GEEL, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, who flourished about the year 1660. He was a scholar of Gabriel Metz, and imitated the polished style of that master so exactly, that it is not always easy to distinguish their works. He also painted marines and sea-ports, which are highly finished, and very agreeably coloured. [He was born in 1631, and died in 1698.]

GEEST, CORNELIUS VAN. We have by this engraver a half-sheet print of Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury.

GEIN, G. D., an obscure Flemish engraver, who flourished from the year 1640 to 1650. He was principally employed in engraving book ornaments for the booksellers, in which he attempted a humble imitation of the style of Paul Pontius. Among other prints by him we have the portrait of Carolus Aleaspinæus.

GEILEKERCK, NICHOLAS VAN. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1612. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits; and among others, we have that of Maurice, Prince of Nassau, surrounded with military trophies.

GELDER, ARNOLD DE, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1645. After studying some time in his native city, under Samuel van Hoogstraeten, he went to Amsterdam, where he entered the school of Rembrandt, and became one of the ablest imitators of the style of that great colourist. Endowed with a similar feeling for the art, he seems, like his master, to have only appreciated its beauties as they relate to the harmony of colour, and the magical effect of a judicious management of the chiaro-scuro; little solicitous of the higher considerations of correctness of design and dignity of character. Like Rembrandt, he painted portraits and historical subjects, in which he exhibits the same uncouth choice of forms, with the same fascinating charm of colour; the same eccentricities and defects, with his admirable conduct of light and shadow, and the richness and spirit of his pencil. In his historical pictures, he also equally set at nought the propriety of costume, and the elevation of sentiment. His works, notwithstanding, still captivate by their surprising effect, and the facility with which it is produced. He designed all the accompanying objects in his pictures from nature, and his painting-room, crowded with armour, old draperies, flags, and sabres, resembled rather the interior of a broker's shop, than the atelier of an artist. He was most successful in his portraits, some of which are not unworthy of Rembrandt, and are frequently attributed to that master. Of his historical works, the most deserving of notice are, a picture at the Hague, of a Jewish Synagogue, with a great number of figures, of an admirable effect; at Dort, Solomon on his throne, surrounded by soldiers; and a picture which has been considered as his chef-d'œuvre, representing Bathsheba entreating David to leave his sceptre to Solomon; it is exquisitely coloured, and of a rich and glowing effect. His last works were a series of pictures of the Life and Passion of our Saviour. He died at Dort in 1727.

[GELDER, PETER, a Dutch painter, supposed to have been a scholar of Rembrandt, whose manner he imitated. He was a good colourist and had a free touch, but his pictures want finish. He was living in 1655.]

GELDERSMAN, VINCENT. This painter was born at Mechlin in 1539. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted historical subjects with some reputation. His design is correct, and his colouring excellent, particularly in his carnations. Of his most esteemed works may be noticed a picture of Susanna and the Elders, and a Descent from the Cross, with the Marys and others, in the cathedral at Mechlin.

GELDORP. See GUALDORP.

GELEE, CLAUDE. See LORRAINE.

GELENIUS, SIGISMUND, an old German engraver, who flourished about the year 1576, to whom are attributed, by the Professor Christ, a set of twelve small wooden cuts of the Labours of Hercules. They are executed with considerable spirit, with fine strokes neatly cut, without any etchings. The drawing is tolerably correct, and there is expression in the heads.

GELLE, JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1628, and resided chiefly at Cologne. He engraved some of the plates for the Académie de l'Espée, published at Antwerp, by Gerard Thibault, in 1628. They are worked entirely with the graver, in a stiff, formal style. We have also by this artist,

The Portrait of the Emperor Ferdinand II. in a border of medals; dated 1619, signed Joan Gelle, fec. et exc.

GELLIG, JACOB, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht about the year 1636. He excelled in painting fish, which he represented with great fidelity. He also painted portraits, though without much claim to celebrity. [Balkema calls him Gillig, and says that he painted landscapes, and died in 1688.]

GEMIGNANO. See GIMIGNANO.

GEMINUS, or GEMINIE, THOMAS. This old English artist was an engraver, as well as a printer, and executed several plates to ornament his publications. In the year 1545, he published a translation of Vesalius's Anatomy, which was first printed at Padua in 1542, with wooden cuts. Geminus copied them on copper, and the book was dedicated to Henry VIII., with the title Thomæ Gemini Lysiensis compendiosa totius Anatomies delineatio æra exarata, in folio. These plates, according to Ames, were some of the first rolling-press printing in England. He afterwards published another translation of the same work by Nicholas Udal in 1552, dedicated to Edward VI. In the preface, the translator says, "Accepte therefore, jentill reader, this Tractise of Anatomie, thankfully interpreting the labours of Thomas Gemini the workman. He, that with his great charge, watch and travayle, hath set out these figures in pourtrature, will most willingly be amended, or better perfected of his own workmanship, if admonished." Thomas Geminus lived in Blackfriars, where he published a Prognostication, relating to the weather, the Phenomena of the Heavens, &c., with a number of plates, engraved by himself. Vertue states, that he published another small work, on Midwifery, with copper cuts, by himself.

GENGA, GIROLAMO. This painter was born at Urbino, in 1476, and was first a disciple of Luca Signorelli. He assisted that master in several of his works, particularly at Orvieto. After passing some years under Signorelli, he entered the school of Pietro Perugino, at the time when Raffaele was a student under that master, where he remained three years. Few of the works of this master are known, as he was chiefly employed as a coadjutor with Signorelli Timoteo della Vita, at Urbino, and Raffaello del Colle in the Imperiale at Pesaro. He was for some time engaged in the service of the Duke of Urbino, who employed him more in the capacity of an architect than a painter, though he made many designs for the decorations of the theatre. He afterwards resided at Florence, where he painted a fine picture of the Resurrection for the church of S. Caterina da Siena. He died in 1551.

GENGA, BARTOLOMEO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Urbino in 1518. According to Vasari, he painted some historical pictures in the style of his father, but he is more known as a sculptor and an architect, than a painter. He died in 1558.

[GÉNILLON, JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS, a marine painter of the school of Vernet. His subjects are naval combats, shipwrecks, sea-ports, eruptions of Vesuvius by moonlight, and conflagrations at sea under a similar aspect. He died in 1829.]

GENNARI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Cento near Ferrara, and flourished about the year 1606. He is stated by Lanzi to have been one of the masters of Guercino, and to have painted history with reputation. In the Guida di Bologna is noticed a picture by this master in the church of S. Biagio, representing the Madonna and several saints, with a glory of angels, painted in the style of Procaccini. It is dated 1606.

GENNARI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was of the same family as the preceding artist, born at Cento in 1589. He was nearly of the same age with Guercino, and rather emulated his style than copied him. The expression of his heads is natural and animated; and his pictures possess considerable vigour and relief. In the church of S. Maria del Carobio, at Bologna, is a fine picture by this master of the Assumption. He died in 1658. [Zani places his birth in 1594, and his death in 1661. His manner approaches so closely to that of Guercino, that amateurs may be deceived in the master, though not in the excellence of the work.]

GENNARI, BENEDETTO, was born at Cento in 1633, and was the nephew and the scholar of Guer-omo, whose style he followed, and whose works he copied with an exactness that renders it very difficult to distinguish them from the originals. Barbieri's celebrated pictures of the Persian Sibly, the St. John, and his Herodias, were frequently copied by Benedetto, and his brother Cesare, in such a manner as to deceive the most intelligent. They are only to be distinguished by something inferior in clearness, and vigour of effect. Lanzi reports, that he had seen in the Palazzo Ercolani, a picture of Bathsheba by Guercino, together with a copy of the same by Gennari, and remarks that the former appeared to be freshly painted, and the copy the older picture. He also painted some pictures of his own composition for the churches at Bologna and Cento. At Bologna, in S. Domenico, is a picture by him of S. Rosa; in S. Giovanni in Monte, S. Anniano baptizing a Pagan King; and at the Cappuccini, St. Anthony of Padua. In the dome at Osimo, he painted a picture of S. Leopardo; and at the Filippini, at Forli, S. Zaccaria, which are only inferior to Guercino in the want of force and relief. He visited France in the reign of Louis XIV., and painted some pictures for one of the palaces, and several portraits, among which was that of the Duke of Orleans, which was much admired. He afterwards came to England, and was made one of the painters to Charles II. He was continued in the same capacity by James II., whose portrait he painted, and in whose collection there were twelve of his pictures. On the abdication he returned to Italy, where he died in 1715.

GENNARI, CESARE, was the younger brother of Benedetto, born at Cento in 1641, [Zani says 1637,] and was also instructed by his uncle Guercino, whose style he followed with success, though somewhat inferior to his brother. Besides his extraordinary ability in copying the works of Guercino, he painted several pictures, from designs of his own, for the churches at Bologna. In S. Martino Maggiore is a picture of S. Maria Maddalena de Pazzi, painted entirely in the style of Guercino; in S. Niccolo, St. Nicholas kneeling before the Virgin; at the Padri Servi, S. Apollonia; and in S. Bartolomeo, Christ praying in the Garden. He died in 1688.

GENNARI, LORENZO. This painter was probably of the same family. He was a scholar of Guercino, and flourished about the year 1650. One of his best pictures is at the Cappuccini at Rimini.

GENOELS, ABRAHAM, an eminent landscape painter, born at Antwerp in 1640. When he was twelve years of age, he became a scholar of James Backereel, where he remained until he was fifteen. His ambition confined itself at first to portrait painting; but having made some successful attempts in landscapes, he attached himself to that branch of the art, to which his genius was more adapted. To perfect himself in perspective, so essential to his success, he went to Bois-le-Duc, where he studied some time under Firelans, esteemed the most correct professor of that science of his time. His desire of improvement prompted him to travel; and he visited Paris at the time when Poussin, Mignard, and le Brun were in the zenith of their fame. It was not long before his talent distinguished itself in that metropolis; and he was employed to paint the cartoons for eight large landscapes, to be executed in tapestry, for M. de Louvois, in which the figures were painted by de Seve. He was engaged by le Brun to paint the back-grounds of his Battles of Alexander; and in 1665 was made a member of the Academy at Paris, under the auspices of le Brun. These flattering distinctions could not, however, detain him at Paris; he longed to visit Rome, where he arrived in 1674, and was received into the Bentevogel society, who conferred on him the name of Archimedes, on account of his knowledge of the mathematics, with which title he sometimes signed his etchings. He painted several large pictures of views in the vicinity of Rome, for the Cardinal Rospiugliosi; and after a residence of some years in Italy, he returned to Flanders, with an ample collection of designs he made of the environs of Rome. Genoels may be ranked among the ablest landscape painters of his country. His colouring is natural and vigorous; he possessed a commanding facility, and a touch which he could appropriate to the particular objects he had to represent. We have by this painter some masterly etchings of landscapes, from his own designs, executed in a bold, free style, and ornamented with figures and cattle. Among others, we have the following by him:

- A set of four mountainous Landscapes, with ruins and figures; A. Genoels, aqua fort. fec. 1684.
- Two rocky Landscapes, with figures; A. Genoels, alias Archimedes, sc. Rome. 1676.
- Two grand Landscapes, with ruins and figures; A. Genoels, fec.
- Four mountainous Landscapes, with ruins and waterfalls; A. Genoels, fec.
- Four views of Gardens, with figures and statues; A. Genoels, inv. et sculp. vander Meulen, exc.
- Two large Landscapes, with waterfalls; one signed A. Genoels, inv. et fec.

He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher

G. A. Genoels died at a very advanced age at Antwerp. [Zani says in 1703, and Balkema in 1682: the latter is certainly wrong, as there are prints by him of a later date. Neither can it be said that 63 is a "very advanced age."]

GENOVESE, IL PRETE. See STROZZI.

GENOVESINO. See CALCIA GIUSEPPE.

GENTILE, LOUIS PRIMO, called. The family name of this painter was Primo, but the name of Gentile, by which he is generally known, was given him on account of his polished manners and the elegance of his dress. He was born at Brussels in 1606, where he was instructed in the rudiments of the art; but it is not said under what master. He went to Rome when he was young, where he resided thirty years, and was received into the Academy of St. Luke in 1650. He painted portraits and historical subjects, and was employed by Pope Alexander VII., whose portrait he painted, and those of many of the principal personages at Rome. His portraits are highly finished, though without the appearance of labour, and he was an excellent colourist, like most of his countrymen. In his historical works he discovers a different style; his design is bold and correct, and his touch free and spirited. In the church of S. Marco at Rome, is a picture by Gentile of S. Antonio; and at the Cappuccini at Pesaro, the Nativity, and a picture of S. Stefano. One of his most esteemed works is a picture of the Crucifixion, in the chapel of the Trinity, in the church of St. Michael at Ghent. He died at Brussels in 1670. [Balkema says he died at Rome in 1668; Lanzi and Nagler say at Brussels in 1657.]

GENTILESCHI, ORAZIO LOMI, called. This painter was born at Pisa in 1563, and received his first instruction in the art from Aurelio Lomi, his half-brother. The name of Gentileschi he adopted from his uncle by the mother's side. After a few years passed under his brother, he went to Rome, where he improved his style by studying the works of the best masters, and by the advice and assistance of Agostino Tassi, with whom he formed an intimate friendship, and whose landscapes he frequently decorated with figures. Several of their joint performances are in the Palazzo Rospigliosi, in the great saloon of the Palazzo Quirinale, and in other situations at Rome. He also painted historical subjects for the churches and public edifices, particularly in La Pace, and a fine picture of S. Cecilia and S. Valeriano, in the Palazzo Borghese. Some of his best performances are in the royal palace at Turin, and at Genoa. His celebrity reached England, and he was invited to the court of Charles I., who settled on him a considerable salary, and employed him in several works for the palaces, and in painting some ceilings in that of Greenwich. Nine pictures by Gentileschi in the royal collection were sold after the king's death for six hundred pounds, and are now the ornaments of the hall at Marlborough House. He also painted two pictures for Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, of a Magdalene, and the Holy Family. On his arrival in England, he became acquainted with Vandyck, who painted an admirable portrait of him, which has been finely engraved by Vosterman. He died in London in 1647.

GENTILESCHI, ARTEMISIA. This lady was the daughter and the disciple of the preceding artist, born at Rome in 1590. She accompanied her father to England, where she painted some portraits of the nobility, and some historical pictures for the king, the best of which was David with the Head of Goliath. But she passed the chief part of her life at Naples and Bologna, where she was much admired for her accomplishments and her talents as a painter. She was favoured with the friendship and advice of Guido, and studied attentively the works of Domenichino. In the gallery at Florence is one of her best performances, representing Judith with the Head of Holofernes, which Lanzi highly commends; and in the collection of Signor Averardo de Medici, is a picture by her of Susanna and the Elders, which is admired for the amenity of the colouring, and the graceful design of the principal figure. In portraits she excelled her father, and in that branch established a brilliant reputation. She died in 1642.

GENTILESCHI, FRANCESCO, was the son of Orazio Gentileschi, by whom he was instructed in the art; but he afterwards studied under Domenico Fiasella, called Sarzana. He painted history, and resided chiefly at Genoa, where, according to Soprani, he painted several pictures for the churches in that city.

GENTSCH, ANDREW, a German engraver, who resided at Augsbourg, and flourished about the year 1616. He engraved several small copper plates of grotesque ornaments, some of which are dated in 1616. He usually marked his plates with the same cipher as Albert Aldergrever A; but their works are not difficult to distinguish, by the inferiority of those of Gentsch, and the difference in the date.

[GERARD, FRANÇOIS. This very eminent painter was born at Rome, of French parents, in 1770, and was a scholar of the celebrated David. He had studied previously under Pajou, a statuary, and Brenet, a painter. His first exhibition, in 1795, was the picture of blind Belisarius bearing in his Arms the Body of his expiring Guide. Since then he has distinguished himself by many classical works, which are well known by engravings of them, and are to be found in the royal and noble galleries in France. He painted numerous portraits of the prominent persons of his time, particularly of the Emperor Napoleon and his consorts Josephine and Marie Louise, the king of Rome, Madame Pasta, George Canning, General Foy, and some of the Bourbon family. He was a great favourite with Napoleon, and was honoured and esteemed by his countrymen and foreigners. He was a member of the Institute and several Academies, and Chevalier of the orders of the Legion of Honour and of St. Michael. He was living in 1831.]

GERARDI, ANTONIO. This artist is mentioned by le Comte as an engraver of funeral pomps, monuments, and tombs.

GERARDIU. Apparently an Italian artist, who flourished about the year 1680. He worked entirely with the graver, in a neat style, but without taste. He engraved a set of plates after the pictures by Pietro da Cortona, in the Florentine palace.

GERARDS, MARK. See GUERARDS.

GERBIER, SIR BALTHASAR. He was born at Antwerp in 1591, and distinguished himself as a miniature painter, at a period when the ablest artists of his country were in their greatest celebrity. He came to England when young, and was a retainer of the Duke of Buckingham as early as the year 1613, and painted the portraits of the principal nobility of the time. He was afterwards employed in some diplomatic situations, and accompanied the Duke of Buckingham to Spain, where he was sent to bring about the treaty of marriage. Among the Harleian manuscripts is a letter from the Duchess of Buckingham to her lord, when in Spain, in which she says, "I pray you, if you have an idle time, sit to Gerbier for your picture, that I may have it well done in little." In the collection of the Duke of Northumberland, is a large oval miniature of the Duke of Buckingham on horseback. The head is well painted; the figure dressed in scarlet and gold; it is finished with great labour and richness. The head of the horse is spirited. Over the Duke's head is his motto, Fidei coticula crux; and on the foreground is inscribed B. Gerbier. 1618. In a letter dated 1628, it is said, "That the King and Queen were entertained at supper at Gerbier's, the Duke's painter's house, which could not stand him in less than one thousand pounds." Vandyck painted a fine picture of Sir Balthasar Gerbier and his family.

GERCO, B., a Dutch engraver, who executed some plates in imitation of the charming prints of Waterloo. After etching the plates he scratched upon them with the graver, and from not having afterwards cleared away the barb, there is an unpleasant clumsiness in the effect.

[GERICAULT, JEAN LOUIS THEODORE ANDRÉ, an historical painter, born at Rouen in 1790, and died in 1824. He studied first under the direction of Karle Vernet, and afterwards in the school of Guerin. Most of his works were popular, but that on which his reputation is based is the "Wreck of the Medusa," which was exhibited in London with great applause, and now occupies a place in the gallery of the Louvre.]

GERMAIN, ———. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1765. We have by him some spirited etchings, representing views in Rome, from the designs of Le Geay and Dumont.

[GERMAN LLORENTE, BERNARDO, a Spanish portrait painter, born at Seville in 1685. He was patronized by Philip V., but refused the offer of being painter to the king, that he might not be obliged to follow the court. He was called Pintor de las Pastoras, because he painted many of his Virgin Marys in the habits of shepherdesses. He gave to his heads so much grace, sweetness, and relief, that many were sold as the work of Murillo, and pass for such out of Spain. At the latter part of his life, by endeavouring to increase the force of his chiaroscuro, he produced blackness, very injurious to his pictures of that period. He died at Seville in 1757.]

[GERMYN, SIMON, a native of Dort, born in 1650, was a scholar of G. Schalcken, whose manner he for some time followed; he afterwards studied under Ludowyk Smits, called Hartcamp, who instructed him in his peculiar manner of painting fruit, but, though successful at first, his productions in that way are not much esteemed. He next turned to landscape painting, which he continued till his death, in 1719.]

GERRARD OF HAERLEM, an old Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about the year 1460. He was a disciple of Albert van Ouwater, who was the first that practised oil-painting in his country, soon after the time of John van Eyck. He was sometimes called Gerard of St. John, from his residing in a convent of that name, though not a monk. Although he only reached the age of twenty-eight, he finished many pictures for the churches, which were admired for the beauty of the colouring, and for a better expression and a more correct design than was usual at that early period. His most considerable work was an altar-piece in the church of St. John at Haerlem. The principal picture represented the Crucifixion, and on the folding-doors the Descent from the Cross and the Resurrection. The expression of grief in the Marys and the Apostles, was superior to any production of the time. He died about the year 1488. [There is reason to suppose that Gerard of Haerlem (called also Geertgen of St. John) and Gerard of Ghent signify the same artist. The dates, occupation, and style ascribed to each, have a close relation. See the article DIRCK VAN HAERLEM.]

GESSI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1588. He was one of the ablest scholars of Guido Reni, and one of the most successful imitators of his style. He possessed a vivacity of genius, and a facility of execution, which are said by Lanzi to have excited the jealousy of his master. His early pictures exhibit a suavity of colour, and a delicacy of pencil, which nearly approach the excellence of his instructor. His Assumption, in the church of La Morte at Bologna; his Martyrdom of St. Caterina, in the church of that Saint; and above all, his S. Francesco, at the Nunziata, have frequently been mistaken for the works of Guido. Abusing a fertile invention, and an uncommon promptness of hand, he afterwards declined into the languor and coldness of a mannerist. There are, however, several other pictures by him in the churches at Bologna, which are greatly admired, and which justly rank him among the able artists of that school. Such are his picture of S. Carlo praying in the midst of the Pestiferous, in the church of La Compagnia de Poveri; S. Antonio di Padoua, in S. Maria delle Muratelle; and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, at the Cappuccini. He died in 1649.

GESSNER, SOLOMON. This celebrated personage is well known to the literary world by his poem of the Death of Abel, and his other poetical works. He claims our notice here as a designer and an engraver. He etched several plates of vignettes, and other ornaments, for his Death of Abel and his Pastorals. We have, besides, by him several landscapes, executed in a very pleasing and finished style, of which the following are the principal:

A set of ten Landscapes; dedicated to M. Watelet. 1764.
Twelve pastoral Landscapes. 1767. 1786.
Ten Landscapes, with mythological figures. 1769. 1771.

[He was born at Zurich in 1730, and died in 1788.]

GHEDINI, GIUSEPPE. This painter was born at Ferrara about the year 1710, and was a scholar of Giacomo Paroliui. There are several of his works in the churches at Ferrara. In S. Caterina da Siena, is a picture by him of S. Lucia; in S. Leonardo, the Martyrdom of St. Catherine; in Corpus Domini, the Annunciation, and the Death of St. Joseph; and in the refectory of the monastery of S. Maria degli Angeli, his principal work, representing the Multiplication of the Loaves, painted in 1755.

GHEEST, WYBRAND DE, was a native of Friesland, about the year 1591. He travelled to Italy when young, where he resided several years, chiefly at Rome, where he made drawings from the principal statues and pictures; and on his return to Holland painted historical subjects with considerable reputation. The plates in the book entitled Cabinet des Statues, published at Amsterdam in 1702, are from his designs.

GHEIN. See GHEYN.

GHENDT, EMANUEL DE, a modern French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1749. He was a pupil of J. Aliamet, and has engraved several plates in a neat, pleasing style. He executed many of the prints and vignettes for the Voyage d'Italie de l'Abbé de Saint Non. We have also, among others, the following prints by him:

L'Amour Asiatique; after Ch. Eisen.
Les Moissonneurs dans les Champs; after the same.
La pleine Moisson; after Isaac Moucheyron.
A View of the Fountain of Arethusa at Syracuse; after Chatelet.

The Four Times of the Day; after Baudouin.

[GHENT, JUSTUS VAN, a scholar of the Van Eycks. He is supposed to have assisted those masters in some of their most celebrated pictures; and Dr. Waagen is of opinion that the Last Judgment in the church of St. Mary at Dantzic is by him, though long held by connoisseurs to be the work of John van Eyck. This picture is one of superior excellence, and is ranked by Kügler, a very competent judge, among the greatest master-works of art. He has given a very full description of it. Kügler, however, does not say that it is by Justus van Ghent; he speaks only of the Communion in the church of S. Agatha, at Urbino, and a small picture at Ghent of the Finding of the True Cross, in which he says there is a want of depth of conception, and some dryness of handling. The picture at Urbino was probably finished in 1475, as he was paid in that year the sum of 300 florins, by the brotherhood of the "Corpo di Cristo," for whom it was originally painted. There is much uncertainty about the painters of this era; and many able artists are defrauded of their just reputation by the desire of the possessors of pictures of merit to ascribe them to the brothers Van Eyck.]

GHERARDI, CRISTOFORO, called DOCENO. This painter was born at Borgo S. Sepolero in 1500, and was a disciple of Raffaellino dal Colle. He excelled particularly in fresco, and assisted Giorgio Vasari in many of his most considerable works. There are several grotesque subjects by him in the Casa Vitelli. Of his oil-paintings, the principal are the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to St. Elizabeth, in the church of S. Domenico at Citta di Castello; and his picture of S. Maria del Popolo, at Perugia, painted in conjunction with Lattanzio della Marca. According to Lanzi, he died in 1552. [According to Zani, in 1556.]

GHERARDI, FILIPPO, was born at Lucca in 1643, and was first instructed in the art by his father Bastiano Gherardi, an artist of no great celebrity: but he went to Rome when young, and became a scholar of Pietro da Cortona, under whom he made great improvement. He afterwards visited Venice, where he studied the works of the great colourists of that school; and in conjunction with Giovanni Coli, painted several pictures in the Library of S. Giorgio Maggiore. Pietro da Cortona invited him back to Rome, to assist him in painting the cupola of S. Maria in Campitelli. In the Colonna Gallery are two fine pictures by him of the Battle of Lepanto, and the Triumph of Mark Anthony Colonna. There are several pictures by him in the churches at Lucca. He died in 1704.

GHERARDINI, ALESSANDRO. This painter was born at Florence in 1655, and was a scholar of Alessandro Rosi. He proved a very eminent painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. His compositions evince a fertile and inventive genius; his design is correct, and his colouring rich and harmonious. In the Monastery of the Augustines at Florence, is a fine picture by this painter of the Crucifixion; and in the Casa Orlandini, a subject from the Life of Alexander the Great. He died in 1723.

GHERARDO, DALLE NOTTI. See HONDTHORST. [GHERINGS, JOHN, a Flemish painter of architecture and perspective, lived about 1665. Some of his works are in the galleries at Vienna and Dresden.]

GHEYN, or GHEIN, JAMES, THE ELDER, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Antwerp in 1565. He was instructed in drawing by his father, who was a glass-painter, and learned engraving under Henry Goltzius. He imitated the style of that master, and his plates evince a great command of the graver. They are executed in a bold, free style, and his design is correct, and not without taste. He engraved a great number of plates, both from his own designs and after other masters, and his prints are highly esteemed. He generally used the cipher IG. The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

Tycho Brahe, the celebrated Danish Astronomer.
Abraham Gokevius, antiquary, of Amsterdam.
Hugo Grotius.
Philip de Marnix, the disciple of Calvin.
The Count de Medici, called the Father of the People.
Sigismund Malatesta, a famous warrior; circular.
Johannes Basiliowitsch, Autocrator Russiæ; circular.

SUBJECTS AFTER HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Vanity; represented as a Woman at her toilet.
Magdalene; a small oval.
Mars and Venus; two small medallions.
A Gipsy telling a Girl her fortune.
The Statue of the Laocoon.
A Lion, in a landscape; J. de Gheyn, fec. C. de Visscher, etc.; very scarce.
A set of ten plates, called the Masks; J. de Gheyn, inv. et fec.; very scarce.

The Twelve Roman Emperors; circular; fine.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Life and Passion of Christ; in fourteen plates; engraved by J. de Gheyn and Z. Dolendo, after C. van Mander.

The Twelve Tribes of Israel; in twelve plates; after the same.

The Four Evangelists; after Henry Goltzius.

The Confusion of Tongues at the building of the Tower of Babel; after C. van Mander.

The Adoration of the Trinity; after the same.

The Judgment of Midas; after the same.

The Prodigal Son; in two sheets; after the same.

The Crucifixion; after Crispin vander Broeck.

The Assembly of the Gods; after the same. 1589.

The Empire of Neptune; after H. Goltzius. 1587.

Twelve plates of Soldiers of the Guard of Rodolphus II.; fine.

The Annunciation; after Ab. Bloemaert.

A Repose in Egypt; after the same.

Christ preaching to the Jews; after the same.

The Miracle of the Loaves; after the same.

Daniel in the Lions' Den; after T. Bernard.

Diana and Actæou; after the same.

Polypheumus, with Acis and Galatea; after C. van Haerlem.

A small Landscape; an etching; after Breughel.

[He died in 1615.]

GHEYN, or GHEIN, JAMES, THE YOUNGER, was of the same family as the preceding artist, but it is not ascertained whether he was his son or his nephew. He is supposed to have studied in Italy, under A. Tempesta, from the resemblance in their style. In conjunction with Cornelius Boel, he executed eight plates for La Vie de Charles V., from designs by Tempesta. He marked his prints, J. de Gheyn, Jun. fec. He flourished about the year 1630.

GHEYN, or GHEIN, WILLIAM, a Flemish engraver, probably related to the foregoing artist. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he engraved some plates for J. le Blon. Jointly with Jeremiah Falk, he engraved the Four Seasons, represented by French ladies, attired in the mode of the time of Louis XII. We have also by him the two following portraits:

Louis XIV. when a boy, on horseback; G. de Gheyn, fec.
Bernard, Duke de Weymar, on horseback; same mark.

GHEZZI, SEBASTIANO. This painter was born in the Communanza, near Ascoli, and flourished about the year 1638. He was a scholar of Guercino, and painted history with some reputation. At the Barefooted Augustines at Monsamartino, there is a fine picture by him of St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.

GHEZZI, GIUSEPPE, was the son of the preceding artist, born in 1634, and was for some time instructed by his father; but he went afterwards to Rome, where he studied the works of Pietro da Cortona, whose style he adopted. He was employed and highly esteemed by Pope Clement XI., and at the time of his death, in 1721, was secretary to the Academy of St. Luke, at Rome.

GHEZZI, CAVALIERE PIER LEONE. This painter was the son of Giuseppe Ghezzi, and studied under his father, whom he surpassed. In conjunction with L. Garzi, F. Trevisani, and B. Luti, he was employed by Benedict XIV. to paint the Prophets in St. John of Lateran, and in other works. He was also employed in several considerable works by the Duke of Parma, who conferred on him the order of the Golden Spur. But he was most celebrated for his talent in caricature, and his works of that description are numerous in the collections at Rome. We have by him a few etchings, executed in a clear, neat style, from his own designs, and after the works of his father. Among others,

The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Giuseppe Ghezzi, marked Petrus Leo Ghezzius, del. et scul. Romæ. 1700; fine.

The Portrait of the Abb. Pietro Palatio.

Signior Nicola Zabbaglia; Ingegniere della fabrica di S. Pietro.

He died in 1755, aged 81.

GHIARINI, MARC ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Bologna in 1652. He etched and published a set of plates of the Aqueducts and Fountains at Rome.

GHIGI, TEODORO, or TEODORO MANTUANO. This painter was a native of Mantua, and flourished about the year 1545. He had the advantage of being educated under Giulio Romano, and was one of the ablest of his scholars. After the death of Giulio, he was selected by the Duke of Mantua to finish the works which were left imperfect by that great master.

GHIRLANDAJO, DOMENICO CORRADI, called DEL. The family name of this painter was Corradi, but he was usually called del Ghirlandajo, from his father's following the profession of a flower-maker. He was born at Florence in 1449, and was instructed in design, with the intention of his being bred to the business of a goldsmith; but his inclination for the art of painting induced him to become a disciple of Alessio Baldovinetti, and he proved one of the most distinguished artists of that early period, both as a mosaicist and a painter. His design was more correct and graceful than was usual in his time, and the expression of his heads superior to any painter that had preceded him. According to Mengs, he was the first of the Florentine painters, who, by a judicious attention to perspective, gave to their works the appearance of verity and depth. He was also the first of his countrymen that exploded the gilded and tawdry ornaments with which the painters anterior to him were accustomed to load their works, who, not being able to give beauty to their figures, were determined to make amends for it by finery. Pope Sixtus IV. invited him to Rome, and employed him in the Sistine chapel, where he painted two pictures, one of which, the Resurrection, has perished; the other, representing the Vocation of St. Peter and St. Paul to the Apostleship, is still preserved. He was the founder of an eminent school, which produced many able artists; and he claims the credit of being the instructor of Michael Angelo Buonaroti. Many of his works are mentioned by Vasari at Rome, Florence, Pisa, and Rimini. At Florence, in the church of the Innocenti, is a fine picture by this master of the Adoration of the Magi; in S. Trinità, several pictures of the Life of S. Francesco; and in the same church an altar-piece representing the Nativity. He died in 1493. [Zani and Lanzi place his birth in 1451, and his death in 1495.]

GHIRLANDAJO, RIDOLFI CORRADI, called. This painter was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Florence in 1485. His father dying when he was only eight years of age, he was taken under the protection of his uncle Davide Corradi. He afterwards studied under Fra. Bartolomeo di S. Marco, and had so far profited by the instruction of that master, that when Raffaele visited Florence, he was so satisfied of his ability, that he intrusted him to finish a picture of the Virgin and Infant he had commenced, for one of the churches at Siena. He entertained so high a respect for his talents, that on his return to Rome he invited him to assist him in his great works in the Vatican. Unfortunately for his fame, he refused the invitation of Raffaele, which, if he had accepted, he would probably have participated in the glory of that illustrious painter in an equal degree with Giulio Romano. He possessed an acute and vivacious imagination, with an elegance and taste in his forms that have a near affinity to the style of that master. In some of his first productions, in S. Jacopo di Ripoli; and in S. Girolamo at Florence, though there is something of the dryness of Pietro Perugino, they bear a great resemblance to the juvenile works of Raffaele. He approaches nearer to the better time of that master in his two pictures of subjects from the Life of S. Zanobi, originally painted for the Academy at Florence, but afterwards placed in the Ducal Gallery. He died in 1560. [The print of the Procession to Calvary (plate 125 of Rosini) will give an idea of his style of composition, and delineation of character; but it does not bear much of the impress of Fra. Bartolomeo or Giulio Romano.]

GHISI, GIOVANNI BATISTA BRITANO, [OF BERTANO,] called MANTUANO. This artist was born at Mantua about the year 1500, and, according to Baldinucci, was a painter, a sculptor, an architect, and an engraver. He was a disciple of Giulio Romano; but little is known of his works as a painter. As an engraver he is more distinguished, and is supposed to have been instructed in the use of the graver by Marc Antonio Raimondi, from the resemblance of their style. His design is correct, though somewhat stiff, and there is a want of harmony in the effect of his prints. He usually marked his plates with the cipher  We have the following by him:

Some Heads, with Helms, and antique ornaments.

The Virgin Suckling the infant Jesus. 1539.

David cutting off the Head of Goliath; after Giulio Romano. 1540.

A young Warrior carrying off a young Woman; called Paris and Helen. 1539.

A River God; after Luca Penni.

Mars, Venus, and Cupid.

A large naval Combat; from his own design. 1538.

The Burning of Troy, a grand composition; fine.

GHISI, GIORGIO, called MANTUANO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Mantua in 1524, and was instructed in design, and the use of the graver, by his father, whose style he greatly improved. He drew the naked very correctly, and was particularly attentive to the extremities. There is, notwithstanding, a continued sameness in his figures, as if he had only consulted one model, which gives to his works the appearance of a mannerist. This defect is particularly discernible in his immense print of the Last Judgment, after Michael Angelo Buonaroti. These deficiencies are sufficiently compensated by the many excellencies we find in the works of this esteemed artist, which are highly valued by the intelligent collector. Fine impressions of his prints are now become scarce. They are generally signed Giorgio Ghisi di Mantoua, fecit, or marked with the cipher G.N.F. M. The following are his principal plates:

The Portrait of Julius II.; after Raffaele.

The Holy Family, half length; after the same.

The School of Athens, two sheets; after the same.

The Dispute of the Sacrament; after the same.

An emblematical subject; sometimes called Raffaele's Dream, and sometimes The Melancholy of Michael Angelo. It represents an old Man looking at a Shipwrecked Vessel, whilst a Nymph appears approaching him; in the back-ground are seen several horrible and fantastical figures. It is inscribed Raphaelis Urbinateus inventum, and on a tablet, Georgius Ghisi Mat. 1561. The Prophets and Sibyls; six large plates; after the paintings by M. Angelo Buonaroti, in the Sistine Chapel. The Last Judgment; ten large plates; after the celebrated work by the same painter. An allegorical subject, representing the Birth of a Prince of the House of Gonzague; after Giulio Romano. 1568. Cupid and Psyche crowned by Hymen; after the same. The Birth of Memnon; after the same; very fine. Cephalus and Procris; after the same. The Interview between Hannibal and Scipio; after the same. Regulus led to death by the Carthaginians; after the same. Regulus shut up in the Tun; after the same. Venus in the Forge of Vulcan, sharpening the Arrows of Cupid; after Ferrino del Vaga. Venus and Mars; after Raffaelle da Reggio. An allegorical subject, representing a Judge on his Tribunal with Asses' Ears; after Luca Penni. Endymion carrying Diana to the Chase on his shoulders; after the same. Hercules conquering the Hydra; after Giov. Bat. Bri-tano Mantuanos. The Judgment of Paris; after the same. The Siege of Troy; after the same. The taking of Troy; after the same. A Print representing tombs, skeletons, &c., called the Resurrection of the dry Bones. 1554; fine; after the same. Venus and Adonis; after Teodoro Ghisi. Angelica and Medora; after the same. The Birth of the Virgin; after B. Spranger. The Mystery of the Trinity; after his own design. 1576. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Angelo Bronzino; in two sheets. 1554. The Last Supper; after Lambert Lombard. The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth; after his own design. The Crucifixion; after the same.

GHISI, ADAMO, called MANTUANO, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Mantua about the year 1530. He engraved several plates after the great Italian masters, which are well drawn; and though inferior to the works of Giorgio, possess great merit. He sometimes signed his prints Adamo Scultore, Mantuanus, and sometimes marked them with the cipher AS. We have by him the following:

The Nativity; after Giulio Romano. Adamo Scultore Mant.

The Presentation in the Temple; after Nic. Martinelli. Romæ. 1581. Adamo Scultore Mant. sc.

The dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin; after the celebrated sculpture by Michael Angelo Buonaroti. Adam. Mantuano. 1566; on a white ground. This plate was afterwards retouched, and the back-ground changed into a landscape, with the inscription, Romæ Ant. Lafreri, sc.

Cupid carrying the Arms of Mars; after Giulio Romano. Mars, preceded by Cupid, going to Battle; after the same.

The Bath of Venus; after Giulio Romano.

Diana going to the Chase; after the same.

Endymion regarding the Moon; after the same.

Hercules between Virtue and Vice; after the same.

Venus and Cupid, with Pan playing on the Pipe.

GHISI, DIANA, called MANTUANA. This distinguished lady was the sister of the two preceding artists, and probably was instructed in engraving by her brother Giorgio, as she has executed several plates in his style, which possess great merit. We have some excellent prints by her, which are usually signed with her name, and sometimes simply DIANA. The following are her principal plates:

Two Men and a Woman seated at a Table; signed Diana.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. John and St. Joseph presenting a Basket of Fruit; Diana Mantuana incidit Romæ. A. M. D. LXXXV. without the name of the painter.

The Holy Family, with St. Joseph at work; after Co-reggio.

The Holy Family, with St. John presenting a Billet; after Raffaelle.

The Virgin caressing the Infant; after F. Salviati.

The Virgin and Infant seated in the Clouds, and below the Archangels Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael; inscribed R. V. I. Diana Mantuana and Regina Angelorum.

St. Peter made Head of the Church, accompanied by the Ten Apostles, kneeling before Christ; after Raffaelle.

The Adulteress before Christ; after Giulio Romano.

The Continence of Scipio; after the same.

The Birth of Castor and Pollux; after the same; fine.

The Festival of the Gods at the Nuptials of Cupid and Psyche; after the design of Giulio Romano, in the Palazzo del T. at Mantua; in three sheets, very fine.

The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth; after G. Vasari.

GHISLANDI, DOMENICO. This painter was a native of Bergamo, and flourished about the year 1662. He excelled in painting architectural and perspective views in fresco; though he occasionally painted historical subjects. Comte Tassi mentions some pictures of the life and miracles of S. Francesco di Paola by him, in the cloisters of the Padri Minimi at Bergamo; and in the Palazzo Terzi is a saloon ornamented with architecture, in which the figures are painted by Giacomo Barbello.

GHISLANDI, FRA VITTORE, called FRA PAOLOTTO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Borgo di San Leonardo, in the Bergamese state, in 1655, and was a scholar of Sebastiano Bombelli. Although he never reached any eminence as an historical painter, he distinguished himself as one of the ablest portrait painters of his time. For this excellence he was more indebted to his attentive study of the portraiture of Titian, than the counsels of his instructor. He died in 1743.

GHISOLFI, GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Milan in 1623; and, according to Orlandi, was first a scholar of Girolamo Chignolo; and was afterwards instructed in architecture and perspective by his uncle Antonio Volpini; but his best instruction he received from Salvator Rosa. He is principally known as a painter of perspective and sea-ports: he nevertheless occasionally painted historical pictures and altar-pieces; some of which are in the Certosa at Pavia, and in the Sanctuario at Varese. When the Archduchess of Austria made her public entry into Milan, he was employed to paint the triumphal arches. In 1650 he visited Rome, where he made designs of the magnificent ruins in the environs of that city, which furnished him with admirable materials for the composition of his pictures. His works abound at Rome, Naples, Milan, and Genoa, where they are placed in the choicest collections. He died in 1683. [Zani places his birth in 1632.]

GHISSONI, OTTAVIO, was a native of Siena, but at an early age went to Rome, where he studied several years, chiefly under the tuition of Cherubino Alberti. In the year 1610 he visited Genoa, and was for some time a scholar of Ventura Salimbeni, where he painted some pictures in fresco for the public edifices. His works are more esteemed for the excellence of his colouring, than for correctness of design.

GHITI, POMPEO. This painter was born at Marone, a small town in the vicinity of Brescia, in 1631, and was first a scholar of Ottavio Amigoni. He afterwards went to Milan, where he studied five years under Giovanni Batista Discepoli, called Lo

Zoppo di Lugano. On his return to Brescia, he was employed in several works in oil and in fresco. He possessed a ready invention, and was a correct designer. His colouring is, however, cold and languid. He had a number of scholars, who resorted to him for his excellence in drawing. He died in 1703. [His last known work is dated 1704.]

GIALDISI, N. According to Zaist, in his Notizie de' pittori Cremonesi, this painter was of Parma, but flourished at Cremona about the year 1720. He excelled in painting flowers and fruit, and particularly in his pictures of still-life, such as carpets, with musical instruments, books, &c., which he represented with a fidelity of form and a truth of colour which are admirable. [Zani calls him Francesco, or Giovanni.]

GIAMPICOLI, GIULIO, an Italian engraver, born at Venice about the year 1700. His style renders it probable that he was brought up in the school of Wagner. He engraved several plates after Marco Ricci and others; among which are the following:

A set of thirteen Landscapes, with the frontispiece after Marco Ricci, entitled Raccolti di 12 paesi inventati e dipinti dal celebre Marco Ricci.

A set of four pretty Pastoral subjects.

A set of four Landscapes; after M. Ricci and F. Zuccarelli.

[Brulliot says he was the nephew of Marco Ricci, and was born in 1690; Zani, that he was born in 1698, and died in 1760.]

GIANNETTI, FILIPPO. According to Hakert, this painter was a native of Messina, and flourished about the year 1685. He was a scholar of Abraham Casembrot, and painted landscape in so bold a style, and with such extraordinary facility, that occasioned him to be styled the Luca Giordano of landscape.

GIAQUINTO, CORRADO. This painter was a native of Molfetta, and flourished about the year 1750. He was first a scholar of Francesco Solimene; but he went afterwards to Rome, where he entered the school of Sebastiano Conca, whose style he followed. Less correct in his design, and even more of a mannerist than his instructor, he possessed a ready invention and a resolute touch. His best works are his frescos in the tribune of St. Croce, and the great altar-piece of the church of La S. Trinitá at Rome. There are many of his works at Macerata, Turin, and other cities in Italy. He was invited to the court of Madrid, where he was employed in some of the palaces. He died in 1765.

GIAROLA, or GEROLA, ANTONIO, called IL CAVALIERE COPPA, was born at Verona in 1595, and studied at Bologna under Guido and Albano. In some of his pictures he approached the suavity of colour and the graceful contours of the former, though inferior to him in relief, and in the elegance and simplicity of his compositions. In the church of S. Bernardo at Bologna, is a picture by him of S. Mauro kneeling before the Virgin and Infant; but he is seen to more advantage in his Magdalene in the Desert, in the church of the Padri Servi. In the refectory of the seminary at Verona is a fine picture by Giarola of Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus. He died in 1665.

GIBERTONI, PAOLO. This painter was a native of Modena, and flourished about the year 1760. He chiefly resided at Lucca, and excelled in grotesque subjects in fresco, in which he introduced little animals of every description, touched with great spirit. He also painted landscapes, which were esteemed in his time, and have increased in value since his death.

GIBSON, RICHARD. This extraordinary personage was usually called the Dwarf, from his diminutive size, being only three feet ten inches high. He was, when a boy, page to a lady at Mortlake, who perceiving in him a disposition for the art, placed him under the care of Francis de Cleyn, under whom he made considerable progress. His talent attracted the notice of King Charles I., who made him one of his pages. It is reported in the Anecdotes, that he was married to a little lady of his own height, and that their marriage was celebrated in the presence of Charles I. and his queen, who ordered a diamond ring for the bride; but the troubles coming on she never received it. The union of this diminutive couple was distinguished by Waller in one of his prettiest poems. After the death of the king he was taken into the protection of Philip, Earl of Pembroke, and is said to have painted the portrait of Oliver Cromwell several times. When Sir Peter Lely visited England, Gibson improved himself greatly, by copying the portraits of that master; and he rose into such repute, that he was sent to Holland to teach the Princess Mary to draw, and had also the honour of instructing Queen Anne. R. Gibson lived to the age of 75, and died in 1690.

GIFFART, PETER. This artist was born at Paris in 1648. He engraved a considerable number of portraits and book ornaments, which are neatly executed with the graver, but without much taste, though his merit was sufficient to obtain the distinction of engraver to the King. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Maria Anne Victoire de Baviere, Dauphiness of France.
Frances d'Aubigné, Marchioness de Maintenon.
Philip, son of Thomas XIII., Count of Savoy.
Edward, son of Amedeus XV., Count of Savoy.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

A set of Medals from the French King's Cabinet.
A set of Ornaments; after Berain.
A Frontispiece to the Introduction to Geography, by P. Violier; after S. Le Clerc.

GIFFORD, GEORGE, an English engraver of portraits, who flourished about the year 1640. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and his plates are very indifferently executed. Among others, he engraved the following:

Hugh Latimer, Bishop of Worcester.
Sir Edward Marmion; scarce.
John Bate; prefixed to his Mysteries of Nature.

GILARDI, PIETRO. This painter was born at Milan, in 1679, and was instructed in the art by Federigo Bianchi, but he afterwards went to Bologna, where he became a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini, and afterwards studied under Giovanni Gioseffo del Sole. He painted history with reputation, and especially excelled in large fresco works, his talents being particularly adapted to the embellishments of cupolas, vaults, and other extensive operations, in which he proved himself an able machinist. Such are his frescos in the refectory of S. Vittore at Milan, which are not less esteemed for the ingenuity of the composition, and the facility of the execution, than for the tenderness and harmony of the colouring.

GILARTE, MATEO, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia, according to Palomino, in 1647. He was a scholar of Francisco Ribalta, and proved an eminent painter of history, both in oil and in fresco.

His chief residence was at Murcia, where there are several of his works. In the church of Nuestra Señora del Rosario, are three large pictures in fresco, representing Esther before Ahasuerus, Jacob wrestling with the Angel, and St. Dominick with other saints. In the refectory of the same convent, he painted the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes. Although the works of this master are not distinguished by the beauty of his forms, or the expression of his heads, his compositions are grand and copious; and he was a perfect master of the chiaro-scuro. He died in 1700.

GILES OF ANTWERP. See COIGNET.

GILES, or GYLES, HENRY, an English painter on glass, who resided at York, and flourished from about the year 1640 to 1687. One of his principal performances is the east window of University College, Oxford, which is marked, Hen. Giles, pinxit, 1687.

GILIOLI, GIACINTO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1584, and was brought up in the school of the Caracci. He painted history with some reputation. Of his works at Bologna, the most esteemed are his picture of the Death of St. Joseph in S. Mattia, and David with the Head of Goliath in S. Salvatore. He died in 1665.

GILLARDINI, MELCHIORE. According to Orlandi, this painter was a native of Milan, and was a scholar of Giovanni Batista Crespi, called Il Cerano. After the death of that master, he was employed to finish the pictures he left imperfect; and he also painted several altar-pieces for the churches of his own composition. At S. Celso, a small town near Milan, is a picture by him of S. Caterina da Siena, of which Lanzi speaks in favourable terms. By Melchiorre Gillardini, who is miscalled Girardini by Mr. Strutt, we have some etchings after P. da Cortona, Guido, and others. He also etched several plates from his own designs, in the style of Callot, representing battles and other subjects, executed with neatness and spirit. He died in 1675. [According to Zani, his proper name was Gherardini.]

GILLBERG, JOHN, a Swedish engraver, born at Stockholm about the year 1748. He engraved several portraits of distinguished personages of Sweden; and afterwards went to Paris, where he executed several plates in imitation of chalk drawings; among which were some heads after Raffaële, and some landscapes engraved jointly with Demarteau.

GILLEMANS, N., a Flemish painter of flowers and fruit, born at Antwerp about the year 1672. His pictures are generally small, and very highly finished, but without much effect. [See the following article.]

[GILLEMANS, JOHN PETER, a fruit and flower painter of Antwerp. His pictures are generally of a small size, well coloured and composed, and neatly finished. He assisted other artists in decorating their pictures, where flowers and fruit were required. Balkema says he was born in 1672: the time of his death is uncertain, but it is related that he fell into a canal and was drowned.]

[GILLIG, JACOB, born at Utrecht in 1636, painted landscapes and river fish. He died in 1688.]

GILLIG, M. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of Gerard de Vries, philosopher of Utrecht.

GILLOT, CLAUDE, a French painter and engraver, born at Langres in 1673. He was sent to Paris when young, and became a scholar of J. B. Corneille. He chiefly excelled in designing fauns, satyrs, and grotesques, in which he acquired some reputation, and was received into the Academy at Paris in 1715. Anthony Watteau was his scholar, and greatly surpassed him. His works as a painter are little regarded; but he has left us a considerable number of etchings, from his own designs, which are executed in a bold, free style, and sufficiently finished. Including the plates he engraved for Les Fables de la Mothe-Houdard, M. Gersaint makes his prints amount to near one hundred and eighty. Among others, we have the following by him:

The Feast of Diana disturbed by Satyrs; C. L. Gillot, fec.

The Feast of Bacchus, assisted by Satyrs and Bacchante. The Triumph of Pan celebrated by Nymphs and Sylvans. The Triumph of Faunus, the God of the Forests.

The Count Caylus engraved several plates after his designs. He died at Paris in 1722.

[GILLRAY, JAMES, the most eminent of English caricaturists, was born in 1757, and is supposed to have been of Irish descent. Scarcely any particulars of his early years are known. It is said that he was the son of a Chelsea pensioner, and a person of the same name, who was probably his father, filled the office of sexton to the Moravian cemetery at Chelsea for forty years, and was buried there in 1799. Like the illustrious Hogarth, and the celebrated engraver Sharp, he began his career as a letter engraver, though we have been unable to find any specimens of his works of that description.

Being disgusted with this monotonous occupation he ran away from his employer, joined a company of strolling players, and, after undergoing the various hardships this course of life invariably entails upon its followers, he returned to London, and became a student of the Royal Academy, where he pursued most energetically his studies in the art of design. That he must have attained remarkable proficiency is very evident from several plates which he engraved after his own designs, particularly two subjects from Goldsmith's Deserted Village, inscribed "The Village Train," and "The Deserted Village," published in 1784. These are designed in a remarkably free and picturesque manner, and have some resemblance to the earlier works of Stothard. They are exceedingly well engraved in the dotted manner, and though we are not acquainted with the name of his instructor in this art, they so much resemble the works of the unfortunate Ryland, that we have little hesitation in asserting that he must have been instructed by him. Among other works of this class, and executed about the same time, are, a capital portrait of Dr. Arne, after Bartolozzi; Colonel Gardiner's last Interview with his Children; The burning of the Duke of Athol East Indianman, 1785; The Wreck of the Nancy Packet off Scilly, 1784; and two portraits of William Pitt: all after his own designs. The two last, though admirable representations of the man, are nevertheless somewhat approaching to caricature. He also engraved a few plates after Lady Spencer's drawings, and, whether for the purpose of amusement or mystification, occasionally adopted fictitious names. Thus the following plates, which are known to be by him, have other names attached to them: The Nativity, after Copley, J. Hurd, fecit, 1785; The Return, a child with a dog in a landscape, J. Kent, fecit, 1781; A Storm, J. Penn, fecit, 1786; and were it necessary, many others of his works might be quoted bearing these names. He also, on many of his earlier caricatures, made use of a monogram composed of the letters J. S., interlaced, very much resembling that used by Sayer the caricaturist, and he probably adopted it to mislead the public as to the real author of his publications.

Gillray appears to have worked as an engraver long after his career as a caricaturist had commenced, as he engraved, in 1792, a large plate after Northcote, representing the delivery of the prisoners from the Bastille, inscribed, "Le Triomphe de la Liberté, ou, L'élargissement de la Bastille;" and in 1794, "Marquis Cornwallis receiving the royal Hostages at Seringapatam," after the same painter: probably the last of his productions of this description.

Admirable as many of these works are, it is as a caricaturist that Gillray is best known, and upon which his fame entirely rests. In this art he has no rival; and the exquisite tact with which he seized upon points, both in politics and manners, most open to ridicule, is only equalled by the consummate skill and wit with which he satirized them. His earlier works are more carefully than spiritedly executed, and look like the productions of an engraver only. The earliest of his undoubted caricatures, though many others antecedent have been with great reason attributed to him, is dated 1779; it is probably a satire on the Irish Fortune-hunter, and is called "Paddy on Horseback," the so-called horse being a bull, on which he is riding with his face to the tail. But his improvement was rapid and extraordinary, and he soon attained a marvellous freedom both of design and in the management of the etching needle. We believe he etched his ideas at once upon the copper without making a previous drawing, his only guides being sketches of the distinguished characters he intended to introduce made on small pieces of card which he always carried about him, and many of which we have seen. His caricatures amount to more than twelve hundred; and as it would be quite impossible to give any thing like a complete list of them in this work, we shall merely notice a few of the more important, arranging them according to the dates at which they appeared.

A New Way to pay the National Debt. George III. and his queen are coming out of the Treasury loaded with money, which is overflowing their pockets; on the right is the Prince of Wales in a very shabby condition, gratefully receiving money from the Duc d'Orleans. April 21, 1786.

Ancient Music. A capital caricature of the king and queen in ecstacy at a concert performed by the ministers. May 10, 1787.

Monstrous Croas; a powerful satire on the grasping avarice of George III. and Queen Charlotte. May 29, 1787.

March to the Bank. A capital etching, executed in the most masterly style. August 22, 1787. There are two states of this plate; in the first, the female who is thrown down in front has less drapery.

Market Day. Lord Thurlow, as a grazier, is attending Smithfield Market, and examining the beasts, the heads of which represent the leading political characters of the day. May 2, 1788.

Election Troops bringing in their Accounts to the Pay Table; J. Gillray inv. et fecit, 1788. A satire on the means employed by ministers, unsuccessfully however, to frustrate the election of Fox for Westminster. This we believe is the first caricature on which the name of Gillray appears.

Frying Sprats:—Toasting Muffins. 1791. Two small but very clever caricatures on the parsimonious habits of George III. and his queen. In the first the queen is represented carefully frying her own sprats; and in the second the king is in the full enjoyment of toasting his own muffins.

Anti-Saccharites, or John Bull and his Family leaving off the use of Sugar. 1792. The king and queen, from economical motives, are enjoying and praising their tea without sugar, while the princesses are evidently very much disgusted, and take no pains to conceal it. The royal family, it is said, were highly delighted with this caricature.

A Connoisseur examining a Cooper. A very bold and happy idea, capitally carried out. George III. is represented almost purlling looking with great attention at a miniature of Oliver Cromwell, which he holds in one hand, and has a candle in the other. The bitterness of this satire was occasioned by the disparaging observations the king made on the portraits Gillray had sketched during his tour in Flanders with Loutherbourg. The king had said, "I don't understand these caricatures." The exasperated artist made this drawing, and said, "I wonder if the royal connoisseur will understand this?"

Temperance enjoying a frugal Meal, and A Voluptuary under the Horrors of Digestion. 1792. Two most admirable productions, unsurpassed either in humour, design, or execution. The temperate habits of George III. in the former, and the Epicurean manners of the Prince of Wales in the latter, are portrayed with the most consummate ability.

Bengal Levee, from an original drawing made on the spot by an amateur. 1792. A very large and skilfully executed plate.

The Dagger Scene, or the Plot discovered. 1792. A capital representation of a well-known scene in the House of Commons, in which Edmund Burke was the chief performer.

Fatigues of the Campaign in Flanders. 1793. The Duke of York luxuriating in the company of the Flemish frows, attended by his soldiers, who are bringing in large bowls of punch.

The Loyal Toast. 1793. The Duke of Norfolk giving his celebrated toast, "The majesty of the people," at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, for which he was dismissed from his offices.

The consequences of a successful French Invasion; a set of four plates, in which the horrors to be expected are given with extraordinary spirit. No doubt these and other similar caricatures produced a great and powerful effect on the minds of the English public, inspiring the people to a determined resistance.

The Cow-pock, or the wonderful effects of the new Inoculation. A very humorous burlesque on the popular opinions respecting Jenner's invaluable discovery.

L'Assemblée Nationale, or a grand co-operative Meeting at St. Anne's Hill, (the residence of Charles James Fox,) respectively dedicated to the admirers of a Broad Bottom'd Administration. 1804. This we have no hesitation in asserting to be the most talented caricature that has ever appeared. The king is supposed to have been executed, the republic proclaimed, and Fox, as first consul, is holding his levee at his house at St. Anne's Hill. All the leading Whigs are present, of whom the likenesses are most admirable, and in the right corner is seen a portion of the figure of the Prince of Wales. This caricature gave so much offence to the prince that he offered a large sum of money for its suppression, which being accepted, he ordered the plate to be destroyed. It was the misfortune of the prince and those by whom he was surrounded to place reliance on each other; the plate was not destroyed, it was secreted, and still exists. It will be found in the collection published by Mr. Bohn.

The King of Broddingnag (sic) and Gulliver (George III. and Buonaparte); two plates. 1803 and 1804.

The Middlesex Election, 1804. Sir Francis Burdett dragged in his carriage to the poll by the Duke of Norfolk, Charles Fox, and other leading Whigs.

The Reconciliation between George III. and the Prince of Wales, 1804. Admirably treated.

The Life of William Cobbett, written by himself; eight satirical plates. 1809.

Installation of the Chancellor of Oxford, (Lord Grenville,) Aug. 3, 1810; a large plate, and the last political engraving having his name.

Other pieces not of a political nature, but full of humour, and sometimes severely satirical on the fashionable frivolities of the time, wherein he did not spare the persons of the prime leaders of the ton, may be added:

A Pic Nic Orchestra, in which are introduced the portraits of the Marchionesses of Buckingham and Salisbury, Lady Mary Cholmley, Lord Edgumbe, and Charles Greville.

Magdalene penitent.
The Adulteress before Christ.
Christ disputing with the Doctors.
St. Anne received into Heaven by the Virgin.

Luca Giordano died at Naples in 1705.

GIORGETTI, GIACOMO. This painter was born at Assisi about the year 1610, and was a scholar of Giovanni Lanfranco. He painted history, chiefly in fresco, and several of his works are in the churches of his native city, of which the most considerable is the dome of the principal church. In the sacristy of the Conventuali he painted some pictures of the Life of the Virgin. His colour is good, and his works are more finished than those of his master, but his design is not so correct.

GIORGIO, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, who was employed chiefly by the booksellers. He resided at Padua, where he engraved the plates for a collection of antique lamps, published in 1653, entitled De Lucernis Antiquorum reconditis, Patavii, 1653. He also engraved a frontispiece with figures to a book on Anatomy, by J. Veslingi, dated 1647, signed Joan Georgius Patavii. We have also by him a ludicrous print, called the Bath of the Anabaptists; after Raffaelle.

GIORGIONE, GIORGIO BARBARELLI, called. This distinguished painter was born at Castelfranco, near Treviso, in 1477. His father, perceiving his disposition for the art, placed him under the tuition of Giovanni Bellini, at Venice, where Titian soon after became his fellow student. Giorgione was the first of the Venetian painters that broke through the timid and constrained style to which the art was confined at the time of the Bellini, and introduced a freedom of outline, a boldness of handling, and a vigorous effect of chiaro-scuro, which were unknown before him. Rich and harmonious in his colouring, dignified in his characters, broad and simple in his masses of light and shadow, he was the first that practised the admirable blending of his tints, which forms so great a part of the beauty of Venetian colouring. For this excellence he was little indebted to the instruction of Bellini. The works of Leonardo da Vinci were the models he most consulted; and by a profound study of them he acquired the breadth of effect and the extraordinary relief by which his works are distinguished. He added suavity to force, and in his carnations he sometimes approached the tenderness and truth of Coreggio. His pictures became the admiration of Titian, who for some time followed his style. Of his works in fresco, the greater part have perished, and those which remain are so materially injured, that little of their original beauty is discernible. Giorgione was much employed in portrait painting, to which his powers were peculiarly adapted; and in that department of the art he may be ranked with the greatest masters. Grace, dignity, expression, and truth of character distinguish his works of that description. Of his oil pictures the principal are, Christ bearing his Cross, in the church of St. Roch at Venice; in the school of Sarti, his picture of S. Omobono; and in that of S. Marco, that saint appeasing the Tempest. At Treviso, in the Monte di Pietà, is a fine picture of the dead Christ. One of his most admired works is the finding of Moses, in the archiepiscopal palace at Milan. This eminent painter died of the plague in the prime of life in 1511.

GIOTTINO, TOMASO. See STEFANO.

GIOTTO, sometimes called AMBROGIOTTO, and by others GIOTTO DI BONDONE. This venerable painter was born at Vespignano, near Florence, in 1276. He was the son of a shepherd, and whilst guarding his flocks in the fields, he was discovered by Cimabue amusing himself with drawing the figure of a lamb on a stone. Struck with the disposition of the boy, he persuaded his father to intrust him to his care, and conducted him to Florence, where he educated him with the greatest attention. It was not long before the disciple surpassed his master; and in one of his earliest pictures, painted for a convent at Florence, representing the Annunciation, although the style was dry and hard, there was a dawning of grace and beauty, which indicated the advancement he afterwards made in divesting the art of the stiffness and formality which still marked the works of Cimabue. In his attention to symmetry, a more correct design, a softer blending of his tints, and in the expression of his heads, he was superior to every artist of his time. Giotto distinguished himself as a mosaicist, particularly in his celebrated work in the Portico of the Basilica of St. Peter's at Rome, called the Navicella, or the Boat of St. Peter, now so mutilated and repaired, that it retains little of the original design. Another famous mosaic by Giotto is the Death of the Virgin at Florence, so much admired by Michael Angelo Buonaroti. He was the first painter who gave to portraits the air of truth and resemblance. Among other illustrious persons, he painted the portraits of Pope Clement IV. and that of Dante, who has celebrated him in his poem. He died in 1336. [The inquirer who may be desirous of fuller information respecting this great patriarch of painting, will be gratified by referring to the instructive and delightful work on "CHRISTIAN ART," by Lord Lindsay; in which he will find collected many particulars relating to the artist, his contemporaries, and his scholars. As the greater part of Giotto's works have been destroyed by accident, by ignorance, and by time; and as many inferior productions have been attributed to his pencil by careless or presumptuous writers, it will be satisfactory to peruse the records of facts concerning those lost and those that exist, as described by this noble and intelligent writer on art. One fact the reader should be made acquainted with; the discovery of the portrait of Dante. In the chapel of the Podestà, now the Bargello, at Florence, which had for two centuries been coated with whitewash, and partitioned into prisoners' cells, was this discovery made. Relying on the assertion of Vasari that Giotto had introduced the portrait of Dante in "the Gloria" painted there, Signor Bezzi, Mr. Kirkcup, and some other gentlemen obtained permission to remove the whitewash at their own expense, which was done with admirable address by the painter Marini, and the portrait discovered. It represents the poet in his thirty-fifth year, wearing the falling cap of the time, holding a book in his right hand and a pomegranate in his left. Rosini, in his "Storia della Pittura Italiana," has given an outline of it (tom. ii. p. 223). The Deposition and Transition of the Virgin, plate 14 of the same work, is one of the noblest productions of art, and it may be doubted whether it has ever been excelled.]

