly pronounced, remained very bread, and the same bread which was before the words spoken. And this examination about the Sacrament lasted from eight of the clocke of the same day vntil eleuen of the clocke, or thereabouts: in so much that during all this time the foresaid William would no otherwise answer, neither yet touching the same Sacrament receiue Catholike information, according to the institution of the popes church and his Christian faith. Wherefore the said Canturburie, by the counsell and assent of his whole couent then and there present, did promulgate and giue sentence, by the mouth of Robert Hall, against the same sir William Sautre (being personally present, and refusing to reuoke his heresies, that is to say, his true doctrine, but constantly defended the same) vnder the tenour of words as followeth.

The Sentence against W. Sautre.

“In the name of God, Amen. Wee Thomas by the grace of God archbishop of Canturbury, primate of England and legate of the sea apostolicall, by the authoritie of God almightie and blessed saint Peter and Paul, and of holy church, and by our owne authoritie sitting for tribunall or chief iudge, hauing God alone before our eyes, by the counsell and consent of the whole clergie our fellow brethren, and suffragans assistants vnto vs in this present councill prouinciall, by this our sentence definitiue do pronounce, decree, and declare by these presents thee William Sautre, otherwise called Chawtre, parish priest pretended, personally appearing before vs, in and vpon the crime of heresie iudicially and lawfully conuict, as an heretike, and as an heretike to be punished.”—Which Sentence definitive being thus read, the foresaid archbishop of Canturbury continued in the same prouinciall councill till Wednesday next and immediatly ensuing, to wit, the 24 day of the same month of Februarie: which being expired, the bishop of Norwich, according to the commandement of the said archbishop of Canturburie, presented vnto the foresaid William Sautre by a certain friend of his, being present at the same councill, a certaine processe inclosed and sealed with his seale, giuing the names of credible witnesses sealed with their seales; the tenor whereof followeth in this wise:

“Memorandum, that vpon the last day of April, in the yeere of our Lord, 1399, in the 7 indiction, and 10 yeere of the papacie of pope Boniface the 2, in a certaine chamber within the manor house of the said bishop of Norwich, at South Helingham (where the register of the said hishop is kept) before the 9 houre, in a certain chapell within the said manor situate, and the first day of May then next and immediatly ensuing, in the foresaid chamber sir W. Chawtris parish priest of the church of S. Margaret in the towne of Linne, appeared before the bishop of Norwich, in the presence of John de Derlington, archdeacon of Norwich, doctor of the decrees, frier Walter Disse, and John Rikingham, professors in diuinitie, William Carlton, doctor of both lawes, and William Friseby, with Hugh Bridham, publike notaries, and there publicly affirmed and held the conclusions, as before is specified.—All and singular the premises the foresaid William affirmeth vpon mature deliberation. And afterwards, to wit, the 19 day of May in the yeere, indiction, and papacie aforesaid, in the chapell within the manour house of the said Henrie bishop of Norwich situate at South Helingham, the foresaid sir William reuoked and renounced all and singular the foresaid his conclusions; abiuring and correcting all such heresies and errors, taking his oth vpon a booke before the foresaid Henrie the bishop of Norwich, that from that time forward hee would neuer preach, affirme, nor hold, priuily nor apertly, the foresaid conclusions; and that he would pronounce, according to the appointment of the said bishop, the foresaid conclusions to be erroneous and heresies in the parish churches of Linne, and Tilney, and in other places at the assignement of the said bishop: and farther sware, that hee would stand to the ordinance of the said bishop touching the premisses, in the presence of the discreet and worshipfull men afore-recited with diuers other moe.—As concerning the first conclusion, that he said he would not worship the crosse, &c. hee confessed himselfe to haue erred, and that the article was erroneous, and submitted himselfe. And as touching the second article, that he said he would rather worship a king, &c. he confessed himselfe to haue erred, and the article to be erroneous, and submitted himselfe, and so forth of all the rest.—Then next after this, vpon the 25 day of May in the yeere of our Lord afresaid, in the churchyard of the chappell of saint James within the towne of Linne, the foresaid William, in presence of the foresaid bishop and clergie, and the people of the said towne of Linne standing round about, publickly declared in the English tongue the foresaid conclusions to be erroneous and heresies, as was contained in a certaine scrole. After this, the 26 day of May in the yeere abouesaid, in the church of the hospitall of saint Johns in the towne of Linne, the said sir William, before the said bishop sitting as iudge, swore and tooke his oth vpon the holy Euangelists, that hee would neuer after that time preach openly and publickly the foresaid conclusions, nor would heare the confessions of any of the subiects of his diocesse of Norwich, without the speciall licence of the said bishop, &c. In the presence of frier John Smermen, M. John Rikinghall doctor of diuinitie, W. Carlton doctor of both lawes, and Thomas Bulton officer of the liberty of Linne afresaid, with diuers others.”

The tenor of the Scrole and Recantation.

“1. 2, Imprimis, touching the first and second, where I said that I would adore rather a temporall prince, and the liuely bodies of the saints, than the wooden crosse whereupon the Lord did hang, I doe reuoke and recant the same as being therein deceived.—3. To this I say, that the article is false and erroneous, and by false information I held it; the which I renounce and aske forgiveness thereof, and say, that it is a precious relique, and that I shall hold it while I liue, and that I swear here.—4. I know well that I erred wrongfully by false information: for I wot well, that a deacon or a priest is more bound to say his mattens and hours than to preach; for thereto he is bounden by right: wherefore I submit me, &c.—5. Touching that article, I know right well that I erred by false information. Wherefore I aske forgiveness.—6. As concerning voves, I say that opinion is false and erroneous, and by false information I held it; for a man is holden to hold his vow, &c.—7. To the 7 article I say, that I did it by authoritie of priesthood, where through I knowlege well that I haue guilt and trespassed: wherefore I submit me to God and to holy church, and to you father, swearing that I shall neuer hold it more.—8. To the 8, I say, that I held it by false and wrong information. But now I know well that it is heresie, and that bread, anon as the word of the sacrament is said, is no longer bread materiall, but that it is turned into very Christs bodie; and that I swear here. 9. I say, that this is false and erroneous, &c. 10. I say as I said, &c.”

This being done, the 22 of February afresaid in the yeere of our Lord 1400 in the Chapter-house of Saint Paul in London afresaid; the foresaid archbishop of Cantorbury, in the conuocation of his prelates and clergie and such like men there being present, caused the forerecited processe of the bishop of Norwich to bee read openly and publickly to sir William Sautre, otherwise called Chautris. And afterward he asked the said sir William, whether he plainely vnderstood and knew such processe and the contents within the same; and he said, Yea. And farther he demanded of him, if hee would or could say or obiect any thing against the processe; and he said, No. And after that incontinent, the foresaid archbishop of Canturburie demanded and obiected against the said sir William, as diuers others more did; that after hee had before the bishop of Norwich reuoked and abiured iudicially diuers errors and heresies, among other errors and heresies by him taught, holden and preached, he affirmed; that in the same Sacrament of the altar after the consecration made by the priest, as he taught, there remained materiall bread: which heresie amongst others as errors also hee abiured before the foresaid bishop of Norwich. Hereunto the foresaid William answered smiling or in mocking wise, saying, and denying that hee knew of the premisses. Notwithstanding hee publickly affirmed, that he held and taught the foresaid things after the date of the said processe made by the said bishop of Norwich, and that in the same councill also hee held the same. Then finally it was demanded of the said sir William, why he ought not to bee pronounced as a man fallen into heresie, and why they should not further proceede vnto his degradation according to the canonicall sanctions: whereunto he answered nothing, neither could he alledge any cause to the contrary.—Whereupon the foresaid archbishop of Canturbury by the counsell and consent of the whole councill, and especially by the counsell and assent of the reuerend fathers and bishops, as also priors, deanes, archdeacons, and other worshipfull doctors and clerkes then and there present in the councill, fully determined to proceed to the degradation, and actual deposing of the said William Sautre, as refallen into heresie and as incorrigible, according to the Sentence definitiue put in writing, the tenor whereof is in words as followeth. "In the name of God, amen. We Thomas by the grace of God archbishop of Canturbury, legate of the Sea apostolicall, and Metropolitan of all England, doe find and declare that thou William Sautre, otherwise called Chautris priest, by vs with the counsell and assent of all and singular our fellow brethren and whole clergie, by this our sentence definitiue declared in writing, hyst benee for heresie conuict and condemned, and art (being againe fallen into heresie) to be deposed and degraded by these presents."—And from that day being Wednesday there was in the said counsell prouinciall nothing further prosecuted, but was continued with all dependents till the Friday next ensuing. Which Friday approaching, master Nicholas Rishon, by the commaundement of the said archbishop of Canturbury, being then husied, as he said, in the parliament house, continued this counsell and conuocation with all incidents, dependents, and occasions, growing and annexed thereunto, to the next day, to wit, Saturday next and immediately after ensuing. Vpon Saturday, being the 26th of the said month of Februarie, the foresaid archbishop of Canturbury sate in the bishops seat of the foresaid church of St. Paul in London, and solemnly apparelled in his pontificall attire, sitting with him as his assistants these reuerend fathers and bishops, of London, Lincolne, Hereford, Exeter, Mrauenensis & Roffensis Episcopi, aboue mentioned, commanded and caused the said sir William Sautre, apparelled in priestly vestments, to be brought and appeare before him. That done, he declared and expounded in English to all the clergy and people there in a great multitude assembled; that all processe was finished and ended against the said sir William Sautre. Which thing finished, before the pronouncing of the said sentence of the relapse against the said sir William, as is premised, he often then and there recited and read. And for that hee saw the said William in that behalfe nothing abashed; hee proceeded to his degradation and actual deposition in forme as followeth.

"In nomine Patris, & Filij & Spiritus Sancti. We Thomas by Gods permission archbishop of Canturbury, primate of all England, and Legate of the apostolike sea, doe denounce thee William Sautre, otherwise called Chautris, chaplaine fained, in the habite and apparell of a priest, as an heretike, and one refallen into heresie, by this our sentence definitiue, by counsell, assent, and authoritie to be condemned; and by conclusion of all our fellow brethren, fellow bishops, prelates, counsell prouinciall, and of the whole clergie, doe degrade and depriue thee of thy priestly order. And in signe of degradation and actual deposition from thy priestly dignitie, for thine incorrigibilitie and want of amendment, we take from thee the patent and chalice, and doe depriue thee of all power and authority of celebrating the masse, and also wee pull from thy backe the casule, and take from thee the vestment, and depriue thee of all manner of priestly honor.—Also we Thomas the aforesaid archbishop by authoritie, counsell, and assent, which vpon the foresaid William we haue being deacon pretended, in the habit and apparell of a deacon, hauing the new Testament in thy hands, being an heretike, and twice fallen, condemned by sentence as is aforesaid, doe degrade and put thee from the order of a deacon. And in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition we take from thee the booke of the new Testament, and the stole, and doe depriue thee of all authoritie in reading of the gospell, and of all and all manner of dignitie of a deacon.—Item, we Thomas archbishop aforesaid, by authoritie, counsell, and assent, which ouer thee the foresaid William we haue, being a subdeacon pretended, in the habit and vestment of a subdeacon, an heretike, and twice fallen, condemned by sentence, as is aforesaid, doe degrade and put thee from the order of a subdeacon; and, in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, wee take from thee the albe and maniple, and do depriue thee of all and all manner of subdiaconicall dignitie.—Also, we Thomas archbishop aforesaid, by counsell, assent and authoritie which wee haue ouer thee the fore-said William, an acolyte pretended, wearing the habite of an acolyte, and heretike, twice fallen, by our sentence, as is aforesaid, condemned, doe degrade and put from thee all order of an acolyte; and in signe and token of this thy degradation, and actual deposition, we take from thee the candlestick and taper, and also vrcolum, and doe depriue thee of all and all manner dignitie of an acolyte.—Also we Thomas archbishop aforesaid, by assent, counsell, and authoritie, which vpon thee the foresaid William we haue, an exorcist pretended, in the habite of an exorcist or holy water clerke, being an heretike, twice fallen, and by our sentence as is aforesaid, condemned, doe degrade and depose thee from the order of an exorcist; and, in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, we take from thee the booke of conuocations, and doe depriue thee of all and singular dignitie of an exorcist.—Also, we Thomas archbishop aforesaid, by assent, counsell, and authoritie, as is aforesaid, do degrade and depose thee the foresaid William, reader pretended, clothed in the habite of a reader, an heretike, twice fallen, and by our sentence, as is aforesaid, condemned, from the order of a reader; and, in token of this thy degradation and actual deposition, we take from thee the booke of the diuine lections (that is, the booke of the church legend) and doe depriue thee of all and singular manner of dignitie of such a reader.—Item, we Thomas archbishop of Canturburie aforesaid, by authoritie, counsell, and assent, the which we haue, as is aforesaid, doe degrade, and put thee the foresaid William Sautre, sexton pretended, in the habite of a sexton, and wearing a surplice, being an heretike, twice fallen, by our sentence definitiue condemned, as aforesaid, from the order of a sexton: and, in token of this thy degradation and actuall deposition, for the causes aforesaid, wee take from thee the keyes of the church doore, and thy surplice, and do deprivue thee of all and singular manner of commodities of a doore keeper.—And also, by the authoritie of omnipotent God the father, the sonne, and holy Ghost, and by our authoritie, counsell, and assent of our whole counsell prouinciall aboute written, we doe degrade thee, and depose thee, being here personally present, before vs, from orders, benefices, priuiledges and habite in the church; and for thy pertinacie incorrigible wee doe degrade thee before the secular court of the high constable and marshall of England, being personally present; and doe depose thee from all and singular clerly honors and dignities whatsoever by these writings. Also, in token of thy degradation and deposition, here actually wee haue caused thy crowne and ecclesiasticall tonsure in our presence to be rased away, and utterly to be abolished, like vnto the forme of a secular lay man; and here we doe put vpon the head of thee the foresaid William the cap of a lay secular person; beseeching the court aforesaid, that they will receive fauourably the said William vnto them thus re-committed.—Thus William Sautre the seruant of Christ, being vterly thrust out of the popes kingdome, and metamorphosed from a clerke to a secular lay man, was committed (as ye haue heard) vnto the secular power. Which so done, the bishops, yet not herewith contented, cease not to call vpon the king, to cause him to be brought forth to speedie execution. Whereupon the king, readie enough and too much to gratifie the clergy, and to retaine their fauours, directeth out a terrible decree against the said William Sautre, and sent it to the maior and sheriffes of London to be put in execution; the tenor whereof here vnder ensueth.

The Decree of the King against William Sautre.

“The Decree of our soneraigne lord the King and his counsell in the parliament, against a certaine new sprung vp heretike. To the maior and sheriffes of London, &c. Whereas the reuerend father Thomas archbishop of Canturbury, primate of all England, and legat of the apostolike see, by the assent, consent, and counsell of other bishops, and his brethren suffragans, and also of all the whole clergie within his prouince or dioces, gathered together in his prouinciall counsell, the due order of the law being obserued in all points in this behalfe, hath pronounced and declared, by his definitiue sentence, William Sautre sometime chaplaine fallen againe into his most damnable heresie, the which beforetime the said William had abiured, thereupon to bee a most manifest heretike, and therefore hath decreed that he should bee degraded, and hath for the same cause really degraded him from all prerogatiue and priuiledge of the clergie, decreeing to leaue him vnto the secular power; and hath really so left him, according to the lawes and canonicall sanctions set forth in this behalfe, and also that our holy mother the church hath no further to doe in the premises; we therefore being zealous in religion, and reuerent louers of the catholike faith, willing and minding to maintaine and defend the holy church, and the lawes and liberties of the same, to route all such errors and heresies out of our kingdome of England, and with condigne punishment to correct and punish all heretikes or such as be conuict; provided alwayes that both according to the law of God and man, and the canonicall institutions in this behalfe accustomed, such heretikes conuict and condemned in forme aforesaid ought to be burned with fire: We commaund you as straitly as we may, or can, firmly enioyning you that you doe cause the said William, being in your custodie, in some publike or open place within the liberties of your citie aforesaid (the cause aforesaid being published vnto the people) to be put into the fire, and there in the same fire, really to bee burned, to the great horror of his offence, and the manifest example of other christians. Faile not in the execution hereof, vpon the peril that will fall thereupon: Teste rege, apud Westm. 26 Febr. an. regni. sui. 2do.”

Note. This writ De Heretico Comburendo, for burning Sautre seems to be a special act of parliament made for that purpose, being tested per Regem et concilium in parlamento, which is to be intended of an act of parliament, see 8 Coke's Rep. 19, a. Prince's case, 1 Hale's P. C. 396. 709.—The two first statutes relating to heresy are those here mentioned by Fox 5 R. 3. C. 5, enacting that sheriffs and other civil officers should apprehend and imprison persons suspected of heresy in order to their being tried by Holy Church, and 2 Henry 4. cap. 15. empowering every diocesan to imprison persons suspected of heresy in their respective dioceses, and try them (so that such diocesan proceeded judicially and openly against such persons), and where any person was convicted, he might be imprisoned at the discretion of the ordinary; or, if the party refused to abjure his errors, or having abjured them, relapsed, he was to be left to the secular arm; and the sheriff (whom the ordinary might call to be present at the trial) was to cause the party to be burnt in some high (or open) place.

The lord chief justice Brook (in his Abridgment, tit. Heresy) says, that upon this statute it was resolved, That if a person was convicted of heresy in the presence of the sheriff, the ordinary might commit him to the same sheriff, and he was to cause him to be burnt without the writ de Heretico comburendo; but if the sheriff was absent, or if the heretic was to be burnt in another county, in either of these cases the writ de Heretico comburendo must be first obtained before the sheriff could burn him.

Some authors have wondered why the writ, &c

Hæretico comburendo was issued for the burning of Sawtre, when by the last-mentioned act the sheriff was empowered to execute persons convicted of heresy, without that writ; But the wonder ceases, if we consider that the sheriff could not proceed to execute the offender by his own authority, unless he was present at the conviction; and though the diocesan might call the sheriff to attend the trial, yet he might too convict the offender in his absence. And further, Sawtre was convicted by the convocation; and it may be difficult to give one instance where the convocation called the sheriff to assist at the trial of an heretic; and, if they had, such a conviction was not within the letter of the act: Therefore, upon this conviction, the sheriff was under a necessity of waiting for the writ de Hæretico comburendo, before he could execute him.

By the 2d of Henry 5. cap. 7. all civil officers were to be sworn to assist the ordinaries in extirpating heresies; and one convict of heresy was to forfeit his goods and chattels, and fee-simple lands.

By the 25th of Henry 8. cap. 14. the act of the 2d of Henry 4. is in part repealed; and it is thereby provided, That no person shall be executed as an heretic without the writ de Hæretico comburendo first obtained.

By the 1st of Elizabeth cap. 1. the abovesaid statutes, as well as that other statute of the first and second of Philip and Mary, cap. 6. against hereticks, are repealed.

And by the 29th of Charles 2. cap. 9. passed in contemplation of the duke of York's accession to the crown, the writ de Hæretico comburendo, with all proceedings thereon, and all capital punishments in pursuance of any ecclesiastical censures, are from thenceforth utterly abolished.

So that at this day a person convicted of heresy is liable only to excommunication, and such pains and disabilities as persons standing excommunicated for any other offence, (which however are not very light) for if the excommunicate person be not reconciled to Holy Church within forty days, he is liable to be taken by the civil powers under the writ de excommunicato capiendo, and to be imprisoned until he be so reconciled. 18. The Trial and Examination of Master WILLIAM THORPE, Preste, for Heresy, before Thomas Arundel, Archebishop of Canterbury: 8 Hen. IV. A. D. 1407. Written by Himself. [1 Fox's Acts and Monum. 689. Coll. Eccl. Hist. 625.]

KNOWEN be yt to all men that rede or heree thys Writing benethe, That on the Sondayes next after the Feste of Seynt Peter, that we call Lammesse, in the yeaere of our Lord a M.CCCC. and vii. yeaere, I William Thorpe, being in pceson in the castell of Saltwoode, was brought before Thomas Arundell archebyschope of Canterbury, and Chauncellor than of Ingland: And when that I came to hym, he stodee in a great chamber, and moche people aboute hym; and when that he sawe me, he went feste into a closett, bydding all secular men that solowed him to go forth from hym sone; so that no man was left than in that closet but the archebysshop hymselfe, and a physician that was callyd Malueren, person of Seynt Dunstanys in London, and other two personys, unknown to me, which ware minysters of the lawe. And I standyng before them, by-and-by the archebysshop seyde to me, 'William, I know well that that thou hast thys twenty wynter and more traueley about besyly in the North contre, and in other diverse contres of Ingland, sowyng about false doctrine, hauyng great busynesse yf thou myght wyth thyne untrew teachyng, and shrewyd will for to infecte and poyson all this lande: but through the grace of God thou art now wythstoded and brought in to my ward, so that I shall now sequester the from thyne euill purpose, and lett the to enuenyme the shepe of my provynce. Never the lesse Seynt Paul seythe, Yf it may be as ferre as in us is, we owe to have peace wyth all men: therefore William, yf thou wyll now mekely, and of good harte, without onye feynyng, knele downe and leve thy hande upon a booke and kysse yt, promysyng feythfully, as I shall here charge the, that thou wilt submyt the to my correccyon, and stande to myne ordinance, and fulfyll yt dewly by all thy connyng and power, thou shall yet fyntle me gracyouse unto the.' Then seyde I to the Archbysshop, Syr, syns ye deme me an Herytyke out of beleue, wyll ye gyue me here audience to tell my Beleue; and he seyde, ye tell on. And I seyde, I beleue that there is not but one God Almyghty, and in thys Godhede, and of thys Godhede ar thre Persones; that is, the Fader, the Sonne, and the sothe faste Holy Goste: And I beleue that all thes thre persones ar enen in power, and in connyng, and in myght, full of grace and of all goodnesse; for whatsoever that the Fader dothe, or can, or wyll, that thynge also the Sonne dothe, and can, and wyll; and in all their power, connyng and wyll, the Holy Goste is equal to the Fader and to the Sonne. Over thys I beleue, that through counsell of thys moste blessyd Trinite, in a moste conuenient tyme before ordenyd for the salvacyon of u...

kynde, the seconde peerson of thys Trinite was ordeynd to take the fourme of man, that is the kynde of man. And I beleue that thys seconde person, our Lorde Jesu Christe, was conceiuyd thorough the Holy Goste into the wombe of the most blessyd virgyn Marye, without manys seede: And I beleue that after nyne monthys Christe was borne of thys moste blessyd virgyn, without one peyne, or brekyng of the closter of hyr wombe, and without fylthe of her virginite: And I beleue that Christe our Sauour was circumciysd in the eyghte daye after hys bythe in fulfillyng of the lawe, and hys name was callyd Jesu, which was callyd of the Angell before that he was conceiuyd in the wombe of Marie hys moder: And I beleue that Christe, as he was about thyrty yeare old, was baptyzed in the flude of Jordane of John Baptist; and, in lykness of a dove, the Holy Goste descendyd there upon hym, and a voyce was herde from Heuen, seying, 'Thou art my welbelouyd Sonne, in the I am full pleasyd.' And I beleue that Christe was moeuyd than by the Holy Goste for to go into Desert, and there he fastyd fourty dayes and fourty nyghtes without hodely meate and drynk: And I beleue that by and by, after hys fastyng, when the manhode of Christe hongeryd, the Feende came to hym and temptyd hym in glotony, in veyn glory, and in couetyse; but in all thoes temptacyons Christe concludyd the Fende, and withstoode hym; and than wythout taryng, Jesu began to preache and to seye unto the people, 'Doe ye penance, for the reime of Heuen ys now at hande.' And I beleue that Christ, in all hys tyme here, lyued moste holyly, and taught the wyll of hys Fader moste trewly; and I beleue that he sufferyd therefore moste wrongfully greatyst repreuys and despysynges. And after thys when Christe wolde make an ende here of hys temporall lyfe, I beleue that in the daye next before that he wolkte suffer passyon in the morne, in fourme of brede and of wyne he ordeynd the Sacramente of hys flesh and his blood, that ys, hys owne precyous body, and gave it to hys Apostles, for to eate, comaundyng them, and by them all their after-comers, that they shoulde doo it in thys fourme that he shewyd to them, use them self, and teache and commune forthe to other men and woomen thys moste worshipful holiest Sacrament, in myndefulnesse of hys holyst lyuynge, and of hys moste trew teachyng, and of hys wilfull and pacient sufferyng of the moste peynfull Passon: and I beleue that thus Christe our Sauour, after that he had ordeind thys most woorthy Sacrament of hys owne precyous body, he went forthe wyllfully agensyt hys enemyes, and he sufferyd them most paciently to ley their handys moste violently uppon hym, and to bynde hym, and to leade hym forthe as a thefe, and to skorne hym, and buffet, and all to blow or fyle him with their spyttinges. Over this I beleue that Christe suffered most mekely and paciently his enemyes for to dinge out with sharpe scourges the bloude that was betwene his skyn and his flesh: yce without grudgyng Christe suffered the cruell Jewes to crown him with most sharp thornes, and to strike him with a rede: and after Christe suffered wicked Jewes to draw him out upon the crosse, and for to naye hym there upon fote and hande; and so, thorow this pitiefull naylinge, Christe shed out wilfully for man's lyfe the bloude that was in his vaynes: and then Christe gave wilfully his spirite in to the bandes or power of his Father, and so as he wolde, and when he wold, Christ deid wilfully for man's sake upon the crosse. And notwithstandinge that Christe was wilfully, paynfully, and most shamefully put to deeth as to the worlde, there was left bloude and water in his herte, as he before ordered, that he wolde shede out this bloude and this water for man's saluacion: and therefore he sufferd the Jewes to make a blinde knight to thrust him in to the herte with a spere, and this the bloude and water that was in his herte Christe wolde shede out for man's love. And after this I beleue that Christe was taken downe from the crosse, and buried; and I beleue that on the third daye, by power of his Godheed, Christ rose again from deeth to life; and the xlth day ther after, I beleue that Christe ascended up into Heuen, and that he there sitteth on the right hande of God the Father Almyghty; and the tenth daye after this up goynge, he sente to his apostles the Holy Goost that he had promysed them before; and I beleue that Christe shall come and judge all mankinde, some to euerlasting peace, and some to euerlasting paynes. And as I beleue in the Father and in the Sonne, that they are one God almyghty; so I beleue in the Holy Goost, that is also with them the same God almyghty. And I beleue an holy Chirche, that is, all thei that haue byn, and that now are, and always to the end of the worlde shal be a people, the which shall endeuer them to knowe and to kepe the commaundements of God, dredynge over all thyng to offende God, and lovyng and sekyng most to please hym. And I beleue that all they that haue had, and yet haue, and all they that yet shall haue the foresayde vertuous surely standyng in the belefe of God, hoppyng stedfastly in hys mercifull doynge, continuyng to their ende in perfect charitie, wilfully, paciently, and gladly soferyng persecutions, by the example of Christ chiefly and his apostles, all these haue their names wrytten in the boke of life: therefore I beleue that the gaderyng together of this people, lyuynge now here in this lyfe, ys the holye chyrche of God, seyghtynge here on erth agaynst the Fende, the prosperyte of the worlde, and their fleshely lustes. Wherefore seynge that all the gaderyng together of this Church before said, and every parte therof, nother coueteth, nor willeth, nor loveth, nor seket any thinge but to eschew the offence of God, and to do his pleasing will; mekely, gladly, and wilfully of all myne herte I submitt my selfe unto thys holye church of Christe, to be ever buxom and obedient to the ordinaunce of it, and of every member thereof, after my knowledge and power by the helpe of God. Therefore I knowledge now and euermore shall, if God will, that of all my harte, and of all my might, I will submyt me only to the rule and gouernaunce of them whome after my knowlege, I may perceave, by the havyng and usynge of the beforesayd verques, to be membres of the holy church. Wherefore these Articles of Belefe, and all other bothe of the olde lawe and of the newe, which after the commaundement of God any man oughte to beleue, I beleue verely in my soule, as synnefull deedly wretche, of my cunningge and power oughte to beleue, prayenge the Lorde God, for his holye name, for to encrease my belefe, and help my unbelefe.

And forbycause to the praynyng of Goddes name, I desyre above all thyng to be a faythfull membre of Holy Church, I w.ake this Protestacyon before you all foure that are now here presente, covetyng that all men and women that now absent knewe the same, that what thyng soever before this tyme I have sayde or done, or what thyng here I shall doo or saye at any tyme here after; I beleue that all the olde lawe and the newe lawe, geuen and ordered by the councell of these thre persones of the Trynite, were geuen and wrytten to the saluacyon of mankynde: And I beleue that these lawes are sufficient for man's saluacyon: And I beleue every article of these lawes, to the entente that these articles were ordered and commaunded of these thre persones of the moste blessed Trynyte to be beleued. And therefore to the rule and the ordynance of these Goddes lawes, mekely, gladly, and wilfully I submyt me with all myne harte, that who ever can or wyll by auctoryte of Goddes lawe, or by open reason, tell me that I haue erred, or now erre or any tyme here after shall erre in any Article of Belefe (fro whyche inconvenience God kepe me for his goodnesse) I submyt me to be reconcyled, and to be buxom and obedyente unto these lawes of God, and to every article of them. For by auctoryte, specially of these lawes, I will, thorowe the grace of God, be vnyed charytably unto these lawes. Yee, syr, and ouer thys I beleue and admyt all the Sentences, Auctorites, and Reasons of the Sayntes and Doctoures, accordyng unto Holy Scripture, and declaryng it truly.—I submyt me wyfully and mekely to be ever obedyente after my connyng and power to all these sayntes and doctoures, as they are obedyente in worke and in worde to God and to his lawe, and forther not to my knowlege, not for any erthly power, dignity or state, thorowe the help of God. But syr, I praye you tell me if after youre bidding I shall laye my hande upon the Boke to the entente to swere thereby?

And the Archebishope said to me, 'ye, wherefore els?' And I sayde to him, 'Syr, a boke is nothyng els but a thyng coupled together of dyuerse creatures, and to swere by any creature both Gods lawe and mans lawe is agaynst. But syr, this thyng I saye here to you before these your clerkes, with my forsayd Protestacion, that how, where, when and to whom men are bounden to swere or to obey in any wise after Gods lawe, and sayntes and trewe doctoures according with Gods lawe: I will thorow Gods grace be ever redy thereto with all my connyng and power. But I pray you syr, for the charity of God, that ye will before I swere as I have here rehersed to you, tell me how or whereto that I shall submyt me; and shewe me whereof that ye will correct me, and what is the ordinaunce that ye will thus oblige me to fulfill.' And the Archebishope said unto me, 'I will shortly that nowe thou swere here to me that thou shalt forsake all the opinions which the Secte of Lollards holde, and is slaundred with: so that after this tyme nother pryely nor apertly thou holde any opinion which I shall after that thou haste sworne reherse to the here. Nor thou shalt fauer no man nor woman, young nor old, that holdeth any of these foreseid opinions; but after thy knowledge and power thou shalt enforse the to withstand all soche distrobbers of Holy Chyrche in euery diocese that thou comest in: and them that will not leaue their false and dampnable opinions, thou shalt put them up, publeshyng them and their names, and make them known to the bishop of the diocese that they are in, or to the bishopes ministres. And ouer this I will that thou preach no more unto the tyme that I know by good witnesse and trewe, that thy conuersacion be soch that thy hart and thy mouth accorde treuly in one contrariyng all the leude learning that thou hast taught here before.'

And I hearyng these wordes, thought in my harte, that this was an vinefull asking; and I demyed myself cursed of God, yf I consented hereto, and I thought howe Susan said, 'Anguyssch is to me on euery syde.' And in that I stode still, and spake not, the abb. seid to me, 'Answer one wyse or a nother;' and I said, 'Syr, if I consented to you thus, as ye haue here rehersed to me, I shoulde become an Appeler, or euery bishopis espye, somonour of all Englonde. For, and I shoulde thus put up, and publeshe the names of men and women, I shoulde herein deceiue full many persons; ye syr, as it is likely by the dome of my conscience I shoulde herein, because of the dethe of both men and women, ye both bodely and gostely. For many men and women that stand now in the treuthe, and are in the waye of salvation; yf I shoulde for the learning and reding of their beleve publeshe them, and put them therfor up to bishopes, or to their unpituouse ministres, I knowe some dele by experience, that they shoulde be so distrobled and diseased with persecution or otherwise, that many of them (I thinke) would rather chose to forsake the waye of treuthe, than to be traveled, skurned, and slaundred, or puished as bishopes and their ministres now use for to constryene men and women to consent to them. But I fynde in no place in Holy Scripture, that this office that ye wolde now enfesse me with accordith to any priste of Christes secte, nor to any other Christen man. And therefore to do thus wer to me a full'noycous bonde to be bounden with, and over greuous charge. For I suppose, that yf I thus dede many men and women would, ye syr, might justly unto my confusion sey to me, that I wer a traitor to God and to them; syns (as I thinke in myne hert) many men and women truste so mekle in me in this case, that I wold not for sayng of my lyfe do thus to them. For yf I thus sholde do, full many men and women wolde (as they might full truly sey) that I hadde falsly and cowerdly forsaken the truthe, and slaundred shamefully the Word of God. For yf I consented to you to do hereafter your will for bon chese or mischief that may befall to me in this lyfe, I deme in my conscience that I were worthy herefore to be cursed of God; and also of all his seyntes, fro which inconuenience kepe me, and all Christen people Almighti God now and ever for his holy name.'

And than the abp. said unto me, 'O thine hart is full hard endured as was the herte of Pharao, and the Deuell hath ouercomen the and perverted the; and he hath so blynded the in all thy wittes, that thou hast no grace to know the treuthe, nor the mesure of mercy that I have profered to the. Therefore, as I perceyue now by thy folish Answere, thou hast no will to leaue thyne olde errours. But I sey to the leude losell, other thou quickly consente to myne ordinaunce, and submit the to stand to my decrees, or by seynt Thomas thou shalt be disgraded, and followe thy felowe in Smithfelde.' And at this saying I stode styll and spake not, but I thought in myne harte that God did to me a greate grace, if he wolde of his great mercy bringe me to soch an ende. And in myne harte I was nothing frayde with this menasing of the abp. And I considered there two things in him: one, that he was not yet sorrowfull for that he had made William Soutre wrongfully to be burnt; and as I considered that the abp. thyrsted yet after more sheding out of innocent bloode. And fast therefore I was moved in all my wittes, for to hold the abp. nother for prelate nor for priest of God; and for that myne inward man was thus altogether departed from the abp. methought I should not haue any dreul of him. But I was right heuy and sorouful, for that ther was none audience of seculermen by: but in myne hart I praid the Lord God for to comforte me and strengith me against them that there ware agaynste the sothefastnesse. And I purposed to speak no more to the abp. and his clerckes than me nede behoved: and all thus I praid God for his goodnesse to geue me than and alway grace to speake with a meke and an easy spyrit; and whatsoever thinge that I shulde speke, that I might haue true authorities of scripture, or open reason.

And for that I stode thus still, and nothing spake, one of the abp's. clerkes seid vnto me, 'What thing mustiste thou? Do thou as my lord hath now commanded to the here.' And yet I stode still, and answered him not; and than sone after the abp. seid to me, 'Art thou not yet bethought, whether thou wilt do, as I haue here seid to the? And I seid then to hym; 'Syr, my father and my mother, on whose souls God haue mercy (if it be his will) spent mekyll money in diue se places about my learning, for the entent to haue innde me a prieste to God: but when I came to yeares of discretion I had no will to be prieste, and therefore my friends were right heuy to me: and than me thought their grudging agenst me was so peynfull to me, that I purposed therfor to haue left their company: and when they perceiued this in me, they spake some tyme full feire and pleasaunt wordes to me; but for that they might not make me to consent of good harte to be a prieste. thei spake to me full ofte tynes very grevous words, and manassed me in diuerse manners, shewing to me full leuy chere. And thus one while in feire manner, a nother while in greuous they were long tyme as me thought full besy about me, or I consented to them to be a prieste; but at the laste, whan in this matter they wold no longer suffer myne excusacions, but other I should conseat to them, or I shold ever bear their indignation, ye, their curse, (as they seide) than I seing this, praid them that they wold gyue me licence for to go to them that wer named wyse priestis and of vertuous conuerscaion, to haue their counsell, and to know of them the office and the charge of priesthode. And hereto my father and my mother consented full gladly, and gaue me their blissing and goode leaue to go, and also money to spende in this journey. And so than I went to the priests, whom I herde to be of best name, and of moste holy lyving, and beste learnid, and most wyse of heavenly wisdom; and so I communed with them vnto the tyme that I perceiued by their vertuous and continuall occupations that their honeste and charitable werks passed their fame which I herde before of them. Wherefore, Syr, by the example of the doctrine of them, and specially for the godly and innocent workis which I perceiued than of them and in them; after my conning and power I haue exercised me than and in this time to knowe perfectly God his lawe, hauing a will and a desyre to lyve ther after, willing that all men and women exercised them self feithfully therabout. Yf than, syr, other for pleasure or displeasure of them that ar nother so wise, nor of so verteuouse conuersation to my knowledge; nor by comone fame to ony other mannis knowledge in this land, as thes men wer of whom I toke my counsell and information; I sholde now forsake thus sodenly and shortly, and unwarnid, all the learning that I exercised my self in this thirty winter and more; my conscience shulde ever be here-with out of mesure vnquieted: and as, syr, I knowe well that many men and women shoulde be therthrowe greatly troublid and sclauderid, and as I said syr to you before, for myne untrawthe and false cowardness many a one sholde be put into full great reprefe: ye syr I drede, that many a one, as thei might then iustly, wolde curse me full bitterly, and syr I fear not but the curse of God, which I sholde deserve herein, wolde bring me to a full euill end, yf I continewid thus. And if thorow remorse of conscience I repentid me any tyme retourning into the way, which you doo your diligence to constreine me now to forsake ye syr, all the bishopis of this lande with full many other priestis wolde defame, and purswe me as a relapse, and thei that now have (though I be unworthy) some confidence in me, hereafter wolde neuer truste to me though I cowlde teache and liue neuer so vertuously more than I can or may. For if after your counsell I leste vterly all my learning, I sholde hereby firste wounde and defyle myne owne soule; and also I sholde here through geue occasion to many men and women of full sore hurting: ye syr, as it is likely to me, if I consented to your will I sholde herein by myne euill example in it, as ferre as in me wer, see many folke ghostely, that I sholde neuer deserue for to haue grace of God to the edifying of his Chirche nother of my self, nor of none other mannes lyfe, and undone bothe before God and man. But syr, by example chefely of some whos names I will not now reherse, H. of J. P. and B. and also by the present doying of Philip of Rampenton that is now becomen bishop of Lincoln, I am now learnid, as many more hereafter thorow Goddis grace shall be learned, to hate and to fle all soche sclander, that thes foresaid men chefely hath defyled principally themselves with. And in it that in them is they have enuencid all the Chirche of God for that sclanderous reuoking at the crosse of Paulis of H. P. and of B. and how now Philip Rampenton perseweth Christis people. And that feining, that thes men dissemble by worldly prudence keeping them coverdly in their preaching and communing within the bondis and termis (wich without blame may be spokyn and shewid out to the moste worldly luyers) will not be unpunishid of God. For to the point of trewthe that thes men shewid out some tyme, they will not now streche forth their luyes. But by example eche one of them, as their wordis and their works shew, they besy them thorow their feinyng, for to sclander and to persewe Christe in his members, rather than they will be persewed.

And the Archebishop seid to me, 'Thes men the which thou spekest of now wer foolis and heretiques, whan they were countid wyse men of the and other soche loselles. But now they ar wyse men, though thou and soche o' er deme them vnwyse. Neuerthelasse I wistener none, that right seide, that any while were enuynymed with your contagiousnesse, that is, contaminate and spottid doctrine.'—And I seid to the Archebishop, 'Syr, I think well that thes men and such other ar now wyse as to this worlde; but as their wordis soundid sometyme, and their workis shewid outwardly, it was likely to move me that they had earneste of the wisdom of God; and that they sholde haue deserued mickell grace of God to haue sau'd their own soules, and meny other mennys, if they had continewid feithfully in wyfull pouerte, and in other symple vertuous lyving; and specially if they hadde with thes foresaid vertues continewid in their besy fruteful sowing of Goddis word: as to many mennys knowledge they occupied them a season in all their wittes full besyly to know the pleasaunt will of God, traueyling all their membres full besyly for to doo thereafter, purely and chefely to the praising of the most holy name of God, and for grace of edification and saluacion of Christen people; but wo worthe false couetise, and euill counsell, and tyranny, by wiche they and many men and women are ledde blyndely into an euill ende.—Than the Archebishop seide to me, 'Thou and soche other losellis of thy secte wolde shaue your headis full nere for to haue a benefice. For by Jesu I know none more couetouse shrewis than ye ar, when that ye haue a benefice. For lo I gave to John Puruay a benefice but a myle out of this castell, and I herde more compleintis aboute his covetousnesse for tythes and other mysdoynngys, than I didde of all men that wer auancid within my diocese.'—And I seid to the Archebishop, 'Syr, Puruay is nother with you now for the benefice that ye gaue him, nor he holdith feithfully with the learningyng that he taught and writ before tyme, and thus he sheweth hymself nother to be hote nor cold; and therefore he and his felaws may sore drede, that if they torne not hastely to the waye that they haue forsaken, perauenture they be put out of the nombre of Cristis choyn people.'—And the Archebishop said, 'Though Puruay be now a false harlot, I quyte me to him; but come he more for soche cause before me or we depart, I shall knowe with whom he holdith. But I sey to the, Whiche are thes holy men and wyse of whom thou haste takyn thyne informacion?'—And I seid, 'Sir, Master John Wicliff was holden of full many men the greateste clerke that they knewe than lyving; and therwith he was namid a passing ruely man, and an ynnocent in his luyunge, and herefore great men commonyd ofte with him, and they louyd so his learningyng that they writ it, and besyly enforlid them to rule themselves there after. Therefore syr, this foresaid learningyng of master John Wicliff is yet holden of full many men and women, the most agreeable learning unto the luyng and teaching of Christe and of his apostles, and moste openly shewing and declaring how the Chirche of Christ hath ben, and yet shulde be rewld and govern'd. Therefore so many men and women couet this learningyng, and purpose through Goddis grace to contornue their tyuyng life to this learningyng of Wicliff. Master John Aiston taught and writ accordingly, and full besyly witer and whan, and to whome that he might; and he vied it hymself right perfily unto his life ende. And also Philip of Rampenton while he was a chanone of Lacerter, Nicolas Herforde, Daury Gotray of Pakring, monk of Bylande, and a master of diuinitie, and John Puruay and many other wich wer holdea right wise men and prudent, taucht and writ besily this foresaid learning, and conformid them thereto. And with all thes men I was ofte right homely, and commuynyd with them long tyme and ofte; and so before all other men I choos wilfully to be informid of them and by them, and specially of Wicliff himself, as of the most vertuous and godly wise men that I herde of or knewe. And therefore of him specially, and of thes men, I tooke the learning that I haue taucht, and purpose to liue there after (if God will) to my liues end. For though some of thes men be contrary to the learning that they taucht, before I wote well that their learning was trewe which they taught; and therefore with the helpe of God I purpose to holde and to use the learning which I harde of them, while they sat on Moses chaire, and specially while they sat on the chaire of Christe. But after the werkis that they now do, I will not doo with Goddis helpe. For they feine and hide, and contrary the trowth the wich before they taucht out plenly and trewly. For as I know well when some of these men hath been blamid for their sclauderous doing, they graunte not that they haue tauchte a misse, or erryd before time; but that they were constrained by peine to leave to tell out the sothe, and thus they choese now rather to blasphemie God than to suffer a while here persecution bodely for sothefastnesse that Christe shed out his harte bloode for.' And the Archebishop said, 'That learning that thou callist trowth and sothefastnesse, is open sclauder to holy Chirche, as it is proud of holy Chirche. For all be it, that Wicliff your autour was a great clerke, and though that many men held him a perfit liuer, yet his doctrine is not approuid of holy Chirche, but many sentences of his learning are dampnid as they well woorthy ar. But as touching Philip of Rampenton that was first chanone, and after abbot of Laucester, which is now bishop of Lincoln; I tell the that the day is comen for which he fastid the euene. For nother he holdeth now, nor will hold the learning that he thought when he was a chanon of Laucester: for no bishop of this land perseweth now more sharply them that holde thy way than he doeth.'—And I said, 'Syr, full many men and women wonderith upon him, and speakith him mekill shame, and holdeth him for a cursid enemy of the trowth.' And the Archebishop said to me, 'Wherefore tariest thou me thus here with soche fables, wilt thou shortly (as I have seid to the) submit the to me or no?' And I seid, 'Syr, I tell you at one word, I dare not for the drede of God submit me to you, after the tenour and sentence that ye have aboue rehersed to me.'

And than as if he hadde been wrothe he seid to one of his clerkis, 'fetch hider quikely the Certificacion that came to me fro Shrewisbure under the bailiues seal, twinnising the Errours and Heresies which this losell hath venemously sownen there.'—Then hastily the clerke tooke out, and leid forth on a cupborde diverse rollis and writings, among which there was a little one, which the clerke delivered to the Archebishop. And by and by the archebishop redde this rolle, containing this Sentence?

"The thirde Sonday after Easter, the yere of our Lorde M.CCCC. and seuen, William Thorpe came vnto the towne of Shrewisbure, and thorow leaue graunted unto him to preache: He said openly in Synt Chaddis Chirche in his sermone, that the sacrament of the altare after the consecration was material brede: and that ymages shulde in no wise be worshipped: and that men shulde not go on pilgremages: and that priests have no titles to tythes: and that it is not leself for to swere in any wise."

And when the Archebishop had red thus this Rolle, he rolled it up agein, and seid to me, 'Ys this wholesome learninge to be among the people?' And I said to him, 'Syr, I am both ashamed on their behalfe, and right soroufull for them that have certified you thes things thus vutrewly: for I preached never nor taught thus priuely nor apertly.'—And the archebishop said to me, 'I will give credence to thes worshipfull men which haue written to me, and witnessed vnder their seals there among them. Though thou now deniest this, wenist thou that I will give credence to the? Thou losell haste trobled the worshipful cominalte of Shrewisbure; so that the bailives and cominalte of that town haue written to me, praynge me that am archbishop of Canterbury, primate and chaunceler of Englonde, that I will vouchsafe to grannte them, that if thou shalt be made (as thou art worthy) to suffer opeu jouseure for thine Heresys, that thou maye haue thi yoursesse openly ther among them: so that all they whome thou and soche other loselles haue ther peruerted, may thorow feare of thy dede be reconsyled ageyn to the vnite of holy Chirche. And also they that stand in true faithe of Holy Chirche may thorowe thy dede be more established therein.' And as yn thys askyng hadde pleased the Archebishop, he said, 'by my thrifte this hartye prayoure and seruente requeste shal be thought on.'

But certeynly nother the prayer of the men of Shrewisbure, nor the manassyng of the Archebishop made me any thinge affrayde. But in rehersyng of this malice, and in the hear- ynge of it, my herte greatly rejoyced and yet dothe. I thanke God for the grace that I than thought and yet thinke shall come to all the chirche of God here thorowe, by the speciall mercifulle doynge of the Lord. And as hauynge no drede of the malice of tyrauntes, by trustynge stedfastly in the helpe of the Lorde with full purpose for to knowlege the sothefastnesse, and to stande thereby after my connyng and power, I said to the Archebishop; 'Syr, yf the truthe of Gods Wordie might be now accepted as it sholde be, I doute not to proue by lykely evidence, that they that are famed to be out of the faythe of Holy Chirche in Shrewisbure, and in other places also, are in the true faithe of Holy Chirche. For as their wordes sounde, and their workes shewe to mannis judgment, dreading and louing faithfully God, their will, their desyre, their loue, and their businesse are moste sett to drede to offend God, and to loue for to please him in true and faithfull keping of his commandments. And agene, they that are said to be in the faithe of Holy Chirche in Shrewisbury and in other places, by open euidence of their proude, enuious, maliciose, couetouse, lecherouse and other foule wordes and workes, nother knowe nor haue will to knowe, nor to occupye their wittes truly and effectuously in the right faith of Holy Chirche. Wherefore all these, nor more that followe their maners, shall ony time come verely in the faith of Holy Chirche, except they enforce them more trulye to come in the waye whiche nowe they despise. For these men and women that are now called feithfull and holden iuste, nother knowe nor will exercise themselves to knowe of faithfulness one commandment of God. And thus full many men and women now, and especially men that are named to be principall lymmes of Holy Chirche, stiere God to greate wrathe, and deserue his curse, for they that call or holde them unjste men, which are full vnjste, as their vicious wordes, their great customable sweringe, and their slaunderouse and shamefull workes shew openly and witness. And herefore soche vicious men and unjste in their owne confusion call them unjste men and women, which after their power and conning besy them self to liue iustly after the commandment of God. And where syr ye say, that I haue distrobbled the cominaltie of Shrewisbury, and many other men and women with my teaching, if it thus be, it is not to be wondred of wise men, sins all the cominalte of the cite of Jerusalem was destrobbled of Christes awne person that was very God and man, and most prudent precher that ever was or shall be. And also all the synagogue of Nazareth was moued againste Christe, and so fulfilled with ire towards him for his preaching, that the men of the synagogue rose up and cast Christe out of their cyte, and ledde him vppe to the top of a mountaine for to cast him doune ther hedeling. Also accordingly hereto the Lord witnessyth by Moses, that he shall put dissention betwix his people and the people that contraieth and perseweth his people. Who, syr, is he that shall preche the treuthe of Goddes worde to the vnfeithful people, and shall lett the sothfastenesse of the Gospell, and the prophecy of God almighty to be fulfilled?

And the Archebishop said to me, 'It foloweth of thes thy words, that thou and soche other thinkest that ye do right well for to preach and teach as ye do without authoritie of any bishop. For ye presume, that the Lord hath chosen you only for to preache as faithful disciples and special folowers of Christe.'—And I said, 'Syr, by authoritie of Gods lawe, and also of seintes and doctours, I am learned to deme, that it is every priests office and dutie for to preache besily frely and trulye the words of God. For no doute every priest should purpose first in his soule, and couett to take the order of priesthode chiefly for to make knowen to the people the worde of God after his conning and power, aprouing his wordes euer to be true by his vertuous workes: and for this entent we suppose that bishopes and other prelates of Holy Church shold cherefly take and use ther prelacie. And for the same cause bishopes sholde giue to priestes their orders. For bishopes sholde accept no man to priesthode, except that he had good will and full purpose, and were well disposed, and well learned to preache. Wherefore, syr, by the bidding of Christ, and by example of his moste holy liuing, and also by the witnessing of his holy Apostles and Prophets, we are bounde under full great peine to exercise vs after our conning and power (as every prieste is likewise charged of God) to fulfil dewly the office of priesthode. We presume not here of oure selves for to be esteemed (nother in our owne reputacion, nor in none other mannes) feithfull disciples, and special folowers of Christe: but syr, as I said to you before, we deme this by authoritie chiefly of Goddes worde, that it is the chiefe deutie of every prieste to besy them feithfully to make the law of God knowen to his people, and so to comune the commandment of God charitably, howe that we may beste, where, whan, and to whom that euer we may, is our very deutie. And for the will and businesse that we owe of our dewe dette to do justly our office throw the steiring and special helpe (as we truste) of God, hoping stedfastly in his mercie, we desire to be the feithfull disciples of Christe; and we pray this gracious Lorde for his holy name, that he make us able so to please him with deuout prayers, and charitable priestly workes, that we may obtaine of him to folowe him thankfully.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'Lewde lolsell, whereto makist thou soche vneye reasons to me? Asketh not Seynt Paul, 'Howe sholde Priestes preche, except they be sent?' but I sent the neuer to preche; for thy venemous doctryne as so knowen thorow out Englonde, that no bishop will admitt the for to prech by witnessyng of their letters. Why thao, lewde Ydiot, willest thou presume to prech, syns thou art not sent, nor licensed of thy souereyna to prech? Saith not Seynt Paule, 'That subiectes owe to obey their souereyns, and not only good and vertuous, but also tyrauntis that are vicious?'—And I said to the Archebishop, 'Syr, as touching your letter of licence or other bishopes, which we say we sholde haue to witness that we ver able to be sent for to preche; we knowe well that nother you, syr, nor any other bishop of this lande will graunte to us ony soche letters of licence, but we sholde oblige us to you and to other bishopes, by unlesfull oathes, for to passe not the bondes and termes, which ye, syr, or other bishopes, will limyt, to us, And sins in this matter your term is to be some to large, and some to streite, we dare not oblige us thus to be bounden to you for to kepe the termes, which you will lymitt to us, as ye do to Friere and soch other

prechers: and therefor though we haue not your letter, sir, nor letters of other bishopps written with ynke upon parchment, we dare not herefor leaue the office of preaching; to which preaching all priestes, after there conyng and power, are bounde by diuerse testimonies of God's lawe, and of great doctours, without ony mencion making of bishopps letters. For as mekell as we haue taken upon vs the office of priesthode (though we are vnworthy thereto) we come and purpose to fulfill it with the helpe of God, by authoritie of his owne lawe, and by witness of great doctours and seintes accordingly, hereto trusting stedfastly in the mercye of God; For that he commaundeth vs to do the office of priesthode, he will be our sufficient letters and witness, if we by example of his holy lyuing and teaching specially occupye vs faithfully to do our office justly, ye the people to whom we preache, be they faithful or unfaithfull, shall be our letters, that is, our witnesserers; for the treuthe, where it is sowne, maye not be unwitnessed: For all that are conuerred and sauved by learninge of Goddes worde, and by working thereafter, are witnesserers, that the trewth and sothfastnesse which they harde and dyd after, is cause of their saluacion. And ageyn, all unfeythfull men and women, which herde the treuthe, tolde out to them and wolde not do thereafter; also all they that might have herde the treuthe, and wolde not heare it because that they wolde not do thereafter: all thes shall beare witness against themselves, and the treuth which they wolde not heare, or else harden and despised to do thereafter thorow their unfeythfulness, is and shall be cause of their dampnacion. Therefore, syr, syns this forseide witnessing of God, and of diuerse seintes and doctours, and of all the people good and evyll, sufficeth to all true preachers; we thinke that we do not the office of presthode, if that we leaue our preaching, because that we haue not, or maye not haue, dewly bishopps letters to witness that we are sent of them to preache. This Sentence approneth Seynt Paul, wher he speaketh of himselfe, and of faithful apostles and disciples, saing thus: 'We neede no letters of commendacion, as some other preachers do, whiche preache for couetousnes of temporal goodes, and for mennes praising.' And where ye say, syr, that Paul biddeth subjectes obey their souereyns: this is soth, and may not be denied: But ther is ij. maner of souereyns, vertuous suffereyns, and vicious tyrauntes; therefore to thes last souereyns nother men nor women that be subjecte owe to obey in ij. manners. To vertuous suffereins and charitable, subjectes owe to obey wilfully and gladly, in hearing of their good counsell, in consenting to their charitable biddings, and in werkynge after their frutefull works. This sentence Paul approueth, wher he saith thus to subjectis; 'Be ye mindfull of your souereyns that speke to you the worde of God, and folow you the feithe of them whos conuersacion you know to be vertuous.' For as Paul saith after, 'Thes souereyns, to whome subjectis

'owe to obeye in following of their maners, worke besily in holy studying, how they may withstande and destroy vices firste in themself, and after in all their subjectis, and how they may beste plante in them vertues.' Also thes souereyns make deuoute and feruent prayers for to purchase grace of God, that they and their subjectis may ouer all things dreade to offende him, and to loue for to please hym. Also these souereyns to whom Paul biddeth vs obey, as it is seid before, lyue so vertuously, that all they that will lyue well may take of them goode example to knowe and to kepe the commaundmentis of God. But in this forseid wyse, subjectis owe not to obey, nor to be obedient to tyrauntis, while they ar vicious tyrauntis; syns their will, their counsell, their biddings, and their workis ar so vicious, that they owe to be hatid and lefte. And though soche tyrauntis be masterfull and cruell in bostyng, and manasing in oppressions and diuerse punyshyngis; Seynt Paul biddeth the seruauantis of soche tyrauntis to obey mekely to soche tyrauntis, suffering paciently their malicious cruelnes; But Peter counsellith not ony seruaut or subjecte to obey to ony lorde, or prince, or souereyn in ony thyng that is not pleasing to God.'

And the Archebishop said vnto me, 'Yf a souereyn bidde his subject doo that thyng that is vicious, this souereyn herein is to blame; but the subjecte for his obedience deserueth mede of God, for obedience pleasith more to God than ony sacrifice.'—And I said, Samuel the prophete said to Saul the wycked king, 'That God was more pleased with the obedience of his commaundment than with ony sacrifice of bestis.' But Dauid saith, and Seynt Gregory according to gither, 'That not onely they that do euyll is worthy of dethe and dampnacion, but also all they that consente to euyll doers.' And, syr, the law of Holy Chirche teacheth in the Decrees, That no seruaut to his lorde, nor childe to the father or mother, nor wyfe to hyr husband, nor monke to his abot, ought to obey except in lefull thingis and lawfull.'—And the Archebishop said to me, 'All these allegingis that thou bringest furth ar not els but proude presumptuousnes; for hereby thou enforcest the to prove, that thou and soche other ar so juste, that ye owe not to obeye to prelati. And thus agenst the learning of Seynt Paul, that teachith you not to preache but if ye wer sent, of your own authority ye will go forthe, and preache, and doo what ye liste.'—And I said, 'Sir, presentith not every prieste the office of the apostles, or the office of the disciples of Christe?' And the abp. said 'ye.' And I said, 'Syr, as the tenth chaptre of Matthew, and the laste chaptre of Marke witnesseth, Christe sent his apostles for to preache; And the tenth chaptre of Luke witnesseth, that Christe sent his two and seuentie disciples for to preache in every place that Christe was to come to. And Seynt Gregory in the common lawe saith, That every man that goth to priesthode, takith vpon hym

the office of preaching; for as he saith, that prieste steirith God to great wrathe, of whos mouthe is not herde the voice of preaching. And as other more gloses upon Ezechiel witnesseth, that the prieste that preacheth not besily to the people, shall be partetaker of their dampnacion that perishe throw his defeaute; and though the people be sauved by other speciall grace of God than by the priestis preaching, yet the priestis, in that they ar ordenyd to preache and preache not, as before God they ar manslears, for as ferre as in them is; soche priestes as preache not besily and trewly sleeth all the people gostely, in that they withhold from them the worde of God, that is lyfe and sustenance of menes soules. And Seynt Isidore saith, Priestis shall be dampnid for wickednesse of the people, if they teachie not them that ar ignorant, or blame not them that ar synners: For all the worke or businesse of priestis standith in preaching and teaching, that they edifye all men as well by connyng of feithe, as by discipline of workes, that is vertuous teaching. And as the Gospell witnessith, Christe said in his teaching, 'I am borne and comen into this worlde to beare witnesseth to the trewthe, and he that is of the trewthe hearith my voice.' Than, syr; syns by the Word of Christe specially, that is, his voice, priestis ar commaundid to preache, whatsoever prieste that it be that hathe not good-will and full purpose to doo thus, and ableth not hymself, after his connyng and power, to doo his office by the example of Christe and of his apostles, whatsoever other thing that he dothe displeasith God. For lo Seynt Gregory saith, that thing lefte that a man is bounde chiefly to doo, whatsoever other thing that a man dothe, it is unthankfull to the Holy Goste: And therefore saithe Lincoln, That prieste that preachith not the worde of God, though he be siene to have none other defeaute, he is Antichriste and Sathanas, a night-thiefe and a day-thefe, a sear of soules, and an angell of light tournid into derkenesse. Wherefore, syr, thes autorites and other well considered, I deme myself dampnable if I, other for plesure or displeasure of any creature, applye me not diligently to preache the worde of God. And in the same dampnacion I deme all those priestis, which of goode purpose and will enforce them not besily to doo thus; and also all them that have purpose or will to lett ony priest of this businesse.'

And the Archebishop said to those three clerkis that stode before hym, 'Lo, Syrs, this is the manner and businesse of this losell and soche other, to pike out soche sharp sentencis of holy Scripture, and of doctoris, to mainteine ther secte and lore againste the ordinaunce of holy Chirche. And therefore, losell, it is that thou couetist to have ageyn the Psalter that I made to be takyn from the at Canterbury, to recorde sharpe versys ageinst vs; but thou shalt neuer haue that Psalter, nor none other boke, tyll that I know that thy harte and thy mouthe accordes fully to be gouernid by holy Chirche.' And I said, Syr, all my will and power is and euer shall be (I truste to God) to be gouernyd by holy Chirche. And the Archebishop asked me, 'What was holy Chirche?' And I said, Sir, I tolde you before what was holy Chirche; but syns ye aske me this demaunde, I call Christe and his Seyntes holy Chirche.—And the Archebishop said unto me, 'I wote well that Christe and his Seyntes ar holy Chirche in Heuene; but what is holy Chirche in erthe? And I said, Syr, though holy Chirche be euery one in charite, yet it hath two partis: the firste and principall parte hath ouercomen perfetly all the wretchednesse of this lyfe, and reigneth joyfully in Heuene with Christe; and the tother parte is here yet in erth, besily and continually fighting day and night ageinst temptacions of the Fende, forsakyng and hatyng the prosperite of this worlde, despising and withstanding their flesschely lustis; which only ar the pilgrimes of Christe, wandering toward Heuene by stedfast feith, and grounded hope, and by perfite charite: for this heuenly pilgremis may not, nor will not be lettid of their goode purpos, by the reason of eny doctours discording from holy scripture, not by the suddis of any tribulacion temporall, nor by the winde of any pride of boste, or of manasing of ony creatre; for they ar all faste grounded upon the suer stone Christe, hearing his worde, and louing it, exercising them feithfully, and continually in all their wittes to doo thereafter.'

And the Archebishop said to his Clerkis, 'Se ye not how his harte is endured, and how he is traueled with the deuill, occupying him thus lesely to allege soche sentencis to mainteyne hys errours and heresies? certeyn thus he wold occupie vs here all day, if we wold suffer hym.' One of the Clerkes answered; 'Syr, he said right now, that this Certification that came to you fro Shrewisbery is untrewly forged against hym; therefore, Syr, appose you hym now here in all the pointis which ar certified ageinst hym, and so we shall heare of his owne mouthe his Answers, and witnesseth them.'

And the Archebishop tooke the Certification in his honde, and looked thereon a while, and than he said to me: 'Lo here it is certified ageinst the by worthy men and feithfull of Shrewisbery, that thou preachedst there openly in Seynt Chaddis Chirche, that the sacramente of the altare was material brede after the consecracion: what saist thou? was this trewly preached?' And I said, Syr, I tell you trewly that I touchid nothing there of the sacrament of the altare, but in this wyse, as I will with Goddis grace tell you here. As I stode ther in the pulpet, besying me to teache the commaundement of God, ther kyllid a sacring bell, and therefore mekill people toornid awaye hastily, and with great noyse ran fro towardis me. And I seing this, said to them thus: Goode men, ye wer better to stand here still, and to hear Goddis worde; for certis the vertue and the mede of the moste holy sacrament of the altare standith mekill more in the beleue thereof that ye ought to haue in your soule, than it dothe in the outward sight thereof. And therfor ye were better to staude still quietly to hear Goddis worde, because that thorow the hearing thereof men come to very trewe belefe. And otherwyse, Syr, I am certein I spake not there of the worthy sacrament of the altare.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'I beleue the not what so euer thou saist, syns so worshipfull men haue witnessed thus against the; but syns thou denyest that thou saidist thus there, what saist thou now? restith there, after the consecration, in the oste materiall brede or no?' And I said, Sir, I knowe in no place in holy scripture where this terme materiall brede is written; and therefore, sir, when I speake of this matter, I vse not to speake of materiall brede. Then the Archebishop said to me, 'How teachest thou men to beleue in this sacrament?' And I said, Syr, as I beleue myself, so I teache other men. He said, 'Tell out plainly thy beleue hereof.'—And I said with my protestacion, Sir, I beleue that the nyght before that Christe Jesu wold suffer willfully passion for mankynde on the morne after, he toke breade in his holy and moste worshipfull handis, liffing vp his eyes, and gyyng thankis to God his father, blessed this breade and brake it, and gaue it to his disciples, saying to them, 'Take and eate of this all you, this is my body;' and tho this is and ought to be all mennis beleue, Mathew, Mark, Luke, and Paul witnessith: other beleue, sir, haue I none, nor will haue none else; for I beleue, with Goddis grace, I purpose to lyue and dye, knoleging as I beleue, that the worshipfull sacrament of the altare ys the sacramente of Christis flesche and his bloode, in fourme of breade and of wine.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'It is sothe that this Sacrament is very Christis body in fourme of breade; but thou and thy secte techist it to be substance of brede: thynke you this true teachinge?'—And I said, Nother I nor any other of the secte that ye dampne, teach any other wyse than I haue told you, nor beleue otherwise to my knowyng. Neuertheless, syr, I aske of you for charyte, that ye will tell me here pleyntly, how ye shall vnderstonde this text of Saynt Paule, wher he sayth thus: 'This thinge feale you in youre self, that is in Christe Jesu, while he was in the fourme of God.' Sir, calleth not Paule here the fourme of God, the substance or kynde of God? Also, sir, saith not the Chirche in the houres of the most blessed virgine accordyngly hereto, wher it is written thus: 'Thou auctour of healthe remembre, that sometyme thou toke of the undefyled vyrgyne the fourme of oure bodye?' Tell me for charyte therefore, whether the fourme of our bodye he called here the kynde of our body or no?—And the Archebishop said to me, 'Wouldest thou make me to declare this texte after thy purpose, syns the Chirche hath nowe determyned, that there abideth no substance of breade after the consecration in the sacrament of the altare? beleuest thou not on this ordinance of the Churche?' And I said, Syr, what soeuer prelates haue ordered in the Church, our beleue standith euer hooll. I haue not herde that the ordinaunce of men under beleue shulde be putt in to beleue. And the Archebishop saide to me, 'Yf thou hast not learned this before, learne now to knowe that thou art out of beleue, if in this matter and other thou beleuest not as holy chirche beleueth. What saue doctours treatinge of this Sacrament?'—And I said, Syr, Seint Paule that was a greate doctour of holy chirche, speakyng to the people, and teaching them the right beleue of this moste holy Sacrament, calleth it breade that we breake. And also in the canou of the masse after the consecration, this most worthy Sacrament is called holy breade; and euey prieste in this lande, after that he hath receyued this Sacrament, saythe in thys wyse: That thyng that we haue taken with oure mouthe, we praye God that we may take it with a pure and cleue mynde; that is, as I vnderstoude, we praye God that we may receyue, thorowe very beleue, this holy Sacrament worthely. And, Syr, Seynt Augustine saith, That thing that is sene is breade: but that menneys feithe asketh to be informed of, is verye Christes body. And also Fulgence, an ententyfe doctour, saith, as it were an errour to saye that Christe was but a substance, that is, very man, and not very God, or to say, that Christe was very God, and not very man; so is it (this doctour sayth) an errour to say, that the Sacrament of the altur is but a substance. And also, Syr, accordyngly hereto in the secrete of the middle masse on Christmasse day, it is written thus: 'Idem refulsit Deus, sic terrena substantia nobis conferat quod diuinum est;' which sentence, Syr, with the secrete of the forthe ferye, quatuor temporum Septembris; I pray you, syr, declare here openly in English.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'I perceiue well ynough wher about thou art, and how the dcuell blyndeth the, that thou may not vnderstond the ordinaunce of holy churche, nor consent thereto: but I commaunde the now answere me shortly; Beleuest thou that, after the consecration of this foresaid Sacrament, there abideth substance of breade or not?'—And I said, Syr, as I vnderstond, it is all one to graunte and to beleue that there dwelleth substance of brede, and to graunte and to beleue that this most worthy Sacrament of Christes owne body is one accident withoute subjecte. But, Syr, for as makell as your asking passeth myne understanding, I dare nother denye it nor graunte it; for it is skole-mater aboute which I besyed me neuer for to know it: and therefore I commit this terme, Accidens sine subjecto, to those clerkes which delyte them so in curiouse and suttil sophistrie, because they determine oft so difficulte and straunge maters, and wade and wander so in them, from argument to argument with pro & contra, till that they wote not where they are, nor vnderstonde not them selfe: but the shame that these proude sophistrers haue to yelde them to men and before men, maketh them ofte foolis, and to be concluded shamefully before God.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'I purpose not to oblige the to the suttill argumentes of clerkes, syus thou art vnable therto: but I purpose to make the obeye to the determination of holy chirche.—And I said, Syr, by open evidence and great witness a thousand yeare after the Incarnation of Christe, the determination which I haue here before you rehearsed was accepte of holy church, as sufficient to the saluacion of all them that wolde beleue it faithfully, and worke thereafter charitably. But, Syr, the determination of this mater, which was brought in syus the Fende was losed by frier Thomas agayn, especially calling the most worshipfull Sacrament of Christes owne body an accident without subjecte, which terme syus I knowe not that Goddess laue approueth it in this mater, I dare not graunte; but vtely I denye to make this frier's sentence or ony soche other my beleue, do with me God what thou wilt.—And the Archebishop saide to me, 'Well, well, thou shalt say otherwise or that I leaue the.'

'But what saist thou to this Seconde Poynte, that is recorded against the by worthy men of Shrewisbury, saing, that thou preachest openly there, that Ymages ought not to be worshipped in ony wise?'—And I said, Syr, I preached neuer thus, nor thorow Gods grace I will not any tyme consent to thinke nor to say thus nother pryuely nor apertly: for, lo! the Lorde witnesseth by Moses, that the things which he made were righte good, and so then they were, and yet they are and shall be good, and worshipfull in their kynde; and therefore to the ende that God made them to, they are all preisable and worshipfull, and specially man, that was made after the Ymage and likeness of God, is full worshipfull in his kynde: ye this holy Ymage, that is man, God worshippeth; and herefore every man shuld worshippeth other in kynde, and also for heauenly vertues that men use charitably. Also I say, woode, tynne, gold, syluer, or any other mater that Ymages are made of, all these creatures are worshipfull in their kynde, and to the ende that God made them for; but the keryng, castyng, nor peyntyng of ony Ymagery made with mannes hande, all behit that this doing be accepte of man of hiest state and dignitie, and ordered of them to them to be a kalendar to leude men, that nother can nor will be learned to know God in his worde, nother by his creatures, nor by hys wonderfull and diuers workinges; yet this Ymagery ought not to be worshipped in the forme nor in the likeness of mannes crafte: neuertheless that every matter that painters peynte with, syus it is Gods creature, ought to be worshipped in the kynde, and to the ende that God made and ordered it to serue man.

Then the Archebishop saide to me, 'I graunte well that no body oweth to do worshippeth to any soche Ymages for them selfe; but a crucifye ought to be worshipped for the passion of Christe that is peynted therein, and so brought ther thorow to mannes mynde: and thus the Ymages of the blessed Trinitie, and of Virgin Mary, Christes mother, and other Ymages of sayntes ought to be worshipped. For lo earthly kynges and lordes, which use to send their letters ensealid with their armes, or with their preuy signet, to men that are with them, are worshipped of thes men: for whan thes men receiue their lordes letters, in whiche they se and knowe the willes and biddings of their lordes in worshippeth of their lordes they do offer their cappes to thes lettres. Why not than, sins in Ymages made with mannes hande, we may rede and knowe many diuerse thinges of God, and of his sayntes, shal we not worshippeth their Ymages?'—And I sayde with my foresaid Protestacyon, I say that these worldly visages of temporal lordes that he speake now of, maye be done in case without synne: but thys is no similitude to worship Ymages made by mannes hande, syus that Moses, Dauid, Solomon, Baruch, and other seyntes in the Bible, forbidde so pleyntyly the worshippyng of ali soche Ymages.

Then the Archebishop saide to me, 'Lewde losell, in the olde lawe, before that Christe toke mankind, was no likeness of any persone of the Trinitie, nother shewed to man nor known of man: but nowe syus Christe became man, it is lefull to haue ymages to shewe his manhode: ye though many men, which are right greate clerkes, and other also helde it an error to peynte the Trinitie, I say it is well done to make and to peynte the Trinitie in ymages. For it is great mouing of deuocion to men, to haue and to behold the Trinitie and other ymages of seyntes caruyd, caste, and peynted; for beyonde the sea are the beste peynters that euer I saw. And, syus, I tell you this is their maner, and it is a goode maner. Whan that an ymage makers hall kerue, caste in moule, or peynte ony images, he shall go to a prieste, and shryue him as clene as if he sholde than dye and take penaunce, and make some certeyn vow of fastyng or of praiynge, or of pilgrimages doinge, praiynge the prieste specially to praye for hym, that he may haue grace to make a faire and deuoute ymage.'—And I said, Syr, I doute not yf thes peynters that ye speake of, or any other peynters, vnderstode truly the texte of Moses, of Dauid, of the wise man, of Baruch, and of other seyntes and doctours, these peynters should be moued to shryue them to God wyth full inwarde sorowe of harte, takyng vpon them to doo right sharpe penaunce for the synfull and vayne crafte of peyntyng, karuyng or castyng that they had vsed, promysing God feithfully neuer to do so after, knowleging openly before all men they reprouable earning. And also, syr, thes priestes that shriue (as ye do say) peinters, and inioine them to do penaunce, and praye for their speede, promysyng to them helpe of their prayers for to be curious in their synfull craftes, syne herein more greuously than the peynters: for thes priestes do comforte and gyue them counsell to do that thyng, which of græt peyne, ye under the peyne of Goddes curse, they sholde vitterly forbydde them. For certis, syr, yf the wonder-full working of God, and the holy luyunge and teachynge of Christe, and of his apostles and prophetes, were made knowne to the people by holy luyunge, and true and besy teachynge of priestes; these thynges (syr) were sufficient boke and kalendares to knowe God by and his sayntes, without ony ymagis made with mannes hond: but certis the vicious luyunge of priestes, and their couetousnesse, are hefe cause of this error, and all other viciousnesse that reigneth among the people.

Than the Archebishop said unto me, 'I holde the a vicious priest and acurste, and all them that are of thy secte; for all priestes of holy Chirche, and all ymagis that moue men to deuocion, thou and soche other go about to destroy. Losell, ware it a feire thing to come into a Chirche, and see therein none Ymage?' And I said, Syr, they that come to the Chyrch for to pray deuoutly to the Lorde God, may in their inwarde wittes be the more feruent, that all their outward wittes be closed for all outward seyng and hearing, and fro all distroublance and lettynge. And syns Christe blessed them that saw him not bodely, and haue beleuyd feithfully in hym; it sufficeth than to all men, thorow hearing and knowing of Goddis worde, and to doo there after, for to beleue in God, though they see neuer ymagis made with mannis hande, after ony person of the Trinitie, or of ony other seynte.—And the Archebishop said to me with a feruent spyrite, 'I say to the, losell, that it right well done to make and to haue an ymage of the Trinitie, ye what saist thou? ys it is not a stiering thinge to beholde soche an ymage?'—And I said, Sir, ye said right now, that in the olde lawe, or Christe toke mankynde, no likenesse of ony person of the Trinitie was shewid to men: wherefore, sir, ye said it was not than lesfull to haue ymagis; but now ye say, syns Christe is becomen man, it is lesfull to make and to haue an ymage of the Trinitie, and also of other seyntis. But, syr, this thing wolde I learne of you, syns the Father of Heuen, ye and euery person of the Trinite was without beginnyng God Almighty, and many holy prophetis that wer dedely men wer martiresd violently in the olde lawe, and also many men and women than died holy confessours: why was it not than as lesfull and necessarie as now to haue made an ymage of the Father of Heuen, and to haue made and hadde other ymagis of marties, prophetis, and holy confessours, to haue ben kalendaris to aduise men, and move them to deuocion, as ye say that ymagis now doo?—And the Archebishop said, 'The sinagoge of Jues hadde not authorite to approue thes thyngs, as the Chirche of Christe hath the nowe.—And I said, Sir, seint Gregory was a great man in the newe lawe, and of great dignitie: and as the common lawe witnesseth, he commendid greatly a bishop, in that he forbadde vtterly the ymagis made with mannis hande, sholde be worshippid.

And the Archebishop said, 'Vngracious losell, thou fauerist no more tretteh than an hounde, syns at the roode at the northe dore at

London, at our Lady at Walsingham, and many other diuerse places in England, ar many great and preisable miracles done: shulde not the Ymagis of soche holy seyntis and placis, at the reuerence of God and our Lady, and other seyntis, be more worshippid than other placis and ymagis wher no soche miracles ar done?'—And I said, Sir, ther is no soche vertue in ony ymagery, that ony ymagis sholde herefore be worshippid: wherefore I am certain, that ther is no miracle done of God in ony place in ertle, because that ony ymagis made with mannis hande sholde be worshippid. And herefore, Sir, as I preached openly at Shrewisbury and other placis, I say now here before you, that no body sholde truste that thier war ony vertue in ymagery made with mannis hande, and herefor no body sholde vowe to them, nor seake them, nor knele to them, nor bow to them, nor pray to them, nor offer any thinge to them, nor kyse them, nor encense them: for lo the most worthy of soche ymagis, the brasen serpente by Moyses made at Goddis bidding, the goode kyng Ezechie destroyed worthily and thankfully, for byncuse it was encensed. Therefore, sir, ys men take goode hede to the writing and to the lerning of Seynt Augustine, of Seynt Gregory, and of Seynt John Chrisostome, and of other seyntis and doctours, how they speake and write of miracles that shall be done now in the last ende of the worlde, it is to dreade, that for the vnfeithfulnessse of men and women, the Fende hath great power for to worke many of the miracles that now ar done in soche placis: for bothe men and women delyte now more for to heare and knowe miracles, than they do to knowe Goddis worde, or to hear it effectuously. Wherefore to the great confusion of all them that thus doo, Christe saith, 'The gnacion of adulterers requireth tokyns, miracles and wonders.' Neuerthelesse as diuerse seyntis say, now whan the feithe of God is published in Christendome, the worde of God sufficeth to mannis saluacion without soche miracles; and thus also the worde of God sufficeth to all feithfull men and women, without ony soche ymagis. But, goode sir, syns the Father of Heuen that is God in his Godhead, is the moste unknowen thing that may be, and the moste wonderfull spyrit, hauyng in it no shape or likenesse of ony members of ony dedely creature; in what likenesse or what ymage may God the Father be shewid or peyntyd?—And the Archebishop said, 'As holy Chirche hath sufferid and yet sufferith the ymagis of all the Trinitie, and other ymagis to be peyntid and shewid, sufficeth to them thnt ar membres of holy Chirche; but syns thou art a rotten membre, cutt away from holy Chirche, thou fauerest not the ordinaunce thereof. But syns the daye passith, leaue we this matter.'

And than he said to me: 'What saist thou to the Thirde Poynte that is certified against the, preching openly in Shrewisbury, that pilgrimage is not lesful?' And ouer this thou saidist, that those men and women that go oa pilgrimage to Canterbury, to Buerley, to Karlington, to Walsingham, and to any soche other placis, ar cursed, and made foolisch, spending their goodes in waste.—And I said, sir, by this Certificacion I am accused to you, that I shoulde teache that no pilgrimage is lefull. But I said neuer thus: for I knowe that ther be trew Pilgrimage, and lefull and full plesant to God: and therefore, s.r, how so euer myne enemies haue certified you of me, I tolde at Shrewsbury of two maner of pilgrimage.—And the Archebishop said to me, ‘whom callest thou trewe pilgrimes?’ And I said, Sir, with my Protestacion I call them trewe pilgrimis trauelyn toward the blisse of Heuen, which in the state, degre or ordre that God calleth them, doo besy them faithfully for to occupie all their wittes bodely and gostely, to knowe trewly and to keape faithfully the bildinges of God, hatyng and sleynge all the seuen dedely synnes, and euery braunche of them, reuylng them vertuously (as it is said before) with all their wittes, doynge discretely, wilfully and gladly all the werkis of mercy bodely and gostely after their connyng and power, abylyng them to the gyftes of the Holy Goste, disposing them to receyue in their soules, and to holde therein the right blessinges of Christe, beseyng them to knowe and to keepe the seuen principall vertues; and so than they shall ohteyne here thorow grace for to see thankfully to God all the condicions of charitie, and than they shall be moouyd with the good spirite of God for to examyne ofte and diligently their conscience, that nother wilfully nor wittingly they erre in any article of beleue, hauyng continually (as fraite will suffer) all their besinesse to drede and to flee the offence of God, and to looue ouer all thing, and to seke euer to doo his plesant will. Of these pilgrimis I said, what so euer goode thought that they any tyme thinke, what vertuous worde that they speake, and what fruitfull worke that they worke, euery soche thoughte, worde and werke is a steppe nountered of God toward hym into Heuene. The forsaid pilgrimis of God delyte sore when they heare of seyntis or of vertuous men and women, how they forsake wilfully the prosperity of this lyfe, how they withstode the suggestion of the Fende, how they restrained their fleschly lustes; how discrete they wer in their penaunce doynge; how patient they wer in all their aduersites, how prudent they wer in counseling of men and women, moouyng them to hate all synne, and to fye them, and to shame euer greatly thereof, and to love all vertues, and to draw to them, ymaginyng how Christe and his folowers by example of hym, suffered skornis and slaunders, and how patiently they abode and toke the wrongfull manasyng of tyrantis, how homely they wer and seruisable to poore men, to relieue and comforte them bodely and gostely after their power and connyng, and how deuote they wer in prayers, how feruent they wer in heuenly desyres, and how they absented them fro spectacles of veyne seyngis, and hearingis, and how stable they were to lett and to destroye all vices, and how laborious and joifull they wer to sowe and to plante vertues. The heuenly condicions and soche other haue the pilgrimis, or endeuer them for to haue, whose pilgrimage God acceptith. And ageyne I saile, as their werkis shew the moste part of men and women that go now on pilgrimage have not thes forsaid condicions, nor loueth to besy them faithfully for to haue. For as I well know, syns I have full ofte assaide, examyne whosoever will twentie of thes pilgrinis, and he shall not fynde thra men or women that knowe surely a commaundment of God, nor can say their Pater-noster and Ave-maria, nor their Credo redely in any maner of language. And as I have learned and also know somewhat by experience of thes same pilgrinis, tellyng the cause why that many men and women go lither and thither now on pilgrimages, it is more for the helthe of their bodies than of their soules, more for to haue richesse and prosperitie of thys worlde, than for to be enryched with vertues in their soules, more to haue here worldly and fleschely friendship, than for to haue friendship of God and of his seintes in Heuen. For whatsoever thing man or woman dothe, the friendship of God, nor of any other seynthe, cannot be hadde without keeping of Goddis commaundmentis. Forther with my protestacion I say now as I said in Shrewsbury, though they that haue fleschely willes trauell for their bodies, and spende mekill money to seake and to visite the bonys or ymagis (as they say they do) of this seynte or of that; soche pilgrimage goyng is nother praisable nor thankfull to God nor to any seinte of God: syns in effect all soche pilgrimes despise God and all his commaundmentis and seyntis. For the commaundmentis of God they will nother knowe nor keape, nor conforme them to lyue vertuously by example of Christe and of his seyntis. Wherefore syr, I haue preclid and taucht openly, and so I purpose all my lyfe time to do with Gods helpe, saying that soche fond people wast blamefully Gods goodes in ther veyne pilgrimage, spending their goodes upon vicious hostelers, which ar ofte vaelene women of their bodies; and at the leste those goodes with the which thei shoulde doo werkis of mercie after Goddis bidding to poore nedy men and women. The poore mennis goodes and their lyuelode thes runners about offer to riche priestis, which haue mekill more lyuelode than they neade: and thus those goodes they waste wilfully, and spende them vjustly against Goddis bidding upon straungers, with which they sholde helpe and releue after Goddis will their poore nedy neighbours at home: ye and ouer this foly, ofte tymes diuerse men and women of thes runners thus madly hither and thither in to pilgrimage borowe hereto other mennis goodes, ye and sometyme they stele mennis goudes hereto, and they pay them neuer again. Also sir, I know well that when diuerse men and women will go thus after their own willes, and fyndyng out one pilgrimage, they will orden with them before to haue with them both men and women that can well syng waa-ton songs, and some other pilgrims will haue with them bagge pipes; so that euery towne they come throwe, what with the noyse of their synging, and with the sounde of their piping, and with the jangelyng of their Canterbury bellis, and with the barking out of doggis after them, that they make more noise than if the kyng came there awaye with all his clarions, and many other menstrelles. And if these men and women be a moneth in their pilgrimage, many of them shall be an half year after great janglers, tale-tellers and lyers.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'Leude losell, thou seest not ferre ynough in this mater, for thou considerest not the great trauell of pilgrims, therefore thou blamest that thing that is praisable. I say to the that it is right well done, that pilgrims haue with them both syngers, and also pipers, that whan one of them that goeth barfote striketh his too upon a stone and hurteth hym sore, and maketh hym to blede; it is well done that he or his fellow begyn than a songe, or else take out of his boosome a bagge-pype for to driue away with soche myrtle the hurte of his felow. For with soche solace the trauell and werinesse off pylgrymes is lightly and merily broughte forth.'—And I said, 'Sir, seynte Paule teacheth men to wepe with them that wepe.' And the abp. said, 'What janglist thou ageinst mennis deuocion? what soeuer thou or soch other say, I say that the pilgrimage that now is used, is to them that doo it a praynable and a good meane to come the rather to grace. But I holde the unable to know this grace; for thou enforcest the to lett the deuocion of the people: syns by authoritie of holy scripture men maye lefully haue and use soche solace as thou reponest. For Dauid in his laste psalme teacheth me to haue diuerse instrumentes of music for to praise therwith God.' And I saide, Sir, by the sentence of diuerse doctours expounding the psalmes of Dauid, the musike and menstrely that Dauid and other seyntes of the olde lawe spake of, owe now nother to be taken nor used by the letter, but the instrumentes with their musike ought to be interpreted gostely: for all those figures are called vertues and graces, with which vertues men sholde please God and praise his name. For saynt Paul saith, All soch thynges befehl to them in figure. Therefore sir, I understand that the letter of this psalme of Dauid, and of soche other psalmes and sentences, dothe see them that take them now letterally, This sentence I understand syr, Christ apprometh himself, putting out the menstrelles, or that he wolde quycken the deade damsell. And the abp. said to me, 'Leude losell is it not lefull to us to haue organes in the chirche for to worship therwithall God?' And I said, 'Ye, syr, by mannis ordynauce, but by the ordynauce of God, a goode sermonne to the peoples understanding were mckill more pleasant to God.' And the abp. sayde, 'that organes and good delectable songe quyckened and sharpened more mennys witts than sholde ony sermonne.' But I said, Sir, lusty men and worldly louers delyte and coeet, and use well to haue all their witts quickened and sharpened with diuerse sensible solace: but all the feithfull louers and folowers of Christe haue all their delyte to heare Goddis worde, and to vnderstand it truely, and to worke thereafter feithfully and continually. For no doute to drede to offende God, and to loue to please him in all thing, quyckeneth and sharpeneth all the wittes of Christes chosen people: and ableth them so to grace, that they ioye greatly to withdrawe their cares, and all their wittes and membres frome all worldly delyte, and from all fleschly solace: for seynt Jerome (as I thinke) saith, 'No body may ioye with this worlde, and reigne with Christe.' And the abp. (as yf he had been displeasid with myne answer) said to his clerkes, 'What gesse ye this ydiote will speake there, wher he hath nooe drede, syns he speaketh thus nowe here in my presence? Well, well, by God thou shalt be ordered for.' And than he spake to me all angerly.

'What saist thou to this Fortbe Pointe, that is certified against the, preching openly and boldly in Shrewisbury, that priestes haue no title to tythes?' And I said, 'Sir, I named ther no worde of tithes in my preaching. But, more than a moneth after that I was arreasted there in prysone, a man came to me in to the pryson askynge me what I sayde of tythes. And I saide to him, Sir, in this towne are many clerkes and priestes, of which some are called religious men, though many of them be seculers, therefore aske ye of them this question. And this man saide to me, sir, our prelates say, that we ar also obliged to pay our tythes of all things that renewe to us; and that they ar accursed, that withdrawe ony part wittingly fro them of their tythes. And I said, sir, to that man, as with my protestacyon I say now here before you, that I hadde wonder that ony prieste dare say, men to be accursed without grounde of Goddis worde. And the man said, sir, our priestes say that they curse men thus by authoritie of Goddes law. And I sayde, sir, I know not wher this sentence of cursing is authoried now in the Bible. And therefore, syr, I pray you that ye will aske the mooste conning clerke of this Towse, that ye may knowe wher this sentence cursing them that tythe not now is written in Goddes lawe: for yf it were written there, I wolde right gladly be learned where. But shortly this man wolde not go from me, to aske this question of another body; but required me there, as I wolde answer before God, if in this case the cursing of priestes wer lausful and approued of God, And shortly herewith came to my mynde the learning of seynt Peter, teaching priestes especially to halow the Lord Christ in their hartes: beinge enermore redye (as ferre as in them is) to answere thorowe faith and hope to them that aske of them a reason. And this lesson Peter teacheth men to use with a meke spyrit, and with drede of the Lord. Wherefore, syr,

I said to this man in this wise: In the old lawe which endyd not fully till the tyme that Christe rose up ageyn fro dethe to lyfe, God commaunded tythes to be gūnen to the Leuites, for the great besynesse dayly trauell that pertayned to their office. But priestes, because their trauell was mekyl more easy and light, than was the office of the Leuites, God ordeyned that priestes should take for their lifelode to do their office, the tenth part of the tythes that wer gūnen to the Leuites. But naw (I said) in the newe lawe nother Christe, nor any of his apostles tooke tythes of the people nor commaunded the people to pay tythes nother to priestes, nor to deacons. But Christe taught the people to do almesse, that is werkes of mercy, to poor nedey men, of surpluse, that is superfluousse of their temporal goodes, which they hadde more than them nedid reasonably to their necessary lyuelode. And thus (I said) not of tythes, but of pure almesse of the people Christe lyued and his apostles, when they were so besye in teachyng off the worde of God to the people, that they might not trauell other wyse for to gett their lyuelode. But after Christes ascension, and when the apostles had receuyed the Holy Goste, they traueled with their handes for to gett their lyuelode, when that they myght thus doo for besye preachyng. Therefore by example of hymselfe Seynt Paule teacheth all the priestes of Christe for to trauell with their hande, when for besye teaching of the people they myght thus do. And thus all these priests whose priestehode God accepteth nowe, or will accepte or dyd in the apostles tyme, and after their decease, will do to the worldes ende. But (as Cisterciensis telleth) in the thousande year of oure Lorde Jesu Christe, two hundreth and a leuenth yere, one pope the tenth Gregory ordered new tythes first to be gyuen to priestes now in the newe lawe. But Seynt Paule in his tyme, whose trace or example all priestes of God enforce them to folow, seyng the coueotusnesse that was among the people, desyringe to destroye this foule synne thorow the grace of God and the true vertuousse lyuynge an example of hymselfe, wrotte and taught all priestes for to folowe him as he folowed Christe patiently, willingly, and gladly in hys Pouerte. Wherefore Paule saithe thus, the Lorde hath ordered that they that preache the Gospell shall lyue of the Gospell. But we (saith Paul) that couet and besy us to be feithfull folowers of Christ, vse not this power. For lo (as Paul witnesseth afterwarde) when he was full pore and nedey preaching among the people, he was not chargeous vnto them, but with his handes he traueled not only to gett his owne lyuynge, but also the lyuynge of other poore and nedey creatures. And syns the people was never so coueotouse nor so auarouse (I gesse) as thei are now, it were good counsell, that all priestes take good hede to this heuenly learnyng of Paul, folowing him here, in wilfull pouerte, nothing charging the people for their bodely lyuelode. But because that many priestes do contrary to Paule, in this forsayde doctrine: Paul biddeth the people take hede to those preystes that folow him as he had geuen them example. As if Paul wolde say thus to the people, Accept ye none other priestes than thei that lyue after this fourme that I haue tauchte you. For certeyn in whatsoever dignitie or ordre that any prieste is in, yf he conforme him to folowe Christe and his apostles in wilful pouerte, and in other heuenly vertues, and specially in true preachyng of Goddes worde; though soche a one be named a prieste, yet he is no more but a prieste in name, for the worke of a very prieste such a one wanteth. This sentence approueth Augustine, Gregory, Chrysostome, and Lincoln, plainly.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'Thinkest thou this bolsome learninge for to sowe openly or yet priuely among the people? Certeyn this doctryne contrarieth playnly the ordinaunce of holy Fathers, which haue ordered, graunted and licensed priestes to be in diuerse degrs, and to lyue by tythes and offrynges of the people, and by other deuties.'—And I said, Syr, if priestes were now in mesurable mesure and nombre, and lyued vertuously, and taucht besyly and truly the word of God by example of Christ, and of his apostles, withouten tythes, offrynges, and other deuties that now chalenge and take, the people wolde gyue them freely sufficient lyuelode.

And a Clerke said to me, 'How wilt thou make this good that the people will gyue frely to priestes their lyuelode, syns that now by the lawe every prieste can scarcely constrayne the people to gyue them their lyuelode?'—And I said, Sir, it is now no wonder, though the people grudge to gyue priestes the lyuelode that they aske; for mekill people knowe now how that priestes shulde lyue, and how that they lyue contrary to Christe and to his apostles: and therefore the people is full heuy to paye (as they do) their temporall goodes to persones, and to other vicares and priestes, which sholde be feithfull dispensatours of the pashes goodes, taking to themselves no more but a scarce lyuing of tythes nor of offrynges by the ordinaunce of the comun lawe. For whatsoever priestes take of the people, be it tythe or offering, or any other deutie or seruyce, the priestes ought not to haue thereof no more but a bare lyuing, and to parte the residew to the poore men and women specially of the parishe, of whom they take this temporal lyuynge. But the most dele of priestes nowe wasteth their pashes goodes, and spendeth them at their owne will after the worlde in their veyne lustes, so that in few places poore men haue dewly (as they sholde haue) their owne sustenance, nother of tythes nor of offrynges, nor of other large wages and foundations that priestes take of the people in diuerse maners aboute it, that they neede for nedeful sustenance of meat and clothinge. But the poore nedey people ar forsaken, and left of priestis to be susteynd of the paroshenis as if the priestis toke nothing of the paroshenis, for to help the poor people with. And thus, syr, into ouer great chargis of the paroshenis they pay their temporal goods twice, wher ones myght suffice, if priestis wer trow dispensatours. Also sir, the paroshenis that pay ther temporal goodes (be they tythes or offeringes) to priestis that doo not their office among them justly, are parteners of euery synne of those priestis; because that they susteyne those priestis soly in their synne with their temporal goods. Yf these things be well considerid, what wonder is it than, syr, if the paroshenis grudge ageinst thes dispensatours?

Then the Archebishop said to me, 'Thou that shouldest be judged and reuled by holy chirche, presumptuously thou demest holy chirche to haue erryd in the ordinaunce of tythes and other dewties to be payd to pristis. It shall be long or thou thryue losell, that thou despicest thy gostely mother, how darist thou speake this losell among the people? Ar not tythes geuyn to pristis for to lyue by?'—And I said, Sir, Seynt Paul saith that tythes wer gyuen in the old lawe to Leuites and to the priestis, that came of the lynage of Leui; but our priest he saith came not of the lynage of Leui, but of the lynage of Juda; to which Juda no tythes wer promised to be geuyn. And therefore Paul saith, syns the priesthode is chaunged from the generacion of Leui to the generacion of Juda, it is necessary that chaunging also be made of the lawe. So that priestis lyue now without tythes and other dewties that they now claime, folowinge Christe and his apostles in wilfull pouertie, as they haue geuyn them example. For syns Christe lyued all the tyme of his preaching by pure almes of the people, and by example of hym his apostles lyued all the same wyse, or els by the trauell of their handis, as it is said aboue, euery prieste whose priesthode Christe approuyth knowith well, and confessith in worde and in werke, that a disciple owyth not to be aboue his master; but it sufficeth to a disciple to be as his master, symple and pure, meke and patient; and by example specially of his master Christe, euery priest should reule hym in all his luyng, and so after his connyng and power a prieste sholde besy him to enfourne, and to reule whome soeuer he myght charitably.

And the Archebishop said to me with a great spyrite, 'Goddis curse haue thou and myne for this teacling; for thou woldist hereby make the olde law more fre and perfect than the new lawe. For thou saist that it is lefull to Leuites and to priestis to take tythes in the old lawe, and so to enjoye their privileges; but to us priestis in the new lawe thou saist it is not lefull to take tythes: and thus thou geuiest Leuites of the olde lawe more fredome than to priestis of the new lawe.'—And I said, Sir, I wervell that ye vnderstonde this playne text of Paul thus. Ye wote well, that the Leuites and priests in the olde lawe that tooke tythes, wer not so fre nor so perfite as Christe and his apostles that tooke no tythes. And sir, there is a doctour (I thinke that it is Seynt Jerome) that saith thus, The priestis that chalenge now in the new lawe tythes, say in effecte, that Christe is not becomen man, nor that he hath yet suffered dethe for mannis loue. Wherfore this doctour saith thys sentence, Syns tythes were the hyres and wagis lymited to Leuites and to priestes of the olde lawe for bearing about of the tabernacle, and for sleayng and fleayng of beastis, and for burning of sacrifice, and for keeping of the temple, and for tromping of battell before the oste of Israel, and other diuerse obseruaucis that pertainyd to their office; those priestis that will chalenge or take tythes, denye that Christe is comen in fleshe, and doo the priestis office of the old lawe for whome tythes wer graunted; for els (as this doctour saith) priestis take now tythes wrongfully.

And the Archebishop said to his clerkes, 'Herde ye euer losell speake thus? Certeyn this is the learnyng of them all, that wher so ever they come, and they may be suffered, they enforce them to expunge the fredome of Holy Chirche.'—And I said, Sir, why call you the takyng of Tythes, and of soche other dewties that priestes chalenge now wrongfully, the fredome of Holy Chirche? syns nother Christe nor his apostles chalengid nor tooke soche dewties. Herefore thes takyngs of priestis now ar not callyd justly the fredome of Holy Chirche; but all soche geuyng and takyng ought to be called and holden the sclauderous couetousnesse of men of the Holy Chirche.—And the Archebishop said to me, 'Why losell wilt not thou and other that ar confedered with the, seake out of Holy Scripture, and of the sentence of doctours, all sharp authorities ageinst lordis, and knyghtis, and squyeris, and ageinst other secler men, at thou doeste ageinst priestes?' And I said, Sir, what so euer men or women, lordis or ladies, or any other that ar present in our preaching specially, or in our communying, after our connyng we tell out to them their office and their charges, but syr, syns Chrisostome saith, that priestis ar the stomake of the people, it is needfull in preaching and also in communying, to be most besy about this priesthode, syns by the viciousnes of priestis both lordis and commons ar moste synfully infected and ledde into the worste: And because that the couetousnes of priestis, and pride and the boste that they haue and make of their dignity and power, destroieth not only the vertues of priesthode in priestis themselfe, but also ouer this, it stiereth God to take greate vengeance both upon lordis and comons, which suffer thes priestes charitably.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'Thou judgest euery prieste proude that will not go arayed as thou doste. By God I deme hym to be more meke that goeth euery day in a scarlet gowne, than thou in that threde bard blew gowne. Whereby knowest thou a proude mam?'—And I said, Sir, a proude prieste may be knowen when he denyeth to folowe Christe and his apostles in wilfull pouerte and other

vertues, and couetith worldly worship, and taketh it gladly, and gatherih to gither with pletyng, monasyng, or with flattering, or with simony any worldly goodes: and woste if a prieste besy hym not chefully in himself, and after in all other men and women, after his conyng and power to withstond synne.—And the Archebishop said to me, 'Though thou knewest a prieste, to haue all thes vices, and though sawest a prieste louely lye now by a woman, knowing hir fleschly; woldest thou herfore deme this prieste dampnable? I say to the, that in the tournyng about of thy hande soche a synner may be verily repented.'—And I said, Sir, I will not dampne any man for any synne that I knowe done or may be done, so that the synner leweth his synne. But by an thoricie of holy Scripture, he that synneth thus openly as ye shew here, is dampnable for doying of soche a synne, and most especially a prieste that sholde be example to all other for to hate and fle synne; and in how short tyme that euer ye say that soche a synner may be repented, he oweth not of hym that knoweth not his synnyng to be judged verily repentaunt, without open euidence of greate shame and hartly sorow for his synne. For whosoouer, and specially a prieste that vseth pride, enuy, couetousnes, lechery, simony, or any other vices; and shewith not as opyn euidence of repentaunce as he hath gyuen euyll example and occasion of synning, if he contynew in any soche synne as long as he may, it is likely that synne leueth hym, and he not synne; and as I vnderstonde, soche a one synneth unto dethe, for whome no body oweth to pray, as Seynt John saith.—And a Clerke said than to the Archebishop, 'Sir, the lenger that ye appose him, the worse he is; and the more that ye besy you to amende him, the waiwarder he is: for he is of so shrewde a kynde, that he shamyth not onely to be himself a foule neste, but without shame be besieth him to make his neste fouler.' And the Archebishop said to his clerke, 'Suffer a while, for I am at an ende with him: for there is one other poynte certified ageynst hym, and I will heare what he saith thereto.'

And so than he said to me, 'Lo it is here certified agaynst the, that thou preachidst openly at Shrewisbury, that it is not lefull to swear in any case.'—And I said, Sir, I preached neuer so openly, nor I haue not tauchte in this wise in any place. But sir, as I preachid in Shrewisbury with my protestacion I say to you now here; that by the thoricie of the Gospel and of Seynt James, and by witnessse of diuerse Seyntis and doctours, I haue preachid openly in one place or other, that it is not lefull in any case to swear by any creature. And ouer this, sir, I haue also preachid and tauchte by the forsaid authorities, that no body sholde swear in any case; if that without othe in any wyse be that is charged to swear myght excuse hym to them that haue power to compell hym to swear in lefull thyng and lafull. But if a man may not excuse hym without othe to them that haue power to compell hym to swear, than he

And than a Clerke asked me yf it wer not lefull to a subjecte at the bidding of his prelate for to knele down and touche the holy gospell booke and kysse it, saying, 'So heple me God and his holy Dome;' for he sholde after his conyng and power do all thyng that his prelate commaundeth hym.—And I said to them, 'Sirs, ye speke here full generally or largely: What if a prelate commaunded his subjecte to doo an unlawfull thyng, should he obey thereto?

And the Archebishop said to me, 'A subjecte ought not to suppose that this prelate will bidde him doo an unlawfull thing; for a subject ought to thinke, that his prelate will bidde hym doo nothing but that he will answer for before God that it is lefull; and than though the bidding of the prelate be unefull, the subject hath no parell to fulfill it, syns that he thinketh and judgeth that what so euer thing his prelate biddeh him doo, that it is lefull to hym for to doo it.' And I said, Sir, I truste not hereto. But to our firste purpose, Sir, I tell you that I was onys in a gentill mannis house, and there war than two Clerkes there, a master of diuinite, and a man of lawe, which man of lawe was also communing in diuinite; and among other thinges thes men spake of othes, and the man of lawe said, At the bidding of his souereign which hadde power to charge hym to swear, he wold lay his hand upon a booke, and heare his charge: and if his charge to his understandinge were unefull he wold hastily withdrawe his hande from the booke: and if he perceived his charge to be lefull, he wold holde still his hande upon the booke, takyng there only God to witnessse, that he wold fulfill that lefull charge after his power. And the master of diuinitie said than to hym thus, Certeyn he that leyeth his hande upon a booke in this wyse, and makyth there a promesse to doo that thing that he is commaunded, is obliged there by booke othe than to fulfill his charge. For no doute he that chargeth hym to lay his hande thus upon a booke touchyng the booke and swearing by it, and kysing it, promising in this fourme to doo this thyng or that, will say and witnessse that he that towcheth thus a booke and kysseth it, hath sworne upon that booke: and all other men that see that man thus doo, and also all tho that heare hereof in the same wyse, will saye and witnessse, that thys man hath sworne upon a boke: wherfore the master of diuinite sayde, it was not lefull nother to gyue nor to take any soche charge upon a boke, for euery boke is nothing els but diuerse creatures of whiche it is made of. Therefore to swear upon a boke, is to swear by creatures, and this swearinge is euer unefull. This sentence witnesseth Christostome, plainly blaming them greatly that bring forthe a boke for to swear upon, charginge Clerkes that in no wise they constraune any body to swear, whether they think a man to swear true or false.—And the Archebishop and his Clerkes scorned me, and blamyd me greatly for this saiyng. And the Archebishop manassed me with great punishment and sharpe, except I lefte this opinion of swearing. And I saide, Sir, this is not myne opinion, but it is the opinion of Christe our Sauyour, and of Seynt Jamis and of Christosome, and other diuerse Seyntes and doctours.

Than the Archebishop badde a Clerke rede the Homely of Christosome, which homely thys clerke helde in his hande written in a Roll, which rolle the archebishops caused to be taken fro my felow at Canterbury; and so than this clerke redde this Roll till he came to a clause, wher Christosome saithe, that it is synne to swere well. And than a clerke (Malueren, as I gesse) said to the Archebishop, 'Sir, I pray you wete of him, how that he vnderstondeth Christosome here, saing it to be synne to swere well.'—And so the Archebishop asked me how I vnderstode here Christosome. And certeyne I was somewhat afraide to answere hereto, for I had not beyed me to study about the sense thereof; but lifyng up my mynde to God, I prayed him of grace. And as faste as I thought how Christe said to his Apostles, 'When for my name ye shall be brought before Judges, I shall gyue into your mouth wisdom, that your aduerserayes shall not ageynst saye;' and trusting feithfully in the worde of Gode, I said, Sir, I know well that many men and women haue now swearing so in custome, that they know not nor will not knowe that they do euell for to swere as they do; but they thinke and say that they do well for to swere as they do, though they know well that they swere vntreuly. For they saye, they may by their swearing (though it be false) voide blame or temporall harme, which they sholde haue yf they swere not thus. And, Sir, many men and women maynteyne strongly that they swere well, whan that thing is sothe that they swere for. Also full many men and women now say, that it is well done to swear by creatures, whan they may not (as they saye) otherwise be beleued. And also full many men and women now say, that it is well done to swere by God, and by our Ladye, and by other seyntes, for to haue them in mynde. But syns all these sayynges are but excusations and synne, me thinketh, sir, that this sentenco of Christosome may be alleged welle ageynste all soch swerers, witnessing that all thes synne greuouly, though they thinke themselves for to swear in this forsaid wyse well. For it is euyll done and great synne for to swere trewthe, whan in any manner a man may excuse him without othe.

And the Archebishop said, that Christosome might thus vnderstode. And than a Clerke said to me, 'Wilt thou tarye my lorde no lenger, but submit the here mekely to the ordinance of holy chirche, and laye thyne hande upon a booke touching the holy gossell of God, promysinge not onely with thyne mouth, but also with thyne harte to stande to my lordes ordinance?' And I said, Sir, haue I not told you here, how that I herde a master of diuinitie say that in soche a case it is all one to touche a boke, and to swere by a boke? And the Archebishop said, 'There is no master of diuinitie in England so great, that yf he hold this opinion before me, but I shall punishe him as I shall do the, except thou swere as I shall charge the.' And I said, Sir, is not Christosome an ententyfe doctour? And the Archebishop said 'Ye.' And I sayde, Yf Christosome proueth hym woorthly great blame that bryngeth forthe a boke to swere upon, it muste nedes folowe that he is more to blame that sweareth on that boke. And the Archebishop said, 'Yf Christosome ment accordingly to the ordinance of holy chirche, we will accepte him.'

And than said a Clerke to me, 'Ys not the worde of God and God himself equipollent, that is, of one autorite?' And I saide, Ye. Than he said to me, 'Why wilt thou not swere than by the gossell of God, that is Gods worde, syns it is all one to swere by the worde of God, and by God himselfe?' And I said, Sir, syns I may not nowe otherwise be beleued but by swearynge, I perceyue (as Augustine saithe) that it is not spedefull that ye that shold be my brothern sholde not beleue me: therefore I am redy by the worde of God, (as the Lorde commaunded me by his worde) to swere.—Than the Clerke said to me, 'Laye than thyne hande upon the boke, touching the Holy Gossell of God, and take thy charge.' And I said, Sir, I vnderstode that the holy gossell of God may not be touched with mannes hande. And the Clerke saide, I fonded, and that I sayde not trewthe. And I asked this Clerke, whether it wer more to reade the gossell, or to touche the gossell. And he said, it was more to reade the gossell.

Than I said, Sir, by autorite of Seynt Jerome, the gossell is not the gossell for reding of the letter; but for the beleue that men haue in the worde of God, that it is the gossell that we beleue, and not the letter that we rede: for because the letter that is touched with mannes hande is not the gossell, but the sentence that is verely beleued in mannis hart is the gossell. For so Seynt Jerome saith, the gossell that is the vertue of Goddes worde is not the leauys of the boke, but it is in the root of reason. Nother the gossell (he saith) is in the writing aboue of the letters; but the gossell is in the marking of the sentence of scriptures. This sentence approueth Seynt Paule, sayyng thus, the kingdome of God is not in worde, but in vertue. And after Dauid saith, the voice of the Lorde, that is his worde, is in vertue. And after Dauid saith, thorow the worde of God, the Heauens were fourmed, and in the spirite of his mouth is all the vertue of them. And I pray you, syr, vnderstode ye well how Dauid saith, that in the spirite of the mouthe of the Lorde is all the vertue of angels and of men?

And the Clerke said to me, 'Thou woldest make us to fonde with thee: saye we not that the gossellis are written in the masse-boke?' And I sayde, Syr, though men use to saye thus, yet it is unperfyte speche. For the principall parte of a thinge is properlye the hool thynge: for lo, mannes soule, that may not now be sene here, nor touched with any sensible thing, is properly man. And all the vertue of a tree is in the roote thereof, that maye not be sene; for do awaye the roote, and the tree is destroyed. And, syr, as ye sayde to me right now, God and hys worde are of one authoritie; and, syr, Seynte Jerome witnesseth that Christe, very Godde and very man, is hidde in the letter of his lawe: thus also, syr, the gospell is hidde in the letter. For, syr, as it is full likely many diuerse men and women here in the erthe touched Christe, and sawe hym and knewe his bodeley persone, which nother touched nor sawe, nor knewe ghostely his Godhede; right thus, syr, many men now touche and see, and write and rede the scriptures of Goddis lawe, whiche nother touche, see nor rede effectuallye the gospell. For as the Godhede of Christe, that is the vertue of God, is known by the vertue of thorowe belefe, so is the gospell, that is Christes worde.

And a Clerke said to me, 'Thes be full mystic matters, and unsuery, that thou shewest here to vs.' And I said, Sir, if ye that ar masters know not playly this sentence, ye may sore die for the kingdome of Heuene be taken fro you, as it was fro the princes of priestes, and fro the elders of the Jewes.—And than a Clerke (as I gesse Malueren) sayde to me, 'Thou knowest not thyn equiuocacyons, for the kyngdome of Heuene hathe diuerse vnderstandinges. What callest thou the kingdome of Heuene, in this sentence that thou shewest here?' And I said, Sir, by good reason and sentence of doctours, the realm of Heuene is called here the vnderstanding of Godes worde.—And a Clerke said to me, 'Frome whome thinkest thou that this vnderstandinge is taken awaye?' And I said, Sir, by authorite of Christe himselfe, the effectull vnderstandinge of Christes worde is taken awaye from all them chesely, whiche are greete lettered men, and presume to vnderstonde high thynge: and will be holden wise men, and desyre master-shippe and hys state and dignite; but they will not informe them to the lyuyng and teaching of Christe and his apostles.

Than the Archebishop said, 'Well, well, thou wilt iudge thy souereyns. By God the kyng doeth not his deutie, but he suffer the to be condemned.' And than another Clerke said to me, 'Why on Friday that last was, counseldest thou a man of my lordes, that he sholde not shrieue him to man, but only to God?'—And with this asking I was abashed, and than by and by I-kawee that I was suttely betrayed of a man that came to me in presone on the Friday before, comunyng with me in thys matter of confession; and certayn by his wordes (I th: nighte) that this man came than to me of full feruent and charitable will: but now I knowe he came to tempt me, and to accuse me (God forgyue him, yf it be his will). And with all myne haitte whan I hadde thoughte thus, I said to this clerke, Sir, I pray you that ye wolde fetche this man hitler; and all the wordes as nere as I can repete them, which that I spake to hym on Fridaye in the pryson, I will reherse nowe here before you all, and before hym.

And (as I gesse) the Archebishop said than to me, 'They that are nowe here suffyse to repete them: how unildest thou to him?' And I said, Sir, that man came and asked me of diuerse thynge; and after his askynge I answered hym (as I vnderstoode) that goode was: and as he shewed to me by his wordes, he was sory of his lyuyng in courte, and right heuy for his owne vicious lyuyng; and also for the viciousnesse of other men, and speciallye of priestes euyl lyuyng: and herefore he sayde to me with a sorrowfull harte (as I gessed) that he purposed fully within shorte tyme for to leaue the court, and besy him to knowe Gods lawe, and to conforme all his lyfe thereafter. And whan he hadde said to me thes wordis and mo other, which I wolde reherse and he wer present, he praid me to heare his confession. And I said to hym, Sir, wherefore come ye to me to be confessed of me? ye wote well that the archebishop puttith and holdeth me here as one unworthy, other to gyue or to take any sacrament of holy chirche. And he said to me, 'Brother I wote well, and so wote many mo other, that you and soche other ar wrongfully vexed, and herefore I will comon with you the more gladly.' And I said to hym, Certeyn I wote well that many men of this court, and speciallye the priestis of this householde, wolde be full euyl a payde, both with you and with me, if they wiste that ye wer confessed of me. And he said that he cared not therefore, for he hadde full little affection in them: and (as me thought) he spake thes wordis, and many other, of so goode will, and of so hys desire, for to haue knownen and done the pleasant will of God. And I said than to hym, as with my foresaid protestacion I say to you now here; Sir, I counsell you for to absente you frome all euyl company, and to drawe you to them that loue and besy them to knowe and to keape the preceptis of God; and than the good Spirite of God will moue you for to occupie besily all your wittes, in gathering to gither of all your synnes, as far as ye can bethinke you, slamyng greatly of them and sorrowyng hartely for them, ye, sir, the holy Goste will than put in your harte a good will, and a feruent desyre for to take and to holde a good purpose to hate euer, and to fie (after your conyng and power) all occasion of synne: and so than wysdome shall come to you frome aboue, lightenyng with diuerse beamis of grace, and of heuently desyre, all your wittes, enfourmyng you how ye shall truste stedfastely in the mercie of the Lorde, knowledgyng to him onely all your vicious lyuyng, praying to him euer deuoutely of charitable counsell and continuance, hoping without doute, that yf ye contynew thus besyng you feithfully to knowe and to kepe his bidding, that he will (for he only may) forgyue you all your synnes. And this man said than to me, Though God forgyue men their synnes, yet it behoueth men to be assoyled of priestis, and to doo the penance that they enjoyne them. And I said to him, Sir, it is all one to assoyle men of their synnes, and to forgyue men their synnes: wherefore syns it pertainyth onely to God to forgyue synne, yt suffisith in this case to counsell men and women for to leave their synne, and to comforte them that besye them thus to doo, for to hope steadfastly in the mercie of God. And ageynward, priestis owght to tell sharply to customeable synners, that if they will not make an ende of their synne, but contynue in diuerse synnes while that they may synne, all soche deserue peyn without any ende. And herfore priestis shoulde euer besy them to liue well and holily, and to teache the people besely and trawly the worde of God, shewing to all folke in open preaching, and in preuy counsel- yng, that the Lorde God onely forgeuyth synne. And therfore those priestis that take upon them to assoyle men of their synnes, blas- pheme God: syns that it pertainyth only to the Lorde to assoyle men of all their synnes. For no doubte a thousande yeare after that Christe was man, no prieste of Christe durste take upon hym to teach the people nother pruely nor apertely, that they behouoyd nedis to come to be assoild of them, as priestis now doo. But by authoritie of Christis worde, priestis bound indured customeable sinners to euerlasting peyns, which in no tyme of their luyng worde besy them faithfully to know the biddinges of God, nor to keape them. And ageyn, all they that would occupie all their wittes, to hate and to flie occasion of synne, dreding over all things to offend God, and loouyng for to please him continually, to thes men and women, priestis shewid how the Lorde assoilleth them of all their synnes. And thus Christe promised to conferme in heuen all the binding and loosyng, that priestis by authorite of his worde bynde men in synne that ar indured therein, or loose them out of synne here upon erthe that ar verely repentaunt. And this man hearing thes wordis said, that he myght well in conscience consent to this sentence; but he said, Is it not needful to the lay people that cannot thus doo, to go shriue them to priestis? And I said, Yf a man feale himself so distrobled with ony sinne that he cannot by his owne witte auoide this synne without counsell of them that ar herein wyser than he, in soche a case the counsell of a goode prieste is full necessarie. And if a good prieste faile, as they do now commonly, in soche a case seynt Augustine saith that a man may lefully comon and take counsell of a verteuos secular man; but certeyn that a man or woman is euer laden and to bestely, which cannot brynge their own synnes into their mynde, besyng them night and day for to hate and to forsake all their synnes, doyng a sighe for them after their connyng and power. And, sir, full accordingly to this sentence, upon Mid- lenton Sunday two yeare (as I gesse) now agone,

I harde a monke of Feuersham, that men called Moredon, preache at Canterbury at the crosse within Christe-Church abbey, sayng thus of confession: As thorow the suggestion of the fende, without counsell of any other body, that of themself many men and women can yma- gine, and fynde meanys and wayes inough to come to pride, to theste, to lecheite, and to other diuerse vyces: in contrarie wyse this monke said, syns the Lorde God is more redy to forgyue synne, than the fende is or may be of power to moue ony body to synne, than who so euer will shame and sorow hartely for their synnes, knouledging them faithfully to God, anending them after their power and connyng, without counsell of any other body than of God and hymself, thorow the grace of God, all soche men and women may fynde sufficient meanys to come to Goddis mercie, and so to be cleane assoild of all their synnes. This sentence I said, Sir, to this man of yours, and the selfe wordis as were as I can gesse.

And the Archebishop said, 'Holy Chirche approueth not this learyng.' And I said, Sir, Holy Chirche of which Christ is hed in heuen and erthe, must nedys approue this sentence. For lo hereby all men and women may, if they will, be sufficiently tauchte to know and to kepe the commaundementis of God, and to hate and to flie continewally all occasion of synne, and to looue and to seke vertues besely, and to beleue in God stably, and to truste in his mercy stedfastly, and so to come to per- fite charitie, and contynue therein perseue- rently. And more the Lorde askith not of ony inan here now in this lyfe; and certeyn, syns Jesu Christe dyed upon the crosse wil- fully to make men fre, men of the chirche ar to bolde to besy to make men thrall, hynding them under the peyns of endless curse (as they say) to doo many obseruaunces and ordi- nancis, which nother the luyng nor teaching of Christe, nor of his Apostles approueth.

And a Clerke said than to me, 'Thou shew- ist playnely here thy disceite which thou haste learyd of them that trauell to sowe popill among wheate. But I counsell the to go away clene frome this learning, and submyt the lowly to my lorde, and thou shalt fynde hym yet to be gracious to the.' And as faste than another Clerke said to me, 'How wast thou so bolde at Paulis Crosse in London, to stonde there harde with thi tippet bounden about thyne hedde, and to repreue in his sermonne the woorthy clerke Aleerton, drawyng away all that thou myghtist; ye and the same day, at after- none thou metyng that woorthy doctour in Wutlyng-strete, callidst hym false flaterer and ypocrite.'—And I said, Sir, I thynk certainly that there was no man nor wooman that hated verely synne, and loouyd vertues, hearing the sermonne of the clerke of Oxforde, and also Alkerton's sermonne; but they sayd or might justly say, that Alkerton reprouyd the clerke untrewly, and sclaudered hym wrong- fully and uncharitably. For no doute if the luyng and teaching of Christe chiefly, and of his apostles he trewe, no body that looueth God and his lawe, will blame any sentence that the clerke than preachid there, syns by authorite of Goddis worde, and by approued seyntis and doctours, and by open reason, this clerke approued all thingis clerly that he preached there.

And a Clerke of the Archebishops said to me, 'His sermonne was false, and that he shewith openly, syns he dare not stande forthe, and defende his preaching that he then preached there.' And I said, Sir, I thinke that he purposith to stande stedfastly thereby, or els he sclaundereth foully hym self, and also many other that haue great truste, that he will stande by the trewth of the gospel. For I wote well his sermonne is written both in Latyne and in Englysch, and many man haue it, and they sett great pryse thereby. And sir, if ye wer present with the Archebishop at Lambeth when his clerke apeted, and was at his answer before the Archebishop, ye wote well that this clerke denyed not there his sermonne? but two days he maynteinyd it before the Archebishop and his clerkis.—And than the Archebishop, or one of his clerkis said, I wote not which of them, that harlot shall be met with for that sermonne. For no man but he and thou, and soche other false harlotis praisith ony soche preaching.

And than the Archebishop said, 'Your cursed secte is besy, and it joieth right greatly to contrarie, and to destroye the priuilege and fredome of holy chirche.'—And I said, Sir I knowe no man that trauell so besely as this secte dothe (which you repreue) to make rest and peace in holy chirche. For pride, couetousness and simony which distrooble moste holy chirche, this secte hatith and flethe, and trauellith besely to moue all other men in lyke maner unto meaknesse; and wilfull pouerte and charite, and fre ministryng of the sacramentis, this secte louyth and vsith, and is full besy to moue all other folkis thus to doo. For the vertues owe all membres of holy chirche to their hedde Christe.

Than a Clerke said to the Archebishop, 'Sir, it is ferre daics, and ye haue ferre to ryde to nyght: therefore make an ende with him, for he will none make. But the more, sir, that ye besy you for to drawe hym toward you, the more contumax he is made, and the ferder from you.' And than Malueren said to me, 'William knele down and praye my lorde of grace, and leaue all thy fantasies, and become a childe of holy chirche.' And I said, Sir, I haue praied the Archebishop ofte, and yet I pray hym for the loue of Christe, that he will leaue his indignacion that he hathe ageinst me; and that he will suffer me after my connyng and power, for to doo myne office of priestehode, as I am chargid of God to do it. For I couete nought els but to serve my God to his pleasing, in the state that I stand in, and haue taken me to.

And the Archebishop said to me, 'Yf of good harte thou wilt submyt the now here mekely to be reulid from this tyme forthe by my

counsell, obeyng meekly and wilfully to myne ordinaunce, thou shalt fynde it moste profitable and best to the for to doo thus. Therefore tary thou me no lenger, graunte to doo this that I haue said to the now here shortly, or deny it utterly.' And I said to the abp., Sir, owe we to beleue that Jezu Christe was, and is very God and very man? And the abp. said, Ye. And I said, Sir, owe we to beleue, that all Christis luyyng and his teaching is trewe in euery poynte? And he said, Ye. And I said, Sir, owe we to beleue, that the luyyng of the apostles, and the teaching of Christe, and of all the prophetes, are true, which are written in the Bible for the health and saluacion of Goddes people? And he said, Ye. And I said, Syr, owe all Christen men and women after their connyng and power for to conforme all their luyyng to the teaching specially of Christe, and also to the teaching and luyyng of his apostles, and of prophetes, in all thinges that are pleasaunt to God, and edification to his church? And he said, Ye.

And I said, Sir, ought the doctrine, the bidding or the counsell of ony body to be accepted or obeid unto, excepte this doctrine, thes biddinges or this counsell may be graunted and affermed by Christes luyyng and his teaching specially, or by the luyyng and teaching of his apostles and prophetes? And the Archebishop said to me, 'Other doctrine ought not to be accepted, nor we owe not to obey to any unnes bidding or counsell, except we can perceyue that this bidding or counsell accordeth with the bidding and teaching of Christe, and of his apostles and prophetes.' And I said, Sir, is not all the learninge and biddinges and counsellis of holy chirche meanes and healfull remedies to know and to withstond the preuy suggestions, and the aperte temptacions of the fende; and also wayes and healfull remedies to flee pride, and all other dedely synnes, and the braunches of them, and souereyn meanes to purchase grace, for to withstonde and ouercome all the fleschly lustes and mouynges? And the abp. said, Ye. And I said, Sir, whatsoever thing ye or ony other body bid or counsell me to do, accordingly to this foresaid learning, after my connyng and power throwe the helpe of God I will mekely with all myne harte obey thereto. And the Archebishop sayde to me, 'Submitt the than now here mekely and wilfully to the ordinaunce of holy chirche, which I shall shewe to the.' And I said, Sir, accordingly as I haue here now before you rehersed, I will now be redy to obey full gladly to Christe the hedde of all holy chirche, and to the learninge and biddynges and counsellis of euery pleasyng membre of hym.

Than the Archebishop striking with his honde ferselye upon a cupborde, spake to me with a greate spyrite, saying, 'By Jezu, but yf thou leaue soche addicions obliging the now here, without ony excepcion to myne ordinaunce, or that I go out of this place, I shall make the as sure as ony thefe that is in the pryson of Lantern. Aduyse the now what thou wilt do:' and

than as if he had ben angered, he went fro the cupborde where he stode to a wyndowe.

And than Malueren and another clerke came nerer me, and they spake to me many wordes full plesently: and another while they manased me, and counselled full besily to submyt me, or els they sayde, I shoulde not escape ponishing ouer mesure; for they saide I shoulde be degraded, cursed and burned, and so than dampned. But now they said, thou maiste eschewe all these mischeues, yf thou wilt submit the wilfully and mekely to thys worthy prelate that hath cure of the soule. And for the pytie of Christe (said they) be-thinke the, howe great clerkes the bishop of Lincoln, Herford, and Purney, wer and yet are, and also B. that is a well vnderstondinge man, which also haue forsaken and reuoked all the learnynge and opinions, that thou and soche other holde. Wherefore syns eche of them is mekill wyser than thou arte, we counsell the for the beste, that by the example of this four clerkes thou folowe them, submyttinge the as they did.—And one of the bishopes clerkes said than there, that he herde Nicoll Herforde say, that syns he forsokke and reuoked all the learning and Lolardes opinions, he hathe had mekill greater favour, and more delyste to holde against them, than euer he hadde to holde with them while he helde with them.—And therefore Malueren said to me, ‘I vnderstonde and thou wilt take the to a priest, and shryue the clene; forsake all soch opinions, and take thy penance of my lord here, for the holding and teaching of them, with in shorte tyme thou shalt be greatly confortid in this doing.’

And I said to the Clerkes that thus besyly counselled me to folow these forsaide men, Sirs, if thes men, of whome ye counsell me to take example, had forsaken benefices of temporall profyte, and of worldly worshippe, so that they had absented them and eschewed frome all occasyons of couetousnesse, and of fleschely lustes, and had taken them to synple luyng, and wilfull pouerte, they hadde herein geuen goode example to me, and to many other to haue folowed them. But now, syns all thes foure men haue slaundersovly and shamefully done the contrarye, consentyng to receyue and to haue and to holde temporall benefices, luyng now more worldly and more fleschely than they did before, conformyng them to the maners of this worlde; I forsake them herein, and in all their forsaid slaundersous doynge. For I purpose with the help of God into remission of all my synnes and of my soule cursed luyng, to hate and to flye prively and apertly, to folow thes men, teaching and counsellyng whome soeuer that I may for to flye and eschewe the waye that they haue chosen to go in, whiche will lede them to the worste ende, if in conuenient tyme they repente them not, verely forsakyng and reuokynge openly the slaunder that they haue put and euery daye yet put to Christes Church. For certeyn so open blasphemye and slaunder as they haue spoken and done in their reuokynge and forsakyng of the trewthe, ought not, nor maye not priuely be amended dewly. Wherefore, sirs, I praye you that ye besye you not for to moue me to folowe these these men in reuokynge and forsakyng of the trewth and sothefastenesse as they haue done and yet doo, wherein by open euvidence they steire God to great wrothe, and not onely ageynst them selfe but also ageynste all them that fauoure them or consente to them herein, or that comoneth with them, except it be for their amendement. For whereas thes men firste were persued of enemyes, now they haue obliged them by othe for to slaunder and persue Christe in his members. Wherefor as I truste stedfastely in the goodnes of God, the worldly couetousnesse, and the lustie luyng, and the slyding fro the treuth of these runagates, shall be to me and to many other men and women an example, and an euidence to stonde the more stify by the trewth of Christe. For certeyn, right many men and women doo marke and abhorre the foulnesse and cowardnesse of these forsaide untrew men, howe that they are ouercome and stopped with benefices, and withdrawn fro the treuth of Goddes worde, forsaking vtterly to suffer therefore bodely persecucion. For by this vnfeithfull doynge and apostasié of them, specially that ar great lettered men and haue knowledged openly the treuth, and now other for pleasure or displeasure of tyrantes haue taken hyer and temporal wages to forsake the trewth, and to holde against it, slaundering and persewing them that couete to folowe Christ in the waye of righteousness, many men and women therefore are nowe moued: but many mo, thorow the grace of God, shall be moued hereby for to learne the treuth of God, and to doo thereafter, and to stond boldly thereby.

Than the Archebischoppe sayde to his Clerkes, ‘Besy you no lenger aboute hym; for he and other soche as he is are confedered so to gither, that they will not sweare to be obedient, and to submytte them to prelates of holy chirche. For nowe syns I stode here, his felowe sente me worde that he will not sweare, and that he counselled hym that he shoulde not sweare to me. And, losell, in that thyng that in the is, thou haste besyed the to loose thysyonge man; but blessed be God, thou shalt not haue thy purpose of hym: for he hath forsaken all thy learnynge, submytting him to be buxum and obedient to the ordinance of holy church, and wepeth full bitterly, and curseth the full hartely for the venemous teachyng whiche thou haste shewed to hym, counsellyng him to doo thereafter. And for thy false counsellyng of many other and hym, thou haste greate cause to be righte sory. For long tyme thou haste besied the to peruert whom so euer thou mightest; therefore as many deathes thou arte worthy of, as thou hast geuen euell counnelles. And therefore by Jesu thou shalt go thither, where Nicoll Harforde and Tom Purnay were herbered. And I vndertake, or thys daye eighte dayes thou shalt be righte gladd for to doo what thyng that euer I bydde the doo.

And, losell, I shall assaye if I can make the there as soroufull (as it was tolde me) thou waste gladd of my laste going out of England; by seynt Thomas I shall tourne thy joye into sorowe.'—And I sayde, Sir, there can no body preue lauffully that I joyed euer of the manner of youre goynge out of this lande. But, sir, to saye the sothe, I was joyfull when ye were gone; for the bishop of London, in whos pryson ye leste me, founde in me no cause for to holde me lenger in hys pryson, but at the requeste of my frendes, he delivered me to them, asking of me no manner of submittyng.

Than the Archebishoppe said to me, 'Wherefore that I yede out of England is vnknewen to the; but be this thinge well knowen to the, that God (as I wote well) hath called me ageyne, and broughte me into this lande for to destroye the and the false secte that thou arte of, as by God I shall persue you so naroulye, that I shall not leave a steppe of you in thys lande.' And I said to the abp. Sir, the holy prophete Jeremy said to the false prophet Anany, 'When the worde that is the prophceye of a prophete is known or fulfilled, than it shall be known that the Lorde sent the prophete in treuthe.'—And the Archebishop, as if he hadde not been pleasid with my sayynge, turned hym awaye warde hyther and thither, and sayde, 'By God I shall sette upon thy shynnes a pair of perlis, that thou shalt be gladd to change thy voice.'

Thes and many mo wonderous and convicious wordes were spoken to me, manassing me and all other of the same secte for to be punished and destroyed vnto the vttermoste. And the abp. called than to hym a Clerke, and rowned with him; and that Clerke went forthe, and sone he brought in the constable of Saltwode Castell, and the abp. rowned a good while with hym, and than the constable went forthe, and than cam in diuerse seculers, and they scorned me on euery syde, and manassed me greatly; and some counselled the abp. to burne me by and by, and some other counselled hym to drounde me in the sea, for it is near hande there. And a Clerke standyng besyde me there, knelede downe to the abp., prayng hym that he wolde delysuer me to hym for to saye matenes with hym, and he wolde vndertake that within thre dayes I sholde not resiste any thyng that were commaunded me to doo of my prelate. And the abp. said, that he would ordeine for me himselfe. And than after came in ageyn the constable, and spake priuely to the abp. And than the abp. commaunded the constable to lede me forthe thens with hym, and so he did; and when we wer gone forthe thens, we wer sent after ageyn. And when I came in ageyne before the abp. a Clerke badde me knele downe, and aske grace, and submit me lowly, and I sholde fynde it for the beste.

And I said than to the abp. 'Sir, as I haue said to you diuerse tymes to-day, I will wilfully and lowly obey and submit me to be ordenid euer after my connyng and power to God, and to his lawe, and to euery membre of holy Chirche, as ferre forth as I can perceyue that thes membres accorde with their hedde Christe, and will teach me, rule me, or chastyse me by authority specially of Goddis lawe. And the Archebishop said, 'I wiste well he wolde not without soche addicions submit hym. And than I was rebukyd, scornyd, and manasyd on euery syde; and yet after this diuerse persones cried vpon me to knele down and submit me, but I stood still and spake no worde: and than there was spokyn of me, and to me many greate wordis: and I stooode and herde them manase, curse, and scorne me; but I said nothing.—Than a while after the Archebishop said to me, 'Wilt thou not submit the to the ordinance of holy Chirche?' And I said, Sir, I will full gladly submit me, as I haue shewid you before. And than the Archebishop badde the constable to haue me forthe thens in haste; and so then I was led forth, and brought into a foul unonest prison, where I came never before.

After this, it is not known what became of him; but most probably he died in prison.

19. Proceedings against JOHN BADBY, for Heresy: 10 Henry IV. A. D. 1409. [Fox's Acts and Monuments, p. 679.]

IN the yeere of our Lord 1409, on Sunday being the 1st day of March, in the afternoone, the examination following of one John Badby, tailor, being a lay man, was made in a certaine house or hall within the precinct of the preaching friers in London, in an vtter cloister, vpon the crime of heresie, and other articles repugnant to the determination of the erroneous Church of Rome, before Thomas Arundell, archbishop of Canterbury, and others his assistants, as the archbishop of Yorke, of London, of Winchester, of Oxford, of Norwich, of Salisbury, of Bath, of Bangor, et Meneuensis Episcopi, and also Edmund duke of Yorke, Thomas Bewford the chancellor of England, lord de Roos the clerke of the roles, and a great number of other lords both spirituall and temporall, being then at the selfe same time present; master Morgan read the articles of his opinions to the hearers, according as it is contained in the instrument read by the foresaid master Morgan, the tenor whereof followeth, and in effect is such.—In the name of God, Amen. Be it manifest to all men by this present publike instrument, that in the yeere after the incarnation of our Lord, according to the course and computation of the Church of England, otherwise in the yeere 1409, in the second indiction, in the yeere of the popedome of the most holy father in Christ and Lord, lord Gregorie the xi. by the diuine permission pope, the second day of Januarie, in the chappell Caruaris, of Saint Thomas martyr, nigh vnto the cathedrall church of Worcester, being situate in the said diocese, in the presence of me the publike notarie, and of the witnesses vnder written, the aforesaid John Badby a layman, of the said diocese of Worcester, appearing personally before the reuerend father in Christ and Lord, lord Thomas, by the grace of God bishop of Worcester, sitting in the said chappell for chiefe iudge, was detected of and vpon the crime of heresie being heretically taught, and openly maintained by the foresaid John Badby: that is, that the sacrament of the body of Christ, consecrated by the priest vpon the altar, is not the true bodie of Christ by the vertoe of the words of the sacrament. But that, after the sacramentall words spoken by the priest to make the body of Christ, the materiall bread doth remaine vpon the altar as in the beginning, neither is it turned into the very body of Christ after the sacramentall words spoken of the priest. Which John Badby being examined, and diligently demanded by the foresaid reuerend father concerning the promisses, in the end did answer; that it was impossible that any priest should make the body of Christ, and that he beleued firmly that no priest could make the body of Christ, by such words sacramentally spoken in such sort. And also he said expressly that hee would neuer while he liued beleuee that any priest could make the body of Christ to be handled in the hands of the priest vpon the altar, in his corporall forme. And furthermore he said that John Raker of Bristoll had as much power and authoritie to make the like body of Christ, as any priest had. Moreover he said, that when Christ sat at supper with his disciples, hee had not his body in his hand, to the intent to distribute it to his disciples; and he said expressly, that he did not this thing. And also he spake many other words teaching and fortifying the heresie in the same place, both grieuous, and also out of order, and horrible to the eares of the hearers, sounding against the Catholike faith.—Upon which occasion the same reuerend father admonished and requested the said John Badby oftentimes, and very instantly to charitie; for so much as he would willingly that he should haue forsaken such heresie and opinion holden, taught, and maintained by him, in such sort against the sacrament, to renounce, and vtterly abure them, and to beleuee other things which the holy mother the Church doth beleuee. And he informed the said Iohn on that behalfe both gently, and also laudably. Yet the said Iohn Badby, although he were admonished and requested both often and instantly by the said reuerend father, said and answered expressly, that hee would neuer beleuee otherwise than before he had said, taught, and answered. Whereupon the foresaid reuerend father bishop of Worcester seeing, vnderstanding, and perceiuing the foresaid Iohn Badby to maintaine and fortifie the said heresie, being stubborne, and proceeding in the same stubbornnesse, pronounced the said Iohn to be before this time conuicted of such an heresie, and that he hath bin and is an heretike, and in the end declared it in these words:

“ In the name of God, Amen. We Thomas bishop of Worcester doe accuse thee Iohn Badby, being a lay man of our diocese, of and vpon the crime of heresie, before vs sitting for chiefe iudge, being oftentimes confessed and conuicted of and vpon that, that thou hast taught, and openly affirmed, as hitherto thou dost teach, boldly affirme, and defend; that the sacrament of the body of Christ, consecrated vpon the altar by the priest, is not the true body of Christ; but after the sacramentall words, to make the body of Christ by vertue of the said sacramentall words pronounced, to haue been in the crime of heresie; and we doe pronounce thee both to haue beene and to bee an heretike, and doe declare it finally by these writings.”—These things were done accordingly as is aboue written, and are recited in the yeere, indiction, popedome, moneth, day, and place aforesaid, being present the same time Iohn Malune prior of the cathedrall church of Worcester, John Dudle monke, and Haule the sub-prior of the said church, Thomas Penings of the order of the Carmelites, Thomas Fekenhams of the order of the preaching Friars, William Pomfret of the order of the Minorites, being professors and masters in diuinitie, William Hales, Qualter of London, John Swippedew being publike Notaries, and William Benchampo and Thomas Cerbris being knights, Richard Wish of Tredington, Thomas Wilbe of Hembury, Iohn Westen of Yewley, being parsons of churches, and Thomas Balesinges, the master of saint Wolston in Worcester, and also Henry Haggely, Iohn Penerell, Thomas Trogmorton and William Wasseborne, esquires of the diocese of Worcester and Norwich, and many other worshipfull and honest men being witnesses and called specially to the things aforesaid.—And I Iohn Chew Clerke, of the dioces of Bathe and Welles, and by the authority apostolicall, publicque notarie of the said bishop, haue in testimonie of the premisses put my hand and seale to the examination, interrogation, monition, and answer of the same Iohn Badby, and to his obstinacie, and also to the proceedings of all and singular other doings as is aforesaid, which against him before the said bishop were handled and done, in the yeere, indiction, popedome, moneth, day, and place aforesaid, which with the forenamed witnesses was personally present: and the same, euen as I heard them and saw them to bee done (being occupied with other matters) I caused to bee written and published, and into this publike forme haue compiled the same. I the foresaid notarie am also priue vnto the words and examinations interlined between seuen or eight lines of the beginning of this instrument, which lines I also the foresaid notarie doe approue and make good.—And I Walter London clerke, of the diocese of Worcester, and, by the authoritie apostolicall, publike notarie, to all and singular the foresaid things as afore by the foresaid notarie is recited, and in the yeere, indiction, notedome, moneth, day, and place aforesaid handled and done, being with other the forerecited witnesses personally present, and to all and euery of the same (as I saw and heard them to be done, being thereunto faithfully desired and required): in testimony of the premisses haue signed and subscribed according to the accustomed manner. Hæc ex Reg. Cant. And when the articles, in the foresaid instrument contained, were by the archbishop of Canturbury publicly and vulgarly read and approued; he publicly confessed and affirmed, that hee had both said and maintained the same. And then the archbishop to conuince the constant purpose of the said Iohn Badby, commanded the same articles againe to be read, often instructing him both by words and examples, informing and exhorting him that thereby he might bee brought the sooner to the religion that he was of. And furthermore the said archbishop said and affirmed there openly to the same Iohn, that he would (if he would lue according to the doctrine of Christ) gage his soule for him at the iudgement day. And after that againe he caused those articles in the said instrument expressed to be read by the foresaid Philip Morgan, and the said archbishop himselfe expounded the same in English as before: whereunto Iohn Badby answered: As touching the first article concerning the body of Christ, hee expressly said, that after the consecration at the altar, there remaineth material bread, and the same bread which was before: notwithstanding (said he) it is a signe or sacrament of the liuing God.—Also, when the second article was expounded vnto him, that it is impossible for any priest, &c. To this article he answered and said, that it could not sinke into his mind that the words are to be taken as they literally lie, vnlesse he should denie the incarnation of Christ.—Also being examined of the third article concerning Iacke Raker, hee said, that if Iacke Raker were a man of good liuing, and did loue and feare God, he hath as much power so to doe, as hath the priest: and said further, that he hath heard it spoken of some doctors of diuinitie, that if he should receiue any such consecrated bread, he were worthy to bee damned, and were damned in so doing.—Furthermore hee said that he would beleeeve the omnipotent God in trinitie; and said moreouer, that if euery host being consecrated at the altar were the Lord's body, that then there be 20,000 gods in England. But he beleecued (he said) in one God omnipotent, which thing the foresaid archbishop of Canterbury denied not.—And when the other conclusion was expounded, That Christ sitting with his disciples at supper, &c. To this he answered and said, that he would greatly maruell, that if any man had a loafe of bread, and should breake the same and giue to every man a mouth-full, that the same loafe should afterwards be whole.—When all these things were thus finished, and all the said conclusions were often read in the vulgar tongue; the foresaid archbishop demanded of him, whether hee would renounce and forsake his opinions and such like conclusions or not, and adhere to the doctrine of Christ and Catholike faith? He answered, that, according to that he had said before, he would adhere and stand to those words, which before he had made answer vnto. Then the archbishop oftentimes required the said Iohn, in the bowels of Jesus Christ that hee would forsake those opinions and conclusions, and that henceforth he would cleaue to the Christian faith; which thing to doe in the audience of all the lords and others that were present, hee expressly denied and refused.—After all this, when the aforesaid archbishop of Canturbury, and the bishop of London had consulted together, to what safe keeping the said Iohn Badby (vntill the Wednesday next) might be committed; it was concluded, that hee should bee put into a certaine chamber or safe house within the mansion of the Friers preachers, and so he was: and then the archbishop of Canturbury said, that hee himselfe would keepe the key thereof in the meane time. And when the foresaid Wednesday was expired, being the 15 day of March, and that the foresaid archbishop of Canterbury, with his fellow brethren and suffragans, were assembled the in church of Saint Paul in London; the archbishop of Canturbury taking the episcopall seat called vnto him the archbishop of Yorke, Richard London, Henry Winchester, Robert Chichester, Alexander Norwich, and the noble prince Edmund the duke of Yorke, Rafe earle of Westmerland, Thomas Beaufort knight, lord chancellour of England, and the lord Beaumont with other noble men as well spiritual, as temporall, that stooode and sate by, whom to name it would bee long. Before whom the said Iohn Badby was called personally to answer vnto the articles premised in the foresaid instrument. Who when hee came personally before them, the articles were read by the official of the court of Canterbury and by the archbishop (in the vulgar tongue) expounded publicly and expressly: and the same articles, as he had before spoken and deposed, hee still held and defended, and said, whilst he liued, he would neuer retract the same. And furthermore, he said specially to bee noted, that the lord duke of Yorke personally there present, as is aforesaid, and euery man else for the time being, is of more estimation and reputation, than the Sacrament of the altar, by the priest in due forme consecrated. And whilst they were thus in his examination, the archbishop considering and weighing that hee would in no wise bee altered, and seeing moreouer his countenance stout and heart confirmed, so that he began to perswade other as it appeared in the same: these things considered, the archprelat, when hee saw that by his allurements it was not in his power, eirher by exhortations, reasons, or arguments, to bring the said Iohn Badby from his constant truth to his Catholike faith (executing and doing the office of his great master) proceeded to confirme and ratifie the former sentence given before by the bishop of Worcester against the said John Badby, pronouncing him for an open and publike heretike. And thus shifting their hands of him, they deliuered him to the secular power; and desired the said temporall lords, then and there present very instantly, that they would not put the same John Badby to death for that his offence, nor deliver him to be punished or put to death, in the presence of all the lords aboue recited.—These things thus done and concluded by the bishops in the forenoone: in the afternoone, the king's writ was not farre behind. By the force wherof John Badby, still perseuering in his constancie vnto the death, was brought into Smithfield, and, there being put in an empty barrell, was bound with iron chaines fastened to a stake having drie wood put about him.—And as he was thus standing in the pipe or tunne (for as yet Perillus bull was not in vse among the bishops) it happened that the prince, the king's eldest sonne, was there present. Who, shewing some part of the good Samaritane, began to endeavour and assay how to saue the life of him, whom the hypocriticall Leuites and Pharisees sought to put to death. Hee admonished and counselled him, that hauing respect vnto himselfe hee should speedily withdraw himselfe out of these dangerous labyrinths of opinions, adding oftentimes threatnings, the which might haue daunted any man's stomacke. Also Courtney, at that time chancellor of Oxford, preached vnto him, and enformed him of the faith of holy Church.—In this meane season the prior of Saint Bartlemewes in Smithfield brought with all solemnity the Sacrament of God's body, with twelue torches borne before, and so shewed the Sacrament to the poore man being at the stake. And they demanding of him how he beleueed in it, he answered, that he knew well it was hallowed bread, and not God's body. And then was the tunne put ouer him, and fire put vnto him. And when hee felt the fire, hee cried, Mercy (calling belike upon the Lord) and so the prince immediatly commanded to take away the tunne, and quench the fire. The prince, his commandement being done, asked him if he would forsake heresie to take him to the faith of holy Church; which thing if hee would doe, he should haue goods enough, promising also vnto him a yerely stipend [of three-pence a-day out of the king's treasury as long as he lived. This offer he rejected, and was then burnt to death.]

20. The Trial and Examination of Sir JOHN OLDCASTLE, Lord Cobham, for Heresy, before the Archbishop of Canterbury: 1 Hen. V. A. D. 1413. Collected by John Bale. [Holin. Chron. 544. a. 1 Hall's Chron. 24. b. Stow's Annals, 344. a. 1 Hale's P. C. 141. Fox's Acts and Monuments, 726, 845.]

AFTER that the true seruaunte of Jesus Chryst, Johan Wycleue, a man of very excellent lyfe and learning, had for the space of more than 26 yeares mooste valeauntly battelled with the great antichrist of Europa, or the Pope of Rome, and his diuersly disguised host of anoynted hypocrites, to restore the Church again to the pure estate that Chryst left her in at hys ascensyon, he departed hens most christely into the handes of God, the yere of our Lord 1387, and was buried in his owne parrish-church at Lutterworth in Lecestershere. No small nombre of godly dysciples left that good man behynd hym to defend the lowlynesse of the gospell against the exceeding pryfte, ambition, symony, auarice, ipocrysye, whoredom, sacrylege, tyrannye, ydolatrouse worshipinges, and other fylthy frutes of those stifnecked pharyses. Agaynst whome Thomas Arundel, than Archbishop of Caunterbury, so ferce as was Pharaon, Antiochus, Herodes, or Cayphas, collected in Pauls church at London an unyuersall Synode of all the papisticall clergy of England, in the yere of our Lord 1413 as he had done diuerse other afore, to withstand their moost godly enterpryse. And thys was the fyrst yere of king Henry V. whom they had than made fit for theyr hande.—As these hygh prelates with their pharysees and scribes were thus gathered in thys pestilent counsell against the Lorde and his Woorde, fyrst there resorted vnto them the 12 Inquisitours of Heresy (whom they had appointed at Oxford the yere afore, to serche out heretikes with all Wicleues hookes) and they brought 266 faithfull Conclუსyons whome they had collected as heresy of the seyd bokes. The names of the seid Inquisitours where these; Johan Langueon a master in the New-college, Johan Languedon monke of Chry-Church in Conterbury, Wilyam Ufforde regent of the Carnelyte-, Thomas Claxton, regent of the Dominikes, Robert Gylbert, Rycharde Earthysdale, John Lucke, Rycharde Snedisham, Rycharde Flemming, Thomas Rottborne, Robert Roudbery, and Richard Grasdale. In the meane season caused they their hyred seruautes to blowe it forth abroude throughout all the hole realme, that they were there congregated for an wholesome unite and reformation of the church of England, to stoppe so the mouthes of the comen people. Such is always the comen practise of these subtle sorcerers, whyls they are in doing mischief, to blere the eyes of the vnlearned multytude, with one false craft or other.

After a certain communication they concluded among themselves, that it was not possible for them to make whole Christes cote without seme (meaning thereby their patched popysh synagoge) onlesse certeyne great men were brought out of the way, which semed to be the chefe maintainers of the seyd disciples of Wicleue: among whome the most noble knight sir Johan Oldcastell, the lord Cobham (a) was complained of by the generall proctours, yea rather betrayars of Christ in his faithfull members, to be the chefe principal. Him they accused first for a mighty maintener of suspected preachers in the dioceses of London, Rochester, and Hertforde, contrary to the windes of their ordynaries: not only they affirmed him to have sent thyder the seyd preachers, but also to haue assisted them ther by force of armcs, notwithstanding their sinodall constitution made afore to the contrarye. Last of all, they accused him, that he was farre other wise in beleue of the Sacrament of the Altre, or Penance, of Pilgrimage, or Ymuge-worshipping, and of the Ecclesiastycall power, than the holy church of Rome had taught many years afore.

In the ende it was concluded among them, that wythoute anye farther delaye, processe shulde oute agaynst hym, as agaynst a moost pernycyous Heretike.—Som of that felloushyp, whyche were of more craftye experyence than the other, wold in no case haue that matter so rashlye handeled, but thought thys waye moche better. Consydering the seyd lord Cobham was a man of great byrth, and in fauer at that tyme with the kyng, theyr counsell was to knowe first the kynges mynde, to saue all thynges right vp. This counsell was well accepted, and ther vpon the archbishop Thomas Arundell, wythe his other byshoppes, and a great part of the clergy, went straight wayes vnto the kyng, as than remaynyng at Kenyngton; and there layed forth most greuous complainyes against the saied lord Cobham, to his great infamy and blemysh, being a man most godly. The kyng gentilly harde those bloud thirsty rauenours; and farre otherwise than became his princelye dignitie, he instauntly desyred them, that in respect of his noble stock and knighthode, they shuld yet fauourably deale with him; and that they wold, if it were possible, without all rigour or extreme handeling, reduce him again to the churches unite. He promised them also, that in case they were not contented to take some deliberacion, his selfe wold serously common the matter with him.

Anon after the kyng sent for the seyd lord Cobham; and as he was come, he called him secretly, admonishing him betwixt him and him, to subuit him selfe to hys mother the holy church, and as an obedient chyld to acknowledge him selfe culpable. Vnto whom the Christen knight made this answer, 'You most worthy prince,' saith he, 'am I alwayes prompt and wylling to obeye, for so moche as I knowe you a Christen kyng, and the appointed minister of God, bearing the sworde to the punishment of Yll-doers, and for the sauegarde of them that be virtuous. Unto you next my eternal God, owe I my whole obedience, and submit my thervnto, as I haue done euer, all that I haue ether of fortune or nature, redy at all times to fulfill what so euer ye shall in that lorde commaund me; but as touching the pope and hys spirituality, truly I owe them neyther sute nor seruice; for so moche as I knowe hym by the Scriptures to be the great antichryste, the sonne of perdycon, the open aduersary of God, and the abominacyon standing in the holy place.' When the kyng had hearde this, with sobelyke sentences more, he wolde talke no longer with him, but lefte hym so utterly.

And as the Archebishop resorted again vnto him for an Answer, he gaue him his full auctoryte to cyte hym, examine hym, and punyshe him according to the deuclish decrees, whiche they call the lawes of holy church. Than the seyd abp. by the counsell of hys other bishoppes and clergy, appointed to call before him syr Johan Oldcastell, the lord Cobham, and to cause him personally to appeare to answer to suche suspect Articles as they shuld lay against him. So sent he forth his chefe sommener, with a very sharp citacion, vnto the castell of Cowling, where as he at that tyme dwelt for his so-lace. And as the seyd sommener was thether comen, he durste in no case entre the gates of so noble a man without his lycens; and therefore be returned home agayne, hys message not done. Than called the archebishop one John Butler unto him, which was than the dorekeeper of the kynges pryve chamber, and with him he couenanted through promises and rewards to haue this matter craftly brought to passe vnder the kyng's name. Wherevpon the seyd John Butler toke the archebishops sommener with hym, and went vnto the sayd lord Cobham shewing him that it was the kyng's pleasure that he shuld obeye that citacyon, and so cyted him fraudulently. Than said he vnto them in few woordes, that in no case wold he consent to those moost deuclish practices of the priestes. As they had informed the abp. of the Answer, and that it was mete for no man priuately to cyte him after that without parell of lyfe, he decreed by and by to haue him cyted by publicke processe or open commaundment. And in al the heat possible, vpon the Wednesday before the natiuite of oure Ladye in September, he commaunded letters citatory to be set vpon the great gates of the Cathedral Church of Rochester, (which was but iij. English myles from theirs) charging him to apere personally before him at Ledys, in the 11th daye of the same moneth and yeare, all excuses to the contrary set apart. Those letters were taken doue anon after, by such as hare fauer vnto the lorde Cobham, and so conueyed asyde. After that caused the archebischoppe newe letters to be set vpon the natiuite day of our Ladye, which also were rent doue and utterly consumed.

Than for so moche as he did not apere at the day appointed at Ledys (where as he sate in consistory, as cruell as euer was Cayphas, with his court of hypocrites aboute him) he judged hym, denounced him, and condemned him of most depe contumacy: after that whan he had bene falsely informed by his hierd spies, and other glosing glauerers, that the sayd lord Cobham had lawghed him to scorne, disdayned all his doings, mainteined his old opinions, contemned the churches power, the dignitie of a bishop, and the ordre of presthode (for all these was he than accused) in hys mody madnes, without just profe, dyd he openly excommunicate him. Yet was he not for all this ferce tyranny qualifed, but commaunded him to be cited a fresh, to apere afore him the Saturday before the feast of Saint Mathew the apostle, with these cruell threatinges added therunto; That if he did not obey at that day, he wold more extremely handle him: and to make him selfe more strong towards the performance thereof, he compelled the lay-power, by most terrible menacings of curses and interdictions, to assyst him against that ceciduous apostate schismatike, that heretike, that troubler of the publycke peace, that enemye of the realme, and greate aduersarye of all holy chirchie; for all these hateful names dyd he giue him.

This most constaunt seruant of the lord and worthy knight sir Johan Oldcastell, the lord Cobham, beholding the vnpacable fury of Antichrist this kindeled against him, perceiuing him self also compased on every side with deadly daungers, he toke paper and penne in hand, and so wrote a Christen confession or Rekening of his Faith (which foloweth here after) and both signed and sealed it with his own hande? Wherein he also answereth to the 4 chefest Articles that the Archebishop layed against him. That doone, he toke the cople with him, and wente therwith to the kyng, trustinge to fynd mercy and fauer at his hande. None other was that Confession of his, than the common beleue or somme of the churches faith, called the Apostles Crede, of all christen men than vsed: As thus.

The Christen Beleue of the Lord Cobham.

"I beleue in God the Father Almighty, maker of heuen and earth; and in Jesu Christ his only Sonne our Lord, which was conceyued by the Holy Gost, borne of the Virgin Mary, suffred vnder Ponte Pilate, crucified, dead, and buried, went down to helle, the third daye rose againe from death, ascended vp to Heuen, sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty, and from thens shall come agayne to iudge the quicke and the dead. I beleue in the Holy Gost, the vniuersall holy church, the communion of saintes, the forgoenyes of sinnes, the vprising of the flesh, and euerlasting life. Amen.—And for a more large Declaracion of this my Faith in the Catholick Church, I stedfastly beleue that there is but one God Almighty, in and of whose godhead are these iii. parsonnes, the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Gost, and that those iii. parsonnes are the same selfe

God Almyghtyes. I beleue also that the seconde parsonne of this most blessed Trinite, in most conuenient tyme appointed thereunto afore, toke flesh and bloud of the most blessed Virgyn Mary, for the sauegard and redemption of the uniuersall kynd of man, which was afore lost in Adam's offence. Moreouer, I beleue that the same Jesus Christ our Lord thus being both God and man, is the only head of the whole Christen Church, and that all those that hath bene, or shal be saued, be members of this most holy church: and this holy church I think to be diuided into iii. sortes or companies.—Wherof the first sort be now in heauen, and they are the sayntes from liens departed. These, as they were bere conuersaunt, conformed alwayes theyre lyues to the most holye lawes and pure examples of Chryste, renouncyng Sathan, the worlde, and the flesh, wythe all their concupiscences and euels. The second sort are in purgatory (yf any such be by the scriptures) abyding the mercy of God, and a full deluyerance of Payne. The thyrd sorte are here vpon the earth, and be called the Church Mylytaunt. For daye and nyght they contend agaynst the crafty assaultes of the deucl, the flattering prosperities of thys worlde, and the rebellouse fylthynges of the fleshe.—Thys latter congregation by the iuste ordinaunce of God is also seuered into three diuerse estates, that is to say into priesthode, knighthode, and the comens. Amonge whom the wyll of God is, that the one shuld ayde the other, but not destroye the other. The priestes fyrst of all secluded from all worldlynesse shuld conforme theyr lyues vterly to the examples of Chryst and his Apostles. Euermore shulde they be occupied in preaching and teaching the Scriptures purely, and in geuing wholesome counsels of good liuing to the other two degrees of men. More modest also, more louing, gentyll, and lowleye in spirite shuld they be than any other sortes of people.—In knighthode are all they which beare sword by lawe of office. These shuld defende Gods lawes, and see that the gospell were purely taught, conforming their lyues to the same, and secludyng all false preachers: yea these ought rather to hasard their lyues than to suffer such wycked decrees as eyther blemisheth the eternal Testament of God, or yet letteth the fre passage thereof, whereby heresies and schismes might spring in the church. For of none other ryse they as I suppose, than of erroneous constitucions, craftely fyrst creping in under hypocrites lyes for auantage. They ought also to preserue Gods peple from oppressors, tirauntes, and theues, and to se the clergy supported so long as they teache purely, pray rightly, and minister the Sacraments frely. And if they se them do otherwise, they are bound by law of office to compell them to chaunge their doinges, and to se all thinges performed according to Gods prescript or ordinaunce.—The latter fellowship of this church are the common people, whose dewtye is to beare their good mindes and true obedience to the aforesayd ministers of God, their kinges, cyuile governours and priestes. The right office of these is justly to occupy every man in his faculte, be it merchaundise, handy-craft, or the tithe of the grounde. And so one of them to be as an helper to another, followyng all wayes in theyr sortes the just commaundementes of theyr Lord God.—Ouer and besydes all thys, I moost faithfully helue that the sacramentes of Chrystes church are necessary to all Chrysteu beleuers, thys always sene to, that they be truly ministred according to Christes fyrst institution and ordinaunce. And for so moch as I am unaliciously and most falsely accused of a misbeleue in the sacrament of the aluter, to the hurtfull slaundre of many; I signifye here unto all men, that this is my fayth concerning that. I beleue in that sacrament to be contayned very Christes body and bloude under the similitudes of breade and wyne, yea, the same body that was conceyued of the Holy Gost, born of Mary the Virgin, done on the crosse, dyed, that was buried, arose the thyrday from the death, and is now glorified in Heauen. I also beleue the vniuersal lawe of God to be moost true and perfight, and they which do not so followe it in theyr fayth and workes at one time or other, can neuer be saved. Where as he that seeketh it in faith, accepteth it, learneth it, delyghteth therein, and perfourmeth it in loue, shall tast for it the felicity of cuerlasting innocency.—Finally, this is my faith also, that God wyll axe no more of a Christen beleuer in this lyfe, but only to obey the preceptes of that most blessed law. If any prelates of the church require more, or esse anye other kynd of obedience, than thys to be vsed, he contemneth Christ, exalting himself aboue God, and so becometh an open Anti-Christe. All these premisses I beleue particularlye, and generally all that God hath left in his holy scriptures that I shuld beleue: instantly desiring you, my lyge Lord and most worthy king, that thys confession of mine may be justly examined by the most godly, wise, and learned men of your realme. And if it be found in all pointes agreying to the verite, than let it be so allowed, and I theryppon holden for none other than a true christiane. If it be proued otherwise, than let it be viterly condemned: prouided alwaies, that I be taught a better releue by the word of God, and I shall most reuerently at all times obey therunto.”

Thys brefe confession of hys fayth, the lorde Cobham wrote, and so toke it wyth hym to the court, offering it wyth all mekenesse vnto the kyng to rede it ouer. The kyng wold in no case receiue it, but commaunded yt to be deliuered unto them that shuld be his Judges. Than desyred he in the kinges presens, that an hondred knights and esquiers might be suffered to come in vpon hys purgacyon, which he knewe wolde clere him of all Heresyes. Moreouer he offred hymself after the law of armes, to fight for lyfe or death with any man luyng, Christen or Heythen, in the quarrill of his faith, the king and the lordes of his counsell excepted. Fynally, with all gentillesse he protested before all that were present, that he wold refuse no manner of correction that shuld after the lawes of God be ministred vnto him; but that he wold at all times with all mekenesse obey it. Notwithstandyng all thys, the kyng suffered him to be summoned personally in his own preuy chambre. Than sayed the lord Cobham to the kyng, that he had appealed from the archbyshop to the pope of Rome, and therefore he ought, he sayd, in no case to be his judge. And hauyng hys Appeale there at hande redye written, he shewed yt wyth all reuerence to the kyng. Wherwith the kyng was than moche more displeasid than afore, and sayd angerlye unto him, that he shuld not pursue his Appeal: but rather he shuld tarry in hold, tyll such time as it were of the pope allowed. And than, wold he or nyld he, the archebishop shuld be his judge. Thus was there nothing allowed that the good lorde Cobham had lawfully afore required. But for so moch as he wold not be sworn in all things to submit himselfe to the church, and so to take what penaunce the archbishops would enioyne him, he was arested againe at the kinges commaundment, and so led forth to the Tower of London, to kepe his day (so was it than spoken) that the archbysshop had appoynted him afore in the kinges chambre.

Than caused he the aforesayd Confession of his Faith to be copyed againe, and the Answeres also (which he had made to the iij. Articles proponed agaynst him) to be wryten in maner of an Indenture in two shetes of paper; that whan he shuld come to his Answer, he might geue the one copy vnto the archebishop, and reserue the other to himselfe. As the day of Examination was comen, whyche was the xxij. day of Septembre, the Saturday before the feast of saint Mathewe, Thomas Arundell the archebysshop, sytting in Cayphas Rounge, in the Chapterhouse of Paules, wyth Richard Clyfforde bisshop of London, and Henry Bolingbroke bisshop of Winchester, sir Robert Morley knight and lefetenant of the Towr, brought personally before him the seid Lord Cobham, and there left hym for the time, vnto whom the archebishop sayd these wordes:

The fyrst Examination of the Lord Cobham, September 23.

“Sir John, in the last general Connocation of the clergie of thys our prouynce, ye were detected of certain Heresyes, and by sufficient witnesss founde culpable; wheryppon ye were by fourme of spirituall lawe cyted, and wolde in no case appeare: In conclusion, vppon your rebellous contumacie, ye were both priuately and openly excommunicated. Notwythstandyng we neuer yet shewed oure selfe unreadye to haue geuen you youre absolucion (nor yet do not to thys houre) woldc ye haue mekely axed it.” Unto this the lord Cobham shewed as though he had given none eare, hauing his mynde otherwise occupied, and so desyred none absolucion; But he sayd, he wold gladly before him and his brethren make rehearsal of that Fayth, which he helde and entended always to stande to, yf it wolde please them to lycens him thereunto; and than he toke out of his bosome a certein writing endented, concerning the Articles whereof he was accused, and so openly redde it before them, geuing it vnto the archbishop, as he had made thereof an ende; whereof thys is the copy:

“I Johan Oldecastell knight and lord Cobham, wyll all Chrysten men to understand, That Thomas Arundell, archbishop of Canterbury hath not onely laid it to my charge maliciously, but also very vntuly by hys letter and seale, written against me in most slanderouse wyse, that I shuld otherwyse fele and teach of the Sacramentes of the Church (assigning specially the Sacrament of the Aulter, the Sacrament of Penauice, the worshipping of Ymages, and the going of Pilgrimage vnto them) far other wise than either beleueith or teacheth the vniuersall holye church. I take Almyghte God vnto wytuesse, that yt hath bene and nowe is, and euermore wyth the helpe of God yt shall be my full intent and wyll, to beleue faythfully and wholly all the sacramentes that ever God ordeined, to be minystrid in the holy church; and morouer, for to declare me in these iij. points afore rehearsed.—I beleue that in the moost worshypfull sacrament of the alter, is Christs very body in forme of bread, the same body that was borne of the blessed Virgin Mary, done on the crosse, dead and buried, and that the thyrd day arose from death to lyfe, the which body is now glorified wyth the Father in heaven. And as for the sacrament of penauice, I beleue that it is nedefull to all them that shall be saued, to forsake theyr sinne, and to do penauice for it wyth true contricion to God, confession of their fautes, and dewe satisfactyon in Chryste, lyke as Gods laws limiteth and teacheth, els can they haue no saluation; This penauice I desyre all men to do. And as for Images, I vnderstand that they pertyen nothing to our Christen beleue, but were permitted long sins the faith was geuen vs of Christ, by sufferance of the church, for to be as kalendars vnto laymen, to represent or bring to mind the passion of our Lorde Jesus Christ, with the martirdom and good liuing of the saintes.—I thinke also, that whatsoever he which doth that worship to dead ymages, that is duely belonging vnto God, or that putteth his faith, hope, or confidence in the helpe of them, as he shuld do only in his eternal lyuing God, or that hath affection in one more than in another, he perpetrath in so doing the abhominable sine of idolatry. Moreouer in this am I fully perswaded, that everye man dwellynge on thys ærth is a pilgrim, eyther towards blesse, or els towards payne.—And that he which knoweth not, nor wyll not knowe, nor yet kepe the holy commaundementes of God in hys lyuing here (all be it that he goth on pylgrimage into all quarters of the worlde) yf he departeth so, he shall surely be dampned. Agayne, he that knoweth the holy commaundementes of God, and so performeth them to the ende of his life to his power, shal without fayle be saued in Christ, though he neuer in his lyfe go on pylgrimage as men vse now a dayes, to Caunterbury, Walsingham, Compostell, and Rome, or to any other places.”

Thys Auswere to his Articles thus ended and redde, he deliuered it to the bysshopes, as is sayde afore. Than counceled the archbishop wythe the other two byshoppes, and with dyuerse of the doctours, what was to be done in thys matter, commaunding him for the time to stand aside. In conclusion, by theyr assent and information, he sayd thus vnto him: Come hyder sir Johan; in this your Writing are many good thinges conteyned, and ryght Catholyck also, we deny yt not; but ye must consyder that thys daye was appoynted you to answeere to other poynts concerning those Articles, whereof as yet no mencion is made in this your byll; and therefore ye must yet declare vs your mind more plainly; as thus, Whether that ye holde, affirme, and beleue, that in the Sacrament of the Alter, after the Consecracion rightly done by a pryest, remaineth materall breade or not? Moreouer, whether ye do hold, affirme, and beleue, that as concerning the sacrament of penance (wher as a competent nombre of priests are) everye Chrysten manne is necessarily bound to be confessed of hys synnes to a priest ordayned by the church or not?

After certein other communication thys was the Auswere of the good lord Cobham, ‘That none otherwyse wold he declare his mynde, nor yet answeere vnto hys Articles, than was expresselye in hys wrytinge there conteyned.’ Than sayd the archbishop agayne vnto him, ‘Syr Johan bewar what ye do; for if ye answeere not clerely to those thinges that are here objected against you, specially at the time appointed you only for that purpose, the lawe of holy church is, that compelled ones by a iudge, we may openly proclayme ye an heretike.’ Unto whom he gaue this Auswere, Do as ye shall thinke it beste, for I am at a point. Whatsoever he or the other bysshoppes did aske him after that, he bad them resort to his byll, for therby wold he stande to the verye death; other Ausweere wold he not geue that day: wherwith the bisshops and prelates were in a maner amased and wonderfully disquyeted. At the last the Archbishop counseled agayne with his other bisshops and doctours, and in the end therof declared vnto him what the holy church of Rome, following the saynges of Saint Austyn, Saint Hierom, Saint Ambrose, and of other holy doctours, had determined in these matters, no manner of mencion ones made of Christ; which determination (sayth he) ought all Chrysten menne bothe to beleue and to folowe.

Than said the lord Cobham vnto him, That he wold gladlye bothe beleue and obserue whatsoever the holy church of Christes institution had determined, or yet whatsoever God had willed him eyther to beleue or to do; but that the pope of Rome with his cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and other prelates of that church, had lafull power to determine suche matters as stode not with his word throughly, that wolde he not (he sayd) at that tyme affyrme. Wyth thys the archbyschoppe bad hym to take good aduysment tyll the Mondaye nexte followinge (which was the xxv. daye of Septembe) and then justlye to answer specyallye vnto thys pointe, Whether there remainyd materyall breade in the Sacrament of the Aulter, after the wordes of consecration, or not? He promysed him also to sende vnto him in wryting those matters clerely determined, that he myght than be the more persyght in hys answer making; and all this was not els but to blynde the multitude with somewhat. The next day following (according to his promes) the archbishop sent unto him into the Towr this folysh and blasphemouse Writtynge, made by him and by his vnlearned clergy.

The Determination of the Archbishop and Clergye.

“The Faith and Determination of the holy church touching the blesful Sacrament of the Aulter, is this, That after the sacramentall wordes be ones spoken by a priest in his masse, the materiall bread, that was before bread, is turned into Christes very body; and the materyall wyne, that was before wyne, is turned into Chrystes very bloud; and so there remaineth in the sacrament of the aulter, from thens forth, no materyall breade, nor materiall wyne, which were there before the sacramentall wordes were spoken. How beleue ye this Article? Holy Church hath determined, that euery Chrysten man lyuing here bodyly vpon earth, ought to be shruien to a priest ordeyned by the church, if he may come to him: How fele ye thys Article?—Christ ordeyned Saint Peter the apostle to be his vicar here in earth, whose see is the holy church of Rome; and he graunted that the same power which he gaue vnto Peter, shuld succede to al Peters successours, which we call now popes of Rome; by whose special power in churches particular, be ordeyned prelates, as archbishops, byshops, parsons, curates, and other degrees more, unto whom Christen men ought to obeye after the lawes of the church of Rome. Thys is the determination of holy church: how fele ye this Article? Holy Church hath determined, that it is meritoryous to a Christen man to go on pilgrimage to holy places, and there specially to worship holy relyques and ymages and saintes, apostles, martirs, confessours, and all other saintes besydes, approued by the church of Rome: howe fele ye thys Artycle?”

And as the good lord Cobham had red ouer thys moost wretched Wryting, he maruelled greatly of their madd ignorance; but that he considered agayne, that God had geuen them ouer for theyr unbelueus sake, into moost depe errorrs and blindness of soule. Agayne, he perseued therby, that theyr vttermost malycie was purposed against him, howsoeuer he shulde answer; and therefore he put his lyfe into the handes of God, desyring his onely spyrit to assist him in his next answer. When the seyd xxv. day of Septembre was come (which was also the Monday afore Myghelmasse) in the sayd yeare of our Lorde, 1413, Thomas Arundell, the Archbishop of Caunterbury, commaunded his iudiciall seate to be removed from that chapterhouse of Pauls, to the Dominike Fryers wythin Ludgate at London; and as he was there set with Rychard the bishop of London, Henry the bishop of Winchester, and Benet the bishop of Bangor, he called in vnto him his counsell and his officers, with diuerse other doctours and friers; of whom these are the names here followynge. Master Henry Ware, the officyall of Caunterbury; Philip Morgan, doctor of both lawes; Howell Kiffin, doctor of the canon lawe; Johan Kempe, doctour of the canon law: Willyam Carleton, doctour of the canon law; Johan Witnam, of the New Colledge in Oxforde; Johan Whighthead, a doctour of Oxforde also; Robert Wonehewell, vicar of Saint Laurence in the Jewry; Thomas Palmer, the Warden of the Mynors; Robert Chamberlaine, Prior of the Dominickes; Rychard Dodington, Prior of the Augustines; Thomas Walden, Prior of the Carmelites, all doctours of diuinite; Johan Steuens also, and James Cole, both notaries, appointed there purposely to write all that shuld be eyther said or done: all these, with a great sort more of pryestes, monks, channons, friers, parish-clarkes, belingers, and pardoners, disdained him with innumerable mockes and scornes, rekening him to be an horrible heretik, and a man cursed afore God.

Anon the Archbyschoppe called for a Masseboke, and caused all those prelates and doctours to sweare there vpon, that euery man shoulde saythfullye doo thys offyce and dewtye that daye; and that neyther for fauer nor feare, loue nor hate of the one partye nor the other, any thing shuld ther be witnessed, spoken, or done, but according to the trueth, as they wold answer before God and all the world at the day of dome. Than were the two forseyd notaries sworne also to wryt and to witnes the wordes and processe that ther shuld be vttered on both parties, and saye their mindes (if they otherwise knewe it) before they shuld register it; and all thys dissimulation was but to colour their mischeues before the ignoraunt multytude.—Consydre herin (gentyll reader) what this wicked generacion is, and how farre wyde from the just feare of God; for as they were than, so are they yet to this daye.—After that cam forth before them sir Robert Morley knight, and lefetenante of the Tower, and he brought with him the good lord Cobham, there leauing him among them, as a lambe among wolues, to his Examination and Answer.

The latter Examination of the Lord Cobham, September 25.

Than sayd the Archbyschoppe vnto hym, “Lord Cobham, ye be aduysed (I am sure) of the woordes and processe which we had vnto you vpon Saturday last past in the Chapterhouse of Paules, which proces were now to long to be rehearsed agayne: I sayd vnto you than, that ye were acused for your contumacy and disobedience to holy Church, thinking that ye shulde with mekenes haue desired your absolution.' Than spake the lorde Cobham with a most cherefull contenance, and sayd, God sayth by his holye prophet, Maledicam benedictionibus vestris, which is as much as to say, I shall curse, wher as you blesse.—The Archbisshop made than as though he had continued for the thys tale, and not heard him, saying, 'Sir, at that tyme I gentillye proferd to haue assoyled you if ye wold haue asked it: and yet I do the same, if ye will humblye desyre it in due forme and maner, as holy Church hath ordered.' Than sayd the lorde Cobham, Naye, forsooth, wyll I not, for I neuer yet trespassed against you, and therefore I will not do it: and with that he kneled downe on the pauement, holding vp hys handes towards heauen, and sayed, I shryue me here vnto the my eternal lyuyng God, that in my frayle youth I offended the (Lorde) most greuouly in pryde, wrath, and glottony, in couetousnes and in lechery. Many men haue I hurt in mine auger, and done manye other horryble synnes, good Lord I aske the mercy; and therwith wepingly he stode vp agayne, and sayd with a mighty voice, Lo, good people, lo, for the breaking of God's lawe, and his great commandmentes, they never yet cursed me; but for theyr owne lawes and tradicions most cruelly do they handle both me and other men; and therefore both they and theyr lawes, by the promes of God, shall vterly be destroyed.

At this the Archbishop and hys companye were not a litle blemysed; notwithstanding he toke stomack vnto him agayn, after certain wordes had in excuse of theyr Tyrannye, and examained the lorde Cobham of his Christen Beleue. Whereunto the lorde Cobham made thys godly Answer. 'I beleue fullye and faythfullye the vnyuersall lawes of God; I beleue that all is true which is conteyned in the holy sacred Scriptures of the Byble; finally, I beleue all that my Lorde God wolde I shulde beleue.'—Than demanded the Archbishop an Answer of the Byll which he and the clergy had sent him vnto the Tower the day afore, in maner of a Determinacion of the Church concerning the 4 Articles whereof he was accused, specially for the Sacrament of the Alter, how he beleued therein?—Wherunto the lorde Cobham said, That with that Byll he had nothing to do; but this was his Beleue concerning the Sacrament, That his Lord and Sauer Jesus Christ, sytting at hys last Supper with his most dere disciples, the night before he shuld suffer, toke bread in his hand, and geuing thanks to his eternal Fath'r, blessed it, brake it, and so gaue vnto them, saying, 'Take it vnto ye, and eate therof all; this is my body which shall be betraid for you, do this here after in my remembrance.' This do I thoroughly beleue for this Faith am I taught of the Gospell in Matthew, in Marke, and in Luke, and also in the first Epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, chap. ii.

Then asked the Archbysshoppe, 'If he beleued that it were breade after the consecracion or sacramentall wordes spoken ouer it.' The lorde Cobham sayd, 'I beleue that in the Sacrament of the Aulter is Christs very body in fourme of breade, the same that was born of the Virgin Mary, done on the crosse, dead, and buried, and that the third day arose from death to lyfe, whych nowe is glorified in heauen.'—Than sayd one of the doctors of lawe, 'After the sacramentall wordes be vttered, there remaineth no breade but the onely body of Christ.' The lorde Cobham said than to one Master Johan Whighthead, 'You said ones unto me in the castell of Coulynge, that the sacred Host was not Chrystes body; but I helde than against you, and proued that herein was his body, though the Seculars and Friars could not therin agree, but helde yche one against another in that opinyon: these were my woordes than if ye remembre it.'—Than shouted a sort of them together, and cryed with great noyse, 'We say all that it is God's body.' And dyuerse of them asked hym in great anger, Whether it were materiall breade after the consecracion or not? Than loked the lorde Cobham earnestly vpon the Archbishop, and sayde, 'I beleue surely that it is Chrystes body in fourme of breade; sir, beleue not you thus?' And the Archbishoppe sayd, 'Yes mary do I.'

Than asked him the Doctours, Whether it were onely Christes body after the consecration of a priest, and no bread or not? And he sayd vnto them, It is both Christs body and bread. I shall proue it as thus: for lyke as Chryst dwelling here vpon the earth, had in him both Godhede and manhead, and had the inuisible godhead covered under that manhead, which was only visible and seane in him: so in the Sacrament of the Aulter is Christes very body and very bread also, as I beleue the breade is the thyng that we see with our eyes, the bodye of Christ (whiche is his flesh and his blood) is there vnder hydde, and not seane, but in fayth. And moreouer, to prove that it is both Christ's bodie and also bread after the consecration, it is by plaine words expressed by one of your owne doctors [Gelasius contra Eutychen,] writing against Eutyches, which saith: Like as the selfe same Sacraments doe passe by the operation of the Holy Ghost, into a diuine nature, and yet notwithstanding keepe the proprietie still of their former nature: so, that principall mystery declareth to remaine one true, and perfect Christ, &c.—Than smyled they yche one vpon other, that the people shulde judge hym taken in a greate heresy: and wyth a great bragge diuerse of them sayde, It is a foule Heresy.

Than asked the Archbishop, 'What breade it was?' And the Doctours also inquired of hym, whether it were materyall or not? The lorde Cobham sayd unto them, the Scriptures maketh no mencion of this woorde materyall; and therefore my Faith hath nothing to do therewith: but thys I say and beleue it, that it is Christes bodye and breade; for Chryst sayde in the syxt of Johans Gospell, Ego sum panis vitus, qui de Celo descendi; I which came downe from heauen am the lyuing, and not the dead bread: therefore I say now again, like as I said afore, as our Lord Jesus Chryst is very God and very Man, so in the most blessed Sacrament of the Altar, is Chrystes very body and breade.—Than seyde they all with one voyce, 'It is an Heresy.'

One of the Bishoppes stode vp by and by, and said, 'What, it is an heresy manifest, to saye that it is breade after the sacramentall wordes be ones spoken, but Chrystes body onely.' The lord Cobham said, 'Saint Paule the Apostle was, I am sure, as wyse as you be nowe, and more godlye learned. And he called yt breade, wrytting to the Corinthians, 'The breade that we breake,' sayth he, 'is it not the partaking of the body of Christ?' Lo, he calleth it bread and not Christes body, but a meane whereby we receyve Christes body. Thou sayd they agayne, Paule must be otherwise vnderstanded. For it is surely an heresy to saye that it is breade after the consecration, but onely Chrystes body. The lord Cobham asked, howe they coulde make good that sentence of theirs? They answered him thus, 'For it is against the determination of holy Church. Than sayde the Archbishop vnto him, 'Sir Johan we sent you a Wrytting concerning the Faith of thys Blessed Sacrament clearly determined by the Church of Rome, our mother, and by the holy doctours.' Than sayd he again vnto him, 'I knowe none holier than is Christ and his apostles. And as for that determinacion, I wote it is none of theirs, for it standeth not with the Scriptures, but manifestly against them. If it be the Churches, as ye saye it is, it hath bene hers onely sins she receiued the greates poyson of worldly possessions, and not afore.'

Than asked hym, they to stoppe hys mouth therewith, if he beleued not in the determination of the Church? And he said vnto them, 'No forsooth, for it is no God. In all our crede is it but thyrse mencioned concerning beleue; in God the Father, in God the Sonne, in God the Holy Goost. The Byrthe, the Death, the Buriall, the Resurrection and Ascensyon of Christe hath none in, for beleue but in hym. Neyther yet hath the Church, the Sacramentes, the Forgyuenes of Synne, the latter Resurrection, nor yet the Lyfe Everlasting, any other in, than in the Holy Goost.'

Than sayd one of the Lawiers, 'Tush, that was but a worde of office. But what is your beleue concerning holy Church?' The lord Cobham answered, 'My beleue is (as I sayde afore) that all the Scriptures of the Sacred Bible are true. All that is grounded vppon them, I beleue throughly. For, I know, it is God's pleasure that I shuld so do. But in youre lordly lawes and ydell determinations haue I no beleue. For ye be no part of Christis holy Church, as your open dedes doth shew; but ye are very antichrists, obstinately set against his holy law and will. The lawes that ye haue made are nothing to his glorye; but onely for your wayne glory and abhominable couetousness. This they said, was an exceeding Herisy (and that in a great fume) not to beleue the determination of holy Church.

Than the Archbishop asked hym, what he thought Holy Church? He said vnto him: 'My beleue is, that holy Church is the nombre of them which shall be saued, of whom Christ is the head. Of this Church one part is in Heauen with Christ, an other in purgatory (you say) and the third is here in earth. This later part standeth in thre degrees, in knighthode, priesthode, and the comunalte, as I said afore plainly in the Confession of my Beleue.'

Than sayde the Archbishop vnto him, 'Can ye tell me who is of this Church?' The lord Cobham answered, 'Yea truly can I.'

Than said doctour Walden the prior of the Carmelites, 'It is doubte vnto you who is thereof. For Christ sayth in Math. Nolite iudicare, Presume to judge no man. If ye here be forbidden the judgment of your neighbour or brother, moche more the judgment of your superior.' The lord Cobham made him thys answer, 'Chryst sayth also in the same selfe chapter of Math. 'That lyke as the yll tree is knowue by his yll fruit, so is a false prophet by his works, appeare they neuer so glorious.' But that ye left behind ye. And in Johan he hath this text, Operibus credite, Beleue you the outward doings. And in another place of Johan, Iustum iudicium iudicate, When we know the thing to be true, we may so judge it, and not offende. For Dauid sayth also, Recte iudicate filii hominum, 'Judge rightly always ye children of men.' And as for your superiorite, were ye of Christ, ye should be meke ministers, and no proud superiours.'

Then said doctour Walden vnto him, 'Ye make here no difference of judgements: ye put no diuersite betwene the yll judgements, which Chryst hath forbidden, and the good judgements, which he hath commaunded us to haue. Rash judgement and right judgement, al is one with you. So is judgement presumed, and judgement of office. So swift judges always are the learned scolers of Wickleue. Unto whome the lord Cobham thus answered, 'It is well sophistried of you forsooth; preposterouse are your judgements euer more. For as the prophet Esay saith, 'Ye judge yll good, and good yll.' And therefore the same prophet concludeth, 'That your wayes are not Gods ways, nor Gods wayes your wayes.' And as for that vertuose man Wickleue, whose judgment ye so highly disdayne; I shall saye here for my part both before God and man, that before I knew that dispised doctrine of his, I neuer absteyned from synne. But syns I learned therein to feare my Lord God, it hath otherwise, I trust, been with me: so much grace could I neuer finde in all your gloriouse instructions.'

hym, 'It were not well wyth me, so meny vertuous men luyng, and so many learned men teaching, the scriptures being also so open, and the examples of fathers so plenteouse, if I than had no grace to amende my life till I hearde the deuell preache. Saint Hierom saith, that he whych seketh suche suspected masters, shall not fynde the mydday lyght, but the mydday deuell.' The lord Cobham said, Your fathers the olde Pharisees ascribed Chrystes miracles to Belzebub, and hys doctrine to the deuell. And you as their naturall children haue still the same self judgment, concerning his faithful followers. They that rebuke your viciously luyng, must nedes be heretykes; and that must your doctours proue, whan ye haue no scriptures to do it. Than said he to them all, To judge you as ye be, we nede no farther go than your owne propre actes. Where do ye fynd in all Gods lawe, that ye shuld thus syt in judgment of any Christen men, or yet sentens anye other man vnto death, as ye do here daily? No ground haue ye in all the scriptures so lordely to take it vpon ye; but in Annas and in Cayphas, whiche sate thus vpon Chryst, and vpon his apostles after his ascencion, of them onely haue ye taken it to judge Christes members as ye do, and neyther of Peter nor Johan.

Than sayde some of the Lawyers, 'Yes forsoth, sir, for Christ judged Judas.' The lord Cobham said, No, Christ judged him not, but he judged himselfe; and therupon went forth, and so did hang himselfe. But indede Christ sayd, wo vnto him for that couetous act of his, as he doth yet styll unto many of you. For sens the venime was shed into the church, ye neuer folowed Christ: neither yet haue ye stand in the perfection of Gods lawe.

Than asked him the archbysshoppe, 'What he meant by that venim?' The lord Cobham said, your possessyons and lordshippes: for, than cryed an aungell in the ayre (as your owne Chronycles mencioneth) 'Wo, wo, wo, this day is venime shedde into the church of God.' Before that tyme all the Bysshopes of Rome were martirs in a maner. And sens that time we rede of very few: but in dede sens that same time one hath put down another, one hath poysoned another, one hath cursed another, one hath slayne another, and done much more mischefe besides, as all the chronicles telleth. And let all men consydre well thys, That Christ was meke and mercifull; the pope is proud and a tiraunt. Christ was pore and forgaue; the pope is riche, and a most cruell manslayer, as his dayly actes doth proue him. Rome is the very nest of Antichryst, and out of the nest cometh all his disciples; of whome prelates, priestes and monkes are the body, and these pydle friers are the tayle, whyche couereth his moost fylthy part.

Than sayed the Pryor of the fyre Augustines, 'Alac, Syr, why do ye say so? That is uncharitably spoken.' And the lord Cobham said, not only is it my saying; but also the prophet Esayes long afore my tyme. The prophet, sayth he, which preacheth lyes, is the tayle behind. As you fryers and monkes be lyke pharisees diuided in your outward apparell and vsages, so make ye diuysyon among the peple. And thus, you with such other are the very naturall membres of Antychryst.—Than said he vnto them all, Christe saith in his gospell, 'Wo to you Scribes and Pharisees, ypocrites, for ye close up the kingdome of heauen before men. Neyther entre ye in your selves, nor yet suffre any other that would entre into it. But ye stop up the wayes thereunto with your owne tradicions, and therefore are ye the houshold of Antichrist; ye will not permit Gods veryte to haue passage, nor yet to be taught of his true ministers, fearing to haue your wickedness reproofed. But by such vayne flatterers as vpholde you in your mischeues, ye suffer the common peple most miserably to be seduced.'

Than saide the Archbishop, 'By oure lady, Sir, there shall no suche preache within my diocese, (and God will) nor yet in my jurisdiction, (yf I may know yt) as either maketh diuision, or yet dissension amonge the poore commons.' The lord Cobham sayd, Both Chryst and his Apostles were accused of sedicion making, yet were they most peaceable men. Both Daniel and Christ prophocyed, that such a troublous tyme shulde come, as hath not been yet sens the worldes beginning. And this prophycy is partly fulfilled in your daies and doinges. For many haue ye slaine already, and more wyl ye slee hereafter, if God fulfil not his promes. Chryst saith also, if those daies of yours were not shortened, scarsly shuld any flesh be saued. Therefore loke for it justly, for God wyll shorten your dayes. Moreouer, though priestes and deacons for preaching of God's word, and for ministring the sacraments, with prouision for the pore, be ground-ed in God's lawe, yet haue these other sectes no maner of ground thereof, so as far as I haue red.

Than a Doctour of Lawe, called master Johan Kempe, plucked out of his bosome a cople of that Byll which they had afore sent him into the Tower, by the Archbishops Council, thinking thereby to make shorter worke with him. For they were so amased with his Answers (not al vnlike to them which disputed with Steven) that they knew not well howe to occupye the tyme, there wyttes and sophistry (as God wolde) so fayled them that day. My lord Cobham (sayth this doctor) 'we must brefely know your mynde concerning these 4 Poyntes here following. The fyrst of them is thys. And then he redde vpon the Byll. The Fayth and the Determinacion of holy Church touching the Blessed Sacrament of the Alter is this, that after the sacramentall wordes be ones spoken by a pryest in hys masse, the materyall bread that was before bread, is turned into Christes very bodye. And the materiall wyne that was before wyne, is turned into Christes very bloude. And so there remaineth in the sacrament of the aluter from thens forth no materyall bread nor matervall wyne, which were there before the sacramentall wordes were spoken; Sir, beleue ye not this? The lord Cobham sayed, This is not my Belcue; but my Faith is (as I sayd to you afore) that in the worshipfull sacrament of the altuer, is very Christes body in fourme of breade. Than said the Archbishop, 'Sir Johan, ye must say otherwise.' The lord Cobham saide, Nay, that I shall not, if God be vpon my syde (as I truste he is) but that there is Christes body in fourme of breade, as the comon beleue is.

Than redde the doctor againe. The second Point is this, 'Holy Churche hath determined that eury Christen man lyuing here bodely vpon earth, ought to be shryuen to a priest ordeined by the church, if he may come to him: Sir, what say ye to this?' The lord Cobham answered and said, A diseased or sore wounded man had neede to haue a sure wyse chyrgion, and a true; knowing both the ground and the danger of the same. Moost necessary were it therefore, to be fyrst shryuen vnto God, which only knoweth our diseases, and can helpe us, I deny not in this the going to a priest, if he be a man of good lyfe and learning: for the lawes of God are to be required of the priest which is godly learned. But if he be an ydiote, or a man of viciouse lyyunge, that is my curate, I ought rather to flee from him, than to seke unto him. For sooner might I catch yll of him that is nought, than any goodnesse towards my soule helth.

Than redde the doctour againe. The third Pointe is this, Christe ordeined Sainct Peter the apostle to be his vicar here in erth, whose see is the church of Rome. And he graunted, that the same power which he gaue vnto Peter, shulde succede to all Peter's successors, which we call now popes of Rome. By whose speciall power in churches particuler he ordeyned prelates, as archbishops, parsons, curates, and other degrees more; vnto whom christen men ought to obeye after the lawes of the Church of Rome. This is the determination of holy church: Sir, beleue ye not this? To this he answered and said, He that foloweth Peter moost nighest in pure lyying, is next vnto him in succession; but your lordely ordre estemeth not greatly the lowly behauer of pore Peter, what soeuer ye prate of him; neither care you greatlye for the humble maners of them that succeded him tyll the time of Silvestre, which for the more part were martirs, as I tolde ye afore. Ye can lett all their good conditions go by you, and not hurt your selues with them at all; all the worlde knoweth thys well inough by you, and yet ye can make boast of Peter.

With that one of the other doctours axed him, 'Than what do ye say of the pope?' The lord Cobham answered, As I said before, he and you together maketh whole the great antichrist, of whome he is the great heade; you bishops, priestes, prelates and monkes, are the body, and the begging friers are the taile, for they couer the filthinesse of you both with their subtile sophistrys: neuer will I in conscience obey any of you all, tyll I see you with Peter follow Chryst in conversation.

Than redde the Doctour againe: 'The fourth Pointe is this, holy church hath determined, that it is meritorious to a chrysten manne to go on pilgrimage to holy places, and there specially to worship holy relikes and images of saintes, apostles, martirs, confessours, and all other saintes besydes, approued by the church of Rome: Sir, what say ye to this?' Whereunto he answered, I owe them no seruice by any commaundment of God, and therefore I minde not to seke them for your covetousnes: It were best ye swept them fayre from copwebs and duste, and so layed them up for catchiug of scathe; or els to bury them faire in the ground, as ye do other aged people which are Gods ymages. It is a wonderful thing, that saintes now being dead, shuld become so covetous and nedye, and thereypon so bitterly begge, which all their lyfe time hated all covetousnesse and begginge. But this I saye vnto you, and I wold all the world shuld marke it. That with your shrines and idolles, your fayned absolutions and pardons, ye drawe vnto you the substance, welthe, and chefe pleasures of all christen realmes.

'Why, Syr,' said one of the clerkes, 'will ye not worshiup good Ymages?' What worshiup shuld I geue vnto them? sayd the lord Cobham.—Than sayd fryer Palmyr vnto him, 'Sir, ye well worshiup the crosse of Christ that he died vpon.' Where is it? said lord Cobham.

The fryer sayd, 'I put ye the case, Sir, that it were here euen now before you?' The lord Cobham answered, This is a great wyse manne, to put me an earnest question of a thing, and yet he his selfe knoweth not where the thing it selfe is: yet ones againe aske I you, what worshiup I shuld do unto it?—A Clerk said unto him, 'Such worshiup as Paul speaketh of, and that is this, 'God forbidde that I should joye but onely in the crosse of Jesu Christ.' Than sayd the lord Cobham, and spreade his armes abroad, This is a very Crosse, yea and so muche better than your crosse of woode, in that it was created of God; yet will not I leke to haue it worshipped.

Than said the bishop of London, 'Sir, ye wote well that he died on a material crosse.' The lorde Cobham sayd, Yea, and I wote also that our saluacion came not in by that material crosse, but alone by him which dyed thereypon. And well I wote that holy saint Paul joyced in none other crosse, but in Christes passion and death onely, and in his own sufferings of like persecution with him, for the same selfe verite that he had suffered for afore.—And other Clerke yet asked him, 'Wyll ye than do none honour to the holy crosse?'—He answered him, Yes, if he were myne, I wolde lay him vp honestly, and see vnto him that he shuld take no more scathes abroad, nor be robbed of his goodes as he is now a days.

Than sayd the Archbishop vnto him, 'Sir

Johan, ye haue spoken here many wonderfull wordes, to the slaundrous rebuk of the whole spirituallte, geuing a greet yll example vnto the common sort here, to haue vs in the more disdayne. Moche time haue we spent here about you, and al in vaine so farre as I can see. Well, we must be now at this short point with you, for the day passeth away: ye muste eyther submit your selfe to the ordinance of Holy Church, or else throwe your self (no remedy) into moost depe daunger; se to it in time, for anon it will be els to late.' The lord Cobham said, I knowe not to what purpose I shuld otherwise submitte me; moch more haue you offended me, than euer I offended you, in thus troubling me before thys multitude.—Than sayd the Archbishop againe vnto him, 'We ones againe require you to remembre your selfe wel, and to haue none other opinion in these maters, than the universall Fayth and beleue of the holy Church of Rome is: and so lyke an obedient child to return again to the vnto of your mother. Se to it, I say in time, for yet ye may have remedy, where as anon it will be to late.

The lord Cobham sayd expressly before them all, 'I will none otherwise beleue in these pointes than I haue tolde ye here afore, do with me what ye will.' Finally, than the Archbishop sayd, 'Wel, than I see none other but we must needs do the lawe, we must procede forth to the Sentence diffinitive, and both judge ye and condemne ye for an Heretike. And with that the Archbyschoppe stode vp, and redde there a Byll of his Condemnation, all the clergie and layte avaylyng their bounettes; and thys was thereof the tenour:

The Diffinitive Sentence of his Condempnacion.

In Dei Nomine, Amen. Nos Thomas, permissione diuina, Cantuariensis Ecclesie Archiepiscopus, Metropolitanus totius Anglie primus, & Apostolicæ sedis Legatus, and so forth in barbarous Latin, which we haue here translated into English, for a more playne vnderstanding to the reader."—In the name of God, so be it. We Thomas, by the sufferaunce of God, Archbishop of Caunterbury, metropolitan and primate of all England, and legate from the apostolyke seate of Rome, willet this to be knowen vnto all men. In a certain cause of Heresy, and vpon diuerse articles, where vpon sir John Oldcastle knight, and lord Cobham, after a diligent inquisition made for the same, was detected, accused, and presented before vs in our last conuocation of all our province of Caunterbury, holden in the cathedrall church of Paules at London; at the lauffull denoucement and request of our universall clergie in the seyd conuocation, we proceded against him according to the lawe (God to witnes) with al the fauer possible. And folowing Christes example in all that we might, which willet not the death of a synner, but rather that he be conuerted and lyue, we took vpon vs to correct him, and sought all other ways possible to bring him againe to the churches vnite, declaring vnto hym what the holye and universall church of Rome bath sayd, holden, determined, and taught in that behalfe. And though we found him in the catholike faith farre wyde and so stifnecked, that he wold not confesse his erreure, nor purge him selfe, nor yet repent him thereof; we yet pyteing hym of fatherly compassion, and interlye desyringe the helthe of his soule, appoynted him a competent tyme of delyberacion, to se if he wold repent and seke to be reformed: and sens we haue found him worse and worse. Considering therefore that he is incorrygible, we are driuen to the very extremitie of the lawe, and with great heynes of hart, we now procede to the publication of the sentence diffinitive against him.

Than brought he forth an other Byll, conteyning the sayd Sentence, and that he redde also in his banger Latyne; 'Christi nomine inuocato, ipsum que solum pre oculis habentis, quia per acta mactitata,' and so forth; which I haue also translated into English, that men may understand it: "Christ we take vnto witnes, that nothing els we seke in this our whole enterpryse, but his only glory. For as much as we haue found by diuerse actes done, brought forth and exhibited by sondry evidences, sygnes, and tokens, and also by many most manifest proues, the said sir Johan Oldcastell knight, and lord Cobham, not only an evident heretyke in hys own parson, but also a mighty mainteyner of other heretikes, against the faith and relygion of the holy and vniuersal Church of Rome, namely, about the two sacramentes of the alter, and of penaunce, besides the popes power and pilgrimages: and that he, as the chyld of iniquite and darkenes, hath so hardened his hart, that he will in no case attend vnto the voice of hys pastour: neyther wyll he be alured by strayght admonishments, nor yet be brought in by fauourable wordes. The worthenes of the cause first wayde on the one side, and his vnworthynes again considered on the other syde, his fautes also aggrauated, or made double through his damnable obstinacy. We being loth that he which is nought shuld be worse, and so with his contagiousnes infect the multitude; by the sage counsell and assent of the very discret fathers, our honorable brethren and lordes bishopes here present, Richard of London, Henry of Wynchester, and Benit of Bangor, and of other great, learned, and wyse men here, both doctours of diuinite and of the lawes, canon and ciuyle, seculars and religious, with diuerse other expert men assisting vs, we sentencyally and diffinitively, by thys present writing, judge, declare, and condemne the seid sir Johan Oldcastell knyght, and lord Cobham, for a most pernicious and detestable heretyke, conuicted vpon the same, and refusing vtterly to obey the church agayne, committing hym here from hens forth as a condemned heretik to the secular jurisdiction, power, and judgment, to do him ther vpon to death. Furthermore, we excommunicate and denounce acursed not only this heretike here present, but so many els besydes as shall here after, in fauer of his errour, eyther receive him or defend him, counsell him or helpe him, or any other way maintain him, as very fauters, receiuers, defenders, counceilers, ayders, and maynteyners of condemned heretiks.—And that these premysses maye be the better knowne to all faythfull Chrysten men, we commit yt here vnto your charges, and gaue you straighte commaundement therupon by thys wrytyng also, that ye cause this condemnation and diffinityue sentence of excommunicacyon, concerning both thys heretyke and his fawters, to be publishyd through oute all dyoceses in cytyes, townes, and vyllages, by your curates and parysh priestes, such time as they shall haue most recourse of people, and so that it be done after this sort. As the people are thus gathered deuoultly together, lett the curate euery where go into the pulpet, and there open, declare, and expounde thys process in the mother tonge, in an audyble and intelligible voyce, that it maye well be persciued of all men; and that vpon the feare of this declaration also, the people maye fall from their yll opinions conceiued now of late by sediciouse preachers. More ouer, we will that after we haue deliuered vnto yche one of you bishoppes (which are here present) a cōpye hereof, that ye cause the same to be written out again into dyuers coppies, and so to be sent vnto the other bishoppes and prelates of our whole prouince, that they maye also see the contents thereof solempnely published within their dioceses and cures. Finally we wyll that both you and they signifye aguin vnto vs seriously and distinctly by your wrytinges, as the matter is without fayned colour in euery point perfourmed, the daye wheruppon ye receyued thys processe, the tyme when it was of you executed, and after what sort it was done in euerye condicion, according to the tenour hereof, that we may knowe it to be justly the same."

A cōpye of thys Wrytyng sent Thomas Arundel the archbishop of Caunterbury, afterward from Maydeston the x daye of October, within the same yere of oure Lorde 1413, unto Richard Clifford the bishop of London, which thus beginneth, "Thomas Permissionē Diuina," &c. The sayde Richard Clifford sent an other cōpye thereof, enclosed within his owne letters, unto Robert Mascall, a Carmelite fryer, which was than bishop of Hertford in Walis, written from Hadham the xxiii day of Octobre, in the same yere; and the beginning thereof is this, "Reuerende in Christo Pater," &c. The said Robert Mascall directed an other copy thereof from London the xxvii day of November in the same yere, enclosed in his owne commission also, vnto his archdeacons and deanes in Herford and Shrewisbury. And this is thereof the beginning, "Venerabilibus & discretis viris," &c. In like manner did the other bishoppes within their dioceses.

After that the Archebishop had thus red the Byll of his Condemnation, with most extreme, before the whole multitude: the lord

Cobham sayd with a most cherefull countenance, 'Though ye judge my body, which is but a wretched thing, yet am I certain and sure, that ye can do no harme to my soule, no more than could Sathan vpon the soule of Job. He that created that, will of his infinite mercy and promess save it, I haue therein no manner of doubt. And as concerning these Articles before rehersed, I will stande to them, euen to the very death, by the grace of my eternall God.' And therwith he turned him vnto the people, casting hys handes abroad, and saying with a very loude voice, 'Good Christen people, for Gods loue he well ware of these men: for they will els begyle you, and leade you blindelyng into hell with themselves. For Christ saith plainly vnto you, 'If one blind man leadeth another, they are lyke both to fall into the dytche.'—After thys he fell downe there vpon his knees, and thus before them all prayed for his enemies, holding vp both his handes and his eyes towards heauen and saying, 'Lord God eternal, I beseeche the for thy great mercies sake to forgeue my pursuers, if it be thy blessed will.' And than he was deliuered to syr Robert Morleye, and so ledde forth againe to the Tower of London. And thus was there an ende of that dayes worke.

Whyle the Lord Cobham was thus in the Tower, he sent out priuily vnto his friends; and they at his desire wrote this lytle Bill here following, causing it to be set up in diuerse quarters of London, that the people shulde not beleve the slaunders and lyes that his enemies the bishoppes seruauants and priestes had made on him abroad. And this was the Letter;

"For as much as sir John Oldcastell knight and lord Cobham, is vntuly conuictid and imprisoned, falsely reported, and slaunders among the conien people by his aduersaries, that he shuld otherwise both fele, and speake of the sacraments of the Church, and specially of the blessed sacrament of the altur, than was written in the confession of his heliue, which was undinted and taken to the clergy, and so set up in diuerse open places in the cite of London, knowen be it here to all the world, that he neuer sens varied in any poynt therfro; but this is plainly his beleue, that all the sacraments of the church be proffitable and expedient also to all them that shal be saued, taking them after the intent that Christ and his true church hath ordayned. Further more he beleued that in the blessed sacrament of the altur is verely and truly Christes body, in fourme of bread."

After thys the byshops and pryestes were in moche obloquie, both of the nobilitie and commons, partly for that they had so cruelly handled the good lord Cobham; and partlye againe, bycause hys opinion (as they thought at that tyme) was perfygt concerning the sacrament. As they feared thys to grow to further inconuenience towards them both wayes, they drew their heads together, and at the last consented to use an other practise, somewhat contrary to that they had done asforc. They caused it by and by to be blowne abroad by their feed seruaunts, fryendes and babeling sir Johnes, that the sayde lord Cobham was becomen a good man, and had lawlye submitted him selfe in all things vnto holy church, vtterly chaunging his opinion concerning the sacrament. And ther-vppon they contrefayted an abjuration in his name, that the peple shuld take no hold of that opinion by any thing they had hearthe of him before, and to stande so in the more awe of them, considering hym so great a man, and by them subdued.

An Abjuration counterfayted of the Bishoppes.

This is the Abjuration (say they) of Syr J. Oldecastell knt. sometime the lord Cobham.

In Dei nomine, Amen. I Johan Oldecastell denounced, detected and conyucted of and vppon diuerse articles sauering both heresy and errour, before the reuerend father in Christ, and my good lord Thomas, by the permission of God, lord Archebishop of Caunterburye, and my lauful and rightful iudge in that behalfe, expressly graunt and confesse, That as concerning the ystate and power of the moost holy father the pope of Rome, of his archbishops, his bishops, and his other prelates, the degrees of the church, and the holy sacramentes of the same, specyally of the sacramentes of the aulter, and of penauce, and other obseruances besides of our mother holy church, as pilgrimages and pardons; I affyrme (I say) before the said reuerend father archbishop, and els where, that I being yl seduced by diuerse sedicious preachers, haue greuously erred and heretically persisted, blasphemously answered, and obstinately rebelled. And therefore I am by the sayd reuerend father, before the reuerend fathers in Christ also the bisshops of London, Winchestre, and Bangor, lawfullye condemned for an heretyke.—Neuertheless yet, I now remembering myselfe, and coueting by this menne to auoide that temporal payne, which I am worthy to suffer as an heretike, at the assignacion of my most excellent Christen prince and liege lord king Henry the fift, nowe by the grace of God most worthy kyng of both Englande and of France: minding also to preferre the wholsom determinacyon, sentence and doctryne of the holy and uniuersal church of Rome, before the vnholsum opinions of my self, my teachers, and my followers: I frely, willyngly, deliberately, and thoroughly confesse, graunt, and affyrme the mooste holye fathers in Christ, saint Peter the apostle, and his successors bishoppes of Rome, specially now at this tyme my moost blessed Lorde pope Johan by the permyssyon of God the 23 pope of that name, which now holdeth Peter's seate (and each of them in their succession) in full strength and power, to be Chrystes vycar in ærth, and the head of the church milytaunt. And that by the strength of his office (what thogh he be a great sinner, and afore knowen of God to be damned) he hath full auctorite and power to rule and governe, bind and lose, saue and destroy, accurse and assoyle, al other Christen men.—And agreeably styl vnto this, I confesse, graunt, and affyrme all other archbishoppes, bishoppes, and prelates, in their prouinces, dyocesses, and parishes (appointed by the said pope of Rome, to assyst him in his doinges or business) by his decrees, canons, or vertue of his office, to haue had in tymes past, to haue now at this tyme, and that they ought to haue in tyme to come, auctorite and power to rule and to governe, binde and lose, acurse and assoyle the subjectes or peoples of their aforesaid prouinces, dyocesses, and parishes; and that theyr said subjectes or peoples ought of right in all things to obey them. Furthermore I confesse, graunt and affyrme, that the sayde spyrytuall fathers, as our moost holy father the pope, archbishops, byshops and prelates, haue had, haue now and ought to haue hereafter, auctorite and power for the estate, order and gouernaunce of theyr subjectes or peoples, to make lawes, decrees, statutes and constitucions; yea, and to pullysh, commaunde and compell theyr said subjectes and peples to the obseruacion of them.—Moreover, I confesse, graunt and affyrme that all these forsaid lawes, decrees, statutes and constitucions, made, published and commaunded accordyng to the fourme of spirituall lawe, all Christen peple and euery man in him selfe, is straightly bound to obserue, and mekeleye to obeye, accordyng to the diuersite of the forsayde powers. As the lawes, statutes, canons and constitucions of our most holy father the pope, incorporated in his decrees, decretals, clementynes, codes, chartes, rescriptes, sextiles and extrauagauntes the world over all; and as the prouinciall statutes of archebisshops in their prouinces, the sinodall actes of byshopes in theyr diocesses, and the commendable rules and customes of prelates in their colleges, and curates in their parishes, all Christen peple are both bound to obserue, and also moost mekeleye to obeye.ouer and besides all this, I Johan Oldecastell, vtterly forsakinge and renouuncyng all the aforesaid errors and heresyes, and all other errors and heresyes lyke vnto them, lay my hande here vppon this boke, of holy euangelye of God, and swear, that I shall neuermore from hens forth hold these forsaid heresyes, nor yet any other lyke vnto them wetingly. Neyther shall I geue counsell, ayde, helpe nor fauer at any tyme to them that shall holde, teache, affyrme or mainteine the same, as God shall helpe me and these holy euangelyes.—And that I shall from hens forth faithfullye obeye, and inuolably obserue all the holy lawes, statutes, canons, and constitucions of all the popes of Rome, archbishops, bishops and prelates, as are contayned, and determined in theyr holye decrees, decretals, clementines, codes, chartes, rescriptes, sextyles, summes papall, extrauagauntes, statutes prouincyall, actes synodal, and other ordinary rules customes constituted by them, or that shall chaunce hereafter dyrectly to be determined or made. To these and all such other, wyll I my selfe with al powr possible apply. Besydes all this, the penauce which it shal please my said reuerend father, the lorde archbishop of Caunterbury, hereafter to enioyne me for my sinnes, I will mekely obeye and faithfully fulfill. Finally, all my seducers and false teachers, and all other besydes, whom I shall hereafter knowe suspected of heresy or errors, I shall effectually present, or cause to be presented, vnto my sayd reuerend father lord archbishop, or to them which hath his auctorite, so some as I can conueniently do it, and see that they be corrected to my vttermost power. Amen."

The cruell Complaint of the Clergy, and tyrannouse Acte thereoppon made.

Neuer came this Abjuracyon to the handes of the lord Cobham, neyther was it compyled of them for that purpose; but onely therwyth to bleare the eyes of the unlearned multitude. And when they perceyued that polycye wolde not helpe, but made more and more against them, than sought they out an other false practyse. They went vnto the king with a most greuouse complaint, lyke as they did afore in his fathers tyme, that in euery quarter of the realme, by reason of Wicleues opinions, and the said lord Cobham, were wonderful contentions, rumours, tumultes, vprours, confederations, dissencions, diuisions, differences, discordes, harmes, slaunders, scismes, sectes, sedicions, perturbacions, pannels, vnlawfull assemblyes, variaunce, strifes, fychtinges, rebelliousse ruffelings and dayly insurrections. The Church (they said) was hated; the dioceses were not obeyed; the ordinaries were not regarded; the spirituall offycers, as suffraganes, archdeacons, chancellers, doctours, commissaries, offcials, deanes, lawyers, scribes and sommeners were euery where despyed; the lawes and liberties of holy Church were troden vndre fote; the Chrysten fayth was ruynously decayed; Gods seruice was laught to scorne; the spiritual iurisdiction, auctorite, honour, power, polycy, lawes, rytes, ceremonies, curses, keyes, censures and canonical sanctions of the Church were had in an vitre contempt. So that all in a manner was come to nought.

And the cause of this was, that the Heretikes and Lollards of Wicleues opiniou, were suffered to preach abroad, so boldly to gether conuenticles vnto them, to kepe scoles in mens houses, to make bokes, comyle treatises, and wryte ballets, to teach priuately in angles and corners, as in wodes, felde, medowes, pastours, groues, and in caues of the ground. This wolde be (they sayd) a destruction to the commonwelth, a subuercion to the land, and an utter decay of the kinges estate ryall, if remedy were not sought in tyme. And this was their policy, to couple the kinges auctorite wyth that they had done in their former counsell of craft, and so to make it thereby the stronger. For they perceiued themselves very farre to weake els to follow against their enemies, that they had so largely enterprised. Upon this complaint, the king immediately called a parliament at Leichestre; it might not in those daies be holden at Westminstre, for the great fauer that the lord Cobham had both in London, and about the cyte. Yet were they deceiued; that they doubted most, lyghted there sonest upon them.

A Byll was put in there again by the commons, against their continual wasting of the temporalities, lyke as it had bene twise afore by procurement of the said lord Cobham, both in the daies of Richard the Second, Anno 1365, and also of king Henry the Third, Anno Dom. 1410, whervpon was growne all this malice afore specified; but this was than workemanly defeated by an other proper practise of theyrs. They put the king in remembrance to claime his right in Fraunce, and graunted him therevnto a dime, with other great subsidy of mony. Thus were Christes people betrayed euery way, and their Liues bought and sold by these most cruell theues. For in the said parliament, the king made this most blasphemouse and cruell acte, to be as a law for euer, That whatsoever they were that should rede the Scriptures in the mother tong (which was then called Wicleue's lerning) they shuld forfet land, catel, body, lif and godes from their beyres for euer, and so be condemned for heretykes to God, ennemies to the crowne, and most errant traiters to the lande.

Besides this, it was inacted that neuer a sanctuary, nor priuileged ground within the realme, shulde holde them, though they were still permitted both to theues and murtherers. And if in case they wold not gyue ouer, or were after their pardon relapsed, they shulde suffer death in two manner of kindes; that is, they shulde first be hanged for treason against the king, and then be burned for heresy against God, and yet neither of both committed. The beginning of that Act is this, 'Pro eo quod magni rumores, &c.' Auon after was it proclaimed throughout the reame, and than had the bissshops, priests, monkes and Fryers, a worlde somewhat to their mindes. For then were many taken in diuerser quarters, and suffered most cruel death. And many fled out of the lande into Germany, Bohem, Fraunce, Spain, Portingale, and into the weld of Scotland, Wales, and Yreland, working their many maruels against their false kingdom, to long to wryte. In the Christmas followinge was syr Roger Acton knyght, Master Johan Browne esquire, sir Johan Beuerlaye, a learned preacher, and dyuerse other more attached for quarrelling with certeine priestes, and so imprisoned. For all men at that time could not patiently suffre their blasphemouse bragges.

The complaint was made vnto the king of them, that they had made a greate assemble in Sainct Gyles Felde at London, purposing the destruction of the land, and the subuercion of the commonwelth. As the king was thus infourmed, he erected a banner (saith Walden) with a crosse thereupon, as the pope doth comonly by his legate, when he pretendeth to warre against the Turke; and with a great nombre of men entered the same felde, where as he found no such company, yet was the complaint judged true, because the byshoppes had spoken it at the informacion of their priestes. All this hath Thomas Walden in diuerse of his workes, which was at the same tyme a White or Carmelite Frere, and the king's confessor; and partly it is touched both by Robert Fabian, and by Polidorus Virgilius in their English Chronicles: but not in all pointes rightly. In the meane season [on the feast of St. Simon and Jude] sir John Oldcastell the lord Cobham, escaped out of the Towr of London in the night, and so fledde into Wales, whereas he continued more than four years after (d).

Some wryters haue thought this escape to come by the said sir Roger Acton, and other gentlemen, in displeasure of the priestes, and that to be the chefe occasion of their deathes, which might well be; but Walden doth not so vtter it, which reigned the selfe same time. In January next following was the aforementioned syr Roger Acton, master Johan Browne, syr Johan Beuerlaye and 36 more (of whom the more part were gentylmen of byrthe) conuicted of Heresy by the byshoppes, and condempned of treason by the temporalte, and according to the acte, were fyrste hanged and then brent in the sayd Saint Giles Feld (e). In the same yeare also was one Johan Claydon a skinner, and one Richard Turmin a baker, both hanged and brent in Smythfilde by that vertuous act; besides that was done in al other quarters of England, which was no small number, if it were now throughly knowen.

[In the mean while (says Holinshed, vol. iii. p. 560.) the lord Cobham, who shifted from place to place to escape the hands of them who he knew would be glad to lay hold on him, had conveyed himself in secret wise into an husbandman's house not far from St. Albans, within the precinct of a lordship belonging to the abbot of that town: the abbot's servants getting knowledge hereof, came thither by night, but they missed their purpose, for he was gone; but they caught divers of his men, whom they carried streight to prison. The lord Cobham herewith was sore dismayed for that some of them, who were taken, were such as he trusted most, being of counsel, in all his devices. In the same place were found books written in English, and some of those books in time past had been trimly gilt, limned and beautified with images, the heads whereof had been scraped off; and in the Litany they had blotted out the name of our Lady and other saints, till they came to the verse 'Parce nobis Domine.' Divers Writings were found there also in derogation of such honour as then was thought due to our lady. The abbot of St. Albans sent the Book so disfigured with scrapings and blottings out, with other such writings as there were found, unto the king, who sent the book again unto the archbishop, to show the same in his sermons at Paul's-Cross in London, to the end that the citizens and other people of the realm might understand the purposes of those that were called Lollards, to bring them farther into discredit with the people.]

The latter Enprisoning and Death of the Lord Cobham.

In the yeare of oure Lorde 1415 dyed Thomas Arundell, which had bene Archbishop of Caunterbury more than 32 yeares, to the great destruction of Chrysten belieue. Yet died not his prodigious tyrannye with him; but succeeded with his office in Henry Chicheley, and in a great sort more of the spryghful spiritualtie. For their malice was not yet sated against the good lord Cobham. But they confedered with the lord Powys (which was at that time a great gouernour in Wales) feeding him with lordly giftes and promises, to accomplish their desyre. He at the last, thus monied with Judas, and outwardly pretending him great amity and fauer, moost cowardlye and wretchedlye toke hym, and in conclusion so sent him up to London, whereas he remayned a moneth or two imprysoned again in the Tower. Upon the 14 Dec (1417) he was brought before the parliament, and after long processe they condempned him againe of Heresy and Treason by force of the afore named Act (f). He rendering thanks unto God that he had so appointed him to suffre for his names sake. And upon the day appointed (25 Dec.) he was brought out of the Tower, with his armes bound behynd him, hauing a very cherful countenance. Than was he layd vpon a hurdle, as though he had been a moost haynouse traitoure to the crowne, and so drawn forth into saint Gyles Felde, where as they had set vp a newe paire of galowes. As he was comen to the place of execution, and was taken from the hurdle, he fell down deuoughtly upon his knees, desyringe Almightye God to forgeue his enemies. Than stode he up and beheld the multitude, exhorting them in most godly maner to folowe the laws of God, written in the scriptures; and in any wyse to beware of such teachers as they se contrary to Christ in their conuersacion and liuing, with many other special counsels (g). [When at his last hours he was urged to confess himself to a priest, whose service was offered for that purpose, he not only with a noble scorn rejected him, but openly protested, 'That if the Apostles Peter and Paul were

(f) It is pretended by some historians, that he had been indicted and out-lawed for high-treason, and was executed upon that outlawry: the indictment itself is inserted at the end of this case; but it appears by many marks to be a forgery [for which see Fox's Acts and Mon.] The Sentence itself plainly shewing he was executed in pursuance of the late Act.

there, he would not confess to them, since one infinitely greater, God himself, was present; and as for him only he implored and hoped for pardon, so to him alone he would make confession of his sins.' The cruel preparations of his torments could make no impression of terror upon him, nor shock his illustrious constancy: but in him were seen united the fearless spirit of a soldier, and the holy resignation of a true christian.] Then he was hanged vp ther by the middle in chaynes of yron, and so consumed alyue in the fyre, praising the name of God, so long as his life lasted. In the ende, he commended his soule into the handes of God, and so departed hens most christenly, his body resolved to ashes.—And this was done in the yere of our lord 1417 which was the sixt yere of the reygne of king Henry the fift, the people ther present shewyng great dolour. How the priestes that time fared, blasphemed, and cursed, requiring the people not to pray for hym, but to judge him dampned in hell, for that he departed not in the obedience of their pope; it were too long to wryte.

The following Account of the Condemnation and Execution of the Lord Cobham is extracted from Cobbett's Parl. Hist. vol. 1. p. 336.

“On the 18th of December and the 29th day of this parliament, sir John Oldcastle, of Cowling, in the county of Kent, knight, being outlawed upon Treason in the king's-bench, and excommunicated by the archbishop of Canterbury, for Heresies, was brought before the lords; and having heard his said Conviction, answered not thereto in excuse; upon which record and process it was adjudged, That he should be taken as a traitor to the king and realm; that he should be carried to the Tower of London, and from thence drawu through London to the new gallows in saint Giles's, without Temple-bar, there to be hanged, and burned hanging.' The Record out of the king's-bench is at large; the effect whereof is, 'That the said sir John Oldcastle, and others, to the number of twenty men, called Lollards, at saint Giles's aforesaid, did conspire to subvert the state of the Clergy, to kill the king, his brothers, and other nobles.' The archbishop of Canterbury's Instrument for his Excommunication, is there also at large. And a motion being made, that the lord Powis might have the thanks of the house, and the reward in the Proclamation mentioned, for apprehending of sir John Oldcastle, knight, the heretick; it passed in the affirmative.—Thus far sir Robert Cotton, and his publisher. What we have to add, relative to the Condemnation of this great man, by his peers, is chiefly from Walsingham; who says, that, when the parliament was informed of sir John Oldcastle's being taken in Wales by the lord Powis, they ordered him to be sent for up. He was brought to London in a horse-litter, having been much wounded in the conflict, and placed before the duke regent and the other estates of the realm; and the Indictment drawn up against him at the king's-bench some years before, for levying war against the king, was read in the house. Being demanded what he could alledge in arrest of Judgment, he ran out into a discourse very foreign to the purpose, about God's mercies; and that all mortal men, who would be followers of God, ought to prefer mercy above judgment; that vengeance pertained only to the Lord, and that his servants ought not to trench upon this prerogative of the Almighty. Thus he went on, talking widely from the business, till, at last, the chief justice desired the regent to order the prisoner not to make them lose any more time, but to answer directly to the point. After some pause he told them, it was a small thing for him to be judged by them, or of man's judgment; and then began again to ramble from the question, when the Chief Justice once more interrupted him, and bid him answer peremptorily, if he had any thing to object against the legality of the process? To this he replied, with a surprising boldness, 'That he had no judge amongst them, nor could acknowledge them as judges, as long as his sovereign lord king Richard was living in Scotland.' Upon this answer a warrant was instantly signed for his execution, and he was ordered to be hanged and burnt. The first part of his sentence was for Treason; and the other for Heresy. Accordingly he was executed on a gallows, built on purpose in saint Giles's fields, being hung by the neck in a chain of iron, and his body, with the gallows, consumed to ashes. Many are the disputes between the protestant and popish writers, about the character of this nobleman, who was the first peer of England that suffered for religion. The former crying him up as a martyr to truth; and the latter treating him with no better titles than an enthusiast, a rebel, and an heretick. Mr. Goodwin says, 'He had all the qualities of a brave and gallant gentleman, and was equally illustrious in arts and arms;' but, if what Walsingham relates of his behaviour at his execution be true, that when many persons of quality attended there, the last words he spoke was to sir Thomas Erpingham, adjuring him, 'That if he saw him rise from the dead again, on the third day, he would procure that his sect might live in peace and quietness;' we can look upon him, in this latter part of his life, as little better than an enthusiast."

The Archbishop of Canterbury against the Lord Oldcastle, 1 Hen. V. A. D. 1413. [From the Records at Lambeth, and may be found in Rymer's Fœd. t. 9. p. 61.]

“Thomas, by divine permission, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolick see, to our venerable brother Richard, by the grace of God, bishop of London, health and brotherly love in the Lord.—Whereas in our late consultation, concerning the unity and reformation of the church of England, in convocation of the prelates and clergy of our province of Canterbury, last held in our church of St. Paul's, with the said prelates and clergy, among other things it was concluded by us, and the said prelates and clergy, next to impossible, to repair the rending of our Lord's seamless coat, unless first of all certain great men of the kingdom, the authors, abettors, protectors, defenders and entertainers of those hereticks, who are called Lollards, were severely reprehended, and reclaimed from their errors, if other means failed, by the censure of the church, assisted by the secular arm:—And accordingly, upon the most diligent enquiry in the said convocation, by the proxies of the clergy, and others there assembled in great numbers from each diocese of our said province, it was found by them, and made known and presented to us, that sir J. Oldcastle knight, was and is the principal receiver, abettor, patron and defender of the same.—And that he sent the Lollards to preach about in the dioceses of London, Rochester, and Hereford, without any licences from the ordinaries or diocesans of the places, contrary to the synodical constitution made for that purpose; and that he was present at the wicked preachings of the same, and silenced all opposers he met with, with threatnings and terrors, and the power of the secular sword:—Asserting and affirming, amongst other things, that we and our brethren the suffragans of our province, never had, nor have authority to make any constitution of this kind.—And concerning the Sacraments of the altar and penance, pilgrimages, adoration of images, and the power of the keys, he has believed, and does believe, and dogmatizes and teaches otherwise than the Roman and universal church holds and affirms.—Wherefore the said prelates and clergy then besought us, that we would be pleased to proceed against the said sir John Oldcastle, for and upon the premises.—But in reverence to our lord the king, (with whom the said sir John was a great favourite) and as much out of respect to the order of knighthood, with all our brethren and suffragans of our said province, and a great part of the clergy of our said province, we waited on our said lord the king, at his palace at Kennington; and making complaint against the said sir John, we in some measure represented the errors of the said sir John.

“ But at the instance of our lord the king, and our own desire to reduce the said sir John to the unity of the church, without bringing him to open shame, we deferr'd for a long time all execution of the premises. But forasmuch as we had it from the king's own mouth, and under his hand, that all his pains to reclaim this man had proved vain and ineffectual; we thereupon decreed to summon the said sir John to appear before us at a certain time now past, to answer for and concerning the premises; and we sent our officer with these our citations to the said sir John, then dwelling at his castle of Cowling.

of the said sir John without leave; but by the mediation of one John Butler, door-keeper to the privy-chamber of our lord the king, he should apply to sir John himself, for his leave to enter his castle, in order to give him a citation; or at least that he wou'd appear without the castle, and suffer the citation to be serv'd upon him.—But sir John publicly answered the said John Butler, tho' in the premises he had made use of the king's name, that he wou'd by no means be cited, nor suffer any manner of way such citation to be served upon him.—Upon this faithful account given us, that it was impossible to serve the said sir John personally with a citation; and we being fully persuaded thereof, decreed that he should be cited by an edict, which should be publicly fixed on the great doors of the cathedral church in Rochester, which is but three English miles from his said castle of Cowling. Accordingly we caus'd him to be cited, and our edict to be fix'd in publick and open view on the great doors of the said church, charging him to appear before us on the second day of September now past, personally to answer to and for the premises, and other allegations of heretical pravity against him.—On the day appointed we held a court in the greater chapel in our castle of Leeds, in our diocese, in which we then lived and resided with our court; and after the necessary proof of the premises, and we had heard and receiv'd the relation, as it is commonly reported in the parts where the said sir John immures and fortifies himself in his said castle, and defends his opinions by contemning the keys of the church, and impugning the archiepiscopal authority:

“ We caused Proclamation aloud and in open court, to be made for the said sir John to appear; and after proclamation made, and we had long waited, and he not appearing, we justly pronounced him, as he was, contumacious; and then and there returned him excommunicated, in punishment for so high a contumacy.—And because from the series of the premises, and other plain demonstrations and evidences of fact, we apprehend that the said sir John strengthens and fortifies himself in defence of his errors against the authority of the church, as is premised, (which gives great handle to suspect him of heresy and schism) we decreed against the said sir John, that he should be a second time cited personally, if he could be found; if not, by edict, as before, to appear before us on the Saturday next after the feast of the apostle and evangelist St. Matthew next ensuing, to shew, if he has reasonable cause why he ought not to be proceeded against as a publick heretick, schismatick, and an enemy of the Catholick Church, and why he ought not to be adjudged as such, and the assistance of the secular arm be solemnly called for against him; personally to propound, and further to answer, do, and receive concerning all and singular the premises, what in justice is meet.—At which time (namely, the Saturday next after the feast of St. Matthew, being the 23d of Sept. as we held our court in the chapter-house of St. Pauls in London, with our brethren, Rd. lord bishop of London, and Henry of Winchester in sessions with us, sir Robert Morley knight and lieutenant of the Tower of London, appeared in court with the said sir John Oldcastle knight, and delivered him to us:

“ For he had been arrested a little before by the king’s order, and confined to the Tower. To the said sir John Oldcastle thus personally appearing, we repeated, in soft and moderate terms, and in a manner very courteous and obliging, all our proceedings against him, as they stand upon the journal of the former day; namely, How he the said sir John stood presented and charged by and upon the articles above mentioned, in convocation of the prelates and clergy of our said province. And how he had been cited and excommunicated for his contumacy. And, though by his default it was come to this, we notwithstanding shewed our selves ready and willing to absolve him.—But he the said sir John taking no notice of this our overture, answered, He would gladly make profession, before us and my said brethren, of the faith which he believed and maintained. For which we giving leave, as he desired, he drew out of his bosom an indented writing, and there openly read the contents of it, and afterwards with his own hand presented to us the said writing, touching the Articles whereof he was accused; of which this is the copy:

“ ‘ I John Oldcastle knight, and lord Cobham, desire it may be known to all Christians, and I call God to witness, that I never have entertained, and, by the help of God, never will entertain any persuasion, which is not consistent with a firm and undoubting belief of all the sacraments, which were ordained and appointed by Christ himself for the use of his church. Moreover, that my faith, as to the four points alledged against me, might be more clearly understood, I declare, First of all, That I believe that in the adorable sacrament of the altar, the very body of Christ does exist, under the species of bread: the same body, I mean, that was born of his mother Mary, that was crucified for us, that dy’d and was bury’d, and rose again the third day from the dead, and was exalted to the right hand of his eternal father, where he now sits partaker with him in glory.—Then for the Sacrament of penance, I believe it is chiefly necessary for all that desire to be saved, to amend their wicked lives, and undergo such a penance for the sinful part of them, as by a true confession, an undissembled contrition, and lawful satisfaction, manifests it self to be agreeable to the holy scriptures, without which none can hope for salvation. Thirdly, with respect to Images, I hold that they are no ingredient in the Christian belief, but, long after the publication of the faith of Christ, were introduced into the world, by the permission of the Church, to be as a calendar to the laity and the ignorant, that by visible representation of the sufferings of Christ and of the pious lives and martyrdoms of the saints, the remembrance of those things might the more easily be impressed on their minds: but if one so abuses this representation, as to give that worship to these images of the saints, which is due to the saints themselves, or rather to him to whom the saints themselves owe all honour and adoration, and putteth his confidence in them, which is only to be placed in God, or is so affected towards these senseless images, as to be more devoted to them than God, in my opinion he is guilty of idolatry, and wickedly sins against God, the only object of worship.—Lastly, I am fully persuaded, that there is no abiding place upon earth, but that we are all pilgrims either on the way to happiness, or tending to misery: he that either knows not, or will not be instructed in, nor live in the practice of the commandments of God, it is in vain for him to expect salvation, tho’ he went on pilgrimage into all quarters of the world: and on the other side, he that lives in obedience to the holy commandments of God, will undoubtedly be sav’d, tho’ he never went a step on pilgrimage in his life, either to Rome or Canterbury, or Compostell, or to any other places.”

“ Sir John having thus read his Writing, we with our brethren the bishops abovementioned, and divers other doctors and learned men, held a consultation about the contents of it: and by the advice and agreement of the same, we thus applied to the said sir John Oldcastle, at the same time and place: ‘ Look you, Sir John! In this writing of yours, it must be confessed there are contained many good things and right Catholick; but this day was appointed you to answer to other points, which savour of error and heresy, which your declaration has not fully answered; and therefore you ought to explain yourself more clearly as to those points, and more particularly declare your faith and assertions expressed in the said writing, viz. Whether you hold, believe, and affirm, that in the sacrament of the altar, after consecration by the priest, there remaineth material bread or not? Also, whether you hold, believe, and affirm, that in the sacrament of penance, it is necessary, where a priest can be had, to confess your sins to the priest, ordained by the church?’—To which state of the questions, amongst many other things said by the said sir John, he answered, expressly, That he would not declare himself otherways, nor return any other Answer, than in his said Writing. Upon this we replied to the said sir John, with much patience, and in a courteous and affectionate manner: ‘ Sir John, it behoves you to consider well of this matter, because if you don’t return a clear answer to the articles exhibited against you, within the time assigned by the judge, we may proceed to pronounce and declare you an heretick.’ But sir John would abide by his former answer, and afford us no other.

“ We therefore advised with our brethren the bishops above-mentioned, and others of our council, and by their advice we declared to the said sir John Oldcastle, what the holy Roman Church, following the doctrines of St. Austin, St. Jerom, and St. Ambrose, and other fathers, in these points, had determined; which determinations all Catholicks were obliged to submit to. To which the said sir John gave for Answer; 'That he would readily assent to and observe the determinations and decisions of holy church, and all that God required him to believe and observe; but that our lord the pope, the cardinals, the archbishops, and bishops, and other prelates of the church, had power to determine such things, he would by no means affirm.' We, still patiently bearing with him, in hopes he might be better informed by mature deliberation, promised the said sir John, That certain determinations, relating to the points above-mentioned, and to which he ought to give a clearer Answer, should be translated from the Latin into English, that he might the more easily understand them, and they be published for his use. And we commended and affectionately entreated him to prepare and deliver in a full and clear answer to the same on Monday next following.

"And we caused these determinations to be translated the same day, and to be delivered into his own hands the next Sunday, the tenor of which determination is as follows: 'The faith and determination of the holy catholick church, concerning the sacrament of the altar, is this, That after consecration by a priest at mass, the substance of the bread is chang'd into the material body of Christ, and the substance of the wine into the material blood of Christ; therefore after consecration, there remaineth not any of the substance of bread and wine, which were in both before it. What Answer do you give to this Article?—Also holy church hath determined, that it is the duty of every Christian living in the world, to confess his sins to a priest, ordain'd by the church, if he has the opportunity of such an one. What are your sentiments of this Article?—Christ ordain'd St. Peter to be his vicar on earth, whose see is the church of Rome; and that all the successors of Peter, who are now called the popes of Rome, should succeed in the same power and authority with which Christ invested him; by whose special power are constituted and ordained prelates in particular churches, as archbishops, bishops, curates, and the rest of the ecclesiastical order; to which all Christians owe obedience, according to the traditions of the Roman church. This is the determination of holy church, and what is your opinion of this Article?—Besides these, the holy church hath ordain'd, that it is the indispensable duty of every Christian man to go on pilgrimage to holy places, and there to adore the sacred relicks of the apostles, martyrs, and confessors, and of all the saints in the calendar of the Roman church. How do you hold this Article?'

"On Monday the 25th of the said month of September, we assembled with our brethren the bishops above-mention'd, with the addition, by our order and command, of our venerable brother Benedict, by the grace of God bishop of Bangor. And our counsellors and officers, namely, Mr. Henry Ware, official of Canterbury; Philip Morgan, doctor of both laws; Howel Kyffen, John Kemp and William Carleton, doctors of the canon law; and John Witnam, Thomas Palmer, Robert Wontherval, John Withead, Robert Chamberlain, Richard Duddington, and Thomas Walden, doctors in divinity; also James Cole and John Stevens, our notaries, both called to assist, and take the Examinations, in the Trial, were all and every of them sworn upon the holy evangelists, as they would answer it to God and the world, faithfully to discharge their duty that day, in the matter and cause above-mention'd.

"After this Robert Morley knight and lieutenant of the Tower of London, brought sir John Oldcastle into court, and set him before us: To whom we affably and courteously repeated the Proceedings of the former day, and, as before, told him, How he had been, and still stood, excommunicated; and we intreated and besought him to desire and accept of absolution, in the usual form of the church. To which sir John then answered in these words: 'That he desired no absolution from us, but only from God.'—Upon this we prayed the said sir John, with an air of kindness and concern, to give his full Answer to the Articles exhibited against him. And first we demanded what he had to say about the Sacrament of the Eucharist? To which Article, among other things he answer'd and said, 'That as Christ, when he liv'd upon earth, had the divine and human nature united together in him, and the divine was veil'd and cover'd under the human, and only the human visible and outward; so in the sacrament of the altar, there is the very body of Christ, and real bread too; the bread is the thing we see with our eyes, and the body of Christ, which is hidden under it, we do not see.' And the faith about this Sacrament of the Altar, express'd in the Writing which we sent to him, as determin'd by the holy Roman church and the fathers, he expressly deny'd to be the determination of the church, or, if it was the determination of the church, he asserted such determination to be made contrary to the holy scriptures, and after the church was aggrandiz'd and corrupted, and not before.

"To the Articles about Penance and Confession, he answer'd in these words: 'That if any one is so entangled in the snares of sin, that he knows not how to extricate himself, it is advisable and expedient for him to apply to some pious and discreet minister for ghostly counsel: but that he should confess his sin to his own or any other priest, tho' he had never so good an opportunity, is not at all necessary to salvation, because such a sin can be forgiven only upon contrition, and on that alone can the sinner be clear'd.'—Concerning the Adoration of the Holy Cross, he then declared and asserted, 'That the body of Christ, which hung upon the cross, ought only to be worshipp'd, because that body was and is the only adorable cross.' And being ask'd what honour he allow'd to the image of the cross? he answer'd in these express words; 'That to keep it clean and in his closet, was the only honour he vouchsafed it.'—As to the power of the Keys, our lord the pope, archbishops, bishops, and other prelates, he said, 'The pope and we together made up the true antichrist: the pope was the head, the archbishops, bishops, and other prelates the body and limbs, and the friars the tail of antichrist; To which pope, archbishops; and prelates, there was no obedience due, any further than they imitated Christ, and Peter, in their lives, manners, and conversation; and that he is the successor of Peter, who follows him in the purity of his life and conversation, and no other.'

"The said sir John added, addressing himself with a loud voice, and extended hands, to the people that were present: 'Those who sit in Judgment upon me, and are desirous to condemn me, will seduce you all, and themselves, and lead ye to Hell; take therefore good heed of them.' Upon his saying this, we apply'd to the said sir John, and besought him, with tears in our eyes, and exhorted him in the most compassionate manner we could, to return to the unity of the church, to believe and embrace the faith and doctrine of holy church. To which he return'd this peremptory Answer: 'That he would not believe nor maintain otherwise than he had before declar'd.'

"Seeing therefore he was so harden'd in his errors, that we had no hopes of working on him to renounce them, we proceeded with regret and bitterness of heart, to pronounce the following definitive Sentence:

"In the name of God, Amen. We Thomas, by divine permission, archbishop and humble minister of the holy church of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolick see: Whereas in our last convocation of the clergy of our province of Canterbury, holden in the cathedral church of saint Paul, London, after consultation upon several heretical tenets, and strict inquiry made who were the authors and abettors of the same, sir John Oldcastle, knight, and lord Cobham, was detected and presented of and for the said heresies, as having given great scandal throughout our province of Canterbury, by openly and avowedly professing the same; upon the address and representation of all the clergy in the said convocation for a process, we proceeded according to law against the said sir John, and (as God knows) with all the equity and favour that could possibly be shew'd: and, following the steps of Christ, 'who would not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live,' we endeavour'd to reclaim the said sir John, and try'd all ways and means that we could devise to reduce him to the unity of the church, declaring unto him the doctrines, tenets, and determinations of the holy Roman and universal church, relating to those points. And tho' we found he had apostatiz'd from the catholick faith, and was so confirm'd in his error, that he would not confess it, nor clear himself of it, nor disavow it; yet forbearing him in paternal love, and out of a sincere desire of his salvation, we allow'd him a competent time for deliberation, and wherein he might repent and reform himself.—But forasmuch as we have experienced the said sir John to be incorrigible and irreclaimable, we at last with grief and heaviness of heart, in obedience to what the law requires, proceed to give sentence definitive against him—in the name of Christ, and having his honour only in view; forasmuch as we have found by divers acts done, produced, and exhibited by indications, presumptions and proofs, and many other kinds of evidence, that sir John Oldcastle knight is really and truly an heretick, and a follower of hereticks, against the faith and religion of the holy Roman and catholic church, and particularly with respect to the sacraments of the eucharist and penance; that, as a child of darkness and iniquity, he has hardened his heart to that degree, that he refuses to hear the voice of his pastor, and will not be prevailed upon by gentle monitions, nor reduc'd by soft persuasions, tho' the merits of our cause, and the demerits of his own, he had diligently canvassed and weighed, and so aggravated the wickedness of his error by his damnable obstinacy: we unwilling that he should contract further degrees of guilt, by infecting others with the contagion of heresy, by the advice and consent of men famous for discretion and wisdom, our venerable brothers, the lords, Rd. bishop of London, Henry bishop of Winchester, and Benedict bishop of Bangor, and some other doctors of divinity, and of canon and civil law, and other religious and learned persons, called to our assistance: we do peremptorily and definitively, by this present writing, judge, declare, and condemn the said sir John Oldcastle for an heretick, convicted of the detestable crime of heresy, and utterly refusing to be reconciled to the church by repentance, and an apostate from those doctrines, in the above-mentioned articles especially, which the holy Roman and catholick church holds, teaches, and hath determined: and we leave him from henceforth as an heretick, to the secular Judgment.—And furthermore, we have excommunicated, and by these presents do denounce excommunicated, the said heretick, and all others who shall hereafter, in favour of his error, countenance, defend, or afford him any counsel, aid, or comfort: deeming such person or persons as abettors, encouragers, and defenders of hereticks.—And that these premises might be promulg'd and known to all christians, we charge and enjoin you, forasmuch as the said sir John Oldcastle was and is condemned by us for an Heretick, a Schismatick, and as erroneous in the above-mention'd articles, and also all other persons, who out of favour or affection to his error, shall hereafter countenance, defend, or afford him any counsel, aid, or comfort, are excommunicated, as deen'd abettors, encouragers, and patrons of hereticks, according to our said definitive sentence, to give orders and directions to your priests and curates of your respective cities and dioceses, in their respective churches, when there is the greatest congregation of people, to declare, publish, and expose with loud and audible voice, and in our mother tongue, the said heretick, and hereticks, according to our said definitive sentence, and the order observed in this process; to the end that any wrong notions, which possibly the people may have given into concerning these matters, and our proceedings upon them, might be rectify'd by this publick declaration.—Moreover, we will and command you the bishops here present, to take copies hereof word for word, and send one to each bishop of our province of Canterbury, that so all and every of them may publish, intimate and declare, and cause by their respective priests and curates to be publish'd, in their several cities and dioceses, the manner and form of this our proceeding, and also the said Sentence pronounced by us, and all and singular contents of the same.—And, lastly, we require of you and them, that this business be dispatch'd with all convenient expedition; and that you and they do duly and punctually advise and certify us of the time of receiving these presents, and how this our command has been executed, by your and their letters patent, according to the tenor hereof.—Given at our palace at Maydstone, on the 10th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1413, and of our translation the 18th."

21. Proceedings, upon an ex post facto Act, against Sir JOHN MORTIMER, for making his Escape from Prison. 3 Hen. VI. A. D. 1424. [1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 350.]

SIR John Mortimer, of Bishop's Hatfield, Hertford, having been indicted on the oath of one King, servant to sir Robert Scot, keeper of the Tower of London, upon the Statute of Escapes; an act was made this parliament on purpose to destroy him, alleging several other Articles against him. As, first, "That the said sir John had contrived with him to break out of his imprisonment, and had promised him immediately a reward of 40*l.* a year, to be aiding and assisting to him in his escape; and afterwards an earldom. Second, that the said sir John told him, that after his escape he would go into Wales to the earl of March; and, having raised 40,000 men, would enter the kingdom again, and cut off the heads of the protector and the bishop of Winchester. Third, he had told this informant, that the earl of March was rightful heir to the crown of England, and that after him he was the next heir; wherefore, if the earl of March refused to recover his right, he himself would take upon him the regal power as his due. Lastly, that when he came into Wales, if the earl of March would not accept his service, nor engage in the cause, he would then fly into France, and assist the French king against Henry, and did not doubt but in the end he should gain his design."—It appears by the Record, that this sir John Mortimer had been committed prisoner to the Tower, for suspicion of Treason done against the late king, from whence he had made his Escape the first year of this reign. For which escape alone, we suppose, he was indicted, and this indictment, by the authority of parliament, was allowed to be good. And the said sir John being again apprehended and brought before this parliament, Judgment was given against him, to be carried back to the Tower, and drawn from thence to Tyburn, there to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; his head set on London bridge, and his four quarters on the four gates of the city.

22. Proceedings against HENRY BEAUMONT, Bishop of Winchester, for High Treason: 4. Henry VI. A. D. 1426. [Cotton. Hall. Holling. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 354.]

ABOUT this time it was, that a dangerous quarrel was set on foot between two very great men, both chief supporters to the house of Lancaster; Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, lord protector, and Henry Beaufort, the rich bishop of Winchester, great uncle to the king. The latter of these, by his magnificence and grandeur, seemed so much to out-shine the Protector himself, though almost on the throne, that he drew on him the odium and jealousy of the other. The haughty spirit of the bishop, being legate to the pope in England, was so great, that the Protector could not endure his pride; and such an implacable enmity grew between them, that great parties were raised, on both sides, for each other's defence. In short, a civil war, it was much dreaded, would be the consequence; and, all their mutual friends could do, was not sufficient to pacify the mind of the Protector, or to make the Prelate yield any further, than, as he thought, was becoming his high place and state. In this situation the bishop, however, thought proper to write a letter to the duke of Bedford, regent of France, to come over and endeavour to heal matters between them. The duke came accordingly, and calling a council of the chief nobility at Saint Albans, many hot contests arose; and, nothing being concluded at that time, it was adjourned to Northampton, but to as little purpose; till, at last, it was determined, that these differences should be referred to parliament.

Accordingly, writs of summons were issued out, dated Westminster, Jan. 7, 1426, for one to meet, at Leicester, on the 18th of Feb. At which time and place being assembled, in the great hall of the Castle of Leicester, much care had been taken to prevent any tumults between the great trains of the protector and the bishop, by strictly prohibiting any person whatsoever, to come thither with swords or any other warlike weapon. Which order, though it was literally observed, yet the lords and their attendants came armed with batts, or great clubs, on their shoulders; from whence this meeting got the name of "The Parliament of Batts;" but this, also, as soon as it was taken notice of, was prohibited. Being all, at length, sat in a peaceable manner, as aforesaid, the young king being there, also, present, the bishop of Winchester, as lord chancellor of England, declared the cause of the summons, in a very short manner; for, after telling them that the king's will was, that all estates should enjoy their liberties, he took his subject from these words of Saint Paul: Sic facite ut salvi sitis. These the learned prelate divided into three parts, and referred them: 'First to God, for protecting the faith of the church, against all invasions from Lollards and Heretics: 2dly, by imparting sound counsel; and, lastly, by granting the several needful subsidies. By which, he affirmed, three virtues and conveniences would follow, viz. glory to God, by protecting his faith; honour to the king, by receiving good advice; and peace to the subject, by their liberal grants. In all which he desired, that every estate of this parliament would labour; and that the commons would chuse, and the next day present, their Speaker.'—The same day the commons presented, before the king, sir Richard Vernon, knight, to be their Speaker; who, with the common protestation, was allowed.

Then the commons expressed their great dislike to the Dissentions between duke Humphrey and the bishop of Winchester, and moved for their reconciliation. On which, the duke of Bedford, some bishops, and other lords, made a solemn decree amongst themselves, to bear and determine the said difference, without favour or affection. Which order, after every one of the lords had sworn to observe, they sent a copy of it to the commons. They then proceeded in the matter, and, at length, caused the said duke and bishop, by their formal instruments, to have their disputes compromised, and referred to the decision of a select committee of certain bishops and lords; who, after some time, came to this resolution: first, that the said bishop of Winchester should submit himself to the king's mercy; which he did accordingly. And, then the duke of Bedford, in open parliament, pronounced the said bishop innocent of what was alledged against him, in that he procured a person to murder the late king, when he was prince, as the murderer himself confessed who was drowned by the earl of Arundel. And, also, in that he should counsel and advise the said prince to have deposed Henry IV. his father. Likewise, it was awarded by the said committee, that the bishop should acknowledge his offence to the duke of Gloucester, and, in a submissive manner, ask his pardon; that the said duke should freely forgive him; and, in token of a thorough reconciliation, each should take the other by the hand; which was accordingly done before the whole assembly.

This is all the account which sir Robert Cotton has thought fit to extract, relating to this strong contention between these two noblemen; who, though so nearly related as uncle and nephew, yet still carried on that implacable malice against each other, which ended not but in the death of one or both of them. However, the Chronicles of Hall and Hollingshead are not so silent in this matter; they tell us, that when the affair of the quarrel was brought before the parliament, and each party allowed to plead his cause freely, the Protector, who looked upon himself as the person aggrieved, exhibited five Articles against the bishop, to all which he was urged to give in his Answer. Which Articles and Answers are as follow:

Articles of Accusation presented to the Parliament by the Duke of Gloucester, against Henry, bishop of Winchester, with his Answers to them severally.

1. "That Richard Woodville, esq. keeper of the Tower of London, did by the instigation and encouragement of the said bishop of Winchester, deny admittance to him the said duke of Gloucester, then being Protector of the kingdom, into the Tower, contrary to reason and duty, and in derogation to the kings authority. To this Article the bishop answered, "That while the duke of Gloucester was gone into Hainault, it happened that many pamphlets and reports being dispersed up and down the city of London tending to rebellion, it was ordered by the lords of his majesty's council, that Richard Woodville, esq. should with a sufficient number of armed men have the keeping of the Tower, and should not permit any man to come into the Tower stronger than himself, without the special commandment of the king, by the advice of his council. After this strict charge the duke of Gloucester returning out of Hainault, and not approving the fortifying the Tower, told the citizens, who were dissatisfied at it, 'That had he been in England it should not have been so;' and immediately going to the Tower demanded admittance, but Woodville, not daring to give him entrance, came to the bishop of Winchester for advice, who told him, 'that the duke of Gloucester took more upon him than he ought, and that before he admitted him into the Tower, he ought to provide himself a sufficient warrant of the king and council for his so doing contrary to the former order.'"

2. That the bishop of Winchester, without the advice or consent of the duke of Gloucester, or of his majesty's privy council, contrived and purposed to lay hands on his majesty's person, and to have removed him from Eltham, the place that he was then in, to Windsor, there to put him under the government of such persons as he pleased. The bishop's answer to this article was, "That he never could propound to himself any advantage by removing the king, or taking him into his custody or charge, nor did ever intend to meddle with any thing about the king's person without the advice of the privy council, as in time and place he could prove."—

5. That the bishop of Winchester knowing that the duke of Gloucester had resolved to prevent his design of seizing the king's person at Eltham, laid wait for him, by placing armed men at the end of London-bridge, and in the windows of the chambers and cellars in Southwark, to have killed him, if he had passed that way; all which is against the king's peace, and duty of a true subject. The bishop's defence was, "That true indeed it is, that he did provide a certain number of armed men, and set them at the foot of London-bridge, and other places, without any intention to do any bodily harm to the duke of Gloucester, but merely for his own safety and defence, being informed by several credible persons, that the duke of Gloucester had purposed bodily harm to him, and gathered together a company of citizens for that end."—4. That the late king Henry 5, told him, that when he was prince, a man was seized in his chamber, who was hid behind the hangings, and confessed after his apprehension, that he was set at work by the bishop of Winchester, to kill the prince in his bed. He was delivered to the earl of Arundel, who drowned him in a sack in the Thames. To this accusation the bishop replied, "That he was ever a true and faithful subject to his sovereigns, and never purposed or contrived any treason against any of their persons, and especially against his sovereign lord Henry 5. And this he thought was sufficiently evident to any, that considered the great wisdom and courage of the said king, and the great trust he reposed in him so long as he remained king, which he would not have done had he found him guilty of such unfaithfulness to him while he was prince."—5. That the bishop of Winchester in the sickness of king Henry 4, advised his son prince Henry, to assume the government of the nation before his father's death, as the said prince himself told him. The bishop replied "That this was mere calumny, which could not be proved; and he hoped the parliament would appoint them judges, that he might vindicate his honour, or else leave him to sue out his right before suitable judges."—6. That the bishop of Winchester had, in his letter to the duke of Bedford, plainly declared his malicious purpose of assembling the people, and stirring up a rebellion in the nation, contrary to the king's peace. The bishop's answer was, "That he never had any intention to disturb the peace of the nation, or raise any rebellion, but sent to the duke of Bedford to come over in haste to settle all things that were prejudicial to the peace; and though he had indeed written in the letter, 'That if he tarried, we shall put the land in adventure by a field, such a brother you have here;' he did not mean it of any design of his own, but concerning the seditious assemblies of masons, carpenters, tilers and plasterers, who being distasted by the late act of parliament against excessive wages of those trades, had given out many seditious speeches and menaces against the great men, which tended much to rebellion; and yet the duke of Gloucester did not use his endeavour, as he ought to have done in his place, to suppress such unlawful assemblies, so that he feared the king and his good subjects must have made a field to withstand them: to prevent which, he chiefly desired the duke of Bedford to come over."

This Charge, and the Answers to it, being thus delivered into the parliament, the further examination of it was by the houses devolved upon a select number of lords, who having thoroughly examined all matters, acquitted the bishop, and by a formal award enjoined them to be firm friends for the future; and by such inducements wrought upon them, that they shook hands, and parted with all outward signs of perfect love and agreement, which gave a mighty satisfaction to all people, both of the clergy and laity. And the king, by the advice of his council, made a magnificent feast at Whitsuntide, to rejoice for this happy reconciliation.

23. Proceedings against WILLIAM DE LA POLE, duke of Suffolk, for High Treason: 28 Hen. VI. A. D. 1451. [1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 386.]

IN the parliament which met at Westminster, on the 22nd of January 1451, came on the Trial of the duke of Suffolk, on several Articles of High Treason; which, because he saw that he could not avoid, he moved for himself. For, according to the Record, on the twenty second of January the duke stood up in the house of lords, and required the king "That he might be specially accused, and be allowed to answer to what many men reported of him, that he was an unfaithful subject." He further told the king, "That his father, and three of his brethren, died in his service and that of his father's and grandfather's. That he himself had served in the wars thirty-four years; and, being but a knight, and taken prisoner, had paid for his ransom 2000*l*. That he had been of the Order of the Garter thirty years, and a counsellor to the king fifteen years, and had been seventeen years in the wars, without returning home. And, asking God's mercy, as he had been true to the king and realm, he required his purgation."—January 26, the Commons came before the Lords, and required that the duke, on his confession, might be committed to safe custody; but the lords and judges, upon consultation, "thought there was no good cause for it, unless some especial matter was objected against him."—January 28, the Speaker came again, and declared, "That the duke of Suffolk, as it was said, had sold this realm to the French, who had prepared to come hither; and that the said duke, for his own defence, had furnished the castle of Wallingford with all warlike munition;" whereupon, at the Speaker's request, the said duke was committed to the Tower of London.—February 7, the Speaker of the commons, the chancellor, and the lords, sent to the king a Bill of Articles, by which they accused William de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, late of Ewelme in the county of Oxford, of sundry Treasons, viz.

"1. That the said duke having the wardship of Margaret the daughter and heir of John duke of Somerset, he meant to marry his son John to her; and thereby for want of issue of the king, to claim the crown, and to procure the French king, by means of certain French lords, there named, to depose the king.—2. That he procured the delivery of the duke of Orleans, and practised with him to cause the French to recover the English conquests in that kingdom.—3. Related to the duke's promise of delivery of Anjou and Main, to requite the king of Sicily the king's enemy, without the assent of the other ambassadors.—4. For disclosing the king's counsel to the earl of Dunoys bastard of Orleans, and to others of the French nation.—5. For betraying to the French the strength of the king's piles, ordnance, and munition, beyond sea.—6. That the said duke, by disclosing the king's secrets, caused the peace to be broken.—7. That the said duke supported the king's enemies, by staying sundry arms which should have passed against them.—8. That the said duke had strengthened the king's enemies against him, by not compromising in the last peace the king of Arragon, who is almost lost; and the duke of Britany, who is wholly so." All which Articles, the commons require to be enrolled, and that prosecution may be awarded thereon.

On the 9th of March the commons made a new Complaint against the duke, in effect following: "First, for procuring the king, in his eighteenth year, to give away the inheritance and lands of the crown. For procuring many liberties in derogation of the common law, and hindrance of justice. For causing the king to give away the castle of Manlion de Searl, and other territories in Guienne. For that the earl of Armanac and other nobles of Guienne, were drawn from their obedience to the king, by the said duke's discovering of secrets, to the utter impoverishment of this realm. For procuring the king to bestow the keeping of divers towns and offices in Normandy and Guienne, on unworthy persons. For procuring the king to grant the earldoms of Enreney and Longueville, and other lordships in Normandy, to the bastard of Orleans, and other Frenchmen, the king's chiefest enemies, without the assent of the council. For that the duke procured the king, in his own presence, to promise the French ambassador to attend in person at the convention in France, to the king's subversion

if it had taken effect. For causing the subsidies granted to be contrarily employed. For causing the king's treasure to be spent on the French queen, and other French people. For consuming the sum of 60,000*l.* left by the lord Dudley the late treasurer. For conveying out of the king's treasury the obligations of the finance for the duke of Orleans. For procuring himself to be made earl of Pembroke, and obtaining the lordships of Haverford-west, after the death of sir Rowland Lenthal. For staying the process of outlawry against William Talbois, esquire of Lincoln, upon several appeals of murder. For procuring a pardon to the said William for not appearing upon suretyship of peace. For procuring persons of his confederacy to be made sheriffs. For procuring a garrison of Englishmen to fight against the Germans, the king's allies, on the part of the French, the king's enemies." All which Articles the commons required to be enrolled, and that the said duke might answer to them.

—On the same day, the duke of Suffolk was brought from the Tower, by the king's writ, into the Parliament Chamber, at Westminster, before the king and lords; to whom the Articles aforesaid were rehearsed, who desired a copy of them, which was granted. And, for the more ready answer to them, he was committed to the custody of certain esquires, in the Tower within the king's palace.

On the 14th of March the said duke appeared again before the lords, and on his knees denied the truth of the first eight Articles of Treason against him; and offered to prove them false in any manner the king should appoint. The first of them he denied as impossible, inferring, that some of the lords knew he meant to have married his son to the earl of Warwick's daughter, if she had lived. To many of the rest, he referred himself to the king's letters patents, and to some acts of the council. To the yielding up of Anjou and Main, he referred also to the acts of the council; which shew, that other lords were privy thereto, as well as himself, and said that the same was delivered up by the bishop of Chichester, then keeper of the privy seal.—On the 17th, the said duke was brought again before the lords, to whom the chancellor repeated the Answer he had made, and told him, that therein he had not put himself upon his peerage, and asked the duke which way he would be tried? Who, kneeling, said that he hoped he had answered all things to the full, and so protesting his innocency, referred himself entirely to the king's mercy and award.—Thereupon the Chancellor, by the king's command, pronounced this Sentence, "That since the duke did not put himself upon his peerage, the king, in relation to the Articles of Treason contained in the first Bill, would be doubtful. And as to the Articles of Mispriaion, the king, not as judge by the advice of the lords, but as one to whose order the duke had committed himself, doth banish him the realm, and other his dominions, for five years; from the 1st of

May next ensuing."—After which Sentence being given, lord Beaumont, lord high constable, stood up, on the behalf of the bishops and lords, and required, "That it might be enrolled, that the said Judgment was by the king's own rule, and not by their assent; and also required, that neither they nor their heirs should, by this example, be barred of their peerage and privileges."

The foregoing account of this parliamentary inquiry into the misconduct of a prime minister, is taken from the Records themselves. Undoubtedly, the mildness of his Sentence proceeded from the queen's great indulgence to him; who was in hopes, that his short banishment might last longer than the malice of his enemies against him. But, unhappily for both, the duke was taken prisoner at sea, by a private English captain, who had way-laid him, had his head struck off on the side of a long-boat, and his body thrown into the sea.

24. Proceedings against GEORGE duke of CLARENCE, brother to King Edward the Fourth, for Treason: 18 Edw. IV. A. D. 1478. [1 Kenn. 475. 1 Rapin, 623. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 436.]

WHILE the duke of Clarence was in Ireland, not suspecting any design against himself, the queen and his brother the duke of Gloster were plotting his destruction. Upon his return to the court he understood that Thomas Burdet of Arrow in the county of Warwick, esq. who ever was dependant upon him, had been in his absence apprehended, indicted, arraigned and executed all in the compass of two days. The crime upon which his Accusation was principally grounded, were inconsiderate words, by which, upon a report that the white buck in which he much delighted was killed as the king was hunting in his park, he wished the head and horns and all in the king's belly, whereas indeed he wished it only in his belly, who counselled the king to kill it. With this Accusation were mingled many other of poisoning, sorceries, and enchantments: crimes which every judicious man easily perceived, were only put in the scale like grains, to make his rash language full weight, which otherwise would have been too light to deserve the sentence of death. These proceedings Clarence resented, as they were intended, and expostulated with the king about the injustice done to his servant, and injury to himself. And according to the custom of expostulations, his words were bold and disorderly, and having received an apparent injury, built too much on the right of his cause, and provoked the king too far into indignation; so that soon after he was committed close prisoner to the Tower, where being by act of parliament attainted, he was secretly put to death. The manner, as it is generally received, was by thrusting his head into a butt of Malmesey, by which he was stifled.