GIOVANNI, DA SAN GIOVANNI. See MANNOZZI.

GIOVANNINI, GIACOMO MARIA, was born at Bologna in 1667, and was a scholar of Antonio Roli. He painted some pictures for the churches at Bologna; one of the most esteemed is that of Magdalene worshipping the Cross, in the church of

S. Niccolo degli Alberi. He is more known as an engraver than a painter. We have by him several plates after the great masters, particularly after Coreggio and the Caracci. They are executed very neatly, chiefly etched, and some of them assisted with the graver; but there is a want of effect in his prints, and his design is frequently incorrect. The following are his principal plates:

A set of twenty large plates; after the paintings by Lodovico Caracci, and others, in the cloister of St. Michael in Bosco, at Bologna.

Twelve prints from the pictures by Coreggio, in the cupola of S. Giovanni at Parma.

A print after the celebrated picture called the St. Jerome, by Coreggio. The same has been engraved by Agostino Caracci and Sir Robert Strange.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. George; after the famous picture by Coreggio; in the Dresden gallery.

St. Sebastian; after Lodovico Caracci.
The Communion of the Apostles; after Marc. Ant. Franceschini.

[He died at Parma in 1717.]

GIOVANNINI, CARLO, was probably related to the preceding artist, and flourished at Bologna about the year 1698. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he was a reputable historical painter. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Bologna, of which the following are the most esteemed: St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read, in the church of La Morte; Adam and Eve driven from Paradise, in La Madonna del Piombo; and Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in S. Giovanni in Monte.

GIOVANNINO, DEL PIO. See BONATI.

GIOVENONE, GIROLAMO. This painter was a native of Vercelli, and flourished about the year 1514, as appears from two of his pictures in the church of S. Paolo in that city, dated 1514 and 1516. At Milan, in the church of the Augustines, there is a fine picture by this master of the Resurrection, with two laterals representing St. Margaret and St. Cecilia. [Rosini has given a print of a votive picture, in the gallery of Lochis at Bergamo, with the date 1527, (plate 122,) which will excite a high opinion of the master.]

GIRANDOLE, ———. See BUONTALENTI.

[GIRODET TRIOSON, ANNE LOUIS, one of the most eminent French painters of modern times, was born at Montargis in 1767, and died at Paris in 1824. His name, originally, was GIRODET; it was only in 1812 that he adopted that of his tutor, Dr. Trioison. He was a pupil of David, and afterwards completed his pictorial education at Rome. He gave early indication of talent, and before he attained his twenty-second year he gained the highest academical prize. During his residence at Rome he produced his pictures of Endymion sleeping and Hippocrates refusing the Presents of Artaxerxes. On his return to France he rose to the highest rank in his profession. His picture of the "Deluge" carried off the palm from the "Sabines," by David, in the competition for the great prize for the best historical composition. He painted numerous portraits of the distinguished persons of the time; and made many designs to illustrate the works of Anacreon, Virgil, and Racine, published by Firmin Didot in quarto. A great number of his works have been engraved or lithographed; and the originals are in the royal and private collections in France. He was buried at the Cemetery of Père La Chaise.]

GIRTIN, THOMAS. This ingenious English artist was born in 1775, and was a pupil of Edward Dayes. He was one of the most admired landscape painters of his time, and was among the first founders of that tasteful style of designing landscapes in water-colours, which our countrymen have carried to such perfection. On the occasion of the peace of Amiens, Mr. Girtin went to Paris, where he made twenty drawings of the principal views in that metropolis, of which he etched the outlines, and the plates were finished in aquatinta by other artists. Though of a very weak and delicate constitution, such was his attachment to the art, that he continued to exercise his profession till within a few days of his death, though in a state of the most deplorable debility. This interesting artist died in 1802, at the premature age of 27, regretted by every admirer of taste and genius.

GISMONDI, PAOLO, called PAOLO PERUGINO. This painter was a native of Perugia, but was brought up at Rome, under Pietro da Cortona. He painted history with some reputation, and was received into the Academy at Rome in 1668. Some of his best fresco works are those in the church of S. Agnese in Piazza Navona, and the pictures in the tribune of S. Agata in Piazza Nuova at Rome.

GIUGNI, ———. See ZUGNI.

GIUSTI, ANTONIO, was born at Florence in 1624, and was first a scholar of Cesare Dandini, but afterwards studied under Mario Balassi. His talent was not confined to historical subjects. He painted with equal success landscapes, animals, and huntings; and continued to exercise his profession with unabated vigour, until he reached his eighty-first year, and died in 1705.

GLAUBER, JOHN. The family of this painter was originally of Germany, but his father resided at Utrecht, where he was born in 1646. Glauber was distinguished by a decided disposition for the art, which difficulties appear to have encouraged, by which obstacles were converted into means, and who, by an invincible perseverance and energy of character, overcame the most embarrassing impediments which circumstances and prejudice could oppose to him. His father destined him to a different and favourite profession; and, after a long resistance, he was with difficulty prevailed on to permit him to follow the bent of his inclination, by placing him under the tuition of Nicholas Berghem. With the advantage of so able an instructor, and gifted with uncommon genius, his progress was unusual. Having seen some of the landscapes of Gaspar Poussin and others, representing the grand scenery of the environs of Rome, he conceived a strong desire to visit a country of which the transcripts appeared to him so picturesque and interesting. He determined on a journey to Italy; and in 1671 he left Holland to travel to Rome, through France, where he expected, by the exercise of his talent, to furnish himself with the means of accomplishing his journey. After passing three years at Paris and at Lyons, in both of which cities he left proofs of his ability, he arrived at Rome, and it was not long before he distinguished himself in the metropolis of art. He was received with acclamation into the Bentevogel Society, where they conferred on him the title of Polidore. Glauber passed two years at Rome, in designing the most remarkable scenery in the vicinity of that capital; and afterwards visited Padua and Venice, on his return to Holland. He settled at Amsterdam; and having formed an intimacy with Gerard de Lairesse, who was then in the height of his reputation, he became his inmate, and by the union of their talents the admirers of the art were gratified by the production of some admirable landscapes by Glauber, decorated with the classic figures of the Poussin of Holland. Such was the desire of possessing their works, that it was with difficulty they could execute the commissions they received. It was at this time that he painted the fine landscapes in the Chateau of Soesdyck, for the Prince of Orange, in which the figures are painted by Lairese. The works of Glauber exhibit nothing of the taste of his country, his forms and scenery are entirely Italian, and of a select and grand choice. We have by this painter several etchings, executed in a slight, spirited style, some of which are after his own designs, and others after Berghem and Gaspar Poussin. He also etched some plates from the designs of Gerard de Lairese. The following are his principal prints:

Various Landscapes and Cattle; after Berchem.

Two Landscapes; after Gaspar Poussin; Gaspar Poussin, pinx.; J. Glauber, fec.

A set of six Landscapes, lengthways; from his own designs.

A set of six Landscapes, upright; after the same.

A set of circular plates of allegorical subjects, from the history of the four great Monarchies of Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome; after de Lairese.

J. Glauber died in 1726.

GLAUBER, JOHN GOTTLIEB, was the younger brother and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Utrecht in 1656. At the age of fifteen he accompanied John Glauber in his journey through France to Italy. Whilst at Paris, he was placed under the care of Jacob Knyf, who was in some repute as a painter of architectural views and sea-ports. After passing some time under that master he rejoined his brother at Lyons, and went with him to Rome, where he studied two years. In 1684 he went to Hamburg, and met with great encouragement. He was soon after invited to the court of Vienna, where he passed great part of his life. John Gottlieb Glauber painted landscapes in the style of his brother, though more finished and less masterly in the handling; and also excelled in sea-ports, which he embellished with small figures, correctly drawn and neatly touched. The pictures of this artist are almost confined to Germany, where they are found in the choicest collections. He died in 1703.

GLAUBER, DIANA. This paintress was the sister of the two foregoing artists, born at Utrecht in 1650. She was instructed in design by her elder brother. Her talent led her to paint historical subjects and portraits, in which she distinguished herself at Hamburg, where she chiefly resided. She had acquired considerable reputation in that city, when she became blind, some years before her death.

GLOCKENTON, ALBERT, an old German engraver, born at Nuremberg, about the year 1432. Papillon asserts that he executed some wooden cuts in a coarse style; but this is contradicted by Huber, and the other German authorities. His plates are wrought entirely with the graver, in a neat but stiff style; and he appears to have imitated the manner of Martin Schoen, some of whose plates he copied. He usually marked his prints with the initials A.

G. in Gothic letters, with the date $\text{A} \text{C}$. We have the following by him:

Twelve plates of the Passion of Christ; fine and scarce; after Martin Schoen.

Ten plates of the wise and foolish Virgins; after the same.

Christ bearing his Cross; after the same; scarce.
The Death of the Virgin; after the same.
The Virgin and Infant seated on an altar.

GLOVER, GEORGE, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1637. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and engraved several portraits of distinguished persons, which are interesting to English History. They are executed in a bold, open style, though without much taste. He also engraved some frontispieces and emblematical subjects; but his portraits are the best of his works. We have the following by him:

James I.

Charles I.

Henrietta Maria, Queen of Charles I.

Mary, Daughter of Charles I.

Charles II.

Catherine, Queen of Charles II.

James II.

Maria Beatrix, Queen of James II.

Oliver Cromwell.

William Russell, Duke of Bedford.

Francis Russell, Earl of Bedford.

Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland.

Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex.

Henry Rich, Earl of Holland.

Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford.

James Usher, Archbishop of Armagh.

Sir Thomas Urquhart; very scarce.

Sir Edward Deering; fine. 1640.

Sir James Cambell.

Sir Henry Oxenden de Barham.

Sir Anthony Vanduyck.

John Pym, M. P. for Tavistock.

John Fox, the Martyrologist.

Lewis Roberts, Mercat. Lond. 1637.

John Goodwin, Presbyter. 1642.

William Bariff. 1643.

John Lilburne. 1641.

Henry Burton, Rector of St. Matthew's, Friday-street. 1648.

Nat. Witt, an idiot, with four verses.

GLUME, J. G. This artist is said by Basan to have been a native of Germany, and a painter. He etched some plates of portraits and other subjects, from his own compositions. He flourished about the year 1760.

GNOCCI, PIETRO. This painter was a native of Milan, and, according to Morigia, flourished about the year 1595. He was a scholar of Aurelio Luini, and surpassed his instructor in the elegance and taste of his figures. Lanzi conjectures that this artist may be the painter called Pietro Luini, as it was not unusual at that time for the disciple to adopt the name of his master. His best performance is his picture of Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in the church of S. Vittore at Milan.

GOAR, VAN, an old German engraver on wood, who was employed chiefly by the booksellers. Although the subjects he was engaged in are little interesting in themselves, being principally frontispieces and book ornaments, yet his cuts are executed with so much spirit, and in so masterly a style, that his prints are much esteemed. He flourished about the year 1516. He usually marked his prints with the cipher $\text{V} \text{G}$.

GOBBO, PIETRO PAOLO BONZI, called IL. The family name of this painter was Bonzi, but he is generally known by the name of il Gobbo. He is sometimes called il Gobbo da Cortona, from his having been born in that city in 1580, and sometimes il Gobbo de Caracci, from his having been brought up in their academy; but he is more frequently styled il Gobbo da Frutti, from his singular excellence in painting fruit. He first attempted historical painting; and has given proof of his incompetency in his picture of the Incredulity of St. Thomas, in the rotunda at Rome. He was not much more successful in landscapes, as appears in his pictures of that description in the Palazzo Mazerini at Monte Cavallo. But he surpassed every artist of his country in painting fruit. His arrangement of these objects is tasteful and picturesque; and his colouring has all the voluptuous richness of nature, with a relief that is perfect deception. His works are the ornaments of several of the palaces at Rome, particularly the beautiful festoons in a ceiling in the Palazzo Mattei. His oil-pictures are not less admired than his works in fresco, and are found in the first collections. He died in 1640.

GOBBO, ANTONIO. See CARACCI.

GOBBO, DEL. See SOLARI.

GODDARD, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1651. He engraved some frontispieces, maps, and other subjects, for the booksellers. One of his best prints is the portrait of Martin Billingsley, a writing-master, in an oval border; dated 1651, with four English verses. It is prefixed to his copy-book. Mr. Strutt mentions a small upright print of a woman standing, under which is inscribed Vetura, and another its companion.

[GODEFROY, JEAN, a French historical engraver, was born at London, of French parents, in 1771, and was a scholar of J. P. Simon. He engraved the works of the most eminent French painters of his time; particularly those of Gerard, Prud'hon, Karlé Vernet, Isabey, and Chaudet. There are also by him engravings after Raphael, Correggio, Poussin, and the Caracci. His last work of importance was the Congress at Vienna, after Isabey, which he executed in 1819. He was living in 1831.]

GODETZ, ANTHONY DES, a French designer and engraver, who flourished about the year 1682. He published a large folio volume of plates, entitled, Les Edifices Antiques de Rome, engraved from his designs; and he etched the frontispiece himself.

GODEWYCK, MARGARET. According to Houbraken, this ingenious lady was born at Dort in 1627. She was a pupil of Nicholas Maas, and painted landscapes and flower-pieces, which were admired in her time. She possessed a remarkable talent of executing similar subjects in needle-work. She died in 1677.

GODFREY, G. This English artist engraved, among other things, some of the plates for Grose's Antiquities in 1785.

GODFREY, RICHARD, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several views and antiquities, and some English portraits for the Antiquarian Repertory; among which are the following:

Edward, the Black Prince.
Thomas, Duke of Gloucester.
Margaret, Countess of Salisbury.
Sir Henry Unton, British Minister in France.
Simon Forman, Astrologer.
Sir Anthony Weldon, Historian.
John Evans, Astrologer.
Abraham Cowley, Poet.
Richard, son of Oliver Cromwell.

GODFREY, FRANCIS, a modern French engraver, born at Rouen in 1748. He was brought up under P. le Bas, and has engraved several plates of landscapes and other subjects, in the neat style of his instructor. Among others, we have the following by him:

A pair of Landscapes, called Le Temple des Amours, and La Tour de deux Amans; after Lantara.

A View of the Village of Moutiers Travers; after Chatelet.

Amusement of Brabant; after Teniers.

The Georgian Bath; after L. de la Hyre.

A pastoral Landscape; after Casanova.

A Landscape, with a Waterfall; after le Prince.

A Landscape; after Claude Lorraine.

GOEBOUW, [or GOBAU,] ANTHONY, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1625. His parents were opulent; and after being taught the rudiments of the art, he was sent to Italy for improvement, and passed several years at Rome. On his return to Flanders he painted some historical subjects with considerable reputation; but his chief merit was in painting similar subjects to those by Teniers and Ostade, representing village festivals and merry-makings. His pictures of that description are deservedly admired in his own country, and are placed in the best collections. [He also painted Italian sea-ports and market-places, with numerous figures, in the style of Lingelbach, which have great merit; and also fields of battle after the conflict, with soldiers and camp-followers stripping the slain. His representations of such scenes are so true that they are horrible. It may also be suspected that some of the naked figures in K. du Jardin's pictures are by him. He died in 1677.]

GOEREE, J., a Dutch engraver, who resided at Amsterdam about the middle of the seventeenth century. He engraved a variety of frontispieces and other book plates, which are chiefly, if not entirely, from his own designs. Mr. Strutt miscalls this artist Goerce.

GOES, HUGO VANDER, an old Flemish painter, born at Bruges about the year 1405. He was a disciple of John van Eyck, who instructed him in oil-painting. Van Mander describes several of the works of this ancient master, particularly a small picture, which served as an epitaph in the chapel of Wouter Gaultier, in the church of St. James at Ghendt. It represented the Holy Family, in which the head of the Virgin was extremely beautiful for the time, and the whole was very highly wrought up. At Bruges there are some of his works, one of which is preserved with great veneration in the sacristy of the church of St. James, representing the taking down from the Cross. In the convent called Sion, at Brussels, are two pictures by Vander Goes of the Resurrection and the Transfiguration, very highly finished. [There are great discrepancies among the several writers respecting the birth and death of this master. Some would place his birth in 1366, and his death in 1427; but this is evidently erroneous, as Waagen describes a picture, which he calls "a well-preserved one of this scholar of Van Eyck," with the date 1472. It is in Lord Shrewsbury's collection at Alton Tower. Lord Lindsay gives a critical description of an altar-piece by him, in the church of S. Egidio, which he painted for the Portinari family. Kügler mentions several, but does not give any date. He says there are four small pictures by him, in the private collection of the king of Holland. Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys does not notice them as the work of Vander Goes, in his excellent catalogue of that collection: it is probable that Kügler alludes to the St. John, the Magdalene, St. Stephen, and St. Christopher, which are by JOHN HEMLING. Rathgeber gives a detailed account of his pictures. The probability is that he died in 1480.]

GOETZ, GOTTFRIED BERNARD, a German painter and mezzotinto engraver, born at Kloster-Welchrod, in Moravia, in 1708. He was instructed in painting by Eckstein, and afterwards was a scholar of John George Bergmuller, at Augsburg. His works, as a painter, are little known out of his own country; but he has scraped some plates in mezzotinto, among which are the following:

The Portrait of the Emperor Charles VII.; after a picture by himself.

Bust of Louis XV.

St. Amandus; after J. G. Bergmuller.

St. Walburg; after the same.

GOLDAR, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several humorous subjects, after Collet and other masters; among which is a set of four plates after Inigo Collet, called Modern Love. He also engraved a print of Ships, after an engagement; after Wright.

GOLE, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1660. We have by him several prints, some of which are executed with the graver, and others in mezzotinto. The former are the preferable performances. Among others, the following are by him:

ENGRAVINGS.

Charles XI. King of Sweden. 1685.

The Duchess de la Valiere; the same date.

Mahomet IV., Emperor of the Turks.

Kara Mustapha, Grand Visir.

Abraham Hellenbrock, Minister of the Gospel.

Nicholas Colvius, Pastor of the Walloon Church; after B. Vaillant.

MEZZOTINTO PORTRAITS.

Charles III. King of Spain.

Frederick, King of Poland.

George Augustus, electoral Prince of Brunswick Lunenburg.

Charles, Landgrave of Hesse Cassel.

Cornelius Tromp, Admiral of Holland.

Balthasar Becker.

SUBJECTS IN MEZZOTINTO.

Peasants smoking; after A. Ostade.

Dutch Boors regaling; after A. Brouwer.

The Tooth-drawer; after Teniers.

The School-master; after E. Hemskerk.

Heraclitus; after Cornelius Dusart.

[Nagler calls him Jacob, and gives an ample list of his works.]

GOLTZ, or GOLTZIUS, HUBERT. This eminent artist and learned antiquary was born at Venloo in 1520. He was the son of an obscure painter, who taught him the rudiments of design, and placed him under the tuition of Lambert Lombard of Liege. That painter had, during a long residence in Italy, made designs from the most celebrated remains of antiquity, which were given to Goltzius to copy. The constant study of these interesting objects excited in him a strong inclination to contemplate the source from which his instructor had drawn such admirable materials, and he resolved to visit Rome, where he resided several years. On his return from Italy, he settled at Bruges, where he published several works on antiquity, embellished with prints, in which he was assisted by Joseph Gietlinghen, of Courtray, who executed the wooden cuts. Of his works as a painter little is known. Van Mander commends a set of pictures by Hubert Goltzius, representing the history of the Golden Fleece, painted for the house of Austria. In 1563 he published his work, entitled C. Julius Cæsar, sive historia Imperatorum Cæsarum Romanorum, ex antiquis numismatibus restituta, liber primus, Huberto Goltzio, Herbipolita Vanloniano Auctore et Sculptore. Printed at Bruges, with forty-six copper-plates. In 1566 was published another work, entitled Pastor Magistram et Triumphorum Romanorum ab Urbe condita ad Augusti obitum, ex antiquis Monumentis restitutos, Hubertus Goltzius Herbipolita Venlovanus dedicavit. Printed at Bruges, with two hundred and thirty-four plates and wooden cuts. He died at Bruges in 1583.

GOLTZ, or GOLTZIUS, HENRY. This distinguished artist was born at Mulbrecht, in the duchy of Juliers, in 1558. His father was an eminent glass-painter, who instructed him in the first principles of the art; and he was taught engraving by Theodore Cuernbert. His progress was such, that he soon surpassed his master, who employed him to engrave some plates, and he executed several for Philip Galle. He afterwards travelled through Germany to Italy, where his studies were particularly directed to the works of Michael Angelo, Raffaëlle, and Polidoro da Caravaggio. A too vehement desire to imitate the sublime style of Buonaroti, led him frequently into an outrageous and extravagant design, which is not always compensated by the extraordinary excellence of his graver. He was perfectly master of the anatomy of the human figure, and drew the extremities with the greatest precision. There is occasionally an appearance of affectation, and a desire to display the unrestrained energy of his graver. His compositions are often eccentric, and the attitudes and movement of his figures strained and unnatural; but these defects are greatly recompensed by the uncommon beauty and freedom of his execution. His style is sometimes extremely neat and highly finished; at others, it is surprisingly bold, clear, and masterly. Nature seems to have endowed him with a faculty of appropriating his manner to the particular object he had to represent. During his residence at Rome, he engraved several plates after Raffaëlle, Polidoro, and others; and on his return to Holland he settled at Haerlem, where he engraved several plates from the principal Flemish and Dutch masters. He imitated with the greatest success the styles of Albert Durer, Lucas of Leyden, and the other admired old masters, which he has proved by a set of six large plates, called the Masterpieces of Goltzius, not because they are his best productions, but as showing how perfectly he could copy the particular manner of those artists whose works were held in higher estimation than his. Henry Goltzius had reached his forty-second year when he commenced painting. His first picture represented the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary and St. John, and it is commended by Van Mander for the excellence of the colouring, and the boldness of the design. From his having begun the practice of painting at so late a period of his life, his pictures cannot be supposed to be very numerous. Some of his works, in painting, are in the Imperial collection at Vienna; but he is much more distinguished as an engraver than a painter. His prints are very numerous, and they are highly esteemed by the intelligent collector. They amount to more than five hundred plates. He frequently marked his prints with the cipher IG.

The following list of his works comprises his principal plates, and their merit and variety will excuse our giving an ample detail of them.

PORTRAITS.

Henry Goltzius; inscribed, H. Goltzius Sculptor et Pictor.

Henry IV. King of France. 1592; oval; very scarce.

Frederick II. King of Denmark. 1588; oval.
 William, Prince of Orange, in Armour, with an emblematical border; H. Goltzius, fec.; fine.
 Charlotte de Bourbon, Princess of Orange; fine.
Theodoros Cornhertius ad vivum depictus et aeri incisus, ab H. Goltzius; very scarce.
 Gerbrand Adriaans Brederods; with an oval border of laurels; scarce.
Joannes Bollius, Mechliniensis pictor; in an ornamented border.
 John Stradan, painter.
 Philip Galle, engraver.
 Peter Forest, or Forestus, physician. 1586.
 Justus Lipsius; inscribed, Morbis antiquis. 1587.
 John Zurenus, holding a Book; after M. Hemskerk.
 M. de la Faille; inscribed, Leges tuæ; very highly finished.
 Madame de la Faille, with a Scull. 1589; the companion.
 Christopher Plantin, the printer.
 Frances D'Egmont, with her hand on a Scull; oval.
 Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. 1586; oval; fine and scarce.
 The portrait of S. Sovius, without his name; inscribed, Bene agere et nil timere. 1583; scarce.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Judah and Thamar; circular; supposed to be one of his earliest plates.
 The Life and Passion of our Saviour, in twelve plates, executed in the style of Albert Durer; H. Goltz, fec. 1597. There is a set of copies after these, in a stiff, formal style.
 Christ and the Apostles, in fourteen plates. 1598.
 Six large plates, known by the name of his Masterpieces. They are executed in the style of each of the masters he wished to imitate, and are as follow:
 The Annunciation; in the style of Raffaelle.
 The Visitation; in imitation of Parmegiano.
 The Annunciation; in the manner of Bassano.
 The Circumcision; in the style of Albert Durer.
 The Adoration of the Magi; in imitation of Lucas of Leyden.
 The Holy Family; in the manner of F. Baroccio.
 The Nativity; Jac. Matham, exc. 1615; extremely scarce; the plate is unfinished.
 The Adoration of the Magi; scarce.
 The Murder of the Innocents; C. Visscher, exc.; very scarce; the plate was not finished.
 The Repose in Egypt; H. Goltzius, fec. 1589.
 The Woman of Samaria; H. Goltzius, sc. et exc. 1589.
 The Wise Men's Offering; a curious composition; fine and scarce.
 The infant Jesus holding a globe, with a glory of Angels; H. Goltz, fec. 1597.
 The Temptation of St. Anthony.
 A Female Saint, holding a book; Matham, exc.; very scarce. Some parts of the plate are merely traced.
 A set of fifty-two plates for the Metamorphoses of Ovid; J. C. de Visscher excudit. It is supposed that Goltzius was greatly assisted by his scholars in these plates.
 A set of ten plates of Eight of the Heroes of ancient Rome, with the introduction and conclusion; H. Goltz. 1586. Engraved in a free, bold style, with fine backgrounds.
 Venus reclining against a Tree, holding a Bunch of Grapes, whilst Cupid presents her a handful of Corn; inscribed, Sine Cerere et Baccho, friget Venus; a circular plate, of a most finished and beautiful execution.
 Three plates; Bacchus, Venus, and Ceres; dedicated to Cornelius van Haerlem.
 Three, of Juno, Minerva, and Venus; ovals. 1596.
 Mars and Venus. 1585.
 Three; Jupiter and Juno, Neptune and Amphitrite, and Pluto and Proserpine.
 Pygmalion and his Statue; inscribed, Sculpsit.—Marita est. 1593. Jo. Jansomius, exc.
 Mercury and Argus; a small plate, very scarce.
 Nine, of the Muses; each with four verses; dedicated to John Sadeler. 1592.
 Three, of the Graces.
 The Three Fates; in circular plates.
 The Apollo of Belvidere, with the Portrait of the Designer, in half-length; inscribed, Apollo Pythius, &c.
 The Hercules Commodus; inscribed, Hercules AÆZIKAKOÏS inscriptus, &c., with four Latin verses.

The Farnesian Hercules; inscribed Hercules Victor, &c., with four Latin verses and two figures.

The three last-mentioned prints, after the famous antique statues, are executed with surprising beauty and energy.

Hercules holding his Club; in the back-ground are represented his labours. 1589.

In this plate Goltzius has overcharged the outline of the figure in the most barbarous manner, the parts are scattered, and the whole is without effect.

The Judgment of Midas. 1590.

The seven Cardinal Virtues; Faith, Hope, Charity, Justice, Prudence, Fortitude, and Temperance; in seven plates.

Three fine plates, of Diligence, Patience, and Wisdom; personified by female figures.

Labour and Diligence; represented by a male and a female figure. 1580; scarce.

An emblematical subject of Christian Prudence, in a female figure, richly clothed; inscribed, Astu serpentes, et simplicitate columbas: small circular, highly finished and scarce.

The Blind leading the Blind; circular; the same.

The Chariot of War; an immense composition; Henricus Goltzius, fecit. Joan. Galle, exc.; very scarce.

The Boy and Dog. The Boy is supposed to be the portrait of the son of Theodore Frisius, a painter of Venice, to whom he dedicated the print. It is considered one of his finest plates.

Corydon and Silvia; a pastoral; fine and scarce.

A Mountainous Landscape, with the story of Dedalus and Icarus; an etching.

WOODEN CUTS AFTER HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A Landscape, with a Cottage, and a Woman drawing Water from a Well.

A Landscape on the sea-coast, with a large Rock, and a Hermit kneeling.

A pastoral Landscape, with a Shepherd and Shepherdess.

A Warrior, with a Helmet and a Spear; half-length.

Hercules slaying Caucas.

A set of seven, of the Heathen Divinities; fine.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS ITALIAN MASTERS.

St. Joachim; after Raffaelle.

The Triumph of Galatea; after the same.

Eight plates of the Heathen Divinities; in niches; after the paintings by Polidoro da Caravaggio, in the Quirinal.

Two Shyls; after the same.

The Last Supper; after Paolo Veronese. 1585.

The Marriage at Cana; after G. Salviati; in two sheets.

St. Jerome in the Desert, in meditation; after Palma; fine.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS FLEMISH AND GERMAN MASTERS.

The Fall of Adam and Eve; after B. Spranger. 1585.

The dead Christ supported by an Angel; after the same.

The Banquet of the Gods on the Marriage of Cupid and Psyche; in three sheets; after B. Spranger.

The Venetian Ball; after Theodore Bernard; in two sheets.

The Dragon devouring the Companions of Cadmus; after Cornelius van Haerlem. 1588.

The dead Christ, with the Four Evangelists at the Tomb; after A. Blocklandt.

[For a still more ample catalogue of his works, consult the industrious Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon.]

GOLTZIUS, JULIUS. This engraver was probably of the same family as the two foregoing artists, and flourished about the year 1580. From the style of his plates, it is thought he was a pupil of the Galle. His drawing is incorrect, and his execution is tasteless and poor. The following are by him:

The good and bad Shepherd; a set of middle-sized plates; after Martin de Vos.

Christ appearing to Magdalene; after Fed. Zucchero.

Part of the plates for a book, entitled Habitus Variorum Orbis Gentium; by Joan. Jac. Boissard. 1581.

[GOMEZ, JUAN, a Spanish historical painter in the service of Philip II. in 1593. He painted the large picture of the Martyrdom of S. Ursula and her companions, which was designed and traced by Pellegrino Tibaldi to supply the place of the same subject by L. Cambiasi, which had been removed to the old church of the Escorial. He also painted several subjects from the Life of S. Jerome. He restored the Annunciation, and the S. Jerome penitent, by F. Zuccherò, which Philip had rejected, and ordered to be retouched. He died in 1597.]

GOMEZ, SEBASTIANO, called EL MULATO DE MURILLO. This extraordinary personage was a Mulatta servant to the celebrated Murillo. From the opportunities he had of witnessing the exercise of the admirable talents of his master, he conceived an affection for the art, and passed his leisure time in humble efforts to acquire some proficiency in it, and his endeavours were by no means fruitless. After the death of Murillo, in 1685, he painted some pictures for the churches and convents at Seville. In the portico of the convent of the Mercenarios Descalzos, there is a painting by him of the Virgin and infant Christ; and at the Capuchins, our Saviour bound to the Pillar. There are several other works by him at Seville.

GOMEZ, VICENTE SALVADOR, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia about the year 1645. He was a scholar of Jacinto Geronimo de Espinosa, and discovered such extraordinary juvenile powers, that before he was fifteen years of age, he executed some considerable works in fresco, of subjects from the Life of St. Ignatius, which equally satisfied and surprised his employers. His talents were not confined to historical painting; he was equally successful in landscapes, animals, and architectural views. He is said to have been the founder of an academy of artists at Valencia. [He was director in 1670, of the Academy of Valentinian Artists, held in the convent of Saint Dominic in that city. He died about the end of the 17th century.]

GONZALEZ. See COCQUES.

GONZALEZ, BARTOLOME, was born at Valladolid in 1564, but he visited Madrid when young, and became a scholar of Patricio Caxes. He painted history and portraits, and was employed by Philip III. to paint the portraits of different branches of the Austrian family, for the palace of the Pardo. On the death of Castello he was made painter to the king. There are many of his works in the Escorial, at Valladolid, and at Burgos. Of his historical works, the principal are the angles in the church of the Augustines at Madrid; and an allegorical subject representing the Arts, in the royal collection. He died at Madrid in 1627.

GONZALEZ DE VEGA, DON DIEGO. This painter was born at Madrid in 1622, and was a scholar of Francisco Ricci, whose style he followed. There are many of his works in the public edifices at Madrid, and some of his easel pictures in the private collections. In the cloister of the Franciscans are several pictures by him of the Life and Passion of our Saviour; and in the convent of the Religiosas Mercenarias, are some subjects from the Life of the Virgin. The works of this master are commended by Palomino for a grand style of design, and an excellent colour. He died at Madrid in 1697.

GONZALEZ, DON PEDRO RUIZ, was born at Madrid in 1633, and was brought up in the school of Antonio Escalante. He did not, however, attach himself to the style of that master, preferring the bolder manner of Don Juan Carreño. He painted several pictures for the public edifices at Madrid, which gained him great reputation, of which a particular account is given by Palomino. His most admired works are his picture of the Nativity, in the church of San Justo at Madrid; and the Death of St. Joseph, in the Lado de la Epistola. Palomino, perhaps with an excusable partiality for his compatriot, compares his picture of Christ before Pilate, to the works of Paolo Veronese; and his Entombing of our Saviour, to Titian. He died at Madrid in 1709.

GONZALEZ, JUAN GIACCHINETTI, called IL BORGOGNONE DALLE TESTE, a Spanish portrait painter, born at Madrid in 1630. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but by the evidence of his style, it is probable his best studies were from the works of Titian. He particularly excelled in portrait painting, and from his extraordinary talent in that branch, acquired the name of Il Borgognone dalle Teste. About the middle of his life he went to Italy, and painted many portraits at Brescia and Bergamo, at which latter city he died in 1696.

GOOL, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter and writer on art, who resided at Amsterdam about the year 1750. He painted landscapes, with cattle, in which he attempted to follow the fine style of Paul Potter, but it is a very humble imitation. His drawing of the animals is not very incorrect, and his pencilling is neat and clean; but he is greatly deficient in the admirable expression of truth and nature, as well as in the spirited and exquisite touch, which distinguish the works of his celebrated model. In 1751 and 1752, he published a continuation of the Lives of the Dutch Painters, from the period at which Houbraken left it, in two volumes octavo, with portraits. [John Van Gool, the author of the Lives of the Dutch Painters, as a supplement to Houbraken, was born at the Hague in 1685. He was a scholar of Terwesten and Simon Vander Does. He painted landscapes and cattle, which are attractive in design and colour, but are not admissible into collections that can boast of Paul Potter, Berghem, or Karil du Jardin. In fact, Van Gool, for his peculiar manner, stands alone; his pictures are objects of admiration for the uninitiated in art, but will never obtain the approbation of the instructed. He died at the Hague in 1763.]

GOTTI, VINCENTIO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and was a scholar of Denis Calvart at the time that Guido Reni studied under that master. When he was twenty years of age he went to Rome, in company with Guido, where he painted some pictures. He was invited to the court of Naples, where he passed the remainder of his life. This painter possessed so ready an invention, and such surprising facility, that Orlandi states, from a list of his works, found after his death, that he had painted no fewer than two hundred and eighteen pictures for public situations, in the different towns of the kingdom of Naples. He died in 1636.

GOUAZ, YVES LE, a French engraver, born at Brest in 1742. He went young to Paris, where he became a pupil of J. Aliamet; and was afterwards instructed by Nicholas Ozanne. We have by him a great many plates of views of the sea-ports of France, after the designs of Ozanne, and other subjects. Among which are the following:

- Three Views of the Ports of Toulon, Brest, and Rouen; Nic. Ozanne, del. Yves le Gouaz, fec.
- The Port of Antibes; the same inscription.
- A View of the Port and Gulf of Calvi, in Corsica; after La Croix.
- A View of the Port of St. Lawrence; after the same.

A Sea-storm; after Bon. Peters.

Two Views of the Environs of Candebeac, in Normandy; after Philip Hackert.

[GOVAERTS, JEAN BAPTISTE, of Antwerp, painted figures, fruit, and flowers. There is a picture by him in the Musée, representing an assembly of the fraternity of Cross-bowmen. He died in 1746.]

[GOUDA, CORNELIUS VAN, was born at Gouda in 1510, and was a scholar of Martin Heemskirk, whose manner he followed. He died in 1550.]

GOUDT, HENRY, COUNT DE. This distinguished amateur artist was of a noble family of Holland, and a Count of the Palatinate. He was born at Utrecht in 1585. A passionate inclination for the art led him to an early application to drawing, and when he was young he went to Rome, in search of improvement. Arrived in that capital, he was one of the most assiduous students of his time, and daily frequented the academy, to design after the model. He contracted an intimacy with Adam Elsheimer; and, as it is noticed in the Life of that painter, he became his most liberal benefactor. He purchased some of the most finished works by Elsheimer, which he has engraved in a style peculiar to himself, which is perhaps better adapted to express the polished finishing and the admirable effect of chiaro-scuro of the originals, than any other that could have been adopted. His plates are wrought entirely with the graver, and their extraordinary effect is produced, not in the usual mode of deepening and strengthening the stroke, but by delicately crossing and recrossing them several times in the shadows. Though his plates are finished with the most extraordinary precision, there appears a surprisingly free and dexterous handling of the graver. There is a fine expression in the heads, and his figures are correctly drawn. The plates of Count Goudt have been so judiciously described by Mr. Strutt, that it has been judged proper to quote that author precisely on this occasion. The following are the seven prints by him, after Adam Elsheimer:

Ceres drinking from a Pitcher. An old woman appears holding a candle at the door of a cottage, and a boy naked standing by her, is laughing and pointing at the goddess, for which contempt he was metamorphosed into a frog. The powerful and striking effect of this engraving cannot be properly described. The very deep shadows are perhaps rather too sudden upon the strong lights in some few instances; but in the fine impressions this is by no means so conspicuous as in those after the plate had been retouched. This print was well copied by Hollar, who, with the point only, has given us all the effect, though not the neatness, of the original. It is distinguished by the name of the Sorcery.

The Flight into Egypt; a night scene, in which the moon and stars are introduced with great success.

The Angel with Tobit; who is drawing a fish by his side. The back-ground is a landscape; the weeds in the foreground, and the branches of the trees in front, as well as the foliage and weeds hanging from them, are beautifully expressed. He fails most in those parts where the graver alone is by no means equal to the undertaking, namely, the distant woods and assemblage of trees, which graduate one from the other, and require that freedom of determination which the point only can give: when executed with the graver, they always appear flat and heavy.

The Angel with Tobit crossing a stream of water; Tobit holds the fish under his arm. The back-ground is a landscape. Hollar has copied this print with much success.

Baucis and Philemon entertaining Jupiter and Mercury; a small plate, nearly square.

Aurora representing the Dawn of Day; a small landscape. The effect is very beautiful.

The Beheading of St. John in Prison; a very small oval print, which is by far the rarest.

[GOVERT, ———, a painter of landscapes with humorous figures; he lived at Amsterdam at the early part or middle of the 17th century.]

[GOVERTZ, THEODORE, a portrait painter of Utrecht, was the master of H. Verschuring and T. Camphuysen. He lived about the middle of the 17th century.]

GOUPY, JOSEPH, a French painter and engraver, born at Nevers in 1729. He came to England when he was young, where he resided the remainder of his life. He excelled in painting landscapes in water-colours, which he treated with great spirit and intelligence. His pictures in the style of Salvator Rosa have considerable merit. J. Goupy has etched several plates in a very spirited and masterly style, some of which are from his own designs. Among others, we have the following by him:

Mutius Scevola burning his hand before Porsenna; from his own design.

St. Philip baptizing the Eunuch; after Salvator Rosa.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after Salvator Rosa.

The Vocation of St. Andrew to the Apostleship, in a landscape; after P. da Cortona.

A grand Landscape, with the story of Pyramus and Thisbe; after N. Poussin.

A View of Castel Gandolfo, and of the Campagna near Rome; after Bolognese.

A set of eight Landscapes; after Sal. Rosa.

He died in London in 1763.

GOVRAND. See GOVRAND.

GOURMONT, a French engraver, mentioned by Mr. Strutt, from his name being affixed to a portrait of Charles, Duke of Bourbon. He is supposed to have worked chiefly for the decoration of books.

GOUSBLOOM, an obscure Dutch engraver, by whom we have a portrait of Leonard Vander Gocs.

GOUWEN, G. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, a native of Amsterdam, who flourished about the year 1716. We have an indifferent set of prints for the Bible, published in that city in 1720, after the designs of Picart and others. He also engraved some ornamental frontispieces, and other works, for the booksellers.

GOYEN, JOHN VAN. This painter was born at Leyden in 1596. His family was in easy circumstances; and his father, Joseph van Goyen, being a lover of the art, encouraged the propensity he discovered in his son, and placed him under the care of a landscape painter, named Schilperoot, with whom he passed some time. He afterwards became a scholar of John Nicolaï, and ultimately studied under Esais Vandevelde, of Haerlem. His progress was extraordinary, and he acquired a facility of operation that has produced a greater number of pictures and drawings than any artist of his prolific country. The pictures of Van Goyen represent landscapes, and views in Holland of the banks of rivers, with boats, full of figures, very neatly drawn; and in the distance he generally introduced a small town or village. His pencil is surprisingly light and spirited; and though he appears to have been little attentive to depth and richness of colouring, his pictures please from his charming facility of touch. The works of this painter are extremely unequal; some of them are finished with care, and are held in considerable estimation; but many of them are the productions of negligence and haste, and are little more than sketches. We have a few small etchings of landscapes by Van Goyen, executed in a spirited and masterly style. He died at the Hague in 1656.

GOYRAND, CLAUDE, a French engraver, born at Sens about the year 1634. He resided some time at Rome, as appears from the inscription on one of his plates. We have by this artist a variety of neat and spirited etchings, after Callot, Della Bella, &c., of landscapes and views, of which the following are the principal:

A set of twenty Landscapes, &c.; after Callot; published by Israel, dedicated to M. de Crenan.

A set of four Views; the Castle of Bissetre, the Invalids, the Ruins of an old Tower, and the Fountain in the Garden of Tivoli.

Four Landscapes; after de la Bella.

Eight Views in Paris and the environs; after the same; Goyrand, fecit; Israel, exc. 1645.

The Chapel of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome; after the same.

A small Head, with an ornamental border; inscribed, Cl. Goyrand Gall. sculpsit Rome; worked with the graver.

GOZZOLI, BENNOZZO. This painter was born at Florence in 1400. He was a disciple of Fra Giovanni da Fiesole, called Angelico. His style, however, rather resembles that of Masaccio, whom he surpassed in the grandeur of his architecture, the beauty of his landscape, and in the tasteful arrangement of his compositions. In the chapel of the Palazzo Riccardi at Florence are two pictures by Gozzoli, of the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, in which he has introduced a profusion of gilding and embroidery, that is perhaps unexampled in fresco painting, and which false taste he had afterwards the judgment to relinquish. He resided the remainder of his life at Pisa, where he executed several works in a superior style to that which he had exhibited at Florence, and in which he exploded the tinsel gaudiness and minute ornaments which load his earlier productions. His S. Tommaso d'Aquina in the dome, is highly commended by Vasari; but above all, Lanzi extols his numerous pictures of Scriptural subjects in the Campo Santo, completed in two years. In these he shows a grandeur of composition, an ingenious variety in his forms, a verity of individual representation, a clearness and brilliancy of colour, and an affecting expression in the heads, that rank him superior to every artist of his time; perhaps with the exception of Masaccio. Near to these, his principal works, is erected his monument; raised by the city as a grateful tribute to his memory and his talents. He died in 1478.

[GRAAF, JOHN, was born at Vienna in 1680, and was a scholar of Van Alen. He painted fairs and market-places, horses, and other animals. His pictures are well grouped and designed, and touched with spirit. He was also a good landscape painter. He died at Vienna in 1734.]

[GRAAF, or GRAVE, JOSHUA, a painter of landscapes and views of cities; he also painted fortified places and encampments. He lived at the end of the 17th century, and was an officer in the service of Holland.]

[GRAAF, or GRAVE, TIMOTHY DE, a landscape painter. Neither the date of his birth or his death is recorded; but he was the master of Jacob Appel, at Amsterdam. The Sale Catalogues of Hoet and Terwesten mention many pictures of this artist, particularly of landscapes and views in the vicinity of Amsterdam.]

GRAAT, BARENT, or BERNARD, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1628. Whilst he was very young he was placed under the care of his uncle, a reputable painter of landscapes and animals. His application to his studies was exemplary, and his progress was commensurate with his industry. The pictures of Peter de Laer, called Bamboccio, were then in the highest estimation, and he applied himself to study and imitate the style of that master, in which he was so successful, that some of his pictures were mistaken for those of Bamboccio. The landscapes of Graat exhibit very pleasing scenery, and the figures and animals with which he embellished them are correctly drawn and touched with great spirit, particularly his sheep and goats, in which he excelled. The success he met with in that branch of the art inspired him with the ambition of distinguishing himself in the higher walk of historical painting, and he was not unsuccessful in his attempt. To perfect himself in the design of the figure, he established a kind of school or academy in his house, where his contemporary artists and himself occupied themselves in drawing after the model. The Dutch biographers speak highly of his talents in historical painting, and particularly commend a picture he painted for the Council-chamber at Amsterdam, representing Time discovering Truth. Another admired picture by him was David and Bathsheba. He also painted portraits with great success. He died at Amsterdam in 1709. [His cabinet pictures of interiors and conversations are of a very pleasing character; the figures are well grouped, and selected from the better class of persons, whose habits may be considered as favourable specimens of the fashion of the times. His colouring is, in general, subdued in tone, but in perfect harmony with his subject.]

GRAAW. See GRAUW.

GRADO, FRANCESCO DE, an Italian engraver, who resided chiefly at Naples, and flourished about 1690. He engraved the plates of the illustrious personages published at Naples in 1693, and executed part of the portraits for Bellori's Lives of the Painters, &c. He worked with the graver in a formal, tasteless style.

GRAFFICO, CAMILLO. This artist was a native of Friuli, and flourished about the year 1588. He engraved several plates of devout subjects, among which is one representing the Holy Family, in which the Virgin is suckling the infant Jesus, after Bernardino Passari. He worked entirely with the graver, in a style resembling that of Cornelius Cort, but very inferior.

GRAMMATICA, ANTIVEDUTO. According to Baghione, this painter was born at a village in the neighbourhood of Rome in 1571. He was a disciple of Domenico Perugino, and proved a very reputable painter of history. Several of his works were placed with distinction in the public edifices at Rome. In the church of S. Maria in Trastevere, there is a picture of the Virgin and Infant in the clouds with Angels, and below S. Giacinto; and in S. Giacomo degl' Incurabili, a fine picture of the Nativity, with the Adoration of the Shepherds. His talents had raised him to the presidency of the Academy of St. Luke, of which distinction he was deprived, on account of a nefarious attempt to dispose of a picture by Raffaele belonging to the Academy, and to substitute a copy he had made of it, in its place. He did not long survive this disgrace, and died at Rome in 1626.

[GRAN, DANIEL, an historical painter, born at Vienna in 1694, died at Pölsen in 1757. His pictures ornament several public buildings in his native city, and he was of some consideration in his time, but his works are not known out of Germany.]

born at Florence in 1477, and was a fellow student with Michael Angelo Buonaroti, under Domenico Ghirlandajo. He lived in habits of intimacy with that sublime artist, to whose friendship and counsel he was indebted for a great share of the ability he unquestionably possessed. He was the companion of his studies in the Medicean Museum, founded by Lorenzo de Medici, in the garden of S. Marco; and had the advantage of studying from his cartoons, by which he aggrandized his style, and made rapid strides towards the great principles established by Buonaroti. Of this he has given proof in his picture of S. Zannobi and S. Francesco, with the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds; but still more in his Assumption, in S. Pier. Maggiore, in which the figure of St. Thomas is entirely in the great gusto of Michael Angelo. He died in 1544. [A print in Rosini (plate 134) will give an idea of the grand style of the artist. The action, expression, and pose of the figures are noble and true.]

GRAND, LE, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1750. He was chiefly employed in vignettes and other decorations of books, many of which were after the designs of Gravelot, Eisen, and others. He engraved a set of plates for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published at Paris. We have also by him some large plates of ruins, neatly executed, but with little taste.

GRANDHOMME, or GRANTHOMME, JAMES, a German engraver, born at Heidelberg, and flourished about the year 1600. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Theodore de Bry. We have several plates by him, engraved in a neat, stiff style, without taste. His best prints are his portraits, which possess considerable merit. He worked entirely with the graver. He usually marked his plates with one of these ciphers, G or GF. The following are his principal prints:

The Portraits of the Doctors and Reformers of the Church; or, as they are styled, the Heresiarch; after a painter whose initials are J. M. F.

The infant Dauphin strangling a Serpent. 1601.

Adam and Eve.

The Portrait of Henry Smetius.

The Death of Adonis.

Venus and Adonis.

The Murder of the Innocents.

The Apostles; twelve small prints; after his own designs.

The Rape of Helen; copied from the print by Marc Antonio, after Raffaele.

GRANDI, ERCOLE, called ERCOLE DA FERRARA. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1491, and was a disciple of Lorenzo Costa, whom he surpassed, and was one of the most reputable artists of his time. In the church of S. Paolo at Ferrara, is a picture by him, representing St. Sebastian, St. Peter, and St. John Evangelist, painted in the style of Pietro Perugino, and in no way inferior to that master. His principal works were his fresco paintings of the Life of St. Peter, in the Garganelli chapel, in S. Pietro Martyre, at Bologna, which occupied him seven years, and have been demolished with the chapel. In S. Lucia at Ferrara, is preserved a fine picture by E. Grandi, of the Holy Trinity. He died in 1531. [Three of the pictures painted in the Garganelli chapel were preserved when it was taken down, many years ago, and were placed in the Tanara palace; these were afterwards brought to England by Mr. Edward Solly. They induce a very poor opinion of the painter.]

[GRANET, FRANÇOIS MARIUS, a French painter of interiors, was born at Aix en Provence in 1774, and received his first instructions from a painter of the name of Constantine in that city. He afterwards entered the school of David at Paris. He made his first exhibition of three interiors of subterraneous chapels in 1800; and continued to exhibit till 1829. His style is peculiar, and may be termed Dioramic painting in small; the effects are surprising. There is a fine specimen of his manner in the Royal Collection of England, which cost about £800 sterling. He was living in 1833.]

GRANGES, D. DES, an obscure artist, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of some very indifferent frontispieces and book-plates; among others, the ornamental title to a book, called Bethel, or a Form for Families. 1634.

GRANÒ. See GANDINI.

GRANVILLE, ———, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved landscapes; among which we have some plates from the pictures of Thomas Smith of Derby.

[GRASDORP, WILLIAM, a painter of fruit and flowers, was a scholar of Ernst Stuken in 1710; he resided at Amsterdam. His pictures are held in great estimation, and are to be found in some of the finest private collections in Holland.]

GRASSI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Udine, and flourished about the year 1568. According to Vasari, he was a disciple of Gio. Antonio Licinio, called Il Pordenone; but Lanzi thinks it more probable that he was brought up in the school of Titian, to whose style his best works bear a strong resemblance. Such are his pictures in the cathedral at Gemona, representing the Annunciation, the Vision of Ezechiel, and Elijah taken up into Heaven.

GRATELLA. See FILIPPI.

GRATI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was born at Bologna in 1681, and was a scholar of Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole. He is commended by Crespi for the accuracy of his design and the elegance of his compositions. There are several of his pictures in the churches at Bologna, of which the most esteemed are the Virgin and Infant, with S. Francesco, S. Giuseppe, and S. Gaetano, with a glory of Angels, in S. Maria Inconronata; and St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read, in S. Giacomo Maggiore. He died in 1758.

GRAVELOT, HENRY, a French designer and engraver, who resided chiefly in England, whither he was invited in 1733, by Claude du Bosc, to assist him in the plates for the Religious Ceremonies, which he published in English, copied from Picart. He was an excellent draughtsman, and drew designs for ornaments, ancient buildings, monuments, &c., with great taste. He etched several plates for books; among which were those for Sir Thomas Hanmer's edition of Shakspeare, some of which were from his own designs, and others after Francis Hayman. He also engraved the plates for Theobald's Shakspeare, from his own designs. His best plate is his large print of Kirkstall Abbey, which is a fine specimen of his abilities. He died at Paris in 1773.

GRAUW, HENRY, a Dutch painter of history, born at Hoorn, in North Holland, in 1627, and was successively the scholar of Peter Grebber and Jacob van Kampen the younger. On leaving those masters, he was employed by Prince Maurice of Nassau, to paint four frescos in the cupola of the Palace in the Wood, which established his reputation as one of the most promising artists of his time. Ambitious of improvement, and elated with the description he had heard of the wonders of Italy, he resolved to visit that country, and in 1648 he embarked for Leghorn, and made the best of his way to Rome. The celebrated remains of antiquity, and the admirable productions of modern art, which presented themselves to his view on every side, astonished and delighted him. For three years he was assiduously employed in designing, after the objects most worthy of his contemplation; and he returned to Holland with an ample store of materials for his future studies. On his establishing himself at Amsterdam, he was loaded with commissions, so anxious were his countrymen to witness the improvement of a talent which had appeared to them so promising, nurtured and refined by the advantages of travel. He painted for the family of Bronckhorst a series of historical and fabulous subjects, of which two were particularly admired, representing the Triumph of Julius Cæsar, and the Education of Bacchus. His compositions are grand and noble, his design is correct, evincing nothing of the taste of his country, and he was an excellent colourist. He resided chiefly at Amsterdam and Utrecht, universally esteemed, and enriched by the exercise of his respectable talents. He died in 1682. [Balkema says in 1684.]

GRAY, an English engraver, of little celebrity, by whom there is a set of plates of views, engraved for a work entitled Thirty different Draughts of Guinea, by William Smith, Surveyor to the Royal African Company of England, &c. There is a frontispiece to the work, representing an Elephant, which is very freely etched, in the style of Hollar, very superior to the plates by Gray.

GRAZIA, LIONARDO. See PISTOJA.

GRAZIANI, ERCOLE. This painter was born at Bologna in 1688, and was brought up in the school of Donato Creti, whose style he improved by a grander character of design, a more harmonious colouring, and a greater freedom of hand. His powers approximate to those of Marc Antonio Franceschini and others, that issued from the school of Cignani. He was an artist of unusual assiduity, and painted a prodigious number of pictures for the public edifices at Bologna and Piacenza. The churches at Bologna abound with his works, of which the most esteemed is his celebrated picture of St. Peter consecrating S. Apollinare amidst an assemblage of the primitive Christians. The Cardinal Lambertini, on being made Pope, commissioned him to paint a duplicate of this fine picture for the church of S. Apollinare at Rome. In the same church is his Baptism of Christ by St. John. In S. Bartolomeo di Reno, are two admired pictures by him of the Marriage of St. Catherine, and St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read. In la Purità, is the Ascension; and in la Madonna delle Rondini, the Annunciation, one of his most celebrated works. He died in 1765.

GRAZZINI, GIOVANNI PAOLO, was a native of Ferrara, about the year 1570, and passed the first and greater part of his life in the business of a goldsmith. He had learned the rudiments of design, as was at that time usual with those of his profession, and living in habits of intimacy with Carlo Bonone, the celebrity acquired by his friend prompted him to make an essay of his powers in painting, though he had already passed the prime of his life. His first public performance, which occupied him eight years, was a picture of S. Eligio, Bishop of Nojon, which Lanzi says was painted for the Scuola degli Orefici. Barotti, in his description of Ferrara, places it in the church of S. Giuliano, and adds, that Carlo Bonone embellished it with four angels at the corners, in chiaro-scuro, and that Scarsellino environed it with nine small pictures of the principal actions of the saint. He also painted several easel pictures, which were esteemed by his fellow citizens for their merit, and the singular story of the painter. He died in 1632.

[GREBBER, FRANÇOIS PIETERSZ DE, was born at Haerlem in 1579; he was a scholar of Roland Savery, and painted both in large and small. He also made copies of his master's works and those of Brehngel de Velours. He died in 1636.]

GREBBER, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about the year 1590. He was the son of an obscure artist, named Francis Peter Grebber, who instructed him in the elements of design; but he afterwards became a scholar of Henry Goltzius. He painted history and portraits; and there is a grandeur in his style which partakes of that of his master. He chiefly painted easel pictures, of which there are many in the collections in Holland, particularly at Haerlem. He had a sister, MARIA GREBBER, who excelled in painting perspective and architectural views. By Peter Grebber we have a spirited etching, in the style of Rembrandt, of Christ and the Woman of Samaria. [Peter Grebber, according to Nagler and Balkema, was born in 1600. There are several other engravings by him, one of which is dated 1655; it is supposed that he died in the following year. Immerzeel calls him Pieter Franz de Grebber.]

GRECCHI, MARC ANTONIO. This painter was a native of Siena, and flourished about the year 1634, as appears from a picture by him, mentioned by Lanzi, in a church at Poligno, representing the Holy Family, signed with his name, and the above date. It is painted in a chaste, expressive, and correct style, resembling rather the Bolognese taste of Tiarini, than any of the Sienese painters.

GRECHE, DOMENICO DELLE, or DOMENICO TEOSCOPOLI, called IL GRECO. According to Palomino, this painter was a Greek, and a disciple of Titian, whom he accompanied to Madrid, whither he was invited by the Emperor Charles V. The works of this artist are almost entirely confined to Spain, where he passed the greatest part of his life. His best productions are those he painted in imitation of his master, though he occasionally attempted an originality of style, in which he was totally unsuccessful. When he departs from the principles of Titian, he sinks into an extravagance of composition, with so impoverished a mode, both of drawing and colouring, that he no longer appears the same painter. Such are his pictures in the convent of Donna Maria of Arragon at Madrid, and the Martyrdom of San Mauricio in the Escorial. Contrasted with these are his fine pictures in the cathedral at Toledo, particularly a grand composition of the partition of our Saviour's Raiment before his Crucifixion, painted entirely in the style of Titian, and but little inferior. A very capital picture by this master is in the parochial church of San Thome at Toledo, representing the Burial of Don Gonzalo Ruiz, with St. Augustine and St. Stephen placing the Body in the Tomb, considered his most celebrated work. Domenico delle Greche executed some fine wooden cuts, after the designs of Titian. Palomino states him to have died at Madrid in 1625, aged 77.

GRECHETTO. See CASTIGLIONE.

GREFF, JEROME, a German engraver, who was a native of Franckfort, and flourished about the year 1520. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Albert Durer; but this conjecture probably arose from his having copied some of the wooden cuts of that artist with great exactness. We have by him the wooden cuts of the Apocalypse of St. John, copied from Albert Durer, the same size as the originals, very finely executed. He usually marked his prints with the cipher JM. [He is also called Jerome von Frankfort. He published some wood cuts in 1502.]

GREEN, JOHN, an English engraver, a native of Shropshire, who flourished about the year 1758. He was a pupil of J. Basire, and engraved several plates of landscapes and views, and a few portraits. He also executed the plates for Borlase's Antiquities of Cornwall. He engraved the Almanacks of the University of Oxford for some time. Among other portraits, we have the following by him :

Thomas Rowney, M. P.
Thomas Shaw, D. D. Master of Edmund Hall, Oxon.
William Derham, D. D. Canon of Windsor.

GREEN, VALENTINE. This much respected and venerable artist has lately ended a long life, chequered indeed by the vicissitudes of success and adversity, but always distinguished by honourable feeling and an assiduous exercise of his eminent talents. Mr. Green was born in Warwickshire in 1739, and was intended by his father for the profession of the law, for which purpose he was placed under a respectable practitioner at Eusham, in Worcestershire, with whom he passed two years; but having a taste for drawing, he abandoned his office, and, without his father's concurrence, became a pupil to an obscure line-engraver at Worcester. His progress in that branch of engraving not succeeding to his wishes, he came to London in 1765, where he turned his thoughts to scraping in mezzotint, and, without the aid of an instructor, arrived at a perfection which has seldom been equalled. Mr. Green participates with Mac Ardell and Earlom the merit of being the first artists who gave consequence and variety to the particular mode of engraving to which they devoted themselves; and it is due to Mr. Green to remark, that his celebrated prints of Hannibal and Regulus, after the pictures by Mr. West in the royal collection, were the first plates of equal magnitude and importance that had appeared. These were succeeded by several others of similar consideration, which will ever rank among the ablest and most energetic efforts of mezzotint. This indefatigable artist, by his unremitting exertions during a period of upwards of forty years, has produced nearly four hundred plates, engraved from the most celebrated painters, ancient and modern. In 1789 Mr. Green obtained a patent from the Duke of Bavaria of the exclusive privilege of engraving and publishing prints from the pictures in the Dusseldorf Gallery; and in the year 1795, had published twenty-two prints of that collection. The enterprise promised to remunerate him amply for so spirited an undertaking, but unfortunately, during the siege of that city by the French in 1798, the castle and gallery were laid in ruins, and a very valuable property belonging to him was destroyed. Other speculations, flattering in their outset, were lost to him by the overwhelming eruption of the French Revolution, of which Mr. Green thus became one of the innumerable victims. In 1767 he was elected a member of the Incorporated Society of Artists of Great Britain; and in 1774 one of the six associate engravers of the Royal Academy. On the foundation of the British Institution he was appointed Keeper; and it will be allowed that his zealous exertions to promote the purposes of the establishment, and the urbanity of his manners to the public and the artists, were exemplary. Mr. Green died in July, 1813. The merit of his works, and the importance of their subjects, will authorize our giving an ample list of them.

GREENHILL, JOHN, an English portrait painter, born at Salisbury in 1649. He was one of the ablest scholars of Sir Peter Lely, and before he was twenty copied Vandyck's picture of Killigrew and his Dog so well, as to be mistaken for the original. His heads in crayons were much admired; and he appears to have been more employed in that way than in oil. He would probably have reached an eminent rank in the art, but he fell a victim, in the prime of life, to an intemperate and dissolute course of life. He etched a portrait of his brother, Henry Greenhill, the mathematician, with a sphere. He died in 1676.

GREENWOOD, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1780. He scraped some plates of portraits and other subjects, and etched some landscapes. We have by him, among others, the following :

PORTRAITS.

Simon Fokke, Dutch engraver; after J. Buys.
John Wesley; after N. Hone.
George Whitefield; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Christ, with Nicodemus; after Rembrandt.

An old Woman; after Van den Eeckhout.
The happy Family; after Van Harp.
The good Friends; after Teniers.
A Dutch Woman, with a Parrot; after G. Metsu.

GREGORI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, born at Florence in 1719. He was instructed in engraving by Jacob Frey at Rome, and has executed several plates, of which the principal are those after the paintings by Bernardino Barbatelli, called Poccetti, in the chapel of S. Neri at Florence. He also engraved several plates for the Museo Fiorentino; as well as many after the pictures, &c. in the collection of the Marquis Gerini, and several portraits. Among others, we have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

Francis Mary, Grand Duke of Tuscany; after Campiglia.
Eleonora Vincentina, of Gonzaga, his spouse; after the same.
Sebastian Bombelli; after a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Image of the Virgin; after a design by Fratta.
St. Catherine; after Bartolozzi.
Fourteen plates of the life of S. Neri; after Bernardino Barbatelli, called Poccetti.
The Marys at the Sepulchre; after Raffaele.

[Nagler states that he died in 1759, and gives a good list of his works.]