In his Attainder, according to the form, are Crimes enough to make his death have appearance of justice, the execution of which the king seemed rather constrained to, than to have sought. For there are reckoned, "how the duke of Clarence, to bring the present government into hatred with the people, and thereby the present state into trouble; had not only in his speeches frequently laid injustice to the king's charge in attainting Thomas Burdet falsely, convict of many notorious Treasons, but suborned many of his servants and divers others, corrupted with money, to divulge the like seditious discourses: That he had spread abroad impious rumours that the king dealt by necromancy, and upon offence against such of his subjects, whom by order of law he could not destroy, he was accustomed to take them away by poison: That he had not rested there, but thereby to advance himself to the kingdom, and for ever to disable the king and his posterity from the crown, he had, contrary to truth, nature and religion, viper-like destroying her who gave him life, published that the king was a bastard, and no way capable to reign: that to make this his so monstrous ambition more successful, and already to begin his usurpation, he had caused many of the king's subjects to be sworn upon the most blessed sacrament to be true to him and his heirs, without any exception of their allegiance; after which so solemn oaths, he discovered to them his resolution to right himself and his followers, who had both suffered by the king's violent wresting away their estates: and in particular to revenge himself upon the king, who (as he most impiously and falsely suggested) had by art-magic contrived to consume him as a candle consumeth in burning. And what most expressed the treason of his designs, that he had got out an exemplification under the great seal of Henry 6, late king; wherein was shewed how by the parliament it was enacted, that if the said Henry and Edward his son should die without issue male, the kingdom should descend upon the duke of Clarence and his heirs; whereby clearly appeared his intention, immediately to possess himself of the crown, with destruction of king Edward and his children, by pretence of a general election of the commonwealth."

This was the sum of his Attainder, which we may well believe had not so easily past but by the king's public declaring himself: the secret working of the duke of Gloucester; and the passionate urging of the queen's kindred. But this Attainder hath in it one thing most remarkable, that Clarence here was accused of falsely laying bastardy to the king, to endeavour possession of the crown; which afterwards was alleged indeed by Richard duke of Gloucester, to the absolute disinherit of the king's sons.

25. The Trial of Sir WILLIAM STANLEY, knight, for High Treason: 10 Hen. VII. A. D. 1494-5. [Hall and Lord Bacon.]

[There is not a regular account of the Trial of this eminent person, in any book we have met with. Old Fabian, with his usual dryness and brevity, only writes, that about Christmas 1494 sir Robert Clifford impeached sir William Stanley, and that sir William was beheaded the 15th of February following. Fab. 580. Hall, with his followers Grafton and Hollingshead, explains, by whom sir William was accused to the king, what was reported to be his offence, and how the king acted on the occasion; adding some conjectures as to the cause of sir William's alienation from the king; but as to the Trial itself, all they say is, that he was condemned and executed. Even lord Bacon, though he appears to have taken no small pains to throw every light on the subject, owns, that the memory of the case was dark; and writes of it only from imperfect tradition, aided by the strength of his own conjecture. However, our readers will scarce be averse to seeing what a historian of such a deep penetration writes on a subject so interesting. We shall therefore extract the result of this investigation, after first giving Hall's account, which will be found to be the groundwork of some part of lord Bacon's more splendid and enlightened narrative.—Mr. Hargrave's Note.]

Extract from Hall's Henry VII. p. 35.

SYR Robert Clyfford, partly trusting on the kynges promes, and partly mistrusting the thing, because he knewe that diverse that were accused to be partakers of that faction and conspiracy [in favir of Perkyn Warbeck] were put in execucion: and therefore perceavyng that their could not be a more pernicious nor more desperate begonne thinge then that devilshe enterprice, returned sodeynly agayn into England. The kyng beyng certified before of his coming, went streight to the Towre of London the morrow after the daye of Epiphany, and there taryed til suche tyme that syr Robert Clyfford was there presented to hys person, which thinge he used under this pretence, that if syr Robert Clifford had accused any of the nobilitie to be partakers of this ungracious fraternitie and diabolical conjuration, that then every such person might be called thether without suspencion of any evell, and there streight to be attached and cnst in holde.—But before I go any farther I wil shew the opinion that at that time ranne in many mens heddes of this knyghts goyage into Flaunders. Some men helde this opinion, that kyng Henry for a polcey dyd sende him as a spye to Flaunders, or els he woulde not have so sone received him into his grace and favour agayn. Nevertheless this is not like to be true by diverse reasons and apparant argumentes, firste, after that attempt begonne by syr Robert, he was in no smal dangier himselfe, and by that was not a litle noted, and hys fame blemished, but also hys frendes were suspected and had in a gealosey. Secundarely, he was not after that in so great favour, nor so esteemed with the kyng as he had been in tymes past, because he was blotted and marked with that crime and offence. And therefore he bearing his favoure to the house of Yorke, entendinge in the beginning to administer displeasure to kyng Henry, sayled to the lady Margaret, beyng seduced and brought in belefe that Perkyn was the very sonne of kyng Edward. But to my purpose: when syr Robert came to the presence of the kyng, he knelyng on his knees most humblye, beseeched hym of grace and pardone, whiche he shortly obteyned. And after that beyng required of the maner and ordre of the conjuration and what was done in Flaunders, he opened every pointe to his knowlege, and after disclosed the names, as well of the aiders and fautours as of the inceptors and begynners. Amongest whome he accused syr William Stanley, whome the kyng made hys chiefe chamberleyn, and one of hys prevy counsayll. When he had so sayde, the kyng was greatly dismayed and grieved, that he shoulde be partaker in that grevous offence, consideryng first that he had the governaunce of his chambre, and the charge and comptment of all suche as were next to hys bodye, and also callyng to remembrance the manifolde gratuities, whiche he had received at hys hande, but in especial not forgettyng that benefite above all other, that onely by his aide and succoure, he had vanquished and overthrowen his mortall enemy kyng Rycharde. Wherefore at the begynnyng he coulde in no wyse be induced nor persuaded to beleve, that he was such a prevy conspiratoure or malicious offender; but when the crime was openly proved and probably affirmed, then the king caused hym to be restrayned from his libertie in his awne chambre within the Quadrate Towre. And there appoynted hym by his prevy counsayll to be examined. In whiche examination he nothinge denied, but wisely and seriously did astipulate and agree to all thinges layed to hys charge, if he were in any of them culpable or blame woorthy.—The reporte is, that this was his offence. When communication was had betwene hym, and this syr Robert Clyfforde, as concerning Perkyn, whiche falsely usurped the name of kyng Edwardes sonne, syr William Stanley sayde and affirmed there, That he would never fight nor beare armure agaynst the young man, if he knew of a truth that he was the indubiate sonne of kyng Edward 4. Thys poynte argueth and proveth hym at that tyme, beyng moved with melancholy, to beare no great good will to kyng Henry, whereof suspicion first grewe, and after this ensued the accusation of syr R. Clyfforde.—Then the kyng doubtinge what to do with him, did consult and breath with hymselfe of this sodeyne chaunce. For he feared least that his brother lorde Thomas Stanley, in whome he had founde great friendship, woulde take this matre greuously. And if he should remit that fault, that, abusynge his lenyte and mercy, he would be the more holder to offende and treaspase more highly. Albeit at the last, severitee tooke place and mercy was put backe, and so he was arreigned at Westmynster, and adjudged to dye, and accordinge to that Judgemente was broughte to the Towre-hill the 16 daye of February, and there had hys head stricken of. What was the occasion and cause, why the syncere and faythfull mynde, that syr William allways before bare to kyng Henry, was turned into cancarde hatred and dispite, and why the especiaall favoure that the kyng bare towards hym was transmuted into disdeyne and displeasure, dyverse men alledge dyverse causes, affirmynge that when kyng Henry (what other mutuall benefites the one had received of the other, I wyl nowe pretermyt and overpasse) in that battaile, in the whiche he bereft kyng Rychard bothe of hys life and hys kyngdom, beyng associate and accompanied but with a small numb, and circumvented by kyng Richardes army, and in great jeopardy of his lyfe, thys syr William beyng sent from the lord Standley hys brother with a good company of stronge and hardy men (whiche lorde Stanley was nere the felde with a great army) came sodeynly and fortunately to the succours of kyng Henry, and saved hym from destruction, and overthrewe kyng Rychard as before you have heard. Surely thys was a benefite above all benefites to be remembred, by the which kyng Henry was not onely preserved alyve, but also obteyned the croune and kingdome, which great benefite, after the kingdome once obteyned, he did neither forget nor yet left unrewarded. For the lord Thomas Stanley he invested with the sworde of the countie of Darby, and beside other great giftes and officies geven to William Stanley, he made him his chiefe chamberleyn. This syr William, although he were in great favoure with the kyng, and had in great and high estimacion, more remembring the benefite done to the kyng, then the rewardes and gratuitees of his liberalite received, thinking that the vessel of oyle, (according to the gospel) woulde overflowe the brymmes, and as some saye, desiring to be erle of Chestre and therof denyed, began to grudge and disdeyne the kyng his high frend: and one thing encouraged him much, which was the riches and treasure of king Richard, which he onely possessed at the conflict of Boswoorth: by reason of which haboundance of ryches and greates powre of people, he set nought by the kyng his sovereign lord and mastre. When the king perceived that his stomack began to caucker and waxe rusty, he was with him not a litle displeased, and so when both their hartes were enflamed with melancoly, bothe loste the fruite of their longe continued amitie and favoure. And so it often chaunceth, that when men do not consider nor yet regard the great benefites to them exhibited, they readre agayne hatred for liberalitee, and for brende geven, they yelde agayne a scorpion. Nowe to returne to the matter.

At thys tyme the kyng thought it best, ye and very necessary, not onely to take hede about him, but also to use some sharpe punyshment and correccion of the offences of hys subjects, to the intent that the late begon sedicion might the soner be repressed, and for this cause specially that some persons voyde of all honest feare and reverent dread, had taken such courage and audacitie to them, that they feared not to speake evell of their kyng and sovereign lord, with moost spiteful and contumelious wordes, as though thei neither feared nor woulde obey him, or his preceptes and commaundementes, expecting dayly and hourelly the arryvall and landing of the feyned Rychard duke of Yorke, now lately rysen from death to lyfe. But when knowlege of the slaundersous and opprobrious wordes were brought to the kynges eares, he caused dyverse persons to suffre condigne punyshment for their heynuous offences, whereby their complices wel perceavyng that their entrepryce had no prosperous success nor toke any good effect, and especially such as temerariouly began to make mastries and farther seyng what preparacion was made and provyded agaynst theyre tumultuous commocion and frantique entrepryce, they of their awne swynge paciefied themselves, and beganne to turne to their kyng and naturall liege lorde.

Extract from Bacon's Henry 7. in 1 Kennet's Complete History, p. 610.

UPON Al-hallows-day even, being now the tenth year of the king's reign, the king's second son Henry was created duke of York; and as well the duke, as divers others, noblemen, knights batchellours, and gentlemen of quality, were made knights of the bath, according to the ceremony. Upon the morrow after Twelfth-day, the king removed from Westminster (where he had kept his Christmas) to the Tower of London. This he did as soon as he had advertisement, that sir Robert Clifford (in whose bosom or budget most of Perkin's secrets were layed up) was come into England. And the place of the Tower was chosen to that end, that if Clifford should accuse any of the great ones, they might without suspicion, or noise, or sending abroad of warrants, be presently attached; the court and prisou being within the cincture of one wall. After a day or two, the king drew unto him a selected council, and admitted Clifford to his presence; who first fell down at his feet, and in all humble manner craved the king's pardon, which the king then granted, though he were indeed secretly assured of his life before: Then commanded to tel his knowledge, he did amongst many others (of himself, not interrogated) appeach sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain of the king's household.—The king seemed to be much amazed at the naming of this lord, as if he had heard the news of some strange and fearful prodigy. To hear a man, that had done him service of so high a nature, as to save his life, and set the crown upon his head; a man, that enjoyed by his favour and advancement so great a fortune, both in honour and riches; a man, that was tied unto him in so near a band of alliance, his brother having married the king's mother; and lastly, a man, to whom he had committed the trust of his person, in making him his chamberlain; that this man, no ways disgraced, no ways discontent, no ways put in fear, should be false unto him. Clifford was required to say over again, and again, the particulars of his accusation, being warned, that in a matter so unlikely, and that concerned so great a servant of the king's, he should not in any wise go too far. But the king finding that he did sadly and constantly (without hesitation or varying, and with those civil protestations that were fit) stand to that that he had said, offering to justify it upon his soul and life; he caused him to be removed. And after he had not a little bemoaned himself unto his council there present, gave order that sir William Stanley should be restrained in his own chamber, where he lay before, in the Square Tower. And the next day he was examined by the lords. Upon his examination he denied little of that where-with he was charged, nor endeavoured much to excuse or extenuate his fault. So that (not very wisely) thinking to make his offence less by confession, he made it enough for condemnation. It was conceived, that he trusted much to his former merits, and the interest that his brother had in the king. But those helps were over-weighed by divers things that made against him, and were predominant in the king's nature and mind. First, an over-merit; for convenient merit, unto which reward may easily reach, doth best with kings. Next the sense of his power; for the king thought, that he that could set him up, was the more dangerous to pull him down. Thirdly, the glimmering of a confiscation; for he was the richest subject for value in the kingdom; there being found in his castle of Holt forty thousand marks in ready money, and plate, besides jewels, household-stuff, stocks upon his grounds, and other personal estate, exceeding great. And for his revenue in land and fee, it was three thousand pounds a year of old rent, a great matter in those times. Lastly, the nature of the time; for if the king had been out of fear of his own estate, it was not unlike he would have spared his life. But the cloud of so great a rebellion, hanging over his head, made him work sure. Wherefore after some six weeks distance of time, which the king did honourably interpose, both to give space to his brother's intercession, and to shew to the world, that he had a conflict with himself what he should do; he was arraigned of high-treason, and condemned, and presently after beheaded.—Yet is it to this day but in dark memory, both what the case of this noble person was, for which he suffered, and what likewise was the ground and cause of his defection, and the alienation of his heart from the king. His case was said to be this; that in discourse between sir Robert Clifford and him, he had said; that if he were sure, that that young man were king Edward's son, he would never bear arms against him. This case seems somewhat an hard case, both in respect of the conditional, and in respect of the other words. But for the conditional, it seems the judges of that time (who were learned men, and the three chief of them of the privy council) thought it was a dangerous thing to admit ifs and ands, to qualify words of treason; whereby every man might express his malice, and blanch his danger. And it was like to the case (in the following times) of Elizabeth Barton, the Holy Maid of Kent; who had said, 'that if king Henry the Eighth did not take Katherine his wife again, he should be deprived of his crown, and die the death of a dog.' And infinite cases may be put of like nature. Which (it seemeth) the grave judges taking into consideration, would not admit of treasons upon condition. And as for the positive words, 'that he would not bear arms against king Edward's son;' though the words seem calm, yet it was a plain and direct overruling of the king's title, either by the line of Lancaster, or by act of parliament. Which (no doubt) pierced the king more, than if Stanley had charged his lance upon him in the field. For if Stanley would hold that opinion, that a son of king Edward had still the better right, he being so principal a person of authority, and favour about the king; it was to teach all England to say as much. And therefore (as those times were) that speech touched the quick. But some writers do put this out of doubt; for they say, that Stanley did expressly promise to aid Perkin, and sent him some help of treasure.—Now for the motive of his falling off from the king; it is true, that at Bosworth Field the king was beset, and in a manner inclosed round about by the troops of king Richard, and in manifest danger of his life; when this Stanley was sent by his brother with three thousand men to his rescue, which he performed so, that king Richard was slain upon the place. So as the condition of mortal men is not capable of a greater benefit, than the king received by the hands of Stanley; being like the benefit of Christ, at once to save and crown. For which service the king gave him great gifts, made him his counsellour and chamberlain; and, somewhat contrary to his nature, had winked at the great spoils of Bosworth Field, which came almost wholly to this man's hands, to his infinite enriching. Yet nevertheless blown up with the conceit of his merit, he did not think he had received good measure from the king, at least not prest down and running over, as he expected. And his

as an instrument for raising great sums to the king; Dudley (a gentleman of birth and such parts as he was chosen Speaker of the parliament-house, 19 Henry 7), assisting him. These men (called by Polydore Virgil Judices Fiscales) having it seems exceeded their bounds, were detested of all, but especially the poorer sort, who found it easier to hate than to pay. To satisfy their complaints therefore, it was thought fit to permit them to the ordinary ways of justice: the promoters they used being so severely punished in the mean time, betwixt the pillory and shame, that they died all (a few days after) in prison, save one Giovanni Baptista Grimaldi, who, foreseeing the storm, took sanctuary in Westminster.

Empson and Dudley being (as is abovesaid) committed to the Tower, new and strange crimes were found and objected against them, as appears in their Indictments upon record, wherein they are accused of conspiracy against the king and state; and first, that during the sickness of the late king in March last, they summoned certain of their friends to be in arms at an hour's warning; and upon the death of the said king, to hasten to London. Out of which, and other circumstances, it was collected by the jury, that their intent was to seize on the person of the new king, and so to assume the sole government: or when they could not attain this, to destroy him.—Of which crimes, how improbable soever, Dudley in his Trial at Guildhall in London, July 16, 1509, and Empson at Northampton, October 1, were found guilty by their Juries, and both condemned of Treason, and so remanded to the Tower.

Empson and Dudley lying now in prison, condemned and attainted by parliament, the importunate clamours of the people prevailing with the king in this year's progress, he not only restored divers mulcts, but for further satisfaction to the commonalty (by a special writ) commanded to have their heads struck off, August 18, doing therein (as thought by many) more like a good king, than a good master.—The attaint against Dudley was reversed in parliament, 5th Hen. 8. 1533.

27. Trial of EDWARD duke of BUCKINGHAM, for High Treason; in the Court of the Lord High Steward of England: 13th May, 13 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1522. [Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. in 2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. p. 40. Stowe's Chronicle, 510.]

["Some account of this Trial is to be met with in various writers, exclusive of the notice taken of it by our more modern historians. It is slightly mentioned by Polydore Virgil, whose history first came out within eleven or twelve years after the event; and from him it appears, that the prosecution originated from the malice of one Charles Knevet, who, having been removed from the stewardship of some of the duke's estates, for oppressing the tenants, in revenge turned informer against his former master, and betrayed him to his great and powerful enemy cardinal Wolsey. Polyd. Virg. ed. Basil, 660, 665. Hall, who was also a cotemporary historian, gives many particulars, relative as well to the manner of arresting the duke and his execution, as to the Trial itself. Hall's Hen. 8. fol. 85. Grafton merely copies from Hall: but Hollingshead and Stow state in addition the several facts charged as Treason in the indictment of the duke from the record of it. Grafton 1011. S. Hollingsh. 2d. edit. 863. Stow's Chron. Howes's edit. 512. Lord Herbert, in his History of Henry the 8th, assisted by materials from the preceding authors, writes the narration of the duke's Trial, which we now offer to the reader. There is an account of this Trial amongst the Harleian Manuscripts; but it is merely a compilement from Hall and Stow." Hargrave.]

ABOUT this time Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, eminent for his high blood, and large revenue, drew on himself a dangerous suspicion; which though it was again fomented by the cardinal, who disaffected him for some speeches he had cast forth, yet could not have overthrown him, but that some indiscretion of his own concurred. Besides, he suffered much through the ill offices of Charles Knevet, formerly mentioned; who yet durst not appear, till he saw the duke not only discountenanced, but weakened in his friends and allies. And of these I find two principally; one, Henry Percy earl of Northumberland, whose daughter the duke had married; the other, Thomas earl of Surrey, who had married the duke's daughter. Against Northumberland, cause was taken for claiming certain wards; which, after close commitment, yet, he was forced to relinquish. Against Surrey the cardinal proceeded otherwise: for, though he hated him for drawing his dagger at him on some occasion; yet as the earl was more wary than to give new offence, he thought fit to send him away upon some honourable employment, for which he found this overture.

Gerald Fitz-Gerald, earl of Kildare, made deputy in Ireland to Henry duke of York, (now king, who at four years old was by his father made lieutenant of that country) having done divers good services against the rebels, was made knight of the garter, and enjoyed that place till his death in 1513; when his son Gerald being substitute therein, so behaved himself, as he likewise got much credit: though, as he had the house of Ormold his enemy, and purticularly sir Pierce Butler earl of Ossory, secret ill offices were done him. Nor did it avail, that he had given his sister in marriage to the said Butler, and helped him to recover the earldom of Ormond, detained wrongfully, since the death of James, by a bastard of that family: for it was impossible to oblige him; especially, where he found so advantageous an occasion to dissent. For as he watched over the earl of Desmond, his perpetual adversary, since the division of Lancaster and York, (in which his ancestors were on the side of Lancaster, and the Kildares and Desmonds on that of York), he discovered more favours done the present earl of Desmond, (whom he called a traitor) than he thought due to him; inso-much that he complained to the cardinal, who thereupon sent for Kildare. Though Polydore saith, he came voluntarily, into England to match with some English lady, and there behaved himself so unrespectfully to the cardinal, that he was cast into prison. But whatsoever the cause was, his charge was bestowed on the earl of Surrey, who going to Ireland in April 1530, reduced the earl of Desmond and others to obedience.

The duke of Buckingham being thus exposed and unfriended, the cardinal treats secretly with Knevet, concerning him; who thereupon discovers his late master's life; confessing, that the duke, by way of discourse, was accustomed to say, how he meant so to use the matter, that, if king Henry died without issue, he would attain the crown, and that he would punish the cardinal. Besides, that he had spoken hereof unto George Nevill lord Abergavenny, who married the said duke's daughter. By what means yet the duke intended particularly to effect these designs, I do not find exactly set down by Charles Knevet. Neither do the authors, who write hereof, relate his pedigree; only our heralds say, he was descended from Anne Plantagenet, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, son to king Edward 3. How far this yet might entitle him to the crown, in case king Henry should have no issue, I have neither leisure nor disposition to examine. I shall only therefore, for satisfaction of the reader, select some principal points out of his Indictment; leaving the reader, for the rest, unto the search of the record: In which, the points that in my opinion made most against the duke, were;

1. "That at several times (1512, April 24, and July 22; and 1513, April 26; and 1517, July 20,) he had sent to one Hopkins, a monk in the priory of Henton, to be informed by him, concerning the matters he imagined; and that the monk should return answer, the duke should have all; and therefore should labour to procure the love of the people. 2. That the duke afterwards should go in person to the said Hopkins, who confirmed the said prediction, adding, that he knew it by revelation. Whereupon the said duke should give him several rewards. 3. That he should speak to Ralph Nevill earl of Westmorland (his son-in-law).

that, if aught but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to the crown, the king having as yet no issue. That, to comply herewith, he did many things which argued ambition, and desire to make himself popular. That he said to one Gilbert, his chancellor, that whatsoever was done by the king's father, was done by wrong; murmuring withal against the present government. 4. And to the said Charles Knevet, that if he had been committed to the Tower, (whereof he was in danger, upon occasion of one sir W. Bulmer) he would have so wrought, that the principal doers thereof should not have cause of great rejoycing; for he would have plaid the part which his father intended to have put in practice against king Rd. 3 at Salisbury, who made earnest suit to come into the presence of the said king, which suit, if he might have obtained, he having a knife secretly about him, would have thrust it into the body of king Richard, as he had made semblance to kneel down before him. And that, in speaking these words, he maliciously laid hands on his dagger, swearing, that, if he were so evil used, he would do his best to accomplish his intended purpose. 5. That being in speech with sir George Nevill, knight, lord Abergavenny, he said, that if the king died, he would have the rule of the realm, in spite of whosoever said the contrary; swearing, that if the lord Abergavenny revealed this, he would fight with him."

This I conceive to be the substance of the most special Articles in the evidence: which the courteous reader yet may do well to consider more at large, as they are extant on Record. How far yet these particulars were proved, and in what sort, my authors deliver not. Only I find (out of our Records) that the duke of Buckingham being committed to the Tower, April 16th, did, under his own hand, declare to sir Thomas Lovell, constable of the Tower, the passages betwixt him and Hopkings, in this manner; that is to say, 'That the summer before our king made war in France (1512), Hopkings sent for him; but, not being able to go, he commanded one Delacour, his chaplain, to repair thither; howbeit, that Hopkings said nought to him; yet that himself came the next Lent; where, in shrift, the said monk told him, that our king should win great honour in his journey to France; and that if the king of Scots came to England then, he should never go home again. And that, when he asked Hopkings how he knew this, he said, ex Deo habeo; It is revealed to me of God. And that Hopkings demanding afterward what children the king had had, he told the number; and that Hopkings should say thereupon, I pray God his issue continue; for that he feared God was not contented, because he made no restitution according to his father's will, charging the duke further to advise the king's council to make restitution. Further, That he told his chancellor those words, and at his return out of France, came to Hopkings again, and said, he had told him true: also, that (another time) he came to Hopkins, together with his son Stafford, and the earl of Westmorland; and that Hopkins asked who he was? and thereupon should say, that some of his blood or name should prove great men. And that, after this, Hopkins should send to the duke, to pray him, according to his promise, to help their house (being at Henton in Somersetshire) to make their conduit; the ten pounds, formerly given by him, being spent. And more than this he confessed not. Notwithstanding which, when the Iudicment was openly read, the duke said, it was 'false, untrue, conspired, and forged', to bring him to his death; alledging (as he was an eloquent person) many reasons to falsify the indictment. The king's attorney, on the other side, producing the examinations, confessions, and proofs of witnesses; the duke hereupon desired the witnesses, which were Kneret, Gilbert, Delacour, and Hopkins, to be brought forth. These confirming their depositions, the duke was tried by his peers, (being a duke, a marquis, seven earls, and twelve barons) before the duke of Norfolk, who was for the time made lord high steward of England. They condemning him, the duke of Norfolk delivered his sentence, not without tears. To which he replied; 'My lord of Norfolk, you have said as a traitor should be said unto, but I was never one. But, my lords, I nothing malign for what you have done to me; but the eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I shall never sue to the king for life: howbeit, he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him, than I desire. And so I desire you, my lords, and all my fellows, to pray for me.' Whereupon he was brought back to the Tower; where all the favour he received was a message from the king, declaring his Sentence was mitigated so far, that, instead of receiving the death of a Traytor, he should have only his head cut off. Thus ended the duke of Buckingham (May 17), much lamented by the people, (who libelled the cardinal for it, calling him Carnificis filium, Son of a Butcher,) as being thought rather criminal through folly and rash words, than any intention declared by overt-act against the king's person; and therefore not incapable of his mercy; which also it was thought would not have been denied, had he sued for it in fitting terms. But since at his arraignment, he did, as it were, disclaim his life, he would not obtrude it; and therefore only caused a letter of comfort to be written to the dutchess, and lord Stafford. Yet the tragedy ended not so; for though George lord Abergavenny, after a few months imprisonment, was, through the king's favour, delivered; yet Hopkins, after a serious repentance that he had been an author of so much mischief, dyed of grief. And here I must observe, that together with this duke, that great place of high-constable of England remains extinguished, unless some extraordinary occasion revive it.

[Lord Herbert's statement of the effect of the Indictment, not being nearly so full as Stowe's, and there being also some further particulars in the latter, perhaps his account of the Trial may be acceptable to some readers. The following extract from Stowe's Chronicle is therefore added.]

Extract from Stowe's Chronicle, Howes's edition, p. 510. to 513.

In this meane time Edward duke of Buckingham was accused of High Treason, wherefore the king directed his letters to the said duke, being at his manor of Thornebury in Gloucestershire, that incontinently he should come to his presence, which commandement the duke obeyed, and came to London, where hee was straight wayes arrested by sir Henry Marney capitaine of the gard, and conveyed to the Tower of London on the 16th of April: before which time sir Gilbert Parke the dukes chancellor was taken, which had confessed matter of high treason, concerning the kings person. There was also attached one Nicholas Hopkins a monk of the order of Carthusians, being of Henton priory in Somersetshire, and John de la Court the dukes confessor, and others. These were prisoners in the Tower.

After the apprehension of the duke, inquisitions were taken in divers shires of him, so that by the knights and gentlemen he was indicted of High Treason for certaine words spoken by the said duke at Blochingly in Surrey, to George Nevill lord Burgavenny, and therewith was the same lord attached for concealment, and so likewise was the lord Montagus, and both conveyed to the Tower: and sir Edward Nevill brother to the said lord of Burgavenny was forbidden the kings presence.

Moreover, in the Guildhall of London, before sir John Bruge knight, then maior of the same city, by an inquest, the said duke was indicted of divers points of high treason, as by the same inditement (which I have seene and read) it appeareth, inferring, that the said duke intending to exalt himselfe, and to usurpe the crowne, the royall power, and dignity of the realme of England, and to deprive the king thereof, that hee the sayde duke might take upon him the same against his allegiance, had the tenth day of March, in the second yeere of the kings raigne and at divers times before, and after, imagined and compassed the kings death and destruction at London, and at Thornebury in the county of Gloucester: and for the accomplishment of the wicked intent and purpose, the 24th of April, in the fourth yeere of the kings raigne, he sent one of his chaplaines called John de la Court, unto the priory of Henton in Somersetshire, which was an house of Carthusian monkes, there to understand of one Nicholas Hopkins, a monke of the same house (who was vainely reputed by way of revelation to have foreknowledge of things to come) what should happen concerning this matter, which he had imagined: which monke, causing the said de la Court first to sweare unto him, not to disclose his words to any manner of person, but onely to the duke his master, therewith declared that his master the said duke should have all, willing him for the accomplishment of his purpose to seeke to winne the favour of the people. De la Court came backe with this answer, and told it to the duke at Thornebury the morrow after, being the 25th of Aprill. And on the 22 of July the same fourth yeere, the duke sent the same de la Court with letters unto the saide monke, to understand of him further of such matters, and the monke told to him againe for answer, that the duke should have all: and being asked as well now as before at the first time, how he knew this to bee true, he saide by the grace of God, and with this answer de la Court now also returning, declared the same unto the duke, on the 24. of July at Thornebury aforesaid. Moreover, the saide duke sent the same de la Court againe unto the saide monke with his letters the 26. of Aprill, in the 5. yeere of the kings raigne, when the king was to take his journey into France, requiring to understand what should become of these warres, and whether the Scottish king should in the kings absence invade this realme or not. The monke among other things, for answer of these letters, sent the duke word that the king should have no issue male. Againe, the said duke the 20 day of Feb. in the 6. yeere of the kings raigne, being at Thornebury, spake these words unto Ralph earle of Westmerland: Well, there are two dukes created in England, but if ought but good come to the king, the duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to succede to the crowne. After this the said duke on the 16. day of Aprill, in the said six yeere of the kings raigne, went in person unto the priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid monke Nicholas Hopkins, who told him, that hee should bee king; whereunto the duke said, that if it chanced, hee would shew himselfe a just and right wise prince. The monke also told the duke that he knew this by revelation, and willed him in any wise to procure the love of the commons, the better to attayne his purposed intention. The duke the same time gave, and promised to give yeerly unto the saide priory 6. pound, thorewith to buy a tunne of wine: and further promised to give unto the said priory in ready money twenty pounds, whereof ten pounds he gave in hand, towards the conveying the water unto the house by conduit. And to the saide monke Nicholas Hopkins, he gave at that present in reward three pound, and at one other time forty shillings, and at another time a marke, and at another time six shillings and eight-pence. After this, on the 20 day of March, in the tenth yeere of the kings raigne, he came to the same priory, and estoones had conference with the saide monke, to bee more fully informed by him in the matters above specified, at what time the monke also told him that he should be king, and the duke in talke tolde the monke, that he had done very well to binde his chaplaine Joha de la Court, under the seale of confession, to keepe secret such matters, for if the king should come to knowledge thereof, it would be his destruction. Likewise the twentieth day of October, in the seventh yeere of the kings raigne, and at divers other times, as well before as after, the said duke had sent his chancellor Robert Gilbert, chaplaine, unto London, there to buy certaine clothes of golde, silver, and velvets, every time so much as amounted to the value of three hundred pound, to the intent, that the saide duke might bestow the same, as well upon knights, esquires, and gentlemen of the king's house, and yeomen of his gard, as upon other the king's subiects, to winne their favours and friendships to assist him in his evill purpose: which clothes the saide Gilbert did buy, and brought the same to the said duke, who on the 20th day of January in the saide seventh yeere, and divers other dayes and yeeres before and after, did distribute, and give the same to certaine of the kings subjects, for the purpose before recited. Furthermore, the saide duke the tenth of July, in the tenth yeere of the king's raigne, and divers other dayes and times, as well before as after, did constitute more severall and particular offices in his castles, honors, lordships, and lands, than hee was accustomed to have, to the end they might bee assistant to him under colour of offices, to bring his evill purpose to passe. Moreover, the same duke sent to the king the tenth daye of May, in the ninth yeere of his raigne, for licence to retaine any of the kings subjects, whom it should please him, dwelling within the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, and Somersetshire: and also, that he might at his pleasure convey divers armours, and habilements for warre into Wales, to the intent to use the same against the king, for the accomplishment of his naughty purpose, which was to destroy the king, and to usurpe the roial government and power to himselfe: which suite for licence to have retainers, and to convey such armours and habilements of war, the said Gilbert the 20th of May, in the sayde ninth yeere, and divers other dayes before and after at London, and East Greenwich did follow, labouring earnestly, both to the king and counsell, for obtaining of the same. And the 20th of July, in the said ninth yeere, the saide duke sent the said Gilbert unto Heuton aforesaid, to understand of the aforesaid monke Nicholas Hopkins what hee heard of him: and the monke sent him word, that before Christmas next there should be a change, and that the duke should have the rule and government of all England. And moreover, the 20th of February, in the 11th yeere of the kings raigne, at Blechingly in Surrey, the sayde duke sayde unto the saide Robert Gilbert his chancellor, that he did expect and tarry for a time more convenient to achieve his purpose, and that it might easily bee done, if the nobles of the realme would declare their mindes together; but some of them mistrusted and feared to shew their mindes. Hee sayde further the same time unto the saide Robert Gilbert, that whatsoever was done by the kings father, was done by wrong; and still the duke murmured against all that the king then presently raigning did. And further he said, that he knew him-

selfe to be so wicked a sinner, that hee wanted Gods favour, and therefore he knew, that whatsoever he tooke in hand against the king had the worse successe. And furthermore, the saide duke (to alienate the king's subjects mindes from dutifull obedience, towards him and his heires, the 20th of September, in the 1st yeere of his raigne) beeing then at London, reported to Robert Gilbert, that he had a certaine writing, sealed with the kings great seale, comprehending a certaine act of parliament, in the which it was enacted, that the duke of Somerset, one of the kings progenitors, was made legitimate. And further, that the said duke meant to have delivered the same writing unto king Henry the 7th, but (said he) I would not that I had so done for ten thousand pounds. And furthermore the same duke the 4th of November, in the 11th yeere of the kings raygne, at East Greenwich in the county of Kent, said unto one Charles Knevet, esquire, after the king had reproved the duke for retaining William Bulmer knight unto his service, that if he had perceived that he should have bin committed to the Tower, as he doubted he should have bene, he would have so wrought, that the principall doers therein should not have had cause of great rejoycing, for he would have played the part, which his father intended to have put in practise against king Richard the 3rd at Salisbury, who made earnest suit to have come to the presence of the same king Richard, which suite if hee might have obtained, he having a knife secretly about him, would have thrust it into the body of king Richard, as he had scmbance to kneele downe before him: and in speaking these words, he maliciously laid his hand upon his dagger, and said, that if he were so evil used, he would doe his best to accomplish his pretended purpose, swearing to confirme his word, by the blood of our Lord. And beside all this, the same duke the 10th of May, in the 12th yeere of the kings raigne at London, in a place called the Rose, within the parish of St. Laurence Poultney, in Canwike-street ward, demanded of the said Charles Knevet, esq. what was the talke amongst the Londoners, concerning the kings journey beyond the seas: and the said Charles told him, that many stooode in doubt of the journey, lest the Frenchmen meant some deceit towards the king: whereunto the duke answered, it was to be feared lest it would come to passe, according to the words of an holy monke: for there is (saith he) a certaine charter-house monke, that divers times hath sent to mee, willing mee to send unto him my chancellor, and I did send unto him J. de la Court my chaplain, unto whom hee would not declare any thing, till de la Court had sworne unto him to keepe all things secret, and to tel to no creature living what he should heare of him, except it were to me; and the said monke told de la Court, that neither the king nor his heires should prosper, and that I should endeavour myselfe to purchase the good wils of the comunality of England, for I (the same duke) and my blood should prosper and have the rule of the realme of England. Then said Charles Knevet, the monke may be deceived through illusion of the devil, and that it was evil to meddle with such matters. Well, said the duke, it cannot hurt me, and so the duke seemed to rejoyce in the monkes words. And further, the same time the duke told the said Charles, that if the king had miscarryed now in his last sicknes, hee would have chopped off the heads of the cardinall, of sir Thomas Lovell knight, and of others; and also said, that he had rather die for it, than to bee so used as he had bene. Moreover, the 10th of September in the said 11th yeere of this kings raigne, at Blechingly in the county of Surrey, walking in the gallery there with George Nevill knight, lord of Burgaveny, the duke murmuring against the kings counsellors, and their government, said unto the said George that if the king died, he would have the rule of the realme in spite of whosoever said the contrary, and withall said, that if the said lord of Burgaveny would say, that the duke had spoken such words, hee would fight with him, and lay his sword upon his pate, and this he bound with many great oaths.—These were the points and articles comprised in the indictment, and laid to his charge, whereof he was by the inquest found guilty.

On the 13th of May, the said duke was brought from the Tower by water unto Westminster-hall, before the duke of Norfolk high steward of England, to accomplish the high appeale of the peere or peeres of the realme, and to discern and judge the cause of the peeres. There were also appointed to sit as peeres and judges upon the duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorset, the earles of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford, and Darby, the lords of S. Johns, de la Ware, Fitz Waren, Willoughby, Brooke, Cobham, Herbert, and Morley. There was made within the hall at Westminster a scaffold for these lords, and a presence for the judge railed, and counter-railed about, and barred with degrees. When the lords had taken their place, the duke was brought to the barre, and upon his arraignment pleaded not guilty, and put himselfe upon his peeres. Then was the indictment read, which the duke denyed to bee true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alleged reasons to falsifie the indictment, very pithily. The kings attorney against the dukes reasons, alleged the examinations, confessions and proofes of witnesses. The duke desired the witnesses might be brought forth: and then came before him Charles Knevet, sir Gilbert Perke his chancellor, John de la Court his confessor, and Nicholas Hopkins the monke of Henton, that had fed his humour with vaine speeches: divers presumptions and accusations were laid to him by Charles Knevet, which hee would have covered. But the depositions being read, and the deponents delivered prisoners to the officers of the Tower, finally he was found guilty by his peeres, and having judgement to suffer as in case of treason is used, was led againe to his barge, and so conveyed by water, to the Temple staires, where he was set a land, and from thence by land through London to the Tower with the axe afore him, sir William Sands having him by the right arme, and sir Nicholas Vaux by the left arme. And on the 17th of May, being the Fryday before Whitsunday, he was delivered to the sheriffes of London, who led him to the scaffold on the Tower-hill, about 11 of the clocke, and there he was beheaded, in the presence of sir Thomas Lovel and all the people: his body with the head was borne by the fryers Augustines to their church, and there buried in the chappell church for the close. And now followeth the publication at the disgrading of the saide Edward late duke of Buckingham, knight and companion of the most noble order of St. George, named the Gartar, which was read and published by Gartar king at armes, at the feast of Saint George, in the quire of Windsore-Colledge, standing on the high pise at the dexe, all the other officers of armes about him, there being also present the lord marques Dorset knight of the same order, then being the kings deputy for the feast, the earle of Essex, the earle of Wilshire, the earle of Kent, sir Thomas Lovel, and the lord la Ware, knights of the said order, with great audience assembled there on the eight of June, the thirteeno yeere of Henry the eight, the yeere of Christ, 1521.

“ Bee it knowne unto all men, that whereas Edward late duke of Buckingham, knight and companion of the noble order of Saint George, named the Gartar, hath lately done and committed high treason against the king our soveraigne lord, and soveraigne of the saide order of the Gartar, in compassing and imagining the destruction of the most noble person of our said soveraigne lord the king contrary to his oath and due allegiance, and for the which high treason the said Edward hath bin indicted, arraigned, convicted, and attainted, for the which detestable offence and high treason, the saide Edward hath deserved to bee disgraded of the said noble order, and expelled out of the saide company, and not worthy that his armes, ensignes, and hachments should remaine among other noble ensignes of the other noble, vertuous, and approved knights of the said noble order, nor have the benefit of the said noble order: wherefore our said soveraigne lord the king, soveraigne of the said noble order of Saint George, named the Gartar, by the advice of the other knights of the said noble order, for his saide offences, and committing of the said high treason, wiltheth and comuandeth that the said Edward duke of Buckingham be disgraded of the said noble order, and his armes, ensignes, and hachments cleerely expelled, and put from among the armes, ensignes, and hachments of the other noble knights of the saide order, to the intent, that all other noble men thereby may take ensample hereafter, not to committe any such haynous and detestable treason and offences, as God forbid they should. God save the King.”

It is to be remembered, that Somerset Hereault was in the roode loft behind the hachments of the saide duke Edward: and when Gartar spake these words, ‘ expelled and put from the armes,’ then the saide Somerset violently cast downe into the quire, his creast, his banner, and sword. And when the publication was all done, the officers of armes spurned the saide hachment with their feete out of the quire into the body of the church, first the sword, and then the banner, and then was the creast spurned out of the said quire through the church out at the west doore, and so to the bridge, where it was spurned over into the ditch. And thus was the said Edward late duke of Buckingham fully disgraded of the order of Saint George, named the Gartar.

[“ It is well known that, by the Attainder of the duke of Buckingham, the subject of the preceding Trial, the great office of high constable, which was hereditary in his family, reverted to the crown, and has ever since rested dormant, except when granted for particular occasions, such as a coronation, and the holding of a court of the high constable. See 3 Hollingsh. 365. Co. Lit. 163, a. Keilw. 170. b. Dy. 285. 6. b. and the 2nd volume of Hearne’s Antiquarian discourses. The execution of the duke of Buckingham was soon after followed with a parliamentary attainder of him; the reason of which is not very obvious; unless indeed this sanction was added, that the two houses might have their share of the odium of his death with the king, his then minister cardinal Wolsey, and the particular peers, by whom the duke was condemned. Ro. Parl. in 1 Journ. Dom. Proc. cv. and the private acts of 14 H. VIII. 3 Parl. Hist. 37. 1 Dugdale’s Baron. 170. However, some mercy was shewn to the duke’s family. The same parliament made a provision for his duchess for her life; and also confirmed a grant from the king to Henry, the duke’s eldest son, and his issue by his wife Ursula, of some of the forfeited estates. Ro. Parl. 1 Journ. Dom. Proc. cxxii, cxxiv. Sir William Dugdale calls the last act a restitution of blood, except to honours and lands; but improperly, the record shewing, that it was simply an act to confirm a grant from the crown, of part of the duke’s real property. 1 Dugd. Baron. 171. The king also a few years afterwards extended his bounty to the same Henry, granting to him some more of the late duke’s possessions, particularly the castle and manor of Stafford. Ibid. Further, in the first parliament of Edward 6, the same Henry Stafford was restored in blood, so far as to take the barony of Stafford, one of the family honours.” 1 Journ. Dom. Proc. 305, 522. 28. Proceedings relating to the Dissolution of the Marriage between King HENRY VIII. and CATHARINE of Arragon: 19 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1528. [Lord Herbert's Life and Reign of Hen. VIII. in 2 Kennett's Compl. Hist. 98. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 507.]

OUR king had now for many years enjoyed the vertuous queen Katherine, without that either scruple of the validity of their Match, or outward note of unkindness had past betwixt them. Nevertheless, as, presently after the birth of the princess in 1515-16, (who alone of all their children survived), Luther and others controverted the authority and extent of the Papal jurisdiction, so in this kingdom, the dispensation of Julius 2. for the aforesaid Marriage being privately questioned, many of our learned men concluded it void, as being granted in a case prohibited Jure Divino, and therefore indispeusable. This again, whispered in the ears of many, begot such a muttering, as being brought to the king, made him think what he was to do. For though he knew that a keeping of the succession doubtful was one of the ill arts by which princes conserve themselves, yet, as a desire to have posterity, which might succeed him in the crown, prevailed over all other considerations, he resolved to clear this point by all fitting degrees; and the rather, in that he knew the same objections had been made (though wrongfully) to Edward 4, and his children. And certainly (as it appears to me: by many circumstances,) it was in the beginning, as much as he could, in favour of the princess his daughter. So that, although the bishop of Tarbe (being sent by Francis 1527, to conclude the alternative formerly set down,) did object openly against her legitimation, as being got by the king upon his brother's wife, it did not much move him. But, seeing it now grown a publick doubt, he thought it more notorious than could be suppress. Neither did he believe that Charles would be greatly scandalized at it; since, to avoid the Treaty of Windsor, himself had alledged some things to this purpose. All which again (as Polydore relates) was secretly fomented by Longland bishop of Lincoln (his majesties Confessor,) at the instigation of the cardinal; who both hated the emperor, and was averse from the queen, by reason of her reproving his loose, and inordinate life. Though (whatever Polydore saith,) it will appear hereafter, that Woolsey indeavoured not, finally, the Divorce. Howsoever, on some or all of these causes, the king was much perplexed, as knowing how deeply this affair concerned himself, his posterity, and kingdom. And because it was easie to collect of what consequence any rumor of this kind might be, he not only sent to our ambassadors in Spain, as is said before, to silence the noise thereof, but used all means possible both to appease those violent jealousies the queen had conceiv'd, and to satisfie his people, at least until himself had look'd further into the business. In which certainly his intentions privately were to proceed; for besides his dispatching his secretary William Knight, doctor of law, to Rome, (whom yet he commanded to advise with our cardinal by the way, being then in France,) he took information sometimes about his present condition, and sometimes (it is probable also) about such ladies as might furnish him a choice for a genial, and second bed. In which number the dutchess of Alanzon, sister to Francis, is the first I find mention'd, whose picture (as Hall saith) was sent over, about this time. Neither did the cardinal, being certified of these passages, omit to comply at least in appearance with him, and therefore writ to the king, that the best way to obtain his desire, was, to tell the emperor plainly, that, 'Unless he set the pope free,' (at this time in prison) 'he would proceed in the Divorce upon his own, and his Clergies authority.' After which, he sent for John Clark, bishop of Bath, (then resident ambassador in France) and commended him to the king, as a person to whom he might discover himself; and, together, delivered his opinion: 1. That because the party would appeal, the business could not be determin'd in England, unless the Pope would give him absolute authority, in omnibus casibus (a Minute whereof to be sent to Rome, I have seen.) 2. That she should be persuaded, ad ingressum religionis. And, lastly, if neither of those could be effected, it should be thought of, Quid possit clam ferri quoad forum conscientie? Concerning which points, the bishop of Bath at his return speaking (as I find in an Original from the said bishop to Woolsey), the king reply'd, 'My lord of Bath, the Bull is good, or it is naught; if it be naught, let it be so declar'd, and if it be good, it shall never be broken by no by-ways for me.' Whereupon, the Bishop represented, That the Pope's captivity hindered all suits in that court, and, howsoever, that the process would be so slow, as it could not be determined in six or seven years. Besides, that there must be three distinct Sentences given in it, by three divers judges, the two last to be chosen for the adverse party. Lastly, that after all this, the Sentence may be recalled; Quia sententia contra matrimonium, nunquam transit in rem judicatum; adding, in conclusion, as the knot of the business, that the party would Appeal. To which the king answered, 'He thought she would not appeal from the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishops of Rochester, Ely and London: as for the tediousness of the suit, since he had patience eighteen years, that he would stay yet four or five more; since the opinion of all the clerks of his kingdom, besides two, were lately declared for him; adding, that he had studied the matter himself, and written of it, and that he found it was unlawful, de jure divino, and undispensible.' Businesses standing thus, and no probability of the queen's fruitfulness since the princess Mary's birth, appearing; and the rather, that Spanish women are observed to be seldom mothers of many children; he resolves to have recourse to the Pope; comforting himself, for the rest, that no other difficulty appeared in removing all these inconveniences, than the obtaining a Dispensation to dissolve that Marriage, which a dispensation only had at first made. He knew the same key that lockt, could unlock. Therefore he thought fit to send to Rome, both to represent the dangerous condition of himself, his issue and kingdom, and to solicit the pope for a licence to marry another. And the rather, for that so many circumstances had made the Bull and Breve, upon which the first Marriage was grounded, to be suspected. The prosecuting whereof therefore (in a dispatch dated 25th Dec. 1527), was recommended, by the cardinal, to sir Gregory Casalis, an Italian; which also he was required to urge so far, as to say, that our king could impute the punishment God had laid on him in taking away his issue male, upon nothing so much, as the unlawfulness of this Marriage; which learned men did also generally so detest, as they held it to be more than the pope could dispense with (as I find they declar'd afterwards, in a book, which was sent thither.) Wherefore, that he should procure a Commission for hearing and determining this cause, to be directed to the cardinal; or, if that were refus'd, to bishop Staphylæus, dean of the Ruoots, who had been lately in England. And that he should furthermore say, that he doubted not, but the Pope would easily grant it, though against the will of Charles; since he had granted Charles a Dispensation and Absolution from the oath which he had taken to marry the princess Mary, without so much as demanding the consent of our king. For facilitating of which business, letters of exchange, to the value of ten thousand ducats, were sent him; as also certain Instruments for the pope's signing, which were, 1. a Commission, in ample form, to hear, and determine the cause in England. 2. a Decretal, wherein the pope, upon probation of carnal knowledge between Arthur and Katharine, should pronounce the Marriage void. 3. A Dispensation for the king to marry another. 4. A Pollicitation, that the pope will not recall any of those Acts.

But it was an ill time for sir Gregory to negotiate with the pope; he being, (as I find by an original dispatch of doctor Knight, dated from Rome, Sept. 13, 1527,) so aw'd by Hernando de Alanzon, that he durst neither give the said knight a public audience, nor so much as admit a private message from him, but by the intervention of the cardinal Piseni. So that, what wisdom or piety soever our king might pretend herein, the cojuntura certainly was no way auspicious. And the rather, because the pope, during his imprisonment in the castle of saint Angelo, had been requir'd in the emperor's name (as I find by a Dispatch of doctor Knight's from Orvieto) not to grant any Act concerning the Divorce, nor so much as suffer the cause to be heard before any judge in our king's dominions. I find also in the same letter that Lorenzo Pucci, cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor, being chosen by the pope for dispatching our king's businesses, had told doctor Knight, that the Commission peun'd here in England, for the Popes signing, might not pass, but that he had minuted another, which the pope (though with some reluctance) had granted; earnestly intreating our king nevertheless, not to put it in execution, till the Spaniards and Almain were gone out of Italy, and himself left in his full liberty. To confirm which grant also, the same doctor Knight, by a letter (dated Jan. 9, 1528), did certifie, that the king's Dispensation was obtain'd under lead, as amply as the Minute sent from England did contain; and the Commission for the lord legate likewise was granted sufficiently, though not according to the form propos'd; and that it was drawn by the cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor. Moreover, he tells (as in the popes name) that if monsieur de Lautrech were come, the pope thinketh he might, by good colour, say to the emperor, that he was requir'd by the English ambassadors, and monsieur de Lautrech to proceed in the business. All which particularities I have the rather set down, that it might appear how the difficulties that the pope made in this business, seemed to proceed chiefly from humane considerations. Which also is much confirm'd by a dispatch from Gregory Casalis 13 January 1528, where (on the popes part, and in his name) he saith, that if the kings conscience be satisfied (which he alone can best tell) his course were, Ut statim committat causam, aliam uxorem ducat, litem sequatur, mittatur pro legato, &c. and, that this was the only way for the king to attain his desires: though yet he intreated this advice might be taken, as proceeding from the cardinal Sanctorum quatuor, and Simonetta, and not from himself. And this, certainly, as it may be thought a politic advice, so would it have prov'd safer and easier for both, than a Commission for two legates; which as it took up more time on the kings part, so it caus'd a like danger and inconvenience to the pope. Howsoever, it appeared afterwards, that the king, either out of tenderness of conscience, or consideration of the hazard he should run, if the pope would not confirm this Act, thought not fit to allow thereof; but chose rather to demand a larger Commission than that which doctor Knight obtained; the procuring whereof also he committed to Stephen Gardiner, doctor of law, and secretary to Woolsey, and Edward Fox, provost of Kings Colledge in Cambridge; not neglecting in the mean time, both to instruct the Pope in his cause, and do him all the good offices he could with Christian princes and states, and particularly the Venetians, concerning the restitution of Ravenna and Cervia; though yet it took not such effect as was hoped. Neither did our king forget, by a Letter of cardinal Woolsey's to the protonotary John Casalis, to desire him to acquaint the Pope with some domestick and private passages; which (though out of the respect I bear to that vertuous queens memory) I cannot but mention somewhat unwillingly, yet must not omit, both for the sake of that truth that ought to be in history, and as it seems to contain some motive of the kings intentions. I shall set down the words in Latin as they are extant in our Record, Sunt nonnulla secretò Sanctissimo Domino nostro exponenda, & non credenda literis, quas ob causas, morbosq; nonnullos, quibus, absque remedio, regina laborat, & ob animi etiam conceptum scrupulum, Regia Majestas nec potest nec vult, ullo unquam posthac tempore, cauti, vel ut usorem, admittere, quodcumq; coenerit. 'These are besides some particular reasons to be laid before his holiness in private, but not proper to commit to writing, upon which account, as well as by reason of some distempers which the queen lies under without hopes of remedy, as likewise through some scruples which disturb the kings conscience, insomuch that his majesty neither can nor will for the future look upon her, or live with her as his wife, be the consequence what it will.'

Gardiner and Fox, receiving their Instructions in February 1528, repaired first to Francis, from whom they readily obtained a promise to co-operate puissantly with the Pope, for effectuating the kings desire, as also a perswasory and menacing Letter in case of refusal to the Pope; for complying wherewith also the bishop Staphylæus was sent by him to Rome not long after. Our ambassadors having given the king account hereof, proceeded in their journey to Italy, and coming at last to Orvieto, where the Pope then was, they found him lodged in an old and ruinous monastery, his outward chamber altogether unfurnished, and his bed-chamber-hangings, together with his bed, valued by them (as the original Letter hath it) at no more than 20 nobles. The Pope yet received them lovingly; though not without the anxiety of one who could neither safely grant, nor deny the request of a king to whom he so much owed whatsoever liberty he enjoyed. Their Instructions for the present, were only yet, to thank him for the Commission and Dispensation granted in this business to doctor Knight, and after intrusted to Gambara his agent here (successor unto Melchior Langus, who was first authorized by the Pope, to give queen Catherine notice of this affair, together with the Popes secret intention therein.) They added further, that by Gambara, as also by sir Gregory Casalis, our king had gladly understood, how all defects, upon due remonstrance, should be supplied and amended. They were charged also, from the cardinal, privately to protest in his name, that he was no author of this counsel. After which they were desired, by him, to proceed to the merit of the cause, and qualities of the gentlewoman (being, as I take it, mistress Boleyn.) The perplexed Pope, who knew well how much the Spaniard was interested herein, heard them at this time with more tear, when at another time he would have granted their request. Therefore, together with an ambiguous answer, which he gave them by word of mouth, he sent in cipher a Letter to our king, of so much irresolution, that it needed no other cover. Howsoever, as the commission of our ambassadors was to stay till further order was given, they seemed to take all in good part. At last our able negotiators, urging the aforesaid and many other motives to the Pope, and he again finding the French and confederate army puissant and victorious in the kingdom of Naples at that time, made no difficulty to grant a full Commission to two legates, to hear and determine the Cause in England, being (according to the kings desire) Woolsey and Campejus (not long since made bishop of Salisbury.) Besides, it seems he granted this following Pollicitation, or Promise, dated at Viterbo, July 23, 1528, which yet being no original-piece, but an ancient copy, extant among sir Robert Cottons Records, I shall mention but according to the credit it may deserve from the equal reader; only I must not omit to say, that, as divers original dispatches, both before and after, give some touches of it, and that the date for the rest is added, so it may challenge better credit than to be thought a Minute, and much less a counterfeit and supposed piece, which also is the more probable, in that the Pope granted amplier testimonies than this, in favour of the Divorce; howsoever they were either controlled again, or detained in the hands of his ministers, after that sort, that our king might well take notice, but neither copy nor advantage of them.

The Pollicitation.

"We Clement, by the providence of God the 7th Pope of that name, having duly weighed with how much justice our well beloved son in Christ, Henry 8, king of England, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, hath laid before us as a thing notorious, publicly known, and of evil report, his case concerning the nullity of a Marriage, which he did both contract, and de facto, consummate with our most dear daughter in Christ, Catherine, daughter to the most Catholick king, Ferdinand of Spain, of glorious memory, contrary to the laws both of God and man, which he thereby grievously transgressed; and having thereupon issued out our Commission in form and manner there expressed (which Commission we do hereby confirm and ratifie, as much as if here again expressed and inserted) to our beloved sons in Christ, Thomas and Laurence, by the Divine Grace, Cardinals, Sancta Cæcilie, and Sancta Maria in Transtiberim, our Legats de Latere in the kingdom of England, from the Apostolical See; whereby we did constitute and appoint them (as we do by the tenor of these presents, most fully and effectually constitute and appoint them either together or asunder) in our stead to examine, and finally to determine as competent judges in this Cause; that we may give the more manifest and evident token of our tenderness and affection to the aforesaid king Henry, in speedily administering justice, and freeing him by our immediate Sentence, from that tediousness and vexation wherewith the most just causes (by the corruption of the present times) are so far embarrassed, as scarce to be finished, and finally determined in an age: and being desirous that the Process carried on, or to be carried on according to the tenor of the said Commission, may be firm, valid and irreversible, we do engage, and upon the word of a Pope promise, that we will never by the entreaty, request or instance of any person, or from our own mere motion, or otherwise, at any time grant any letters, breves, bulls or writs of any sort, either under shew of justice, as acts of grace, or on any other pretence whatever, to inhibit or revoke the matter of the Commissions heretofore in the above-mentioned cause issued out, of the foresaid Commission, or of the Process by these our delegates, according to the tenor of the former commissions, or said commission either yet formed and made, or to be formed and made hereafter, whereby any prejudice, hindrance or interruption may be given to the full, perfect, final and effectual execution of the said commissions, commission or process, or whereby all or any of them may in any wise be revoked, opposed or retarded in the whole, or in any part of them; but we will preserve entire, ratifie, confirm and defend to all purposes with our utmost power and authority, most effectually the commissions and commission granted by us to our foresaid delegates, and the Process which the said delegates according to the tenor of the said commissions or commission, by their plenary power and authority have or shall form and carry on. Lastly, we will effectually make valid, and without refusal, delay, or any difficulty whatever, grant all such letters, breves, bulls or writs, which may serve any ways to strengthen or confirm the execution of the said commissions, commission, or fore-mentioned process, or to ratifie and establish any things by virtue thereof, by our foresaid delegates decreed, determined or adjudged. And we do furthermore engage and promise, upon the word of a pope, that we will in no wise (unless by force and violence compelled, or by fraud and treachery surprized) injure all or any of the foresaid particulars, or act or attempt any thing contrary to them, or any of them directly or indirectly, tacitly or expressly, mediately or immediately, upon any colour or pretence whatsoever; but will support and preserve all and every of them firm, valid, fixed, and inviolable. And farther, if (which God forbid) we should act or attempt any thing in any wise against the premises, or any of them;

we do hereby for that time, will and declare as effectually as if this our Declaration were at that time made, that every such act and attempt shall be null and void: and it is hereby made null and void, and is declared, pronounced, and adjudged, to be of no force and efficacy.—Given at Viterbo July 13, 1528, in the fifth year of our Pontificat. CLEMENT V."

This while, the queen, who understood well what was intended against her, laboured with all those passions which jealousy of the king's affection, sense of her own honour, and the legitimation of her daughter, could produce; laying, in conclusion, the whole fault on the cardinal; who yet was less guilty than the queen thought, or Polydore would make him. I will not deny yet, but out of due regard to his masters interests (so nearly concerned in this great affair,) as well as care of giving satisfaction to his conscience, which seemed much troubled, he might comply with the kings desires; but to be the single author of a counsel, which might turn so much to his prejudice, when the king should die, is more than may easily be believed of so cautious a person as Woolsey. And this innocenco, perchance, was the reason that he neither suspected himself to be so much abhorred of the queen, nor to stand in that danger of her practices which yet procured at last his ruine. The first who gave the cardinal notice of the queen's displeasure (as I find by a Letter of his dated at Faversham, 5 July 1527, then in his journey towards France,) was the archbishop of Canterbury; the consequence whereof he so much apprehended, that he thought fit to use all means for satisfying her. Therefore he presently laboured with the abp. to persuade the queen, that whatsoever she heard in this kind, was intended only for clearing the surmises of the bishop of Tarbe, formerly mentioned. He writ also to our ambassadors in Spain, to quench all rumours there, upon the same pretext. But the queen had sent those agents abroad, (and amongst them, one Abel, her chaplain) who both informed her of all that passed, and engaged the emperor to assist her to the uttermost of his power. Therefore the Pope stood more and more suspended. The pace of Campejus (the promised legate) also appeared staggering and slow; and all that might frustrate the king's intentions, was secretly practised. This while the cardinal, (who out of the king's designs would ever produce and subrogate some particular end of his own, whereof, either in point of glory or profit, he might make advantage) had so disposed this of the Divorce, as thereby to mediate the Pope's entire delivery, not only from the guards, but even fear of the emperor. Again as, during the Pope's restraint, he had, (under pretence that it was the best expedient for the king's proposed Divorce) projected a meeting of cardinals at Avignon, for settling the government of the Church, where he himself intended to be present; so, now, since the king liked not that course, and that the Pope was free, he persuaded him to erect some Cathedral churches in England, at the price of throwing down more monasteries. Whereby it appears, both how busie this Cardinal was, and how much he studied his own ends. For as he knew this would please the king (who began to think that religious persons might serve God as well in defending the kingdom, as praying for it,) so he assured himself the authority thereof would be derived on him chiefly; and the Pope, in the mean time, obnoxious, while he could not but fear how far those innovations might extend. When this project therefore was moved to the Pope, I find by a Letter of the protonotary John Casalis, Oct. 30, 1528, that he answered, gravely, he liked the design well; but that he would proceed deliberately, because it was ad perpetuam rei memoriam. Therefore he desired the two legates (for Campejus was by this time come) might be joyned in determining this business, and that all the revenues of the monasteries might be conferred on the new bishops; and that the two legates, having advised with the Pope hereof, should afterwards nominate them. So that it seemed the Pope held it fitting to comply with the king a little at this time, since Gardiner told him plainly, that he had in his Instructions these words to tell him, 'Necesse est supprimi proserenissimi Regis Collegio Monasteria cuiuscunque ordinis:' in conclusion, a Bull was granted for applying the Revenues of some small Monasteries for maintenance of the king's colleges in Cambridge and Windsor Castle; the copy whereof is extant in sir Robert Cotton's Library. It may be doubted yet, whether these apprehensions, that were now, in more than one kind, given the Pope of our king's declining the absolute authority of the Church of Rome, did dispose the Pope more to oblige or disoblige him. For, though the Pope had reason to fear, lest he should lose his ancient jurisdiction in this kingdom, if he denied; yet he might doubt as well, that in adhering too much to that side, he might offend the emperor so far, as to hazard the loss of his own. He therefore, at once treats with the emperor of a perfect peace and amity, and together of recovering Cervia and Ravenna, and of effecting certain other designs which he had in Florence; and grants (as is abovesaid) in appearance a large Commission to Woolsey and Campejus; yet, in effect, so restrained, as the emperor might see it was not out of his power to check or revoke it. And this was all that sir Gregory Casalis and Stephen Gardiner, after much importunity, could obtain. They moved the Pope also to canonize Henry 6, (which I find was formerly proposed to Alexander 6, by Henry 7,) to which the Pope answered, 'That if the archbishop of Canterbury, and bishop of Winchester (who had examined the matter in partibus) did send the process thither, as their Commission required, the Canonization should follow shortly after.' Businesses standing thus, our king thought fit to send sir Francis Bryan, knight, and Peter Vannes (an Italian, and his secretary, for the Latin Tongue) to Rome; (their Instructions in general, being signed with the king's own hand) were to dissuade the Pope from entering into any League with the emperor, whose design was (he said) to divest the Pope of his means and authority, by the forcible bringing in of one Angelo, a cordelier, to be Pope, who should not intermeddle with secular jurisdiction, and the patrimony of the Church; which therefore the emperor would take to himself and usurp. For preventing whereof, the king wished him to keep a guard, offering in his own and Francis's name, to contribute thereunto. They were commanded also, to search privately for a certain pretended Breve, in Rome, (said to be a Supplement or Confirmation of the Bull of Julius 2, and authorizing the Marriage with queen Catherine) since it was not to be found in the king's Records. Furthermore, they were required to discover (in the name of a third person) whether, if the queen entered a religious life, the king might have the Popes Dispensation to marry again, and the children be legitimate, and what precedents were for it? Secondly, whether if the king (for the better inducing of the queen thereunto) would promise to enter himself into a religious life, the Pope might not dispense with his vow, and leave her there? Thirdly, if this may not be done, whether he can dispense with the king to have two wives, and the children of both legitimate? Since great reasons and precedents, especially in the Old Testament, appear for it. All which they were to do with that secrecy and circumspection, that the cause might not be published, propounding the king's case always therefore as another man's. Lastly (as in all other Instructions) some kind of menaces were to be added. But persuasions and terrors wanted not on the other side; which did so much more prevail with the Pope, as the danger was more immediate and pressing on the emperor's part, than on our king's. Therefore our ambassadors were so far from obtaining any thing, but what was formerly granted in the Commission to cardinal Woolsey and Campejus, that they found the Pope now more than ever disposed to favour the emperor: insomach that they observed daily new delays and restrictions in him. Some whereof (besides the evidence in our Records) Sanders doth confess, while he saith, that the Pope, by four several messengers to Campejus (now on his way) gave him in charge: 1. That he should make easie journies. 2. That when he came to England, he should labour all he could to reconcile the king and queen. 3. That if this could not be effected, he should persuade her to enter a monastery, and take on her a religious life. Lastly, That when this could be obtained, he should give no definitive Sentence for the Divorce, without express commandment from him, & hoc (saith he) summum & maxumum sit tibi mandatum. Campejus thus instructed, protracts all things; whereat though our king seemed scandalized, as suspecting it came from unwillingness, yet, being an active prince, he made use of that time to negotiate in Spain for recovering the Breve, (of which above) commanding the bishop of Worcester, and doctor Edward Lee, by all means to procure it. At length (and not before the beginning of Oct. 1528) Campejus coming through France, and being conducted thence into England, by John Clark, bishop of Bath, our king's ambassador there, came to London: where, being by our cardinal presented to the king, he publicly acknowledged in the name of the pope, cardinal, clergy, and people of Rome, that our king was Liberator Urbis. Shortly after, obtaining audience of the queen, he took occasion both to acquaint her with her danger, and to persuade her thereupon to renounce the world, and enter into some religious life. For which many pretexts wanted not, (as I find in our Records) she having been observed, since the Commission obtained, to allow dancing and pastimes more than before. And that her countenance not only in court, but to the people, was more cheerful than ordinary; whereas (it was alleged) she might be more sad and pensive, considering the king's conscience was unsatisfied, and that he had refrained her bed, and was not willing the lady princess, her daughter, should come in her company. But the offended queen replying peremptorily, 'That she was resolved both to stand to that Marriage the Roman Church had once allowed; and, howsoever, not to admit such partial judges as they were, to give sentence in her cause.' Campejus writes to Rome, both to inform the Pope hereof, and to desire farther Instructions: the Answer whereunto the Pope yet so long deferred, that very near six months passed before the two cardinals sat in their Commission.

This while the bishop of Worcester, and Dr. Lee, having given the emperor an overture of the Divorce, did (by a Letter dated at Saragosa, April 5, 1529) return our king this Answer, on the emperor's part: 'That he was sorry to understand of the intended divorce, adjuring our king (for the rest) by the Sacrament of Marriage, not to dissolve it. Or, if he would needs proceed therein, that the hearing and determining of the business yet might be referred to Rome, or a General Council, and not be decided in England.' Adding further, 'That he would defend the queen's just cause.' Wherewith, the pretended original Breve was produced, and a transumpt or copy thereof (signed by three bishops) offered them, to send to England; but the Breve itself was denied, for fear (as he said) of miscarrying. To which our ambassadors answered, That our king was a prince of that piety, that he ought not to be adjured; and for the Breve, that it was a jewel belonging to the king and his queen only, and not to be detained by any other from them. And for appealing to Rome, it needed not; since authority of determining that business was already given from thence to cardinal Woolsey and Campejus. Besides that, in causes matrimonial, the presence of the parties to be examined, being required for the most part, the emperor might easily imagine how unfit it was for the king and queen personally to go to Rome, especially at that time. After this, the emperor commanding the Breve to be read, the ambassadors required a notary to be allowed them, for setting down the whole passage of this business, together with their Protestations. But no notary but the emperor's being permitted, the ambassadors were forced to accept him, desiring notwithstanding their Allegations might be set down apart. Hereupon the emperor told the ambassadors, that he would send an express messenger to our king, to intreat him to continue his Match, and, in case of refusal, to protest against the Divorce. Our ambassadors yet persisted still in urging the emperor, for his own sake, to send the Breve for England; lest the Judges, wanting sight thereof, should proceed against the queen, or otherwise, that he would send the said Breve to the Pope. The emperor replied, that therefore he would not send it. For if it miscarryed, the Judges might then proceed as they would; but for sending it to the Pope he would advise. And that, if matters were now as they were heretofore, he would not fear to send it to England. By a Letter also, the 20th of April 1529, they certify the king, 'That the emperor intended to send both to England and Rome, to make his Protestations against this Divorce; and that he would not send the original Breve. Furthermore, that he required our king, according to an Article of a former Treaty, to fall upon Francis, as a perturber of the publick peace. Lastly, because the said ambassadors had heard, and considered, at large, the Breve, they sent their Objections against it.' Which, being one of the grounds of the king's proceeding in this great affair, I have thought fit punctually to set down, as they are extant in the original letter, written in cipher, and thus to be read, as I find it deciphered in our Records.

'That where it is pretended the Bull and Breve to be impetrate in one day, either they were impetrate in one suit, and by one man; and then it is not to be thought, but that this suit, being of so great importance, was committed to such a one, as could perceive, that the Bull, not containing so large dispensation as the Breve, is superfluous, (supposing the Breve to be necessary.) If the one were impetrate after the other, and the suits made by one man, it is hard to think that one man, being instructed in the suit for both, would put the dispensation of less moment in a Bull, and of greater moment in a Breve, seeing the one might be as easily impetrate as the other, and that the dispensation in lead is more durable to remain; and, that the two kings were bound to impetrate Bulls, and not Breves, whereof he or they that had such Commission (as it seemeth) could not be ignorant. And if these suits were made by divers persons, and by several commissions, there is no reason can be alledged, (the impetration being in one day) why to two several persons several commissions should be given herein, the thing requiring no haste, the Marriage following five or six years after; but more likely it is, if the Breve were then obtained indeed, that it was procured by secret practices not known to all parties quorum intererat scire & consentire; for, both the parties consenting, I think there can be no sufficient cause alledged, why, the thing being done by common consent, the Breve rather than the Bull should have larger dispensation; for what needed two divers suits, with divers commissions, if both the parties were agreed upon the suits? Especially the impetration of both being in one day.—2. Supposing it to be true, that master Abel saith, the queen to have sworn, quod nunquam fuit cognita à Principe Arthuro; the cause of the impetration for so much is vain, (viz. quod Regina cum Arthuro principe matrimonium carnali copula consummaverit.) If this be true, it appeareth that he that sued the Breve had no commission of the parties, for they would not give him commission to impetrate dispensation for cause not true.—3. Supposing it to be true, that master Abel saith to me, that the queen never heard of such Breve, before the emperors orators there presented it to her; how can it stand, that is reported in the Breve, quod impetratum est Breve ad Reginae instantiam?—4. If your highness had made instance and supplication for the same Breve, it is not to be thought that it should be so far out of your remembrance, the causes of impetration being such, as your highness might and could, anon, reduce it to the same.—5. If it were impetrate at the instance of your highness, and of the queen's grace, no cause is why it should be sent into Spain to king Fernando (as the emperor's folks first said, but now swerve) and not to your highness, and the queen's grace. If any will suppose that it was done by your consent, no reason agreeth why you should consent thereto, and not rather keep it in your own hands, than send it to the custody of another. And yet, if you did consent, it cannot be thought, but that it should remain in your remembrance, as the firmity of your Marriage, and discharge of your conscience, with other things, touching highly your succession, standing therein: and it may be supposed moreover, that some writing of the deposit thereof should remain there, which is not found.—6. Considering that the king of most noble memory, your father then alive, your highness not being at the date of the Breve past 15, or 16 years of age," [for so the Cipher is; though as king Henry was then but 12, and something more, I conceive these figures were ciphers only, signifying his true age: unless perchance the cipherer or decipherer did otherwise mistake it;] "it may be well supposed that your highness was not then much to sollicite the impetration of such things. And that, if any such Breve should have been impetrate that time, that rather it should have been done at the instance of the king your father, than of your highness. And although then it might have been impetrate in your highness's name, yet it could not have been done there without knowledge and consent of the king your father, and also at his setting forth. And, if any his intervention and consent had been in this matter, he would not have bound king Fernando, and likewise have been bound himself, to get Bulls of Dispensation. And surely it may be thought, that, if the king your father consented, Don Fernando of Spain did the same, so that it cannot be doubted, but that as they say here, they have two Bulls reserved in their archives, so should also this Breve have been, which indeed was not there found, as hereafter shall be shewed, nor any such is found in your highness's archives. Wherefore it may be well reckoned, that there was no such obtained by the consent of the king your father.—And so, 7thly, maketh the Breve suspect, that the emperor's folks first said, that it was found in Archivis Regum Hispaniarum, as appeareth in my lord cardinals graces Letters; and now, forgetting themselves, the emperor's chancellor and Perinot have confessed to us, that it was found among the Writings of doctor de Puebla, which was orator of Spain, in England, in the king's days of most noble memory your father. Which contrariety maketh to appear that they do not upright. Of a nephew of doctor Puebla's being there, I have written in our common Letters the 5th of April, and now do again; by whom peradventure some light might be had.—8. Whoso considereth the high renowned wisdom of the king your said father, and his great sage council, men of singular wisdom and learning for all purposes, may well conceive that, or ever any Dispensation for Marriage to be had between your highness and the queen were sent for, that her grace was examined an esset cognita à principe Arthuro an non? And that, si fassa est, that the two kings would have provided therefore Dispensationem in Bulla, as they were bound. And on the other side, si negarat se fuisse cognitam, nihil erat opus Brevis quoad, &c. And for the second part of the Breve, I cannot suppose that your highness, in that time which the date of the Breve pretendeth (your highness being then not much more than 14 or 15 years of age, and the king your father living) need any Dispensation in that party. And if none needed then, why should your highness then make instance for any, which is supposed in the Breve?—9th. If this Breve were impetrate in the days of Dr. de Puebla; the being thereof so long in his hands, and the manner of keeping of the same, giveth new conjecture that it is a thing cassat; for the thing being of so much importance, touching so high your highness and the queen, why should he keep it; specially so long? for he lived in England after the date of the Breve 5 or 6 years, and died there, not long after the king your father. Who can think that such a king, and such a council, would have suffered the Breve to be out of their hands, in his hands, all that time, if the Breve had been known to them necessary for this Matrimony, and of any value? And, as I said, the manner of keeping thereof seemeth to confirm the same; which manner of keeping I conjecture of two things: one, that it was not kept in a case of tin, after the manner of Breves; for only in a paper they did exhibit it to us twice. Another, that in the superscription it appeared slubbered, by reason of often handling, peradventure lying among so many his writings and old letters; wherefore, although it were then impetrate, yet it seemeth that he took it as cassat, and void, peradventure as surreptitiously obtained of his own head, without any commission or consent of the parties.—10. Another suspicion is, that, although the emperor's chancellor and Perenot say, they have divers Letters and Writings of the said Puebla's, concerning both the first Marriage and second of the queen's; yet, because they uttered not that they have any thing specially concerning this Breve, (which they would not have forgotten to say, for so much as it maketh for their purpose, if there had been any such) moved upon that suspicion, I demanded of them, and divers times to the same, whether they had any special letters concerning the Breve? They could not, ne did say that they had; but the emperor's chancellor answered, That the Breve was enough. Whereupon may be gathered; that his Answer implied, that they have none other.—11. If any such Breve were impetrate at that time, by the knowledge and consent of both the kings, likely is, that either of them should have one. Let them then here bring forth the Breve ex Archivis suis. If they will say, this is it; what likelihood is it, that it should be sent into England, to come into Spain? For this Breve, if it were in Dr. de Puebla's custody, came out of England after his death, with other his writings; which I think his nephew there (if he confess that it was found amongst other his uncle's writings) will also confess. I say, why was it sent into England? It is not to be doubted, but Don Fernando had an ambassador in the court of Rome, which might easilier and nearer way have sent it into Spain. Wherefore, if they cannot, out of their archives, bring forth any such Breve, their diligence in custody of such things supposed, and well deprehended in the custody of two Bulls, (for some of the secretaries said to me that they have two) they may, of this, gather (themselves) that there is no such, ne any otherwhere, of any effect and value."

The 12th suspicion against the Breve is in it self; that, whensoever it was impetrate, it was not duly impetrate, may be gathered of divers things in the same, and about the same; the hand of some learner, and not of one exercised in writing of such things; and some defaults in the writing; such, as my lord of Worcester saith, he hath not seen committed in any Breve. And, as he trusteth to prove, the date shall utterly condemn the Breve. And these Exceptions were, as I find in another Letter, dated from the same ambassadors to the cardinal: 1. that there were rasures in it; 2. divers hands; 3. names false written, as Artherus pro Arthurus; 4. the date false; as being Dec. 26. 1503, which, according to the date of Breves, beginning Dec. 25, was almost a year before Julius II. was pope. It was observed likewise, that the seal swelled in the middle, and appeared like some old seal newly clapped on. And thus much out of these Dispatches of those able negotiators, the bishop of Worcester, and Edward Lee the king's almoner; who, sending the transumpt of the Breve to the king, April 23, by a Letter the 12th of June following, also certified our king of the sending of Gonzales Fernando, the emperor's chaplain, to the earl of Desmond, in Ireland, together with the return of a chaplain of the said earl's in his company; the emperor seeming to take this intended Divorce so much to heart, that he thought fit to give our king this jealousy. Shortly after which, I find also the bishop of Worcester repealed.

This while, the common people, who with much anxiety attended the success of this great affair, seemed, betwixt pity to queen Catherine, and envy to Anne Bolen, (now appearing to be in the king's favour) to cast out some murmuring and seditious words; which being brought to the king's ears, he thought fit to protest publickly in an Assembly of Lords, Judges, &c. called to his palace of Bridewell, 'That nothing but desire of giving satisfaction to his conscience, and care of establishing the Succession to the crown in a right and undoubted line, had first procured him to controvert this Marriage; being (for the rest) as happy in the affection and vertues of his queen, as any prince living.' To confirm which also, he caused Anne Bolen to depart the court, in such an abrupt and discontented fashion, that she determined to absent her self altogether. Neither could she be induced (as Sanders hath it) to come to the king any more, till her father was commanded (not without threats) to bring her thither. Who by representing the common danger to them both, obtained at length (though not without much difficulty) the consent of his unwilling daughter to return; where yet she kept that distance, that the king might easily perceive how sensible she was of her late dismission.

It was now mid-May 1529, when our king, understanding how the Pope intended a strict League with the emperor, and judging wisely also, that Francis, upon the restoring of his children, might easily be drawn from him, did resolve, without relying any longer on either of their promises, to take the best course he could, for giving a conclusion to this business. And the rather, in that matters seemed daily more and more indisposed for that conclusion he desired. For though Campejus, according to the order he had from the pope (as I find by a dispatch of John Casalis, dat. Dec. 17, 1528.) did both persuade the queen to a Di-worce, and dissuade the king from it, as having either way the end he proposed : yet he failed in both. Nor would he (as I find in the same dispatch) let go out of his hand the decretal Bull mentioned before, being the absolute decision of the Cause, (the Dispensation being relative to the queens entering into religion, or other dissolution of the Marriage ;) in regard (as the Pope pretended) it was got by the importunity of cardinal Woolsey, with intention that it should be shewed to the king and cardinal only, as an arra or token of his good will, and afterwards burnt ; protesting nevertheless to the said Casalis, that he desired the cardinals should proceed according to their Commission, but that the Bulla Decretalis should by no means be shewed to any of the kings counsellors, or other person whatsoever, though upon oath of secrecy ; it being sufficient that the king and cardinal had seen it already, in Campejus hand. How our king yet was satisfied with this evasion of the Pope, appears not to me by any record, more than he still solicited the Pope, that it might be exhibited publicly. Howbeit the Pope, who had far other thoughts, told our agents, that he kept the Bulla Decretalis, secretly, as well from all his cardinals ; as fearing lest the emperor should call him to a council for it. For the more caution, taking order that the memory of it should be raz'd out of all his archives. And, not staying here, (as I find by our Records) he commanded one Francisco Campana (his servant) into England, on pretence to confer with the king and cardinal, but indeed to charge Campejus to burn the Decretal. For colouring of all which, he finally objected to our king that he had not kept promise with him, about the restitution of Cervia and Ravenna. Our king conceiving hereupon, that all these difficulties the pope made, proceeded from the fear which he had of the emperor, sends to sir Francis Bryan, and Peter Vannes again, to renew his offer of a guard of a thousand or two thousand men, to be kept at the cost of the French king and his, whereof the Comte de Turenne, and sir Gregory Casalis should be captains ; and, in the mean while, that a general peace should be treated of. But whether the pope, as being late enough offended with the guard which the emperor put on him, would not now accept them from any other prince ; or that he thought them too slender to defend him ; or that it would argue partiality to do any thing on these terms ; or that otherwise he had made his private peace with the emperor, (which certainly was the truth,) I do not find the pope accepted this offer. Howsoever, he seemed still to fear the emperor ; insomuch, that by a Dispatch from Gregory Casalis, dated Jan. 3, 1529, I find the Pope for the better making both his own, and a general peace, especially betwixt Charles and Francis, (which also followed at Cambray this year,) declared to cardinal Woolsey, he thought it necessary to go himself in person into Spain, and that cardinal Woolsey should go along with him ; not yet as pope and cardinal, but as two legates, or ambassadors, for concluding a peace. But this journey (if at least it were really intended) was interrupted by the sickness of the pope, which was thought so desperate, that our cardinal, Feb. 7, wrote to Stephen Gardiner (then at Rome) that, by all means, he should procure the papacy for him, being (as affairs then stood) the most indifferent and equal that could be found in christendom. To which purpose also, besides our kings recommendations, the cardinal had obtained the French kings letters, written with so much earnestness for him, that though the convalescence of the pope did frustrate this design, Stephen Gardiner yet was wished to keep the Letter in omnia eventum. I find also, order was given, that if Woolsey could not be chosen, the cardinals which were for him (being a third part of the whole number) should put in a Protestation, and departing the conclave, should in some secure place proceed to an election, notwithstanding any to be made at Rome. But, whether the Pope having notice of this untimely ambition of our cardinal, were now offended with him, or that otherwise his engagement to the Spaniard (whereof, in a Dispatch from the pope to the emperor July 21, 1528, that came to our king's hands, there is mention) did hold him off ; I find after this time the Pope more averse than ever. Therefore, notwithstanding a design of his, that cardinal Woolsey and Campejus, having finished the business of the Divorce, should afterwards go to conclude an universal peace, yet all that past in this affair afterwards (on his part) was little more than illusion. Which sir Francis Bryan discovering, in a Dispatch to our king, plainly told him, no good was to be done ; which our king also believing, had commanded Gardiner to threaten the pope with his solicitation of the princes of Almaine. Among whom I find particularly George duke of Saxony (the Lutherans in vain opposing it) to have persuaded the Divorce. Gardiner, hereupon, useth more than one menace ; though so much in vain, that, for a conclusion, he advised our king to proceed upon the Commission given to the legates, the Pope being (as he alleged April 21, 1529), so awed by the Cesareans, as he had rather suffer much in another's name, than do any thing in his own. To incourage him the more also, Gardiner calls the Breve false and counterfeit, as being not to be found in the registers at Rome. Moreover, for seconding this advice, Gardiner, by another Letter, May 4, says there was danger of recalling the Commission given to Woolsey and Campejus : which was confirmed by divers other letters from our agents. Whereof Gregory Casalis, in a dispatch of 13 June following, gives a reason, in these words of the Pope : who, being at that time more slackly relieved from the confederates than he expected, and divers of his subjects (for the rest) in arms against him, said, Mulle esse in preceptis dari, & Cesari, a Statulo, nedom à Sacris insurreire, quam in- feriorum hominum, subditorum, vassalorumque; rebellium injurias sustinere. The remedy whereof be expected only from the emperor. So that not only fear, but even hope making him obnoxious, he did, for more than one reason, incline to the emperor. Our king also, being well informed hereof by certain excommunicatory Letters from Rome, and that a Treaty betwixt the Pope and emperor (whereof there shall be mention) was already upon term of conclusion, and an interview appointed; gave order first to recall Gardiner and Bryan; yet so as he neglected not, at the same time, to send William Bennet, Dr. of law, to Rome, to hinder the advocacy of the Cause; whereof he was so jealous, that he intercepted not only those dispatches which were sent to Rome from Campejus, or any else, but even those intelligences which queen Catharine should give to her aunt the lady Margaret, governess of the Low-Countries. So that now our king, finding his conscience unsatisfied, his nobility in suspense, and the people murmuring at these procrastinations in an affair that so much concerned the Succession, charged the two cardinals to proceed; as being satisfied by a particular discussion of this business before archbishop Warham, and divers the learnedst men of both Universities, at Lambeth, that his cause was fair.

And now, publick notice of a solemn hearing being given, the court was appointed to sit; the queen chusing archbishop Warham, and Nicholas West bishop of Ely, doctors of the law, and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and Henry Standish bishop of St. Asaph, doctors of divinity, her council, &c. according to the permission the king gave her in that behalf. The passages whereof, out of an ancient and authentic Record in parchment, subscribed by the three notaries (used in this business, and remaining in the custody of that great antiquary, sir Henry Spelman, knight,) I shall set down, with as much particularity, as the context of my History will suffer.

The place appointed for hearing and determining the Cause, was a great Hall in Black-Fryers in London, (commonly called the Parliament-Chamber.) The time, the 21st of May 1529. The Judges, the two Cardinals above-mentioned, whose Commissions I have thought fit to set down at large:

“Clement bishop, servant of the servants of God, to our beloved sons Thomas archbishop of York, cardinal Sanctæ Cecilie, and Laurence Campejus cardinal Sanctæ Mariæ in Transiberim, our legats de latere from the Apostolical See to the kingdom of England, health and apostolical benediction. The relation of very many persons of undoubted credit hath reached our ears, concerning the validity of that Marriage which our beloved son in Christ Henry king of England, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, (a Dispensation of the Apostolical See being first had) was known to have contracted and consummated with our dearly beloved daughter in Christ queen Katharine, from whence in those parts a controversie hath arisen which hath so perplexed the minds of men, and held them in suspense and expectation, what justice and equity will determine in a case of so peculiar a nature, and of so great moment, not yet tried in any publick court of ecclesiastical judicature, that it is but necessary to proceed to some quick and speedy determination herein, to avoid that danger which must unavoidably ensue upon deferring it. But since we, whom God has appointed Servant of his Servants, to administer to all men impartial justice in judgment and truth, are not able in our person to inquire into the truth of the fact, and examine this Cause our selves: considering likewise that the fact, concerning the right of which the present debate is, may with more certainty, speed and expedition be inquired into and examined there than here; farthermore, being desirous, that in that kingdom, which has always shewn the greatest affection and obedience to the Apostolical See, all matter of disension may be taken away, the bond of peace and love be strengthened, and the blessed harmony of mutual charity, which has so many years continued, may still flourish, and be conveyed down to posterity; and a Decision may be made of the above-mentioned Cause, concerning the foresaid Marriage, according to the rules of justice, judgment and truth, whereby this Dispute may, as it is most expedient it should, obtain a firm, valid, certain and speedy conclusion and end. For these purposes, we do hereby give and grant a plenary authority, and most ample power and commission to your eminences in our own stead either both jointly, or in case of unwillingness, or any other impediment, to either of you singly; that, being subject to the authority and jurisdiction of no court or person whatever, nor liable to any Appeal or Question concerning your jurisdiction; you do hear and examine all and every thing which may relate to the validity or invalidity of the said Marriage, or of any Apostolical Dispensation whatever, to be exhibited and produced before you, and all other things, matters, circumstances, allegations and causes, which may any ways relate to, and concern the said Marriage, and the said Dispensation: and that you do proceed judicially, without tumult or disturbance, summarily and plainly to examine all parties concerned and knowing in the case of the said Marriage, and of the validity of the said Dispensation; and if it shall to you appear, that any such Apostolical Dispensations shall be sufficient, effectual and valid, or invalid, ineffectual, insufficient, surreptitious or arreptitious, or on any account null and void, such you shall pronounce and declare finally that they are, and ought to be held; and in like manner concerning the said Marriage, you shall, if by either party required, define, determine, and finally sentence the same to be valid, just, lawful and firm, or on the other side unjust, invalid, and unlawful, and thereupon that it is and ought to be void and null, and is therefore by you there declared invalid, unjust, unlawful, void and null, on either side pronouncing Sentence, as shall appear most just, according to the laws of reason, and the dictates of your own consciences; and if it shall thus appear that the Dispensation is invalid, and the Marriage null, that you do judicially, deliberately, summarily and clearly, as aforesaid, pronounce a Sentence of Divorce, and grant a Faculty and Licence in the Lord to the foresaid king Henry and queen Katherine to marry again. And we do hereby create and depute you jointly, or (if as above-said any ways hindred) separately in our stead to execute, finish, fully and finally to determine all or any of the things contained in this Commission in so ample a manner, that whatsoever we by our power and authority could have done in the premises, all that you are hereby enabled to do as fully and effectually. We do likewise of our own certain knowledge, by our apostolical authority, and by the tenor of these presents, grant you power and authority to pronounce, sentence, and publish, if it shall to you seem convenient, that the children by the first Marriage as well as by the second are legitimate; and that you do confirm and establish the legitimacy of both sorts, either by censures and ecclesiastical punishments to be inflicted on the gainsayers, or by way of decree and perpetual sanction, or by any other more valid and effectual method or form that can be thought of, or contrived to strengthen, and effectually support the same: any General Councils, Apostolical Canons, publick Ordinances or Decrees whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding.— Given at Viterbo in the year of our Lord 1528, 6th of the Ides of June, in the fifth year of our Pontificat."

After the Commission was read, our Chronicles say, the king was called, and appeared personally in court, at whose feet the queen prostrated her self, demanding justice, right, and pity, &c. But now to come to the authentic Record. I find the king and queen were by bishop Longland, the kings confessor, cited to appear upon 18th June next ensuing. The king (for observing his time,) gave Richard Sampson, dean of his chapel, and John Bell, doctor of the decrees, a Commission sealed in green wax, and dated at Greenwich, 15th June; by which he constituted them his proctors, with authority to refuse or accept the Court and Judgment of the two cardinals, and, if need were, to Appeal; allowing them also to substitute other proctors: binding himself finally sub hypotheca & obligatione bonorum, to ratifie what they should do. But the queen using a shorter way, appeared in person, protesting yet against the cardinals, as incompetent Judges; requiring further, that this her Protestation might be recorded, and so departed presently out of the court. This while the cardinals, who took into their Commission John Longland, bishop of Lincoln; John Clark, bishop of Bath and Wells; John Islip, abbot of Westminster; and doctor John Taylor, master of the rolls; sent unto the queen letters monitory; declaring, if she appeared not, they would notwithstanding proceed to execute their Commission; for which purpose the abovementioned bishop of Bath and Wells, was employed; but she, refusing, is pronounced contumacious.

Certain Articles were then put in by the legates, against our king and queen Katharine, the principal substance whereof was, that prince Arthur did marry, and carnally know queen Catharine, confirming also this Marriage by cohabitation with her till his death. After which king Henry being his brother, did marry the said lady Catharine, An. Dom. 1509, in facie ecclesie, and had children by her; which Marriage yet being as well Divino as Ecclesiastico jure prohibited, and (unless it may be otherwise made good) to be reputed in its self nullum omnino & invalidum, had caused huge scandal both in the clergy and people of England, and of many other places, insomach that it hath come to the pope's ears, who taking notice hereof, gave Commission to those cardinals to hear and proceed in this business, according to the importance of it.

This being done, the queen is cited a second time to appear; which she refusing, is pronounced again contumacious. This hindered not the court yet to proceed, and appoint doctor Taylor, archdeacon of Buckingham, to examine the witnesses; while themselves calling for the Dispensations that were alledged in favour of this Marriage, a certain Bull and Breve were exhibited, which I have thought fit to set down at length as they are extant in the same Record.

The Bull being sub plumbo, more Romane Curie, was an original; but the Breve was only a copy subscribed and signed with the hand of Juan Vergara, a canon of Toledo, and publick notary, Authoritate Apostolica; and with the seals of Balthazar de Castigione the Pope's nuncio, and of the reverend father in God Alfonsus de Fonseca, archbishop of Toledo.

THE BULL.

"Julius Bishop, servant of the servants of God, to our beloved son Henry, son of our most dearly beloved in Christ Henry king of England, and to our beloved daughter Catharine, daughter of our most dearly beloved in Christ Ferdinand and Elizabeth, most Catholick king and queen of Spain and Sicily, health and apostolical benediction. The supreme authority of the Pope exercises its power granted from above, as it shall seem most wholsom and expedient in Christ, according to the difference of persons, things, and times. Your Petition lately exhibited to us did set forth that you, daughter Catherine, and Arthur (eldest son of the most illustrious and our most beloved son in Christ Henry king of England) since deceased, for the better preserving and continuing the Leagues and Treaties of peace and friendship between our most dear son in Christ, Ferdinand, our most dear daughter in Christ Elizabeth, most Catholick king and queen of Spain and Sicily, and the foresaid king and queen of England, did lawfully contract a Marriage in words de presenti, and did perhaps consummate it by carnal knowledge, which prince Arthur dyed, leaving no issue by the said Marriage; now whereas your Petition did further set forth, that to the end that the said amity and good friendship may be still strengthened and continued between the foresaid kings and queen, you did desire that a Marriage might be contracted between you, in order to which you did supplicate that we would of our apostolical grace and favour grant you a sufficient Dispensation on account of the premises; We therefore out of our hearty inclination and earnest desire that peace and concord should ever flourish and remain among all the faithful in Christ, but more especially among all Catholick king, and princes, hereby absolving you and either of you from all sentences of prohibition, suspension, excommunication, and all other ecclesiastical censures and penalties on any occasion or pretence whatever, either by any person or law inflicted upon you, or that in the case forementioned may be, by suit yet depending; and as we do hereby judge you absolved, so in compliance with your so reasonable request, by our apostolical authority, out of our meer and special grace and favour, by the tenor of these presents we do dispense with you, so that any impediment through the foresaid affinity between you, any apostolical constitution, ordinance or pretence whatsoever notwithstanding, you may lawfully contract marriage together per verba de presenti, and when it is so contracted, although it should already have been either publicly and openly, or privately and clandestinely contracted, and perhaps by carnal knowledge consummated, that you therein may lawfully continue and remain, and we do by the same authority absolve and free you and either of you from all Censure and Sentence of Excommunication, which you may have incurred by having de facto entered into this contract of marriage before this Dispensation; and we do further pronounce all the children legitimate, either already or yet to be born from the said marriage, either now or to be hereafter contracted. Provided that you (daughter Catharine) have not by force and violence been hereto compelled: provided also, that if you have already actually contracted the said Marriage, your confessor, to be by you both or either of you appointed, do therefore lay upon you some wholsom penance, which you are hereby obliged to do. Let therefore no mortal man presume to infringe this our Sentence of Absolution and Dispensation, or with rash boldness to contradict our will herein; and if any one shall be so presumptuous as to attempt any thing contradictory hereunto, let him take notice that he shall therefore incur the vengeance of the Almighty God, and of his blessed apostles St. Peter and St. Paul.—Given at St. Peters in Rome in the year of our Lord 1503. Seventh of the Calends of January, in the first year of our Pontificat."

The BREVE together with the Asseverations of those who subscribed it.

"We Balthazar de Castiglione of Mantua, Notary of the Apostolical See, and Nuncio of the said See, in the kingdom of Spain, and all other territories and places subject to the temporal dominion of their most serene majesties Charles elected emperor, and Joan, most Catholick king and queen, and Alfonsus de Fonseca, by the grace of God, abp. of Toledo, primate of Spain, and high chancellor of the kingdoms of Castile, to all and every one to whom these presents may come and whom the knowledge thereof may any ways concern. Health in the Lord. Know ye that we formerly received with all due reverence the Letter of our most holy father in Christ, Pope Julius 2, of happy memory, in form of a Breve, under the Seal of the Fisher; which Letter was shewn us in the presence of his most sacred, and imperial, and most catholick majesty Charles, by the grace of God, elected emperor of the Romans, being whole and entire, no ways viciated nor cancelled, nor on any account or in part of it to be suspected, but free from all manner of suspicion or colour of deceit. The outward superscription of which Letter was in this manner: 'To our beloved son Henry, son of our most dearly beloved in Christ Henry, king of England, and to our beloved daughter Catharine, daughter of our most dearly beloved in Christ Ferdinand and Elizabeth, most catholick king and queen of Spain and Sicily.' And the contents of the Letter within was to this effect: 'Julius 2, Pope, sends you, dear son and dear daughter in Christ, health and apostolical benediction. The supreme authority of the Pope exercises its power granted from above, as it shall seem most wholesome and expedient in Christ, according to the difference of persons, things, and times. Your Petition lately exhibited to us did set forth that you, daughter Catherine, and Arthur (eldest son of the most illustrious and our most beloved son in Christ Henry king of England) since deceased, for the better preserving and continuing the Leagues and Treaties of peace and friendship between our most dear son in Christ Ferdinand, our most dear daughter in Christ Elizabeth, most catholick king and queen of Spain and Sicily, and the foresaid king of England, did lawfully contract a Marriage in words de presenti, and did perhaps consummate it by carnal knowledge; Now because prince Arthur dying without issue by this Marriage, in all likelihood this bond of peace and amity between the said kings and queen would not last so firm, as if strengthened and supported by a new tye of affinity: You therefore, for these and certain other causes, desire lawfully in words de presenti to contract Marriage; which desire as you may not in the premises fulfil without our Apostolical Dispensation therein first had, you therefore have made it your humble request, that we would of our apostolical grace and favour vouchsafe you our Dispensation in the premises. We therefore, out of our hearty inclination and earnest desire that peace and concord should ever flourish and remain among all the faithful in Christ, but more especially among all Catholick kings and princes: these and other reasons as thereunto moving, in compliance with your request herein, do by these presents of our apostolical authority dispence with you, so that it may be and is lawfull for you, any impediment arising from your affinity by reason of the premises notwithstanding, to contract marriage together, and in it so contracted lawfully and freely to live and continue: And inasmuch as perhaps you may have already publicly or clandestinely de facto contracted Marriage, and consummated it by carnal knowledge, we do in such case by the same authority free and absolve you or either of you from censure and the sentence of excommunication, which you may thereby have incurred, and we in like manner dispence with you herein, that you may be impowered freely and lawfully to live and continue in the Marriage de facto thus contracted, or to contract it anew; and we do declare and pronounce that all the children born or to be born from this marriage contracted or to be contracted, be, and be accounted legitimate. But our will is, that if this Marriage was contracted de facto before this Dispensation, that a confessor, to be appointed by both or either of you, do therefore injoin you some penance, which you are hereby bound to do. Given at Rome at St. Peters under the seal of the Fisherman, Dec. 26, 1508, in the first year of our Pontificat. SIGISMUNDUS.—Which Letter being by us Balthazar de Castiglione as Apostolical Nuncio, and Alfonsus de Fonseca, as ordinary of the place, diligently read over and carefully examined, and because we found it as is foresaid perfect and entire, without any colour or suspicions of deceit, therefore by the express desire of his said imperial and catholic majesty, both in his own, and in the name of the most serene Catherine queeu of England, his most dear aunt and cosin, in as much as it greatly concerned both himself and the said queen, for the perpetual remembrance thereof, that the foresaid original may not be consumed by time, and that certain knowledge may be had of the tenor and contents of it as often as it shall be necessary, and in such places as by reason of wars or the hazard of carriage it may not be safe to transmit or trust the Original Dispensation, in compliance with the so reasonable and just request of his said most sacred majesty, we cause the said Letter to be copied, transcribed and publicly attested; willing and decreeing that to this Copy thus faithfully transcribed and publicly notified as unquestionable credit shall, in all places where it is thought fitting to produce it, be given as to the original letter it self. To all which both of us do give our authoritative decree and sanction. And for the fuller and more certain confirmation of the truth of these premises, we have both to this present instrument set our hands and seals. Given at Toledo this 12th of Dec. 1528."

In the presence of these most noble and most illustrious lords, Henry count de Nassau; The marquis de Zenete, lord high-chamberlain. Don Juan Manuel, Don Laurence de Gorrendo, Knights of the Golden Fleece; Charles de Popcto, lord of Chaulx; Ludovicus à Flandria, lord of Prato; Nicholaus Perrenot, lord of Grandville. All of the privy council to his said most sacred, most imperial and most catholick majesty, who were specially called and appointed witnesses hereto. Balthazar de Castiglione, nuncio and apostolical collector; Alphonsus, archbishop of Toledo. I Johannes Vergara, canon of Toledo, professor in divinity, and by the apostolical authority appointed public notary, who was present at the signing and sealing of all the premises, and saw the said witnesses subscribe their hands, have signed this publick instrument, and set my name to it, in testimony of the truth, being thereunto called and required by his said imperial catholick majesty."

Against these Dispensations, the following Objections were used.

"1. That the peace and unity betwixt England and Spain was firm before the granting of the Dispensation, which yet was alledged as a cause. 2. That the said Dispensation, as being grounded on this pretext, must be held surreptitious, Henry 8, being then not above 13, and consequently unable for Marriage, which also if the pope had known beforehand, or that otherwise it had been represented to him, he would not have easily granted any such Dispensation. 3. Because it was pretended that Henry 8 had desired the Match only for maintaining peace betwixt the two kingdoms; whereas, (being then not above 13) he must be thought incapable of such thoughts. 4. That though this Dispensation might once be thought to have his force and vertue, yet seeing the motive of granting it was grounded upon the above-mentioned peace, and that one of the said princes died before the solemnizing of the said Marriage, the cause of the Dispensation must be held void. 5. That, supposing the Objection of Affinity were taken away by vertue of the said Dispensation, yet the Objection de publica honestate was not cleared. 6. That the Breve above-mentioned appears by the tenor of it to contain many falshoods and suspicions, and particularly that the stile, inditing, as also many clauses and circumstances, differ from the Bull, so that it may be thought forged since the time of the questions moved concerning this Matrimony; as by comparing them together may be manifestly gathered."

This also was urged by these Reasons:

"1. That in the Register-Book of the Breves at Rome, no such breve is found, or any argument that such a breve was made. 2. That likewise neither in the Chartophylacio, or Paper-Chamber of the king, no such Breve is extant, nor otherways, in the private Treaties of the Marriage, any mention is made thereof. 3. That in the date of the said Breve, as it is exemplified, the year of our Lord is discrepant from the vulgar account; for whereas the stile of the court of Rome begins always from the nativity of our Lord, this seems to be a year before Julius was made Pope."

All which Objections were delivered to the king's proctor, that he might answer to them. Whereupon witnesses being summoned to appear, July 12, Thomas duke of Norfolk, Charles duke of Suffolk, Thomas marquis Dorset, George earl of Shrewsbury, Thomas viscount Rochfort, Robert viscount Fitzwater, John bishop of Carlisle, sir David Owen, sir John Hussey, sir Richard Weston, Knights, with divers others, presented themselves to be examined, by the archdeacon of Buckingham, above-mentioned.

In the mean while, these two Articles were added to the former, as serving to strengthen the Objections above-mentioned. 1. That the year for pope's breves begins Dec. 26, and the year for bulls the 25th of March. 2. That in all Marriages contracted within the kingdom of England, the form hath been in words, De presenti, ego accipio te, &c.

Businesses being thus ripe for examination of Witnesses, the Depositions of two ancient ladies, who excused themselves by their infirmity from appearing in person, were publicly read. —1. The first, being Mary countess of Essex, said little, but in general terms. 2. But Agnes the old dutchess of Norfolk, who was present at the Marriage at St. Paul's in London, declared the age of prince Arthur at the time of his said Marriage to be about 15; and moreover, did positively affirm, that she saw prince Arthur and the lady Catharine, alone, in bed together, the next night after their Marriage. Which therefore, as also a following Deposition of the viscountess Fitzwater, may serve to answer Sander's tale, where he saith, a grave matron was put into the same bed with him, to hinder the prince from knowing her carnally. 3. George earl of Shrewsbury deposed, the Marriage was celebrated at St. Paul's, Decimo septimo Henrici Septimi, 1501, adding further, that prince Arthur was born at Winchester, secundo Henrici Septimi; and that he believed the prince knew his lady carnally, both as being able so to do, as also because himself knew his wife being not sixteen. 4. William Warham abp. of Canterbury, being examined, protests not to reveal any secrets of the queen, as being her sworn counsellor. For the rest, as he answered warily to the questions propounded him concerning the validity of the Match, inasmuch that he referred himself therein to the Judges, who were to determine it; so yet he made no difficulty to confess that he approved it not at first; which also he declared, not only in a contestation which he had with Richard Fox bishop of Winchester, who persuaded it, but in certain words to king Henry 7 himself, whom he told plainly, that the Marriage seemed to him neither honourable, nor well-pleasing to God. Adding further, that because the said king Henry 7 appeared not much inclined to the Marriage, that he the said deponent intrusted him to persuade his son prince Henry to protest that he would not take the lady Catharine to wife, and that he should renew this protestation when he came to the crown; which also he the said deponent believeth was made. Notwithstanding, that when the Bull of Dispensation was granted, that he the said deponent contradicted it no more; and that the murmuring of the people on that occasion was quieted, till the king's conscience being troubled, revived it again. 5. Sir William Thomas, knight, deposed, prince Arthur and the lady Catharine lived five months partly about London, and partly at Ludlow, in household together as man and wife: and that he heard sir William Wodal, who was at the prince's christning, say, that he was above 15 at the time of his Marriage, and the lady Catharine elder. 6. Sir Anthony Poynes, knight, deposed, that prince Arthur was above 15 at the time of his Marriage. 7. Thomas marquis Dorset, deposed, he saw a Register of the nativity of the king's children; by which he found the prince Arthur born September 20, 1486, and that at the time of his Marriage (which was upon a Sunday, in Nov. 1501, he was of a good and sanguine complexion, and able as he supposed for that purpose. 8. Robert viscount Fitzwater deposed, the prince was then about 15, and queen Catharine elder; and that, the next day after being in bed together, (which he remembered after they entered to have been solemnly blessed) he waited at breakfast on prince Arthur, where Maurice St. Johns did carve, and he the lord Fitzwater gave drink: at which time the said Maurice demanding of the prince how he had done that night? The prince answered, I have been in Spain this night. 9, 10, 11. Thomas lord Darcy, Wm. lord Montejoy, and Henry Guldeford, knight of the garter, said little but by way of publick report. 12. Charles duke of Suffolk deposed, that he was in the bishop of London's palace the morrow next following the day of Marriage, and that he waited there upon the prince at breakfast, confirming moreover in effect the words of Maurice St. John, before set down. Furthermore, he added, that the Shrovetide following the Marriage, (which was in Nov. preceding) the said prince began to decay, and grow feeble in body; which grew, as the said St. John related, by reason the said prince lay with the lady Catharine. 13. David Owen deposed, that prince Arthur was born at Winchester, secundo Henrici septimi; which he knew, because he was at the christening. 14. Thomas duke of Norfolk, lord treasurer of England, deposed, that he being the day of the Marriage in the bishop of London's palace, and the morrow after, at the prince's breakfast, heard the prince's words to Maurice Saint John, when he said he had been that night in the midst of Spain; by which words, as also because prince Arthur was a gentleman of a good complexion and nature, and above 15, he believes that he carnally knew his lady; because himself also at the same age did carnally know and use: and he believes this the rather, that he heard from credible persons, that the said prince Arthur did lie with the said lady Catharine five or six nights afterwards. 15. Anthony Willoughby, knight, deposed, that being the morrow after the Marriage in the prince's privy-chamber, the said prince spake afore divers witnesses these words, 'Willoughby, give me a cup of ale, for I have been this night in the midst of Spain.' After which he said, 'Masters, it is a good pastime to have a wife;' which words he repeated also divers other times. Moreover, he heard say they lay at Ludlow together the Shrovetide next following. 16. Nicholas bishop of Ely said, he could depose nothing concerning the carnalis copula, but that he doubted of it, because the queen often sub testimonio conscientie suae said to this deponent, that she was never carnally known of prince Arthur, though otherwise he must confess them both to be legitimæ atatis at the time of their Marriage. He doubted further, whether the cardinals were competent judges, an Appeal being made from them. 17. Rd. Sacheverel, knight, deposed, the people sud commonly, that it was unfit one brother should marry the other brother's wife. 18. Thomas viscount Rochefort, deposed, that he heard divers of prince Arthur's followers confirm the words he used, of his having been in Spain the night of his Marriage. Moreover, he heard say, that king Henry 8, was persuaded by his confessor, about two years since, to abstain from the bed of the lady Catharine, lest he should offend his conscience. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23. Sir Rd. Weston, and sir John Hussey, knights, deposed, the age of king Henry 8, was 38 upon the eve of the feast of saint Peter and saint Paul last; which viscount Rochefort also confirm'd, saying the place of his birth was Greenwich, and the year was 1491, and day the 28th of June; which Robert viscount Fitzwater confirm'd also, adding that king Henry 7 died two days before the feast of saint George, 20 years since; with whom David Owen, servant and counsellor to king Henry 7, agreed, save only, that he said it was three days before the feast. 21. Thomas duke of Norfolk deposed, that Pedro de Ayala or Aller, and doctor de Puebla, ambassadors from Spain, were much in favour heretofore with Henry 7, and that Henry 7 died before the Marriage betwixt his son prince Henry and the princess Catharine; and queen Isabel or Elizabeth her mother died also before that time. 25. Wm. Warham, abp. of Canterbury, and counsellor to Henry 7 and Henry 8, for 36 years last past, deposed, that he conceived Henry 8 to be under 13, at the time of Dispensation granted; because king Henry his father told him that he was impubes after that time. Whereupon this deponent reply'd to the king, that any Protestation he should then make, would be of no force, and therefore he should make it again one or two days after his coming to annos pubertatis. 26, 27. Charles duke of Suffolk, and Thomas marquis Dorset, examined again, said little but what was formerly set down. 28. Pedro Mates, Utriusque Juris Doctor, native of Barcelona in Spain, who had lived in the court of Rome 30 years, in exercitio causarum, deposed, that the date of years there is computed after three divers manners; so that Judgments, Contracts, and last Wills, bear date from the nativity 25 December; Litteræ Apostolicæ sub plumbo 25 of March; Litteræ Apostolicæ per Breve sub annulo piscatoris, cruce rubee impresso scribuntur simpliciter & absolute absque expressione ipsius Domini aut Navitatis, aut Incarnationis, sed solum Anno M. D. &c. Yet so that he conceiv'd it began always à Nativitate, scilicet 25 Decembris; neither doth he know any thing to the contrary, except the pope's secretary alter the stile. 29. Nicolaus Rusticus of Lucca in Italy, saith that Annus Domini in Brevibus Apostolicis is computed from the nativity of our Lord. 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36. Thomas viscount Rochefort, Henry Guilford, knight, Thomas marquis Dorset, Thomas duke of Norfolk, Wm. Falke Notarius Publicus, John Taverner, and John Clampton, being examined, deposed, that the forms of marriages are always in verbis de presenti, in England. 37. The lady Elizabeth, wife to viscount Fitzwater, deposed, that she saw the lady Catharine and prince Arthur in bed together, which was blest, and that she left them alone together.

Hereupon the Depositions were published, and the king's proctor summon'd to receive those acts and writings be deliver'd into the court; but he not appearing, is pronounced contumacious.

The commissioners yet proceeded to require the sight of the Archiva, and Record concerning this business; for which purpose Thomas Wriothlesly, and Thomas Tong king of arms, had been employed: these men certified that prince Arthur died in the castle of Ludlow the 2d of April, 1502, and that his brother Henry was born the 28th of June, 1491, and that the Marriage betwixt prince Arthur and the lady Catharine was the 14th of November, 1501. This being done, a Deposition of Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester, taken by doctor Woolman, April 5th and 6th 1527, was read. The most substantial part whereof was, that he conceived doctor Puebla did first motion this Match, and that more than one Bull was impetrated for dispensing therewith, whereof two remained in England, one or two were extant in Spain, but all of the same tenor, and gotten without asking the consent of Henry 8. Furthermore, that he did not remember that Henry 8 when he came to age, did expressly consent to, or dissent from the intended Marriage, yet that he believed that a Protestation was made in the name of Henry 8 to this effect: That notwithstanding any contracts or tokens mutually sent, or colohabitation in the house of king Henry 7, he would not hold himself bound to ratifie this act done in his non-age; and that this Protestation is to be found inter protocolla Magistri Ryden, then clerk to the council, before whom it was made. As for the person by whom this Protestation was made, Peram Magistro Ryden Notario publico; credit quod vel ipemet, vel Magister Thomas Rutha tunc Secretarius Domini Regis, & postea Episcopus Dunelm. vel Mr. Doctor West tunc consiliarius ejusdem domini Regis & nunc Episcopus Eliene. sicut eandem protestationem nomine domini nostri Regis Henrici Octavi moderni; presentibus tunc ibidem Comite de Surrey tunc Thesaurario Angliæ & postea Duce Norfolkiciæ ac domino Doctore Peohebla, & coram sepe-dicta clarissima Domina Catharina. ut recolit, ac infra Ædes Episcopi Dunelm. vulgari-ter nuncupat. Duresme-place. Adding further, that our king was not present there, that he remembers. Furthermore, that upon conference had betwixt Henry 7 and himself, he found it was the intention of that king, that his son Henry should marry the said lady Catharine, although he deferr'd the solemnization of this intended Matrimony, by reason of some discord which was at that time betwixt him and the king of Spain, for the calling back of the dowry. He added moreover, that king Henry intended not (that he knew) to marry the mother of Charles 5, but his aunt Margaret, dutchess of Savoy.

This Examination being compleat, and set down by Andrew Smith, notary, the said doctor Woolman required him to subscribe his hand; which was refused by the said bishop, both because he was blind of both eyes, as that he was not admitted to take any counsel or advice about it. But doctor Woolman pressing him on the kings part, that he should subscribe his name, he at last assented, out of the reverence he bore to the king, and that he never contravened him in any thing. Whereupon he subscribed his name April 8, the year above-mentioned, being 1527. After which also another Instrument of this tenor was produced.

“Augustinus Spinola, Priest, Cardinal St. Syriaci in Thermis, and high chamberlain of the holy church in Rome, to all and singular to whom these presents may pertain, health in the Lord. It is not only agreeable to reason, but a point of honesty, that when enquiry is by any persons made into the processes of the Popes which have been written, registered, and entered into their books, and preserved in their archives, that a true and just account of them should be given: for which reason we do make known and testifie to every of you, by the tenor of these presents, that in the Books and Registers of the Apostolical Chamber, to wit, in the Book of the Register of the breves of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd years of Pope Julius 2, of happy memory; we have seen, and read a certain Apostolical Letter in form of a Breve of the said Pope Julius 2, registered according to custom, the tenor of which is to this effect.

‘To our most dear son in Christ, the most illustrious king of England, health and apostolical benediction. Most dear son in Christ, we have received your highnesses’s Letters, in which you give us thanks for so graciously receiving your ambassadors, for granting them such ready audience, giving them such kind answers, and bestowing upon them other marks of our grace and favour. To esteem so highly, most dear son, which light favours is the effect of that piety and gratitude you have never failed to shew. We have indeed already made manifest both in our words and actions, as far as we were able, our good affection to you, nor shall we ever be backward to manifest the same in more instances, it being but reasonable and just so to do, on account of your highness’s great zeal for, and particular devotion towards us, and the Apostolical See. As for the Dispensation in the point of your Marriage, it has never been by us denied, nor have we ever given any just cause to suspect that we would deny it, as some have basely suggested: on the contrary, our answer has been, that we wait only till a more seasonable and proper time shall offer itself, that it may be done more to the reputation of both parties, and to the honour of the Holy See than now. When we shall find this more proper season to grant the Dispensation, as we have determined to grant it, we do purpose to send it (as a thing of great trust and moment) by our beloved son Dr. Robert Sherbon, dean of St. Paul’s London, one of your ambassadors, who together with his extraordinary learning, has given evident proofs of his modesty, fidelity and diligence, and this we choose to do on two accounts; both that it may by him be conveyed with secrecy and privacy; and besides that, we may further recommend one of his great capacity and integrity, as a person whose fidelity and services may be of further use to your highness at home, since the disagreeableness of this air to him, and the excessiveness of the heat make it impossible for him to continue longer at Rome without hazard of his life. Given at Rome at St. Peters, July 6, 1504, in the first year of our Pontificat.”

Letter from the Pope to King Henry.

The rest, having little material, save that mention is made how the Cardinal Sancti Petri ad vincula, the Popes nephew, was made Protector of the English, I have purposely omitted, that I may insert another Letter of the Popes of 22 Feb. 1505, the tenor whereof is this:

“To our most beloved son in Christ, the most illustrious Henry king of England, health and apostolical benediction. We have been informed by our beloved son in Christ, the Cardinal St. Petri ad Vincula, the Protector of you and your kingdoms, and our nephew according to the flesh; and by our venerable brother Sylvester bishop of Worcester, your highness’s ambassador here, that the Letters of Dispensation in the point of your Marriage, which they have so long solicited in your highness's name to procure, have already been sent to you from Spain. Know therefore, most dear son, that at the instance of the foresaid cardinal and bishop, but in respect wholly to yourself, we did grant the said Dispensation, and in consequence appointed our Bull under the seal of lead to be got ready to be sent your highness in due time by the foresaid cardinal and bishop. But whereas Elizabeth, of glorious memory, most Catholick queen of Spain, perceiving herself to be now finishing the course of her mortal life, did with great earnestness, and most pressing instances by her ambassador, most humbly entreat us, that we would vouchsafe for her consolation to grant her a copy of the said Letter, that being by us fully satisfied of this Dispensation, she might to her great comfort depart this life in peace; we thought it a piece of Christianity, and an indispensable part of our paternal love and affection toward her, to comply with the queen's earnest request at a time she was expiring, in communicating to her the knowledge of a thing, which even to the commonest and meanest of her subjects, would give comfortable and cheerful hopes from the prospect of so near an alliance with your highness; especially when her ambassador promised the greatest faithfulness and secrecy herein (which promise we are greatly grieved and troubled that he hath broken.) The Original Bull we judged meet and convenient, to keep by us till we have an opportunity to send it you, by the same our most dear and most faithful bishop of Worcester, together with the sword which we thought fit to present your highness for your singular piety, and filial obedience to the Holy Apostolical See, at which time your highness will receive more perfect information, as well of the reason of our delaying hitherto to send the Bull, as also in some other affairs with which we have intrusted him. Nor ought your majesty to wonder, that we have not communicated before any thing hereof to our cardinals, or your majesties ambassador, since we could never have thought it possible, that the ambassador of her said majesty should have herein thus deceived us, and that the said Letters of Dispensation should be transmitted to you from Spain, the Copy of which we granted only for the consolation of the said queen, who thus lay at the point of death: and not denying them to your highness for want of inclination, which we with great reason have, to gratifie your desires herein, who have so well deserved of us, and of the Holy Catholick Church, nor out of distrust or disrespect to the said Cardinal or bishop your ambassador, of whose fidelity and diligence in promoting your affairs, we are abundantly satisfied. Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, Feb. 22, 1505, in the second year of our Pontificat."

under the hand and seal of his office the 27th of Jan. 1529.

In sequence whereof, the commissioners took oath of the kings of arms, that the copies they delivered were true, appointing further the next Wednesday, ad concludendum. Upon which day (being 21 July) the commissioners being sate, John Hughes, promoter, appeared before them, and signified that there is found a certain Protestation made by our king, when he came to ripe years, in the presence of notaries and witnesses, and subscribed with the hand of the said king (at that time priuce of Wales) and some counsellors of king Henry 7, which he said were much to the purpose of the business then in question. Whereupon the commissioners received the said Protestation in presentia dicti Magistri Ricardi Sampson Procuratoris Regis, & in contumaciam Reginae; Commanding further, that it should remain penes acta sua. The tenor of which protestation is thus:

"In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you the Reverend Father in Christ, by the grace of God, and favour of the Apostolical see, Richard lord bishop of Winchester; I Henry prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester, do say, alledge, and by this writing set forth; that although in my minority and being not as yet arrived to ripeness of age for giving my consent, I have de facto contracted a Marriage with the most serene lady Catharine, daughter of the king of Spain, which contract, although it be of itself invalid, imperfect, and of no effect and force, by reason of my said minority; yet because this contract when I shall come to age and years of consent, may appear and seem valid, and confirmed by tacit consent, mutual cohabitation, giving and receiving tokens and gitts, or any other determinate way; for these causes, I the foresaid Henry prince of Wales, now nearly arrived to maturity of age, and being just at years of consent, do hereby Protest, that by any thing said or to be said, done, or to be done, I do not intend to ratifie, confirm, or unke valid the said pretended Contract of Marriage; but by these presents, being thereunto moved neither by force, craft, nor intreaty, but voluntarily, freely, and without any compulsion whatever, I do renounce and disclaim the said Contract; and do resolve and intend by the most powerful means, in the most significant terms, and most effectual manner I can, to renounce, disclaim, and dissent from the said pretended Marriage Contract, as the same is hereby renounced, disclaimed, and dissented from. And I farther protest, that by any word, deed, action or behaviour, said or done by myself, or by any other in my name, or to be said, acted, done or performed by any person at any time, or in any manner whatsoever, I do not consent to the said Marriage Contract, or receive the said lady Catherine as my lawful spouse and wife; to all which premises, this my testimony is given, set forth and published by me, Henry Prince of Wales."

The above written Protestation was made and read by the most serene prince the lord Henry, before the reverend father in Christ, Richard lord bishop of Winchester, who then sat judge, and before me the under-written notary publick, who took it in writing, in the presence of the under-written witnesses, in the year of our Lord 1505, in the eighth indiction, in the second year of the pontificat of our most holy father in Christ, by the Divine providence Julius 2, pope, on the 27th day of June, on which day his most serene highness the prince, was entring upon years of maturity and age of consent, as he there asserted, in a certain ground room, under the royal palace of Richmond, situate in the western part of the said palace. Concerning all which, and singular the premises, his said most serene highness the prince, instantly ordered and demanded of me the said notary, to draw up this publick Instrument, and the under-written witnesses, thereto to bear testimony, In proof and evidence of all which things, and every of them, his said most serene highness the prince, and the witnesses, as is aforesaid, being thereunto called and required, set their names subscribed with their own hands. The truth of all which, I John Read testifie, by setting thereto my hand and seal manual. G. Daubney, C. Somerset, Thomas Rowthale, Nicholas West, Henry Marny.

Among whom Nicholas West, above-named, now bishop of Ely, in presence of the commissioners, acknowledged and confessed, that this Protestation was subscribed with his own hand. Whereupon the commissioners, in contumaciam Regina, did, in the presence of the above-mentioned proctor, continue and prorogue the court, till Friday next following, warning the said proctor also to be there. Upon which day, being the 23d of July, the court being set, the promoter above-mentioned signified unto the commissioners, that all that was requisite for the instruction and information of their understanding and consciences, had been judicially proposed and exhibited to them, and remained in their custody, and that therefore this day was assigned, and appointed for concluding the business. Notwithstanding because cardinal Campejus alledged and protested in verbo veri prelati, that a certain general vacation, which be termed Ferias generales messium & vindemiarum, was observed in the court of Rome every year, before the said Friday; and because he and his colleague were bound to follow the stile of the said court in the process of the above-mentioned Cause; therefore the said Judges, in the presence of the kings proctor, and in contumaciam Regina, did prorogue the conclusion of this business, until the first of October next following, warning the king's proctor then to appear, and receive a conclusion of this business as should be according to justice. All which passed in the presence of Thomas duke of Norfolk, the bishop of Ely, and divers other persons.

And thus much out of the Record formerly mentioned; which I have with more particularity set down, in that it is so rare and unusual a case to find a prince submit himself, in his own kingdom, to the judgment of two persons, whereof one was a suspected stranger, the other, in birth, but of the meanest of his subjects, and after all this, to receive no other fruit hereof, but delay and insatisfaction; as appears not only by this abrupt dismissal, but by a sudden advocacion of the cause, to the pope, inhibiting further proceedings here (as will appear shortly after;) the consequences whereof extended further yet than our king then thought, or the pope could easily have imagined,

These Proceedings were subscribed by the notaries William Clayburgh, doctor of both laws, Protonotarius Apostolicus, Florianus Montinus, and Richard Watkins, who acknowledged the rasures, interlineations and lines in the margin, together with the number of the leaves in the parchment book (being 69.) To which also Letters testimonial from Nicholas Wotton, doctor of the laws, and the bishop of London's official, having the seal of the office, were annexed. After all which a Dispensation, written by a later hand, and in loose paper, was found in the said book. Though that alone should not have induced me to publish it, had I not seen it already printed in a book called Anti-Sanderus, and met in our archives some dispatches that make it probable:

The Bull for a new Dispensation.

"Clement bishop, servant of the servants of God, to our most dear son in Christ, the most illustrious Henry king of England, defender of the faith, health and apostolical benediction. You have caused to be laid before us, that heretofore you, and our beloved daughter in Christ, Catherine, widow of * * * your own brother, knowing the relation that was between you, of the first degree of affinity, did de facto contract Marriage in words, de presenti, and did consummate the said Marriage by carnal knowledge, and from thence had children born, having no sufficient canonical Dispensation granted you to that effect, incurring therefore the Sentence of Excommunication: And whereas your majesty who cannot without sin live in the said Marriage, does desire to continue no longer in the said sin, nor lie under the sentence of excommunication; but by some competent ecclesiastical judge, to receive the benefit of absolution from the said sentence of excommunication, and that the Marriage itself should be declared to have been, and still to be null and invalid, and that it is, and may be lawful for you to marry any other woman, any canon to the contrary notwithstanding, and that in consequence of such declaration of the nullity of the said Marriage, you may be dispensed with, lawfully to marry any other woman, and with her in marriage freely to live, and lawful issue by her to have,

although she may be one who has already contracted marriage with some other person, provided she hath not consummated it by carnal knowledge; and although she may be related to you in the second or more remote degree of consanguinity, or first degree of affinity, either from lawful or forbidden wedlock, provided she be not the widow of your said brother, and although she may be related to you by any other legal or spiritual affinity, whereby an impediment may otherwise lie against you therein, in the common course of law and publick justice. And whereas your majesty has farther laid before us, that it is evident from the Chronicles of your kingdom, that many grievous wars have often arisen in your kingdom, that all Christian peace and concord hath been violated and disturbed by traitorous and malicious men, out of their detestable ambition, and wicked desire of power, but under pretence that some of the children born in just and lawful marriage of some of your predecessors and forefathers, were illegitimate, on account of some impediment in the said marriages, by reason of consanguinity or affinity, whom under pretence of the said illegitimacy, they have gone about to exclude from the Succession, from whence has followed most miserable destruction and bloodshed, both of princes and nobility, as well as of the common people; on which account your majesty has supplicated us, that of your apostolical grace and favour, we would vouchsafe herein to consult the peace and quiet of your kingdom and subjects, to obviate these great miseries, and apply fitting remedies to the aforesaid grievances. We who favourably listen to, and as far as with a safe conscience we may, cheerfully comply with all petitions, especially those which concern the safety of their souls, which we at any time receive from Christian princes, especially from your majesty, by reason of the manifold marks of affection and kindness you have always shewn both to us and the Apostolical See, over which by the Divine permission we preside, which you have not ceased most courageously to maintain and support, as well with your power and sword, as with your learning and pen, from the most wicked attempts of nefarious men, who partly by force and open violence, partly by craft and subtle doctrines, endeavoured to undermine and overthrow it; for the foresaid, as well as some other reasons us thereunto moving, in compliance with your Petition, we from our apostolical authority, by our certain knowledge, and out of the plenitude of our apostolical power, by the tenor of these presents do dispence with you, that if your contract of Marriage with the said Catherine, shall be declared to have been, and still to be null and invalid, and you to be lawfully freed from the bond thereof, that then it may, and is lawful for you to marry any other woman, and any other woman to marry you, provided she be not thereto by you compelled, although she should be one who has already contracted Marriage with some other person, provided she hath not consummated it by carnal knowledge, and although she may be related to you in the second or more remote degree of consanguinity, or first degree of affinity, either from lawful or forbidden wedlock, provided she be not the widow of your said brother; and although she may be related to you by any other legal or spiritual affinity, whereby an impediment may otherwise lie against you therein, in the common course of law and publick justice: and if such Marriage is contracted, that you may lawfully continue and remain therein, although it should be so, that this Marriage was contracted de facto, by you either openly or clandestinely, and by carnal knowledge consummated before this Dispensation was granted, determining further, that all the children born, or to be born, from this marriage, be, and be accounted legitimate; any prohibitions of the divine law, constitutions or ordinances whatsoever declaring the contrary notwithstanding, which we do, as far as by our apostolical power we may, disannul and rescind so far as they may affect this special particular matter now before us only, leaving them in all other regards, and to all other manner of purposes in their full force and power. Strictly enjoying, and in virtue of their canonical obedience commanding, under the threat of Divine vengeance, and under penalty of Anathema, and other ecclesiastical sentences, censures and punishments, which we do now for that time pronounce and publish, by the tenor of these presents, that no person whatever shall presume or attempt to alledge, propose or object either in open court or in private discourse, any impediment in the Marriage which by the tenor of these presents you shall contract, or to speak or act, or attempt any thing in word or deed against the legitimacy of the said Marriage, or the children which shall be born of it on any insinuation or pretence of marriage precontracted, consanguinity in the second, and more remote degree of affinity as aforesaid in the first, or any other spiritual or legal affinity in the common course of law and publick justice judged an impediment. Let no mortal man therefore presume to contradict this our Writ of Dispensation, Decree, Ordinance, Inhibition and command, or with presumptuous boldness in any wise gainsay it. And if any one shall presume herein, let him know that he shall incur the vengeance of the Eternal God, and of his holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul. Given in our city of Orvieto, in the year of our Lord 1527, 16 Calends of January, and in the fifth year of our Pontificate."

While these things passed thus in England, the queen found means to inform the lady Margaret, regent of the Low-Countries, of the whole process, who thereupon sends word of it to Charles and Ferdinand, intreating them to assist their aunt; which they accorded, dispatching their orators to the Pope, whom also the queen constituted her proctors in the court of Rome; giving them Commission to tender to the Pope a Copy of the Bull, Breve, and her Declaration that she was never car-nally known by prince Arthur. Shortly after which, the said orators, in the queen's name, made a Protestation against the two legates now in England (every page subscribed with queen Catharine's own hand) intreating the Pope to advoke the Cause, to annul the proceedings in England, to warn the king to desist his suit, or at least to try it at Rome, &c. or, otherwise that they would seek their remedies elsewhere. The Pope being thus pressed at Rome, and having now concluded the treaty with the emperor at Barcellona, July 3rd, 1529, about three weeks before the Cause was pro-rogued by Campejus, could no longer, either with safety of his person or dignity, favour our king; so that what excuses soever (in the frequent dispatches he made about this time) were given to our king, yet were they little more than compliment and evasion, till, finally, declaring himself more openly for the emperor, he signed an Advocation of the Cause to himself, inhibiting further proceedings, under great penalties. And herein (as our agents did observe) the Pope's principal ministers did not a little concur, that the benefit of deciding thereof might fall upon them. In vain therefore did our agents (being sir Gregory Casalis and Dr. Bennet) both by representing the desolation of our king from the Roman See, and the ruine of the cardinal of York, labour to stay these proceedings. For the Inhibition was brought into England, about the beginning of September, the king then being in his progress; and because it was sent to the queen to make her benefit of it, the king (by Stephen Gardiner, now his secretary) sends to Woolsey, to persuade the queen to let this Inhibition (or, as he calls it, a Citatory Letter) sleep, it containing matter prejudicial to his person, and not to be published to his subjects: and that it will be sufficient for the cessation of the process that the Pope by letter to Woolsey (July 19) hath signified his Advocation of the Cause. Nevertheless, if the queen will needs have the Inhibition executed, then that it should be privily executed, upon the two legates, (rather than be divulged in Flanders;) which it seems was done accordingly. Howbeit, shortly after the Advocation was granted, the Pope, conceiving that the censures and penalties mentioned in the Inhibition would not be well taken by our king, dispatched a Breve to him of August 29, which, for the better satisfaction of the reader, I have thought fit to transcribe out of the original and insert here.

The Pope's Breve to the King of England.

"Most dearly beloved son in Christ, health, &c. A cause heretofore depending between your highness and our dearly beloved daughter in Christ, Catherine queen of England, of and concerning your Marriage Contract; We, at the earnest request of your ambassadors, committed the said Cause to be determined by our beloved sons, Thomas lord bishop, and cardinal Sancte Ceciliae, and Laurence cardinal Sancte Marie in transtiberim our legats de latere from the apostolical See, in which Cause perhaps some process has been made; since which at the instance of our most dear son in Christ, Charles most Catholick king of Spain, and elected emperor, and his most Catholick queen, as well as for some other reasons us thereunto moving, we ordered the said cause to be brought before our ourselves, and reserved the determination and decision thereof to ourselves, and the sacred college of our most venerable brethren their eminences the Cardinals; on which account perhaps an Inhibition has been given. Now whereas we have heard that this Inhibition has been executed, and that therein are mentioned several Censures and Penalties; we whose intention it never was, nor is to subject your highness's person, who have so well deserved of us, and of the apostolical See, to any censures or penalties whatsoever; do hereby signifie to your highness, that those censures were inserted into the said Inhibition by our judge or commissary without our knowledge, and contrary to our inclination: which Censures therefore, and penalties so far as they may concern your own person, we do hereby rescind, declaring them to be null, of no power, efficacy or validity. As for the Cause itself, we will that it be suspended till Christmas-day next ensuing, and it is by these presents till then suspended. And herein we have done all that we could with a safe conscience, in favour and affection to your highness, that as we are assured that you have for conscience sake propounded your case, you may have time duly and carefully to consider an affair of so great moment and importance as this is, and thereby settle it, without the vexation and trouble which suits of law ingender and produce, to the great comfort and quiet of your mind; wherein you shall never fail of our aid and assistance: In the mean time, we do exhort your majesty in the Lord, that for the sake of conscience, you would not leave the queen, but till these things shall be determined, comfort and cherish her with the love and affection of an husband, as we trust your highness of your great piety and goodness will do. Given at Rome Aug. 29, 1529, in the sixth year of our Pontificat."

Before yet these Breves were sent, the Pope wisely considering that by the diligence of our agents not only the first Minutes of them were sent to England, but also that his Treaty with the emperor was more notorious than that it could be hidden, thought fit to advertise our cardinal, That the League betwixt him and the emperor was made pro temporum ratione & rerum Christianarum utilitate; exhorting him therefore to do him good offices with the king, which also he explicated in another dispatch, Sept. 23, wishing that aid might be sent against the Turk. All which being contrary to the king's present designs, could not upon what terms soever be represented without much offence, and ill conceit of cardinal Woolsey. The king believing that underhand he held intelligence with the Pope, to the prejudice of his affairs. Which Polydore also affirmeth; saying, that he writ privately to the Pope to suspend the Cause, till they could bring the king to some better temper. This also I believe was confirmed in the king's mind, by some notice he might have of a joint dispatch (a Minute whereof is extant in our Records) from Woolsey and Campejus, during their session, whereby they desired the Pope to avoke the Cause, in case it grew so doubtful that they could not determine it; both as they would be free from the trouble and danger, and as they conceived, he might better help the king ex plenitudine potestatis; who perchance, as they said, would be content therewith, if the Pope would promise to end the matter, shortly afterwards to his satisfaction.

Our king, who at the first prorogation of the Sentence, by reason of the Feria Vindemiarum, hoped yet, that at least, Oct. 1st, when the Court was appointed to sit again, he might have the Cause determined, seeing now all proceeding in England inhibited, the cause avocated to Rome, Campejus recalled; and finally finding, by many dispatches, that the pope and emperor had appointed shortly to meet at Bononia, was much troubled; and the rather, for that the two cardinals proceeding hitherunto had been little more than illusion; whereupon also he became much incensed against them. Yet containing a while his anger, he neither altered his fashion to Woolsey, nor declared any dislike of Campejus: insomuch, that he culnly gave him leave to depart. So that no argument of suspicion or dislike appeared hitherunto on either side: Campejus thus dismissed and rewarded, was conducted honourably to the seaside, where he expected only a fair wind. But when he came to take ship, the searchers, upon pretence he carried either money or letters from England to Rome, ransacked all his coffers, bags and papers; not without hope, certainly, to recover that Decretal Bull our king so much longed for. I find also (by some relation) that divers love-letters betwix our king and mistress Bolen, being conveyed out of the king's cabinet, were sought for, though in vain, they having been formerly sent to Rome. Which usage so offended Campejus, that he complained immediately to our king; protesting 'he would not proceed in his journey till he had reparation for the wrongs done to his person and dignity; that the people were satisfied concerning certain scandalous rumours, which he heard were scattered abroad to the prejudice of cardinal Woolsey and himself. But our king by his Letter of Oct. 22nd answered, That it must not be expected from him, prestare, quicquid vel vulgi temeritas effutire, vel quorundam nimium fortasse scrupulosa & anxiosa sedulitas designare solet. As for the ius legati pretended to be violated, our king answered, 'That he conceived, it was expired, not only as it was revoked by the Pope's late Inhibition, but particularly by the interposition of his own regal authority, which alone his subjects did acknowledge.' Adding moreover, 'That he wondered somewhat that Campejus understood our law so little, as not to fear how he usurped after that time the name of a legat in this kingdom; since he, having been made bishop here of Salisbury, was bound by oath to the conservation of the royal prerogative. As for the searchers doings, it was a mistake; the commandment having been given long since, when there was just occasion for it, and not in relation to his particular, who therefore he was sorry to have been so roughly used; desiring the cardinal, for the rest, to excuse the said searchers, since they are bound thereto by oath. So that he ought not to pretend this as a cause of his stay. As for the other part, which was the rumour, our king said, It was uncertain from whence it came; notwithstanding that it was (though not altogether fixed in his breast, yet) so generally received and believed in his kingdom, that it would be hard to remove that opinion: in which regard also, it was in vain for him to stay here so much as one hour. Howsoever; that he might make this use of it, as to know how ill his subjects took this frustration of the business. But as his royal care should be to prevent the inconveniences might follow hereof, so that it belonged to Campejus's wisdom to continue those good intentions he had made shew of. For we (saith the king) tunc demum dubitare poterimus, cum ipse factis pulam diversum ostenderit.—Campejus being now more than once licensed, thought it time to be gone; so that, coming at last to the Pope he acquainted him with all the proceedings.

Our king considering that Francis being now disengaged, might more freely declare himself, did (by a particular Message) not only make known the little hope he had of the Pope's favour in his particular business, but desired that king's assistance, for obtaining the resolution of the Universities and Learned Men in his kingdom concerning the lawfulness of his Marriage; for which purpose he induced Guillaume de Bellay (sent by Francis to him in the beginning of this year) to co-operate with them, as also those of Italy and Germany, not omitting together to employ at Paris, his kinsman and beneficiary Reginald Pole, with sir Francis Bryan, and Edward Fox, master William Paget (after) being sent to Orleans and Tholouse, and Francis together readily promising his assistance. And because our king had many agents about this time employed in Italy, as namely doctor Rd. Croke, (a man excellent in the Greek tongue) at Padua; Hierome de Ghinucci, bishop of Worcester, and Gregory Casalis, at Rome; doctor Stokesley at Venice, Thomas Cranmer (afterwards abp. of Canterbury) Andreas and Johannes Casalis, and Previdellus, he had enough to do; while sometimes he laboured to reconcile, and sometimes again to make use of their various advertisements. Stokesley writ a Letter (dated June 13.) that he had gotten the Opinions of the University of Bononia; and that more would have concurred, had not the Pope contradicted.

Croke said, the pope and emperor threatened all that subscribed in favour of the king's Cause. He writes also that the emperor's ambassador in Padua, challenged one frier Thomas, for favouring the king's cause, and told him, if this conclusion should take effect, many of the greatest princes of Christendom should be disherited, or taken as illegitimate; accounting in those as well the emperor, as the king of Portugal. Notwithstanding which, he had gotten 80 principal mens hands a good while since, and had obtained 30 more, which yet by their means were burnt. By a Letter also of Crokes, Aug. 24, it appears, that the emperor laboured with the State of Venice, to oppose the king in his demand. Furthermore he protested none would take money (lawyers only excepted) for delivering their Opinions, though he forced sometimes a small reward on them when they had done. Which particular Dr. Stokesley (in a Dispatch Sept. 23, 1530) did confirm; saying it was their manner both in Padua and Bononia to refuse money with these words, Quod à Spiritu Sancto gratis accepimus, gratis & libenter impertimur. Moreover Croke by a Letter, Aug. 31, 1530, said, Cæsar minis, precibus, pretio, & sacerdotiis, partim certitat nostros, partim confirmat suos: certifying our king further, that Andreas Casalis and Previdellus did reveal his highness secrets to the Cæsarians: in conclusion I find that many would have given their opinion in favour of the Divorce, if they durst. So that though the King's agents did now and then differ in some points, they all yet agreed that most of the Learned Men in those parts would have favoured the king in the point of his Divorce, had not the pope and emperor oppugned it. Croke adds further, that the emperor got some hands in Mantua for money, but they were of the meaner sort. Whereas 29 doctors in that place had freely subscribed on his highness part. Now, as Gregory Casalis seemed among all his highness agents, at this time, the most industrious, so he solicited the Pope continually on our king's behalf, not neglecting also the Cæsarians, to whom he gave, and from whom he received that intelligence, as he made advantage of all. By which dangerous and suspected wisdom yet he prevailed so far, that at length he had authority, as it seems, to write this following Dispatch, which I have caused faithfully to be transcribed out of the original.

"Most serene and most powerful lord, and my most gracious sovereign, to whom all health and happiness, and the most humble acknowledgments of my duty and affection. Some days agoe the Pope in private offered to me this Proposal, as a thing of which he made much account, that your majesty might have a Dispensation to have two wives; to whom I answered, that I was very unwilling to take upon me to write to your majesty to know your majesties pleasure herein, because that I did not know whether this proposal would satisfie your conscience, the ease and quiet whereof, was what your majesty does only aim at. The reason why I gave this for Answer, was, that in a certain place, from whence I have information of the designs and contrivances of the Cæsarians, I have certain intelligence and undoubted knowledge, that this proposal was started, and is promoted by the Cæsarians; but what their aim and design herein should be, I dare not certainly affirm, and therefore leave that wholly to your highnesses great prudence and consideration. And though I told his holiness, that I could not venture to write to your majesty herein, yet was I unwilling to keep this from your majesties knowledge, that it may appear, that no care or industry is wanting in me to execute your majesties commands, or promote your services. I have done all which I have been able with one of Ancona, with whom I have great intimacy. As to all which I refer to the common letters. May God preserve your majesties health. Rome Sept. 18, 1530. Your most excellent majesties most obedient servant, GREGORY CASALIS."

How this Letter was believed or accepted yet, doth not appear to me; so that although Melancthon is said to have concurred in some such opinion, no effect followed thereof. For I find, that at this very time, king Henry, jealous of the queen's, or (as our Historians say) of Woolsey's procuring Bulls against him, set forth this Proclamation, Sept. 19.

"The king's highness straightly chargeth and commandeth, that no manner of person of what estate, degree, or condition soever he or they be of, do purchase or attempt to purchase from the court of Rome or elsewhere, nor use and put in execution, divulge or publish any thing heretofore within this year passed, purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, containing matter prejudicial to the high authority, jurisdiction and prerogative royal of this his said realm, or to the let, hindrance, or impeachment of his graces noble and virtuous intended purposes in the premises; upon pain of incurring his highness indignation, and imprisonment, and further punishment of their bodies, for their so doing, at his graces pleasure, to the dreadful example of all other."

Declaration of the House of Lords to the Pope.

Thus did the king begin to shake off the Romish yoke; to which he was much animated by the concurrence of his subjects in Parliament, both spiritual and temporal, who (as it appears by our records) in July this year under their hands and seals sent a Declaration to the Pope. The tenor whereof is this;

"To the most holy lord, our lord and father in Christ Clement, by the Divine providence the seventh pope of that name, we wish and pray for perpetual felicity in our Lord Jesus Christ, with all humility throwing our selves at his feet. Most blessed father, although the Cause concerning the Marriage of the most invincible prince our sovereign lord the king of England and France, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, does for sundry great, and weighty reasons of itself, require and demand your holiness assistance, that it may be brought to that speedy end and determination, which we with so great and earnest desires have wished, and with so very great, though very vain expectations have long looked for from your holiness: we could not nevertheless prevail with our selves to keep silence herein any longer, especially since our kingdom and the affairs thereof suffer so much, and are brought into so great danger through the unreasonable delay of Sentence herein: so that since his majesty our head, and by consequence the life of us all, and we in his words, as subject members, by a just union annexed to the head, have with great earnestness prayed your holiness, but prayed in vain, we are by the greatness of our grief, forced separately and distinctly by these our Letters, most humbly to intreat your speedy determination hereof. Be justice of the cause it self, approved of by the Opinions of the most Learned Men every where, and determined by the Decrees of the most famous Universities in the world, and esteemed and judged most righteous by all persons either in England, France, or Italy, who are most eminent for their learning, might so far prevail, as that your holiness, though no body entreated it, may, though some opposed it, should with your own voice and authority, confirm that Sentence which has so universally been pronounced just, especially when your determination of this Cause is a piece of justice done to that king and kingdom, which upon so many several accounts have deserved well of the Apostolical See; although entreaties to you herein seem not to be necessary, however we make them, as persons overborn with troubles, who indulge their grief, and frequently pour forth repeated and unnecessary prayers. But since your holiness is not to be prevailed upon, either by the justice of the Cause, the remembrance of the good services you have always found, or by the earnest and continued requests of the best of princes, to do that which might be expected from your paternal love and affection alone, our grief is by the remembrance of our miseries and calamities increased to that immense degree, that it overspreads the whole body of the realm, and gives a voice of complaint to each member of it, forcing them both by their words, and in their letters, to lay before your holiness this their insupportable grievance. For how great a misfortune is it, that what our own two Universities, the University of Paris, as well as many other in France, what almost all men of learning, knowledge and integrity, both at home and abroad have determined and affirmed to be true, and the truth of which they are ready to defend and support both in their discourses and writings; yet cannot a confirmation of this so universally acknowledged a truth be obtained from the holy apostolical see by that prince, by whose support and assistance that see still keeps and preserves its authority, which has been shaken and undermined by so many,

and so powerful adversaries, till he withstood and opposed their designs, partly by his sword, partly by his pen, at other times by his commands and authority, supporting that power and authority of the church from whence others are enabled to obtain those mighty advantages from which he now finds himself only excluded. What answer can be made hereto we see not, and yet we see that from hence a flood of miseries is flowing in upon the commonwealth, and a sort of deluge of calamities overwhelming us, from the disputes about Succession, which will soon overtake us, never to be settled without infinite slaughter and effusion of blood. We now have a king most eminent for his virtues, seated upon the throne of his ancestors, by right undoubted and unquestionable, who would entail lasting peace, and uninterrupted tranquillity on his realms, if he leaves a son to succeed him from lawful and true Marriage, nor will that be possible, unless your holiness will by your authority, pronounce the same Sentence concerning his former Marriage, which so many Learned Men have already delivered. But if your holiness, whom we justly call our Father, shall by refusing to comply herein, esteem us as cast-aways, and resolve to leave us orphans; we can make no other construction of it, but that the care of ourselves is committed to our own hands, and that we are left to seek our remedy elsewhere. But that we may never be driven to these extremities, we beg your holiness, without delay, or farther loss of time, to assist these his majesty's most just and reasonable desires, we most earnestly intreat a confirmation of the judgment of these most Learned Men, humbly imploring, that for the sake of that mutual love, and that paternal affection which your pastoral office requires you to shew us, not to shut up your bowels of pity and compassion against us, your most dutiful, most loving, most obedient sons. The Case of his most sacred majesty, is the case of us all, since the head cannot suffer but the members must bear a part, the grief arising herefrom, and the injury suffered hereby does equally affect us, who bear our proportion of all his majesties afflictions; the remedy of which, as it must proceed wholly from your holiness's power so is it a duty necessarily arising from your paternal authority and affection: Which remedy, if your holiness shall refuse or delay to grant, our condition will indeed herein be more miserable, that so long we have fruitlessly and in vain sought redress, but it will not be wholly desperate, since it is possible to find relief some other way. Desperate remedies indeed are not without extremity to be applied; but he that is sick, will by any means get rid of his distemper; in the change of our miseries there is some comfort, when if we cannot obtain perfect relief, yet we may change our condition for that which is less afflicting and more tolerable. That your holiness would be pleased to take these things into your most serious consideration, we do again and again beseech you, for our lord Jesus Christ's sake, whose vicar on earth you stile yourself, and that you would now conform your actions to that title by pronouncing your sentence to the glory and praise of God, and thereby giving your testimony and sanction to that truth which has been examined, approved, and after much deliberation confirmed by the most Learned Men of all nations. In the mean time we will beseech God, whom we infallibly know to be truth, that he would vouchsafe so to inform and direct your holiness's deliberations, herein, that having by your holiness's authority, a confirmation of what is just, righteous and true, we may therein rest satisfied, and be free from the trouble of seeking to attain this end by other means. "To our Venerable Brethren the archbishops and bishops, and to our beloved sons the abbots, noblemen, dukes, marquisses, earls, barons, knights and doctors assembled together in Parliament in England: Clement VII. Pope. Venerable brothers and beloved sons, health be to you, and apostolical benediction! There are many expressions in your Letter, bearing date July 13, which we received some days ago, which we could not have thought well of, did we not wholly impute them to the great duty and tender affection which you bear to our most dear son in Christ your king. We shall therefore without taking these things amiss, sedately answer your Letter, that you may thereby learn with how little reason you have complained of us, and that your private duty and affection to your king, ought not to extend so far, as to justify your excusing us of two grievous offences, ingratitude to his highness, and denial of justice. We do acknowledge that your king has deserved all that your Letter mentions, nay, even much more, that the remembrance of his many meritorious actions towards the Apostolical See, will not only live fresh in our memories, but be transmitted down to late posterity. We cannot but own likewise, that not only with respect to our office and character in the Church, but also in our own private person, we owe so much to his highness's affection, as we shall scarce ever be able sufficiently to recompence. As to what relates to the controversy concerning the Marriage between his highness and queen Catherine, we have been so far from disappointing the king's expectation therein by denying him justice, that we have even lain under the censure of the other party, and have been thought partial, and too much inclined to favour his majesty's desires herein. But to give a more undeniable proof of our constant affection to your king, it will be necessary to mention what has some time since passed: When first, about three years since, his majesty's ambassadors laid this Cause before us, rather seeking redress herein from our affection and kindness to his highness, than from the rigorous course of justice, we committed it to the determination of our beloved sons, Thomas abp. of York our legate in England, cardinal Sanctæ Cecilie, and Laurence Campejus, cardinal Sanctæ Mariæ transtiberim our legate de latere, who were both in your kingdom, and upon the spot to examine into the matter; whereby, as far as we were able, we satisfied his highness's desires. But when the queen began to suspect them as partial judges, and on the account of some grievances she had imposed on her by the said legates, had appealed from them to the Apostolical Tribunal, and had on her part appointed proctors to prosecute the said Appeal at Rome, even then our great inclination to his majesty's service was sufficiently evidenced. For although we could not in this Cause deny the queen a Commission of Appeal, yet seeking rather that this controversy might be finished by the agreeable methods of peace and concord, than by course of law, we framed several delays in granting our Commission of Appeal in the said Cause, under pretence that this being a cause of the highest nature, must therefore be brought before the Consistory. After this we held frequent consultation with our most venerable brethren their Eminences the Cardinals, whereby this affair was still farther put off; till at length by the unanimous vote of all the Cardinals it was concluded, that a Commission of Appeal in this Cause could not be refused. It was therefore appointed to be examined, heard, and in the said Consistory, by us to be finally determined. For as in all cases we ought to proceed with the greatest caution, so ought we more especially to do in that which concerns the majesties of kings and queens, on which we see the eyes of all the Christian world placed. Since which no lawful proctor has appeared on the king's part, to set forth his majesty's pretensions either in writing, or by word of mouth, from whence it is that this Cause could not yet receive its determination. Since it must be decided according to what is alleged, and by witnesses proved; not according to favour and affection. There is therefore no reason why this deferring our sentence of determination, of which you complain, should be ascribed to us, and your complaint herein seems to us the more strange, because his majesty's ambassadors in several places, particularly at Bononia, did request and solicit this delay of Sentence from us, contrary to the inclination and demand of the queen's proctors herein. Since therefore we have no ways occasioned these delays, or hindred this Cause from being determined, after mature examination, and due consideration of all the circumstances of it, we see not on what reasons these your complaints are grounded; unless you will venture to say, that the services which his majesty has shewn us, and the Apostolical See, are such, that the Cause should be determined in his favour, without regard had either to right or justice; for that must be the meaning of your words, when you say that Sentence ought to be given by us, though nobody entreated it, nay, though some opposed it in this case, which has been adjudged just by all the Learned in England, France and Italy, and by the Decrees of so many Universities: which words to us seem not to proceed from your usual prudence and modesty; since we see not with what reason you can desire, that we should in a cause of the greatest moment give Sentence, though none entreated it, nay, though some opposed it; when on the other side is alleged the great scandal and offence that all Christians would take, at a Sentence of Divorce from a Marriage which has continued so many years, which was contracted by Dispensation from the Holy See, at the request of his most excellent majesty Henry 7, and the most Catholick king Ferdinand; from whence the queen has had so many children born, and still has a daughter living; contrary to the opinion of several doctors (which you urge also on your behalf) and those very learned and grave men, and who confirm their judgment both by the laws of God, and by arguments taken not only from the Latins, but likewise derived from the Jewish law: Notwithstanding all which, we kept ourselves unbiassed, inclined to favour neither side, but to hear both, looking on this most extraordinary Cause, not only to concern the whole Christian world, but also to belong to all posterity. As for the opinions of Learned Men, and the Decrees of Universities which you mention, few of them have come to our notice, shewn us not in proper form by your ambassadors, nor in the name of the king exhibited, and those were but bare opinions of those men, alledging no reasons for their Determinations, nor supporting them by any authority from Scripture, or the Canons, which herein ought only to prevail. Wherefore, to demand that we should rashly, and without due consideration, determine any thing herein in his majesty's favour, is a thing neither righteous in itself, nor agreeable to your wisdom. For although we owe much to his highness, yet in executing Judgment we must necessarily much more regard him, 'by whom Kings reign and Princes decree Justice;' and further, it is the duty of a good Father, to take care that by over fondness, he do not too much indulge his children: besides, we should not only entangle our own, but also his highness's conscience, by such an hasty and inconsiderate Sentence, which if thus unduly given, would by its dangerous example, greatly damage the whole Christian world. As for that deluge of calamities, which you fear is impending over your kingdom, sure it were much more to be feared, if we should rashly hasten that Sentences which ought calmly to proceed in the strait way of justice and reason, thereby violating both our own duty, and departing from the rules of justice through too great favour and affection to your king; you cannot with more earnest desires wish his majesty a son, than we do, and that not only his highness, but all Christian princes had sons like so great a king, the inheritors not only of their realms, but of such princely virtues, but we are not in the stead of God, that we can give children. As to what you say, that we were unwilling to confirm by our authority, a truth concerning the former Marriage, which by so many Learned Men in the kingdom is agreed upon; we are truly willing to gratify his highness in all things wherein we are able by our authority, but then our ability cannot extend to those things which will destroy that authority, as it would if we should judicially give sentence contrary to the usual methods and due course of law in any thing, though it might appear never so plain and manifest to us. As for what you mention in the end of your Letter, that unless we grant your request herein, you shall imagine that the care of yourselves is remitted into your own hands, and that you are left at liberty to seek remedy herein elsewhere; this is a resolution neither worthy of your prudence, nor becoming your Christianity; and we do therefore of our fatherly love, exhort you to abstain from any such rash attempt: though it would be no fault of the physician, if the patient weary of his distemper, should rashly and unadvisedly venture upon measures destructive to his health; we indeed never denied you such remedies as might with safety be given, and with advantage received; 'for who is weak, and I am not weak, who is offended, and I burn not?' I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. We cannot imagine that his majesty, on whose account you write, can approve your writing in this manner; for we know, and are so fully acquainted with his honour and integrity, that we are assured he would not accept of any thing that is unjust, although it were offered him; and although your intercession is in all cases of great power and prevalence with us, yet is our love and affection to his highness such, as to need neither the entreaty nor solicitation of any persons whatever, to influence or quicken it; and as we never remember that his highness has ever yet made his request to us, and received a denial, where it could be granted with safety to our own, and the honour of the Apostolical See, so we shall always shew him the same regard and good will. Lastly, as to the present Cause, we shall give no hindrance or delay to its decision, so that when it is ready for Examination, and all the circumstances of it have been heard, it shall be brought to a speedy determination, and final conclusion; being earnestly desirous to free your king and queen, and our ourselves from this most troublesome affair. But this we must desire of his highness, and of your goodness, that you would not require more from us, by reason of his majesty's great deservings of us, than we can without offending God perform; and then you may assure yourselves of all the good offices which can be expected from us, considering the person and office we bear, and the justice we are indispensably bound to administer. Given at St. Peter's, Rome, under the Seal of the Fisherman, Sept. 27, 1530, in the 7th year of our Pontificat."

The Chancellor's Speech to the Commons respecting the Divorce.

The former proceedings of king Henry, being advertised to the Pope, made him fear a total defecton in our king. Insomuch, that at Rome they studied nothing more than how to retain him in his ancient devotion: some arguments whereof have been formerly mentioned. To the furthering of which intention also it did not a little conduce, that he had taken some distaste against the emperor: who, being desired to appoint certain judges to determine all differences betwixt him and the duke of Ferrara, concerning Modena and Reggio, chose such as sentenced on the duke's behalf; which so incensed the Pope that he fell off from the emperor. For which reason also it is probable, that our king might have closed with him, and received some satisfaction in the affair of the Divorce, had not his Parliament, at this time, as is above-said, concurred to the setting up of the regal authority in ecclesiastical affairs. To whom therefore he thought fit to communicate what his agents in Italy and other places had done, concerning that so much controverted point of the lawfulness of his Marriage. Whereupon, the parliament yet sitting, the lord chancellor, accompanied with Dr. Stokesley bishop of London, and divers other lords spiritual and temporal, came into the Lower-House, 31st March 1531, and told them; "That they could not be ignorant, how the king, having married his brother's wife, was troubled in conscience, and therefore had sent to the most learned Universities in Christendom, to be resolved in that point: and namely had employed the bishop of London there present, for this purpose. Not, yet, but that his own Universities of Oxford and Cambridge could have sufficiently decided the point, but that he might the more amply satisfy himself and the world." Whereupon sir Bryan Tuke was commanded to take out, and read the Determinations of the Universities of Paris, Orleans, Angiers, Bourges in Berry, and Thoulouse in France, and of Bononia and Padua, in Italy, who all agreed in declaring the Marriage unlawful. After which, above a hundred Books of several doctors, (whereof Dr. Cranmer was one) confirming the same Opinion, were exhibited. The perusing of which yet (the day being far spent) was referred to a further time. As also the Resolution of our two Universities (brought after the rest to our king) which because Sanders calls in a sort surreptitious, I shall relate out of some Original pieces which I have seen.

To the University of Oxford, the bishop of Lincoln was employed, where, neither easily, nor by general vote, there past this Decree, April 4, 1530.

"We John Cotisford, commissary of the University of Oxford, by the authority, and with the consent of the whole venerable Convocation, do declare, determine and adjudge, that the major part of all the doctors, masters, as well regents as non-regents of all faculties in this famous University, have agreed and given their consent and assent, that the Determination, Resolution, and final Answer to the Question lately propounded to us by his most excellent majesty the king, which shall be given by the 88 doctors and bachelors in the faculty of divinity, chosen for that purpose, or by the major part of them, be esteemed and accounted the Determination, Resolution, and final Answer of this whole University, and therefore that it may be lawful for the commissary and the proctors to affix the common seal of the University to the Decree, which shall be made in pursuance to their said Determination."

Which Copy, though blurred (upon what occasion I know not, for it is not probable it should be intended to the king in that manner) was dispatcht the day following, as the Act of the University, by the bishop of Lincoln. As for the University of Cambridge, I find Stephen Gardiner, and Edward Fox were employed; where, notwithstanding the king's Letters, and the diligence used on their part, not a few difficulties did occur. Insomuch that it was first denied, then the voices on both sides were brought even, and at last, (some absenting themselves) it was agreed, that the question should be disputed by 28 delegates, and that two parts of three should determine it; which accordingly was done in favour of the king, by the vice-chancellor, and the two proctors, ten doctors, and fifteen others, whose names are extant in the same Record. Which averseness, more than in foreign Universities, whether it should be attributed to the power of the Pope in England, or to their particular scrupulosity of conscience, is more than I will determine; though, on this occasion, I can do no less, that repeat some arguments drawn (in favour of the Divorce) out of our Records. 1. The place in Leviticus, chap. xviii. vers. 16. 'Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife.' 2. St. Basil's Opinion, tending this way, where he saith, 'that he shall be excommunicated that marieth his wife's sister.' 3. Because two Epistles, transcribed out of the Pope's Registers, and sent into England by Dr. Stokesly (whereof one was of Gregory, the other of Innocent the 3rd) do profess, that the Pope cannot dispense against the law of God, the particular case being then a Marriage. 4. That granting the Pope can dispence, ex urgentissima causa, with that which is ex jure divino, (which yet divines for the most part deny) there was no occasion here, since the peace betwixt England and Spain, which was taken as the ground of the Breve) stood firm and intire. Lastly, that the Jews themselves (for our agents consulted with them also) did not hold the law of marrying the brother's wife, (Deut. 25.) as necessary in this time, but did often pate disalcationem. All which being maturely considered by the Lower-House, made them detest the Marriage, as our Historians have it. Whereupon the king thought fit also to prorogue the parliament, to the intent that every man repairing home, might satisfy his neighbour of these passages; not omitting, together, to cause these foreign Determinations, to be printed and published this year, as the Book yet extant in print shews. Notwithstanding which, so far was the king from remitting any thing of his gentle behaviour to the queen, that, had he not forborn to come to her bed, neither could his outward favour towards her, or her fashions towards him, have argued any diminution of love; all those wonted ceremonies by which they sustained the dignity of their place, and civilities which might imply a mutual respect, continuing firmly on either side. Which our historians amplify so far, that they say he sore lamented his chance, and made no manner of mirth or pastime as he was wont to do; without yet that they can be thought to speak improbably, when we consider both how dear this liberty cost him, and how much it endangered the Succession. However, that he might both prevail himself of the occasion, and also satisfy the doubts he had raised, not in his own alone, but subjects breasts, he sent to queen Catherine some lords of his council, wishing them to acquaint her with these Determinations (which also I find had been shewed the Pope,) and together to demand of her for quieting the king's conscience, and ending this business, whether she would rather refer herself to the Judgment of four spiritual, and four temporal lords in this kingdom, or stand to her Appeal. To which the sad queen answered, "That her father, before he consented to her second marriage, had taken the advice of doctors, and clerks, whose opinion she believed rather than any others; and that, the Pope having confirmed it, she wondered that any should question it. And, whereas for quieting the king's conscience, you would have me put the business to eight lords; that which I say, is, I pray God send his grace a quiet conscience. As for answer to your message; I pray you tell the king, I am his lawful wife, and so will abide, till the court of Roune determine to the contrary." But our king, who alledged his proceedings were according to the law of God (which therefore he said should be more insisted on, than any other authority) sent other messengers, exhorting her still to conform herself; among whom one spake to this effect: "Madam, you cannot be ignorant how much you have provoked the king's displeasure against you, since his grace having used all fit means to clear his own, and subjects insatisfactions, concerning the lawfulness of his Marriage, you yet continue refractory in that violent manner, as you not only refuse the general Determinations of Universities, and Learned Men; but contrary to the laws of the land, and the royal dignity, have cited his highness to appear in the Court of Rome; neither have those many admonitions you have received concerning the danger and consequences hereof, been able to divert you from your purposes, or reduce you to reason and your duty. Of which therefore his highness is so sensible, that he hath forborn of late to see your grace, or receive your tokens, giving you liberty further, to repair either to his manner of Oking, or Estamsted, or the Monastery of Bisham; for, since you were known by his brother prince Arthur, you cannot be his lawful wife." To which the virtuous and sorrowful queen replied little more than this: "That to what place soever she removed, nothing could remove her from being the king's wife." And here the king bid her a final farewell: for, from this time, being July the 14th, I find not the king ever saw her more.

The Pope's Letter to persuade the King to take his Wife again.

And now queen Catherine by her proctor at Rome, assisted with the advice and power of the imperialists, negotiated puissantly with the Pope; so that, notwithstanding our king's indignation for her prosecuting him in this manner, she urged still the Appeal, beseeching the Pope to cite the king, by himself or proctor, to appear. But the Pope thought fit rather gently thus to exhort our king to take again his wife Catherine; which he did in the following Letter:

CLEMENT VII. Pope.

"To our most dear son in Christ, &c. health and apostolical benediction. What in our tender affection towards you, for the sake of both your honour here, and your salvation hereafter, we should be glad to find false, has been reported to us, and by many hands confirmed, concerning your highness, that although not only before, but since the Controversy has been depending about the lawfulness of the Marriage Contract between yourself, and our most dear daughter in Christ, the most excellent Catherine queen of England; you entertained the said Catherine in your palace, and lived with her as your queen and wife, as it was fitting you should do; yet now of late you have not only removed her from your person and court, but have banished her from the city, the usual place of her residence, and sent her to another place, taking in her room publicly to your bed and conversation, a certain lady Anne, with whom you cohabit, and to whom you shew that conjugal love and affection, which is only due to your wife, the said queen. Which thing, most dear son, if it be true, and you would lay aside carnal affections, and give yourself leisure to think, we doubt not but that, although we were silent herein, you would soon perceive upon how many several accounts it is unworthy your highness, either as it is a great contempt of our Judgment and Sentence, which you thus refuse to stay for, as it is a publick scandal to the Church, or as it is a manifest violation of the public peace; all which things are so contrary to the principles of a virtuous and religious prince, as we have always esteemed your highness, that though they have daily more and more been confirmed unto us, yet we have found great difficulty to believe them, as things wholly repugnant to your nature, and perfectly contrary to your usage. For what can be more unnatural to you, or less agreeable to your integrity, on one hand, both by your letters and by your ambassadors, to implore our assistance in determining your Cause, and on the other, by your actions to judge and decide it your ownself? To contemn the authority of the Church by such a proceeding, how unlike is it to the actions of him, who has so well defended by the power of the sword, and by the strength of argument, our most holy faith and the catholic Church? Surely the public peace and tranquillity have by no prince of our age, been more carefully preserved than by you, who piously undertook a war for the Church, gloriously prosecuted it, and at length for the sake of public peace and quiet desisted from it, from whence your highness has been justly esteemed the arbiter of peace and common concord among Christian princes; wherefore when we hear these strange things concerning you, it raiseth both our admiration, and encreaseth our grief, that this one action of yours, if it be true, should cast a blemish upon the glory of your former life and behaviour. Wherefore as we could not but enquire into the truth hereof more carefully, and ought not to pass by a matter of this weight with neglect, we were willing to send you this kind admonition, as of a loving and affectionate father, before we are forced to deal with you in the severer methods of an impartial judge. The high dignity of your majesty, your most deserving services to us, and our most tender love and affection to you, makes us choose to act towards you, with all respect and gentleness in the person of a kind parent, and so long lay aside our office as a Judge, till by your Letters we shall see what measures will be most proper for us to take. We wish, dear son, as we have said, that these things were false, or at least not so bad as they are represented to us; and farther, that you yourself would take such care, of your singular wisdom, that nobody may in this thing have occasion to speak ill of your highness, whose virtues have in all other your actions been so conspicuous. For if any catholic to his great grief, or any heretic to his mighty joy, should hear that you have now removed afar off from your bed and presence, your queen whom you married, the daughter of a king, the aunt of the emperor, and king of the Romans, after she had lived with you more than twenty years, and had several children by you; that you have openly taken another woman to your bed, not only without our licence and dispensation, but also contrary to our express prohibition; he cannot but in some measure make this judgment of the best of kings, that he is one that little regards the authority of the Church, and nothing values the public peace, than which we are satisfied nothing can be farther from your highness's will and intention; insomuch that should any one in your kingdom dare to do this which is reported of your highness, we surely know that you would be so far from approving, that you would most surely punish it. Wherefore, my son, as we most certainly believe that your knowledge is rightly informed herein, so ought your practice to be such, as not to give occasion to scandalous reports; especially in these dangerous times, which so abound with heresies, and other most grievous calamities, lest what you do, should grow a precedent and example for others: for the actions of princes, especially those so illustrious as your highness, are looked upon as marks and patterns whereto others may direct their aim, and whereby they may form their practice. Nor ought your highness to neglect the common safety, and overlook the peace and tranquillity of Christendom, to which the best of princes have never failed to pay, as in duty bound, a regard. Nor ought you, my son, to offer this injury to the most serene princes, the emperor and the king of the Romans, the said queen Catherine's nephews, who have never given you offence, by thus proceeding before your Cause is determined, thereby disturbing that universal peace among Christian princes, wherein alone our safety from the Turks consists; lest you give occasion of much scandal in the Church, and of great danger in the Christian world, and so provoke the Almighty so far, as to change the great blessings he has so long poured down upon you into bitterness and affliction. We therefore of our tender love and affection exhort you, and of our paternal duty, warn you, my son, that for the sake of that kind indulgence and favour which we have always shewn, and shall continue ever to shew you, unless you hinder us, that, if these things be true, that tarnish your former reputation of piety and glory, you yourself would amend them by affectionately taking again to yourself your queen Catherine, by giving her the honour and respect due to a queen, and the tenderness and affection due to wife: and by removing the said lady Aune from your bed and conversation, so long at least till your Cause shall be determined, and we have given Sentence herein. Which, although it be no more than your duty, and what will greatly conduce to your honour, and advance your glory; yet we shall take as a great mark of your highness's respect and good will towards us. For as our most earnest desire is always to preserve in you your good esteem of us, and your customary duty and affection to the apostolical See, which in your regard and your actions, you have never failed to shew: so we cannot without the greatest grief betake ourselves to the sharper remedies of Justice; to which the indignity offered to our own person herein, which we can willingly pass by, could never prompt us, nor indeed can any thing force us to it, but the honour of Almighty God, the advancement of the public good, and the salvation of your immortal soul, as our Nuntio with you has orders more fully to acquaint your highness. Given at St Peter's under the Seal of the Fisherman, Jan. 25, 1532, in the 9th year of our Pontifical."

It is moved, in the House of Commons to petition the King to take his Wife again.

But the Pope had no good Answer thereunto; for as the people for the most part exclaimed against the match (as our Historians relate) so the king would have found perchance some difficulty to appease their scruples, when otherwise he could have satisfied his own. The Queen wanted not yet those who defended her Cause publicly, both in Books and Sermons (of whom the chief were Thomas Abel, her chaplain, and John Fisher, bishop of Rochester) and privately in discourse, (especially women) though not sufficiently either to clear all objections, or to remove the king from his affection to Mrs. Anne Bölen. Among which I must not forget one Tenise, of the Lower House of Parliament, who motioned that they all should Petition the king to take his queen again; which being advertised to our king, he sent for Thomas Audley, the Speaker of the House, and told him to this effect: "That he marvelled any among them should meddle in businesses which could not properly be determined there. As for this particular, that it concerned his soul so much, that he many times wished the Marriage had been good, but since the Doctors of the Universities had generally declared it unlawful, he could do no less than abstain from her company. Which therefore he wished them to take as the true reason, without imputing it to any wanton appetite: since, being in the one and fortieth year of his age, it might be justly presumed such motions were not so quick in him. All which, that they might the better understand, he had informed himself in all parts of Christendom, concerning strange Marriages; and that, saving in Spain and Portugal, he could never find that any man had so much as married two sisters, if the first were carnally known. But for the brother to marry the brother's wife was so abhorred among all nations, that he never heard any Christian so did but himself; and therefore wished them to believe that his conscience was troubled."

While these things thus passed, king Henry commands his agents at Rome, (the bishop of Worcester and sir Gregory Casalis) to present unto the Pope the Opinion of divers famous lawyers, in favour of his Cause; procuring also learned men from all parts of Italy, to come to Rome, to offer disputation for the same. To second this again, king Henry in Jan. 1532, sends William Bennet, doctor of law, to Rome, with instructions to this purpose. But because it was found, that, by the continual intercession of the queen and emperor, the Pope intended shortly to cite the king to appear at Rome, either in person or by proxy; he dispatches thither about February, Edward Karne, doctor of law, to be his excusator; and to remonstrate, that his grace is not bound by law so to appear. But the Pope making difficulty to admit this excusator, it was disputed in the Consistory, whether he ought to be heard or no? But much time being spent herein, the queen's agents require the Pope to proceed in the principal Cause. In the meanwhile our king, by sir Francis Bryan, importunes Francis to intercede for him with the Pope; who, thereupon by Letter, dated March 16, informs his holiness, 'that the request of the king of England is just, and he ought to relieve him. Or else they two (being une mesme chose, and who have so well deserved of him) shall be forced to seek such other remedies, as shall not please him,' &c. To enforce this most earnest Letter, Francis sends Gabriel de Grammont, bishop of Tarbe, lately made cardinal, to the Pope, who yet, being continually urged by the Imperialists to proceed against the king, and hearing besides, first, the Prohibition of Annates above mentioned, and afterwards that a certain priest was committed for maintaining the papal authority, and that another priest (being put in prison by the abb. of Canterbury for favouring Luther) after he had appealed to the king (tanquam Dominum Supremum, was set at liberty, proceeds to Citation; and calling a Consistory, July 8, commits the hearing of the Cause to Paulus de Capisucci, dean of the Ruota, and appoints the month of October 1532, for the king's appearance, protesting alioqui procedetur, &c. In the mean time, he writes to our king, certifying him what was done, yet omitting the Clause of alioqui procedetur, intreating him further to send a proctor; making also this overture to our agents, that he will be content that all the process shall be in England, except only the final decision, which, because there is question of the papal authority and the law divine, he will reserve to himself. The term prefixed for our king's appearance being expired, Capisucci cites our king again, or his proctors, or finally his orators. To all which Edward Karne agswered publickly, Nov. 14, 1532, That the Proceeding was undue, both as the question concerning his Excusation was not decided, and that he could not get a copy of the Citation; and finally as it was not congruous to the Breve sent to the king concerning this business. Besides, that the emperor was so powerful in Rome, that he could not expect justice, wherefore, unless they desisted, he declared, that he must appeal from thence to the able men in some indifferent universities. And that, if this were refused, he protested then a nullity in all that they did. But the Pope, as little regarding this, goes to Bononia shortly after, to meet the emperor, according to an agreement made a good while since betwixt them; promising our agents yet, that notwithstanding the queen's proctor's solicitation, nothing of moment should be done in this Cause, till the emperor were departed.—Our king finding he could obtain no satisfaction from the Pope, hastens the League with Francis, formerly projected, to a conclusion; and the rather, that he heard this meeting betwixt the Pope and the emperor would shortly follow.

The king finding that the emperor, who seemed a while to desist from the eager prosecution of his aunt's cause, was now more vehement than ever; sends Instructions to his agents at Rome, to protest in his name, that he was not bound either in his own person, or by his proctor, to appear there, urging for this purpose, the Determination of some universities, and particularly of Orleans and Paris. Notwithstanding which, he permitted doctor Bennet to make (as of himself) divers motions to the Pope, the principal whereof in our Records I find these. First, that seeing by the Opinion of lawyers, and the Council of Nice, the matter ought to be decided in partibus; and that by the laws of England the determination (it concerning the Succession) cannot elsewhere be made; it would please his holiness that the abp. of Canterbury taking to him two eminent bishops or abbots, or the whole clergy of his province, should decide the same. But this being dislik'd by the pope, Bennet secondly propos'd, whether he would refer the determination to sir Tho. More, or the bishop of London, to be nominate by the king, and let the queen or emperor name another, and the French king the third, and let the abp. of Canterbury be the fourth. But this also being rejected, Bennet came, it seems, to the last degree of the Instructions, which was, that if the Cause might be heard in England, and that the queen refused the Sentence, she should have the benefit of her Appeal before three judges, one of England, one of France, and the third from the Pope, who also should discuss the matter in some indifferent place. But the Pope allowed not this, saying, 'Since he saw the king would needs conserve his authority, he would likewise conserve his, and proceed via ordinaria.'

Our king thought it now his best expedient to stand to the decision of his own clergy:

Whereunto it conduced much, that Warham, abp. of Canterbury, being lately dead, Thomas Cranmer (an able person) much favoured by the nobility, as our Historians say, and lately employed in the king's business in Italy, and at this present in Germany, was, though absent, chosen to this place. Neither, indeed, could the king's Clandestine Marriage be much longer hidden, the new queen being quick with child: so that he resolved shortly, both to publish his Marriage, and to require his Clergy to proceed to a Sentence concerning the Divorce. His parliament, in the mean time, so favouring his intentions, that they made an Act against Appeals to Rome, to the no little displeasure of queen Catharine, who found thereby how dangerous it would be (in point of our law) to insist on hers. Howsoever, I find she had many openly favoured her Cause, without that our king thought fit to punish them.

Sentence of Divorce pronounced against Queen Catharine.

Queen Catharine was now at Amphil in Bedfordshire; and because it concerned the king to acquaint her with the causes of this second Marriage, he sent again some grave persons to prepare her thereunto, wishing her together to submit. But she persisting still, Cranmer, abp. of Canterbury, cited her to appear at Dunstable, being six miles off. Where for deciding this business, he appointed a Court to be held; and with him came the bishops of London, Winchester, (being Stephen Gardiner) Bath, Lincoln, and many great clerks. Their first proceeding (as Sanders hath it) was a citation to our king to put away his wife Catharine, protesting otherwise that they would censure him. But the Records which I have seen, mention only that Cranmer demanded and obtained leave of the king to determine the matter, since it caused much doubt among the common people, and fears of great inconveniences in matter of Succession. The Court being now held, and the queen summon'd 15 days together, without yet that she appeared, the archbishop having first pronounced her contumacious, proceeds to Sentence, which also he caused to be publickly read in the chapel of our Lady in the priory of Dunstable, before two notaries, and then sent to the king, desiring further to know his mind concerning his second Marriage, as soon as he had advised with his council.

The Tenor of the Sentence was this.

"In the name of God, Amen: We Thomas by divine permission archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and legate of the apostolical see, in a certain cause of enquiry of and concerning the validity of the Marriage contracted and consummated between the most potent and most illustrious prince, our sovereign lord Henry 8, by the grace of God king of England and France, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, and the most serene princess Catharine, daughter of his most catho-lick majesty, Ferdinand king of Spain, &c. of glorious memory; we proceeding according to law and justice in the said Cause, which has been brought judicially before us in virtue of our office, and which for some time has lain under examination, as it still is, being not yet finally determined and decided, having first seen all the Articles and Pleas which have been exhibited and set forth of her part, together with the Answers made thereto, and given in on the part of the said most illustrious and powerful prince Henry 8; having likewise seen, and diligently inspected the Informations and Depositions of many noblemen and other witnesses of unsuspected veracity exhibited in the said Cause; having also seen, and in like manner carefully considered not only the Censures and Decrees of the most famous Universities of almost the whole Christian world, but likewise the Opinions and Determinations both of the most eminent divines and civilians, as also the Resolutions and Conclusions of the clergy of both provinces of England in convocation assembled, and many other wholesome instructions and doctrines which have been given in and laid before us concerning the said Marriage. Having farther seen, and with like diligence inspected all the Treaties and Leagues of peace and amity on this account, entered upon, and concluded between Henry 7, of immortal fame, late king of England, and the said Ferdinand of glorious memory, late king of Spain, having besides seen, and most carefully weighed all and every of the Acts, Debates, Letters, Processes, Instruments, Writs, Arguments, and all other things which have passed, and been transacted in the said Cause at any time, in all which thus seen and inspected, our most exact care in examining, and our most mature deliberation in weighing them, hath by us been used, reserving herein whatsoever of right ought to be by us reserved. Furthermore the said most illustrious and most powerful prince king Henry 8, in the forementioned Cause, by his proper proctor having appeared before us, but the said most serene lady Catharine in contempt abenting herself, (whose absence may the divine presence always attend) by and with the advice of the most learned in the law, and of persons of most eminent skill in divinity, whom we have consulted in the premises, we have found it our duty to proceed to give our final Decree and definitive Sentence in the said Cause, which accordingly we do in this manner. Because by acts, warrants, deductions, propositions, exhibitions, allegations, proofs and confessions, articles drawn up, answers of witnesses, depositions, informations, instruments, arguments, letters, writs, censures, determinations of professors, opinions, councils, assertions, affirmations, treaties and leagues of peace, processes and other matters in the said Cause as is above-mentioned before us laid, had, done, exhibited, and respectively produced, as also from the same and sundry other reasons, causes and considerations, manifold arguments, and various kinds of proof of the greatest evidence, strength and validity, of which in the said Cause we have fully and clearly informed ourselves, we find, and with undeniable evidence and plainness, see, that the Marriage contracted and consummated, as is aforesaid, between the said most illustrious prince king Henry 8, and the most serene lady Catharine, was and is null and invalid, and that it was contracted and consummated contrary to the law of God. Therefore we Thomas, archbishop, primate and legate aforesaid, having first called upon the name of Christ for direction herein, and having God altogether before our eyes, do pronounce sentence, and declare for the nullity and invalidity of the said Marriage, decreeing that the said pretended Marriage always was, and still is null and invalid, that it was contracted and consummated contrary to the will and law of God, that it is of no force or obligation, but that it always wanted, and still wants the strength and sanction of law, and therefore we sentence, decree and declare, that it is not lawful for the said most illustrious and powerful prince Henry 8, and the said most serene lady Catharine, to remain in the said pretended Marriage; and we do separate and divorce from each other the said most illustrious and most powerful king Henry 8, and the said most illustrious lady Catharine, in as much as they contracted and consummated the said pretended Marriage de facto and not de jure, and that they so separated and divorced, are absolutely free from all Marriage Bond, with regard to the foresaid pretended Marriage, we do pronounce, decree and declare by this our definitive Sentence, and final Decree, which we now give, and by the tenor of these presents publish. May 23, 1533."

The king hereupon (according to the Decree of the last parliament) commands strictly Catharine should no more be called queen, but princess dowager, and widow of prince Arthur.

And now the news of the archbishop of Canterbury's Sentence, and open Marriage of mistress Anne Bolen, being come to the Pope's ears, and together with it an Information concerning the Book our king had composed against the Pope's authority (which also more than any thing else offended him) the whole college of cardinals, especially such as were for the emperor, became humble supplicants to the Pope, that he would proceed rigorously against our king; which also the Pope accorded, though not in that peremptory and publick manner as was afterwards done; for I find that this Sentence was not definitive in the principal Cause, (as the imperials desired, and Sanders mistakes it) but only declarative in the point of Attemptats, (as they call it) in that king Henry (the Cause yet depending) had divorced himself without the leave and authority of the Pope. Therefore it was declared that all his actions herein were subject to a nullity, and himself to excommunication, unless he restored things as integrum, for which time was allowed him till the end of September following. These proceedings being reserved, and the censures thus suspended, argued that the Pope was willing before he went any farther to see the success of his interview with Francis, which was accelerated by this means.—This while, our king being confident, that either by the Pope's good permission, or his proper authority, he should be able to justify a Cause which so many Universities had sentenced on his side, proceeds to the coronation of his new queen, which also was performed with much solemnity.—The Pope was often solicited by Francis in the behalf of our king, that at least the time of declaring the Censures against him might be prorogued. But the Pope answering only, that though the term prefixed for fulmination were now past, yet he would omit further process till he came to Rome. Our agents not content herewith, proceed in their Instructions, and Edmund Bonner, as I find by an Original of his to our king, getting audience of the Pope, Nov. 7, in respectful terms, and under protestation that his majesty intended no contempt of the see apostolick or holy church, intimated to him king Henry's 'Appeal to the next General Council lawfully assembled,' exhibiting also the authentick Instruments thereof (made before the bishop of Winchester;) at which the Pope being much incensed, said, 'he would refer it to the Consistory.' Which being held Nov. 10, he answered Bonner, 'That, concerning the king's Appeal he rejected it, as being unlawful, and against a Constitution of Pope Pius. 2, For the Council, he would procure it, as belonging to his authority, and not to king Henry's. 3, For the Original Instruments,' which Bonner required back, 'he denied them,' and so dismissed him; desiring Francis only, that he would persuade our king to conform himself to his ancient devotion and obedience to the Roman Church.' Shortly after which, being the 12th of Nov. 1533, the Pope returned. I find moreover that the abp. of Canterbury at this time suspecting the Pope would proceed against him, by the advice of our king made his Appeal also to the Council: which he desired our agents to intimate to the Pope. The success whereof yet doth not appear in our Records.

The Pope's Sentence against the King set up at Dunkirk.

About this time the Pope's Sentence against the king was openly set up at Dunkirk in Flanders; so that to prevent further inconveniences, the king (as our Records shew) advised with his Council, Dec. 2. First, To inform his subjects of his Appeal to the Council General, and the justice thereof. Secondly, Of the Unlawfulness of the dowager's Appeal to Rome, and the late statute against it; which said statute was (for that purpose) to be set upon every church door in England, as also his majesty's said Proclamation, or Appeal, whereof transumpt also were to be sent into Flanders. Thirdly, To command it to be taught, that the General council is above the pope, and that he hath no more authority in England by God's law than any other foreign bishop. Lastly, to send into Germany, to confederate with the king of Poland, John king of Hungary; the dukes of Saxony, of Bavaria, the landgrave of Hess, &c. as likewise the Hanse-Teutonic towns, being Lubeck, Dantzick, Noremburgh, &c. These things being resolved on, for a final Answer, he desired the bishop of Paris to certify Francis, That if the pope would supersede from executing his Sentence, until he had indifferent judges sent, who might hear the business, he would also supersede from the execution of what he was deliberated to do in withdrawing his obedience from the Roman see. But the bishop, who thought this alone not enough to reduce things into good terms, made an offer to negotiate the business at Rome; which our king gladly accepted, assuring him withal, that as soon as he had obtained what was demanded, he would send sufficient power and authority to confirm as much as was accorded on his part, as having entire confidence in his discretion and sufficiency, ever since his two years employment as ambassador in this kingdom. Whereupon the bishop, though in Christmas holydays, and an extrem winter, posted to Rome: where he came before any thing was done, more than what formerly past: and here obtaining a public audience in the Consistory, he eloquently declared our king's Message, representing both what he had obtained of our king, and shewing withal how advantageous it would be to the whole church. Which so prevailed, that they prefix a day for receiving from our king a confirmation thereof. Insomach, that a courier was dispatched to our king Henry, desiring his Answer, within the time limited. But the term being expired, and no Answer brought, the pope resolved to proceed to fulmination of the Sentence; which being advertised to Bellay, he repaired to the pope and cardinals, (then sitting in full Consistory) desiring them to stay a while, it being probable that the courier, either through cross winds, or other accidents in long journeys, might be detained; concluding his speech, that if the king of England had six years together been patient, they might attend six days; which space only he desired them to give him, for the receiving of our king's Answer; this proposition being put to the question, the plurality of voices carried it against our king, and the rather, that in this mean time, news came to Rome, that the king had printed and published the Book written against the Pope's authority, (which yet was untrue, for it came not forth till afterwards, though it was not yet kept so close, but a copy was now come to the Pope's hands) and that there was a comedy represented at court, to the no little defamation of certain cardinals. By reason whereof the Sentence was so precipitated, that, what according to their usual forms could not be done in less than three Consistories, was now dispatched in one: and so by a final determination the Marriage with queen Catharine was pronounced good, and king Henry commanded to accept her for his wife, and in case of refusal Censures were fulminated against him. But two days of the six were not past, when the courier arrived with ample commission and authority from our king, to conclude and confirm all that the bishop had agreed in his name. Which was this, (as the writer of the Concilio Tridentino hath it) that king Henry was content to accept the Judgment of that court, upon condition that the suspected and imperial cardinals should not intervene, and that indifferent persons should be sent to Cambray to be informed of the merits of the Cause; giving authority further for his proctors to appear in that court. At which, the more wise and temperate cardinals were so astonished, that they became humble suppliants to the pope, that he would advise how all things might be repaired; whereupon the business was again discussed. But all remedies being judged either late, or impossible, the Sentence stood, and the emperor was made the executor of it. The bishop now returning toward France, met (as I find by our Records) Edward Karne and William Revet, who were employed by our king for soliciting this important business. But as they understood by the bishop, that the first Marriage was pronounced good, and the issue by it legitimate, so they judged it lost labour to proceed, and advertised all to our king.

The Sentence was to this effect.

“That Pope Clement the seventh with the consent of his other brethren the cardinals assembled together in the consistory, sitting there in the throne of justice calling upon the name of Christ, and having God only before his eyes, doth pronounce, define, and declare in the cause and causes between his dear daughter Catharine queen of England appealing to the see apostolique, and his beloved son Henry the 8th, king of England, concerning the validity and invalidity of the matrimony heretofore contracted between them, and yet depending in the Consistory Court of the said Pope Clement; that the said matrimony always hath and still doth stand firm and canonical, and that the issue proceeding, or which shall proceed of the same, standeth and shall stand lawfull and legitimate; and that the aforesaid Henry, king of England, is and shall be bound and obstruct to the matrimonial society and cohabitation with the said lady Catharine his lawful wife and queen, to hold and maintain her with such love and princely honour, as becometh a loving husband, and his kingly honour to do.—Also that the said Henry king of England, if he shall refuse so to perform and accomplish all and singular the premises, in all effectual manner is to be condemned and compelled hereunto by all remedies of the law, and enforced, according as we do condemn, compell, and enforce him so to do, providing, that all molestations and refusals whatsoever made by the said king

Henry against the said queen Catharine, upon the invalidity of the said marriage, to have been and be judged unlawful and unjust; and the said king from henceforth for ever to hold his peace, and not to be heard in any court hereafter to speak touching the invalidity of the said matrimony: like as we also do here will and charge him to hold his peace, and do put him to perpetual silence hereiu; willing moreover and adjudging the said king Henry to be condemned, and presently here we do condemn him in the expences on the said queen Catharine's behalf here in our court, expended and employed in traversing the aforesaid cause, the valuation of which expences we reserve to ourselves to be limited and taxed, as we shall judge meet hereafter. We do so pronounce, I, at Rome in our Apostolical palace publicly in our Consistory, 25th March 1534. Blossius.

The King's Marriage with Catharine made void by Act of Parliament.

In the year 1554, 23 Hen. 8, upon the suit of Parliament to the king for the establishing of the Succession to the crown (the uncertainty whereof hath caused heretofore great division and bloodshed in this realm) it was enacted, that the king's Marriage with the lady Catharine, wife and carnally known to his brother prince Arthur (as was lawfully proved before Thomas, abp. of Canterbury) as contrary to God's law, shall be held void: and she stiled no more queen, but Dowager to prince Arthur, and the matrimony with queen Anne shall be taken for firm and good; and the issue thence procreate be accounted lawful; the inheritance of the crown to belong to the same, in manner following, viz. First to the eldest son begotten by the king on queen Anne, and to the heirs of the said son lawfully begotten, and for default of such heir then to the second son, &c. and if queen Anne decease without issue male, then the crown to descend to the son and heir of the king's body lawfully begotten, and the heirs of the said son lawfully begotten, and for a default of such issue, to the second son in like manner, &c. And for default of sons, that then the crown shall belong to the issue female of the king by queen Anne; and first to the first begotten the princess Elizabeth, and to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten. And for default of such issue then to the second daughter in like sort, &c. And for default of all such issue, to the right heirs of the king's highness. It was ordained that this Act shall be proclaimed before May next throughout the kingdom. And all persons of age shall swear to accept and maintain the same. They who refuse the Oath standing guilty of misprision of High Treason; and they who speak or write against the Marriage or Succession here established, to be adjudged traitors.

Two Bishops sent to acquaint Queen Catharine with this Act.

The Pope having proceeded in those rigorous terms with our king, (as is formerly mention) and for more authorising his Sentence, made the emperor executor thereof, hoped now to have his revenge, but he was deceived. For though the emperor did gladly accept this overture, for his aunt queen Catharine's sake, and the hope he had to dispose of the princess Mary, as inheritrix of the crown, yet as he had deeper designs, in aspiring to the conquest of Italy, and indeed to an universal monarchy, he was no less glad of the occasion to take off our king from the Pope: howsoever each side prepared for war. The emperor's intention was, to give the princess Mary to some one, who upon her title might pretend to the crown, whom therefore he promised to second. Our king and Francis not ignorant of the emperor's designs, agreed on the other side, partly to join with the duke of Gueldres for invading the adjoining territories to France, and partly to renew the ancient claim to Navarre, and assail the emperor in those quarters. Yet neither did that of the emperor take effect, because there was no means to recover the person of the princess Mary. Nor this of our king's, because Francis employing his thoughts wholly on the affairs of Italy, did not think fit to comply openly with one against whom the Pope had fulminated. Howbeit, our king for defence of his authority and second Marriage, neglected not to obtain from the parliament a confirmation thereof, and of the Succession in that line, (as is mentioned before;) sending also to queen Catharine at Bugden near Huntingdon, in sequence thereof, Edward Lee, abp. of York, and Cuthbert Tonstall, bishop of Duresme, to signify unto her, that he took it ill that she still claimed the title of Queen, &c. the passages of which negotiation I have thought fit to transcribe out of the Original Record, as containing many material points concerning the whole frame of the business.

Their Letter to the King, was this:

“ Please it your highness to understand, that this day we repaired to the princess Dowager, and there I, the abp. of York, for an introduction to declare to her the effect of our commission, said to her; 1. That your highness had often sent to her divers of your council, and amongst them me, one, to declare unto her the invalidity of the Marriage, between your highness and her; 2. That carnal knowledge, which is the great key of the matter, is sufficiently proved in the law, as also some that were of the council do avow; 3. That upon proof so sufficiently made of carnal knowledge, Divorce was made between your highness and her; 4. That upon Divorce made by lawful Sentence, she was admonished to leave the name of a queen, and not to account or call herself hereafter your highness wife; 5. How that after your highness was discharged of the Marriage made with her, you contracted new Marriage with your dearest wife queen Anne; 6. That for so much as, thanked be God, fair issue is already sprung of this Marriage, and more likely to follow, by God's grace, that the whole body of your realm gathered together in parliament, hath for the establishment of this issue, by your dearest wife queen Anne, and the Succession coming of this Marriage, made Acts and Ordinances against all them that would in word or in deed withstand them, and that for these purposes, we were sent to her grace, to the intent she might understand the true purpose of these Acts, with the pains; lest by ignorance she should fall in any of them, and so I declared the Act. Which thing being thus declared to her, she being therewith in great choler and agony, and always interrupting our words to the aforesaid points, made these Answers following. To the first, that she took the Matrimony between your highness and her for good, and so always would account herself to be your highness's lawful wife, in which opinion she said she would continually, till death, persist. To the second, she utterly denied that ever carnal knowledge was had between her and prince Arthur, and that she would never confess the contrary, and with loud voice when mention was made of that point, she said they lied falsely that so said. To the third, she answered, that she is not bound to stand to that Divorce made by my lord of Canterbury, whom she called a shadow, and that although he had given Sentence against her, yet the Pope had given Sentence with her, whom she took for Christ's vicar, and therefore would always obey him, as his faithful daughter. To the fourth, she answered, that she would never leave the name of a queen, and she would always take herself for your highness wife. To the fifth, she said that this Marriage, made after her Appeal, which she made by your highness leave and consent, is of no value. To the sixth, she answered, that she is not bound to the acts of the parliament, for so much as she is your highness wife, and not subject to your highness, and also because these Acts were made by your highness subjects in your favour, your highness being party in this matter; with divers other unseemly words. Unto which her Answer I the bishop of Duresme replying, forasmuch as she had said in her communication, that both I and the residue of her council had always shewed unto her, that her matter is just and good; I said, that all the question whereupon we were consulted at such time as the legates were here, depended only upon the validity of the Bull and Breve, albeit I said, that sith that time divers other questions had risen and been debated by many Universities, the chief of Christendom, of which one was Bononia, the Pope's own town; and by them concluded, that after the decease of the brother, who had had carnal knowledge with his wife, the brother living might not marry the said wife by any dispensation of the Pope, because it was forbidden by the law of God. And forasmuch as the Pope (albeit the said conclusions, have been by learned men sent from your highness, declared unto him) never made answer to maintain lawfully his power to the contrary, but rather in confirmation of the Opinions of the said Universities, said at Marseilles, that if your grace would send a Proxie thither, he would give the Sentence for your highness against her, because that he knew that your Cause was good and just, which his saying was accordingly also to an Epistle Decretal sent hither by the legat Campejus, whereof the effect was, that if marriage and carnal knowlege were had betwixt prince Arthur and her, the legates should pronounce for the Divorce, according whereunto proofs were brought in before the legats, and also since, before the convocations of this realm, and the bishop of Canterbury, and by them allowed and approved as sufficient and lawful: whereby doth plainly appear, that the Sentence given by the Pope to the contrary was not available, because it pronounced the Dispensation, (which he had no power to grant, seeing it was against the law of God) to be good; therefore I had now changed my former opinion, and exhorted her to do the semblable, and forbear to usurp any more the name of a queen; specially for that the Sentence she sticketh so greatly unto, was given after your Grace's appeal to the council general, and intimate to the Pope, so that it could not be available. And that if she should so do, she might thereby attain much quietness for herself, and her friends, and that she being conformable so to do, I doubted not but your highness would suffer her to have about her such persons as should be to her pleasure, and intreat her as your Grace's most dearest sister, with all liberty and pleasure, with divers other things which by her much enterlacing, I was forced to answer unto. The specialities whereof, and of her obstinacy, that she will in no wise, ne for any peril of her life or goods relinquish the name of a queen, we do remit for tediousness unto the wisdoms and discretions of my lord of Chester, Mr. Almoner, and Mr. Redell, who like as they have very substantially, wisely, and effectually ordered themselves in the execution of the premises, so we doubt not, but that they will sincerely report the circumstances of the same unto your highness, whom we beseech

Almighty God long to preserve in much honour, to his pleasure, and your hearts desire. At Huntingdon, the 21 day of May. By your highness most humble subjects, servants and chaplains, EDOVARD EDOU, CUTHBERT DURZENE.

Queen Catharine, or (as the king commanded her to be called) the Princess Dowager, finding now no assistance but spiritual from the Pope, nor reparation procured by the emperor but incertain and slow, and for the rest grieving at the prosperity and fruitfulness of queen Anne (now with child again, whereof yet she miscarried) fell into her last sickness at Kimbolton in Huntingdonshire, in the 50th year of her age, and the three and thirtieth since her coming into England; during which time, though comforted by the king and Eustachio Chapuys, doctor of both laws, and ambassador resident from Charles, she fell so desperately ill, as finding death now coming, she caused a maid attending on her to write to the king to this effect:

"My most dear Lord, King and Husband: The hour of my death now approaching, I cannot chuse, out out of love I bear you, advise you of your soul's health, which you ought to prefer before all considerations of the world or flesh whatsoever. For which yet you have cast me into many calamities, and yourself into many troubles. But I forgive you all; and pray God to do so likewise. For the rest I commend unto you Mary our daughter, beseeching you to be a good father to her, as I have heretofore desired. I must intreat you also, to respect my maids, and give them in marriage, which is not much, they being but three; and to all my other servants, a year's pay besides their due, lest otherwise they should be unprovided for. Lastly, I make this vow, that mine eyes desire you above all things. Farewell."

Besides which Letter she dictated another to Eustachius, desiring him to procure that the emperor might put our king in mind of her request, when otherwise he forgot it; and soon afterwards she died.

29. Proceedings against THOMAS WOLSEY, Cardinal and Archbishop of York, upon a Præmunire, and for other Offences: 20 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1529. [Lord Herb. in Kennett Comp. Hist. 123. 4 Co. Inst. 89. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 490.]

CARDINAL Wolsey being now divested of his late power (wherein he had the glory, in some sort, to have been superior to his king) and for the rest being left alone, and exposed not only to a general hatred, but to the private machinations of the present and future queen, became sensible of his ill estate; though yet he did not believe himself so near his overthrow, as it appeared afterwards. But what could he hope for, when such puissant enemies did procure his destruction? Therefore, though he received some advices from Rome, which might argue a care rather than a power for his conservation, yet in effect what secret intelligence soever passed betwixt the pope and him, came to the emperor first, and after to queen Catharine, who cunningly caused it to be whispered into the king's ears, by some more indirect ways, than it could possibly be imagined to proceed from her. Likewise mistress Anne Bolen, having learned from some of the king's wisest and gravest counsellors divers malversations of the cardinal, was so far from disguising them, that she even misinterpreted his better actions. Edmund Campion adds to these reasons, that sir Francis Bryan being in Rome, did by the means of a familiar of one who kept the Pope's papers, obtain a Letter of the cardinal's, which wrought his ruin, in this manner: Having first shewed her the cardinal's hand-writing, and then corrupted her, this courtesan so dexterously performed the rest, as upon pretence of visiting her servant in his study, she conveyed away this letter, and gave it Bryan, who failed not immediately to send it to our king. Which relation of Campion, though I will not contradict, yet I suppose to be the more improbable, that I find by original dispatches, Bryan was come from Rome before any argument of the king's disfavour to the cardinal appeared. Howsoever, the way the king took to overthrow him was merely legal, though approaching to Summum Jus, after most mens opinion. In the carriage whereof yet that secrecy was used, that the cardinal did not, or perchance out of greatness of mind, would not take notice of what was intended against him. So that though the Bill or Indictment was put in (at the beginning of Michaelmas term) yet did he ride that day to the Chancery with his accustomed pomp. Of which our king being advertised, thought fit to forbid him the place; as thinking it undecent, that a man, who was upon terms of conviction, should administer that high charge. Therefore the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were sent, the 18th of October, to require the great seal of him. But the cardinal, instead of rendering it, disputed their authority, alledging the place of lord chancellor, was by the king's letters patents given him during life. [Qu. the validity of such a patent, see Co. 4. Inst.] The two dukes hereupon returned to court, bringing the next day the king's letters to the cardinal, who having read them, delivered immediately the great seal; in sequence thereof, also submitting himself to the king, who commanded him to leave York-Place, and simply to depart to Asher, a country-house near Hampton-Court, belonging to the bishop of Winchester. He charged his officers also to inventory and bring forth his goods. Whereupon much brave furniture made into hangings, besides whole pieces of rich stuffs were set upon divers tables in his house; the variety and number whereof may be imagined, when (as Cavendish hath it) of fine Holland cloth alone there were a thousand pieces. Besides, the walls of his gallery on the one side, were hanged with rich suits of cloth of gold, cloth of silver, cloth of tissue, and cloth of bodkin; on the other side was placed the most glorious suit of copes that had been seen in England. In a chamber near to the gallery was a great cupboard of plate, of massy gold; and in a chamber adjoining, vast quantity of other plate. All which the cardinal commanded sir William Gascoigne (his treasurer) to deliver to the king, when he was required.

The Bill against the Cardinal.

In the mean while the Bill against the cardinal proceeded, the most substantial parts whereof being extracted out of the Original Record, I have thought fit to present to the reader. The ground upon which Christopher Hales, the king's Attorney, prosecuted the cardinal, was a statute of 16 Richard 2, in which is enacted, "That whereas the commons of the realm ought of right, and were wont of old time to sue in the king's court to recover their presentments to churches, prebends, and other benefices of holy church, to which they had right to present, and when judgment shall be given in the said court upon such a plea and presentment, the archbishops, bishops, and other spiritual persons, which have institutions of such benefices within their jurisdictions, be bound, and have made execution of such judgments by the king's commandments, of all the time aforesaid, without interruption, and also be bound of right to make execution of many other the king's commandments: of which right the crown of England hath been peaceably seized, as well now, as in the time of all his progenitors. And whereas the bishop of Rome" (for so he is termed in the act) "had made divers processes and censures of excommunication upon certain bishops in England, because they have made execution of such commandments, and also because he hath ordained and purposed to translate some prelates of the realm, some out of the realm, and some from one bishoprick to another within the said realm, without the king's assent and knowledge, and without the assent of the prelates, which so shall be translated; which prelates be much profitable and necessary to our lord the king, and to all his realm; which translations if they should be suffered, the statutes of the realm should be defeated and made void, and his said liege sages of his council, without his assent, and against his will, carried away and gotten out of his realm, and the substance and treasure of the realm shall be carried away, and so the realm destitute as well of counsel as of substance, to the final destruction of the same realm; and so the crown of England, which hath been so free at all times, that it hath been in no earthly subjection, but immediately subject to God in all things touching the legality of the same crown, and to none other, should be submitted to the pope; and the laws and statutes of the said realm, by him defeated and avoided at his will, in perpetual destruction of the sovereignty of the king our lord, his crown, his regality, and of all his realm, &c. Therefore the king, by the assent of his lords, and at the request of the commons, hath ordained and established, that, if any purchase or pursue, or cause to be purchased or pursued, in the court of Rome, or elsewhere, any Translations, Processes, and Sentences of Excommunication, Bulls, Instruments, or other things whatsoever, which touch the king, against him, his crown, and regality or realm, and they which bring within the realm, or them receive, or make thereof notification, or any other execution whatsoever within the same realm or without; that they, their notaries, procurators, maintainers, abettors, factors and counsellors, shall be put out of the king's protection, and their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, forfeit to the king, and that they be attached by their bodies if they may be found, and brought before the king and his council, there to answer to the cases aforesaid, or that process be made against them by a writ of Premunire facias, in manner as it is ordained in other Statutes of Provisors, and other, which do sue in any other court, in derogation of the regality of our lord the king."—

Upon which statute it was alledged, "That Thomas, legatus de latere, cardinal, archbishop of York, and primate of England, being not ignorant of the premises, had obtained certain Bulls from Clement 7, by which he exercised jurisdiction and authority legatine, to the deprivation of the king's power established in his courts of justice; which said Bulls he caused to be publicly read in Westminster, (Aug. 28, 1525) assuming to himself thereupon the dignity and jurisdiction of Legatus de Latere, which he hath exercised from the said 28th of Aug. to this day, to the prejudice of the right of both secular and ecclesiastical persons, and that by colour thereof, he had given away the Church of Stoke-Guildford in the county of Surrey (being of right in the donation of the prior of St. Pancrase) to one James Gorton, who also enjoyed it accordingly. All which was to the contempt of the king and his crown, and contrary to the aforesaid statutes of 16 Rd. 2. Moreover that, by colour of the said authority, he had caused the last Wills and Testaments of many (out of his diocese) to be exhibited and proved in his court, and their goods and chattels to be administered by such as he appointed. Also that, under colour of the said authority, he had made divers visitations out of his diocese, and drawn divers Pensions from Abbeyes, to the contempt of the king and his laws."

The proofs of which particulars, though evident and notorious, were not yet urged to his conviction, till, through the king's special permission (by writ of October 28.) John Scuse and Christopher Genney appeared in court as his Attorneys; where, for all other Answers, they protested in the said cardinal's name, that the said cardinal did not know the impetration of the said Bulls to have been to the contempt and prejudice of the king, or that it was against any Statute of Provisors heretofore made. As for the particulars wherewith he was charged by master Attorney, he confest them all true in the manner and form alledged: and so submitted himself to the king. Whereupon the court gave Sentence, that "he was out of the king's protection, and his lands, goods, and chattels forfeit, and that his person might be seized on."

The Cardinal is condemned in the Star Chamber.

Not contented herewith yet, another proof of the same kind was by the king's attorney produced against the Cardinal, namely, that contrary to the right of the true patron (being the master and fellows of the hospital of St. Lazarus in Burton-Lazar), he had, by the same authority, given away the parish-church of Galby in Leicestershire, and diocese of Lincoln (then vacant by the death of one Woodroff) to one John Allen, doctor of both laws, and placed him in it.—And thus fell the Cardinal, together with all his vast possessions, into the king's hands. But the king did not think it enough that he had particularly advantaged himself of the Cardinal's punishment, unless he made some use thereof to the general, so he called a Council of the nobles, to sit in the Star-Chamber, who having sufficiently condemned him, he afterwards remitted him to the Parliament, which began November 3, 1529. Wherein the king also did wisely, since by interesting the publick in his condemnation, he both declined the censure of those who thought the late Proceedings to have been of the severest, and endeared his people by putting the power of punishing him into their hands. Therefore they took it as an intire satisfaction for all they had hitherto suffered; and by applauding of the king, made him know how thankfully they took this favour. And thus did the king return to that former good opinion he had of his subjects.

ARTICLES preferred against the Cardinal in Parliament.

Hereupon, certain Articles against the Cardinal were preferred in parliament. The Original whereof, found among our Records, I have thought fit to transcribe; and the rather for that our vulgar Chronicles misreport them.

"Constrained by necessity of our fidelity and conscience, complain and shew to your royal majesty, we your graces humble, true, faithful, and obedient subjects, That the lord Cardinal of York, lately your graces chancellor, presuming to take upon him the authority of the Popes Legat de latere, hath by divers and many sundry ways and fashions committed notable, high, and grievous Offences, misusing, altering, and subverting the order of your graces laws, and otherwise contrary to your high honour, prerogative, crown, estate, and dignity royal, to the inestimable damage of your graces subjects of every degree, and consequently to the great hindrance, diminution, and decay of the universal wealth of this your graces realm, as is it touched summarily and particularly in certain Articles here following; which be but a few in comparison of all his enormities, excesses, and transgressions committed against your graces laws. That is to say,

1. First, where your grace, and your noble progenitors within this your realm of England, being kings of England, have been so free, that they have had in all the world no other sovereign, but immediate subject to Almighty God, in all things, touching the regality of your crown of England, and the same pre-eminence, prerogative, jurisdiction, lawful and peaceable possession, your grace, and your noble progenitors have had, used, and enjoyed without interruption, or business therefore, by the space of 200 years and more; whereby your grace may prescribe against the Popes Holiness, that he should not, nor ought to send, or make any legat to execute any authority legatine, contrary to your graces prerogative within this your realm. Now the lord Cardinal of York being your subject, and natural liege born, hath of his high, orgullous, and insatiable mind, for his own singular advancement and profit, in derogation, and to the great imblemishment and hurt of your said royal jurisdiction, and prerogative, and the large continuance of the possession of the same, obtained authority legatine, by reason whereof he hath not only hurt your said prescription, but also by the said authority legatine hath spoiled and taken away from many houses of religion in this your realm, much substance of their goods; and also hath usurped upon all your Ordinaries within this your realm much part of their jurisdiction, in derogation of your prerogative, and to the great hurt of your said ordinaries, prelates, and religious.—2. Also, the said lord cardinal, being your ambassador in France, made a Treaty with the French king for the Pope, your majesty not knowing any part thereof, nor named in the same; and binding the said French king to abide his order and award, if any controversy or doubt should arise upon the same betwixt the said Pope and the French king.—3. Also, the said lord cardinal, being your ambassador in France, sent a Commission to sir Gregory de Casalis, under your great seal, in your graces name, to conclude a Treaty of Amity with the duke of Ferrara, without any command or warrant of your highness, nor your said highness advertised or made privy to the same.—4. Also, the said lord cardinal, of his presumptuous mind in divers and many of his Letters and Instructions sent out of this realm to outward parties, had joined himself with your grace, as in saying and writing in his said Letters and Instructions; 'The king and I.' And, 'I would ye should do thus. The king and I give unto you our hearty thanks.' Whereby it is apparent that he used himself more like a fellow to your highness, than like a subject.—5. Also, where it hath ever been accustomed within this your realm, that when noblemen do swear their household servants, the first part of their oath hath been, 'That they should be true liegemen to the king and his heirs kings of England; the same lord cardinal caused his servants to be only sworn to him, as if there had been no sovereign above him.—6. And also, whereas your grace is our sovereign lord and head, in whom standeth all the surety and wealth of this realm, the same lord cardinal knowing himself to have the foul and contagious disease of the great pox, broken out upon him in divers places of his body, came daily to your grace, rowning in your ear, and blowing upon your most noble grace with his perilous and infective breath, to the marvelous danger of your highness, if God of his infinite goodness had not better provided for your highness. And when he was once healed of them, he made your grace to believe that his disease was an impostume in his head, and of none other thing.—7. Also, the said lord cardinal, by his authority legatine, hath given, by prevention, the Benefices of divers persons, as well spiritual as temporal; contrary to your crown and dignity, and your laws and estatutes therefore provided; by reason whereof he is in danger to your grace of forfeiture of lands and goods, and his body at your pleasure.—8. Also, the said lord cardinal, taking upon him otherwise than a true counsellor ought to do, hath used to have all ambassadors to come first to him alone, and so hearing their charges and intents it is to be thought he hath instructed them after his pleasure and purpose, before that they came to your presence; contrary to your high commandment by your graces mouth to him given, and also to other persons sent to him by your grace.—9. Also, the said lord Cardinal hath practised so, that all manner of Letters sent from beyond the sea to your highness have come first to his hands, contrary to your high commandment by your own mouth, and also by others sent to him by your grace; by reason whereof your highness, nor any of your council had knowledge of no matters, but such as it pleased him to shew them; whereby your highness and your council have been compelled of very force to follow his devices, which oftentimes were set forth by him under such crafty and covert means, that your highness and your council have oftentimes been abused. Inasmuch, that when your council have found, and put divers doubts and things which have afterwards ensued, he to abuse them used these words; 'I will lay my head that no such thing shall happen.'—10. Also, the said lord cardinal hath practised that no manner of person, having charge to make espial of things done beyond the sea, should at their return come first to your grace, nor to any other of your council, but only to himself, and in case they did the contrary, he punished them for so doing.—11. Also, the said lord cardinal hath granted License under your great seal for carrying out of grain and other victual, after the restraint hath been made thereof, for his own lucre, and singular advantage of him and his servants, for to send thither as he bare secret favour, without your graces warrant or knowledge thereof.—12. Also, the said lord cardinal used, many years together, not only to write unto all your ambassadors resident with other princes in his own name all advertisements concerning your graces affairs, being in their charge; and in the same his Letters wrote many things of his own mind, without your graces pleasure being known, concealing divers things which had been necessary for them to know; But also caused them to write their Advertisements unto him: and of the same Letters he used to conceal for the compassing of his purposes many things both from all your other counsellors, and from yourself also.—13. Also, where good hospitality hath been used to be kept in houses and places of Religion of this realm, and many poor people thereby relieved, the said hospitality and relief is now decayed and not used; and it is commonly reported that the occasion thereof is, because the said lord cardinal hath taken such impositions of the rulers of the said houses, as well for his favour in making of abbots, and priors, as for his visitation, by his authority legatine: and yet, nevertheless, taketh yearly of such religious houses, such yearly and continual charges, as they be not able to keep hospitality as they used to do; which is a great cause that there be so many vagabonds, beggars and thieves.—14. Also, where the said lord cardinal said, before the suppression of such Houses as he hath suppressed, that the possessions of them should be set to farm among your lay-subjects, after such reasonable yearly rent as they should well thereupon live, and keep good hospitality; and now the demaun possessions of the said houses, since the suppression of them, hath been surveyed, mete, and measured by the acre, and be now set above the value of the old rent; and also such as were farmers by covent-seal, and copy-holders be put out, and moved of their farms, or else compelled to pay new fines, contrary to all equity and conscience.—15. Also, the said lord cardinal, sitting among the lords, and other of your most honourable council, used himself that if any man would shew his mind according to his duty, contrary to the opinion of the said cardinal, he would so take him up with his accustomed words, that they were better to hold their peace than to speak, so that he would hear no man speak, but one or two great personages, so that he would have all the words himself, and consumed much time with a fair tale.—16. Also, the said lord cardinal by his ambition and pride, hath hindered and undone many of your poor subjects for want of dispatchment of matters; for he would no man should meddle but himself. Inso-much, that it hath been affirmed by many wise men, that ten of the most wise, and most expert men in England, were not sufficient in convenient time to order the matters that he would retain to himself: and many times he deferred the ending of matters, because that sutors should attend and wait upon him, whereof he had no small pleasure that his house might be replenished with sutors.—17. Also, the said lord cardinal, by his authority legatine, hath used, if any spiritual man having any riches or substance, deceased, he hath taken their goods as his own; by reason whereof their Wills be not performed: and one mean he had, to put them in fear that were made executors, to refuse to meddle.—18. Also, the said lord cardinal constrained all ordinaries in England yearly to compound with him, or else he will usurp half or the whole of their jurisdiction by prevention, not for good order of the diocess, but to extort treasure; for there is never a poor arch-deacon in England, but that he paid yearly to him a portion of his living.—19. Also, the said lord cardinal hath not only by his untrue suggestion to the Pope, shamefully slandered many good religious houses, and good virtuous men dwelling in them, but also suppressed by reason thereof above 80 houses of religion; and where, by authority of his Bull, he should not suppress any house that had more men of religion in number, above the number of 6 or 7, he hath suppressed divers houses that had above the number: and thereupon hath caused divers offices to be found by verdict, untruly, that the religious persons, so suppressed, had voluntarily forsaken their said houses, which was untrue, and so hath caused open perjury to be committed, to the high displeasure of Almighty God.—20. Also, the said lord cardinal hath examined divers and many matters in the Chancery, after Judgment thereof given at the common law, in subversion of your laws; and made some persons restore again to the other party condemned, that they had in execution by virtue of the Judgment in the common law.—21. Also, the said lord cardinal hath granted many injunctions by writ, and the parties never called thereunto, nor bill put in against them. And, by reason thereof, divers of your subjects have been put from their lawful possession of their lands and tenements. And, by such means, he hath brought the more party of the sutors of this your realm before himself, whereby he and divers of his servants have gotten much riches, and your subjects suffered great wrongs.—22. Also, the said lord cardinal, to augment his great riches, hath caused divers pardons granted by the Pope to be suspended, which could not be revived till that the said lord cardinal were rewarded, and also have a yearly pension of the said pardon.—23. Also, the said lord cardinal, not regarding your laws nor justice, of his extort power, hath put out divers and many farmers of his lands, and also patents of the archbishoprick of York, and bishoprick of Winchester, and of the abby of St. Albans, which had good and sufficient grant thereof by your laws.—24. Also, the same lord cardinal at many times when any houses of religion have been void, he hath sent his officers thither, and with crafty persuasions hath induced them to compromit their election in him. And that, before ere he named or confirmed any of them, he and his servants received so much great goods of them, that in manner it hath been to the undoing of the house.—25. Also, by his authority legatine, the same lord cardinal hath visited the most part of the religious houses and colleges in this your realm, hath taken of them the twenty-fifth part of their livelihood, to the great extortion of your subjects, and derogation of your laws and prerogative; and no law to bear him so to do.—26. Also, when matters have been near at Judgment by process at your common law, the same lord cardinal hath not only given and sent injunctions to the parties, but also sent for your judges, and expressly by threats commanding them to defer the Judgment, to the evident subversion of your laws, if the judges would so have ceased.—27. Also, whereas neither the bishoprick of York, nor Winchester, nor the abbey of St. Albans, nor the profit of his legation, nor the benefit of the chancery, nor his great pension out of France, nor his wards, and other inordinate taking could not suffice him, he hath made his son Winter to spend 2700*l.* by the year, which he taketh to his own use, and giveth him not past 200*l.* yearly to live upon.—28. Also, where the said lord cardinal did first sue unto your grace to have your assent to be legate de latere, he promised and solemnly protested before your majesty, and before the lords both spiritual and temporal, that he would nothing do or attempt by virtue of his legacy, that should be contrary to your gracious prerogative or regality, or to the damage or prejudice of the jurisdiction of any ordinary, and that by his legacy no man should be hurt or offended: and upon that condition, and no other, he was admitted by your grace to be legate within this your realm, which condition he hath broken, as is well known to all your subjects. And when that he made this promise, he was busy in his suit at Rome, to visit all the clergy of England, both exempt and not exempt.—29. Also, upon the suit of the said lord cardinal at Rome, to have his authority legatine, he made untrue surmise to the Pope's holiness against the clergy of your realm, which was, that the regular persons of the said clergy had given themselves in reprobum sensum; which words St. Paul writing to the Romans applyed to abominable sin; which slander to your Church of England, shall for ever remain in the register at Rome against the clergy of this your realm.—30. Also, the said lord cardinal had the more part of the goods of Dr. Smith, late bishop of London, bishop Savage of York, Mr. Dalby, archdeacon of Richmond, Mr. Tornyers, Dr. Rothal, late bishop of Durham, and of Dr. Fox, late bishop of Winchester, contrary to their wills and your laws and justice.—31. Also, at the Oyer and Terminer at York, proclamation was made, that every man should put in their bills for extortion of ordinaries, and when divers bills were put in against the officers of the said lord cardinal of extortion, for taking 12*d.* of the pound for probation of testaments, whereof divers bills were found before justice Fitz-Herbert, and other commissioners, the same lord cardinal removed the same indictments into the chancery by Certiorari, and rebuked the same Fitz-Herbert for the same cause.—32. Also, the said lord Cardinal hath busied and endeavoured himself by crafty and untrue tales to make dissention and debate amongst your nobles of your realm, which is ready to be proved.—33. Also, the said lord cardinal's officers have divers times compelled your subjects to serve him with carts for carriages. And also his servants have taken both corn and cattel, fish, and all other victuals at your graces price or under, as though it had been for your grace, which is contrary to the laws.—34. Also, the said lord cardinal hath misused himself in your most honourable court, in keeping of as great estate there in your absence, as your grace would have done, if you had been there present in your own person.—35. Also, his servants, by virtue of your commission under your broad seal by him to them given, hath taken cattel, and all other victual, at as low price as your purveyors have done for your grace by your prerogative, against the laws of your realm.—36. Also, where it hath been accustomed that your purveyors for your honourable household have had yearly out of your town and liberty of St. Albans 300 or 400 quarters of wheat, truth it is, that since the lord cardinal had the room of abbot there, your said purveyors could not be suffered by him and his officers, to take any wheat within the said town or liberties.—37. Also he hath divers times given injunction to your servants, that have been for causes before him in the Star-Chamber, that they nor other for them should make labour, by any manner of way directly or indirectly, to your grace, to obtain your gracious favour or pardon, which was a presumptuous intent for any subject.—38. Also, the said lord cardinal did call before him sir John Stanley, knight, which had taken a farm by covent-seal of the abbot and covent of Chester, and afterwards by his power and might, contrary to right, committed the said sir John Stanley to the prison of Fleet by the space of one year, until such time as he compelled the said sir John to release his covent seal to one Leghe of Adlington, which married one Lark's daughter, which woman the said lord cardinal kept, and had with her two children. Whereupon the said sir John Stanley, upon displeasure taken in his heart, made himself monk in Westminster, and there died.—39. Also, on a time your grace being at St. Albans, according to the ancient custom used within your verge, your clerk of the market doing his office, did present unto your officers of your most honourable household the prices of all manner of victuals, within the precinct of the verge; and it was commanded by your said officers to set up the said prices both on the gates of your honourable household, and also in the market-place within the town of St. Albans, as of ancient custom it hath been used; and the lord cardinal, hearing the same, presumptuously, and not like a subject, caused the aforesaid prices which were sealed with your graces seal, accustomedly used for the same, to be taken off, and pulled down in the said market-place where they were set up, and in the same place set up his own prices sealed with his seal, and would, if it had not been letted, in semblable manner used your seal standing upon your graces gates; and also would of his presumptuous mind, have openly set in the streets within your said town your clerk of your market. By which presumption and usurpation your grace may perceive, that in his heart he hath reputed himself to be equal with your royal majesty.—40. Also, the said lord cardinal, of his further pompous and presumptuous mind, hath enterprised to join and imprint the cardinals hat under your arms in your coin of groats, made at your city of York, which like deed hath not been seen to have been done by any subject within your realm before this time. 41. Also, where one sir Edward Jones, clerk, parson of Crowley in the county of Buckingham, in the 18th year of your most noble reign, let his said parsonage with all tythes, and other profits of the same to one Wm. Johnson by indentures for certain years, within which years the dean of the said cardinal's college in Oxford, pretended title to a certain portion of tythes within the said parsonage, supposing the said portion to belong to the parsonage of Chicheley, which was appropriated to the priory of Tykeford, lately suppressed, where of truth, the parsons of Crowley have been peaceably possessed of the said portion, time out of mind: whereupon a subpoena was directed to the said Johnson to appear before the said lord cardinal at Hampton-Court; where without any bill, the said lord cardinal committed him to the Fleet, where he remained by the space of twelve weeks, because he would not depart with the said portion; and at the last, upon a recognition made, that he should appear before the said lord cardinal wheresoever he was commanded, he was delivered out of the Fleet. Howbeit, as yet the said portion is so kept from him, that he dare not deal with it.—42. Also, where one Martin Docowra had a lease of the manor of Balsal in the county of Warwick, for term of certain years, an injunction came to him out of the Chancery, by writ, upon pain of 1000*l.* that he should avoid the possession of the same manor, and suffer sir Geo. Throgmorton, knight, to take the profits of the same manor, to the time the matter depending in the Chancery between the lord of St. Johns, and the said Docowra were discuss; and yet the said Docowra never made answer in the Chancery, never was called into the Chancery for that matter. And now of late he hath received the like injunction, upon pain of 2000*l.* contrary to the course of the common law.—43. Also, whereas in the parliament-chamber, and in the open parliament, communication and devices were had and moved, wherein mention was, by an incident, made of matters touching heresies, and erroneous sects. It was spoken and reported by one bishop there being present, and confirmed by a good number of the same bishops in presence of all the lords spiritual and temporal then assembled, and two of the said bishops were miuded and desired to repair unto the University of Cambridge, for examination, reformation, and correction of such errors as then seemed, and were reported to reign amongst the students and scholars of the same, as well touching the Lutheran sect and opinions, as otherwise; the lord cardinal informed of the good minds and intents of the said two bishops in that behalf, expressly inhibited and commanded them in no wise so to do. By means whereof the same errors (as they affirmed) crept more abroad, and took greater place: saying furthermore, that it was not in their defaults that the said heresies were not punished, but in the said lord cardinal, and that it was no reason any blame or lack should be arrected unto them for his offence. Whereby it evidently appeareth that the said lord cardinal, besides all other his heinous offences, hath been the impeacher and disturber of due and direct correction of heresies; being highly to the danger and peril of the whole body and good Christian people of this your realm.—44. Finally, forasmuch as by the aforesaid articles is evidently declared to your most royal majesty, that the lord cardinal by his outrageous pride hath greatly shadowed a long season your graces honour, which is most highly to be regarded, and by his insatiable avarice and ravenous appetite, to have riches and treasure without measure, hath so grievously oppressed your poor subjects, with so manifold crafts of bribery and extortion, that the commonwealth of this your graces realm is thereby greatly decayed and impoverisbed: and also by his cruelty, iniquity, affection and partiality, hath subverted the due course and order of your graces laws, to the undoing of a great number of your loving people;—Please it your most royal majesty therefore of your excellent goodness towards the weal of this your realm, and subjects of the same, to set such order and direction upon the said lord cardinal, as may be to the terrible example of others to beware so to offend your grace and your laws hereafter: and that he be so provided for, that he never have any power, jurisdiction, or authority, hereafter to trouble, vex, and impoverish the commonwealth of this your realm, as he hath done heretofore, to the great hurt and damage of every man almost, high and low. Which for your grace so doing, will daily pray, as their duty is, to Almighty God, for the prosperous estate of your most royal majesty long to endure in honour and good health, to the pleasure of God, and your hearts most desire.

“Subscribed the 1st day of December, the 21st year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Henry 8. T. More.* T. Norfolk, Char. Suffolk, Tho. Dorset, H. Excter, G. Shrewsbury, R. Fitzwater, Ju. Oxniord, H. Northumberland, T. Darcy, T. Rochford, W. Mountjoy, Wm. Sandys, Wm. Fitz-William, Henry Guldeford, Anthony Fitz-Herbert, John Fitz-James.”

* Concerning these signatures, lord Coke, (4 Inst. 95), observes ‘So these Articles began to be subscribed by sir Thos. More, lord chancellor, and ended with the two judges of the law.’

These Articles being agreed to by the whole house were presented to the king by the lords, and then sent down to the lower house: where Tho. Cromwel (obtaining the place of a Burgess) so wittily defended the cardinal his matter, that no Treason could be laid to his charge. Yet could not the resisting of this brunt, nor even the gracious Messages received frequently from the king, cheer up the cardinal. For as he found the Pope had now a long while neglected to give the king any satisfaction, which certainly was the only way to procure the cardinal's restitution, and that, for the rest, no evident sign of the king's relenting appeared, so being not able to support any longer his many afflictions, he fell dangerously sick. The news whereof being brought to the king's ears, moved so much compassion, as not only he, but, by his intreaty, mistress Anne Bolen, whom the cardinal had in vain importuned to intercede for him, also sent him several tokens; whereof one was a ruby, wherein the king's image was curiously engraven, a gift heretofore of the cardinal's, together with a gracious message delivered by Dr. Butts, his physician; 'That his highness was not angry with him in his heart, which he should know shortly.' Whereupon the cardinal recovered his health, for the king, so confirming his promises, sealed his pardon, Feb. 12, and three days after, by letters patents, restored him to the archbishoprick of York. Moreover, he sent him money, plate, rich hangings, and furniture for his house and chapel, in that quantity, as the cardinal was for the present much recovered: hoping also, that since he had resigned his house called York-house, but afterward by the king styled the Mannor of Westminster, now Whitehall, that his punishment ended there, and himself now upon terms of regaining the king's favour. The confidence whereof also made him to be an humble suppliant to the king, that, for his health's sake, he might have leave to remove to Richmond-house, the use of which he had received in exchange from the king, for that his sumptuous palace which he built, and called by the name of Hampton-court.

The Cardinal sent to his Bishoprick of York.

And now Cardinal Wolsey, it seems, had tried his utmost skill for recovering of the king's favour; whereof also some hope was given him in his being permitted to remove to Richmond. But as his enemies suspected he would make use of this nearness, to obtain access to the king, so they laboured instantly to send him to the north. Wherein they prevailed at length, obtaining further, that the Revenues of the bishoprick of Winchester, and abbey of Saint Albans, as also some other places of his, forfeited by the Præmunire, might be applied in part to the king's servants; a pension only out of Winchester, being reserved to the cardinal. The revenues also of his two colleges were torn and divided, which grieved him more than any other affliction:

insomuch, that he wrote to the king, humbly, as on his knees, with weeping eyes, that the college of Oxford might stand, and importuned Cromwel to this purpose, since they are in a manner, saith he, 'Opera manuum tuarum.' But Cromwel returned him no comfort herein, saying, 'the king was determined to dissolve them, though whether he meant to restore them again, and found them in his own name, he knew not; but wishes him to be content, &c.' howsoever, in the traffick of these and other lands, as well as negotiating his masters business, Cromwel shewed that dexterity, which at last won him much credit, both with the king and his principal counsellors. And now the cardinal being commanded to York, had no excuse for retarding his journey, but want of means, which also he signified to the king; who thereupon sent him a thousand pounds, with which and a train, reduced now to about 160 persons, he set forth, giving by the way much alms, and not a few other arguments of devotion, which also made him gracious with the people, who resorted from all places adjoining, to him. And thus with slow and unwilling removes, he came to Cawood castle near York, about the end of Sept. 1530, where he prepared according to the antient custom, to be installed with much ceremony about a month after; all access to the choir, being till then forbidden. But whether the solemnity of this action was thought by our king to be unreasonable, and misbecoming one in disgrace; or that otherwise the cardinal had cast forth some discontented words, which were related again to the king; here certainly began his final ruine. Which, as his enemies (at this distance) did with more boldness and advantage procure, so had he less means to repair himself. Insomuch, that without being able to discover or prevent their machinations, he was forced to suffer all that could be either truly, or almost falsely surmised against him. Neither had he other hope, but that the punishments he had already endured, might be accepted as an intire satisfaction for all his offences.

The Cardinal is arrested in York, of High Treason.

And now his stallion grew near, when the earl of Northumberland, warden of the marches, with one sir Walter Welsh, gentleman of the king's privy chamber, came by the king's command to Cawood, to arrest the cardinal, wherein he used that diligence and secresie, that he had placed his guards in the hall, before any escaped to advertise the cardinal thereof. Neither did he, at the earls coming up stairs, receive him in other terms than those of a guest, till entering into a private chamber together, the earl in a low and troubled voice arrested him of High Treason. The dismayed and pensive cardinal stayed a while before he answered, but at last recovering his spirits, demanded the sight of the earls commission, protesting that otherwise he would not obey; urging further, that he was a member of the college of cardinals at Rome, and so exempt from all princes jurisdiction. But while the earl replied, that he might not shew his commission, sir Walter Welsh, who had now arrested Dr. Augustine the cardinals physician, comes in, and confirms what the earl had said. The cardinal believing, by this time, that they were in good earnest, yields to sir Walter Welsh, as the kings servant, and not to the earl; to whom he said he would not submit himself, before he was better satisfied of his authority. Which whether he did out of stubbornness to the earl, who had been heretofore educated in his house, or out of despite to mistress Anne Bolen, who (he might conceive) had put this affront upon him, in finding means to employ her antient sutor to take revenge in both their names, doth not appear to me by my author. Howsoever, he protested he was no way faulty in his allegiance. Dr. Augustine, whose offence yet doth not appear to me, was dispatched to London, in the posture of a traitor, his legs tied to his horse. But the cardinal had some respite; though yet commanded to prepare for his journey; which he began at length in that deliberate manner, that if he removed slowly before from the king, he moved now more slowly to him. Inasmuch that had not the earl of Shrewsbury, to whom, being the steward of the kings household, the earl of Northumberland was commanded to deliver him, till the kings further pleasure were known, told him, that the king commanded he should be used kindly, as one whom he highly favoured; it is probable, that the afflicted cardinal would have fallen under the burthen of his own griefs. Furthermore, the earl assured him on the king's part, that, though his highness could do no less than put him to his Trial, yet that it was more for the satisfying of some persons, than out of mistrust of his traitorous doings.

The Cardinal's last Speech, and Death.

And thus at Sheffield castle, he staid a fortnight, when a wind-colick, which ended in a dysentery, took him. In which state, sir Wm. Kingston, captain of the king's guard, and constable of the Tower, attended with 24 yeomen of the guard (all of them formerly servants to the cardinal) did find him. So that, notwithstanding the many encouragements of the earl, seconded by sir Wm. Kingston (who on his knees saluted him) the cardinal remained still sick and comfortless. Neither did it avail him, that sir Wm. Kingston (on the king's part) gave him many gracious words, adding furthermore, that he should make no more haste than stood with his health and convenience. For the cardinal became still more and more dejected. Notwithstanding, as he considered that delay would but argue guiltiness, so he proceeded in his journey the best he could, till he came to Leicester abbey, where a fever, complicate with his former disease, seizing on him, he languished, not without manifest signs of his end. Being thus upon his bed, sir William

'Had I served God as diligently as I have done the king, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs; but this is my just reward. Notwithstanding, I pray ye commend me most humbly to the king, desiring him to call to remembrance all matters that have past betwixt us, and specially about queen Catharine, and then shall his grace know whether I have offended him. He is a prince of royal courage: but rather than he will want or miss any part of his will or pleasure, he will endamage the loss of one half of his realm. For, I assure you, I have often kneeled before him, sometimes the space of three hours, to persuade him from his will and appetite, but could never dissuade him from it. Therefore master Kingston, I warn you, if ever you be of his council (as for your wisdom you are meet) that ye be well assured and advised what you put in his head, for you shall never put it out again.'

After which words, as Cavendish hath them, he began an exhortation to take heed of the Lutherans, 'by the example of those of Bohemia, lest they should likewise subvert the secular power.' But as in the prosecuting of this discourse his speech failed him, so did his breath presently after, inasmuch that he died, and was buried there in the Abbey Church, Nov. 30, before day. And not, where he had begun a monument for himself, long since, wherein as appears by our Records he had not omitted his own image, which one Benedetto, a statuary of Florence, took in hand 1524, and continued till 1529, receiving for so much as was already done 4250 ducats. The design whereof was so glorious, that it exceeded far that of Henry 7. Nevertheless, I find the cardinal, when this was finished, did purpose to make a tomb for Henry 8, but dying in this manner, king Henry made use of so much as he found fit, and called it his. Thus did the tomb of the cardinal partake the same fortune with his college, as being assumed by the king; both which yet remain still imperfect. The news of the cardinal's death being brought to our king, did so much afflict him, that he wished it had cost him twenty thousand pounds upon condition he had lived. Howbeit he omitted not to enquire of about one thousand and five hundred pounds, which the cardinal had lately got without that the king could imagine how. So that, till it appeared he borrowed it of divers persons, he might perchance suspect it to be the remainder of some of his ancient acquisitions.

And thus concluded that great cardinal. A man in whom ability of arts, and industry were equally eminent, though, for being employed wholly in ambitious ways, they became dangerous instruments of power in active and mutable times. By these arts yet he found means to govern not only the chief affairs of this kingdom, but of Europe; there being no potentate, which, in his turn, did not seek to him; and as this procured him divers pensions, so, when he acquainted the king therewith, his manner was, so cunningly to disoblige that prince who did see him last, as he made way thereby oftentimes to receive as much on the other side. But not of secular princes alone, but even of the pope and clergy of Rome he was no little courted; of which therefore he made especial use, while he drew them to second him on most occasions. His birth being otherwise so obscure and mean, as no man had ever stood so single: for which reason also, his chief endeavour was not to displease any great person, which yet could not secure him against the divers pretenders of that time. For as all things passed through his hands, so they who failed in their suits generally hated him, all which, though it did but exasperate his ill nature, yet this good resulance followed, that it made him take the more care to be just; whereof also he obtained the reputation in his publick hearing of causes. For as he loved no body, so his reason carried him. And thus he was a useful minister of his king, in all points, where there was no question of disserving the Roman church; of which (at what price soever) I find he was a zealous servant; as hoping thereby to aspire to the papacy, whereof (as the factious times then were) he seemed more capable than any, had he not so immoderately affected it. Whereby also it was not hard to judge of his inclinations. That prince, who was ablest to help him to this dignity, being ever preferred by him, which therefore was the ordinary bait by which the emperor and French king one after the other, did catch him. And, upon these terms, he doubted not to convey vast treasures out of this kingdom, especially unto Rome, where he had not a few cardinals at his devotion. By whose help, though he could not obtain that supreme dignity he so passionately desired, yet he prevailed himself so much of their favour, as he got a kind of absolute power in spiritual matters at home. Wherewith again he so served the king's turn, as it made him think the less of using his own authority. One error seemed common to both, which was that such a multiplicity of offices and places were invested in him. For as it drew much envy upon the cardinal in particular, so it derogated no little from the regal authority, while one man alone seemed to exhaust all. Since it becometh princes to do like good husbandmen when they sow their grounds, which is, to scatter, and not to throw all in one place. He was no great dissembler, for so qualified a person; as ordering his businesses for the most part so cautiously, as he got more by keeping his word than by breaking it. As for his learning, (which was far from exact) it consisted chiefly in the subtilities of the Thomists, wherewith the king and himself did more often weary than satisfy each other. His style in missives was rather copious than eloquent, yet ever tending to the point. Briefly, if it be true (as Polydore observes) that no man ever did rise with fewer virtues, it is as true, that few that ever fell from so high a place had lesser crimes objected against him. Though yet Polydore (for being at his first coming into England committed to prison by him, as we have said) may be suspected as a partial author. So that in all probability he might have subsisted longer, when either his pride and immense wealth had not made him obnoxious, and suspected to the king, or that other than women had opposed him: Who as they are vigilant and close enemies, so for the most part, they carry their businesses in that manner, they leave fewer advantages against themselves, than men do. In conclusion, as I cannot assent to those who thought him happy for enjoying the untimely compassion of the people a little before his end, so I cannot but account it a principal felicity, that during his favour with the king, all things succeeded better than afterwards, though yet it may be doubted whether the impressions he gave, did not occasion divers irregularities which were observed to follow.

30. The Trial of Sir THOMAS MORE, knight, Lord Chancellor of England, for High Treason, in denying the King's Supremacy: 26 Henry VIII. A. D. 1535. [Hall. Lord Herbert's Life of Hen. VIII. More's Life of Sir Thomas More.]

A BILL being preferred in parliament, Nov. 1534, to attain Elizabeth Barton, and several others, of High-Treason, bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More were also brought into it for Misprision of Treason for the refusing of the Oath of Succession—says my lord Herbert. The same author avows the Bill did so pass; but sir Thomas's great-grandson, in his Life, shews the contrary, and that notwithstanding the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, duke of Norfolk, and secretary Cromwell, by the king's command, went to him and pressed him to a compliance, yet the chancellor influenced the king so far, that the matter of Misprision was dropt.—Sir Thomas, was also examined at other times by the lord chancellor, dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, Mr. Secretary, and others of the privy-council, who pressed him, with all the arguments they could think of, to own the king's Supremacy in direct and open terms, or plainly to deny it; but he being loth to aggravate the king's displeasure, would say no more than that the Statute was like a two-edged sword, for if he spoke against it, he should be the cause of the death of his body; and if he assented to it, he should purchase the death of his soul. Those Examinations being over, Richard Rich, newly made solicitor general, and afterwards lord Rich, with sir Richard Southwell, and Mr. Palmer, Secretary Cromwell's man, were sent by the king to take away his books. Rich, pretending friendship to him, and protesting he had no commission to talk with him about the former affair of the Supremacy, he put a case to him thus: If it were enacted by parliament that Richard Rich should be king, and that it should be Treason in any body to deny it, what offence it were to contravene that Act? Sir Thomas More answered, that he should offend if he said so, because he was bound by the Act; but that this was casus levis. Whereupon sir Thomas said, he would propose a higher Case: suppose it were enacted by parliament, Quod Deus non sit Deus, and that it were Treason to contravene, whether it were not an offence to say it, according to the said Act? Rich replied, yea; but said withal, I will propose a middle Case, because this is too high: the king, you know, is constituted supreme head of the Church upon earth; why should not you, master More, accept him for such? as you would me, if I were made king by the aforesaid supposition. More answered, the Case was not the same, because, said he, a parliament can make a king, and depose him, and that every parliament-man may give his consent thereunto, but that a subject cannot be bound so in the case of Supremacy. Quia consensus ab eo ad Parliamentum præbere non potest (so, says my lord Herbert, it is in my copy if it be not mistaken,) & quamquam Rex sic acceptus sit in Anglia, plurimæ tamen Partes extræ idem non affirmant.

Sir Thomas, having continued a prisoner in the Tower somewhat more than a twelvemonth, for he was committed about the middle of April 1534, and was brought to his Trial on the 7th of May, 1535, he went into the Court leaning on his staff, because he was much weakened by his imprisonment, but appeared with a cheerful and composed countenance. The persons constituted to try him, were, sir Thomas Audley, lord chancellor, Thomas duke of Norfolk, sir John Fitz-James, lord chief justice, sir John Baldwin, sir Richard Leicester, sir John Port, sir John Spelman, sir Walter Luke, sir Anthony Fitz-Herbert.

The Indictment was very long, but where to procure a copy of it, I could never learn; it is said in general, it contained all the Crimes that could be laid to the charge of any notorious malefactor; and sir Thomas professed it was so long, that he could scarce remember the third part of what was objected therein against him. It was read aloud by the Attorney-General; and sir Thomas's mortal sin seemed plainly to be his refusing the Oath of Succession, already mentioned.—To prove this, his double Examination in the Tower was alleged against him, the first before Secretary

Cromwell, Thomas Beade, John Tregonnel, &c. to whom he professed he had given over all thoughts of titles either to popes or princes, though the whole world should be given him, he being fully determined only to serve God. The second time before the lord chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, earl of Wiltshire, and others, before whom he compared that Oath to a two-edged sword, as before observed.

Presently after the Indictment was read, the lord chancellor and the duke of Norfolk spoke to him to this effect; 'You see now how grievously you have offended his majesty; yet he is so very merciful, that if you will lay aside your obstinacy, and change your opinion, we hope you may obtain pardon and favour in his sight.' But sir Thomas stoutly replied, 'Most noble lords, I have great reason to return thanks to your honours for this your great civility, but I beseech Almighty God, that I may continue in the mind I am in, through his grace, unto death.'—Then having intimation given that he might say what he thought fit in his own Defence, he began thus: 'When I consider the length of my Accusation, and what heinous matters are laid to my charge, I am struck with fear, lest my memory and understanding, which are both impaired, together with my bodily health, through a long indisposition contracted by my imprisonment, should now fail me so far, as to make me incapable of making such ready Answers in my Defence, as otherwise I might have done.'

The Court being sensible of his weakness, ordered a chair to be brought in, wherein he might sit himself, which he did accordingly, and then went on thus: 'This my Indictment, if I mistake not, consists of four principal Heads, each of which I purpose, God willing, to answer in order. As to the first Crime objected against me, that I have been an enemy out of stubbornness of mind to the king's second Marriage; I confess, I always told his majesty my opinion, according to the dictates of my conscience, which I neither ever would, nor ought to have concealed: for which I am so far from thinking myself guilty of High Treason, that on the contrary, being required to give my opinion by so great a prince in an affair of so much importance, upon which the peace of the kingdom depended; I should have basely flattered him, and my own conscience, had not I spoke the truth as I thought: then indeed I might justly have been esteemed a most wicked subject, and a perfidious Traitor to God. If I have offended the king herein; if it can be an offence to tell one's mind freely when his sovereign puts the question to him; I suppose I have been sufficiently punished already for the fault, by the great afflictions I have endured, by the loss of my estate, and my tedious imprisonment, which has continued already near fifteen months. The second Charge against me is, That I have violated the Act made in the last parliament: that is, being a prisoner, and twice examined, I would not, out of a malignant, perfidious, obstinate and traitorous mind, tell them my opinion, whether the king was Supreme Head of the Church or not; but confessed then, that I had nothing to do with that Act, as to the justice or injustice of it, because I had no benefice in the Church: yet then I protested, that I had never said nor done any thing against it; neither can any one word or action of mine be alleged, or produced, to make me culpable. Nay, this I own was then my Answer to their honours, that I would think of nothing else hereafter, but of the bitter Passion of our Blessed Saviour, and of my exit out of this miserable world. I wish no body any harm, and if this does not keep me alive, I desire not to live; by all which I know, I would not transgress any law, or become guilty of any reasonable crime: for this Statute, nor no other law in the world can punish any man for his silence, seeing they can do no more than punish words or deeds; 'tis God only that is the judge of the secrets of our hearts.'

The Attorney General (Christopher Hales.) 'Sir Thomas, though we have not one word or deed of yours to object against you, yet we have your silence, which is an evident sign of the malice of your heart: because no dutiful subject, being lawfully asked this question, will refuse to answer it.'

Sir Thomas More. 'Sir, my silence is no sign of any malice in my heart, which the king himself must own by my conduct upon divers occasions; neither doth it convince any man of the breach of the law; for it is a maxim amongst the Civilians and Canonists, Qui tacet consentire videtur, he that holds his peace, seems to give his consent. And as to what you say, that no good subject will refuse to give a direct answer; I do really think it to be the duty of every good subject, except he be such a subject as will be a bad Christian, rather to obey God than man; to be more cautious to offend his conscience, than of any thing else in the whole world; especially if his conscience be not the occasion of some sedition and great injury to his prince and country: for I do here sincerely protest, that I never revealed it to any man alive.—I come now to the third principal Article in my Indictment, by which I am accused of malicious attempts, traitorous endeavours, and perfidious practices against that Statute, as the words therein do alledge, because I wrote, while in the Tower, divers packets of letters to bishop Fisher; whereby I exhorted him to violate the same law, and encouraged him in the like obstinacy. I do insist that these letters be produced and read in court, by which I may be either acquitted or convinced of a lye; but because you say the bishop burnt them all, I will here tell you the whole truth of the matter. Some of my letters related only to our private affairs, as about our old friendship and acquaintance: one of them was in answer to his, wherein he desired me to let him know what Answers I made upon my Examinations concerning the Oath of Supremacy; and what I wrote to him upon it was this, That I had already settled my conscience, and let him satisfy his according to his own mind. God is my witness, and as I hope he will save my soul, I gave him no other answer; and this I presume is no breach of the laws.—As to the principal Crime objected against me, that I should say upon my Examination in the Tower, That this Law was like a two-edged sword; for in consenting to it, I should endanger my soul, and in rejecting it should lose my life: 'tis evidently concluded, as you say, from this Answer, because Fisher made the like, that he was in the same conspiracy. To this I reply, That my Answer there was conditional, if there were both danger either in allowing or disallowing that Act; and therefore, like a two-edged sword, it seemed a hard thing it should be put upon me, who had never hitherto contradicted it either in word or deed. These were my words; what the bishop answered, I know not: if his Answer was like mine, it did not proceed from any conspiracy of ours, but from the similitude of our learning and understanding. To conclude, I do sincerely avouch, that I never spoke a word against this law to any man living, though perhaps the king's majesty has been told the contrary.'

There was little or no reply made to this full Answer, by Mr. Attorney, or any body else; the word Malice was what was principally insisted on, and in the mouths of the whole court, though for proof of it no body could produce either words or actions: nevertheless, to set the best gloss that could be upon the matter, Mr. Rich was called to give evidence in open court upon oath, which he immediately did, affirming what we have already related concerning a conference between him and sir Thomas in the Tower. To which sir Thomas made answer, 'If I were a man, my lords, that had no regard to my oath, I had had no occasion to be here at this time, as is well known to every body, as a criminal; and if this oath, Mr. Rich, which you have taken, be true, then I pray I may never see God's face, which, were it otherwise, is an imprecation I would not be guilty of to gain the whole world.'

More having recited in the face of the Court all the discourse they had together in the Tower, as it truly and sincerely was, he added: 'In good faith, Mr. Rich, I am more concerned for your perjury, than my own danger; and I must tell you, that neither myself, nor any body else to my knowledge, ever took you to be a man of such reputation, that I or any other would have any thing to do with you in a matter of importance. You know that I have been acquainted with your manner of life and conversation a long time, even from your youth to the present juncture, for we lived in the same parish; and you very well know, I am sorry I am forced to speak it, you always lay under the odium of a very lying tongue, of a great gamester, and of no good name and character either there or in the Temple, where you was educated. Can it therefore seem likely to your lordships, that I should in so weighty an affair as this, act so unadvisedly, as to trust Mr. Rich, a man I had always so mean an opinion of, in reference to his truth and honesty, so very much before my sovereign lord the king, to whom I am so deeply indebted for his manifold favours, or any of his noble and grave counsellors, that I should only impart to Mr. Rich the secrets of my conscience in respect to the king's Supremacy, the particular subject, and only point about which I have been so long pressed to explain myself? which I never did, nor never would reveal, when the Act was once made, either to the king himself, or any of his privy-counsellors, as is well known to your honours, who have been sent upon no other account at several times by his majesty to me in the Tower. I refer it to your judgments, my lords, whether this can seem credible to any of your lordships.—But supposing what Mr. Rich has sworn should be true, seeing the words were spoke in familiar and private conversation, and that there was nothing at all asserted, but only cases put without any offensive circumstances; it cannot in justice be said, that they were spoke maliciously, and where there is no malice, there is no offence. Besides, my lords, I cannot think so many reverend bishops, so many honourably personages, and so many virtuous and learned men, of whom the parliament consisted in the enacting of that law, ever meant to have any man punished with death, in whom no Malice could be found, taking the word Malitia for Malevolentia; for if Malitia be taken in a general signification for any crime, there is no man can be free: wherefore this word Maliciously is so far significant in this Statute, as the word Forcible is in that of Forcible Entry; for in that case if any enter peaceably, and puts his adversary out forcibly, it is no offence; but if he enters forcibly, he shall be punished by that Statute.—Besides, all the unspeakable goodness of his majesty towards me, who has been so many ways my singular good and gracious lord, who has so dearly loved and trusted me, even from my first entrance into his royal service, vouchsafing to honour me with the dignity of being one of his privy-council, and has most generously promoted me to offices of great reputation and honour, and lastly to that of lord high-chancellor, which honour he never did to any layman before, the same being the highest dignity in this famous kingdom, and next to the king's royal person, so far beyond my merits and qualifications; honouring and exalting me by his incomparable benignity, for these twenty years and upwards, heaping continual favours upon me; and now at last, at my own humble request, giving me liberty to dedicate the remainder of my life to the service of God for the better saving of my soul, has been pleased to discharge and free me from that weighty dignity; before which he had still heaped more and more honours upon me: I say, all this his majesty's bounty, so long and so plentifully conferred upon me, is enough, in my opinion, to invalidate the scandalous accusation so injuriously surmized and urged by this man against me.'

This touched the reputation of Mr. Rich to the very quick, and was a slur that could not be effaced, without the utmost difficulty; and the only way to do it, was, if possible, to produce substantial and creditable Witnesses to attest the contrary: and therefore he caused sir Rd. Southwell, and Mr. Palmer, who were in the same room with sir Thomas and Mr. Rich when they conferred together, to be sworn as to the words that passed between them. Whereupon Mr. Palmer deposed, 'That he was so busy in thrusting sir Thomas's books into a sack, that he took no notice of their talk.' And sir R. Southwell likewise swore, 'That because his business was only to take care of conveying his books away, he gave no ear to their discourse.'

Sir Thomas having urged other reasons in his own Defence, to the discrediting of Mr. Rich's Evidence; the Judge proceeded to give the Charge to the Jury. Whether sir Thomas had challenged any of the pannel, when they were returned to serve, does not appear; but the twelve persons on whose Verdict his life now depended, were these: sir Thomas Palmer, knt. sir Tho. Peirt, knt. George Lovell, esq. Tho. Burbage, esq. Geoffry Chamber, Edw. Stockmore, Jasper Leake, Wm. Browne, Tho. Billington, John Parnel, Rd. Bellame, George Stoakes, gents.

Now the Jury having withdrawn, scarce were out a quarter of an hour before they returned with their Verdict, by which they found the prisoner Guilty; upon which the lord chancellor, as chief in the Commission for this Trial, immediately began to proceed to judgment: which sir Thomas observing, he said to him, 'My lord, when I was concerned in the law, the practice in such cases was to ask the prisoner before Sentence, whether he had any thing to offer why Judgment should not be pronounced against him.' The lord chancellor hereupon stopping his sentence, wherein he had already proceeded in part, asked sir Thomas, 'What he was able to say to the contrary?' who presently made Answer in these words: 'For as much as, my lords, this Indictment is grounded upon an act of parliament, directly repugnant to the laws of God and his Holy Church, the supreme government of which, or of any part thereof, no temporal person may by any law presume to take upon him, being what of right belongs to the See of Rome, which by special prerogative was granted by the mouth of our Saviour Christ himself to St. Peter, and the bishops of Rome his successors only, whilst he lived, and was personally present here on earth: it is therefore, amongst Catholic Christians, insufficient in law, to charge any Christian to obey it.' And in order to the proof of his assertion, he declared among other things, 'That whereas this kingdom alone being but one member, and a small part of the Church, was not to make a particular law disagreeing with the general law of Christ's universal Catholic Church, no more than the city of London, being but one member in respect to the whole kingdom, might enact a law against an act of parliament, to be binding to the whole realm; so he shewed farther, That law was even contrary to the laws and statutes of the kingdom, yet unrepealed, as might evidently be seen by Magna Charta, wherein are these words; Ecclesia Anglicana libera sit, & habeat omnia jura integra, & libertates suas illasas: and it is contrary also to that sacred Oath which the king's majesty himself, and every other Christian prince, always take with great solemnity, at their coronations. So great was sir Thomas's zeal, that he further alledged, that it was worse in the kingdom of England to refuse obedience to the See of Rome, than for any child to do to his natural parent: for as St. Paul said to the Corinthians, 'I have regenerated you, my children, in Christ:' so might that worthy Pope of Rome, St. Gregory the Great, say of us Englishmen, 'Ye are my Children, because I have given you everlasting Salvation:' for by St. Augustine and his followers, his immediate messengers, England first received the Christian faith, which is a far higher and better inheritance than any carnal father can leave to his children: for a son is only by generation, we are by regeneration made the spiritual children of Christ and the Pope.'

Here the Lord Chancellor took him up, and said: 'That seeing all the bishops, Universities, and the most learned men in the kingdom had agreed to that Act, it was much wondered that he alone should so stiffly stickle, and so vehemently argue there against it.' His Answer was, 'That if the number of Bishops and Universities were so material as his lordship seemed to make it: then, my lord, I see no reason why that thing should make any change in my conscience: for I doubt not, but of the learned and virtuous men now alive, I do not speak only of this realm, but of all Christendom, there are ten to one of my mind in this matter; but if I should take notice of those learned doctors and virtuous fathers that are already dead, many of whom are saints in heaven, I am sure there are far more, who all the while they lived thought in his case as I do now. And therefore, my lord, I do not think myself bound to conform my conscience to the counsel of one kingdom, against the general consent of all Christendom.'

Here it seems the Lord Chancellor not willing to take the whole load of his condemnation upon himself, asked in open court the advice of sir John Fitz-James, the lord chief justice of England, Whether the Indictment was valid or no? who wisely answered thus: 'My lords, all, by St. Gillian' (for that was always his oath) 'I must needs confess that if the act of parliament be not unlawful, then the Indictment is not in my conscience invalid.' Some have wrote, That the Lord Chancellor should hereupon say, Quid adhuc desideramus testimonium, reus est mortis, and then presently proceeded to give Sentence to this effect: 'That he should be carried back to the Tower of London, by the help of William Kingston, sheriff, and

'from thence drawn on a hurdle through the city of London to Tyburn, there to be hanged till he should be half dead; that then he should be cut down alive, his privy parts cut off, his belly ripped, his bowels burnt, his four quarters set up over four gates of the city, and his head upon London-Bridge.'

This was the Judgment pronounced upon this great man, who had deserved so well both of the king and kingdom, and for which Paulus Jovius calls king Henry 8, another Phalaris. This severe Sentence was afterwards, by the king's pardon, changed to beheading, because he had borne the greatest office in the kingdom; of which mercy of the king's, word being brought to sir Thomas, he merrily said, 'God forbid the king should use any more such mercy to any of my friends, and God bless all my posterity from such pardons.' When he had received Sentence of Death, he spake thus with a resolute and sedate aspect: 'Well, seeing I am condemned, God knows how justly, I will freely speak for the disburdening my conscience, what I think of this law. When I perceived it was the king's pleasure to list out from whence the Pope's authority was derived, I confess I studied seven years together to find out the truth of it, and I could not meet with the works of any one doctor, approved by the Church, that avouch a layman was, or ever could be the Head of the Church.'

Chancellor. 'Would you be esteemed wiser, or to have a sincerer conscience than all the bishops, learned doctors, nobility and commons of this realm?'

More. 'I am able to produce against one bishop which you can produce on your side, a hundred Holy and Catholick bishops for my opinion; and against one realm, the consent of Christendom for a thousand years.'

Norfolk. 'Sir Thomas, you shew your obstinate and malicious mind.'

More. 'Noble sir, it is no malice or obstinacy that makes me say this, but the just necessity of the cause obliges me to it for the discharge of my conscience; and I call God to witness, that nothing but this has excited me to it.'

After this the Judges kindly offering him their favourable audience if he had any thing else to say; he answered most mildly and charitably, 'I have no more to say, but that as the blessed Apostle St. Paul, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, was present, and consenting to the protomartyr Stephen, keeping their clothes that stoned him to death, and yet they are both now holy saints in heaven, and there shall continue friends to eternity; so I verily trust, and shall therefore heartily pray, that albeit your lordships have been on earth my Judges to condemnation, yet that we may hereafter meet joyfully together in Heaven to our everlasting salvation: and God preserve you, especially my sovereign lord the king, and grant him faithful counsellors.'

Sir Thomas, after his Condemnation, was conducted from the bar to the Tower, an axe being carryed before him, with the edge towards him.

Sir Thomas More having remained a prisoner in the Tower about a week after his Sentence, on the 6th of July early in the morning, his old friend sir Thomas Pope came to him with a message from the king and council, to acquaint him, That his Execution was appointed to be before nine that morning. Whereupon sir Thomas said, 'He thanked him heartily for his good news. I have been,' says he, 'much obliged to his majesty for the benefits and honours he has most bountifully conferred upon me; yet I am more bound to his grace I do assure you, for confining me in this place, where I have had convenient place and opportunity to put me in mind of my last end. I am most of all bound to him, that his majesty is pleased to rid me out of the miseries of this wretched world.' Then sir Thomas Pope acquainted him, it was the king's pleasure he should not use many words at the place of execution. 'Sir,' said he, 'you do well to acquaint me with the king's pleasure; for I had otherwise designed to have made a speech to the people; but it matters not, and I am ready to conform myself to his highness's pleasure. And I beseech you, sir, you would become a suitor to his majesty, that my daughter Margaret may attend my funeral.' To which Pope replied, That the king was willing his wife and children, and other friends should be present. Sir Thomas Pope being about to take his leave, could not refrain from tears. Whereupon sir Thomas More said, 'Let not your spirits be cast down, for I hope we shall see one another in a better place, where we shall be free to live and love in eternal bliss.' And to divert Pope's grief, he took up his urinal and shook it, saying merrily, 'I see no danger but that this man may live longer, if the king pleases.'

About nine he was brought out of the Tower; his beard was long, his face pale and thin, and carrying a red cross in his hand, he often lift up his eyes to heaven; a woman meeting with him with a cup of wine, he refused it, saying, 'Christ at his Passion drank no wine, but gall and vinegar.' Another woman came crying, and demanded some Papers she said she had left in his hands, when he was lord chancellor, to whom he said, 'Good woman, have patience but for an hour, and the king will rid me of the care I have for those Papers, and every thing else.' Another woman followed him, crying, he had done her much wrong when he was lord chancellor, to whom he said, 'I very well remember the Cause, and if I were to decide it now, I should make the same Decree.'