GREGORI, FERDINANDO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Florence in 1743. After receiving some instruction in engraving from his father, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of G. Wille. On his return to Florence, he engraved several plates, which possess considerable merit, of which the following are the principal :

The Portrait of Carlo Gregori; after his own design.
The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; after C. Maratti.
Venus sleeping; after Guido.
St. Sebastian; half-length; after the same.
Venus, with Cupid mounted on a Dolphin; after Casanova.
Two Groups of Sculpture; after Cellini.
The Holy Family; after A. del Sarto.
The Stoning of Stephen; after L. Cardis; fine.
The Death of St. Louis Gonzaga; after Cipriani.

[According to Nagler he died in 1804. See Kunstler-Lexicon for a list of his works, and also for those of several others of the same name.]

GREISCHER, M., a German engraver, mentioned by Basan. He is said to have engraved several plates after various masters, one of which is a print of

The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after F. Baroccio.

GRESSE, JOHN ALEXANDER. This artist was born in London in 1741; his father was a native of Rolle, on the Lake of Geneva. He was first instructed in the rudiments of design by Gerard Scotin, the engraver, but afterwards studied some years under Cipriani, and also received some instruction from F. Zuccherelli. He was one of the first students who attended the Duke of Richmond's gallery, and in a short time afterwards he entered the Academy in St. Martin's Lane. Though he possessed considerable talents, he was not sufficiently assiduous in the prosecution of his studies, to distinguish himself in the higher branches of painting; and as he inherited a small fortune at the death of his father, he relinquished the more arduous exercise of the profession, and became a drawing-master, in which pursuit he acquired great reputation and extensive employment; and in 1777 was appointed drawing-master to the princesses. In the early part of his life he etched the figures, &c. for Kennedy's Account of the Statues and Pictures at the Earl of Pembroke's, at Wilton, in which he had the advantage of being assisted by Bartolozzi. There are also four other etchings by this artist, one representing a View of Framlingham Castle, Suffolk; another, a Cottage; a St. Jerome, mentioned by Basan in his Catalogue; and a Satyr sleeping, after Nicholas Poussin. These prints are now scarce. He died in 1794.

GREUT, JOSEPH. This artist is noticed by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of Hieronymus Bartholomews. It is neatly executed with the graver. He is supposed to have been of Germany, and to have worked chiefly for books.

GREUTER, MATTHEW, a German engraver, born at Strasburg about the year 1564. After receiving some instruction in his native city, he travelled to Italy, by way of Lyons and Avignon, in both which cities he was some time employed. He resided chiefly at Rome, where he engraved several plates, executed in a very neat style, though his design is generally incorrect. Some of his plates are wrought entirely with the graver, and the others are etched, and finished with the graver, in a slighter style. He sometimes signed his prints with his name at length, and sometimes with the cipher

M. The following are his principal works :

Pope Sixtus V. with an ornamental border.
Cardinal Seraphinus Oliverius Razzialius.
The Virgin seated, with the infant Jesus and St. John; after F. Baroccio.
Mary Magdalene sitting, in a landscape, holding a Book, leaning her hand on a Scull; after Gaetano. 1584.
Venus standing on a Globe, with figures emblematical of Virtue and Vice; very neatly finished with the graver; marked M. Greuter, inv. et fecit. 1587.
The Fall of Phaeton; after W. Diertin. 1588.
The Burning of Troy; after Lanfranco.
The grand Cavalcade of the Emperor Charles V.; engraved conjointly with Lucas Vosterman.
A set of small plates of Insects; etched in a style like that of Gaywood.

[Füssli says he died at Rome in 1638, in his 72nd year. Brulliot misquotes Füssli in his Dictionary of Monograms, with respect to the date of Greuter's birth, and founds an argument on his own mistake. Nagler gives a good list of his works.]

GREUTER, JOHN FREDERICK, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Rome about the year 1600, and was instructed by his father. We have by him a variety of plates executed with the graver, in a clear, neat style. He engraved the plates for the Flora of P. Ferrari. Among others, the following are by him :

The Portrait of Gio. Batista Marino; after J. Vouet.
Hercules in the Garden of the Hesperides; after P. da Cortona.

Marc Antonio Collona carried in triumph by Sea Gods; after the same.
 The Forge of Vulcan; after Lanfranco.
 The Hesperides arriving in the Port of Naples, with their Fruit, borne by Britons; after the same.
 Apollo and the Muses; after A. Camassei.
 The Virgin and Infant, with St. Francis kneeling; after his own design.
 The Death of St. Cecilia; after Domenichino.
 An emblematical subject of the Growth of Christianity; after Romanelli.
 A Battle; after A. Tempesta.

[He died in 1660. For a copious list of his works see Nagler.]

[GREUZE, JEAN BAPTISTE, was born at Tourmus, or Tonneins, in 1726, and died at Paris in 1805. His works are well known by the engravings of them by several eminent French artists, and are not uncommon in England. His style is eminently French, and he may be considered as one of their best colourists; a quality in his pictures that can be recommended for imitation. He was a great mannerist, and, therefore, easily copied; many duplicates, as they are called, exist of heads of young persons ascribed to Greuze. It is the manner only that they possess; they want the mind and spirit of the master. They are generally overcharged, or have an affected freedom of pencilling; in the latter case they are termed his unfinished pictures, of which it is said that he left a great number. His larger compositions are sometimes defective in arrangement, though the story is generally well told; and his representation of the passions often borders on caricature. The costume is frequently unfavourable, and renders that which was intended to be pathetic, ludicrous; but still there is strong sentimental expression. The heads of young girls are the most pleasing of his works, especially when he paints them as nature formed them, with the untutored simplicity and innocence of infancy, before they are spoiled by education, and tricked out with the dress and airs of coquettes. His pictures are highly prized by his countrymen, and no less so by English amateurs; enormous prices have been given for them in public sales. There is a good specimen in the National Gallery, bequeathed by the late Richard Simmons, Esq. Among the best may be reckoned the pictures named "La Confidence," "L'Aveugle trompé," "Le Pere de Famille," "L'Accordée de Village," in the Louvre, "La petite Fille et le Chien," which was sold in London in 1832, for £703 10s.; "Le priere du Matin," in the choice collection of Monsieur Waldo, and "La Latiere," in that of Baron Rothschild, at Paris. It is to be regretted that an artist so capable of exciting agreeable sensations by the expressions of youthful innocence, should ever have debased his pencil by producing subjects for the gratification of the sensualist, or make vice look amiable in beautiful forms seduced from the paths of virtue, or alluring by the meretricious glances of assumed simplicity.]

GRIBELIN, SIMON, a French engraver, born at Blois in 1661, and was instructed in engraving at Paris. He came to England in 1680; but it was above twenty years before he was noticed. The first work that raised his reputation was a plate he copied from Gerard Edelinck's fine print of the Tent of Darius, after Le Brun. This was followed by a set of the Cartoons. They had some success, being the first complete set of them that had appeared; but they were on too small a scale for the grandeur of the subjects, and the contracted powers of Gribelin, both in execution and drawing, were extremely inadequate to express the sublimity of Raffaele. He afterwards published several plates after some pictures in the Royal Collection; but his prints give no idea of the style of the masters he engraved from. They are at best but neat memoranda. He also engraved some portraits, and a variety of other subjects. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

William III.; after Fowler.
 Mary, his Queen; after the same.
 William, Duke of Gloucester; after Kneller.
 Queen Anne.
 Frederick, Prince of Wales.
 George Granville, Lord Lansdowne.
 James Butler, Duke of Ormond; after Dahl. 1718.
 Thomas Herbert, Earl of Pembroke.
 The Duke of Schomberg.
 The Earl of Shaftesbury; after Closterman; affixed to the Characteristics.
 Sir William Dawes, Archbishop of York; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Cartoons; seven small plates; after Raffaele. On the title is the portrait of Queen Anne, and the representation of the apartment in which the paintings then hung.
 The Apotheosis of James I.; after the ceiling at Whitehall, by Rubens; in three plates.
 Hercules between Virtue and Vice; after P. Matheis.
 The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Palma.
 Esther before Ahasuerus; after Tintoretto.
 Apollo and the Muses; after the same.
 The Birth of Jupiter; after Giulio Romano.

S. Gribelin, junior, died in London in 1733.

[GRIFF, or rather GRYEFF, ANTHONY, a painter of wooded landscapes with dead game, dogs, and accessories of the chase. His pictures are small, but painted with spirit and well coloured, though somewhat too sombre. He lived about the middle of the 17th century, but there are no particulars of him recorded. His pictures are well known in England, and are frequent in sales.]

GRIFFIER, JOHN. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1645, and was first placed under a flower-painter; but his taste leading him to landscape, he became a scholar of Roland Rogman, whose works were then highly esteemed. He preferred, however, the brighter and more agreeable style of Ruysdael and Lingelbach, and he studied their pictures more than those of his master. In a short time he became a very pleasing painter of landscapes and views of the Rhine, in which he particularly excelled.

J. Griffier came to England soon after the fire of London, where his pictures were much admired, and he met with great encouragement. His favourite subjects were views of the Thames; and that he might consult nature more intimately, he purchased a yacht, embarked his family and his pencils, and passed his whole time on the river between Windsor, Greenwich, and Gravesend. After staying here many years, he sailed in his own yacht for Rotterdam, but was shipwrecked, and lost the produce of his industry in England. In hopes of repairing his fortune he returned to this country, where he died in 1718, aged 73. He etched some plates of birds and animals, after the drawings of Barlow. They are executed with great freedom and spirit, and the animals are finely drawn. [Balkema, Nagler, and Brulliot, place his birth in 1656; the last says he was living in 1720. If he ever imitated the styles of Ruysdael and Lingelbach, or copied the works of Rembrandt, Teniers, and Poelmeburg, as some writers assert, they must be deceptions indeed. It is more likely that he studied the landscapes and style of Herman Zachtleven, as is apparent in the works of both father and son.]

GRIFFIER, ROBERT, was the son of the foregoing artist, born in London in 1688, and was instructed in the art by his father. His pictures, like those of the early works of John Griffier, represent views of the Rhine, with boats and figures, very neatly painted, and agreeably coloured. They are highly esteemed in Holland, where he chiefly resided, particularly at Amsterdam. [He died in 1750.]

GRIGNON, JAMES, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. The best of his works are his portraits, some of which possess great merit. They are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear style. In his plates of historical subjects he is less successful, as his drawing is very incorrect, and his management of the lights and shadows heavy, and without effect, particularly in his plates after Caracci and Poussin. He engraved some of the plates for a work entitled Les Tableaux de la Penitence; after the designs of Chaveau. We have also the following portraits by him:

Francis Maria Rhima; an ecclesiastic.

Peter Barbarcau, Doctor in Theology; after Champagny.

Jacques Caur de St. Fargeau; J. Grignon.

Jean Bureau, Mayor of Bordeaux; J. Grignon, sc.

GRIGNON, CHARLES. It is probable that he was a relative of the preceding artist. He was born in France about the year 1710, and was established in London in 1750. He engraved several plates in a masterly style; some of which were executed in conjunction with his contemporaries. Among his earliest works were several of the plates for the celebrated anatomical work of Albinus, published by Knapton in 1757. He handled the graver in a clear, bold manner, and executed with the point with great neatness and facility. He engraved some of the plates of the Antique Statues, after the designs of Dalton, as well as for the tapestries of the Vatican, published in 1753. We have also by him the following prints:

Two perspective Views of the Foundling Hospital; after Valée.

Four plates of the Election; after Hogarth; engraved conjointly with Le Cave and Aveline.

Garrick, in the character of Richard III.; W. Hogarth and Ch. Grignon, scul. 1745.

Phryne and the Philosopher Zenocrates; after Sal. Rosa.

GRIMALDI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, called IL BOLOGNESE. This eminent painter was born at Bologna in 1606, and was a relation and a disciple of the Caracci. In that celebrated academy he became a skilful and correct designer of the figure, though his inclination led him to landscape painting. In that branch of the art he followed the great style of Annibale; and having acquired no mean degree of ability in their school, he went to Rome, where, by copying and studying the fine objects with which he was surrounded, he soon rose to distinction, and was taken into the protection of Innocent X., who employed him in the Vatican, and in his gallery at Monte Cavallo. These commissions were accomplished so much to the satisfaction of his Holiness, that the Prince Pamphilo, nephew to the Pope, engaged him in several works for his villa of Bel Respiro, which he embellished with some admirable landscapes with figures, in the style of the Caracci. His reputation reached Paris, whither he was invited by Cardinal Mazarine, and was employed by Louis XIV. in the palace of the Louvre, who rewarded him with his accustomed munificence. On his return to Rome, after the death of his protector, Innocent X., he was equally patronized by his successors, Alexander VII. and Clement IX., and was one of the most employed and successful artists of his time. He was twice appointed chief of the Academy of St. Luke. The landscapes of Il Bolognese are of grand and select scenery; his pencil is light and flowing, his foliage admirable, and his colouring is fresh and agreeable, though occasionally too green. He is inferior to Annibale Caracci and Domenichino in the choice of his forms, in his aerial tint, and in the energy of handling. An instance of the most interesting benevolence is recorded of this artist, which it is gratifying to commemorate. A Sicilian nobleman, who had been obliged to fly from Messina during the troubles in that country, had taken refuge at Rome, with his daughter, and was reduced to a state of the greatest indigence and distress. Their wretched habitation happened to be precisely opposite to the residence of Grimaldi, and it was not long before he became acquainted with their story and their deplorable situation. Desirous of affording relief, without wounding the feelings of the illustrious sufferers, he approached their door under the darkness of evening, and knocking gently, as soon as it was opened threw in a purse of money, and retired undiscovered. This humane stratagem had been repeated more than once, when the Sicilian, resolved to find out his mysterious benefactor, concealed himself near the door, and on his approach rushed into his arms and fell at his feet, expressing his gratitude and admiration. Grimaldi brought the strangers to his house, and lived in the closest friendship with them till his death. We have a considerable number of etchings by this able artist, executed with great freedom, taste, and spirit. Some of them are from his own designs, and others after Titian and the Caracci. Among others are the following:

A set of four small Landscapes.

A grand Landscape, with Buildings, and in the foreground Figures at play; Gio. Fran. Grimaldi Bolognese, inv. et fec.

A grand Landscape, with Buildings and Fishermen; same mark.

A Landscape, with the Baptism of Christ.

A Landscape, with Ruins and Figures; Fr. Grimaldi Bolognese, fec.

A mountainous Landscape, with Figures; no mark.

Two upright Landscapes; after An. Caracci.

A set of four Landscapes; after the same.

[He left a great number of drawings with the pen, some of which have been engraved by Bartolozzi.]

G. F. Grimaldi died in 1680. [There is some doubt respecting the exact year of his death. Those who wish to know more of his etchings will do well to consult Bartsch or Nagler.]

GRIMALDI, ALESSANDRO, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, and painted landscapes in the style of his father, though very inferior to him. There is a spirited etching by him of the Brazen Serpent, signed Alex. Grimaldi, inv. et fec.

GRIMANI, ———. See JACOBS.

GRIMMER, JACOB. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1510, and was for some time a disciple of Matthew Cock; and afterwards studied under Christian Queburg. He was a reputable landscape painter, and was received into the academy at Antwerp in 1546. His pictures are generally embellished with buildings and ruins, in which he excelled; and his pencil is neat and flowing. The works of this artist are little known out of his own country. [Balkema writes his name Jacques Grimmaar, and says that he was an excellent landscape painter, and also of views of cities and villages. His distances and skies are admirable for colour and lightness of handling.]

GRISONI, GIUSEPPE, was born at Florence about the year 1700, and was a scholar of Tommaso Redi. The rising merit of the disciple is said to have occasioned so much jealousy and uneasiness in the master, that it shortened his life. He painted history and portraits; but particularly excelled in the latter, of which his own portrait, in the gallery at Florence, is a fine specimen. He died in 1769.

GROENSVELT, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, born at the Hague about the year 1650. He etched several views and landscapes, after Berghem, Van Goyen, Lingelbach, and others; and engraved some historical subjects and portraits. The following are his principal prints:

The Portrait of Dorothy, Countess of Sunderland; after Vandyck.

A Girl, with a Cat; after Ab. Bloemart.

A Man sleeping on a Barrel.

The Adoration of the Magi; after P. Veronese; J. Groensvelt, fec.

Christ before Pilate; after A. Schiavone; J. Groensvelt, fec.

A set of six Landscapes; after Berghem.

A set of four Landscapes; after the same; Berghem, del. Groensvelt, fec. Cle. de Jonghe, exc.; fine.

GRONIGIUS, GERARD, an engraver, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as having etched ten plates, emblematical of the life of man, from ten to a hundred years. The drawing is incorrect, and the outline hard; but they are not devoid of merit. They are marked Ger. Gronigius, inv. faciebat.

GROSNIER, MADEMOISELLE, a French lady, mentioned by Basan as the engraver of several plates, after various masters; but he has not specified any of them.

[GRÜNEWALD, MATHIAS, was born at Aschaffenburg about the year 1450, according to some writers, or in 1480, according to others. He has been considered, in a measure, as the rival of Albert Durer; but his works, preserved at Munich and Mayence, do not support the title. Füssli says he died in 1510; if so, the first date is probably right.]

GRUNWALD, HANS, a German engraver, by whom we have some plates, indifferently copied, after Albert Durer; among which is the Virgin and Child, a small upright plate; and a Woman and a Satyr, with another Woman striking at her, and a Man warding off the blow, a middle-sized upright plate, copied the reverse way from Albert Durer, but not correctly. There are also some wooden cuts by this artist; among which is a Landscape, with a rock and a view of the sea. He usually marked his prints with the cipher GH. [Hans was the brother of Mathias Grünewald.]

GUALDORP, GELDORP GORTZIUS, called, a Flemish painter, born at Louvain in 1553. After learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, when he was seventeen years of age he went to Antwerp, where he became a disciple of Francis Franck; and on the death of that master he passed into the school of Francis Pourbus. Under that able master he became one of the most reputable artists of his time, particularly in portraits, in which he was greatly employed. His talents were not, however, confined to portraits: he painted several historical subjects for the Duke de Terra Nova at Cologne. Among his best works are the Four Evangelists, which have been finely engraved by Crispin de Passe. He died in 1618. [Balkema says he died at Cologne in 1611. He names him Gelsdorf.]

GUARANA, GIACOMO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Vicenza in 1716. He first studied under Sebastiano Ricci, but was afterwards a scholar of Giovanni Batista Tiepolo. There are several of his pictures in the churches at Venice, and in the Palazzo Rezzonico. He etched some large fabulous subjects after his own designs.

GUARDI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Venice in 1712. He was a scholar of Canaletto, and, like his instructor, excelled in painting architectural views of Venice. Though inferior to Canaletto in the exactness of his perspective, and the masterly conduct of the light and shadow, his works, perhaps from the nature of the subjects they painted, bear so near a resemblance to those of his master, that they are frequently mistaken for them. He died in 1793. [An accurate observer can hardly mistake the works of Guardi for those of Canaletto. The light, spirited manner and pencilling of Guardi are far superior to the mechanical execution of the other. It is true that his pictures are not so laboured as those of Canaletto, nor do they yet obtain so large a price in the market; but they exhibit more of the spirit of a real artist, who observes and paints from nature, than of the artisan who works with the assistance of the Camera lucida.]

GUCHT, MICHAEL VANDER, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1660, and was a pupil of one of the Boutats. It is not ascertained at what time he came to England, but he met with considerable encouragement. He was employed in several portraits and other subjects for the booksellers, and engraved many of the portraits for Clarendon's history. He also executed many plates of anatomical figures, and a large print of the Royal Navy, after Baston. The following portraits are also by him:

Queen Elizabeth; after Sir Anthony More.

William III. and Mary his Queen.

Queen Anne; four plates.

George II.; two plates.

Edmund Grindall, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Lord Astley.

James Butler, Duke of Ormond.

Edward Montague, Earl of Manchester.

Sir Josiah Child; after Riley.

J. Savage, prefixed to his History of Germany; after Foster; fine.

James Drake, M. D.; after the same.

James Stanley, Earl of Derby; after Winstanley.

George Granville, Lord Lansdowne.

Francis Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester; after Kneller.

William Congreve, poet; after the same.

Simon Patrick; Bishop of Chichester; after the same.

Thomas Sprat, Bishop of Rochester; after Lely.

Offspring Blackall, Bishop of Exeter; after M. Dahl.

William Beveridge, Bishop of St. Asaph; after Ferrers.

Joseph Addison, poet; after Kneller.

Thomas Betterton, actor; after the same.

There are several other portraits by this artist. Michael Vandergucht was the instructor of the ingenious and industrious George Vertue. He died in 1725.

GUCHT, GERARD VANDER, was the son and the pupil of the preceding artist, and was principally employed by the booksellers. We have by him, among others, the following portraits:

James II. and Maria his Queen.

John Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury; after Kneller.

Matthew Wren, Bishop of Hereford.

The Countess of Clarendon.

John Milton, poet; three plates.

John Dryden, poet; after Kneller.

John Hughes, poet; after the same.
 John Philips, poet; after the same.
 John Barber, Alderman of London; after Dandridge.
 John Allen, D. M.
 Colley Cibber, poet and actor; after Van Loo.
 Charles Jervas, painter.

GUCHT, JOHN VANDER, was the younger son of Michael Vander Gucht, and was instructed in engraving by his father. He also received some instruction in drawing from Louis Cheron, and completed his studies at the academy by designing from the model. He engraved six academical figures, from the drawings of Cheron, which were much admired; and was employed by William Cheselden, the surgeon, to engrave the plates for his Osteology, for which he commends him highly in his preface to that work. He also had a share in the plates after Sir James Thornhill's Cupola of St. Paul's. There is a print by him of Tancred and Erminia; after N. Poussin. We have also by him the following portraits:

John Ker, of Kersland; affixed to his Memoirs; after Hammond.
 William King, LL. D.; prefixed to his works; after Dellow.
 John Dennis, critic.

John Vander Gucht died in 1776, aged 80.

GUELARD, B., a French artist, mentioned by Basan as the engraver of several plates after Oudry, P. van Bloemen, &c., but without specifying any of them. He flourished about the year 1750.

GUERARDS, or GERARDS, MARK, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Bruges about the year 1560. He painted history, landscape, and portraits; and was an able architect. He also engraved, illuminated, and designed for glass painters. He came to England soon after the year 1580, and was appointed painter to Queen Elizabeth. His works are not uncommon, particularly his portraits, which are distinguished by the careful neatness of their finish, and the stiffness of his draperies, enriched with pearls and jewels. His carnations are thinly and delicately coloured, with a prevalent bluish tint. He designed the procession of Queen Elizabeth to Hunsdon House, which has been engraved by Vertue. He also drew a procession of the Queen and Knights of the Garter in 1584, from which Ashmole took his plate for the History of the Order. An Introduction to the general Art of Drawing, "first set out by Marc Gerard, of Bruges," was translated and published in English in 1674. M. Guerards engraved a set of plates for Æsop's Fables, after his own designs. We have also by him a large plate of a View of Bruges. He also engraved

A set of fourteen plates of the Passion of Christ; oval; J. Sadelet, exc.
 A set of eighteen plates of Quadrupeds; Visscher, exc. 1588.

He died in 1635. [This artist's name is written in so many different forms that it is difficult to say, with certainty, which is the right one. Some writers call him Gheeraerts, Geraats, Geerarts; others, Gerard, Garrard, and frequently only Marco de Bruges. With respect to his birth and death there are wide differences. The writer of the "Galerie d'Artistes Brugeois," says that he engraved the plates for Æsop's Fables in 1566, and that several years before he designed and engraved a plan of the City of Bruges. Zani quotes him as working in 1560, and places his death in 1598, in which Brulliot agrees. The dates as given by Bryan are evidently wrong.]

GUERARDS, N., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He executed the plates for a work entitled Les Edifices Antiques de Rome, published at Paris, after the designs of A. des Godetz, who engraved the frontispiece. He also engraved the frontispiece to a book of ornaments, published by P. Bourdon in 1703; and a small plate of Soldiers marching, in imitation of Callot, but very inferior.

GUERCINO, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO BARBIERI, called. The family name of this eminent painter was Barbieri, but as he is generally known by the name of Guercino, he is noticed under that designation, for the convenience of reference. He was born at the small town of Cento, in the Ferrarese territory, in 1590, and, according to Malvasia, acquired the denomination of Guercino from his having in his infancy lost the sight of his right eye by an accident, occasioned by the negligence of his nurse. Such was the early indication he gave of uncommon genius, that before he was ten years old he painted a figure of the Virgin on the façade of his father's house, which would have been considered as a very extraordinary production, even at a more mature age. He is said by some writers to have been brought up in the school of the Caracci; but that is not easily reconciled with the time in which he lived, or the distinct difference that is evident in their styles. Lanzi positively asserts that he never studied under the Caracci, and that he had not the advantage of superior instruction to that of Gio. Batista Cremonini, and Benedetto Gennari the elder, both obscure painters, from whom he could acquire little of the transcendent ability he afterwards displayed. He was the disciple of his own genius and of nature. It is probable that he derived some advantage from studying the celebrated picture by Lodovico Caracci, at the Capuchins at Cento, of which he always spoke in terms of the highest respect and admiration. The works of Guercino are distinguished by three different styles, which he followed at different periods of his life. In his early works he seems to have been seduced into a violent and daring contrast, of light and shadow, from the extraordinary estimation in which the pictures of Michael Angelo Caravaggio were at that time held; and though he is always superior to that master in design and dignity of character, his first productions were infected with the vitiated principles, and something of the vulgarity of that painter. After having visited Bologna, Venice, and Rome, he changed his manner; and his second style is distinguished by a grander and more elevated taste of design, more amenity and sweetness in his colouring, a fine expression in his heads, and an extraordinary relief, without the aid of harsh and violent contrast. Such are his celebrated picture of St. Petronilla, formerly in St. Peter's, now in the gallery of the Louvre; the Aurora, in the Casino of the Villa Ludovisi; and his St. Philip of Neri, in the Chiesa Nuova at Rome. To these may be added his fine picture of the Resurrection at Cento; and his S. Elena, at the Mendicanti, at Venice. It was at this epoch, the middle of his life, that he undertook his immense work of the Dome at Piacenza, where he has carried fresco painting to the highest perfection, in the beauty and force of his colouring, the boldness of his foreshortening, and the magic of his relief. The cupola is divided into eight compartments, in the upper part of which he has represented the Prophets, accompanied by Angels; and in the lower, the Sibyls, and subjects from the New Testament. These admirable performances rank the powers of Guercino among those of the greatest artists of his time. It must however be allowed, that, in his best works, we look in vain for the graces of ideal beauty, or the purest choice of selected nature. His figures are neither distinguished by dignity of form, nor nobleness of air; and there is generally something to be wished for in the expression of his heads; but he subdues us by the vigour of his colouring: he is brilliant in his lights, tender in his demi-tints, and always energetic in his shadows. His drawing is bold, and often correct, and his execution is of the most prompt and daring facility. Of this we have a convincing proof in the surprising number of considerable works he accomplished. Malvasia gives a list of them, by which it appears that he painted one hundred and six altarpieces for the churches, one hundred and forty-four large historical pictures, besides his great fresco works, and his numerous Madonnas, portraits, and landscapes, in private collections. Towards the latter part of his life, after the death of Guido, the celebrity that painter had acquired by the beauty and suavity of his style, induced Guercino once more to alter his manner. He now endeavoured to imitate the grace and elegance of Guido's forms, and the silvery sweetness of his colouring; but in attempting delicacy, he fell into feebleness and languor, and lost sight of the energy and vigour by which his best works are distinguished. Of the pictures painted in his last and weakest manner, are most of those in the churches at Bologna, his Marriage of the Virgin in S. Paterniano at Faro, the Annunciation at Forli, and the Prodigal Son, in the royal palace at Turin. This laborious artist left an incredible number of admirable drawings, which are highly esteemed. Many of those in his Majesty's collection have been finely engraved by M. Bartolozzi. We have a few etchings by Guercino, executed with great freedom and spirit; they are as follow:

St. Anthony of Padua; half-length; Joan Fr. Cent.

St. John; the same mark.

St. Peter; Joan. F. Barbieri, f.

St. Jerome, with a Crucifix; the same mark.

Bust of a Man with a cap and a beard.

Bust of a Woman.

Bust of a Man, in an Oriental costume.

[The S. Petronilla is not now in the Louvre.]
G. F. Barbieri died in 1666.

GUERIN, C., a modern French engraver, who resided at Strasburg about the year 1790. He engraved several plates of antique gems, which are executed with the graver in a neat, finished style. [Probably the same as the following.]

[GUERIN, CHRISTOPHE, a designer and engraver, was born at Strasburg in 1758, and was a scholar of Jolain and Müller. He engraved after Raphael, Correggio, Giulio Romano, and Louthembourg. He was keeper of the Museum at Strasburg, and was living in 1831.]

[GUERIN, J. B. PAULIN, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was born at Toulon in 1783. His historical pictures are chiefly scriptural subjects, and are well treated, according to the prevailing taste of the time. Portraits by him are numerous, and preserve the likeness of several of the restored Bourbons, their generals, and courtiers. He was a member of the Legion of Honour, and titular professor of painting to the maison royale de St. Denis. He was living in 1831.]

[GUERIN, PIERRE, an historical painter, born at Paris in 1774, was a scholar of Regnault. His subjects are from Roman history, and from the poets, and he treats them in a classic and grand manner. They have the severity of the French drama, as developed in Racine and Corneille. The greater part have been engraved. He received many honours, and was a member of the academies of Rome, Florence, Turin, Antwerp; and professor of the Royal School of Arts in his own country. He was living in 1831.]

GUERNIER, LEWIS DU, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1677. He was instructed in the art by L. de Chastillon, and came to England in 1708, though with very moderate talents. His chief business was engraving frontispieces for plays, and other publications. He assisted Du Bosc in engraving the plates of the Duke of Marlborough's Battles. At the desire of Lord Halifax, he executed a large plate of Lot and his Daughters, after Michael Angelo Caravaggio. There are also two portraits of James Douglas, Duke of Queensberry, and his Duchess; after Kneller; they are rare. He died in London in 1716.

GUERNIER, RENE. This artist was probably a native of France. According to Florent le Comte he excelled in engraving ornaments and grotesque figures.

GUEROULT, WILLIAM. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a set of wooden cuts for a Bible, published at Paris in 1564, dedicated to Catherine de Medicis.

GUERRIERE, FRANCIS DE LA, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. We have by him a set of seventeen etchings, from the grotesque friezes by Raffaello, in the Vatican.

GUERRIERE, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Fossombrone, in the Roman state, and flourished about the year 1650. It is not said under whom he studied, but he painted history in the style of Caravaggio and Guercino. Lanzi mentions several of his works in very favourable terms, particularly a picture at the Filippini at Fano, of S. Carlo contemplating the Mysteries of the Passion, with two laterals, representing subjects from the life of that saint, in which the style of Caravaggio was improved by softer tints, and more elegance in the forms. In one of the churches at Fabriano is a picture of St. Sebastian, by torch-light, of a fine effect, in which he has imitated the style of Guercino.

GUEVARA, DON JUAN NIÑO DE. According to Palomino, this Spanish painter was born at Malaga in 1631. He was the son of a captain of the Guards of the Viceroy of Arragon, under whose protection he was placed, as a disciple of Miguel Manrique, a Fleming, who had been educated in the school of Rubens. He afterwards studied at Madrid, under Alonzo Cano. With the instruction of these masters he became a very reputable artist, and adopted a style that partook of the character of both. To the grandeur and correctness of Alonzo Cano, he united the splendid and brilliant colouring of the head of the Flemish school. His principal works are at Malaga, Granada, and Cordova. In the church de la Charidad at Malaga, is a fine picture of the Triumph of the Cross; and in the Cathedral, the Ascension of our Saviour, and the Assumption of the Virgin. At Cordova, in the cloister of the Augustines, there are some pictures of the Life of the Founder of the Order, and several portraits, which are compared by Palomino to those of Vandyck. He died at Malaga in 1698. [Bermudez says he was born at Madrid the eighth of February, 1632.]

GUIDI, RAFFAELLE, an Italian engraver, born at Florence in 1540. From his style, it is probable that he was instructed in the art by Cornelius de Cort, or Agostino Caracci. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled in a masterly manner. His design is tasteful and correct, and though he is inferior to Agostino, his prints possess great merit. The following are his principal prints :

Dedalus and Icarus; after the same.
The Crucifixion; after Christopher Schwartz.
The Entombing of Christ; after F. Baroccio.
Æneas carrying his Father Anchises; after the same.
Jupiter, with his Thunder; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.
Vulcan, with his Hammer; after the same.

GUIDO, RENDI. See RENDI.

GUIDO, ASCANIUS, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1567. There is a print by him of the Last Judgment, after Michael Angelo Buonaroti, rather smaller than the plate engraved by Martin Rota, and is not much inferior to it in merit. It is dated 1567, by which it appears to have been done two years previous to that by Rota. It is signed Ascanis. Don. Guido faciebat.

GUIDOBONO, BARTOLOMEO, was born at Savona in 1654. His father, a painter on china, had him instructed in drawing, to assist him in his profession. Having seen some pictures by Benedetto Castiglione, he copied them with so much exactness and spirit, that it was difficult to distinguish them from the originals. He afterwards visited Parma and Venice, studying the works of the best masters, and on his settling at Genoa, he was much employed in that city, and in the state. He particularly excelled in painting animals, flowers, and fruit; and was no despicable designer of the figure, as he has shown in some fabulous subjects in the Palazzo Centurioni. He united great suavity of pencil with a fine effect of the chiaro-scuro. Some of his best pictures are in the Palazzo Brignole Sale; among which is distinguished that of Lot and his Daughters. He died in 1709.

GUIDOTTI, CAVALIERE PAOLO. This artist was born at Lucca in 1569, and according to Baglione, went to Rome when young, in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., with some instruction in design, and improved his talent by studying the great works of art in that city. He was employed by Sixtus V. in several fresco works in the library of the Vatican, in the Scala Santa, and in the Palace of St. John of Lateran. He distinguished himself as a sculptor as well as a painter; and for some productions in that art was honoured by Paul V., with the permission to take his name of Borghese, and was made a knight of the order of Christ. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Rome. In S. Girolamo degli Schiavoni, is a picture of St. Matthew; and in the cupola of S. Maria de Monti, the Assumption of the Virgin. He died at Rome in 1629.

GUIGOU, V., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1676. He engraved some bird's eye views of chateaux, and other buildings in France, which are executed in a neat, stiff style. He also engraved several portraits for books.

GUILAIN, SIMON, a French sculptor, born at Paris in 1581, who for his amusement etched several plates in a slight, masterly style. We have the following prints by him :

A set of twenty plates of the Life of St. Diego; after An. Caracci.

Eighty plates of the Cries of Bologna; after the same; engraved in conjunction with Alessandro Algorgi.

GUILLEMART, ———, an obscure French engraver, who was chiefly employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers. Among others, we have that of Setani Abbé de S. Genevieve.

GUINACCIA, DEODATO. This painter was born at Messina about the year 1510, and was a disciple of Polidoro di Caravaggio, when he visited that city, after the sacking of Rome. After the death of Polidoro he was engaged to finish the fine picture of the Nativity, in the Chiesa dell' Alto Basso, which was left imperfect by that master. In the church of the Pellegrini is a picture of his own composition, representing the Trinity, and another of the Transfiguration in S. Salvatore de Greci, both in the great style of his instructor.

GUIRRO, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter of history, born at Barcelona in 1630. There are several of his works in the churches of his native city, of which the most esteemed are at the convent of Recoletas. He died in 1700.

GUISONI, FERMO, was a native of Mantua, and flourished about the year 1568. Educated in the school of Giulio Romano, he became one of the favourite disciples of that great master, from whose cartoons he painted the Vocation of St. Peter and St. Andrew to the Apostleship, in the dome of the cathedral; esteemed one of the finest compositions of Giulio. In the church of S. Andrea, there is a fine picture of his own composition, representing the Crucifixion.

GULDENMUNDT, HANS, an old German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1500. There is a middle-sized upright wooden cut by this artist, representing two Soldiers standing, one of them holding a halbert, and the other a flag. Over the first is written Gept Piltzharber, &c., and over the second JFendrich, with his name at length, and the cipher IG. It is executed in a bold, spirited style, and the figures are correctly represented in the dress of the time. [Brulliot says that Hans Guldenmundt was not only an engraver but a printer at Nuremberg, and that he flourished from 1520 to the middle of the sixteenth century. He doubts that the prints above-mentioned are by him, and refers to an artist of the name Hans Glaser, and to Michael Ossinger, for whom Guldenmundt published several portraits. But all his conjectures on the subject are very unsatisfactory. See the monograms of Guldenmundt, Ostendorfer, and Ossinger in the Table.]

GUNST, PETER VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1667. From the style of his prints, it is probable that he formed his manner from the works of the Drevets. He worked entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear manner; but there is a want of effect in his prints, and his drawing is sometimes very incorrect. His best plates are his portraits, and they form the larger part of his productions. His greatest work was a set of ten full-length plates of portraits, after Vandeyck, of Charles I., his Queen, and some of the English nobility. Houbraken, father to the celebrated engraver of that name, came to England to make the drawings from the pictures. He also engraved a set of portraits for Larrey's History of England. The following are his principal plates :

PORTRAITS AFTER VANDYCK.

Charles I.
Henrietta Maria, his Queen.

William Villers, Viscount Grandison.
 Lucy Percy, Countess of Carlisle.
 Viscount Chaworth.
 Margaret Smith, Lady Herbert.
 Ann, Countess of Chesterfield.
 Lady Wharton.
 Elizabeth, Countess of Lindsey.
 Arthur Goodwin, of Winchendon, Bucks.

PORTRAITS FOR LARREY'S HISTORY.

Edward VI.
 Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerset.
 Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor.
 Mary, Queen of England.
 Philip of Spain, her Consort.
 Mary, Queen of Scots.
 James Hamilton, Earl of Arran.
 Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk.
 Sir Francis Walsingham.
 Cardinal Pole.
 Sir Richard Bacon, Lord-keeper.

VARIOUS PORTRAITS.

King William III.; after Brandon.
 Mary, his Queen; after the same.
 Queen Anne; after Kneller.
 George, Prince of Denmark; after Wissing.
 John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough; after Kneller.
 George I.; after the same.
 Earl of Peterborough; after the same.
 John Locke; after Greenhill.
 John Dryden; after Riley.

He also engraved nine plates of the Loves of the Gods; after Titian. The same subjects that Smith has scraped in mezzotinto.

GUTTENBERG, CHARLES, a modern German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1744. He was a pupil of J. G. Wille, at Paris, and has engraved several plates, in the neat style of that artist. His principal works were the plates he executed for the Voyage Pittoresque du Royaume de Naples, by the Abbé de St. Non. We have also by him,

The Portrait of Catherine II., Empress of Russia; after Rotari.
 William Tell; after Fuessli.
 Le Petit Boudeur; after Greuze.
 L'Invocation à l'Amour; after Theolon.
 The Death of General Wolfe; neatly copied from the print by Woollet.
 A pair of Views in Switzerland; after Schutz.

[His name was Charles Gottlieb. He died at Paris in 1792. His works are numerous; a good account of them will be found in Nagler.]

GUTTENBERG, HENRY, the brother and pupil of the preceding artist, was born at Nuremberg about the year 1755. He has engraved several plates in the style of his brother; among which are the following:

A Dutch Family; after C. Bega.
 A Repose in Egypt; after Baroccio.
 A Mountainous Landscape; after Dietricy.

[He was born in 1749, and died about 1818. He produced many works after superior masters to those above mentioned. For a full list of them, see Nagler.]

GUTTENBRUNN, L. This painter was a native of Dresden, who came to England about the year 1789, where he staid nearly three years. He painted portraits and small historical subjects, and exhibited with the Royal Academy until 1792, about which time he went to Petersburg, by the recommendation of the Russian Ambassador. He was a member of the Academy of Florence, from whence it may be presumed that he had studied in Italy.

GÜTTIERER, or GÜTTIEREZ, GENNERO. This artist engraved some plates for the Museo Fiorentino; and we have by him a large upright plate of the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds; after Carlo Maratti; executed in a neat style, in the manner of James Frey, though inferior. He flourished about the year 1760.

GYZEN, PETER. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1636, and was a scholar of John Breughel, called Velvet Breughel. He painted landscapes, in the highly finished and laboured style of that master, with small figures, neatly drawn; and sometimes views of the Rhine, with boats, in the manner of Herman Sachtleven. Though inferior to Breughel in the mellowness of his colouring, his pictures are not without merit. [This artist is sometimes called Gysels. If born in 1636 he could not have been a scholar of John Breughel, whose death is recorded in 1625 by some, and, at the latest, in 1642 by others. He may have imitated his manner of painting, Nagler says Gyzen, or Gysels, was born in 1610, and that he died in 1670; this would allow of a possibility of Gyzen receiving some instruction from John Breughel, supposing that he died in 1642; but Nagler says that he died in 1625; and Balkema, that Gyzen was born in 1636. Balkema is often inaccurate in his dates; but in this instance he is supported by others. He mentions a John Gyzels, by whom there is a picture in the Museum at Amsterdam, representing the View of a Village, with chariots, horses, and figures. As Breughel and Peter Gyzen both painted such subjects, this John, of whom there are no particulars in Nagler or Balkema, may be the cause of the difference in their accounts relating to Peter. After all this confusion of names and dates, the inquirer will be pleased to know that the real name of the painter is PETER GHEYSSELS, and that he was living in 1687, for so he has signed a picture of a Dutch Fair, in the collection of H. T. Hope, Esq., who has also another of a Peacock, a Dead Swan, some sporting apparatus, a variety of birds and game, foliage and insects, all admirably finished, with the name of the painter on a pedestal. Mr. Morrison has a picture of dead game signed at length Peeter Gheysels; and there is a similar subject in the possession of Baron I. Steengracht van Ooscapelle. So it would appear that he abandoned his imitation of John Breughel, and adopted altogether a new style. These subjects by him are very rare and precious.]

H

[HAACK, G. MARCELLUS, a Dutch portrait painter, of whom little is known. He was living in 1700.]

[HAAG, J. F. C., a German portrait painter. He was painter to William Charles Henry Friso, Prince of Orange, and hereditary Stadtholder of Friesland, and accompanied him to the Hague, when he became Stadtholder of the United Provinces; and died there in 1759.]

[HAAG, TETHART PHILIP CHRÉTIEN, was son of the preceding, and born at Cassel in 1737. He was instructed by his father, and painted portraits and other subjects; but excelled in painting horses, by which he gained a great reputation. He died at the Hague in 1812.]

[HAAN, ABRAHAM DE, was born at Amsterdam, and was a disciple of Cornelius Pronk. He painted portraits and architecture. He was also a painter on glass. He died in 1748, or 1750, being about 40 years of age.]

[HAAN, DAVID DE, was born at Rotterdam in 1602. He studied in Italy, and became a good historical painter; but his chief excellence was in battle-pieces. He died at Rome in 1659, according to Balkema; but Füessli and Zani say in 1674. He painted his own portrait when he was in his fifty-seventh year.]

HAANSBERGEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1642. He was a scholar and imitator of Cornelius Poelemburg, whom he nearly equalled in the delicacy of his pencil and clearness of his colouring, though inferior to him in design. Finding that the length of time he was occupied in the high finishing of his pictures, was never sufficiently remunerated by the price he received for them, he abandoned landscape painting, and applied himself to portraits, which, from the agreeable tone of his colouring, and a happy talent of succeeding in his likenesses, were admired, and he met with great encouragement. His cabinet pictures, in the style of Poelemburg, are seldom to be met with out of Holland. He died at the Hague in 1705.

[HAASTERT, ISAAC VAN, born at Delft in 1753, and died there in 1834. He was instructed by a Venetian painter, of the name of Jerome Lapis, who resided at Delft, and became a respectable painter of landscapes, and views of cities. It is, however, said that his reputation rests more on his poetical than pictorial productions. He translated a work on Physiognomy, and published a collection of prints of wild animals.]

HABERT, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1650. He was much employed for the booksellers, and has engraved several portraits of literary characters, and other celebrated persons, in a neat style. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

James II.; after Kneller.

Louis Maimbourg, a celebrated Jesuit; after his own design. 1683.

Cornelius Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres; after Champagne.

Felix Vialart, Bishop of Chalons; after the same.

John Milton.

John Dun; called Scotus.

Old Parr. 1715.

He also engraved an emblematical print, in the style of Anthony Masson, which he dedicated to that artist.

[HACCOU, JOHN CORNELIUS, was born at Middlebourg in 1798, and was a student of the Academy in that city, and at the same time a pupil of J. H. Koekkoek, under whom he made a rapid progress. He painted winter scenes, lakes with vessels, moonlights, and landscapes, all with considerable talent. After visiting France, Germany, and Switzerland, he established himself in London, where he died in 1839.]

HACKAERT, JOHN. This painter was born at Amsterdam about the year 1635. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but he was one of the ablest landscape painters of the Dutch school. Not satisfied with the monotonous and contracted scenery of Holland, he visited Switzerland and Germany, where he designed from nature the choicest views of those interesting countries. On his return to Holland he painted some admirable landscapes of the most romantic sites of the places he had visited, in which there is an extraordinary effect of sunshine piercing through the rocks and foliage, in the most picturesque manner. He lived in habits of intimacy with Adrian Vanden Velde, who frequently embellished his pictures with his charming figures and cattle. With this additional attraction they are very highly esteemed. We have a set of six charming etchings of landscapes by this able painter, from his own designs, executed in the style of Waterloo. They are inscribed, Joannes Hackaert, inv. et fecit. [The name should be written John Hakkert. He was an excellent landscape painter, but is not so well known in England as he is in France and Holland. Some of his works are composed in a style similar to those of Both, where rocks, rivers, and mountains present the most agreeable scenery under the effect of sunset, and which bring to mind the elevated and various appearances of nature in Germany and Switzerland, where he delighted to study. Some of his pictures are of large dimensions.]

HACKEN, or HAECKEN, ALEXANDER VAN, a Dutch mezzotinto engraver, who resided some time in London. We have several portraits by him, which possess considerable merit. Among others are the following:

George II.

Caroline Wilhelmina, his Queen; after Amiconi.

William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland; after the same.

General Wade; after J. Vanderbanck.

General Wentworth; after Ramsay.

John Christopher Pepusch, musician; after C. Lucy.

Carlo Broschi, called Farinelli; after the same.

HACKERT, JAMES PHILIP, a Prussian painter and engraver, born at Prentzlau in 1734. He was the son of a portrait painter, who sent him to Berlin, where he studied landscape painting, under N. B. le Sueur. He afterwards travelled to Sweden, and made several drawings of views in that country, which he has etched. In 1766 he went to Italy, and resided some years at Rome, where he painted views of the environs of that city, which were much admired, and he met with great encouragement. The King of Naples invited him to his court, appointed him his principal painter, with a liberal pension; and he remained in his service many years. Hackert has etched a variety of plates from his own designs, which are executed with great fire and spirit. Among others, we have the following by him:

Twenty-one Views in Pomerania and the Island of Rugen; J. Ph. Hackert, fec. 1763, 1764.

Six Views in Sweden; same mark.

Six Views in Norway.

Four Views in the Kingdom of Naples. Rome, 1779.

[James Philip Hackert was born in 1737, and died at Florence in 1807. His works are numerous, and hold a distinguished rank. Nagler has given a full account of them, and of many particulars relating to this eminent artist and his employers.]

HACKERT, GEORGE, was the younger brother and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Prentzlau in 1744. In 1786 he established himself at Naples as a printseller and engraver. He has engraved several plates of landscapes and views, chiefly from the designs of James Philip Hackaert. We have the following prints by him:

A View of the Environs of Carpentras.

The Ruins of the Aqueduct at Frejus.

Two Views of the Ruins of the Bridge of Augustus at Narni.

Two Views of Tivoli.

A View of Rome, from the Villa Mellini.

A View of Castel Mare.

A View of the Bay of Naples.

A pair, Morning and Evening; after Gaspar Poussin.

[George Hackert was born in 1755, and died in 1805. He should be called the youngest brother of James Philip, as there were three others between them, all of whom were artists.]

[HACKERT, JOHN GOTTLIEB, brother of the preceding, was born in 1744; he studied in Italy with his brothers, and afterwards came to England. He excelled in animal painting, and exhibited several of his pictures at the Royal Academy in 1773, the same year in which he died at Bath.]

[HÆFTEN, NICHOLAS VAN, a painter of portraits and merry-meetings, and an engraver, was born at Gorcum. He painted and engraved his own portrait, which bears his name and that of the place of his birth. Balkema says he was born in 1690; but that cannot be correct, for many of his prints have the date of 1694, and the last noticed by Nagler was published in 1709. For a list of his engravings, see Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon. The following is probably the same artist.]

HAFTEN, NICHOLAS VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He both etched and engraved in mezzotinto. There are several plates by him of ludicrous subjects, very indifferently executed; among which is a Dutch Burgomaster toying with his Kitchen-maid, very poorly etched.

HAELWEGH, A., a Flemish engraver, born about the year 1670. He was employed chiefly by the booksellers, for whom he engraved several portraits and frontispieces, in a stiff, formal style. He resided some time at Copenhagen, where he engraved some portraits of distinguished Danish personages. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Sophia Amelia, Queen of Denmark and Norway; after A. Wachters.

Christian, Count of Rantzou, Minister of State; after the same.

Louis, Landgrave of Hesse Cassel; after Duarte.

The Duke of Argyie, in armour.

The reverend patriot, George Walker, Governor of Londonderry.

Jacob Oldenborg, Phil. Doct.; after A. Houbraken.

He also engraved a frontispiece for the Flora Danica Simonis Pauli, with the portrait of the author; and the Four Seasons; after Karel van Mander. [If this article refers to Adrian Haehoegh, there are prints by him with the date 1673; if to Albert, there is one with the date 1666, and some are quoted even earlier. The truth is that there is great obscurity about the Haelweghs, Adrian, Albert, and Adam. Lists of their works will be found in Nagler by those who are curious in the matter; but readers in general would hardly care to have a dissertation respecting them introduced here.]

HAERLEM, CORNELIUS CORNELISZ, called CORNELIUS VAN. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1562. His family name was Cornelisz, but he is universally known by the name of Cornelius van Haerlem. Having shown an early inclination for the art, his parents placed him under the tuition of Peter Aertsen the younger, called Long Peter, under whom he studied until he was seventeen years of age, when he formed the design of travelling through France to Italy, and with that intention he embarked in a vessel for Rouen. On his arrival at that port he was prevented landing by the plague, with which that city was afflicted, and was obliged to return to Holland. He soon after visited Antwerp, where he first became a disciple of Francis Pourbus, and afterwards of Giles Coignet. The improvement he made under these masters was such, that he abandoned his project of visiting Italy, and he returned to Haerlem, presenting his last instructor with one of his best pictures of the Bath of Diana and her Nymphs. On his return to his native city, in 1583, he was employed to paint a large picture for the Hall of the Company of Archers, representing the portraits of the principal members of that society. This picture, though an assemblage of portraits, he composed with the science and arrangement of an historical painter, in which the ordonnance, colouring, and design were equally admirable. Van Mander, arriving at Haerlem soon after it was finished, declared he had seen nothing of the time that surpassed it. Deprived by accidental circumstances of the advantage of visiting Rome, he collected the most celebrated models and casts, from which he formed his taste of design. He is said by Descamps to have painted a large picture of the Deluge, for the Earl of Leicester, which, if true, must have been done before he was twenty-seven years of age, as the Earl died in 1588. He died in 1638. [It is by no means certain that the family name was Cornelisz; Cornelisz is an abbreviation of Corneliszoon, signifying son of Cornelius, and should be read Cornelius son of Cornelius of Haerlem.]

HAERLEM, DIRK (THEODORE) VAN, an ancient Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about the year 1410. Van Mander speaks highly of the works of this venerable painter, and particularly of an altarpiece he describes in one of the churches at Leyden; the principal picture represented our Saviour, and the two folding-doors St. Peter and St. Paul. It is dated 1462. The whole is very highly finished, and less crude and dry than was usual at that early period of the art. He died in 1470. [Dirck of Haarlem, Dirck of Louvain, and Theodore Stuerbout, signify one and the same painter. It is now pretty clearly ascertained that Stuerbout was the family name, and that he was called Dirck of Haerlem from the place of his birth, and Dirck of Louvain from having painted a number of pictures there. Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys, in his excellent Catalogue of the Pictures in the private collection of the King of Holland, gives an interesting description of two large pictures, now in his Majesty's possession, which were discovered in the council-house of Louvain, and which are undoubtedly the work of Dirck of Haarlem. "Karl Van Mander ignore qui fut le maitre de Dirck de Haarlem, mais, à en juger par les deux tableaux qui sont maintenant dans ce palais, il est evident que Dirck de Haarlem a fait ses etudes à l'ecole de Bruges; car ces tableaux ont assez de rapport avec les ouvrages de Roger de Bruges et d'Hemling, pour qu'on puisse être convaincu que celui qui les peignit adopta leurs manières; d'où l'on peut conclure que les premiers artistes de Haarlem qui ont peint à l'huile, ont été en rapport avec l'ancienne école de Bruges." Mr. Nieuwenhuys having satisfactorily proved that the two pictures described by him are by Dirck of Haarlem, and the analogy they bear to the works of the great masters who flourished contemporaneously at Bruges, further observes, "Ce n'est que depuis Dirck de Haarlem que l'on a commencé à s'occuper avec intérêt de l'école hollandaise, dont il fut le fondateur, et qui brilla depuis avec tant d'éclat. Les deux tableaux que je viens de décrire sont donc singulièrement précieux pour la Hollande; ce sont les seuls qu'elle possède de son premier maitre. Monuments de l'art national, ils peuvent en même temps servir de termes de comparaison pour nous convainere que les deux tableaux qui ornent l'église collégiale de Saint Pierre à Louvain, représentant, l'un la Cène, et l'autre, à deux volets, le supplice de saint Erasme, bien qu'on les attribue à Hemling, sont réellement l'œuvre de Dirck de Haarlem, surnommé Stuerbout." Mr. Nieuwenhuys has also discovered a print of his portrait, on which is inscribed at the top, Floruit Harlemi et Lovanii, An. 1462; and below, Theodori Harlemio pictori; with four eulogistic lines in Latin, containing the hackneyed compliment of "Nature fearing the rivalry of his art," &c.]

[HAESKEL, ———, a Dutch or Flemish portrait painter, who flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. It is probable that he visited England, as some of his portraits have the character and costume of persons of distinction of the country at that period. His manner of painting has a strong resemblance to that of Dobson. There is no record of him in any of the writers on these subjects; and this notice is in consequence of seeing two portraits, a gentleman and a lady, with the name, and date 1647: it may lead to further discovery.]

HAFFNER, MELCHIOR, a German engraver, who flourished about 1680. He worked principally for the booksellers, and his chief performance was a set of portraits for a work entitled Templum Honoris, published at Vienna in 1673, by Theophilus Spizelius; they are neatly executed. He also engraved a frontispiece for a book entitled Bibliotheca Realis Universalis, published at Francfort in 1685. It represents the interior of a large library, executed entirely with the graver.

HAGEDORN, CHRISTIAN LOUIS DE, a German amateur engraver, who flourished about the year 1745. This gentleman was a great admirer of the arts, and for his amusement etched about fifty plates of landscapes, heads, and caricatures, from his own designs, in a spirited and masterly style. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher LD. The following is a list of his prints:

Six sheets of Heads and Caricatures, called his Erster Versuch,* or his First Essay; dated 1744.

Six sheets of studies of Heads, containing thirty-six Heads; in two of the sheets there are landscapes below the heads, with the cipher, and inscribed Appendix, 1744.

Thirty-six Landscapes; called Landschaften, (Landscapes); dated in 1744 and 1745; numbered.

Six sheets, containing seven Landscapes; called Neue Versuch; dated 1765.

HAGEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1635. He painted landscapes and views, chiefly taken from the environs of Cleves and Nimuegen. The pictures of this master are admirably painted; but having made use of a pernicious colour, much in vogue at his time, called Haerlem blue, the freshness of his verdure and skies has flown, and his pictures are much deteriorated. One of the best of his landscapes is deemed worthy a place in the gallery of the Louvre; it represents the View of a Village in the middle of a Plain; in the fore-ground is a Sportsman, followed by his Servant leading his Dogs; dated 1660. [His pictures are generally small, and partake of the manner of Dekker and Rontbouts. They were common a few years ago, but on account of the fault above named obtained small prices. He died in 1679.]

HAGENS, CHRISTOPHER, an obscure Dutch engraver, who lived about the year 1664. In that year he engraved a portrait of Sir William Davidson, resident in Holland for Scotland, drawn by himself, ad vivum, at Amsterdam.

HAID, JOHN JACOB, a German portrait painter, and engraver in mezzotinto, born in the duchy of Wurtemberg in 1703. He went young to Augsburg, where he became a pupil of Ridinger. He painted portraits with success, and distinguished himself by the plates he scraped of the portraits of the illustrious personages of Germany, which, with their Lives, written by Jacob Brucker, was published in a large folio volume, containing a hundred prints, at Augsburg, in 1741. Among his best prints are the following:

Carl Ludwig, Count of Hohenloe.
Christophorus Fridericus, Baron of Seckendorf
Felix Meyer, painter.
Egidius Verhelst, sculptor.
Joannes Carolus Hedlinger, sculptor.
Marcus Fridericus Kleimert, painter.
Georgius Brandmuller, painter.

[He died in 1767, according to Nagler, who gives a good list of his works.]

HAID, JOHN GOTTFRIED, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Augsburg in 1730, and was instructed by his father. He came to England when he was young, and engraved some plates in mezzotinto for Mr. Boydell, which are executed in a very respectable style. He also executed several plates after his return to Germany, which possess great merit. The following are among his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

George II.
Maria Theresa, Empress of Germany.
Joseph II., Emperor of Germany; after Weickart. 1770.
Lord Camden; after Reynolds.
Garrick, in the Farmer's Return; after Zoffany.
Foote, in the character of Major Sturgeon; after the same.
James Anthony Arlaud, painter; after Largilliere.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Virginia; after Nathaniel Dance.
Absalom's Submission to his Father; after F. Bol.
Abraham offering up his son Isaac; after Rembrandt.

[According to Zani and Nagler, he was born in 1710, and died in 1776. His works are numerous, and consist chiefly of portraits. See Nagler.]

HAID, JOHN ELIAS, was the younger son of John Jacob Haid, born at Augsburg in 1740, and was instructed in mezzotinto engraving by his father. Independent of a number of portraits, we have by him various subjects after different masters. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Joannes Jacobus Haidius, Pictor et Calcographus; after Graff.
Antonius Graff, Pictor; se ipse pinx. 1766.
Joannes Koella Pictor Tigur; J. Koella, pinx. 1776.
Johann Winkelmann; after Liotard. 1782.

SUBJECTS.

The Nativity; after Rembrandt.
The Raising of Lazarus; after the same.
[He died in 1809. Like the preceding artists of the same family, he was very industrious, and engraved numerous portraits of distinguished persons. For a list see Nagler.]

HAINZELMÄNN, ELIAS, a German engraver, born at Augsburg in 1640. After learning the first principles of design in his native city, he went to

* Mr. Strutt has been led into a whimsical mistake in the article of this amateur, by following the blunder of Basan, who, speaking of this engraver, has stated that he etched some plates from Versuch, and other masters. Versuch, in German, means essay.

Paris, where he became a pupil of Francis Poilly, whose manner he followed with great success. Although not very correct in his design, his prints possess great merit, particularly his portraits. The following are among his best plates :

PORTRAITS.

S. Franciscus Xaverius, Societatis Jesu.
Aegedius Strauch, Theologiae Doctor. 1682.
Marcus Huberus, Reipubl. Augustanae Senator.
David Thoman ab Hagelstein, Juris consultus.
Carolus liber Baro a Friesen.
Gabriel Willer, Juris consultus.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin presenting^a Pinks to the infant Jesus; after Raffaele.
Christ appearing to Magdalene; after Albano.
St. Francis praying before a Crucifix; after Domenichino.
The Virgin, with the Infant sleeping, and St. John, called the Silence; after An. Caracci. This subject has been engraved by Michael Lasne, Stephen Picart, and Bartolozzi.
The Holy Family, with St. John presenting a Lamb to the infant Christ; after Sebastian Bourdon.
The Holy Family, with the Virgin washing Linen; after the same.
The Holy Family, with St. John presenting an Apple to the infant Jesus; after the same.

[He died in 1693.]

HAINZELMAN, JOHN, the brother of the foregoing artist, was born at Augsburg in 1641. He accompanied his brother to Paris, and was also instructed in engraving by Francis Poilly. We have by him a variety of subjects, from various masters, and a number of portraits, which he designed from the life, in which his design is more correct than that of Elias. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

John Sobieski, King of Poland; J. Hainzelmann, del. et sec. 1684.
The Elector Frederick William; after de Clerck.
Philippe Dufour, Chevalier; Paris, 1682.
J. B. Tavernier, Ambassador to Persia, in an Oriental dress. 1679.
Claude le Pelletier, Minister of State. 1687.
M. F. le Teller, Marquis de Louvois; after F. Voet.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The infant Jesus embracing the Virgin; after An. Caracci.
The Virgin and Infant, with St. John; after J. Guillebaud.
The Annunciation; after Sebastian Bourdon.
The Holy Family; after the same.
The Repose in Egypt; after the same.

[Nagler says he died in 1693, the same year as his brother; but Zani states that he was living in 1700.]

[HAL, NICOLAS VAN, was born at Antwerp in 1668. His early historical pictures were esteemed for the genius displayed in the compositions, the beauty of the colour, and correctness of design. He also introduced nymphs and geni in the pictures of Hardimé, and other flower painters. His latter productions are, however, not held in much estimation. He died in 1738.]

HALBECK, JOHN. This engraver was a native of Copenhagen, and flourished about the year 1618. He engraved a variety of prints, executed entirely with the graver, in a stiff, formal style. Among other plates, he engraved a set of grotesque ornaments, dated 1618, and a large plate of the Heads of the Emperors, from Julius Cæsar to Ferdinand II.

HALBOU, JOHN LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1730. He was a pupil of N. G.

Dupuis, and has executed several plates with the graver, of various subjects, in a neat, pleasing style. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

Le Jeune Aubergiste; after Coquetet.
Le galant Boulanger; after the same.
Le Buveur trop grave; after F. Meris.
La Toilette du Savoyard; after Murillo.
Le Tems perdu; after P. A. Wille.
Les Intrigues amoureuses; after Schenau.
Le Beau Commissaire; after Eisen.
La Jolie Charlatane; after the same.
La Sultane favorite; after Jeaurat.
Le Sultan galant; after the same.

[HALDEN WANG, CHRISTIAN, an eminent landscape engraver, was born at Durlack in 1779, and died at Rippoldsau in 1831. He was articled to Christian von Mechel, at Basle, who ranked high in his profession. He lived five years in this establishment, destitute of every means that could promote his education as an artist; for, says his biographer, it was rather a factory than a school of art. The examples set before him were only French engravings, or pieces of Mechel manufacture. He, however, obtained a sight of some of Middiman's Views in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and others by Woollett, which were probably presents from those artists to Mechel. The sight of these prints excited in Haldenwang a desire to imitate them, and he determined to make Woollett his model. This did not tend to ingratiate him with Mechel, who called him "a maker of horse-shoes" when he saw the strong lines in the foreground of the plate of "St. Maurice's Bridge." Haldenwang, however, still prosecuted his studies, and at length completed his engagement with Mechel. At the latter part of his time he made some attempts at aquatint, which, though injurious to his health, had beneficial results; for some well-executed works in this kind obtained the notice of the Chalcographic Society, and he went to Dessau in 1796, where he remained for eight years, producing many beautiful landscapes, and improving his skill in that style of engraving. The reputation he acquired induced Charles Frederic of Baden, to appoint him engraver to the Court of Carlsruhe. During the time the French had the ascendancy in Germany, he was obliged to work for the booksellers. It was then that he executed the views in the Rhenish Pocket-book, and the two masterly engravings for the "Travels in Brazil," of Prince Maximilian of Neuwied. He also executed four landscapes, after Claude and Ruisdael, for the "Musée Napoleon." Haldenwang's model, particularly in the latter part of his time, was Woollett; and some German critics are of opinion that he has excelled that artist, with reference to harmony and judicious moderation in his treatment of the subject. Bè that as it may, as an engraver of landscapes he holds a distinguished rank among his countrymen. He unites power with grace, and picturesque freedom with delicate execution. His best pieces are after Claude, G. Poussin, Bolognese, Ruisdael, Hakkert, Elsheimer, and Paul Potter.]

[HALEN, ARNOULD VAN, a painter and engraver. The works by which he is best known are designs in chiaro-scuro, or relief. As an engraver he excelled in mezzotinto. He painted and engraved the portrait of Lambert Bidlo, the poet. He resided at Antwerp, and died there in 1732.]

[HALEN, PETER VAN, of Antwerp, an excellent landscape painter, who flourished about 1660. His landscapes, in which he sometimes imitated Claude, are generally enlivened with a number of small figures. Several of his pictures were brought to England at the conclusion of the late war, but are now of rare occurrence. It is said that he also painted historical and bacchanalian subjects; but none of that class have come under the editor's notice.]

HALL, CHARLES. This artist was an Englishman, born about the year 1720. He was brought up a letter engraver, but he soon aspired to a more respectable branch of the art; and he was much employed in engraving portraits, coins, medals, and other antiquities. His portraits are his best works; and independent of the merit of their execution, they are faithful representations of the originals from which they are taken. The following are his best productions:

PORTRAITS.

Thomas Howard, when Earl of Surrey, who gained the victory at Flodden Field.

Henry Fitzallen, Earl of Arundel; after Holbein.

Catherine, Marchioness of Pembroke; after Passe.

Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke; after the same.

Sir Francis Wortley; after Hertocks.

Sir George Barnes, Lord Mayor of London.

William Hervey, Herald.

Thomas Goodrich, Bishop of Ely, Lord Chancellor.

He died in London, in 1783.

HALL, JOHN, an English engraver, "was born at Wivenhoe, near Colchester, Essex, Dec. 21, 1739. He came to London at an early period of his life, but was not originally designed for that particular branch of the fine arts which he afterwards cultivated with so much success. Having exhibited considerable talents for drawing, he was placed under the care of Mr. Ravenet, the engraver, with whom Mr. W. W. Ryland was at the same time. There is still extant an admirable drawing by Mr. Hall, done with pen and ink, in imitation of engraving, and, excepting by a nice judge, scarcely discernible from engraving. It was done at the age of seventeen. The subject is two Children with a Cat, from a French print. His first friends in London were Sir Stephen Theodore Jansen, and Jonas Hanway, Esq. On the decease of Woollett he was appointed historical engraver to the king, and had on that occasion the honour of presenting to his Majesty, at Windsor, his print of the Battle of the Boyne, being introduced by Mr. West. He died April 7, 1797, in his 58th year, and was buried at Paddington.

"His style of engraving was entirely confined to that more laborious but fine department which is called the line or stroke engraving." He engraved several plates for the collection of Mr. Boydell; they are chiefly executed with the graver, in a bold, clear style, and possess great merit. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Pope Clement IX.; after Carlo Maratti. 1767.

Sir Robert Boyd, Lieutenant-Governor of Gibraltar.

William Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester; after Hoare.

Richard Chenevix, Bishop of Killaloe.

Richard Brinsley Sheridan, M. P.; after Reynolds.

Sir William Blackstone, Justice of the Common Pleas; after Gainsborough.

Edward Gibbon, historian; after Reynolds.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Timon of Athens; after Dance.

William Penn treating with the Indians for the Province of Pennsylvania; after West.

Oliver Cromwell dissolving the Long Parliament; after the same.

The Death of the Duke of Schomberg, at the Battle of the Boyne; after the same.

HALLÉ, CLAUDE GUY, a French painter, born at Paris in 1651. He was the son of Daniel Hallé, an historical painter of little celebrity, who taught him the rudiments of the art; and it does not appear that he had the advantage of superior instruction, or that he ever travelled out of his own country. In 1680 he painted a large picture of Christ driving the Money-changers out of the Temple, for the church of Notre Dame, which gained him considerable reputation; and in 1682 he was made a member of the Royal Academy at Paris. In the same church is one of his best productions, representing the Annunciation. There are several other pictures by him in the churches at Paris. His colouring is agreeable, but not vigorous; and his design, though not incorrect, is mannered and constrained. He died in Paris in 1736.

HALLÉ, NOËL, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1711. According to M. Watelet, he was one of those artists who had few defects, but to whom nature had refused the fire and inspiration so essential to reach an elevated rank in the art. His best performance is the picture he painted for the church of St. Louis at Versailles. He died at Paris in 1781. We have by this painter a few etchings from his own designs, among which are Antiochus thrown from his Chariot, and the Companion.

[HALLEMAN, THOMAS, a portrait and historical painter, who flourished about 1691. He resided at Rotterdam, and little else is known of his life.]

HALS, FRANCIS. This celebrated portrait painter was born at Mechlin in 1584, and was a disciple of Karel van Mander. Few painters have equalled Hals in his particular department, and of the numerous artists of his country, he has only been surpassed in it by Vandyck. His colouring is chaste, and at the same time vigorous, and his heads are full of life and character. It was the opinion of Vandyck, that no artist would have equalled him in his profession, if he could have given more tenderness to his colouring. Houbraken recounts a whimsical anecdote respecting this painter. Previous to the departure of Vandyck for England, he went to Haerlem, for the express purpose of visiting an artist of whose works he had conceived so high an opinion. On his arrival, Hals was, as usual, at the tavern, where he was more frequently to be found than in his painting-room. Vandyck requested that he might be sent for, representing himself as a traveller, who was desirous of having his portrait painted, but that he could only allow two hours for that purpose. The painter readily obeyed the summons, and catching up the first cloth he could find, set about painting the picture with all possible despatch, and finished it within the time, desiring his model to rise and look at what he had done. Vandyck expressed his approbation of the performance, observing, that it appeared to him to be a very easy art, and that he should like to try what he could do in that way, requesting him to take his place. In a short time, he sketched an admirable portrait of Hals, who, on seeing it, exclaimed, "You are Vandyck or the d——l," embracing him with enthusiasm. It is added, that Vandyck invited him to accompany him to England, where his talent would be properly rewarded, but Hals declined the proposal, alleging, that he was perfectly content with his situation. The most capital work of this master is a large picture in the hall of the Company of Archers at Delft, representing the portraits of the members. It is painted with surprising life and vigour. He died in 1666.

HALS, DIRK, (THEODORE,) was the brother of the foregoing artist, born at Mechlin in 1589, and was a scholar of Abraham Bloemaert. In the early part of his life he painted animals and huntings; but he afterwards changed his subjects for village festivals and merry-makings, which he treated with considerable humour. He died in 1656.

[HALS, NICOLAS, the youngest son of Frank Hals, was a painter of landscapes and villages, with animals and figures.]

HAMEL, A. B. DU, a French engraver, who flourished about 1760. He resided at Paris, and was employed chiefly by the booksellers in engraving portraits, and other book-ornaments. Among others, we have the following portraits by him :

Joliot de Crebillon.

Jean Jacques Rousseau.

[HAMILTON, CHARLES WILLIAM VAN, born at Brussels in 1668, and died at Augsburg in 1754, was a good painter of birds and insects.]

HAMILTON, GAVIN, was descended from an ancient Scotch family. After receiving a liberal education he went to Italy, and resided at Rome the greater part of his life. He was more distinguished for his ardour in promoting the fine arts, than his celebrity as a painter; in collecting antiquities, and advancing the interests of science. Without the possession of much fertility of invention, he became a chaste and careful designer; and with the advantage of a highly cultivated mind, a devout adherence to the propriety of costume, and a familiarity with the antique, he reached a respectable, if not a brilliant rank, among the modern painters of history. His best pictures are from subjects taken from the Iliad; Achilles grasping the Dead Body of Patrocles, and rejecting the Consolation of the Grecian chiefs; Achilles dismissing Briseis; and Hector tied to his Car, are among his most esteemed performances. Mr. Hamilton published an interesting work, his Schola Italica Picturae, for the purpose of demonstrating the progress of the art from the time of Leonardo da Vinci, to the period which succeeded the school of the Caracci. He died about the year 1775. [He died in 1797.]

[HAMILTON, JOHN GEORGE VAN, born at Brussels in 1666, and died at Vienna in 1740; painted horses and subjects of the chase.]

HAMILTON, WILLIAM. This eminent artist was of Scotch parentage, though it is probable he was born in London in 1751. When he was very young he accompanied A. Zucchi to Italy. After a residence of some years at Rome, he returned to England, and soon distinguished himself by the readiness of his invention, the snavity of his style, and the charm of his colouring. Mr. Hamilton flourished at a period when the enterprise of commercial speculation, combined with a laudable project for the encouragement of modern art, set on foot the spirited undertakings of Messrs. Boydell's Illustration of Shakspeare; Macklin's Biblical and Poets' Galleries; and that of English History, by Mr. Bowyer. In all these, Mr. Hamilton was extensively employed; and in all his productions received the marked approbation of his employers, and the admiration of the public. His coloured drawings may be placed among the most tasteful and effective efforts of the art in that style. This excellent artist possessed the most gentle and amiable manners. It has been justly observed of him, that "his politeness covered no insincerity, nor his emulation envy." He died, generally beloved and lamented, in the vigour of life, in 1801. Mr. Hamilton was a Royal Academician.

HANCOCK, R., an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished about the year 1785. He engraved several portraits, among which are the following:

General William Kingsley; after Reynolds.

Lady Chambers; after the same.

Miss Day, afterwards Lady Fenhoulet; after the same.

Mark Noble, Rector of Barming; prefixed to his History of the House of Cromwell.

John Wesley, M. A.; after Miller.

James Wright, of Frome; after J. Wright; scarce.

William Hopley, Verger of the Cathedral of Worcester; after the same.

Robert Hancock, Engraver, of Worcester; after the same. This print is called unique in Bromley's Catalogue.

HANDERLOT, FRANCIS, a French engraver, mentioned by Florent le Comte. He engraved, among other prints, a plate representing St. John thrown into the Caldron of boiling Oil, after C. le Brun.

[HANGEST, ROBERT MARINUS FREDERIK D', an amateur painter, born at Utrecht in 1746. While studying the law he took lessons of Versteegh in painting. After finishing his legal studies, he set out on his travels as an artist, and commenced his course by painting landscapes, in the manner of Zafleven; views of the Rhine, and rocky scenery; landscapes with lakes and rivers; sun-sets and moonlights, in which he was very successful. His pencilling is vigorous and free; and his pictures would not discredit a professor. They are not to be found in commerce, as his heirs, on his death in 1810, took each a portion. He left about thirty, six of which are in the manner of Zafleven.]

[HANNAN, WILLIAM, a native of Scotland, who served his apprenticeship to a cabinet-maker, but afterwards devoted himself to painting. He came to London, and was patronized by Lord le Despenser, who employed him to paint several of the ceilings of his seat at West Wycombe; one of the designs is by Cipriani. Woollett engraved some of his landscapes. He died in 1775.]

HANNEMAN, ADRIAN. This painter is mis-called John, by Mr. Pilkington. He was born at the Hague in 1611, and was a disciple of John Ravesteyn, not of Hubert Ravesteyn, as asserted by that author, who, by his own account, was born about the year 1647, consequently upwards of thirty years younger than Hanneman. He had distinguished himself as a portrait painter at the Hague, when the encouragement given to the arts by Charles I. induced him to visit England soon after Vanduyck's arrival in this country. His talents recommended him to immediate employment, and, during a residence of sixteen years, he painted the portraits of several of the nobility. He greatly improved his style whilst he was in England, by studying and copying the works of Vanduyck; and he became one of the most successful imitators of his style. He returned to Holland on the commencement of the civil wars, and resided at the Hague. He painted a portrait of Charles II., before the Restoration, of which there is a print by Henry Dankers. He was made painter to Mary, Princess of Orange; and in 1665 was director of the Academy at the Hague. Hanneman occasionally painted historical subjects, of which his best performance is an emblematical picture of Peace, in the council-chamber of the States at the Hague. He died in 1680.

[HANSEN, CHARLES LOUIS, born at Amsterdam in 1765, was a scholar of Peter Barbiere Pietersz; he painted landscapes, views of cities and villages, and also interiors. His pictures are to be found in several rich collections. He died in 1840.]

HARDIME, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1678. He was a scholar of his brother Simon Hardime, an indifferent flower painter, who, according to Descamps, died in London in 1737, but he is not mentioned in the Anecdotes. He greatly surpassed his brother in the beauty of his colouring and the arrangement of his groups. He resided chiefly at the Hague, where his pictures were for some time much in vogue. Having married the sister of the abbot of the Bernardines, near Antwerp, he was commissioned to paint four large pictures, for that convent, of the Four Seasons, in which he introduced the particular fruit and flowers that are produced in each. These were greatly admired; and he was soon afterwards commissioned to paint a picture of flowers and fruit, which gave great satisfaction. In conjunction with Terwesten, who painted the figures, he ornamented the apartments of the Hotel of the Count of Wassenaer with some of his best performances. Towards the latter part of his life he retired to Dort, where he died, in 1748. [Immerzeel calls him Harbrinè.]

HARDOUIN, MICHAEL, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about the year 1680. He engraved the plates for a work entitled Livre des Plans, Profiles, et Elevations du Chateau de Clayny, pres de Versailles, published at Paris by M. Cossin, engraver to the King. The plates are executed in a neat style, chiefly with the graver.

HAREFELDT, or HAREVELD, BERNARD, an indifferent Flemish engraver, who, according to Bassan, flourished at Antwerp about the middle of the seventeenth century. Among other prints by him, we have the Crucifixion; after Rubens.

HARING, DANIEL, was born at the Hague about the year 1636. He painted portraits in the manner of Netscher, and though inferior to that master, his works were esteemed, and he painted the portraits of many of the most considerable families in Holland.

[HARINGS, MATTHEW, a portrait painter of Leuwarden, lived about 1637. His portraits are said to have been excellent likenesses, and well painted. Some writers place his birth in the same year as that of Daniel Haring, and describe his works as similar to those of that artist; but not correctly.]

[HARLING, DANIEL, born at the Hague about 1636; painted portraits in the style of Netscher. He became director of the Academy of his native place, and died there in 1706. No doubt the same artist as Daniel Haring, though Immerzeel and Balkema mention them as two.]

seem strange in any other profession. He was to pay one hundred guineas yearly, as a pupil; that is to say, "for permission to have access to Sir Thomas's house at nine o'clock in the morning, with leave to copy his pictures till four o'clock in the afternoon, but to receive no instruction of any kind." It appears, however, that the master (if he may be so called) soon perceived the talents of the pupil, (if he may be so called,) and availed himself of them by employing him to prepare some of his pictures in the dead colouring, and to advance copies. He remained with Lawrence about eighteen months, and it is allowed that he entered more largely into the peculiar style and character of that master's performances than any other of his pupils, so called. His success must be attributed solely to himself; for Lawrence, though he employed him in forwarding portraits, never condescended to instruct him further than how to accomplish that drudgery. It seems that they separated on not very amicable terms; whether that Harlow was conscious of his abilities, and did not relish the mechanical labour to which he was subjected, or disgusted with the cold, measured graciousness of a master who taught him nothing; or that the master perceived a spirit of rivalry and rebellion growing in the pupil, the connexion terminated abruptly. A quarrel with Lawrence was a quarrel with the Royal Academy, and, consequently, when Harlow afterwards offered himself as a candidate for the rank of Associate to that body, he was rejected: Fuseli was the only member who voted in his favour, and vindicated himself by observing, that "he voted for the talent, and not for the man." The first works of Harlow were of the historical kind; Bolingbroke's Entry into London, and the Quarrel between Queen Elizabeth and Essex. As these attempts were not very successful, he was induced to paint portraits; and as he had considerable facility of hand, skill in drawing, and generally caught the proper peculiarity of character, he soon obtained many sitters. But the work that first attracted the attention of the public was the Hubert and Prince Arthur, which he painted for a Mr. Leader. This person's knowledge, or judgment, it seems, was not in accordance with that of the public, for he returned the picture to the artist in exchange for portraits of his daughters. The success of his portraits, and the praise, without patronage, which his historical attempts obtained, induced him to try a blending of the two styles in one subject; and, accordingly, he commenced what is called The Trial of Queen Catharine or, more properly, The Kemble Family. This he painted for Mr. Welch, the professor of music. Its popularity was very great; and the print which was engraved from it had an extensive sale, both in England and on the continent. In 1818, Harlow went to Italy to acquire the art of drawing the human figure with purity and taste; and he astonished the Italian artists by the rapidity with which he copied The Transfiguration of Raphael. Canova complimented him by saying, that "it rather seemed the work of eighteen weeks than of eighteen days," the time in which he made this correct and beautiful copy, of the same size as the original. He was introduced to the pope by Canova, and was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke, to which he gave his picture of The Presentation of the Cardinal's Hat to Wolsey in Westminster Hall. He returned to London in 1819, and shortly afterwards was attacked by a severe disease, which terminated his life in his thirty-second year.]

HARNSIUS, P. A., a Dutch engraver, born at Haerlem, and flourished about the year 1611. He etched several plates in a spirited style; among others, we have by him a plate of the Ecce Homo, from his own design, dated 1611, and the Funeral Procession of William Ludwich, of Nassau, in four sheets.

HARP, VAN. Although the works of this estimable painter are so generally known and admired, he has escaped the notice of every writer on art. He is supposed to have been brought up in the school of Rubens, whose vigorous touch, and brilliancy of colour, he nearly approached. He copied some of the large works of that admirable painter on a small scale; and his pictures of that description are frequently taken for the productions of Rubens. His most esteemed pictures are those of his own composition, representing the interiors of Flemish farm-houses, with peasants regaling. His figures are boldly designed, his colouring clear and harmonious, and his pencil flowing and facile. The works of Van Harp are deservedly placed in the choicest collections. [His name was Gerard Van Herp, for so he signed it on his pictures. He painted a great variety of subjects, sacred and profane. His easel pictures are generally on copper. Some are very carefully painted; some loosely. His manner partakes largely of the school of Rubens; but his pictures can hardly be mistaken for the work of that master. There is a good specimen in the National Gallery, bequeathed by the late Richard Simmons.]

HARREWYN, FRANCIS, a Flemish engraver, born at Brussels about the year 1675. He was a pupil of Romeyn de Hooghe, but was very inferior to his instructor. He engraved a set of views, castles, &c., for Le Roy's Account of the Brabant Families, published in 1699. We have also the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Henry of Lorraine, Duke of Guise.

Margaret of Valois.

Albert, Archduke of Austria, kneeling, with a Book, and St. James by his side; after Rubens.

Isabella, Infanta of Spain, kneeling, with St. Margaret presenting her a Crown of Flowers; after the same.

Two Views of Rubens' House, one from the court and the other from the garden; Harrewyn, fecit.

HARRIS, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He engraved some architectural views for the fourth volume of the Vitruvius Britannicum, published in 1739. We have also by him a plan of the Encampment of the Royal Army on Hounslow Heath, dated 1686, with his name. In conjunction with John Kip, he engraved some large plates of views of gentlemen's seats.

HARRIS, MOSES. This artist was an Englishman. He engraved a book of Insects, with his own portrait prefixed to it. He flourished 1778.

HARTLEY, MISS. This ingenious young lady executed a charming etching of Jeddiah Buxton, the celebrated arithmetician, from the life; dated 1764. She also etched a landscape, dated Dec. 5, 1761.

[HARTZOEKER, THEODORE, born at Utrecht in 1696; studied in Italy under Balestra. He was considered a good historical painter. He died at Utrecht in 1740.]

HARWEYN, JAMES. This artist was a native of Flanders, and flourished about the year 1696. He engraved several views of chateaus and gentlemen's seats in the Netherlands, which are etched in a neat, pleasing style.

[HÄSSEL, JACOB VAN, lived in 1650. He painted landscapes and rivers; the views are principally of the environs of Rome.]

HATTIN, or HATTINS, JOHN, an obscure English engraver, by whom, among other things, we have a small plate of a View of old St. Paul's, executed with the graver, in a neat but tasteless style.

HAYER, JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1612. We have by him a set of wooden cuts of the portraits of the Electors of Saxony, executed in conjunction with Moses Thym. He also engraved some small copper-plates. He marked his prints H.

[HAVERMAN, MARGARET, the daughter of a schoolmaster at Amsterdam, was a scholar of Jan Van Huysum, and it is said her skill was so great as to excite the jealousy of her master. She resided at Paris, where her works were held in high estimation. They are sometimes sold as the work of Van Huysum; a mistake easily made, as that master, at his death, left many unfinished sketches, which, it is said, were finished by this lady.]

[HAUGHTON, MOSES, born at Wednesbury, in Staffordshire, in 1734, was brought up as an enamel painter under a Mr. Holden; he afterwards went to Birmingham, and was employed in the manufactories there as an ornament of tea-boards. But his excellence lay in delineations of still-life in water colours, in which department he was unequalled. As he was a man of quiet, unpretending habits, his superior talents were known only to a few. He passed the greater part of his life at his native place, esteemed by those who could appreciate his artistic works, and respected by all that knew him. He died in 1804, and was buried at Wednesbury, the place of his nativity. His son Matthew engraved some of the ornaments to the first edition of Roscoe's Life of Lorenzo de' Medici.]

[HAUGHTON, MOSES, nephew of the above, a distinguished miniature painter, born at Wednesbury, in Staffordshire, about 1772, was a pupil of the celebrated horse painter, Stubbs, but associated a number of years with Henry Fuseli, at the Royal Academy. He had a masculine style of painting on ivory and prepared paper, that gave his portraits, though in water colours, the appearance of oil pictures of the size of life. He had a perfect knowledge of the figure, and was ever ready to render assistance to the rising artists of the Academy, when difficulties presented themselves in their studies. Fuseli's estimate of his abilities may be conjectured by his intrusting him with the engraving of his Miltonic pictures, which he did with all the spirit of the originals. He was a frequent exhibitor at the Academy, but more, perhaps, for the sake of old associations, than from a desire of display. One great peculiarity in his portraits was, that they never lost the characteristic resemblance of the person they represented, even after a lapse of many years. His talent was not confined to miniature. He painted scriptural and rural subjects in oil. They are generally of a pathetic or sentimental kind, and show an intimate acquaintance with nature. He numbered among his friends the celebrated William Roscoe of Liverpool, his son Thomas, and all that most respected family, the Rev. Mr. Shepherd of Gataker, and numerous men of literary talents, who were cognizant of his ability. Some of his works have been engraved; among others, two very beautiful amatory subjects, entitled "The Love Dream," and "The Captive."]

HAUSSARD, or HAUSSART, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1700. He imitated with success the style of Benoit Andran.

His drawing is generally correct, and many of his plates are executed in a clear, neat style. His best prints are those he engraved for the Crozat collection, which are the following :

The Creation of Eve; after Giulio Romano.

Jupiter and Semele; after the same.

An Allegorical subject; after Sermoneta.

Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple; after Bart. Manfredi.

An Assembly at Table; after the same.

Moses Striking the Rock; after F. Romanelli.

The Rich Man and Lazarus; after Dom. Feti.

The Virgin and Infant; after la Fosse.

Pan and Syrinx; after J. Corrtin.

[HAYDON, BENJAMIN ROBERT, an English historical painter, was born at Plymouth in 1786, and became a student of the Royal Academy in 1804. In 1807 he exhibited his first picture, A Riposo of the Holy Family; in 1809 he exhibited Dentatus, for which he received the great prize at the Royal Institution; and this was followed by The Judgment of Solomon, which was exhibited at Spring Gardens, and the directors of the British Institution voted him a present of one hundred guineas; it was subsequently sold for seven hundred guineas. He had previously quarrelled with the Royal Academy as a body, or he might now have become a member. Haydon's ambition was to be the founder of an elevated school of art; his impetuosity of temper frustrated his views. He had the mind, the knowledge, and the energy suited to the purpose; but he had to contend with settled prejudices, and the undermining influences of persons whose position gave their opinions weight with society, and whose dislike of the man induced them to depreciate his works, and his attempts at improving the art. This he could not brook, for knowing the pitiable incompetency of his detractors, as artists, he boldly, but imprudently, retorted on them, and openly declared war; forgetting that ignorance in place is ever disposed to use its power malevolently against those who will not pay it homage, and submit to its dictates. Had Haydon been less enthusiastic for the advancement of the art and answered his opponents by the productions of his pencil instead of his pen, he would have taken a surer means to attain his object. His frequent tirades irritated his enemies, and furnished them with weapons which they too successfully used to crush his efforts, though they could not humble the man. His struggles for the promotion of his art involved him in pecuniary embarrassments; in 1827 a public subscription was made for his relief, when he gave this melancholy account of the fate of his great pictures: "My Judgment of Solomon is rolled up in a warehouse in the Borough; my Entry into Jerusalem, once graced by the enthusiasm of the rank and beauty of the three kingdoms, is doubled up in a back room in Holborn; my Lazarus is in an upholsterer's shop in Mount Street; and my Crucifixion, in a hay-loft at Lisson Grove." He was now an inmate of the King's Bench prison, where he painted the Mock Election that was held there, and which was purchased by George the Fourth, for five hundred guineas; and its companion, Chaining the Member, bought by Mr. Francis of Exeter, for three hundred guineas. Another picture of the same period, was his Pharaoh dismissing Moses, which Mr. Hunter, an East India merchant, purchased for five hundred guineas. It is needless to inquire why Haydon should remain embarrassed when he could obtain such prices, but so it was. He now attempted portrait painting, in which he was sure to fail of success: his genius was not suited for it; he painted vigorous likenesses, but disdained to flatter; he represented what beauty he found, but did not call in the assistance of the Graces to show it to advantage. In fact, in these matters, he was too great a stickler for truth to become a fashionable portrait painter. Some of his heads of men of intellect, done in black chalk, are admirable. His pictures of the Reform Banquet, and the Anti-Slavery Society, are merely collections of portraits. Napoleon at St. Helena was one of his most successful works; of this he made four copies, three of which were ordered by Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Duke of Sutherland. His Wellington at Waterloo did not receive the like approbation. He exhibited a Cartoon, as a candidate to paint a fresco in the new House of Parliament; but his ill fate attended him; the judges appointed by royal commission did not understand, or overlooked his performance. This was the death-blow to his hopes. He had laboured for forty years to exalt the art of painting, and had cherished the hope that some public work of magnitude would be his reward, and hand down his name with honour to posterity; that hope was blasted; he saw, as others did, a preference given to mediocrity and plagiarism. He made a last effort to vindicate his claims to distinction, and exhibited his Banishment of Aristides, and Nero playing on the Lyre while Rome is burning. In the adjoining room was an exhibition of a dwarf called Tom Thumb; the public, to the number of 120,000 in one week, flocked to the latter, while, in the same space of time, Haydon and Aristides received the visits of only 133. His pictures of Curtius plunging into the Gulf, and Alexander the Great encountering a Lion, are noble productions, worthy of ancient Greece, though not to the taste of this fastidious age. Haydon vindicated the correctness of the action in the former by a diagram, which at once convicted of ignorance the self-styled critics of the day. At the time of his death he was employed on a large picture, the subject, Alfred the Great and the First English Jury. Before this, broken-hearted and driven to desperation, he fell, on the 22nd of June, 1846, in the sixtieth year of his age, not leaving his equal as an English historical painter behind him. His friends, at the head of which were Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, Lord Morpeth, and Sir J. C. Hobhouse, held a meeting to devise means for the support of his widow and daughter, to which Sir Robert Peel contributed one hundred pounds, having shortly before the artist's death sent him fifty pounds. Her Majesty the Queen settled a pension of fifty pounds on Mrs. Haydon, and Lady Peel assigned to her twenty-five pounds a year, out of funds under her control. These are acts of munificence that deserve to be recorded.]

HAYE, CHARLES DE LA, a French engraver, born at Fontainebleau in 1641. He went early to Italy, where he engraved, conjointly with C. Bloemaert, Spierre, Blondeau, and others, the paintings by P. da Cortona, in the Palazzo Pitti at Florence. His style of engraving resembles that of Cornelius Bloemaert; and though his plates want harmony, they possess considerable merit. The following are among his best prints:

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Catherine and other Saints; after Ciro Ferri.

St. Philip Neri kneeling before the Virgin; after the same.

Coriolanus refusing to see the Roman Ambassadors; after the same.

The Grecian Philosophers in Conference; after Romanelli.

[HAYE, REYNIER DE LA, a Dutch painter of scenes of private life, attempted in the manner of Terburg and of Metsu; but his style is not so large nor so light, his colouring is not so vigorous, and his chiaro-scuro defective. He lived about 1670.]

HAYLS, JOHN. This English portrait painter lived in the reign of Charles II., and, according to Lord Orford, possessed an extraordinary talent for copying the pictures of Vandyck, and was a rival of Sir Peter Lely. At Woburn are some portraits of the illustrious house of Russell, painted by Hayls. He also painted the portrait of the father of Secretary Pepys, and another of Thomas Flatman, the poet and painter. He died in 1679.

HAYM, NICOLÒ FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, who resided in London in the year 1719, when he etched the plates for a work he published, entitled Tesoro Britannico.

HAYMAN, FRANCIS, an English painter, born in Devonshire in 1708. He was a scholar of Robert Brown, and leaving that master, was much employed in making designs for the booksellers. As a painter, he is principally known for the pictures he painted for Vauxhall, which are considered the best of his works. He died in 1776. He etched a few small plates, one of which represents Falstaff seated upon a drum. [He was one of the first members of the Royal Academy, and was librarian at the time of his death.]

HAYNSWORTH, WILLIAM, an indifferent English engraver, who lived towards the end of the seventeenth century. We have by him a portrait of Richard Cromwell. He also copied the print by Jerom David of Geffroy le Grandent le Lusignan, in a dark, stiff style.

HEAD, GUY. This artist was a native of Carlisle, and the son of a house painter in that city. He was instructed in the elements of design, and at an early age gave so much promise of future eminence in the art, that he obtained the patronage of a gentleman, who enabled him to visit Italy. He appears to have formed an idea, that the best method of study was the constant employment in copying the works of the old masters; a servile drudgery, by which none of the higher excellencies of the art can ever be acquired. On the subject of this erroneous method of proceeding, Sir Joshua Reynolds thus expresses himself in one of his admirable discourses: "I consider general copying as a delusive kind of industry; the student satisfies himself with the appearance of doing something; he falls into the dangerous habit of imitating without selecting, and of labouring without any determinate object; as it requires no effort of the mind, he sleeps over his work; and those powers of invention and composition which ought particularly to be called out and put in action, lie torpid, and lose their energy, for want of exercise." He painted some original pictures, which are not without merit, though they are rather dry in the outline and tame in the execution. His copies of the most celebrated pictures of the Italian and Flemish masters are very numerous. He died in the early part of the year 1801.

[HEAPHY, THOMAS, was brought up as an engraver, but soon devoted himself to painting in water colours. In the earlier part of his career he enjoyed more patronage than any other artist of the day, in his department. His "Fish-markets" caused a great sensation; and his scenes of low life found ardent admirers among the connoisseurs in vulgarity. The artist became disgusted with his own productions, and turned from the purlieus of St. Giles to the more refined precincts of St. James. He painted portraits of Queen Caroline, the Princess Charlotte, Prince Leopold, the Duke of Wellington and about fifty field-officers, in one piece; the print of the last is well known. In 1831 he visited Italy, and made many copies of celebrated works of art, which are said to be admirable. Heaphy was undoubtedly a man of talent. He studied nature, and his works possess much simplicity and truth, delicacy of colouring, and appropriate expression. His reputation would have been greater had he been less versatile. He did not confine himself to painting; he was equally expert at quarrying for stone, constructing a pleasure-boat, building a house, devising an improved axle, or laying down a railway. He was an intractable man: he was always opposed to the Academy; he was one of the earliest members of the old Water-colour Society, but soon seceded from it; after lending a willing hand to the Society of British Artists, of which he was the first president, he almost immediately withdrew from the connexion. He died in 1835.]

[HEARNE, THOMAS. This excellent artist was born in 1744, at Brinkworth, near Malmsbury, in Wiltshire. He came to London very early, and was articled to the celebrated engraver, William Woollett, with whom he continued for six years, and assisted him in many of his works. He did not long continue the practice of engraving; for at the expiration of his term with Woollett, he went as draughtsman with Lord Lavington, who was appointed Governor of the Leeward Islands, and remained nearly five years in the West Indies. On his return to England his fondness for antiquity led him to the study of Gothic architecture, combined with landscape, and in 1778 he engaged with Byrne in that valuable work, "The Antiquities of Great Britain," for which he made the whole of the drawings. He also made drawings for other publications: but it is in private collections that his works are chiefly to be found; and though, from the care and fidelity with which they are executed, they are not numerous, they are eminently distinguished for some of the best qualities of the art. He seldom attempted the bolder effects of nature; but for truth, a chaste and mild tone of colouring, and an admirable judgment in the arrangement of the whole, they have seldom been surpassed. He may be styled the father of all that is good in the art of painting landscape in water colours, which is peculiar to England. His works in pencil are a matchless combination of accuracy and tasteful execution. He died in 1817.]

[HEATH, JAMES, an eminent English engraver, born in 1765. His works are numerous, and his earlier productions, which are much esteemed, are to be found, as illustrations, in various publications by the booksellers. His larger plates are the Death of Major Pierson, after Singleton; the Dead Soldier, after Wright; the Riots in 1780; the Death of Nelson, after West; and Scenes from Shakspeare, after Smirke and Peters. He also assisted in completing the Canterbury Pilgrims, after Stothard.]

HECK, JOHN VAN. This painter was born at Quaremonde, near Oudenarde, in Flanders, about the year 1625. In the early part of his life he visited Italy, and resided some years at Rome, where he was patronized by the Duke of Bracciano. He painted small landscapes with figures, representing views of the environs of Rome, neatly drawn, and highly finished. He also excelled in painting flowers and fruit, vases of gold and silver, with figures of bronze and marble. His pictures of those subjects were in high estimation at Rome, where he met with great encouragement. In 1660 he returned to Flanders, where his works were equally esteemed. We have several etchings by this artist, executed in a free, spirited style, from his own designs, particularly a set of twelve plates of animals, dated 1656. [Died about 1670.]

HECK, NICHOLAS VANDER, was born at the Hague about the year 1580, and was a scholar of John Naeghel. He painted history and landscapes, but excelled particularly in the latter. Of his historical works, the most considerable are three large pictures in the town-house at Alkmaer, which are highly commended by Houbraken and Weyermans. In one, he has represented the Decollation of a Magistrate, for an act of oppression towards a peasant; the second is the terrible Justice of Cambyse; and the third, the Judgment of Solomon. His compositions are copious and ingenious, his penciling bold and firm; and there is a fine effect of the chiaro-scuro in his pictures. He was one of the founders of an academy at Alkmaer, in the year 1631. [He died in 1638.]

HECK, MARTIN HEMSKIRK VANDER, was the son of the preceding artist, and received his instruction from his father. He painted landscapes, with ruins, in the dark style of Roland Rogman, but never rose above mediocrity.

HECKELL, G. VAN, a Dutch painter, who flourished about the year 1660. He is not mentioned by any of the biographers of the artists of his country, but, from the style and character of his pictures, it is probable that he was a scholar of Gerard Douw. He painted similar subjects to those of that admired artist, and his works, though not equal to the extraordinary productions of Douw, are very highly finished, and brilliantly coloured; the masses of light and shadow are managed with great ability.

HECKENAVER, LEONARD, a German engraver, born at Augsburg about the year 1640. He engraved several of the plates for the Academia Artis Pictoriae, by Sandrart, published 1683. His plates are worked chiefly with the graver, in a formal, heavy style. Among other prints by him is a Holy Family; after Pietro Liberi, dated 1675.

HECKINS, ABRAHAM. This artist is supposed by Mr. Strutt to have been a goldsmith. He engraved a set of ornaments for goldsmiths and jewelers, executed in a neat style. They are signed Abraham Heckins, inv. et Celatar. 1634.

HECQUET, ROBERT, a French engraver, born at Abbeville about the year 1730. He resided several years at Paris, but was not very eminent in the art. We have by him an upright plate of a Woman Bathing; after Nicholas Poussin. He also engraved four small plates, copied from the large prints of the Labours of Hercules, by Rousset, after Guido.

HEDA, GUILLAUME KLAASZ, a painter of still-life, insects, flowers, and fruit, in the manner of David de Heem, was born at Haerlem in 1594. His pictures were formerly in much esteem, as it is recorded in Hoet's Catalogue that one sold at Dort, in 1708, for 105 florins, a large price at that time. He lived to a good old age, as Jacob De Bray painted his portrait in 1678, when he was in his eighty-fourth year.]

HEEDE, WILLIAM VAN. This painter was born at Furnes, in Flanders, in 1660. It is not said under whom he studied; but he travelled, when young, through France to Italy, where he resided a considerable time, and left many proofs of his ability as an historical painter at Rome, Naples, and Venice. On his return to Flanders, he was invited by the emperor to the court of Vienna, where he ornamented the imperial palace with several of his works. He did not reside long in his native town, as the only picture by him at Furnes is an altar-piece in the church of St. Walbourg, representing the Martyrdom of a Saint. It is finely composed, correctly drawn, and the colouring is rich and harmonious. It bears a great resemblance to the style of Gerard Lairese. He died in 1728. [His works are better known and more esteemed in foreign countries than in his own.]

HEEDE, VIGOR VAN, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Furnes in 1661. He accompanied him to Italy, where he did not remain long, but returned to Flanders, and painted history with some reputation, but was very inferior to his brother. He died in 1708. [It is also said that he distinguished himself as a painter of still-life.]

[HEEM, DAVID DE, born at Utrecht in 1570, was an excellent painter of fruit, flowers, gold, silver, and crystal vessels, and other objects of still-life. He was the father of John David de Heem, and dealers, and possessors of his pictures, delight in placing his works to the son's account. There is a group of flowers by him in the Museum at Brussels. He died in 1632.]

[HEEM, JOHN DE, a son of David, was born in 1603. He was instructed by his father, whose manner he followed very exactly. There is a picture of still-life by him in the Museum at Amsterdam. He died in 1650.]

HEEM, JOHN DAVID DE. This artist was born at Utrecht in 1600. He was the son of a flower painter, by whom he was instructed, and whom he soon greatly surpassed. The pictures by de Heem represent fruit, flowers, vases, and ornaments of gold and silver, musical instruments, and similar objects of still-life; and it is impossible to render subjects of that description more interesting than he has done, by the ingenious and picturesque arrangement of his compositions, the correct delineation of every object, the beauty of his colouring, and the delicate polish of his finishing. His pencil is sweet and tender, yet decided; and he was a perfect master of the chiaro-scuro. He particularly excelled in imitating the transparent clearness of glass and crystal, which he was fond of introducing into his pictures, and which he has represented with a verity that is perfect deception. The pictures of John David de Heem were so superior to those of every artist that had preceded him, in similar subjects, that his works were anxiously sought after by the most distinguished persons of his time, and were purchased at large prices. They are still held in high estimation. During the troubles which took place in Holland in 1671, he was obliged to leave Utrecht, and he took refuge at Antwerp, where he died in 1674.

HEEM, CORNELIUS DE, was the son and scholar of the foregoing artist, born at Utrecht in 1623. Cornelius painted similar subjects to those of his father, and though his pictures are well coloured and highly finished, they are infinitely inferior to the admirable productions of John David de Heem.

[HEEMS, N. VAN, of Rotterdam, made admirable copies of the pictures of the Chevalier and Peter Vander Werf.]

HEERE, LUCAS DE. This painter was born at Ghent, in 1534, of a family distinguished in the arts. His father was an eminent sculptor and architect, and his mother painted miniature with such diminutive neatness, that she represented a landscape, with a windmill and figures, a cart and a horse, in so small a space, that a grain of corn would have covered the whole performance. His father instructed him in the first principles of design, and being obliged, in the pursuit of his profession, to visit, frequently, Namur and Dinant, he was accompanied by Lucas, who designed the castles, ruins, and other objects worthy of notice, which they met with on their journey. He was afterwards placed under the tuition of Francis Floris, and made so rapid a progress, that in a short time he made several designs for tapestry, and for the glass-painters, which passed for his master's. After studying three years under F. Floris, he visited France, where he was for some time engaged by the Queen and Queen-mother, in making designs for tapestry at Fontainebleau. On his return to Ghent, he was employed in some works for the public edifices. In the church of St. John, he painted a picture of the Resurrection, and on the folding-doors, Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, and his Apparition in the Garden; and in St. Peter's, is an altar-piece by him, representing the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and on the shutters, the Last Supper. He was also much employed in portraits, in which he particularly excelled. Lucas de Heere visited England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but it is not known in what year. Several of his portraits of the Queen and the nobility are mentioned in the Anecdotes. The most remarkable is a picture at Kensington, representing Queen Elizabeth, richly dressed, with her crown, sceptre, and globe, coming out of a palace, with two female attendants. Juno, Venus, and Minerva seem flying before her; Juno drops her sceptre and Venus her roses; Cupid flings away his bow and arrows, and clings to his mother. On the old frame remain the following lines, probably written by himself, as he was a poet as well as a painter:

Juno potens sceptris, et mentis acumine Pallas,
Et roseo Veneris fulget in ore decor;
Adfuit Elisabeth; Juno perculsa refugit;
Obstupuit Pallas, erubuitque Venus.

If his colouring was as glowing as his flattery, he was probably the favourite painter of her Majesty. Lucas de Heere returned to Flanders, and died at Ghent in 1584. [Lucas de Heere must have visited England before the reign of Elizabeth, as there is a beautifully executed portrait of her sister Mary by him. It is in the possession of the Rev. Heneage Finch.]

[HEERSCHOP, HENRY. The only record of this painter is on his portrait, painted in 1649, when he was in his twenty-second year, where it is said that he was a pupil of Rembrandt. There is a picture by him in the collection at Cassel; it represents a soldier and a female playing at Cards.]

HEFELE, —. According to Lord Orford, this painter was a native of Germany, and came to England as a soldier in King William's Dutch troops; he obtained his discharge, and remained here several years. He painted landscapes, flowers, and insects, neatly, in water colours, but without much knowledge of the chiaro-scuro.

[HEGRET, THEODORE, a landscape and historical painter, born at Malines in 1643. He was a scholar of C. Beerings. There are pictures by him in some of the churches and convents of his native city.]

HEIL, DANIEL VAN. This painter was born at Brussels in 1604. It is not known under whom he studied, but he had acquired considerable reputation as a landscape painter, when he changed the subjects of his pictures for conflagrations and towns on fire, which he represented with surprising effect, and a brilliancy of colour well suited to the subjects he painted. He had a lively and spirited touch, and was well acquainted with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. He occasionally painted winter-pieces, which were also admired. Houbraken speaks highly of two pictures by Van Heil, representing the Burning of Sodom, and the Destruction of Troy. [According to Balkema, he died in 1662.]

HEIL, JOHN BAPTIST, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Brussels in 1609. He painted history and portraits, and was employed for some of the churches in his native city. His chief merit was in portraits, of which there are many in the Low Countries, painted in a firm, free style, and finely coloured. [He was living in 1661.]

HEIL, LEO VAN. This artist was the youngest of the brothers Van Heil. He is more known as an architect than a painter. He etched for his amusement a plate of a Dance of Flemish Villagers; after Rubens. [His name was Leonard, or Leone, and his birth is placed in 1603 by some writers, and in 1605 by others. He painted architecture, flowers, and insects.]

HEINCE, ZACHARY, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. Conjointly with Francis Bignon, he engraved a set of portraits of persons of France, after the pictures by Simon Vouet, in the Palais Royal. They are large prints, with ornamental borders, in which are introduced small historical subjects, etched in a spirited style. The heads are executed with the graver, in a neat manner, but without taste. They were published in 1790.

[HEINS, HEINSIUS, or ENS, GIOSEFFO, the son of Gioseffo, a copyist, who was employed by Rodolph I. to make copies of the works of the old masters, flourished about 1660, and was a painter of subjects which the Italians style Capricci. He acquired celebrity in Venice by some highly imaginative pictures, partaking of the style of Salvator Rosa, Civetta, Carponi, and the devilry of Breughel de l'Enfer. They represent allegorical fictions, in which are introduced sphinxes, chimera, and monsters in grotesque shape. In such a career did he arrive at the honour of being made a chevalier of the order of the Cross by Urban VIII. Subsequently, however, he applied himself, with more judgment, to the study of truth, and left behind him, in Venice, several altar-pieces, one of which, adorning the church of Ognissanti, is extremely beautiful. Some of his pictures have been brought to England, and have been puzzles, both as regarded the subjects and master.]

HEINS, —, a German painter and engraver, who came to England, and resided at Norwich, about the year 1740. He painted the portraits of several members of the corporation, some of which he engraved in mezzotint, in a formal, poor style. One of his best prints is Thomas Gooch, Bishop of Norwich, half-length, signed Heins, pinx. et fecit. 1741.

HEINS, J., was the son of the preceding artist, born at Norwich about the year 1740. His father placed him as an apprentice to a stuff manufacturer; but, without his parent's approbation, he became a painter of portraits, both in oil and in miniature. He succeeded better in engraving. His plates are executed in a style resembling that of Worlidge, by scratching with the dry point, without the help of aquafortis. He made the drawings of the views and monuments for Bentham's History of Ely. Of his engravings, Mr. Strutt mentions a plate of a Cat with Kittens; after Collet; and the portraits of Mr. Grosse and his Wife. He died at Chelsea of a decline, about the year 1770.

HEINS, W. C. This artist was probably of Germany, and flourished about the year 1640. He engraved several plates of portraits; among which, the most considerable are those he executed for Boissard's Bibliotheca Chalcographica.

HEINTZ, JOSEPH. This painter was a native of Berne, in Switzerland, but the time of his birth is not known, nor is it mentioned by whom he was instructed. He is said, however, to have been a respectable painter of history; and was invited to Prague by the Emperor Rodolphus II., who favoured him with his protection, and sent him to Italy for improvement. He applied himself particularly to the study of the works of Coreggio, at Parma, whose style he imitated with some success; and on his return to Germany painted several pictures, which gained him reputation. Among his best works are, Jupiter and Leda, the Rape of Proserpine, and Diana and Acteon.

HEINZELMAN, ———. See HAINZELMAN.

HEISS, CHRISTOPHER ELIAS, a German painter and engraver in mezzotinto, born at Memmingen, in Suabia, about the year 1670. He was one of the first of the German artists that practised mezzotinto engraving, on any considerable scale; and though his plates are scraped in a dark, heavy style, and his drawing indifferent, his prints are not without merit, considering the period at which they were executed. He engraved several very large plates, of which some are upwards of three feet high, and more than two feet wide. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Petrus Alexiewitz, Czar, et Magn. Dux Moscovizæ.
Fridericus August. Rex Polon. et Elect. Saxon.; after Hoyer.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Paul and St. Anthony, the first Hermits.
Christ praying on the Mount; a large plate; after C. Maratti.
The Virgin and Infant, on a globe; the same.
The Adoration of the Shepherds; the same.
The Annunciation; after J. G. Bergmüller.

HEKEL, AUGUSTINE, a German engraver, born at Augsburg about the year 1690. He was the son of a chaser on gold and silver, and followed that profession with success. He came to England, and was considered the first artisan, in that line, of his time. He drew views in water colours, some of which were engraved by Bowles and Sayer. He etched eight small plates of Richmond, and its environs; a Horse, after Wootton; and a Book of Flowers. He had a sister who engraved, in a neat style, some plates for Kilian's Bible.

[HELLE, ISAAC DEL, a Spanish painter who flourished about 1568. He painted for the cathedral at Toledo, a capital picture of St. Nicasius, which Pons mistook for the work of Berruguetta, a proof of its merits. It is said that he was a disciple of M. Angelo; of this there is no certainty, but it appears that he studied his manner. There are no records of his birth or death yet discovered.]

HELMAN, ISIDORE STANISLAUS, a modern French engraver, born at Lisle in 1743. He was a pupil of J. P. le Bas, and has engraved several plates in the neat, finished style of his instructor. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife; after Langrené.
Susanna and the Elders; after the same.
The Death of Cleopatra; after the same.
The Useless Precaution; after le Prince.
The Useless Lesson; after the same.
The French Quack-Doctor; after Bertaux.
The German Quack-Doctor; after the same.
The Temple of the Sibyl at Tivoli; after Robert

HELMBRECKER, THEODORE. This eminent painter was born at Haerlem in 1624. He was the son of an organist, who destined him to the study of music, but his disposition evidently leading him to painting, he was placed under the tuition of Peter Grebber, at the time that Sir Peter Lely was a scholar of that master. On the death of his instructor, he travelled to Venice, and on his arrival was patronized and employed by the Senator Lordano, for whom he painted several pictures, which were greatly admired. The celebrity of his talent reached Rome, and he soon after visited that city, where he was immediately taken into the protection of the Cardinal de Medici. He afterwards visited Florence and Naples. After a residence of several years in Italy, he was desirous of returning to his native country, and of exhibiting his powers, such as they had become, from the advantages of travel, and the study of the best models. He was not disappointed in his hopes of a favourable reception from his countrymen. He was loaded with commissions, which he found it difficult to keep pace with. This flattering encouragement could not, however, detain him in Holland, his desire of revisiting Rome prevailed, and he returned to Italy. On his arrival at Rome he was employed by the Jesuits two years, for whom he painted some of his finest pictures. The style of Helmbrecker is excellent. He sometimes painted subjects as large as life; but he is more successful in his easel pictures, representing markets, fairs, public places, and views in Rome, with groups of poor, to whom the monks are distributing alms or food. His pictures of that description are admirably composed; his figures designed with elegance and taste, with the most expressive character; his touch is broad and free, and his colouring clear and harmonious. He sometimes resembles Bamboccio in the subjects and tone of his pictures, but they are designed and painted in a greater style. This estimable painter died at Rome in 1694.

[HELMONT, LUCAS GASSEL VAN, born at Brussels in 1480, is mentioned as a landscape painter whose works are very rare. He died in 1528.]

HELMONT, MATTHEW VAN, was a native of Brussels, about the year 1650. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but he excelled in painting fairs and Italian markets, with shops of confectionery, vegetables, &c., in a style that makes it probable that he had visited Italy. He resided some time at Paris, where his works were admired by Louis XIV., for whom he painted some of his best pictures. [He was a scholar of D. Teniers, and painted pictures, if not in imitation, at least analogous to those of that master. He died in 1719.]

HELMONT, SEGRES JAMES VAN. This painter was the son and scholar of the foregoing artist, born at Antwerp in 1683. Although he had the misfortune to lose his father when he was very young, it does not appear that he received the instruction of any other master, but improved himself by studying the best models, and consulting nature in every thing. Van Helmont painted history with great reputation; his compositions are grand and copious, his design correct, and his colouring chaste and pure. His principal works are in the churches at Brussels, where they hold a respectable rank among the able artists of the Flemish school. In the church of Mary Magdalene, is a fine picture of the Martyrdom of St. Barbara, designed and painted in the style of Vandyck. In the church of St. Michael, is the Triumph of David: and at the Carmelites, one of his most esteemed works, representing Elijah sacrificing before the Priests of Baal. He died in 1726.

HELST, BARTHOLOMEW VANDER, a very eminent portrait painter, born at Haerlem in 1613. The Dutch biographers do not inform us by whom he was instructed, but he is deservedly considered as one of the ablest artists of his country. That his talents were of no ordinary cast may be presumed, from Sir Joshua Reynolds's description of his celebrated picture in the Stadhous at Amsterdam. "The best picture in this house," says that judicious critic, "is painted by Vanderhelst. It represents a company of trained bands, about thirty figures, whole length, among which the Spanish ambassador is introduced, shaking hands with one of the principal figures. This is perhaps the first picture of portraits in the world; comprehending more of those qualities which make a perfect portrait, than any other I have seen: they are correctly drawn, both heads and figures, and well coloured, and have great variety of action, characters, and countenances; and those so lively and truly expressing what they are about, that the spectator has nothing to wish for." [Vander Helst occasionally painted historical subjects, but he is superior in portraits. He died at Amsterdam in 1670.]

HEMMELINCK, JOHN. This painter was born at Damme, a small town near Bruges, about the year 1450. He lived soon after the time of John van Eyck, the supposed discoverer of oil-painting, as some of his works are dated 1479. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed, but Van Mander reports, that being of a very dissolute character, he was reduced to the necessity of engaging as a private soldier, and, falling sick, was received as a patient into the hospital of St. John at Bruges. Sickness and solitude is the season of reflection; and it was during a tedious confinement that Hemmelinck beheld, in a proper view, the depravity of his conduct, and the degradation of his talent. He was no sooner in a state of convalescence, than he made known to the brotherhood of the hospital his profession, and offered to paint a picture for their chapel, as a testimony of his gratitude. He accordingly painted an altar-piece, with two folding-doors; in the centre picture he has represented the Nativity, with the Adoration of the Shepherds; on one of the shutters, a group of angels adoring the infant Jesus in the cradle; and on the other, the Presentation in the Temple. The picture bears the inscription, Opus Johannis Hemmelinck M.CCCC.LXXIX. This extraordinary performance is preserved in the chapel of the hospital, with great care and veneration. It is impossible to conceive any thing more beautifully or more delicately coloured than this surprising picture; the figures are grouped with an order and intelligence little known in that early period; and some of the heads bear a character and expression very superior to the artists of his time. In the chapel of St. Julian was formerly a picture by Hemmelinck, representing St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus across a River, with St. Benedict and St. Giles; it was considered an object worthy of French spoliation, and is now in the gallery of the Louvre.

[The preceding short and unsatisfactory notice, shows how little was known of John Hemling when the first edition of this Dictionary was published. Since that time discoveries respecting him have been made, that not only throw considerable light on his real works, but on those of several contemporary artists, whose names had almost sunk into oblivion, and whose pictures had been apportioned, according to the will of the possessor or the confidence of self-styled connoisseurs, to masters who had the good fortune to be historically recorded. Although the recent discoveries, as they may be termed, of several real connoisseurs in these matters, have cleared away much of the obscurity that enveloped the Flemish painters of the middle age, yet there remains sufficient to incite to further inquiry. Indeed, more than one country is interested in appropriating the artist whose works attract attention by their excellence, but the record of whose name and birth-place they had neglected to preserve, and had left solely to the care of tradition. The parties interested in sharing the glory of these eminent, but neglected artists, are the Germans, the Flemings, and the Dutch. Each can now furnish claims for one or the other of them. But as this is not the place for the discussion, it must suffice to give a concise account of some of the pictures acknowledged to be the work of John Hemling, (or, as some will have it, Memling), and of others attributed to him with less certainty.]

Dr. Franz Kugler, in his Hand Book of the History of Painting, part the second, on the German, Flemish, and Dutch Schools, notices Hans Hemling, as "the scholar of Roger of Bruges, and as one of the best artists of the school of Van Eyck, and the one by whom its principles, so far as we may judge from existing works, have been carried out, at once with the greatest freedom and originality. Of the personal career of this artist," he says, "little is known. This only is certain, that from the year 1479 he worked a great deal in the hospital of St. John, at Bruges; according to tradition, out of gratitude for having been received and attended there, when a sick and indigent soldier. At an earlier period he is said to have lived for some time in Italy; and in the last years of the fifteenth century, to have worked in Spain. This last supposition rests on his identity with Juan Flamenco, (John the Fleming,) who gained a considerable reputation in Spain." (See Ceán Bermúdez, Diccionario Historico de los mas illustres Profesores de las bellas Artes en España, tom. ii. page 118; and the articles JUAN FLAMENCO and JUAN DE FLÁNDES, in this Dictionary.) "Hemling adopted the mode of conception peculiar to the school of Van Eyck, tinged, however, with greater severity. The features are less lovely, but more earnest; the figures less elegant; the movements less soft; the handling sharper, with greater finish of the detail. His grouping is strictly symmetrical, and he confines himself in general to the characters absolutely necessary; whilst, on the other hand, he endeavours to exhaust the history, and often introduces the events which preceded or followed the principal action, in a smaller size in the back-ground. We trace his more serious feeling particularly in the conception and colouring of his landscapes. If in John Van Eyck these shone in the light of spring, in Hemling they glow with the richness of summer; the greens are darker, the meadows more equally tinted, the foliage of the trees more dense, the shadows stronger, the masses of light broader and more tranquil. In other cases, the tone of his landscapes is a clear, uniform, autumnal tint. He is always successful in scenes which require the highest brilliancy of strong lights, as the rising sun; or forcible and singular combinations of colour, as in visions and such-like subjects." After this eloquent discriminating character of the master's style, Dr. Kügler proceeds to give an account of his pictures, of which, he says, "the best collection is in Bruges, and particularly in the hospital of St. John. Two of them are inscribed with his name and the date of the year 1479. Both are altar-pieces with wings, and are preserved in the common or chapter hall." Of these he gives a minute description; and mentions a third picture of a Sibyl, in the same hall, ascribed to Hemling, but the genuineness of which is doubted. In the chapel of St. John's hospital is also the celebrated Reliquary of St. Ursula, a shrine about four feet in length; its style and form are those of rich Gothic church architecture, such as we often find adopted for the larger depositories of relics. On this precious gem of art is represented, in different compartments, the several events recorded in the legend of St. Ursula, and other subjects of a religious character; all of which are eloquently described by Kügler. "These little pictures," he says, "are among the very best productions of the Flemish school. The drawing in these small figures is much more beautiful than in the larger ones by the same master; there is nothing in them meagre, stiff, or angular; the movements are free; the execution and tone of colour, with all its softness, very powerful; the expression in the single heads, of the highest excellence." He next mentions the series of small pictures in the private collection of the king of Holland, formerly in Brussels, as equally excellent. They contain, in two long panels, ten scenes from the life of St. Bertin, and once served as a covering to the splendid reliquary of this saint, preserved in the Abbey-church of St. Martin, at St. Omer. Also, a similar picture, of a long form, now at Munich, and formerly in the Boisserée collection, which, he says, deserves especial notice. "It represents the principal events of the life of Christ and the Virgin (the Seven Joys and the Seven Sorrows of the Virgin); not in separate compartments, but in one great whole, united in a landscape, with an endless number of subordinate events: a whole world of life, and joy, and sorrow, all executed with wonderful grace and beauty." In the Academy of Bruges are preserved two altar-pieces by Hemling. The one which contains the Baptism of Christ, and other scenes of sacred history, is an excellent and beautiful work; the other, with the date 1484, and the Story of St. Christopher, is less important. Besides these, there are in Bruges other works bearing the name of Hemling; one is a small altar-piece, in a closed chapel, on the right, in St. Salvator, representing the Martyrdom of St. Hippolytus. In the hall of St. Julian's hospital, is also a diptych, of the year 1487; on one of the panels is painted the Holy Virgin and Child, and on the other, the donor. In a chapel at Louvain there is an altar-piece by Hem-ling, which consists of several panels; it represents the martyrdom of St. Erasmus; on the wings are saints, and above, the Last Supper, a simple symmetrical composition, of extremely delicate execution. Of the pictures "marked with the name of Hemling, in the Berlin Museum," Kügler speaks with some hesitation; and the editor of the English translation of his work (the intelligent Sir Edmund Head) cannot reconcile his description of an altar-piece there with the account of the picture in the Berlin Catalogue. There are also some excellent portraits by Hemling. Two are in the private collection of the king of Holland; one represents a young lady; the other, a man of middle age, which is supposed to be Hemling's own likeness. A third was in the collection of Mr. Aders, in London, with the date 1462, also taken to be a portrait of the artist. Among the numerous excellent miniatures in the style of Van Eyck, which occur in different places, the hand of Hemling is said to be often recognised; but of these only one is historically authenticated. It is a large Breviary, in the library of St. Mark, at Venice: the text is enclosed in ornamented borders of the most varied kind, and is broken by larger illuminations, chiefly of sacred subjects. The richness of these illustrations, their grand style, and fine execution, give to this work the first place among similar manuscripts. These were executed by Hemling, with the assistance of two scholars, Liwin of Antwerp, and Gerard of Ghent. Professor Waagen, director of the Royal Gallery at Berlin, in the account which he gives of his journey in England, says, "I have really had the good fortune to see one of the richest and most beautiful works of this great master. It is the small travelling altar of the Emperor Charles V., which, up to the time of the French Revolution, was in the cathedral of Bruges, whence it was obtained by purchase by Viscount d'Armagnac, a French general, and has lately been sent to M. Berthon, a French painter residing here, (London,) to be sold." He then gives a detailed description of the subjects, and concludes by saying, "Unfortunately the demand of £3000 sterling for this jewel is so extravagant, that no offer even has been made for it."—This jewel is now in the private collection of the king of Holland, as will be seen in the sequel. Dr. Kügler has been quoted largely for the knowledge and just feeling he displays with regard to the masters of the Flemish and Dutch schools, and of painters in general; and Dr. Waagen, for the reputation he has acquired, and the value so frequently attached to his opinions on art and artists. Others of less celebrity, who have written as mere tourists, may be passed on the present occasion, as their accounts and opinions appear, too frequently, but echoes. It is a different matter, however, with Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys, whose excellent and very valuable catalogue of the pictures in the private gallery of the king of Holland, contains an account of no less than nine authentic works of John Hemling, and of four others, under the head "ATTRIBUE." As this catalogue is privately printed, and not to be readily obtained, it will, perhaps, be gratifying to many to have copious extracts from it, especially as regards the artist under consideration. The high reputation which Mr. Nieuwenhuys has acquired as a profound connoisseur, in all that relates to the German, Flemish, and Dutch painters, and the extensive commerce he has had for many years in the best works of the best masters, are guarantees for a right judgment on all that he discusses relating thereto.