When he came to the scaffold, it seemed ready to fall; whereupon he said merrily to the Lieutenant, 'Pray, Sir, see me safe up; and as to my coming down, let me shift for myself.' Being about to speak to the people, he was interrupted by the sheriff, and thereupon he only desired the people to pray for him, and bear witness he died in the faith of the Catholic Church, a faithful servant both to God and the king. Then kneeling, he repeated the Miserere Psalm with much devotion; and rising up, the Executioner asked him forgiveness. He kissed him, and said, 'Pluck up thy spirits, man, and be not afraid to do thine office; my neck is very short, take heed therefore thou strike not awry for saving thine honesty.' Laying his head upon the block, he bid the executioner stay till he had put his beard aside, for that had committed no Treason. Thus he suffered with much cheerfulness; his head was taken off at one blow, and was placed upon London-Bridge, where having continued for some months, and being about to be thrown into the Thames to make room for others, his daughter Margaret bought it, inclosed it in a leaden box, and kept it for a relique.

It is said, when news of his death was brought to the king who was at that time playing at tables, Anne Bullen looking on, he cast his eye upon her, and said, 'Thou art the cause of this man's death;' and presently leaving his play he betook himself to his chamber, and thereupon, fell into a fit of melancholy. More's great grandson, in his 'Life,' relates that money was miraculously supplied for the purchase of his winding sheet, and that one of his teeth preserved as a relic was miraculously converted into two.

31. The Trial of JOHN FISHER, Bishop of Rochester, before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Westminster, for High Treason: 26 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1535. [Dr. Bailey's Life of Bishop Fisher, p. 188.]

["The reverend prelate, whose Trial we now offer to the reader, was one of the most eminent sufferers in the reign of Henry 8th, for opposing the king's Divorce from his first queen, and his claim to the Supremacy over the Church of England. Opinions so averse to that prince's views and passions, involved the bishop in three different prosecutions. The first was on a charge of Misprision of Treason, in concealing the predictions against the king, made by the famous visionary Elizabeth Barton, known by the name of the Holy Maid of Kent; one of whose prophecies denounced, that, if the king did not desist from the Divorce, but married again, he should not continue king more than a month after. For this offence the bishop was included in the Act for punishing Elizabeth Barton and her accomplices; but was one of those, whom the act attainted of Misprison sion of Treason only. This Act was passed in Jan. 1533-4. See 25 Hen. 8. c. 12. Rastall's edit. of Stat. The same parliament passed a law, which declared Henry's first marriage void, confirmed his marriage with Anna Bolloigne, made it treason to do or say any thing in derogation from the latter marriage, and required every person to take an oath to adhere to the contents of the statute, making it misprision of treason to refuse the oath. 25 Hen. 8. c. 29. and 26 Hen. 8. c. 3. It was for refusing the oath formed on the 25 Hen. 8. that the bishop endured a second prosecution; for on that account the next parliament attainted him of misprision of treason, and deprived him of his bishoprick. See 26 Hen. 8. c. 3. of private acts. The third prosecution, which terminated with the bishop's life, soon followed. The statute of the 26 Hen. 8. annexed the title of Supreme Head of the Church to the crown; and by another statute of the same parliament, it was made High Treason by words or writing to attempt depriving the king of any of his titles. 26 Hen. 8. c. 1. and 15. The operation of these two last statutes gave the opportunity of reaching the life of the bishop, who, as will appear from the following Trial, having been ensnared into a denial of the king's being supreme head of the church, after the accession of that title, was therefore deemed to come within the succeeding statute, which made it treason to deny the king any of his titles.—The following Trial is extracted from a very scarce book, which was printed in 1655, with a title describing it as the Life of bishop Fisher, by Dr. Thomas Bailey. But the real author, according to bishop Tanner and others, was Dr. Richard Hall, who wrote several pieces in the reign of Elizabeth. Tann. Bibliothec. Britannic. Hibern. voce Hall Edwardus. In number 7049 of the Harleian MSS. at the British Museum, there is a Life of bishop Fisher, which contains an account of his Trial in the same words as the printed life.—It is proper to apprise the reader, that the book, whence we borrow the Trial, was certainly written by a very zealous Roman Catholic, and that on other accounts he should be believed with caution. The writer throughout strenuously supports the Pope's claim of the Supremacy. He relates a very improbable story of queen Anna Bolleynne, accusing her of great indignity to the head of bishop Fisher after his execution, and of even striking it. His book is also full of miracles; one of which is, that, though the bishop's head was parboiled, and the weather was very warm, when exhibited on London-Bridge, it not only continued fourteen days without wasting, but in that time daily grew so much fresher, that the bishop was never seen to look so well. However, so far as regards the relation of the Trial, it must be confessed, that it carries with it great appearance of truth; and more especially seems to deserve credit, because the hard measure it represents the bishop to have experienced at his trial, so much resembles what we read in the trial of his eminent fellow-sufferer sir Thomas More. Nor in these liberal and humane times can we imagine, that many will be found, however averse to bigotry and superstition, who will not concur in the sentiment, that the proceedings against both sir Thomas and the bishop were attended with extreme cruelty and injustice. This censure more particularly belongs to the bishop's case. His crime was simply an opinion against the king's supremacy, which he was urged to give by a message from his sovereign, who at the same time sent a promise of indemnity. If this was really so, which there seems too much reason to believe, the bishop's death was one of the worst passages which polluted the reign of Henry; because the injustice of the case was highly aggravated by superadding insidiousness and breach of faith. What an idea must we form of a prince, who could stoop to devise such unworthy means to accomplish his cruel purpose? What must we think of the subject, who could be so void of feeling, as to become the instrument of such perfidy? What must we conceive of the times, in which judges and juries could be found to give the form and colour of justice on such bad proceedings?" Hargrave.]

AFTER this good bishop was recovered to some better strength, by the help of his physicians, and that he was more able to be carried abroad, he was on Thursday the 17th of June brought to the King's Bench at Westminster, from the Tower, with a huge number of holberts, bills, and other weapons about him, and the ax of the Tower born before him with the edge from him, as the manner is; and because he was not yet so well recovered, that he was able to walk by land all the way on foot, he rode part of the way on horseback in a black cloth gown, and the rest he was carried by water, for that he was not well able to ride through for weakness. As soon as he was come to Westminster, he was there presented at the barre before the commissioners being all set ready in their places against his coming, whose names were these: sir Thomas Audely, knight, lord chancellor of England; Charles duke of Suffolk; Henry earle of Comberlande; Thomas earle of Wiltshire; Thomas Cromwell secretary; sir John Fitz-James chief justice of England; sir John Baldwin chief justice of the Common Pleas; sir Wm. Pawlet; sir Rd. Lyster chief baron of the exchequer; sir John Port, sir John Spilman, and sir Walter Luke, late justices of the King's Bench; and sir Anthony Fitzherbert one of the justices of the Common Pleas. Being thus presented before these commissioners, he was commanded, by the name of John Fisher late of Rochester, clerk, otherwise called John Fisher bishop of Rochester, to hold up his hand, which he did, with a most cheerful countenance and rare constancy. Then was his Indictment read, which was very long and full of words; but the effect of it was thus, That he maliciously, treacherously, and falsely, had said these words, 'The king, our sovereign lord, is not Supreme Head in the earth of the Church of England, and being read to the end, it was asked him, whether he was guilty of this treason or no? Whereunto he pleaded, Not Guilty. Then was a Jury of twelve men (being free-holders of Middlesex) called to try this issue, whose names were these: sir Hugh Vaughan knt. sir Walter Langford knt. Tho. Burbage, John Nudgate, Wm. Browne, John Hewes, Jasper Leak, John Palmer, Rd. Henry Young, Henry Lodis-man, John Elrington, and George Heveningham, esquires. These twelve men being sworn to trie whether the prisoner were guilty of this treason or no, at last came forth to give evidence against him Mr. Rich. the secret and close messenger that passed between the king and him, as ye have read before, who openly, in the presence of the judges, and all the people there assembled, deposed and swore, that he heard the prisoner say in plaine words, within the Tower of London, that he believed in his conscience, and by his learning he assuredly knew, that the king neither was, nor by right, could be Supreme Head in earth of the church of England. When this blessed father heard the accusations of this most wretched and false person, contrary to his former oath and promise, he was not a little astonished thereat; wherefore he said to him in this manner: 'Mr. Rich, I cannot but marvel to hear you come in, and bear witness against me of these words, knowing in what secret manner you came to me: but suppose I so said unto you, yet in that saying I committed no treason; for upon what occasion, and for what cause it might be said, your self doth know right well; and therefore being now urged (said he) by this occasion, to open somewhat of this matter, I shall desire my lords, and others here, to take a little patience in hearing what I shall say for myself.'

'This man' (meaning Mr. Rich) 'come to me from the king, as he said, on a secret message with commendations from his grace, declaring at large, what a good opinion his majesty had of me, and how sorry he was of my trouble, with many more words than are here needful to be recited, because they tended so much to my praise, as I was not onely ashamed to hear them, but also knew right well that I could no way deserve them. At last he broke with me of the matter of the king's supremacy, lately granted unto him by act of parliament, to the which he said, Although all the bishops in the realme have consented, except your self alone, and also the whole court of parliament, both spirituall and temporall, except a very few; yet he told me, that the king, for better satisfaction of his owne conscience, had sent him unto me in this secret manner, to know my full opinion in the matter, for the great af-

fiance he had in me more than any other. He added further, that if I would herein frankly and freely advertise his majesty my knowledge, that upon certificate of my misliking, he was very like to retract much of his former doings, and make satisfaction for the same, in case I should so advertise him. When I had heard all this message, and considered a little upon his words, I put him in minde of the new act of parliament, which standing in force as it doth against all them that shall directly say, or do any thing that is against it, might thereby endanger me very much, in case I should utter unto him any thing that were offensive against the law. To that he told me, that the king willed him to assure me on his honour, and in the word of a king, that whatever I should say unto him by this his secret messenger, I should abide no danger, no perill for it, neither that any advantage should be taken against me for the same, no, although my words were never so directly against the statute, seeing it was but a declaration of my minde secretly to him, as to his owne person: and for the messenger himselfe, he gave me his faithfull promise that he would never utter my words in this matter to any man living, but to the king alone. Now therefore, my lords, quoth he, seeing it pleased the king's majesty to send to me thus secretly under the pretence of plaine and true meaning, to know my poore advice and opinion in these his weighty and great affaires, which I most gladly was and ever will be willing to send him in; methinks it is very hard injustice to heare the messenger's accusation, and to allow the same as a sufficient testimony against me in case of treason.'

To this the messenger made no direct answer, but (neither deuying his words as false, nor confessing them as true) said, that whatever he had said unto him on the king's behalf, he said no more than his majesty commanded; and said he, if I had said to you in such sort as you have declared, I would gladly know what discharge this is to you in law against his majesty, for so directly speaking against the statute; whereat some of the Judges taking quick hold one after another, said, That this message, or promise from the king to him, neither could, nor did by rigour of the law, discharge him: but in so declaring of his minde and conscience against the supremacy, yea though it were at the king's own commandment or request, he committed treason by the statute, and nothing can discharge him from death but the king's pardon.

This good father perceiving the small account made of his words, and the favourable credit given to his accuser, might then easily finde in which doore the wind blew. Wherefore directing his speeches to the lords his judges, he said, 'Yet I pray you, my lords, consider, that by all equity, justice, worldly honesty, and courteous dealing, I cannot, as the case standeth, be directly charged therewith as with treason, though I had spoken the words indeed, the same being not spoken maliciously, but in the way of advice and counsell, when it was requested of me by the king himself; and that favour the very words of the statute do give me, being made onely against such as shall maliciously gainsay the king's supremacy, and none other: wherefore, although by rigour of law, you may take occasion thus to condemn me, yet I hope you cannot finde law, except you adde rigour to that law, to cast me downe, which herein I hope I have not deserved.' To which it was answered by some of the judges, that the word maliciously is but a superfluous and void word; for if a man speak against the king's supremacy by any manner of meanes, that speaking is to be understood, and taken in law as maliciously.

'My lords,' said he, 'if the law be so understood, then it is a hard exposition, and, as I take it, contrary to the meaning of them that made the law. But then let me demand this question, whether a single testimony of one man may be admitted as sufficient to prove me guilty of Treason for speaking these words, or no? and whether my answer, negatively, may not be accepted against his affirmative, to my availe and benefit, or no?' To that the judges and lawyers answered (that being the king's case) it rested much in the conscience and discretion of the jury; and as they upon the evidence given before them shall finde it, you are either to be acquitted, or else by judgment to be condemned. The Jury having heard all this simple evidence, departed, according to the order, into a secret place, there to agree upon the Verdict; but before they went from the place, the case was so aggravated to them by my lord chancellour, making it so hainous and dangerous a treason, that they easily perceived what verdict they must returne; otherways heape such danger upon their owne heads, as none of them were willing to undergo. Some other of the commissioners charged this most reverend man with obstinacy and singularity, alledging, that he being but one man, did presumptuously stand against that, which was in the great councell of parliament agreed upon, and finally was consented unto by all the bishops of this realme, saving himselfe alone. But to that he answered, 'That indeed he might well be accounted singular, if he alone should stand in this matter (as they said): but having on his part the rest of the bishops in Christendome, far surmounting the number of the bishops of England, he said they could not justly account him singular. And having on his part all the Catholicks and bishops of the world from Christ's ascension, till now, joynd with the whole consent of Christ's universall church, I must needs account mine own part farre the surer: and as for obstinacy, which is likewise objected against me, I have no way to cleare myself thereof, but my owne solemne word and promise to the contrary, if you please to believe it, or else, if that will not serve, I am here ready to confirme the same by my oath.' Thus, in effect, he answered their objections, though with many more words, both wisely and profoundly uttered, and that with a merveilous, courageous, and rare constancy, inso-much as many of his hearers, yea some of his Judges, lamented so grievously, that their inward sorrow in all sides was expressed by the outward teares in their eyes, to perceive such a famous and reverend man in danger to be condemned to a cruell death, upon so weak evidence given by such an accuser, contrary to all faith and promise of the king himself. But all pity, mercy, and right, being set aside, rigour, cruelty, and malice, took place; for the twelve men being shortly returned from their consultation, Verdict was given that he was Guilty of the Treason, which although they thus did, upon the menacing and threathing words of the commissioners, the king's learned counsell, yet was it, no doubt, full sore against their conscience, as some of them would after report, to their dying daies, onely for safety of their goods and lives, which they were well assured to lose, in case they had acquitted him. After the Verdict thus given by the twelve men, the lord chancellour, commanding silence to be kept, said unto the prisoner in this sort, 'My lord of Rochester, you have been here arraigned of High Treason, and putting your selfe to the triall of twelve men, you have pleaded Not Guilty, and they notwithstanding have found you Guilty in their conscience; wherefore, if you have any more to say for your selfe, you are now to be heard, or else to receive judgment according to the order and course of law.' Then said this blessed father againe, 'Truly, my lord, if that which I have before spoken be not sufficient, I have no more to say, but onely to desire Almighty God to forgive them that have thus condemned me, for I think they know not what they have done.' Then my lord chancellour, framing himselfe to a solemnity in countenance, proclaimed Sentence of death upon him, in manner and forme following: 'You shall be led to the place from whence you came, and from thence shall be drawn through the city to the place of execution at Tyborne, where your body shall be hanged by the neck, half alive you shall be cut down and throwne to the ground, your bowels to be taken out of your body before you, being alive, your head to be smitten off, and your body to be divided into four quarters, and after your head and quarters to be set up, where the king shall appoint; and God have mercy upon your soule.'

After the pronouncing of this cruell Sentence, the lieutenant of the Tower, with his band of men, stood ready to receive and carry him back again to his prison. Before his departure he desired audience of the commissioners for a few words, which being granted, he said thus in effect: 'My lords, I am here condemned before you of High Treason, for denial of the king's Supremacy over the Church of England, but by what order of justice I leave to God, who is the searcher both of the king's majesty's conscience and yours. Nevertheless, being found guilty (as it is termed) I am, and must be contented with all that God shall send, to whose will I wholly referre and submit myselfe. And now to tell you more plainly my minde, touching this matter of the king's Supremacy, I thinke indeed, and alwaies have thought, and do now lastly affirm that his grace cannot justly claime any such supremacy over the church of God, as he now taketh upon him, neither hath it ever been seen or heard of, that any temporall prince before his daies, hath presumed to that dignity. Wherefore if the king will now adventure himselfe in proceeding in this strange and unwonted case, no doubt but he shall deeply incurre the grievous displeasure of Almighty God, to the great dammage of his owne soule, and of many others, and to the utter ruine of this realme, committed to his charge, whereof will ensue some sharp punishment at his hand: wherefore I pray God his grace may remember himselfe in time, and hearken to good counsell, for the preservation of himselfe and his realme, and the quietnesse of all Christendome.' Which words being ended, he was conveyed back againe to the Tower of London, part on foot, and part on horseback, with a number of men, bearing holberts and other weapons about him, as was before at his coming to arraignment: and when he was come to the Tower-gate, he turned him back to all his traine that had thus conducted him forward and backward, and said unto them, ' My masters, I thank you all for the great labour and paines you have taken with me this day: I am not able to give you any thing in recompence, for I have nothing left; and therefore I pray you accept in good part my hearty thanks.' And this he spake with so lusty a courage, so amiable a countenance, and with so fresh and lively a colour, as be seemed rather to have come from some great feast, or banquet, than from his arraignment, shewing by all his gesture and outward countenance, nothing else but joy and gladnesse.

Thus being after his condemnation, the space of three or four daies, in his prison, he occupied himselfe in continual prayer most fervently; and although he looked daily for death, yet could ye not have perceived him one whit dismayed thereat, neither in word nor countenance, but still continued his former trade of constancy and patience, and that rather with a more joyfull cheere and free minde than ever he had done before, which appeared well by this chance that I will tell you: there hapned a false rumour to rise sodainly among the people, that he should be brought to his execution by a certain day; whereupon his cook, that was wont to dress his dinner, and carry it daily unto him, hearing, among others, of his execution, dressed him no dinner at all that day; wherefore at the cook's next repaire unto him, he demanded the cause why he brought him not his dinner as he was wont to doe: Sir, said the cook, it was commonly talked all the towne over, that you should have died that day, and therefore I thought it but vaine to dresse any thing for you. Well, said he merrily unto him again, for all that report thou seest me yet alive, and therefore whatsoever newes thou shalt heare of me hereafter, let me no more lack my dinner, but make it ready as thou art wont to do; and if thou see me dead when thou comest, then eat it thy selfe: but I promise thee, if I be alive, I minde, by God's grace, to eat never a bit the lesse.

Thus while this blessed bishop lay daily expecting the houre of his death, the king, who no lesse desired his death than himselfe looked for it, caused at last a writ of execution to be made, and brought to sir Edmond Walsingham lieutenant of the Tower. But where by his judgement at Westminster, he was condemned, as ye have read before, to drawing, hanging, and quartering, as traitors alwaies use to be, yet was he spared from that cruell execution. Wherefore order was taken that he should be led no further than Tower-hill, and there to have his head struck off.—After the lieutenant had received this bloody writ, he called unto him certaine persons, whose service and presence were to be used in that business, commanding them to be ready against the next day in the morning: and because that was very late in the night, and the prisoner asleep, he was louth to disease him of his rest for that time; and so in the morning before five of the clock, he came to him in his chamber in the Bell-tower, finding him yet asleep in his bed, and waked him, shewing him that he was come to him on a message from the king; and after some circumstance used with persuasion that he should remember himself to be an old man, and that for age he could not, by course of nature, live long; he told him at last, that he was come to signifie unto him, that the king's pleasure was he should suffer death that forenoone. Well, quoth this blessed father, if this be your errand, you bring me no great newes, for I have long time looked for this message, I most humbly thank his majesty, that it pleaseth him to rid me from all this worldly business; and I thank you also for your tidings. But I pray you, Mr. Lieutenant, said he, when is mine houre that I must go hence? Your houre, said the lieutenant, must be nine of the clock. And what houre is it now, said he? It is now about five, said the lieutenant. Well then, said he, let me by your patience, sleep an houre or two, for I have slept very little this night: And yet to tell you the truth, not for any feare of death, I thank God, but by reason of my great infirmity and weaknesse. The king's further pleasure is, said the lieutenant, that you should use as little speech as may be, especially any thing touching his majesty, whereby the people should have any cause to think of him or his proceedings otherwise than well. For that, said he, you shall see me order myself, as, by God's grace, neither the king, nor any man else, shall have occasion to mislike my words. With which answer the lieutenant departed from him; and so the prisoner falling againe to rest, slept soundly two houres and more. And after he was waked, he called to his man to help him up: but first of all he commanded him to take away the shirt of haire (which accustomedly he wore on his back) and to convey it privily out of the house, and instead thereof to lay him forth a clean white shirt, and all the best apparrell he had, as cleanly brushed as may be: and as he was arraying himselfe, his man perceiving in him more curiosity and care for the fine and cleanly wearing of his apparrell that day, than ever was wont to be before, demanded of him what this sodain change meant, saying that his lordship knew well enough he must put off all againe within two houres, and lose it. What of that, said he? Doest thou not mark, that this is our marriage-day, and that it behoveth us therefore to use more cleanlinesse for solemnity of the marriage-sake?

About nine of the clock the lieutenant came againe to his prisoner, and finding him almost ready, said that he was come now for him. I will wait upon you straight, said he, as fast as this thin body of mine will give me leave. Then said he to his man, Reach me my furred tippet to put about my neck. O my lord, said the lieutenant, what need you be so careful for your health for this little time, being, as your self knoweth, not much above an hour? I think no otherwise, said this blessed father, but yet in the mean time I will keep myselfe as well as I can, till the very time of my execution: for I tell you truth, though I have, I thank our Lord, a very good desire, and a willing minde, to die at this present, and so trust of his infinite mercy and goodnesse he will continue it, yet will I not willingly hinder my health, in the mean time, one minute of an hour, but still prolong the same as long as I can, by such reasonable waies and meanes as Almighty God hath provided for me. With that taking a little book in his hand, which was a New Testament lying by him, he made a crosse on his forehead, and went out of his prison-doore with the lieutenant, being so weak that he was scarce able to go downe staires: wherefore at the staires foot he was taken up in a chaire between two of the lieutenants men, and carried to the Tower-gate, with a great number of weapons about him, to be delivered to the sheriffs of London for execution. And as they were come to the uttermost precinct of the liberty of the Tower, they rested there with him a space, till such time as one was sent before to know in what readinesse the sheriffs were to receive him; during which space he rose out of his chaire, and standing on his feet leaned his shoulders to the wall, and lifting his eyes towards heaven, opened his little book in his hand, and said, 'O Lord, this is the last time that ever I shall open this book; let some comfortable place now chauce unto me, whereby I thy poore servant may glorifie thee in this my last hour; and with that, looking into the book, the first thing that came to his sight were these words, Hæc est autem vita æterna, ut cognoscant te, solum verum Deum, & quem misisti Jesum Christum. Ego te glorificavi super ter- ram, opus consummari quod dedisti mihi ut faciam: Et nunc clarifica tu me, Pater, apud te met ipsum claritate quam habui priusquam, &c. and with that he shut the book together, and said, 'Here is even learning enough for me to my live's end.' And so the sheriffs being ready for him, he was taken up againe among certain of the sheriffs men, with a new and much greater company of weapons than was before, and carried to the scaffold on the Tower-hill, otherwise called East-Smithfield, himselfe praying all the way, and recording upon the words which he before had read; and when he was come to the foot of the scaffold, they that carried him offered to help him up the staires. But then said he, Nay, masters, seeing I am come so farre, let me alone, and ye shall see me shitt for myself well enough; and so went up the staires without any helpe, so lively, that it was merveile to them that knew before of his debility and weaknesse; but as he was mounting up the staires, the south-east sun shining very bright in his face, whereupon he said to himselfe these words, lifting up his hands, Accedite ad eum, & illuminamini, & facies vestra non confundetur. By that time he was upon the scaffold it was about ten of the clock; where the executioner being ready to do his office, kueeled downe to him, as the fashion is, and asked him forgiveness: 'I forgive thee, said he, with all my heart, and I trust thou shalt see me overcome this storme lustily.' Then was his gown and tippet taken from him, and he stood in his doublet and hose, in sight of all the people, whereof was no small number assembled to see his execution. There was to be seen a long, lean, and slender body, having on it little other substance besides skin and bones, insomuch as most of the beholders merveiled to see a living man so farre consumed, for he seemed a very image of death, and as it were death in a man's shape, using a man's voice; and therefore it was thought the king was something cruell to put such a man to death, being so neere his end, and to kill that which was dying already, except it were for pity sake to rid him of his pain.

When the innocent and holy man was some upon the scaffold, he spake to the people in effect as followeth: 'Christian people, I am come hither to die for the faith of Christ's holy Catholique church; and I thank God hitherto my stomach hath served me very well therunto, so that yet I have not feared death; wherefore I desire you all to help and assist with your prayers, that at the very point and instant of death's stroke, I may in that very moment stand stedfast, without fainting in any one point of the Catholique faith, free from any fear. And I beseech Almighty God of his infinite goodnesse, to save the king and this realme, and that it may please him to hold his hand over it, and send the king good counsel.'

These or the like words he spake, with such a cheerefull countenance, such a stout and constant courage, and such a reverend gravity, that he appeared to all men not only void of feare, but also glad of death. Besides this, he uttered his words so distinctly, and with so loud and clear a voice that the people were astonished thereat, and noted it for a miraculous thing, to heare so plain and audible a voice come from so weak and sickly an old body; for the youngest man in that presence, being in good and perfect health, could not have spoken to be better heard and perceived, than he was. Then after these few words by him uttered he kneeled down on both his knees, and said certain prayers, among which one was the hymn of Te Deum laudamus, to the end, and the psalm of In te, Domine, speravi. Then came the executioner, and bound a handkerchief about his eyes; and so this holy father lifting up his hands and heart towards heaven, said a few prayers, which were not long, but fervent, and devout: which being ended, he laid his head down on the middle of a little block, where the executioner being ready with a sharp and heavy ax cut asunder his slender neck at one blow, which bled so abundantly, that many wondered to see so much blood issue out of so slender and leane a body. He was beheaded June 22, 1535, in the 80th year of his age. Lord Herbert says that "the Pope (Paul 3rd) sent him a cardinal's hat, but unseasonably, his head being off." There is a story, that when Henry heard of the Pope's intention to send him a hat, he exclaimed, "Fore God, then, he shall wear it on his shoulders, for I'll have his head off."

32. The Trial of WILLIAM Lord DACRES of the North, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward: 27 Henry VIII. A. D. 1535. [Hall and Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII.]

[“ This Trial is taken notice of in most of the old Chronicles, and also in one of the Harleian manuscripts; but Hall's is the book, from which the others transcribe. We therefore present our readers with an extract from him, to which we add one from lord Herbert's Henry the 8th, as the latter is more explanatory. But both accounts are so short, that we fear they will be deemed too trivial for insertion. Against such a censure, we have only to say, that it is the fact of lord Dacres's acquittal, which was our chief inducement for admitting the mention of this Trial into the collection. In ancient times, more especially in the reign of Henry 8th, when, from the devastation made by the civil wars amongst the ancient nobility, and other causes disturbing the balance of the constitution, the influence of the crown was become exorbitant, and seems to have been in its zenith, to be accused of a crime against the state and to be convicted were almost the same thing. The one was usually so certain a consequence of the other, that, exclusively of lord Dacres's Case in the reign of Henry 8th, and that of sir Nicholas Throckmorton in his daughter Mary's, the examples to the contrary are very rare. But those which do occur ought to be remembered in justice to the times they belong to, as a sort of balance for the reproach deservedly cast upon them, for the culpable facility of condemnation so conspicuous in most other instances.” Hargrave.]

Extract from Hall's Hen. VIII. p. 225.

THE ninth day of July was the lorde Dacres of the north arreigted at Westminster of High Treason, where the duke of Norfolkke sate as judge and high steward of England. The sayd lorde Dacres beyng brought to the barre with the axe of the Tower before him, after his inditement red, not only improved the sayd inditement as false and maliciously devised against him, and answered every part and matter herin contained, but also so manly, wittily, and directly confuted his accusers, whiche there were ready to avouche their accusacions, that to their great shames, and to his great honor, he was found that day by his peres not giltie, whiche undoubtedly the commons excedyngly joyed and rejoyces of, insomuche as there was in the hall at those woordes, 'Not giltie,' the greatest shoute and crye of joy that the like no man livyng may remembre that ever he heard.

Extract from lord Herbert's Henry VIII. in 2 Kenn. Compl. Hist. p. 177.

The lord Dacres of the north (July 9, as our historians have it) was arraigned at Westminster of High Treason, but as the principal witnesses produced against him by his accusers (sir Ralph Fenwick and one Musgrave) were some mean and provoked Scottish men, so his peers acquitted him, as believing they not only spoke maliciously, but might be easily suborned against him, as one who (having been warden of the Marches) by frequent inroads had done much harm in that country. And thus escaped that lord to his no little honour, and his judges, as giving example thereby how persons of great quality, brought to their trial, are not so necessarily condemned, but that they sometimes may escape, when they obtain an equal hearing.

33. The Trials of Queen ANNA BOLEYN, and her Brother lord viscount ROCHFORD, for High Treason, in the Court of the Lord High Steward; and also of HENRY NORRIS, MARK SMETON, WILLIAM BRERETON, and Sir FRANCIS WESTON, before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, for the same Offence: 28 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1536. [Harleian MS. 1 Burnet's Reform. 196. 1 Strype's Memorials, 279.]

[The earliest account we have of these proceedings is in Hall's Chronicle; but, except the queen's Speech, at her death, it scarce mentions more, than that she and the rest were arrested, accused, tried, and executed. Hall's Hen. 8. fo. 227. b. Grafton copies verbatim from Hall, except omitting this circumstance, that the king the day after her death wore white for mourning. Graft. 1228. Fox, in his Martyrology, is chiefly occupied in vindicating the queen's virtue, and defending the succession to the crown through her. 2 Fox Martyr. ed. 1610. p. 937. In Hollingshead, the account is more full than Hall. 3 Hollingsh. 940. Stow, who follows next, chiefly borrows from Hollingshead. Stow's Chron. Howe's ed. 572. Some additional circumstances are noticed by Speed. Speed's Chron. 1014. Lord Herbert is still more particular in his narrative. Herbert's Hen. 8. in 2. Kenn. Compl. Hist. 193. There is also a short account of this Trial amongst the Harleian Manuscripts at the British Museum, which seems to have been compiled out of the printed chronicles. But the most copious relations of this singular transaction, are in Heylin and Burnet; more especially the latter, who was aided not only by some original Letters, but by two other cotemporary manuscripts of great authority, one being a Common-Place-Book of judge Spelman, the other an account by Anthony Anthony, a surveyor of the ordnance of the Tower. Heyl. Reformat. 263. 1. Burn. Reform. After Burnet's book, our learned annalist Strype, favoured the world with some additional matter. 1 Strype's Memor. 279. What we shall lay before the reader, will consist, first of the Harleian Manuscript, secondly of Extracts from Burnet, and thirdly of an Extract from Strype; which together will, as we apprehend, nearly comprize every circumstance deserving of notice throughout the whole affair." Extract from Harleian Manuscript.

THOMAS duke of Norfolk, lord high steward of England, att the Tryall of queene Anne Boleyn, who on the 15th day of May, in the 28th yeare of the raigne of kinge Henry the eight, was arraigned in the Tower of London, on a scaffold for that purpose made in the kings hall, the duke of Norfolk sittinge under the cloath of state, the lord chauncellor on his right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on his lefte, the earle of Surrey, sonne of the duke of Norfolk, sittinge directly before his father, a degree lower, as earle marshall of England, to whome were adjoynd 26 other peeres, and among them the queenes father (a), by whome shee was to be tryed. The king's Commission beinge read, the accusers gave in their Evidence, and the Witnesses were produced, the queene sittinge in her chaire made for her, (whether in regard of any infirmity, or out of honor permitted to the wife of the soveraigne) havinge an excellent quick witt, and beinge a ready speaker, did so answeare to all obiections, that had the peeres given in their Verdict accordinge to the expectation of the assembly, shee had bene acquitted: but they (among whome the duke of Suffolke the kings brother-in-law was cheife, and wholly applyinge himselfe to the kings humor) pronounced her guilty; wherevpon the duke of Norfolk, bound to proceede accordinge to the Verdict of the peeres, condemned her to death, either by beinge burned in the Tower-Greene, or beheaded, as his majestie in his pleasure should thinke fitt.—The Sentence beinge denounced the court arose, and she was conveyed backe againe to her chamber, the lady Boleyn her aunt, and the lady Kingston, wife to the constable of the Tower, only attendinge her.—And on the 19th of May, the queene was brought to the place of execucion in the Greene within the Tower, some of the nobility and company of the cittie beinge admitted rather to bee witnesses then spectators of her death, to whome the queene (havinge ascended the scaffold) spake on this manner.

"Freinds and good Christian people, I am here in your presence to suffer death, whereto I acknowledge my selfe adjudged by the lawe, how instly I will not say; I intend not an accusation of any one. I beseech the Almighty to preserve his majestie longe to raigne over you, a more gentle or mild prince never awayed septer; his bounty and clemency towards mee I am sure hath bene speciall; if any one intend an inquisitiue survey of my actions, I intreate him to judge favourably of mee, and not rashly to admitt any censorious conceit. And soe I bid the world farewell, beseeching you to commend mee in your prayers to God." (b)

(a) The queen's father was not one of her judges. See page 417, and the note there.

(b) Fox, 2 Acts and Monuments, p. 270. gives nearly the same speech.

This speech shee vttered with a smylinge countenance; then kneelinge downe, with a fervent spirit said: 'To Jesus Christ I commend my soule, Lord Jesu receaue my soule;' and repeatinge these words very often, suddenly the stroke of the sword sealed the debt that shee owed vnto death.—Nowe the court of England was like a stage, whereon are represented the vicissitudes of ever various fortunes; for within one and the same moneth, that saw queene Anne flourishinge, accused, condemned, executed, and another assumed into her place both of bedd and honour. The first of May, yt seemeth, shee was informed against, the second imprisoned, the fiftenth condemned, the seaventeenth deprived of her brother and friends, who suffered in her cause, and the nyneteenth executed. On the twentyeth the kinge married Jane Seimour, who on the nyne and twentieth was publicly shewed queene.

Extract from 1 Burnet's Reformation, 196.

In January, 1536, the queen brought forth a dead son. This was thought to have made ill impressions on the king: and that, as he concluded from the death of his sons by the former queen, that the marriage was displeasing to God, so he might upon this misfortune, begin to make the like judgment of this marriage. Sure enough the popish party were earnestly set against the queen, looking on her as the great supporter of heresie. And at that time, Fox, then bishop of Hereford, was in Germany at Smalcaid, treating a league with the protestant princes, who insisted much on the Augsburg confession. There were many conferences between Fox and Dr. Barnes, and some others, with the Lutheran divines, for accomodating the differences between them, and the thing was in a good forwardness. All which was imputed to the queen. Gardiner was then ambassador in France, and wrote earnestly to the king, to dissuade him from entering into any religious league with these princes: for that would alienate all the world from him, and dispose his own subjects to rebel. The king thought the German princes and divines should have submitted all things to his judgment, and had such an opinion of his own learning, and was so puffed up with the flattering praises that he daily heard, that he grew impatient of any opposition, and thought that his dictates should pass for oracles. And because the Germans would not receive them so, his mind was alienated from them.—But the duke of Norfolk at court, and Gardiner beyond sea, thought there might easily be found a mean to accomodate the king, both with the emperor and the pope, if the queen were once out of the way; for then he might freely marry any one whom he pleased, and that marriage, with the male issue of it, could not be disputed: whereas, as long as the queen lived, her marriage, as being judged null from the beginning, could never be allowed by the court of Rome, or any of that party. With these reasons of state, others of affection concurred. The queen had been his wife three years; but at this time he entertained a secret love for Jane Seimour, who had all the charms both of beauty and youth in her person; and her humour was tempered, between the severe gravity of queen Katherine, and the gay pleasantness of queen Ann. The queen, perceiving this alienation of the kings heart, used all possible arts to recover that affection, of whose decay she was sadly sensible. But the success was quite contrary to what she designed. For the king saw her no more with those eyes, which she had formerly captivated; but grew jealous, and ascribed these caresses to some other criminal affections, of which he began to suspect her. This being one of the most memorable passages of this reign, I was at more than ordinary pains to learn all I could concerning it, and have not only seen a great many letters that were writ by those that were set about the queen, and caught every thing that fell from her, and sent it to court, but have also seen an account of it, which the learned Spelman, who was a judge at that time, writ with his own hand in his Common-Place book, and another account of it writ by one Anthony Anthony a surveyor of the ordnance of the Tower. From all which I shall give a just and faithful relation of it, without concealing the least circumstance, that may either seem favourable or unfavourable to her.

She was of a very cheereful temper, which was not always limited within the bounds of exact decency and discretion. She had rallied some of the kings servants more than became her. Her brother, the lord Rochford, was her friend as well as brother; but his spiteful wife was jealous of him: and being a woman of no sort of vertue, (as will appear afterwards by her serving queen Katherine Howard in her beastly practices, for which she was attainted and executed,) she carried many stories to the king, or some about him, to persuade, that there was a familiarity between the queen and her brother, beyond what so near a relation could justifie. All that could be said for it, was only this: that he was once seen leaning upon her bed, which bred great suspition. Henry Norris, that was groom of the stole, Weston, and Breton, that were of the kings privy-chamber, and one Mark Smeton, a musician, were all observed to have much of her favour; and their zeal in serving her was thought too warm and diligent to flow from a less active principle than love. Many circumstances were brought to the king, which working upon his aversion to the queen, together with his affection to mistress Seimour, made him conclude her guilty. Yet somewhat which himself observed, or fancied; at a tilting at Greenwich, is believed to have given the crisis to her ruin. It is said, that he spied her let her handkerchief fall to one of her gallants to wipe his face, being hot after a course. Whether she dropt it carelessly, or of design; or whether there be any truth in that story, the letters concerning her fall making no mention of it, I cannot determine; for Spelman makes no mention of it, and gives a very different account of the discovery in these words. 'As for the evidence of this matter, it was discovered by the lady Wingfield, who had been a servant to the queen, and becoming on a sudden infirm some time before her death, did swear this matter to one of her—' and here unluckily the rest of the page is torn off. By this it seems, there was no legal evidence against the queen, and that it was but a witness at second hand, who deposed what they heard the lady Wingfield swear. Who this person was we know not, nor in what temper of mind the lady Wingfield might be, when she swore it. The safest sort of forgery, to one whose conscience can swallow it, is to lay a thing on a dead persons name, where there is no fear of discovery before the great day : and when it was understood that the queen had lost the kings heart, many, either out of their zeal to popery, or design to make their fortune, might be easily induced to carry a story of this nature. And this it seems was that which was brought to the king at Greenwich, who did thereupon immediately return to Whitehall, it being the 1st of May. The queen was immediately restrained to her chamber, the other five were also seized on : but none of them would confess any thing, but 'Mark Sretton, as to any actual thing,' so Cromwell writ. Upon this they were carried to the Tower. The poor queen was in a sad condition ; she must not only fall under the kings displeasure, but be both defamed and destroyed at once. At first she smiled and carried it cheerfully ; and said, she believed the king did this only to prove her. But when she saw it was in earnest, she desired to have the sacrament in her closet, and expressed great devotion, and seemed to be prepared for death.

The surprize and confusion she was in, raised fits of the mother, which those about her did not seem to understand : but three or four letters, which were writ concerning her to court, say, that she was at some times very devout, and cried much ; and of a sudden would burst out in laughter, which are evident signs of vapours. When she heard that those who were accused with her, were sent to the Tower, she then concluded herself lost ; and said, she should be sent thither next ; and talked idly, saying, 'That if her bishops were about the king, they would all speak for her. She also said, that she would be a saint in heaven, for she had done many good deeds ; and that there should be no rain, but heavy judgments on the land, for what they were now doing to her.' Her enemies had now gone too far, not to destroy her. Next day she was carried to the Tower, and some lords, that met her on the river, declared to her what her offences were. Upon which, she made deep protestations of her innocence, and begged leave to see the king ; but that was not to be expected. When she was carried into the Tower, 'She fell down on her knees, and prayed God to help her, as she was not guilty of the thing for which she was accused.' That same day the king wrote to Cranmer, to come to Lambeth ; but ordered him not to come into his presence. Which was procured by the queen's enemies, who took care, that one who had such credit with the king, should not come at him, till they had fully persuaded him that she was guilty. Her uncle's lady, the lady Boleyn, was appointed to lye in the chamber with her. Which she took very ill ; for, upon what reason I know not, she had been in very ill terms with her. She engaged her into much discourse, and studied to draw confessions from her. Whatsoever she said, was presently sent to the court. And a woman full of vapours, was like enough to tell every thing that was true, with a great deal more ; for persons in that condition, not only have no command of themselves, but are apt to say any thing that comes in their fancy.

The duke of Norfolk, and some of the king's council, were with her ; but could draw nothing from her, though they made her believe, that Norris and Mark had accused her. But when they were gone, she fell down on her knees and wept, and prayed often, 'Jesu have mercy on me ;' and then fell a laughing : when that fit was over, she desired to have the sacrament still by her, that she might cry for mercy. And she said to the lieutenant of the Tower, she was as clear of the company of all men, as to sin, as she was clear from him ; and that she was the king's true wedded wife. And she cried out, 'O Norris, hast thou accused me ? Thou art in the Tower with me, and thou and I shall dye together ; and Mark, so shall thou too.' She apprehended they were to put her in a dungeon ; and sadly bemoaned her own, and her mother's misery ; and asked them, whether she must dye without justice. But they told her, the poorest subjects had justice, much more would she have it. The same letter says, that Norris had not accused her ; and that he said to her almoner, that he could swear for her, 'she was a good woman.' But she being made believe that he had accused her, and not being then so free in her thoughts, as to consider that ordinary artifice for drawing out confessions, told all she knew, both of him and Mark. Which though it was not enough to destroy her, yet certainly wrought much on the jealous and alienated king. She told them, 'That she once asked Norris, why he did not go on with his marriage ?' who answered her, 'that he would yet tarry some time.' To which she replied, 'You look for dead men's shoes ; for if ought come to the king but good, you would look to have me.' He answered, 'if he had any such thought, he would his head were cut off.' Upon which, she said, 'she could undoe him if she pleased, and thereupon she fell out with him.' As for Mark, who was then laid in irons, she said, he was never in her chamber, but when the king was last at Winchester ; and then he came in to play on the virginals : she said, that 'She never spoke to him after that, but on Saturday before May-day, when she saw him standing in the window, and then she asked him, why he was so sad; he said, it was no matter: she answered, You may not look to have me speak to you, as if you were a nobleman, since you are an inferior person. 'No, no, madam,' said he, 'a look sufficeth me.' She seemed more apprehensive of Weston, than of any body. For on Whitsun Munday last he said to her, 'That Norris came more to her chamber upon her account, than for any body else that was there. She had observed that he loved a kinswoman of hers, and challenged him for it, and for not loving his wife. But he answered her, that there were women in the house, whom he loved better than them both; she asked who is that; yourself, said he; upon which, she said, she defied him.'

This misery of the queens drew after it the common effects that follow persons under such a disgrace; for now all the court was against her, and every one was courting the rising queen. But Cranmer had not learned these arts, and had a better soul in him, than to be capable of such baseness and ingratitude. He had been much obliged by her, and had conceived an high opinion of her, and so could not easily receive ill impressions of her; yet he knew the kings temper, and that a downright justification of her would provoke him: therefore he wrote the following Letter, on the 3d of May, with all the softness that so tender a point required; in which he justified her as far as was consistent with prudence and charity. The letter shows of what a constitution he was that wrote it; and contains so many things that tend highly to her honour, that I shall insert it here, as I copied it from the original.

'Pleaseth it your most noble grace, to be advertised, that at your graces commandment by Mr. Secretary his letters, written in your graces name, I came to Lambeth yesterday, and do there remain to know your graces further pleasure. And forsomuch as without your graces commandment, I dare not contrary to the contents of the said Letters, presume to come unto your graces presence; nevertheless, of my most bounden duty, I can do no less than most humbly to desire your grace, by your great wisdom, and by the assistance of Gods help, somewhat to suppress the deep sorrows of your graces heart, and to take all adversities of your graces hands both patiently and thankfully. I cannot deny, but your grace hath great causes many ways of lamentable heaviness: also that in the wrongful estimation of the world, your graces honour of every part is so highly touched, whether the things that commonly be spoken of, be true or not, that I remember not that ever Almighty God sent unto your grace, any like occasion to try your graces constancy throughout, whether your highness can be content to take off Gods hands, as well things displeasing, as pleasant. And if he find in your most noble heart such an obedience unto his will, that your grace, without murmuration and overmuch heaviness, do accept all adversities, not less thanking him, than when all things succeed after your graces will and pleasure, nor less procuring his glory and honour; then I suppose your grace did never any thing more acceptable unto him, since your first governance of this your realm. And moreover, your grace shall give unto him occasion to multiply and increase his graces and benefits unto your highness, as he did unto his most faithful servant Job; unto whom, after his great calamities and heaviness, for his obedient heart, and willing acceptance of Gods scourge and rod, Addidit ei Dominus cuncta duplicia. And if it be true, that is openly reported of the queens grace, if men had a right estimation of things, they should not esteem any part of your graces honour to be touched thereby, but her honour only to be clearly disparaged. And I am in such a perplexity, that my mind is clean amazed. For I never had better opinion in woman, than I had in her; which maketh me to think, that she should not be culpable. And again, I think your highness would not have gon so far, except she had surely been culpable. Now I think that your grace best knoweth, that next unto your grace, I was most bound unto her of all creatures living. Wherefore I most humbly beseech your grace, to suffer me in that which both Gods law, nature, and also her kindness, bindeth me unto; that is, that I may with your graces favour wish and pray for her, that she may declare her self incapable and innocent. And if she be found culpable, considering your graces goodness towards her, and from what condition your grace of your only meer goodness took her, and set the crown upon her head; I repute him not your graces faithful servant and subject, nor true unto the realm, that would not desire the offence without mercy to be punished, to the example of all other. And as I loved her not a little, for the love which I judged her to bear towards God and his gospel; so if she be proved culpable, there is not one that loveth God and his gospel, that ever will favour her, but must hate her above all other; and the more they favour the gospel, the more they will hate her: for then there was never creature in our time that so much slandered the gospel. And God hath sent her this punishment, for that she feignedly hath professed his gospel in her mouth, and not in heart and deed. And though she have offended so, that she hath deserved never to be reconciled unto your graces favour; yet Almighty God hath manifoldly declared his goodness your grace, and never offended you. But your grace, I am sure, knowledgeth that you have offended him. Wherefore I trust that your grace will bear no less entire favour unto the truth of the gospel, than you did before: forsomuch as your graces favour to the gospel, was not led by affection unto her, but by zeal unto the truth. And thus I beseech Almighty God, whose gospel he hath ordained your grace to be defender of, ever to preserve your grace from all evil, and give you at the ‘ end the promise of his gospel. From Lambeth, the 3d of May.

‘ After I had written this letter unto your grace, my lord chancellor, my lord of Oxford, my lord of Sussex, and my lord chamberlain of your graces house, sent for me to come unto the Star Chamber; and there declared unto me such things as your graces pleasure was they should make me privy unto. For the which I am most bounden unto your grace. And what communication we had together, I doubt not but they will make the true report thereof unto your grace. I am exceedingly sorry, that such faults can be proved by the queen, as I heard of their relation. But I am, and ever shall be, your faithful subject, Your graces most humble subject, and chaplain. T. Cantuariensis.’

But jealousy, and the king's new affection, had quite defaced all the remainders of esteem for his late beloved queen. Yet the ministers continued practising, to get further evidence for the Tryal; which was not brought on till the 12th of May; and then Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeton, were tried by a commission of Oyer and Terminer in Westminster-Hall. They were twice indicted, and the indictments were found by two grand juries, in the counties of Kent, and Middlesex; the crimes with which they were charged, being said to be done in both these counties. Mark Smeton confessed, he had known the queen carnally three times. The other three pleaded ‘not guilty;’ but the jury, upon the evidence formerly mentioned, found them all guilty; and judgment was given, that they should be drawn to the place of execution, and some of them to be hanged, others to be beheaded, and all to be quartered, as guilty of high treason. On the 15th of May, the queen and her brother the lord Rochford (who was a peer, having been made a viscount when his father was created earl of Wiltshire) were brought to be tried by their peers; the duke of Norfolk being lord high steward for that occasion. With him sate the duke of Suffolk, the marquess of Exeter, the earl of Arundel, and 27 more peers, of whom their father the earl of Wiltshire was one. (a) Whether this unnatural complacency was imposed on him by the imperious king, or officiously submitted to by himself, that he might thereby be preserved from the ruin that fell on his family, is not known. Here the queen of England by an unheard-of precedent was brought to the bar, and indicted of High Treason. The crimes charged on her were, ‘That she had procured her brother and the other four to lye with her, which they had done often; that she had said to them, that the king never had her heart, and had said to every one of them by themselves, that she loved them better than any person whatsoever. Which was to the slander of the issue that was begotten between the king and her.’ And this was Treason, according to the statute made in the 26th year of this reign (so that the law, that was made for her and the issue of her marriage, is now made use of to destroy her). It was also added in the indictment, that she, and her complices, ‘had conspired the kings death;’ but this it seems was only put in to swell the charge, for if there had been any evidence for it, there was no need of stretching the other statute, or if they could have proved the violating of the queen, the known statute of the 25th year of the reign of Edward 3, had been sufficient. When the Indictment was read, she held up her hand, and pleaded Not Guilty, and so did her brother, and did answer the evidence was brought against her discreetly. One thing is remarkable, that Mark Smeton, who was the only person that confessed any thing, was never confronted with the queen, nor was kept to be an evidence against her; for he had received his sentence three days before, and so could be no witness in law. But perhaps, though he was wrought on to confess, yet they did not think he had confidence enough to aver it to the queen's face. Therefore the evidence they brought, as Spelman says, was the oath of a woman that was dead, yet this, or rather the terror of offending the king, so wrought on the lords, that they found her and her brother Guilty; and Judgment was given, that she should be burnt, or beheaded at the kings pleasure. Upon which Spelman observes, that whereas burning is the death which the law appoints for a woman that is attainted of Treason, yet since she had been queen of England, they left it to the king to determine, whether she should dye so infamous a death, or be beheaded. But the Judges complained of this way of proceeding, and said, such a disjunctive in a judgment of Treason, had never been seen. The lord Rochford was also condemned to be beheaded and quartered. Yet all this did not satisfy the enraged king, but the marriage between him and her must be annulled, and the issue illegitimated. The king remembered an intrigue that had been between her and the earl of Northumberland, which was mentioned in the former book; and that he then lord Piercy said to the cardinal, ‘That he had gone so far before witnesses, that it lay upon his conscience, so that he could not go back.’ This, its like, might be some promise he made to marry her, per verba de futuro, which though it was no precontract in itself, yet it seems the poor queen was either so ignorant or so ill-advised, as to be perswaded afterwards it was one; though its certain that nothing, but a contract per verba de presenti, could be of any force to annul the subsequent marriage. The king and his council, reflecting upon what it seems the cardinal had told him, resolved to try what could be made of it, and pressed the earl of Northumberland to confess a contract between him and her. But he took his oath before the two archbishops, that there was no contract, nor promise of marriage ever between them, and received the sacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk, and others of the king's privy council; wishing it might be to his damnation, if there was any such thing (concerning which I have seen the original declaration under his own hand). Nor could they draw any confession from the queen, before the Sentence; for certainly if they could have done that, the divorce had gone before the trial; and then she must have been tried only as marchioness of Pembroke. But now she lying under so terrible a sentence, it is most probable, that either some hopes of life were given her; or at least, she was wrought on by the assurances of mitigating that cruel part of her Judgment, of being burnt, into the milder part of the sentence, of 'having her head cut off;' so that she confessed a pre-contract, and on the 17th of May was brought to Lambeth: and in court, the afflicted archbishop sitting judge, some persons of quality being present, she confessed some just and lawful impediments; by which it was evident that her marriage with the king was not valid. Upon which Confession, her marriage between the king and her was judged to have been null and void. The Record of the Sentence is burnt; but these particulars are repeated in the Act that passed in the next parliament, touching the Succession to the Crown. It seems this was secretly done, for Spelman writes of it thus; It was said, there was a divorce made between the king and her, upon her confessing a precontract with another before her marriage with the king: so that it was then only talk of, but not generally known.

The two sentences that were past upon the queen, the one of attainder for adultery, the other of divorce because of a precontract, did so contradict one another, that it was apparent, one, if not both, of them must be unjust; for if the marriage between the king and her was null from the beginning, then since she was not the king's wedded wife, there could be no adultery: and her marriage to the king was either a true marriage, or not; if it was true, then the annulling of it was unjust, and if it was no true marriage, then the attainder was unjust; for there could be no breach of that faith which was never given: so that it is plain, the king was resolved to be rid of her, and to illegitimate her daughter, and in that transport of his fury, did not consider that the very method he took, discovered the injustice of his proceedings against her. Two days after this, she was ordered to be executed in the Green on Tower-Hill. How she received these tidings, and how steadfast she continued in the protestations of her innocence, will best appear by the following circumstances. The day before she suffered, upon a strict search of her past life, she called to mind, that she had played the step-mother too severely to lady Mary, and had done her many injuries. Upon which, she made the lieutenant of the Tower's lady sit down in the chair of state; which the other, after some ceremony, doing, she fell down on her knees, and with many tears charged the lady, as she would answer it to God, to go in her name, and do as she had done, to the lady Mary, and ask her forgiveness for the wrongs she had done her. And she said, she had no quiet in her conscience, till she had done that. But though she did in this what became a Christian, the lady Mary could not so easily pardon these injuries; but retained the resentments of them her whole life.

This ingenuity and tenderness of conscience about lesser matters, is a great presumption, that if she had been guilty of more eminent faults, she had not continued to the last denying them, and making protestations of her innocency. For that same night she sent her last message to the king, and acknowledged her self much obliged to him, that had continued still to advance her. She said, he had, from a private gentlewoman, first made her a marchioness, and then a queen; and now, since he could raise her no higher, was sending her to be a saint in Heaven: she protested her innocence, and recommended her daughter to his care. And her carriage that day she died, will appear from the following Letter writ by the lieutenant of the Tower, copied from the original, which I insert, because the copier employed by the lord Herbert has not writ it out faithfully; for I cannot think that any part of it was left out on design.

"Sir, These should be to advertise you, I have received your letter, wherein you would have strangers conveyed out of the Tower, and so they be by the means of Richard Gressum, and William Cooke, and Wytspoll. But the number of strangers past not thirty, and not many of those urned; and the ambassador of the emperor had a servant there, and honestly put out: Sir, if we have not an hour certain, as it may be known in London, I think here will be but few, and I think a reasonable number were best, for I suppose she will declare her self to be a good woman, for all men but for the king, at the hour of her death. For this morning she sent for me, that I might be with her at such time as she received the good Lord, to be intent I should hear her speak as touching her innocency alway to be clear. And in the writing of this, she sent for me, and at my coming she said: 'Mr. Kingston, I hear say I shall not die aforonoon, and I am verry sorry therefore, for I thought to be dead by this time, and past my pain. I told her, it should be no pain, it was so sottle. And then she said, I heard say the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck, and put her hands about it, laughing heartily. I have seen many men, and also women, executed; and that they have been in great sorrow, and to my knowledge this lady has much joy and pleasure in death. Sir, her almoner is continually with her, and had been since two a clock after midnight. This is the effect of any thing that is here at this time, and thus fare you well, Yours, William Kingston."

A little before noon, being the 19th of May, she was brought to the scaffold, where she made a short speech to a great company that came to look on the last scene of this fatal tragedy: the chief of whom were the dukes of Suffolk and Richmond, the lord chancellor, and secretary Cromwell, with the lord mayor, the sheriffs and aldermen of London. 'She said, she was come to die, as she was judged by the law; she would accuse none, nor say any thing of the ground upon which she was judged. She prayed heartily for the king; and called him a most merciful and gentle prince, and that he had been always to her a good, gentle, sovereign lord, and if any would meddle with her cause, she required them to judge the best. And so she took her leave of them, and of the world; and heartily desired they would pray for her.' After she had been some time in her devotions, her last words being, 'To Christ I commend my soul;' her head was cut off by the hangman of Calais, who was brought over as more expert at beheading than any in England: her eyes and lips were observed to move after her head was cut off, as Spelman writes; but her body was thrown into a common chest of elm-tree that was made to put arrows in, and was buried in the chappel within the Tower before twelve a clock.

Her brother with the other four did also suffer; none of them were quartered, but they were all beheaded, except Smeton, who was hanged. It was generally said, that he was corrupted into that confession, and had his life promised him; but it was not fit to let him live to tell tales. Norris had been much in the king's favour, and an offer was made him of his life, if he would confess his guilt, and accuse the queen. But he generously rejected that un-handsom proposition, and said, 'That in his conscience he thought her innocent of these things laid to her charge; but whether she was or not, he would not accuse her of any thing, and he would die a thousand times, rather than ruin an innocent person.'

These proceedings occasioned as great variety of censures, as there were diversity of interests. The popish party said, the justice of God was visible, that she who had supplanted queen Catherine, met with the like, and harder measure, by the same means. Some took notice of her faint justifying her self on the scaffold, as if her conscience had then prevailed so far, that she could no longer deny a thing, for which she was so soon to answer at another tribunal. But others thought her care of her daughter made her speak so tenderly; for she had observed, that queen Catherine's obstinacy had drawn the kings indignation on her daughter; and therefore that she alone might bear her misfortunes, and derive no share of them on her daughter, she spoke in a stile, that could give the king no just offence: and as she said enough to justify her self, so she said as much for the kings honour, as could be expected. Yet in a letter that she wrote to the king from the Tower, (which will be found in the Collection,) she pleaded her innocence, in a strain of so much wit, and moving passionate eloquence, as perhaps can scarce be paralleled: certainly her spirits were much exalted when she wrote it, for it is a pitch above her ordinary stile. Yet the Copy I take it from, lying among Cromwell's other Papers, makes me believe it was truly written by her.

Her carriage seemed too free, and all people thought that some freedoms and levities in her had encouraged those unfortunate persons to speak such bold things to her, since few attempt upon the chastity, or make declarations of love, to persons of so exalted a quality, except they see some invitations, at least in their carriage. Others thought that a free and jovial temper might, with great innocence, though with no discretion, lead one to all those things that were proved against her; and therefore they concluded her chaste, though indiscreet. Others blamed the king, and taxed his cruelty in proceeding so severely against a person whose chastity he had reason to be assured of, since she had resisted his addresses near five years, till he legitimated them by marriage. But others excused him. It is certain her carriage had given just cause of some jealousy, and that being the rage of a man, it was no wonder if a king of his temper, conceiving it against one whom he had so signally obliged, was transported into unjustifiable excesses.—Others condemned Cranmer, as a man that obsequiously followed all the king's appetites; and that he had now divorced the king a second time, which shewed that his conscience was governed by the king's pleasure as his supreme law. But what he did was unavoidable. For whatever motives drew from her the confession of that precontract, he was obliged to give sentence upon it: and that which she confessed, being such as made her incapable to contract marriage with the king, he could not decline the giving of sentence upon so formal a confession. Some loaded all that favoured the Reformation: and said, It now appeared what a woman their great patroness and supporter had been. But to those it was answered, That her faults, if true, being secret, could cast no reflection on those, who being ignorant of them, made use of her protection. And the church of Rome thought not their cause suffered by the enraged cruelty and ambition of the cursed Irene, who had convened the second council of Nice, and set up the worship of images again in the east; whom the Popes continued to court and magnifie, after her barbarous murder of her son, with other acts of unsatiated spite and ambition. Therefore they had no reason to think the worse of persons for claiming the protection of a queen, whose faults (if she was at all criminal,) were unknown to them when they made use of her.

Some have since that time concluded it a great evidence of her guilt, that during her daughter's long and glorious reign, there was no full nor complete vindication of her published. For the writers of that time thought it enough to speak honourably of her; and in general, to call her innocent, but none of them ever attempted a clear discussion of the particulars laid to her charge. This had been much to her daughter's honour, and therefore, since it was not done, others concluded it could not be done; and that their knowledge of her guilt restrained their pens. But others do not at all allow of that inference, and think rather, that it was the great wisdom of that time not to suffer such things to be called in question; since no wise government will admit of a debate about the clearness of the princes title. For the very attempting to prove it weakens it more, than any of the proofs that are brought can confirm it; therefore it was prudently done of that queen and her great ministers, never to suffer any vindication or apology to be written. Some indiscretions could not be denied, and these would all have been caught hold of, and improved by the busie emissaries of Rome and Spain.

The tragedy of queen Anne followed soon after this: it broke out on the first of May 1536, but it seems it was concerted before; for a parliament was summoned, at least the writs were tested the 27th of April before. There is a long account of her sufferings given by Meteren, in that excellent History that he wrote of the Wars in the Netherlands, which he took from a full relation of it, given by a French gentleman, Cuispin, who was then in London, and as Meteren relates the matter, wrote without partiality. He begins it thus: "There was a gentleman who blamed his sister for some lightness that appeared in her behaviour, she said the queen did more than she did; for she admitted some of her court to come into her chamber at undue hours: and named the lord Rochford, Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeton the musician: and she said to her brother, that Smeton could tell much more: all this was carried to the king."—When the matter broke out on the first of May, the king who loved Norris, sent for him, and said, if he would confess those things with which the queen was charged, he should neither suffer in his person, nor his estate; nor so much as be put in prison: but if he did not confess, and were found guilty, he should suffer the extremity of the law. Norris answered, he would much rather die than be guilty of such falsehood: that it was all false, which he was ready to justify in a combat against any person whatsoever; so he was sent with the rest to the Tower: the confession of Smeton was all that was brought against the queen: he, as was believed, prevailed on to accuse her: yet he was condemned contrary to the promise that had been made him: but it was pretended that his crime was, that he had told his suspicions to others, and not to the king: and when it was alledged that one witness was not sufficient, it was answered that it was sufficient. He adds, that the queen was tried in the Tower; and that she defended her honour, and modesty, in such a way, as to soften the king (for she knew his temper) by such humble deportment, to favour her daughter. She was brought to her trial without having any advocate allowed her; having none but her maids about her. A chair was set for her, and she looked to all her judges with a cheerful countenance, as she made her curtsies to them, without any fear: she behaved herself as if she had been still queen: she spoke not much in her own defence; but the modesty of her countenance pleaded her innocence, much more than the defence that she made; so that all who saw or heard her, believed her innocent. Both the magistrates of London, and several others who were there, said, they saw no evidence against her; only it appeared, that they were resolved to be rid of her.

She was made to lay aside all the characters of her dignity: which she did willingly; but still protested her innocence. When she heard the Sentence, that she was to be beheaded, or burnt, she was not terrified; but lifted up her hands to God, and said, 'O Father! O Creator! Thou, who art the way, the truth, and the life; thou knowest that I have not deserved this death.' And turning herself to her Judges, (her uncle, the duke of Norfolk, being the lord high steward) she said, 'My lords, I will not say that your sentence is unjust; nor presume, that my opinion ought to be preferred to the judgment of you all. I believe you have reasons, and occasions of suspicion and jealousy, upon which you have condemned me: but they must be other, than those that have been produced here in court; for I am entirely innocent of all these accusations; so that I cannot ask pardon of God for them. I have been always a faithful and loyal wife to the king. I have not, perhaps, at all times shewed him that humility and reverence, that his goodness to me, and the honour to which he raised me, did deserve. I confess, I have had fancies and suspicions of him, which I had not strength nor discretion enough to manage: but God knows, and is my witness, that I never failed otherwise towards him: and I shall never confess any other, at the hour of my death. Do not think that I say this, on design to prolong my life: God has taught me to know how to die; and he will fortify my faith. Do not think that I am so carried in my mind, as not to lay the honour of my chastity to heart; of which I should make small account now in my extremity, if I had not maintained it my whole life long, as much as ever queen did. I know, these my last words will signify nothing, but to justify my honour and my chastity. As for my brother, and those others, who are unjustly condemned, I would willingly suffer many deaths, to deliver them: but since I see it so pleases the king, I must willingly bear with their death, and shall accompany them in death, with this assurance, that I shall lead an endless life with them in peace.' She said all this, and a great deal more : and then, with a modest air, she rose up, and took leave of them all. Her brother, and the other gentlemen, were executed first. "He exhorted those who suffered with him, to die without fear ; and said to those that were about him, that he came to die, since it was the king's pleasure that it should be so. He exhorted all persons, not to trust to courts, states, and kings, but in God only. He had deserved a heavier punishment for his other sins ; but not from the king, whom he had never offended. Yet he prayed God to give him a long, and a good life. With him, all the rest suffered a death, which they had no way deserved. Mark Smeton only confessed, he had deserved well to die : which gave occasion to many reflections. When the queen heard how her brother and the other gentlemen had suffered, and had sealed her innocence with their own blood ; but that Mark had confessed, he deserved to die ; she broke out into some passion, and said ; ' Has he not then cleared me of that publick shame he has brought me to ? Alas ! I fear his soul suffers for it, and that he is now punished for his false accusation. But for my brother, and those others, I doubt not, but they are now in the presence of that Great King, before whom I am to be tomorrow.' "

It seems, that gentleman knew nothing of the judgment that passed at Lambeth, annulling the marriage : for it was transacted secretly. It could have no foundation or colour, but from that story mentioned in Cavendish's Life of Wolsey, of the lord Percy's addresses to her. He was now examined upon that : but it will appear from his letter to Cromwell, that he solemnly purged both himself and her, from any precontract ; being examined upon oath by the two archbishops : and that he received the sacrament upon it, before the duke of Norfolk, and some of the king's council that were learned in the spiritual law ; assuring them by his oath, and by the sacrament that he had received, and intended to receive, that there was never any contract, or promise of marriage, between her and him. This he wrote on the 13th of May, four days before the queen's execution ; which will be found in the collection. This shews plainly, that she was prevailed on, between fear and hope, to confess a precontract, the person not being named.

The French gentleman gives the same account of the manner of her death, and of her speech, that all the other writers of that time do. " When she was brought to the place of execution, within the Tower, he says, her looks were cheerful ; and she never appeared more beautiful, than at that time. She said to those about her, Be not sorry to see me die thus ; but pardon me from your hearts, that I have not expressed to all about me, that mildness that became me ; and that I have not done that good, that was in my power to do. She prayed for those who were the procurers of her death. Then, with the aid of her maids, she undressed her neck with great courage, and so ended her days."

This long recital I have translated out of Meteren ; for I do not find it taken notice of by any of our writers. I leave it thus, without any other reflections upon it, but that it seems all over credible. Thevet, a Franciscan fryar, who for 17 or 18 years, had wandered up and down Europe, to prepare materials for his Cosmography, (which he published in the year 1563,) says, that many English gentlemen assured him, that king Henry expressed great repentance of his sins, being at the point of death ; and among other things, of the injury and the crime committed against queen Anne Boleyn, who was falsely accused, and convicted of that which was laid to her charge. It is true, Thuanus has very much disgraced that writer, as a vain and ignorant plagiarist : but he having been of the order that suffered so much for their adhering to queen Catherine, is not to be suspected of partiality for queen Anne. We must leave those secrets to the great day.

The Earl of Northumberland's Letter to Cromwell, denying any Contract, or Promise of Marriage, between Queen Anne and himself.

' Mr. Secretary, this shall be to signifie unto you, that I perceyve by sir Raynold Carnaby, that there is supposed a precontract between the queen and me ; whereupon I was not only heretofore examined upon my oath before the archbishops of Canterbury and York, but also received the blessed sacrament upon the same before the duke of Norfolk, and other the king's highnes council learned in the spirital law ; assuring you, Mr. Secretary, by the said oath, and blessed body which assure I received, and hereafter intend to receive, that the same may be to my damnation, if ever there were any contracte, or promise of marriage between her and me. At Newyngton-Green, the xiiijth day of Maye, in the 28th year of the reigne of our soveraigne lord king Henry the 8th. Your assured.

' NORTHUMBERLAND.'

Queen Ann Boleyn's last Letter to king Henry.

' Sir ; Your grace's displeasure, and my imprisonment, are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour) by such an one whom you know to be mine antient professed enemy ; I no sooner received this message by him, than I rightly conceived your meaning ; and if, as you say, confessing a truth indeed may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your command.— But let not your grace ever imagine that your poor wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not so much as a thought thereof preceded. And to speak a truth, never prince had wife more loyal in all duty, and in all true affection, than you have ever found in Ann Boleyn, with which name and place I could willingly have contented my self, if God and your grace's pleasure had been so pleased. Neither did I at any time so far forget my self in my exaltation, or received queenship, but that I always looked for such an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my preferment being on no surer foundation than your grace's fancy, the least alteration, I knew, was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other subject. You have chosen me, from a low estate, to be your queen and companion, far beyond my desert or desire. If then you found me worthy of such honour, good your grace let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine enemies, withdraw your princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain of a disloyal heart towards your good grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most dutiful wife, and the infant princess your daughter: try me, good king, but let me have a lawful trial, and let not my sworn enemies sit as my accusers and judges; yea, let me receive an open trial, for my truth shall fear no open shame; then shall you see, either mine innocence cleared, your suspicion and conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the world stopped, or my guilt openly declared. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your grace may be freed from an open censure; and mine offence being so lawfully proved, your grace is at liberty, both before God and man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unlawful wife, but to follow your affection, already settled on that party, for whose sake I am now as I am, whose name I could some good while since have pointed unto; your grace being not ignorant of my suspicion therein.—But if you have already determined of me, and that not only my death, but an infamous slander must bring you the enjoying of your desired happiness; then I desire of God, that he will pardon your great sin therein, and likewise mine enemies, the instruments thereof; and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me, at his general judgment-seat, where both you and my self must shortly appear, and in whose judgment I doubt not, (whatsoever the world may think of me) mine innocence shall be openly known, and sufficiently cleared.—My last and only request shall be, that my self may only bear the burthen of your grace's displeasure, and that it may not touch the innocent souls of those poor gentlemen, who, as I understand, are likewise in strait imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your sight, if ever the name of Ann Boleyn hath been pleasing in your ears, then let me obtain this request; and I will so leave to trouble your grace any further, with mine earnest prayers to the Trinity to have your grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your actions. From my doleful prison in the Tower, this 6th of May. Your most loyal and ever faithful wife, ANN BOLEYN.'

Extract from Strype's Memorials, vol. 1. p. 279.

This year, (1536) in the month of May, queen Anne Boleyn was beheaded: a great friend and patroness of the reformed religion. She was very nobly charitable, and expended largely in all manner of acts of liberality, according to her high quality. And among the rest of her ways of shewing this Christian virtue, she being a favourer of learning, together with her father, the lord Wiltshire, and the lord Rochford, her brother, maintained divers ingenious men at the universities. Among the rest, were these men of note, Dr. Hethe, afterward archbishop of York, and lord chancellor; Dr. Thirby, afterward bishop of Ely; and Mr. Paget, afterward lord Paget, and secretary of state: all which in her time were favourers of the Gospel, though afterwards they relapsed. Of Paget one hath observed, that he was a most earnest Protestant, and being in Cambridge, gave unto one Raynold West, Luther's book, and other books of the Germans, as Franciscus Lambertus de Sectis: and that, at that time he read Melancthou's rhetorick openly in Trinity-hall; and was a maintainer of Dr. Barnes, and all the Protestants then in Cambridge, and helped many religious persons out of their cowles. This queen was also a great favourer of those that suffered for religion. Let this Letter ensuing, writ by her to Crumwel, stand upon record here, shewing both her love to such sufferers, and her high esteem of the word of God.

By the Queen.

'Anne the Queen. Trusty and right well beloved, wee greet you well. And whereas, we be credibly enformed, that the bearer hereof, Rychard Herman, inerchant, and citizen of Antwerp in Brabant, was, in the time of the late lord cardinal, put and expelled from his freedom and fellowship of and in the English-House there, for nothing else, as he affirmeth, not only for that, that he did, both with his goods and policy, to his great hurt and hindrance in this world, help to the setting forth of the New Testament in English. Wee therefore desire and instantly pray you, that with all speed and favour convenient, ye woll cause this good and honest merchant, being my lords true, faithful and loving subject, to be restored to his pristin freedom, liberty and fellowship aforesaid. And the sooner at this our request: and at your good pleasure to hear him in such things as he hath to make further relation unto you in this behalf. Yeven under our signet, at my lord's manner of Grenewich, the 14 day of May.'

Such a material piece of history in the king's reign, besides what is written by our historians, may deserve divers particular remarks to be shewn, concerning this queen's behaviour and her speeches, from the time of her commitment to the Tower, to her execution. Which I am enabled to give from five or six letters of sir William Kyngston, constable, or (as others) lieutenant, of the Tower, to secretary Crumwel. And I do it the rather, to represent matters concerning this queen in her afflictions the more largely, exactly and distinctly; which bishop Burnet hath set down from the same papers, more briefly and imperfectly. And perhaps upon the reading of what follows, some things which that reverend author attributes to fits and vapours in the queen, may find a better and truer interpretation. The lord Herbert also has given us only some short hints of these things.

After the duke of Norfolk, and some other of the kings council who had conducted queen Anne to the Tower (which was on the 2d of May) were departed, the said constable of the Tower went before her into her lodging. And then she said to him, 'Mr. Kyngston, shall I go into a dungeon?' he answered her, No, madam; you shall go into your lodging, that you lay in at your coronation. Upon which she said, It is too good for me. And further said, 'Jesu! have mercy on me.' And then kneeled down, weeping a great pace. And in the same sorrow fell into a great laughing. And so she did several times afterwards. Then she desired Mr. Kyngston, to move the king's highness that she might have the sacrament in the closet by her chamber, that she might pray for mercy. 'For I am as clear,' said she, 'from the company of man, as for sin, as I am clear from you.' and again, 'the king's true wedded wife.' And then she said, 'Mr. Kyngston, do you know wherefore I am here?' and he said, Nay. And then she asked him, when he saw the king? he said, not since he saw him in the Tilt-Yard, [which was but the day before at Greenwich, when he seemed first to take a displeasure against her.] And then she asked him, I pray you tell me, where my lord my father is. He told her, he saw him afore dinner in the court. O! where is my sweet brother? (for she feared the king's displeasure against her, would reach unto all her relations.) Kingston replied, I left him at York-place: thinking it convenient to conceal it from her, though he was committed the same day. I hear say, said she, that I shall be accused by three men. And I can say no more but, Nay: though you should open my body; and therewith she opened her gown. Adding, O! Norris, hast thou accused me? thou art in the Tower with me. And thou and I shall die together. And Mark, [another that accused her] thou art here too. And then with much compassion she said, O! my mother, thou wilt die with sorrow. And then she much lamented my lady Worcester (being with child) because her child did not stir in her body. And when the constable's wife, being present, asked, what might be the cause, she said, It was for the sorrow she took for me.

Then she said, Mr. Kyngston, shall I die without justice? to which he resolved, The poorest subject the king had, had justice. And therewith she laughed. All these sayings happened that night. The next morning in conversation, with her, these speeches happened; related by sir W. Kyngston, in his foresaid letter. Mrs. Cosins, a gentlewoman appointed to wait upon the queen here, and that lay on her palate bed, said, that Norris (one of those that were accused about her) did say on Saturday last unto the queen's amner, that he would swear for the queen, that she was a good woman. And then the said gentlewoman added, speaking to the queen, [as minding to enquire of her concerning the occasion of her present trouble] Madam, why should there be any such matters spoken of? Marry, said the queen, I bade him do so. For I asked him, why he did not go through with his marriage [with some lady, it seems, Norris courted]. And he made answer, he would tarry a time. Then said she, You look for dead men's shoes. For if ought should come to the king, but good, you would look to have me. Then he said, If he should have any such thought, he would his head were off. And then she said, she could undo him, if she would. And therewith they fell out.

And then she said, I more fear Weston [another that was cast into the Tower about her business.] For Weston had said unto her, that Norris came more unto her chamber for her, than he did for Mage [the name, I suppose, of one of the queen's maids, that he courted.] And further, Kyngston related another saying, which the queen spake to him concerning Weston, [whom also she had sometimes talk with, coming often in her way; which might create a jealousy concerning him.] That she had spoke with him, because he did love her kinswoman, Mrs. Skelton. And said to him, that he loved not his wife [spoken by way of reproof.] And he made answer to her again, that he loved one in her house better than them both. And the queen said, Who is that? he gave this answer, It is yourself. And then she defied him, as she said to Kyngston [in scorn and displeasure, as reflecting upon her honour, undoubtedly]. These passages between the queen and them, was the cause of all their deaths; coming some way or other to the jealous king's ears. For she, being of a free and courteous nature, would exchange words sometimes, and enter into some talk with such as she met in the court; and with these gentlemen, who were of the privy chamber: and so happened often to come where she was. And some of their discourse happened to be brought to the king by some officious person, that owed her no good will.

In another Letter to secretary Crumwel, he wrote these passages concerning the said queen: That she much desired to have there in her closet the sacrament; and also her amner for one hour, when she was determined to die [that is, to suffer death.] After an examination of her at Greenwich, before some of the council, the said Kyngston sent for his wife and Mrs. Cosins (who both were appointed to be always with her) to know of them, how she had done that day. They said, she had been very merry, and made a good dinner: and after, called for a supper. And then called for him, and asked him, where he had been all day. And after some words, she began to talk, and said, she was cruelly handled at Greenwich with the king's council: namely, with my lord of Norfolk [who was indeed her enemy.] And that he said, [to what she had spoken, as it seems in her own defence] 'Tut, tut, tut;' and shaking his head three or four times. And as for Mr. Treasurer, he was, said she, in the forest of Windsor. You know, added the writer of the letter, what she meant by that. And then named Mr. Comptroller (another of the council) to be a very gentleman. But she to be a queen, and so cruelly handled, it was never seen. 'But I think the king doth it to prove me.' And then laughed withal: and was very merry. And then she said, I shall have justice. Then said the constable, Have no doubt therein. Then she said, If any man arcuse me, I can say but nay. And they can bring no witness.

And in some communication with the lady Kyngston and Mrs. Cosins, I would to God, said she, I had my bishops. For they would all go to the king for me. For I think the most part of England prayeth for me. And if I die, you shall see the greatest punishment for me within this seven years, that ever came to England. [This she spake no doubt in the confidence of her innocency; and God's righteous and visible judgments for the most part, for shedding innocent blood. And indeed within the seventh year following, happened a dreadful pestilence in London, and many commotions and insurrections to the end of this reign.] 'And then,' said she, 'shall I be in Heaven. For I have done many good deeds in my days.' Then she took notice of divers women set about her, that she liked not; saying, I think much unkindness in the king to put such about me, as I never loved. Then Kyngston shewed her, that the king took them to be honest and good women. But I would have had of my own privy chamber, replied she, which I favour most, &c.

In another Letter of Kyngston to Crumwel, he relates, how she desired of him to carry a letter to the said Crumwel [of whose friendship she had a belief.] But he (it seems not thinking it safe for him to carry letters from her) said to her, that if she would tell it him by mouth, he would do it. For which she gave him thanks: and added, that she much marvelled, that the king's council came not to her, as seeming to be ready to justify her self. The same day she said, we should have no rain, till she was delivered out of the Tower: it being a season that wanted rain: [thinking probably that God (who takes care of innocency) would vindicate her, by giving, or withholding the clouds of Heaven.] To which Kyngston replied, I pray, it may be shortly, because of the fair weather: adding, you know what I mean [that is, the king's reconciliation to her].

Other occasional speeches of hers, were these. She said concerning such women as was set about her, That the king wist what he did, when he put two such about her, as my lady Boleyn, and Mrs. Cosins. For they could tell her nothing of my lord, her father, and nothing else. But that she defied them all. [Meaning any about her whosoever, to be able to charge her with any dishonourable act.] But then upon this, my lady Boleyn [her kinswoman] said to her, Such desire as you have had to such tales, [tale-carriers or tellers, as some perhaps of her women were] have brought you to this. Then said Mrs. Stoner, [another gentlewoman about her] Mark [Smeton, the musician, another committed to the Tower, an accuser of the queen] is the worst cherished of any in the house. For he weareth irons. The queen said, that was because he was no gentleman. And he never was at my chamber; [and so could know less, she meant, than any, what was done by her, or any with her there] but at Winchester, and there she sent for him, to play on the virginals: for there my lodging was above the king's. And I never spake with him since, but upon Saturday before May day [that fatal day, when the king first conceived his jealousy.] And then I found him standing in the round window in my chamber of presence. And I asked him, why he was so sad. And he answered and said, it was no matter. And then she said, You may not look to have me speak to you as I would do to a nobleman: because ye be an inferior person. No, no, said he, a look sufficeth me: and thus fare you well. This shews him to be some haughty person; and thought the queen gave him not respect enough. And so might take this opportunity to humble her; and revenge himself by this means on her: not thinking it would cost him his own life.

Another letter of sir William Kyngston to Crumwel, giving an account of this queen's behaviour at her execution, is published in the History of the Reformation, which began thus; 'Sir, this shall be to advertise you, that I have received your letter; wherein you would have strangers conveyed out of the tower. And so they be, by the means of Richard Gresham, and William Loke, and Withepole. But the number of strangers past not thirty; and not many hothe [otter.]' 'Armed' is added in the said History, which word is not in the original letter. Other mistakes there, this more exact transcription will rectify thus far in the Letter. Another Letter of hers to the king, beginning, 'Sir, your grace's displeasure,' &c. (p. 426), is published in the said History. But this passage following wrote at the end of her Letter, I think worthy to be transcribed, and set here, the reverend author of that book relating it imperfectly, viz. The king sending a message to the queen Anne, being prisoner in the Tower; willing her to confess the truth, she said, 'She could confess no more, then she had already spoken. And she said, she must conceal nothing from the king, to whom she did acknowledge her self so much bound for many favours: for raising her first from a mean woman to be a Marquess; next to be his queen. And now, seeing he could bestow no farther honour upon her on earth, for purposing to make her, by martyrdom, a saint in Heaven.—I add one remark more concerning this queen: that at this time of her being in the Tower, a former charge was revived against her: namely, the contract of marriage between her and the present earl of Northumberland, before her marrying with the king: designing, if they could prove this, to make her former marriage with the king unlawful and void; and to make the smoother way for his marrying with the lady Jane. But whatsoever the afflicted queen confessed to save her life, or to change the way of her execution, from burning to beheading, that there never was any such precontract, the said earl protested solemnly in a letter to secretary Crumwel: who it seems had now desired to know the truth from himself. Therein telling him, how he had formerly before the two archbishops, viz. Warham and Wolsey, utterly denied it upon his oath, and the receiving of the sacrament: so he now confirmed it in this letter. See further Fuller's Church Hist. book 5, p. 206, 207.

34. Proceedings against THOMAS CROMWELL, earl of ESSEX, for Treason: 33 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1541. [2 Kennett's Compl. Hist. 222. 2 Fox's Acts and Monum. 512. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 544.]

THAT beauty and attraction which should take the king's eye in Anne of Cleve, not appearing, nor that conversation which should please his ear; and her brother besides excusing himself in the performance of some Articles of the Treaty, he did more willingly think of a Divorce; for which purpose, the precontract with the duke of Lorain's son was chiefly pretended. For though Olesleger, chancellor of Cleve, had according to his promise, 26 Feb. 1540, procured an Instrument in writing out of the Records of Dusseldorp, dated Feb. 15, 1535, testifying the Sponsalia heretofore made by the parents betwixt the duke of Lorain's son, and the lady Anne, should not take effect. Yet this it seems either was not shewed, or did not satisfy our king. Howsoever it was not deposited in Archivis Regiis, but found among Cromwel's Papers after his apprehension. And now although all scruples seemed the more considerable, in that so many doubts had been already cast concerning the king's former Marriages, yet the king determined at what price soever to separate himself from Anne of Cleve, and together to ruine Cromwel. For though he had not long before made him knight of the Garter, earl of Essex, and high chamberlain of England, yet as he was odious by reason of his low birth to all the nobility, and hated particularly by Stephen Gardiner, and the Roman catholics, for having operated so much in the dissolution of Abbies; and that the Reformers themselves found he could not protect them from burning; and lastly, that besides a Subsidy that the clergy gave of 4s. in the pound, he had gotten in the present parliament, not without much reluctance, one tenth, and one fifteen parts of all laymens goods; he was universally hated: which our king considering, and having besides divers Articles brought against him, he now judged him no longer necessary: therefore he gave way to all his enemies accusations; which could not but be material; it being impossible that any man, who meddled so much in great and public affairs, should not in divers kinds so mistake, forget, and err, as to incur the note of a criminal, when severe inquisition were made against him. And now the king caused Cromwel, to be arrested at the Council-Table by the duke of Norfolk, when he least suspected it: to which Cromwel obeyed, though judging his perdition more certain, that the duke was uncle to the lady Catharine Howard, whom the king began now to affect. The news whereof, and his commitment to the Tower being divulged, the people with many acclamations witnessed their joy; so impatient are they usually of the good fortune of favourites arising from mean place, and insolent over the ill: Whereof the king being informed, proceeded more overtly, both in his Parliament business, and the Divorce; and the rather, that all former faults being now imputed to Cromwel, every body began to hope of a better age. But Cromwel (if we may believe some of our Authors) foresaw his fall two years before, and therefore provided for his family; neither did the late honours give him much comfort or security, when he thought they were conferred only to make him the greater sacrifice.

Crimes and Accusations brought against the Lord Cromwell.

After this he was attainted by parliament; in the which Attainder, divers and sundry Crimes, Surmises, Objections, and Accusations were brought against him, but chiefly and above all other he was charged and accused of Heresy, for that he was a supporter of them (whom they recounted for heretics) as Barnes, Clark, and many other, whom he by his authority and letters written to sheriffs and justices in divers shires rescued, and discharged out of prison. Also that he did divulgate and disperse abroad among the king's subjects great numbers of Books, containing, as they said, manifest matter of much heresy, diffidence, and misbelief. Item, that he caused to be translated into our English tongue Books comprising matter expressly against the Sacrament of the Altar, and that, after the translation thereof, he commended and maintained the same for good and Christian doctrine. Over and besides all this, they brought in certain witnesses, what they were, the Attainder expresses not, which most especially pressed, or rather oppressed, him with heinous words spoken against the king in the Church of St. Peter the Poor, in the month of March, in the thirtieth year of the king's reign. Which words, if they be true, as the Attainder doth purport, three things, says Fox, I have here much to marvel at. First, if his adversaries had so sure hold and matter against him, then what should move them to make such hasty speed, in all post haste to have him dispatched and rid out of the way, and in no case could abide him to come to his purgation? Which, if he might have done, it is not otherwise to be thought, but he would easily have cleared himself thereof. Secondly, this I marvel, that if the words had been so heinous against the king, as his enemies did pretend, why then did those witnesses which heard those words in St. Peter's Church, in the thirtieth year of the king's reign, conceal the said words of such treason so long, the space almost of two years, and now uttered the same in the two and thirtieth year of the king's reign, in the month of July. Thirdly, here is again to be marvelled, if the king had known or believed these words to be true, and that Cromwell had indeed been such a traitor to his person, why then did the king so shortly after lament his death, wishing to have his Cromwell alive again? What prince will wish the life of him whom he suspecteth undoubtedly to be a traitor to his life and person? Whereby it may appear what judgment the king had of Cromwell in himself, howsoever the parliament by sinister information was otherwise incensed to judge upon him.

The proceedings against him were thought rigorous, but so few pitied him, that all was easily passed over: nevertheless, I find by an Original, that Cranmer wrote to the king in his behalf boldly, considering the times; 'for though,' as is in his letter, 'he heard yesterday in his grace's council, that he is a Traitor; yet, he saith, who cannot be sorrowful and amazed that he should be a traitor against your majesty? He that was so advanced by your majesty, he whose surety was only by your majesty, he who loved your majesty, as I ever thought, no less than God; he who studied always to set forward whatsoever was your majesty's will and pleasure; he that cared for no man's displeasure to serve your majesty; he that was such a servant, in my judgment, in wisdom, diligence, faithfulness, and experience, as no prince in this realm ever had; he that was so vigilant to preserve your majesty from all Treasons, that few could be so secretly conceived, but he detected the same in the beginning? If the noble princes of memory, King

John, Henry 2, and Richard 2, had had such a counsellor about them, I suppose they should never have been so traitorously abandoned, and overthrown as those good princes were.' After which, he says again, 'I loved him as my friend, for so I took him to be, but I chiefly loved him for the love which I thought I saw him bear ever towards your grace singularly above all others: But now, if he be a Traitor, I am sorry that ever I loved him, or trusted him, and I am very glad that his treason is discovered in time; but yet again I am very sorrowful; for who shall your grace trust hereafter, if you might not trust him? Alas! I bewail and lament your grace's chance herein, I wot not whom your grace may trust. But I pray God continually night and day to send such a counsellor in his place, whom your grace may trust, and who for all his qualities can and will serve your grace like to him, and that will have so much solicitude and care to preserve your grace from all dangers, as I ever thought he had.' All which, as being a character of Cromwell in Cranmer's opinion, I have faithfully copied out of the Original. Not yet that I will pretend excuses for him, whom the laws have condemned; (though Fox doubts not to say, 'That as General Councils have sometimes been observed to err, so princes and parliaments may be sometimes informed by sinister heads;') but that his punishment may serve as a caution for those that serve severe princes, to procure sufficient warrant for all that they do. The Crimes objected to Cromwell seeming to be chiefly an usurpation of power, to set at liberty certain persons not capable of it, and granting certain Licences, and making certain Commissions in high affairs, without the king's knowledge: For which, though Cromwell in his discretion might have found due motives; yet as he proceeded not warily therein, he fell into the danger of the law. Furthermore, he was accused for being an Heretic, and favouring them: (But then, that the head of the Churches vicegerent in spiritual affairs, should be an Heretic and favourer of them, to some seemed strange, to others gave occasion of merriment.) As for his speaking certain high presumptuous words concerning the king, and sundry of the nobility, many thought it proceeded rather out of mistaking and rashness, than any ill intention.

Cromwel thus unheard, and almost unpitied, being condemned while he was in the Tower, omitted not yet to write unto the king. Amongst the rest of the Commissioners which came unto him, one there was, whom the lord Cromwell desired to carry for him a Letter to the King, which when he refused, saying that he would carry no Letter to the king from a Traitor; then the lord Cromwell desired him at least to do from him a message to the king. To that the other was contented, and granted, so that it were not against his allegiance. Then the lord Cromwell taking witness of the other lords, what he had promised; you shall commend me, said he, to the king, and tell him, by that he hath so well tried, and thoroughly proved you as I have done, he shall find you as false a man as ever came about him.—Besides this, he wrote also a Letter from the Tower to the king, whereof when none durst take the carriage upon him, sir Ralf Sadler, (whom he also had preferred to the king before, being ever trusty and faithfull unto him) went unto the king to understand his pleasure, whether he would permit him to bring the letter or not, which when the king had granted, the said master Sadler, as he was required, presented the Letter unto the king, which he commanded thrice to be read unto him, insomuch as the king seemed to be moved therewith.

The Lord Cromwell brought to the Scaffold.

Notwithstanding, by reason of the Act of Parliament afore passed, the worthy and noble lord Cromwell, oppressed by his enemies, and condemned in the Tower, and not coming to his Answer, the 28th of July 1541, was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, where he said these words following;

“ I am come hither to die and not to purge myself, as some think peradventure that I will. For if I should so do, I were a very wretch and a miser. I am by the law condemned to die, and thank my Lord God, that has appointed me this death for mine offence. For sithence the time that I have had years of discretion, I have lived a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I ask him heartily forgiveness. And it is not unknown to many of you, that I have been a great traveller in this world, and being but of a base degree, was called to high estate, and sithence the time I came thereunto I have offended my prince, for the which I ask him heartily forgiveness, and beseech you all to pray to God with me, that he will forgive me. And now I pray you that be here, to bear me record, I die in the Catholic faith, not doubting in any article of my faith, nor doubting in any Sacrament of the Church. Many have slandered me, and reported that I have been a bearer of such as have maintained evil opinions, which is untrue. But I confess, that like as God by his holy spirit doth instruct us in the truth, so the devil is ready to seduce us, and I have been seduced; but hear me witness that I die in the Catholic Faith of the holy Church: and I heartily desire you to pray for the kings grace, that he may long live with you in health and prosperity; and that after him his son, prince Edward that goodly impe, may long reign over you. And once again I desire you to pray for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I waver nothing in my Faith.”

And so making his prayer, kneeling on his knees he spake these words, the effect whereof here followeth:

A Prayer that the Lord Cromwell said at the hour of his Death.

“ O Lord Jesus, which art the only health of all men living, and the everlasting life of them which die in thee; I wretched sinner do submit myself wholly unto thy most blessed will, and being sure that the thing cannot perish which is committed unto thy mercy, willingly now I leave this frail and wicked flesh, in sure hope that thou wilt in better wise restore it to me again at the last day in the resurrection of the just. I beseech thee, most merciful Lord Jesus Christ, that thou wilt by thy grace make strong my soul against all temptations, and defend me with the buckler of thy mercy against all the assaults of the devil. I see and acknowledge that there is in myself no hope of salvation, but all my confidence, hope and trust is in thy most merciful goodness. I have no merits nor good works, which I may alledge before thee. Of sins and evil works (alas) I see a great heap; but yet through thy mercy I trust to be in the number of them to whom thou wilt not impute their sins; but wilt take and accept me for righteous and just, and to be the inheritor of everlasting life. Thou merciful Lord was born for my sake, thou didst suffer both hunger and thirst for my sake; thou didst teach, pray, and fast for my sake: all thy holy actions and works thou wroughtest for my sake; thou sufferedst most grievous pains and torments for my sake: finally, thou gavest thy most precious body and thy blood to be shed on the Cross for my sake. Now most merciful Saviour, let all these things profit me, that thou freely hast done for me, which hast given thyself also for me. Let thy blood cleanse and wash away the spots and foulness of my sins. Let thy righteousness hide and cover my unrighteousness. Let the merits of thy passion and blood-shedding be satisfaction for my sins. Give me Lord thy grace, that the faith of my salvation in thy blood waver not in me, but may ever be firm and constant. That the hope of thy mercy and life everlasting never decay in me, that love wax not cold in me. Finally, that the weakness of my flesh be not overcome with the fear of death. Grant me merciful Saviour, that when death hath shut up the eyes of my body, yet the eyes of my soul may still behold and look upon thee, and when death hath taken away the use of my tongue, yet my heart may cry and say unto thee, Lord into thy hands I commend my soul, Lord Jesus receive my spirit. Amen.”

And thus his prayer being made, after he had godly and lovingly exhorted them that were about him on the scaffold, he quietly committed his soul into the hands of God, and so patiently suffered the stroke of the ax, by a ragged and butcherly miser, which very ungodly performed his office.

To this end came Cromwel, who from being but a blacksmiths son, found means to travel into divers foreign countries, to learn their languages, and to see the wars, (being a soldier of Bourbon at the sacking of Rome;) whence returning, he was received into the cardinal Wolsey's service: to whom he so approved himself by his fidelity and diligence, that the king after his fall voluntarily took him for his servant; in which place he became a special instrument for dissolving the Abbies, and other religious houses, and keeping down the clergy; whom in regard of their oath to the pope, he usually termed the king's half subjects: And for expelling the monks, he said it was no more than a restoring them to the first institution of being lay and labouring persons. Neither did it move him, that so much strictness and austeritv of life was enjoined them in their several orders, since he said they might keep it in any condition. But as these reasons again were not aduitted by diuers learned and able persons, so he got him many enemies, who at last procured his fall; but not before he had obtained successively the dignities of Master of the Rolls, Baron, Lord Privv-Seal, Vicegerent to the king in Spiritualities, Knight of the Garter, Earl of Essex, Great Chamberlain of England, &c. He was noted in the exercise of his places of judicature to have used much moderation; and in his greatest pomp, to have taken notice, and been thankful to mean persons of his old acquaintance, and therein had a virtue which his inaster the cardinal wanted: as for his other descriptions, I leave them to be taken out of Crumner's letter formerly mentioned, with some deduction; for it seems written to the king in more than ordinary favour of his ancient service.

At the same time with Cromwel, Walter lord Hungerford suffered. The crimes objected to him were, For taking into his house as chaplain one William Bird, who had called the king Heretick, &c. That he had procured certain persons to conjure, to know how long the king should live; also, that he had used the sin of buggery.

Rupin observes, that the care Cromwel took when he came to die, to say nothing which might offend the king, proved to the advantage of his son Gregory, who was that very year created a peer by the title of lord Cromwel.

Shortly after this followed the countess of Salisbury's Execution, who had with Cromwel been excepted from the general Act of Pardon, which, whether occasioned by the late Rebellion, (as being thought of cardinal Pool's instigation) or that she gave some new offence, is uncertain: The old lady being brought to the scaffold, set up in the Tower, was commanded to lay her head on the block; but she (as a person of great quality assured me) refused; saying, 'So should Traytors do, and I am none.' Neither did it serve that the executioner told her it was the fashion; so turning her gray head every way, she bid him, if he would have her head, to get it as he could: So that he was constrained to fetch it off slovenly.

She was daughter of George duke of Clarence, brother of Edward the 4th. She had four sons: cardinal Pole was the youngest. The eldest was Henry lord Montacute, from a daughter of whom the present earl of Moira is descended.

35. The Trial of Lord LEONARD GREY, at Westminster, for High Treason: 33 Hen. VIII. A. D. 1541. [Holling. Chron. in the Irish Hist. 102. 1 Cox's Ireland, 264.]

[“ Hall, Grafton, Stow, and lord Herbert, all make mention of this Trial. It is also noticed in Ware's Annals of Ireland. But Hollingshead in the Chronicles of Ireland, and sir Richard Cox in his History of Ireland, are most particular; and therefore what we shall give will be an extract from these latter writers.—In the earl of Straf-ford's case, Mr. St. John, arguing before the lords for the bill of attainder against the earl, cited this Trial of lord Leonard Grey, particularly to prove, that treasons committed in Ireland are triable here; and said, that he had read the whole record of the case. 8 Rushw. 689, 694, 695. But Mr. St. John represents the charges against lord Leonard Grey differently from the author of the Irish Chronicles and sir Richard Cox; for, according to Mr. St. John, lord Leonard was attainted of High Treason, for letting diverse rebels out of the Castle of Dublin, and discharging Irish hostages given to secure the king's peace, and for not punishing one, who said, that the king was an heretick. It is observable, too, that Mr. St. John argues for a trial in England, independently of any statute; and to prove his point, takes notice, that lord Leonard Grey's case was before the 33 Hen. 8, c. 2, as if that was the only statute for trying foreign treasons in England. But there are two other statutes about the trial of foreign treasons, which, being prior to lord Leonard Grey's case, were material to be considered. See 26 Hen. 8, c. 13. § 4. 32 Hen. 8, c. 4. The 33 Hen. 8, c. 24, on the same subject, seems subsequent several months; otherwise that also would have required observation. We are the more particular in adverting to this omission of Mr. St. John; because there is a like one in our principal writers on Criminal Law, not one of whom, as well as we can recollect, pointedly attends to all the statutes. We do not even except Staundford, though his work contains a chapter on the trial of crimes committed out of the realm. See Staundf. Pl. c. 89. a.” Hargrave.]

Extract from Hollingshead's Chronicle in the Irish History, p. 102.

THE governor, lord Leonard Grey, turning the oportunitie of this skirmish (with some Irish revoltors) to his nduantage, shortly after rode to the north, preiding and spoiling Oneale with his confederats, who by reason of the late overthrow were able to make but little resistance. In this iornie he rased Saint Patrike his church in Downe, an old ancient citie of Ulster, and burnt the monuments of Patrike, Brigide, and Colme, who are said to haue bene there intoomed, as before is expressed in the description of Ireland. This fact lost him sundrie hartes in that countrie, alwaies after detesting and abhorring his prophane tyrannie, as they did name it. Wherevpon conspiring with such of Mounster as were enemies to his government, they booked vp diuerse Complaints against him, which they did exhibit to the king and counsell. The Articles of greatest importance laid to his charge were these. 1 Inprimis, "That notwithstanding he were striclike commanded by the king his maiestie, to apprehend his kinsman the yong Fitzgiral, yet did he not onlie disobeie the kings letters as touching that point by plaieng bopeepe, but also had priuie confereuce with the said Fitzgiral, and laie with him two or three seuerall nights before he departed into France.—2 Item, That the cheefe cause that moued him to inuegle Thomas Fitzgiral with such faire promises, proceeded of set purpose to haue him cut off, to the end there should be a gap set open for the yong Fitzgiral to aspire to the earldome of Kildare.—3 Item, That he was so grecdilie addicted to the pilling and polling of the king his subjects, namelie of such as were resiant in Mounster, as the beds he laie in, the cups he dranke in, the plate with which he was serued in anie gentlemans house, were by his seruants against right and reason packt vp, and carried with great extortion awaie.—4 Item, That without anie warrant from the king or counsell, he prophaned the church of Saint Patrikes in Downe, turning it to a stable, after plucked it downe, and shipt the notable ring of bells that did hang in the steeple, meaning to haue sent them to England: had not God of his iustice preuented his iniquitie, by sinking the vessell and passengers wherein the said belles should haue bene conueied."—These and the like Articles were with such odious presumptions coloured by his accusers, as the king and counsell remembering his late faults, and forgetting his former seruices (for commonlie all men are of so hard hap, that they shall be sooner for one trespass condemned, than for a thousand good deserts commended) gauo commandement, that the lord Greie should not onlie be remoued from the government of the countrie, but also had him beheaded on the Tower-hill, the 28th of June. But as touching the first Article, that brought him most of all out of conceipt with the king, I moued question to the erle of Kildare, whether the tenor therof were true or false? His lordship thereto answered bona fide, that he neuer spake with the lord Greie, neuer sent messenger to him, nor received message or letter from him. Whereby maie be gathered, with how manie dangers they are inwrapped that gouerne provinces, wherein diligence is twackt with hatred, negligence is loden with tawnts, seueritie with perils menaced, liberalitie with thanklesse unkindnesse contemned, confereuce to vndermining framed, flatterie to destruction forged, each in countenance smiling, diuerse in heart pouting, open sawning, secret grudging, gaping for such as shall succeed in government, honouring magistrates with cap and knee as long as they are present, and carping them with toong and pen as soone as they are absent.

Extract from 1 Cox's History of Ireland, 264.

Before we proceed farther in the affairs of Ireland, it will be fit to pay that respect to the memory of the late lord deputy, the lord Grey, as to give some account of his misfortunes and destiny. He had certainly performed considerable achievements in Ireland, and great commendations of him are contained in most of the letters from the council to the king; and his majesty did so well approve of his good services, that he created him viscount Granby; and although the earl of Ormond, the lord chancellor Allen, the vice-treasurer Brabazon, and sir John Travers, went with him, or immediately followed him into England, to impeach him, yet he was kindly received by the king, and carried the sword before him on Whitsunday: nevertheless he was in a short time after imprisoned in the Tower, and accused of very many Articles; the principal of which are these:

1. "That O Conner feasted him, and mended Toghercroghan for him; and that in favour of O Molloy, a rebel, he took a castle from Dermond O Molloy, whose father-in-law O Carol was a good subject; for which the lord Grey had a bribe, and Stephen ap Harry had twenty cows. 2. That he took the castle of Bir from a loyal O Carol, and gave it to a rebel O Carol, who married the earl of Kildare's daughter, and also took Moderhern, a castle belonging to the earl of Ormond, and gave it to the rebel O Carol, and wasted the earl of Ormond's lands: for which, he had an hundred and forty kine and Stephen ap Harry had forty, and Gerald Mac Gerrot had a black hackny. 3. That he took forty kine from O Kenedy, a tenant of the earl of Ormond's, and his son for hostage. 4. That he held secret and private familiar correspondence with James of Desmond, and went to visit him in his tents in his night-gown, and forced the abbot of Owny to give him forty pounds sterling to preserve that abby from ruine, and O Brian to give him thirty kine and hostages; and Ulick Bourk, a bastard, gave him 100 marks to have Ballinacleere-Castle, and to be made Mac William; and that he carried the artillery in a small vessel to Galway, and made the town of Galloway pay thirty-four pounds for that carriage. 5. That the exploits at Bryans bridge, &c. were in favour of O Bryan a rebel, Desmond's son-in-law, and to the prejudice of Donough O Bryan, a good subject; and that he took a bribe of eighty kine from Macnemarra. 6. That trusting Desmond and O Bryan, he hazarded the king's army in a long and dangerous journey, wherein Desmond quarrelled, and deserted him, and O Bryan sent but one man with a battle-ax to guide him. 7. That he rifled the abby of Ballyclare, and left neither chalice, cross nor bell in it. 8. That he destroyed the castles of Lecagh and Derrivclaghny, in favour of Ulick Burk, though the rightful proprietor offered submission and rent to the king. 9. That he had secret conference with and received a horse from O Connor Roe, who was the chief instrument in conveying away the young Fitz-Gerald. 10. That he took eighty kine from O Maddin, and forced O Mlaghlin's son from Mr. Dillon, whose lawful prisoner he was; for which he had seventy kine."

And there was a Commission sent to Ireland, to examine witnesses; and they say that these Articles were proved by the testimony of above 70 persons; whereof some were of quality, that is, some of them swore to one article, and some to another; so that the lord Grey, who was son to the marquess of Dorset, and viscount Grany in Ireland, but no peer in England, being tried by a common jury, thought it his best way to confess the indictment, in hopes of the king's grace and pardon: but in that he was mistaken; and although his services did infinitely over-balance his faults, yet he was publicly executed on the 28th of July 1541.

There are four other Articles mentioned by others, to be laid to his charge. 1. "His partiality to his nephew Fitz-Gerald, afterwards earl of Kildare, whom they say he might have taken. 2. That his servants pillaged the gentlemen in Munster, that entertained them. 3. That he had inveigled Thomas Fitz-Gerald to submit, by promises which he had no commission to perform; and that he did it, to destroy that lord, that his own nephew might come to be earl of Kildare (as afterwards he did.) 4. His sacrilege at Down; but however that be, it was not long after his execution, before a commission was directed to archbishop Brown, and Cowley master of the rolls, to make an estimate or survey of the lord Grey's estate in Ireland, and to deliver it to the lord deputy Saintleger, to be disposed of as the king shall direct."

36. The Trial of Sir EDMOND KNEVET, knight, at Greenwich, for striking a Person within the King's Palace there: 33 Henry VIII. A. D. 1541. [Stowe's Annals, 581.]

["The following Trial, if so slight an account deserves the name, we extract from Stowe, who borrows from Hollingshead. The trial is also taken notice of in 'Brooke's Abridgment,' under the title Pain and Penance, pl. 16. It occurred a few months after the statute of 33 Hen. 8. by which, malicious striking in the palace where the king resides, so as to draw blood, is punishable, not only by imprisonment for life and fine at discretion, but further by cutting off the right hand of the offender. Whether the prosecution was grounded on the statute, is not explained by Stowe; and what renders it more doubtful is, that by the statute, drawing of blood is essential, which circumstance neither Brooke nor Stowe states as part of sir Edmond Knevet's case.—Cutting off the hand is a rare punishment by the English law; and the cruelty of it being considered, it must give pleasure to the humane reader to know, that there are very few instances of inflicting it. We are not aware, that there are any crimes, which by our law are liable to be so punished, except drawing a weapon on one of the king's judges, and striking in the king's courts or his palaces; and so unfrequent have been both those crimes, that perhaps all our books do not furnish ten cases of the sort. 3 Inst. 140. Dy. 188. and the marginal cases in the edition of 1688.—The manner in which sir Edmond Knevet obtained a pardon of his offence, must strike every reader of sensibility. The circumstances do equal honour to sir Edmond and his sovereign; to the former for his manly request to pay the forfeit by his left hand instead of his right, that he might be better able to serve his king and country; to the latter, for feeling the greatness of mind which such a request denoted." Hargrave.]

Extract from Stowe's Annals, 581.

THE 10th of June, sir Edmond Knevet, knight of Norfolk, was arraigned before the kings justices, sitting in the great hall at Greenwich, master Gage comptroller of the kings household, master Suthwell, sir Anthony Browne, sir Anthony Winkfield, master Wisley, and Edmond Pecham cofferer of the kings household, for striking of one master Clere of Norfolk, servant with the earle of Surrey, within the kings house in the Tenice court. There was first chosen to goe vpon the said Edmond, a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of yeomen, to enquire of the said stripe, by the which inquests he was found Guilty, and had Judgement to loose his right hand; whereupon was called to do the execution, first the serjeant churrgion, with his instrument appertaining to his office: the serjeant of the woodyard with the mallet and a blocke, whereupon the hand should lie: the master cooke for the king with the knife: the serjeant of the larder to set the knife right on the ioynt: the serjeant farrier with his searing yrons to seare the veines: the sergeant of the poultry with a cocke, which cocke should have his head smitten off vpon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the yeoman of the chandry with seare clothes: the yeomen of the scullery with a pan of fire to heat the yrons: a chafur of water to coole the ends of the yrons: and two fourmes for all officers to set their stufte on: the sergeant of the seller with wine, ale, and beere: the yeomen of the ewry in the sergeants steed, who was absent, with bason, ewre, and towels. Thus every man in his office ready to doe the execution, there was called forth sir William Pickering knight marshall, to bring in the said Edmond Knevet, and when hee was brought to the barre, the cheife justice declared to him his trespass, and the said Knevet confessing himselfe to be guilty, humbly submitted him to the kings mercy: for this offence he was not onely judged to loose his hand, but also his body to remaine in prison, and his landes and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the sayd sir Edmond Knevet desired that the king of his benigne grace, would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left: for (quoth he) if my right hand be spared, I may hereafter doe such good seruice to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. Of this submission and request the justices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnes, considering the gentle heart of the said Edmond, and the good report of lords and ladies, granted him pardon, that he should loose neither hand, land, nor goods, but should go free at liberty. 37. Proceedings against Queen CATHARINE HOWARD, for Incontinency: 33 Henry VIII. A. D. 1542. [Lord Herbert's Life of Hen. VIII. in 2 Kenn. Comp. Hist. 228. 1 Rapin, 831. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 550.]

BUT our king encountered a greater vexation; for the queen was supposed to offend in Incontinency; some particulars whereof being extant in our Records, I have thought fit, says lord Herbert, to transcribe, rather than to make other narration; the family of which she came being so noble and illustrious, and the honour of her sex (which is tender) being concerned therein. The Letter sent from diuers of the Council to William Paget, our ambassador then in France, was this:

"After our hearty commendations, by these our letters, we be commanded to signify unto you, a most miserable case, which came lately to revelation, to the intent that if you shall hear the same spoken of, you may declare the truth as followeth: Where the king's majesty upon the Sentence given of the Invalidity of the pretended Matrimony between his highness and the lady Anne of Cleve, was earnestly and humbly solicited by his council, and the nobles of this realm, to frame his most noble heart to the love and favour of some noble personage to be joined with him in lawful Matrimony, by whom his majesty might have some more store of fruit, and succession to the comfort of this realm; it pleased his highness upon a notable appearance of honour, cleanness and maidenly behaviour, to bend his affection towards mistress Catharine Howard, daughter to the late lord Edmond Howard, brother to me the duke of Norfolk, insomuch as his highness was finally contented to honour her with his Marriage, thinking now in his old days, after sundry troubles of mind, which have happened unto him by Marriages, to have obtained such a jewel for womanhood, and very perfect love towards him, as should not only have been to his quietness, but also brought forth the desired fruit of marriage, like as the whole realm thought the semblable, and in respect of the virtue and good behaviour which she shewed outwardly, did her all honour accordingly. But this joy is turned into extreame sorrow; for when the king's majesty receiving his Maker on Alhallows day last past, then gave him most humble and hearty thanks for the good life he led and trusted to lead with her, and also desired the bishop of Lincoln, his ghostly father, to make like prayer, and give like thanks with him; on All-souls day being at mass, the archbishop of Canterbury having a little before heard, that the same mistress Catharine Howard was not indeed a woman of that pureness and cleanness that she was esteemed; but a woman, who before she was joined with the king's majesty, had lived most corruptly and sensually; for the discharge of his duty opened the same most sorrowfully to his majesty, and how it was brought to his knowledge, which was in this form following.—While the king's majesty was in his Progress, one John Lossels came to the said abp. of Canterbury, and declared unto him, that he had been with a sister of his married in Sussex, which sometimes had been servant with the old dutchess of Norfolk, who did also bring up the said mistress Catharine, and being with his said sister, chanced to fall in communication with her of the queen, wherein he advised her (because she was of the queen's old acquaintance) to sue to be her woman; whereunto his sister answered, that she would not so do; but she was very sorry for the queen; Why, quoth Lossels? Marry, quoth she, for she is light both in living and condition: How so, quoth Lossels? Marry, quoth she, there is one Francis Derrham, who was servant also in my lady of Norfolk's house, which hath lien in bed with her in his doublet and hose between the sheets an hundred nights. And there hath been such puffing and blowing between them, that once in the house a maid which lay in the house with her, said to me, She would lie no longer with her, because she knew not what matrimony meant. And further she said unto him, that one Mannock, sometimes also servant to the said dutchess, knew a privy mark of her body. When the said Lossels had declared this to the said abp. of Canterbury, he considering the weight and importance of the matter, being marvellously perplexed therewith, consulted in the same with the lord chancellor of England, and the earl of Hertford, whom the king's majesty going in his Progress left to reside at London, to order his affairs in those parts; who having weighed the matter, and deeply pondered the gravity thereof, wherewith they were greatly troubled and unquieted, resolved finally that the said archbishop should reveal the same to the king's majesty; which because the matter was such, as he hath sorrowfully lamented, and also could not find in his heart to express the same to the king's majesty by word of mouth, he declared the Information thereof to his highness in writing. When the king's majesty had read this Information thus delivered unto him, his grace being much perplexed therewith, yet nevertheless so tenderly loved the woman, and had conceived such a constant opinion of her honesty, that he supposed it rather to be a forged matter, than of truth. Whereupon it pleased him secretly to call unto him the lord privy seal, the lord admiral sir Anthony Brown, and sir Tho. Wriothesly; to whom he opened the case, saying, He could not believe it to be true: And yet seeing the Information was made, he could not be satisfied till the certainty thereof was known; but he would not in any wise, that in the inquisition any spark of scandal should rise towards her. Whereupon it was by his majesty resolved, that the lord privy seal should go straight to London, where the said Lossels that gave the Information was secretly kept, and with all dexterity to examine and try whether he would stand to his saying: Who being so examined, answered, That his sister so told him, and that he had declared it for the discharge of his duty, and for none other respect; adding that he knew what danger was in it; nevertheless, he had rather die in declaration of the truth, as it came to him, seeing it touched the king's majesty so nearly, than live with the concealment of the same: which asseveration being thus made by the said Lossels, the king's majesty being informed thereof, sent the Lord Privy-Seal into Sussex, to examine the woman, making a pretence to the womans husband of hunting, and to her for receiving of hunters; and sent the said Tho. Wriothesly to London at the same instant, both to examine Mannock, and also to take the said Derrham upon a pretence of pynacy, because he had been before in Ireland, and hath been noted before with that offence; making these pretences to the intent no spark of suspicion should rise of these Examinations. The said Lord Privy Seal found the woman in her Examination constant in her former sayings: and sir Tho. Wriothesly found by the Confession of Mannock, that he had commonly used to feel the secrets and other parts of her body, ere ever Derrham was so familiar with her; and Derrham confessed that he had known her carnally many times, both in his doublet and his hose between the sheets, and in naked bed, alledging such Witenesses of three sundry women one after another, that had lien in the same bed with them when he did the acts, that the matter seemed most apparent. But what inward sorrow the king's majesty took when he perceived the Information true, as it was the most woful thing that ever came to our hearts, to see it; so it were too tedious to write it unto you. But his heart was so pierced with pensiveness, that long it was before his majesty could speak, and utter the sorrow of his heart unto us: and finally with plenty of tears (which was strange in his courage) opened the same. Which done, she was spoken withal in it by the abp. of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the Lord Great Chamberlain of England, and the bishop of Winchester; to whom at the first she constantly denied it; but the matter being so declared unto her, that she perceived it to be wholly disclosed, the same night she disclosed the whole to the abp. of Canterbury, who took the Confession of the same in Writing subscribed with her hand: then were the rest of the number, being eight or nine men and women which knew of their doings, examined, who all agreed in one tale.—Now may you see what was done before the Marriage; God knoweth what hath been done sithence: but she had already gotten this Derrham into her service, and trained him upon occasions, as sending of errands, and writing of letters when her secretary was out of the way, to come often into her privy chamber. And she had gotten also into her privy chamber to be one of her chamberers, one of the women which had before lien in the bed with her and Derrham: what this pretended is easy to be conjectured. Thus much we know for the beginning; whereof we thought meet to advertise you, to the intent afore specified: and what shall further succeed and follow of this matter, we shall not fail to advertise you thereof accordingly.—You shall also receive herein inclosed a packet of Letters, directed unto sir Henry Knevet, his graces ambassador with the emperor, which his highness's pleasure is you shall see conveyed unto him by the next post. Thus fare you right heartily well.—From the king's Palace at Westminster the 12th of November. Your loving Friends,

* Thomas Audeley, Chancellor;

* Here were other Names, which are now defaced in the Original; but 'D. Norfolk' may by the contents of the Letter be supposed one.

E. Hertford, William Southampton, Robert Sussex, Stephen Winton, Anthony Wingfield."

Besides the persons specified in this Letter, one Thomas Culpeper (being of the same name with the queen's mother) was indicted for the same fault (as our Histories have it,) which he and Derrham at their Arraignment confessing, Culpeper had his head cut off, and Derrham was hanged and quartered. But it rested not here; for the lord Wm. Howard (the queen's uncle, newly returned from an ambassage in France) and his wife, and the old dutchess of Norfolk, and divers of the queen's and the said dutchess's kindred and servants, and a butter-wife, were indicted of Misprision of Treason (as concealing this fact,) and condemned to perpetual prison; though yet by the king's favour some of them at length were released. The king yet not satisfied thus, for more authorizing his proceeding, referred the business to the parliament sitting the 16th of January, 1541. On the 21st of the same month a Bill was brought into the house, and read a first time for the Attainder, on the charge of High Treason, of Catharine Howard, late queen of England, and Jane lady Rochford, with others. And in the same Bill was contained the Attainders, on misprision of treason, of Agnes Howard duchess of Norfolk, Wm. Howard, &c. On the 28th, the lord chancellor declared to the rest of the peers, "How much it concerned all their honours, not to proceed to give too hasty a judgment on the bill for the attainder of the queen and others, which had yet been only once read amongst them. For that they were to remember that a queen was no mean or private person, but an illustrious and public one. Therefore, her cause was to be judged with that sincerity, that there should be neither room for suspicion of some latent quarrel, or that she should not have liberty to clear herself, if perchance, by reason or council she was able to do it, from the crime laid to her charge. For this purpose he thought it but reasonable, that some principal persons, as well of the lords as commons, should be deputed to go to the queen, partly to tell her the cause of their coming, and partly in order to help her womanish fears, by advising and admonishing her to have presence of mind enough to say any thing to make her cause better. He knew for certain, that it was but just that a princess should be judged by equal laws with themselves; and he could assure them, that the clearing herself in this manner would be highly acceptable to her most loving husband. But that some answer ought to be had from her, and to report the truth of it to his majesty, his advice was, that they should choose the archbishop of Canterbury; Charles duke of Suffolk, grand master of the household; William earl of Southampton, lord privy seal; with the bishop of Westminster; if the king's council approved of this, day after day, to repair to the queen, to treat of this matter, according as their own prudence might think it necessary." And in the mean time, the sentence concerning the bill against her majesty was ordered to be suspended.—On the 30th of January, the chancellor declared to the lords openly, that the privy council, on mature deliberation, disliked the message that was to be sent to the queen; nevertheless, in the mean time, they had thought of another way, less faulty, to be put to the king, or rather to be altogether demanded of him: "1st. That his majesty would condescend, according to his usual wisdom in council, to weigh by an equal balance, the mutability of all human affairs; that nature is weak and corrupt; none made free from accidents; and that no man can be happy in every thing. That the whole state of the kingdom depends on his majesty's resolution to divert his mind from all trouble and solicitude. Next, that the attainder of Thomas Colepepper and Francis Dereham, with the king's assent, should be confirmed by authority of parliament. Also the attainder on misprision against lord William Howard. And that the parliament might have leave to proceed to give judgment, and to finish the queen's cause; that the event of that business may be no longer in doubt. 3rd, That when all these things are completed in a just parliamentary method, without any loss of time, that then his majesty would condescend to give his royal assent to them; not by being present and speaking openly, as the custom hath been in other parliaments, but absent, by his letters patents, under the great seal of England, and signed by his own hand. That the remembrance of this late and sorrowful story and wicked facts, if repeated before him, may not renew his grief and endanger his majesty's health. Lastly, they were to beseech his majesty that if by chance, by speaking freely on the queen, they should offend against the statutes then in being, out of his great clemency, he would pardon all and every of them for it. And to propound all these matters to his majesty, the archbishop of Canterbury, Charles duke of Suffolk, with the earl of Southampton, were deputed for that purpose."—January 31, the lord chancellor declared to the house, "That their message and request of yesterday had been delivered to his majesty by the lords commissioners; and that the king had denied no part of their petition, but had orderly granted every part of it. That he had returned them thanks for their loving admonition in regard to his health; which he said he took care of, not so much for the sake of his own body, as that of the whole republic. Nay, his majesty declared further to them than they durst ask of him, as in the case of desiring liberty of speech, &c. For he told them he granted yet more, in giving leave for each man to speak his mind freely, and not incur the penalty which the laws had fixed on those who took the liberty to talk on the incontinency of queens; especially when the said person did not do it out of malice or ill will, but out of zeal for his service."

On the 11th of February, the lord chancellor produced two statutes, which had passed both lords and commons; one concerning the Attainder of the queen, and the other about the method of proceeding against lunatics, who before their insanity had confessed themselves guilty of high treason. Each statute signed with the king's own hand, and together with his majesty's assent to them, under the broad seal, and signed also, which was annexed to the said statutes. This the chancellor held forth in both hands, that both lords and commons, who were called for that purpose, might apparently see it, and that the statutes might from thence have the full force and authority of a law. Which, when done, the duke of Suffolk, grand master of the king's household, delivered himself, in a very serious discourse, to this effect: he told the houses, "That he and his fellow-deputies, appointed to wait upon the queen, had been with her; and that she had openly confessed and acknowledged to them the great crime she had been guilty of against the most high God and a kind prince, and lastly against the whole English nation: That she begged them all to implore his majesty not to impute her crime alone to her whole kindred and family. But that his majesty howsoever unworthy she might be and undeserving, would yet extend his unbounded mercy and his singular beneficence to all her brothers, that they might not suffer for her faults. Lastly, to beseech his majesty that it would please him to bestow some of her cloaths on those maid-servants who had been with her from the time of her marriage, since she had now nothing else left to recompence them as they deserved." The earl of Southampton, lord privy seal, next stood up in the house, and, in near the same words, confirmed what the duke had said: adding - - - Here the Journal Book again breaks off abruptly, and we are only told that the chancellor prorogued the parliament to the Tuesday following. This last hiatus in manuscripto, along with the former, makes it seem evident, that they were not done by neglect of the clerks, but by design; and that it was a trick of state, to prevent posterity from being acquainted with some matters, not consistent with the respect they then paid to their grand monarch.

And so the queen and lady Jane Rochfort (wife to the late lord Rochfort, and noted to be a particular instrument in the death of queen Anne) were brought to the Tower, and after confession of their faults, had their heads cut off.—An Act also passed, declaring that it shall be lawful for any of the king's subjects, if themselves do perfectly know, or by vehement presumption do perceive any will, act or condition of lightness of body in her which shall be the queen of this realm, to disclose the same to the king, or some of his council; but they shall not openly blow it abroad, or whisper it, until it be divulged by the king or his council. If the king, or any of his successors shall marry a woman which was before incontinent, if she conceal the same, it shall be High-Treason, &c. But this Act was repealed 1 Edward VI. 12. and 1 Mary 1.

38. The Trial of HENRY Earl of SURREY, for High Treason, before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, at Guildhall, London: 38 Henry VIII. A. D. 1546; with the Proceedings against his Father THOMAS duke of NORFOLK, for the same Crime. [Lord Herbert's Hen. VIII. in 2 Kennett's Compl. Hist. 263. 1 Burn. Reform. 345.]

Extract from Lord Herbert's Hen. 8.

I SHALL conclude this year, 1546, with the disaster of the renowned lord the duke of Norfolk, and the execution of his son Henry the earl of Surrey, which passed in this manner, as our records tell us.—The dutchess Elizabeth, daughter to Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham, having for many years entertained so violent jealousies of the duke her husband's matrimonial affection and loyalty, as it broke out at last to open rancour, divers occasions of scandal were given; insomuch, that not being content with having surmized a long while since two Articles against him, she again, in sundry letters to the lord privy-seal, both averred the Articles, and manifestly accused some of his minions, repeated divers hard usages she pretended to receive from them, and briefly discovered all the ordinary passions of her offended sex. This again being urged in a time when the king was in his declining age, and for the rest, disquieted with scruples that the duke's greatness or interest in sequent times might interrupt the order he intended to give, was not unwillingly heard. So that notwithstanding his many important and faithful services, both in war and peace, at home and abroad, he and his son Henry earl of Surrey were exposed to the malignity and detraction of their accusers. This again fell out in an unfortunate time; for besides that the lady his dutchess had now for above four years been separated from him; his son the earl of Surrey was but newly, and perchance, scarce reconciled with him; his daughter Mary dutchess of Richmond not only inclined to the protestant party, (which loved not the duke) but grown an extreme enemy of her brother: so that there was not only a kind of intestine division in his family, but this again many secret ways fomented.

Among which, the industry of one Mrs. Holland, thought to be the duke's favourite, appeared not a little, as desirous (as what price soever) to conserve herself. Besides, divers at the king's council disaffected him, and particularly the earl of Holland, as knowing that after the king's death (now thought to be imminent) none was so capable to oppose him in the place he aspired to of protector. All which circumstances concurring, and being voiced abroad, encouraged divers of his adversaries to declare themselves; and the rather, because it was notorious, how the king had not only withdrawn much of his wonted favour, but promised impunity to such as could discover any thing concerning him.

The first that manifested himself was sir Richard Southwel, (Dec. 2.) who said that he knew certain things of the earl, that touched his fidelity to the king. The earl, before the lord chancellor Wriothesley, the lord St. John, the earl of Hertford, and others, vehemently affirmed himself a true man, desiring to be tried by justice, or else offering himself to fight in his shirt with Southwel. But the lords for the present only committed them. The duke this while, hearing his son was in trouble, sends to divers of his friends to know the cause, and particularly to the bishop of Winchester. (Dec. 3, 4.) Those letters yet (it is probable) fell into the king's council's hands; but could not preserve him from being involved in his son's fortune: (Dec. 12.) so that he was sent for, and the same day, not long after his son, committed to the Tower. Divers persons also were examined concerning his affairs. Mrs. Elizabeth Holland being deposed, confessed, that the duke had told her, that none of the king's council loved him, because they were no noblemen born themselves; as also because he believed too truly in the sacrament of the altar. Moreover, that the king loved him not, because he was too much loved in his country; but that he would follow his father's lesson, which was, that the less others set by him, the more he would set by himself. As also, that the duke complained that he was not of the most secret (or, as it is there termed, the privy) council. And that the king was much grown of his body, and that he could not go up and down the stairs, but was let up and down by a device. And that his majesty was sickly, and could not long endure; and the realm like to be in an ill case through diversity of opinions. And that if he were a young man, and the realm in quiet, he would ask leave to see the vernacle; which he said was the picture of Christ given to women by himself as he went to death. As touching his arms, that she had not heard the duke speak of his own, but of his son's, that he liked them not, and that he had gathered them, himself knew not from whence; and that he placed the Norfolk's arms wrong, and had found fault with him; and therefore that she should take no pattern of his son's arms to work them with her needle in his house, but as he gave them. Furthermore, she confessed that the earl of Surrey loved her not, nor the dutchess of Richmond him; and that she addicted herself much to the said dutchess.

Mary dutchess of Richmond being examined, confessed, that the duke her father would have had her marry sir Thomas Seymour, brother to the earl of Hertford, which her brother also desired, wishing her withal to endear herself so into the king's favour, as she might the better rule here as others had done; and that she refused: and that her father would have had the earl of Surrey to have matched with the earl of Hertford's daughter, which her brother likewise heard of (and that this was the cause of his father's displeasure) as taking Hertford to be his enemy. And that her brother was so much incensed against the said earl, as the duke his father said thereupon, his son would lose as much as he had gathered together.

Moreover, that the earl her brother should say, these new men loved no nobility; and if God called away the king, they should smart for it. And that her brother hated them all since his being in custody in Windsor-Castle: but that her father seemed not to care for their ill will, saying his truth should bear him out. Concerning arms, she said, that she thought that her brother had more than seven rolls; and that some, that he had added more of Anjou, and of Lancelott Du-lac. And that her father since the attainder of the duke of Buckingham (who bare the king's arms) where the arms of her mother (daughter to the said duke) were rayned in his coat, had put a blank-quarter in the place, but that her brother had re-assumed them. Also that instead of the duke's coronet, was put to his arms a cap of maintenance purple, with powdered furr, and with a crown to her judgment, much like to a close crown; and underneath the arms was a cipher, which she took to be the king's cipher. H R. As also that her father never said that the king hated him, but his counsellors; but that her brother said, the king was displeased with him (as he thought) for the loss of the great journey. Which displeasure, he conceived, was set forward by them who hated him, for setting up an altar in the church at Boulogne. And that her brother should say, God long save my father's life; for if he were dead, they would shortly have my head. And that he reviled some of the present council, not forgetting the old cardinal. Also that he dissuaded her from going too far in reading the scripture. Some passionate words of her brother she likewise repeated, as also some circumstantial speeches, little for his advantage; yet so, as they seemed much to clear her father.

Sir Edmund Knevet being examined, said, he knew no untruth directly by the earl of Surrey, but suspected him of dissimulation and vanity; and that a servant of his had been in Italy with cardinal Poole, and was received again at his return. Moreover, that he kept one Pasquil an Italian as a jester, but more likely a spy, and so reputed. He mentioned also one Peregrine an Italian entertained by the said earl; adding, that he loved to converse with strangers, and to conform his behaviour to them. And that he thought he had therein some great ill device.

One Thomas Pope also informed the council, that John Freeman told him, that the duke (at Nottingham, in the time of the commotion of the North) should say, in the presence of an hundred persons, that the Act of Uses was the worst act that ever was made, and that Freeman affirmed those words before the lord Audley, late lord chancellor. These Depositors together with others (as it seems) being brought to the king's Judges at Norwich, they signified by their letter unto the lords of the council, dated Jan. 7. that the king's solicitor and Mr. Stamford had brought the Indictments, and that they were found true, and the duke and his son indicted thereupon of High-Treason; and that they made haste to bring the said indictment to London; desiring further to know whether sir Thomas Paston, sir Edmund Knevet, sir John Peer, and others, should be of the same jury. Upon the 13th (the king being now dangerously sick) the earl of Surrey was arraigned in Guild-hall in London, before the lord chancellor, the lord mayor, and other commissioners. Where the earl, as he was of a deep understanding, sharp wit, and deep courage, defended himself many ways: sometimes denying their accusations as false, and together weakening the credit of his adversaries; sometimes interpreting the words he said, in a far other sense than that in which they were represented. For the point of bearing his arms (among which those of Edmund the Confessor are related) alledging that he had the opinion of heralds therein. And finally, when a witness was brought against him in viva voce, who pretended to repeat some high words of the earl's by way of discourse, which concerned him nearly, and that thereupon the said witness should return a braving answer; the earl replied no otherwise to the jury, than that he left it to them to judge, whether it were probable that this man should speak thus to the earl of Surrey, and he not strike him again. In conclusion, he pleaded Not Guilty; but the jury (which was a common inquest, not of the peers, because the earl was not a parliament lord) condemned him. Whereupon also judgment of death was given, and he beheaded at Tower-hill. And thus ended the earl; a man learned, and of an excellent wit, as his compositions shew.

This while the king (though his sickness increased) omitted not to give order to seize on the duke's goods, and together to inform himself of all which might be material against him. Not forgetting also to cause Wriothesley to advertise the king's ambassadors in foreign parts, that the duke of Norfolk and his son had conspired to take upon them the government of the king, during his majesty's life, as also after his death to get into their hands the lord prince; but that their devices were revealed, and they committed to the Tower. And that for preventing uncertain bruits, they were willing to communicate the premises. But the duke, who had now as much merit of ancient service to plead for him, as any subject of his time could pretend to, thought fit (Jan. 19.) from the Tower, to write unto the king in this manner.

"Most gracious and most sovereign lord. I your most humble subject prostitute at your feet, do most humbly beseech your highness to be my good and gracious lord. I am sure some great enemy of mine hath informed your majesty of some untrue matter against me. Sir, God doth know, in all my life I never thought one untrue thought against you, or your succession, nor can no more judge or cast in my mind what should be laid to my charge, than the child that was born this night. And certainly, if I knew that I had offended your majesty in any point of untruth, I would declare the same to your highness. But (as God help me) I cannot accuse myself so much as in thought. Most noble and merciful sovereign lord, for all the old service I have done you in my life, be so good and gracious a lord unto me, that either my accusers and I together may be brought before your royal majesty; or if your pleasure shall not be to take that pains, then before your council: then if I shall not make it apparent that I am wrongfully accused, let me, without more respite, have punishment according to my deserts: Alas! most merciful prince, I have no refuge but only at your hands, and therefore at the reverence of Christ's passion have pity of me, and let me not be cast away by false enemies' informations. Undoubtedly, I know not that I have offended any man, or that any man was offended with me, unless it were such as are angry with me for being quick against such as have been accused for sacramentaries. And as for all causes of religion and many others, I do know you to be a prince of such virtue and knowledge, that whatsoever laws you have in times past made, or hereafter shall make, I shall to the extremity of my power stick unto them as long as my life shall last. So that if any man be angry with me for these causes, they do me wrong. Other cause I know not why any man should bear me any ill-will: and for this cause I know divers have done, as doth appear by casting libels abroad against me. Finally, (most gracious sovereign lord) I most humbly beseech your majesty to have pity of me, and let me recover your gracious favour, with taking of me all the lands and goods I have, or as much thereof as pleaseth your highness to take, leaving me what it shall please you to appoint; and that according as is before-written I may know what is laid to my charge, and that I may hear some comfortable word from your majesty. And I shall, during my life, pray for your prosperous estate, long to endure. Your most sorrowful subject, THO. NORFOLK."

To the lords he wrote thus:

"Item, Most humbly to beseech, my lords, that I might have some of the books that are at Lambeth; for unless I may have books to read ere I fall on sleep, and after I wake again, I cannot sleep, nor did not this dozen years. Also to desire that I might have a ghostly father sent to me, and that I might receive my Maker. Also that I might have mass, and to be bound upon my life to speak no word to him that shall say mass, which he may do in the other chamber, and I to remain within. Item, To have licence in the day-time to walk in the chamber without, and in the night to be locked in, as I am now. At my first coming I had a chamber without a-days. I would gladly have licence to send to London to buy one book of St. Augustin's, De Civitate Dei; and of Josephus, De Antiquitatibus; and another of Sabellicus; who doth declare most of any book that I have read, how the bishop of Rome from time to time hath usurped his power against all princes, by their unwise sufferance. Item, For sheets."

Nevertheless, the duke remained as condemned to perpetual prison, without that his great services formerly rendered, or his submission on this occasion could restore him; which was in these words, as I find by our Records in an original.

"I Thomas duke of Norfolk, do confess and acknowledge myself most untruly, and contrary to my oath and allegiance, to have offended the king's most excellent majesty, in the disclosing and opening of his privy and secret counsel, at divers and sundry times, to divers and sundry persons, to the great peril of his highness, and disappointing of his most prudent and regal affairs. T. N.

"Also, I likewise confess, That I have concealed high treason, in keeping secret the false and traitorous act, most presumptuously committed by my son Henry Howard earl of Surrey, against the king's majesty and his laws, in the putting and using the arms of St. Edward the Confessor, king of the realm of England before the conquest, in his scutcheon or arms: Which said arms of St. Edward appertain only to the king of this realm, and to none other person or persons; whereunto the said earl by no means or way could make any claim or title, by me, or any of mine or his ancestors. T. N.

"Also I likewise confess, That to the peril, slander, and dishonour of the king's majesty, and his noble son prince Edward, his son and heir apparent, I have against all right, unjustly, and without authority, born in the first quarter of my arms, ever since the death of my father, the arms of England, with a difference of the labels of silver, which are the proper arms of my said prince, to be born for this realm of England only, whereby I have not only done prejudice to the king's majesty, and the said lord the prince, but also given occasion that his highness might be disturbed or interrupted of the crown of this realm, and my said lord prince might be destroyed, disturbed, and interrupted in fame, body, and title of the inheritance to the crown of this realm. Which I know and confess, by the laws of the realm, to be high treason. T. N.

"For the which my said heinous offences, I have worthily deserved by the laws of the realm, to be attainted of high treason, and to suffer the punishment, losses and forfeitures that appertain thereunto. And although I be not worthy to have or enjoy any part of the king's majesty's clemency and mercy to be extended to me, considering the great and manifold benefits that I and mine have received of his highness: Yet I most humbly, and with a most sorrowful and repentant heart, do beseech his highness to have mercy, pity, and compassion on me. And I shall most devoutly and heartily make my daily prayer to God for the preservation of his most noble successour, as long as life and breath shall continue in me. T. N."

"Written the twelfth day of the month of January, in the year of our Lord God 1546, after the computation of the church of England, and in the thirty-eighth year of our sovereign lord Henry 8, by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; and of the church of England, and also of Ireland the supreme head. In witness of all the premises, I the said duke have subscribed my name with my own hand, in the presence of the lord Wriothesly, lord chancellor; the lord St. John, lord president of the council; the earl of Hertford, lord great chamberlain; the viscount Lisle, lord high admiral; sir Anthony Brown, master of the horse; sir William Paget, secretary; sir Richard Rich, sir John Baker, of our said sovereign lord's privy-council; sir Richard Lister, sir Edward Montague, the two chief justices.

"Without compulsion, without force, without advice or counsel, I have and do subscribe the premises, submitting me only to the king's most gracious pity and mercy, most humbly beseeching his highness to extend the same unto me his most sorrowful subject. By me Tho. Norfolk. Thomas Wriothesly, chancellor; William St. John, John Lisle, William Paget, John Baker, E. Hertford, Anth. Brown, Rich. Rich, Rich. Lister, Edward Montague."

Notwithstanding all which Submission, joined with the merits of his services, it was thought that the duke would hardly escape, had not the king's death, following shortly after, reserved him to more merciful times.

Extract from 1 Burn. Reformat. p. 345.

The duke of Norfolk had been long lord treasurer of England: he had done great services to the crown on many signal occasions, and success had always accompanied him. His son the earl of Surrey was also a brave and noble person, witty and learned to an high degree, but did not command armies with such success. He was much provoked at the earl of Hertfords being sent over to France in his room, and upon that had said, 'that within a little while they should smart for it;' with some other expression that savoured of revenge, and dislike of the king and a hatred of the counsellors. The duke of Norfolk had endeavoured to ally himself to the earl of Hertford, and to his brother sir Thomas Seimour, perceiving how much they were in the king's favour, and how great an interest they were like to have under the succeeding prince; and therefore would have engaged his son, being then a widower, to marry that earl's daughter; and pressed his daughter, the dutchess of Richmond, widow to the king's natural son, to marry sir Thomas Seimour. But though the earl of Surrey advised his sister to the marriage projected for her; yet he would not consent to that designed for himself, nor did the proposition about his sister take effect. The Seimours could not but see the enmity the earl of Surrey bore them, and they might well be jealous of the greatness of that family; which was not only too big for a subject of itself, but was raised so high by the dependence of the whole popish party, both at home and abroad, that they were like to be very dangerous competitors for the chief government of affairs, if the king were once out of the way; whose disease was now growing so fast upon him, that he could not live many weeks. Nor is it unlikely that they persuaded the king, that if the earl of Surrey should marry the lady Mary, it might embroil his son's government, and perhaps ruine him. And it was suggested, that he had some such high project in his thoughts, both by his continuing unmarried, and by his using the arms of Edward the Confessor, which of late he had given in his coat without a diminution. But to compleat the duke of Norfolk's ruine, his dutchess, who had complained of his using her ill, and had been separated from him about four years, turned informer against him. His son and daughter were also in ill terms together. So the sister informed all that she could against her brother. And one Mrs Holland, for whom the duke was believed to have an unlawful affection, discovered all she knew. But all amounted to no more, than some passionate expressions of the son, and some complaints of the father, who thought he was not beloved by the king and his counsellors, and that he was ill used, in not being trusted with the secret of affairs. And all persons being encouraged to bring informations against them, sir Richard Southwell charged the earl of Surrey in some points that were of a higher nature: which the earl denied, and desired to be admitted, according to the martial law, to fight in his shirt with Southwell. But that not being granted, he and his father were committed to the Tower. That which was most insisted on was, their giving the arms of Edward the Confessor, which were only to be given by the kings of England. This the earl of Surrey justified, and said, they gave their arms, according to the opinion of the king's heralds. But all excuses availed nothing, for his father and he were designed to be destroyed, upon reasons of state; for which, some colours were to be found out.

The earl of Surrey being but a commoner, was brought to his Tryal at Guildhall; and put upon an inquest of commoners consisting of nine knights and three esquires, by whom he was found guilty of treason, and had sentence of death passed upon him, which was executed on the 10th of January at Tower-hill. It was generally condemned, as an act of high injustice and severity, which loaded the Seimours with a popular odium that they could never overcome. He was much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities.

But the king, who never hated nor ruined any body by halves, resolved to compleat the misfortunes of that family, by the attainder of the father. And as all his eminent services were now forgotten, so the submissions he made, could not allay a displeasure, that was only to be satisfied with his life and fortune. He wrote to the king, protesting his innocency: "That he had never a thought to his prejudice, and could not imagine what could be laid to his charge: he had spent his whole life in his service, and did not know that ever he had offended any person; or that any were displeased with him except for prosecuting the breakers of the act about the sacrament of the altar. But in that, and in every thing else, as he had been always obedient to the kings laws, so he was resolved still to obey any laws he should make. He desired he might be examined with his accusers face to face, before the king, or at least before his council; and if it did not appear that he was wrongfully accused, let him be punished as he deserved. In conclusion he begged the king would have pity on him, and restore him to his favour; taking all his lands, or goods from him, or as much of them as he pleased." Yet all this had no effect on the king. So he was desired to make a more formal submission; which he did on the 12th of January under his hand, ten privy counsellors being witnesses. In it he confessed, "1st, his discovering the secrets of the king's council. 2dly, his concealing his son's treason, in using to give the arms of St. Edward the Confessor, which did only belong to the king, and to which his son had no right. 3dly, that he had ever since his father's death, born in the first quarter of his arms, the arms of England: with a difference of the labells of silver, that are the proper arms of the prince; which was done in prejudice of the king and the prince: and gave occasion for disturbing or interrupting the succession to the crown of the realm. This he acknowledged was high treason; he confessed he deserved to be attainted of High Treason; and humbly begged the kings mercy and compassion." He yielded to all this, hoping by such a submission and compliance to have overcome the king's displeasure. But his expectations failed him.

A Parliament was called, the reason whereof was pretended to be the coronation of the prince of Wales. But it was thought the true cause of the calling it, was, to attain the duke of Norfolk: for which they had not colour enough, to do it in a trial by his peers. Therefore an attainder by act of parliament was thought the better way. So it was moved, that the king intending to crown his son, prince of Wales, desired they would go on with all possible haste in the attainder of the duke of Norfolk; that so these places, which be held by patent, might be disposed of by the king to such as he thought fit, who should assist at the coronation. And upon this slight pretence, since a better could not be found, the Bill of Attainder was read the first time on the 18th of January; and on the 19th and 20th it was read the second and third time. And so passed in the house of lords: and was sent down to the commons, who on the 24th sent it up also passed. On the 27th the lords were ordered to be in their robes, that the royal assent might be given to it: which the lord chancellor, with some others joined in commission, did give by virtue of the king's letters patents. And it had been executed the next morning, if the king's death had not prevented it. Upon what grounds this attainder was founded, I can only give this account from the 34th act of the first parliament of queen Mary; in which this act is declared null and void, by the common law of the land; for I cannot find the act itself upon record. In the act of repeal it is said, "That there was no special matter in the act of attainder, but only general words of treasons and conspiracies; and that out of their care of the preservation of the king and the prince, they passed it. But the act of repeal says also, 'That the only thing with which he was charged, was, for bearing of arms which he and his ancestors had born, both within and without the kingdom; both in the king's presence, and in the sight of his progenitors; which they might lawfully bear and give, as by good and substantial matter of record it did appear. It is also added, that the king died after the date of the commission. That the king only empowered them to give his assent, but did not give it himself; and that it did not appear by any record, that they gave it. That the king did not sign the commission with his own hand, his stamp being only set to it, and that not to the upper, but the nether part of it, contrary to the king's custom.'" All these particulars though cleared afterwards, I mention now, because they give light to this matter.

As soon as the Act was passed, a warrant was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, to cut off his head the next morning; but the king dying in the night, the lieutenant could do nothing on that warrant. And it seems it was not thought advisable to begin the new king's reign with such an odious execution. And thus the duke of Norfolk escaped very narrowly.

Extract from 3 Burn. Reformat. p. 167.

The last transaction of importance in this reign, was the fall of the duke of Norfolk, and of the earl of Surrey, his son. I find in the Council Book, in the year 1543, that the earl was accused for eating flesh in Lent, without licence; and for walking about the streets in the night, throwing stones against windows, for which he was sent to the Fleet. In another letter, he is complained of for riotous living. Towards the end of the year 1546, both he and his father were put in prison: And, it seems, the council wrote to all the king's ambassadors beyond sea, an account of this, much aggravated, as the discovery of some very dangerous conspiracy; which they were to represent to those princes, in very black characters. I put in the collection an account given by Thirlby, of what he did upon it. The letter is long; but I only copy out that which relates to this pretended discovery: Dated from Hailbron, on Christmas-day, 1546.

"He understood by the council's letters to him, what ungracious and ingrateful persons they were found to be. He professes, he ever loved the father, for he thought him a true servant to the king: He says, he was amazed at the matter, and did not know what to say. God had not only on this occasion, but on many others, put a stop to treasonable designs against the king, who (next to God) was the chief comfort of all good men. He enlarges much on the subject, in the stile of a true courtier. The messenger brought him the council's letters, written on the 15th of December, on Christmas-eve; in which he saw the malicious purpose of these two ungracious men: So, according to his orders, he went immediately to demand audience of the emperor; but the emperor intended to repose himself for three or four days, and so had refused audience to the nuncio, and to all other ambassadors; but he said, he would send a secretary, to whom he might communicate his business. Joyce, his secretary, coming to him, he set forth the matter as pompously as the council had represented it to him. In particular, he spoke of the haughtiness of the earl of Surrey, of all which the secretary promised to make report to the emperor, and likewise to write an account of it to Grandvil. Thirlby excuses himself that he durst not write of this matter to the king: He thought, it would renew in him the memory of the ingratitude of these persons; which must wound a noble heart."

After so black a representation, great matters might be expected: but I have met with an original Letter of the duke of Norfolk's, to the lords of the council, writ indeed in so bad a hand, that the reading it was almost as hard as deciphering. It gives a very different account of that matter, at least with relation to the father. "He writes, that the lord great chamberlain, and the secretary of state, had examined him upon divers particulars: the first was, Whether he had a cypher with any man? He said, he had never a cypher with any man, but such as he had for the king's affairs, when he was in his service. And he does not remember that ever he wrote in cypher, except when he was in France, with the lord great master that now is, and the lord Rochford:

nor does he remember whether he wrote any letters then, or not; but these two lords signed whatsoever he wrote. He heard, that a letter of his was found among bishop Fox's papers, which being shewed to the bishop of Duresme, he advised to throw it into the fire. He was examined upon this: He did remember, the matter of it was, the setting forth the talk of the northern people, after the time of the commotions; but that it was against Cromwell, and not at all against the king:" (so far did they go back, to find matter to be laid to his charge) "but whether that was in cypher, or not, he did not remember. He was next asked, if any person had said to him, that if the king, the emperor, and the French king came to a good peace, whether the bishop of Rome would break that by his dispensation; and whether he inclined that way. He did not remember he had ever heard any man speak to that purpose: but, for his own part, if he had twenty lives, he would rather spend them all, than that the bishop of Rome should have any power in this kingdom again. He had read much history, and knew well how his usurpation began, and increased: and both to English, French, and Scots, he has upon all occasions spoken vehemently against it. He was also asked, if he knew any thing of a letter from Gardiner and Knevet, the king's ambassadors at the emperor's court, of a motion made to them for a reconciliation with that bishop, which was brought to the king at Dover, he being then there.

"In answer to this, he writes, he had never been with the king at Dover since the duke of Richmond died: but for any such overture, he had never heard any thing of it; nor did any person ever mention it to him. It had been said in council, when sir Francis Bryan was like to have died, as a thing reported by him, that the bishop of Winchester had said, he could devise a way to set all things right between the king and the bishop of Rome. Upon which, as he remembers, sir Ralph Sadler was sent to sir Francis, to ask the truth of that: but sir Francis denied it; and this was all that ever he heard of any such overture. It seems, these were all the questions that were put to him; to which those were his answers. He therefore prayed the lords, to intercede with the king, that his accusers might be brought face to face, to say what they had against him: and he did not doubt, but it should appear, he was falsely accused. He desired to have no more favour than Cromwell had; he himself being present when Cromwell was examined. He adds, Cromwell was a false man; but he was a true, poor gentleman. He did believe, some false man had laid some great thing to his charge. He desired, if he might not see his accusers, that he might at least know what the matters were; and if he did not answer truly to every point, he desired not to live an hour longer.

"He had always been pursued by great enemies about the king; so that his fidelity was tried like gold. If he knew wherein he had offended, he would freely confess it. On Tuesday in the last Whitson-week, he moved the king, that a marriage might be made between his daughter (the dutchess of Richmond) and sir Thomas Seymour; and that his son Surrey's children might, by cross-marriages, be allied to my lord great chamberlain's children (the earl of Hertford). He appealed to the king, whether his intention in these motions did not appear to be honest. He next reckons up his enemies. Cardinal Wolsey confessed to him at Asher, that he had studied for fourteen years, how to destroy him, set on to it by the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the lord Sandys, who often told him, that if he did not put him out of the way, he would undo him. When the marquis of Exeter suffered, Cromwell examined his wife more strictly concerning him, than all other men; of which she sent him word by her brother, the lord Mountjoy. And Cromwell had often said to himself, that he was a happy man, that his wife knew nothing against him, otherwise she would undo him. The late duke of Buckingham, at the bar, where his father sate lord high steward, said, that he himself was the person in the world, whom he had hated most, thinking he had done him ill offices with the king: but he said, he then saw the contrary. Rice, that married his sister, often said, he wished he could find the means to thrust his dagger in him. It was well known to many ladies in the court, how much both his two nieces, whom it pleased the king to marry, had hated him. He had discovered to the king that for which his mother-in-law was attainted of misprision of treason. He had always served the king faithfully, but had of late received greater favours of him, than in times past: what could therefore move him to be now false to him? A poor man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinsman. Alas! alas! my lords, (writes he) that ever it should be thought any untruth to be in me. He prays them to lay this before the king, and jointly to beseech him, to grant the desires contained in it. So he ends it with such submissions, as he hoped might mollify the king."

Here I must add a small correction, because I promised it to the late sir Robert Southwell, for whose great worth and virtues I had that esteem, which he well deserved. Sir Richard Southwell was concerned in the evidence against the duke of Norfolk: he gave me a memorandum, which I promised to remember when I reviewed my history. There were two brothers, sir Richard and sir Robert, who were often confounded, an R serving for both their christened names. Sir Richard was a privy-counsellor to Henry the 8th, king Edward, and queen Mary: the second brother, sir Robert, was master of the rolls, in the time of Henry the 8th, and in the beginning of Edward the 6th. I had confounded these, and in two several places called sir Richard master of the rolls.

I have now set forth all that I find concerning the duke of Norfolk; by which it appears, that he was designed to be destroyed only upon suspicion; and his enemies were put on running far back to old stories to find some colours to justify so black a prosecution. This was the last act of the king's reign, which, happily for the old duke, was not finished, when the king's death prevented the execution.

Bishop Thirleby's Letter concerning the Duke of Norfolk and his Son. An original.

"I would write unto you my harte (if I coulede) against those two ungracious, ingrate, and inhumane non homines, the duke of Norfolk and his sonne. The elder of whom, I confess that I did love, for that I ever supposed hym a true servant to his master; like as both his allegiance, and the manifold benefits of the king's majestie bounde him to have been; but nowe when I sholde begyn to wright to you heriu, before God I am so amased at the matter, that I know not what to say; therefore I shall leave them to receive for their deeds, as they have worthily deservyd; and thank God of his grace that hath openyd this in tyme, so that the king's majestie may see that reformed. And in this point, wher Almighty God hath not nowe alone, but often and sondry tymes hertofore, not only letted the malice of such as hath imagenyd any treason against the king's majestie, the chiefe comferte, wealth, and prosperite of all good Englishmen next unto God; but hath so wonderfully manifest, that in suche tyme that his majesties high wisdom myght let that malice to take his effecte, all good Englishlie cannot therfore thanke God enough. And for our parts, I pray God, that we may thorough his grace, so c.intynue his servants, that hereafter we be not founde unworthly to receiyye suche a benefyte at his hands. On Christmas-even, about 10 of the clocke after noon here arryved Somerset with the letters of the king's majesties most honourable counsell, dated the 15th of December at Westminster, whereby I perceyved the malicious purpose of the two said ungracious men: and for the execution of the king's majesties commandment declared in the same letters, I syud immediately for audience to the emperor, who entred this town within halfe an houer after Somerset was come. The emperor praid me of pacience, and to declare to the secretarie Joyse, that I wolde saie to him. For he said he had determynd to repose him selfe for 3 or 4 days; and had therfore for that tyme refused audience to the nuntio, the ambassador of France, and the ambassador of Venice, which had sued for audience. On Christmas-day on the morning, at nine of the clocke, Joyse came to my lodginge, to whom I declared as well as I coulede the great benefits theis ungracious men had receyved at the king's majesties hands, and how unkindly and traytously they went about to searve him, with the rest as myn instructions led me. The king's majestie, my master (taking the same affection to be in the emperor, his good brother, towards him, that his highnes hathe to the emperor, (ut amicorum omnia sint communia, gaudere cum gaudentibus, flere cum flentibus,) hath commanded me to open this matter to the emperor: that as naturally all men, and much more-princes, ought to abhorre traytors, and specially suche as bad receyved so great benefytes as theis men had; so his majestie might rejoyse that the king's highnes his good brother had founde forthe this matter, or the malice coulede be brought to execution. Secretary Joyse said that he would advertise the emperor herof accordingly, and after a little talke of the haughtiness of the earle of Surrey, and a few salutations, he bad me fare well. When I ask-him for monsieur de Grandevela, to whom I said, that I wolde tell this tale, for that I doubted not but that he, and all honest men wolde abhorre such traytors; he said that he was not yet come, but he wolde this day advertise him herof by his letters; for I wright (quoth he) daily to him. Albeit that this be the hok, and the effecte of that I have done in the execution of the king's majesties commandment, declared in my said lord's letters, yet I will as my dutie is, answer a-part their said letters to the king's majestie. Herin I dare not wright. For, to enter the matter, and not to detest that as the cause requireth, I think it not convenient. And again on the other side, to renew the memorie of these mens ingratitude, (wherwith all noble and princely hartes above all others be sore wounded) I thinke it not wisdome. Therefore I beseech you hartely, amongst other my good lords, there to make my most humble excuse to his majestie for the same. This ungracious matter that hath happened otherwise then ever I could have thought, hath caused you to have a longer letter then ever I have bene accustomed to wright. Ye shall herewith receive a scedule of courte newis, whiche havng lernyd while I wrote this: secretarie Joyse hath prayed me to sende the letter herwith enclosed to the emperor's ambassador in England, which I pray you to cause to be delivered, and hartely fare you well. From Halebourne the Christmas-day at night, 1546. Your assured loving friend, THOMAS WESTM'.

Herewith ye shall also receive the copie of my letters of the 19th of this monyth, sent by Skipperus, &c."

A Letter of the Duke of Norfolk's, after he had been examined in the Tower.

"My very good lords, whereas at the being here with me of my lord great chamberlayne, and Mr. Secretary, they examynd me of divers thyngs, which as near as I can call to my remembrance were the effects as here after doth ensew.—First, Whether ther was any cipher betwene me and any other man: For answer wherunto, this is the truth, there was never cipher between me and any man, save only such as I have had for the king's majestie, when I was in his service. And us God be my judge, I do not remember that ever I wrote in cipher, but at such time as I was in France; my lord great master that now is, and my lord of Rochford being in commission with me. And whether I wrote any then, or not, as God help me, I do not remember; but and I wrote any thing, I am sure both their hands were at it; and the master of the horse privy to the same. I do remember that after the death of the bishop of Hereford, Fox, it was shewed me that the said bishop had left a letter, which I had sent him, amongst his writings, which being found by a servant of his, that is now with master Deny, who shewed the same to the bishop of Durham that now is, he caused him to throw the same in fier. As I do remember, it was my said lord bishop of Dureham that advised him to burn it; and as I also do remember, the matter that was conteyned therein, concerned lewde speaking of the Northern men after the time of the conioction against the said Cromwell. If there had been any thyng concerning the king's majesty's affairs, neyther the bishope, nor he, were he now alyve, would not have concealed the same; and whether any part of that was in cypher, or not, as I shall answer to God, I do not remember.—The effect of another question, there asked me, was, as near as I can call to my remembrance, whether anie man had talked with me, that and ther were a good peaco made betwene the king's majestie the emperor and the French king, the bishope of Rome would brek the same againe by his dispensation: And whether I enclosed that waies, or not, to that purpose? As God help me now, at my most nede, I cannot call to my remembrance, that ever I heard any man living speak like words. And as for mine inclinations, that the bishope of Rome should ever have aucthority to do such thing; if I had twentie lives, I would rather have spent them all against him, then ever he should have any power in this realme. For no man knoweth that better then I, by reding of stories, how his usurped power hath increased from time to time. Nor such time as the king's majestie hath found him his enemy, no living man hath, both in his harte and with his tounge, in this realme, in France, and also to many Scottish jantlemen, spoken more sore against his said usurped powse, then I have done, as I can prove by good witnes.—Also my said lord and Mr. Secretary asked me, whether I was ever made privy to a letter, sent from my lord of Wynchester and sir Henry Knevett, of any overture made by Grandville to them, for a way to be taken between his majestie, and the bishope of Rome; and that the said letters should have come to his majestie to Dover, I being there with him. Wherunto this is my answere. I was never at Dover with his majestie since my lord of Richmond died, but at that time, of whose death word came to my lord of Richmond: and as God be my helpe, I never heard of no such overture, save that I do well remember, at such time as sir Francis Biryan was sore aike, and like to have died, it was spoken in the councill, that my lord of Winchester should have said, he could devise a way, how the king's majestie might have all things upright with the said bishope of Rome, and his highnes honour saved. Suche were the words, or much like. Wherupon, as I had often said in the councill, one was sent to the said sir Francis, to know, if ever he heard the said bishope speake like words; which he denied: and as I do remember, it was sir Rauf Sadeler, that was sent to the said sir Francis. And to say that ever I heard of any such overture made by Grandville, or that ever I communed with any man concerning any such mater, other then this of the bishope of Winchester, as God be my help, I never dyd; nor unto more thenne this, I was never prevye.—Now, my good lords, having made answer according to the truth of such questions as hath been asked me, most humbly I beseeche you all to be mediators for me to his most excellent majestie, to cause such as have accused me (if it might be with his high pleasure) to come before his majestie, to lay to my charge afore me, face to face, what they can say against me: and I am in no dout, so to declare my selfe, that it shall appere I am falsly accused. And if his pleasure shall not be, to take the paine in his royall person, then to give you commandment to do the same. My lords, I trust ye think Cromwell's service and mine hath not be like; and yet my desire is, to have no more favour shew'de to me, than was shew'de to him, I being present. He was a fals man; and sewerly I am a trewe poore jantleman.—My lords, I think surelie there is some fals man, that have laid some great cause to my charge, or else; I had not be sent hither. And therefore, eftsonys most humbly I beseeche to finde the names, if they and I may not be brought face to face, yet let me be made privy what the causes are; and if I do not answer truly to every point, let me not live one howre after. For sewerlie I would hide nothing of any questions that I shall know, that doth concern my self, nor any other creature.—My lords, there was never gold tried better by fier and watter then I have been, nor hath had greater enemies about my sovereign lord, then I have had; and yet (God be thanked) my truth hath ever tried me, as I dont not it shall do in this causes. Suerly, if I knew any thought I had offended his majestie in, I would suerly have declared it to his person.—Upon the Tuysdaye in Whitson-week last past, I broke unto his majestie, moste humbly beseeching him to helpe, that a mariage might be had between my daughter and sir Thomas Semour; and whereas my son of Surey hath a son and divers daughters; that, with his favour, a crosse mariage might have been made between my lord great chamberline and them: and also when my son Thomas hath a son, that shall (be his mother) spend a thousand marks a yere, that he might be in like wise married to one of my said lord's daughters. I report me to your lordships, whether myn intent was honest in this motion, or not. And whereas I have written, that my truth hath been severly tried, and that I have bad great enemies. First, The cardinall did confesse to me at Asser, that he had gone about fourteen years to have destroyed me; saying, he did the same by the setting upon of my lord of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and and my lord Sands; who said often to him, that if he found not the means to put me out of the way, at length I should severly undo him.—Crownwell, at such tyme as the marquis of Exeter suffered, examined his wife more streitly of me, then of all other men in the realme, as she sent me word by her brother, the lord Montjoy. He hath said to me himself many times, my lord, ye are an happy man, that your wife knoweth no hurt by you; for if she did, she would undo you.—The duke of Buckingham confessed openly at the bar, (my father sitting as his judge) that of all men living he hated me most, thinking I was the man that had hurt him most to the king's majestie: which now, quoth he, I perceive the contrary.—Rice, who had married my sister, confessed, that, of all men living, he hated me most; and wished many times, how he might find the meanes to thrust his dagger in me.—What malice both my neecys, that it pleased the king's highnes to marie, did bere unto me, is not unknowne to such ladies as kept them in this sute; as my lady Herberd, my lady Tirwit, my lady Kynston, and others, which heard what they said of me. Who tried out the falshod of the lord Darcy, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer, Aske, and many others, for which they suffered for? but only I. Who slewed his majestie of the words of my mother-in-law, for which she was attainted of inisprision? but only I. In all times past unto this time, I have shewed my self a most trewe man to my sovereign lord. And since these things done in tymes past, I have received more proffight of his highnes, then ever I did afore. Alas! who can think that I, having been so long a trew man, should now be false to his majestie? I have received more proffight then I have deserved: and a poore man, as I am, yet I am his own near kinsman. For whose sake should I be an untrew man to them? Alas, alas, my lords, that ever it should be thought any ontruthe to be in me.—Fynally my good lords eftsonys most humble I beseech you to shew this scribe letter to his majestie, and all joyntle to beseech his highnes to grante me the petitions that are conteyned in the same, and most especyall to remyt out of his most noble gentle hart such displeasure as he hath conceyved against me: and I shall dewryng my lyff pray for the continuence of his most royall estate long to endure: By his highnes poor prisoner, T. NOAFOLK."

39. Proceedings against Various Persons in the Reign of Hen. VIII. for Treason, in denying the King's Supremacy; and other capital Crimes, principally relating to Religion. [1 Burn. Reformat. 351.]

[" Bishop Burnet closes the first volume of his History of the Reformation with a summary account of various Trials and Attainders, in the reign of Hen. 8. in order to exhibit at one view the severities practised by that prince against the popish party; we therefore flatter ourselves, that our insertion of this part of the Bishop's work will not be deemed foreign to the present undertaking. It is observable, that, though by the Bishop's own acknowledgment, the king's severity to the Popish party furnishes great ground for just censure; and though he states many instances of violating the first principles of justice and humanity; yet he denies, that there is any thing to justify all the clamours of the Roman Catholics against his memory, insisting too, that his cruelties were far short both in number and degree of those in queen Mary's reign. But really this is writing too tenderly of Henry; for there is not only grievous, but almost equal cause to detest the memories of both him and Mary, the barbarities exercised in the reign of each being too numerous to leave room for much distinction between them. When two princes both with characters of so dark a complexion are to be delineated, it calls for very nice touches to discriminate them in the colouring." Hargrave.]

IN the latter part of his reign, there were many things that seem great severities, especially as they are represented by the writers of the Roman party; whose relations are not a little strengthened by the faint excuses, and the mistaken accounts, that most of the protestant historians have made. The king was naturally impetuous, and could not bear provocation; the times were very ticklish; his subjects were generally addicted to the old superstition, especially in the northern parts; the monks and friers were both numerous and wealthy; the Pope was his implacable enemy; the emperor was a formidable prince, and being then master of all the Netherlands, had many advantages for the war he designed against England. Cardinal Pole, his kinsman, was going over all the courts of Christendom, to persuade a league against England; as being a thing of greater necessity and merit than a war against the Turk. This being, without the least aggravation, the state of affairs at that time, it must be confessed he was sore put to it. A superstition that was so blind and headstrong, and enemies that were both so powerful, so spiteful, and so industrious, made rigour necessary: nor is any general of an army more concerned to deal severely with spies and intelligencers, than he was to proceed against all the popes adherents, or such as kept a correspondence with Pole. He had observed in history, that upon much less provocation than himself had given, not only several emperors and foreign princes had been dispossessed of their dominions; but two of his own ancestors, Henry the 2d and king John, had been driven to great extremities, and forced to unusual and most indecent submissions by the means of the popes and their clergy.—The Pope's power over the clergy was so absolute, and their dependence and obedience to him was so implicate; and the popish clergy had so great an interest in the superstitious multitude, whose consciences they governed, that nothing but a stronger passion could either tame the clergy, or quiet the people. If there had been the least hope of impunity, the last part of his reign would have been one continued rebellion; therefore to prevent a more profuse effusion of blood, it seemed necessary to execute laws severely in some particular instances.—There is one calumny that runs in a thread through all the Historians of the Popish side, which not a few of our own have ignorantly taken up; that many were put to death for not swearing the king's supremacy. It is an impudent falshood; for not so much as one person suffered on that account; nor was there any law for any such oath before the parliament in the 28th year of the king's reign, when the unsufferable Bull of Pope Paul the 3rd, engaged him to look a little more to his own safety. Then indeed in the Oath for maintaining the Succession of the crown, the subjects were required, under the pains of Treason, to swear that the king was Supreme Head of the Church of England; but that was not mentioned in the former Oath, that was made in the 25th, and enacted in the 26th year of his reign. It cannot but be confessed, that to enact under pain of death that none should deny the king's titles, and to proceed upon that against offenders, is a very different thing from forcing them to swear the king to be the supreme head of the church.(a)

(a) "This sounds more like an apology, than just reasoning. Enforcing the Oath of Supremacy by the penalty of Treason, was resorting to the highest punishment known to our law. Wherein, too, consisted the material difference, in point of rigor, between treason for not swearing to the king's supremacy, and treason for denying it? Was it not equally the object of the statutes creating both crimes, to compel an acknowledgment of the king's supremacy by the same extremity of punishment? Can there be any reason to suppose, that those who were concerned in the deaths of bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More for denying the Supremacy, if it had been requisite, would have been so scrupulous as to hesitate about construing the refusal of the oath a denial? When it is ob-

The first instance of these capital proceedings was in Easter-Term, in the beginning of the 27th year of his reign. Three priors, and a monk, of the Carthusian order, were then indicted of Treason, for saying, 'That the king was not Supreme Head under Christ of the Church of England.' These were John Houghton, prior of the Charter-House near London, Augustin Webster, prior of Axholme, Robert Laurence, prior of Bevall, and Richard Reynolds, a monk of Sion. This last was esteemed a learned man, for that time, and that order. They were tried in Westminster-hall by a commission of Oyer and Terminer: they pleaded Not Guilty, but the jury found them Guilty, and Judgment was given that they should suffer as Traitors. The Record mentions no other particulars; but the writers of the popish side make a splendid recital of the courage and constancy they expressed both in their Tryal, and at their death. It was no difficult thing for men so used to the legend, and the making of fine stories for saints and martyrs of their orders, to dress up their narratives with much pomp. But as their pleading Not Guilty to the Indictment, shews no extraordinary resolution, so the account that is given by them of one Hall, a secular priest that died with them, is so false, that there is good reason to suspect all. He is said to have suffered on the same account; but the Record of his Attainder gives a very different relation of it.

He and Robert Feron were indicted at the same time for having 'said many spiteful and treasonable things; as, that the king was a tyrant, an heretic, a robber, and an adulterer; that they hoped he should die such a death as king John and Richard the 3rd died; that they looked when those in Ireland and Wales should invade England: and they were assured that three parts of four in England would be against the king: they also said that they should never live merrily till the king and the rulers were plucked by the pates, and brought to the pot, jected to Henry as a cruelty, that many were put to death for not swearing to his Supremacy, without doubt every denial of it, whether impliedly by refusing the oath, or expressly by words, was meant: Therefore it is foreign to the spirit of the remark to say, that they were thus punished for denying the Supremacy, not for refusing to swear to it. So verbal an answer to the animadversion of Henry's enemies would scarce have escaped the learned bishop, if he had not been insensibly influenced by a fear, lest the justice and propriety of the Reformation should be prejudiced by the cruelty of Henry's measures in its commencement. But the cause of truth is never finally helped by an ill-founded argument. The Reformation rests on a better foundation than the humanity of Henry's actions; nor is there any necessary connection between the one and the other, bad and cruel princes being frequently the casual instruments of great good to society." Hargrave.

and that it would never be well with the Church till that was done.' Hall had not only said this, but had also written it to Feron the 10th of March that year. When they were brought to the bar, they at first pleaded Not Guilty; but full proof being brought, they themselves confessed the Enditement, before the jury went aside, and put themselves on the king's mercy; upon which, this being an imagning and contriving both war against the king, and the king's death, Judgment was given as in cases of Treason: but no mention being made of Feron's death, it seems he had his pardon. Hall suffered with the four Carthusians, who were hanged in their habits.

They proceeded no further in Easter-Term: but in Trinity-Term there was another commission of Oyer and Terminer, by which Humphrey Middlemore, William Exmew, and Sebastian Nudigate, three monks of the Charterhouse near London, were endited of Treason, for having said on the 25th of May, 'That they neither could nor would consent to be obedient to the king's highness, as true, lawful, and obedient subjects; to take him to be Supream Head on earth of the Church of England.' They all pleaded Not Guilty, but were found guilty by the jury; and Judgment was given. When they were condemned, they desired that they might receive the body of Christ before their death. But (as judge Spelman writ) the Court would not grant it, since that was never done in such cases but by order from the king. Two days after that, they were executed. Two other monks of that same order, John Rochester and James Wolver, suffered on the same account at York in May this year. Ten other Carthusian monks were shut up within their cells, where nine of them died. The tenth was hanged in the beginning of August. Concerning those persons I find this said in some Original Letters, that they had brought over into England, and vented in it, some books that were written beyond sea, against the king's Marriage, and his other proceedings: which being found in their house, they were pressed to peruse the books that were written for the king, but obstinately refused to do it. They had also been involved in the business of the Maid of Kent, for which, though all the complices in it, except those who suffered for it, were pardoned by act of parliament, yet such as had been concerned in it, were still under jealousy: and it is no wonder that upon new provocations they met with the uttermost rigor of the law.

These Tryals made way for two others that were more signal: of the bishop of Rochester, and sir Thomas More. The first of these had been a prisoner above a year, and was very severely used; he complained in his letters to Cromwell, that he had neither cloaths nor fire, being then about fourscore. This was understood at Rome, and upon it, pope Clement, by an officious kindness to him, or rather in spite to king Henry, declared him a cardinal, and sent him a red-hat. When the king knew this, he sent to examine him about it; but he protested he had used no endeavours to procure it, and valued it so little, that if the hat were lying at his feet, he would not take it up. It never came nearer him than Picardy: yet this did precipitate his ruin. But if he had kept his opinion of the king's Supremacy to himself, they could not have proceeded further. He would not do that, but did upon several occasions speak against it, so he was brought to his Tryal on the 17th of June (see p. 395.) The lord chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, and some other lords, together with the Judges, sate upon him by a commission of Oyer and Terminer. He pleaded Not Guilty, but being found guilty, Judgment was passed on him to die as a traitor; but he was by a warrant from the king, beheaded. Upon the 22d of June, being the day of his execution, he dressed himself with more than ordinary care; and when his man took notice of it, he told him, he was to be that day a bridegroom. As he was led to the place of execution, being stopt in the way by the croud, he opened his New Testament, and prayed to this purpose; 'that as that book had been his companion and chief comfort in his imprisonment, so then some place might turn up to him, that might comfort him in his last passage.' This being said, he opened the book at a venture, in which these words of St. John's Gospel turned up: 'this is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.' So he shut the book with much satisfaction, and all the way was repeating and meditating on them. When he came to the scaffold he pronounced the Te Deum, and after some other devotions his head was cut off. Thus died John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, in the 80th year of his age. He was a learned and devout man, but much addicted to the superstitions in which he had been bred up; and that led him to great severities against all that opposed them. He had been for many years confessor to the king's grand-mother, the countess of Richmond; and it was believed that he persuaded her to those noble designs for the advancement of learning, of founding two Colleges in Cambridge, St. Johns and Christs College, and divinity professors in both Universities. And in acknowledgment of this, he was chosen chancellor of the University of Cambridge. Henry the 7th gave him the bishoprick of Rochester, which he, following the rule of the primitive church, would never change for a better. He used to say his church was his wife, and he would never part with her, because she was poor. He continued in great favour with the king, till the business of the Divorce was set on foot; and then he adhered so firmly to the queen's cause, and the Pope's Supremacy, that he was carried by that headlong into great errors: as appears by the business of the Maid of Kent. Many thought the king ought to have proceeded against him rather upon that, which was a point of state, than upon the Supremacy, which was matter of conscience. But the king was resolved to let all his subjects see, there was no mercy to be expected by any that denied his being Supreme Head of the Church; and therefore made him and More, two examples for terrifying the rest. This being much censured beyond sea, Gardiner, that was never wanting in the most servile compliances, wrote a Vindication of the king's proceedings. The lord Herbert had it in his hands, and tells us it was written in elegant Latin, but that he thought it too long, and others judged it was too vehement, to be inserted in his History.

On the 1st of July, sir Thomas More was brought to his Trial. (see p. 385.) The special matter in his indictment, is, that on the 7th of May preceding, before Cromwell, Bedyll, and some others that were pressing him concerning the king's supremacy, he said he would not meddle with any such matter, and was fully resolved to serve God, and think upon his Passion, and his own passage out of this world. He had also sent divers messages by one George Gold to Fisher to encourage 'him in his obstinacy; and said, the act of parliament is like a sword with two edges, for if a man answer one way, it will confound his soul; and if he answer another way, it will confound his body.' He had said the same thing on the 3rd of June, in the hearing of the lord chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, and others: and that he would not be the occasion of the shortning his own life. And when Rich the king's solicitor came to deal with him further about it, but protested that he came not with any authority to examine him, they discoursed the matter fully. Rich pressed him, 'that since the parliament had enacted that the king was Supreme Head, the subjects ought to agree to it; and said Rich, what if the parliament should declare me king, would you not acknowledge me? I would, said More, quis (as it is in the indictment) rex per parlamentum fieri potest, & per parlamentum deprivari. But More turned the argument on Rich, and said, what if the parliament made an act that God was not God? Rich acknowledged it could not bind, but replied to More, that since he would acknowledge him king, if he were made so by act of parliament, why would he not acknowledge the king Supreme Head, since it was enacted by parliament? To that More answered, That the parliament had power to make a king, and the people were bound to acknowledge him, whom they made; but for the supremacy, though the parliament had enacted it, yet those in foreign parts had never assented to it.' This was carried by Rich to the king, and all these particulars were laid together, and judge: to amount to a denial of the Supremacy. Judge Spelman writ, that More, being on his trial, pleaded strongly against the statute that made it treason to deny the Supremacy, and argued that the king could not be supreme head of the church. When he was brought to the bar, he pleaded not guilty, but being found guilty, judgment was given against him as a traitor. He received it with that equal temper of mind, which he had shewed in both conditions of life, and then set himself wholly to prepare for death. He expressed great contempt of the world, and that he was weary of life, and longed for death; which was so little terrible to him, that his ordinary facetiousness remained with him even on the scaffold. It was censured by many, as light and undecent. But others said, that way having been so natural to him on all other occasions, it was not at all affected; but shewed that death did no way discompose him, and could not so much as put him out of his ordinary honour. Yet his rallying every thing on the scaffold was thought to have more of the Stoick than the Christian in it. After some time spent in secret devotions, he was beheaded on the 6th of July.

Thus did sir Thomas More end his days, in the 53d year of his age. He was a man of rare virtues, and excellent parts. In his youth he had freer thoughts of things, as appears by his Utopia, and his letters to Erasmus; but afterwards he became superstitiously devoted to the interests and passions of the Popish clergy; and as he served them when he was in authority, even to assist them in all their cruelties; so he employed his pen in the same cause, both in writing against all the new opinions in general, and in particular against Tindal, Frith, and Barnes, as also an unknown writer, who seemed of neither party, but reproved the corruptions of the clergy, and condemned their cruel proceedings. More was no divine at all, and it is plain to any that reads his writings, that he knew nothing of antiquity, beyond the quotations he found in the canon-law and in the master of the sentences (only he had read some of St. Austin's treatises): for upon all points of controversie, he quotes only what he found in these collections; nor was he at all conversant in the critical learning upon the scriptures; but his peculiar excellency in writing, was, that he had a natural easie expression, and presented all the opinions of popery with their fair side to the reader, disguising or concealing the black side of them with great art; and was no less dextrous in exposing all the ill consequences that could follow on the doctrine of the reformers: and had upon all occasions great store of pleasant tales, which he applied wittily to his purpose. And in this consists the great strength of his writings, which were designed rather for the rabble, than for learned men. But for justice, contempt of money, humility, and a true generosity of mind, he was an example to the age in which he lived.

But there is one thing unjustly added to the praise of these two great men, or rather feigned, on design to lessen the king's honour; that Fisher and he penned the book which the king wrote against Luther. This Sanders first published, and Bellarmine and others since have taken it up upon his authority. Strangers may be pardoned such errors, but they are inexcusable in an Englishman. For in More's printed Works there is a letter written by him out of the Tower to Cromwell, in which he gives an account of his behaviour concerning the king's Divorce and Supremacy. Among other particulars one is, "That when the king shewed him his book against Luther, in which he had asserted the pope's primacy to be of divine right, More desired him to leave it out; since as there had been many contests between popes and other princes, so there might fall in some between the pope and the king; therefore he thought it was not fit for the king to publish any thing, which might be afterwards made use of against himself; and advised him either to leave out that point, or to touch it very tenderly: but the king would not follow his counsel," being perhaps so fond of what he had writ, that he would rather run himself upon a great inconvenience, than leave out any thing that he fancied so well written. This shews that More knew that book was written by the king's own pen; and either Sanders never read this, or maliciously concealed it, lest it should discover his foul dealing. (b)

These executions so terrified all people, that there were no further provocations given: and all persons either took the oaths, or did so dextrously conceal their opinions, that till the rebellions of Lincolnshire, and the north, broke out, none suffered after this upon a publick account. But when these were quieted, then the king resolved to make the chief authors and leaders of those commotions publick examples to the rest. The duke of Norfolk proceeded

(b) The following is extracted from Denne's Addenda to Hist. of Lambeth, as cited, "Select Views of London and its environs."

"1533, May 28. Archbishop Cranmer confirmed at Lambeth the Marriage of king Henry the 8th with the lady Anne Boleyn. And three years afterwards the same prelate being judicially seated in a certain low chapel within his house at Lambeth, by a definitive sentence annulled the Marriage between the same parties; the queen, in order to avoid the sentence of burning, having confessed to the archbishop, some just and lawful impediments to her marriage with the king.—A little before the latter event, viz. April 13, 1534, the commissioners sat at Lambeth to administer the oath of the settlement of Succession to the crown, upon the heirs of the same queen Anne, to the clergy, and chiefly those of London, that had not yet sworn, who all took it, not one excepted. And a certain doctor, Vicar of Croydon, that it seems made some boggle before, went up with the rest, of whom sir Thomas More, who then stood by, made an observation how as he passed he went to my doctor's Battery-hatch, and called for drink, and drank valde familiariter, 'whether,' says he, sarcastically, 'it were for gladness or dryness, or quod ille notus erat pontifici.' The same day were conveyed hither from the Tower, bishop Fisher and sir Thomas More, the only layman at this meeting, to tender this oath to them, who both being separately called, refused."

against many of them by martial law. There were also tryals at common law of a great many more that were taken prisoners, and sent up to London. The lords Darcy and Hussie were tried by their peers, the marquess of Exceter sitting steward. And a commission of oyer and terminer being issued out for the tryal of the rest, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer and his lady, sir Francis Pigot, sir Stephen Hamilton, and sir Thomas Piercy, and Ask, that had been their captain, with the abbots of Whalley, Jerveux, Bridlington, Lenton, Woburn, and Kingstead, and Mackrall the monk that first raised the Lincolnshire rebellion, with sixteen more, were indicted of High Treason, for the late rebellions. And after all the steps of the rebellion were reckoned up, it is added in the Indictment, that they had met together on the 17th of January, and consulted how to renew it, and prosecute it further, being encouraged by the new risings that were then in the north; by which they had forfeited all the favour to which they could have pretended, by virtue of the indemnity that was granted in the end of December, and of the pardons which they had taken out. They were all found Guilty, and had judgment as in cases of Treason. Divers of them were carried down into Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, and executed in the places where their treasons were committed; but most of them suffered at London, and among others the lady Bulmer (whom others call sir John Bulmer's harlot) was burnt for it in Smithfield.

The only censure, that passed on this, was, that advantages were taken on too slight grounds to break the king's Indemnity and Pardon; since it does not appear, that after their pardon they did any thing more than meet and consult. But the kingdom was so shaken with that rebellion, that, if it had not been for the great conduct of the duke of Norfolk, the king had by all appearance lost his crown. And it will not seem strange, that a king (especially so tempered as this was) had a mind to strike terror into the rest of his subjects, by some signal examples, and to put out of the way the chief leaders of that design: nor was it to be wondered at, that the abbots and other clergymen, who had been so active in that commotion, were severely handled. It was by their means that the discontents were chiefly fomented. They had taken all the oaths that were enjoined them, and yet continued to be still practising against the state; which, as it was highly contrary to the peaceable doctrines of the Christian religion, so it was in a special manner contrary to the rules, which they professed. That obliged them to forsake the world, and to follow a religious and spiritual course of life.

The next example of justice was a year after this, of one Forrest, an Observant frier. He had been, as Sanders said, confessor to queen Catherine, but it seems departed from her interests; for he insinuated himself so into the king, that he recovered his good opinion. Being an ignorant and lewd man, he was accounted by the better sort of that house, to which he belonged in Greenwich, a reproach to their order (concerning this, I have seen a large account in an original letter written by a brother of the same house). Having regained the king's good opinion, he put all those, who had favoured the divorce, under great fears, for he proceeded cruelly against them. And one Rainscroft, being suspected to have given secret intelligence of what was done among them, was shut up, and so hardly used, that he dyed in their hands, which was, as that letter relates, done by frier Forrest's means. This frier was found to have denied the king's supremacy: for though he himself had sworn it, yet he had infused it into many in confession, that the king was not the supream head of the Church. Being questioned for these practices, which were so contrary to the oath that he had taken, he answered, 'That he took that oath with his outward man, but his inward man had never consented to it.' Being brought to his tryal, and accused of several heretical opinions that he held, he submitted himself to the Church. Upon this, he had more freedom allowed him in the prison: but some coming to him diverted him from the submission he had offered; so that when the paper of abjuration was brought him, he refused to set his hand to it: upon which he was judged an obstinate heretick. The Records of these proceedings are lost; but the books of that time say, that he denied the Gospel. It is like it was upon that pretence, that without the determination of the Church it had no authority; upon which several writers of the Roman communion have said unbecoming and scandalous things of the Holy Scriptures. He was brought to Smithfield, where were present the lords of the council, to offer him his pardon if he would abjure. Latimer made a sermon against his errors, and studied to persuade him to recant; but he continued in his former opinions, so he was put to death in a most severe manner. He was hanged in a chain about his middle, and the great image that was brought out of Wales, was broken to pieces, and served for fuel to burn him. He shewed great unquietness of mind, and ended his life in an ungodly manner, as Hall says, who adds this character of him, "That he had little knowledge of God and his sincere truth, and less trust in him at his ending."

In winter that year a correspondence was discovered with cardinal Pole, who was barefaced in his treasonable designs against the king. His brother, sir Geoffrey Pole, discovered the whole plot. For which the marquess of Exeter, (that was the king's cousin-german by his mother, who was Edward the 4th's daughter), the lord Montacute, the cardinal's brother sir Geoffrey Pole, and sir Edward Nevill, were sent to the Tower in the beginning of November. They were accused for having maintained a correspondence with the cardinal, and for expressing an hatred of the king, with a dislike of his proceedings, and a readiness to rise upon any good opportunity that might offer itself.

The special matter brought against the lord Montacute, and the marquiss of Exeter, who were tried by their peers on the 2d and 3d of December, in the 30th year of this reign, is, "That whereas cardinal Pole, and others, had cast off their allegiance to the king, and gone and submitted themselves to the pope, the king's mortal enemy, the lord Montacute did, on the 24th of July, in the 28th year of the king's reign, a few months before the rebellion broke out, say, that he liked well the proceedings of his brother the cardinal, but did not like the proceedings of the realm; and said, I trust to see a change of this world; I trust to have a fair day upon those knaves that rule about the king; and I trust to see a merry world one day.' Words to the same purpose were also charged on the marquess. The lord Montacute further said, "I would I were over the sea with my brother, for this world will one day come to stripes: it must needs so come to pass, and I fear we shall lack nothing so much as honest men." He also said, "He had dreamed that the king was dead, and though he was not yet dead, he would die suddenly; one day his leg will kill him, and then we shall have jolly stirring;" saying also, "That he had never loved him from his childhood, and that cardinal Wolsey would have been an honest man, if he had had an honest master." And the king having said to the lords he would leave them one day, having some apprehensions he might shortly die, that lord said, "If he will serve us so, we shall be happily rid; a time will come, I fear we shall not tarry the time, we shall do well enough." He had also said, "He was sorry the lord Abergavenny was dead, for he could have made ten thousand men; and for his part he would go and live in the west, where the marquiss of Exeter was strong;" and had also said upon the breaking of the northern rebellion, "That the lord Darcy played the fool, for he went to pluck away the council, but he should have begun with the head first, but I beshrew him for leaving 'off so soon.' These were the words charged on those lords, as clear discoveries of their treasonable designs; and that they knew of the rebellion that broke out, and only intended to have kept it off to a fitter opportunity: they were also accused of correspondence with cardinal Pole, that was the king's declared enemy. Upon these points the lords pleaded not guilty, but were found guilty by their peers, and so judgment was given.

On the 4th of December were indicted sir Geoffrey Pole, for holding correspondence with his brother the cardinal, and saying that he approved of his proceedings, but not of the kings; sir Edward Nevill, brother to the lord Abergavenny, for saying, the king was a beast, and worse than a beast; George Crofts, chancellor of the cathedral of Chichester, for saying, 'the king was not, but the pope was, Supream Head of the Church;' and John Collins, for saying, 'The king would hang in hell one day for the plucking down of Abbeyes.' All those, sir Edward Nevill only excepted, pleaded guilty, and so they were condemned; but sir Geoffrey Pole was the only person of the number that was not executed, for he had discovered the matter. At the same time also, cardinal Pole, Michael Throgmorton, gentleman, John Hilliard and Thomas Goldwell, clerks, and William Peyto, a Franciscan of the Observants, were attainted in absence; because they had cast off their duty to the king, and had subjected themselves to the bishop of Rome, Pole being made cardinal by him; and for writing treasonable letters, and sending them into England. On the 4th of Feb. following, sir Nicholas Carew, that was both master of the horse, and knight of the garter, was arraigned for being an adherent to the marquess of Exeter, and having spoke of his attainder as unjust and cruel. He was also attainted and executed upon the 3d of March. When he was brought to the scaffold, he openly acknowledged the errors and superstition in which he had formerly lived; and blessed God for his imprisonment, "For he then began to relish the life and sweetness of God's holy word, which was brought him by his keeper, one Phillips, who followed the Reformation, and had formerly suffered for it."

After these executions, followed the Parliament in 1539, in which not only these Attainders that were already passed were confirmed, but new ones of a strange and unheard-of nature were enacted. It is a blemish never to be washed off, and which cannot be enough condemned, and was a breach of the most sacred and unalterable rules of justice, which is capable of no excuse; it was the attainting of some persons, whom they held in custody, without bringing them to a trial. Concerning which, I shall add what the great lord chief justice Coke writes: "Although I question not the power of the parliament, for without question the attainder stands of force in law, yet this I say of the manner of proceeding, Aufrat oblitio, si potest, si non utrumque silentium tegat. For the more high and absolute the jurisdiction of the court is, the more just and honourable it ought to be in the proceedings, and to give example of justice to inferior courts." The chief of these were the marchioness of Exeter and the countess of Sarum. The special matter charged on the former, is her confederating herself to sir Nicholas Carew, in his treasons; to which is added, 'That she had committed divers other abominable treasons.' The latter is said to have confederated "herself with her son the cardinal, with other aggravating words." It does not appear by the Journal that any witnesses were examined; only that day that the bills were read the third time in the house of lords, Cromwell shewed them a coat of white silk, which the lord admiral had found among the countess of Sarum's cloaths, in which the arms of England were wrought on the one side, and the standard that was carried before the rebels was on the other side. This was brought as an evidence that she approved of the rebellion. Three Irish priests were also attainted for carrying letters out of Ireland, to the pope and cardinal Pole, as also sir Adrian Fortescue for endeavouring to raise rebellion, Thomas Dingley, a knight of St. John of Jerusalem, and Robert Grancter, merchant, for going to several foreign princes, and persuading them to make war upon the king, and assist the lords Darcy and Hussie in the rebellion they had raised. Two gentlemen, a Dominican frier, and a yeoman, were by the same act attainted, for saying that 'That venomous serpent the bishop of Rome was Supreme Head of the church of England.' Another gentleman, two priests, and a yeoman were attainted for treason in general, no particular crime being specified. Thus sixteen persons were in this manner attainted, and if there was any examination of witnesses for convicting them, it was either in the Star-Chamber, or before the privy council; for there is no mention of any evidence that was brought in the Journals: there was also much haste made in the passing this bill: it being brought in the 10th of May was read that day for the first and second time, and the 11th of May for the third time. The commons kept it five days before they sent it back, and added some more to those that were in the bill at first; but how many were named in the bill originally, and how many were afterwards added, cannot be known. Fortescue and Dingley suffered the 10th of July. As for the countess of Sarum, the lord Herbert saw in a Record, "That Bulls from the pope were found in her house, that she kept correspondence with her son, and that she forbade her tenants to have the New Testament in English, or any other of the books that had been published by the king's authority." She was then about seventy years of age, but shewed by the answers she made, that she had a vigorous and masculine mind. She was kept two years prisoner in the Tower, after the act had passed, the king by that reprieve designing to oblige her son to a better behaviour; but upon a fresh provocation by a new rebellion in the north, she was beheaded, and in her name and line of Plantagenet determined. The marchioness of Exeter died a natural death. In November this year were the abbots of Reading, Glassenbury and Colchester attainted of Treason, of which mention was made formerly.

In the parliament that sate in the year 1540 they went on to follow that strange precedent, which they had made the former year. By the 36th act, Giles Heron was attainted of treason, no special matter being mentioned.

By the 57th act, Richard Fetherstoun, Thomas Abell, and Edward Powel, priests, and William Horn, a yeoman, were attainted, for denying the king's supremacy, and adhering to the bishop of Rome: by the same act the wife of one — Tirrell, esq. was attainted, for refusing her duty of allegiance, and denying prince Edward to be prince and heir of the crown; and one Laurence Cook, of Doncaster, was also attainted for contriving the king's death.

By the 58th act, Gregory Buttolph, Adam Damply, and Edward Brindeholm, clerks, and Clement Plulpot, gentleman, were attainted, for adhering to the bishop of Rome, for corresponding with cardinal Pole, and endeavouring to surprize the town of Calais: by the same act Barnes, Gerrard, and Jerome were attainted, of whose sufferings an account has been already given.

By the 59th act, William Bird, a priest and chaplain to the lord Hungerford, was attainted, for having said to one that was going to assist the king against the rebels in the north 'I am sorry thou goest, seest thou not how the king plucketh down images and abbies every day? And if the king go thither himself, he will never come home again, nor any of them all which go with him, and in truth it were pity he should ever come home again;' and at another time upon ones saying, 'O good Lord, I ween all the world will be heretics in a little time:' Bird said, 'Doeest thou marvel at that? I tell thee it is no marvel, for the great master of all is an heretick, and such a one as there is not his like in the world.'

By the same act, the lord Hungerford was likewise attainted. "The crimes specified are, that he knowing Bird to be a traitor, did entertain him in his house as his chaplain; that he ordered another of his chaplains, sir Hugh Wood, and one Dr. Maudlin to use conjuring, that they might know how long the king should live, and whether he should be victorious over his enemies or not; and that these three years last past he had frequently committed the detestable sin of sodomy with several of his servants." All these were attainted by that parliament. The lord Hungerford was executed the same day with Cromwell; he dyed in such disorder that some thought he was frenetick, for he called often to the executioner to dispatch him, and said he was weary of life, and longed to be dead, which seemed strange in a man that had so little cause to hope in his death. For Powel, Fetherstoun, and Abell, they suffered the same day with Barnes and his friends, as hath been already shewn.

This year, Sampson bishop of Chichester, and one doctor Wilson were put in the Tower, upon suspicion of a correspondence with the Pope. But upon their submission they had their pardon and liberty. In the year 1541, five priests and ten secular persons, some of them being gentlemen of quality, were raising a new rebellion in Yorkshire; which was suppressed in time, and the promoters of it being apprehended, were attainted and executed, and this occasioned the death of the countess of Sarum, after the execution of the sentence had been delayed almost two years.

The last instance of the king's severity was in the year 1543, in which one Gardiner, that was the bishop of Winchester's kinsman and secretary, and three other priests, were tryed, for denying the king's supremacy, and soon after executed. But what special matter was laid to their charge, cannot be known, for the record of their attainder is lost.

These were the proceedings of this king against those that adhered to the interests of Rome: in which, though there is great ground for just censure, for as the laws were rigorous, so the execution of them was raised to the highest that the law could admit; yet there is nothing in them to justify all the clamours which that party have raised against king Henry, and by which they pursue his memory to this day; and are far short, both in number and degrees, of the cruelties of queen Maries reign, which yet they endeavour all that is possible to extenuate or deny.—To conclude, we have now gone through the reign of king Henry the 8th, who is rather to be reckoned among the great than the good princes. He exercised so much severity on men of both persuasions, that the writers of both sides have laid open his faults, and taxed his cruelty. But as neither of them were much obliged to him, so none have taken so much care to set forth his good qualities, as his enemies have done to enlarge on his vices: I do not deny, that he is to be numbred among the ill princes, yet I cannot rank him with the worst.

40. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir THOMAS SEYMOUR, knt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, Lord High Admiral of England, Uncle to the King, and Brother to the Lord Protector, for High Treason: 2 & 3 Edward VI. A. D. 1549. [2 Burn. Reform. 90. 8 Rapin, 50. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 587.]

ABOUT the year 1547, sir Thomas Seymour, the Protector's brother, was brought to such a share of his fortunes, that he was made a baron, and lord admiral. But this not satisfying his ambition, he endeavoured to have linked himself into a nearer relation with the crown, by marrying the king's sister, the lady Elizabeth. But finding he could not compass that, he made his addresses to Catherine Parr, the queen dowager, and they were married privately. Being by this match possessed of great wealth, he studied to engage all about the king to be his friends. His design was, that since he was the king's uncle as well as his brother, he ought to have a proportioned share with him in the government. About

Easter that year he first set about that design; and corrupted some about the king, who should bring him sometimes privately through the gallery to the queen dowager's lodgings; and he desired they would let him know when the king had occasion for money, they should not trouble the treasury, for he would furnish him. Thus he gained ground with the king.

When the Protector was that year in Scotland, the Admiral began to act more openly, and was for making a party for himself, of which Paget charged him in plain terms, yet all was ineffectual; for the admiral was resolved to go on, and either get himself advanced higher, or perish in the attempt. During the session, the Admiral got the king to write with his own hand a message to the house of commons for making him governor of his person, and he intended to have gone with it to the house, and had a party there, by whose interest he was confident to have carried his business: he dealt also with many of the lords and counsellors to assist him in it. When this was known, before he had gone with it to the house, some were sent in his brother's name to see if they could prevail with him to go no further; he refused to hearken to them, and said, that if he were crossed in his attempt, he would make this the 'blackest Parliament' that ever was in England. Upon that he was sent for by order from the Council, but refused to come; then they threatened him severely, and told him, the king's writing was nothing in law, but that he who had procured it, was punishable for doing an act of such a nature, &c. so they resolved to have him sent to the Tower. But at last he submitted himself to the Protector and Council; and his brother and he seemed to be perfectly reconciled (a), though it was visible he only put off his projects till a fitter conjuncture, and was on all occasions infusing into the

(a) It is mentioned by some historians, that the first occasion of the quarrel between the two brothers, arose from the envy and malice of the duchess of Somerset against the queen dowager, wife to the Admiral, and that she claimed the precedence as the Protector's lady; but this is very unlikely, that she should be so ignorant of the customs of England, as to dispute precedence with the queen dowager. The whole story seems to be forged by Saunders, in his Treatise de Schismat. Anglican. and copied by Hayward, &c. See 2 Keenet 301, and 2 Burnet's Reformation, 54. 8 Rapin 53, and 2 Strype's Memorials, 124 and 475. But Strype in the same volume, p. 133, saith, king Edward, in his invaluable Journal, preserved in the Cotton Library, noteth, that the Protector was much offended with this marriage of his brother to the queen. See also Strype's Animadversions on Hayward's Edw. 6. in his Memorials, vol. ii. p. 475, and Burnet's Appendix to vol. ii. p. 392; concerning some errors and falsehoods in Saunders's Book of the English Schism.

king a dislike of every thing that was done, persuading him to assume the government himself, and bribing his servants.

Thus he continued contriving and plotting for some time; the Protector had often been told of these things, and warned him of the danger into which he would throw himself. But his restless ambition seeming incurable, he was on the 19th of January (Stowe sayeth the 16th) sent to the Tower (b): and now many things broke out against him, particularly a conspiracy of his with sir William Sharrington, vice treasurer of the Mint at Bristol, who was to have furnished him with 10,000*l.* and had already coined about 12,000*l.* false money (c), and had clipped a great deal more, to the value of 40,000*l.* in all; for which he was attained by a process at common law, and that was confirmed in parliament (d). Fowler also, that waited in the privy-chamber, with others, were sent to the Tower; many complaints being brought against him, the lord Russel, the earl of Southampton and Secretary Petre were ordered to receive their Examinations.

The Protector finding he could not persuade him to submit, on the 22d of Feb. a report was made to the Council of all the Informations against him; consisting not only of the particulars before-mentioned, but of many foul Misdemeanours in the discharge of the Admiralty, several pirates being concerned with him, &c. The whole Charge against him, consisting of 33 Articles, is as followeth, viz.

Articles of High Treason, and other Misdemeanours against the King's Majesty and his

(b) In Bibliotheca Harleiana, 40 B. 29, 51, is the duke of Somerset's and Council's Letter to sir Philip Hobby, declaring to him "The traitorous proceedings of the Lord High Admiral, the duke's brother, viz. 'That he attempted to take in his own hands the most noble person of the king's majesty, and intended by bandying himself with divers persons, to have moved plain sedition in the parliament, and otherwise to have put the whole realm in trouble and danger. That such his practices being discovered, and he questioned, he seemed very penitent, whereupon he was forgiven, and his living advanced almost 1000 marks per annum. That afterwards he practised, and had almost compassed a secret marriage between himself and the lady Eliz. the king's sister; and then intended to have taken into his hands, and order the person of the king's majesty, and the lady Mary, and to have disposed of his majesty's whole council at his pleasure: for all which he is put into the Tower of London.'"

Crown, objected to Sir Thomas Seymour, Knt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, and High Admiral of England. (c)

“ 1. Whereas the duke of Somerset was made Governor of the king's majesty's person, and Protector of all his realms, and dominions, and subjects, to the which you yourself did agree, and gave your consent in writing; it is objected and laid unto your charge, That this notwithstanding you have attempted and gone about, by indirect means, to undo this order, and to get into your hands the government of the king's majesty, to the great danger of his highness's person, and the subversion of the state of the realm. 2. That by corrupting with gifts, and fair promises, divers of the privy chamber, you went about to allure his highness to condescend and agree to the same your most heinous and perilous purposes, to the great danger of his highness's person, and of the subversion of the state of the realm. 3. That you wrote a Letter with your own hand, which letter the king's majesty should have subscribed, or written again after that copy, to the Parliament house; and that you delivered the same to his highness for that intent: With the which so written by his highness, or subscribed, you have determined to have come into the commons house yourself; and there, with your factors and adherents before prepared, to have made a broil, or tumult, or uproar, to the great danger of the king's majesty's person, and subversion of the state of this realm. 4. That you yourself spake to divers of the Council, and laboured with divers of the nobility of the realm, to stick and adhere unto you for the alteration of the state, and order of the realm, and to attain your other purposes, to the danger of the king's majesty's person, now in his tender years, and subversion of the state of the realm. 5. That you did say openly and plainly, you would make the blackest Parliament that ever was in England. 6. That being sent for by the authority, to answer to such things as were thought meet to be reformed in you, you refused to come; to a very evil example of disobedience, and danger thereby of the subversion of the state of the realm. 7. That since the last sessions of this parliament, notwithstanding much clemency shewed unto you, you have still continued in your former mischievous purposes; and continually, by yourself and others, studied and laboured to put into the king's majesty's head and mind, a misliking of the government of the realm, and of the Lord Protector's doings, to the danger of his person, and the great peril of the realm. 8. That the king's majesty being of those tender years, and as yet by age unable to direct his own things, you have gone about to instil into his grace's head, and as much as lieth in you, persuaded him to take upon himself the government and managing of his own affairs, to the danger of his highness's person, and great peril of the whole realm. 9. That you had fully intended and appointed, to have taken the king's majesty's person into your own hands and custody, to the danger of his subjects, and peril of the realm. 10. That you have corrupted, with money, certain of the privy chamber, to persuade the king's majesty to have a credit towards you; and so to insinuate you to his grace, that when he lacked any thing, he should have it of you and none other body, to the intent he should mislike his ordering, and that you might the better, when you saw time, use the king's highness for an instrument to this purpose, to the danger of his royal person, and subversion of the state of the realm. 11. That you promised the marriage of the king's majesty at your will and pleasure. 12. That you have laboured, and gone about to combine and confederate yourself with some persons; and especially moved those noblemen whom you thought not to be contented, to depart into their countries, and make themselves strong; and otherwise, to allure them to serve your purpose by gentle promises and offers, to have a party and faction in readiness to all your purposes, to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and peril of the state of the realm. 13. That you have parted, as it were, in your imagination and intent, the realm, to set noblemen to countervail such other noblemen as you thought would lett your devilish purposes, and so laboured to be strong to all your devices; to the great danger of the king's majesty's person, and great peril of the state of the realm. 14. That you had advised certain men to entertain and win the favour and good-wills of the head yeomen and ringleaders of certain countries, to the intent that they might bring the multitude and commons, when you should think meet, to the furtherance of your purposes. 15. That you have not only studied and imagined how to have the rule of a number of men in your hands, but that you have attempted to get, also gotten, divers stewardships of noblemen's lands, and their mannores, to make your party stronger, for your purposes aforesaid: to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and great peril of the state of the realm. 16. That you have retained young gentlemen, and hired yeomen, to a great multitude, and far above such number as is permitted by the laws and statutes of the realm, or were otherwise necessary or convenient for your service, place, or estate, to the fortifying of yourself towards all your evil intents and purposes; to the great danger of the king's majesty, and peril of the state of the realm. 17. That you had so travailed in that matter, that you had made yourself able to make, of your own men, out of your lands and rulcs, and other your adherents, ten thousand men, besides your friends, to the advancement of all your intents and purposes; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and the great peril of the state of the realm. 18. That you had conferred, cast, and weighed so much money as would find the said ten thousand men for a month; and that you knew how and where to have the same sum; and that you had given warning to have and prepare the said mass of money in a readiness; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and great peril to the state of the realm. 19. That you have not only before you married the queen, attempted and gone about to marry the king's majesty's sister, the lady Elizabeth, second inheritor in remainder to the crown, but also being then lett by the Lord Protector, and others of the Council, since that time, both in the life of the queen, continued your old labour and love; and after her death, by secret and crafty means, practised to achieve the said purpose of marrying the said lady Elizabeth; to the danger of the king's majesty's person, and peril of the state of the same. 20. That you married the late queen so soon after the late king's death, that if she had conceived straight after, it should have been a great doubt whether the child born should have been accounted the late king's or yours; whereupon a marvellous danger and peril might, and was like to have ensued to the king's majesty's succession and quiet of the realm. 21. That you first married the queen privately, and did dissemble and keep close the same; insomuch, that a good space after you had married her, you made labour to the king's majesty, and obtained a letter of his majesty's hand, to move and require the said queen to marry with you; and likewise procured the Lord Protector to speak to the queen to bear you her favour towards marriage: by which colouring, not only your evil and dissembling nature may be known, but also it is to be feared, that at this present you did intend to use the same practice in the marriage of the lady Elizabeth's grace. 22. That you not only, so much as lay in you, did stop and lett all such things as, either by parliament or otherwise, should tend to the advancement of the king's majesty's affairs, but did withdraw yourself from the king's majesty's service; and being moved and spoken unto, for your own honour, and for the ability that was in you, to serve and aid the king's majesty's affairs, and the Lord Protector's, you would always draw back, and feign excuses, and declare plainly that you would not do it—Wherefore, upon the discourse of all these foresaid things, and of divers others, it must needs be intended, that all these preparations of men and money, the attempts and secret practices of the said marriage; the abusing and persuading of the king's majesty to mislike the government, state, and order of the realm that now is, and to take the government into his own hands, and to credit you; was to none other end and purpose, but after a title gotten to the crown, and your party made strong both by sea and land, with furniture of men and money sufficient to have aspired to the dignity royal, by some heinous enterprize against the king's majesty's person; to the subversion of the whole state of the realm. 23. That you not only had gotten into your hands the strong and dangerous isles of Scilly, bought of divers men; but that so much as lay in your power, you travailed also to have Lunday, and under pretence to have victualled the ships therewith, not only went about, but also moved the Lord Protector, and whole council, that you might, by publick authority, have that, which by private fraud and falshood, and confederating with Sharrington, you had gotten: that is, the Mint at Bristol, to be yours wholly, and only to serve your purposes, casting, as may appear, that if these traiturous purposes had no good success, yet you might thither convey a good mass of money; where being aided with ships, and conspiring at all evil events with pirates, you might at all times have a sure and safe refuge, if any thing for your demerits should have been attempted against you. 24. That having knowledge that sir Wm. Sharrington, kt. had committed Treason, and otherwise wonderfully defrauded and deceived the king's majesty, nevertheless, you both by yourself, and by seeking counsel for him, and by all means you could, did aid, assist, and bear him, contrary to your allegiance and duty to the king's majesty, and the good laws and orders of the realm. 25. That where you owed to sir Wm. Sharrington, kt. a great sum of money, yet to abet, bear, and cloak the great falshood of the said Sharrington, and to defraud the king's majesty, you were not afraid to say and affirm, before the Lord Protector and the Council, that the same Sharrington did owe unto you a great sum of money, viz. 2800*l.* and to conspire with him in that falshood, and take a bill of that feigned debt into your custody. 26. That you by yourself and ministers, have not only extorted and bribed great sums of money of all such ships as should go into Island, but also as should go any other where in merchandise, contrary to the liberty of this realm, and to the great discouragement and destruction of the navy of the same, to the great danger of the king's majesty, and the state of the realm. 27. That where divers merchants, as well strangers as Englishmen, have had their goods piratously robbed and taken, you have had their goods in your hands and custody, daily seen in your house, and distributed among your servants and friends, without any restitution to the parties so injured and spoiled; so that thereby foreign princes have in a manner been weary of the king's majesty's amity, and by their ambassadors divers times complained; to the great slander of the king's majesty, and danger of the state of the realm. 28. That where certain men have taken certain pirates, you have not only taken from the takers of the said pirates, all the goods and ships so taken, without any reward, but have cast the said takers, for their good service done to the king's majesty, into prison, and there detained them a great time; some eight weeks, some more, some less, to the discouraging of such as truly should serve the king's majesty against his pirates and enemies. 29. That divers of the head pirates being brought unto you, you have let the same pirates go free unto the seas, and taken away from the takers of them, not only all their commodity and profit, but from the true owners of the ships and goods, all such as ever came into the pirates hands, as though you were authorized to be the chief pirate, and to have had all the advantages they could bring unto you. 30. That where order hath been taken, by the Lord Protector and the whole Council, that certain goods, piratically taken upon the seas, and otherwise known not to be wreck nor forfeited, should be restored to the true owners, and letters thereupon written by the Lord Protector and the Council; to the which letters, you yourself, among the other, did set to your hand: yet you, this notwithstanding, have given commandment to your officers, that no such letters should be obeyed; and written your private letters to the contrary, commanding the said goods not to be restored, but kept to your own use and profit, contrary to your own hand before in the council-chamber written; and contrary to your duty and allegiance, and to the perilous example of others, and great slander and danger of the realm. 31. That where certain strangers, which were friends and allies to the king's majesty, had their ships, with wind and weather broken, and yet came unwrecked to the shore; when the Lord Protector and the Council had written for the restitution of the said goods, and to the country to aid and save so much of the goods as might, you yourself subscribing and consenting thereto: yet this notwithstanding, you have not only given contrary commandment to your officers, but as a pirate have written letters to some of your friends to help, that as much of these goods as they could, should be conveyed away secretly by night farther off, upon hope that if the said goods were assured, the owners would make no further labour for them, and then you might have enjoyed them, contrary to justice and your honour, and to the great slander of this realm. 32. That you have not only disclosed the king's majesty's secret council, but also where you yourself, among the rest, have consented and agreed to certain things for the advancement of the king's affairs, you have spoken and laboured against the same. 33. That your deputy steward, and other your ministers of the Holt, in the county of Denbigh, have now, against Christmas last past, at the said Holt, made such provision of wheat, malt, beefs, and other such things as be necessary for the sustenance of a great number of men; making also, by all the means possible, a great mass of money; insomuch, that all the country doth greatly marvel at it, and the more, because your servants have spread rumours abroad, that the king's majesty was dead; whereupon the country is in a great maze, doubt and expectation, looking for some broil, and would have been more, if at this present, by your apprehension, it had not been staid.

These Articles (as entered in the Council-Books) were so manifestly proved, not only by witnesses, but by letters under his own hand, that it did not seem possible to deny them; yet he had been sent to and examined by some of the Council, but refused to make a direct Answer to them, or to sign those Answers that he had made. So it was ordered, that the next day, all the privy council, except the abb. of Canterbury, and sir John Baker, Speaker of the House of Commons, who was engaged to attend in the house, should go to the Tower, and examine him. On the 23d the lord chancellor, with the other counsellors, went to him, and read the Articles of his Charge, and earnestly desired him to make plain Answers to them, excusing himself where he could, and submitting himself in other things; and that he would shew no obstinacy of mind. He answered them, 'That he expected an open Trial, and his accusers to be brought face to face. All the counsellors endeavoured to persuade him to be more tractable, but to no purpose. At last the lord chancellor required him, on his allegiance, to make his Answer. He desired they would leave the Articles with him, and he would consider of them, otherwise he would make no answer to them. But the counsellors resolved not to leave them with him on those terms. (f) On the 24th of Feb. it was resolved in council, That the whole board should after dinner acquaint the king with the state of that affair, and desire to know of him whether he would have the law to take place? and since the thing had been before the parliament, whether he would leave it to their determination? When the counsellors waited on him, the lord chancellor opened the matter to the king, and delivered his opinion for leaving it to the parliament; then every counsellor by himself spoke his mind all to the same purpose. Last of all the Protector spake. He protested this was a most sorrowful business of him, that he had used all the means in his power to keep it from coming to this extremity. But were it son or brother, he must prefer his majesty's safety to them, for he weighed his allegiance more than his blood; and that therefore he was not against the request that the other lords had made, and said, if he himself

(f) It is strange that as the particulars of his Charge were manifestly proved, if any credit is to be given to the Council Book, not only by witnesses, but by Letters under his own hand, they should refuse however to try him according to the laws of the land, and to bring his accusers face to face; and yet he was a peer of the realm, lord high admiral of England, and uncle to the king. At last, finding he could not obtain this favour, or rather justice, he desired the Articles of his accusation might be left with him, and said he would answer to them when he had examined them; but even this was denied him: I don't know whether it was lawful then to leave with the party accused the Articles of his charge, and to allow him time to examine them: but as for the bringing his accusers face to face, it is evident that could not be denied him without injustice, though this pernicious custom had been introduced in the late reign." 8 Rapin, 50.

were guilty of such offences, he should not think he were worthy of life, and the rather, because he was of all men the most bound to his majesty; and therefore he could not refuse justice. (g) The king answered them in these words: "We perceive that there are great things objected and laid to my Lord Admiral my uncle, and they tend to Treason: and we perceive that you require but justice to be done. We think it reasonable, and we will, that you proceed according to your request." However, the lords resolved that some of both houses should be sent to the Admiral before the Bill should be put in against him, to see what he could or would say; so my lord chancellor, the earl of Shrewsbury, Warwick, and Southampton, and sir John Baker, sir Tho. Cheney, and sir Anthony Denny, were sent to him. He was long obstinate, but after much persuasion was brought to give an Answer to the first three Articles, viz.

The Lord Admiral's Answer to three of the Articles.

"To the first, he saith that about Easter-Tide was twelvemonths, he said to Fowler, as he supposeth it was, that if he might have the king in his custody, as Mr. Page had, he would be glad; and that he thought a man might bring him through the gallery to his chamber, and so to his house: but this he said he spoke merrily, meaning no hurt. And that in the mean time after he heard, and upon that, sought out certain precedents, that there was in England at one time, one Protector, and another regent of France, and the duke of Exeter, and the bishop of Winchester, governors of the king's person: upon that, he had thought to have made suit to the Parliament house for that purpose, and he had the names of all the lords, and totted them whom he thought he might have to his purpose to labour. But afterwards communing with Mr. Comptrolleur Ely-piace, being put in remembrance by him of his assenting and agreeing with his own hand, that the Lord Protector should be governour of the king's person, he was ashamed of his doings, and left off that suit and labour.—To the second, he saith he gave money to two or three of them which were about the king. To Mr. Cheek, he saith, he gave at Christmas-Tide was twelvemonths, when the queen was at Enfield, 40*l.* whercof to himself 20*l.* the other for the king, to bestow where it pleased his grace amongst his servants. Mr. Cheek was very loth to take it, howbeit he would needs press that upon him; and to him

(g) "It is a pretty hard task to justify the duke of Somerset for prosecuting his own brother to death, for crimes committed against his person only. But indeed it was never clearly proved, that he had formed any ill design either against the king or the state, as he protested to his last breath. But this is not the only time that plots against the Ministers have been reckoned High Treason." 8 Rapin, 52.

he gave no more, at no time, as he remembreth, since the king's majesty was crowned. To the groons of the chamber he hath at New-Year's-Tides given money, he doth not well remember what. To Fowler, he saith, he gave money for the king, since the beginning of this parliament now last at London, 20*l.* And divers times, he saith, the king hath sent to him for money, and he hath sent it. And what time Mr. Latimer preached before the king, the king sent to him to know what he should give Mr. Latimer; and he sent to him by Fowler, 40*l.* with this word, that 20*l.* was a good reward for Mr. Latimer, and the other he might bestow amongst his servants. Whether he hath given Fowler any money for himself, he doth not remember.—To the third, he saith, it is true, he drew such a Bill indeed himself, and proffered it to the king, or else to Mr. Cheek, he cannot well tell; and before that he saith, he caused the king to be moved by Mr. Fowler, whether he could be contented that he should have the governance of him as Mr. Stanhope had. He knoweth not what answer he had: but upon that he drew the said bill to that effect, that his majesty was content; but what answer he had to the bill, he cannot tell: Mr. Cheek can tell."

Then he on a sudden stopt short, and bade them be content, for he would go no further, and no intreaties would work on him, either to answer the rest, or to set his hands to the Answers he had made. On Feb. the 25th was read in the house of lords the first time, the Bill for Attainder of the Lord Admiral: Feb. 26, read the second time: Feb. 27, read the third time; and concluded with the common assent of all the peers. (c) The same day,

(h) Burnet says, "The peers had been so accustomed to agree to such bills in king Henry's time, that they did easily pass it. All the judges and the king's council delivered their opinions, That the Articles were Treason. Then the Evidence was brought: many lords gave it so fully, that all the rest, with one voice, consented to the Bill; only the Protector, for natural pity's sake, as in the Council Book, desired leave to withdraw. On the 27th, the Bill was sent down to the commons, with a message, That if they desired to proceed as the lords had done, those lords that had given their Evidence in their own house, should come down and declare it to the commons. But there was more opposition made in the house of commons. Many argued against Attainders in absence, and thought it an odd way that some peers should rise in their places in their own house, and relate somewhat to the slander of another, and that he should be thereupon attained: therefore it was pressed, that it might be done by a Trial, and that the Admiral should be brought to the bar, and be heard plead for himself. But on the 4th of March a message was sent from the king, That he thought it was not necessary to send for the Admiral; and that the lords should come being Wednesday, the Bill was sent down to the commons; when it was thought good by them to send down certain members of their house, to declare unto the commons the manner after which the lords had proceeded in that matter; and further to declare unto them, that in case they were minded to proceed in like sort, certain noblemen who had given evidence against the said Lord Admiral, should be sent unto them, to declare by mouth and presence such matters, as by their writing should in the mean time appear unto them. The Master of the Rolls, sir James Hales, and serjeant Molineux, were the persons sent by the lords. March the 2d, they were sent again to the lower house, with the like commission in effect, as they were sent the Wednesday before. Answer was made, That they would consult together, and thereupon they would with speed send up their Resolution. But no haste having been made therein by them of the nether house, the lords having sat so long, as it was thought the time now far spent, they concluded to depart; desiring the Lord Protector, that it would please him to receive such Answer as should be sent touching that purpose, and to make report thereof at their next assembly, which should be the next Monday. March the 5th, the Bill was brought from the commons for the Attainder of the lord Sudley. Thus it is related in the Journal of the House of Lords.

By the Journal of the House of Commons it appears, that this Bill was read there the last day of Feb. the first time; March the 1st read again; and March 2d the Master of the Rolls, serjeant Molineux, serjeant Hales, and the king's solicitor, were sent from the lords to know the pleasure of this house, if it should be resolved there, to pass upon the attainder of the Admiral in such order as it passed in the higher house? Whereupon it was ordered, that advertisement thereof be sent to the lords by some of that house: That it was resolved, that the Evidence should be heard orderly, as it was before the lords: and also to require, that the lords who affirmed that evidence, might come hither and declare it in voce. And this to be delivered to the Lord Protector by Mr.

down and renew before them the Evidence they had given in their own house. This was done; and so the Bill was agreed to by the commons in a full house, judged about 400, and there were not above ten or twelve that voted in the negative." The Bishop, in the next page, says, "But the way of proceeding was much condemned, since to attain a man without bringing him to make his own defence, or to object what he could say to the Witnesses that were brought against him, was so illegal and unjust, that it could not be defended, only this was to be said for it, That it was a little more regular than Parliamentary Attainders had been formerly; for here the Evidence, upon which it was founded, was given before both houses." 2 Burnet's Reform. 99.

Speaker, and other the king's privy council of the house. March the 4th, the Master of the Rolls, &c. declared the king's pleasure to be, that the Admiral's presence was not necessary in this court; and therefore not to be there. And further declared, That if the house would require to have the lords to come and to satisfy the house for the evidence against the Admiral, the lords would come. Then it was ordered, That master comptroller, and others of the king's privy council, should hear the lords; and require, that if it were judged necessary to have the lords come down, that upon any further suit they might come down to the house. And the Bill for the attainder of High-Treason of sir Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley, was read the third time. Thus far the Journal of the House of Commons. On the 5th of March the royal assent was given to the Bill, which here followeth:

An Act for the Attainder of Sir Thomas Seymour, Knt. Lord Seymour of Sudley, High Admiral of England. Cap. xviii.

"In their most humble wise beseeching your most excellent majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled; That where sir Thomas Seymour, lord Seymour of Sudley, High-Admiral of England, not having God before his eyes, nor regarding the duty which by nature, benefits, and allegiance he ought to your highness, nor being content with his honourable state and condition, whereunto your majesty hath called and indued him with; but replenished and filled with the most dangerous, insatiable, and fearful vice of ambition, and greediness of rule, authority, and dominion, did in the first year of your most noble and victorious reign, determine and resolve with himself to take into his hands your most noble person, and the same either by violence, stealth, or other undue means, to have in his possession, with the order, rule, and government of your majesty's realms, dominions, and affairs, which were before that time, as well by your royal-assent, as by the consent and liberate advice of all your nobles and council, whereof he the said Lord-Admiral was one, otherwise ordered, decreed, and determined; by the means whereof, and by the most prudent foresight and direction of your grace's dearest uncle the duke of Somerset, governour of your majesty's most royal person, and protector of your highness's realms, dominions and subjects, being the said Admiral disappointed of his malicious enterprise. The same Admiral continuing nevertheless his great ambition, and most detestable, malicious, and traitorous purposes, thinking by tumult and violence openly to achieve that thing which by slight he could not secretly compass, travailed with your majesty, being yet for your tender years not able to conceive his falsehood, by crafty, subtle, and traitorous means and persuasions, having also prepared about your grace, by corruption, sundry persons to be instruments to help forward all his naughty, traitorous purposes, to have caused your grace at his contemplation, to have written a Bill or Letter of your majesty's own hand, to your high-courte of parliament, desiring the same thereby to be good unto the said lord Seymour, in such suits and matters as he should open and declare unto them; which Bill or Letter the said Lord Admiral thought and determined not only in his own person to have brought into the nether house of your said court of parliament, but also to have likewise opened the same in the higher house, having in both the same houses laboured, stirred, and moved a number of persons to take part and join with him in such things as he would set forth and enterprise, whereby he thought to breed such a tumult, uproar, and sedition, as well in the said court, as in the whole realm, as by the troubling of the whole state and body of this your realm, he might the more easily and easily bring to pass his most fearful, devilish, and naughty purpose: for the more sure and certain compassing whereof, like as he feared not to say to certain noblemen and others, that he would make the blackest parliament that ever was seen here in England, so most traitorously, for the further accomplishment of his lewd enterprise, he retained a great number of men, and prepared a great furniture of weapons and habiliments of war, ready for the execution of the said traitorous attempts. And to colour and cloak his said mischievous purposes, did, by all such ways and means as he could possibly devise and imagine, practice, as it were, for his entry towards the same, to seek and attain the government of your most noble person, and thereby to have gotten into his hands the order of your realms and dominions, whereunto he aspired in such sort, as he did even then travail expressly with the most part of your highnesses most honourable council to help him to the said government, doing likewise all he could in the parliament by himself, his servants and ministers, not only to hinder and lett all things there proponed, which touched the honour, surety, and benefit of your majesty and the realm; but also spreading abroad slanders touching your majesty's person, your dearest uncle the said Lord Protector, and the whole state of your council, over-vile, dangerous, and unmeet to be here recited: Which things being by the goodness of God revealed, as your said uncle the Lord Protector could not chuse but heartily lament the said lord admiral's evil, malicious, and corrupt disposition, chiefly in respect of the apparent and irrecuperable danger which was like, by the same, presently to have ensued to your majesty, and to your realms and dominions; and secondly, for that he was by proximity of blood so nearly joined unto him. So hoping that by good advertisements and counsels, he might yet recover and save him, and by the grace of God cause him to cast away his naughty, vile and ambitious disposition, and to have had a better consideration hereafter to his duty, both to God and unto your majesty, whereunto he was most bounden; the said

Lord Protector laboured with the whole council and otherwise, to reconcile and reform him, which presently must else have perished in his folly and outrage. And albeit, the said Lord Protector had then perfect knowledge of the attempts and misbehaviours of the said admiral before rehearsed; and that the said admiral had then said, that he would not come at the said Lord Protector and council, although they sent for him, and that he would not be committed to any ward for his doings by the best of them, whereby it appeared that he thought his party strong enough to resist your majesty's power and ordinary authority; yet the said Lord Protector, not ceasing with all clemency to follow his godly and charitable purpose, did not only use all the good means he could devise by the persuasions of certain of your grace's council, and otherwise to frame him to the amendment of his evils, and so to bring him to the better remembrance of his duty; but also considering, that if the matter should have grown to extremity, being so near, and so much bound to your majesty, being new come to your kingdom, your subjects not altogether left in the best concord for matters of religion, great slander, tumult, and danger might have ensued thereby as well here at home in your realm, as from some outward parts with whom you were in the war, and in some secret enmity ready to enter the wars, thought it, with the advice of your whole council, most meet and surest for your majesty to pass his evil-doings over in silence, and in somewhat the more in respect of the better stay, for the time of your present estate, to bridle him with your liberality, and therefore to give unto him lands to the yearly value of 800*l.*, trusting thereby, and by such other good means as were used towards him, to encourage and move him to leave for ever that ambition, and seditious mind, and to live in such order as might have pleased God, and served your majesty, and your publick weal. But all this notwithstanding, the devil, who had before planted that vile and evil weed so deeply in his heart, that the root of the same could not be clearly pulled out, but caused his ambition eff-soons to spring, and shew itself more rankly than it had done before: For it plainly appeareth, that he tarried not long in his dissembled good mood and promise, but began afresh to imagine, compass and devise, for the satisfying of his traitorous desire, to make a party, faction, and confederation, whereof he would be the head, and did not only get as many rules and offices into his hands of all men, as he could possibly attain, and retained many gentlemen and yeomen into his service, making a full account and reckoning, which he declared secretly to some of his familiars, that he was thereby able, of his own ruled tenants and servants, to make ten thousand men for the obtaining of his said purpose; for whose wages he had also devised after 10,000*l.* by the month, out of your majesty's mint at Bristol, which he had obtained, with all your trea sure in the same, by the means and consent of sir W. Sharrington, knt., vice-treasurer there, to be at his commandment, which sir William now standeth attainted of Treason; and also had put your grace's castle of the Holt, whereof he had the keeping, even now of late in a readiness, and there caused to be prepared a great furniture of wheat, malt, beefs, and a great mass of money, for the feeding and entertainment of a number of men: which money he caused to be levied and taxed half the year before the same was due; buying also for the better achieving of his purpose, and to amaze therewith the more the people, that your majesty (whom God long preserve to us) should be dead; but also he laboured sundry of your nobles, and other your grace's subjects, to join with him, devising with divers of them, how and by what policy, ways, and means they should make themselves strong in their countries for that purpose, and how they should win unto them the head yeomen, and ring-leaders of the common people; declaring how he meant to have matched, and set one nobleman against another nobleman, as he thought he could never compass and win to assent to this faction and false conspiracy, promising to divers of them sundry benefits; yea, taking so much upon him, for the accomplishment of his said traitorous intent and purpose, as he spared not to promise your most excellent person in marriage to a nobleman's daughter of this your realm. And yet not contented herewith, for the further advancement of his most naughty and traitorous purpose, did traitorously and unnaturally practise even with your highness's own person, to make your most excellent majesty (for your tender years unable to understand his false and traitorous purposes) an instrument towards the undoing and destruction of your highness, and the subversion of the whole state of this your grace's realm: pursuing your majesty, as much as in him did lie, not only to take upon you, now in your young and tender age, the rule and order of yourself, intending and meaning by the colour thereof, to take in his hands your most royal person, the rules and orders of all the affairs of your realms and dominions; being already by the said Lord Protector, with the advice of your grace's most honourable council, as well prudently and politically governed, as valiantly and nobly defended against our outward enemies, to the increase of your immortal fame and honour; but also to receive and engender an hatred in your most noble heart, both against your dearest uncle the said Lord Protector, and all your true and faithful councillors: To the which his devilish persuasions and assaults, God gave your highness, even at this age, to the great rejoice of all us your faithful subjects and servants, a special grace to resist, above common reason and all expectation, and most graciously, without any advice or counsel, to refuse and deny his evil advertisements and persuasions. And further, the said Admiral did most falsely and traitorously corrupt sundry of your highness's privy-chamber with many gifts, and otherwise, to the intent they should move and procure your majesty to write sundry letters at his or their devices, and to put into your grace's head a special and singular favour, affection, and trust towards him, and a disposition to follow whatsoever he would have wrought towards all others, that he might the rather have compassed his most traitorous purpose, which must needs have tended to your majesty's destruction (which God forbid), and to the utter ruin of all us, your highness's most loving, faithful, and obedient subjects. For most gracious sovereign lord, besides all this, it is most evident and apparent, that as immediately after the king your father's death, of most noble memory, he bare a special love and favour to your grace's sister the lady Elizabeth, second person in the remainder of the state of succession to the crown of this realm after your majesty, and the heirs of your body, whom the living God long preserve unto us, with the increase of much fruit; and would then of his great presumption and traitorous determination have married her, if he could by any means have brought to pass the same, but that he was stayed by the said Lord Protector, and other of your grace's Council; so he did not only continue in his said determination towards her, in the queen his late wife's time, but also by divers secret and crafty means and practices, continually sought by achieving of the same since the queen's death, as by sundry ways is confessed, and appeareth. Inasmuch as the same being perceived by your said dearest uncle, and some others beside of your Council, and other personages of reputation; and the said Admiral by them earnestly advised to beware of it, and to forbear his pretended purpose, specially for that it could not be but dangerous to your grace's person, he hath not been afraid to defend his naughty doings and purposes in it, and to ask why he should not continue his suit towards the said lady Elizabeth? with sundry other words declaring his full intent and determinations to it; and neglecting all good advices, reasons, and admonitions made, given or alleged, contrary to his purpose, he hath secretly and earnestly followed it, in such sort, as if sundry other his mischievous devices and practices had not appeared, and come to knowledge, it is evident that he would have done what he could secretly to have married her, as he did the late queen, whom it may appear he married first, and after sued to your majesty, and the Lord Protector, and your Council, for his preferment to it: whom nevertheless it hath been credibly declared, he holped to her end to haste forwards his other purpose. But what this marriage of your said sister, with his prepared forces and confederacies should mean, and what the getting of the rule and order of your majesty's mint at Bristol into his hands with ten thousand men, which besides all his friends, and divers retainers, he accounted himself furnished of, and able to make all times within his own rules, and of his own servants and tenants, should tend unto, for the wages and entertainments of whom he had prepared, as is aforesaid, considering that the said Admiral at all times, when occasion of the service of your majesty was necessary or requisite, went always back, and refused to take it upon him, whether it were by sea or land, as your grace's Council both know, and divers times have lamented, and in that case travelled with him (in vain) to bring him unto it, whereby no good mind or will of him toward your majesty's safety or assurance can appear. And upon all these sinister ways and means, what his corrupt and subtil attempts of getting your most noble person into his hands, by colour whereof he might have wrought what he would, and whatsoever his ambitious intent could have devised, with his preparation of victuals and money, and other his said doings at your grace's castle of the Holt, and in the parts thereabouts, would have wrought in the end, especially in this tender age of your highness, and whilst your majesty is in the government of a Protector, it is fearful to consider and think upon, and cannot otherwise be taken, but to be indeed more than a manifest declaration of a traitorous aspiring to your crown of this realm, and to be king of the same, and an open deed and act, and a false and traitorous compass and imagination to depose and deprive your majesty from your royal estate and title of your realms, and to compass and imagine the death of your most noble person, and most traitorously to take away and destroy all things which should have sounded to the lett and impediment of his most traitorous and ambitious enterprize.—And further, gracious sovereign lord, to declare the traitorous disposition of his nature, and how little he cared to offend your grace's law, and how he did yet less regard his truth and duty towards your grace, where sir Wm. Sharrington, knight, late of London, the tenth day of July, in the first year of your grace's reign, hath in the county and city of Bristol, falsely and traitorously forged and counterfeited certain of your grace's coin, and further imbezelled and purloined from your majesty, untruly and falsely at the least, the sum of 40,000*l.*; for part whereof the same sir W. Sharrington upon his own confession is attainted of treason according to your grace's laws; to which said traitorous acts the said Lord Admiral did not only abet and procure the said sir W. Sharrington, labouring him he should get as much money from time to time into his hands for his purpose as he could, so that he might ever have a good mass in a readiness; but also since the time of the said treasons and traitorous acts, so done by the said sir W. Sharrington, the said Lord Admiral having perfect knowledge thereof, as well by the declaration of the most part of your highness's Council, as by some of his own counsel learned, hath traitorously comforted, aided, assisted, and maintained the same sir W. Sharrington in his said traitorous acts and faults against your grace's law and statutes of this realm; taking the patent, indentures, books and reckonings of the same sir W. Sharrington, of his own authority, into his custody, and affirming both to sundry of your grace's council, and to divers of your subjects, that the said Sharrington had wrong to be committed; devising all the ways he could possible, contrary to his duty and allegiance, traitorously to bear him in his evil and traitorous doings, and to deliver him, if he by any means might have come by him.—And for a further proof to induce, that the said Admiral did maintain and comfort the same Sharrington, where the said Admiral owed to the said Sharrington 2,800*l.* the said Sharrington upon a mistrust which he had before his apprehension, that he should for his fault and proceedings come one day to his trial and examination, communicating the same with the said Lord Admiral, and the said Admiral agreed and promised not only to aid and maintain and bear him to the uttermost of his power, as indeed he did both as is aforesaid, and in consulting with learned men for him, and otherwise, but also for his more assured aid, being indebted to the said Sharrington the sum of 2,800*l.* untruly conspired with the said Sharrington upon a bill, whereby it appeared that the said Sharrington should owe unto him the sum of 2,000*l.* with interest, so as the said Admiral might help and relieve him with that 2,000*l.* with the interest at your majesty's hand, as a debt unto himself; and also with 2,800*l.* which the said Admiral owed indeed to the said Sharrington, amounting in the whole to 5,600*l.* which bill most untruly, and to the maintenance and favour of the said Sharrington, the said Lord Admiral affirmed before the said Lord Protector, and your highness's Council, to be a true bill, and the same 2,800*l.* with the interest, to be his just debt, and so was taken, until the said Sharrington himself confessed and affirmed the truth, whereby the covin and falshood plainly appeared to the contrary.—Finally, most gracious sovereign lord, it were too much and over tedious to molest and trouble your excellent majesty, either with the remembrance of his evil doings in his office of the Admiralty, wherein he hath so manifestly recited, maintained, aided and comforted sundry pirates, and taken to his own use the goods piratiously taken against your laws, and expressly against the orders determined by the Lord Protector and the whole Council, whereunto his own hand hath been for the restitution of them; whereby he hath moved almost all princes Christian to conceive a grudge and displeasure, and by open wars to seek remedies at their own hands, to the great trouble and danger of your majesty, your realms and dominions, and to the great charge, loss and disquiet of your most loving and faithful subjects, and to the peril of breaking of the leagues and treaties of amity betwixt your majesty and other foreign princes, as their ambassadors here have plainly declared, and as present experience teacheth; or to express his innumerable untruths, falshoods, and deceitful practices, discovering and opening of your majesty's counsels, refusal to serve your highness as he hath been commanded, oppression and manifest extortion of your majesty's subjects, using Island and other voyages by the sea; and his determination of revenge towards all men with whom he was offended, which his own letters and other testimonies do declare against him; with a full resolution to have put the whole of his intent shortly in experience and execution (if God had not prevented it), to the destruction of your most royal person, and the subversion and alteration of the whole estate of your realms and dominions. Wherefore considering as well that he is a member so unnatural, unkind and corrupt, and such a heinous offender of your majesty and your laws, as he cannot, nor may conveniently be suffered to remain in the body of your grace's commonwealth, but to the extrem danger of your highness, being head, and of all the good members of the same; and is too pernicious and dangerous an example, that such a person so much bound and so forgetful of it, so mercifully heretofore intreated, and by sundry and great benefits allured and called, and so cruelly and ingratly continuing in his false and traitorous intents and purposes against your highness, and the whole estate of your realm, should remain amongst us:—' It may therefore please your excellent majesty, that it may be enacted with your highness's assent, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, That the said sir Thomas Seymour, knt. lord Seymour of Sudley, High Admiral of England, for the said traitorous offences and deeds, shall be by the authority of this present parliament adjudged and attainted of treason: and that the same sir Thomas Seymour, knt. lord Seymour of Sudley, High Admiral of England, shall have, suffer, and sustain such pains of death, as in cases of High Treason have been used and accustomed. And also, that the said lord Seymour of Sudley shall forfeit and lose to your majesty, and your heirs, all such castles, manors, lands, tenements, leases, meadows, pastures, woods, waters, rents, reversions, services, offices, fees, annuities, and all other hereditaments, goods, chattels and debts whatsoever, the same lord Seymour had, enjoyed, or was seized or possessed of at the seventeenth day of January, in the second year of your grace's reign, or at any time since.—And that all such castles, manors, lands, tenements, meadows, leases, pastures, woods, waters, rents, reversions, services, offices, fees, annuities, and other hereditaments, to be by authority of this present act adjudged, vested, and deemed in the actual and real possession of your highness, from the said 17th of January, without any office or inquisition to be thereof had or found. Saving to all and every person and persons, and bodies politick and corporate, and to their heirs, assigns, and successors, and to every of them (other than the said lord Seymour of Sudley, and his heirs) all such rights, titles, interests, uses, possessions, reversions, remainders, entries, conditions, leases, fees, offices, rents-services, rents-charges, rents-seck, annuities, commons, and all other commodities, profits, and hereditaments whatsoever, they or any of them had, might, or ought to have had, if this present act had never been had or made.—Furthermore, the king's majesty is pleased that it be enacted, That all person and persons, bodies politick and corporate, and their executors and administrators, shall be well and truly contented and paid, upon their humble suit and petition hereafter to be made unto his highness of all such debts, which either by specialty, or by any other just and true contract, the said Lord Admiral did owe to them, or any of them, at any time before the said 17th day of January, in the said second year of his majesty's reign (a).'

On the 10th of March, the Council resolved to press the king that justice might be done on the Admiral: and since the case was so heavy and lamentable to the Protector (b), (so it is in the Council-Book) though it was also sorrowful to them all, they resolved to proceed in it, so that neither the king, nor he, should be further troubled with it; after dinner they went to the king, the Protector being with them: the king said he had well observed their proceeding, and thanked them for their great care of his safety, and commanded them to proceed in it without further molesting him or the Protector; and ended, 'I pray you, my lords, do so.' Upon this they ordered the bishop of Ely to go to the Admiral, and to instruct him in the things that related to another life, and to prepare him to take patiently his execution; and on the 17th of March, he having made report to them of his attendance on the Admiral, the Council signed a Warrant for his execution, viz.

From whence we may infer, that the prosecution was but too pleasing to him: since he might have been well excused from such an attendance on the fate of so near a relation, as well as signing a warrant for his execution. On the 20th of March, the Admiral was beheaded; but it was amply returned upon the Protector in a short space after; and, as Grafton observes, 'the fall of one brother proved the overthrow of the other.'" 1 Cobb. heard the report of the bishop of Ely, who by the said lords, and others of the council, was sent to instruct and comfort the Lord Admiral; after the hearing whereof, consulting and deliberating with themselves of the time most convenient for the execution of the said Lord Admiral, now attained and condemned by the parliament, they did condescend and agree. That the said Lord Admiral should be executed the Wednesday next following, betwixt the hours of nine and twelve in the forenoon the same day, upon Tower-Hill: his body and head to be buried within the Tower; the king's writ (as in such cases as heretofore hath been accustomed) being first directed and sent forth for that purpose and effect. Whereupon calling to the council-chamber the bishop of Ely, they willed him to declare this their determination to the said Lord Admiral; and to instruct and teach him, the best he could, to the quiet and patient suffering of justice, and to prepare himself to Almighty God. The said bishop, after he had been with the Lord Admiral, repairing again to the court, made report to Mr. Comptroller and Secretary Smith of the Lord Admiral's requests, (c) the which were, that he required Mr. Latimer to come to him, the day of execution to be deferred, certain of his servants to be with him, his daughter to be with my lady duchess of Suffolk to be brought up, and such like. Touching which requests, the said lords and the rest of the council declared their minds to Mr. Secretary Smith, willing him to write their answer in a Letter to the lieutenant of the Tower, who should shew in all those requests their resolute answer to the said Lord Admiral: which was done accordingly.

On the 20th of March he was brought to the scaffold.

"I knowe more of my Lord Admiral's death sith that tyme, then I did knowe before. O saye they, the man dyed very boldly, he woulde not have done so, hadde he not bene in a just quarell. This is no good argument, my frendes. A man semeth not to feare death, therefore hys cause is good. Thys is a deceivable argumente. He went to hys death boldly: ergo, he standeth in a just quarell.—If I should have saied al that I knewe, your cars woulde have yrked to have hearde it, and nowe God hathe brought more to lyghte. And as touchyng the kynde of hys death, whether he be saved or no, I referre that to God onely. What God can do, I can not tell. I wyl not denye but that he maye in the twynkeling of an eye save a man, and turne hys harte. What he dyd, I cannot tell. And when a man hathe two strokes wyth an axe, whoo can tel that betwene two strokes he doth repent. It is very hard to judge; well, I wyl not go so nye to worke, but thus I wyl say, if they aske me what I thinke of hys deathe, that he dyed very dangerously, yrkesomelye, horriblye.—The man beyng in the Tower, wrote certayne papers, whiche I sawe my selfe. Thei were two lyttle ones, one to my ladye Marye's grace, and another to my ladye Elizabeth's grace, tendyng to thys ende, that they shoulde conspyre agaynst my Lord Protectour's grace.—Surely so seditiously as could be. Nowe what a kind of Death was thys, that when he was readye to laye his head upon the blocke, he turnes me to the Levetenantes servaunte and sayeth, 'byd my servaunte spede the thyng that he wottes of:' wel, the worde was over-heard. Hys servaunt confessed these two Papers, and they were found in a shooe of hys. They were so sown between the soules of a velved shooe. He made hys ynke so craftely, and wyth such workmanship, as the lyke hath not bene sene.—I was prisoner in the Touer miselfe, and I coulde never invente to make ynke so. It is a wonder to hear of his subtilitie. He made hys pen of the aglet of a poynte that he plucked from hys hose, and thus wrote these Letters soo seditiouslye, as ye have hearde, enforсынge many matters agaynst my Lord Protectour's grace, and so fourth. God had left him to hymselfe, he hadde cleane forsaken hym. What woulde he have done if he had lived styll? that went about thys geare, when he layed hys head on the blocke at the ende of hys lyfe. Charity (they saye) worketh but godly, not after thys sorte. Well, he is gone, he knoweth hys fate by thys, he is eyther in joy or in payne. There is no repentance after thys lyfe, but if he dye in the state of damnacion, he shall ryse in the same. Yea, thoughte he have a whole monkyerye to synge for hym, he shall have hys fynal sentence when he dyeth.—And that servant of hys that confesseth and uttered hys gere, was an honest manne. He dyed honestlye in it. God put it in his herte. And as for the tother, whether he be saved or no, I leave it to God. But surelye, he was a wycked man, the realme is well rydde of hym.—It hath a treasure, that he is gone, he knoweth hys fare by thys. A terrible example surelye, and to be noted of every man; nowe before he shoulde dye, I heard say he had commendations to the kyng, and spake many wordes of his majesty. All is the kyng, the kyng. Yea, Bona verba. These were fayre wordes, 'the kyng, the kyng.' It hath been the cast of all traitours to pretend nothing against the kyng's person, they never pretend the matter to the kyng, but to other. Subjects maye not resyste anye magistrates, nor oughte to do nothinge contrarye to the kyng's lawes. And therefore these wordes, 'the kyng,' and so fourth, are of small effect. I have hearde muche wickednes of thys manne, and I have thought oft, Jesu, what wyl worth, what wyl be the ende of thys manne? Among others (that went to execution) I heard of a wanton woman, a naughtye lyster, a whore, a wayne bodye: and was ledde from Newgate to the place of execution, for a certain robbery that she had committed, and she hadde a wycked communication by the waye. This woman, I saye, as she went by the waye, had wanton and folysh talke, as thys: that yf good fellowes hadde kept touch wyth hyr, she hadde not been at thys time in that case; and amongate al other talke, she saied, that such a one, and named this manne, had hyr maidenhead fyrste; and herynge thys of hym at that tyme, I loked ever what woulde be hys ende, what woulde become of hym.—He was a manne the fardest frome the feare of God that ever I knewe or herade of in Englande. Fyrste he was author of all thys woman's whoredome. For if he had not had hyr maydenhead, she myghte have been maryed, and become an honeste womanne; whereas nowe beyng nought with hym, shee fell afterwarde by that occasion to other: and they that were nought wyth hyr fel to robbery, and she folowed; and thus was he author of all thys. This geare came bi sequels, peradventure thys maye seeme to be a lyghte matter, but surelye it is a great matter: and he, by unrepentance, fel frome evyl to worse, and from worse to worste of all, tyll at the length he was made a spectacle to all the worlde. I have heard saye, he was of the opinion that he believed not the immortalyte of the soule, that he was not ryghte in the matter. And it mighte well appear by the takynge of hys death.—But ye well say, What ye sclauder, ye breake charitye.—Nay, it is charitye that I do, we canne have no better use of hym nowe, than to warne others to beware by hym.—Christ saith, 'Remember Lotte's Wife!' she was a woman that would not be content with her good state, but wresteled wyth God's callinge; and she was for that cause turned into a salt stone, &c. Thus may thys man be an example to us. Let us all subjects judge well of our magistrates in suche matters, and be content wyth theyr doings, and loke not to be of the Counsaile.—And thus toke I occasion to speake of him, and to profit you thereby, and I beseech you so to take it, he may be a good warnynge to us, and this is the best use that wee can have of him now."

In his fifth Sermon he saith, "You will saye this, the parliament house are wiser than I am; you might leave them to the defence of themselves: although the men of the parliament house can defende themselves, yet have I spoken thys of a good zeale, and a good ground of the Admiralle's wrytinge: I have not sayned, nor lyed one jote. I will nowe leave the honourable counsaile to answer for themselves. He confessed one fact, he would have hadde the governaunce of the king's majesty, and wot ye whye? He sayed, he would not in his minoritie have him brought up lyke a warde. I am sure he hath been brought up so godly, with such schole-masters, as never king was in Englande, &c."

And in his seventh Sermon he saith thus: "I have heard say, when that good quene (meaning queen Catherine) that is gone, had ordained in her house dayly prayer both before none and after none, the Admyral gettes hym out of the waye, lyke a moule diggyng in the earth. He shal be Lotte's Wyfe to me as long as I lyve. He was a covetous man, an horrible covetous manne; I woulde there were no mo in England: he was an ambitious man; I woulde there were no mo in Englande: he was a sedicious man, a contemnar of Commaune Prayer, I woulde there were no mo in England: he is gone, I wolde he had lefte none behind him. Remember you, my lordes, that you pray in your houses, to the better mortificatione of your fleshe."

41. Proceedings in Parliament against EDWARD, Duke of SOMERSET, Lord Protector, for Misdemeanours and High Treason : 3 Edw. VI. A. D. 1550. [2 Burnett's Reform. 183. 2 Fox's Acts and Mon. 748. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 592.]

THE duke of Somerset having taken the part of the common people against the nobility in the business of Luclosures, made himself many enemies. He had also given great grounds of jealousy by entertaining foreign troops in the king's service; and the noble palace he was raising in the Strand out of the ruins of some bishops houses and churches, drew as publick an envy on him as any thing he had done: And his acting by his own authority, without asking the advice of the Council, and often against it, was assuming a regal power, and seemed not to be endured by those who thought they were in all points his equals. Thus, all September, there were great heats between the lords and him. The king was then at Hampton-court, where the Protector also was, with some of his retinue and servants about him, which increased the jealousies: for it was given out, he intended to carry away the king. On the 6th of Oct. some of the council met, and sent to the lord mayor and aldermen of London to obey no letters from the Protector, and wrote to the nobility to inform them how they were proceeding. The Protector hearing of these things, removed the king to Windsor in all haste, and armed such as he could gather for his preservation: whereupon several Letters passed between the Council at London, and those at Windsor (a): and at last a Proclamation was published against the Protector to the following effect:

"1. That the Protector, by his malicious and evil Government, was the occasion of all the sedition that of late happened within the realm. 2. The loss of the king's Pieces in France. 3. That he was ambitious and sought his own glory, as appeared by building of sumptuous and costly houses in the time of the king's wars. 4. That he esteemed nothing the grave counsel of the councillors. 5. That he sowed division between the nobles, the gentlemen, and the commons. 6. That the nobles assembled themselves together at London, for none other purpose but to have caused the Protector to have lived within limits, and to have put such order for the surety of the king's majesty as appertained: whatsoever the Protector's doings were, which they said were unnatural, ungrate, and traitorous. 7. That the Protector slandered the Council to the king, and did what in him lay to cause variance between the king and the nobles. 8. That he was a great Traitor (b), and therefore the lords desired the city and commons to aid them to take him from the king." This was signed by the lord Rich, lord chancellor; the lord St. John, president of the council; the marquis of Northampton; the earl of Warwick, great chamberlain; and most of the council. On the 12th of Oct. the whole council went to Windsor, and coming to the king, they protested, that all they had done was only out of zeal and affection to his person and service. The king received them very kindly, and thanked them for their care of him. On the 13th they sat in council, and sent for those who were ordered to be kept in their chambers, only Cecil (afterwards the famous lord Burleigh) was let go; and, in the end, the Lord Protector was commanded from the king's presence, and committed to ward in a Tower within the castle of Windsor, called Beauchamp Tower: and the next day, being the 14th, they brought from thence the Protector, and conveyed him to the Tower of London. Some time after, the lords resorted to the Tower, and there charged the Protector with the following Articles of Misdemeanour and High Treason (c).

ARTICLES objected to the Duke of Somerset.

"1. That he took upon him the office of Protector, upon express condition, that he should do nothing in the king's affairs, but by assent of the late king's executors, or the greatest part of them. 2. That contrary to this condition, he did hinder justice, and subvert laws of his own authority, as well by letters as by other command. 3. That he caused divers persons, arrested and imprisoned for treason, murder, man-slaughter, and felony, to be discharged, against the laws and statutes of the realm. 4. That he appointed lieutenants for armies, and other officers for the weighty affairs of the king, under his own writing and seal. 5. That he communed with ambassadors of other realms alone, of the weighty matters of the realm. 6. That he would taunt and reprove divers of the king's most honourable councillors, for declaring their Advice in the king's weighty affairs against his opinion; sometimes telling them, that they were not worthy a Traitor, within three days was called in again, with commandment given none of them to be sold. 2 Fox's Book of Martyrs. 1217.

(c) Fox, and Hayward (in his Life of king Edward VI.) both say the duke was in the Tower a small time before the lords laid the Articles to his charge: but Burnett and Rapin say, the duke was called before the Council on the 14th, and that the Articles of his Accusation were then read to him.

to sit in council; and sometimes, that he need not to open weighty matters to them; and that if they were not agreeable to his opinion, he would discharge them. 7. That against law he held a Court of Request, in his own house; and did enforce divers to answer there for their freehold and goods, and did determine of the same. 8. That being no officer, without the advice of the Council, or most part of them, he did dispose offices of the king's gift for money; grant leases and wards, and presentations of benefices pertaining to the king; gave bishopricks, and made sales of the king's lands. 9. That he commanded alchemy and multiplication to be practised, thereby to abase the king's coin. 10. That divers times he openly said, that the nobility and gentry were the only cause of death; whereupon the people rose to reform matters of themselves. 11. That against the mind of the whole Council, he caused proclamation to be made concerning Inclosures; whereupon the people made divers insurrections, and destroyed many of the king's subjects. 12. That he sent forth a Commission, with Articles annexed, concerning inclosures, commons, highways, cottages, and such like matters, giving the commissioners authority to hear and determine those causes, whereby the laws and statutes of the realm were subverted, and much rebellion raised. 13. That he suffered rebels to assemble and lie armed in camp, against the nobility and gentry of the realm, without speedy repressing of them. 14. That he did comfort and encourage divers rebels, by giving them money, and by promising them fees, rewards, and services. 15. That he caused a Proclamation to be made against law, and in favour of the rebels, that none of them should be vexed or sued by any for their offences in their rebellion. 16. That in time of rebellion, he said, that he liked well the actions of the rebels; and that the avarice of gentlemen gave occasion for the people to rise; and that it was better for them to die, than to perish for want. 17. That he said, the lords of the parliament were loth to reform inclosures and other things, therefore the people had a good cause to reform them themselves. 18. That after declaration of the defaults of Bulloign, and the pieces there, by such as did survey them, he would never amend the same. 19. That he would not suffer the king's pieces of Newhaven, and Blackness, to be furnished with men and provision; albeit he was advertised of the defaults, and advised thereto by the king's council; whereby the French king was emboldened to attempt upon them. 20. That he would neither give authority, nor suffer noblemen and gentlemen to suppress rebels in time convenient; but wrote to them to speak the rebels fair, and use them gently. 21. That upon the 5th of Oct. the present year, at Hampton-Court, for defence of his own private causes, he procured seditious Bills to be written in counterfeit hands, and secretly to be dispersed into divers parts of the realm; beginning thus: 'Good People;' intending thereby to raise the king's subjects to rebellion and open war. 22. That the king's privy council did consult at London to come to him, and move him to reform his government; but he hearing of their assembly, declared, by his letters in divers places, that they were lugh traitors to the king. 23. That he declared untruly; as well to the king as to the other young lords attending his person, that the lords at London intended to destroy the king; and desired the king never to forget, but to revenge it; and he desired the young lords to put the king in remembrance thereof; with intent to make sedition and discord between the king and his nobles. 24. That at divers times and places, he said, 'the lords of the council at London intended to kill me; but if I die, the king shall die: and if they famish me, they shall famish him.' 25. That of his own head he removed the king so suddenly from Hampton-Court to Windsor, without any provisions there made, that he was thereby not only in great fear, but cast thereby into a dangerous disease. 26. That by his Letters he caused the king's people to assemble in great numbers in armour, after the manner of war, to his aid and defence. 27. That he caused his servants and friends at Hampton-Court and Windsor, to be apparelled in the king's armour, when the king's servants and guards went unarmed. 28. That he caused at Windsor his own person in the night-time to be guarded in harness by many persons, leaving the king's majesty's person unguarded; and would not suffer his own guard and servants to be next the king's person, but appointed his servants and friends to keep the gates. (d) 29. That he intended to fly to Jersey or Wales, and laid post-horses and men, and a boat, to that purpose." (e)

After he had read and considered the above Articles he sent the underwritten Submission to the Lords:

Edward Duke of Somerset's first Submission.

"I Edward, duke of Somerset, have read and considered these saide 29 Articles before specified, and do acknowledge my said offences, faults, and crimes, doone and contained in the same, and most humble prostrate on my knees, do fullie and wholie submit myselfe to the most abundant mercy and clemencie of the king's majestie, for the moderation of my saide offences; having my full trust and confidence, that his majestie, with the advice of his highnesse most honourable counsaile, will consider mine offences, faultes, wordes and proceedings, that if anie of my saide offences be by his clemencie pardoned, remitted, or otherwise discharged, that I maie enjoye the benefite thereof, although the same become unknowne. And farther, I do most humbly beseech all my lordes, and other his majesties most honourable counsaile, not onlie to be meanes to his majestie, to take awaie and consider mine offences to have proceeded more of ignorance, negligence, follie, wilfulnes, and for lacke of good consideration, than of anie kanker or malicious hart, evil intent or thought, tending to anie treason to his majestie or realm: but that it may please his majestie, by the charitable advise of their good lordships, to have pity upon mee, my wife and children, and to take some mercifull waie with me, not according to the extremity of his lawes, but after his great goodness and clemencie, whereunto whatsoever it shall bee, I doe most humbly with all my hart submit my selfe. Written with mine owne hande the 23rd day of December (Burnet says the 13th) in the 3rd yere of our sovereigne lord king Edward the sixth."

(d) This Article is in Stowe's Chronicle, but omitted in Hayward's Life of Edw. 6, and Burnet's Reformation.

(e) "Upon these accusations, to which it was then no time to answer, he was sent to the Tower; those whom he had taken so much pains to humble being become his proper Judges. He could not deny that most of the facts laid to his charge were true. But the question was, Whether they were crimes? for he was accused neither of fraud nor of rapine, nor of extortion. But that was to be decided only by the peers of the realm, or by the parliament." 8 Rapin, 72.

However, on the 2nd of January, a Bill was put in against the duke of Somerset of the Articles before-mentioned, with the above Confession. This he was prevailed with to do, upon assurance given, that he should be gently dealt with, if he would truly confess and submit himself to the king's mercy. But some of the lords said, they did not know whether that Confession was not drawn from him by force: and that it might be an ill precedent to pass Acts upon such papers, without examining the party, whether he had subscribed them freely and uncompelled: whereupon a committee was appointed of four temporal lords and four spiritual, who were sent to examine him concerning it. The day following the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield made the Report: That he thanked them for their kind Message, but that he had freely subscribed the Confession (f) that lay before them. He made it on

(f) "Many thought his Confession a very strange thing, and aggravated the abjectness of such a behaviour. But it was doubtless because they would have been glad he should have taken another course, which would not have failed to prove fatal to him. It is certain, that among the Articles of his Accusation, there were several which could be justified only by the intention, which could scarce have served his turn in the house of peers: the major part of whom were not inclined to favour him. For instance, to mention only the chief Article; could he deny that, 'contrary to the condition on which he was made Protector, he had degraded, as it were, the other regents, and reduced them to the state of bare counsellors?' It is true, he might have alledged the king's his knees before the king and council, and signed it: and he protested his offences had flowed from rashness and indiscretion rather than malice; and that he had no treasonable design against the king or his realm. So both houses soon passed the Bill against him, and he was fined, by an act of parliament, intitled, 'An Act touching the Fine and Ransome of the duke of Somerset;' that is, for the punishment of his late Misdemeanors, whereby he was fined 2000*l.* a year of land, and lost all his goods and offices.' Upon this, he sent another Submission.

"I am most fearefull and full of heavinesse, my verie good lordes, to understande that my last letter was no better accepted at your lordships handes, to whom I am bounde during my life, for your most gentle and mercifull dealinge with me, that it pleased your goodnesse to bring my case to a fine. I truste your lordships never think that ever I did, or woulde intende, to stand against the king's majestie and youre lordships goodnes, or that I woulde goe about to justifie my cause, seeing his majestie and your lordships offereth clemencie, mercie, and pardon. Although the fine be to me importable, yet I doe commit myself wholie to his highnesse and your lordships mercies; I pray onlie the moderation of it, and did covet to declare to youre goodnesse mine inabilitye to beare it: And yet referred all to his majestie, and your wisdome, goodnesse, and discretion. And I most humbly desire your lordships not to think that I was about to contende with your lordships, when I did speake of my conscience, I might erre, in that I thought I did for the best, as I doe acknowledge and confesse, that neither I am the wisest man in the worlde, nor yet if I were, I shoulde not escape without a most singular grace, but manie times I shoulde offende: But I leave all that, and most humbly, simply, wholie, and lowly, I submit my selfe to the king's majestie and to your good lordships; appealing from the rigour and extremitie of his majestie's lawes, to his majesty's great mercie and clemencie; praying your goodnesse to be meanes to his majestie, not to be offended with mee, nor to exclude his majestie's mercie and benignitie from me, for my rudenes and lack of patent. But it was the patent of a minor king, between ten and eleven years old only, who looking upon him as his governor, did every thing by his advice; wherefore the duke could never have cleared himself upon this Article, any more than upon several others. Consequently his only remedy was to owne himself guilty of all, and to cast himself upon the king's mercy. Besides, it concerned him highly to get out of prison if it was possible on any terms, since it was dangerous for him to continue any longer in the hands of his enemies."

discretion, but to accept my good minde as one that faine woulde doo that were well. And when I cannot or have not doone that things I ought to do, I would gladlie amende, and am readie at all times without condition to doo and suffer willinglie that thing that your honours will appoint inee, accepting what clemencie or mercie soever I obtayne to be of his majestie's and your goodness. Most humbly on my knees praying his majestie and your good lordships to pardone mine offences, and to order me for them, as to his moste high mercifull clemencie shall appeere convenient. And finally flying from extremitie of justice, desire mercie, as you bee, and are called, most mercifull counsellors, not imputing my writings and doings hitherto as of stoutnesse or stubbornnesse, but onlie for lack of discretion and wisdom. For the which once again I require pardon and favor to be shewed, and if it pleased your good lordships to heare me, I trust you should find me lowly unto your honors, and so conformable unto your lordships orders, that I trust to make amends, and obtaine pardon for my former folly. And thus I most humbly commit your good lordships to Almighty God, to whom I shall alwaies pray that ye maie long continue in honor. From the Tower, the 2d of Februarie."

He came out of the Tower on the 6th of February, giving bond of 10,000*l.* for his good behaviour, but limited that he should stay at the king's house at Sheen, or his own at Sion, and should not go four miles from them, nor come to the king or council, unless he was called; and when he knew that the king was to come within four miles of these houses, he was to withdraw from them.

On the 16th he had his Pardon, and carried himself so well, that on the 18th of April following he went by invitation to court, to the king's majesty at Greenwich: where he was honourably received by the king and his council, and dined with the king, and was sworn of the privy-council: and the king of his special favour, and at the humble petition of the council, by patent dated June the 4th, gave him back almost all his estate that was forfeited.

42. Proceedings against EDWARD Duke of SOMERSET, for High Treason and Felony, at Westminster: 5 Edward VI. A. D. 1551. [2 Burnett's Reform. 181. 2 Fox's Acts and Monum. 1217. 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 589.]