He commences his account of the works of the master, in the king's collection, by stating that John Hemmling was born at Bruges about the year 1440, and that he was living in the year 1499. He then gives a detailed and critical description of the two pictures (Nos. 6 and 7) containing the ten subjects of the life of St. Bertin. St. John the Baptist, Mary Magdalene, St. Stephen, and St. Christopher, (Nos. 8, 9, 10, and 11,) are next described. The Repose in Egypt, (No. 12,) formerly in Mr. Aders's collection in London; the portrait of a Young Lady, (No. 13,) taken from a sepulchral monument in the church of St. Donat, at Bruges, in 1818, and on which is inscribed OBYT ANO DÑI 1479; and lastly, St. Luke painting the Virgin (No. 14). The celebrated portable altar of Charles V., which gave Professor Waagen so much delight, and with which he would probably have enriched the Museum at Berlin, but for the enormous sum demanded for it, next ranks (No. 15) under the head of "Attribué à Jean Hemmling," and of which a minutely detailed account is given. The Birth of St. John; the Baptism of Christ; the Portrait of a Man, supposed by Kugler to be that of the artist, (Nos. 16, 17, 18,) also range under the head "Attribué." Lastly, St. Christopher, (No. 19,) is said to be "of the school of Hemmling." This arrangement shows a desire not to mislead by following in the track of those who had, with less knowledge, affirmed them all to be by Hemmling. No doubt several of them are worthy of his pencil; but "there were great men before Agamemnon." Speaking of the portable, or, as it is called, the travelling Altar-piece of the Emperor Charles V., Mr. Nieuwenhuys remarks: "Cette œuvre a été généralement attribuée à Hemmling, et a été décrite comme telle. Cependant, plus j'étudie le tableau, plus son caractère historique me semble plus sévère, et d'un style plus ancien que les ouvrages d'Hemmling. D'après les minutieuses recherches que j'ai faites sur les diverses écoles du moyen âge, et d'après des éclaircissements qui me sont venus à l'appui de ces recherches, je suis parvenu à m'assurer que cette œuvre, dont on fait honneur à Hemmling, est réellement due au pinceau de son maître, le célèbre Roger de Bruges, tant vanté dans l'histoire de l'art, et dont on n'avait pu jusqu'à ce jour retrouver les ouvrages. Elle fut donnée par le pape Martin V. au roi Jean II., et lui servit d'oratoire particulier. En 1445, ce prince en fit don au monastère appelé Certosa di Miraflores, situé à une demi-lieue de Burgos. Don Antonio Conca dit, dans sa description de l'Espagne, (Descrizione odepórica della Spagna, Parma, 1793.) tom. i. page 33, que dans les archives du monastère, on lit, en langue latin, l'article suivant: 'En 1445, le roi susdit (Don Jean) fit don d'un oratoire précieux ayant trois tableaux: la nativité de Jesus-Christ, la descente de croix, et l'apparition à Marie après la resurrection. Cet oratoire fut peint par maître Roger (le nom est écrit ici Rogel) grand et fameux peintre flamand.' Ce chef d'œuvre, connu sous le nom de l'autel portatif de Charles Quint, fut tellement vénéré par ce monarque qu'il le faisait transporter à sa suite dans toutes ses expéditions guerrières. C'est dans sa tente et devant cette petite chapelle que l'illustre souverain s'est maintes fois agenouillé, adressant ses prières à Dieu, avant de livrer les combats mémorables qui ont illustré son règne. Des faits aussi importants, et qui se rattachent à ce précieux tableau le rendent encore plus intéressant. Après la mort de Charles Quint, il orna de nouveau le monastère, la Certosa di Mira- flores, où il fut conservé jusqu'à l'époque de l'invasion des armées Françaises sous Napoleon. C'est pendant l'occupation de la Péninsule par ses armées, que le hasard le fit tomber en la possession du général d'Armagnac, au moment où il allait périr dans un de ces terribles incendies, où tant de choses précieuses ont disparu sans retour. Il fut acheté de la famille d'Armagnac par M. Nieuwenhuys, de qui sa Majesté le roi des Pays-Bas en a fait l'acquisition. Cet objet d'art est dans un état extrêmement remarquable de conservation; il semble avoir défié le temps, qui a détruit un si grand nombre d'autres monuments moins exposés peut-être à ses ravages que celui-ci ne l'avait été. La botte même, ou l'encadrement de ces peintures, est resté dans son état primitif; la serrure seule est moderne." In corroboration, Mr. Nieuwenhuys refers to the work published by Mr. D. F. Campe, under the title Reliquien von Albrecht Durer seinen verehrern geweiht, being some interesting notices given by Albert Durer of the journey he made in the Low Countries in 1520; wherein, among other particulars, he says, "Pendant mon séjour à Bruges, on me conduisit dans la résidence de l'empereur, que est d'une grande magnificence, là je vis la chapelle par Roger." (The name Roger is written Rudiger in German.) This is, no doubt, the chapel in question, as Charles the Fifth carried it with him in all his expeditions, and he was in the Low Countries at this period in his route to Aix-la-Chapelle, there to receive the imperial crown. With regard to the birth-place and name of the artist, which have been subjects of dispute, (and which dispute is not yet terminated,) Mr. Nieuwenhuys adduces proofs in support of Bruges and Hemmling, that will strongly fortify the partisans in their favour. He observes, "Descamps, qui a écrit avec beaucoup de légèreté, affirme que Carel van Mander se trompe lorsqu'il dit que Hemmling est né à Bruges, mais il ne donne aucune preuve à l'appui de sa refutation; il prétend que ce peintre naquit dans la petite ville de Damme; or, il me semble que, quand on nie des faits, il faut au moins pouvoir présenter quelque bonne raison pour justifier son assertion, et c'est ce que Descamps n'a pas fait; en outre, il se trompe encore lorsqu'il prétend avoir lu sur la bordure d'un de ses tableaux que se trouve à l'hôpital de Bruges, OPUS JOHANNIS HEMMELINCK. M.CCCC.LXXIX. Sa description du tableau est aussi incorrecte que celle de l'inscription, puisqu'il dit que le tableau auquel il se reporte est la naissance de Notre Seigneur, et les Bergers en adoration. Il n'y a point de tableau à l'hôpital Saint Jean que représente l'adoration des Bergers; mais nous voyons, par ce qu'il dit de volets, qu'il veut parler du tableau de l'Adoration des Mages, peint par Hemmling, dans lequel il a introduit le portrait du donateur Jean Floreins, âgé de 36 ans. On dit que le peintre s'y est peint lui-même dans la personne qui regarde par la fenêtre à droite; mais il ne porte pas la robe des malades, ainsi que le dit M. Descamps, dont l'ouvrage fourmille d'erreurs." Of this picture Mr. Nieuwenhuys gives a full description, which he closes with an exact copy of the inscription thereon; with the date and authentic signature of the master: ANNO · MCCCC · LXXIX · OPUS ·

JOHANNIS · HEMMLING. In the same year he finished, for the same establishment, one of the most important of his works. It is 65 inches high and 64 wide. The principal subject is a Holy Family, or the Marriage of Saint Catherine; on the right wing is St. John writing the Apocalypse in the Isle of Patmos; on the left, St. John the Baptist. It is remarkable for the execution and finish. On the exteriors of the wings are the portraits of the donors of the picture, accompanied by their patrons and patronesses; in the interior of the picture, at the lower border, Hemling has distinctly traced, OPUS JOHANNIS HEMLING ANNO . M.CCCC.LXXIX.

1479. "H", the H in Johannis and in Hemling being exactly of the same form, thus H. Mr. Nieuwenhuys remarks, "Ces inscriptions étant lisiblement écrites, il est certain qu'on ne peut prendre la première lettre du nom d'Hemling pour un M au lieu d'un H; d'autant mieux que l'artiste s'est servi de la même lettre H dans le mot JOHANNIS, sur lequel on ne peut se tromper. Indépendamment de cette preuve évidente, tous les M sont tellement distinct qu'ils n'ont rien de commun avec les H."

He adds, "J'ai consciencieusement copié ces inscriptions sans en altérer la moindre lettre; car ce n'est que par la parfaite exactitude que l'on peut éclairer le lecteur." This is bringing the question in the fairest and clearest manner before the reader. That there are instances of the letter H being substituted for M is well known; but whether it was owing to caprice, ignorance, or a dialect, it is not easy to determine. Instances may be found on a medal of the Emperor Maximilian; and an inscription on the nimbus surrounding the head of the Virgin by Gentile da Fabriano, given by Rosini in the third volume of his Storia della Pittura Italiana. That Hemling resided at the hospital of St. John at Bruges is quite certain; and it is an immemorial tradition, with the religious tenants of that establishment, that he was a soldier when he first presented himself there; that he was received, carefully attended, and remained long enough there to paint the pictures which are still preserved; but that he was a dissolute character is not in proof. Mr. Nieuwenhuys very justly observes, "D'après la noblesse et l'élevation de pensées qu'Hemling a déployées dans ses œuvres, on peut, on doit même attribuer ses infortunes à des causes plus honorables. Le quinzième siècle offrait un vaste champ aux imaginations chevaleresques; la gloire des armes inflammait alors tous les esprits. On pourrait conjecturer avec vraisemblance qu'Hemling s'enrôla sous le drapeau de Charles le Téméraire, soit dans la guerre de 1474, entreprise pour remplacer l'Évêque de Cologne sur son siège, soit dans la fatale campagne contre les Suisses, campagne si funeste aux Flamands et où Charles le Téméraire resta sur la champ de bataille, près de Nanci, le 5 Février 1477. On sait qu'après cette défaite, les débris de l'armée rentrèrent en Flandre dans l'état le plus déplorable. Cet événement offre plus de rapport avec l'anecdote qui concerne Hemling; et ce qui viendrait encore confirmer cette opinion, ce sont les dates des ouvrages que nous venons de décrire." Works of such exquisite beauty, and holiness of character, are not the productions of a dissolute mind. Descamps must, therefore, have been in error, when he reported that "Hemling s'enrôla par libertinage en qualité de simple soldat, et que le dérèglement de sa conduite l'avait mené dans la plus grande misère." Mr. Nieuwenhuys observes, "If the life of Hemling is not so well known to us as we could desire, we have at least the satisfaction of knowing a great number of his authentic works, which are the guides to a just appreciation of his fine talents. His pictures are the most beautiful pages of his history. It is to be regretted that many other artists of great ability; contemporaries with Hemling, have not signed their works; such as the celebrated Roger de Bruges, Hugo Vander Goes, Dirck Van Haerlem, Vander Meire de Gand, and others, whose pictures are so rarely known, that when they are discovered they are attributed, for the most part, to Van Eyck, or to Hemling; and it is because their works bear a resemblance to those two better known great masters that the mistake arises," and it continues because the possessors are content to rest in the belief that they are the productions of artists of such renown. Mr. Nieuwenhuys concludes his remarks on the works of Hemling with the following observations: "Dans mes refutations, je n'ai cherché qu'à constater des faits qui, pour moi, sont avérés. L'expérience m'a appris à me défier des opinions hasardées, et de toutes ces théories imaginaires que les écrivains répètent les uns après les autres, et qui tombent devant la réalité, des qu'on a sous les yeux les monuments eux-mêmes, dont tant de critiques parlent sans les avoir vus, ou sans les avoir compris." The reader may feel obliged by these extracts, taken, by permission, from a book that is not in commerce, and, therefore, not easily obtained. It is due, also, to the inquirer, and no less so to the author of "l'Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise," M. Alfred Michiels, to direct attention to the numerous particulars that are given in that valuable and interesting work. It is true that M. Michiels is an enthusiast in art, and writes in a very poetical style on the beauties and excellencies of the ancient Flemish and Dutch painters; but his enthusiasm is tempered with judgment, and his poetical language harmonizes with the subjects he describes. With regard to John Hemling and his works, his opinions agree in the main with those of Mr. Nieuwenhuys; some of his descriptions are more diffuse, and he enriches his accounts of the pictures with a relation of the legends from which they are taken, and with anecdotes and reflections that show his whole heart is interested in the matter. His relation of the tastes and temper of Charles le Téméraire, and of Hemling's connexion with that despotic potentate, disprove the aspersion on the character of the latter, that he was of dissolute habits. His account of Hemling's introduction to the hospital of St. John, divested of some of its poetical embellishments, has an air of probability; and that of his labours there, is supported by facts. He describes about one hundred pictures, to be found in various places, attributed to John Hemling, and gives a minute account of the miniatures in the famous manuscript in the library of St. Mark at Venice, pointing out those that he conceives to belong indubitably to that master; also of others in the libraries at Oxford, the Hague, and Munich. He is not willing to allow that John Hemling ever worked at the Carthusian Monastery at Miraflores in Spain, though he admits the genuineness of his pictures there. As he mentions Juan Flamenco, and conjectures that under that name John Hemling is intended, if he had referred to Cean Bermudez, he would have found that he resided in the said Carthusian monastery at Miraflores for three years, and that he received, in addition to his maintenance, the sum of 53,545 maravedis for his labours there. (See the articles Juan Flamenco and Juan de Flándes in this Dictionary.) The following extract from M. Michiels is interesting, both as it regards the spelling of the name, and the year of John Hemling's birth; though he will not admit the inference that the Germans would draw from it. "En 1822, M. Von Lassberg, demeurant à Eppishausen, près de Constance, acheta dans la dernière Ville un manuscrit du quatorzième siècle. Il renfermait la chronique alsacienne de Königshoven, rédigée en 1386. La généalogie d'un Hans Hemling occupe la fin du livre, et les caractères annoncent une époque assez rapprochée de la date qu'on vient de lire. On avait alors l'habitude de consigner des notices de ce genre dans les Bibles et autres ouvrages précieux, que se léguaient comme un bien patrimonial. La liste ne remonte pas plus haut que le grand-père, Radin Hemling, né en 1342, mort en 1414; viennent en suite le père, Conrad, né en 1394, mort en 1448; la mère, Marguerite Bruschin, décédée en 1447, et leurs six enfants, dont l'avant-dernier, Hans Hemling, avait vu le jour en 1439. Quelques détails sur l'histoire de la famille sont joints à cette nomenclature; ils vont jusqu'à l'année 1490, où une des sœurs fut mise au tombeau." If the manuscript be correctly transcribed, the name is, unequivocally, HEMLING; and the date of his birth coincides with the events and labours of his life. Zani, in his Index, writes the name Hemmelinck, with the date 1479, probably from Descamps, and he adds, "non Memeglino, nè Memelin, nè Memilino, nè Memmelinck." Under the head of the Fiamminghi he places Maestro Giovanni, detto Giovanni de Flandes, Operava 1496 and 1509. These dates correspond with those given in Cean Bermudez to Juan Flamenca and Juan de Flándes, as before mentioned, and there is little doubt the three names indicate one artist, namely, JOHN HEMLING. Thus, as far as the limits of a dictionary will allow, an endeavour has been made to bring under the notice of the inquirer the best information respecting this admirable artist, by quoting from those authorities that appear to write from facts. The orthographical dispute will not soon terminate; it is a fine subject for tourists who are anxious to display their knowledge, or their ignorance, in acquainting the public with the discoveries they have made in their travels; and there are plenty of materials to keep up the contest. But the discriminating Dr. Kügler, the enthusiastic and earnest Michiels, and the thoroughly learned and practical connoisseur in Flemish and Dutch paintings, Mr. J. C. Nieuwenhuys, form a triumvirate of champions on the one side, strong enough to maintain the battle with the numerous light infantry that fight on the other.]

HEMMESSEN, JOHN VAN. This painter was a native of Flanders, and flourished about the year 1550. He studied in Italy, and appears to have formed his style by an imitation of the works of Lionardo da Vinci: his pictures, particularly his children, have been frequently attributed to that master. In the collection of Dusseldorp, is a picture by him, representing an Ecce Homo, dated 1544; and in the gallery of the Louvre another, of Tobit restoring Sight to his Father. [In the Museum at Brussels there is a Descent from the Cross, by him: Balkema writes his name Hemmisten.]

HEMRICH, C. H. From the name of this engraver he was probably of Germany. He resided in London about the beginning of the last century. We have by him a set of butterflies and insects, after Roessel, neatly executed.

HEMSKERK, MARTIN VAN VEEN, called MARTIN. The family name of this painter was Van

Veen; he was the son of James William van Veen, born at Hemskirk, a village near Haerlem, in 1498. His father, yielding to his desire of becoming a painter, placed him under the care of John Lucas, of Delft, where he studied some time. The reputation of John Schoorel was at that time the most distinguished of the artists of his country, and Hemskerk quitted his first master, and went to Utrecht, where he entered the school of Schoorel. His progress under that able master was such, as to excite the jealousy of his instructor, who dismissed him from his academy. One of his first public works was a picture of St. Luke painting the Virgin, for the chapel of the painters at Haerlem, so entirely in the manner of Schoorel, that it was generally supposed to be by him. At the age of thirty-four he went to Italy, and passed three years at Rome, where the beauties of antiquity, and the works of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, were the particular objects of his study. On his return to Holland he painted several pictures for the public edifices at Amsterdam, particularly an altar-piece of the Crucifixion, for the old church, with two folding-doors, representing subjects of the Passion of our Saviour. The compositions of Martin Hemskerk, though copious, are without judgment or taste; and in attempting to imitate the great style of Buonaroti, his design is frequently overcharged and preposterous. His draperies are clumsy, with a confusion of folds, and the expression of his heads is neither marked with grace or beauty. With all these defects, he enjoyed the reputation of a distinguished artist at the time, and in the country in which he lived. We have a few etchings by Martin van Veen, or Martin Hemskerk, which are more esteemed for their scarcity than the beauty of their execution, or the correctness of the design. He usually marked them with the cipher . The following are by him:

Judah and Thamar.

The Annunciation of the Virgin.

The Wise and the Foolish Virgins.

Industry and Commerce.

He died in 1573.

HEMSKERK, EGBERT, THE ELDER, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about the year 1610. He painted the interiors of Dutch alehouses, with boors regaling or quarrelling. These subjects he treated with some ability; but he has been so infinitely surpassed by Brower and Teniers, that his pictures are of very inferior consideration.

HEMSKERK, EGBERT, THE YOUNGER, was probably the son of the preceding painter, born at Haerlem in 1645, and is said to have been a scholar of Peter Grebber; but from the great similarity of his style, and the subjects he painted, to those of the elder Hemskerk, it is most probable that he was instructed by him. He visited England in the reign of King William, and was much patronized by Lord Rochester. He painted drunken scenes and drolls with considerable humour, and sometimes incantations, spectres, and similar eccentricities, in which he showed a ready invention and some ingenuity, but his colouring is cold and heavy. He died in London in 1704.

[HENDRIKS, WYBRAND, was born at Amsterdam in 1744, but resided chiefly at Haerlem. He painted landscapes, portraits, interiors; but the pictures by him which are most prized, are flower-pieces, and subjects of dead game, in the manner of Weeninix. He was, however, good in every department, and his works are beginning to assume their place in some of the finest collections. There is a view of Hærlém by him in the Museum at Amsterdam. He died in 1830.]

[HENGEL, H. F. VAN, a native of Nimeguen, studied under Heroman Vander Myn, and painted landscapes and conversations of a cabinet size. Either the public disregarded his works, or he was so enamoured of them as not to part from them, that he retained them, as a collection, to the time of his death, when they were sold with the pictures of other masters belonging to him. He died at Utrecht in 1785.]

HENRIET, ISRAEL. This artist was born at Nancy about the year 1607. He was the son of Claude Henriet, a painter little known, who taught him the rudiments of design, and sent him to Rome for improvement, where he studied some time under Antonio Tempesta. He returned to France, and established himself at Paris as a printseller, and published some of his own plates, as well as those of Callot, Della Bella, and Israel Sylvestre, who were all employed by him. He engraved a few plates of views and small subjects, in which he imitated the style of Callot. He died at Paris in 1661.

HENRIQUEZ, BLAISE LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1732. He was a pupil of N. G. Dupuis, and was admitted into the Academy in 1779. We have by him some plates of portraits, and other subjects, executed with the graver, in a neat style; among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Louis XVI. King of France; after J. Bozé.
Denis Diderot; after Vanloo.
John d'Alembert; after Jollain.
Francis Maria Arouet de Voltaire; after Barat.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Minerva driving away the God of War; after Rubens.
Mercury and Argus; after G. van Beekhout.
Honours paid to the Constable du Guesclin; after Brenet.

HENSHAW, W. Mr. Strutt mentions this name as affixed to a private etching of the portrait of Mr. Gray, the poet.

[HENSTENBURGH, HERMAN, was born at Hoorn in 1667. He excelled in painting birds and flowers, in water colours, which are still in estimation.]

[HERCK, JACOB MELCHIOR VAN, a Flemish painter of flowers, was living in 1720. He was son-in-law to P. G. Verbruggen, whose works he copied.]

HERISSET, A., an indifferent French engraver, who flourished about the year 1740. He engraved part of the plates for the folio publication of Views of Versailles, and also some plates of fortification; published in 1757. We have also some prints by him, after J. F. de Troy.

[HERLIN, FREDERIC, a painter of Nordlingen, who flourished from the middle to the latter part of the fifteenth century. He was a close imitator of the manner of Van Eyck. There are pictures by him at the church of S. George, at Nordlingen, representing a Crucifixion, and the Virgin with the Infant, and Saints attending, with the dates 1462 and 1488. There is also a grand Triptique, very beautiful, and which ornaments the choir of the cathedral of Meissen, attributed to him. Unfortunately this has been shamefully injured by some dauber, under the pretence of restoration. It resembles, in a surprising manner, the works of Van Eyck, in the composition, and in the naked figures; only the latter are not so well treated. The draperies do not exhibit so distinctly as in Jan Van Eyck the particular stuffs, but they are more nobly cast, and resemble the manner of his brother Hubert. There were several other painters of the same name and period, but the records are very defective. Discoveries, however, may be expected from the prevailing interest in the works of the old German and Flemish masters.]

HERREGOUTS, HENRY. This painter was born at Mechlin about the year 1666. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but he was a very reputable historical painter. There are several of his works in the churches at Antwerp, Louvaine, and Bruges. His pictures are composed in a grand style, and his design is correct. He possessed an uncommon freedom of hand, and his colouring is chaste and clear, resembling that of Vandyck. The airs of his heads are graceful and expressive, and his draperies are simple and well cast. In the cathedral at Antwerp, is a fine picture by Herregouts of the Martyrdom of St. Matthew. At Bruges, in the church of St. Anne, is his most capital performance, representing the Last Judgment, an immense work, the figures larger than life, grandly composed, and in a bold style of design. [Died at Antwerp 1724.]

HERREGOUTS, JOHN BAPTIST, was the son and the disciple of the foregoing artist, born at Bruges about the year 1700. He painted history in the style of his father, and though he is inferior to him in some respects, his works possess considerable merit. The following are his most esteemed performances: in the church of St. Anne, at Bruges, the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, with a Glory of Angels; in the church of the Carmelites, the Presentation in the Temple; and at the principal altar, the Virgin and several Saints kneeling before Christ, considered his best production. We have a few etchings by this artist, executed in a free, slight style; among which, is a St. Cecilia surrounded with Angels, signed J. Baptistus Herregouts, f. et invent. a Brugge.

HERRERA, FRANCISCO DE, THE ELDER, a Spanish painter and architect, born at Seville in 1576. He was a scholar of Luis Fernandez, and was one of the earliest artists of his country who attempted to reform the dry and tasteless style that had prevailed before him. His colouring was bold and clear, and he gave great relief to his figures. Among his most considerable works are his picture of the Last Judgment, in the parochial church of San Bernardo at Seville; and his fresco paintings in the cupola of San Buena Ventura. He visited Madrid when he was upwards of sixty years of age, where he painted several pictures of the life of San Ramon, in the cloister de la Merced Calzada. He also excelled in painting fairs, markets, and merry-makings, which were much admired. Herrera etched several plates from his own compositions, particularly his pictures in the cupola of S. Buena Ventura.* He died in 1656.

HERRERA, FRANCISCO, THE YOUNGER, was the son and disciple of the foregoing artist, born at Seville in 1622. After passing some time under his father, he visited Rome, and applied himself with great assiduity in studying the beauties of antiquity, and the works of the most eminent masters. A residence of six years in Italy rendered him one of the most accomplished artists of his country, and some time after his return to Seville he was appointed sub-director of the Academy at its institution in 1660, of which Murillo was president. Not brooking this inferiority, he went to Madrid, where his talents soon brought him into public estimation. He was appointed painter to Charles II. of Spain, and superintendent of the royal works. His principal performances at Madrid are, the great altarpiece of the Barefooted Carmelites, representing San Hermendildo; the cupola of the convent of Nuestra Señora de Atocha, where he painted the Assumption of the Virgin; and in the convent of Corpus Christi, St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read. Herrera the Younger also excelled in painting still-life, flowers, and fish, and for his peculiar talent in the last was called by the Italians il Spagnuolo degli Pesci. He died in 1635.

HERS, or HERTZ, JOHN DANIEL, a German engraver, mentioned by Basan. He was born at Nuremberg in 1599. He etched several plates after his own designs, and from the works of Rottenhammer, and other masters. We have, among others, a large etching of St. Paul preaching at Athens, from a composition of his own. He died in 1635.

[HERSENT, LOUIS, a French historical and portrait painter, was born at Paris in 1777, and was a scholar of Regnault. He painted many interesting subjects from the poets, and passages of French history, which are to be found in some of the best collections in France. Portraits by him of distinguished persons are numerous. Several of his pictures have been engraved by Adam, Laugier, Tardieu, and others. He was a member of the French Institute, the Royal Academy of Berlin, and an officer of the Legion of Honour. His wife, Madame Hersent, whose maiden name was Maudit, has also distinguished herself as an historical and portrait painter. Some of her pictures are in the galleries of the Luxembourg and Fontainebleau, and have been engraved by Tardieu. She was born in 1784, but whether she be living is not ascertained.]

HERTOCKS, A., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He was principally employed by the booksellers in portraits and frontispieces. His plates are executed with the graver, in a stiff, tasteless style, though neat. His portraits are his best prints, and they are more valued for their rarity than their merit as engravings. Among others, we have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

Charles I. kneeling, holding a Crown of Thorns; after P. Fruytiers.

Charles II., when Prince of Wales.

Sir Edward Nicholas, Secretary of State; after Hanneman.

Sir Francis Wortley, Bart.

Henry Rolle, Juris-consult; prefixed to his Abridgment.

Robert Rawdon, a Governor of St. Thomas's Hospital.

William Chamberlaine, M. D. and poet; prefixed to his Pharonnida.

Hugh Crompton, poet.

Alexander Bromé, poet.

Gideon Harvey, M. D.

Edward Waterhouse, Juris-consult and antiquary.

He engraved a frontispiece to the Icon Basilike, and another to the complete collection of the King's works; also that for Mr. Evelyn's Sculptura.

HEUDELLOT, J., a modern French engraver, of no great celebrity, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. We have by him a few plates after Adrian van Ostade and Lingelbach; also the portrait of Margaret van Goyen, after a picture by Jan Steen, her husband.

HEUMAN, GEORGE DANIEL, a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1724. He engraved a set of architectural views of the churches, &c. at Vienna, published by John Andrew Peeffel, at Augsburg, in 1724. They are neatly executed. He also engraved several portraits of German characters.

HEUSCH, WILLIAM DE. This painter was born at Utrecht in 1633. After receiving some instruction in his native city, he visited Rome, where he became a scholar of John Both. He painted landscapes in the charming style of that master, and sometimes approached so near to him, that his pictures have frequently been mistaken for those of Both. His landscapes exhibit the most pleasing scenery, and evince more of the Italian taste than that of his country. They are embellished with figures and cattle, neatly drawn, and touched with great spirit. His subjects are frequently taken from sites in the vicinity of Rome; and they sometimes represent views of the Rhine, and waterfalls. Though inferior to Both, this artist holds a respectable rank among the able landscape painters of the Dutch school. We have a set of twelve spirited etchings of landscapes with figures, by William de Heusch, after his own designs, which are become extremely rare.

HEUSCH, JACOB DE, was the nephew of William de Heusch, born at Utrecht in 1657, and was instructed in the art by his uncle, whose style he at first adopted. Having made considerable proficiency under so able an instructor, he was recommended to visit Italy, where he passed several years. He met with very flattering encouragement at Rome, his pictures being much admired. He particularly attached himself to the study of the works of Salvator Rosa, whose picturesque style he imitated with considerable success. His pictures represent the most select views in the environs of Rome, enriched with groups of charming figures, correctly drawn and vigorously touched. We have a few etchings by this painter of landscapes, from his own designs, executed in a neat, slight style. He died in 1701.

HEUSCH, ABRAHAM DE. This painter was probably a relative of the two preceding artists. He was born at Utrecht in 1650, and was instructed in the rudiments of the art by an obscure painter, called Christian Striep. He excelled in painting plants, insects, and reptiles; which he designed and painted with surprising patience and labour. His pictures of that description do not yield to the highly wrought productions of Gerard Dou or Mieris, in the delicate polish of their finishing. There are a few etchings of landscapes by Abraham de Heusch, from his own designs.

[HEUVELE, ANTONY. VANDEN, a scholar of Gaspar de Crayer, was born at Ghent at the commencement of the seventeenth century. He was for some years in Italy. On his return to Ghent he painted many good pictures, which are in the churches and private collections there, and in other cities in Belgium. The Museum at Ghent possesses his best; the Museum at Brussels has his Martyrdom of S. Aurelia.]

[HEWICK, GASPARD, was born at Oudenarde in 1550. He went to Italy and studied under Lorenzo Costa, and produced some good pictures, on a large scale, for churches and other public buildings. He died in 1611.]

[HEYDEN, JOHN VANDER, a Flemish portrait painter, who was for some time in London, where he died about 1686.]

HEYDEN, JOHN VANDER. This celebrated painter was born at Gorcum in 1637. His only instruction in the art was a few lessons in drawing he received from an unknown glass-painter; but his natural genius soon discovered itself in the production of some designs of ruins and buildings, finished in a manner so correct and precise, that they were the admiration of the artists of his time. He next attempted to represent similar subjects in oil, which he carried to a perfection that is unexampled. The pictures of Vander Heyden represent the most picturesque views of the different towns in Holland, and the adjacent countries, particularly the principal parts of Amsterdam, in which he has introduced the most minute objects with a neatness and precision that are wonderful. Although he goes into the detail of each individual brick or stone in the buildings, there is nothing hard or dry in his pictures; his touch is dexterous and light, and there is a mellowness in his colouring and pencil that takes away all appearance of drudgery or labour. He thoroughly understood the best principles of the chiaro-scuro, and the arrangement of his masses is masterly, producing the finest effect. He was a perfect master of perspective; and in the linear diminution of every object its rules are strictly observed. The pictures of this extraordinary artist are generally embellished with admirable figures by Adrian Vanden Velde, which contribute in no small degree to their beauty and value. After the death of Adrian, the figures in the pictures by Vander Heyden were usually painted by Lingelbach. We have a few etchings of views by this painter from his own designs. He died in 1712. [His name was Vander Heyde, for so he signed it. He travelled into Germany, Belgium, and England. At Cologne, Brussels, London, and other places, he took interesting views of their remarkable monuments, and country seats. Vander Heyde had also a secret of printing pictures in oil colours, which he afterwards retouched with the pencil. Several of them, done on parchment, were afterwards fixed on panel so ingeniously as to deceive the unpractised eye.]

HEYLEN, GONZALES VAN. This artist was a native of Antwerp, and flourished about the year 1694. According to Papillon, he engraved on wood, in a free, spirited style. He engraved several frontispieces, and other book cuts.

HIBBART, WILLIAM, an English artist, who resided at Bath about the year 1760. We have a few portraits etched by him, in a style which renders it probable that he was a painter. They resemble the manner of Worlidge. The following portraits are by him:

Anthony Watteau, painter.
Laurence Delvaux, sculptor.
Samuel Derrick, of Bath.

HIDALGO, DON JOSEPH GARCIA, a Spanish painter, born in 1656. He was probably a native of Murcia, as he studied in that city, under Mateo Gilarte, and Nicolas de Villacis. After passing some years under those masters he went to Italy, and at Rome became a scholar of Giacinto Brandi, under whose tuition he made considerable progress. The climate of Italy proving obnoxious to his health, he returned to Spain, and in 1674 went to Madrid, and was employed by Charles II. in a series of twenty-four pictures for the cloisters of San Felipe el Real, which occupied him, with other commissions from the king, for seventeen years. In 1691 he published a work on art, entitled Principios para estudiar el Nobilissimo Arte de la Pintura. The year of his death is not known.

HIGHMORE, JOSEPH, an eminent English painter, born in London in 1692. He was the son of a coal-merchant, and showing an early inclination for the art, it was his father's intention to have permitted him to gratify his propensity, by placing him under the care of his uncle, who was serjeant-painter to King William, under whom Sir James Thornhill studied; but for some reasons he changed his purpose, and he was articulated to an attorney in 1707, but so much against his inclination, that in about three years he began to form a resolution of indulging his natural disposition to his favourite art, and employed all his leisure hours in drawing, and in the study of geometry and perspective, without any instruction but books. To make himself acquainted with anatomy, he attended the lectures of Mr. Cheselden; at the same time he frequented the painter's academy, then held in Great Queen Street, under the direction of Sir Godfrey Kneller, who noticed him particularly, and distinguished him by the name of the young lawyer. On the termination of his clerkship, instead of frequenting the courts, he commenced painting as a profession, and settled in the city, where he met with employment. His reputation and business increasing, he took a more conspicuous station, by removing to a house in Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1723. An opportunity soon offered of introducing himself advantageously to persons of distinction, on his being engaged by Mr. Pine to make the drawings for his prints of the Knights of the Bath, on the renewal of that order in 1725. He painted the portraits of several of the order, particularly a fine picture of the Duke of Richmond, attended by his three esquires, with a perspective view of Henry VII.'s chapel. He was soon afterwards sent for to St. James's, by George I., to paint the portrait of the Duke of Cumberland, which has been engraved in mezzotinto by Smith. In 1732 Mr. Highmore visited the continent, in company with Doctor Pemberton and other friends, chiefly for the purpose of viewing the Dusseldorp collection of pictures. At Antwerp he had the satisfaction of contemplating several of the finest works of Rubens, his favourite painter. In 1742 he painted the Prince and Princess of Wales, for the Duke of Saxe Gotha. The publication of Pamela gave birth to a series of pictures by Highmore, which were engraved and published by subscription, in 1745. Of his historical pictures, the principal were, Hagar and Ishmael, a present to the Foundling Hospital; the Good Samaritan; the finding of Moses; and the Graces unveiling Nature. Mr. Highmore was the author of several literary works; among which were "A critical Examination of the Paintings by Rubens on the Ceiling of the Banqueting-house, in which Architecture is introduced, as far as relates to Perspective," and "The Practice of Perspective, on the Principles of Dr. Brook Taylor, &c." He died in 1780.

HIGMORE, ———. This artist was probably a native of France. His name is affixed to some large portraits; among which is that of Le Sage, the author of Gil Blas. They are very indifferently executed.

[HILLEGAARD, PAUL VAN, a good historical painter, was a native of Holland. He painted battles, skirmishes, and drunken brawls. There is a picture by him in the Museum at Amsterdam, it represents Prince Maurice dismissing the trained bands in 1618.]

HILLIARD, NICHOLAS. This artist was born at Exeter in 1547. He was the younger son of Richard Hilliard, who served the office of high sheriff of the county of Devonshire in 1560. He was brought up to the business of a goldsmith and jeweller, to which his inclination added that of painting in miniature. He studied the works of Hans Holbein, as the best models he could follow, and acquired something of the neatness of his finishing, though greatly inferior to him in the clearness and vigour of his colouring. He was appointed goldsmith, carver, and portrait painter to Queen Elizabeth, and painted her portrait several times. That his works were greatly admired at the time, appears from his being celebrated by Dr. Donne, in his poem of the Storm, in which he says :

"An hand or eye,
By Hilliard drawn, is worth a historye
By a worse painter made."

He continued in vogue during this reign, and painted several persons of the court, especially ladies. He was not less favoured by James I., who appointed him, by patent, his principal drawer of small portraits, and embosser of medals in gold. Hilliard died in 1619.

[HILTON, WILLIAM, a distinguished English historical and poetical painter, was born at Lincoln in 1786. He received lessons from his father, who was a portrait painter; and was a pupil of J. R. Smith, the crayon painter and mezzotinto engraver. He also attended the schools of the Royal Academy, studied anatomy, and made himself complete master of the human figure. Among many pictures of great excellence may be named, his Triumphant Entrance of the Duke of Wellington into Madrid; Comus; Jupiter and Europa; Sir Calpeine rescuing Serena (in the National Gallery); Edith and the Monks finding the Body of Harold; Venus seeking Cupid at the bath of Diana (in the possession of Lord Charles Townshend); Nature blowing Bubbles for her Children, a truly poetical conception; Rebecca at the Well; The Infant Warrior; Murder of the Innocents; The Magdalene washing the Feet of Christ; The Crucifixion, which is in a church at Liverpool; The Crowning with Thorns, at St. Peter's church, Pimlico; The Angel delivering Peter; the Lazarus, at Newark; and Una and the Satyrs. That he was imbued with a truly poetic feeling, is evinced by his choice of subjects; and he selected such as would permit the exhibition of the most beautiful human forms: The Rapes of Proserpine, of Ganymede, Europa, Amphitrite; Hebe, Comus, and others, as described by Milton and Spenser, his favourite authors. It has been remarked that fewer of Hilton's pictures have been engraved than of most artists of celebrity; one engraving, however, which is very common, Una and the Lion in the Cottage of Corecea, neither does credit to the artists, nor to the Association that put it forth. There are many minor productions of his, in his earlier time, for publications of the day, that abound with beautiful forms and graceful action. He was a member of the Royal Academy, and succeeded Fuseli as keeper. His manners were singularly mild and amiable; and he was much beloved by the young students of that establishment. He died on the 30th of December, 1839. He will stand as a bright star among English historical and poetical painters.]

HINDE, T., an indifferent English engraver, who flourished about the year 1645. We have by him a few portraits, among which are the following :

Charles II. when Prince of Wales.
Prince Rupert.
Robert, Earl of Warwick.
Thomas Fairfax, Lord Fairfax.

HIRE, LAWRENCE DE LA, a French painter, born at Paris in 1606. He was the son of Stephen de la Hire, an historical painter, who had acquired some reputation in Poland, by whom he was instructed. The circumstance most deserving of notice respecting this painter is, that he was the only artist of his time in Paris that did not follow the style of Simon Vouet; but it cannot be added to this observation, that he adopted a better. In aiming at softness, he sunk into insipidity, and in endeavouring to be correct, he became a cold and a timid mannerist. Two of his best pictures are Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, and his Apparition to the Marys, in the church of the Carmelites at Paris. Lawrence de la Hire has etched several plates from his own designs, some of which he has assisted with the graver. They are executed in a slight, free style, but the drawing is generally incorrect. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

The Holy Family with St. John kissing the foot of the infant Jesus; L. de la Hire in. et fec.
The Holy Family reposing, surrounded by Angels.
The Repose in Egypt.
The Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Magdalene, and St. John. 1639.
The Conversion of St. Paul.
The Judgment of Paris.
Venus and Adonis.
Different sets of Children playing, in the form of friezes.
Several Landscapes, of various sizes.

He died in 1656.

HIRE, PHILIP DE LA, was the grandson of the foregoing artist, born at Paris in 1677. He was first instructed in the principles of design; but he afterwards studied physic, and was of some eminence in the profession. In his moments of leisure he painted several pictures in the style of Watteau, which were very respectable performances. He died in 1719.

HIRSCHFOGEL, AUGUSTINE, a German painter in enamel, and engraver, born at Nuremberg about the year 1506. He was the son of Viet Hirschfogel, a glass-painter, who instructed him in the rudiments of design. We have several etchings by this artist, which possess considerable merit, particularly his landscapes, which are executed in a masterly style. His drawing of the figure is incorrect. He usually marked his plates with the cipher IAN, with the date. The following are his principal prints :

A set of six Mountainous Landscapes, with castles. 1546.
A Landscape, with a Canal and a Stone Bridge. 1526.
A View of a Village, by the side of a River, with a Wooden Bridge. 1546.
A Landscape, with a figure representing the Death of Cleopatra. 1547.
Two Views of Sea-ports, with Shipping. 1549.
Part of the Murder of the Innocents; after a sketch by Raffaelle, different from that by Marc Antonio. 1545.
A Vase, with goldsmith's ornaments. 1543.
A Sword, the handle ornamented with eagles' heads, and the scabbard with goldsmith's ornaments.

HOARE, WILLIAM, an English portrait painter, who resided at Bath about the year 1770. He etched a few plates for his amusement; among which are the following portraits :

Maria Walpole, Duchess of Gloucester; after Reynolds.
William Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester.

Sir Isaac Newton.

Ralph Allen, of Bath, signed Ad vivum, Will. Hoare.

[William Hoare was born at Eye, in Suffolk, about 1707. He received a liberal education, and was placed under Grisoni, an Italian painter residing in London. He afterwards went to Rome and attended the school of Francesco Imperiale, the disciple of Carlo Maratti, and associated much with Pompeo Batoni. He remained abroad for nine years, and then returned to London with many copies and studies of the works of the best masters. Finding no encouragement for historical painting, he had recourse to portraiture, which he practised at Bath with considerable success. He painted a picture, Christ bearing his Cross, for the church of St. Michael there; and another, the Pool of Bethesda, for the octagon chapel. He was eminent as a painter in crayons, and produced many elegant figures in that manner. On the formation of the Royal Academy he was chosen one of the members, and was a constant exhibitor for many years. He died in 1792. His son, the well-known Prince Hoare, was also a painter, and foreign correspondent for the Royal Academy; he did not practise the art as a profession, but merely as an amateur. He wrote "The Epochs of Art in England," "Arcthusa," and other amusing works.]

HOBBEMA, MINDERHOUT. This captivating painter is supposed by Mr. Pilkington to have been born at Antwerp about the year 1611. This conjecture becomes however extremely disputable, when we consider the style of his pictures, and the scenery they represent. It is much more probable that he was a native of Haerlem, or that he resided there, as his landscapes are faithful transcripts of the views in Haerlem wood, and the environs of that place. His pictures in no way partake of the Flemish style, such as it is exhibited in the landscapes of Rubens, Wildens, Van Uden, Artois, or Teniers; but they perfectly assimilate with the works of Ruysdael, and other painters of the Dutch school. Though the subjects of his pictures are frequently confined to a cottage embosomed in a clump of trees, with a sandy road leading through a wood, and a brook or pond, he has represented these humble scenes with the most fascinating naïveté and simplicity. Hobbema has not been surpassed by any painter of his country, in the pure and chaste tinting of his colour, in the full and flowing richness of his pencil, and his intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro. In some of his larger pictures he has introduced, with the happiest effect, the brilliancy of the sunbeam bursting through the gloom of the forest, and illuminating the centre of his picture with a magical effect of light and shadow, that astonishes and charms. His skies are light and floating; and there is a dewy brightness in his verdure that is admirable. The pictures of Hobbema were for a long time unnoticed and neglected, while those of Breughel or Savery were bought at high prices; but such has been the improvement in our taste, that they are now among the most coveted and highly esteemed productions of the Dutch school. [Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys, in his "Review of the Lives and Works of some of the most eminent Painters," observes that "Houbraken makes no mention of HOBBEMA; neither is anything positively known of his private life; we must therefore avail ourselves of the information his works have enabled us to collect. Erroneous reports have been given of him by the Rev. Mr. Pilkington, who is generally correct in his translations from the best authors;

but he states, in his Dictionary of Painters, that Hobbema is supposed to have been born in 1611, at Antwerp, and that most of his pictures were supplied with figures by Ostade and Teniers. I may, without hesitation, contradict this assertion, being convinced there are no such joint productions. On what ground he supposed him to have been born at Antwerp I cannot conjecture: after every consideration, I conceive that this must be a mistake; for there does not exist the slightest doubt that he was a Dutchman, and not a Fleming. I have known many well-informed Dutch amateurs and painters, many of them of advanced age, who have assured me that in their youth they were told by old people, that Hobbema was born at Coeverden; and such is the general belief in Holland. Still nothing positive can be asserted; for some have said that he was a native of Vriesland; others, that he was a Noord Hollander. These remarks were suggested by many of his productions having been found in those provinces; but this is not conclusive, as formerly there were many collectors among the nobility who adorned their country-seats with objects of art; besides whom there were many amateurs living at Groningen, Leeuwarden, Harlingen, Alkmaar, Hoorn, and more particularly at Enkhuisen; this latter place, a century ago, being one of the most important in Holland for its trade and wealth. Many persons have thought Hobbema to be a pupil of Jacob Ruisdael: it is certain that these two great men were upon friendly terms, and there is not the slightest doubt they travelled together over picturesque countries, in order to sketch and paint the scenery most adapted to their studies. In consequence of this circumstance, the same subjects are often repeated by these two great painters, and they even frequently delighted, in imitating each other's style. We have seen productions of Ruisdael that remind us forcibly of Hobbema; but, notwithstanding, there is always a perceptible difference: the pencil of Ruisdael and the touch of his foliage are more defined by his triangular handling: Hobbema is richer in colour, and his style of execution more magically harmonious. It appears evident from the subjects of all the pictures I have seen of Hobbema, that he did not proceed farther than the borders of Westphalia to study scenes for his landscapes; but he particularly selected the interior of Holland, where nature seemed sufficiently adapted to his views for giving those representations which are so truly and beautifully depicted by him. It is to be traced in Hobbema's works that he was on friendly terms with Jacob Ruisdael; and it appears certain that the two painters were already finished artists when they made each other's acquaintance, which probably took place at Amsterdam, where Hobbema resided. He reckoned also as his friends several other eminent painters of his time; among whom were Nicolas Berchem, Adrian Vande Velde, John Lingelbach, Wyntrank, and others, who adorned his beautiful landscapes with figures and animals. This proves that his talents were appreciated by his contemporaries, although it is true that the paintings of Ruisdael were preferred to his; and this continued for a considerable time, until the English amateurs showed a decided preference for the works of Hobbema, and by becoming buyers, considerably increased their value." His pictures are numerous in England, and fine specimens obtain the highest prices; as much as £3000 sterling have been paid for one. To enumerate them and descant on their beauties would fill a volume. They are dated from 1657 to 1669; perhaps he omitted the date on his earlier pictures. There is one, however, in the collection of Sir Robert Peel, and a very extraordinary one it is, which has the date 1689; whether the figure of 8 be a substitution for a 6, obliterated in cleaning, must be left to conjecture. There is no doubt of the genuineness of the picture, but it is recorded that "when it was brought to London it was much improved by cleaning." For a full account of Hobbema's pictures, see Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. vi. and Supplement.]

HOCKNER, JOHN GASPAR, a German engraver, who resided at Dresden about the year 1655. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved a number of portraits, which are executed with sufficient neatness, but in a stiff, tasteless style.

[HODGES, CHARLES HOWARD, an Englishman by birth, who spent the greater part of his life in Holland. He painted portraits, which were considered excellent likenesses, with a firm and broad pencil, and a beautiful tone of colour. Many of the great men of that day sat to him. He engraved in mezzotinto after Van Dyck, Metsu, and Rembrandt. The Shipbuilder and his Wife, in the Royal Collection of England, said to be by Rembrandt, was engraved by him. He died at Amsterdam in 1837, at the age of 63.]

HODGES, WILLIAM, an English landscape painter, born in London in 1744. He was a scholar of the admirable Wilson; and on leaving his instructor, was engaged as a designer to accompany Captain Cook in his second voyage round the world, during which he drew many interesting views of the countries discovered or visited by that intrepid and persevering circumnavigator. On his return he painted some pictures for the Admiralty of views in Otaheite, and the other islands in the Pacific Ocean. A few years afterwards he went to India, where he resided till 1784, and returned with a competent fortune. Mr. Hodges continued the exercise of his talents in London for a few years after his return, but soon after 1790 he engaged in some commercial concern in the west of England. He died in 1797.

HOECK, JOHN VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1600. His parents were in easy circumstances, and he received the advantage of a liberal education. Having shown a decided disposition for painting, he was placed in the school of Rubens, of whom he became one of the most distinguished disciples, and may be said to have approached nearer to the style of his great instructor than any of his numerous scholars. On leaving the academy of Rubens he visited Italy, and passed some years at Rome, studying after the best models. He painted several pictures for the nobility, which gained him great reputation. On his return to Flanders, he was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Ferdinand II., where he was employed in painting the portraits of the principal personages of the court, and some historical pictures for the churches and public places. He accompanied the Archduke Leopold, who was then governor of the Low Countries, in his return to the Netherlands, who employed him in several important works, and appointed him his principal painter. The works of Van Hoeck are finely composed, and designed with correctness and finesse. His colouring and touch resemble Rubens' so nearly, that his pictures have sometimes been taken for those of that master, even in his own country. In his portraits he is little inferior to Vandyck. Such are the pictures of Albert and Isabella, formerly in the collection of Prince Charles of Lorraine. Of his historical works in the Low Countries, one of the most esteemed is in the collegial church of Our Lady, at Mechlin, representing the dead Christ taken down from the Cross, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John. He died in 1650.

HOECK, ROBERT VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1609. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed; but he excelled in painting battles, encampments, and skirmishes, in which he introduced an infinite number of small figures, neatly drawn, and touched with surprising spirit. His compositions remind us of the ingenious Callot. He also painted historical subjects, of which there are twelve pictures in the Abbey of Berg St. Vinoc, near Dunkirk, representing the Twelve Apostles; at the bottom of each he has represented the Martyrdom of the Saint.

HOEFNAGEL, GEORGE, was born at Antwerp in 1546, the son of a diamond merchant, who intended to bring him up to the same business, but a decided genius and inclination for the art, induced his father to permit him to follow the bent of his disposition. Having made some progress in design, he travelled to Italy, where he made drawings after the ancient monuments and objects worthy his attention; and on his return to Flanders published a volume of plates, engraved from the designs he had made during his journey. He afterwards applied himself to painting animals, plants, and insects, which he finished in a beautiful and correct manner. When Antwerp was plundered by the Spaniards, this artist and his father were pillaged of every thing they had, and he took refuge in Bavaria, where he exercised his talent for subsistence. The elector, having seen some of his pictures, took him into his protection, and he remained some years at Munich. He was afterwards employed by the Emperor Rodolphus, who settled on him a considerable pension, and he passed the remainder of his life in his service.

George Hoefnagel also claims our notice as an engraver. He engraved views, and maps for books. He executed a map, or plan, of Bristol. In conjunction with Francis Hogenberg and Simone Novellani, he engraved the plates for Bravyn's Civitates Orbis Terrarum, published at Cologne in 1572; and some of the plates for the Theatrum Orbis Terrarum, by Abraham Ortelius. He died in 1600.

HOEFNAGEL, JAMES, was the son of George Hoefnagel, born at Francfort in 1575. He engraved a set of about fifty plates of beasts, birds, flowers, insects, &c., from the designs of his father, begun in 1592, when he was seventeen years of age. He also executed some plates from his own compositions, and from other masters.

[HOEKGEEST, or HOGEEEST, G. (i. e. GIOVACHIMO, or JOACHIM), a painter of interiors of churches, in the manner of De Wit, lived in the 17th century. In the Museum at the Hague are two pictures by him, representing the new church at Delft, with the monuments of the princes of the House of Orange; one bears date 1651. His cabinet pictures are not uncommon.]

HOET, GERARD. This painter was born at Bommel in 1648. He was the son of a glass-painter, and for some time assisted his father in his profession, but was afterwards placed under the tuition of Warnar van Rysen, who had been a scholar of Cornelius Poelemburg, and was in considerable reputation. He had not the advantage of this master's instruction longer than a year, when the death of his father obliged him to relinquish his studies for a time, and employ himself in finishing the glass-paintings left imperfect by his father, and which were the only resource of his family. In this employment he continued until the year 1672, when the French having taken possession of Bommel, he was obliged to take refuge at the Hague, where he was employed in ornamenting the saloons, and painting ceilings in some of the principal hotels. He also painted cabinet pictures of historical and fabulous subjects, which were much admired. He afterwards visited Amsterdam, where he met with equal encouragement; and after passing some time in that city, he was invited to Utrecht, by M. van Zuylen, one of the most zealous patrons of the art of his time, for whom he painted some of his best pictures. Always intent on the promotion of the art, Gerard Hoet was the means of establishing at Utrecht a school of design or academy, of which he was appointed director; and he conducted it with great credit to himself and advantage to the students for several years. The pictures of G. Hoet are in considerable estimation. He was perfectly acquainted with history and the fable. His compositions are ingenious and appropriate; and in the design of his small figures, he is more than usually correct. His colouring, without much force, is clear and agreeable. He died in 1733.

[HOEY, or HOOY JAN VAN, a painter, and supposed engraver, born at Leyden in 1545. When young he went to France, where he studied the art of painting, and settled at Paris. He was superintendent of the royal collection of pictures, and valet of the bed-chamber to Henry IV. He painted historical pictures; and several engravings of landscapes have been attributed to him, as also portraits, and a Virgin and Child in the Clouds. But there is great uncertainty in the matter. He died in 1615.]

HOFFMAN, FRANCIS. This artist was probably a native of Germany, but he resided in England about the year 1711. He engraved a plate representing the portraits of the Right Honourable Henry St. John, one of the principal Secretaries of State; the Right Honourable William Bromley, Speaker of the House of Commons; and the Right Honourable Robert Harley, Chancellor of the Exchequer. Underneath is a printed account of the transactions of the House of Commons for the year 1711. It is etched in a coarse, tasteless style, and inscribed Francis Hoffman, fecit aqua forte. In Mr. Gulstone's collection was a portrait of Francis Hoffman, drawn and engraved by himself, in which he is styled the inventor of ships with three bottoms.

[HOFLAND, THOMAS CHRISTOPHER, an English landscape painter, was born at Worksop, in Nottinghamshire, on Christmas-day, 1777. He received a little instruction in the art from Rathbone, who was then considered a good landscape painter. After spending some years at Derby as a teacher of drawing, he visited London for the purpose of copying pictures at the British Gallery, in which he was very successful. Finding that his copies sold well, he determined on settling in London, which he did in 1814. In this year the governors of the institution awarded him one hundred guineas for the best landscape, A Storm off the Coast of Scarborough, which was purchased by the Marquis of Stafford. He made many copies of Claude, Poussin, Wilson, and Gainsborough, and painted lake scenery which was considered excellent. He was employed for some time at White Knights by the Duke of Marlborough, to paint a series of pictures to illustrate a description of that place; but it appears that the result was greatly injurious to the artist, and dishonourable to the peer. In his 63rd year he visited Italy, under the patronage of the Earl of Egremont, and made many sketches of the beautiful scenery of Naples, Castellamare, Pompeii, Rome, Tivoli, and Florence. Here he was attacked by fever, which obliged him, after five months' absence, to return to England; and, though he rallied for a time, disease had laid such hold on him as to add twenty years to his appearance. After about two years of severe suffering, he died at Leamington in 1843. He was one of the originators of "The General Benevolent Society of Artists;" and also, in conjunction with Linton, Glover, Holmes, and others, projected and carried into effect the building of the Gallery in Suffolk Street.]

HOFMAN, SAMUEL, was a native of the canton of Zurich in Switzerland in 1539, and learned the elements of design under Gotthard Ringgli. The celebrity of the school of Rubens induced him to visit Antwerp, where he entered the academy of that distinguished painter. Such was his progress under so able an instructor, that he became eminent as a painter of history and portrait, at Antwerp, even at a period when that city was the residence of so many reputable artists. On his return to Switzerland he met with extensive employment, particularly in portraits, in which he united grandeur of style and dignity of character to fidelity of resemblance. He also painted fruit, game, and still-life. He died in 1648. [Balkema says he was born in 1598, and Nagler, that he was 56 when he died.]

HOGARTH, WILLIAM. For the particulars of the life of this extraordinary genius we are principally indebted to Mr. Nichols's Biographical Anecdotes of Hogarth, published in 1782. He was the son of a schoolmaster, born in 1697 or 1698, in the parish of St. Martin's, Ludgate. Having shown some disposition for drawing, he was bound an apprentice to an eminent silversmith and plater, to learn the branch of engraving arms and ciphers on plate; but before his time was expired, he felt the impulse of genius, and that it directed him to painting. During his apprenticeship, he set out with some of his companions on a Sunday's excursion to Highgate. The weather being hot, they went into a public-house to refresh themselves, where they had not been long, before a quarrel arose between some persons who were in the same room with them. One of the combatants struck his antagonist on the head with a quart pot, and cut him severely. The blood running down the man's face, together with the agony of the wound, which had distorted his features into a hideous grin, presented Hogarth with too laughable a subject to be overlooked. He drew out his pencil, and immediately produced one of the most ludicrous figures that ever was seen, an exact likeness of the man, and the caricature resemblance of the persons that surrounded him. On the expiration of his apprenticeship, he entered the Academy in St. Martin's Lane, and studied drawing after the model, though without ever attaining to any great excellence in the design of the figure. The first production in which he distinguished himself as a painter, is supposed to have been a representation of Wanstead Assembly. The figures in it were portraits, without any circumstances of burlesque, and are said to have been extremely like; the colouring perhaps better than in some of his later and more finished performances. It appears from the date of the earliest plate that can be ascertained to be the work of Hogarth, that he began the business of an engraver on his own account as early as 1720; and was chiefly employed at that time in engraving arms and shop-bills. We find him soon after engaged in designing and executing plates for the booksellers, the first of which appear to have been twelve folio prints for Aubry de la Motraye's Travels, signed with his name, in 1723. In the following year, seven smaller prints for Apuleius's Golden Ass. In 1725, among others, fifteen head-pieces for Beaver's Military Punishments of the Antients; and five frontispieces for the five volumes of the Translation of Cassandra. In 1726, seventeen prints for a duodecimo edition of Hudibras, with a head of Butler; and a variety of others between 1726 and 1733. He was at this time much employed in portrait painting; the most ill-suited employment imaginable to a man whose turn was certainly not flattery, nor his talent adapted to look on vanity without a sneer. Yet his facility in catching a likeness, and a novel mode he adopted of painting family pieces in the style of conversations, brought him prodigious business for some time. It did not however last, either from his applying to the real bent of his disposition, or from his customers apprehending that a satirist was too formidable a confessor for the devotees of self-love. What the price of his portraits were, Mr. Nichols strove in vain to discover; but it is suspected that they were originally very low. Lord Orford has remarked, that if our artist "indulged his spirit of ridicule in personalities, it never proceeded beyond sketches and drawings; that his prints touched the folly, but spared the person; and that he never delivered the very features of any identical person." But this distinguished writer, who may be said to have received his education in a court, was perhaps little acquainted with the low popular characters with which Hogarth occasionally peopled his pictures. It has been unquestionably ascertained, that almost all the personages in "The Rake's Levee-room," were undoubtedly portraits; and that in "Southwark Fair," and the "Modern Midnight Conversation," as many more were discoverable.

In the year 1730, Hogarth married the only daughter of Sir James Thornhill. This union was a stolen one, and consequently without the approbation of Sir James, who, considering the youth of his daughter, then barely eighteen, and the slender finances of her husband, as yet an obscure artist, was not easily reconciled to the match. Soon after his marriage, he began his celebrated series of "The Harlot's Progress;" and was advised by Lady Thornhill to have some of the pictures placed in the way of his father-in-law. Accordingly, Mrs. Hogarth contrived to have some of them conveyed into his dining-room. Sir James inquired from whence they came, and being told by whom they were introduced, he said, "it was very well, the man who can produce such representations as these, can maintain a wife without a portion." He soon after, however, became both reconciled and generous to the young people. This admirable performance was followed by "The Rake's Progress," which, though perhaps superior, had not so much success, from want of novelty. The Abbé du Bos has complained that no history painter of his time had gone through a series of actions, and thus, like an historian, painted the successive fortune of his hero from the cradle to the grave. What Du Bos wished to see done, Hogarth accomplished. He launches his young adventurer, a simple girl of the town, and conducts her through all the vicissitudes of wretchedness to a premature death. This was painting to the understanding and to the heart.

In 1745, he acquired additional reputation by his much-admired suite of the "Marriage à-la-Mode." He had projected a set of a "Happy Marriage," as a counterpart to it, and had made some sketches of the subjects. In the year of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, he went to France, but was prevented from proceeding further than Calais by a whimsical circumstance. While he was making a drawing of the gate of the town, he was taken into custody, and carried before the governor as a spy. After a very strict examination, he was committed to the care of his host, on condition that Hogarth should not go out of his house till he was on the point of embarking for England. He has ridiculed this event in his print of "O the Roast Beef of Old England!" Hogarth now appeared to the world in the character of an author, by publishing his Analysis of Beauty, written with a view of fixing the fluctuating ideas of Taste, in a quarto volume, in 1753, in which he attempted to show, by a variety of examples, that a curve is the line of beauty; the leading idea of which was hieroglyphically thrown out in a frontispiece to his works in 1745. In this undertaking, he acknowledges himself indebted to his friends for assistance, particularly to one gentleman, for his corrections and amendments of at least a third part of the "wording." This friend was Dr. Benjamin Hoadley, the physician, who carried it on to the third part; and he was lastly assisted by Dr. Morrell. It is observed of Hogarth, that all his powers of delighting were restrained to his pencil. Having rarely been introduced into polite circles, none of his sharp corners had been rubbed off, and he continued to the last a gross, uncultivated man. He had one failing in common with persons who attain wealth and eminence without the aid of a liberal education. He affected to despise every kind of knowledge which he did not possess. About the year 1757, his brother-in-law, Mr. Thornhill, resigned the place of king's serjeant-painter in favour of Mr. Hogarth.

The last memorable event of our artist's life, Lord Orford observes, was his quarrel with Mr. Wilkes, in which, if Hogarth did not commence direct hostilities, he at least gave the first offence, by an oblique attack on the friends and party of that gentleman. In September, 1762, Hogarth published his print of "the Times." It was answered by Mr. Wilkes in a severe North Briton. On this, the painter exhibited the caricature of the writer. Churchill, the poet, then engaged in the war, and wrote his Epistle to Hogarth, with the motto "Ut Pictura Poesis." In revenge for this Epistle, Hogarth caricatured Churchill, under the form of a canonical bear, with a club and a pot of porter, et vitulâ tu dignus et hic.—Never did two angry men of their abilities throw mud with less dexterity. At the time when these virulent and disgraceful proceedings were carrying on, Mr. Hogarth was visibly declining in his health; and on the 26th of October, 1764, he died of a dropsy in the chest, at his house in Leicester Fields.