THE duke of Somerset had such access to the king, and such freedoms with him (notwithstanding the late Judgment against him), that the earl of Warwick had a mind to get rid of him. The duke seemed also in April this year to have got the king again in his power, and dealt with the lord Strange to persuade the king to marry his daughter Jane; and that he would advertise him of all that passed about the king. The earl of Warwick had got himself created duke of Northumberland; and for several of his friends he procured a creation of new honours. The new duke of Northumberland could no longer bear such a rival in greatness as the duke of Somerset was, who was the only person that he thought could take the king out of his hands: so a design being laid to destroy him, he was apprehended on the 17th of October, and sent to the Tower, and with him the lord Gray, sir Ralph Vane, sir Tho. Palmer, sir Tho. Arundell, were also taken, and some of his followers, Hamond, Newdigate, and two of the Seymours, and were sent to prison. The day after, the dutchess of Somerset was also sent to the Tower, with one Crune and his wife, and two of her chamber-women: after these, sir Tho. Holdcroft, sir Miles Patridge, sir Michael Stanhope, Wingfield, Bannister, and Vaughan, were all made prisoners,

But sir Thomas Palmer though imprisoned with him as an accomplice, was the person that ruined him. The Evidence against the duke was chiefly sir Thomas Palmer's Information; who being brought by the duke of Northumberland privately to the king, related the whole conspiracy.

Sir Thomas Palmer's Examination.

He declared, That upon St. George's-Day last, before the duke of Somerset being upon a journey towards the north, in case sir Win. Herbert, master of the horse, had not assured him that he should receive no harm, would have raised the people: and that he had sent the lord Gray before to know who would be his friends: also that the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Pembroke, and other lords, should be invited to a banquet; and if they came with a bare company, to be set upon by the way; if strongly, their heads should have been cut off at the place of their feasting. He declared farther, that sir Ralph Vane had 2000 men in readiness: that sir Thomas Arundell had assured the Tower, that Patridge should raise London, and take the Great Seal; that Seymour and Hamond would wait upon him, and that all the horse of the gendarmerie should be slain.

The earl of Rutland did affirm, that he had made a party for getting himself declared Protector in the next parliament.

The above-mentioned particulars were, told the king, with such circumstances, that he was induced to believe them, and resolved to leave him to the law.

Sir Thomas Palmer's Second Examination.

That the gendarmerie, upon the muster-day, should be assaulted by 2,000 men, under sir Ralph Vane, and by an hundred horses of the duke of Somerset's, besides his friends, which should stand by, and besides the idle people, which were thought inclinable to take his part. That this done, he would run through the city and proclaim, 'Liberty, liberty,' to raise the Apprentices, &c. And in case his attempt did not succeed, he would go to the Isle of Wight or to Poole.

Crane's Examination.

He confessed all that Palmer had said; to which he added, That the lord Paget's house was the place, where the nobility being invited to a banquet, should have lost their heads: and that the earl of Arundel was made acquainted with the Conspiracy by sir Michael Stanhope, who was a messenger between them: and that the thing had been done, but that the greatness of the enterprize caused delays, and some diversity of advice. And further, that the duke of Somerset once, feigning himself sick, went to London to see what friends he could procure.

Humond's Examination.

He confessed that the duke of Somerset's chamber at Greenwich had been strongly guarded in the night by many armed men.

All these were sworn before the council, and the greatest part of the nobility, that their confessions were true; and they did say, that what was sworn was without any kind of compulsion, force, or envy, or displeasure, but as favourable to the duke as they could swear to with safe consciences.

Lord Strange's Examination.

He voluntarily informed how the duke desired him to move the king to take to wife his third daughter the lady Jane; and that he would be his spy about the king, to advertise him when any of the council spake privately with him, and to acquaint him what they said.

Hereupon the lord chancellor openly declared in the Starr Chamber these Accusations against the duke of Somerset; and on the 22d of Oct. with much shew and ceremony, were all the crafts and corporations of London commanded to repair to their Halls, and there it was shewed them, That the duke of Somerset would have taken the Tower, seized on the broad-seal, and have destroyed the city, and then to have gone to the Isle of Wight. After this Declaration, they were charged each corporation to ward every gate in London, and to have a walking watch through the city. Towards the latter end of Nov. a Letter was sent to the lord chancellor, to cause a sufficient Commission to be made, and sealed with the great seal of England, of Oyer and Terminer, to the lord marquis of Winchester, that he may thereby be the king's seneschal, hac unica vice tantum, for the hearing and determining of the treasons and felonies of the duke of Somerset, giving the date of the said commission the 28th of Nov.; and the 1st of Dec. was ordered for his trial.

Dec. 1. The duke of Somerset came to his Trial at Westminster-Hall. The lord treasurer sat as high-steward of England, under the cloth of state, on a bench between two posts, three degrees high. All the lords to the number of twenty-seven, viz. Dukes; Suffolk, Northumberland.—Marquis Northampton.—Earls; Derby, Bedford, Huntington, Rutland, Bath, Sussex, Worcester, Pembroke.—Viscount Hereford.—Barons; Burgavenny, Audley, Wharton, Evers, Latimer, Bourough, Zouch, Stafford, Wentworth, Darcy, Sturton, Windsor, Cromwell, Cobham, Bray. These sat a degree under, and heard the matter debated.

The Crimes laid against him were cast into five several Indictments, as king Edward 6 has it in his Journal; but the Record mentions only three, whether Indictments or Articles, is not so clear. 1. "That he had designed to have seized on the king's person, and so have governed all affairs. 2. That he, with 100 others, intended to have imprisoned the earl of Warwick, afterwards duke of Northumberland. And 3. That he had designed to have raised an Insurrection in the city of London." But the Indictment which here follows, is only for designing to seize on and imprison the duke of Northumberland.

Then were read the Depositions of Palmer, Crane, Hamond, &c. and the king's counsel opened the Indictment, and urged strongly Palmer's voluntary Examination (as they called it) with Crane's and the other Examinations.

The duke of Somerset being, it seems, little acquainted with law, did not desire counsel to plead or assist him in point of law, but only answered to matters of fact: he desired no advantage might be taken against him for any idle or angry word that might at any time have fallen from him; he protested he never intended to have raised the northern parts, but had only upon some reports, sent to sir Wm. Herbert to be his friend; that he had never determined to have killed the duke of Northumberland, or any other person, but had only talked of it, without any intention of doing it. That for the design of destroying the gendarmery, it was ridiculous to think, that he with a small troop could destroy so strong a body, consisting of 900 men; in which, though he had succeeded, it could have signified nothing. That he never designed to raise any stir in London, but had always looked upon it as a place where he was most safe. That his having men about him at Greenwich was with no ill design, since when he could have done mischief with them, he had not done it: but upon his attachment rendered himself a prisoner, without any resistance. He objected also many things against the Witnesses, and desired they might be brought face to face. He particularly spoke against sir Thomas Palmer, the chief witness. But the witnesses were not brought, only their Examinations before-mentioned read. Upon this the king's counsel replied, and avouched the law to be, to assemble men with intent to kill the duke of Northumberland, was Treason by a Statute of the 3rd and 4th of Edw. 6, made against unlawful Assemblies, which enacts, 'That if twelve persons should have assembled together to have killed any privy-counsellor, and upon proclamation they have not dispersed themselves, it was Treason: or, if such twelve had been by any malicious artifice brought together for any Riot, and being warned, did not disperse themselves, it was felony without benefit of clergy or sanctuary.' That to raise London, or the North parts of the realm, was Treason. That to have men about him to resist his Attachment was felony. That to assault the lords, and to devise their deaths, was felony. These things were urged against him by the counsel (as is their usual way of pleading) with much bitterness. Then the peers withdrew to debate the matter. The Proofs about his design of raising the North or the City, or of killing the gentlemen, did not satisfy them, (for all these had been without question treasonable) so they only held to that point, 'of conspiring to imprison the duke of Northumberland.' The duke of Suffolk was of opinion, That no contention among private subjects should be on any account screwed up to be Treason. The duke of Northumberland said he would never consent that any practice against him should be reputed Treason. Several of the lords said, They held it unfit that the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke should be on the Trial; because the prisoner was chiefly charged with practices intended against them. But Answer was made, That a peer of the realm might not be challenged. So after great difference of opinion, they all acquitted him of Treason. But the greater number found him guilty of Felony, (g) and Judgment was given that he should be hanged. (h)

(g) "One Attainder passed in Edward 6th's reign, when, though the party was not heard, the witnesses were heard; but when the duke of Somerset came to be tried both for Treason and Felony, he had not the benefit of the accusers being brought face to face, but was proceeded against upon depositions read in the court; he was acquitted of the Treason, but cast for Felony; and that occasioned the Act which the commons grafted upon a Bill sent down by the lords in the subsequent sessions, viz. 5 and 6 Edw. 6. State Tracts, vol. 2, p. 554. By which Act, no person shall be indicted, arraigned, &c. unless the offender be accused by two lawful accusers; which accusers, at the time of the Arraignment, shall be brought in person before the party so accused," &c. 1 Rastal, 109.

(h) Thuanus translated by the Rev. Mr. Wilson, vol. 2, p. 409, says, "In England there were troubles of a most dangerous nature; for John Dudley, first created earl of Warwick, and then duke of Northumberland, an ambitious and sagacious man, had accused the duke of Somerset, Protector of the realm,

Then the duke of Northumberland addressed himself to the duke, and told him, That now, since by the law he was condemned to die, as he had saved him formerly, so he would not now be wanting to serve him, how little soever he expected it from him; he desired him therefore to fly to the king's mercy, in which he promised him he would faithfully serve him. The duke of Somerset then thanked the lords for their favour, and asked pardon of the duke of Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke for his ill intentions against them; and made suit for his life, and for his wife and children: and from thence he was carried to the Tower, where he remained till January 23, when his Petition for life having been rejected, he was brought to the scaffold about eight o'clock in the morning.

Account of the Duke's Execution.

Touching which Execution (i) a few words here would be bestowed in describing the wonderful order and manner thereof, according as it hath faithfully been suggested to us upon the credit of a certain noble personage, who not only was there present at the deed doing, but also in manner next unto him upon the scaffold, beholding the order of all things with his eyes, a person of mean spirit, whose patience he had long abused, of male-administration, and had procured his imprisonment; after that, being reconciled to him, he put him upon beheading his brother, who was exceeding brave, and formidable to Northumberland. Which done, after he had gained his wish, and drawn the chief power into his own hands, he had nothing else to do, but to remove Somerset himself out of the way; towards whom he shewed such a contempt, as drove the other upon thought of killing Dudley, for the vindication of his own authority. Somerset therefore went to his house under pretence of a visit, covered with a coat of mail under his cloaths, and carrying with him a party of armed men, whom he left in the next chamber; but when he was introduced in the civilest manner to Dudley, who was naked, and lying upon his bed, the good natured man repented him, would not execute his design, and departed without striking a stroke. The plot being afterwards discovered by the treachery of some of the accomplices, he was accused upon it, and, notwithstanding the unwillingness of the king, who had been brought up under his care, was condemned to death, because he had offended against a late law, which had provided, That whoever was found contriving the death of a privy-counsellor, though he did not accomplish it, should forfeit his head. Accordingly, in the beginning of the next year, he was, by the malignant sport of fortune, beheaded at London. With him suffered sir Ralph Vane, by whose advice Somerset was said to have held his unlawful councils, and to have conspired against Northumberland and others."

(i) 2 Fox's Book of Martyrs, 1247.

and with his pen also reporting the same in order and manner as here followeth :

In the year of our Lord 1552, the 22nd day of January, the noble duke of Somerset, uncle to king Edward, was brought out of the Tower of London and delivered to the sheriffs of the city, and compassed round about with a great number of armed men, both of the guard and others, he was brought unto the Scaffold on Tower-hill ; where as he nothing changing neither voice nor countenance, but in a manner with the same gesture which he commonly used at home, kneeling down upon both his knees, and lifting up his hands, commended himself unto God. After that he had ended a few short prayers, standing up again, and turning himself toward the east-side of the scaffold, nothing at all abashed (as it seemed unto me standing about the midst of the scaffold, and diligently marking all things), neither with the sight of the ax, neither yet of the hangman, or of present death ; (k) but with the like alacrity and cheerfulness of mind and countenance as befortimes he was accustomed to hear the causes and supplications of others, and especially the poor, he uttered these words to the people :

‘ Dearly beloved friends ; I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit that I never offended against the king, neither by word nor deed, and have been always as faithful and true unto this realm, as any man hath been. But forso much as I am by a law condemned to die, I do acknowledge myself as well as others to be subject therunto. Wherefore to testify my obedience which I owe unto the laws, I am come hither to suffer death ;

(k) “ It was generally believed, that all this pretended conspiracy upon which he was condemned, was only a forgery ; for both Palmer and Crane, the chief witnesses, were soon after discharged, as were also Bartville and Hamond, with all the rest that had been made prisoners on the pretence of this plot. And the duke of Northumberland continued after that in so close a friendship with Palmer, that it was generally believed he had been corrupted to betray him. And indeed, the not bringing witnesses into court, but only the depositions, and the parties sitting Judges, gave great occasion to condemn the proceedings against him. For it was generally thought, that all was an artifice of Palmer’s, who had put the duke of Somerset in fear of his life, and so got him to gather men about him for his own preservation ; and that he afterwards being taken with him, seemed through fear to acknowledge all that which he had before contrived. This was more confirmed by the death of the other four, who were executed on the 26th of Feb. and did all protest they had never been guilty of any design, either against the king, or to kill the lords. Vane added, That his blood would make Northumberland’s pillow uneasy to him. The people were generally much affected with this execution.” 2 Burn. Reform. 186.

‘ whereunto I willingly offer myself, with most hearty thanks unto God, that hath given me this time of repentance, who might through sudden death have taken away my life, that neither I should have acknowledged him nor myself—Moreover, dearly beloved friends, there is yet somewhat that I must put you in mind of, as touching Christian Religion ; which, so long as I was in authority, I always diligently set forth and furthered to my power. Neither I repent me of my doings, but rejoice therein, sith that now the state of Christian Religion cometh most near unto the form and order of the primitive church. Which thing I esteem as a great benefit given of God both unto you and me : most heartily exhorting you all, that this which is most purely set forth unto you, you will with like thankfulness accept and embrace, and set out the same in your living. Which thing if you do not, without doubt greater mischief and calamity will follow.’

When he had spoken these words, suddenly there was a terrible noise heard : whereupon there came a great fear on all men. This noise was as it had been the noise of some great storm or tempest, which unto some seemed to be heard from above ; like as if a great deal of gunpowder being inclosed in an armoury, and having caught fire, had violently broken out. But unto some again, it seemed as though it had been a great multitude of horsemen running together, or coming upon them. Such a noise then was in the ears of all men, albeit they saw nothing. Whereby it happened, that all the people being amazed without any evident cause, without any violence or stroke stricken, or any man seen, they ran away, some into the ditches and puddles, and some into the houses thereabout ; other some being afraid with the horror and noise, fell down groveling unto the ground with their pole-axes and halberts ; and most of them cried out, ‘ Jesus save us, Jesus save us !’ Those which tarried still in their places, for fear knew not where they were. And I myself which was there present among the rest, being also afraid in this hurly-burly, stood still altogether amazed, looking when any man would knock me on the head.—In the mean time, whilst these things were thus in doing, the people by chance spied one sir Anthony Brown riding unto the scaffold, which was the occasion of a new noise ; for when they saw him coming, they conjectured that which was not true, but notwithstanding which they all wished for, that the king by that messenger had sent his uncle Pardon ; and therefore with great rejoicing, and casting up their caps, they cried out, ‘ Pardon, pardon is come : God save the king !’ Thus this good duke, although he was destitute of all man’s help, yet he saw before his departure, in how great love and favour he was with all men. And truly I do not think, that in so great slaughter of dukes as hath been in England within these few years, there were so many weeping eyes at one time ; and not without cause : for all men did see in the decay of this duke, the public ruin of all England, except such as indeed did perceive nothing. But now to return from whence we have strayed, the duke in the mean time standing still in the same place, modestly, and with a grave countenance, made a sign to the people with his hand, that they would keep themselves quiet. Which thing being done, and silence obtained, he spake unto them in this manner :

‘ Dearly beloved friends, there is no such matter here in hand, as you vainly hope or believe. It seemeth thus good unto Almighty God, whose ordinance it is meet and necessary that we all be obedient unto. Wherefore I pray you all to be quiet, and to be contented with my death; which I am most willing to suffer: and let us now join in prayer unto the Lord for the preservation of the king’s majesty, unto whom hitherto I have always shewed myself a most faithful and true subject. I have always been most diligent about his majesty in his affairs, both at home and abroad, and no less diligent in seeking the common commodity of the whole realm. At which words all the people cried out, and said, ‘ It was not true.’ Then the duke proceeding, said, ‘ Unto whose majesty I wish continual health, with all felicity and all prosperous success.’ Whereunto the people again cried out, ‘ Amen.’—‘ Moreover, I do wish unto all his counsellors the grace and favour of God, whereby they may rule in all things uprightly with justice. Unto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to shew yourselves obedient, as it is your bounden duty, under the pain of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation and safeguard of the king’s majesty. Moreover, forso much as heretofore I have had oftentimes affairs with divers men, and hard it is to please every man, therefore if there be any that hath been offended and injured by me, I most humbly require and ask him forgiveness; but especially Almighty God, whom throughout all my life I have most grievously offended: and all other whatsoever they be that have offended me, I do with my whole heart forgive them. Now I once again require you, dearly beloved in the Lord, that you will keep yourselves quiet and still, lest through your tumult you might trouble me. For albeit the spirit be willing and ready, the flesh is frail and wavering; and through your quietness, I shall be much more quieter. Moreover, I desire you all to bear me witness, that I die here in the faith of Jesus Christ; desiring you to help me with your prayers, that I may persevere constant in the same unto my life’s end.’

After this, he turning himself again about like a meek lamb, kneeled down upon his knees. Then Dr. Cox, who was there present to counsel and advertise him, delivered a certain scroll into his hand, wherein was contained a brief Confession unto God; which being read, he stood up again upon his feet, without any trouble of mind, (as it appeared) and first bad the sheriffs farewell, then the lieutenant of the Tower and others, taking them all by the hands which were upon the scaffold with him. Then he gave the hangman certain money. Which done, he put off his gown, and kneeling down again in the straw, untied his shirt-strings. After that the hangman coming unto him, turned down his collar round about his neck, and all other things which did let or hinder him. Then lifting up his eyes to Heaven, where his only hope remained, and covering his face with his own handkerchief, he laid himself down along, shewing no manner or token of trouble or fear, neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were covered there began to appear a red colour in the midst of his cheeks.—Thus this most meek and gentle duke lying along, and looking for the stroke, because his doublet covered his neck, he was commanded to rise up and put it off; and then laying himself down again upon the block, and calling thrice upon the name of Jesus, saying, ‘ Lord Jesu, save me!’ As he was the third time repeating the same, even as the name of Jesu was in uttering, in a moment he was hereft both of head and life.”

His son continued in a disconsolate condition, deprived of all his titles; till queen Elizabeth, in the 1st year of her reign, created him earl of Hertford, and baron Seymour; and his grandson, William earl of Hertford, was created marquis of Hertford, 1640, and in the year 1660, he presented the following Case to the house of peers: which giving a great light into that proceeding, is here inserted.

The Case of the Marquis of HERTFORD, touching the Dukedom of SOMERSET, A. D. 1660, when the Bill was brought into Parliament to restore him to the Title of Duke of SOMERSET.

EDWARD, earl of Hertford (great grandfather of the said marquis) was by letters patents under the great seal of England, bearing date the 6th of April, 1 Edw. 6, created duke of Somerset, to hold to him and the heirs males of his body, upon the body of the lady Anne his then wife begotten and to be begotten, for ever; with several other remainders over in tail.—The said duke afterwards, viz. in Michaelmas-Term, 5 Edw. 6, was indicted of Felony, for procuring and stirring up others to take and imprison John earl of Warwick (one of the king’s privy council); which Indictment (though void both in matter and form) was pretended to be grounded on the statute of 3 and 4 Edw. 6, which makes it Felony to stir up and procure others to take away the life of any of the king’s council; but this Indictment was only for stirring up others to imprison a privy-counsellor, (which was never reduced into act) and the same declared and branded in print to be void by learned judges. Yet the said duke was found guilty of Felony, and put to death for this fact, which was but a pretended felony; and if true, yet no entailed estate forfeitable thereby.—The malice of his enemies not satis-fed with his blood, afterwards by their power (in the infancy of the duke's heir, who continued and was owned for duke of Somerset for several months after his father's death,) procured an act of parliament in the same year, 5 Edw. 6, intituled, 'An Act touching the limitation of the late duke of Somerset's Lands,' wherein there is a clause obliquely inserted, to take away the said honour so entailed as aforesaid; which by no Felony (how notorious soever the same had been) could by law have been forfeited, viz. "And be it farther enacted, That the said duke and his heirs males, begotten upon the body of the said lady Anne for ever, shall, by authority of this Act, lose and forfeit unto your highness, your heirs and successors for ever, and also be deprived from henceforth for ever, as well of the names of viscount Beauchamp, earl of Hertford, and duke of Somerset, and every of them, as also of all and every other his and their honour or honours, degrees, dignities, estates, prebeminences, and styles, by whatsoever name or names he the same duke hath been called, named, or created, by any letters patents, writs, or otherwise." This being a case unprecedented, both in law and history, and so contrary to the rules of law, justice and reason, to have an attainder of Felony stand, for an offence, which apparently neither then, nor at any time after, was felony; and if a felony yet to have a forfeiture extended beyond the offence, (if there were any) and to be so maliciously prosecuted after the death of the said duke, (who was mainly instrumental in bringing about the blessed Reformation of Religion) it is humbly conceived to be most agreeable to justice to restore the said marquis, who is heir male of the bodies of the said duke and the lady Anne his wife, to his ancient honour, so illegally taken away as aforesaid."

Whereupon, in September 1660, the said marquis of Hertford was restored to the Dukedom of Somerset, by a repeal of the Act of the 5th of Edw. 6.

43. Proceedings concerning the Non-Conformity in Religion of the Lady MARY, Sister of the King EDWARD the Sixth, afterwards Queen of England: 4 & 5 Edw. VI. A. D. 1550, 1551. [2 Fox's Acts and Monum. 700.]

BY the first Instrument which is here printed, it appears that a letter or letters had been sent by the Lord Protector and Council to the Lady Mary, remonstrating against her Non-conformity. Such letter or letters I have not found.

The Lady Mary's Letter to the Lord Protector and the rest of the Council.

"My Lord; I perceive by the letters which I late received from you, and other of the king's majesty's council, that ye be all sorry to find so little conformity in me touching the observation of his majesty's laws; who am well assured, that I have offended no law, unless it be a late law of your own making, for the altering of matters in Religion, which in my conscience is not worthy to have the name of a law, both for the king's honour's sake, the wealth of the realm, and giving an occasion of an evil bruit through all Christendom, besides the partiality used in the same, and (as my said conscience is very well persuaded) the offending of God, which passeth all the rest: but I am well assured that the king his father's laws were all allowed and consented to without compulsion by the whole realm, both spiritual and temporal, and all ye executors sworn upon a book to fulfil the same, so that it was an authorized law, and that I have obeyed, and will do with the grace of God, till the king's majesty my brother shall have sufficient years to be a judge in these matters himself. Wherco, my lord, I was plain with you at my last being in the court, declaring unto you at that time

whereunto I would stand, and now do assure you all, that the only occasion of my stay from altering mine opinion, is for two causes.—One principally for my conscience sake; the other, that the king my brother shall not hereafter charge me to be one of those that were agreeable to such alterations in his tender years. And what fruits daily grow by such changes, since the death of the king my father, to every indifferent person it well appeareth, both to the displeasure of God, and unquietness of the realm.—Notwithstanding, I assure you all, I would be as loth to see his highness take hurt, or that any evil should come to this his realm, as the best of you all, and none of you have the like cause, considering how I am compelled by nature, being his majesty's poor and humble sister, most tenderly to love and pray for him, and unto this his realm (being born within the same) with all wealth and prosperity to God's honour.—And if any judge of me the contrary for mine opinion's sake, as I trust none doth, I doubt not in the end, with God's help, to prove myself as true a natural and humble sister, as they of the contrary opinion, with all their devices and altering of laws, shall prove themselves true subjects; praying you, my lord, and the rest of the council, no more to trouble and unquiet me with matters touching my conscience, wherein I am at a full point, with God's help, whatsoever shall happen to me, intending, with his grace, to trouble you little with any worldly suits, but to bestow the short time I think to live in quietness, and pray for the king's majesty and all you, heartily wishing, that your proceedings may be to God's honour, the safeguard of the king's person, and quietness to the whole realm.—Moreover, where your desire is, That I should send my controller and Dr. Hopton unto you, by whom you would signify your minds more amply, to my contentation and honour; it is not unknown to you all, that the chief charge of my house resteth only upon the travels of my said controller, who hath not been absent from my house three whole days since the setting up of the same, unless it were for my letters patents; so that if it were not for his continual diligence, I think my little portion would not have stretched so far. And my chaplain by occasion of sickness hath been long absent, and is not yet able to ride.—Therefore like as I cannot forbear my controller, and my priest is not able to journey, so shall I desire you my lord, and all the rest of the council, that having any thing to be declared to me, except matters of religion, ye will either write your minds, or send some trusty person, with whom I shall be contented to talk, and make answer as the case shall require; assuring you that if any servant of mine, either man or woman, or chaplain, should move me to the contrary of my conscience, I would not give ear to them, nor suffer the like to be used within my house. And thus my lord, with my hearty commendations, I wish unto you and the rest as well to do as myself.—From my house at Kinning-hall, the 29d of June, 1549. Your assured friend to my power, MARY."

A Remembrance of certain Matters appointed by the Council to be declared by Dr. Hopton to the Lady Mary's Grace, for Answer to her former Letter; which said Hopton was, after she came to her Reign, Bishop of Norwich.

Her grace writeth, 'That the Law made by Parliament is not worthy the name of Law,' meaning the Statute for the Communion, &c. You shall say thereto: "The fault is great in any subject to disallow a law of the king, a law of a realm, by long study, free disputation, and uniform determination of the whole clergy, consulted, debated, and concluded; but the greater fault is in her grace, being next of any subject in blood and estate to the king's majesty her brother and good lord, to give example of disobedience, being a subject, or of unnaturalness, being his majesty's sister, or of neglecting the power of the crown, she being by limitation of law next to the same. The example of disobedience is most perilous in this time, as she can well understand; her unkindness resteth in the king's own acceptation; the neglecting of the power before God is answerable, and in the world toucheth her honour."

'The Executors,' she saith, 'were sworn to king Henry 8th his laws.' You shall say: "It is true, they were sworn to him, his laws, his heirs, and successors; which oath they duly observe, and should offend if they should break any one jot of the king's laws now being, without a dispensation by a law, and herein her grace shall understand, that it is no law which is dissolved by a law: neither may her grace do that injury to the king's majesty her brother, to diminish his authority so far, that he may not, by the free consent of a parliament, amend and alter unprofitable laws, for the number of inconveniences which hereof might follow, as her grace with consideration may well perceive."

'Offence taken by the sending for her Officers.' You shall say: "If her grace consider the first letters of that purpose, they will declare our good meaning to her, and her gentle usage, requiring the presence of her trusty servant, because she might give more trust to our message."

'Her house is her flock.' You shall say: "It is well liked her grace should have her house or flock, but not exempt from the king's orders; neither may there be a flock of the king's subjects, but such as will hear and follow the voice of the king their shepherd. God disalloweth it, law and reason forbid it, policy abhorreth it, and her honour may not require it."

'Her grace deferreth her obedience to the king's laws, until his majesty be of sufficient years.' You shall say: "She could in no one saying more disallow the authority of the king, the majesty of his crown, and the state of the realm. For herein she suspendeth his kingdom, and esteemeth his authority by his age, not by his right and title. Her grace must understand he is a king by the ordinance of God, by descent of royal blood, not by the numbering of his years. As a creature subject to mortality, he hath youth, and by God's grace shall have age; but as a king he hath no difference by days and years. The Scripture plainly declareth it, not only young children to have been kings by God's special ordinance, but also (which is to be noted) to have had best success in their reign, and the favour of God in their proceedings. Yea, in their first years have they most purely reformed the church and state of religion. Therefore her grace hath no cause thus to diminish his majesty's power, and to make him as it were no king until she think him of sufficient years. Wherein how much his majesty may be justly offended, they be sorry to think."

She saith 'she is subject to none of the council.' You shall say, "If her grace understandeth it of us in that acceptation as we be private men, and not counsellors sworn to the king's majesty, we knowledge us not to be superiors; but if she understand her writing of us as counsellors and magistrates ordained by his majesty, her grace must be contented to think us of authority sufficient by the reason of our office to challenge a superiority; not to rule by private affection, but by God's providence; not to our estimation, but to the king's honour, and finally to increase the king's estate with our council, our dignity and vocation; and we think her grace will not forget the saying of Solomons in the sixth chapter of the Book of Wisdom, to move a king to rule by counsel and wisdom, and to build his estate upon them. Wherefore her grace must be remembered, the king's majesty's politic body is not made only of his own royal material body, but of a council, by whom his majesty ruleth, directeth, and governeth his realm. In the place of which council her grace is not ignorant that we be set and placed. Wherefore the reputation she shall give us, she shall give it to the king's honour, and that which she shall take from us, she shall take from his majesty, whose majesty we think if it might take increase or honour, as God giveth a daily abundance, it should receive rather increase from her, being his majesty's sister, than thus any abatement."

"She received master Arundel, and master Englefield, You shall say; "All the council remembereth well her refusal to have her house charged with any more number, alledging the final proportion for her charge, and therefore it was thought to come more for their earnest suit, meaning to be privileged subjects from the law, than of her desire, which refused very often to increase her number. Their cautele the king might not suffer, to have his law disobeyed, their countries where they should serve by them to be destitute, and, having been servants to his majesty, the circumstances of their departure might in no wise be liked."

"She refused to hear any man to the contrary of her opinion. You shall say; "It is an answer more of will than of reason, and therefore her grace must be admonished neither to trust her own opinion without ground, neither to mislike all others having ground. If hers be good, it is no hurt to hear the worse. If it be ill, she shall do well if she hear the better. She shall not alter by hearing, but by hearing the better. And because she shall not mislike the offer, let her grace name of learned men whom she will, and further than they by learning shall prove she shall not be moved. And so far it is thought reason will compel her grace."

In the end ye shall say; "The good wills and minds of the Lord Protector and the council is so much toward her grace that howsoever she would herself in honour be esteemed, howsoever in conscience quieted, yea howsoever benefited, saving their duties to God and the king, they would as much, and in their doings, (if it please her to prove it) will be nothing inferiours, assuring her grace, that they be most sorry that she is thus disquieted: and if necessity of the cause, the honour and surety of the king, and the judgment of their own conscience, moved them not, thus far they would not have attempted. But their trust is, her grace will allow them the more, when she shall perceive the cause, and think no less could be done by them, where she provoked them so far."

These and other of like credit, more amply committed to you in speech, you shall declare to her grace, and further declare your conscience for the allowing of the manner of the communion, as ye have plainly professed it before us. At Richmond the 14th of June 1519.

The Lady Mary to the Lord Protector and the rest of the Council, 27th June, 1549.

"My lord, I perceive by letters directed from you, and other of the king's majesty's council, to my comptroller, my chaplain, and master Englefield my servant, that ye will them upon their allegiance to repair immediately to you, wherein you gave me evident cause to change mine accustomed opinion of you all, that is to say, to think you careful of my quietness and well doing, considering how earnestly I writ to you for the stay of two of them, and that not without very just cause. And as for master Englefield, as soon as he could have prepared himself, having his horses so far off, although ye had not sent at this present, he would have performed your request. But indeed I am much deceived. For I supposed ye would have weighed and taken my letters in better part, if ye have received them; if not, to have tarried my answer, and I not to have found so little friendship, nor to have been used so ungenerally at your hands in sending for him upon whose travel doth rest the whole charge of my whole house, as I writ unto you lately; whose absence therefore shall be to me and my said house no little displeasure, especially being so far off. And besides all this, I do greatly marvel to see your writing for him, and the other two, with such extreme words of peril to ensue towards them in case they did not come, and specially for my comptroller, whose charge is so great, that he cannot suddenly be meet to take a journey: which words in mine opinion needed not (unless it were in some very just and necessary cause) to any of mine, who taketh myself subject to none of you all; not doubting but if the king's majesty my brother were of sufficient years to perceive this matter, and knew what luck and incommodity the absence of my said officer should be to my house, his grace would have been so good lord to me, as to have suffered him to remain where his charge is. Notwithstanding, I have willed him at this time to repair to you, commanding him to return forthwith for my very necessities sake, and I have given the like leave to my poor sick priest also, whose life I think undoubtedly shall be put in hazard by the wet and cold painful travel of this journey. But for my part I assure you all, that since the king my father, your late master and very good lord, died, I never took you for other than my friends; but in this it appeareth contrary. And saving I thought verily that my former letters should have discharged this matter, I would not have troubled myself with writing the same, not doubting but you do consider, that none of you all would have been contented to have been thus used at your inferiour's hands; I meane, to have had your officer or any of your servants sent for by force (as ye make it) knowing no full cause why. Wherefore I do not a little marvel, that ye had not this remembrance towards me, who always have willed and wished you as well to do as myself, and both have and will pray for you all as heartily, as for mine own soul to Almighty God, whom I humbly beseech to illuminate you all with his holy spirit, to whose mercy also I am at a full point to commit myself, whatsoever shall become of my body. And thus with my commendations I bid you all farewell. From my house at Kenninghall, the 27th of June. Your friend to my power, though you give me contrary cause, MARY.

“Right dear, &c. We have seen by Letters of our Council, sent to you of late, and by your answer thereunto, touching the cause of certain your chaplains, having offended our laws in saying of mass, their good and convenient advices, and your fruitless and indirect mistaking of the same: which thing moveth us to write at this time, that where good counsel from our Council hath not prevailed, yet the like from ourself may have due regard. The whole matter we perceive rests in this, That you being our next sister, in whom above all other our subjects nature should place the most estimation of us, would wittingly and purposely, not only break our laws yourself, but also have others maintained to do the same. Truly howsoever the matter may have other terms, other sense it hath not: and although by your letter it seemeth you challenge a promise made, that so you may do; yet surely we know the promise had no such meaning, neither to maintain, ne to continue your fault. You must know this, sister, you were at the first time, when the law was made, born withal, not because you should disobey the law, but that by our lenity and love shewed you might learn to obey it. We made a difference of you from our other subjects, not for that all other should follow our laws, and you only gainstand them, but that you might be brought as far forward by love, as others were by duty... The error wherein you would rest is double, and every part so great that neither for the love of God we can well suffer it unredressed, neither for the love of you can we but wish it amended. First, you retain a fashion in honouring of God, who indeed thereby is dishonoured, and therein err you in zeal for lack of science, and having science offered you, you refuse it, not because it is science, we trust (for then should we despair of you) but because you think it is none. And surely in this we can best reprehend you, learning daily in our school, that therefore we learn things because we know them not, and are not allowed to say we know not those things, or we think they be not good, and therefore we will not learn them. Sister, you must think nothing can commend you more then reason, according to the which you have been hitherto used; and now for very love we will offer you reason ourself. If you are persuaded in conscience to the contrary of our laws, you or your persuaders shall freely be suffered to say what you or they can, so that you will hear what shall be said again.—In this point you see I pretermitt my estate, and talk with you as your brother rather than your supreme lord and king. Thus should you, being as well content to hear of your opinions as you are content to hold them, in the end thank us as much for bringing you to light, as now before you learn you are loath to see it. And if thus much reason with our natural love shall not move you, whereof we would be sorry, then must we consider the other part of your fault, which is the offence of our laws. For though hitherto it hath been suffered in hope of amendment, yet now, if hope be none, how shall there be sufferance? Our charge is to have the same care over every man's estate, that every man ought to have over his own. And in your own house as you would be loath openly to suffer one of your servants, being next you, most manifestly to break your orders, so must you think in our state it shall miscontent us to permit you, so great a subject, not to keep our laws. Your nearness to us in blood, your greatness in estate, the condition of this time maketh your fault the greater. The example is unnatural that our sister should do less for us then our other subjects. The cause is slanderous for so great a personage to forsake our majesty.—Finally, it is too dangerous in a troublesome commonwealth, to make the people to mistrust a faction. We be young, you think, in years to consider this. Truly sister, it troubleth us somewhat the more; for it may be, this evil suffered in you is greater than we can discern, and so we be as much troubled because we doubt whether we see the whole peril, as we be for that we see. Indeed we will presume no further than our years giveth us, that is, in doubtful things not to trust our own wits, but in evident things we think there is no difference. If you should not do as other subjects do, were it not evident that therein you should not be a good subject? Were it not plain in that case, that you should use us not as your sovereign lord? Again, if you should be suffered to break our laws manifestly, were it not a comfort for others so to do? And if our laws be broken, and contemned, where is our estate? These things be so plain, as we could almost have judged them six years past. And indeed it grieveth us not a little, that you, which should be our most comfort in our young years, should alone give us occasion of discomfort. Think you not but it must needs trouble us? and if you can so think, you ought, sister, to amend it. Our natural love towards you without doubt is great, and therefore diminish it not yourself. If you will be loved by us, shew some token of love towards us, that we say not with the psalm, Mala pro bonis mihi reddiderunt. If you will be believed when by writing you confess us to be your Sovereign Lord, hear that which in other things is often alledged, Ostende mihi fidem tuam ex factis tuis. In the answer of your Letter to our Council, we remember you stick only upon one reason divided into two parts. The first is, that in matters of religion your faith is none other, but as all Christendom doth confess. The next is, you will assent to no alteration, but wish things to stand as they did at our father's death. If you mean in the first to rule your faith by that you call Christendom, and not by this church of England wherein you are a member, you shall err in many points, such as our fathers and yours would not have suffered, whatsoever you say of the standing still of things as they were left by him. The matter is too plain to write, what may be gathered, and too perilous to be concluded against you. For the other part, if you like no alteration by our authority, of things not altered by our father, you should do us too great an injury. We take ourself, for the administration of this our commonwealth, to have the same authority which our father had, diminished in no part, neither by example of Scripture, nor by universal laws. The stories of Scripture be so plenteous, as almost the best ordered church of the Israelites was by kings younger than we be. Well sister, we will not in these things interpret your writings to the worst; love and charity shall expound them. But yet you must not thereby be bold to offend in that whereunto you see your writings might be wrested. To conclude, we exhort you to do your duty, and if any impediment be thereof, not of purpose, you shall find a brotherly affection in us to remedy the same. To teach and instruct you we will give order, and so procure you to do your duty willingly, that you shall perceive you are not used merely as a subject, and only commanded, but as a daughter, a scholar, and a sister, taught, instructed and persuaded. For the which cause, when you have considered this our letter, we pray you that we may shortly hear from you."

The Lady Mary to the King.

"My duty most humbly remembered to your majesty, please it the same to understand that I have received your letters by master Throgmorton this bearer. The contents whereof do more trouble me than any bodily sickness, though it were even to the death, and the rather for that your highness doth charge me to be both as breaker of your laws, and also an incourager of others to do the like. I most humbly beseech your majesty to think that I never intended towards you otherwise than my duty compelleth me unto, that is, to wish your highness all honour and prosperity, for the which I do and daily shall pray. And where it pleaseth your majesty to write, that I make a challenge of a promise made otherwise than it was meant, the truth is, the promise could not be denied before your majesty's presence at my last waiting upon the same. And although, I confess, the ground of faith, whereunto I take reason to be but an handmaid, and my conscience also hath and do agree with the same: yet touching that promise, for so much as it hath pleased your majesty, God knoweth by whose persuasion, to write, it was not so meant;

I shall most humbly desire your highness to examine the truth thereof indifferently, and either will your majesty's ambassador, now being with the emperor, to inquire of the same, if it be your pleasure to have him move it, or else to cause it to be demanded of the emperor's ambassador here, although he were not within this realm at that time. And thereby it shall appear that in this point I have not offended your majesty, if it may please you so to accept it. And albeit your majesty, God be praised, hath at these years as much understanding and more, than is commonly seen in that age, yet considering you do hear but one part, your highness not offended, I would be a sutor to the same, that till you were grown to more perfect years, it might stand with your pleasure to stay in matters touching the soul. So undoubtedly should your majesty know more, and hear others, and nevertheless be at your liberty and do your will and pleasure. And whatsoever your majesty hath conceived of me, either by letters to your Council, or by their report, I trust in the end to prove myself as true to you, as any subject within your realm, and will by no means stand in argument with your majesty, but in most humble wise beseech you, even for God's sake, to suffer me, as your highness hath done hitherto. It is for no worldly respect I desire it. God is my judge, but rather than to offend my conscience, I would desire of God to lose all that I have, and also my life; and nevertheless live and die your humble sister and true subject. Thus after pardon craved of your majesty for my rude and bold writing, I beseech Almighty God to preserve the same in honour with us long continuance of health and life, as ever had noble king. From Beaulien, the 3rd of February. Your Majesty's most humble and unworthy sister, MARY."

The Lady Mary to the Lords of the Council, the 4th of December, 1550.

"My lords, your letters dated the second of this present were delivered unto me the third of the same. And where you write that two of my chaplains, doctor Mallet and Barkly, be indicted for certain things committed by them contrary to the king's majesty's laws, and process for them also awarded forth, and delivered to the sheriff of Essex; I cannot but marvel they should be so used, considering it is done, as I take it, for saying mass within my house: and although I have been of myself minded always, and yet am, to have mass within my house: yet I have been advertised that the emperor's majesty hath been promised that I should never be inquieted nor troubled for my so doing, as some of you, my lords, can witness. Furthermore, besides the declaration of the said promise made to me by the emperor's ambassador that dead is, from his majesty, to put my chaplains more out of fear, when I was the last year with the king's majesty my brother, that question was then moved, and could not be denied, but affirmed by some of you before his majesty to be true, being not so much unquieted for the trouble of my said chaplains, as I am to think how this matter may be taken, the promise to such a person being no better regarded. And for mine own part, I thought full little to have received such ungentleness at your hands, having always (God is my judge) wished unto the whole number of you as to myself, and have refused to trouble you, or to crave any thing at your hands, but your good will and friendship, which very slenderly appeareth in this matter. Notwithstanding, to be plain with you, howsoever ye shall use me or mine (with God's help,) I will never vary from mine opinion touching my faith. And if ye or any of you bear me the less good will for that matter, or faint in your friendship towards me only for the same, I must and will be contented, trusting that God will in the end shew his mercy upon me, assuring you, I would rather refuse the friendship of all the world, (wherunto I trust I shall never be driven) than forsake any point of my faith. I am not without some hope that ye will stay this matter, not enforcing the rigour of the law against my chaplains. The one of them was not in my house these four months, and D. Mallet, having my licence, is either at Windsor, or at his benefice, who, as I have heard, was indicted for saying of mass out of my house, which was not true. But indeed, the day before my removing from Woodham water, my whole household in effect being gone to Newhal, he said mass there by mine appointment. I see and hear of divers that do not obey your Statutes and Proclamations, and nevertheless escape without punishment. Be ye judges if I be well used to have mine punished by rigour of a law, besides all the false bruits that ye have suffered to be spoken of me. Moreover, my chaplain doctor Mallet, besides mine own commandment, was not ignorant of the promise made to the emperor, which did put him out of fear. I doubt not therefore but ye will consider it, as by that occasion no piece of friendship be taken away, nor I to have cause but to bear you my good will, as I have done heretofore: for albeit I could do you little pleasure, yet of my friendship ye were sure, as if it had lain in my power, ye should have well known. Thus with my hearty commendations to you all, I pray Almighty God to send you as much of his grace, as I would wish to mine own soul. From Beaulien, 4th of Dec. Your assured friend to my power, MARY."

The Council to the Lady Mary, the 25th of December, 1550.

"After our due commendations to your grace, by your letters to us, as an answer to ours, touching certain process against two of your chaplains, for saying mass against the law and statute of the realm, we perceive both the offence of your chaplains is otherwise excused than the matter may bear, and also our good wills otherwise misconstrued than we looked for. And for the first part, where your greatest reason to excuse the offence of a law, is a promise made to the emperor's majesty, whereof you write, that first some of us be witnesses, next that the ambassador for the emperor declared the same unto you, and lastly, that the same promise was affirmed to you before the king's majesty at your last being with him: we have thought convenient to repeat the matter from the beginning, as it hath hitherto proceeded, whereupon it shall appear how evidently your chaplains have offended the law, and you also mistaken the promise. The promise is but one in itself, but by times thrice as you say repeated. Of which times, the first is chiefly to be considered, for upon that do the other two depend. It is very true the emperor made request to the king's majesty, that you might have liberty to use the mass in your house, and to be as it were exempted from the danger of the statute. To which request divers good reasons were made, containing the commodities that should follow the grant thereof, and means devised rather to persuade you to obey and receive the general and godly reformation of the whole realm, than by a private fancy to prejudice a common order. But yet, upon earnest desire and intreaty made in the emperor's name, thus much was granted, that for his sake and your own also, it should be suffered and winked at, if you had the private mass used in your own closet for a season until you might be better informed, whereof there was some hope, having only with you a few of your own chamber, so that for all the rest of your household the service of the realm should be used, and none other; further than this the promise exceeded not. And truly such a matter it then seemed to some of us, as indeed it was, that well might the emperor have required of the king's majesty a matter of more profit, but of more weight or difficulty to be granted his majesty could not. After this grant in words, there was by the ambassador now dead oftentimes desired some writing, as a testimony of the same. But that was ever denied; not because we meant to break the promise, as it was made, but because there was daily hope of your reformation.—Now to the second time you say the emperor's ambassador's declaration made mention of a promise to you, it might well so be. But we think no otherwise than as it appeareth before written. If it were, his fault it was to declare more than he heard; ours it may not be, that deny not what we have said. As for the last time when ye were with the king's majesty, the same some of us (whom by these words your letter noteth) do well remember, that no other thing was granted to you in this matter, but as the first promise was made to the emperor, at which time you had too many arguments made to approve the proceedings of the king's majesty, and to condemn the abuse of the mass, to think that where the private mass was judged ungodly, there you should have authority and ground to use it. About the same time, the ambassador made means to have some testimony of the promise under the great seal; and that not being heard, to have it but by a letter; and that also was not only denied, but divers good reasons alledged, that he should think it denied with reason, and so to be contented with an answer. It was told him, in reducing that which was commonly called the mass to the order of the primitive Church, and the institution of Christ, the king's majesty and his whole realm had their consciences well quieted, against the which if any thing should be willingly committed, the same should be taken as an offence to God, and a very sin against a truth known. Wherefore to license by open act such a deed, in the conscience of the king's majesty and his realm, were even a sin against God. The most that might herein be born, was, that the king's majesty might, upon hope of your grace's reconciliation, suspend the execution of his law, so that you would use the license as it was first granted. Whatsoever the ambassador hath said to others, he had no other manner grant from us, nor having it thus granted, could alledge any reason against it. And where in your letter your grace noteth us as breakers of the promise made to the emperor, it shall appear who hath broken the promise: whether we that have suffered more than we licensed, or you that have transgressed that which was granted. Now therefore we pray your grace confer the doings of your chaplains with every point of the premises; and if the same cannot be excused, then think also how long the law hath been spared. If it prick our consciences somewhat, that so much should be used as by the promise you may claim, how much more should it grieve us to license more than you can claim; and yet could we be content to bear a great burthen to satisfy your grace, if the burthen pressed not our consciences so much as it doth, whereof we must say as the Apostle said, gloriatio nostra est hæc, testimonium conscientie nostræ. For the other part of your grace's letter, by the which we see you misconstrue our good wills in writing to you, howsoever the law had proceeded against your chaplains, our order in sending to you was to be liked, and therein truly had we special regard of your grace's degree and estate. And because the law itself respecteth not persons, we thought to give respect to you, first signifying to you what the law required, before it should be executed, that being warned, your grace might either think no strangeness in the execution, or for an example of obedience cause it to be executed yourself. Others we see perplexed with suddenness of matters; your grace we would not have unwarned, to think any thing done on a sudden. Truly we thought it more commendable for your grace to help the execution of a law, than to help the offence of one condemned by law. And in giving you knowledge what the king's laws required, we looked for help in the execution by you the king's majesty's sister. The greater personage your grace is, the nigher to the king, so much more ought your example to further his laws. For which cause it hath been called a good commonwealth where the people obeyed the higher estates, and they obeyed the laws. As nature hath joined your grace to the king's majesty to love him most entirely, so hath reason and law subdued you to obey him willingly. The one and the other we doubt not but your grace remembereth: and as they both be joined together in you his majesty's sister, so we trust you will not sever them; for indeed your grace cannot love him as your brother, but you must obey his majesty as his subject.—Example of your obedience and reverence of his majesty's laws is instead of a good preacher to a great number of his majesty's subjects, who, if they may see in you negligence of his majesty, or his laws, will not fail, but follow on hardy, and then their fault is not their own but yours, by example, and so may the king's majesty, when he shall come to further judgment, impute the fault of divers evil people (which thing God forbid) to the sufferance of your grace's doings. And therefore we most earnestly from the depth of our hearts desire it, that as nature hath set your grace nigh his majesty by blood, so your love and zeal to his majesty will further his estate by obedience. In the end of your letter two things be touched, which we cannot premit; the one is, you seem to charge us with permission of men to break laws and statutes. We think indeed it is too true, that laws and proclamations be broken daily, the more pity it is, but that we permit them, we would be sorry to have it proved. The other is, that we have suffered bruits to be spoken of you, and that also must be answered as the other. It is pity to see men so evil, as whom they may touch with tales and infamies they care not, so they miss not the best. Such is the boldness of people, that neither we can fully bridle them to raise tales of you, nor of ourselves. And yet whensoever any certain person may be gotten, to be charged with any such, we never leave them unpunished. Indeed the best way is, both for your grace, and us also, that when we cannot find and punish the offender, let us say as he said that was evil spoken of; Yet will I so live, as no credit shall be given to my backbiters. Certainly, if we had credited any evil tale of your grace, we would friendly have admonished you thereof, and so also proceeded, as either the tale-tellers should have been punished, or else to have proved their tales. And therefore we pray your grace to think no unkindness in us, that any evil bruits have been spread by evil men, but think rather well of us, that howsoever they were spread, we believed them not. Hitherto your grace seeth we have written somewhat at length, of the promise made to you, and our meanings in our former writings. And now for the latter part of our letter, we will as briefly as we can remember to you two special matters, whereof the one might suffice to reform your proceedings, and both together, well considered, we trust shall do your grace much good. The one is, the truth of that you be desired to follow; the other is, the commodity that thereby shall ensue. They both make a just commandment, and because of the first the latter followeth, that first shall be entreated of. We hear say, your grace refuseth to hear any thing reasoned contrary to your old determination, wherein you make your opinion suspicious, as that you are afraid to be dissuaded. If your faith in things be of God, it may abide any storm or weather; if it be but of sand, you do best to eschew the weather. That which we profess hath the foundation in scriptures upon plain texts and no glosses, the confirmation thereof by the use in the primitive church, not in this latter corrupted. And indeed our greatest change is not in the substance of our faith, no, not in any one article of our creed; only the difference is, that we use the ceremonies, observations, and sacraments of our religion as the apostles and first fathers in the primitive church did. You use the same that corruption of time brought in, and very barbarousness and ignorance nourished, and seem to hold for custom against the truth, and we for truth against custom. Your grace in one or two places of your letter seemeth to speak earnestly in the maintenance of your faith, and therein (so that your faith be according to the scriptures) we must have the like opinion; the saying is very good, if the faith be sound. But if every opinion your grace hath (we cannot tell how) conceived, shall be your faith, you may be much better instructed. Saint Paul teacheth you, that faith is by the word of God. And it was a true saying of him that said, Non qui cuius credit fidelis est, sed qui Deo. For where hath your grace ground for such a faith, to think common prayer in the English church should not be in English, that images of God should be set up in the church; or that the sacrament of Christ's body and blood should be offered by the priests for the dead; yea, or that it should be otherwise used than by the scripture it was instituted: though you have no scripture to maintain them, we have evident scriptures to forbid them. And although fault may be found, that of late baptism hath been used in your grace's house, contrary to law, and utterly without licence, yet is it the worse, that contrary to the primitive church, it hath been in an unknown tongue, by the which the best part of the sacrament is unused, and as it were a blind bargain made by the godfathers in a matter of illumination; and thus in the rest of the things in which your grace differeth from the common order of the realm, where have you ground or reason, but some custom, which oftentimes is mother of many errors? and although in civil things she may be followed where she causeth quiet, yet not in religious, where she excuseth no error, as in Leviticus it is said, 'Ye shall not do after the custom of Egypt, wherein ye dwelled, nor after the custom of Canaan; no, you shall not walk in their laws, for I am your Lord God, keep you my laws and commandments.' The points wherein your grace differeth in your faith, as you call it, may be shewed where, when, how, and by whom they began since the gospel was preached, the church was planted, and the apos-ties martyred. At which time your faith depended upon the scripture, and otherwise there was no necessity to believe. For as Hierome saith, Quod de Scripturis non habet auctoritatem, eadem facilitate contemnitur qua probatur. And because your grace, as we hear say, readeth sometimes the doctors, we may alledge unto you two or three places of other principal doctors. Augustine saith, Cum Dominus tacuerit, quis nostrum dicat, illa vel illa sunt: aut si dicere audeat, unde probat? And Chrysostom's saying is not unlike; Multi, inquit, jactant spiritum sanctum, sed qui propria loquuntur, falsum illum pretendunt. And if you will take their meaning plain, read the fifth chapter of the first book of Ecclesiastica historia; and where Constantine had these words in the council. In disputationibus, inquit, rerum divinarum habetur prescripta spiritus sancti doctrina; Evangelici & Apostolici libri cum prophetarum oraculis plene nobis ostendunt sensum numinis; proinde discordia posita, sumamus ex verbis spiritus questionum explicationes. What plainer sayings may be than these to answer your fault? Again, too infinite it were to remember your grace of the great number of particular errors, crept into the church, whereupon you make your foundation. The fables of false miracles, and lowd pilgrimages may somewhat teach you. Only this we pray your grace to remember with your self, the two words that the Father said of his Son Jesus Christ, Ipsium audite. To the second point of the commodity that may follow your obedience, we having by the king's authority in this behalf, the governance of this realm, must herein be plain with your grace. And if our speech offend the same, then must your grace think it is our charge and office to find fault where it is, and our part to amend it as we may. Most sorry truly we be, that your grace, whom we should otherwise honour for the king's majesty's sake, by your own deeds should provoke us to offend you; we do perceive great discommodity to the realm by your grace's singularity, if it may be so named, in opinion; and in one respect, as you are sister to our sovereign lord and master, we most humbly beseech your grace to shew your affection continually towards him, as becometh a sister. And as your grace is a subject, and we counsellors to his majesty's estate, we let you know the example of your grace's opinion, hindereth the good weal of this realm, which thing we think, is not unknown to you; and if it be, we let your grace know, it is too true. For God's sake we beseech your grace, let nature set before your eyes the young age of the king your brother. Let reason tell you the looseness of the people; how then can you without a wailing heart think that you should be the cause of disturbance? If your grace see the king, being the ordinary ruler under God, not only of all others in the realm, but of you also, call his people by ordinary laws one way, with what heart can your grace stay yourself without following; much worse to stay other that would follow their sovereign lord? Can it be a love in you to forsake him, his rule and law, and take a private way by yourself? if it be not love, it is much less obedience. If your grace think the king's majesty to be over his people, as the head in a man's body is over the rest, not only in place but in dignity and science, how can you, being a principal member in the same body, keep the nourishment from the head? We pray your grace most earnestly, think this thing so much grieveth us, as for our private affection and goodwills to you (though we should dissemble) yet for our public office, we cannot but plainly inform your grace, not doubting but that your wisdom can judge what our office is, and if it were not your own cause, we know your grace by wisdom could charge us, if we suffered the like in any other. Truly every one of us apart honoureth your grace for our master's sake, but when we join together in public service, as in this writing we do, we judge it not tolerable, to know disorder, to see the cause, and leave it unamended. For though we would be negligent, the world would judge us. And therefore we do altogether estoons require your grace, in the king's majesty's name, that if any of your two chaplains, Mallet, or Barkley, be returned, or as soon as any of them shall return to your grace's house, the same may be, by your grace's commandment or order, sent and delivered to the sheriff of Essex, who hath commandment from the king's majesty, by order of the law and of his crown, to attach them, or if that condition shall not like your grace, yet that then he may be warned from your grace's house, and not kept there, to be as it were defended from the power of the law. Which thing we think surely neither your grace will mean, nor any of your council assent thereto. And so to make an end of our letter, being long for the matter, and hitherto deferred for our great business, we trust your grace first seeth how the usage of your chaplains differeth from the manner of our licence, and what good intent moved us to write to you in our former letters; lastly, that the things whereunto the king and the whole realm hath consented, be not only lawful and just by the policy of the realm, but also just and godly by the laws of God. So that if we, which have charge under the king, should willingly consent to the open breach of them, we could neither discharge ourselves to the king for our duties, neither to God for our conscience: the consideration of which things we pray Almighty God, by his holy spirit, to lay in the bottom of your heart, and thereupon to build such a profession in you, as both God may have his true honour, the king his due obedience, the realm concord, and we most comfort. For all the which we do heartily pray, and therewith, for the continuance of your grace's health to your hearts desire. From Westminster, the 25th of December."

"My lords, after my hearty commendations to you, although both I have been and also am loth to trouble you with my letters, yet nevertheless the news which I have lately heard, touching my chaplain doctor Mallet, forceth me thereunto at this present; for I hear by credible report, that you have committed him to the Tower, which news seem to me very strange. Notwithstanding I thought it good by these to desire you to advertise me what is the cause of his imprisonment, assuring you I would be sorry that any of mine should deserve the like punishment; and there is no creature within the king's majesty's realm would more lament, that any belonging to them should give just cause so to be used, than I would do; who would have thought much friendship in you, if you had given me knowledge wherein my said chaplain had offended, before you had ministered such punishment unto him, estoons requiring you to let me know by this bearer the truth of the matter. And thus thanking you for the short dispatch of the poor merchant of Portugal, I wish to you all no worse than to myself, and so bid you farewell. From Beaulien, the 2d of May, 1551. Your friend to my power. MARY."

"After our humble commendations to your grace, we have received your letters of the 2d of this month, by the which your grace seemeth to take it strangely, that doctor Mallet is committed to prison, whereof we have the more marvel, seeing it hath been heretofore signified unto you, that he hath offended the king's majesty's laws, and was therefore condemned, and your grace hath been by our letters earnestly desired that he might be delivered to the sheriff of Essex, according to the just process of the law, to the which all manner of persons of this realm be subject: Wherefore, howsoever it seem strange at this time to your grace, that he is imprisoned, it may seem more strange to others, that he hath escaped it thus long; and if the place, being the Tower, move your grace not to impute his imprisonment to his former offence, then we pray your grace to understand that indeed it is for the very same, and the place of the imprisonment to be at the king's majesty's pleasure, from whom, besides the charge of his laws, we have express commandment to do that we do. And so we beseech your grace to think of us, that neither in this case, nor in any other, we mean to do any other than minister and see, as much as in our power lieth, justice ministered indifferently to all persons. Which doing, then we think your grace should not think it any lack of friendship that we did not certify you of the offence of your chaplain, although indeed the cause hath already been certified. And we trust your grace, both of your natural nearness to the king's majesty, and your own good wisdom, will not mislike our ministry in the execution of the laws of the realm, and the pleasure of the king's majesty. So we wish to your grace,

Mary to the Council, the 11th of May, 1551.

"My lords, it appeareth by your letters of the sixth of this present which I have received, that the imprisonment of my chaplain, doctor Mallet, is for saying of mass, and that he was condemned for the same. Indeed I have heard that he was indicted, but never condemned. Nevertheless I must needs confess and say, that he did it, but by my commandment; and I said unto him, that none of my chaplains should be in danger of the law for saying mass in my house. And thereof to put him out of doubt, the emperor's ambassador that dead is, declared unto him before that time, how and after what sort the promise was made to his majesty, whereby it appeareth, that the man hath not in that willingly offended. Wherefore I pray you to discharge him of imprisonment, and set him at liberty: if not, ye minister cause, not only to him, but to others, to think that I have declared more than was true, which I would not wittingly do, to gain the whole world. And herein, as I have often said, the emperor's majesty can be best judge. And to be plain with you, according to mine own custom, there is not one amongst the whole number of you all, that would be more loth to be found untrue of their word than I. And well I am assured, that none of you have found it in me. My lords, I pray you seek not so much my dishonour, as to disprove my word, whereby it shall appear too plain, that you handle me not well. And if you have cause to charge my chaplain for this matter, lay that to me, and I will discharge it again, by your promise made to the emperor's majesty, which you cannot rightfully deny; wishing rather that you had refused it in the beginning, than after such promise made, and to such a person, to seem to go from it; which, my lords, as your very friend, I heartily desire you to consider, and to give me no cause to think you otherwise than my friends, considering I have always, and yet do (God is my judge) wish to you all no worse, neither in souls nor bodies, than to myself, and so, with my hearty commendations, I commit you all to God. From Beaulieu the 11th of May. Your assured friend to my power, MARY."

The Council to the Lady Mary, the 27th of May, 1551.

"After our due commendations to your grace, although the same receiveth not answer so soon, as perchance was looked for upon the return of your grace's servant: yet we doubt not but your grace understanding that where we have matters of estate pertaining to the king's majesty in hand, as indeed we have had of late, the deferring of the answer, in a matter being no greater, requireth to be borne withal. And touching the answer of your grace's letter for doctor Mallet, we pray your grace to understand, that although you write he was indicted, he was not condemned, and so seem to take exception at the manner of his imprisonment: yet if they which informed your grace of that manner of reason in the law, were as well disposed to please your grace with truth, as the reason indeed is not true, then should they have told your grace that, by the act of parliament, if either Mallet have been convicted by the oaths of twelve men, or that the fact have been notorious, then the punishment doth follow justly. The truth of the one and the other way of conviction in this case is notorious enough, besides his flying from the process of the law. And where your grace, to relieve him, would take the fault upon yourself, we are sorry to perceive your grace so ready to be a defence to one that the king's law doth condemn. Nevertheless, he is not punished because your grace bad him, and willed him to do that which was an offence, but he is punished for doing it; and if we should not so see the king's laws executed without respect, it might appear that we too much neglected our duty: and for that your grace taketh it as a discredit to yourself, that he should be punished for that you bad him do, alledging to him that you had authority so to do, and that so promise was made to the emperor, it hath been both written, and said to your grace, what is truth in that behalf. And howsoever that your grace pretendeth your licence to have mass said before yourself, for a time of your reconciliation, it had been far out of reason to have desired that whosoever was your chaplain might say mass in any house that was yours, when your grace's self was not there; for so is doctor Mallet's offence, for saying mass at one of your houses where your grace was not, which thing as it was never granted, so do we not remember that ever it was demanded. The suit that hath been at any time made, either by the emperor's ambassador that dead is, or by him that now is, was never but in respect of your grace, and not to be taken that the emperor or his ambassador meant to privilege master Dr. Mallet, or any other, to say mass out of your presence. Wherefore as we do plainly write to your grace, so do we pray you to take it in good part, and think we be as ready to do our due reverence towards your grace in any thing we may do with our duty to our master, as any your grace may command; and of such wisdom we know your grace to be, that ye should judge the better of us, for that we be diligent to see the laws of the realm executed, wherein resteth the strength and safeguard of the king's majesty our sovereign lord and master."

The Lady Mary to the Lords of the Council, the 21st of June, 1551.

"My lords; Although I received by my servant, this bearer, (who lately delivered unto you my letters, wherein I desired to have my chaplain, Dr. Mallet, discharged of his imprisonment) your gentle message in general words, for the which I give you most hearty thanks;

yet have I no knowledge whether you will set him at liberty or not; but I think that your weighty affairs at that time was the let and cause ye did not write, for else I doubt not but ye would have answered me. Wherefore not being satisfied, and understanding ye would gladly pleasure me, I thought good fitsoons to desire you that my said chaplain may have his liberty, wherein I assure you ye shall much gratify me, being not a little troubled, that he is so long in prison without just cause, seeing the matter of his imprisonment is discharged by the promise made to the emperor's majesty, as in my late letter I declared unto you. Wherefore my lords, I pray you let me have knowledge by this bearer, how ye will use me in this matter; wherein if ye do pleasure me accordingly, then shall it well appear that ye regard the aforesaid promise, and I will not forget your gentleness therein, God willing, but requite it to my power. And thus with my hearty commendations to you all, I bid you farewell. From Beaulieu the 21st of June.

Your assured friend to my power, MARY."

The Council to the Lady Mary the 24th of June, 1551.

"After our humble commendations to your grace, we have received your grace's letter of the one and twentieth hereof, wherein is received the same request that in your former letters hath been made for the release of doctor Mullet, and therein also your grace seemeth to have looked for the same answer of your former letter, the which indeed partly was omitted (as your grace conjectureth) by the reason of the king's majesty's affairs, wherewith we be thoroughly occupied; partly for that we had no other thing to answer, than you had heretofore heard in the same matter. And therefore where your grace desireth a resolute answer, we assure the same we be right sorry for the matter, and that it should be your grace's chance to move it, sith we cannot with our duties to the king's majesty accomplish your desire. So necessary a thing it is to see the laws of the realm executed indifferently in all manner of persons, and in these cases of contempt of the ecclesiastical orders of this church of England, that the same may not, without the great displeasure of God, and the slander of the state, be neglected: and therefore your grace may please to understand, that we have not only punished your chaplain, but all such others whom we find in like case to have disobeyed the laws of the king's majesty. And touching the excuse your grace oftentimes useth, of a promise made, we assure your grace, none of us all, nor any other of the council, as your grace hath been certified, hath ever been privy to any such promise, otherwise than hath been written. And in that matter your grace had plain answer both by us of the king's majesty's council, at your being last in his majesty's presence; and therein also your grace might perceive his majesty's determination; whereunto we beseech your grace not only to inclind yourself, but also to judge well of us that do addict ourselves to you. And so also shall we be ready to give our hearts, our due reverence towards you, whose preservation we commend to Almighty God with our prayer."

The Lady Mary's Letter to the King's Majesty.

"My duty most humbly remembered to your majesty; it may please the same to be advertised, that I have received by my servants your most honourable letters, the contents whereof do not a little trouble me, and so much the more, for that any of my said servants should move or attempt me in matters touching my soul, which I think the meanest subject within your highness realm could evil bear at their servants hands, having for my part utterly refused heretofore to talk with them in such matters, and of all other persons least regarded them therein, to whom I have declared what I think, as she which trusted that your majesty would have suffered me your poor sister and beadwoman to have used the accustomed mass, which the king your father and mine with all his predecessors did evermore use. Wherein also I have been brought up from my youth. And thereunto my conscience doth not only bind me, which by no means will suffer me to think one thing, and do another, but also the promise made to the emperor by your majesties council was an assurance to me, that in so doing I should not offend the laws, although they seem now to qualify and deny the thing. And at my last waiting upon your majesty, I was so bold to declare my mind and conscience to the same, and desired your highness, rather than you should constrain me to leave mass, to take away my life, whereunto your majesty made me a very gentle answer. And now I most humbly beseech your highness to give me leave to write what I think touching your majesty's letters. Indeed, they be signed with your own hand, and nevertheless (in mine opinion) not your majesty's in effect, because it is well known (as heretofore I have declared in the presence of your highness) that although our Lord be praised, your majesty hath far more knowledge and greater gifts than other of your years, yet it is not possible that your highness can at these years be a judge in matters of Religion: and therefore I take it that the matter in your letters proceedeth from such as do wish those things to take place which be most agreeable to themselves, by whose doings, your majesty not offended, I intend not to rule my conscience. And thus without molesting your highness any further, I humbly beseech the same, even for God's sake, to bear with me as you have done, and not to think that by my doings or example any inconvenience might grow to your majesty or your realm: for I use it not after such sort, putting no doubt but in time to come, whether I live or die, your majesty shall perceive that mine intent is grounded upon a true love towards you, whose royal estate I beseech Almighty God long to continue, which is and shall be in my power according to my duty. And I have obeyed of your majesty for my good letters, if neither at my commandment, nor for the regard of the promise made to the emperor, your highness will suffer and bear with me as you have done, till your majesty may be a judge herein yourself, and rightly understand their proceedings, (of which your goodness yet I despair not :) otherwise rather than to offend God and my conscience, I offer my body at your will, and death shall be more welcome than life with a troubled conscience; most humbly beseeching your majesty to pardon my slowness in answering your letters. For mine old disease would not suffer me to write any sooner. And thus I pray Almighty God to keep your majesty in all virtue and honour, with good health and long life to his pleasure. From my poor house at Copped Hall the 19th of August. Your majesty's most humble sister, MARY."

The King's Letters to the Lady Mary.

"Right dear and right entirely beloved sister, we greet you well, and let you know that it grieveth us much to perceive no amendment in you, of that which we for God's cause, your soul's health, our conscience, and the common tranquillity of our realm, have so long desired: assuring you that our sufferance hath much more demonstration of natural love, than contentation of our conscience, and foresight of our safety. Wherefore although you give us occasion, as much almost as in you is, to diminish our natural love; yet we be loth to feel it decay, and mean not to be so careless of you as we be provoked.—And therefore meaning your weal, and therewith joining a care not to be found guilty in our conscience to God, having cause to require forgiveness that we have so long for respect of love toward you omitted our bounden duty, we send at this present our right trusty and right well-beloved counsellor the lord Rich chancellor of England, and our trusty and right well-beloved counsellors, sir Anthony Wingfield, knight, controller of our household, and sir Wm. Paget, knight, one of our principal secretaries, in message to you, touching the order of your house, willing you to give them firm credit in those things they shall say to you from us, and do there in our name. Given under our signet at our castle of Windsor, the 24th of August, in the first year of our reign."

The King's Instructions given to the said Lord Chancellor, sir R. Wingfield, and sir Wm. Paget, knights, &c. 24th of August, 1551.

"First you the said lord chancellor and your colleagues shall make your immediate repair to the said lady Mary, giving to her his majesty's hearty commendations, and shew the cause of your coming to be as followeth.—Although his majesty hath long time, as well by his majesty's own mouth and writing, as by his council, travelled that the said lady being his sister, and a principal subject and member of his

realm, should both be indeed and also shew herself conformable to the laws and ordinances of the realm, in the profession and rites of religion, using all the gentle means of exhortation and advise that could be devised, to the intent that the reformation of the fault might willingly come of herself, as the expectation and desire of his majesty and all good wise men was: yet notwithstanding his majesty seeth that hitherto no manner of amendment hath followed, but by the continuance of the error and manifest breach of his laws no small peril consequently may hap to the state of his realm, especially the sufferance of such a fault being directly to the dishonour of God, and the great offence of his majesty's conscience, and all other good men: and therefore of late, even with the consent and advice of the whole state of his privy council, and divers others of the nobility of his realm, whose names ye may repeat, if you think convenient, his majesty did resolutely determine it just, necessary and expedient, that her grace should not in any wise use or maintain the private mass, or any other manner of service, than such as by the law of the realm is authorised and allowed; and to participate this his majesty's determination to her grace, it was thought in respect of a favourable proceeding with herself, to have the same, not only to be manifested by her own officers and servants, being most esteemed with her, but also to be executed with them in her house, as well for the quiet proceeding in the very matter, as for the less molesting of her grace with any message by strangers, in that time of her solitariness, wherein her grace was then by reason of the late sickness. For which purpose her three servants, Rochester, Englefield, and Walgrave were sent in message in this manner. First to deliver his majesty's letter to her, next to discharge the complaints of saying mass, and prohibiting all the household from hearing any. Wherein the king's majesty perceiveth upon their own report, being returned to the court, how negligently, and indeed how falsely, they have executed their commandment and charge, contrary to the duty of good subjects, and to the manifest contempt of his majesty. Inasmuch as manifestly they have before his majesty's council refused to do that which pertaineth to every true faithful subject, to the offence so far of his majesty and derogation of his authority, that in no wise the punishment of them could be forborn: and yet in the manner of the punishment of them, his majesty and his council hath such consideration and respect of her person, being his sister, that without doubt his majesty could not with honour have had the like consideration or favour in the punishment of the dearest counsellor he hath, if any of them had so offended: and therefore his majesty hath sent you three not only to declare to her grace the causes of their sending thither of late his officers in message, but also the causes of their absence now presently. And further, in the default of the said officers, to take order, as well with her chaplains, as with the whole household, that his majesty's laws may be there observed. And in the communication with her, you shall take occasion to answer in his majesty's name certain points of her Letter, sent now lately to his majesty. The copy of which letter is now also sent you to peruse, for your better instruction how to proceed therein. First, her allegation of the promise made to the emperor must be so answered, as the truth of the matter serveth, whereof every of you have heard sufficient testimony divers times in the council. For her offering of her body at the king's will, rather than to change her conscience, it grieveth his majesty much, that her conscience is so settled in error, and yet no such thing is meant of his majesty, nor of any one of his council once to hurt, or will evil to her body, but even from the bottom of their heart they wish to her Mentem sanam in corpore sano. And therefore ye shall do very well to persuade her grace, that this proceeding cometh only of the conscience the king hath to avoid the offence of God, and of necessary counsel and wisdom to see his laws in so weighty causes executed. Item, because it is thought that Rochester had the care and consideration of her grace's provision of household, and by his absence the same might either be disordered or disurnished; his majesty hath sent a trusty skilful man of his own household, to serve her grace for the time. Who also is sufficiently instructed of Rochester of the state of her things of household. And if there shall be any thing lacking in the same, his majesty's pleasure is, that his servant shall advertise his own chief officers of household, to the intent if the same may be supplied of any store here or other where helped conveniently, her grace shall not lack.—Item, having thus proceeded with her grace, as for the declaration of the causes of your coming, ye shall likewise to be called afore you the chaplains, and the rest of the household there present, and in the king's majesty's name most straitly forbid the chaplains either to say or use any mass or kind of service, other than by the law is authorised; and likewise ye shall forbid all the rest of the company to be present at any such prohibited service, upon pain to be most straitly punished, as worthily falling into the danger of the king's indignation, and alike charge to them all, that if any such offence shall be openly or secretly committed, they shall advertise some of his majesty's council. In the which clause ye shall use the reasons of their natural duty and allegiance that they owe as subjects to their sovereign lord, which derogateth all other earthly duties.—Item, if you shall find either any of the priests, or any other person, disobedient to this order, ye shall commit them forthwith to prison, as ye shall think convenient.—Item, forasmuch as ye were privy to the determination at Richmond, and there understood how necessary it was to have reformation herein; his majesty upon the great confidence he hath in your wisdom and uprightness, remiteth to your discretion the manner of the proceeding herein, if any thing shall chance to arise there that in your opinions might otherwise than according to these instructions, conduce you to the execution of your charge, which in one sum is to avoid the use of the private mass, and other unlawful service in the house of the said Lady Mary.—Item, ye shall devise by some means as you may, to have understanding after your departure, how the order you give is observed, and as you shall judge fit, to certify hither."

44. Proceedings against STEPHEN GARDINER, bishop of Winchester, for opposing the Reformation of Religion, and disobeying the King's Orders and Injunctions respecting the same: 5 Edw. VI. A. D. 1551. [Fox's Acts and Monum. 711.]

FIRST we will set before the reader the copy of a certain Writ or Evidence against the said Bishop, wherein, as in a brief sum, generally is described the whole order and manner of his misordered demeanour, copied out of the public Records in manner as followeth:

The Writ or Evidence touching the Order and Manner of the Misdeameor of Winchester, with Declaration of the Faults wherewith he was justly charged.

"Whereas the king's majesty, by the advice of the Lord Protector and the rest of his highness's privy council, thinking requisite for sundry urgent considerations to have a general visitation throughout the whole realm, did about ten months past address forth Commissioners, and by the advice of sundry bishops and other the best learned men of the realm, appointed certain orders or injunctions to be generally observed; which being such as in some part touched the reformation of many abuses, and in other parts concerned the good governance and quiet of the realm, were (as reason would) of all men of all sorts obediently received, and reverently observed and executed, saving only of the bishop of Winchester, who as well by conference with other, as by open protestation and letters also, shewed such a willful disobedience therein, as if it had not been quickly espied, might have bred much unquietness and trouble: upon the knowledge thereof he being sent for, and his lewd proceedings laid to his charge, in the presence of the whole council, so used himself, (as well in denying to receive the said Orders and Injunctions, as otherwise) as he was thought worthy most sharp punishment: and yet considering the place he had been in, he was only sequestered to the Fleet, where after he had remained a certain time, as much at his ease as if he had been at his own house, upon his promise of conformity he was both set at liberty again, and also licensed to repair to and remain in his diocese at his pleasure. Where when he was, forgetting his duty, and what promise he had made, he began forthwith to set forth such matters, as bred again more strife, variance, and contention in that one small city and shire, than was almost in the whole realm after. Besides that, the lord protector's grace and the council were informed, that, to withstand such as he thought to have been sent from their grace and lordships into those parts, he had caused all his servants to be secretly armed and harnessed, and moreover when such preachers, as being men of godly life and learning, were sent into that diocese by his grace and lordships to preach the word of God, had appointed to preach, the bishop, to disappoint and disgrace them, and to hinder his majesty's proceedings, did occupy the pulpit himself, not fearing in his sermon to warn the people to beware of such new preachers, and to embrace none other doctrine but that which he had taught them, (than the which words none could have been spoken more perilous and seditious.) Whereupon, being eftsoons sent for, and their grace and lordships objecting to him many particular matters, wherewith they had just cause to charge him, they did in the end upon his second promise leave him at liberty, only willing him to remain at his house at London, because they thought it most meet to sequester him from his diocese for a time; and being come to his house, he began afresh to ruffle and meddle in matters, wherein he had neither commission nor authority; part whereof touched the king's majesty. Whereof being yet once again admonished by his grace and their lordships, he did not only promise to conform himself in all things like a good subject, but also because he understood that he was diversly reported of, and many were also offended with him, he offered to declare to the world his conformity, and promised in an open sermon so to open his mind in sundry articles agreed upon, that such as had been offended, should have no more cause to be offended, but well satisfied in all things. Declaring further, that as his own conscience was well satisfied, and liked well the king's proceedings within this realm, so would he utter his conscience abroad, to the satisfaction and good quiet of others. And yet all this notwithstanding, at the day appointed, he did not only most arrogantly and disobediently, and that in the presence of his majesty, their grace and lordships, and of such an audience as the like whereof hath not lightly been seen, speak of certain matters contrary to an express commandment given to him on his majesty's behalf, both by mouth and by letters, but also in the rest of the articles whereunto he had agreed before, used such a matter of utterance as was very like even there presently, to have stirred a great tumult, and in certain great matters touching the policy of the realm, handled himself so colourably, as therein he showed himself an open great offender, and a very seditious man: forsomuch as these his proceedings were of such sort, as being suffered to escape unpunished might breed innumerable inconveniences, and that the clemencies shewed to him afore, by their grace and lordships, did work in him no good effect, but rather a pride and boldness to demean himself more and more disobediently against his majesty's and his grace's proceedings, it was determined by their grace and lordships, that he should be committed to the Tower, and be conveyed thither by sir Anthony Wingfield, and that at the time of his committing, sir Ralph Sadler and William Hunnings, clerk of the council, should seal up the doors of such places in his house as they should think meet; all which was done accordingly."—By this evidence abovementioned, first here is of the reader to be noted, how lewdly and disobediently the said Stephen Gardiner misused himself in the king's general visitation, in denying to receive such orders and injunctions, as for the which he justly deserved much more severe punishment, albeit the king with his uncle the lord protector, more gently proceeding with him, were contented only to make him taste the Fleet. In the which house, as his durance was not long, so his intreating and ordering was very easy. Out of the which Fleet, divers and sundry letters he wrote to the lord protector and other of the council, certain also to the archbishop of Canterbury, and some to master Ridley bishop of London; the particulars were too long here to rehearse, considering how this book is overcharged as ye see already; and especially seeing the same to be notified in our first edition sufficiently, as is aforesaid. Wherefore, omitting the rehearsal of these said letters, and referring the reader to the book aforesaid, I will only repeat one letter of the said bishop, with the answers of the lord protector unto the same; the contents whereof be these as follow.

A Letter of Winchester to Master Vaughan.

"Master Vaughan, after my right hearty commendations: In my last letters to my lord protector, signifying, according to the general commandment by letters given to all justices of peace, the state of this shire, I declared (as I supposed true) the shire to be in good order, quiet, and conformity, for I had not then heard of any alteration in this shire, which the said letters of commandment did forbid. Now of late within these two days, I have heard of a great and detestable (if it be true that is told me) innovation in the town of Portsmouth, where the images of Christ and his saints have been most contemptuously pulled down, and spitefully handled. Herein I thought good both to write to you and the mayor, the king's majesty's chief ministers, as well to know the truth, as to consult with you for the reformation of it, to the intent I may be seen to discharge

my duty, and discharging it indeed both to God and to the king's majesty, under whom I am here appointed to have cure, and care to relieve such as be by any ways fallen, and preserve the rest that stand from like danger. Ye are a gentleman with whom I have had acquaintance, and whom I know to be wise, and esteem to have more knowledge, wisdom, and discretion, than to allow any such enormities, and therefore I do the more willingly consult with you herein, with request friendly to know of you the very truth in the matter, who be the doers, and the circumstances of it, and whether you think the matter so far gone with the multitude, and whether the reproof and disproving of the deed, might without a further danger be enterprised in the pulpit, or not, minding, if it may so be, to send one thither for that purpose upon Sunday next coming. I would use preaching as it should not be occasion of any further folly where a folly is begun, and to a multitude, persuaded in the opinion of destruction of images, I would never preach. For (as Scripture willesh us) we should cast no precious stones before hogs. Such as be infected with that opinion, they be hogs and worse than hogs, if there be any grosser beasts than hogs be, and have been ever so taken, and in England they are called Lollards, who denying images, thought therewithal the crafts of painting and graving to be generally superfluous and naught, and against God's laws.—In Germany, such as maintained that opinion of destroying of images, were accounted the dregs cast out by Luther after he had tunned all his brewings in Christ's religion, and so taken as hogs meat. For the reproof of whom Luther wrote a book specially, and I have with mine eyes seen the images standing in all churches, where Luther was had in estimation. For the destruction of images containeth an enterprise to subvert religion and the state of the world with it, and especially the nobility, who by images set forth and spread abroad to be read of all people, their lineage, parentage, with remembrance of their state and acts; and the pursuivant carrieth not on his breast the king's name written with such letters as a few can spell, but such as all can read, be they never so rude, being great known letters in images of three lions, and three flowers de luce, and other beasts holding those arms. And he that cannot read the scripture written about the king's great seal, yet he can read saint George on horseback on the one side, and the king sitting in his majesty on the other side, and readeth so much written in those images, as if he be an honest man, he will put off his cap, and although if the seal were broken by chance, he would and might make a candle of it, yet he would not be noted to have broken the seal for that purpose, or to call it a piece of wax only whilst it continueth whole. And if by reviling of stocks and stones, in which matter images be graven, the setting of the truth to be read in them of all men shall be contemned; how shall such thing continue in honour as is comprised in clouds and pitch, whereof and whereupon our books be made, such as few can skill of, and not the hundredth part of the realm? and if we a few that can read, because we read in one sort of letters, so privileged as they have many reliefs, shall pull away the books of the rest, and would have our letters only in estimation, and blind all them, shall not they have just cause to mistrust what is meant? And if the cross be a truth, and if it be true that Christ suffered, why may we not have a writing thereof, such as all can read, that is to say an image? If this opinion should proceed, when the king's majesty hereafter should shew his person, his lively image, the honour due by God's law among such might continue; but as for the king's standards, his banners, his arms should hardly continue in their due reverence for fear of Lollards idolatry, which they gather upon scripture beastly, not only untruly. The scripture reproveth false images made of stocks and stones, and so it doth false men made of flesh and bones.—When the emperor's money was shewed to Christ, wherein was the image of the emperor, Christ condemned not that image calling it an idol, nor noted that money to be against God's law, because it had an image in it, as though it were against the precept of God, Thou shalt have no graven image; but taught them good civility, in calling it the emperor's image, and bid them use the money as it was ordered to be used in his right use.—There is no scripture that reproveth truth, and all scripture reproveth falsehood. False writings, false books, false images and false men, all be nought, to be contemned and despised; as for paper, ink, parchment, stones, wood, bones, A. B. of the Chancery hand, and A. B. of the Secretary hand, a letter of Germany fashion, or of any other form, they be all of one estimation, and may be, of man inclining to the devil, used for falsehood, or applying to God's gracious calling, used to set forth truth. It is a terrible matter to think, that this false opinion conceived against images should trouble any man's head: and such as I have known vexed with that devil (as I have known some) be nevertheless wonderously obstinate in it: and if they can find one that can spell Latin to help forth their madness, they be more obdurate than ever were the Jews, and slander whatsoever is said to them for their relief. Of this sort I know them to be, and therefore if I wish there were many of that sort with you, I would not irritate them by preaching without fruit, but labour for reformation to my Lord Protector. But if you thought there might be other ways used first to a good effect, I would follow your advice, and proceeding with you and the mayor, with both your helps to do that may lie in me to the redress of the matter; which I take to be such an enterprise against Christ's religion, as there cannot be a greater by man excogitate with the devil's instigation, and at this time much hurtful to the common state, as ye can of your wisdom consider. Whom I heartily desire and pray to send me answer by this bearer to these my letters, to the intent I may use myself in sending of a preacher thither, or writing to my Lord Protector, as the case shall require accordingly. And thus fare you heartily well. From my house at Wolvesey, the 3rd of May, 1547. STEPH WINT.

After hearty commendations, I received of late two letters from your lordship, the one inclosed in a letter of master Vaughan's to us, and directed to him, the other directed straight unto us, very wittily and learnedly written, whereby we do perceive how earnest you are that no innovations should be had. The which mind of yours as we do highly esteem and allow, proceeding from one that would quietness, so we would likewise wish, that you should take good heed that too much fear of innovation or disturbance doth not cause both of them to be. Many times in an host, he that crieth enemies! enemies! when there be none, causeth not only disturbance, but sometimes a mutiny or rebellion to be made, and he that for fear of a sickness to come taketh unadvisedly a purgation, sometimes maketh himself sick indeed. We perceive by the said your letters, that hainous facts and words have been brought to your cares, than there was cause why: and those facts which were punishable be already by him redrest.—For the matter of Images, an order was taken in the late king of famous memory our sovereign lord's days. When the abused images (yet lurking in some places by negligence of them who should ere this time have looked unto the same), be now abolished, let not that be a matter of the abolishing of all images. Though felons and adulterers be punished, all men be not slain. Though the images which did adulterate God's glory be taken away, we may not think by and by all manner of images to be destroyed. Yet after our advice, better it were for a time to abolish them all, than that for the dead images the king's loving subjects, being faithful and true to the king's majesty, should be put to variance and disturbance. With quietness the magistrates and rulers shall keep them well in order, whom contentious preachers might irritate and provoke to disorder and strife. So it must be provided that the king's majesty's images, arms and ensigns, should be honoured and worshipped, after the decent order and invention of human laws and ceremonies, and nevertheless that other images, contrary to God's ordinances and laws, should not be made partakers of that reverence, adoration and invocation, which (forbidden by God) should derogate his honour, and be occasion to accumulate God's wrath upon us. Where they be taken for a remembrance, it maketh no great matter though they stand still in the church or market stand, following the late king of famous memory his counsel and order; yet more gentleness was shewed to those books of images, than to the true and unfeigned books of God's word, both being abused, the one with idolatry, the other with contention. The Scripture was removed for a time from certain persons, and almost from all: the images were left still to them who most did abuse them, the thing being yet closed from them which should teach the use. Wherefore it may appear unto us meet, more diligenter heed to be taken that the abused before be not abused again, the advantage of some priests, simplicity of laymen, and great inclination of man's nature to idolatry giving cause thereto.—They that condemn images, because the matter that they are made of is but vile, as stocks and stones, may likewise despise printing in paper because the ink hath pitch in it, and the paper is made of old rags. And if they be both alike, it might be reasoned why a man should be more aggrieved, that an image of wood, though it were of St. Anne, or St. Margaret, should be burned, than he will that the Bible, wherein the undoubted word of God is comprised, should be torn in pieces, burned or made paste of. Nor do we now speak of false Bibles, nor false gospels, but of the very true gospel, either in Latin, Greek, or English, which we see every day done, and sometime commanded, because the translator displeaseth us; and yet herein no man exclaimeth of a terrible and detestable fact done. But let one image either for age, and because it is worm-eaten, or because it hath been foolishly abused, be burnt or abolished, by and by some men are in exceeding rage, as though not a stock or a stone, but a true saint of flesh and bone should be cast into the fire, which were a detestable and a terrible sight. We cannot see but that images may be counted marvellous books to whom we have kneeled, whom we have kissed, upon whom we have rubbed our beads and handkerchiefs, unto whom we have lighted candles, of whom we have asked pardon and help, which thing hath seldom been seen done to the gospel of God, or the very true Bible. For who kissed that but the priest at the mass, at a painted picture, or in such a ceremony? Or who kneeleth unto it, or setteth a candle before it? and yet it seeth or heareth, as well as the images or pictures either of St. John, or our Lady, or Christ.—Indeed images be great letters; yet as big as they be, we have seen many which have read them amiss. And be like they be so likely to be read amiss, that God himself, fearing the Jews to become evil readers of them, generally did forbid them. Nor is it any great marvel though in reading of them the lay-people are many times deceived, when your lordship, as appeareth, hath not truly read a most true and a most common image. Your lordship hath found out, in the king's highness great seal, St. George on horseback, which the graver never made in it, nor the sealer ever sealed with it; and this inscription is not very little, and if it were, it could not escape your lordship's eyes. As the inscription testifieth, the king's image is on both the sides; on the one side as in war the chief captain; on the other side as in peace the liege sovereign; in harness with his sword drawn to defend his subjects; in his robes in the seat of justice with his sceptre rightfully to rule and govern them, as he whom both in peace and war we acknowledge our most natural and chiefest head, ruler and governor. If it were St. George, my lord, where is his spear and dragon? And why should the inscription round about tell an untruth, and not agree to the image? Yet it is called sometimes so of the rude and ignorant people; but not by and by, that, that is commonly called so, is always truest. And some have thought that by like deceiving, as your lordship herein appeareth to have been deceived, the image of Belerophon or Perseus was turned first and appointed to be St. George, and of Polyphemus, of Hercules, or of some other Colossus, to be St. Christopher, because authentical histories have not fully proved their two lives. But those be indifferent to be true or not true, either thus invented upon some devise, or rising of a true fact or history, and whether it were true or not, it maketh no great matter.—It were hardly done indeed, my lord, if that you, and a few which can read, should take away from the unlearned multitude their books of their images: but it were more hardly done, if that you or a few which can read in one or two languages, (as Greek and Latin) the word of God, and have had thereby many reliefs and privileges, should pull away the English books from the rest which only understand English; and would have only your letters of Greek and Latin in estimation, and bind all them, which understand not these languages, from the knowledge of God's word. And indeed, my lord, by your saying, they have just occasion to suspect what is meant.—What you mean by true images and false images, it is not so easy to perceive. If they be only false images, which have nothing that they represent, as St. Paul writeth, An idol is nothing, because there is no such god, and therefore the cross can be no false image, because it is true that Christ suffered upon it: then the image of the sun and the moon were no idols, for such things there be as the sun and the moon, and they were in the image then so represented, as painting and carving doth represent them. And the image of Ninus and Cesar, and (as some write) the images of all the 12 chosen gods (as they called them) were the images of once living men. And it might be said that the image of God the Father hath no such eyes, nose, lips, and a long grey beard, with a furred robe, nor ever had, as they carve and paint him to have: But if that be a false image and an idol which is otherwise worshipped and accepted than it ought to be, as the brazen serpent, being a true image and representation of Christ, by abuse was made an idol; it may be thought in times past, and peradventure now at this time, in some places, the images not only of St. John or St. Anne, but of our lady and Christ be false images and idols, representing to foolish, blind and ignorant mens hearts and thoughts, that which was not in them, and they ought not to be made for. The which were by you, my lord, to have been removed sooner, and before that the captain there should have need to have done it. But if your lordship be slack in such matters, he that removeth false images and idols abused doth not a thing worthy of blame.—Christ called not the money, having Cesar's image in it, an idol, when it was used to lawful uses, and to pay the due tribute withal. But when a man doth not use those images graven in money to do his neighbour good and the commonwealth service, saint Paul, Christ's disciple, called that covetousness, and the serving and bondage to idols. So that even in money may be idolatry, if we make too much of those images which Christ here doth not reprehend. There be some so ticklish and so fearful one ways, and so tender stomached, that they can abide no old abuses to be reformed, but think every reformation to be a capital enterprise against all religion and good order: as there be on the contrary side some too rash, who having no consideration what is to be done, headlong will set upon every thing. The magistrate's duty is betwixt these, so in a mean to see and provide that old doting should not take further or deeper rust in the commonwealth, neither ancient error overcome the seen and tried truth nor long abuse, for the age and space of time only, still be suffered: and yet all these with quietness and gentleness, and without all contention, if it were possible, to be reformed. To the which your lordship, as a man to whom God hath given great qualities of wit, learning, and persuasion, could bring great help and furtherance, if it were your pleasure, with great thanks of men and reward of God. The which thing is our full desire and purpose, and our hearty and daily prayer to God, that in the king's majesty's time, whose majesty's reign God preserve, all abuses with wisdom reformed, Christ's religion with good and politic order of the Commonwealth, without any contention and strife among the king's subjects, might flourish and daily increase. And this to your lordships letter sent to master Vaughan of Portsmouth.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

May it please your grace to understand, that I have noted some points in my lord of Saint David's sermon, which I send unto you herewith, whereby to declare unto you some part what I think, for the whole I cannot express: somewhat I shall incumber you with my babbling, but he hath incumbered some friends more with his tattling. And alas, my lord, this is a piteous case, that having so much business as ye have, these inward disorders should be added unto them, to the courage of such as would this realm any ways evil. For this is the thing they would desire, with hope thereby to disorder this realm, being now a time rather to repair that which needeth reparation, than to make any new buildings which they pretend. Quiet, tranquillity, unity, and concord shall maintain estimation. The contrary may animate the enemy to attempt that which was never thought on, which God forbid. There was never attempt of alteration made in England, but upon comfort of discord at home, and woe be to them that mind it. If my lord of Saint David's, or such others, have their head cumbered with any new platform, I would wish they were commanded, between this and the king's majesty's full age, to draw the plat, diligently to hew the stones, dig the sand, and chop the chalk in the unseasonable time of building, and when the king's majesty cometh to full age, to present their labours to him, and in the mean time not to disturb the state of the realm, whereof your grace is protector, but that you may in every part of religion, laws, lands, and decrees (which four contain the state) deliver the same unto our sovereign lord, according unto the trust you be put in, which shall be much to your honour, and as all honest men wish and desire. To which desired effect there can be nothing so noisome and contrarious, as trouble and disquiet. Wherein your grace shall be specially troubled, as on whose shoulders all the weight lieth; and whatsoever shall happen amiss by the faults of other, shall be imputed to your grace, as doer thereof, or wanting foresight in time to withstand the same. And albeit that you mind not to be faulty in either, yet if the effect be not to the realm as it were to be wished, the priuce though he were of age should be excused, and the governors bear the blame. And this is the infelicity of preheminece and authority, and specially in this realm, as stories make mention, which should not discourage you, for you need fear nothing without, if quiet be reserved at home; and at home if the beginning be resisted, the intended folly may easily be interrupted. But if my brother of Saint David's may like a champion with his sword in his hand, make enter for the rest, the door of licence opened, there shall more by folly thrust in with him than your grace would wish. Thus, as I think, I write homely to your grace; because you were content I should write, wherein I consider only to have all things well. And because your grace is the protector, and the chief director of the realm, to present unto your wisdom, what my folly is, I have been oftentimes blamed for fearing over much, and yet I have had an inking that they that so blamed me, feared even as much as I. Being in the state that you be in, it shall be ever commendable to foresee the worst. In quiet ye be strong; in trouble ye be greatly weak, and bring yourself in danger of one part, when parties be, therewith one to scourge the other. Whereas in concord they be both yours, in an honest, reverent, lovely fear to do their duty, which I doubt not your wisdom can consider. And consider also how noisome any other outward incumber might be in the time of the minority of our sovereign lord. I told the emperor's council, That our late sovereign lord did much for the emperor, to enter war with him, and to put his realm in his old days in the adventure of fortune, whether he should enjoy it or no, for that is the nature of war. And sometime the contemned and abject have had the upper hand. And when ye administer the realm for another, it were a marvellous question of him that shall enjoy the realm, to say, what meant you in the time of administration to adventure my realm; Why took ye not rather for the time of my minority any peace whatsoever it were, which is better than the best war, as some men have written? I know you have authority sufficient, and wisdom plenty, and yet being entered to write, I forget for the time what ye be, and commune with you as I were talking at Brussels with you, devising of the world at large. And if I were sworn to say what I think of the state of the world, I would for a time let Scots be Scots, with despair to have them, unless it were by conquest, which shall be a goodly enterprise for our young master when he cometh to age. And in the mean time prepare him money for it, and set the realm in an order which it hath need of. And for a stay, if the emperor would offer the king of Romans' daughter, as he did: do with him in our minister's minority, as he did with us in his, whereby all this hath chanced unto him. And by this alliance your estimation shall encrease, and our sovereign lord's surety not a little encrease and be augmented. For of France it must be taken for a rule, they be so wanton, they cannot do well longer than they see how they may be scourged if they do not. Here is all the wit that I have, which I offer unto you upon this occasion of writing, and shall pray God to put into your mind that which shall be for the best, as I trust he will; and in the mean time to extinguish this barbarous contention at home, which can serve only to do hurt, and no good. I had fashioned a letter to Master Ridley, which I send unto your grace, and incumber you with these melancholy writings, ingendered of this fondness, which be not worth the reading. And so it may like you to use them, for having heard that which ye have said unto me, and otherwise heard and seen what you do, I shall go occupy my wit in other matters, and now such as have fond enterprises shall see that I letted not their follies, which they called God's word. But for his time the king our sovereign lord that dead is, and after his time you have done much to your honour and reputation; howsoever any shall be here not contented; which miscontention hath been so fond in some, as they have burst out and wished, that they might without breach of his laws kill me: which is to me a token of a marvellous fury, which had been cause why I am glad both to depart hence, and to depart the sooner, and pray to God to order all things for the best, with preservation of our sovereign lord, and increase of your grace's honour.

At my house in Southwark, the last of February. Your grace's humble beadman,
S. W.

Another Letter of Winchester.

After my humble commendations to your grace, it may like the same to understand, I have seen of late two books set forth in English by Bale, very pernicious, seditious, and slanderous. And albeit that your grace needeth not mine advertisement in that matter, yet I am so bold to trouble your grace with my letters for mine own commodity, wherewith to satisfy mine own conscience, to write and say as becometh me in such matters, which I desire your grace to take in good part. For it grieveth me not a little, to see, so soon after my late sovereign lord and master's death, a book spread abroad more to his dishonour (if a prince's honour may be by vile inferior subjects impeached) than professed enemies have imagined, to note a woman to have suffered under him as a martyr, and the woman therewith to be by Bale's own elucidation, as he calleth it, so set forth and painted as she appeareth to be, and is boasted to be a sacramentary, and by the laws worthy (as she suffered) the pains of death; such like things have by stealth in our late sovereign lord's days gone abroad as they do now. And as I am wont in such cases to speak, I keep my wont to write to your grace now, in whose hands I know the state of the realm to be for the time in government, and to whom, for respects of old acquaintance, I wish all felicity. In these matters of religion I have been long exercised, and have, thanks be to God, lived so long as I have seen them thoroughly tried, and besides that I have learned in written books of authority, I have perceived by books written without authority, as by Master Bale, Joy, and other, and especially as Bale useth now, that Scripture doth, by abuse, service to the right hand and the left at once, inasomuch as at one time Bale priseth Luther, and setteth his death forth in English, with commendations as of a saint, which Luther (whatsoever he was otherwise) stoutly affirmed the presence really of Christ's natural body in the Sacrament of the altar. And yet Bale, the noble clerk, would have Anne Askew, blasphemously denying the presence of Christ's natural body, to be taken for a saint also. So as Bale's saints may vary in heaven, if they chance not by the way; which might suffice to disprove the man's credit, if thwarting talk were more desired of many than the truth indeed, which truth was supposed to have been, both in writing and exercise well established, long before our late lord's death; and Bale and his adherents in their madness plainly reproved and condemned. I cannot forget, your grace told me you would suffer no innovation: and indeed if you deliver this realm to the king at 18 years of age, as the king his father, whose soul God assail, left it, as I trust you shall, the act is so honourable and good, as it were pety to trouble it with any innovation, which were a charge to your grace more than needed, being already burthened heavily. And albeit in the commonwealth every man hath his part, yet as God hath placed you, the matter is, under the king's majesty, chiefly yours, and as it were yours alone. Every man hath his eye directed unto you both here and abroad, you shall shadow mens doings if they be done, which is one incommodity of high rule. And for my part, besides my duty to the king's majesty and the realm, I would that your grace, in whom, since your government, I have found much gentleness and humanity, had as much honour with good success as ever any had, and pray to God that men would let your grace alone, and suffer the realm in the time of your government in quiet among ourselves, whereby we may be the more able to resist foreign trouble, which your grace doth prudently foresee. Certain printers, players, and preachers make a wonderment, as though we knew not yet how to be justified, nor what Sacraments we should have. And if the agreement in religion made in the time of our late sovereign lord be of no force in their judgment, what establishment could any new agreement have? And every uncertainty is noisome to any realm. And where every man will be master, there must needs be uncertainty. And one thing is marvellous, that at the same time it is taught that all men be liars, at the self-same time almost every man would be believed; and amongst them Bale, when his untruth appeareth evidently in setting forth the examination of Anne Askew, which is utterly misreported. I beseech your grace to pardon my babbling with you. But I see my late sovereign lord and master slandered by such simple persons*,

"Forsomuch as mention is inserted in this place of the good inclination of king Henry in his latter days to the reformation of religion, by the occasion hereof it cometh also to mind, somewhat likewise to add by way of appendix touching the talk between the archbishop of Canterbury Thomas Cranmer, and the duke of Suffolk Charles Brandon, as concerning the king's purpose and intent conceived against the bishop of Winchester Steven Gardiner, in that he could never allow any reformation in religion in this realm, and, namely, being offended with this, that men should use in their talk, The Lord, as well as our Lord; the said duke said unto the said archbishop, We of the counsel had him once at a good list, and should well have dispatched him from his authority, if the king's majesty our master had stayed himself from admitting him to his presence, as then his highness was content that we should thoroughly have sifted and tried him. It was, my lord, quoth the duke to the archbishop, at that time when Gardiner his secretary was attached, and suffered for defending the Pope's authority. For then I and certain of the counsel having conference with the king's majesty for that matter, religion assaulted, the realm troubled, and peaceable men disquieted, with occasion given to enemies to point and say, that after Wickliffe's strange teaching in the Sacraments of Christ's Church hath vexed other, it is finally turned unto us to molest and scourge us, for other fruit cannot Bale's teaching have, ne the teaching of such other as go about to trouble the agreement established here. In which matter I dare not desire your grace specially to look earnestly unto it, lest I should seem to note in you that which becometh me not. And I know, that your grace being otherwise occupied, these things may creep in as it hath been heretofore; sometime it may be hard for your grace to find out or pull out the root of this naughtiness: but yet I am so bold to write of these, of mine own stomach, who have ever used, for discharge of myself, to say and write in time and place as I thought might do good for relief of the matter, remitting the rest to the disposition of God, who hath wrought wonders in these matters, since they were first moved, and given me such knowledge and experience in them, as I ought to take them, as they be, for corruption and untruth; I mean knowledge and experience of them that be chief stirrers, to infect with untruth, as they cannot speak or report truly in common matters. The pretence is of the spirit, and all is for the flesh, women, and meat, with liberty of his highness was fully persuaded, that the bishop's secretary, being in such special favour with his master, would never stand so stiff in defence of the bishop of Rome's usurped power and authority, without his said master's both advice, knowledge, and persuasion. For already, quoth the king, he played but an homely part with me, when he was ambassador to the Pope concerning my cause of divorce. And therefore, quoth the king to me, send for him my lord incontinently, and by assistance of two or three more of the council, whom you think good, let him be committed to the Tower, to answer to such things as may be objected against him. This communication was in the evening, so that we purposed to have executed the king's pleasure and commandment the next morning. Howbeit our talk was not so secret, but that some of his friends of the privy chamber, where he had many friends then, suspecting the matter, sent him word thereof. Who incontinently repaired to the king's presence, and finding some matter to minister unto the king, his highness said to the bishop, We do marvel that your secretary hath thus notoriously offended against us and our laws. It is surely thought that you are not all clear in this offence, but that you are of the same opinion with him, and therefore my lord be plain with me, and let me know if you be that way infected or no. If you will tell me the truth, I will rather pardon the fault; but if you halt or dissemble with me, look for no favour at my hand.—With this monition Winchester fell down upon his knees, and besought his majesty hand and tongue, a dissolution and dissipation of all estates, clean contrarious to the place God hath called your grace unto. For it tendeth all to confusion and disorder, which is the effect of untruth.—Bale hath set forth a prayer for the duke John of Saxony, wherein the duke remitteth to God's judgment to be shewed here in this world the justness of his cause concerning religion, and desireth God, if his cause be not good, to order him to be taken, and to be spoiled of his honour and possessions, with many such gay words whereby to tempt God; since which prayer the duke is indeed taken as all the world saith, and at the time of his taking, as the account is made, such strangeness in the sun, as we saw it here, as hath not been seen. They happened both together, this we know, and be both marvellous; but whether the one were a token ordered to concur with the other, God knoweth, and man cannot define. Many commonwealths have continued without the bishop of Rome's jurisdiction, but without true religion, and with such opinions as Germany maintained, no estate hath continued in the circuit of the world to us known since Christ came. For the Turks and Tartars government is as it were a continual war, and they uphold their rule with subduing of nobility by fire and sword. Germany with their new religion could never have stood, though the emperor had let them alone: for if

of mercy and pardon, manifestly confessing that he had long time been of that opinion with his said secretary: and there bewailing himself promised from that day forward to reform his opinion and become a new man. Well, quoth the king, this way you have of me that which otherwise you should never have obtained. I am content to remit all things past, and pardon you upon your amendment.—The next morning I had word how the matter was handled, whereupon I came to his highness and said; Your majesty hath prevented our commission, which I and other had from your grace concerning my lord of Winchester's committing to the Tower. Wot you what, quoth the king; He hath confessed himself as guilty in this matter as his man, and hath with much sorrow and pensiveness sued for my pardon; and you know what my nature and custom hath been in such matters, ever more to pardon them that will not dissemble but confess their fault.—Thus wilfully and politicly he got himself out of our hands. But if I had suspected this, I would have had him in the Tower over night, and stopped his journey to the court. Well, said my lord of Canterbury, he was evermore too good for you all. Moreover as touching this foresaid bishop of Winchester, forso much as he in king Edward's time bragged so much of his old master of famous memory king Henry the eighth, to the intent that the glorious vanity of this bishop, and of all other like unto him, may appear more notoriously to all men, here is to be noted by the testification as well of master Denny, as also of sir Henry Nevil, who were

it be persuaded the understanding of God's law to be at large in women and children, whereby they may have the rule of that, and then God's law must be the rule of all, is not hereby the rule of all brought into their hands? These of some will be called witty reasons, but they be indeed truth's children, and so is all the eloquence, which some (to dispraise me) say I have, whatsoever they say of me. For truth is of itself, in a right meaning man's mouth, more eloquent than forged matters can with study bring forth. What rhymes be set forth to deprave the Lent, and how fond (saving your grace's honour) and foolish? and yet the people pay money for them, and they can serve for nothing, but to learn the people to rail, and to cause such as used to make provision for fish against Lent, fearing now in Lent to be so sick as the time purporteth and like to die indeed, to forbear to make their accustomed provision for the next year. And thereto shall it come if the common diet be not certain. For the fishmonger will never hope to have good sale, when the butcher may with flesh outface him. And fish is that great treasure of this realm and food inestimable. And these good words I give, although I love it not myself: for such as love not fish should nevertheless commend it to others, to the intent the flesh by them forborn might be to such as love it, only the more plenty. The public defamation, and there present witnesses of the matter, whose record was this, that king Henry before the time of his sickness, taking his horse upon the terrace at Windsor to ride out on hawking, saw standing before him the lord Wriothsley lord chancellor, with divers other counsellors, and amongst them the bishop of Winchester. Whereupon he called the lord chancellor, and said, Did not I command you he should come no more amongst you? (meaning the bishop) Whereunto the lord chancellor answered, That his coming was to bring his majesty word of a benevolence given unto him by the clergy, Whereat the king said, Ah! let him come hither, and so he did his message, and the king went straight away.—Item, another time the king immediately after his repair to London fell sick, and caused divers times his whole council to come unto him about his will, and other his grave affairs. At what time the bishop also would come up with them into the utter privy chamber, and there remain until the council came from the king, and then go down with them again, to the end, as then was thought, to blind the world withal.—Furthermore, as the king grew more in sickness, he considering upon his will and testament made before, at his going over to Bullein, willed the same to be drawn out again with leaving out and excluding the bishop of Winchester by name from amongst his executors. Which being to him no small corse, and a cutting off of all their purposes, a way was found, that sir Anthony Brown, a principal pillar of Winchester's side, pretending unto the king, as though by the negligence of trifling with Lent is a marvellous matter to them that would say evil of this realm; for there is nothing more commended unto us Christian men in both the churches of the Greeks and Latins, than Lent is, if all men be not liars. In the king our late sovereign lord's days this matter was not thus spoken of. And I think our enemies would wish we had no Lent. Every country hath his peculiar inclination to naughtiness; England and Germany unto the belly, the one in liquor, the other in meat; France a little beneath the belly; Italy to vanities and pleasures devised; and let an English belly have a further advancement, and nothing can stay it. When I was purveyor for the seas, what an exclamation was there (as your grace shewed me) of the bishop's fasting day, as they called Wednesday, and Winchester, Winchester, grand mercy for your wine, I beshrew your heart for your water? Was not that song, although it was in sport, a signification how loth men be to have their licence restrained? or their accustomed fare abated? unless it were in extreme necessity. I hear say that the Lent is thus spoken of by Joseph and Tongue, with other new (whom I know not) as being one of Christ's miracles, which God ordained not man to imitate and follow, at which teaching all the world will laugh. For Christian men have Christ for an example in all things, both to use the world as the writer the bishop's name had been left out of the king's will, kneeled down to the king's majesty lying in his bed, and said, My lord of Winchester I think by negligence is left out of your majesty's will, who hath done your highness most painful, long and notable service, and one without whom the rest shall not be able to overcome your great and weighty affairs committed unto them.—Hold your peace, quoth the king, I remembered him well enough, and of good purpose have left him out. For surely if he were in my testament, and one of you, he would cumber you all, and you should never rule him, he is of so troublesome a nature. Marry, quoth the king, I myself could use him, and rule him to all manner of purposes, as seemed good unto me, but so shall you never do, and therefore talk no more of him to me in this behalf. Sir Anthony Brown, perceiving the king somewhat stiff herein, gave place to the king's words at that time. Howbeit, seeking further occasion upon more persuasions put into his head, he took in hand once again to move the king to have the bishop one of his executors. When the king perceived that this instant suit would not cease; Have you not yet done, quoth the king, to molest me in this matter? If you will not yet cease to trouble me, by the faith I owe unto God, I will surely dispatch thee out of my will also, and therefore let us hear no more of this matter. All this sir Anthony Denny was heard to report to the archbishop of Canterbury Thomas Cranmer, of the said archbishop's secretary, who is yet alive, and witness unto the same."

he did only for necessity, and to contemn the world as he did, and in case to refuse it, and chuse the vile death, as he did the death of the cross, which things he did like a master most perfect, for he was very God, and we must endeavour ourselves in the use of his gifts to follow that he did, not to fast forty days without meat as Christ did, for we be but apprentices, and carry about a ruinous carcase, that must have some daily reparation with food: but yet was there never any that said, how therefore we should do nothing, because we cannot do all, and take Christ's fast for a miracle only. And yet all that follow Christ truly, they work daily miracles, in subduing and conforming by God's grace their sensual appetites, and humbly obeying to the will of God, which no man can of himself do. And Christ promised that his true servants should work the works that he did, and greater works also. Wherefore it is a slender matter to say, Lent was one of Christ's miracles, for so was it to love his enemies, and specially those that scourged and bobbed him; which may not be, if that a legation hath place, taught Christian men to follow, because it was a miracle, as they might say: it were more tolerable to forget Lent, as Pogge telleth, of a priest in the mountains, that knew not how the year went about, and when the weather opened, and he went abroad, and perceived his neighbours were towards Palm Sunday, he devised an excuse to his parish, and bad them prepare therefore, for indeed the year had somewhat slipped him, but he would fashion the matter so, as they should be as soon at Easter as the rest: and thus did he pass over Lent with much less slander, than to teach it for a doctrine, that Lent was one of Christ's miracles, and therefore not to be imitated of us. For although it was indeed a great miracle, as all Christ's doings were, yet was it not a greater miracle, nor more against man's nature, than to love them that laboured and were busy to take away the natural life of his manhood. For as the nature of man desireth relief, so doth it abhor destruction or hurt. In will and desire men follow Christ in all things; in execution they cannot; for we have brittle vessels, and God giveth his gifts to men as he seeth expedient for his church; so as men cannot heal the lame when they will, as Christ did when he would, but as God shall think profitable for the edification of the flock assembled.—Gregory Nazianzene speaketh of some that enterprised to imitate Christ's fast above their power, whose immoderate zeal he doth not disallow, not requiring of all men so to do, for that is an extremity, ne yet assoyling the matter as our new schoolmen do, that Christian men should let Christ's fast alone as a miracle: which manner of solution I heard a good fellow make, when it was told him he might not revenge himself, and when he was stroken on the one ear, he should put forth the other; I am, quoth he, a man, I am not God, if Christ being God did so, he might, quoth he, if it had pleased him, have done otherwise. And so when it hath been alledged that Christ fasted forty days, he might, quoth he, have eaten if he had list; these triflings in sport might be drawn to grave speech, if Christian men shall refuse to follow Christ in miracles. For all his life was miracles, and his love that is our badge most miraculous of all, to die for his enemies. I beseech your grace to pardon me, for I am like one of the common house, that when I am in my tale, think I should have liberty to make an end, and specially writing to your grace with whom I account I may be bold, assuring you it proceedeth of a zeal towards you to whom I wish well, whose intent although it be such as it ought to be, and as it pleased you to shew me it was, yet are such things spread abroad whereof the evil wilters of the realm will take courage, and make account (although it be wrong) that all goeth on wheels. If any man had either fondly or indiscreetly spoken of Lent to engrieve it to be an importable hurthen, I would wish his reformation; for I have not learned that all men are bound to keep the Lent in the form received, but this I reckon, that no Christian man may contemn the form received, being such a devout and profitable imitation of Christ to celebrate his fast, and in that time such as have been in the rest of the year worldly to prepare themselves to come, as they should come, to the feast of Easter, whereof St. Chrysostom speaketh expressly. And for avoiding contempt, a licence truly obtained of the superior serveth. And so I heard the king's majesty our sovereign lord declare when your grace was present. And therefore he himself was very scrupulous in granting of licences; and to declare that himself contemned not the fast, he was at charge to have (as your grace knoweth) the Lent diet daily prepared, as if it had been for himself, and the like hereof I hear say your grace hath ordered for the king's majesty that now is, which agreeth not with certain preaching in this matter, nor the rhimes set abroad. Lent is among Christian men a godly fast to exercise men to forbear, and in England both godly and politic, such as without confusion we cannot forbear, as the experience shall shew, if it be ever attempted, which God forbid. And yet Lent is buried in rhyme, and Stephen Stockfish bequeathed, not to me, though my name be noted, wherewith for mine own part I cannot be angry, for that is mitigated by their fondness. But I would desire of God to have the strength of this realm increased with report of concord, which doth quench many vain devices and imaginations.—And if all men be liars, as it is now to my understanding strangely published, methink Bale and such new men, as be new liars, should be most abhorred and detested, and so much the more dangerous as they be new. That which in Italy and France is a matter of combat, is now found to be impropriate to all men. God grant the truth to be desired of all men truly. But as one asked, when he saw an old philosopher dispute with another, what they talked on; and it was answered how the old man was discussing what was virtue; it was replied, if the old man yet dispute of virtue, when will he use it: So it may be said in our religion; If we be yet searching for it, when shall we begin to put it in execution: I would make an end of my letters, and cannot, wherein I account myself faulty. And though I may err, as every man may, yet I lie not, for I say as I think, forso-much as I have said and further think your grace hath no trouble troublesome, but this matter of religion unseasonably brought into the defamation of our late sovereign lord's acts, doings, and laws. I beseech your grace take my meaning and words in good part, and pardon my boldness, which groweth of the familiarity I have heretofore had with your grace, which I cannot forget. And thus enforcing myself to an end, I shall pray to Almighty God to preserve your grace in much felicity, with increase of honour, and achieving of your heart's desire. At Winchester, the one and twentieth of May. Your grace's humble beadman, S. W.

The Letter of the Lord Protector, answering to Winchester.

YOUR letters dated the one and twentieth day of May, as concerning two books new set forth by one Bale, and certain Sermons preached here, were with convenient speed delivered unto us. And like as in your letters to Edward Vaughan of Portsmouth, so in those to us we perceive that you have a vigilant and diligent eye, and very fearful of innovation: which as it cannot be blamed, proceeding of one which is desirous of quiet, good order and continuance of the godly state of this realm, so we do marvel that so soon, so far off, and so plainly, you can hear tell and say of so many things done here, which indeed we being here and attendant upon the same cannot yet be advertised of. The world never was so quiet, or so united, but that privily or openly those three which you write of, printers, players and preachers, would set forth somewhat of their own heads, which the magistrates were unawares of. And they which already be banished and have forsaken the realm, as suffering the last punishment, be boldest to set forth their mind; and dare use their extreme licence or liberty of speaking, as out of the hands or rule of correction, either because they be gone, or because they be hid. There have foolish and naughty rhimes and books been made and set forth, of the which as it appeareth you have seen more than we, and yet to our knowledge too many be bought; but yet after our mind it is too sore and too cruelly done to lay all those to our charge, and to ask as it were account of us of them all. In the most exact cruelty and tyranny of the bishop of Rome, yet Pasquill, as we hear say, writeth his mind, and many times against the bishop's tyranny, and sometime toucheth other great princes, which thing for the most part he doth safely, not that the bishop alloweth Pasquill's rhimes and verses, specially against himself, but because he cannot punish the author, whom either he knoweth not or hath not. In the late king's days of famous memory, who was both a learned, wise and politic prince, and a diligent executor of his laws; and when your lordship was most diligent in the same, yet as your lordship itself writeth, and it is too manifest to be unknown, there were that wrote such lewd rhimes and plays as you speak of, and some against the king's proceedings, who were yet unpunished, because they were unknown or forgotten. And when we do weigh the matter, we do very much marvel, why that, about Jack of Lent's lewd ballad, and certain, as it was reported unto us, godly sermons, (which be evil in your letters joined together) you be so earnest, when against doctor Smith's book, being a man learned in the doctors and scripture, which made so plain against the king's highness authority, and for the furtherance of the bishop of Rome's usurped power, your lordship neither wrote nor said any thing. And as it appeared you be so angry with his retraction (which frankly without fear, dread, compulsion or imprisonment, only with learning and truth overcome, he came unto) that you cannot abide his beginning, although having the very words of scripture. Except peradventure you think that the saying of David, Omnis homo mendax, cannot be interpreted, every man is a liar, which howsoever your lordship taketh it at pleasure, it appeared unto us then of him taken but godly, to declare the infirmity of a man, and the truth of God and his word. And we are not able to reason so clerly with you, and yet we have heard of the subtle difference of lying and telling of a lie, or as it is in Latin called, mentiri and mendacium dicere: but if your lordship be loth to be counted mendax, which belike he hath interpreted a liar, or a lying man, and think it a matter of combat, he was deceived in the interpretation, and it is a matter for clerks to dispute of; we would have wished your lordship to have written against his book before, or now with it, if you think that to be defended which the author himself refuseth to aver: your lordship writeth earnestly for Lent, which we go not about to put away, no more than when doctor Smith wrote so earnestly that every man should be obedient to the bishops. The magistrates by and by went not about to bring kings and princes and other under their subjection. Writers write their fantasy, my lord, and preachers preach what either liketh them, or what God putteth in their heads. It is not by and by done that is spoken. The people buyeth those foolish ballads of Jack a Lent. So bought they in times past pardons and carols, and Robin Hood's Tales. All be not wise men, and the foolisher a thing is, to some (although not to the more part) it is 'the more pleasant and meet, and peradventure of the Sermons there is, and indeed there is (if it be true that we have heard) otherwise spoken and reported to you, than it was of the preachers there and then spoken or meant. Lent remaineth still, my lord, and shall, God willing, till the king's highness, with our advice and the residue of his grace's counsel, take another order, although some light and lewd men do bury it in writing;

even as the king's majesty remaineth head of the church, although through sinister ways and by subtil means some traitors have gone about and daily do, to abuse the king's majesty's supremacy, and bring in the bishop of Rome's tyranny, with other superstition and idolatry. On both sides great heed is to be taken, and as your lordship writeth, we are set in a painful room to reform all lightness, and lewdness, to the which we do endeavour ourself to the best of our power, although not so cruelly and fiercely as some peradventure would wish, yet not so loosely that there needeth such exclamation or great fear to be. We do study to do all things attemperately, and with quiet and good order. And we would wish nothing more than your lordship to be as ready to the reformation of the one as of the other, that neither superstition, idolatry, or papacy, should be brought in, nor lightness, nor contempt of good order to be maintained. They both take beginning at small things, and increase by little and little at unawares. And quiet may as well be broken with jealousy as negligence, with too much fear or too much patience. No ways worse than when one is over light eared the one way, and deaf on the other side. Rumours by space of time increase naturally, and by that time they come at you, as it appeareth, they be doubled and trebled. We do perceive your diligent eye towards us, and we will wish (and trust you have) your heart faithful to us: our most hearty and continual prayer to God is, to leave this realm to the king's highness, at his grace's age by you written, rather more flourishing in men, possessions, wealth, learning, wisdom, and Gods religion and doctrine, if it were possible and God's will, than we found it. And that is our whole intent and esperance, to the which we refuse no man's help, as knoweth God, in whom we bid you heartily farewell.

Another Letter of Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace: upon the return of my servant Massy with your grace's letters answering to such my letters wherein I signified the robbing of my secretary, I read the same gladly, as by the contents of the matter I had cause so to do, which was such a comfortative as I digested easily the rest of the great packet, having been accustomed thereunto in the king's my late sovereign lord's days, which fashion of writing his highness (God pardon his soul) called whetting; which was not at the most pleasant unto me at all times, yet when I saw in my doings was no hurt, and sometime by the occasion thereof the matter amended, I was not so coy as always to reverse my argument, nor, so that his affairs went well, did I ever trouble myself, whether he made me a wanton or not. And when such as were privy to his letters directed unto me, were afraid I had been in high displeasure (for the terms of the letters sounded so) yet I myself feared it nothing at all, I esteemed him, as he was a wise prince; and whatsoever he wrote or said for the present, he would after consider the matter as wisely as any man, and neither hurt nor inwardly disfavoured him that had been bold with him. Whereof I serve for a proof, for no man could do me hurt during his life. And when he gave me the bishopric of Winchester, he said he had often squared with me, but he loved me never the worse; and for a token thereof gave me the bishopric. And once when he had been vehement with me, in the presence of the earl of Wiltshire, and saw me dismayed with it, he took me apart into his bed-chamber, and comforted me, and said, that his displeasure was not so much to me as I did take it, but he misliked the matter, and he durst more boldly direct his speech to me, than to the earl of Wiltshire, and from that day forward he could not put me out of courage, but if any displeasing words passed from him, as they did sometime, I folded them up in the matter; which hindered me a little: for I was reported unto him that I stooped not and was stubborn, and he had commended unto me certain men's gentle nature (as he called it) that wept at every of his words, and me thought that my nature was as gentle as theirs, for I was sorry when he was moved; but else I know when the displeasure was not justly grounded in me, I had no cause to take thought, nor was I at any time in all my life discontent or grudging at any thing done by him, I thank God for it.—And therefore being thus brought up, and having first read your grace's most gentle letters, signifying the device of a proclamation to stay these rumours, and reading the same proclamation, which my servant brought with him; I read with the more quiet your grace's great letters, and would have laid them up without further answer, were it not that percase my so doing might be mistaken. For glum silence may have another construction than frank speech, where a man may speak, as I reckon I may with your grace, upon confidence whereof I am bold to write thus much for my declaration touching your grace's letters of the 27th of May, that how earnest soever my letters be taken in fearing any innovation, I neither inwardly fear it, neither shew any demonstration in mine outward deeds to the world here, or in communication, that I do fear it to be done by authority, but in myself resist the rumors and vain enterprises, with confidence in the truth and your grace's wisdom; for if I feared it indeed, with persuasion it should come to pass, I should have small lust to write in it; but I fear more indeed the trouble that might arise by light boldness of other, and the cumber of such matters while other outward affairs occupy your grace's mind, than the effect by your direction that hath been talked of abroad: and yet in the writing I do speak as the matter leads, continuing mine old manner to be earnest, which, as some men have dispraised, so some have commended it; and therefore in a good honest matter I follow rather mine own inclination, than to take the pains to speak as butter would not melt in my mouth : wherewith I perceive your grace is not discontent, for the which I most humbly thank you. And first as concerning Portsmouth, I wrote to the captain and mayor in the thing, as I had information, and by men of credence. And yet I suspended my credit till I had heard from thence, as by my letters appeareth : and as I was loth to have it so, so was I loth to believe it. And to shew that I feared no innovation by authority, nor regarded any such danger, I went thither myself, and in conclusion was in such familiarity with the captain, that after he had shewed me all the gentle entertainment that he could, he desired me to make an exhortation to his men as they stood handsomely with their weapons, wherewith they had shewed warlike feats ; which I did, and departed in amity with the captain and soldiers and all the town ; the captain telling me plainly, he was nothing offended with any thing I had said in my sermon, nor was there cause why he should. But the very act indeed in defacing the images, had no such ground as master captain pretended ; for I asked specially for such as had abused those images, and no such could be shewed, for that I enquired for openly. And the image of Saint John the Evangelist standing in the chancel by the high altar was pulled down, and a table of alabaster broken : and in it an image of Christ crucified so contemptuously handled, as was in my heart terrible, to have the one eye bored out, and the side pierced ; wherewith men were wonderously offended, for it is a very persecution beyond the sea, used in that form where the person cannot be apprehended. And I take such an act to be very slanderous, and esteeming the opinion of breaking images, as unlawful to be had, very dangerous, void of all learning and truth, wrote after my fashion to the captain, which letters I perceive to have come to your grace's hands. I was not very curious in the writing of them, for with me truth goeth out plainly and roundly, and speaking of the king's seal, I uttered the common language I was brought up in, after the old sort. When, as I conject of a good will, the people taking Saint George for a patron of the realm under God, and having some confidence of succour by God's strength derived by him, to encrease the estimation of their prince and sovereign lord, I called their king on horseback in the seat of arms, Saint George on horseback ; my knowledge was not corrupt, I knew it representeth the king, and yet my speech came forth after the common language, wherein I trust is none offence. For besides learning, I by experience have known the pre-eminence of a king both in war and peace, and yet if I had wist my letter should have come to your grace's hands to be answered, then I would have been more precise in my speech, than to give occasion of so long an argument therein. As for Saint George himself, I have such opinion of him as becometh me. And have read also of Bellerophon in Homer, as they call him, the father of tales, but I will leave that matter.