We cannot dismiss this article without adding to the above account an abstract from the admirable character of Hogarth, by the late Lord Orford. "I consider that great and original genius," says that elegant biographer, "rather as a writer of comedy with a pencil, than as a painter. If catching the manners and follies of an age, 'living as they rise,' if general satire on vices and ridicules, familiarized by strokes of nature, and heightened by wit, and the whole animated by proper and just expressions of the passions, be comedy; Hogarth composed comedies as much as Moliere. In his Marriage à-la-Mode, there is even an intrigue carried on throughout the piece. He is more true to character than Congreve; each personage is distinct from the rest, acts in his sphere, and cannot be confounded with any other of the dramatis personæ. The alderman's foot-boy, in the last print of the set I have mentioned, is an ignorant rustic; and if wit is struck out of the characters in which it is not expected, it is from their acting conformably to their situation, and from the mode of their passions, not from their having the wit of fine gentlemen. Thus there is wit in the figure of the alderman, who, when his daughter is expiring in the agonies of poison, wears a face of solicitude, but it is to save her gold ring, which he is drawing gently off her finger. The thought is parallel to Moliere's, where the miser puts out one of the candles as he is talking. Moliere, inimitable as he has proved, brought a rude theatre to perfection. Hogarth had no model to follow and improve upon. He created his art, and used colours instead of language. He resembled Butler, but his subjects are more universal; and amidst all his pleasantry, he observes the true end of comedy, reformation; there is always a moral to his pictures. Sometimes he rose to tragedy, not in the catastrophe of kings and heroes, but in marking how vice conducts, insensibly and incidentally, to misery and shame. He warns against encouraging cruelty and idleness in young minds; and discerns how the different vices of the great and the vulgar lead, by various paths, to the same unhappiness. The fine lady in Marriage à-la-Mode, and Tom Nero in the Four Stages of Cruelty, terminate their story in blood; she occasions the murder of her husband; he assassinates his mistress. How delicate and superior too is his satire, when he intimates, in the College of Physicians and Surgeons that preside at a dissection, how the legal habitude of viewing shocking scenes, hardens the human mind and renders it unfeeling. The president maintains the dignity of insensibility over an executed corpse, and considers it but as the subject of a lecture. In the print of the Sleeping Judges, this habitual indifference only excites our laughter. He drew all his stores from nature, and the force of his own genius, and was indebted neither to models nor books for his style, thoughts, or hints; and was never successful when he designed for the works of other men. He could not bend his talents to think after any body else. He could think like a great genius rather than after one. I have a sketch in oil, that he gave me, which he intended to engrave. It was done at the time when the House of Commons appointed a committee to inquire into the cruelties exercised on prisoners in the Fleet, to extort money from them. The scene is the committee; on the table are the instruments of torture. A prisoner in rags, half starved, appears before them; the poor man has a good countenance, that adds to the interest. On the other hand is the inhuman gaoler. It is the very figure that Salvator Rosa would have drawn for Iago, in the moment of detection. Villany, fear, and conscience are mixed in yellow and livid on his countenance; his lips are contracted by tremor; his face advances as eager to lie; his legs step back, as thinking to make his escape; one hand is thrust precipitately into his bosom, the fingers of the other are catching uncertainly at his button-holes. If this was a portrait, it is the most speaking that ever was drawn; if it was not, it is still finer. It is seldom his figures do not express the character he intended to give them. When they wanted an illustration that colours could not bestow, collateral circumstances, full of wit, supply notes. The nobleman in Marriage à-la-Mode has a great air; the coronet on his crutches, and his pedigree issuing out of the bowels of William the Conqueror, add to his character. In the Breakfast, the old steward reflects for the Spectator. Sometimes a short label is an epigram, and is never introduced without improving the subject. The Scenes of Bedlam and the Gaming-house, are inimitable representations of our serious follies and unavoidable woes; and the concern shown by the Lord Mayor, when the companion of his childhood is brought before him as a criminal, is a touching picture, and big with human admonition and reflection. Another instance of this author's genius is his not condescending to explain his moral lessons by the trite poverty of allegory. If he had an emblematical thought, he expressed it with wit, rather than by symbol. His Southwark Fair is full of humour; his March to Finchley, of nature; the Enraged Musician tends to farce. The Four Parts of the Day, except the last, are inferior to few of his works. The Sleeping Congregation, the Lecture on the Vacuum, the Laughing Audience, the Consultation of Physicians, as a coat of arms, and the Cockpit, are perfect in their several kinds. The prints of Industry and Idleness have more merit in the intention than execution. Towards his latter end he now and then repeated himself, but seldom more than most great authors who executed so much. It may appear singular, that of an author whom I call comic, and who is so celebrated for his humour, I should speak in general in so serious a style; but it would be suppressing the merits of his heart, to consider him only as a promoter of laughter. I think I have shown that his views were more generous and extensive. Mirth coloured his pictures, but benevolence designed them. He smiled like Socrates, that men might not be offended at his lectures, and might learn to laugh at their own follies. When his topics were harmless, all his touches were marked with pleasantry and fun. He never laughed, like Rabelais, at nonsense that he imposed for wit; but, like Swift, combined incidents that divert one from their unexpected encounter, and illustrate the tale he means to tell. The manners or costume are more than observed in every one of his works. The very furniture of his rooms describe the characters of the persons to whom they belong, a lesson that might be of use to comic authors. It was reserved to Hogarth to write a scene of furniture. The Rake's Levee-room, the Nobleman's Dining-room, the Apartments of Husband and Wife in Marriage à-la-Mode, the Alderman's Parlour, the Poet's Bed-chamber, and many others, are the history of the manners of the age. Not content with shining in a path untrodden before, he was ambitious of distinguishing himself as a painter of history. But not only his drawing and colouring rendered him unequal to the task; the genius that had entered so feelingly into the calamities and crimes of private life, deserted him in a walk that called for dignity and grace. The burlesque turn of his mind mixed itself with the most serious subjects. In his Danae, the old nurse tries a coin of the golden shower with her teeth, to see if it is true gold; in the Pool of Bethesda, a servant of a rich ulcerated lady beats back a poor man that sought the same celestial remedy. Both circumstances are justly thought, but rather too ludicrous. It is a much more capital fault that Danae herself is a mere nymph of Drury. He seems to have conceived no higher idea of beauty. So little had he eyes to his own deficiencies, that he believed he had discovered the principle of grace. With the enthusiasm of a discoverer, he cried Eureka! This was his famous line of beauty, the groundwork of his Analysis, a book that has many sensible hints and observations, but that did not carry the conviction, nor meet the universal acquiescence he expected. As he treated his contemporaries with scorn, they triumphed over this publication, and imitated him to expose him. He determined to rival the ancients, and, unfortunately, chose one of the finest pictures in England as the object of his competition. This was the celebrated Sigismonda, in the possession of the Duke of Newcastle, said to be painted by Coreggio, but no matter by whom. It is impossible to see the picture, or read Dryden's inimitable tale, and not feel that the same soul animated both. After many essays, Hogarth at last produced his Sigismonda, but no more like Sigismonda than I to Hercules. Not to mention the wretchedness of the colouring, it was the representation of a maudlin strumpet, just turned out of keeping, and with her eyes red with rage and usquebaugh, tearing off the ornaments her keeper had given her. To add to the disgust raised by such vulgar expression, her fingers were blooded by her lover's heart, that lay before her. None of the sober grief, no dignity of suppressed anguish, no involuntary tear, no settled meditation on the fate she meant to meet, no amorous warmth turned holy by despair; in short, all was wanting that should have been there, all was there that such a story should have banished from a mind capable of conceiving such complicated woe; woe so sternly felt, and yet so tenderly. Hogarth's performance was more ridiculous than any thing he had ever ridiculed. He set the price of four hundred pounds on it, and had it returned on his hands by the person for whom it was painted. He took subscriptions for a plate of it, but had the sense at last to suppress it. I make no more apology for this account, than for the encomiums I have bestowed on him. Both are dictated by truth, and are the history of a great man's excellencies and errors. Milton, it is said, preferred his Paradise Regained to his immortal poem."

The following is as ample a list of the designs and prints of Mr. Hogarth, as our limit will allow, and comprises nearly all those engraved by himself. It has been judged most desirable to arrange them according to their dates.

The Portrait of William Hogarth, with two figures and two Cupids. 1720.

An emblematical print on the South-sea Bubble; W. Hogarth, inv. et sculp. 1721.

Thirteen prints for Aubrey de la Motraye's Travels, in 1723.

Seven small prints for Apuleius's Golden Ass; in 1724.

Fifteen head-pieces for Beaver's Military Punishments of the Ancients.

A Burlesque on Kent's Altar-piece in St. Clement's. 1725.

A Masquerade, invented for the use of ladies and gentlemen by the ingenious Mr. Heidegger. 1725.

A Just View of the British Stage. 1725.

Twelve prints for Hudibras; the large set. 1726.

The small set, containing seventeen, with Butler's head.

[The head engraved for Butler, is that of J. B. Mo- neyer, the flower-painter, of which there is a mezzotinto.]

Mary Tofts, the rabbit woman of Godalmin. 1726.

Rich's Glory, or his triumphant entry into Covent Garden. 1728.

Sarah Malcolm, executed in 1732, for murder. W. Hogarth, ad vivum pinxit et sculpsit. This woman sat to him for her picture two days before her execution.

A Midnight Modern Conversation. 1733.

Southwark Fair. 1734.

The Harlot's Progress; in six plates. 1733, 1734.

The Rake's Progress; in eight plates. 1735.

The Sleepy Congregation. 1736.

The Distressed Poet. 1736.

The Lecture; datur vacuum. 1736.

The Four Times of the Day. 1738.

Strolling Actresses in a Barn. 1738.

The Enraged Musician. 1741.

Marriage à-la-Mode; engraved under his direction by Scottin, Ravenet, and Baron. 1745.

The Portrait of Martin Folkes, Esq. 1745.

Simon, Lord Lovat; an etching. 1746.

Garrick, in the character of Richard III.; engraved by Hogarth and Grignion. 1746.

The Stage-coach, an Election Procession in the yard. 1747.

The Effects of Industry and Idleness; in twelve plates. 1747.

The Gate of Calais, "O the Roast Beef of Old England!" by Hogarth and Mosely.

The March to Finchley; L. Sullivan, sc. W. Hogarth, dir. 1748.

The Portrait of Hogarth, with a pug dog. 1749.

The Stages of Cruelty; four prints. 1751.

Paul before Felix; scratched in the manner of Rembrandt. 1751.

Paul before Felix; after the picture in Lincoln's Inn Hall. Moses brought to Pharaoh's daughter; by Hogarth and Sullivan.

Columbus breaking the Egg. 1755. The ticket to the Analysis.

Four prints of an Election. 1755; by Hogarth, Grignion, la Cave, and Aveline.

The Portrait of Hogarth, painting the Comic Muse. 1758.

The Cockpit. 1759.

The Five Orders of Periwigs. 1761.

Credulity, Superstition, and Fanaticism. 1762.

The Times; two plates. 1762.

John Wilkes, Esq.; drawn from the life, and etched by W. Hogarth. 1763.

The Bruiser, C. Churchill, in the character of a Russian Hercules. 1763.

The Good Samaritan.

The Pool of Bethesda.

Sigismonda.

The Analysis of Beauty; two plates.

HOGEN, J., an obscure engraver, by whom we have the portrait of Damianus Agoess, neatly executed with the graver. It is signed Io. Hogen, fec.

HOGENBERG, REMIGIUS. From the name of this old engraver, we may conclude that he was a native of Germany. He was in England as early as 1573, in which year he engraved the portrait of Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, in whose service he appears to have been retained. This portrait was supposed, by Vertue, to have been the first that was executed in England; but this is rendered very disputable, by the existence of a portrait of Mary I. by Francis Hogenberg, dated 1555, unless we are to conclude that this plate was not engraved in England; or that the date alludes to the era of her reign, rather than the time of the engraver. Remigius Hogenberg worked entirely with the graver; and the few prints that are known of him are more sought after for their extreme rarity than their merit. We have by him,

The Portrait of Archbishop Parker, seated at a table, with a book open, and a bell by the side of it, a coat of arms at each of the four corners. 1573.

Another Portrait of the Archbishop.

He also engraved a large genealogy of the kings of England, from the Conquest to Queen Elizabeth. It is inscribed, Remigius Hogenbergius servus D. Matt. Archiep. Cant. sculpsit, 1574.

HOGENBERG, FRANCIS, was the brother of Remigius; but it is not known whether he was older or younger. It has been conjectured by some, that he came to this country before his brother, from his having engraved the portrait of Mary; but that is not precisely ascertained. He was employed, however, by English publishers. The following engravings are by him :

The Portrait of Mary I., Queen of England; 1555; inscribed Veritas temporis filia.

The Maps of Gaul and Belgium, in Saxton's Atlas.

Part of the views in Braun's Civitates Orbis Terrarum; printed at Cologne in 1572; engraved in conjunction with Simone Novelani and George Hoeffnagel.

The pompous Funeral of Frederick II., King of Denmark; dated 1592; engraved in conjunction with Simone Novelani; in twenty-one plates.

An emblematical print of Charity; inscribed Franciscus Hogenbergus, sculpsit. Jacobus Christianus, excudit. Engraved in a poor dry style.

HOGENBERG, ABRAHAM, is supposed to have been the younger brother of the two preceding artists. He assisted Francis Hogenberg in the plates he engraved for the Theatrum Orbis Terrarum, by Abraham Ortelius. His plates are worked with the graver, in a neat, stiff style, and his drawing is very incorrect. He engraved some frontispieces for the booksellers; among others, one for a Commentary on the Book of Kings, published at Cologne in 1635. We have also by him,

The Portrait of Wolfgang William, Duke of Bavaria, on horseback; Geldorp, pinx. Abr. Hogenberg, fec.

HOGENBERG, JOHN. This engraver was a relation of the foregoing artist, and flourished at Cologne about the year 1600. He engraved several portraits, and some historical subjects, executed in a clear, neat style, resembling that of Crispin de Passe, though infinitely inferior. Among others, we have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

John Adams, Electoral Prince, Archbishop of Mentz; J. Hogenberg, scul.

Lotharius, Electoral Archbishop of Treves; the same.

George, Cardinal Radzivil, Bishop of Cracow; the same. The Scourging of Christ; after M. de Vos.

HOI, or HOY, NICHOLAS VAN, a Flemish engraver of no great note: in conjunction with J. van Ossenbeck, and Francis Vandersteen, with others, he engraved part of the plates, after the pictures in the collection of the Archduke Leopold, called the Gallery of Teniers, published at Antwerp in 1660. It consists of two hundred and forty-three prints.

HOLBEIN, HANS, or JOHN. In recording the life of this distinguished artist, whose memoirs and whose works are so interesting to our country, we are relieved from the painful duty of representing genius and talent suffering under neglect, indigence, and obscurity, too often the mortifying fate of the most illustrious followers of the art. Indeed it has been the lot of few, to have their merit so munificently rewarded, or to whose fame posterity has paid the tribute of more honourable testimony. Hans Holbein has generally been said to have been born at Basle in 1498; but M. Huber thinks it more probable that he was a native of Augsburg, in which city his father resided at the time of his birth, as appears from an inscription on his picture of St. Paul; This work was completed by John Holbein, a citizen of Augsburg, in 1499. However this may be, his father soon afterwards settled at Basle, where he resided the remainder of his life. The young Holbein was instructed in the art by his father, and at the early age of fourteen gave proof of uncommon capacity in the portraits he painted of his father and himself, in 1512, which are engraved in Sandrart's Academia, and which, if they have not been greatly improved by the engraver, must have been very extraordinary performances for a boy. He had acquired considerable celebrity, particularly in portraits, when an English nobleman, (supposed to have been the Earl of Surrey,) travelling through Switzerland to Italy, was so struck with the beauty of his pictures, that he sat to him, and invited him to visit England, where his talent would be esteemed and rewarded, and promised him a favourable reception from Henry VIII. Holbein did not, however, at that time listen to the proposal. A few years after, Erasmus, visiting Basle, for the purpose of superintending the publication of some of his works, formed an intimacy with Holbein, who painted his portrait. Erasmus used every persuasion to induce him to visit England, and at length prevailed. He presented him with a letter of introduction to Sir Thomas More, to whom he sent the portrait he had just painted, as a specimen of his ability. On his arrival in England, in 1526, Sir Thomas received him with all possible kindness, and accommodated him with apartments in his house at Chelsea, where he employed him for some time in painting the portraits of himself, his family, and friends, with other considerable works. Whilst he was living with the chancellor, he happened to mention the circumstance of his having been invited to visit England by a nobleman, previous to his being advised to do so by Erasmus, and Sir Thomas was extremely solicitous to know who it was. Holbein replied, that he had forgot the title, but he remembered his features so well, that he thought he could draw his likeness from memory; which he did so exactly, that it was immediately recognised. The chancellor having richly decorated his apartments with Holbein's pictures, was desirous of introducing him to his royal master, in the manner most likely to secure him the favour and protection of Henry VIII. He accordingly arranged the pictures in the most advantageous order in the great hall, and invited his Majesty to an entertainment. On the king's entrance, he was prodigiously struck with the beauty of the paintings, and expressed his admiration of them in such terms, that Sir Thomas requested his Majesty would deign to accept of whatever he most liked; but the king inquiring anxiously after the artist, the chancellor introduced Holbein to him, who received him in the most gracious manner, observing, "that now he had got the painter, Sir Thomas might keep his pictures." Henry immediately took him into his service, ordered apartments to be allotted him in the palace, with a liberal salary, besides the price he was to be paid for his pictures. Holbein painted the king several times, and the portraits of the principal persons of the court. On the death of Jane Seymour, Holbein was sent to Flanders to draw the portrait of Christiana, Duchess dowager of Milan, widow of Francis Sforza, whom Charles V. had recommended to Henry for a fourth wife; but changing his humour, the marriage did not take place. Among the Harleian MSS. is a letter from Sir Thomas Wyatt to the king, congratulating him on his escape, as the duchess's chastity was a little equivocal. "If it was so," observes the noble author of the Anecdotes, "considering Henry's temper, I am apt to think the duchess had the greater escape." That princess is said to have sent word to the king, that she had but one head; if she had two, one of them should have been at his Majesty's service. The works of Holbein are extremely numerous; and, besides those that are genuine, a number of wretched productions are attributed to him, which are totally unworthy of him. Of Holbein's historical works little is known in England, where he was chiefly employed in portraits, or in what may be called historical portraits. The two emblematical subjects of Riches and Poverty, formerly in the hall of the company of the Steelyard, are extremely doubtful. Of his public works in England, the most considerable is the celebrated picture in Surgeons' Hall, of Henry VIII. granting the charter to the Company of Surgeons; the character of the king is admirably represented, and all the heads are finely drawn. Another large picture by Holbein is in the hall of Bridewell, representing Edward VI. delivering to the Lord Mayor the royal charter, by which he gave up his palace of Bridewell to be converted into an hospital and work-house. There are many genuine portraits by him in the mansions of the nobility. At Basle, in the town-house, are eight pictures of the Passion of our Saviour; and in the library of the University, a Dead Christ, painted on panel, in 1521. Some doubts have been entertained respecting the celebrated Dance of Death having been originally designed by Holbein; but these have been occasioned by confounding the set of prints of the Dance of Death, engraved by Matthew Merian, after a much older master than Holbein, with the wooden cuts, by that master, after his own designs, the originals of which are preserved in the public library at Basle. Holbein painted in oil, distemper, and sometimes in miniature; which last he is said to have learned in England, from Lucas Cornelii, and carried it to the highest perfection. The portraits of Holbein are distinguished by a pure and simple design, peculiarly characteristic of his model; his carnations are tender and clear, and his heads, without much shadow, have a surprising relief. In the reign of George II., Queen Caroline discovered, in a bureau, an invaluable collection of Holbein's drawings, of the portraits of the most illustrious personages of the court of Henry VIII. They had formerly belonged to Charles I. They remain in the royal collection; there are about ninety of them, some of which are extremely fine. Several of them have been admirably engraved, in the style of the original drawings, by Mr. Bartolozzi.

As an engraver on wood, Holbein deserves particular notice. He is said to have begun to practise that art as early as 1511, when he was thirteen years of age, and, before his departure from Switzerland, had executed a great number of wooden cuts. In these he was employed by the most celebrated publishers of his time, at Basle, Zurich, Lyons, and at Leyden. Of his productions as an engraver, the most remarkable are the following: a set of wooden cuts known by the name of Death's Dance, engraved from his own designs; when complete, it consists of fifty-three prints, though it is seldom to be met with above forty-six. They are small upright prints, surrounded by a border. The first impression of them is said to have been made in 1530; but there are later publications of them, particularly one at Lyons, entitled Simolachri Historie, e figure della Morte, in Lyone oppresso Giov. Frelloni MDXLIX. They have been copied on wood by an old artist, but in a manner very inferior to the originals. We have also by him a set of ninety small cuts of subjects from the Old Testament, executed in a bold, masterly style, yet with great delicacy. The best impression of these was published at Lyons in 1539, by Melchior and Gaspar Treschel. There is a later impression of them, with two Latin verses, in praise of Holbein. This set was copied by Hans Brosamer in a poor style. He also engraved a variety of vignettes, frontispieces, and ornaments, for goldsmiths. He usually marked his prints with the ciphers

HB or BI, or signed them HANS. HOLB.

Holbein died of the plague in London in 1554.

"Holbein painted in oil, in distemper, and water colours. He had never practised the last till he came to England, where he learned it of Lucas Cornelii, and carried it to the highest perfection. His miniatures have all the strength of oil colours joined to the most finished delicacy. He generally painted on a green ground; in his small pictures often on a deep blue. There is a tradition that he painted with his left hand, but this is contradicted by one of his own portraits that was in the Arundelian collection, and came to Lord Stafford, in which he holds his pencil in the right hand."

[The following list of pictures, attributed to Hans Holbein, is taken from "Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting in England," edited by the Rev. James Dallaway. Since the publication of the original work many of them have changed their situation, and others have been discovered that may reasonably be considered as by him. On the other hand, numerous pretenders have appeared that have no claim to their assumed paternity, though supported by the partiality of their possessors, or the interested assurance of dealers who have supplied them. Nagler mentions several that are not enumerated here; and Professor Waagen, in his account of Pictures in England, while he refuses assent to the genuineness of some that occupy high places, and have, therefore, been considered as indisputable, points out others that have juster claims. It is matter for regret that one so well qualified, in this particular, had not leisure, and the necessary facilities, to examine critically the numerous works in England that bear the name of Holbein. The obstacles he had to encounter, and the cursory view he was obliged to take, would not allow him to pronounce decidedly; but his passing remarks prove his acumen, and will be admitted, by every disinterested connoisseur, to be just. Mr. J. C. Nieuwenhuys describes two pictures by Holbein in his Catalogue of the King of Holland's Collection; The Death of the Virgin, and a portrait of Sir Thomas More. The first is not spoken of elsewhere, but, in the opinion of this eminent judge, is a genuine picture; that of Sir Thomas More will be found in the list. As every thing relating to Hans Holbein is interesting to the lovers of the art, a list of publications of his works, real and presumed, is added from Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon.]

It is impossible to give a complete catalogue of his works; they were extremely numerous; and as I have said, that number is increased by copies, by doubtful or by pretended pieces. Many have probably not come to my knowledge; those I shall mention were of his hand, as far as I can judge.

From his drawings for the Moriae Encomium there have been prints to many editions, and yet they are by no means the most meritorious of his performances.

At Basil in the town-house are eight pieces of the history of Christ's Passion and Crucifixion. Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria, offered a great sum for them.

Three of the walls in the upper part of the same edifice are adorned with histories by him.

In the library of the University there is a dead Christ painted on board in the year 1521. In the same place the Lord's Supper, much damaged.

Another there on the same subject, drawn by Holbein when very young. Christ scourged; in the same place, but not very well painted.

Ibidem, A board painted on both sides; a school-master teaching boys. It is supposed to have been a sign to some private school, 1516.

Ibidem, a profile of Erasmus writing his Commentary on St. Matthew.

Ibidem, The same in an oval; smaller.

Ibidem, The portrait of Amerbach.

Ibidem, A woman sitting with a girl in her arms, and stroking a little boy. These are said to be Holbein's wife and children. This has been engraved by Joseph [John?] Wirtz.

Ibidem, A lady of Alsace, with a boy.

Ibidem, A beautiful woman, inscribed Lais Corinthiaca 1526.

Ibidem, Adam and Eve, half figures, 1517.

Ibidem, two pictures in chiaro-scuro, of Christ crowned with thorns, and the Virgin praying.

Ibidem, One hundred and three sketches on paper, collected by Amerbach; who has written on them Hans Holbein genuina. They are chiefly designs for the Life of Christ, and some for the family of Sir Thomas More. Many of them are thought to have been patterns for glass painters. I have heard that at Basil there are paintings on glass both by Holbein himself and his father.

Ibidem, Two death's heads near a grate.

Ibidem, The portrait of John Holbein (I do not know whether father or son) in a red hat, and a white habit trimmed with black.

The portrait of James Mejer, Consul or Burgomaster of Basil, and his wife, 1516, with the sketches for both pictures. In the museum of Feschius.

Erasmus, in the same place.

In the street called Eissengassen, is a whole house painted by him on the outside, with buildings and history. For this he received sixty florins.

The Emperor Charles V. Le Blond, a Dutch painter, gave an hundred crowns for this at Lyons in 1633, for the Duke of Buckingham.

Another portrait of Erasmus, bought at Basil by the same Le Blond for an hundred ducats. This was engraved in Holland by Vischer. It is mentioned in the catalogue of the duke's pictures, p. 17, No. 6. To this was joined the portrait of Frobenius. Both pictures are now at Kensington; but the architecture in the latter was added afterwards by Steenwyck. But the Erasmus is thought a copy: the true one King Charles gave to Mons. de Liencourt. See catal. p. 18. The Frobenius was given to the King by the Duke of Buckingham, just before he went to the Isle of Rhee.

A large picture, containing the portraits of the Consul Mejer and his sons on one side, and of his wife and daughters on the other, all praying before an altar. This was sold at Basil for an hundred pieces of gold; the same Le Blond in 1633 gave a thousand rix-dollars for it, and sold it for three times that sum to Mary de Medici, then in Holland.

Another portrait of Erasmus; at Vienna.

Another there, supposed the father of Sir Thomas

More. This was reckoned one of his capital works.

Two pieces about five feet high, representing monks digging up the bones of some saint, and carrying them in procession; at Vienna.

A picture about four feet square, of dancing, hunting, tilting, and other sports; in the public library at Zurich.

The inside of a church, the virgin, and apostles; angels singing above; in the collection of Mr. Werdmyller at Zurich.

The portrait of an English nobleman in the same cabinet.

The portrait of Conrad Pellican, professor of Theology and Hebrew at Zurich; in the house of Mr. Martyn Werdmyller, senator of Basil.

Christ in his cradle, the Virgin and Joseph: Shepherds at a distance; in the church of the Augustines at Lucern.

The Adoration of the Wise men. ibidem.

Christ taken from the cross. ibidem.

The Sancta Veronica. ibidem.

Christ teaching in the temple. ibidem.

Christ on the cross; the Virgin and St. John; with inscriptions in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin.

All the Prophets in nine pieces, each a yard long; painted in distemper. These were carried to Holland by Barthol. Sarbruck a painter, who made copies of them, preserved in the Feschian museum.

An old man with a red forked beard, supposed to be a grand master of Rhodes.

The Dance of Death in the churchyard of the Predicants of the suburbs of St. John at Basil is always ascribed to Holbein, and is shown to strangers through a grate. And yet, as Vertue observed, our painter had undoubtedly no hand in it. Pope Eugenius IV. appointed the council of Basil in 1431, and it sat there 15 years, during which time a plague raged that carried off all degrees of people. On the cessation of it, the work in question was immediately painted as a memorial of that calamity. Holbein could not be the original painter, for he was not born till 1498; nor had any hand in the part that was added in 1529, at which time he had left Basil. Even if he had been there when it was done (which was about the time of his short return thither) it is not probable that mention of him would have been omitted in the inscription which the magistrates caused to be placed under those paintings, especially when the name of one Hugo Klauber, a painter who repaired them in 1569, is carefully recorded. But there is a stronger proof of their not being the work of Holbein, and at the same time an evidence of his taste. The paintings at Basil are a dull series of figures, of a pope, emperor, king, queen, &c., each seized by a figure of Death; but in the prints which Hollar has given of Holbein's drawings of Death's Dance, a design he borrowed from the work at Basil, there are groups of figures, and a richness of fancy and invention peculiar to himself. Every subject is varied, and adorned with buildings and habits of the times, which he had the singular art of making picturesque.

At Amsterdam in the Warmoes-street was a fine picture of a Queen of England in silver tissue.

Two portraits of himself, one, a small round, was in the cabinet of James Razet; the other as big as the palm of a hand; in the collection of Barth. Ferrers.

Sandrart had drawings by Holbein of Christ's passion, in folio; two of them were wanting; in his book he offers 200 florins to whoever will produce and sell them to him, p. 241.

In the king of France's collection are the following:

1. Archbishop Warham, aet. suae 70. 1527. There is another of these at Lambeth. Archbishop Parker entailed this and another of Erasmus on his successors; they were stolen in the civil war, but Juxon repurchased the former.

2. The portrait of Nicholas Cratzer, Astronomer to Henry VIII. This man after long residence in England had scarce learned to speak the language. The king asking him how that happened, he replied, "I beseech your highness to pardon me; what can a man learn in only thirty years?" These two last pictures were in the collection of Andrew de Loo, a great virtuoso, who bought all the works of Holbein he could procure; among others a portrait of Erasmus, which king Charles afterwards exchanged for a picture of Leonardo da Vinci. A drawing of Cratzer is among the heads by Holbein at Kensington. Among others in de Loo's collection was the fine Cromwell Earl of Essex, now at Mr. Southwell's, and engraved among the illustrious heads.

3. Anne of Cleve.

4. Holbein's own portrait.

5. Erasmus writing; a smaller picture.

6. An old man, with a gold chain.

7. Sir Thomas More, less than life.

8. An old man with beads and a death's head.

In the collection of the Duke of Orleans were four heads;

Another Cromwell Earl of Essex. There is a small head of him at Devonshire-house with this date, aet. 15, 1515.

Sir Thomas More.

A Lady.

George Gysein.

But the greatest and best of his works were done in England, many of which still remain here. Some were lost or destroyed in the civil war; some sold abroad at that time; [in the Florence Gallery, were small portraits of H. Earl of Surrey, and Richard Southwell, both purloined during its occupation by the French, in 1800;] and some, particularly of his miniatures, were, I believe, consumed when Whitehall was burned. There perished the large picture of Henry VII.* and of Elizabeth of York, of Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour; it was painted on the wall in the privy chamber. The copy which Renée made of it for Charles II. in small, and for which he received £150, hangs in the king's bed-chamber below stairs at Kensington; from that Vertue engraved his print. Holbein's original drawing of the two kings is in the collection of the Duke of Devonshire. It is in black chalk, heightened, and large as life; now at Chatsworth. The architecture of this picture is very rich, and parts of it in a good style.

In the chapel at Whitehall he painted Joseph of Arimathea, and in that at St. James's, Lazarus rising from the dead—both now destroyed.

That he often drew the king is indubitable; several pictures extant of Henry are ascribed to him—I would not warrant many of them. There is one at Trinity college Cambridge, (it has HE Fecit upon it, and was probably a copy by Lucas de Heere,) another at Lord Torrington's at Whitehall, both whole lengths, and another in the gallery of royal portraits at Kensington, which, whoever painted it, is execrable; one at Petworth, and another in the gallery at Windsor. But there is one head of that king at Kensington, not only genuine, but perhaps the most perfect of his works. It hangs by the chimney in the second room, leading to the great drawing-room; and would alone account for the judgment of Depiles, who in his scale of picturesque merit, allows 16 degrees for colouring to Holbein, when he had allotted but 12 to Raphael. I conclude that it was in the same light that Frederic Zucherero considered our artist, when he told Goltzius that in some respects he preferred him to Raphael. Both Zucherero and Depiles understood the science too well to make any comparison, except in that one particular of colouring, between the greatest genius, in his way, that has appeared, and a man who excelled but in one, and that an inferior branch of his art. The texture of a rose is more delicate than that of an oak; I do not say that it grows so lofty or casts so extensive a shade.

Opposite to this picture hangs another, but much inferior, called in the catalogue Lord Arundel, or Howard; the latter name is a confusion, occasioned by the title of Arundel passing into the family of Howard. The portrait in question, I suppose, is of H. Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel, and probably the very person who first persuaded Holbein to come into England. The fine original of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, with the staves of Earl Marshal and Lord Treasurer, from whence the print is taken, is at Leicester-house. [The ORIGINAL is now at Norfolk-house.]

In the state bed-chamber is a portrait of Edward VI. It was originally a half-length; but has been very badly converted into a whole figure since the time of Holbein.

Considering how long he lived in the service of the crown, it is surprising that so few of his works should have remained in the royal collection; Charles I. appears by his catalogue to have possessed but about a dozen. All the rest were dispersed but those I have mentioned (unless the whole length of the unfortunate Earl of Surrey, in a red habit, in the lower apartment at Windsor, is so, as I believe it is,) and a fine little picture of a man and woman, said to be his own and wife's portraits, which hangs in an obscure closet in the gallery at Windsor; and the portrait of a man opening a letter with a knife, in the standard-closet in the same palace. But at present an invaluable treasure of the works of this master is preserved in one of our palaces. Soon after the accession of the late king, Queen Caroline found in a bureau at Kensington a noble collection of Holbein's original drawings for the portraits of some of the chief personages of the court of Henry VIII. How they came there is quite unknown. They did belong to Charles I., who changed them with William Earl of Pembroke for a St. George by Raphael, now at Paris. Lord Pembroke gave them to the Earl of Arundel, and at the dispersion of that collection, they might be bought by or for the king. There are eighty-nine of them, a few of which are duplicates: a great part are exceedingly fine, and in one respect preferable to his finished pictures, as they are drawn in a bold and free manner: and though they have little more than the outline, being drawn with chalk upon paper stained of a flesh colour, and scarce shaded at all, there is a strength and vivacity in them equal to the most perfect portraits. The heads of Sir Thomas More, Bishop Fisher, Sir Thomas Wyatt, and Broke Lord Cobham, are master-pieces.

In the same closet are two fine finished portraits by Holbein, said to be his own and his wife's; they were presented to Queen Caroline by Sir Robert Walpole, my father. And a circular drawing; the story of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

In one of the king's cabinets is a miniature of two children of Charles Brandon.

Over one of the doors is a picture ascribed to Holbein, and supposed to be Queen Elizabeth, when princess, with a book in her hand, but I question both the painter and the person represented.

He drew Will. Somers, King Henry's jester, from which there is a print.

Of Holbein's public works in England I find an account of only four. The first is that capital picture in Surgeon's Hall, of Henry VIII. giving the charter to the company of surgeons. The character of His Majesty's bluff haughtiness is well represented, and all the heads are finely executed. The picture itself has been retouched, but is well known by Baron's print. The physician in the middle, on the king's left hand, is Dr. Butts, immortalized by Shakspeare.

The second is the large piece in the hall of Bridewell, representing Edward VI. delivering to the Lord Mayor of London the royal charter, by which he gave up and erected his palace of Bridewell into an hospital and workhouse. Holbein has placed his own head in one corner of the picture. Vertue has engraved it. This picture, it is believed, was not completed by Holbein, both he and the king dying immediately after the donation.

The third and fourth were two large pictures, painted in distemper, in the hall of the Easterlings merchants in the Steelyard. Where Descamps found, I do not know, that they were designed for ceilings. It is probably a mistake. These pictures exhibited the triumphs of riches and poverty. It was on the sight of these pictures that Zucchero expressed such esteem of this master; he copied them in Indian ink, and those drawings came afterwards into the possession of Mons. Crozat. For the large pictures themselves Felibien and Depiles say that they were carried into France from Flanders, whither they were transported I suppose after the destruction of the company.

But for nothing has Holbein's name been oftener mentioned than for the picture of Sir Thomas More's family. Yet of six pieces extant on this subject, the two smaller are certainly copies, the three larger probably not painted by Holbein, and the sixth, though an original picture, most likely not of Sir Thomas and his family. That Holbein was to draw such a piece is indubitable; a letter of Erasmus is extant, thanking Sir Thomas for sending him the sketch of it; but there is great presumption, that though Holbein made the design, it was not he who executed the picture in large, as will appear by the following accounts of the several pieces. The most known is that at Burford, the seat of the famous Speaker Lenthall. To say that a performance is not equal to the reputation of his supposed author, is not always an argument sufficient to destroy its authenticity. It is a well-known saying of Sir Godfrey Kneller, when he was reproached with any of his hasty slovenly daubings, "Pho, it will not be thought mine; nobody will believe that the same man painted this and the Chinese at Windsor."

But there is a speaking evidence on the picture itself against its own pretensions. Holbein died in 1554. The picture at Burford is dated 1593. It is larger and there are more figures than in its rival, the piece in Yorkshire, and some of these Vertue thought were painted from the life. This was kept at Gubbins in Hertfordshire, the seat of the Mores; but by what means the piece passed into the hands of Lenthall is uncertain; the remains of the family of More are seated at Barnborough in Yorkshire, where they have a small picture of their ancestor and his relations like that at Burford, but undoubtedly not an original.

[As Mr. W. has omitted the names of the persons of whose portraits this celebrated picture is composed, they are now added.

1. Elizabeth Damsey, his daughter, æt. 21. 2. Margaret Gige, a relative, æt. 22. 3. Cæcilia Heron, his daughter, æt. 20. 4. Alicia More, second wife of Sir Thomas, æt. 57. 5. Sir John More, the Judge, his father, æt. 76. 6. Anne Grisacre, betrothed to John More, his son, æt. 15. 7. John More, last mentioned, at 19. 8. Sir Thomas More, æt. 50. 9. Henry Patenson, his Fool, æt. 40. 10. Margaret Roper, his heroic daughter, æt. 22, who died in 1544, æt. 36. An outline of this picture is prefixed to the Tabellæ Selectæ Catherinæ Patinæ, Fol. 1691, which Vertue has copied for Knight's Life of Erasmus. Ausley, who saw this picture (now at Burford) in the hall of Sir J. Lenthall, at Besilsleigh, Berks., says that it had an inscription in golden letters, of about sixty lines, 1670.]

The second picture is at Heron in Essex, the seat of Sir John Tyrrel, but having been repainted it is impossible to judge of its antiquity. The dispute of originality has lain only between the piece at Burford and the next.

The third large picture, and which Vertue thought the very one painted for Sir Thomas himself, is twelve feet wide, and is the actual piece which was in Deloo's collection, after whose death it was bought by Mr. Roper, Sir Thomas's grandson. As Deloo was a collector of Holbein's works, and his contemporary, it sounds extraordinary, that a picture, which he thought genuine, should be doubted now; and yet Vertue gives such strong reasons, supported by so plausible an hypothesis, to account for its not being Holbein's, that I think them worth laying before the reader. He says the picture is but indifferent; on this I lay no more stress than I do in the case of that at Burford; but his observation that the lights and shades in different parts of the picture come from opposite sites, is unanswerable, and demonstrate it no genuine picture of Holbein, unless that master had been a most ignorant dauber, as he might sometimes be a careless painter. This absurdity Vertue accounts for, by supposing, that Holbein quitted the chancellor's service for the king's, before he had drawn out the great picture, which however Sir Thomas always understood was to be executed; that Holbein's business increasing upon him, some other painter was employed to begin the picture, and to which Holbein was to give the last touches; in short, that inimitable perfection of flesh which characterizes his works. And this is the more probable, as Vertue observed that the faces and hands are left flat and unfinished, but the ornaments, jewels, &c. are extremely laboured. As the portraits of the family, in separate pieces, were already drawn by Holbein, the injudicious journeyman stuck them in as he found them, and never varied the lights, which were disposed, as it was indifferent, in single heads, some from the right, some from the left, but which make a ridiculous contradiction when transported into one piece. This picture remained till of late years at Wellhall in Eltham, Kent, the mansion of the Ropers. That house being pulled down, it hung for some time in the king's house at Greenwich, soon after which, by the death of the last Roper, whose sole daughter married Mr. Henshaw and left three daughters, the family picture, then valued at £300, came between them, and Sir Rowland Wynne, who married one of them, bought the shares of the other two, and carried the picture into Yorkshire, where it now remains.

The other small one is in the collection of Colonel Sothby in Bloomsbury-square. It is painted in the neatest manner in miniature. On the right hand are inserted the portraits of Mr. More and his wife, Sir Thomas's grandson, for whom it was drawn, and their two sons, with their garden at Chelsea behind, and a view of London. The painter of this exquisite little piece is unknown, but probably was Peter Oliver.

The fifth was in the palace of the Delfino family at Venice, where it was long on sale, the price first set £1500. When I saw it there in 1741, they had sunk it to £400, soon after which the present King of Poland bought it.

It was evidently designed for a small altar-piece at a chapel; in the middle on a throne sits the Virgin and child; on one side kneels an elderly gentleman with two sons, one of them a naked infant; opposite kneeling are his wife and daughters. The old man is not only unlike all representations of Sir Thomas More, but it is certain that he never had but one son. For the colouring it is beautiful beyond description, and the carnations have that enamelled bloom so peculiar to Holbein, who touched his works till not a touch remained discernible! A drawing of this picture by Bischof was brought over in 1723, from whence Vertue doubted both of the subject and the painter; but he never saw the original! By the description of the family-picture of the consul Mejer, mentioned above, I have no doubt but this is the very picture—Mejer and More are names not so unlike but that in process of time they may have been confounded, and that of More retained, as much better known.

In private houses in England are or were the following works of Holbein, besides what may not have come to Vertue's or my knowledge.

In the Arundelian collection, says Richard Symonds, was a head of Holbein in oil by himself, most sweet, dated 1543.

At Northumberland-house an English knight sitting in a chair and a table by him.

Lord Denny, comptroller, and his lady, 1527.

Sir Henry Guldeford and his lady. They were engraved by Hollar. As also Mons. Moret, jeweller to Henry VIII.

In the Earl of Pembroke's collection was a lady in black satin, which Zucchero admired exceedingly.

The Duke of Buckingham had eight of his hand, in particular the story of Jupiter and Io. See his catal. p. 16.

At the Earl of Uxbridge's at Drayton, his ancestor Lord Paget.

At the Earl of Guilford's at Wroxton, Sir Thomas Pope, the founder of Trinity College, Oxford.

At Blenheim, a very lively head of a young man. Henry VIII. and Francis I. exchanged two pictures; the King of France gave to Henry the Virgin and child by Leonardo da Vinci; the English present was painted by Holbein, but the subject is not mentioned. The former came into the possession of Catherine Patin.

In the late Duke of Somerset's possession was a head of his ancestor the protector, engraved among the illustrious heads.

Vertue mentions having seen a fine miniature of Henry VIII. and his three children, but does not say where. It had a glass over it, and a frame curiously carved.

At Lord Orford's at Houghton is a small whole length of Edward VI. on board, which was sold into Portugal from the collection of Charles I. and Erasmus, smaller than life.

I have Catherine of Arragon, a miniature, exquisitely finished; a round on a blue ground. It was given to the Duke of Monmouth by Charles II. I bought it at the sale of the Lady Isabella Scott, daughter of the Duchess of Monmouth.

A head of the same Queen on board in oil; hard, and in her latter age. It is engraved among the illustrious heads.

Cath. Howard, a miniature, damaged. It was Richardson's, who bought it out of the Arundelian collection. It is engraved among the illustrious heads; and by Hollar, who called it, Mary Queen of France, wife of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk.

Edmund Montacute, a judge. Ditto, faf.

Philip the Fair, son of the Emperor Maximilian and father of Charles V., when a boy. It is finely coloured; and is engraved in Mountfaucou's Antiquities of France. This must have been copied from some other picture.

A drawing of a man in a blue gown, cap, and buskins. It seems to be a masquerade dress.

Another drawing, the head of a man, with a hat and picked beard.

A design in water colours, which he afterwards executed on a house at Basil.

A large design for a chimney-piece.

A design for a clock, in great taste. It was drawn for Sir Anthony Denny and intended for a new-year's gift to Henry VIII. From the collection of Mons. Mariette at Paris.

A head of Melancthon, in oil on board, a small round, very fine.

Several drawings by Holbein, and some miniatures, are preserved in various collections.

Holbein's talents were not confined to his pictures; he was an architect, he modelled, carved, was excellent in designing ornaments, and gave draughts of prints for several books, some of which it is supposed he cut himself. Sir Hans Sloane had a book of jewels designed by him, now in the British Museum. He invented patterns* for goldsmith's work, for enamellers and chasers of plate, arts much countenanced by Henry VIII. Inigo Jones showed Sandrart another book of Holbein's designs for weapons, hilts, ornaments, scabbards, sheaths, sword-belts, buttons and hooks, girdles, hatbands and clasps for shoes, knives, forks, salt-

* The noble seal appendant to the surrender of Cardinal Wolsey's college at Oxford, has all the appearance of being designed by Holbein. The deed is preserved in the augmentation-office, and the seal has been engraved among the plates published by the Society of Antiquaries.

sellers and vases, all for the king. Hollar engraved several of them. The Duchess of Portland and Lady Elizabeth Germain have each a dagger set with jewels, which belonged to that prince, and were probably imagined by Holbein. The latter lady has a fine little figure of Henry cut in stone, whole length; Holbein cut his own head in wood, and I have another by his hand of the king, in which about his neck instead of a George he wears a watch. Two other figures carved in stone were in the museum of Tradescant at Lambeth.

His cuts to the Bible were engraved and printed at Leyden by Johannes Frellonius, in 1547, under this title, Icones Historiarum veteris Testamenti. The titles to every print are in Latin, and beneath is an explanation in four French verses. Prefixed is a copy of Latin verses, in honour of Holbein, by Nicholas Borbonius, a celebrated French poet of that time, and of whom there is a profile among the drawings at Kensington. In St. John's college, Cambridge, is Henry VIII.'s Bible printed on velum, with Holbein's cuts finely illuminated, and the figures of Henry, Cromwell, and others.

Lord Arundel showed Sandrart a little book of twenty-two designs of the Passions of Christ, very small; in which, says the same author, Christ was every where represented in the habit of a black monk—but that was a mistake, for Hollar engraved them, and there is only Christ persecuted by monks. Sandrart adds that it is incredible what a quantity of drawings of this master Lord Arundel had collected, and surprising, the fruitfulness of Holbein's invention, his quickness of execution and industry in performing so much.

To the Catechismus or Instruction of Christian Religion, by Thomas Cranmer, printed by Walter Lynn, 1538, quarto, the title is a wooden cut representing Edward VI. sitting on his throne giving the Bible to the Archbishop and Nobles kneeling; this and several head-pieces in the same book were designed by Holbein, and probably some of them cut by him; one has his name.

On the death of Sir Thomas Wyatt, the poet, in 1541, a little book of verses, entitled Naenia, was published by his great admirer Leland. Prefixed was a wooden cut of Sir Thomas, from a picture of Holbein, with these lines:

Holbenus nitidâ pingendi maximus arte
Effigiem expressit graphice; sed nullus Apelles
Exprimet ingenium felix animumque Visti.

No doubt is entertained, that Holbein painted the portraits of the royal or more eminent personages, more than once. These pictures may be fairly estimated as repetitions. That in certain instances copies have been made by his assistants or his successors, is equally true.

[The perfect editions of Holbein's Dance of Death contain 55 plates, nevertheless we must not seek here for any complete list of editions of the Holbein Dance of Death, neither of the original nor copied pieces.

The Edictio princeps bears the title:—Les Simulachres et historiees faces de la mort autant de gamet pourtraies, que artificiellement imaginees. A. Lyon soubz l'escu de Cologne, 1538. It has Latin and French verses, and at the end stands, Excudebant Lugduni Melchior et Gaspar Trachelus fratres, 8vo. The wood cuts of this edition are exceedingly fine, and of uncommon power. This is shown particularly in the copy belonging to the court and state library in Munich.

Imagines Mortis, &c. Lugd. apud Joannem et Franciscum Frelionius fratres, 1542, 9 plates. 8vo.—In the years 1545 and 1546, a Frenchman, Vaugris or V. Valgrisius, produced some very beautiful and finely executed imitations, far superior to the Cologne imitations of Sylvius Antonius, given by Birkman and Erben. Vaugris brought out, in 1546, a Latin edition by G. Æmilii, and in 1545 also an Italian edition.

Imagines Mortis, &c. Lug. exc. J. Frelionius, 1547, 53 plates, 8vo.

Imagines de la Mort, &c. Lyon chez Johann. Frelion., 1547, 8vo.

Simulachri historie et figure de la Morte, &c. In Lyon appresse G. Frelioni, 1549, 53 plates.

Les Images de la Mort, auxquelles sont ajoutées, 17 figures, &c. Lyon, Frelion., 1562, 8vo.

Cologne Imitations of Birkman and Erben.

Imagines Mortis, &c. Colon. apud hæredes Birkmanni, 1555, 53 plates.

Imagines Mortis, &c. 1557, 53 plates.—Of which there is a Lubeck imitation with a few variations. A German (Augsburg) edition of the same year has a preface in rhyme by C. Scheyt, 53 plates.

Imagines Mortis, Colon. &c. 1566, 53 plates.

Imagines Mortis, Colon. &c. 1567, 8vo.

Dance of Death of 1651. Abraham a Diepenbeck, H. B. i. (Holbein inventit). Another edition is of 1682. The borders are by Diepenbeck, and W. Hollar engraved them, with copies of Holbein.

Dance of Death. D. Urbani Regii MDLVII.—This edition is praised by Fiorillo as the non plus ultra of all in the art of figure-engraving.

Dance of Death, by Bellerus, 1654, 8vo, with frontispiece.—These wood cuts are copies after Holbein by A. Sallaert, and not originals, as is stated by all biographers, even Mr. Douce. Vide Weigel's Cat. II. p. 64, No. 2133.

Dance of Death, engraved by W. Hollar, 1647, 51 plates, 4to.

Dance of Death, engraved by W. Hollar, 1789, 12mo. splendidly printed.

Dance of Death, engraved by W. Hollar. The Dance of Macaber, &c., by J. Lydgate, edited by W. Douce. London, 1790.

Dance of Death, Historical Dissertation, &c., 30 plates, by W. Hollar; and Dance of Macaber by Lydgate, as represented in St. Paul's, &c. London, 1796, 8vo.

Dance of Death, 52 engravings on wood by Bewick, with letter-press illustrations, by Douce. 3rd edition. London, 1825.

Dance of Death, &c., by Douce. The wood cuts are by Bonner. London, 1833, 8vo.—Especially good are the copies by the court-inspector, F. A. G. Frenzel, in Dresden, and Professor J. Schlotthamer, in Munich. The former are imitated by Frenzel himself on copper, but the latter Prof. S. had lithographed by the clever artist, C. Hoegerl. In these stone impressions the greatest fidelity and purity of outline are presented, and the character of the wood cuts is to be traced here with undoubted certainty. The number of plates is 53, but only 33 are by Hoegerl; his progress in the execution of the rest was terminated by the hand of death. These were completed by two unnamed artists. The poetry to Frenzel's edition is by Dr. L. Bechstein, and the text to Schlotthamer's was given by Prof. Schubert. The former appeared in 1831, the latter in the following year.

To Holbein's celebrated Triumph of Death are appended the following wood cuts, generally very scarce. These are, to a certain extent, formed into entire works.

1. Catechismus. That is to say, a short Instruction into Christian Religion for the singular communitie and profyte of children and young people, set forth by the moost reverende father in God, Thomas, Archbysshop of Canterbury, Primate of all England and metropolitane. Excwterus Lyne excudebat, 1648. At the end: Enprynted at London in St. James Street by Niclaus Wyll for Cwvalder Lyne, dwelling in Somers Kaye by Kyllings gate. 8vo.

The wood cuts of this extraordinary and rare work are attributed in part to Holbein. Edward Burton, at Oxford, republished this work in 1829.

2. The Pastime of People, or the Chronicles of divers realms, and most especially of the realm of England.—Printed by Russell of Cheapside, 1629. The wood cuts to this work were attributed to Holbein. T. F. Dibden republished it in 1811, with wood cuts by John Nesbit, 4to. This work is likewise very scarce, as only very few copies exist.

3. Historiarum veteris instrumenti icones ad unicum expressæ. Lugd. sub. scuto Coloniense, MDXXXVIII. Excud. Melchior et Gaspar Trachelus fratres.—This is the first very rare edition, with 92 wood cuts, in 4to. The second edition appeared 1530, Liege; the third in 1540, Antwerp; the fourth, 1549, in Liege (at the brothers Frelion, with 94 wood cuts); the fifth, 1543, at Lyons (with Spanish text); the sixth, 1547, in Liege, at Frelions', with 94 wood cuts; the seventh, 1549, in Lyons at Frellons', with English and French text, and 94 plates. The single impressions of the wood cuts are only printed on one side and without text.

A new edition has the title: Icones veteris Testamenti: Illustrations of the Old Testament, &c., with wood cuts by John and Mary Biesfeld, and text in five languages. London, 1820, 8vo.

4. The New Testament; now clearly into German from the right foundation. Also the Revelation of St. John, with beautiful figures. Le Basle, T. Wolff, 1523. The 21 wood cuts of the Apocalypse are attributed to Holbein; and the ornamented title bears Lützelburger's mark. 8vo.
5. Erasmus of Rotterdam. Upright figure, under a decorated gate. A celebrated wood cut, bearing the following inscription in the first impressions:

Pallas Apellæam nuper mirata tabellam
Hanc ait; æternum bibliotheca colat.
Dædaleam monstrat musis Holbeinius artem
Et summi ingenii magnus Erasmus opes.

In the second impressions we read:

Corporis effigiem si quis non vidit Erasmi,
Hanc scite ad unum picta tabella dabit.

The copper still exists from which there are more recent impressions, with and without these lines.

6. The Alphabet with the Dance of Death. Each letter is 11 lines in height and breadth, masterly cut.
7. The Latin Alphabet, with Children at sport and fun, 24 pl., not quite 1 inch in height and breadth.
8. The Peasants' Dance, and the Peasants who drove the Fox from the Goose. Title border of a Lactantius, fol. 1542.
9. Cebes Table. Title border, having several allegorical figures: Felicitas, the Virtues, and Vice.—This is found as title to the Lexicon-Græcum Basiliæ apud Val. Curionem; to the Dissertation of S. Cocceius Promot. Cand. lect. ex Off. Oparin.
10. Female Figure, clothed in a cuirass, as decoration on the blade of a poignard.
11. Venus, on the blade of a poignard.
12. City Arms of Freiburg, in Brisgan, with mark and date of year 1519; fol.
13. Bordering of Title, with Herod at the Beheading of St. John the Baptist; 4to.
14. Bordering of Title, with the Triumph of Infants; 4to.
15. Bordering of Title, with Tarquin and Lucretia; 4to.—These three titles have been used to the works of Erasmus of Rotterdam.
16. Bordering of Title, with the Dying Lucretia, 8vo.
17. ————— similar to the above, with Ceres and Pelop.
18. ————— with the Bishop.
19. ————— with the Fathers of y^e Church.
20. The larger Title border, with Peter and Paul, and the city arms of Basle, after Holbein, to the Geography of Ptolemy.
21. The smaller ditto, with the mark of the printer, A. Petri.
22. Border of Title, with David dancing before the Ark of the Covenant, after Holbein, with the mark of A. Petri.
23. Title, with the feasting of the 5000, Children dancing, and Fight of Tritons.
24. Plates in Erasmi encomium Moræ. (Stultitiæ.) after Holbein's humorous drawings.
25. The Lord's Prayer, illustrations from the old and new Covenant, probably after Holbein,—excellently engraved by V. C.; 8 plates, 8vo.; very scarce.
26. Title Page in Genii and the name Hans Holb., before the Paraphrase in Epistol. S. Pauli ad Galatas per Erasmus Roter. Balileæ S. Frebenium. 1519, 4to.]

HOLBEIN, SIGISMOND. This artist is said to have been the uncle of Hans Holbein, and is mentioned as a painter, and an engraver on wood.

There are some wooden cuts marked SB which are generally attributed to him, but they are very indifferently executed.

HOLE, WILLIAM, an English engraver of little note, who flourished about the year 1613. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and his plates are executed with the graver in a formal, laboured style. We have by him the following prints:

PORTRAITS.

Prince Henry Frederick, son to James I.; full length.
Thomas Egerton, Viscount Brackley, Lord Chancellor.
Sir John Hayward, Knt., LL. D.
Martin Billingsley, writing-master.
Giovanni Floris, Italian master to Anne of Denmark.
Michael Drayton, prefixed to his works.
The Frontispiece to Michael Drayton's Polyobion.

HOLL, ELIAS. According to Professor Christ, this artist resided at Nuremberg, about the year 1638. He engraved some plates from C. Reverdus and others, which are usually marked with an H, surmounted by an F, thus, H.

HOLLAND, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1755. Among other plates, he etched the Head of a Turk, which is executed with spirit, but without much effect.

HOLLAND, SIR NATHANIEL DANCE. The family name of this gentleman was Dance, but coming into the possession of a large property he was made a baronet, and took the name of Holland, when he relinquished the profession of an artist. He was born in London in 1734, and having shown an early inclination for painting, he was placed under the tuition of Francis Hayman, under whose instruction he continued some time. He afterwards travelled to Italy, where he prosecuted his studies eight or nine years. On his return to England he distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits, and also painted landscapes with considerable success. Amongst his most admired productions may be ranked his picture of Mr. Garrick, in the character of King Richard III., in the collection of Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, of which we have a print in mezzotinto, by John Dixon; Timon of Athens, which has been finely engraved by Mr. Hall; Virginia, scraped in mezzotinto by John Godfreid Haid; and a portrait of Omai, engraved by Bartolozzi. [He was a son of Mr. Dance, the city surveyor, who built the Mansion House. He married Mrs. Dummer, the widow of a Hampshire gentleman, by whom he acquired a large fortune. He became a member of parliament, took the name of Holland, and was made a baronet. He did not altogether relinquish the art, but exhibited, as an amateur, in several exhibitions, landscapes which would have done honour to any artist of his day. Many of his portraits pass for the work of Sir Joshua Reynolds. He died suddenly at Winchester in 1811.]

[HOLANDA, FRANCISCO DE, (OR FRANÇOIS DE HOLLANDE.) a Portuguese miniature painter and architect, who flourished from the commencement to the latter part of the sixteenth century. He was sent to Italy by Don John III., king of Portugal, and associated with the greatest artists of the time; among whom he mentions, as his most intimate friends, Michael Angelo, Giulio Clovio, Baccio Bandinelli, Pierino del Vaga, Sebastien del Piombo, and numerous others of the highest celebrity. On his return to Portugal in 1549, he wrote an account of ancient painting, dedicated to the king, in which he gives a most amusing relation of himself, the arts, and the artists with whom he associated: for egotism it may stand as the rival of the life of "Benvenuto Cellini;" but the work is so full of good humour, and information perhaps to be found nowhere else, as to more than compensate for the time of perusal. The Count A. Raczkinski has had the work translated into French, and published in "Les Arts" en Portugal," with the title, "Manuscrit de François de Hollande." It does not appear that this artist ever painted otherwise than as a miniaturist, or illuminator of manuscripts. In "Voyage en Espagne," by Pons, mention is made of a book of drawings by François de Hollande. It was then preserved, with others of a like kind, in an Armoire in the library of the Escorial: it was entitled, "During the reign of Don John III., Francois de Hollande went to Italy, and from the antiquities which he saw there he made, with his own hand, all the drawings in this book." The book begins with the portrait of the reigning pontiff, and another of Michel Angelo, both illuminated. These are followed by drawings of the most beautiful monuments of ancient Rome, such as the amphitheatre of Vespasian, Trajan's column, fragments of ruins, cornices, friezes, &c. It contains also views in Venice, Naples, the amphitheatre at Narbonne; drawings of mosaics, antique statues, and other subjects. All these drawings are mentioned in his manuscript. The time of his death is not accurately stated, but he was living in 1571, as appears by a manuscript written by him with that date, addressed to the king of Portugal, Don Sebastian; which will also be found, translated into French, in Racinski's work, "On the Arts in Portugal."

[HOLLANDAIS, JAN LE, or JOHN OF HOLLAND, a landscape painter, whose works were much sought after formerly, and whom Brehngel imitated, was born at Antwerp in 1494, and died there in 1553. He was the grandfather of Coninxloo, whose landscapes are well known by the engravings.]

HOLLAR, WENCESLAUS. This celebrated engraver was born at Prague in 1607. He was of an ancient family, and was well educated by his parents, with the intention of bringing him up to the profession of the law; but not liking that pursuit, and the civil commotions of his country breaking out, by which his family was plundered of every thing at the taking of Prague in 1619, he had recourse to his disposition for drawing, and having taken refuge at Frankfort, he became a pupil of Matthew Merian. With the assistance of that artist, he soon found himself able to dispense with further instructions; and when he was eighteen, published his two first plates of the Virgin and Child, and an Ecce Homo, in 1625. He travelled through Germany, designing and engraving the views of the cities and landscapes through which he passed, and in making drawings from the principal pictures. His views of Strasburg, Frankfort, Cologne, Mentz, &c., were greatly admired. The Earl of Arundel, who was sent ambassador to Ferdinand II. in 1636, meeting with him at Cologne, his judgment discovered the merit of Hollar, whom he immediately retained in his employment. He accompanied the Earl to the imperial court, and made designs of the principal places through which they passed. He signed his plate of the view of Wurtzburg, Hollar delinea vit, in legatione Arundeliana ad Imperatorem. On Lord Arundel's return to England from his embassy, he brought Hollar to this country. He engraved several plates from the pictures in the Arundelian collection. In 1638, Mary de Medicis arrived in England, to visit her daughter Henrietta Maria, the Queen of Charles I. A particular account of her journey and entry into this country was published in French in 1639, with several portraits of the royal family, etched for the purpose by Hollar. In the same year was published the portrait of his patron, the Earl of Arundel, on horseback. In the following year appeared his beautiful set of twenty-eight plates, entitled, Orna-

tus Muliebris Anglicanus, representing the different habiliments of English women, of all ranks, in full-length figures: and in 1642, 1643, and 1644, were published his other sets of women in the dresses of the different nations of Europe. His labours were now interrupted by the breaking out of the civil war, which overthrew every thing relative to the arts; and becoming obnoxious to the republican party from his connexions, he took shelter with the royalists, and was made prisoner at Basinghouse in 1645. On obtaining his liberty he went to Antwerp, whither the Earl of Arundel had withdrawn, and had taken with him his valuable collection. He resided at Antwerp some years, where he continued to engrave from the pictures of his patron, and some heads of the painters; but the Earl going to Italy for the benefit of his health, he was under the necessity of working for the printsellers of Antwerp, at very low prices. Not meeting with encouragement to keep him longer abroad, he ventured to return to England in 1652, where, though he met with employment, the penurious remuneration he received for his works barely afforded him a subsistence. The restoration of Charles II. brought back several of his friends, and he flattered himself with more auspicious projects, which were unfortunately never fulfilled. The dreadful visitations of the plague, and the fire of London, that succeeded it, put a stop to every pursuit of the art, and Hollar was reduced to a state of indigence and distress, from which all the perseverance of his indefatigable assiduity could never after recover him. He was about this time sent to Africa, in the capacity of his Majesty's designer, to make drawings of the town of Tangier, with the fort and the adjacent country. On his return he only received a hundred pounds for his labour and expenses. In 1672 he travelled to the north, and made his designs of Lincoln, Southwell, Newark, York Minster, &c. The close of his life it will be afflicting to every admirer of art and industry to be acquainted with. Notwithstanding the most exemplary application to his profession, such was the deplorable state of penury and distress to which he was reduced, that when he was on the verge of his seventieth year, being attacked with his last illness, the bailiffs entered his apartment, to seize the only piece of furniture that was left to him, the bed on which he lay. He entreated their forbearance, only for a short time, as he should then have no further need of it; and earnestly requested that he might not be removed to any other prison but his grave. It is not known whether this petty mercy was granted him. He died the 28th of March, 1677. Thus perished an artist whose works will ever be dear to the intelligent collector; and in looking over his numerous and admirable productions with delight, a tear of pity will sometimes be dropped to the memory of the able hand by which they were executed. The prints of Hollar are very numerous, amounting to near two thousand four hundred. Some of them are now extremely rare, and are purchased at very large prices. They are generally etched, and are executed with surprising lightness and spirit. His point is free, playful, and at the same time firm and finished. Some of his views of abbeys, churches, and ruins, are admirably executed; as are his animals, furs, shells, muffs, insects, and still-life. His portraits and landscapes have also great merit. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, with the date, and sometimes used one of these ciphers WH. or WZ. The following is as ample a list of his works as our limit will allow :

[HOLLOWAY, THOMAS, an eminent English engraver, was born in 1748. After receiving a good scholastic education among the Dissenters, he was apprenticed to a seal engraver; and his attention was confined chiefly to sculpture on steel, which was then the prevalent fashion, and he executed some superior specimens, particularly a head of Ariadne, which gained him general praise. When he had completed his pupilage, seals and medals were, in part, abandoned, and he employed himself, without the assistance of a master, in acquiring the knowledge of the varieties of engraving on stone and copper, as well as on steel. He also spent many of his leisure hours at the Royal Academy, drawing and modelling in wax from the antique, and availed himself of the library and lectures. His first subjects, as a copper-plate engraver, were chiefly portraits and embellishments for the Magazines; but the work which drew public attention to him was the English publication of "Lavater's Essays on Physiognomy," translated by the Rev. Dr. Hunter, minister of the Scots' church, London Wall. This appeared in five volumes quarto, with about seven hundred plates. This was followed by many engravings for the publications of Boydell, Macklin, and Bowyer; and by several portraits of distinguished Dissenting ministers, and embellishments for the editions of the British Classics. The work, however, on which his reputation chiefly rests, is the Engravings of the Cartoons of Raphael, which occupied him for many years. As these engravings are extensively known, observations on them are unnecessary. As decorative prints they are esteemed for their elaborate execution; but artists prefer the rougher freedom of Dorigny. Holloway, after an industrious and blameless life, died at Coltishall, near Norwich, in 1827.]

HOLMES, P., an indifferent English engraver, who lived about the year 1696. He engraved the greater part of the plates for Quarles's Emblems, in 1696.

[HOLST, THEODORE VAN, born at London in 1810, was descended from a Livonian family. When a child he manifested much skill in drawing; and having drawn from the antique, in the British Museum, he was admitted a student of the Royal Academy. As a mere boy, he was looked on as a marvel; in his tenth year he attracted the notice of Sir Thomas Lawrence, who gave him three guineas for one of his pencil sketches. Subsequently he executed many drawings for Sir Thomas, several of which were supposed to be commissioned by King George IV. As a painter he followed the bent of his own genius, which neither public direction, the offer of commissions, nor privations, could alter. He could not disengage his mind from romantic and gloomy subjects. His peculiar style is essentially German in conception, composition, and execution, and consequently not suited to the general taste in England. Very few of his productions were altogether free from eccentricity. He left a large number of drawings and sketches, and some unfinished pictures. His picture of The Raising of Jairus's Daughter has been engraved. He died in 1844.]

HOLSTEIN, PETER, a Dutch glass painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1648. He engraved a variety of portraits; among which is a set of twenty-six of the ambassadors to the congress at Munster. They are chiefly executed with the graver, in a stiff style, but not without merit. We have by him, among others, the following:

PORTRAITS.

Cardinal Fabio Chigi, negotiator at the Peace of Westphalia; afterwards Pope Alexander VII.

Jacob vander Burchius; oval.
John Ernest Pictoris, Counsellor to the Elector of Saxony.

John Huydecooper, Burgomaster of Amsterdam.
John Reyner, Historiographer of the Peace of Munster.

1648.
John Saenredam, engraver.

Albert Vinckenbrinck, sculptor.

HOLSTEIN, CORNELIUS, was the son of Peter Holstein, born at Haerlem about the year 1620. His father instructed him in the rudiments of design; and he is said by M. Huber to have painted history with considerable reputation. He has engraved some plates from his own designs, and some of the prints for the celebrated collection, called the Cabinet of Gerard Reynst, published at Amsterdam about the year 1663. The following are by him:

Infant Bacchanalians; a frieze, in six sheets, numbered, Clement de Jonghe, ecc.; rare.

A Lady seated in a chair, richly habited, supposed to be the portrait of Isabella d'Este, Marchioness of Mantua; after a picture, said by some to be painted by Coreggio, by others Giulio Romano. Corn. Holstein, scul.

[There is much difference between writers respecting the date of his birth. Füessli, Zani, and Balckema, say 1653; Nagler and others, 1623: the first are probably right, as his father, Peter, was born in 1626, and was living in 1663. Perhaps he has been confounded with another of the same name.]

HOLZER, JOHN, a German painter and engraver, born at Burgriess, in the Tyrol, in 1708. He studied at Augsbourg, under J. G. Bergmüller. He painted history, and executed several fresco works, for the public places at Augsbourg, some of which have been engraved by J. J. Nilson. We have by this artist some spirited etchings from his own designs, and after other masters; among which are the following:

The Adoration of the Shepherds; J. Holzer, inv. et fec.
The Four Seasons; after Bergmüller.
The Adoration of the Magi; after the same.
The Ecce Homo; Holzer, del. et fecit, aqua forti.
The Virgin, with a Glory of Angels; Holzer, del. et sc.

HOLZHALB, JOHN RUDOLPH, a Swiss engraver, born at Zurich about the year 1730. He was principally employed in engraving portraits for the publications of his time, and executed several plates for the Lives of the Swiss Painters, by Fuesslin, and the Physiognomy of Lavater.

HONDECOOTER, GILES. This painter was a native of Utrecht, about the year 1583. He painted landscapes in the style of David Vinkenbooms, and his pictures are frequently taken for those of that master. He also painted birds and fowls, with landscape back-grounds, agreeably coloured, and highly finished.

HONDECOOTER, GYSBRECHT, was the son and scholar of Giles Hondecooter, born at Utrecht in 1613. His pictures represent various kinds of domestic fowls, which, though they possess considerable merit, they are greatly inferior to those of his son.

HONDECOOTER, MELCHIOR. This eminent painter was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Utrecht in 1636, and was instructed by his father until he was seventeen years of age. After the death of that master, he studied some time under John Baptist Weenix, by whose assistance he soon became a distinguished painter of live fowls, game, and similar subjects. His pictures of that description class with the ablest artists in that branch; and though his works are not so glossy and finished as those of John Weenix, they are painted with more freedom, and a fuller pencil. The plumage of each fowl is imitated in the most perfect manner; his touch is firm and bold, and his colouring rich and mellow. He died in 1695. [Melchior de Hondecoeter was descended from noble parents; his great grandfather is said to have been the Marquis of Westerloo, whose castle was situated in the meyery of Ghelan, between Herenthals and Diest, in Belgium. Becoming a Protestant he was obliged to abandon his estate, and fled with his family to Amsterdam, to escape the cruelties of the Inquisition; which at length threw the seventeen provinces into a state of revolt, and caused the separation of Holland from Belgium. The latter being subdued by Spanish force and fanaticism, the Marquis of Westerloo continued to reside in Amsterdam, all his patrimonial estates being confiscated. His son, Gillis de Hondecoeter, having received a liberal education, according to the custom of the time, learned the art of painting; and becoming skilful in taking portraits, this talent afterwards proved of great assistance towards the support of his parent. This Gillis had a son called Gysbert, who was also a painter, and the father of the Melchior above-mentioned. Melchior studied under his father, who, dying in 1653, the young artist, then seventeen years of age, continued under the instruction of his uncle, John Baptist Weenix, who was related to him by marriage with Josina de Hondecoeter. Many of his pictures are surprising; and in his line, I may say, that he has never been surpassed.—J. C. Nieuwenhuys.]

HONDIUS, ABRAHAM. This painter was born at Rotterdam in 1638. His favourite subjects were huntings and animals, which he treated in a masterly style. He also painted conflagrations and towns on fire; but his chief excellence was in the representation of dogs, in which few artists have surpassed him. He came to England in the reign of Charles II., and met with considerable encouragement. His best pictures are little inferior to those of Snyder or Fyt, either in the spirited design of his animals, or the freedom of his touch. We have a few etchings by Hondius, executed with uncommon fire and animation; they are highly esteemed, and are now become scarce. Among others, we have,

A Boar-hunting; very fine.

A set of Huntings; of various animals.

He died in London in 1695. [Füssli and Balkema say he was born in 1650; but the majority of writers is in favour of 1638. Some say he was a native of Amsterdam; others, of Brabant.]

HONDIUS, or DE HONDT, Jost, or JODOCUS, a Flemish engraver, born at Ghent in 1563. The troubles in the Low Countries obliged him to leave Ghent when he was twenty years of age, and he came to England in 1583, where he exercised various arts, such as making mathematical instruments, types for printing, and engraving maps, charts, &c. He also engraved some portraits, which are neatly executed, and possess considerable merit. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher H, and sometimes added a dog or hound barking, in allusion to his name, with the inscription sub cane vigilante. We have by him the following engravings:

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth.

Henry IV. of France.

Sir Francis Drake, with two hemispheres.

Thomas Cavendish, the famous navigator.

The Maps and Charts of Sir Francis Drake's Voyages.

Several Maps for Speed's Collection; some with figures.

Some plates for the Atlas Major of G. Mercator, with his portrait.

HONDIUS, or DE HONDT, HENRY, THE ELDER. This artist was probably of the same family as the preceding engraver. He was born at Duffel in Brabant, in 1576, and is said to have been a pupil of J. Wierix, whose stiff style he followed, though inferior to him both in his design and execution. He engraved a great number of portraits, chiefly of the principal Reformers, and some of the artists. He also engraved several landscapes, and other subjects, after old Breugel, Vanmander, &c. His plates are usually marked with the cipher H. We have the following by him:

PORTRAITS OF REFORMERS.

John Wickcliffe.

Philip Melancthon.

John Bugenhagen; H. Hondius. 1599

John Knox.

John Calvin.

Jerome Savonarola.

PORTRAITS OF PAINTERS AND ENGRAVERS.

Cornelius Cort; H. H. fec. 1598.

Henry de Clevee.

Giles Coninxloo.

Hans Holbein.

Joas van Clevee.

George Hoefnagel.

John Mabuse.

Sir Anthony More.

Henry Cornelius Vroom.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Judgment of Solomon; after Karel van Mander.

The Adulteress before Christ; after the same. 1597.

St. Paul casting the Viper into the Fire, in a landscape;

after Giles Moestaert.

Christ with the two Disciples going to Emmaus; after the same. 1598.

Four plates of Drolleries; after P. Breughel.

Tobit and the Angel; after G. de Saen. 1600.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after the same.

A View of the Hague; inscribed, Curia Hollandiæ; after the same; scarce.

HONDIUS, or DE HONDT, HENRY, THE YOUNGER, was the son of Jodocus Hondius, born in London about the year 1588, was instructed by his father, and finished some of the plates left imperfect by him. We have a considerable number of portraits by this artist, executed in a neat style. He used a mark very similar to that of the preceding engraver. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth.

James I.

Charles I.

John Bale, Bishop of Ossory.

Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.

William, Prince of Orange.

Mary, Princess of Orange.

Sir Richard Spencer, Ambassador.

Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State.

HONDIUS, or DE HONDT, WILLIAM, was the son of the foregoing artist, and resided at the Hague about the year 1640. We have several portraits by him, many of which possess considerable merit. He engraved some of the celebrated portraits of the artists from the designs of Vandyck. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher G, but more frequently signed them with his name. We have the following portraits by him:

Ladislas IV., King of Poland; W. Hondius, fecit. 1637.

John Casimir, King of Poland; after Schulze.

Louisa Maria, Queen of Poland; after J. van Egmont.

Charles, Prince of Poland, Bishop of Breslau; after Schulze.

Prince Maurice of Austria. 1623; fine.

Bernard, Duke of Saxe Weymar.

Theodore ab Werden-Burgio.

Henry Cornelius Longkuis; after J. Mytens.

Francis Franck, the younger, painter; after Vandyck.

His own Portrait; after the same.

HONE, NATHANIEL. This artist was born in Dublin about the year 1730. He was a very reputable portrait painter, in oil as well as in miniature, and practised enamelling with success. He also painted some subjects of caricature; one of which he has engraved in mezzotinto, representing two Monks making merry; inscribed Monachum non facit Cuculus. Nath. Hone, fec. Mr. Hone was one of the members of the Royal Academy at its foundation in 1768. [He exposed the plagiarisms of Sir Joshua Reynolds in a picture called The Magician, and gave great offence to the Academy by that, and another reflecting on Angelica Kauffman; the latter secured his punishment for the former. He died in 1784.]

[HONT, or HONDT, H. DE, said to have been a scholar of David Teniers. His pictures represent similar scenes to those of that master, and sometimes approach very closely to his manner.]

HONTHORST, GERARD, called GHERARDO DALLE NOTTI. This eminent painter was born at Utrecht in 1592, and was a scholar of Abraham

Bloemaert; but his principal studies were at Rome, where he applied himself to imitate the works of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio. He was called Gherardo dalle Notti, from his pictures generally representing subjects by torch-light. To the vigorous colouring of Caravaggio, and his powerful effect of chiaro-scuro, he added dignity of character, and a more correct and elevated taste of design. He was much employed by the Prince Giustiniani, for whom he painted some of his finest works; of which the most admired are his two pictures of St. Peter delivered from Prison, and Christ before Pilate. In the church of la Madonna della Scala at Rome, is a fine picture by Gherardo, representing the Decollation of St. John, by torch-light. Honthorst visited England soon after his return from Italy, and was employed by Charles I., for whom he painted several pictures, and was munificently rewarded. On leaving England he settled at the Hague, and was taken into the employment of the Prince of Orange. He ornamented the palaces of Ryswick, and the House in the Wood, with several capital pictures. He died in 1660. There is a spirited etching by G. Honthorst, representing the Banquet of Neptune. [See Mr. W. H. Carpenter's "Pictorial Notices of Van Dyck, and other Painters of the Period," for several very interesting letters by Gerrit Van Honthorst, which throw considerable light on his history, and the works he executed for Charles the First. The picture of Christ before Pilate is in the Duke of Sutherland's collection.]

HONTHORST, WILLIAM, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Utrecht in 1604, and was also educated under Abraham Bloemaert. Although he occasionally painted historical pictures in the style of his brother, he is more known as a portrait painter. He died in 1683.

HOOFD, NICHOLAS. This painter was born at the Hague in 1664. His parents were in easy circumstances, and forwarded his disposition for the art, by procuring him the best means of improvement. He was first placed under the tuition of Daniel Mytens, and afterwards studied under Augustine Terwesten. He painted history and portraits with considerable success, and was for some years director of the Academy at the Hague. He died in 1748.

HOOGHE, PETER DE, a Dutch painter, born about the year 1643. It is neither said where he was born, nor by what master he was instructed; but his pictures are generally known, and universally admired. His favourite subjects were the interiors of Dutch apartments, with figures habited in the mode of the time; in which he represented with wonderful success, the sun shining through a window, by which a part of the room is brilliantly illumined, producing a most natural and pleasing effect. Though less finished than Gerard Dow or Mieris, his touch is more spirited, and sufficiently neat. As a colourist, he may be ranked among the most admired painters of his country; and in his management of the chiaro-scuro, he has seldom been surpassed. [No dependence is to be placed on the accounts given of this master by Füessli, and copied by Balkema and Nagler; they are simply ridiculous. His best works are dated 1658. Some of his finest pictures are in England, in the royal collection, and in those of the Duke of Wellington, and Sir Robert Peel. Such are beyond all price. There is one also in the Museum at Amsterdam of the like quality. Nothing satisfactory of his history is known.]

HOOGHE, ROMEYN DE, a Dutch designer and engraver, born at the Hague about the year 1638. He had a lively imagination, by which he was sometimes led astray, and his works must be viewed with some allowance for incorrectness of design, and an injudicious choice of subjects. But several of his compositions show him to have been a man of great genius and readiness of invention. Few artists have handled the point with more spirit and facility than Romeyn de Hooghe, and his small figures and distances are executed with great delicacy and neatness. His fore-grounds and principal figures are less happy, and there is a want of harmony in the effect, and in the management of the chiaro-scuro. The number of his prints is very considerable, and several of them are in great estimation. The following are his principal plates:

The portrait of Michael Adriaensz de Ruyter, Admiral-General of Holland; very fine.

An Allegorical Subject, in honour of Leopold II.

Another, in honour of William Henry, Prince of Orange. The Marriage of William, Prince of Orange, with the Princess Mary.

The Entry of the Prince of Orange into London.

The Coronation of William and Mary.

The Army of William III. in order of Battle, on the Banks of the Boyne, with the medallions of the King, and Queen Mary.

The Siege of Vienna by the Turks. 1683.

The Triumphal entry of John III., King of Poland, into Warsaw, after raising the siege of Vienna.

Constantinople taken by the Turks.

A set of plates representing the Excesses committed by the French in Holland. 1672, 1673.

The Deluge of Coerverden.

The Massacre of the two De Witts. 1672.

The Defeat of the French at Hochstadt in 1704, with medallions of the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene.

The taking of Narva by Charles XII.

The Battle of St. Denys, near Mons; in two sheets.

The Jewish Synagogue at Amsterdam.

The Entry of Louis XIV. into Dunkirk; two sheets; after Vander Meulen.

Charles II. of Spain, descending from his carriage to pay homage to the Host.

Six Emblematical Subjects, relative to the abuses of the clergy of the Romish Church; dated 1679.

The Fair at Arnheim.

Twelve Figures habited in the mode of the end of the seventeenth century.

HOOGSTRAETEN, DIRK (THEODORE) VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1596. He was taught drawing, with the intention of bringing him up to the business of a goldsmith, but his inclination leading him to painting, by studying the works of the best of the Flemish masters, he became a painter of history of considerable reputation, without the aid of any instructor; and surpassed many of his contemporaries who had received the advantage of a regular education. He died in 1640.

HOOGSTRAETEN, SAMUEL VAN, was the son of Theodore van Hoogstraeten, born at Dort in 1627, and received the first part of his education under his father, but afterwards went to Amsterdam, where he entered the school of Rembrandt. He first applied himself to portrait painting, and finding the dark though vigorous style he had acquired under Rembrandt did not please the generality of his sitters, he adopted one more clear and agreeable, and met with great encouragement in that branch at the Hague, and at Dort. He occasionally painted landscapes, flowers, fruit, and subjects of still-life, which he touched with neatness, and they were well coloured. Hoogstraeten visited England in the reign of Charles II., and appears to have been here in the year 1663, from a picture Vertue had seen, by him, signed with his name, representing objects of still-life; among which was an English Almanack of that year. Houbraken, who was his scholar, in his Lives of the Painters, mentions his being in England. He died at Dort in 1678.

HOOGSTRAËTEN, JOHN VAN, was the younger brother of Samuel van Hoogstraeten, born at Dort in 1629. He painted history and portraits with some reputation; and, according to Houbraken, was received into the Society of Painters at Dort in 1649. He was invited to the court of Vienna, and was employed by the emperor some years, in whose service he died, [according to Nagler, in 1654.]

HOOGZAAT, JOHN. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1654, and was educated in the school of Gerard Lairese, who regarded him as one of his ablest disciples. By the recommendation of Lairese, he was employed to paint the ceiling of the Hall of the Burghers, in the Town-house at Amsterdam, representing an allegorical subject, ingeniously composed, and well coloured. He was afterwards employed by William III. in several pictures for the palace at Loo. He died at Amsterdam in 1712.

HOOSTAD, [or HOOGSTADT,] GERARD VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1625. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but Descamps represents him as a very respectable historical painter, whose design was correct, and his compositions ingenious. There are several of his works in the churches at Brussels, particularly some pictures of the Passion of Christ, in the collegiate church of St. Gudule.

HOPFER, DAVID, an old German engraver, born at Nuremberg about the year 1510. We have by this artist a great variety of spirited etchings. His subjects are not well composed, and his design is stiff and Gothic, but he handled the point with great freedom and spirit, and his plates are executed in a very pleasing style. He chiefly excelled in ornamental buildings and decorations. David Hopfer was the eldest of three brothers, who worked in the same manner, but he was the ablest and the most industrious of the three. They marked their plates with the initials of their names, and between the two letters is introduced a hop blossom, in allusion to their name, Hopfer, in German, meaning a hop-plant. The Abbé Marolles mistook it for a candlestick, and calls them the Masters of the candlestick. The mark of David Hopfer is,

The following are his principal prints:

- David cutting off the Head of Goliath.
- David playing on the Harp before Saul. 1531.
- The Woman taken in Adultery.
- The Last Judgment.
- The Presentation in the Temple.
- The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John.
- Christ curing the Blind Man.
- The Crucifixion of Christ between the Two Thieves.
- Another Crucifixion, with the Virgin and St. John.
- St. Christopher.
- The Representation of an Altar. M.D.XXVII.
- A large Altar, with the Virgin, Christ, and St. John.
- Venus, with Cupid playing on a Madoline.
- A Combat of Marine Monsters; copied from Andrea Mantegna.
- Five Swiss Soldiers.
- Several Village Festivals.
- Grotesque Figures dancing; of various sizes.
- The Fountains, ornamented with figures.
- Military Ornaments, with grotesque figures.

PORTRAITS.

- Martin Luther. M.D.XXIII.
- Claus Sturzenbecher; very scarce.
- Carolus Rex Catholicus, a medallion.

[He is also called Daniel Hopper. See Bartsch and Nagler for a list of his works, and also those of Jerome.]

HOPFER, JEROME, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, and flourished at Nuremberg about the year 1535. His plates are etched in the manner of David, though inferior. He copied several of the prints of Albert Durer, though not very successfully, either with respect to drawing or effect. Some of his plates, from his own designs, possess considerable merit. He marked his prints with the initials L. H. on a tablet, with the same plant between the letters used by his brother. We have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

- Franciscus von Sickingen, with a German inscription; fine and scarce.
- Wolfgang Juriger zu Toledt; fine and scarce.
- Julius Secundus, Pontifex Maximus; a bust.
- Innocentius Octav. Pontifex Maximus; the same.
- The Emperors Charles V. and Ferdinand I.; on one plate.
- Leopoldus Dickius, Juris-consultus, &c.; fine.
- Erasmus Roterdamus; fine.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

- Samson overcoming the Lion.
- The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus.
- St. Huhert; copied from Albert Durer.
- St. Jerome; from the same; rather smaller than the original.
- St. George standing upon the Dragon; from his own design.
- An Emblematical Print, representing several naked figures, with Diana in the front, holding a moon in her right hand, and a flambeau in her left; the same.
- Hercules strangling Anteus; after Mantegna.
- Roma. Pallas seated, holding the figure of Victory.
- The English and French Armies before the battle of Agincourt; very scarce.
- A Roman Battle; after Giulio Romano; rare.
- The great Cannon; after Albert Durer.

HOPFER, LAMBERT. This artist was the youngest brother of the two preceding engravers, to whom he is inferior in every respect. He etched several plates from the wooden cuts of Albert Durer, and various subjects from his own designs. His prints are marked with the initials L. H. on a tablet, and sometimes with the hop-plant. The following are by him:

- The Fall of our First Parents.
- A set of fifteen small plates of the Life and Passion of Christ; copied from the wooden cuts of Albert Durer.
- Christ praying in the Garden; with an arabesque border.
- A Triton on a Sea-horse, and Cupid on a Dolphin; the same.
- The Conversion of St. Paul.
- Three circular subjects, on the same plate, a Man caressing a Woman, Paris dying on Mount Ida, St. Jerome praying.
- An arabesque ornament, with four candelabra; esteemed his best print.

HOPPNER, JOHN. For the following memoir of this celebrated artist, we are chiefly indebted to the ingenious author of the Baviad. His style of portrait painting appears to have been founded on an attentive study of the works of Sir Joshua Reynolds; but though Mr. Hoppner well knew how to appreciate that extraordinary person, and entertained the highest veneration for his professional powers, he was very far from his copyist. Occasionally, indeed, he imitated his manner, and formed his pictures on similar principles, but what he thus borrowed, he made his own with such playful ingenuity, and concealed his plagiarism with so many winning and original graces, that pardon was sealed ere his sentence could be pronounced. The prevailing fashion of the times, together with his own narrow circumstances in early life, necessarily directed his attention, almost exclusively, to portrait painting: in a different situation, the natural bent of his genius, no less than his inclination, would probably have led him to landscape, and the rural and familiar walks of life; for when he exercised his talents on subjects of this nature, he did it with so much ease and pleasure to himself, and was always so eminently successful, that it furnishes matter for regret, that the severe and harassing duties of his principal occupation did not allow him more frequent opportunities of indulging his fancy in pursuit of the objects so congenial with his feelings and disposition. Of his exquisite taste in landscape, the back-grounds introduced in his portraits will alone afford sufficient evidence, without considering the beautiful sketches in chalk, with which he was accustomed to amuse his leisure hours. These are executed with a vigour and felicity peculiar to himself, and discover a knowledge and comprehension of landscape, which would do honour to a Gainsborough. Indeed, in several respects, there appear to have been many points of similarity between these extraordinary men, not only in particular parts of their art, but also in their conversation, disposition, and character. In portrait, however, Mr. Hoppner was decidedly superior, and so far outstripped Gainsborough in this department of the art, that it would be the highest injustice to attempt a comparison of their powers.

The distinguishing character of Mr. Hoppner's style is an easy and unaffected elegance, which reigns throughout all his works; his naturally refined taste appears to have given him almost intuitively an aversion from every thing which bordered on affectation and vulgarity, and enabled him to stamp an air of gentility and fashion on the most inveterate awkwardness and deformity. This power of improving what was placed before him, without annihilating resemblance, obtained him a decided preference among the fairer part of fashionable society. The same qualities which rendered him so highly successful in his portraits of women, did not perhaps afford him equal advantages in those of the other sex, in which strength and character ought to take the lead of almost every other consideration. His portraits of men are generally, if the expression may be allowed, too civilized and genteel to be very striking and forcible; and in his constant wish to represent the gentleman, he sometimes failed to delineate the man. To this observation, however, it must be acknowledged, that many of his best works form very splendid exceptions.

In his portraits of children he was peculiarly fortunate; he entered completely into the infantine character, and arranged his compositions of this species with that unaffected ease and playful grace, which so pleasingly mark the early periods of human life. One great charm of his pictures arises from the air of negligence and facility which pervades them; their production appears to have cost no effort, and the careless boldness of his execution, equally removed from insipidity and handicraft, stamps the seal of the master on the most trifling of his performances. His colouring is natural, chaste, and powerful, and his tones for the most part mellow and deep; his pencilling is rich and full, and his carnations fresh and transparent.

The absorbing quality of his original pursuit seldom allowed him to turn his attention to the more elevated departments of the art. He died January 23, 1810, at the age of 51.

[HOREBOUT, GERARD LUCAS, born at Ghent in 1498, was a painter of portraits in the manner of Holbein. He was for some time in England in the service of Henry VIII. He also painted subjects for several churches at Ghent. He died at London in 1588.]

HORFELIN, ANTONIO L', a Spanish painter, born at Saragossa in 1587. He was the son of an obscure artist, named Pedro l'Horfelin, who sent him to Rome for improvement when he was very young: his studies in that capital were directed to the works of Michael Angelo Buonaroti and Raffaele, by which he acquired a grandeur of design, and an intelligent harmony of colour, which distinguished him among the Spanish painters of his time. His principal work is a picture of St. Joseph, with two laterals, in the church of the bare-footed Augustines at Saragossa. He died in 1660.

[HORION, ALEXANDRE DE, a portrait painter, was born at Liege about the end of the 16th century. His portraits were considered good likenesses, and well drawn, but wanting in expression; he made amends to his sitters by the beautiful accessories with which he ornamented their pictures, and which, it is said, was the cause of the fashionable esteem he enjoyed. He also painted some sacred subjects for churches at Liege, and the convent of St. Claire. He died in 1659.]

[HORREMAN, JOHN, THE ELDER, a painter of conversation pieces, was born at Antwerp in 1685, and died in 1759. His characters are generally from the peasantry of his country.]

[HORREMAN, JOHN, THE YOUNGER, was born in 1717, and died in 1759, the same year as his father. The subjects he painted are similar to those of the elder Horremans, but they are from the higher grades of society. His pictures are not uncommon in England. They have, occasionally, a slight analogy to Hogarth.]

HORST, NICHOLAS VANDER. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1598, and was educated in the school of Rubens. He afterwards travelled through Germany, France, and Italy, and on his return to the Netherlands established himself at Brussels, where he met with great encouragement as a painter of history and portraits. The Archduke Albert favoured him with his protection, and appointed him one of his painters. He died at Brussels, in 1646.

HORTEMELS, FREDERICK, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1688. Some of his plates are almost entirely executed with the graver, and have very little etching; but his best prints are those in which he has equally united the point with the burin. These have a more than usual mellowness of effect, and possess considerable merit. His best plates were engraved for the Crozat collection. We have, among others, the following by him:

The Portrait of Philip, Duke of Orleans; after Santerre.
SUBJECTS ENGRAVED FOR THE CROZAT COLLECTION.

Christ bearing his Cross; after Giorgione.

The Wise Men's Offering; after P. Veronese.

The Virgin in Meditation; after Dom. Fetti.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.

The Birth of St. John Baptist; after Pintoretto.

The Death of Abel; after A. Sacchi.

Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after B. Garofalo.

The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after Gaudenzio Ferrari.

HORTEMELS, MARY MAGDALENE. According to M. Watelet, this ingenious lady was the daughter of the preceding artist, and the wife of Charles Nicholas Cochin. She engraved several plates, which are executed with the point, and finished with the graver, in a light, pleasing style. Several of the plates for Monicart's Treatise on the Pictures, Statues, &c., at Versailles, are by her. Among others, we have the following :

PORTRAITS.

Cardinal de Blissy, Bishop of Meaux; after Rigaud.
Cardinal de Rohan, Bishop of Strasburg; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Mercury announcing Peace to the Muses; a ceiling; after Corneille.
Penelope occupied in the midst of her Women; after the same.
Aspasia disputing with the Philosophers of Greece; after the same.
St. Philp baptizing the Eunuch; after N. Bertin.
Iphigenia; inscribed, Quantum religio potuit; after the same.
The Triumph of Flora; after N. Poussin.
The Conquest of Franche-Comté; after C. Le Brun.

HOSKINS, JOHN, an English portrait painter, of whose life little is known. He lived in the reign of Charles I., and in Graham's English School we are told "that he was bred a face painter in oil, but afterwards taking to miniature, far exceeded what he did before; that he drew King Charles, his Queen, and most of the court, and had two considerable disciples, Alexander and Samuel Cooper, the latter of whom became much the more eminent limner." Though he was surpassed in his portraits by Samuel Cooper, he was an artist of great merit. He drew correctly, and there is much truth and nature in his heads, though his tints are not sufficiently broken; and there is a red monotony in his carnations. Lord Orford mentions a son of Hoskins of the same name, who also painted miniature. The father marked his pictures HL., and the younger Hoskins with the initials I. H. The elder Hoskins died in 1664.

HOUBRAKEN, ARNOLD. This painter and biographer of the Dutch artists was born at Dort in 1660. He was well educated, and showing an inclination for painting, he was placed under William van Drillenbourg, and was afterwards instructed by Samuel van Hoogstraeten. He painted portraits and small pictures of historical subjects, which were more esteemed for correctness of design, than the truth of their colouring. He came to England to make the drawings for the portraits by Vandyck, which were engraved by Peter van Gunst. He published a work in Dutch, entitled The Great Theatre of the Dutch and Flemish Painters, with their Portraits, in three volumes. We have some etchings by Arnold Houbraken, after his own designs; among which are the following :

A set of slight etchings of Boys, with vases.
Vertumnus and Pomona. 1699.
Christ, with the Disciples at Emmanus; in the manner of Rembrandt.

An emblematical subject, representing three Women looking at a Child lying in a sort of Basket, encircled by a Serpent; A. Houbraken, pinx. et fecit.

HOUBRAKEN, JACOB. This eminent engraver was the son of Arnold Houbraken, born at Dort in 1698. It is not known by what master he was instructed in engraving, but he appears to have formed his style by an attentive study of the works of Nanteuil and Edelinck. He chiefly excelled in portraits, in which he was principally employed; and although his plates are not all equally excellent, many of them have not been surpassed by the most celebrated artists in that branch. We admire the softness and delicacy of his execution, which is accompanied by correct drawing and a fine taste. His heads do not yield to those of Drevet in the beauty of their finishing, and they surpass them in the boldness of his stroke, and the brilliancy of colour. The number of his portraits is very considerable, and as many of those of English characters are generally known by the Collection of Illustrious Persons, published in London by J. and P. Knapton, a particular detail of them will not be thought necessary. We shall therefore confine ourselves to those of his works which are less universally known

PORTRAITS.

His own portrait; after J. M. Kinkhart.
Jacob van Hoorn; after the same.
Jacob van Selsted, his Wife; after the same.
Albertus Seba; after the same.
John Burman, physician; after the same.
Francis Burman, of Utrecht; Doctor in Theology.
Gustavus William, Baron d'Imhof, Governor-General of Dutch India.
Peter de Musschenbroeck, Professor of Medicine at Leyden.
Ferdinand van Collen, Burgomaster of Amsterdam. 1727.
Herman Alexander Roell, Doctor in Theology.
Peter Burman, Professor at Utrecht. 1727.
Jerome Gaubius, physician. 1744.
John Conrad Rucker, juris-consult. 1736.
William James Sgravesande, mathematician; after Vandyck.
Sigbert Havercamp, Professor of Leyden; after Mieris.
John de Witt, Grand Pensionary of Holland; after Netscher.
John Rodolph Faesch, of Basle; after Huber.
Henrietta Wolters, paintress; se ipsa pinx.
Cornelius Troost, painter, of Amsterdam; se ipse pinx.
Jacob Campo Weyermans, painter, and author of the Lives of the Dutch Artists.
Nicholas Verkolie, painter; after a picture by himself.

He also engraved two plates for the gallery of Dresden :

The Portrait of Daniello Barbaro; after P. Veronese.
The Sacrifice of Manoach; after Rembrandt.

HOVE, FREDERICK HENRY VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Haerlem about the year 1625. The circumstances of his life are little known; he resided chiefly in London, where he was chiefly employed by the booksellers. His prints are dated from 1648 to 1692, and consist principally of portraits. He also engraved some plates for the Historia Plantarum of Robert Morison, and several of the plates for Quarles's Emblems. We have the following portraits by him :

James II.
William III.
Mary, his Queen.
King William and Mary, on their throne.
Thomas Sutton, Mercat. Lond. founder of the Charter-House.
Sir Nathaniel Bernardiston, of Kelton, Suffolk.
Arthur Capel, Earl of Essex; prefixed to his Murder.
Thomas Butler, Earl of Ossory.
Sir Edmund Bury Godfrey; prefixed to his Life.
Sir Matthew Hale; prefixed to his Origin of Mankind.
Samuel Speed, poet.
Sir Thomas Browne, M. D.
Hansard Knollis, V. D. M.
Lady Mary Armyne, grand-daughter to George, Earl of Shrewsbury.
Mary Tracy, Lady Vere.
Sir Henry Morgan, Governor of Jamaica.
John Hopkins, poet.
Joseph Moxon, mathematician.
John Taylor, mathematician.
William Winstanley, biographer.

HOUSEMAN, F. This artist scraped a mezzotino of Nancy Parsons, afterwards Lady Maynard.

HOUSSARD, ———. The name of this engraver, who appears to have been a native of France, is affixed to a portrait of Saverus François Morand.

HOUSTON, RICHARD, an eminent English engraver in mezzotinto, and in the chalk manner, who may be ranked among the ablest and the most indefatigable artists in his branch of engraving. We have a great number of portraits, and various subjects, by him, many of which are highly esteemed. The following are his principal prints :

PORTRAITS.

Several Portraits for Holt's Lives of the Reformers.

George II. ; after Worlidge.

Henry Pelham, Chancellor of the Exchequer ; after Hoare.

John Byng, admiral ; after Hudson.

James Wolfe, general.

AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

Charles, Lord Cathcart.

Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield.

John Manners, Marquis of Granby.

Richard Robinson, Archbishop of Armagh.

Eliza, Duchess of Argyle, with her son and a greyhound.

Maria Walpole, Duchess of Gloucester, with her daughter.

Lady Selina Hastings.

Caroline, Duchess of Marlborough, with Lady Charlotte Spencer.

The Duke of Marlborough.

Mary, Duchess of Ancester.

Elizabeth, Duchess of Northumberland.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin and Infant ; after Raffaello.

The Temptation of St. Anthony ; after Teniers.

An old Man, with a beard ; after Rembrandt ; fine.

A Man seated, with a large hat on his head ; fine ; after the same.

Bust of a Woman, called the great Jew Bride ; after the same.

An old Woman plucking a Fowl ; after the same.

A Man holding a Knife ; after the same.

The Pen-cutter ; after the same.

The Philosopher in Contemplation ; after the same.

The Gold-weigher ; after the same.

Christ, with the Woman of Samaria ; after the same.

Avarice and Innocence ; after Mercier.

[HOWARD, HENRY, an English painter of poetical and classical subjects, was born in 1769. He received his artistic rudiments from Philip Reinagle, and in 1788 was admitted a student of the Royal Academy. In 1790 he obtained the silver medal for the best drawing from the life, and the gold medal for the best historical picture, Caractacus recognising the dead Body of his Son, the first, and perhaps the only instance of the two highest premiums being gained by one student on the same evening. The next year he went to Italy, and from thence sent to the Academy a picture of the Dream of Cain, the figures larger than life. In 1801 he was elected an Associate, and in 1808 an Academician. He became secretary to that institution in 1811, and Professor of Painting in 1833 : the duties of these offices he fulfilled with unremitting assiduity until a few months previous to his decease, which occurred at Oxford on the 5th of October, 1847. As it will be interesting hereafter to know the productions of an artist whose high poetic feeling and tasteful delineations were too refined for the vulgar predilections of his day, and will give lustre to the few who could appreciate the emanations of a mind so richly gifted ; a list is added of some of his numerous works, and the names of those who possess them :

The Pleiades, in the possession of the Duke of Sutherland.

A duplicate of this picture long formed the chief ornament of the Leicester gallery.

The birth of Venus, and Fairies on the Sea-shore, Sir Matthew White Ridley.

The Solar System, Jesse Watts Russell. Of this subject the original was exhibited in 1796, as The Planets drawing light from the Sun ; a duplicate picture was painted for Mr. Morrison ; and an adaptation of the composition to a circle, 12 feet in diameter, decorates the ceiling of the Duchess of Sutherland's boudoir at Stafford House.

The House of Morpheus, the Earl of Egremont.

A series of pictures from Milton's Comus, of which Sabrina is the chief personage, and a Riposo, Mr. T. W. Budd.

The story of Pandora, and other works, in the Soane Museum.

A Lady in Florentine Costume, Lord Colbourne. Of this there is a duplicate in possession of Lord Kennedy, and a similar subject in the collection of Mr. Vernon.

Hebe feeding the bird of Jove, Love listening to the flatteries of Hope, Hylas carried off by the Nymphs, Venus carrying off Aescanius, The Moon unveiling her Light, and other subjects of a similar poetical character.

He also painted some fine landscapes, one of which, a View in Knowle Park, is in possession of the Earl of Egremont. When in Italy he joined Flaxman, and Deare, another sculptor of great ability, in making a set of accurate outlines of the most celebrated works of antique sculpture ; each corrected the other's sketch, until, like the lines of Apelles and Protogenes, the last was admitted to be perfect ; they were then traced off. Many of them remained in Mr. Howard's possession till his decease. On his return to England he was engaged on the series of finished drawings from antique sculpture for the Dilettanti Society, and in making designs for groups and bassi rilievi to be worked in silver. He was also extensively engaged in illustrating the Poets and Essayists for the publications of the day. His fame would have been more widely spread if some of his larger compositions of high poetical character (though all partook of that) had been engraved on an adequate scale : that is to be, when dogs have had their day.—As Professor of Painting at the Royal Academy, he delivered a course of lectures to the students, which are remarkable for the views they take of art in its higher qualities ; for the clearness with which the principles he lays down are explained and established ; for the elevated sentiments he endeavours to infuse into the minds of the students ; and for the elegance of the diction in which his instructions are conveyed.]

HOWARD, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1665. From the resemblance of his style to that of Hollar, it is probable he may have been a pupil of that master, though by no means equal to him in merit. He engraved, among other things, a set of sea views, with shipping, dated 1665. His plates are either signed with his name at length, or with the letters W. H. joined in a cipher WH.

[HOWITT, SAMUEL, a self-taught artist, distinguished for his skill in designing wild animals and the hunting of them, which he executed with great accuracy and spirit. He also etched several prints from his own drawings of sports, in a free and animated style. He died suddenly in 1822.]

HOY. See HOI.

HUBER, JOHN RODOLPH. This painter was born at Basle in 1668. He was the son of Alexis Huber, a member of the council of that place, and was taught drawing for his amusement. Persisting in his desire of becoming an artist, in 1682 he was placed under the tuition of Gaspar Meyer. On the death of that master he became a disciple of Joseph Werner, under whom he studied until he was nineteen, when his instructor advised him to visit Italy. He resided some time at Mantua, where he studied the works of Giulio Romano. He afterwards went to Verona and Venice, and finally visited Rome. A residence of six years in that capital, assiduously employed in well-directed study, rendered him an accomplished designer; and on his return to Switzerland, he met with immediate encouragement. He was engaged by the Margrave of Baden Dourlach to paint a large family picture, which he executed much to the satisfaction of his employer. In 1696 he was invited to Stutgard, and was appointed principal painter to the Duke of Wurtemberg, who employed him in several large historical subjects and ceilings for his palace. He was, however, principally occupied in portrait painting, in which his surprising facility obtained him the title of the Tintoretto of Switzerland. The number of portraits he is said to have painted is almost incredible. He was esteemed a very correct designer, and his pictures are vigorously coloured. He died in 1748.

HUBERT, FRANCIS, a modern French engraver, who flourished at Paris about the year 1780. He was a pupil of Beauvarlet, and engraved a variety of portraits, and other subjects. Among others,

La Nouvelle Heloise; after le Febvre.
Le Retour de la Nourrice; after Greuze.

HUBERTZ, C., a Dutch engraver of little note. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and engraved several plates for the History of the Bible, published at Amsterdam in 1720, from the designs of Picart and others.

HUCHTENBURG. See HUGTENBURG.

HUDSON, THOMAS, an English portrait painter, born in Devonshire in 1701. Mr. Hudson was the scholar of Jonathan Richardson, and became his son-in-law. After the death of his instructor, he was for several years the most occupied portrait painter of his time. He was the master of Sir Joshua Reynolds, who introduced a taste and style which put an end to his popularity; and he retired from the exercise of his profession. He died at his villa at Twickenham in 1779.

[HUE, J. F., a French landscape and marine painter. His subjects are principally of the latter kind, and exhibit storms, combats, moonlights, and sunsets; views of sea-ports and wrecks. He exhibited from the year 1800 to 1824; but he died previous to the exhibition in 1824. There are a few pictures by him of a poetical or historical character; and some of his landscapes may be deemed classical.]

HUGFORD, IGNATIUS. This painter was born at Florence, of English parents, in 1703. He painted history with some reputation. Lanzi speaks favourably of a picture by him in the church of S. Felicita, at Florence, representing St. Raphael. He also painted easel pictures of historical subjects; some of which are in the Florentine gallery. He was esteemed an intelligent judge of the works of the different masters.

HUGTENBURG, JOHN VAN. This celebrated battle-painter was born at Haerlem in 1646. He was a scholar of John Wyck, and on leaving that master went to Italy, where he passed two years. Returning through France to Holland, he remained some time at Paris, where a conformity of talent gave rise to an intimacy with Vandermeulen, who showed him great kindness, and assisted him with his advice. In 1670 Hugtenburg returned to Holland, and his works were the admiration of his countrymen. Prince Eugene employed him to paint the battles of his campaigns with the Duke of Marlborough in 1708 and 1709, several of which he has engraved. In 1711 the Elector Palatine invited him to his court, for whom he painted several pictures, and was honoured with a gold medal and chain. Hugtenburg surpassed Vandermeulen in the beauty of his touch, in which he sometimes approaches the admirable style of Philip Wowermans. His pictures possess great merit; his colouring is clear and vigorous, his pencil neat, and at the same time spirited, and his skies are light and floating. He was perfectly master of the delineation of the passions; and in his pictures the characters of rage, fear, pain, and despair, are represented with the most animated feeling. His observance of the costume is always appropriate; and the expression of his heads is as correctly characteristic of the different nations as their habiliments. John van Hugtenburg has considerable claim to our attention as an engraver. He etched a great number of plates, some of which he has strengthened with the graver. They are executed in a very spirited and masterly style; many of them are from his own compositions, and some are after the designs of Vandermeulen and other masters. In 1720 was published at the Hague, a large folio volume of military operations, with historical observations, by Du Mont. The plates were engraved by Hugtenburg, from his own designs, as expressed in the frontispiece, "De peintes, et graveés en taille douce par le Sieur Jean Hugtenburg." These are, however, inferior to his etchings. He also scraped some plates in mezzotinto; but he was not equally successful in that branch, and it is now difficult to meet with good impressions of them. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, and frequently with the ciphers

FB. or IVB. The following are his principal works:

- A Halt of Travellers, before a Forge; Hugtenburg, fecit. William III. reviewing the British Army near Arnheim; the same mark.
- A set of eight Battles, Skirmishes, and Marches; after Vandermeulen; marked with his cipher; ovals.
- Four Mountainous Landscapes; Vandermeulen, pinx. with cipher.
- A Halt of Sportsmen, in a landscape; the same mark.
- A Battle of Cavalry; dedicated to the Duke D'Enghien; the same.
- Another Battle of Cavalry; dedicated to the Duke de Chevreuse; the same.
- A View of Lisle, with the French Army; Vandermeulen, pinx. Hugtenburg et Baudouin, fec.
- The taking of Dole in Franche-Comté; same inscription; in two sheets.
- Louis XIV. with his Guards, passing the Pont-neuf; Vandermeulen, pinx. Hugtenburg, fecit.
- The Battle between the French and Germans in Italy; D. Hoogstraeten, inv. J. v. Hugtenburg, fec. et exc.; very fine.
- A Horse-Fair in Holland; dedicated to Prince Frederick William of Prussia; the same inscription; very fine.
- Several Battles, and other subjects, in mezzotinto.

John van Hugtenburg died in 1733.

HUGTENBURG, JAMES VAN, was the elder brother of the preceding artist, born at Haerlem in 1639, and was brought up in the school of Nicholas Berchem. Under that able master he made great proficiency; and on leaving his school travelled to Italy, and resided at Rome, where his talents met with encouragement, and it is probable the advantage of studying in that metropolis would have rendered him distinguished in the art; but he died young.

HULETT, JAMES, an indifferent English engraver, who flourished in the beginning of the last century. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and engraved several of the plates for Coetlogon's Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, and for the Life of Queen Anne, published by Walker. We have also the following portraits by him:

Mary, Queen of Scots; after Janet.
Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex.
Thomas Fairfax, Lord Fairfax.

HULETT, another obscure engraver, of whom nothing more is known than that he engraved the plates for one of the editions of Fielding's Joseph Andrews. He died in Clerkenwell in 1771.

[HULLE, ANSELM VAN, born at Ghent about 1605, and died in 1660, was an historical and portrait painter. At the Museum at Ghent is a Dead Christ on the knees of his Mother, which is by him.]

HULS, ESAIAS VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Middleburg, in Zealand. He is said by Professor Christ to have resided at Stutgard, where he published several grotesque engravings, drawn with much taste and accuracy. They are marked with his initials, E. V. H.

HULSBERG, HENRY, a Dutch engraver, was born at Amsterdam, but resided chiefly in London, where he was principally employed by the booksellers. His best works were architectural views and buildings, which he executed in a neat style, but without taste. He engraved several plates for the first volume of the Vitruvius Britannicus, and Sir Christopher Wren's Plans for St. Paul's. We have also by him a large view of St. Peter's church at Rome. He also engraved some portraits; among others, the following:

Sir Bulstrode Whitelocke.
Robert Warren, M. A., Rector of Bow.
Joseph Warder, physician.
Aaron Hill; prefixed to his History of the Ottoman Empire. 1711.

HULSE, or HULSIUS, FREDERICK, a German engraver, said to have been a native of Frankfort. He resided some time in London, where he worked for the booksellers. F. le Comte says he was a disciple of Theodore de Brye, and his style somewhat resembles that of his master. He engraved a variety of book ornaments; among others, the small quarto frontispieces, with figures, to Christopher Lever's History of the Defenders of the Catholic Faith, published in 1627; and the frontispiece to Lucan's Pharsalia, translated by May, 1631. We have also some portraits by him; among others,

George Carleton, Bishop of Chichester.
Nicholas ab Prambesarius, physician.

HULST, PETER VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1652, [and died in 1708.] He went early to Rome, where he attempted historical painting, but without success. He afterwards painted flowers, fruit, and reptiles, in the style of Mario di Fiori. It has been gravely asserted, "That he painted toads and frogs in perfection, and that his manner of design is entirely in the taste of the Italian school." [He was called Tournesol, because he generally painted a sun-flower in his pictures. His manner of painting is more in the Italian than the Dutch style.]

[HULSWIT, JOHN, born at Amsterdam in 1766, was an excellent designer of landscapes, river scenes, and animals. His drawings are more numerous than his paintings in oil; but of the latter he has left some beautiful specimens. He painted two for Louis Napoleon, king of Holland, which are now in the Musée at Amsterdam, and where there is also a landscape with a mill. He died in 1822.]

HUMBELOT, JAMES, an indifferent French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He engraved some plates after Le Brun, and other masters, in a stiff, tasteless style.

HUMPHREY, WILLIAM, an English engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1795. We have several portraits by him, among which are the following:

Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire; after Reynolds.
Doctor Arne; after Dunkarton.
Colonel Richard King; after Kneller.
William Broomfield, Surgeon.

HUMPHRY, OZIAS. This eminent artist was born at Honiton, in Devonshire, September 8, 1742, and was educated at the grammar school in that town, under the direction of the Reverend Richard Lewis, M. A., until he had completed his fourteenth year. His passion for drawing had been early and ardent, and his parents, yielding to his earnest importunity, sent him to London, where he frequented the drawing school of Mr. William Shipley, and profited by studying the plaster casts from the antique statues, &c., then recently imported from Italy, and made public for the benefit of students, by the liberal munificence of the late Duke of Richmond. He prosecuted these studies about three years, when the death of his father rendered it necessary for him to return to Devonshire. He was at that time particularly desirous of being placed with Sir Joshua Reynolds; but circumstances did not permit the gratification of his wishes, and he was engaged with Mr. Samuel Collins, a miniature painter of some eminence at Bath, with whom he resided two years, when his instructor removed to Dublin, and Mr. Humphry succeeded him in his professional situation in that city. In the year 1763 he was encouraged and invited by Sir Joshua Reynolds to settle himself in London near him, which he accordingly resolved upon, and accomplished the following year.

In 1766, he exhibited at Spring Gardens a portrait, in miniature, of John Mealing, the old and well-known model of the Royal Academy, which was universally noticed, and admired, and was purchased by his Majesty, who was graciously pleased to reward him for it by a present of one hundred guineas; and, as a further encouragement, he had the honour to paint a large miniature of the Queen, with other branches of the royal family. He continued to practise this line of art with almost unexampled success, until the year 1772, when a fall from his horse gave his head so violent a shock, and impaired his whole nervous system so much, that he was unable to pursue his profession of miniature painting with the same efficacy that he had hitherto done. By the advice of his friends, he was induced to endeavour to extend the scale of his practice, and with this intention he resolved to pass a few years in Italy, not only for the reason just stated, but with the hope of general improvement in his profession. He left England in 1773, accompanied by his friend Romney, and proceeded to Rome, where, and in the neighbourhood, he resided four years. In this situation, though surrounded by advantages, he had still many difficulties to contend with, for his time had been so entirely engrossed by miniature painting, that he had little or no practice in oil, and had the whole process to discover.

In 1777, Mr. Humphry returned to his native country, where he established himself, painting generally in oil, until the commencement of the year 1785, when he embarked for India. It was suggested to him, on his arrival at Calcutta, that the field was the most open to him in miniature, and that it would be advisable for him to confine himself to that branch of his profession. He visited the courts of Moorshedabad, Benares, and Lucknow, where he painted several large miniatures of princes, nabobs, and rajahs, and many other persons of high distinction. His ill state of health, however, obliged him to return to England in 1788, where he resumed his original line of miniature painting, and the following spring exhibited several pictures, which were greatly admired, and confirmed his former reputation.

In the year 1790, Mr. Humphry was elected a member of the Royal Academy. His sight was now so much affected, that he was obliged to relinquish miniature painting, and he made some experiments in crayons, to which his studies in Italy were eminently conducive, and in which he succeeded to the utmost of his wishes. To this line of painting he now devoted all his attention, and was for some time considered at the head of that province of the art. Having completed the portraits of the Prince and Princess of Orange, in the year 1797, his sight completely failed him, and these were his last productions. The remainder of his life was passed at Knightsbridge till within a few months of his death, which took place on the 9th of March, 1810, when he had nearly completed his 68th year. As an artist, Mr. Humphry possessed considerable genius, which he improved by the most exemplary assiduity, and an attentive study of the best models. His design is tasteful and correct, and his colouring, especially in his miniatures and crayon paintings, is universally rich and harmonious.

HUQUIER, JAMES GABRIEL, a French engraver and printseller, born at Orleans in 1695. He engraved a great number of plates, after Watteau, Boucher, and other masters, in a slight, mannered style. Among others, the following :

The Five Senses; after Watteau.

The Temple of Diana, and the Temple of Neptune; after the same.

The Triumph of Galatea, and a Shepherd caught in a Storm; after the same.

Four Pastoral subjects of the Seasons; after the same.

The Four Elements; after the same.

A large Pastoral subject; after Boucher.

The Five Senses; after the same.

The Four Seasons; after the same.

HUQUIER, GABRIEL, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris about the year 1725, and was a pupil of his father. He painted portraits in crayons, and engraved some plates after Boucher, among which are the following :

Le Repos champêtre.

Le Sommeil, et le Réveil.

Two Corps de Gardes.

A Girl with a Bird, and the Infant Travellers; a pair.

HURET, GREGORY, a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1610. "This artist," says M. Watelet, "merits, as a designer and engraver, a better reputation than he enjoys. His compositions are ingenious, his heads expressive, and his draperies well cast. As an engraver, without placing him in the rank of the great burinists, he possessed a sufficient command of the graver to accomplish every essential effect." We have by him a variety of portraits and other subjects, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Pierre Seguier, Chancellor of France; Greg. Huret, fec.
François de Bonne, Duke de Lesdiguières; after Dumoulier.

Jacques Bouceau, Sieur de la Baranderie; after A. D. Vries.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A set of thirty-two, of the Life and Passion of our Saviour.
The Stoning of Stephen.

St. Peter preaching.

The Holy Family, with St. Catherine.

Christ crowned with Thorns.

[HUSSEY, GILES, was born at Marnhull, in Dorsetshire, in 1710, and descended from a very ancient family. He commenced his studies with Richardson, but left him for Damini, a Venetian artist, with whom he went to Italy, where he was robbed of all his property by his master. He was, however, relieved from this distress, and enabled to prosecute his studies at Bologna and Rome for several years. Not being satisfied with the instruction he received, he aimed at establishing some fixed principles; this led him in search of a theory; which ended in his adopting the ancient hypothesis of musical, or harmonic, proportions, as being the governing principle of beauty, in all forms producible by art, and even by nature. Delighted with this discovery, as he thought it, he continued his studies at Rome, with increasing pleasure and reputation. In 1737 he returned to England, but did not settle in London till 1742. He was now obliged to submit to paint portraits for a subsistence, and to experience the opposition of his professional brethren, whose envy was excited by his masterly and graceful performances. This treatment affected his spirits, and he left London for his native place, where, in 1773, by the death of his brother, he succeeded to the family estate, and lived a retired life till 1788, when he died at Beeston, near Ashburton, in Devonshire. The great merit of Hussey's pencil drawings from life, consists in his preserving the characteristic likenesses; and with respect to those of mere fancy, perhaps no man ever exceeded him in accuracy, elegance, and beauty. His academical drawings at Bologna are still shown there on account of their superior excellence. Barry was his zealous eulogist, and spoke of him with enthusiasm.]

HUTER, SIMON, a German artist, who flourished about the year 1560. He engraved very neatly on wood, and executed several cuts from the designs of Justus Amman. His prints are by no means devoid of merit. They are usually marked with the cipher

SH. He executed, conjointly with Virgilius Solis, part of a set of small cuts for the History of the Bible; also, in conjunction with Justus Amman, part of the small prints for a work, entitled Neuwe Biblisch Figuren, printed at Frankfort, 1564, from the designs of Justus Amman.

HUTIN, FRANCIS and CHARLES. These brothers were natives of France, and flourished at Paris about the year 1760. They etched several plates in a slight, mannered style; among others,

The Seven Works of Mercy; from their own designs.

The Twelve Apostles; the same.

Apollo and Daphne; after de Troy.

HUYBERTS, C., a Dutch engraver, who resided in England about the year 1696. He engraved some anatomical subjects for a work, entitled Johannis Gaubii Epist. Prob. prima ad Fed. Ruyschium, M. D., 1696. He also engraved the Triumph of Julius Cæsar, nine plates, after Andrea Mantegna.

HUYS, or HUS, PETER, an old Flemish engraver, who resided at Antwerp about the year 1571; by him we have some small plates of scriptural subjects, and the prints in a work called Monumenta Humane Salutis, by Arius Montanus. 1571.

HUYSMAN, or HOUSEMAN, CORNELIUS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1648. He was the son of an eminent architect, who purposed bringing him up to his own profession, but dying when he was very young, he was placed under the tuition of Gaspar de Wit. The landscapes of Jacques Artois were then in the highest estimation, and Huysman went to Brussels for the purpose of studying under that master. The fine forest of Soignes, in the vicinity of that city, was the scene of his studies, and his pictures represent the most interesting views of it. He afterwards settled at Mechlin, where he resided the remainder of his life, and is generally called Huysman of Mechlin. His landscapes are painted in a great style, and partake more of the atmosphere of Italy than his own country. His pencil is uncommonly bold and firm, and his colouring rich and harmonious. He embellished the fore-grounds of his pictures with plants, and the foliage of his trees is light and spirited. His pictures are decorated with figures and cattle, well drawn, and pleasingly grouped. He died in 1727. [It is to be regretted that his pictures have become very dark; they exhibit a reddish-brown appearance, which has considerably diminished their value. Otherwise they are masterly productions.]

HUYSMAN, or HOUSEMAN, JAMES. This painter, who was also a native of Antwerp, in 1656, was probably related to the foregoing artist. He was a scholar of Giles Backereel, and proved a reputable painter of history and portrait. He visited England in the reign of Charles II., and met with great encouragement, notwithstanding Sir Peter Lely was then in the height of his fame. Among the beauties at Windsor is the portrait of a lady, which is little inferior to those by Sir Peter. He painted a very beautiful portrait of the Duchess of Richmond, in the habit of a cavalier in the time of the civil war; buff, with blue ribands. The picture is in the palace of Kensington. He died in London in 1696. [The portrait of Izaak Walton, in the National Gallery, is the most accessible for those that are desirous of knowing his style of painting.]

HUYSUM, JUSTUS VAN, THE ELDER, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1659. He was educated under Nicholas Berghem, and gave proof of considerable ability on leaving that master. He was not content with confining himself to painting landscapes and animals; he attempted history, portrait, battles, sea-pieces, and flowers, and the versatility of his talent rendered him respectable in all. He would probably have established a more solid reputation by attaching himself to one particular branch. His pictures of flowers and fruit appear to have been the most esteemed of his works; and from his success in them, it is probable that his son was induced to pursue a similar walk in the art, in which he greatly surpassed his father. Justus van Huysum died in 1716.

HUYSUM, JOHN VAN. This celebrated flower-painter was the eldest son of the preceding artist, born at Amsterdam in 1682. He was instructed in the art by his father, and it was not long before he could dispense with his assistance. The talent of flower-painting has been considered by many as a very inferior department of the art; it has nevertheless raised the reputation of John van Huysum to a brilliant rank among the painters of his country. Having seen some of the best productions of de Heem and Mignon, he was ambitious of surpassing them, by an attentive study of nature in the most beautiful flowers, and the most delicious fruits, of which his pictures exhibit a most delicate selection. His taste in the arrangement of his groups is superior to every other artist in his walk; and though his pictures appear to be so exquisitely finished, that they may be said to rival the velvet softness of nature; his touch, though precious, is broad and facile. The fame of Van Huysum rose to the highest pitch, and the most curious florists of Holland were ambitious of supplying him with their choicest flowers for the materials of his pictures. He usually arranged them in elegant vases, of which the ornaments and bas-relief were finished in the most polished and beautiful manner. His fruit-pieces, though admirable, are inferior to his flowers. Those painted on a clear or yellow ground are most esteemed, and are distinguished from his early works, which are usually on a dark one, by a superior style of pencilling, and a more harmonious colour. He frequently introduced a bird's nest, with eggs, into his pictures, which, with the insects, butterflies, dew-drops, &c., are represented with a truth and precision that is perfect illusion. John van Huysum also distinguished himself as a landscape painter. His pictures of that description are painted in imitation of those of Glauber and Laresse, and are more estimable for the neatness of their execution than originality of style or truth of colouring. He died in 1749.

HUYSUM, JUSTUS VAN, THE YOUNGER, was the younger brother of John van Huysum, born at Amsterdam about the year 1684. It does not appear that he had any particular instruction; but he painted battle-pieces with extraordinary spirit and facility, and would probably have acquired a great reputation in those subjects, had he not been cut off in the bloom of life, at the age of 22.

HUYSUM, JACOB VAN. This artist was the younger son of Justus van Huysum the elder, born at Amsterdam about the year 1680. His chief merit consisted in copying and imitating the precious pictures of John van Huysum, which he did so successfully, that they have sometimes been mistaken for the works of that master. He came to England in 1721, and would have been thought an excellent painter in his way, if some of the pictures of his brother had not preceded him. He did not always servilely copy the works of John, but painted similar subjects from his own designs, which, though less finished, and less delicately coloured, are not without great merit. He died in 1746. [Jacob van Huysum could not have been the younger son of Justus van Huysum, if John was born in 1682, and he in 1680. Balkema says he was born in 1687; Nagler, that he died in 1740.]

HYLE, FRANCIS. This artist is mentioned by Basan as an English engraver, by whom we have several portraits, after Kneller, and other masters.

I AND J

JACKSON, JOHN BAPTIST, an English engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1740. Early in life he went to Paris, and worked some time for Papillon, but not meeting with much encouragement he went to Venice, where he executed several wooden cuts, in imitation of the drawings of the great masters, with considerable success. He also engraved several book ornaments and vignettes. Among his single prints is a Descent from the Cross, after Rembrandt, executed in a very spirited style; but his principal work was a set of seventeen large cuts in chiaro-scuro, published at Venice by Gio. Bat. Pasquali in 1745, entitled Titiani Vecellii, Pauli Caliari, Jacobi Robusti, et Jacobi de Ponte, opera selectiora, a Joanne Baptista Jackson, Anglo, ligno caelata, et coloribus adumbrata. Among these are the following:

- St. Peter Martyr; after Titian.
- The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after the same.
- The Martyrdom of St. Mark; after Pintoretto.
- The Murder of the Innocents; after the same.
- The Presentation in the Temple; after P. Veronese.
- The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.
- Christ praying in the Garden; after Basan.
- The Entombing of Christ; after the same.
- The Raising of Lazarus; after the same.

[JACKSON, JOHN, an English portrait painter, was born at Lastingham, a small village in the North Riding of Yorkshire, in 1778. His father was a village tailor, and he was awhile of that unambitious occupation. It is believed that his first instructions in art were from the village schoolmaster. At the age of nineteen he ventured to offer himself as a miniature painter at York, and had the good fortune to obtain the patronage of Lord Mulgrave and the Earl of Carlisle. At Castle Howard he had the advantage of studying a magnificent collection of pictures, which was in itself a school; there he copied Caracci's picture of the Three Marys. He was also befriended by Sir G. Beaumont. After going through the usual routine of study at the Royal Academy, and being successfully employed in painting and copying portraits for Cadell's publication of "Illustrious Persons," for which he made the drawings, he was elected an associate of the Academy in 1816; and two years afterwards a full member. He painted the portraits of many distinguished persons; but that of Canova obtained the greatest notice. His style of painting was masculine, true without flattery; such as persons of good sense would admire, and skilful judges in the art approve. It was not, like that of Lawrence, fitted only for the fashion and taste of the day; he attended to the character of the person, and was not very solicitous about the work of the tailor or milliner. He did not seem to understand, or would not represent, the affected graces and nauseous airs of what is called polished life; and he may be considered as one of the most honest of all the children of flattery. He had an uncommon readiness of hand; his colouring was clear and splendid, and he resembled Sir Joshua Reynolds more than any other artist has done since his day. There is in the church at Lastingham a copy, made by him, of the famous picture by Correggio, which is in the possession of the Duke of Wellington, which he presented to the place of his nativity, with the sum of fifty pounds to improve the situation in which it was to be placed. He died in 1831.]

JACKSON, ROBERT, an English engraver, mentioned by Mr. Thoresby in his Ducatus Leodensis. He is said to have engraved some portraits in mezzotinto, a wooden cut of Algernon Sidney, &c.

JACOB, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Lisieux, in Normandy, in 1712. He went young to Paris, and was first a pupil of Gerard Scotin the younger. He was afterwards instructed by John Andran. His works are not numerous, nor are they much esteemed. His drawing is incorrect, and his heads want both character and expression. We have, among others, the following by him:

- Perseus and Andromeda; after P. Veronese; for the Crozat collection.
- The Departure of the Israelites from Egypt; after the same; for the same collection.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after the same; for the same.
- Rebecca meeting the Servant of Abraham; after the same.

JACOBE, JOHN, a German mezzotinto engraver, born at Vienna in 1733. He visited London for the purpose of improvement, where he scraped a few plates. He engraved a great variety of prints after his return to Germany. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

- George Sackville Germaine, Viscount Sackville; after Reynolds.
- Mary, Countess of Corke; after the same.
- Joseph Adam, reigning prince of Schwarzenberg; after Kollonitz.
- Elizabeth, Princess of Wurtemberg Stuttgart. 1783.
- Carlo Antonio Martini; after Moesner.
- Francis Ferd. Schroetter; after Donat.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

- The Academy of Vienna, with the Portraits of the members; after Guadali.
- A Bull attacked by Dogs; after Rhein.
- A Stag-hunt, by moonlight; after Casanova.
- A Tiger killed by the Prince of Nassau-Siegen; after the same.

[JACOBELLO DEL FIORE. See FIORE, JACOBELLO DEL.]

JACOBONI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Florence about the year 1760. He engraved several plates for the Museo Fiorentino. The following are by him:

- An Angel protecting a Child from an Evil Genius; after A. Sacchi.
- The Holy Family; after Raffaele.
- The Virgin and Infant; after Seba, Conca.
- St. Fidelis de Simaringa; after the same.

JACOBS, LUCAS. See LEYDEN, LUCAS VAN.

JACOBS, SIMON, a Dutch portrait painter, born at Gouda in 1520. He was a scholar of Charles d'Ypres. His style was peculiarly adapted to the branch of art he made choice of; his colouring was pure and brilliant, his touch free and decided, and he drew very correctly. This artist was killed at the siege of Haerlem in 1572. [The branch of art he made choice of was portraiture; for there is nothing else mentioned as by him.]

JACOBSZ, C. PHILIP, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1767. He engraved several plates representing views in and near Amsterdam, which are executed in a neat, pleasing style.

JACOBSZ, HUBERT, called GRIMANI, a Dutch portrait painter, born at Delft in 1599. Having learned the rudiments of art in his own country, he went to Venice, where he studied with attention the works of Titian, and became an excellent colourist. His talents recommended him to the patronage of the Doge Grimani, in whose employment he passed nine years, and was usually called by the name of Grimani. He afterwards returned to Holland, where he followed his profession with great reputation. He died at the Briel in 1628 or 1629.

JACOBSZ, JURIAEN. This painter was born at Hamburg in 1610. He visited Antwerp when young, where he entered the school of Francis Snyders. Like his celebrated master, he excelled in painting huntings and combats of animals, which were designed and painted with all the fire and spirit which those subjects require; and, according to Descamps, his pictures of that description are little inferior to those of Snyders. He was also a very respectable painter of history and portraits. His works are principally at Amsterdam, where he resided several years, and was greatly respected. He died in 1664.

JACOBUS, an old German engraver on wood, who flourished as early as the year 1480. His principal works were sixteen or eighteen cuts of the Life of Christ, some of which are signed with his name, Opus Jacobi. Papillon mentions a large upright engraving by this artist; he says it belonged to a set of prints representing the history of Rome, in allegorical figures, and adds, that it was well executed.

JACONE. This painter was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1525. He was a friend and coadjutor of Andrea del Sarto, and assisted that master in some of his works. Vasari describes him as a bold, but a fantastical designer, and extravagant and outrageous in his attitudes. His best works were imitations of the style of del Sarto, and some pictures in the churches at Cortona. He died in 1555.

JACOPSEN, H., a Flemish engraver, who lived about the year 1620. He engraved a set of plates, chiefly portraits, for a History of the Netherlands, published in that year.

JACQUART, ANTOINE DE. This artist was probably a native of France; he is said by F. le Comte to have engraved small vignettes, with figures and grotesque ornaments, which he usually marked with the letters A. D. I. F.

[JÄGER, GERARD DE, a native of Dort, flourished about 1646. He painted marine subjects, and was particularly excellent in the representation of still water.]

JÄGER, R., an obscure engraver, from his name probably a Dutchman, by whom we have an indifferent etching, representing the Fleets of Spain and Holland, without a date.

JAMESONE, GEORGE. This eminent painter was styled the Vandyck of Scotland, to which honourable title he had a double pretension, not only for having surpassed all his countrymen as a portrait painter, but from his pictures being sometimes attributed to that master. George Jamesone was the son of Andrew Jamesone, an architect, born at Aberdeen in 1586. It is not known at what time he went abroad, nor how long he remained on the continent; but he resided some time at Antwerp, where he had the advantage of studying in the school of Rubens, at the time when Vandyck was also his disciple. On his return to Scotland he was much employed in painting portraits, both in oil and in miniature; and occasionally painted both history and landscape. His largest portraits were generally somewhat less than life. The excellence of Jamesone consisted in delicacy and softness, a clear and brilliant colouring, without much shadow; principles he acquired in the great school in which he was educated. When Charles I. visited Scotland in 1633, the magistrates of Edinburgh employed Jamesone to make designs of the Scottish monarchs, with which the king was so much pleased, that inquiring for the artist, he sat to him, and presented him with a diamond ring from his finger. There are many of the works of Jamesone in the mansions of the nobility of Scotland; but the greatest collection of them is at Taymouth, in the possession of the Earl of Breadalbane. The portrait of Jamesone, by himself, is in the Florentine gallery of painters. Though the works of this estimable painter are little known in England, his merit is highly and justly esteemed in his own country. Arthur Johnston, the poet, addressed to him an elegant epigram on his picture of the Marchioness of Huntley; and after his death, which happened in 1644, at Edinburgh, a Latin elegy was published by David Wedderburne.

JAMITZER, or JAMNITZER, BARTHOLOMEW, a German engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, resided at Nuremberg, and flourished about the year 1547. He is said by that author to have engraved some plates, which he marked with his initials, and the date, but he has not specified the subjects. [Zani says that he worked in 1571.]

JAMITZER, or JAMNITZER, CHRISTOPHER, was probably of the same family, born at Nuremberg about the year 1560. He published a set of grotesque subjects in 1600, etched with lightness and spirit. We have also by him the following. His mark is .

His own Portrait, studying perspective.

A set of twelve plates of the Sports of Children.

A set of twelve, of Children mounted on Sea Monsters.

Four plates of Children, with the Wings of a Bat.

A Dance of four Children round a Tree.

A set of six Grotesque subjects.

[There are prints by him with the date 1610.]

JAMPICOLI. See GIAMPICOLI.

JAN, LANGEN. See BOCKHORST.

[JANET, FRANÇOIS, who is also known by the name of Clouet, a French portrait painter of the time of Francis the First, Henry the Second, Francis the Second, Charles the Ninth, and Henry the Third of France, drew and painted numerous portraits of the most eminent persons of the courts of those monarchs. Many of them are in England, particularly at Castle Howard, where there are no less than eighty-eight executed in black and white chalk, in the manner of Holbein. His pictures in oil are very elaborately finished; copies of several have been multiplied of late years in London, so skilfully executed as to deceive the unwary.]

JANOTA, JOHN GEORGE. This artist was a native of Bohemia in 1747. When young, he was taken under the protection of the Prince of Lichtenstein, who sent him to study in Italy. Soon after his return he was admitted a member of the Imperial Academy of Vienna. He engraved some portraits, and several plates, from the pictures in the Lichtenstein gallery. Among others the following:

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Joseph II.

The Archduke Maximilian.

SUBJECTS.

Bust of a young Man; after Rembrandt.

Christ hearing his Cross; after Leonardo da Vinci.

St. Catherine of Siena praying; after Aless. Allori.

The Funeral Pomp of Joseph Wenceslas, Prince of Lichtenstein.

JANSON, JACOB, a Dutch painter, who flourished about the year 1785. He resided at Leyden, and painted landscapes and cattle, in which he imitated the finished style of Paul Potter. He etched a few plates from his own designs; among which is a landscape with a cow and two sheep, executed with neatness and spirit. [His pictures are very pleasing; but they resemble Paul Potter only in the subjects. He copied one or two of Potter's very well.]

[JANSON, JOHN CHRISTIAN, son of Jacob Janson, was born in 1763. He was instructed in painting by his father, but preferring a military life, he entered the service in 1795, and made several campaigns in Germany; he there made many studies after nature; and on the union of Holland with France, left the army (in which he had arrived at the grade of captain of Artillery) and settled at the Hague. He painted landscapes with cattle and figures, winter scenes, and various other subjects. His pictures were held in estimation, and are occasionally found in good collections.]

[JANSON, PETER, brother of the preceding, born in 1768, also followed for a time the military profession, but being seriously wounded he retired, with the pension of a Major, and settled at Arnheim, where he occupied himself in painting, after nature, landscapes and cattle, that were in great favour with the amateurs of his time, and are really very pleasing.]

JANSEN, CORNELIUS, improperly called JOHNSON. This eminent portrait painter was born at Amsterdam in or about the year 1590. He had already reached considerable celebrity in his own country, when he visited England in 1618. He met with very flattering encouragement, and was taken into the service of James I., whose portrait he painted several times. His pictures are distinguished by a neat finish, and a clear style of colouring. They are generally painted on board, are featured by a fair character of nature, and somewhat stiff and formal, are remarkable for a truth and tranquillity in the countenances, which is peculiar to him. One of his finest portraits was that of Sir George Villiers, father of the famous Duke of Buckingham, one of his hands resting on a greyhound, painted with as much spirit as the animals of Snyders. Jansen was less employed after the arrival of Vandyck; although he remained in England until 1648, as appears by his passport, recorded in the Journals of the House of Commons, dated 10th October, 1648. He returned to Holland, and died at Amsterdam in 1665. [The portrait of John Milton that belonged to Thomas Hollis, and of which there is an engraving by Cipriani, was by Jansen. It was painted when Milton was only ten years old, consequently in the first year of Jansen's arrival in England.]

JANSENS, ABRAHAM, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1569. He was endowed with an extraordinary genius; his first efforts surpassed those of every competitor, and he became one of the most celebrated painters of his time. He painted several distinguished historical pictures for the churches in Flanders, which justly entitle him to an elevated rank among the able artists of the Flemish school. His compositions and his design possess the judgment and the fire of the greatest masters, supported by an admirable colour, and an intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro. With such powers he had acquired a brilliant reputation, when the extraordinary talents of Rubens began to display themselves, and the transcendancy of his success is said to have excited in Janssens a disgust, which threw him into dissipation and excesses that impaired his fortune and injured his reputation. Confident in his own ability, but not sufficiently appreciating that of his rival, he had the imprudence to send a defiance to Rubens to paint a picture in opposition to him, when he was in the very zenith of his fame. Rubens declined the challenge in the most dignified manner, observing, that he would readily accept the proposal, when Janssens had proved himself worthy of becoming his competitor, and that in the mean time, the public was sure to do ample justice to them both. There are many fine pictures by Abraham Janssens in the churches in Flanders. At Antwerp, in the church of the Carmelites, is an altar-piece by him of the Entombing of Christ, and another of the Virgin and Child, with St. Catherine, St. Cecilia, and other Saints. In the cathedral at Ghent, an Ecce Homo, and a Descent from the Cross, finely composed, and of the grandest effect. In the gallery of the Elector Palatine, is one of his most capital works, representing the Raising of Lazarus. [The time of his death is not exactly known; some place it in 1631, others in 1650.]

JANSENS, H., a Flemish engraver, by whom we have some plates of ornaments for goldsmiths and jewellers, enriched with figures and other embellishments, executed in a neat and delicate style. Some of his prints are from his own designs, and others after H. Tangers and other masters.

JANSENS, J. ALEXANDER, a Flemish engraver, who was probably related to Victor Honorius Janssens, the painter mentioned in a following article. We have by him a set of plates of subjects from the life of Achilles, after pictures by that artist, finely composed, with a commanding effect of light and shadow; they are etched in a neat, free style.

JANSENS, PETER, a Dutch painter on glass, born at Amsterdam in 1612. He was a scholar of John van Bronckhorst, a celebrated artist in that branch. He executed several windows in the churches of Holland, from his own compositions, which were greatly admired. His compositions are ingenious, and he was a correct designer. He died in 1672. According to Le Comte, he engraved some plates of devotional subjects, and images of the Virgin.

JANSENS, VICTOR HONORIUS. This painter was born at Brussels in 1664. He was the son of a tailor, who intended to bring him up to his own business, but showing a disposition for the art, his father was induced to place him under the care of an indifferent painter, named Volders, under whom he studied seven years, and even with this subordinate instruction, he made a progress that surpassed all his contemporaries. On leaving his master, he discovered an ability which recommended him to the notice of the Duke of Holstein, who invited him to his court, and appointed him his painter, with a considerable salary. After passing four years in the employment of that prince, he solicited and obtained his permission to visit Italy; and the liberality of his patron supplied him with the means of undertaking the journey. He prosecuted his studies at Rome with great assiduity, and soon distinguished himself as a ready and correct designer. He formed an intimacy with Tempesta, and frequently painted the figures in his landscapes. The desire of revisiting his native country induced him to leave Rome, where he was in full employment and reputation, and he returned to Brussels. He had hitherto confined himself to small or easel pictures; but he was now called upon to exert his talents on a larger scale, being commissioned to paint several altar-pieces for the churches at Brussels, and the other cities of Brabant. In 1718 he was invited to Vienna, and was made painter to the Emperor of Germany. After a residence of three years at Vienna, M. Descamps informs us that he visited London; but no mention is made of him in the Anecdotes. Among the most esteemed of his large pictures are, St. Roch curing the Diseased, in the church of St. Nicholas, at Brussels; and St. Charles Borromeus interceding with the Virgin for the persons infected with the plague, in the church of the Carmelites. Janssens possessed a ready and inventive genius; his design is tolerably correct, and there is a melting tenderness in his tones that approaches the best colourists of his country. The expression of his heads is graceful and expressive, particularly in his easel pictures, which are preferable to his larger works. He died in 1739. [He excelled in the representation of gay assemblages of belles and beaux, in the cumbrous paraphernalia of the time, dancing, or employed in amatory conversation. His cavaliers and damsels act by the card, and sustain the airs of persons of quality. It is by such pictures he is best-known in England, and they are really lively and pleasing compositions, not so polished as those of Watteau, but having more the appearance of real life and manners.]

JANSZ, EGBERT, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. We have by him a set of small prints, entitled, Icones venantium species varias, &c., 1663, after Antonia Tempesta. He worked chiefly with the graver, in a style somewhat resembling that of Crispin de Passe.

JARDIN, or JARDYN, KAREL DU. This charming painter was born at Amsterdam in 1640. He was a disciple of Nicholas Berghem, and was unquestionably the ablest scholar of that celebrated master. With the advantage of such instruction, his progress was extraordinary; and to perfect himself he travelled to Italy when he was yet very young. On his arrival at Rome he was received with distinction into the Bentevogel society, where they conferred on him the title of Barbe de Bouc. His studies were as assiduous and constant as his attendance on the convivialities of the society; and his pictures rose into great estimation at Rome, where they were admired beyond those of any artist of his country. After a residence of several years at Rome he returned to Holland, where his pictures were not less admired than they had been in Italy, and he met with great employment. Notwithstanding this flattering encouragement, his desire of revisiting Italy prevailed, and he embarked for Venice, where he died soon after his arrival, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. The pictures of Du Jardin are more conformable to the taste of Italy than that of Holland, and they generally exhibit a warmth and brilliancy of atmosphere, which are entirely Italian. His skies are clear and sparkling, and his landscapes are always of the most pleasing scenery. They are decorated with charming figures and animals, in which, to the truth and finish of Paul Potter, he unites a taste which is not found in the works of that celebrated cattle painter. As he died young, and his pictures are highly wrought up, they are scarce, and are very valuable. Karel du Jardin has left us about fifty-two admirable etchings of landscapes, figures, and animals. They are executed with uncommon taste and spirit; his point is extremely playful, yet determined, and manifests the hand of the great painter. They are sometimes signed with his name at length, and sometimes with the initials K. D. I. or K. D. V. I. fec., with the date. As these interesting prints are not very rare, a particular detail of them is not judged necessary. [His pictures obtain extraordinary high prices; one called "Le Passage du Gué," or Passing the Ford, sold in Count Perregaux's sale for 26,500 francs; and others in England for sums that may be considered enormous. Several of his pictures may be seen in the museums at the Hague and at Amsterdam. For descriptions of 150 pictures by him, see Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. v. and Supplement.]

JARDINIER, CLAUDE DONAT, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1726. He was first instructed by Nicholas Dupuis, but was afterwards a pupil of Lawrence Car's. His plates are executed with the graver in a firm and agreeable style. We have the following, among others, by him:

The Virgin and Child; after the picture by C. Maratti; in the Dresden collection.

The Genius of Glory and Honour, represented by a figure in the air, holding a crown, surrounded by Cherubs; after An. Caracci.

A Mother, with three Children; after Greuze.

A Girl sleeping; after the same.

Two Soldiers playing at Cards; after Valentin.

[JARVIS, JOHN WESLEY, a nephew of the great John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was born at South Shields in 1780. He was protected by his uncle until he was five years old, when he was sent to his father, who had emigrated to Philadelphia, in America. Dunlap, in his account of the American painters, describes him as an artist of astonishing powers, but unfortunately of the most depraved habits. His skill, as a painter, lay in portraiture; but his biographer deals too much in generals, and comparisons with other American painters, to enable Europeans to judge of the real extent of his talents. He delights too in dwelling on his depravities, until the account becomes disgusting; and the attempts at wit, both of the writer and his subject, excite contempt. As far as can be collected from Dunlap's account, Jarvis died, or ceased in his artistic career, in 1834.]

throw ridicule on the artist, who, as such, was very respectable. He died in 1817.]

JEURAT, EDMÉ, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1680. He was a pupil of Bernard Picart. This artist possessed the talent of expressing in his prints the peculiar style of the painter from whose work he engraved. His drawing is tolerably correct, and his execution is bold and free, with a fine effect of light and shadow. The following are his principal plates :

The Portrait of Peter Puget, called the Michael Angelo of France; after Puget the younger.
The Meeting of David and Ahigail; after N. Vleughel.
The Resurrection; after the same.
Thetis plunging Achilles into the Styx; after the same.
Telemachus in the Island of Calypso; after the same.
The Triumph of Mordecai; after le Clerc.
Christ among the Doctors; after the same.
Achilles discovered among the Daughters of Lycomedes; after the same.
St. John Baptist baptizing the Jews; after N. Poussin.
Pan and Syrinx; after P. Mignard.
The dead Christ on the knees of the Virgin; after le Brun.
The Interview between Jacob and Rachel; after P. F. Mola; for the Crozat collection; very fine.
The Repose in Egypt; after the same; for the same collection.
The Finding of Moses; after P. Veronese; for the same; fine.

JEURAT, ETIENNE. Mr. Strutt has been led into an error in respect to this artist, by the mistake of Basan. He states him to have been an engraver, and attributes to him three plates which are well known to have been executed by Edme Jeurat, mentioned in the preceding article. Etienne Jeurat was a painter, and became a member of the French Academy in 1743. He painted history and domestic subjects; but I believe he never engraved. He made the designs for a set of plates for Fontaine's Fables, which were engraved by Edme Jeurat about the year 1736.

JEFFERIES, JAMES. This artist was born at Maidstone, in Kent, about the year 1757. He was the son of a coach painter, who sent him to London, where he was placed under the tuition of Mr. Woollet, the engraver, but he afterwards applied himself to painting, and became a student of the Royal Academy. In 1773 he obtained the gold medal given annually, at that time, for the best historical picture; and in 1775 was sent to Rome, on the pension of that establishment.

After a residence of four years in Italy he returned to England, and in 1783 exhibited a picture, representing the destruction of the Floating Batteries before Gibraltar, which was much admired, and was engraved by Mr. Woollet. This promising artist died of a deep decline, in 1784.

JEGHER, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver on wood, born about the year 1590. He resided chiefly at Antwerp, where his merit recommended him to the particular notice of Rubens, who employed him to execute several wooden cuts from his designs, which he intended to publish. They are cut in a bold, free style, with spirited strokes, in imitation of the cross hatchings with a pen, and produce a very powerful effect. After the death of Rubens, Jegher purchased the greater part of the blocks, and republished the prints on his own account. He also worked after the designs of other masters; and among others, a Crucifixion; after F. Frank; dated 1637. The following are all after Rubens; the best impressions are with the name of Rubens as the publisher, those with the name of Jegher substituted are the second, and less valuable.

The Bust of a Man, with a thick beard; in chiaro-scuro. Susanua and the Elders.
The Repose in Egypt.
The infant Jesus and St. John playing with a Lamb.
The Coronation of the Virgin.
Christ tempted by Satan.
Hercules destroying Fury and Discord.
Silenus drunk, supported by two Satyrs; the same subject is engraved by Bolswert.
Lovers in a Garden, called the Garden of Love.

JEHNER, J., an English mezzotinto engraver, by whom we have, among others, the following prints:

The Portrait of William Henry Cavendish Beutinck, Marquis of Titchfield; after Reynolds.
The Earl of Barrymore, as Cupid; after Cosway.
The Four Seasons; after Breughel.

JELGERHUIS, JOHN RIENKSZ, born at Leeuwarden in 1770, was both a painter and an actor. He painted landscapes, interiors of churches, marine subjects, and market-places. He died in 1836, at Amsterdam, and was buried at Haerlem.]

JELGERSMA, TAKO HAJO, an excellent painter of marine subjects, was born at Harlingen in 1702, and was a scholar of Vitranga. He settled at Haerlem, where he painted portraits, of which he executed a great number. It is to be regretted that he did not devote more of his time to marine painting, as the pictures he has left of that kind are real chefs-d'œuvre. He died at Haerlem in 1795.]

JENICHEN, or JENCKEL, BALTHAZAR, an engraver of little note. He was apparently a German, and executed with the graver some small plates, in a style somewhat resembling that of Hans Sebald Beham, but greatly inferior in every respect. We have by him a set of small plates of the Labours of Hercules, dated 1568, and a battle-piece. He usually marked his plates with his initials, enclosed in a small square, with the date.

JENNER, THOMAS, an English engraver and printseller, who flourished about the year 1650. We have the following portraits by him, but indifferently executed :

Oliver Cromwell.
Francis Manners, Earl of Rutland.
Sir William Wadd, or Waad, Lieutenant of the Tower.

He also etched a plate of a large ship, called the Sovereign of the Seas; dated 1653.

JERVAS, CHARLES. This painter was a native of Ireland, and was for a short time a pupil of Sir Godfrey Kneller. According to Lord Orford, "Norris, frame-maker and keeper of the pictures to King William and Queen Anne, was his first patron, and permitted him to copy what he pleased in the royal collection." He is said to have instructed Pope to draw and paint, who has celebrated him with more enthusiasm than felicity. Perhaps some of the least happy lines in the works of that great poet are in his short Epistle to Jervas. Speaking of the families of some ladies; he says ;

"Oh, lasting as thy colours, may they shine,
Free as thy stroke, yet faultless as thy line;
New graces yearly, like thy works, display,
Soft without weakness, without glaring gay,
Led by some rule, that guides, but not constrains,
And finished more through happiness than pains."

Posterity has appreciated more justly the excellence at whose shrine this incense is lavished. With pretensions almost too contemptible to be noticed, such was "the badness of the age's taste, (says Lord Orford,) and the dearth of good masters, that Jervas sat at the head of his profession, and his own vanity thought no encomium disproportionate to his merit. Yet he was defective in drawing, colouring, and composition; and even in that most necessary, and perhaps most easy, talent of a portrait painter, likeness. In general, his pictures are a light, flimsy kind of fan painting, as large as life." A generally-known anecdote of this artist exhibits, in a very whimsical light, the conceit and vanity of Jervas. Having, as he thought, succeeded in copying, and in his own mind surpassing, a picture by Titian, he looked first at the one, then at the other, exclaiming with parental complacency, "Poor little Tit! how he would stare." He died in 1739.

IGONET, MARY MAGDALEN. According to Basan, this lady was a native of Genoa, but resided at Paris in 1767, when he published his Dictionnaire des Graveurs. She engraved some prints after Mieris and other masters.

IMBERT, JOSEPH GABRIEL, a French painter, born at Marseilles in 1666. He was a scholar of Charles le Brun, and afterwards of A. F. Vander Meulen; but he did not follow the style of either of those masters. He had acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history, when he became a monk of the order of St. Bruno, at the Carthusians of Villeneuve d'Avignon, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. He was afterwards chiefly employed in painting altar-pieces for the churches of his order, particularly that of his own monastery. His most esteemed work is the great altar-piece of the Carthusians at Marseilles, which is highly spoken of by M. Watelet. He died in 1749.

IMOLA, INNOCENZIO FRANCUCCI, called DA. This painter was a native of Imola, though he principally resided at Bologna. In 1506 he entered the school of Francesco Francia, but, according to Malvasia, he afterwards passed some years at Florence, under Mariotto Albertinelli. His style partakes of that of il Frate and Andrea del Sarto, whose works he appears to have studied attentively. His pictures are numerous in the churches at Bologna; and in some of them he approaches so near to the beauty and simplicity of Raffaelle, that they appear to have been painted from his designs. Such are his fine frescos in the chapter of S. Michele in Bosco, representing the Four Evangelists, the Annunciation, the Death of the Virgin, and the Assumption. The principal altar-piece in the same church may be ranked among his most admired productions; it represents the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, and below St. Michael, St. Peter, and St. Benedict. It is designed entirely in the taste of Raffaelle. Some of his altar-pieces have small pictures under them, which are extremely beautiful; as in the church of S. Giacomo, under his large painting of the Marriage of St. Catherine, there is an exquisite little picture of the Nativity. In S. Matteo, is an altar-piece of the Virgin and Infant, with several Saints; and below five small pictures, representing Christ appearing to Magdalene in the Garden; the Presentation in the Temple; St. Peter Martyr; the Nativity; and Christ Disputing with the Doctors. That he was well skilled in architecture he has shown, in his immense fresco work in the dome at Faenza, and at the Osservanti at Pesaro, in which his landscape and perspective are compared by Lanzi to Leonardo da Vinci. He usually avoided those subjects which called for crowded compositions, or violence of attitudes, as ill suited to his cast of mind, which was remarkable for meekness and placidity. According to Malvasia, he died of a pestilential fever, at the age of 56. [His pictures are all of a devout and sacred character; the known dates are 1527, 1536, and 1549. If he died in the last year, at the age of 56, he could have been only 13 when he entered the school of Francia. Brulliot is in error, or it is a misprint, when he says that he died at the age of 46.]

IMPARATO, FRANCESCO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished about the year 1565. He was first a disciple of Giovanni Filippo Criscuolo, but afterwards had the advantage of studying under Titian, at Venice. On his return to Naples, he proved how much he had profited by that great master's instruction, by the picture he painted for S. Maria la Nuova, of the Martyrdom of St. Andrew. His most esteemed work was his picture of St. Peter Martyr, in the church dedicated to that Saint. In S. Severino is another fine picture of the Annunciation.

IMPARATO, GIROLAMO, was the son of the preceding artist, and flourished at Naples about the year 1620. Having been instructed in the rudiments of the art by his father, he went to Venice, where he passed some time, and afterwards travelled through Lombardy, and studied the works of Correggio at Parma. He was a respectable painter of history, though inferior to his father. His most esteemed performance is his picture of La Madonna del Rosario, with several saints, and a glory of angels, in the church of S. Tommaso d'Aquino at Naples; which, according to Dominici, is finely composed, and designed with great beauty and taste.

IMPERIALI, GIROLAMO. This artist was a native of Genoa, and flourished about the year 1640. He first applied himself to the study of painting, but quitted that pursuit to learn engraving, under Giulio Bensi. We have several etchings by him, especially portraits.

INDIA, TULLIO. This painter was a native of Verona, and flourished about the year 1530. According to Vasari, he distinguished himself by several works in fresco, and excelled in portrait painting.

INDIA, BERNARDINO, was the son of Tullio India, born at Verona about the year 1535. There are several of his pictures in the churches and in the private collections at Verona. They are dated from 1568 till 1584. His works are distinguished by strength of character, and a tasteful design, in which he seems to have imitated the great style of Giulio Romano.

INGEGNO, L. See ASSISI.

INGHEN, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht, according to Houbraken, in 1651. Weyermans says, in 1650. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he was placed under the tuition of Peter Grebber, at Haerlem, and studied under that master until he was twenty years of age, when he travelled to Rome, where he entered the school of Carlo Maratti, but did not continue longer than a year under that master. He afterwards went to Venice, where the charm of Venetian colouring seems to have seduced him from an attention to design, in which he is very deficient. On his return to Holland, he settled at Amsterdam, and painted history and portraits with considerable success. He died at Amsterdam, but the year of his death is not mentioned.

[INGLES, (called IL MAESTRO GIORGIO by the Italian, and EL MAESTRO JORGE by the Spanish writers,) an artist of whom there is no account except that in the year 1455 the Marquis de Santilana, being at Grenada, ordered this professor to paint the sides of the great altar of the church of the hospital at Buitrago, which he had founded. The great altar is composed of two parts; on the right side Master George placed the Marquis de Santillana, larger than life, in the act of prayer, and on the left he placed the Marchioness in the same posture. To these were added certain accessories. The portraits were some time back removed to Madrid, to be engraved by order of the Duke de l' Infantado. The reason of introducing this article is that it may lead to further inquiry. Who is Master George?—In the second volume of Rosini's work, now in the course of publication, at page 206, there is a print representing two personages in the attitudes described, evidently at the foot of an altar, on which is inscribed MR. GEORGJ ME PINKIT, in letters partly Gothic and partly Roman, the R being placed over the M, in the abbreviation of Master, or Messer. This picture Rosini attributes to a Maestro Giuseppe of the school of Milan, who is mentioned with others of the latter part of the fourteenth century. How it can belong to a Maestro Giuseppe when a Maestro Giorgio had placed his name there, is the question; and as George and Inghes are both English names, perhaps neither Italy nor Spain can legitimately claim the artist. It is also said that he was a great architect.]

INGOLI, MATTEO. This painter was born at Ravenna in 1587. He went young to Venice, where he became a scholar of Luigi del Friso. Boschini asserts, that he adopted as models the works of Palma and Paolo Veronese; but Lanzi thinks he aspired to a style less vague and more solid, as appears in his picture of the Last Supper, in S. Apollinare, and other works, which are characterized by correctness and taste. This estimable artist, in the prime of life, fell a victim to the plague, which visited the Venetian states in the year 1631.

INGOUF, PETER CHARLES, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1746. He was a pupil of John James Flipart, and has engraved several plates in the neat, finished style of that artist, which possess considerable merit. Among others, we have the following by him:

The Portrait of John George Wille; after a drawing by his son.

Four Heads, of various characters; after Greuze.

La Paix du Ménage; after Greuze; etched by Moreau, and finished with the graver by P. C. Ingouf.

La bonne Education; after the same; by the same.

A Girl caressing a Dog; after the same.

The contented Mother; after P. A. Wille.

The discontented Mother; after the same.

[Died in 1800.]

INGOUF, FRANCIS ROBERT, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Paris in 1747, and was also instructed in engraving by John James Flipart. We have several plates by him of portraits, and various subjects, executed in a finished and agreeable style, very creditable to his talent; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

John James Flipart, engraver; a medallion.

Simon, printer.

Bust of John James Rousseau; from a model in wax.

Gerard Douw, playing on a violin to his bird; after a picture by himself.

Armand Jerome Bignon, master of the ceremonies; after Drouais.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

A Boy presenting a Bird to a Cat; after A. Vanderwerf.

The Winter Evening; after Freudenberg.

The Soldier on Furlough; after the same.

The Ambulating Merchant; after the same.

The Return of the Labourer; after Benazech.

[He died at Paris in 1812. He engraved a Nativity after Raphael, and another after Ribera for le Musée Français, and some popular subjects after Benazech and Le Barbier. He executed a great number of vignettes for the booksellers, and some of the subjects for "le Voyage en Egypte."]

INGRAM, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. After learning the first principles of engraving in his native country, he went to Paris, in 1755, where he greatly improved his style, and engraved in a neat manner several vignettes, and other ornaments of books, and some plates after Bradley, Boucher, and others. He was afterwards employed in engraving for the Academy of Sciences, at the time when Basan published his Dictionary of Engravers in 1767.

JOANES. See JUANES.

JOANSUINI, GIACOMO. This artist appears to have been a painter as well as an engraver. His name is affixed to an etching representing the Presentation in the Temple, very indifferently executed. It is inscribed Jacobi Joansuini pictor et incisor.

JODE, GERARD DE, a Flemish engraver and print-seller, born at Antwerp in 1541. This respectable artist was the head of a family greatly distinguished in the art of engraving. He engraved several plates of historical and geographical subjects, in which his style appears to have been an humble imitation of that of Cornelius de Cort. The following are [a part of] his principal prints:

A set of twenty-nine Portraits of the Popes. 1585.

A Roman Triumph, in twelve sheets; after M. Hemskerck.

The Crucifixion; a large print, in three sheets; marked G. de Jode; after Michael Angelo Buonaroti; without the name of the painter.

[There is an error in the date of his birth; it should be 1521: he died in 1591.]

JODE, PETER [DE], THE ELDER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1570. After being taught the rudiments of design by his father, he was instructed in the art of engraving by Henry Goltzius. He afterwards went to Italy for improvement, particularly in drawing, and engraved several plates from the works of the great masters. About the year 1601 he returned to Antwerp, where he distinguished himself by various prints, after the principal Flemish painters. His drawing is very correct; and though his command of the graver is less daring and bold than that of his instructor, he is also less mannered and extravagant. We have several portraits by him, as well as historical subjects, of which the following are the principal:

PORTRAITS.

Erycius Puteanus, or Henry du Puy, a learned Hollander; in a circle formed by a serpent; Pet. de Jode, sculp. J. Meytens, ecc.

Joannes Bocatius; Titian, pinx. Pet. de Jode, fecit.

Ferdinand Count Palatine of the Rhine; oval; after Rubens.

Philip III. King of Spain; oval; after the same.

Francis de Mello, Count d'Azumar; P. de Jode, fec.

Ambrose Spinola; the same.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Five Senses; apparently from his own designs.

The Life and Miracles of St. Catherine of Siena; twelve plates; after Francesco Vanni. 1606.

The Life of Christ; in thirty-six plates; without the painter's name.

The Virgin and Child; after Titian.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.

The large Holy Family; after the same.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Ad. van Oort.

Christ, with Nicodemus; after the same.

The Decollation of St. John; after Rubens; oval; scarce. Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter; after the same; fine; the best impressions are before the address of Vanden Enden.

The crowning of St. Catherine; after the same.

The Last Judgment; after John Cousin; on twelve plates; one of the largest prints known.

Peter de Jode, the elder, died in 1634.

JODE, PETER [DE], THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1606, and was instructed by his father, whom he surpassed in the taste and facility with which he handled the graver. His plates are very unequal, and Basan says of him, that "in some of his prints he has equalled the best engravers, and in others, he has sunk below himself." Perhaps his best performances are his portraits, several of which he engraved from Vanduyck. He will ever be esteemed a very reputable artist, though inferior to his contemporaries, the Bolswerts, Pontius, and Vostermans. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS AFTER VANDUYCK.

Charles I.

Henrietta Maria, his Queen.

Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford.

Prince Rupert.

Catherine, Countess of Newburgh.

Peter de Jode, junior; se ipse scul.

Jacob Jordaens, painter, of Antwerp.

Cornelius Polemburgh, painter, of Utrecht.

John Snellincks, painter, of Antwerp.

Daniel Mytens, painter.

Adam de Coster, painter, of Mechlin.

Andrew Colyns de Nole, sculptor, of Antwerp.

Henry Liberti, organist.

Albert, Duke of Friedland, Count of Wallenstein.

Genevieve d'Urphe, Duchess de Croye.

Jane de Blois.

John Tzerlaes, Count de Tilly.

Diodorus van Tulden, professor at Louvaine.

Anthony Trieste, Bishop of Ghent.

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Charles Henry, Baron de Metternich; after A. van Hulle.

Augustus Adolphus, Baron de Trantorf; after the same.

Thomas Ricciardi; after Simon Vouet.

Ernest, Count d'Isembourg; after J. Willeborts Boschaert.

Petrus de Francavilla, sculptor and architect; after Bamel.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Augustine, bishop, crowned by Religion; P. de Jode, fee.

St. Francis kneeling before a Crucifix; after Baroccio.

The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth, St. John, and Zachary; after Titian.

The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth; after Rubens; fine and scarce.

The Three Graces; after the same; fine.

Venus rising from the Sea, surrounded with Nymphs and Tritons; after the same.

St. Francis and St. Clara adoring the infant Jesus; after Gerard Segers.

Christ with Nicodemus; after the same.

The Nativity; after J. Jordaens; fine.

St. Martin de Tours, working a Miracle; after the same; fine.

Folly and Ignorance; after the same.

St. Augustine supported by Angels; after Vanduyck.

Rinaldo and Armida; after the same.

The Holy Family, with St. Anne; after A. Diepenbeek.

An Allegorical Subject on Peace; after the same.

St. John in the Desert; after P. van Mol.

[For an ample list of his works see Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon. The exact time of his death is uncertain; the latest authentic date on his prints is 1659. Nagler mentions one with the date 1699; but this is probably a misprint.]

JODE, ARNOLO DE. This artist was the son of Peter de Jode, the younger, born at Antwerp in 1636. He was instructed in engraving by his father, 362 though he never rose above mediocrity. It appears from the inscription on one of his plates, that he was in England in 1666, the year of the fire in London. His best prints are his portraits, though they are very indifferent. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Cardinal Palavicini; after Titian.

Sir Peter Lely; from a picture by himself.

Alexander Browne; prefixed to his Ars Pictoria; after Huysmans.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Mercury educating Cupid; after Coreggio. [1667.]

Magdalene; a half-length, circular; after Vanduyck.

The infant Christ embracing St. John; after the same; inscribed Arnoldus de Jode, sculp. Londini, tempore incendii maximi.

A Landscape; after L. de Vadder; Arnold de Jode, sculp. 1658.

JOHNSON, CORNELIUS. See JANSSSEN.

JOHNSON, LAWRENCE, an obscure English engraver, who lived about the year 1603. He executed with the graver some heads for the General History of the Turks, published in 1603; they are very indifferently engraved.

JOHNSON, C. Another English engraver, of little note. He engraved some portraits; among which is the Queen of James I.

JOHNSON, T., an English mezzotinto engraver, by whom we have several portraits, and a few other subjects, executed in a style which does him no great credit. Among others, are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; after G. Zoust.

John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough.

Marquis of Granby.

William, Lord Cowper.

Lord Anson.

Sir John Willis, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Bullock, the comedian; T. Johnson ad vivum pinx. et sculp.

Thomas Britton, the musical small-coal man.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Four plates of the Seasons; Johnson, fec.

The Holy Family returning from Egypt; after Rubens.

Adam and Eve; a small plate.

JOHNSTON, ANDREW. By this artist, who was apparently an Englishman, we have a few portraits in mezzotinto; among which is that of Henry Sacheverel, D. D.; after Gibson.

JOLI, ANTONIO. This artist was born at Modena in 1700. He went when young to Rome, where he became a scholar of Gio. Paolo Pannini, and proved an eminent painter of perspective and architectural views, in the style of that master. He is said by Lanzi to have distinguished himself as a painter of theatrical decorations in England, Spain, and Germany; and was painter to Charles III., king of Naples, and his son. He died in 1777. [He painted a great number of landscape and sea views in the vicinity of Naples, of an oblong form, to serve as decorations over interior doors: they are very pleasing pictures.]

JOLLAT, a French engraver on wood, who, according to Papillon, flourished about the year 1510. He executed the cuts of ornamental borders, figures, &c., for a missal, in octavo, printed at Paris in 1490; also those for an anatomical work by Carolus Stephano, M. D., which bear dates from 1530 to 1532. Though not well drawn, they are very neatly cut.

JONCKHEER, J. This artist, from his name, was probably a native of Holland. He flourished from 1650 to 1660, and engraved a set of small plates, lengthways, representing dogs, and other domestic animals, etched in a free, spirited style, which appear to be the work of a painter. He harmonized the etching with the graver, in the manner of Rembrandt.

JONG, LUDOLPH DE. This painter was born at Overschie, a village near Rotterdam, in 1616. He was the son of a shoemaker, who intended bringing him up to the same business, but having shown an inclination for painting, he was placed under Cornelius Sachtleven, with whom he passed two years. He afterwards successively studied under Anthony Palamedes of Delft, and John Bylaert of Utrecht. On leaving the last-mentioned master he travelled to France, and passed seven years at Paris, where he met with encouragement as a portrait painter, in which branch of the art he chiefly excelled. He also painted easel pictures of huntings and battles, which are ingeniously composed and touched with spirit and vigour. On his return to Holland he settled at Rotterdam, where he was much employed. His most considerable work is a large picture in the Salle des Princes in that city, representing the portraits of the officers of the company of burghers. He died in 1697.

JONG, or JONGE, J. M. DE. This artist was a native of Holland, and was probably related to Ludolph de Jong. He was apparently a painter, from the style of a set of etchings of battles we have by him, which are executed with great fire and spirit, in a very masterly manner. We have also by him several etchings of horses, equally creditable to his talent. He usually marked his plates with the initials of his name, I. M. D. I. [His name was Jan Martss, or Marssen, and de jonge (the younger) was added to distinguish him from another of the same name, probably his father, as is common.]

JONGELINX, ANTHONY. This artist was probably a Fleming; he resided in England in 1762, in which year he engraved some plates of fishes, after Arnold van Achen.

JONGELINX, J. B., a Flemish engraver, by whom we have some portraits, executed in a very indifferent style. To that of Valerius Andreas Desselius, he has affixed his name, J. B. Jongelinx, with the letters Ant, perhaps for Antwerpia, to denote that he was a native of Antwerp.

[JORDAANS, HANS, born at Antwerp in 1539, was a scholar of Martin van Cleef. He painted history, landscapes, corps-de-gardes, village festivals, conflagrations, and moonlights. He died at Delft in 1599.]

JORDAENS, JACOB. This eminent painter was born at Antwerp in 1594. He was a scholar of Adam van Oort, an able artist, but of a character so outrageous and depraved, that his conduct disgusted all his disciples, among which was Rubens. Jordaens was the only student who continued under him for any length of time, and was prevailed on to endure the brutality of his master, by his sensibility to the charms and amiability of his daughter, Catherine van Oort, to whom he was tenderly attached, and whom he afterwards married. This union taking place when he was very young, prevented him from carrying into effect a project he had formed of visiting Italy. Thus deprived of the advantage of cultivating his natural disposition by studying the works of the great Italian masters in their own country; he seized with avidity every opportunity of copying such of their pictures as he could meet with in Flanders, particularly those of Titian and Paolo Veronese. However, as a young artist is naturally led to follow the examples which he has constantly before his eyes, the beauties he discovered in the works of Rubens became the objects of his imitation, and he ever afterwards followed the style of that great painter, though with less elevation and dignity of character. It is very probable, from the apparent bent of his genius, that if circumstances had permitted him to travel, he would still have retained the taste of his country, even in the bosom of Italy. Such has been the case with many of the ablest of the Flemish artists, without excepting the head of their school. The growing talent of Jordaens soon caught the discerning eye of Rubens, who, with a liberality which always distinguished him, took every opportunity of rendering him service. The King of Spain had applied to Rubens for a series of cartoons to be executed in tapestry, who engaged Jordaens to paint them from his designs, and aided him with his assistance and advice; affording him, in this undertaking, a mark of distinction which could not fail of being very advantageous to a young artist. Sandrart, with more malevolence than veracity, charges Rubens with having employed Jordaens in this enterprise, from a jealousy of his promise as a colourist; hoping, that by painting these great works in distemper, he might insensibly lose the vigour and brilliancy which he had already discovered in his oil pictures; and very inconsiderately asserts, that the colouring of Jordaens, after painting the cartoons, became feeble and cold. Fortunately for the purposes of truth, and in justice to the well-known beneficence of Rubens, this calumny is refuted by facts, of which that writer was either ignorant or insensible. The cartoons were painted when Jordaens was young; and so far from his colouring having been deteriorated by that operation, it became from thence infinitely more rich and harmonious, as is evident in the pictures he afterwards painted, on which his reputation is principally founded, and which are in no way inferior, in respect to colour, to the best works of Rubens. Although Jordaens was never so munificently remunerated for his works as Rubens, his extraordinary facility enabled him to acquire both opulence and celebrity. The numerous works of Jordaens are to be found in almost every church or public edifice in Flanders and Brabant; among which are particularly admired his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Apollonia, in the church of the Augustines at Antwerp; and Christ disputing with the Doctors, in that of St. Walburg at Furnes; the last mentioned has frequently been mistaken for a production of Rubens. One of his most considerable performances is a large picture in the Palace in the Wood, near the Hague, representing the triumphal entry of Prince Frederick Henry of Nassau, in a car, drawn by four white horses, in which the horses are admirable. In the gallery at Dusseldorp was his celebrated picture of the Merry-making, esteemed one of his best works, in which there is an admirable glow of harmonious colouring, and the heads are full of the most appropriate and jovial expression. The powers of Jordaens were better adapted to the representation of fabulous subjects, satyrs, and animals, or the festive scenes of tumultuous revelry, than the grave and decorous arrangement of sacred subjects, or the dignified delineation of history, which require graceful expression and elevation of character. He lived to the advanced age of 84, and died at Antwerp in 1678. We have a few spirited etchings by Jacob Jordaens; which, though executed in a hasty, slight style, evince the hand of the master. They are as follow :

The Flight into Egypt; dated 1652.
 Christ driving the Merchandizers from the Temple.
 The Descent from the Cross. 1652.
 Mercury and Argus.
 Jupiter and Io. 1652.
 The Infancy of Jupiter.
 A Peasant stopping an Ox by the tail, with several spectators.

There is an etching very generally attributed to Jordaens, representing Saturn devouring one of his children; very rare. [In 1638 Jordaens painted for the king of Spain (probably at the recommendation of Rubens) the fine landscape, with the story of Vertumnus and Pomona, which, with the Numa Pompilius, or rather Pythagoras, by Rubens, was abstracted by Joseph Buonaparte, on his abdication of the throne of Spain. Both pictures are in England: the Pythagoras, by Rubens, has been purchased by Prince Albert; the Vertumnus and Pomona is in some private collection. Most of the tourists have attributed the latter to Rubens.]

JORDAENS, JOHN, [or HANS,] a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1616. He went to Italy when young, and passed the greater part of his life at Venice, Naples, and Rome. His merit was highly esteemed by the Italians. He composed with a facility, and painted with a promptitude, which astonished his contemporaries. He painted history in the style of Rothenhamer. On his return to Holland he established himself at the Hague, and was much employed. He died at Voorburg, a village in the vicinity of the Hague, but the year of his death is not known. [His style of painting is a mixture of Rothenhamer and old Francks; but nearer to the latter than the former.]

JORDAN, GREGORY. This artist was a native of Venice. In 1622 he published a set of prints, entitled Prophetia seu Vaticinia, XIII. tabellis expressa, representing the woes which are to befall the world at the subversion of the Mahometan superstition, with explanations of the designs. They are slightly etched, with little effect, and the figures are incorrectly drawn.

[JORDAN, SALVADOR, is classed among the Spanish painters, though the name would indicate that he was a Fleming. He painted the portrait of the celebrated Quevedo de Villegas, which was engraved at Madrid, by D. F. Gazan, in 1636; the design, and the striking likeness of this portrait, obtained a great reputation at the time for the artist: little else is known of him, as he has the honour of having his portraits attributed frequently to Velasquez.]

JORDANO, LUCA. See GIORDANO.

JORIS, AUGUSTINE, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1525. He was instructed in the first principles of design by James Mondt, a painter of little celebrity, under whom he remained three years. He afterwards visited France, and resided some time at Paris. On his return to Holland he was employed in painting some historical subjects at Delft, particularly a picture of the Infancy of the Virgin, which established his reputation, and he promised to become one of the ablest artists of his time, when he unfortunately fell into a canal, and was drowned, in 1552.

JOSSE, ABRAHAM, an engraver, mentioned by Florent le Comte, who asserts that his prints are exceedingly numerous, amounting to near six hundred. He has not however specified any of their subjects, [nor has any other writer.]

JOULLAIN, JAMES, a French engraver of little eminence, by whom we have several frontispieces and other book-plates, executed in a formal, stiff style, and very incorrectly drawn.

JOULLAIN, FRANCIS [FRANÇOIS]. This artist was probably a relation of the preceding engraver. He was an eminent printseller, as well as an engraver, and flourished at Paris in 1750. We have several plates by him, executed in the style of Lawrence Cars, which, though inferior to that master, possess considerable merit. The following are his principal plates:

The Flaying of Marsyas; after P. Veronese; for the Crozat collection.

Mercury and Herse; after the same; for the same.

The Ecce Homo; after Charles Coypell.

The Annunciation; after the same.

The Boar-hunting; after N. Desportes.

The Wolf-hunting; after the same.

The Portrait of N. Desportes; after a picture by himself.

The Rural Recreation; after N. Lancret.

JOUVENET, JOHN, [JEAN,] an eminent painter of the French school, born at Rouen in 1644. He was the son of Laurent Jouvenet, a painter, who instructed him in the rudiments of the art; and without any other instruction, he went to Paris, when he was seventeen years of age, where he soon distinguished himself by the vivacity of his genius. In his twenty-eighth year he painted his celebrated picture of Christ curing the Paralytic, in the church of Notre Dame; a noble and a grand composition. In 1665, Charles le Brun presented him as a candidate for the honours of the Academy, and he was received with distinction. His picture of reception was Esther before Ahasuerus, which is one of the finest works in the hall of the Academy. It was about this time that he painted his four admired pictures for the church of St. Martin aux Champs, representing Mary Magdalene at the feet of our Saviour, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple; the miraculous Draught of Fishes; and the Raising of Lazarus. In the church of the Invalids, between the windows of the dome, he painted the Twelve Apostles, with angels, and different attributes, designed in a grand style, and considerably larger than life. The most capital performance of Jouvenet is his much-extolled Deposition from the Cross, painted for the church of the Capucines at Paris, but now in the gallery of the Louvre. It is unquestionably a grand and impressive picture, though we may attribute a fair portion of the eulogium conferred on it, by M. Watelet, (an intelligent critic,) to a pardonable partiality to his ingenious countryman. "In this picture," says that writer, "Guercino is united to Caracci, or rather, it is Jouvenet breathing defiance to all the great masters. If this picture had been painted at Rome, and if Poussin could have seen it there, he would have ranked it as the fourth of the chef d'œuvres in that emporium of art." Having lost the use of his right hand at the age of sixty-nine, by a stroke of the palsy, he attempted to paint with his left, and succeeded, to the astonishment of every one. In this manner he painted his picture of the Magnificat, in the choir of Notre Dame. He possessed great facility and energy of handling, and was a correct designer, but, like most of his countrymen, he was less successful as a colourist. He died at Paris in 1717. [He had a brother of the name of François, who was a good portrait painter; the latter died in 1749.]

IRACE, SEVERO. According to Dominici, this painter was a Neapolitan, and flourished about the year 1534. He was a disciple of Marco Cardisco, called il Calabrese, and painted history with some reputation. In the church of the Nunziata at Naples, is an altar-piece, painted by this master, representing the Virgin with the Infant in the clouds, with a glory of angels, and below St. Peter and St. Paul. It is signed with his name, and dated 1534.

IRELAND, SAMUEL, an English amateur artist, who, about the year 1785, etched several plates from the designs of Mortimer, Hogarth, &c., and also some views, from drawings by himself.

IRIARTE, IGNACIO DE. This Spanish artist was a Biscayan, born in 1620, but went early in his life to Seville, where he became a scholar of Francisco de Herrera the elder. His genius leading him to landscape painting, he left that master, and studied from nature. Palomino speaks in high terms of the landscapes of this painter, which are found in the best collections at Seville. He died in 1685. [Murillo was a great admirer of Iriarte's landscapes, and painted the figures in some of them. The landscapes so ornamented are exceeding valuable.]

ISAACS, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Helvezor in 1569. He was a scholar of Cornelius Ketel at Amsterdam, but afterwards studied under John van Achen, and travelled with that master through Germany and Italy. Though he occasionally painted historical subjects, he was more employed as a portrait painter. He resided the greater part of his life at Amsterdam, where there are many of his portraits. His heads are full of life and character, and he drew the hands with the greatest correctness.

ISAC, JASPER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished from about the year 1620 to 1633. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he was principally employed in engraving frontispieces and portraits for the booksellers. They are executed with the graver in a neat, but tasteless style. Among his portraits are those of Charles L'Oyseau and Stephen Paschasius.

ISSELBURG, PETER, a German engraver, born at Cologne about the year 1585. He lived the greater part of his life at Nuremberg, where he was much employed for the booksellers. He also engraved some plates from Rubens, and a few portraits. We have by him,

The Portrait of James I.

Christ, and the Twelve Apostles; thirteen plates; after Rubens.

[For a list of about 200 attributed to him, see Nagler, Kuntzler-Lexicon.]

JUANES, JUAN BAUTISTA. This distinguished Spanish painter, whose works are only known in his own country, was born at Valencia in 1523. Palomino incorrectly states him to have been a scholar of Raffaëlle, who died before he was born. He certainly studied at Rome, and after his return from Italy, resided the remainder of his life in his native city. The Spanish biographers do not scruple to rank him with the greatest artists of the age of Leo X. Unfortunately for his fame, his works are immured in the convents of Valencia, which, if they could be delivered from their confinement, and placed in the observation of taste and judgment, would secure their author that celebrity to which their uncommon excellence entitles him. Pacheco, in his treatise, bestows on him the highest encomiums; and Palomino Velasco does not hesitate to prefer him to Morales, and even to Raffaëlle himself. Much of this may be ascribed to national partiality; but it may fairly be presumed, that the artist on whom such general and distinguished praise has been conferred, must have possessed transcendent ability. Juanes, like the divine Morales, confined his subjects to sacred history; his pictures are grandly composed, and coloured with great truth and beauty; though they are finished with extraordinary minuteness, it does not impair their force, nor impoverish their general effect. In the sacristy of the church of San Pedro, is a picture of a dead Christ, which is greatly admired. In the chapel of St. Thomas de Villanueva, belonging to the Augustine monks, are three grand compositions by him, representing the Nativity, the Martyrdom of St. Ines, and the Burial of a devout Monk of that order. His principal work is in the cathedral at Valencia; it represents the Baptism of Christ by St. John, with several figures. The composition of this fine picture is in the style of Raffaëlle, the heads are admirable, the expression just and natural, and the whole is finished with the most delicate execution. This eminent artist died at Bocairente, near Valencia, in 1579. [Bermudez calls this highly extolled painter Vicente Joanes, and gives an account of the public buildings in which his pictures, real and supposed, are to be found.]

[JUKES, FRANCIS, an aquatint engraver, born in 1750, flourished till near the end of the 18th century. He engraved Walmesley's Views in Ireland, Nicholson's in England, and numerous other productions by artists of the time. Most of his landscapes and sea-pieces are washed with colour so as to resemble drawings.]

JULLIENNE, JOHN DE, a French gentleman, well known for the celebrated collection of pictures he formed, most of which were engraved. He amused himself with etching a few plates after Teniers, Watteau, and other masters.

[JUNCOSA, called FRÀ JOACHIM, a Spanish painter of sacred and profane subjects, was born at Cornudella, in the diocese of Tarragona. When young he painted fabulous subjects, which gained him great reputation. In 1660 he retired to the Carthusian monastery of Scala Dei, and painted several pictures there, as well as the portraits of the most meritorious members of the brotherhood. He afterwards painted at the Carthusian monastery at Monte-Alegre the Birth and Coronation of the Virgin, and thirty-six of an immense size, which were placed around the cornice of the church. He next visited Italy, and returned much improved. In 1680 he was employed, in conjunction with his cousin Dr. Juncosa, to paint the major chapel of the hermitage De Ruis, in which he represented various circumstances in the life of the Virgin. His works are numerous, and are celebrated throughout Spain for correctness of design, freedom of style, beautiful colour, and a good understanding of the tints and demi-tints. On the whole he is considered a distinguished painter of the Spanish school. It is related that, at the latter part of his life, the superiors of the monastery were no great amateurs of painting, and compelled Juncosa to take his share of the duties of the establishment; this so irritated him, that he fled to Rome and laid his case before the pope, who pardoned his disobedience, and permitted him to reside in a hermitage, without the walls of Rome, with orders that he should not be tormented any more with the sound of the bell at the hours of office. He died in this retreat in 1708.]

JUNE, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He was of no great eminence, and was chiefly employed in book-plates. We have a few portraits by him, among which are,

Richard Nash, master of the ceremonies at Bath.

Fanny Murray.

James Relly, the Antinomian preacher; after Shelly.

JUSTER, JOSEPH. This artist was a native of France, though he chiefly resided at Venice, where he engraved a great number of plates for the books published there from 1691 to 1700. His plates are etched, and coarsely finished with the graver, in a very indifferent style. In conjunction with N. Cochin, H. Tournheyser, and H. Vincent, he engraved part of the collection of prints from select pictures, published at Venice in 1691, by Catherine Patin. These are his best performances.

[JUSTUS OF GHENT, or GIUSTO DE ALEMAGNA, flourished from the middle to the last quarter of the fifteenth century. He was probably a scholar of the Van Eycks. The celebrated picture of The Last Judgment, in the church of St. Mary at Dantzic, which was long supposed to be by Jan van Eyck, is now ascribed, by competent judges, to Justus of Ghent. For a very elaborate description of this famous picture see Kügler's Hand-book of Painting, vol. ii. of the English translation. He painted the Communion in the church of St. Agatha at Urbino; and there is a small picture in the collection of M. van Huyvetter of Ghent, representing the Finding of the true Cross, and its verification by raising a dead woman to life, attributed to him. See ALEMAGNO, GIUSTO.]

JUVANI, FRANCESCO. According to Basan, this artist was a native of Rome, and a scholar of Carlo Maratti. Of his works as a painter, little is known. He etched some plates from the designs of his master, among which is the Adoration of the Shepherds.

JUVARRA, FILIPPO, an Italian architect, who designed and etched a set of ornamental shields, published at Rome in 1722. They are executed in a bold, free manner, and possess great merit. He styles himself Cav. D. Filippo Juvarra, Architetto e Accademico de S. Luca.

[JUVENEL, PAUL, was the son of Nikolaus Juvenel, a painter of perspectives, who died in 1597, and a scholar of Adam Elsheimer. He painted interiors of churches, and was a skillful copyist of the works of the older German and Flemish masters, particularly of Albert Durer. He painted at Nuremberg, Vienna, and Presburg, and died in 1643, in the 64th year of his age.]

[JUWEEL, NICOLAS, a painter of Rotterdam, living in 1690, imitated the manner of Chevalier Vander Werf, without arriving at the peculiar merit of that master.]

K

KABEL. See CABEL.

KAGER, MATTHEW. This painter was born at Munich in 1566. He travelled to Rome while he was yet young, where during a long residence, passed in the assiduous study of the best masters, he became one of the most eminent artists of his country. Soon after his return from Italy, the Duke of Bavaria appointed him his principal painter, with a considerable pension. The churches at Munich, and the palaces of that prince, attest the talents of Kager. Towards the latter part of his life he resided at Augsburg, where he painted his most celebrated work, the Last Judgment, in the hall of the Senate, in that city. The works of Kager are only known out of his own country by the prints engraved from them by the Sadelers, the Kilians, and others, amounting to upwards of sixty.

M. Kager etched some plates from his own designs, which he finished with the graver; among which are the following:

The Adoration of the Shepherds; M. Kager, inv. et sc. 1610.

The Baptism of Christ by St. John; the same inscription. The Holy Family; M. Kager, fecit. 1605.

St. Francis surrounded by the Monks of his order, and the Virgin and Child in the clouds; after P. Rems. Bozzulo.

He died at Augsburg in 1634, aged 78. [Balkema erroneously states that Kager was born at Augsburg in 1598, and that he died there in 1657. All the authorities are against him. The date on one of his prints, 1605, is sufficient to show him in error, as regards the time of Kager's birth. Bryan was out in his arithmetic when he calculated the artist's age: he was only 68, according to the dates he has given. His names were Johann Mathias.]

KALCAR. See CALCAR.

KALF, WILLIAM, a Dutch painter of still-life, born at Amsterdam in 1630. He was a scholar of Hendrick Pot, a painter of history, and for some time applied himself to the same pursuit, but not succeeding to his expectation, he commenced painting flowers, fruit, and still-life. These objects, little interesting in themselves, are only rendered picturesque by the truth and fidelity with which they are represented. Kalf particularly excelled in painting vases, and other ornamental works in gold and silver, which he imitated with a delicacy and precision that approach to deception. His pictures are very highly wrought up; his touch is neat and spirited, his colouring clear and sparkling, and in the general effect he shows a perfect intelligence of the chiaro-scuro. The works of this painter are highly esteemed in Holland, where they find a place in the choicest collections. He died at Amsterdam in 1693. [It should be added, that in painting brass pots and earthen pans, and other utensils of a Dutch boor's establishment, he was admirable.]

KALLE, ALBERT C., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1648, and resided at Strasburg. He was principally employed by the booksellers, and worked with the graver in a stiff, formal style. He engraved some frontispieces and portraits, among which is a frontispiece to Chemnitz's Bellum Sueco-Germanicum, dated 1648, with the portrait of Gustavus Adolphus.

KALRAAT, ABRAHAM VAN. This painter was born at Dort in 1643. He was the son of a sculptor, who instructed him in his art for some time, but on the death of his father he applied himself to painting flowers and fruit, in which he excelled. [Died 1699.]

KALRAAT, BERNARD VAN, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Dort in 1650, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by his brother. He afterwards became a scholar of Albert Cuypp; and for some time following the charming style of that master, he painted figures and cattle on the banks of the Maes, halts of travellers, and sportsmen going to the chase. But not being able to equal his able instructor in those subjects, he had recourse to an imitation of the works of Herman Sachtleven, and, like him, painted cabinet pictures of Views of the Rhine, with boats and figures, which are highly finished, and touched with precision and neatness, though inferior to Sachtleven. He died in 1721. [Balkema, very strangely, says he died in 1757, making him thereby 107 years of age, according to his own account of the artist's birth.]

KAMPEN, JACOB VAN, a Dutch painter and architect, born at Haerlem in 1658. He travelled to Italy when he was young, and on his return to Holland painted a few historical pictures; but he abandoned painting for architecture, in which he was much employed.

[KAMPER, G——, supposed to have been a native of Leyden, lived in the beginning of the eighteenth century. He painted similar subjects to those of Vanderneer, and imitated his manner, but did not arrive at his excellence. His colouring is darker, colder, and less transparent; but his pictures have frequently been mistaken for works of Vanderneer, and sold as such.]

KAMPHUYSEN. See CAMPHUYSEN.

KARTARIUS, MARIUS. This artist was probably a German, but he resided at Rome about the year 1567. We have by him some plates coarsely etched, and finished with the graver. He also copied some of the prints of Albert Durer in a neat, precise manner. His plates are usually marked with the cipher KX. The following are by him:

The Adoration of the Shepherds; neatly executed with the graver.

Christ crowned with Thorns; the same.

Diana and Acteon; a large plate.

Christ praying in the Garden; after A. Durer. Romæ. 1567.

St. Jerome seated in a chamber; after the famous print by the same.

Christ descending into Hell; roughly copied from Andrea Mantegna.

The last Judgment; after Michael Angelo.

[The name should be written KARTARUS. It is supposed that he was a printseller as well as an engraver, and that he put his name, or mark, to the works of others, which will account for the diversity of style that appears in those bearing his monogram.]

KAUFFMAN, MARIA ANGELICA. Although this celebrated paintress changed her name to that of Zucchi, by an ill-advised marriage, she is generally remembered in the world of art by that of