And as for books, let Latin and Greek continue as long as it shall please God, I am almost past the use of them, what service those letters have done experience hath shewed, and religion hath continued in them fifteen hundred years ; but as for the English tongue itself hath not continued in one form of understanding two hundred years, and without God's work and special miracle it shall hardly continue religion long, when it cannot last itself ; and whatsoever your grace's mind is now in the matter, I know well, that having the government of the realm, your grace will use the gift of policy, which is the gift of God.—And even as now at this time bishops be restrained by a special policy to preach only in their Cathedral Churches, (the like whereof hath not been known in my time,) so upon another occasion your grace may perceive think expedient to restrain (further than the parliament hath already done) the common reading of the Scripture, as is now restrained the bishops liberty of preaching. As for the brazen serpent, it did not in all men's language represent Christ, and if I had written to another than your grace, I might have had the like matter of argument that was taken against me of Saint George on horseback. For Gregory Nazianzene, chief divine in the Greek Church, calleth the serpent's death the figure of the death of Christ, but not the serpent to be the figure of Christ ; and yet when I had done all my argument, I would resolve as is resolved with me in the speech of Saint George on horseback, that the common speech is otherwise, and so it is in saying the serpent to be a true figure of Christ, and yet Gregory Nazianzen called the serpent itself Aspidum of Christ in these words, ὄν, &c. in his sermon de Paschate : and yet in Almechorus Domini, we read Aries, Leo, Vermis, spoken of Christ, and some expound the Scripture sicut Moses, &c. after that sort. And as your grace said when I was last at your house with the French ambassador, ye wished him and me together disputing, to see when we would make an end, even so it is in these matters, when they come in an argument, for a by thing (as Saint George on horseback) when it escapeth me, or speaking of the brazen serpent following a speech not thoroughly discussed, shall be occasion of a digression all out of purpose. And therefore was it a great gift of God, that our late sovereign lord (God rest his soul) set these matters in quiet : who had heard all these reasons touching images which be now rehearsed in your grace's letters, and having once my lord of Canterbury and me present with him alone in his palace, that they call otherwise New Hall, handled that matter at length, and discussed with my lord of Canterbury the understanding of God's commandment to the Jews, so as all the clerks in Christendom could not amend it. And where as one had denied the image of the Trinity to be had, by reasons as he touched in your grace's letters, I heard his highness answer to them at another time. And when he had himself specially commanded divers images to be abolished, yet (as your grace knoweth) he both ordered, and himself put in execution the kneeling and creeping before the image of the cross, and established agreement in that truth through all this realm, whereby all arguments to the contrary be assoiled at once. I would wish images used as the book of his highness set forth doth prescribe, and no otherwise. I know your grace only tempteth me with such reasons as other make unto you, and I am not fully at liberty, although I am bold enough (and some will think too bold) to answer some things as I would to another man mine equal, being so much inferior to your grace as I am: but me thinketh Saint Paul's solution during the king's majesty's minority should serve instead of all, Nos talem consuetudinem non habemus, we have no such customs in the Church.—When our sovereign lord cometh to his perfect age (which God grant) I doubt not but God will reveal that which shall be necessary for the governing of his people in religion. And if any thing shall be done in the mean time (as I think there shall not) by your grace's direction, he may when he cometh to age say in the rest, as I hear say, he said now of late concerning procession, that in his father's time men were wont to follow procession: upon which the king's majesty's saying, the procession (as I heard) was well furnished afterwards by your grace's commandment; which speech hath put me in remembrance, that if the bishops and other of the clergy should agree to any alteration in religion to the condemnation of any thing set forth by his father, whereby his father might be noted to have wanted knowledge or favour to the truth, what he would say I cannot tell, but he might use a marvellous speech, and for the excellency of his spirit, it were like he would, and having so just a cause against bishops as he might have, it were to be feared he would. And when he had spoken, then he might by his laws do more than any of our sort would gladly suffer at these days; for as the allegation of his authority represented by your grace shall be then answered (as your grace now writeth unto me) that your grace only desireth truth according to God's Scripture, and it may be then said; we bishops, when we have our sovereign lord and head in minority, we fashion the matter as we lust, and then some young man that would have a piece of the bishop's lands shall say, the beastly bishops have always done so, and when they can no longer maintain one of their pleasures of rule and superiority, then they take another way and let that go, and for the time they be here spend up that they have, which eat you and drink you what ye list and we together, with Edamus & bibamus, cras moriemur. And if we shall alledge for our defence the strength of God's truth, and the plainness of Scripture, with the word of the Lord, and many gay terms, and say we were convinced by Scriptures, such an excellent judgment, as the king's majesty is like to have, will never credit us in it, nor be abused by such a vain answer. And this is a worldly politic consideration, and at home: for the noise abroad in the world will be more slanderous than this is dangerous. And touching the bishop of Rome, the doings in this realm hitherto hath never done him so much displeasure, as an alteration in religion, during the king's majesty's minority, should serve for his purpose; for he wanteth not wits to beat into other princes ears, that where his authority is abolished, there at every change of governors shall be change in religion, and that which has been amongst us by a whole consent established, shall by the pretence of another understanding in Scripture straight be brought in question; for they will give it no other name but a pretence, how stiffly soever we will affirm otherwise, and call it God's word. And here it should be much noted that my lord of Canterbury, being the high bishop of the realm highly in favour with his late sovereign lord, and my lord of Duresme a man of renowned fame in learning and gravity, both put by him in trust for their counsel in the order of the realm, should so soon forget their old knowledge in Scripture set forth by the king's majesty's book, and advise to inavey such matter of alteration. All which things he (I know well) by your grace and them considered. And therefore it is to me incredible that ever any such thing should be indeed with effect, whatsoever the lightness of talk shall spread abroad which your grace hath by proclamation well stayed. But if you had not, and the world talked so fast as ever they did, I assure your grace I would never fear it, as men fear things they like not, unless I saw it in execution; for of this sort I am that in all things I think should not be done in reason, I fear them not, wherewith to trouble me otherwise than to take heed if I can, and to the head governors (as now to your grace) shew my mind, and such experience hath every man of me that hath communed with me in any such matters. And therefore albeit your grace writeth wisely, that over much fear doth hurt, and accelerateth sometime that which was not intended, yet it needs not to me, for I have learned that lesson already, and would a great many more had, which indeed should be a great stay. And thus I talk with your grace homely, with multiplication of speech impertinent and not necessary, as though I meant to send you as great a packet as I received from you.—One thing necessary to answer your grace in, is, touching your marvell; how I know sooner things from thence, than your grace doth there, which ariseth not upon any desire of knowledge on my behalf, for evil things be oversoon known, nor upon any slackness of your grace's behalf there, who is and is noted very vigilant, as your grace's charge requireth. But thus it is, even as it was when I was in some little authority, they that were the evil doers in such matters would hide them from me. So now they have handled it otherwise; for as for Jack of Lent's English Testament, it was openly sold in Winchester Market, before I wrote unto your grace of it. And as for Bale's book, called the elucidation of Anne Askew's martyrdom, they were in these parts common, some with leaves unglewed, where master Paget was spoken of, and some with leaves glewed. And I call them common, because I saw at the least four of them. As for Bale's book, touching the death of Luther, wherein was the duke of Saxony's prayer, whereof I wrote, it was brought down into this country by an honest gentleman, to whom it was, as I remember he told me, given at London for news, and he had it a great while ere I wrote to your grace. I had not then received the inhibition for preaching, whereof men spake otherwise than they knew. And in the mean time doctor Smith recanted, which a priest of this town (who to mine own mouth boasted himself to be your grace's chaplain, but I believed it not) brought down with speed, and made by means to have it brought to my knowledge, which I knew besides, for they had by and by filled all the country hereabouts, of tales of me. And when I saw doctor Smith's recantation begin with, Omnis homo mendax, so Englished, and such a new humility, as he would make all the doctors of the church liars with himself, knowing what opinions were abroad, it enforced me to write unto your grace for the ease of my conscience; giving this judgment of Smith, That I neither liked his tractation of unwritten verities, nor yet his retractation, and was glad of my former judgment, that I never had familiarity with him. I saw him not, that I wote, these three years, ne talked with him these seven years, as curious as I am noted in the commonwealth. And whereas in his unwritten verities he was so mad to say, bishops in this realm may make laws, I have witness, that I said at that word, we should be then daws, and was by and by sorry that ever he had written of the sacrament of the altar, which was not, as it was noised, untouched with that word, All men be liars, which is a marvellous word, as it soundeth in our tongue, when we say a man were better to have a thief in his house than a liar. And the depraving of man's nature in that sort is not the setting out of the authority of the scripture. For albeit the authority of the scripture dependeth not upon man, yet the ministration of the letter, which is writing and speaking, is exercised, and hath been from the beginning delivered through man's hand, and taught by man's mouth; which men the scripture calleth holy men, and that is contrary to liars. And therefore St. Augustine in his book de Mendacio, saying, Omnis homo mendax, signifieth, Omnis homo peccans. If Smith had only written of bishop's laws, and then said he had, saving your honour, lied loudly, or to mitigate the matter, said he had erred by ignorance, that had been done truly and humbly; for he that seeketh for much company in lying as he did, hath small humility; for he would hide himself by the number. And thus much as touching Smith, of whom, or his book, till he was in trouble, I never heard talking. But to the matter I wrote of. I have told your grace how I came to knowledge of them, very scarcely in time, but in the thing over quickly, and never had any such thought in my life, as I denied to your grace, to be worthily charged with them, by them I mean that may hereafter charge; for I know no such yet in this world, and I never was in mine opinion so mad, as to write to your grace in that sort. When all things be well, I have many causes to rejoice; but where things were otherwise, as I trust they shall not, I have nothing to do to ask any account, I trust I shall never forget myself so much. I thank God, I am even as well learned to live in the place of obedience, as I was in the place of direction in our late sovereign lord's life. And for my quietness in this estate I account myself to have a great treasure of your grace's rule and authority, and therefore will worship and honour it otherwise than to use such manner of presumption to ask any account. And I know your grace cannot stay these matters so suddenly, and I esteem it a great matter, that things be staid hitherto thus; but if things had increased as the rumours purported, your grace might have been incumbered more in the execution of your good determination. Now, thanks be to God, your grace goeth well about to stay it. As for myself, I know mine inward determination to do, as I may, my duty to God and the world, and have no cause to complain of the universal disposition of them in my diocese. I know but one way of quiet, to keep and follow such laws and orders in religion as our late sovereign lord left with us; which, by his life, as the bishops and clergy said was the very truth, so I never read yet or heard any thing why to swerve from it, ne think it expedient to call any one thing in doubt, during the king's majesty's minority, whereby to impair the strength of the accord established. Which I write not mistrusting your grace in the contrary, but declaring myself, and wishing the same mind to other about you, as I trust they have, for which I shall pray to God, who prospered our late sovereign lord in that rebellion, as we have seen experience, and by your grace's foresight and politic government shall send the like prosperity to our sovereign lord that now is; wherein I shall do my part, as a subject most bounden many ways thereunto. I send unto your grace herewith my discussion of my lord of Saint David's purgation, wherein I walk somewhat more at liberty than writing to your grace, and yet I take myself liberty enough, with a reverend mind nevertheless to keep me within my bounds; which if I at any time exceed, I trust your grace will bear with me after your accustomed goodness, for whose prosperity I shall continually pray, with increase of honour. At Winchester, the 6th of June."

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AMONG most humble commendations to your grace, I have received this day letters from my lord of Canterbury, touching certain homilies, which the bishops in the convocation holden A.D. 1542, agreed to make for stay of such errors as were then by ignorant preachers sparkled among the people, for other agreement there had not then passed among us. Since that time God gave our late sovereign lord the gift of pacification in those matters, which established by his highnesses authority in the convocation extinguished our devises, and remaineth of force with your grace, wherein to avoid many encumberous arguments, which wit can devise against the truth, I send to your grace the copy of mine answer to my lord of Canterbury, to whom I write and offer myself more largely, than I ever did in any matter of the realm, to any man besides my sovereign lord, or the chief governor as your grace, for I am not factious, and use only to say as I am bound to say as occasion serveth, for that is my duty, having no other thing purposed but truth and honesty, whatsoever any man shall otherwise say of me. I am busier with your grace than needeth, but such commendations as it pleased your grace to send me by master Coke (for the which I most humbly thank your grace) hath engendered thus much more boldness, that ever me thinketh I should desire your grace, not to suffer the king's majesty our late sovereign lord's determination to slip the anchor-hold of authority, and come to a disputation, for ediction whereof, afterward the burden must rest on your grace, unto whom I desire all prosperous success, and the increase and continuance of such honour as God hath granted to your virtue, not to fall in encumber of any by-matter that need not be stirred. If your grace think not yourself encumbered with my babbling, and inculking that needeth not unto you, I would answer your grace's letters of the 6th of April, so as your grace will by other letters withdraw your name, that I may be seen to dispute with one not so far above me in authority, as your grace is, which I have thought requisite to advertise, lest by my silence your grace should deem I thought myself overcome in those matters, where indeed I am of a contrary mind, and can shew whereupon to ground me, why I should so think: And thus desiring your grace to take in good part my doings, I shall continually pray for the preservation of your grace long in felicity. At Westminster the 10th of June 1547.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your grace, since my letters unto your grace wherewith I sent unto you such letters as I had written to my lord of Canterbury for answer to his letters touching homilies, I have estoons received other letters from my said lord of Canterbury, requiring the said homilies by virtue of a convocation holden 5 years past, wherein we communed of that which took none effect then, and much less needeth to be put in execution now, nay in my judgment cannot without a new authority from the king's majesty that now is, commanding such a matter to be enterprised, I wrote at length to my lord of Canterbury, and sent the copy of those letters to your grace, not to the intent your grace should lose so much time to read them, for they be tedious in length, but only for my discharge, who never meddled yet by private letters with any man in the realm to persuade or dissuade matters of religion, but with the prince himself, or him that had the managing of the great matters under him. And following this determination am so bold to send your grace the copy of such letters as I write to my my lord of Canterbury, whose letters to me, I could not of congruence forbear to answer, ne answering forbear to speak freely as I think. And sorry I am to hear the matter of homilies spoken of in this time; your grace hath done prudently to stop the vain rumours by proclamation, and it hath wrought good effect, and me thinketh is not best to enterprise any thing to tempt the people with occasion of tales, whereby to break the proclamation and offend: And to this effect I wrote to my lord of Canterbury: For like as in a natural body, rest without trouble doth confirm and strengthen it, so is it in a common-wealth, trouble travelth and bringeth the things to looseness: And my lord of Canterbury is not surer of his life when the old order is broken, and a new brought in by homilies, that he shall continue to see his new device executed, for it is not done in a day, I would there were nothing else to do now, I have known busines to occupy such as were put in trust, when religion hath been untouched, a new order engendereth a new cause of punishment against them that offend: and punishments be not pleasant to such as have the execution, and yet they must be, for nothing may be contemned. And thus I travel in the matter with my lord of Canterbury, because he would I should weigh things, and so doe I as indifferently as ever did man for the preservation of the ship wherein I sail myself, and so many other whose prosperity I am bound to wish, I can admit no invocations. S. W.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace with thanks, that it hath pleased you to be content to hear from me, wherein now I have from your grace liberty to write at large, I cannot find the like gentleness in my body to spend so much time as I would; and therefore shall now desire your grace to take in good part, though I gather my matter into brief sentences.—The injunctions in this visitation contain a commandment to be taught and learned, two books, one of the homilies that must be taught other by priest. Another of Erasmus Paraphrasis, that the priest must learn himself, these books strive one with another directly, &c. Thus I have signified to your grace some special faults that be Erasmus owne faults; and in my judgment great faults, but I have not written all: and your grace shall further understand that he who it is, I know not who, hath taken the labours to translate Erasmus into English, hath for his part offended sometime, as appeareth plainly by ignorance, and sometime evidently of purpose, to put in, leave out, and change as he thought best, never to the better but to the worse, with the specialities whereof I will not now encumber your grace, but assure you it is so. And here I will grant to your grace, that for every lie I make unto you, set on 100*l.* fine on mine head, and let me live here like a beggar, whilst my revenues pay it; My words you have in writing, and be against me matter of record; and so I yield to have me charged, as the bishop of London was with offering the form of his bishopric, which matter came to my remembrance in the writing hereof; and now I have written unto your grace upon what foundation my conscience is grounded, I shall truly declare unto you the manner of my proceeding from the beginning; I never heard of the execution of the visitation, till your grace was departed from London northward; as the books flowed abroad by liberty of the printers they came to my hands, I never slept while I had perused them, as soon as I had found certain faults I wrote to the council, trusting upon such earnest advertisement as I made, they would incontinently have sent for me, and upon knowledge of so evident matter as me thought I had to shew, have stayed till your grace's return, I saw a determination to do all things suddenly at one time, whereunto although your grace agreed, yet of your wisdom I conjectured ye had rather have had it tarry while you return, if you had not been pressed: and that word pressed I noted in your grace's letters to me, wherein you wrote you were pressed on both sides: me thought if by bringing myself to most extreme danger in your absence, I could have stayed this matter, besides my duty to God, and to my sovereign lord I had done also your grace pleasure, of whom I have this firm opinion, that willingly and wittingly your grace will neither break the act of parliament, nor command books to be bought with authority, that contain such doctrine as these books do: Thus I adventured in your grace's absence, wherein although I had remembrance of your grace, yet I made not your grace my foundation, but God chiefly, as God knoweth with the preservation of our late sovereign lord's honour that dead is, and the security of our late sovereign lord that now is.—Let no man be offended with the vehemency of my writing, for I wrote with a whole heart, and if I could have written it with the blood of my heart I would have done it, to have done good, in staying the thing till it had been more materially digested, and till your grace's safe return. I touched the act of parliament lively, but as truly as ever was any thing spoken of. And I never wept more bitterly than I did for a conceit that troubled my head, which never passed my lips, nor shall never come out of my pen, I will tell it your grace, and you require it. Now whether the king may command against an act of parliament, and what danger they may fall in, that break a law, with the king's consent I dare say no man alive at this day hath had more experience, what the judges and lawyers have said than I: First, I had experience in mine old master the lord cardinal, who obtained his legacy by our late sovereign lord's request at Rome: And in his sight and knowledge occupied the same with his two crosses, and masses borne before him many years; yet because it was against the laws of the realm, the judges concluded the offence of the prebend: which conclusion I bare away, and take it for a law of the realm, because the lawyers so said, but my reason digested it not. The lawyers for confirmation of their doings, brought in a case of the lord Tiptost as I remember, a jolly civilian, he was chancellor to the king, who because in execution of the king's commission he had offended the laws of the realm he suffered on Tower-hill, they brought in examples of many judges that had fines set on their heads in like case for doing against the law of the realm by the king's commandment. And then was brought in the judges oath, not to stay any process or judgment for any commandment from the king's majesty. And one article against my lord cardinal, was that he had granted injunctions to stay the common laws, and upon that occasion, Magna Charta was spoken of, and it was made a great matter the stay of the common law, and this I learned in that case, since that time being of the council, when many proclamations were devised against the carriers out of corn, at such time as the transgressors should be punished, the judges would answer it might not be by the laws, whereupon ensued the act of proclamations, in the passing of which act many liberal words were spoken, and a plain promise, that by authority of the act for proclamations, nothing should be made contrary to an act of parliament, or common-law, when the bishop of Exeter, and his chancellor were by one body brought in a prebend, which matter my lord privy seal cannot forget, I reasoned with the lord Audley then chancellor, so far as he bad me hold my peace for fear of entering into a prebend myself, whereupon I stayed, but concluded it seemed to me strange that a man authorized by the king (as since the king's majesty hath taken upon him the supremacy every bishop is such a one) could fall in a prebend. After I had reasoned the matter once in the parliament house, where was free speech without danger, and there the lord Audley then chancellor, to satisfy me familiarly, because I was in some secret estimation as he then knew, thou art a good fellow bishop quoth he, which was the manner of his familiar speech, look the act of supremacy, and there the king's doings be restrained to spiritual jurisdiction; and in another act it is provided, that no spiritual law shall have place contrary to a common law or act of parliament. And this were not (quod he) you bishops would enter in with the king, and by means of his supremacy order the laity as ye listed; but we will provide quod he, that the premaiure shall ever hang over your heads, and so we laymen shall be sure to enjoy our inheritance by the common laws, and acts of parliament. It is not yet full two years ago, since in a case of jewels I was fain with the emperor's ambassador, and after in the emperor's court, defend and maintain by commandment, that the kings of this realm were not above the order of their laws. And therefore the jeweller, although he had the king's bill signed, yet it would not be allowed in the king's court, because it was not obtained according to the laws, in which matter I was very much troubled, even this time twelve month, when I was in commision with my lord great master, and the earl of Southampton for altering the court of augmentations. There was my lord Montague, and other of the king's learned council, of whom by occasion of that matter I learned what the king might do contrary to an act of parliament, and what danger it was to them that meddled against the act, it is fresh in memory, and they can tell whether I said true or no, and therefore being learned in so notable cases, I wrote in your grace's absence to the council therein, as I had learned by hearing the commons speak, whose judgments rule those matters, howsoever my reason can digest them, and so wrote to the council. Which my writings I fashioned so as I trusted my lord would have stayed till your grace's return. And thus I have declared to your grace the purpose of my writing to the council so vehement, which nevertheless I continued with all humility to abide the order of authority; and learn all other obedience; for thereunto I have ever had as great regard as to any man in this realm. And as my word is Vana salus hominis, so I assure your grace I practise it thoroughly in my deeds.—When my lords sent last for me, I came to them with as much speed as I might, with my sleeves and bosom thrust full of books to furnish my former allegations, I was heard very well and gently, and me thought I shewed matter that should have moved, for I shewed the two books to be contrary, as I have written before, where-with they said they were not moved, adding how their conscience agreed not with mine, using many good words to bring me to such conformity, as they would have had me at, whereupon knowing that I know, I could not relent, but after I had been a little beside from them, and was returned, they entered a precise order with me, either to receive precisely the injunctions, or to refuse, in which case they had rather to say to me, adding that your grace was privy to that was done there that day: my answer was that I would receive the injunctions as far as God's law and the king's would bind me; and because I saw they grew to such preciseness, and remembering how after good sort they had caused me to be accompanied before with master Wingfield, making innovations, what would be the end if I would not yield: I would not therefore leave unspoken, that I thought might avoid that followed: I told them there were three weeks of delay to the coming of the visitors to me: in the mean time, I offered to go to Oxford to abide the discussion there, which offer was not allowed, I desired them to go to my house at London, and to have learned men speak with me there, which was not accepted. I entered then the allegation of the gospel of the servant that said he would not do a thing, and yet did it, and so I said it might be that although I then said nay, as my conscience learned me, yet I might percase change, and was a man that might be tempted: but as my conscience was then, me thought God's law and the king's letted me, and upon knowledge of their pleasures, that I must to the Fleet, I told my lords I thought it hard, unless there were a greater matter then to send me to prison, for declaring before hand what I minded to do before any thing had been by me actually done to resist the visitation, who had all the mean time to think on the matter, and repent me. Whereunto the answer was such as displeased me not inwardly so much, but I have well digested it, and (so all may be well) care not what becometh of my body, I departed as quietly from them, as ever man did, and have endured with as little grudge here, and have learned this lesson in the world never to look backward, as St. Paul saith, ne remember that is past, I will never grudge or complain of nothing for myself.—As for the matter to have such books recommended to the realm in the king's name by your graces direction, me seemeth very weighty, and your grace not to have been well handled in it, all the world knoweth the king's highness himself know not these books, and therefore nothing can be ascribed unto him, your grace hath been to your increase of honour so occupied, as all men know, your grace had no leisure yourself to peruse these books, and yet be the books as I have written, I leave the rest to your grace. If I that tell the council my mind of them that have done so far amiss, because when I know so much, I will not allow them, I shall from henceforth the more regard the lesson of an old ambassador that bed me, let evil tidings go home to my master afoot, and send only good tidings by post. A shift with the word which agreeth not with my nature as master Wallope saith, upon Friday last past, my lord of Canterbury sent for me to the dean of Paul's house, whither I went with some gazing of the world. There I found my lord of Canterbury accompanied with the bishop of Rochester, master doctor Cox, and master Aire, and I was brought thither by the bishop of Lincoln, what report my lord of Canterbury hath made thereof I cannot tell: my lord of Canterbury was in hand with his homily of salvation, but nothing heard or saw I to save my conscience in agreeing to him, but heard that I should justly confirm me in mine own conscience, I made offer to yield to them in that homily, if they could shew me any old writer that wrote how faith excluded charity in the office of justification, it is against scripture's plain words, and to swerve from scripture without any one doctor to lean to it, were sore: where scriptures and doctors want, my lord of Canterbury would fall to arguing, and overcome me that am called the sophister, by sophistry. When I heard my lord's argument I denied it, and would enter none other declaration, for I keep that answer till some other than were there, be present, my solution whereunto, when I declare it, shall make all the rest of the matter very weak and my lord not to like his argument at all, one argument I could not assail, to come again to the Fleet: my lord of Canterbury charged me, that I like nothing unless I do it myself, whereof I am not guilty, I was never author of any one thing other spiritual or temporal, I thank God of it. I am also charged that all the realm hath received these homilies without contradiction save I, whereunto I answer, I think they have not read that I have read in these books, what hath been done I cannot tell, now I am kept as I cannot know though I would when I was abroad, I never sought to know more than was brought by common fame, for this shall be found true, I never advised any man to object any thing against these books, no one man, not my chaplains: a kinaman of mine beneficed in my diocese, and not unlearned, came to me, and told me how he heard a lewd fellow say, that I would not receive the injunctions. And sir, (quoth I) I rebuked him, and reviled him, and said you would as readily receive as any man, I told him that in so saying he did very well; upon my coming up a chaplain of mine, a doctor of divinity told me, he would receive the injunctions quietly, and say nothing; I told him it should be well done, if I had tarried in my diocese: if any man had spoken but myself I would have lost my life for it, nor I think there hath not now. This matter was to try a bishop, whether he careth more for the truth, or his own rest, what examples have I seen in this realm, how freely men have said their conscience against our late sovereign lord's determination, and against the act of parliament: doctor Croe a mean man preached against our late sovereign lord's determinations, and how daintily was he handled to relieve his conscience: if your grace would have this for a precedent, that whatsoever the king's council for the time of a prince's minority shall send to be preached must needs be received without allegation: of what strength is the act of parliament against the bishop of Rome; the king's majesty, when he cometh to his age, will look to be bold to do as much with his subjects as his council did in his minority, whereof the counsellors may be then weary, precedents be dangerous. For I have seen it almost for a rule: that whatsoever hath been once done, may then without question be done again. In our late sovereign lord's time, I have seen the choncell much astonished, when the king would have done somewhat against an act of parliament; it was made then a great matter. The lord Cromwell had once put in the king's our late sovereign lord's head to take upon him to have his will and pleasure regarded for a law, for that he said was to be a very king, and thereupon I was called for at Hampton-court. And as the lord Cromwell was very stout, come on, my lord of Winchester, (quoth he) for that conceit he had whatsoever he talked with me, he knew ever as much as I, Greek or Latin, and all. Answer the king here (quoth he) but speak plainly and directly, and shrink not man. Is not that (quoth he) that pleaseth the king a law? have ye not therein the civil law, (quoth he) quod principi placuit, and so forth? (quoth he) I have somewhat forgotten it now. I stood still, and wondered in my mind to what conclusion this should tend. The king saw me musing, and with earnest gentleness said, answer him whether it be so or no: I would not answer my lord Cromwell, but delivered my speech to the king, and told him, I had read indeed of kings that had their will always received for a law, but I told him the form of his reign, to make the laws his will was more sure and quiet, and by this form of government ye be established, (quoth I) and it is agreeable with the nature of your people: If ye begin a new manner of policy, how it will frame no man can tell, and how this frameth ye can tell, and would never advise your grace to leave a certain for an uncertain: the king turned his back, and left the matter after till the lord Cromwell turned the cat in the pan afore company, when he was angry with me, and charged me as though I had played his part. This tale is true, and not without purpose to be remembered, how I have been tossed to and fro in this kind of matter. Thus I have shewed your grace the whole matter with many more words than I intended in the entry of my letter, and make now an end, enforced by weariness of my body, fed with close air, rather than meat, which my stomach desireth not, yet I must say somewhat in the matter of only faith, wherein my lord of Canterbury so much travelleth.

First, it is sure, he shall never prove that he would say in that matter, but to make an end of it, either I am a very fool in mine own conceit, which may easily be, or I see an occasion given to your grace to make such a true determination in it, as may be honourable to your grace, the contentation of all the world, the preservation of the king's honour that dead is, without prejudice of the act of parliament, without derogation to my lord of Canterbury's honour, without diminution of the reputation of the council, and without any glory to the bishop of Winchester. Which is in some men's conceit the greatest matter of all that be yet rehearsed, and in good faith I would I were not, so all were well. Your grace's doing in Scotland, is not to my judgment more to your grace's honour than this would be, which God grant and your grace much honour and felicity. At the Fleet, the 14th of October. Your grace's humble beadman, S. W.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace, since the writing of my last long letters to your good grace, which as they wearied me in writing, so they have I think wearied your grace in reading, I have been in great expectation to hear somewhat from your grace, of whose gentle and favourable mind towards me, I cannot doubt, howsoever the declaration thereof at this time be hindered by other by-persuasions, wherewith although your grace may be somewhat moved, I marvell not, and therefore whiles all things may be tried, do well satisfy myself, not minding by any suit, I have or shall make; otherwise to press your grace than may be conveniently obtained of you in the state you now present. And yet sue I must of congruence, for declaration of my humility, and also importunely sue, lest I should be seen to contemn, and to be entered into a melancholy, proudly to disdain the world, which I assure your grace I do not, nor never had any such fantasy: Whereof they can be witness, that have continually seen my behaviour, since the death of our late sovereign lord, and since my coming to this prison. And yet my lord of Canterbury, when he sent for me last out of the Fleet, handled me with fair words, declaring me a man meet in his opinion to be called to the council again, adding how we, he said, did daily chuse in, other that were not appointed by our late sovereign lord. They were worldly comfortable words, and as far contrarious on the one side, as the Fleet is on the other side: but I have not, I thank God, that deceit which my lord of Canterbury thought to be in me, or would seem to think so, whereby to induce others to think the same, as though I were not moved to say as I do, for any zeal to the truth, but of perverse frowardness, as one that like not his estate, and therefore cared not what became of him: The truth whereof to be otherwise God knoweth: and I am able to make to the world sufficient proof and testimony of the contrary if it be required: First, as touching the book of Paraphrasis, whereof I wrote to your grace special faults, and other I have to shew as great as they I trust: and doubt not, the matter itself shall sufficiently declare, that I have done well to speak against that book, assuring your grace, that since my coming to prison, many days together when I looked on it, I saw every day, some new thing in such sort of fault, as ought worthily to condemn the work, I have favoured Erasmus's name as much as any other, but I never studied over this book till now, and now I agree with them that said Erasmus laid the eggs, and Luther hatched them: adding further, that of all the monstrous opinions that have arisen, evil men had a wondrous occasion administered to them of that book; and therefore I trust the matter of that book will purge the evil opinion as might be gathered of me, wherein I offer to prove that I said with any learned man, pain of shame and rebuke, and to be taken for a malicolike beast. As for the book of Homilies, in that point where my lord of Canterbury would have taught how faith excludeth charity in the office of justifying, besides that my conscience is otherwise persuaded, and truly persuaded, it doth so touch me outwardly in the world, as if I would for any intercession or request upon offer to be a counsellor, or have as much more land as all the bishops may spend. I were worthy for so agreeing for mede on the one side, or dread on the other side; first to be whipped in every market town in the realm, and then hanged for example, as the veriest varlet that ever was bishop in any realm christened, unless my lord of Canterbury could shew me either Scripture that so said, or some ancient writer, wherein I desire only to see but one where commonly two be required in every matter: but because it is in the matter of only faith, I require but one ancient writer, whereby I cared not for my conscience as some would have it, persuaded if I might excuse myself at least to the world that I were not worthy to be whipped, and hanged in all good men's judgments, and mine own also. And this matter I write unto your grace, to declare unto you in what straits I am tyed inwardly in my conscience by very truth, so I am tyed outwardly in the world with shame, whereby appeareth that I resist not this matter of a willful purpose, or that I like it not because I was not a counsellor, which words my lord of Canterbury used to me, for I am even driven to do as I do of necessity on both sides in my conscience before God and the world abroad, whereof if I shewed not your grace such a proof as cannot be denied, let me be out of all credit in every thing, and be accounted a liar, which I abhor above all faults. Whereupon me seemeth my case is miserable to be so incumbered as I am, and yet to be used as I were without cause obstinate, notwithstanding all such circumstances as I have used to humble myself to learn and abide; I yield myself to be opposed at Oxford, that I might say, if I yielded, learning had overcome me: when that was refused, I offered myself to go to school at home, which offer to yield to the truth. And although I have to maintain me, both the plain Scriptures, the doctors plain, and the plain act of parliament: yet for conformity offered to my lord of Canterbury, to yield if he could shew me one Scripture affirming faith to exclude charity in justification, or Scripture failing as it doth indeed to shew me but one ancient writer that writeth so, with offer to yield and give place, which offer excludeth all stubbornness, and all evil opinion that might be conceived of wilfulness in me; it is now twenty days ago since I spake with my lord of Canterbury, when the strongest arguments he made me were to agree, with hope to be a counsellor again, or go to the Fleet from whence I came, for when I made request to the contrary, he said he had no such commission from the council, and so here I remain without bail or mainprize, without comfort of any of my friends or servants, as one divided from the world, no chaplain to accompany me in prayer, no barber nor taylor for bodily necessities, nor liberty to use physician for relief of disease, whereof I have need: And your grace who I think would shew me relief, for I will never think want of good will in you, is percase persuaded, by means that I resist the truth wilfully, and that your grace may not in anywise shew me the least comfort in the world, for then no man shall rule me. And then your grace that shewed so much favour to the earl of Southampton, late chancellor, wherein all the world commended your gentleness, if your grace should now any ways comfort me in prison with the least token of gentleness, ye might be noted to favour Winchester's factions, as some term it, whereas I take God to record I never joined myself with any man, nor have secretly encouraged any man to be of my opinion. And yet I have none other opinion, but such as the parliament hath established. The earl of Southampton did many things whilst he was chancellor touching religion, which misliked me not, but yet did I never advise him so to do: nor made on him the more for it when he had done, he was one of whom by reason I might have been bold, but I left him to his conscience, therein I never said so much secretly to any nobleman of the realm, as I have to your grace, at which time I advised your grace to be noted neither on the one side, nor the other. And your grace hath for yourself as good a name as can be. And I shall say this without flattery, that like as chance very notably hath advanced your estate many degrees, since the time of my first acquaintance with you, so have you had occasion to shew your virtue, whereby to be thought worthy your estate, by means whereof you cannot wish a more felicity than you have to be the beginning of such an estate as ye shall leave by God's grace to your posterity. This is not altogether out of my matter, for whatsoever become of me, I would your grace did well, men be mortal, and deeds revive, and me think my lord of Canterbury doth not well to entangle thus your grace with this matter of religion, and to borrow of your authority the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and the King's Bench, with prisonment in his house, wherewith to cause men to agree to that it pleaseth him to call truth in religion leaving that he setteth forth not stablished, by any law in the realm; but contrary to a law in the realm: At the least a law it is not yet, and before a law made. I have not seen such a kind of imprisonment, as I sustain, humbly offering myself ready to learn: Our late sovereign lord, whose soul God pardon, suffered every man to say his mind without imprisonment, till the matter were established by law. If my lord of Canterbury hath the strength of God's spirit, with such a learning in his laws, as be able to overthrow with that breath all untruths, and establish truths, I would not desire the let of it, by your grace, nor the work of God's truth any way hindered: In which case if all the realm be persuaded besides myself in this matter, it shall be easy for to reprove me in the face of the world, and drive me to the ground with the sword of Gods

Scripturè, which he should rather desire to do, then to borrow the sword your grace hath the rule of, wherewith to fear me, which is a mean to slander all that is done or shall be done, if men be prisoned before a law made. And I cannot believe but there be more than I, or else I should not be kept so secret. For all my folks resorted to me, and told me there was no reason to stand alone against all men, to undo them and myself also in this world. It were a greater temptation then my lord of Canterbury made to put me in hope to be a counsellor again. Be your grace assured, the foundation of my ground is a zeal to the truth, although I have many worldly considerations to alledge for me, which serve to purge me of wilfulness, which I assure your grace is not my fault. I will not trouble your grace with all I could say of my knowledge: whatsoever my words be of my lord of Canterbury, which the matter enforced me to speak, I am in none enmity with his person, and that I am able to prove, but my lord hath in the homily of salvation taken such a matter in hand, and so handled it, as if I were his extreme enemy. I would have wished him to have taken that piece in hand, and so handled it as he hath done. For that asseveration how faith excluded charity, can neither be proved by scripture, nor confirmed by any ancient writer, or persuaded by any effectual argument. And one argument my lord hath devised, which he frameth thus: We be justified by faith without all works of the law: Charity is a work of the law, Ergo we are justified without charity. The answering of which argument, which I can do plainly by authority, shall declare that either my lord is deceived himself if he take it for a strong argument, when the opinion of his learning shall be hindered, or if he use it willingly knowing the fault in it, the lack is greater another way. But the answer to that argument dissolveth all the matter, whereunto I have an answer made 12 C. yea rcsby-past, which I will of my peril shew if my lord will avow it for his argument. And if my lord will send me the argument of his hand, I will send him the answer of my hand, whereby shall shortly appear, whether I trifle or no. In the latter end of my last letter to your grace I spake of a determination, whereof I wished your grace were author. For weariness of writing I did not, open what I meant in specialty, intending now to begin in the middle of this sorrow, with a merry tale: but a very true tale, and not unmeet to be rehearsed: Thus it happened, certain doctors of divinity at Paris, minding with utterance of some learning, whereof they had store, to requite a gentleman that had bidden them to dinner, using a preface, that as he had fed them with bodily meat, they would feed him with spiritual food, proponed this question to be disputed amongst them: Whether the ass that carried our Lady and Christ when Joseph fled with them into Egypt, when it carried our only Lady with Christ, in her lap, carried then, as perfect a burthen, as when it carried our Lady with Christ on her lap, and a flea sitting on her head. Herein the doctors were in great earnest, and many hot arguments were between them in the matter, with much expence of language. Whether our Lady alone with Christ in her lap, were as perfect a burthen, as our Lady and Christ with a flea upon our Lady's head; The audience which was learned, was well cheared with laughing, but other edification the matter had not. And it may be laughed at, whensoever it is told, to see in what trifles many men spend their time: and now I shall say that which is strange at the first reading, but it is true. The matter of justification with only faith justifieth, and whether faith excludeth charity in justification, pertaineth no more to the use and practise of our Church of England, although in knowledge it be a grave matter, than the trifling question I rehearsed pertained to the hearers edification in good living: I beseech your grace to know how I put a difference between use and knowledge. The knowledge of justification as I have said is in learning of more weight, and such as for the entreating of it, many have wept even here at home, besides those that have wept in Germany, but the use and practise of it is no more necessary in the state of the Church of England, than is the handling of the other question, and for any use in the church, the one may be forborn as well as the other considering the baptism of infants, is so duly observed. In which Sacrament of baptism all we be justified before we can talk of this justification we strive for. And unless the church leave the use to Christian infants, which shall not be, there cannot be a time in which the knowledge of the justification we strive for, can be practised: But all men shall as we already have receive their justification in baptism in their infancy. So as the doctrine of only faith justifieth, if it were true as the homily declareth it is no more necessary for the present state of the church, than to know whether the burthen of our Lady and Christ only were as perfect as the burthen of our Lady and Christ with a flea sitting upon our Lady's head, which the solemn doctors of Paris so earnestly entreated.—Some will say I am waxed mad in prison to compare these two together: But as I compare them for use and practise, the one is as necessary as the other. And as I was bold to use the merry example to imprint the matter the better in your grace's memory. For it is as I say, when we have all talked, for we all are justified in baptism, younglings and falling after baptism, we must arise by the sacrament of penance, which must be confessed of all men, unless they be such as deny all sacraments as some have done indeed, wading so far in the sitting of only faith, that they have left nothing but faith alone, and yet spent a great deal of their faith in the handling of it, or rather all. And that is a general fault I find, that such as write in that matter do not handle it faithfully in alledging the doctors and scriptures right as they be. Now if this be true that I have written, which is true indeed, were it not an horrible part of you to say, why trouble ye the world for a thing not necessary, and so put it from the country, and make it as it were a checker chamber case, and so to be sent to the Universities, for whom it is meet soberly to talk, and not for homilies wherein the people shall hear that they shall never practise, because they learn it too late, being justified before in their infancy in baptism. My lord of Canterbury told me his intent, is only to set out the freedom of God's mercy, which may be done much more plainly, with putting the people in remembrance of the constant received faith of the church in the baptism of infants, where by such as be justified and saved in the virtue of Christ's passion, as after baptism by malice fall not to sin, and those must return to Christ by penance, but such as die (before that actual sin, hath defiled their soul again) if they die in the innocency received in baptism be absolved. And yet those children, when they were christened did nothing but cry for cold, or when they were over hard griped for fear of falling. And when this is believed, is not God's mercy believed to be ministered after a most free liberal sort. If my lord of Canterbury mind only that the matter shall appear without argument, as we practise justification in receiving the Sacrament of Baptism. And as for justification by only faith, is all out of use, howsoever we expound it, as the state of the church is now. And it is a terrible matter to think on, to see such a contention to rise upon a matter not necessary to be spoken of, wherein if my lord of Canterbury will needs travel, my judgement is that he shall never persuade that faith excludeth charity in justification, unless he borrow of your grace's authority prisons, and then he shall percase have some agree unto it, as poor men kneel at Rome, when the bishop there goeth by, that is to say: knocketh on the head with a halbert, if he kneel not, for that is one piece of the office of the bishop of Rome's guard. Finally there hath been nothing done, but your grace may use it to the augmentation of your honour. I have things more to say, but this matter is over-long already, and me thinks I have been over-long here, and shewing myself so humble a scholar, as I have done, it is much to be beaten, because I do not learn where no man teacheth me, and so willing to learn as I ask but one scripture, or scripture failing, as it doth for my lord of Canterbury's purpose, I ask but one ancient doctor: this is my case, for as touching any act of disobedience, my lords of the council did foresee, that I should not fall in that danger, and therefore would not trust my frailty to be in the country, when the visitors should be there: but made me sure here lest I might have offended, if I had been there, though I had but a few words to speak, that is to say, saving God's laws and the king's, yet they might have been misreported, and so engendered me more trouble; and this good I have of my being here, which I suffer patiently, and make it so serve for my purpose in my conceit, as I thank God I have no displeasure of mind, and only feel such as the body engendereth for want of some necessaries, whereof if I may have relief at your grace's hand, I will accept it as thankfully, as any man hath any benefit at your hand, and as instantly require it of you. And yet if I have no other comfort from your grace than I have hitherto had, I will think nevertheless as well of your grace as ever I did, and be only sorry, that in the state you be in the liberty of doing that your heart would persuade you, should be straightly enclosed with respects, as my body is with waxes. This desiring your grace to take in good part my bold writing to you, I shall make and pray Almighty God for the preservation of your person. With increase of honour and felicity. At the Fleet, or rather in the Fleet. Your grace's humble beadman. S. W.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace, upon trust that your grace would take my letters in good part, and not otherwise than I wrote them. I wrote to your grace out of this prison, as I was wont to write to our late sovereign lord, whose soul God pardon; when I was ambassador, refreshing myself some time with a merry tale in a sad matter, which his highness ever passed over without displeasure, as I trust your grace will do the semblable. For though some account me a papist, yet I cannot play the pope wholly, as the old term was, I dare not use that severity in writing, which my cause requireth to speak of God, and his truth in every second sentence, and become suddenly a prophet to your grace, with a new phrase of speech, with whom I have been heretofore so familiarly conversant, as I think honour hath not altered your grace's nature, even so adversity hath not changed mine. Of your high place in the common-wealth, no man is more glad than I, nor no man shall do his duty further than I, to acknowledge you as your grace is now, protector and governor of the realm. But I have been so traded to speak boldly, that I cannot change my manner now, when perchance it doth me no good. And although there be an Italian in prison with me, in whom I see a like folly, who living with a little miserably, will not for his honour take alms, fancying to be still in the state he was some time, which manner I condemn in him, yet I follow him thus far, rather to write after my old manner, which cometh plainly to mind, than to take alms and aid of eloquence, whereof I have in this state need. For your grace's letters return every word of my letters in my neck, and take my fly as it were a bee, which I thought should have stung no man, which matter in mirth, declareth the necessity of the other matter, as aptly as may be, neither to be necessary. And when I wrote I forgot as my fellow prisoner, the Italian doth, the state I am in now.

And wrote as I had written from Antwerp in the state of ambassador. The Italian my companion hath his folly of nature, I have it of custom in bringing up which hath the effect of nature: and is called of learned men another nature. And then the proverb of gentleness hath place, when men say to him that is offended, you must bear with the man's nature, and so I trust you will do with me. Two things there be in your grace's letter, which I trust I may touch without contention. One is, that if your grace will in a plain similitude see the issue of faith only, and whether faith may exclude charity in the office of justifying, or not, it may be well resembled in the making of laws in this parliament, where the Acts be passed by three estates, which be all three present, and do somewhat together, and concur to the perfecting of the law, wherein we may not say that any one estate only made the law, or that any one estate excludeth the other in the office of making the law. This may be said, that these three estates only in respect of the rest of the realm, make the law, and there need no more of the realm be present but they. But if we speak of these three estates within themselves, there is none estate only, that maketh the law.— But where the law hath as it were a body and a soul. The high house and the low house of the parliament make as it were the body of the law, which lieth as it were a dead matter, such as is not apt to take life till the king's majesty hath by the breath of his mouth, saying, le Roy le veut, breathed a full life into it, in the conclusion besides the life the assembly of the other estates had by his authority to assemble, which had else been a dead assembly, even as faith and hope be dead without charity: and as the king's majesty in this similitude of making laws excludeth not in office of the whole the other two estates, no more do the estates, because they devise and frame laws, exclude the king's majesty in the office of making laws, for without his authority they be nothing, as faith and hope be without charity not effectual. And look what absurdity and untruth this saying hath in this realm to say the higher house, and the lower house, exclude the king in the office of making of laws, the same absurdity is yet in religion to say, that faith excludeth charity in the office of justification. And therefore it was never written of ancient writers, And therefore I desired my lord of Canterbury to shew me but one; and yet cannot. In our time this dream hath been dreamed without Scripture, without authority, against Scripture, and against authority, as I can shew. And further can shew how this imagination extendeth so far by them, that open their mind in it thoroughly, as your grace would not at the first believe if I did express it. But I can shew that I fain not evidently as clearly for my discharge as I could wish. Another matter of your grace's letter is, where your grace reasoneth with me that I am over precise in finding of faults in the Paraphrasis, seeing every book hath some faults. And then your grace taketh not Erasmus for a gospel, but as one in whom somewhat may be reprehended or amended. After which manner of sort, if your grace take the homilies; as for like reason in my judgment they must, for they be men's compositions, as the Paraphrasis is, and not the very gospel itself, why should I be kept in prison, who offered to receive the homilies and Erasmus both, so far as they were not without fault, either of God's law or the king's: because I saw the errors before, and spake of them, I have made more speed to prison than other have done, who percase for troubling of their conscience have received the books close with such reverence, as becometh men to receive that is sent from their prince, wherein I would have done as they did, if I had not seen the books before. But I did as I have seen divers noble men do. And among them as I remember your grace, when they have being sept in service to have used such diligence, as to see their commission and instructions made, or they went and finding something doubtful or amiss, after the commission was sealed, and instructions signed worthy to be amended, have upon declaration of their mind therein obtained amendment with commendation. Now I have a charge in the bishopric of Winchester to see the people fed with wholesome doctrine, wherein I be so diligent as to look upon the commission, and considering what I shall be charged with to do, take this or that for a fault in my judgment, and labour to have it amended wherein differ I from other men's diligence. And how can it be for a fault to say reverently, to the council; My lords, me seemeth this and this cannot stand together, either instruct me in them, or amend them, in what nature of crime should this humility be: am I worthy for so saying to be condemned to a perpetual prison? and to be a close prisoner to speak with no man, to hear from no man, to talk with no man, for my household which is a great number, wandering and lamenting for me? My case should be in the nature of praise, in the nature of commendation, in the nature of thanks, if none other have said that I can say; if one only man in a realm saith, he knoweth treason to subvert the whole realm, and can shew evident proof of his so saying, shall he be prisoned because of good will he offereth to say and prove that no man else uttereth but he? And therewith offereth to prove that he saith to be true: it is incredible, that a king should set forth a book tending to the subversion of his own estate, and therefore that I shall cannot touch his majesty, who knoweth not what is done, as reason judgeth in his tender age; it is also incredible, that your grace being uncle to him, should be content, that any book should be set forth that might tend to the subversion of his estate. And I dare say for your grace, you would not if the book be like the horse that the Trojans received into their city, wherein the Trojans knew not what was in it, let me be heard that know what is in it, and so know it, as I can shew it as evidently, as I can the sun and the moon in bright days, and bright nights, when both shine I do not trifle with my wit to undo myself, but travel with my honesty to preserve my country, to preserve my prince, to preserve religion: and this your grace shall find to be true, which knowing my letters to be construed to the extremity, I would not write unless I were furnished with matter to discharge my writing, your grace I doubt not remembereth Singleton's conspiracy. And Erasmus hath framed his doctrine, as though Singleton had required him thereunto. I have such matter to shew, as though I had myself devised it for my justification. And yet I am reasoned with, as though one given to let good doctrine, to find a knot in a rush, to trouble good enterprises; after which sort your grace is moved to write unto me, and thereupon I remain here still without hearing, having such matter to utter as shall confound them all; which I would not write if I were not assured for it were a small pleasure to me writing thus extremely, to be confounded when I had been heard, and then worthily sent hither again for lying so manifestly, which I would think a worthy punishment, as this is unworthy to be handled as I am for virtue, that I dare say the truth, can declare the abomination of this Paraphrasis, and of the homily also, in both which matters I have shewed all I can shew, I shall declare I am not worthy to be kept here, and yet here I have remained this 7 weeks without speaking with any man saving my physician, who I thank your grace hath done me good: and yet when men see I am thus banished from the world, so as no man may speak with me, it is not pleasant for any man to resort unto me, and that I perceive if my lord of Canterbury think I will wax mad he is deceived for I wax every day better learned than other, and find every day somewhat to impugn the Paraphrasis and homilies, not by wit or devise, or other subtilty, but plain sensible matter if I may be heard; and if I be not heard my conscience telleth me I have done my duty, and therewith from travel shall apply myself to prayer, wherein I shall remember the prosperous estate of your grace whom God preserve. In the Fleet, S. W.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace, whatsoever your grace's considerations be not to hear me yet, nor answer me, and howsoever I determine and do bear patiently the state I am now in, reason nevertheless bindeth me to continue my suit, that if your grace seeth at any time occasion to change your determination, there shall nothing want on my behalf to provoke your grace so to do: he that is refused at one time may be heard at another, and importunity speedeth when none other means can prevail. Being also a fault in the inferior to despair of the superior in so reasonable a request as mine is, which I cannot do of your grace for other respects, I have remained here long unheard of your grace, inclosed up more closely, now close religions be begun, than ever were any whiles they were here, no stranger may speak with me, I cannot have the company of my chaplain, which is necessary for me after so long time. And if your grace hath no leisure to hear me shortly, I trust you will without delay suffer my chaplain to resort unto me, as well as of your gentleness ye have suffered the physician for my body to come to me, for the which I most humbly thank your grace, herein I desire your grace to answer me by this bearer, that I may have some comfort from you, for whose preservation I shall pray to Almighty God. Your grace's humble beadman.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace, I am very loth, knowing your grace's business, to trouble you with many letters, and yet not hearing from your grace any thing for answer to mine own letters before written, I am so bold to write these, wherewith to put your grace in remembrance of mine estate in prison, as one dissevered from the use of his servants and friends, and as it were barred quick without knowledge of any just cause wherefore, and with knowledge, by course of time that now the parliament is begun, whereof I am a member, unless my fault had cut me off, and whereunto I was called by writ, which I received before my coming hither, where I would also gladly do my duty, as I am bounden if I were not detained and bounden in prison from my liberty, that I might so do, which allegation I make the rather to your grace, to the intent with the opening of a necessary suit worthy to be regarded, I might minister occasion to your grace, whereupon to shew such gentleness to me, as of your own gentle heart, I am persuaded your grace gladly would, for whose preservation with increase of honour I shall pray to Almighty God, who have your grace in his tuition. Your grace's humble beadman,

S. W.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace. I cannot discuss by conjecture, why evidence is thus put off in my case, that hath been wont commonly to be granted to all men: if it should be of any man through policy, to keep me from the parliament, it were good to be remembered, whether mine absence from the upper house, with the absence of those I have used to name in the nether house, will not engender more cause of objection, if opportunity serve hereafter, than any presence with such as I should appoint were there, the signification whereof is the chief cause of these letters, for as I am now encumbered with being here, so might some be encumbered therewith hereafter, which should do me pleasure. My matter that I have to say toucheth the highest, and is worthy to be heard, whereunto my lord of Canterbury can only answer that he would never have thought it, or that he hath been otherwise informed of them he put in trust, for it would touch him over much to grant he had so much knowledge in the Paraphrasis, as I now have, and knowing the same to have advised your grace to set it forth to the people, I can say much, which is expedient for your grace to hear and consider, desiring only this credit of your grace to think me worthy to be heard, and thereupon give me audience, I cannot enchant men, ne look not to be believed in the matter, unless it be so plain, as no man can gain-say it, and therein the book to be judge. The nature of my cause should move your grace, the present assembly of learned men should move your grace to celebrate mine audience: and if your grace knew what I could say of the long letters your grace sent, good faith, your grace would make so much the more speed. For whereas the purpose of your grace in these letters is, to alter my judgment, the handling of the matters is such, as I am able to shew good cause why they should as they do, work a contrary effect, as I am able to declare, if ever I come to your presence. My lord of Canterbury will needs maintain that our late sovereign lord was seduced, and then it is possible that your grace may be seduced also, and therefore it is good for your grace to hear and to hear in time; whatsoever I have written to your grace is true, and I have not written all the specialities I know in the greatest matters, which your grace shall perceive to be true, I see evidently, that unless my matter be very notable, and also plain, it shall not boot me to alledge it thus much, I am learned by your grace's letters, and therefore if I had any cause to mistrust it, I would use another mean whereof in your grace's letters I see some comfort, but my matter is so plain and so expedient to be understood, that I must needs desire your grace to be heard in it, wherein it may like you to send me knowledge of your pleasure, and that my suit to your grace may stand in some stead, for whose preservation in honour I shall daily pray to Almighty God, who preserve your grace. In the Fleet. Your grace's humble beadman. S. W.

Winchester to the Lord Protector.

AFTER my most humble commendations to your good grace. In my third letters I signified unto your grace my need of the counsel of physician, as the state of my body then required: whereunto because I had no answer, I have used all other means of relief, that I could to avoid that need, as one loth to trouble your grace with requests not necessary, Master Warden of the Fleet, and my servants know that I fain not, and I have cause to fear, the effect will shew I fain not indeed. In this case I may not desperately forbear to write to your grace, and think that because I have had no answer to all mine other letters, among which I made mention of this necessity, that I should likewise have none answer to this. As I have determined myself to a truth in the chief matters, so I eschew to use simulation in by-matters: my mind I thank God was never so quiet, as hath been since my coming hither, which hath relieved my body much, but the body hath need of other relief, which cannot be had as I am kept by commandment. These 7 weeks saving one day I have been here under such strait keeping, as I have spoken with no man. And thus me seemeth I see my matter perplexed, your grace will meddle with nothing done before your coming home. And those of the council that hath sent me hither, can by themselves do nothing, now your grace is come home: upon which consideration I sue to none of them, and perceive that your grace to whom I sue, for some respect forbearth to make me answer, for such a Paraphrasis I make of your grace's silence, wherein I go as near I think the truth, than Erasmus in his Paraphrasis some time, wherein he taketh upon him to guess the causes of Christ's doings, I thank God my mind can take no hurt, how vehement soever these temptations be. But when a certain sect of philosophers called stoicks, contemned in their learning stoutly the grief and disease of the body, they were fain a little to shrink, when the gout or any disease nipped them, and now my stomach nippeth me, which I have favoured as much as any man in England, and have laden it as light either with meat or drink of many years, and specially since my coming hither as any other. And after I saw I could get no answer from your grace for a physician, I have left off such study as I used, and given myself to continual walking for exercise, and with hope of relief, have delayed any further suit in that matter till now. And now I sue enforced, which I do most humbly with request, that imprisonment, being to me, that was never in prison before, of itself too tedious, be not with special commandment made more grievous, unless I were charged with other offence than I am yet charged with, or in my conscience can be. For me seemeth I have deserved thanks of your grace, and the realm, for the disclosing of the faults of the Paraphrasis, wherein I have written some specialties, but not all; and have such to shew as I may term that book at one word, abomination, both for the malice and untruth of much matter out of Erasmus pen and also the arrogant ignorancy of the translator into English considering the book should be authorised by a king, and by the injunctions charge the realm for buying rather above 20,000*l.* than under, whereof I have made account by estimate of the number of buyers, and the price of the whole books: the translator sheweth himself ignorant, both in Latin and English, a man far unmeet to meddle with such a matter, and not without malice on his part, whereby your grace may take an argument, what moved them that counseled your grace to authorize such a book in the realm. As for my lord of Canterbury's homily of salvation hath as many faults, as I have been weeks in prison, which be 7, besides the general that the matter maketh a trouble without necessity, and is handled contrary to the teaching of the parliament.—Finally in the 2 books the matter I have to show is some part so dangerous, as after I knew it as I know it, the concealment thereof were a great fault, if I did not utter it. As for the manner of mine enterprise to utter it, I know not how to have fashioned it better, than to write to the council in your absence, and on my knees to declare some part of it, when I came to them receiving their determination of imprisonment, I humbly departed from them hither without grudge, and remain here without grudge to any one of them, for they shewed no fashion of any evil mind towards me. And I have learned in the civil law that the deed of a number, is no one man's act with this also, the authority is to be honoured, which rule I observe in thought word and deed. After which sort I remain with such suits as I have made to your grace hitherto, and with this also that I add, enforced for the relief of my body, how little soever I do, and have cause to set by it, which I most humbly desire your grace to consider, and to send me some answer by this bearer: and I shall pray Almighty God for the preservation of your grace's felicity. Your grace's humble beadman. S. W.

Articles and Positions ministered and objected, each of them jointly and severally, to the Bishop of Winchester, and contained in a Letter from the Lord Protector to the said Bishop as followeth.

Article 1. "Imprimis, That the king's majesty justly and rightfully is, and by the laws of God ought to be supreme head in earth of the Church of England, and also of Ireland, and so is by the clergy of this realm in their convocation, and by act of parliament justly and according to the laws of God recognised."

W. This first Article the Bishop granteth.

Art. 2. Item, That his majesty, as supreme head of the said Churches, hath full power and authority to make and set forth laws, injunctions, and ordinances for and concerning religion, and orders of the said churches, for the increase of virtue, and repressing of all errors, heresies, and other enormities, and abuses.

W. To this second Article he answereth affirmatively.

Art. 3. Item, That all and every his grace's subjects are bound by the law of God to obey all his majesty's said laws, injunctions, and proceedings concerning religion and orders in the said Church.

W. To the third Article the said Bishop answereth affirmatively and granteth it.

Art. 4. Item, That you Steven Bishop of Winchester have sworn obedience unto his majesty as supreme head of this Church of England, and also of Ireland.

W. To the fourth Article, the said Bishop answereth affirmatively and granteth it.

Art 5. Item, That all and every his grace's subjects, that disobey any his majesty's said laws, injunctions, ordinances, and proceedings already set forth and published, or hereafter to be set forth and published, ought worthily to be punished, according to his ecclesiastical law used within this his realm.

W. To this fifth Article the said Bishop answereth affirmatively and granteth it.

Art. 5. Item, That you the said Bishop as well in the king's majesty's late visitation within your diocese, as at sundry times have been complained upon, and sundry informations made against you for your doings, sayings, and preachings against sundry injunctions, orders, and other proceedings of his majesty, set forth for reformation of errors, superstitions, and other abuses of religion.

W. This Article toucheth other men's acts, who or how they have complained or informed, I cannot thoroughly tell. For at the time of the king's majesty's visitation I was in the Fleet, and the morrow after Twelfth Day I was delivered at Hampton-court, my lord of Somerset and my lord of Canterbury then being in council, with many other counsellors, and was delivered by these words: The king's majesty hath granted a general pardon, and by the benefit thereof I was discharged: whereunto I answered, That I was learned never to refuse the king's majesty's pardon, and in strength as that was; and I would and did humbly thank his majesty therefore, and then they began with me in an article of learning touching justification, whereunto they willed me to say my mind; adding therewith, that because other learned had agreed to a form delivered unto me, I should not think I could alter it: which I received of them, and promised the Thursday after to repair to my lord of Somerset's house at Sheene, with my mind written; which I did, and at that day seven-night following, appearing before him and other of the council, was committed to my house for prisoner, because I refused to subscribe to the form of words and sentences that other had agreed unto, as they said. In which time of imprisonment in my house, the bishop of Rochester then being sent to me, and after master Smith, and then master Cecil, to which master Cecil, when I had by learning resolved my mind in the matter, I delivered it, and he delivering it to my lord's grace, wrote me, in his name, thanks for it; and it was within the time of Lent, ere I was discharged of that trouble, and so went to Winchester as a man clearly out of all travel of business.—And within 14 days after that, or thereabouts, began other travel with me, upon a request made by my lord of Somerset to surrender a college in Cambridge, and divers letters were written between his grace and me in it. Wherein I might perceive the secretary with his pen took occasion to prick me more, than I trusted my lord's grace himself would have done. And by this trouble was I deduced to an end. Then shortly after I received letters to come to the council, and by reason I alledged my disease, I was respited by other letters, and three days before Whitsuntide received yet other letters to come, by which it might seem unto me, that it was not of all believed that I was diseased. And therefore with all expedition, when I could not ride, I came in an horse litter, and according to my duty presented myself to my lords of the council, who all then entertained me secretly among them before the matters were objected unto me, as if I had been in the same place with them that I was in our late sovereign lord's days. Afterwards my lord of Somerset's grace charged me with these matters following, and in this form, having the articles written in a paper.—First, with disobedience that I came not at his sending for. Whereunto I answered, That I had his letters of licence to stay till I might come conveniently. And upon these last letters I came incontinently in a horse litter. Then it was objected, That I bare palms, and crept to the cross. Whereunto I answered, That they were misinformed, and I trusted they would not think I durst deny it, if I had done it, because ceremonies had such circumstances, as I might easily be reproved if it were otherwise. Then it was objected, That at Easter I had a solemn sepulchre in the church, and such other ceremonies. I answered, That I had even as many as the king's majesty's proclamations commanded me: declaring plainly, That I thought it not expedient to make any alteration, wherein to offend the king's majesty's proclamation; adding how he that followeth as he is commanded is very obedient.—It was then objected unto me, That I went about to deface two of the king's majesty's chaplains, sent down to be canons of the church of Winchester. Whereunto I answered, declaring the fact truly as it was, which I am yet able to justify. After this matter thus oft objected and answered, I was commanded to go apart, and being called in again, my lord of Somerset's grace, looking upon a bill of articles, said I had preached how the apostles went from the presence of the council, of the council, of the council;* which matter I denied, adding, That it was not my fashion of preaching, so to play in iteration of words.—After that, it was objected unto me for preaching of the sacrament, to say, the body of Christ was 'really' present, being a fault to use the word 'really,' not comprised in the scripture. Whereunto I answered, That I did not use the word 'really,' which needeth not. For as I once heard my lord of Canterbury reason against one Lambert in the presence of the king's majesty that dead is; the words of the scripture, 'This is my body that shall be betrayed for you,' do plainly and lively express the very presence, and so did I set it forth to the people in my diocese.—And this is the effect of all that was said against me at my being at the council, as I can remember. To whom I declared how much I esteemed obedience; and told them I had taught in my diocese, how the whole life of a Christian man consisteth in suffering properly; and therefore we may not do our own will, but the will of God: and among men, we must either suffer the rulers will, or their power; their will to order us, and their power to punish us. After declaration whereof, my lord of Somerset said; Ye must tarry in the town. Whereunto I answered; I would be contented wth their commandment or pleasure to tarry; but seeing I was no offender, I demed them I might not tarry as an offender: and for declaration thereof that I might have some house in the country about London, to remove unto for a shift. In devising whereof I stuck much to borrow Asshar. My lord of Somerset said, if he had any, in faith he would lend me one. And in the end my lord of Somerset desired me to write what my mind was in ceremonies; and to send it unto him, and with that departed.— Thus I have truly opened after what sort I have been complained on, that hath certainly come to my knowledge; truth it is, that one Philpot in Westminster, whom I accounted altered in his wits, as I have heard, devised tales of me, the specialities whereof I never was called to answer unto. Players and minstrels also railled on me, and others made ballads and rhymes of me, but never man had just cause to complain of any my sayings, doings, or preachings, or to my knowledge did, otherwise than afore. And if any man shall put me in remembrance of any other complaint that might in my absence be made of me, if I have heard it, I will grant so. But well assured I am, I was never complained on, and called to make answer to the complaint, but this one time in all my whole life by any man of any degree. Once the lord Cromwell, God pardon his soul and forgive him, caused one day and a half to be spent in a matter between sir Francis Brian and me, which was ended, and I declared an honest man, which the king's majesty that dead is, God pardon his soul, set forth with his familiarity to me incontinently. And this is all the trouble that I have had in my life, saving the sending to the Fleet, being occasioned by my own letter to the council, upon a zeal that I had, which they allowed not. And finally, this sending of me to the Tower; which was without calling me before the council, to hear what I could say. I am loth to be forsworn, and therefore I account all the complaints in my whole life made against me whereunto I have been made privy.

Art. 7. Item, That after and upon occasion of those and many other complaints and informations, you have been sundry times admonished, commanded and enjoined to conform yourself, as to your duty appertained.

W. To this seventh article I answer; I was never called afore the council by way of outward complaint and information, but only once in all my whole life, which was at my last coming to London. Whereunto I answered as afore, and have told the form and process of speech to serve for furniture of answer to this said that article: for other than I have before written I remember not to have done or suffered by the higher powers in all my whole life, till my coming into the Tower, without that I have had any by-admonitions, as a man feulcy or negligent at any time, that I remember not, for the observation of any thing already made or set forth by the king's majesty that now is, but have kept, and caused to be kept to my power the king's majesty's acts, statutes, injunctions, and proclamations inviolably, having for that purpose such a chancellor, as in orders and ordinances hath been always himself diligent and precise, for that time I might have knowledge of his doings.

Art. 8. Item, That after the premises, and for that these former admonitions and commandments notwithstanding, you did yet still shew yourself not conformable, and for that also others by your example were much animated, and thereby occasion of much unquietness ministered among the people, you were called before the king's majesty's council in the month of June, in the second year of his majesty's reign, and by them on his majesty's behalf commanded to preach a sermon before his majesty, and therein to declare the justness and godliness of his majesty's father in his proceedings upon certain matters partly mentioned in certain articles to you delivered in writing, and partly otherwise declared unto you. The effect whereof was touching the usurped power and authority of the bishop of Rome, that the same was justly and godly taken away in this realm and other the king's majesty's dominions; touching the just suppressing and taking away of monasteries and religious houses, of pilgrimages, reliques, shrines, images. The superstitious going about of St. Nicholas bishop, St. Edmund; St. Katharine, St. Clement, and such like; and just taking away of chantries, abbeys and colleges, hallowing of candles, water, ashes, palm, holy bread, beads, creeping to the cross, and such like. Also, touching the setting forth of the king's majesty's authority in his young years to be as great as if his highness were of many more years. That auricular confession is indifferent, and of no necessity by the law of God; and touching the procession and common prayer in English.

W. This Article being of so many parts as it is, some true, some otherwise, must be answered by division of it into divers members, to divide the one from the other, granting that which is true, denying that which is otherwise, and opening that which is ambiguous, avoiding that which is captious; so as, according to my oath, I may open directly and plainly the truth, with sincerity of conscience. The motion of preaching was made unto me in mine own house by master Cecil, upon the duke of Somerset's behalf, after I had been before the council, as I have before said; from which council I departed, as before is rehearsed, as no offender; and therefore when master Cecil spake to me of preaching before the king's majesty, with request to write my sermon before, I denied that manner of preaching, because I said it was to preach like an offender, and I was none, but departed from the council otherwise, as I have before shewed. And the said master Cecil did not say to me that I was moved to preach, because I was not conformable; for I had at that time no manner of variance with the council, but was in all conformity with them, for any thing that I know, as I will answer afore God.—As for evil example, to any man, I could none give, for I never offended law, statute, or proclamation in this realm, ne did ever any act to the impairing of due obedience to the king's majesty in all my whole life; but by observation of them, and letting innovations, have done as much as in me lay to maintain obedience.—After master Cecil had spoken to me of preaching, and delivered two papers containing the matters whereupon I should intreat, because I refused to give my sermon in writing, which was to me like an offender, or to read those papers of another man's device, as the conception and sincere manner of uttering of mine own conscience, which me thought then since, and yet, a marvellous unreasonableness matter, touching both my conscience and honesty, I was then set to the duke of Somerset's grace's chamber, and came in at a back door to himself alone, saving he took to him as witness he said, the lord now of Wiltshire, then great master; and after many words, he shewed me certain articles subscribed by lawyers, what a bishop might command, and what the king might command, and what pain to the disobeyer.—To whom I said plainly and truly, how those lawyers subscription could not serve in this case to command me to utter to the people, for mine own devise in words, that which is not indeed so; and if I might speak with these lawyers, I said, his grace should soon perceive them to agree with me. My lord said, I should speak with no man, and I should do as I was bidden, or do worse, and had me advise me till dinner was done. And then was I conveyed by the lord great master to his chamber, and there left alone to dine, as was indeed honourably prepared. But I took myself to be in the nature of a prisoner, and a restrained man.—And about two of the clock at afternoon came unto me master Thomas Smith, then secretary, unto whom I complained of the unreasonableness of the matter, and shewed him certain particularities; who said it was not meant so precisely, but to speak of the matters. To whom I said, I was content to speak of the matters, and then if I speak not according to the truth of them, there should be enough to bear witness to my condemnation, and if I speak the truth, then they had their desire. And I said further, I thought I might with my conscience say so as men ought and should be content and satisfied. And further, if I thought that in my manner of the uttering of those matters I should offend the council, I had rather deny to speak of the thing, and begin the contention secretly with them, than to begin with pulpit, and so bring myself in further trouble than needed; and therefore if they would have me preach, I would preach as of myself, and of these matters, so as I thought they should be content.—Whereupon I was brought up to my lord of Somerset's chamber, and there the matter ended thus, that my lord of Somerset said he would require no writing of me, but remit it to me, so I spake of the matters in the papers delivered me by master Cecil. I told him I would speak of them, saving for childrens' toys, of going about of Saint Nicholas, and Saint Clement. If that be now gone, quoth I, and forgotten, if I be too busy in rehearsal of them, they will say I cumber their heads with ceremonies, and thus they will defame me. When ceremonies were plenty, they will say, I did nothing but preach on them, and now they be gone, I babble of them still. I said I would teach the chief points, adding that I would speak of other matters also, and with that, being put to my liberty to choose the day, departed; and otherwise I was not spoken with concerning preaching, saving after Master Cecil came unto me, whereof I shall speak anon.—And concerning the matters to be spoken of, all such things as be here rehearsed be named in the papers delivered unto me, although not altogether after this sort; saving the setting forth of the king's majesty's authority in his minority, whereof there is no word in those papers, now was there ever any promise made of me to speak of it. Truth it is, that after I had signified the day when I would preach, Master Cecil came unto me, making the chief message to know the day when I would preach: to whom I had sent word before that it should be St. Peter's day, because me thought the Gospel served well for that purpose, and in process of communication he told me that he liked gaily well a word that I had said in another communication, how a king was as much a king at one year of age as at an hundred years of age, and if I touched it, he thought it would be well taken. I told him, again, every man knew that, and then opened of myself the matter further. And at his next repair unto me, which was the Monday before I preached, the said Master Cecil brought me papers of the king's majesty's hand, shewing me how the king's highness used to note every notable sentence, and specially if it touched a king; and therefore (quoth he) if ye speak of a king, ye must join counsel with all. Whereunto I made no answer, but shifted to other matter, without making him any promise, or denial, because I would neither bind myself, nor trouble myself to discuss that matter. For albeit it is godly and wisely done of every prince to use counsel; yet, speaking of a king's power by Scripture, I cannot by express Scripture limit the king's power by counsel. And hearing blindly by report some secret matter, that I will not speak of here, I thought not to meddle with it at all in the pulpit; and yet to the effect to have our sovereign lord now obeyed, of which mind I was ever, I pointed to our sovereign lord there in presence, and said he was only to be obeyed, and I would have but one king, and other words to that purpose. But for any promise to be made by me, I utterly deny it, and tell plainly the cause why I spake not otherwise of it. There was also, in the papers delivered unto me, occasion given me to speak of the mass, because of masses satisfactory, as some understand them. And also there was occasion to speak of the sacrament of the altar, because of the proclamation passed of the same, which to be true, I shall justify by the said papers.

Art. 9. Item, That you receiving the same; and promising to declare the same in a sermon by you made before his majesty for that purpose on the feast of St. Peter in the said second year of his reign, did then and there contemptuously and disobediently omit to declare and set forth many of the said matters, and of divers other of the said articles you spake and uttered your mind in such doubtful sort, as the justness and godliness of his majesty's father's and his proceedings was not set forth according to the commandment given unto you, and your own promise, to the great offence of the hearers, and manifest contempt of his majesty, and dangerous example of others.

W. Touching that promise I answer as before; and as touching omission of that I should have spoken of, by contempt or disobedience, I answer by mine oath; I did not omit any thing (if I did omit it) by contempt or disobedience; for I ever minded to satisfy the promise, to speak of all matters in those papers according to my former declaration. And if I did perchance omit any thing, whereof I can make now no assurance, it being two years and a half past since I preached) but if I did omit any thing, he who knew my travel in the matter, would not marvel, being troubled with a letter sent from the duke of Somerset, whereof I shall speak after. So as from four of the clock on Thursday, till I had done my sermon on the Friday, I did neither drink, eat, nor sleep, so careful was I to pass over the travel of preaching without all slander of the truth; and with satisfaction of my promise, and discharge of my duty to God and the king's most excellent majesty. Wherein, whether any thing were omitted or not, I could have answered more precisely than I can now, if according to my most instant suit, and the suit of my servants, the matter had been heard while it was in fresh memory. But because omission may be by infirmity of nature, in which oblivion is a pain of our original sin, in which case it is no mortal offence, if a man being put in remembrance will purge it; I therefore, according to the true testimony of mine own conscience, dare the more boldly deny all contempt and disobedience, having for my declaration a general sentence spoken in my sermon, that I agreed with the upper part in their laws, orders and commandments, or such like words, and found fault only in the lower part. By which sentence it appeared, how I allowed in the whole that was past hitherto, and only dissented from the doings of them that attempt innovations of their own presumption. And furthermore I say, That that saying (omission) here objected unto me, if it were true, as

I know it not to be, may happen two ways; one way by infirmity of nature, another way of purpose. Charity of a Christian man permiteth not to determine the worst of that which is doubtful and ambiguous to both parties: as touching doubtfulness objected, I take God to record, I minded to speak simply, and to be on the king's majesty's side only, and not to go invisible in the world, with ambiguities, esteeming him, &c. The worst man of all is he, that will make himself a lock of words and speech, which is known not to be my fashion, nor do I think this life worth that dissimulation, and how can that be a doubtful speech in him, that professeth to agree with the king's laws, injunctions and statutes, which I did expressly? There be that call in doubt whatsoever serveth not their appetite. It is not in the speaker to satisfy the hearer that will doubt where doubt is not. The sum of my teaching was, that all visible things be ordered to serve us, which we may in convenient service use. And when we serve them, that is an abuse, and may then, at the ruler's pleasure, unless scripture appointeth a special use of them, be corrected in that use, or taken away for reformation. And this is a plain teaching that hath no doubt in it, but a yea and nay on both sides, without a mean to make a doubt. And if any that doubteth cometh unto me, I will resolve him the doubt as I can. And if I promised to speak plainly, or am commanded to speak plainly, and cannot, then is my fault to promise only in the nature of folly and ignorance, wherunto I resort, not for a shift, whereof indeed I profess the knowledge, but to shew how sometime to my hindrance I am noted learned, that can speak plainly, and yet speak doubtfully, otherwhiles am rejected as one that understandeth not the matter at all. As touching contempt, there can be none manifest that proceedeth of a privy promise; if I had broken it, I intended not, but intended to take it, as appeareth by my general sentence, to agree with the superiors, and only find fault in the inferior subjects, who daily transgress the king's majesty's proclamations and other, whereof I spake then.

Article 10th. Item, that you being also commanded on his majesty's behalf, for avoiding of tumult, and for other great considerations, inhibited to treat of any matter in controversy concerning the mass, and of the communion, then, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, did contrary to the said commandment and inhibition, declare divers your judgments and opinions in the same, in the manifest contempt of his highness's said inhibition, to the great offence of the hearers, and disturbance of common quiet and unity of the realm.

W. To the tenth Article the said bishop answered, that the Wednesday at afternoon, next before the Friday when I preached, M. Cecil came to me, and having in all his other accesses spoken no word thereof, did then utter and advise me from the D. of Somerset, that I should not speak of the sacrament or of the mass, whereby he said I should avoid trouble. And when he saw me not to take it well, I mean, quoth he, doubtful matters. I asked him what? he said transubstantiation. I told him he wist not what transubstantiation meant. I will preach, quoth I, the very presence of Christ's most precious body and blood in the sacrament, which is the Catholic faith, and no doubtful matter, ne yet in controversy, saving that certain unlearned speak of it they wot not what. And among the matters, quoth I, whereof I have promised to speak, I must by special words speak of the sacrament and of the mass also. And when I shall so speak of them, I will not forbear to utter my faith and true belief therein, which I think necessary for the king's majesty to know; and therefore if I wist to be hanged when I came down, I would speak it. Which plain zeal of my conscience, grounded upon God's commandment to do his message truly, I would not hide, but utter so, as my lord should, if he would not have it spoken of, not let me to come there as he might have done: whereas else, if I had had a deceitful purpose, I might have accepted the advice, and without any colour of trouble have refused to follow it as a thing grounded upon wealth only, as it was then uttered. With this my answer M. Cecil departed, and upon the Thursday which was the next day following, and the evening before I preached between three and four at afternoon. I received a letter signed with the hand of the duke of Somerset, the copy whereof I am ready to exhibit, and took it then and esteemed it so now to contain no effectual inhibition whereunto I might by God's law, or the king's majesty's laws, with discharge of my conscience and duty obey, although the said letters had been, as they were not, in such terms framed, as had precisely forbidden me, as they did not, but only uttered to speak of matters in controversy of the sacrament which indeed I did not, but only uttered a truth to my conscience most certainly persuaded of the most holy sacrament, necessary to be known to the king's majesty, and to be uttered by me admitted to that place of preaching, from whence God commandeth his truth to be uttered, which in this nature of truth, the undue estimation and use whereof Saint Paul threateneth with temporal death, may in no wise be omitted. So as I was and am persuaded the right estimation of the sacrament to be to acknowledge the very presence of the same most precious body and blood present in the sacrament to feed us, that was given to redeem us. If I shewed not my sovereign lord the truth thereof, I for my part suffer him wittingly to fall into that extreme danger of body, which Saint Paul threateneth, whose person I am bound by nature, by special oaths, and by God's laws, to preserve to my power, as I will do, and must do by all ways and means. And if the king's majesty doth vouchsafe to teach his people not to obey his commandment, where God commandeth the contrary, I might not take my lord of Somerset's letter for an inhibition to hold my peace, when God biddeth me to speak, as he doth when the wolf cometh, and not to hide myself in silence, which is the most shameful running away of all. I have much matter to alledge against the letter why I should not credit it, written in his name alone, against a common letter, as I took it, written by him and the Council, and published in print the first day of the said month, which maintaineth my preaching of the sacrament and mass, according to the proclamation and injunctions, the violation of which public letters, had been a disorder and contempt, whereas I neither offended in the one, nor the other.—And as for tumult, none could reasonably be feared of any thing spoken agreeable to the king's majesty's laws, as there did follow none, nor the people, nor any man did offer my person any wrong, or make tumult against me: notwithstanding, players, jesters, rhymers, ballad-makers, did signify me to be of the true catholic faith, which I according to my duty declared to the king's majesty, from whom I may hide no truth that I think expedient for him to know. And as the name of God cannot be used of any creature against God, no more can the king's name be used of any subject against his highness. Wherefore seeing the abuse of this holy sacrament hath in it a danger assured by scripture of body and soul; whosoever is persuaded in the catholic faith as I am, findeth himself so burdened to utter that unto his majesty, as no worldly loss can let him to do his duty in that behalf, and much less my lord's private letters written without other of the council's hands.

Art. 11. Item, That after the premises, viz. in the month of May or June or one of them, in the third year of his highness reign, his majesty sent afterwards unto you to know your conformity towards his said reformations, and specially touching the book of common prayer, then lately set forth by his majesty, whereunto you at the same time refused to shew yourself conformable.

W. To the 11th Article: for answer and declaration thereof, he said, the next day at afternoon after he had preached, when he looked for no such matter, came to his house the right worshipful sir Anthony Wingfield, and sir Rafe Sadler, knights, accompanied with a great number of the guard, and used themselves for their part according to their worships, and (I doubt not) as they were appointed, and sir Rafe Sadler began thus with me; My lord, said he, ye preached yesterday obedience, but ye did not obey yourself, and went forth with his message very soberly, as he can, and discreetly. I asked him wherein I obeyed not. He said, touching my lord of Somerset's letter. Master Sadler, quoth I, I pray you say unto my lord's grace, I would he never made mention of that letter for the love I bear him. And yet, quoth I, I have not broken that letter, and I was minded, quoth I, to have written to my lord upon the receipt of it, and lo, quoth I, ye may see how I began, and shewed him (because we were then in my study) the beginning of my letter, and reasoned with him for the declaration of myself, and told him therewith, I will not spend, quoth I, many words with you, for I cannot alter this determination. And yet in good faith, quoth I, my manner to you, and this declaration may have this effect, that I be gently handled in the prison, and for that purpose I pray you make suit on my behalf.—Master Wingfield laid his hand on my shoulder and arrested me in the king's name for disobedience. I asked him whither I should? They said to the Tower. Finally I desired them that I might be spoken with shortly, and heard what I could say for myself, and prayed them to be suiters in it, and so they said they would.—After that I was once in the Tower, until it was within six days of one whole year, I could hear no manner, word, message, comfort, or relief, saving once when I was sick, and me thought some extremity towards me, my chaplain had leave to come to me once, and then denied again, being answered, that my fever was but a tertian, which my said chaplain told me when he came to me at the Easter following, and there being with me from the morning till night on Easter day departed, and for no suit could I ever have him since. To master Lieutenant I made divers suits to provoke the duke of Somerset's grace to hear me: and if I might have the liberty of an Englishman, I would plainly declare I had neither offended law, statute, act, proclamation, nor his own letter neither; but all would not help, and I shall report me to Mr. Lieutenant whether in all this time I unlied, grudged, or used any unseemly words, ever demanding justice, and to be heard according to justice. When I had been thus in the Tower one whole year within six days or seven, as I remember, came to the Tower the lord chancellor of England, now being the lord treasurer, and master secretary Peter, who calling me unto them, as I remember, entered thus; they said they had brought with them a book passed by the parliament, which they would I should look on, and say my mind to it, and upon my conformity in it, my lord of Somerset would be suiter to the king's majesty for mercy to be ministered to me. Whereunto I answered, that I trusted if I might be heard, the king's majesty's justice would relieve me, which I had long sued for, and could not be heard. And to sue for mercy, quoth I, when I have not in my conscience offended, and also to sue out of this place, where asking of mercy implieth a further suspicion than I would be for all the world touched in, were not expedient; and therefore, quoth I, not guilty, is and hath been continually allowed a good plea for a prisoner. Then my lord said, why quoth he, were ye not commanded to preach of the king's authority in his young age, and did not? I told him I was not commanded. Is not, quoth he, that article in the papers ye had delivered you? I assured him no.—And after communication of the king's majesty's authority wherein was no disagreement, then my lord chancellor said I had disobeyed my lord's grace's letter. I told him I thought not, and if the matter came to judgment it should appear. And then I said to him, My lord, how many open injunctions under seal and in open court have been broken in this realm? the punishment whereof hath not been handled after this sort, and yet I would stand in defence that I have not broken his letter, weighing the words of his letter, wherein I reasoned with master secretary Peter what a controversy was, and some part what I could say further. But whatsoever I can say, quoth I, you must judge it, and for the passion of God do it, and then let me sue for mercy, when the nature of the offence is known, if I will have it. But when I am, quoth I, declared an offender, I will with humility of suffering make amends to the king's majesty, so far as I am able; for I should never offend him, and much less in his young age.—My lord chancellor then shewed me the beginning of the act for common prayer, how dangerous it was to break the order of it. I told him that it was true, and therefore if I came abroad, I would be well aware of it. But it is, quoth I, after in the act, how no man should be troubled for this act, unless he were first indicted, and therefore (quoth I) I may not be kept in prison for this act. Ah (quoth he) I perceive ye know the law well enough. I told him my chaplain had brought it unto me the afternoon before. Then they required me to look on the book, and to say my mind in it; I answered that I thought not meet to yield myself a scholar to go to school in prison, and then slander myself as though I redeemed my faults with my conscience. As touching the law which I know, I will honour it like a subject, and if I keep it not, will willingly suffer the pain of it. And what more conformity I should shew, I cannot tell; for mine offences be past if there be any. If I have not suffered enough, I will suffer more, if upon examination I be found faulty: and as for this new law, if I keep it not, punish me likewise.—Then my lord chancellor asked me whether I would not desire the king's majesty to be my good lord. At which words I said: Alas my lord, quoth I, do ye think that I have so forgotten myself? My duty, quoth I, requirith so, and I will on my knees desire him to be my good lord, and my lord protector also, quoth I: That is well said, quoth my lord chancellor. And what will he say further? quoth my lord chancellor. In good faith, quoth I, this, that I thought when I had preached, that I had not offended at all, and think so still, and had it not been for the article of the supremacy, I would have rather fained myself sick, than be occasion of this that hath followed; but going to the pulpit, I must needs say as I said. Well, quoth my lord chancellor, let us go to our purpose again. Ye will, quoth he, desire the king's majesty to be your good lord, and the lord protector also, and ye say ye thought not to have offended. All this I will say, quoth I; and ye will (quoth my lord chancellor) submit yourself to be ordered by my lord protector. Nay, quoth I, by the law;

for my lord protector, quoth I, hath scourged me over sore this year, to put my matter in his hands now. And in the latter point I varied with my lord chancellor, when I would not refer my order to my lord protector, but to the law; and staying at this point they were content to grant me of their gentleness to make their suit to procure me to be heard, and do obtain me liberty to go in the gallery, and that I should hear of one of them within two days following. I desired them to remember that I refused not the book by way of contempt, nor in any evil manner, but that I was loth to yield myself a scholar in the Tower, and to be seen to redeem my faults, if I had any, with my conscience. My body, I said, should serve my conscience, but not contrarywise. And this is the truth, upon my conscience and oath, that was done and said at their coming. There was more said to the purposes aforesaid. And I bind not myself to the precise form of words, but to the substance of the matter and fashion of the entreating. So near as I can remember I have truly discharged mine oath. But I heard no more of my matter in one whole year after almost, within fourteen days, notwithstanding two letters written by me to the council, of most humble request to be heard according to justice. And then at the end of two years almost, came unto me the duke of Somerset, with other of the council; which matter because it is left out here, I shall not touch, but prepare it in a matter apart, for declaration of my behaviour at all times.

Art. 12. Item, That after that, &c. the ninth day of July, in the fourth year of his majesty's reign, his highness sent unto you his grace's letters, with a certain submission and articles, whereunto his grace willed and commanded you to subscribe. To which submission you contemptuously refused to subscribe.

IV. To the twelfth Article, for answer therunto, he granted that about the time mentioned in this article, the lord treasurer, the earl of Warwick lord great master, sir William Herbert, and master secretary Peter came to the Tower, and called me before them, and delivered unto me the king's majesty's letters, which I have to shew, and received them at the hands of the lord treasurer upon my knees, kissed them as my duty was, and still upon my knees read them, whereas they gently required me to take more ease, and go apart with them, and consider them: which after that I had thoroughly read, I much lamented that I should be commanded to say of myself as was there written, and to say otherwise of myself than my conscience will suffer me, and where I trust my deeds will not condemn me, there to condemn myself with my tongue. I should sooner (quoth I to them) by commandment, I think if ye would bid me tumble myself desperately into the Thames.—My lord of Warwick seeing me in that agony, said, What say ye my lord, quoth he, to the other articles: I answered, That I was loth to disobey where I might obey, and not wrest my conscience, destroying the comfort of it, as to say untruly of myself. Well, quoth my lord of Warwick, will ye subscribe to the other articles? I told him I would. But then, quoth I, the article that toucheth me must be put out. I was answered, that needeth not, for I might write on the outside what I would say unto it. And then my lord of Warwick entertained me very gently, and would needs whiles I should write, have me sit down by him; and when he saw me make somewhat strange so to do, he pulled me nearer him, and said, we had ere this sat together, and trusted we should do so again. And then having pen and ink given me, I wrote, as I remember, on the article that touched me, these words; I cannot with my conscience say this of myself; or such like words. And there followed an article of the king's majesty's primacy, and I began to write on the side of that, and had made an l, onward, as may appear by the articles, and they would not have me to do so; but wrote only my name after their articles, which I did. Whereat because they shewed themselves pleased and content, I was bold to tell them merrily, That by this means I had placed my subscription above them all; and thereupon it pleased them to entertain me much to my comfort.—And I was bold to recount unto them merry tales of my misery in prison, which they seemed content to hear; and then I told them also (desiring them not to be discontent with that I should say) when I remember each of them alone, I could not think otherwise but they were my good lords, and yet when they meet together I feel no remedy at their hands. I looked (quoth I) when my lord of Somerset was here, to go out within two days, and made my farewell feast in the Tower and all; since which time there is a month past, or thereabout; and I agree with them, and now agree with you, and I may fortune to be forgotten. My lord treasurer said nay, I should hear from them the next day; and so by their special commandment I came out of the chamber after them, that they might be seen depart as my good lords; and so was done. By which process appeareth how there was in me no contempt, as is said in this article, but such a subscription made as they were content to suffer me to make, which I took in my conscience for a whole satisfaction of the king's majesty's letters, which I desire may be deemed accordingly. And one thing was said unto me further, that other would have put in many more articles, but they would have no more but those.

Art. 13. Item, That you having eftsoons certain of the king's majesty's honourable council sent unto you the 12th of July, in the said 4th year, with the said submission, and bring on his majesty's behalf required and commanded to consider again and better the said commission, and to subscribe the same, stood in justification of yourself, and would in no wise subscribe thereunto.

W. To the 18th Article he said, The next day after the being in the Tower of the said lord treasurer, the earl of Warwick, and other, came unto me sir William Harbert and master secretary Peter, to devise with me how to make some acknowledging of my fault (as they said) because the other form liked me not. Whereunto I said, I knew myself innocent, and to enter with you to entreat of a devise to impair my innocency in any the least point either by words or writings, it can have no policy in it. For although I did more esteem liberty of body, than the defamation of myself, yet, quoth I, when I had so done with you, I were not so assured by you to come out. For when I were by my own pen once made a naughty man, then were I not the more sure to come out, but had locked myself the more surer in; and a small pleasure were it to me to have my body at liberty by your procurement, and to have my conscience in perpetual prison by mine own act. Many more words there were, and persuasions on their parts; which caused me to require of them, for the passion of God, that my matter might take an end by justice; and so they departed, there being no contempt or faction of disobedience shewed on my behalf, but only allegation for my defence of mine innocency in the best manner I could devise, as I trust they will testify.

Art. 14. Item, That after all this, viz. the 14th day of July in the said 4th year, the king's majesty sent yet again unto you certain of his majesty's honourable council, with another submission, and divers other articles, willing and commanding you to subscribe your name thereunto. Which to do you utterly refused.

W. To the 14th Article he said, that on the Monday in the morning following came the bishop of London, sir William Harbert, master secretary Peter, and another whom I know not, who brought with them a paper, with certain articles written in it, which they required me to subscribe. Whereupon I most instantly required, that my matter might be tried by justice, which although it were more grievous, yet it hath a comodity with it, that it endeth certainly the matter. And I could never yet come to my assured stay, and therefore refused to meddle with any more articles, or to trouble myself with the reading of them; and yet they desired me so instantly to read them, that I was content, and did read, and to shew my perfect obedient mind, offered incontinently upon my delivery out of prison to make answer to them all, such as I would abide by, and suffer pain for, if I have deserved it. I would indeed gladly have been in hand with my lord of London; but he said he came not to dispute, and said it was the hand of God that I was thus in prison, because I had so troubled other men in my time. Finally, my request was, That they should in this form make my answer to my lords of the council as followeth: that I most humbly thank them of their good will to deliver me by the way of mercy, but because in respect of mine own innocent conscience I had rather have justice, I desired them, seeing both was in the king's majesty's hands, that I might have it; which if it happen to me more grievous, I will impute it to myself, and evermore thank them for their good will; and so departed I with them, as I trust they will testify, and no misbehaviour or misdemeanor to have been used on my behalf.

Art. 15. Item, That after all this, videlicet, the 19th day of July, in the said 4th year, you being personally called before the king's majesty's privy council, and having the said submission and articles openly and distinctly read unto you, and required to subscribe the same, refused for unjust considerations by you alledged to subscribe the same.

W. To the 15th Article I grant, that upon a Saturday at afternoon, even at such time of the day as they were at evening in the chapel at the court, I was brought thither, and at my coming the lords of the council said, they were all my judges by special commission, and intended to proceed thus with me: that I should subscribe certain articles which were then read, and I must directly, make answer, whether I would subscribe them or no. I answered on my knees in this wise: For the passion of God, my lords, be my good lords, and let me be tried by justice, whether I be faulty or no; and as for these articles, as soon as ye deliver me to my liberty, I would make answer to them whether I would subscribe them or no. Then they having further to say, I answered, these articles were of divers sorts; some be laws, which I may not qualify; some be no laws, but learning and fact, which may have divers understandings, and a subscription to them without telling what I mean, were over dangerous. And therefore I offered, for the more declaration of mine obedience to all their requests, that if they would deliver me the articles into the prison with me, I would shortly make them particular answer, and suffer the pains of the law, that by my answer I might incur into. Whereupon I was commanded to go apart, and they sent unto me the lord treasurer and master secretary Peter, who commured with me of a mean way, and that liked not the lords. And then I was called forth again, and my absolute subscription required again: and I again made offer to answer particularly, for I could not with my conscience subscribe them as they were absolutely. And these my considerations I trust to be just, seeing no man for any commandments ought to offend his conscience, as I must have done in that case.

Art. 16. Item, That for your sundry and manifold contempts and disobediences in this behalf used, the fruits of your bishopric were then by special commission of his majesty justly and lawfully sequestered.

W. To the 16th Article, I deny contempts and disobedience of parts, and say, That my doings cannot so be termed, because it is taught in this realm for a doctrine of obedience, that if a king command that which is contrary to the commandment of God, the subject may not do as he is commanded, but humbly stand to his conscience, which is my case, who could not with my conscience do as I was required. And as touching the fact of decree, there was indeed a decree read, having words so placed and framed as though I were such an offender, which matter I deny. And in that decree was mentiou made of administration of fruits; but whether the former words were of the present tense, or else to be sequestered, I cannot precisely tell, but do refer that to the tenor of the decree.

Art. 17. Item, That after this you had intimation and peremptory monition, with communication that you should within three months next following the said intimation, reconcile and submit yourself, under pain of deprivation.

W. To the 17th Article I answer, that in the same decree of sequestration at the same time read, I kneeling from the beginning of the decree to the latter end, I remember there was an intimation and three months spoken of, and expressed also how at every month's end I should have pen and ink offered to write, if I would yet subscribe, and as I understand it was upon the pain of proceeding further. And I do not remember that I heard the word deprivation, but therein I refer me to the acts of the sentence; which when it was read, I desired it might be testified what mine offer was, to answer all those articles particularly even remaining in prison. And this done, I made suit for some of my servants abroad to resort to me to the Tower, partly for my comfort, partly for my necessary business, which could not be obtained. And yet to provoke it, I said to my lord of Warwick, how for agreeing with my lord of Somerset I had some commodity, and for agreeing with him had nothing, and therefore would needs by intercession press him, that I might by this means have some of my servants resorting unto me. He answered very gently. And then one said, I should within two or three days have somebody come to me. And then I was dismissed, with commandment to the lieutenant, to let me have the same liberty I had, but no more.

Art. 18. Item, That the said three months are now thoroughly expired and run.

W. To the 18th Article he said, There is almost six months passed in time and number of days, but not one month past to the effect of the law, nor ten days neither, because I have been so kept in prison, that I could not seek for remedy in form above said, nor was there at every month, after the form of the sentence, offered me pen, ink, and liberty given me to consult and deliberate with other learned men and friends, what were best to do, or to send unto them. And furthermore, the very eighth day after the decree given, I protested before my servants, whom I had only commodity to use as witnesses of the nullity of the decree, for the evident and apparent matter in it; but if it were any in law, I appealed to the king's majesty, because my request was not admitted, to have the copy of the articles to answer them particularly, and because it is excessive correction, to sequester my fruits and keep me in prison. With other cases to be deduced where I might have opportunity. Which appellation I protested to intimate as soon as I could come to any presence meet therefore, as I did in this assembly at my last repair, desiring therewith the benefit restitutio in integrum, because of mine imprisonment; and therefore do answer this matter with protestation of that appeal, and utterly deny all manner of contempt.

Art. 19. Item, That you hitherto, according to the said intimation and monition, have not submitted, reconciled, nor reformed yourself, but contemptuously yet still remain in your first disobedience.

W. To the 19th Article I say, That I have been all this while in prison so kept, as no man could have access to council with me, nor any means to write or send to any man, having made continual suit to master Lieutenant and master Marshal, under whose custody I am here, to make suit in my name to the lords of the council, that I might come to hearing, or else be bailed upon surety, which I could not obtain, and so have remained under the benefit of my said appeal to the king's majesty, made as I might for the time, which I elssoons desire I may have liberty to prosecute.—And whereas answering to these articles for declaration of the integrity of my conscience, I use in the same places general words; I protest I mean not by those words to set forth myself otherwise more arrogantly than as my direct intent (which excludeth malice) and purpose moveth me to say, and as my conscience beareth witness unto me at this time, and therefore will say therein with St. Paul, Nihil mihi conscius sum, sed non in hoc justificatus sum. Wherefore if any especially be objected unto me, wherein, by ignorance or oversight and negligence, any offence of mine may appear against the king's majesty's laws, statutes and injunctions, I shall desire and protest that it be not prejudicial to mine answer (for this present, credo, as lawyers in civil matters use that term) to be true, that is to say, such as without any alteration in my conscience presently I may of myself say in affirmation or denial, as afore is answered. And whereas I spake of commandment to be made to me against God's law, I protest not to touch my sovereign lord's honour therein, which my duty is by all means to preserve, but that the commandment given resolveth to be against God's law on my part in the obedience to be given, because I may not answer or say otherwise but est, est; non, non. So as my words and heart may agree together, or else I should offend God's law, which my sovereign, if he knew my conscience, would not command me."

After these things thus passed, certain of the council, by the king's appointment, had sundry days and times access to him in the Tower to persuade with him, which were these, the duke of Somerset, the lord treasurer, the lord privy seal, the lord great chamberlain, and Mr. seccretary Peter. Who repairing to him the 10th day of June, anno 1550, he desired of them to see the king's book of proceedings; upon the sight whereof he would make a full answer, seeming to be willing in all things to conform himself thereunto; and promising that in case any thing offended his conscience, he would open it to none but to the council. Whereupon it was agreed the book should be sent him to see his answer, that his case might be resolved upon, and that for the mean time he should have the liberty of the gallery and garden in the Tower, when the duke of Norfolk were absent.—The king then was lying at Greenwich, at which time the lieutenant of the Tower was appointed to deliver the king's book to the bishop of Winchester. Who, within three days after, which was the 13th of June, made declaration again unto the council, that the bishop having perused it, said unto him, he could make no direct answer unless he were at liberty, and so being he would say his conscience. Whereupon the lords, and other that had been with him the other day, were appointed to go to him again to receive a direct answer, that the council thereupon might determine further order for him.—The answer of the bishop being received, through the report of the lords which had been with him, declaration was made again, the 8th day of July, 1550, that his answers were ever doubtful, refusing while he were in prison to make any direct answer. Wherefore it was determined that he should be directly examined whether he would sincerely conform himself unto the king's majesty's proceedings or not. For which purpose it was agreed that particular articles should be drawn, to see whether he would subscribe them or not, and a letter also directed unto him from the king's highness, with the which the lord treasurer, the lord great master, the master of the horse, and master secretary Peter, should repair unto him; the tenor of which letter hereafter insueth.

A Letter sent to the Bishop of Winchester, signed by the King, and subscribed by the Council.

"It is not, we think, unknown unto you, with what clemency and favour we by the advice of our council caused you to be heard and used, upon the sundry complaints and informations that were made to us and our said council of your disordered doings and words, both at the time of our late visitation, and otherwise. Which notwithstanding, considering that the favour, both then and many other times ministered unto you, wrought rather an insolent wilfulness in yourself, than any obedient conformity, such as would have beseeemed a man of your vocation, we could not but use some demonstration of justice towards you, as well for such notorious and apparent contempts and other inobediencies, as after and contrary to our commandment were openly known in you, as also for some example and terror of each others as by your example seemed to take courage to mutter and grudge against our most godly proceedings; whereof great discord and inconvenience at that time might have ensued. For the avoiding whereof, and for your just deservings, you were by our said council committed to ward. Where albeit we have suffered you to remain a long space, sending unto you in the mean time at sundry times divers of the noblemen and others of our privy council, and travelling by them with clemency and favour to have reduced you to the knowledge of your duty; yet in all this time have you neither acknowledged your faults, nor made any submission as might have beseeemed you, nor yet shewed any appearance either of repentance or of any good conformity to our godly proceedings. Wherewith albeit we both have good cause to be offended, and might also justly by the order of our laws cause your former doings to be reformed and punished to the example of others: yet for that we would both the world and yourself also should know that we delight more in clemency, than in the straight administration of justice, we have vouchsafed not only to address unto you these our letters, but also to send estoons unto you four of our privy council with certain Articles: which being by us with the advice of our said council considered, we think requisite for sundry considerations to be subscribed by you, and therefore will and command you to subscribe the said Articles, upon pain of incurring such punishment and penalties as by our laws may be put upon you for not doing the same. Given at our palace of Westminster, the 8th day of July, the 4th year of our reign."

With this Letter addressed from the King and his Council, these ARTICLES also were delivered to the Bishop of Winchester here following.

The Copy of the ARTICLES.

"WHEREAS I Stephen bishop of Winchester have been suspected as one too much favouring the bishop of Rome's authority, decrees and ordinances, and as one that did not approve or allow the king's majesty's proceedings in alteration of certain rights in religion, was convented before the king's highness's council, and admonished thereof; and having certain things appointed for me to do and preach for my declaration, have not done that as I ought to do, although I promised to do the same; whereby I have not only incurred the king's majesty's indignation, but also divers of his highness's subjects have by my example taken encouragement (as his grace's council is certainly informed) to repine at his majesty's most godly proceedings; I am right sorry therefore, and acknowledge myself condignly to have been punished, and do most heartily thank his majesty, that of his great clemency it hath pleased his highness to deal with me, not according to rigour, but mercy. And to the intent it may appear to the world how little I do repine at his highness's doings, which be in religion most godly, and to the common wealth most profitable, I do affirm and say freely of my own will, without any compulsion, as ensueth.—1. That by the law of God, and the authority of scriptures, the king's majesty and his successors are the supreme heads of the Churches of England and also of Ireland. 2 Item, That the appointing of holy days and fasting days, as Lent, Ember-days, or any such like, or to dispense therewith, is in the king's majesty's authority and power: and his highness as supreme head of the said Churches of England and Ireland, and governor thereof, may appoint the manner and time of the holy days and fasting days, or dispense therewith, as to his wisdom shall seem most convenient for the honour of God and the wealth of this realm. 3. That the king's majesty hath most christianly and godly set forth, by and with the consent of the whole parliament, a devout and christian book of service of the church to be frequented by the church, which book to be accepted and allowed of all bishops, pastors, curates, and all ministers ecclesiastical of the realm of England, and so of him to be declared and commended in all places where he shall fortune to preach or speak to the people of it, that it is a godly and christian book and order, and to be allowed, accepted, and observed of all the king's majesty's true subjects. 4. I do acknowledge the king's majesty that now is (whose life God long preserve) to be my sovereign lord, and supreme head under Christ to me as a bishop of this realm, and natural subject to his majesty, and now in this his young and tender age to be my full and entire king; and that I and all other his highness's subjects are bound to obey all his majesty's proclamations, statutes, laws, and commandments, made, promulgate, and set forth in his highness's young age, as well as though his highness were at this present 30 or 40 years old. 5. I confess and acknowledge, that the statute, commonly called the statute of the six Articles, for just causes and grounds is by authority of parliament repealed and disannulled. 6. That his majesty and his successors have authority in the said Churches of England and also of Ireland, to alter, reform, correct, and amend all errors and abuses, and all rites and ceremonies ecclesiastical as shall seem from time to time to his highness and his successors most convenient for the edification of his people, so that the same alteration be not contrary or repugnant to the scripture and law of God. Subscribed by STEVEN WINCHESTER, with the testimonial hands of the Council to the same."

To these ARTICLES afore specified although Winchester with his own hand did subscribe, granting and consenting to the supremacy of the king as well then being as of his successors to come; yet because he stuck so much in the first point touching his submission, and would in no case subscribe to the same, but only made his answer in the margin (as is above noted) it was therefore thought good to the king, that the master of the horse, and master secretary Peter should repair unto him again with the same request of submission, exhorting him to look better upon it; and in case the words seemed too sore, then to refer it unto himself in what sort and with what words he should devise to submit him, that upon the acknowledgment of his fault, the king's highness might extend his mercy and liberality towards him as it was determined. Which was the 11th day of June, the year above said.—When the master of the horse and secretary Peter had been with him in the Tower according to their commission, returning from him again they declared unto the king and his council how precisely the said bishop stood in justification of himself, that he had never offended the king's majesty: wherefore he utterly refused to make any submission at all. For the more surety of which denial, it was agreed that a new book of articles should be devised, wherewith the said master of the horse and master secretary Peter should repair unto him again, and for the more authentic proceeding with him, they should have with them a divine and a temporal lawyer, which were the bishop of London, and master Goodrick.

The Copy of the last ARTICLES sent to the Bishop of Winchester.

"WHEREAS I Stephen bishop of Winchester have been suspected as one that did not approve or allow the king's majesty's proceedings in alteration of certain rites in religion, and was convented before the king's highness's council, and admonished thereof, and having certain things appointed for me to do and preach for my declaration, have not done therein as I ought to do, whereby I have deserved his majesty's displeasure; I am right sorry therefore. And to the intent it may appear to the world how little I do repine at his highness's doings, which be in religion most godly, and to the commonwealth most profitable, I do affirm as followeth.—1. That the late king of most famous memory king Henry the 8th, our late sovereign lord, justly and of good reason and ground hath taken away, and caused to be suppressed and defaced, all monasteries and religious houses, and all conventicles and covents of monks, friars, nuns, canons, bonhoms, and other persons called religious, and that the same being so dissolved, the persons therein bound and professed to obedience to a person, place, habit, and other superstitious rites and ceremonies, upon that dissolution and order appointed by the king's majesty's authority as supreme head of the Church, are clearly released and acquitted of those vows and professions, and at their full liberty, as though those unwitty and superstitious vows had never been made. 2. Item, that any person may lawfully marry, without any dispensation from the bishop of Rome or any other man, with any person whom it is not prohibited to contract matrimony with, by the law Levitical. 3. That the vowing and going on pilgrimage to images, or the bones, or reliques of any saints, hath been superstitiously used, and cause of much wickedness and idolatry, and therefore justly abolished by the said late king of famous memory, and the images and reliques so abused have been for great and godly considerations defaced and destroyed. 4. That the counterfeiting of St. Nicholas, St. Clement, St. Catharine, and St. Edmund, by children, heretofore brought into the Church, was a mere mockery and foolishness, and therefore justly abolished and taken away. 5. It is convenient and godly, that the scripture of the Old Testament and New, that is, the whole Bible, be had in English and published to be read of every man, and that whosoever doth repel and debort men from reading thereof doth evil and damnably. 6. That the said late king, of just ground and reason did receive into his hands the authority and disposition of chauntries and such livings as were given for the maintenance of private masses, and did well change divers of them to other uses. 7. Also the king's majesty that now is, by the advice and consent of the parliament, did upon just ground and reason suppress, abolish, and take away the said chauntries and such other livings as were used and occupied for maintenance of private masses, and masses satisfactory for the souls of them that are dead, or finding of obites, lights or other like things: the mass that was wont to be said of priests was full of abuses, and had very few things of Christ's institution, besides the Epistle, Gospel, the Lord's Prayer, and the words of the Lord's Supper, the rest for the more part were invented and devised by bishops of Rome, and by other men of the same sort, and therefore justly taken away by the statutes and laws of this realm; and the Communion which is placed instead thereof, is very godly, and agreeable to the scriptures. 8. That it is most convenient and fit, and according to the first institution, that all Christian men should receive the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ in both the kinds, that is, in bread and wine. 9. And the mass, wherein only the priest receiveth, and the other do but look on, is but the invention of man, and the ordinance of the bishop of Rome's church, not agreeable to scripture. 10. That upon good and godly considerations it is ordered in the said book and order, that the sacrament should not be lifted up, and shewed to the people to be adored, but to be with godly devotion received, as it was first instituted. 11. That it is well, politiciely and godly done, that the king's majesty by act of parliament hath commanded all images which have stood in churches and chapels, to be clearly abolished and defaced, lest hereafter at any time they should give occasion of idolatry, or be abused, as many of them heretofore have been, with pilgrimages and such idolatrous worshipping. 12. And also for that like godly and good considerations, by the same authority of parliament, all mass books, cowobers, grails, and other books of the service in Latin, heretofore used, should be abolished and defaced, as well for certain superstitions in them contained, as also to avoid dissention; and that the said service in the church should be thorough the whole realm in one uniform conformity, and no occasion through those old books to the contrary. 13. That bishops, priests, and deacons have no commandment of the law of God, either to vow chastity, or to abstain continually from marriage. 14. That all canons, constitutions, laws positive, and ordinances of man, which do prohibit or forbid marriage to any bishop, priest, or deacon, be justly, and upon godly grounds and considerations taken away and abolished by authority of parliament. 15. The Homilies lately commanded and set forth by the king's majesty, to be read in the congregation of England, are godly and wholesome, and do teach such doctrine as ought to be embraced of all men. 16. The book set forth by the king's majesty, by authority of parliament, containing the form and manner of making and consecrating of archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons, is godly, and in no point contrary to the wholesome doctrine of the Gospel, and therefore ought to be received and approved of all the faithful members of the Church of England, and namely the ministers of God's word, and by them commended to the people. 17. That the orders of subdeacon, benet, and colet, and such others as were commonly called minores ordines, be not necessary by the word of God to be reckoned in the Church, and be justly left out in the said book of orders. 18. That the holy Scriptures contain sufficiently all doctrine required of necessity for eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, and that nothing is to be taught as required of necessity to eternal salvation, but that which may be concluded and proved by the holy Scriptures. 19. That upon good and godly considerations it was and is commanded by the king's majesty's injunctions, that the paraphrases of Erasmus in English should be set up in some convenient place in every parish Church of this realm, whereas the parishioners may most commodiously resort to read the same. 20. And because these articles aforesaid do contain only such matters as be already published and openly set forth by the king's majesty's authority, by the advice of his highnesses council, for many great and godly considerations, and amongst others for the common tranquillity and unity of the realm; his majesty's pleasure, by the advice aforesaid, is, that you the bishop of Winchester shall not only affirm these articles with subscription of your hand, but also declare and profess yourself well contented, willing and ready to publish and preach the same at such times and places, and before such audience as to his majesty, from time to time, shall seem convenient and requisite, upon pain of incurring such penalties and punishments as for not doing the same may by his majesty's laws be inflicted upon you. These Articles were sent the 15th of July. The bishop of Winchester receiving and perusing these Articles, made this Answer again; That first touching the Article of submission, he would in no wise consent, affirming as he had done before, that he had never offended the king's majesty in any such sort as should give him cause thus to submit himself: praying earnestly to be brought unto his trial; wherein he refused the king's mercy, and desired nothing but "justice." And for the rest of the Articles, he answered, That after he were past this trial in his first point, and were at liberty, then it should appear what he would do in them; it not being, as he said, reasonable, that he should subscribe them in prison.

Of this Answer when the king and his council had intelligence by the foresaid master of the horse, secretary Peter, the bishop of London, and master Goodrick, who had been with him, it was agreed that he should be sent for before the whole council, and peremptorily examined once again, whether he would stand at this point or no; which if he did, then to denounce unto him the sequestration of his benefice, and consequently the intimation, in case he were not reformed within three months, as in the day of his appearance shall appear. The tenor and words of which Sequestration, with the Intimation, followeth:

The Words of the SEQUESTRATION; with the Intimation to the Bishop of Winchester.

"FORASMUCH as the king's majesty our most gracious sovereign lord understandeth, and it is also manifestly known and notorious unto us, that the clemency and long sufferance of his majesty worketh not in you that good effect and humbleness and conformity, that is requisite in a good subject; and for that your disobediences, contempts, and other misbehaviours, for the which you were by his majesty's authority justly committed to ward, have since your said committing daily more and more increased in you, in such sort as a great slander and offence is thereof risen in many parts of the realm, whereby also much slander, dissension, trouble, and unquietness is very like more to ensue, if your foresaid offences being as they be openly known, should pass, unpunished: we let you wit, that having special and express commission and commandment from his majesty, as well for your contumacies and contempts so long continued and yet daily more increasing, as also for the exchange of the slander and offence of the people, which by your said ill demeanors are risen, and for that also the church of Winchester may be in the mean time provided of a good minister, that may and will see all things done and quietly executed according to the laws and common orders of this realm, and for sundry other great and urgent causes, we do by these presence sequester all the fruits, revenues, lands, and possessions of your bishopric of Winchester, and discern, deem and judge the same to be committed to the several receipt, collection and custody of such person or persons as his majesty shall appoint for that purpose. And because your former disobediences and contempts so long continued, so many times doubled, renewed and aggravated, do manifestly declare you to be a person without all hope of recovery and plainly incorrigible;

we eftsoons admonish and require you to obey his majesty's said commandment, and that you do declare yourself, by subscription of your hand, both willing and well contented to accept, allow, preach and teach to others the said articles, and all such other matters as be or shall be set forth by his majesty's authority of supreme head of this church of England, on this side and within the term of three months, whereof we appoint one month for the first monition, one month for the second monition and warning, and one month for the third and peremptory monition.—Within which time as you may yet declare your conformity, and shall have paper, pen and ink, when you shall call for them for that purpose, so if you wilfully forbear and refuse to declare yourself obedient and conformable as is aforesaid, we intimate unto you that his majesty, who like a good governor desireth to keep both his commonwealth quiet, and to purge the same of evil men (especially ministers) intendeth to proceed against you as an incorrigible person and unmeet minister of this church, unto the deprivation of your said bishoprick."—Nevertheless, upon divers good considerations, and specially in hope he might within his time be yet reconciled, it was agreed that the said bishop's house and servants should be maintained in their present estate, until the time that this Injunction should expire, and the matter for the mean time to be kept secret.

After this Sequestration, the said bishop was convented unto Lambeth before the archbishop of Canterbury, and other the king's commissioners by virtue of the king's special letters sent unto the said commissioners, to wit, the abp. of Canterbury, Nicholas bp. of London, Thomas bp. of Ely, Henry bp. of Lincoln, secretary Peter, sir James Hales knight, Dr. Leyson, Dr. Oliver, lawyers, and John Gosnold, esq. &c. before them, and by them to be examined, by whom were objected against him nineteen special Articles in order and form here following [Here follow the Articles inserted at p. 602.]

After these Articles were exhibited unto him, and he having leave to say for himself, wherein he used all the cautes, shifts and remedies of the law to his most advantage, by way of protesting, recusing and excepting against the commission, and requiring also the copies as well of the articles, as of his protestation, of the actuaries (which were W. Say and Tho. Argall) time and respite was assigned unto him to answer to the said Articles in writing. But he so cavilled and dallied from day to day to answer directly, although he was sufficiently laboured and persuaded to the same by sundry callings and acts, and also abundantly convicted by depositions and witnesses, especially by matter induced by the lord Paget, and Andrew Beynton, and Mr. Chalenor, that at the last he appealed from them (reputing them not to be competent and indifferent judges to hear and determine his cause) unto the king's royal person: notwithstanding by protestation always reserving to himself the benefit of his appellation: and so proceeded he to the answering of the foresaid Articles, but in such crafty and obstinate manner as before he had been accustomed.

But briefly to conclude, such exceptions he used against the witnesses produced against him, and he himself produced such a number of witnesses in his defence, and used so many delays and cavillations, that in the end the commissioners, seeing his stubbornness, proceeded to the Sentence definitive against him, as hereunder followeth:

Bishop of Winchester*

"In the name of God, amen. By authority of a commission by the high and mighty prince our most gracious sovereign lord Edward the 6th, by the grace of God king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the Church of England, and also of Ireland, in earth the supreme head, the tenor whereof hereafter ensueth; Edward the sixth, &c. We Thomas by the sufferance of God archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and Metropolitan, with the right reverend fathers in God, Nicholas bishop of London, Thomas bishop of Ely, and Henry bishop of Lincoln, sir William Peter knight, one of our said sovereign lord's two principal secretaries, sir James Hales knight, one of our said sovereign lord's justices of his common pleas, Griffith Leison and John Oliver, doctors in the civil law, Rich. Goodrick and John Gosnold, esqrs. delegates, and judges assigned and appointed, rightfully and lawfully proceeding according to the form and tenour of the said commission, for the hearing, examination, debating, and final determination of the causes and matters in the said commission mentioned and contained, and upon the contents of the same, and certain Articles objected of office against you Stephen bishop of Winchester, as more plainly and fully is mentioned and declared in the said commission and Articles, all which we repute and take here to be expressed; and after sundry judicial assemblies, examinations and debates of the said cause and matters, with all incidents, emergents, and circumstances to the same or any of them belonging, and the same also being by us oft heard, seen, and well understood, and with good and mature examination and deliberation debated, considered, and fully weighed and pondered, observing all such order and other things as by the laws, equity, and the said commission ought, or needed herein to be observed, in the presence of you Stephen bishop of Winchester, do proceed to the giving of our final judgment and sentence definitive in this manner following.—Forasmuch as by the acts enacted, exhibits, and allegations proposed, deduced, and alleged, and by sufficient proofs with your own confession in the causes aforesaid had and made, we do evidently find and perceive that you Stephen bishop of Winchester have not only transgressed the commandments mentioned in the same, but also have of long time, notwithstanding many admonitions and commandments given unto you to the contrary, remained a person much grudging, speaking, and repugning against the godly reformations of abuses in religion, set forth by the king's highness authority within this his realm; and forasmuch as we do also find you a notable, open, and contemptuous disobeyer of sundry godly and just commandments given unto you by our said sovereign lord and by his authority, in divers great and weighty causes touching and concerning his princely office, and the state and common quietness of this realm: and forasmuch as you have and yet do contemptuously refuse to recognise your notorious negligences, and misbehaviours, contempts and disobediences, remaining still, after a great number of several admonitions, always more and more indurate, incorrigible, and without all hope of amendment, contrary, both to your oath sworn, obedience, promise, and also your bounden duty of allegiance; and for that great slander and offence of the people arise in many parts of the realm, through your wilful doings, sayings, and preachings, contrary to the common order of the realm, and for sundry other great causes by the acts, exhibits, your own confession, and proofs of this process more fully appearing; considering withal that nothing effectually hath been on your behalf alleged, proposed, and proved, nor by any other means appeareth, which doth or may impair or take away the proofs made against you, upon the said matters and other the premises:—Therefore we Thomas abp. of Canterbury, primate of all England and metropolitan judge delegate aforesaid, having God before our eyes, with express consent and assent of Nicholas bp. of London, Thomas bp. of Ely, Henry bp. of Lincoln, sir Wm. Peter knight, sir James Hales knight, Griffith Leison and John Oliver, doctors of the civil law, Rd. Goodrick and John Gosnold, esquires, judges, and colleagues with us in the matters aforesaid, and with the counsel of divers learned men in the laws, with whom we have conferred in and upon the premises, do judge and determine you Stephen bishop of Winchester, to be deprived and removed from the bishopric of Winchester, and from all the rites, authority, emoluments, commodities, and other appurtenances to the said bishopric in any wise belonging, whatsoever they be, and by these presents we do deprive and remove you from your said bishopric and all rites and other commodities aforesaid; and further pronounce and declare the said bishopric of Winchester, to all effects and purposes to be void by this our sentence definitive, which we give, pronounce, and declare, in these writings."

This Sentence definitive being given, the said bishop of Winchester, under his former protestations, dissented from the giving and reading thereof, and from the same, as unjust, and of no efficacy or effect in law; and in that the same containeth excessive punishment, and for other causes expressed in his appellation aforesaid, he did then and there apud acta, immediately after the pronouncing of the sentence, by word of mouth appeal to the king's royal majesty first, secondly, and thirdly, instantly, more instantly, most instantly, and asked apostles, or letters dismissorials to be given and granted unto him: And also, under protestation not to recede from the former appellation, asked a copy of the said Sentence: the Judges declaring that they would first know the king's pleasure and his counsel therein. Upon the reading and giving of which Sentence, the promoters willed William Say and Thomas Argall to make a public instrument, and the witnesses then and there present to bear testimony thereunto, &c.*

* Upon the accession of queen Mary, Gardiner was restored to his Bishopric and made lord chancellor. See the Communication between him and judge Hales No. 46. He concurred in all that queen's violent measures, and stimulated her bigotry and persecution. He was a man of learning and a good Greek scholar, as appears by the correspondence on the pronunciation of that language between him and Cheke who was professor of Greek in the University of Oxford, of which Gardiner was chancellor. See also Colonel Mitford's Enquiry into the Principles of Harmony in Language, sect. 13. He died the 12th of Nov. 1555, aged 72.

45. Proceedings against EDMUND BONNER, Bishop of London, for opposing the Reformation of Religion: 1 & 3 Edward VI. A. D. 1547. 1550. [2 Fox's Acts and Monum. 658.]

KING Edward the 6th, in the first year of his reign, Anno 1547, the 1st day of September, for the order of his visitation, directed out certain commissioners, as sir Anthony Cooke, sir John Godsaulle, knights, Master John Godsaulle, Christopher Nevinson, doctors of the law, and John Madew, doctor of divinity. Who sitting in Paul's Church upon their Commission, the day and year aforesaid, there being present at the same time Edmund bishop of London, John Royston, Polydore Virgill, Peter Van, and others of the said cathedral Church, after the sermon made and the Commission being read, ministered an oath unto the said bishop of London, to renounce and deny the bishop of Rome, with his usurped authority, and to swear obedience unto the king, according to the effect and form of the statute made in the 31st year of king Henry 8: also that he should present and redress all and singular such things as were needful within the said church to be reformed.

Whereupon the said Bishop humbly and instantly desired them that he might see their Commission, only for this purpose and intent (as he said) that he might the better fulfill and put in execution the things wherein he was charged by their or their Commission. Unto whom the Commissioners answering, said, they would deliberate more upon the matter, and so they called the other ministers of the said church before them, and ministered the like oath unto them, as they did to the bishop before. To whom moreover they and then certain Interrogatories and Articles of Inquisition were read by Peter Lilly the public notary. Which done, after their oaths taken, the said Commissioners delivered unto the Bishop aforesaid certain Injunctions, as well in print as written, and Homilies set forth by the king. All which things the said bishop received, under the words of this Protestation as followeth:

' I do receive these Injunctions and Homilies with this Protestation, that I will observe them, if they be not contrary and repugnant to God's law, and the statutes and ordinances of the church.' And immediately he added with an oath, ' that he never read the said Homilies and Injunctions.'

The which Protestation being made in manner and form aforesaid, the said Edmund bishop of London instantly desired and required Peter Lilly, the Register aforesaid, there and then to register and enact the same. And so the said commissioners delivering the Injunctions and Homilies to master Bellasere archdeacon of Colchester, and Gilbert Bourne archdeacon of London, Essex, and Middlesex, and enjoining them in most effectuous manner, under pains therein contained, to put the same in speedy execution, and also reserving other new Injunctions to be ministered afterward, as well to the bishop as to the archdeacons aforesaid, according as they should see cause, &c. did so continue the said visitation till three of the clock the same day in the afternoon.

At the which hour and place assigned, the Commissioners being set, and the canons and priests of the said church appearing before them and being examined upon virtue of their oath, for their doctrine and conversation of life; first, one Job. Painter, one of the canons of the said cathedral church, there and then openly confessed, that he viciously and carnally had often the company of a certain married man's wife, whose name he denied to declare. In the which crime divers other canons and priests of the foresaid church confessed in like manner, and could not deny themselves to be culpable.

And after the Commissioners aforesaid had delivered to master Royston prebendary, and to the proctor of the dean and of the chapter of the said cathedral church of saint Paul, the king's injunctions and the Book of Homilies, enjoining them to see the execution thereof, under pain therein specified, they prorogued their said visitation until seven of the clock the next day following.

By this visitation, above specified, it appears, gentle reader, first how Bonner made his Protestation after the receiving of the king's Injunctions, and also how he required the same to be put in public record; furthermore, thou hast to note the unchaste life and conversation of these Popish notaries and priests of Paul's. Now what followed after this Protestation of the bishop made, remaineth further in the sequel of the story to be declared; wherein first thou shalt understand that the said Bishop shortly after his Protestation, whether for fear, or for conscience, repenting himself, went unto the king, where he submitted himself, and recanting his former Protestation, craved pardon of the king for his inordinate demeanour toward his grace's commissioners, in the former visitation.

The King's Letter to the Commissioners concerning the Recantation and pardoning of Bonner.

Which pardon notwithstanding it was granted unto him by the king, for the acknowledging of his fault, yet for the evil example of the fact it was thought good that he should be committed to the Fleet, as by the tenour of the council's letter sent the commissioners may appear, which together with the form also of the bishops Protestation and of his Recantation, here under followeth:

"To our very loving friends, sir Anthony Cook knight, and the rest of the commissioners for the visitation at London in haste. After our hearty commendations: this shall be to signify unto you, that we have received your letters, and in the same inclosed the copy of the protestation made by the bishop of London in the time of your visitation at Paul's: your wise proceedings wherein, and advertisements from you, we take in very thankful part towards us. And because the said bishop, which being here before us hath acknowledged his indiscreet demeanour, did at that time at Paul's require the Register of your visitation to make record and enter of his protestation, and now upon better consideration of his duty maketh means to have the same revoked, as shall appear unto you by the true copy of his writing enclosed, the original whereof remaining with us he hath subscribed; we pray you to cause the register to make enter of this his revocation, according to the tenour of this his said writing: further signifying unto you, that in respect of his offence, and the evil ensample that might thereupon ensue, we have thought meet to send him to the prison of the Fleet, whither he hath been conveyed by master vice-chamberlain. And whereas sundry things for the king's maj.'s service do now occur here, which require the present attendance of you sir John Godsaul, as well for your office of the signet, as of the protonotaryship, we pray you that leaving the execution of the visitation to the rest of your colleagues, you make your repair hither with convenient diligence. Thus fare you right heartily well. From Hampton Court the 12th of September, 1547. Your assured loving friends, Thomas Canterbury, Wm. Saint John, John Russel, Tho. Semer, Wm. Paget, Anthony Brown, Wm. Peter, Anthony Denny, Edward North."

Bonner's Recantation.

"Whereas I Edmund bishop of London, at such time as I received the king's majesty's injunctions and homilies of my most dread sovereign lord at the hands of his highness's visitors, did unadvisedly make such protestation, as now upon better consideration of my duty of obedience, and of the evil ensample that might ensue unto others thereof, appeareth to me neither reasonable, nor such as might well stand with the duty of an humble subject: forso much as the same protestation at my request was then by the register of that visitation enacted and put in record, I have thought it my duty not only to declare before your lordships that I do now upon better consideration of my duty, renounce and revoke my said protestation, but also most humbly beseech your lordships, that this my revocation of the same may be likewise put in the same records for a perpetual memory of the truth, most humbly beseeching your good lordships, both to take order that it may take effect, and also that my former and unadvised doings may be by your good mediations pardoned by the king's majesty. EDMUND LONDON."

The Registers of these affairs of Bonner's remain in the hands of Peter Lilly, then being Register to the foresaid commissioners.

The king being no less desirous to have the form of administration of the sacrament truly reduced to the right rule of the scriptures and first use of the primitive church, than he was to establish the same by the authority of his own regal laws, appointed certain of the most grave and best learned bishops, and other of his realm, to assemble together at his castle of Windsor, there to argue and intreat upon this matter, and conclude upon and set forth one and perfect uniform order according to the rule and use aforesaid.—And in the mean time while that the learned were thus occupied about their conferences, the lord protector and the rest of the king's council, further remembering that that time of the year did then approach, wherein were practised many superstitious abuses and blasphemous ceremonies against the glory of God, and truth of his word, determining the utter abolishing thereof, directed their letters unto the godly and reverend father Thomas Cranmer, then archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, requiring him that upon the receipt thereof he should will every bishop within his province, forthwith to give in charge unto all the curates of their dioceses, that neither candles should be any more borne upon Candlemas day, neither yet ashes used in Lent, nor palms upon Palm Sunday.

Whereupon the archbishops, zealously favouring the good and Christianlike purpose of the king and his council, did immediately in that behalf write unto all the rest of the bishops of that province, and amongst them unto Edmund Bonner then bishop of London. Of whose rebellious and obstinate contumacy for that we have hereafter more to say, I thought not to stand now long thereupon, but only by the way somewhat to note his former dissimulation and cloaked hypocrisy, in that he outwardly at the first consented as well unto this, as also unto all other the king's proceedings, but whether for fear or for any other subtle fetch I know not, bowbeit most like it is, rather for one of them or both, than for any true love. And therefore receiving the archbishop's Letters, as one of them seeming to allow the contents thereof, he did presently write unto the bishop of Westminster, and to others to whom he was appointed, requiring them to give such knowledge thereof in their dioceses, as thereunto appertained; as more plainly appeareth by these his own Letters here inserted which here do follow :

A Letter missive of Edmund Bonner, sent to the Bishop of Westminster, with the tenor of the Archbishop's Letter for abolishing of Candles, Ashes, Palms, and other Ceremonies.

" My very good lord, after most hearty commendations, these be to advertise your good lordship, that my lord of Canterbury's grace this present 28th day of January sent unto me his letters missive, containing this in effect, that my lord protector's grace, with the advice of other the king's majesty's most honourable council, for certain considerations them moving, are fully resolved that no candles shall be borne upon Candlemas day, nor also from henceforth ashes or palms used any longer : requiring me thereupon by his said letters, to cause admonition and knowledge thereof to be given unto your lordship and other bishops with celerity accordingly. In consideration whereof I do send at this present these letters unto your said lordship, that you thereupon may give knowledge and advertisement thereof within your diocese as appertaineth. Thus I commit your good lordship to Almighty God, as well to fare as your good heart can best desire. Written in haste at my house in London, the said 28th day of January, 1548. Your good lordship's to command, Edmund Bonner."

Now, about that present time credible and certain report was made unto the lords of the council, that great contention and strife did daily arise among the common people in divers parts of this realm, for the pulling down and taking away of such images out of the churches, as had been idolatrously abused by pilgrimages, offerings, or otherwise (according to the tenor of one of the injunctions given by the king in his late visitation) some affirming that that image was abused, others that this, and most that neither of them both; so that if speedy remedy were not had therein, it might turn to further inconvenience. Wherefore they, by one advice thinking it best (of good experience) for avoiding of all discord and tumult, that all manner of images should be clean taken out of all churches, and none suffered to remain, did thereupon again write their letters unto the archbishop of Canterbury, requiring his ready aid therein; in manner following :

Another Letter of the Council sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the abolishing of Images.

" AFTER our right hearty commendations to your good lordship, where now of late in the king's majesty's visitations, among other godly injunctions commanded to be generally observed through all parts of this his highness's realm, one was set forth for the taking down of all such images as had at any time been abused with pilgrimages, offerings, or censings, albeit that this said injunction hath in many parts of this realm been quietly obeyed and executed, yet in many other places much strife and contention hath risen and daily riseth, and more and more encreaseth about the execution of the same; some men being so superstitious, or rather wilful, as they would by their good will retain all such images still, although they have been most manifestly abused. And in some places also the images, which by the said injunctions were taken down, be now restored and set up again; and almost in every place is contention for images, whether they have been abused or not. And while these men go on both sides contentiously to obtain their minds, contending whether this or that image hath been offered unto, kissed, censed, or otherwise abused, parts have in some places been taken in such sort, as further inconveniences be like to ensue, if remedy be not found in time. Considering therefore, that almost in no place of this realm is any sure quietness, but where all images be clean taken away and pulled down already, to the intent that all contention in every part of the realm for this matter, may be clearly taken, and that the lively image of Christ should not contend for the dead images, which be things not necessary, and without the which the churches of Christ continued most godly many years; we have thought good to signify unto you, that his highness's pleasure, with the advice and consent of us the lord protector and the rest of the council, is, that immediately upon the sight hereof, with as convenient diligence as you may, you shall not only give order that all the images remaining in any church or chapel within your diocese, be removed and taken away, but also by your letters signify unto the rest of the bishops within your province, that his highness's pleasure, for the like order to be given by them and every of them within their several dioceses. And in the execution hereof, we require both you and the rest of the said bishops to use such foresight as the same may be quietly done, with as good satisfaction of the people as may be. Thus fare your good lordship heartily well. From Somerset Place the 11th of Feb. 1548. Your lordship's assured loving friends, Edw. Somerset, Henry Arundel, Anth. Wingfield, John Russel, Tho. Semer, Wm. Paget."

When the archbishop had received these letters, he forthwith directed his precept unto Bonner bishop of London, requiring, and in the king's majesty's name commanding him, that with all speed he should as well give in charge unto the rest of the bishops within the province of Canterbury, to look immediately without delay unto the diligent and careful execution of the contents of the said letter through all places of their diocese; as also that he himself should do the like within his own city and diocese of London. Whereupon he seeming then, with like outward consent as before, to allow these doings, presently (by virtue of the said precept) did send out his Mandatum as well unto the rest of the bishops, as also again unto the bishop of Westminster, in form following :

The Letter of Edmund Bonner sent with the Archbishop's Mandate, to the Bishop of Westminster, for abolishing of Images.
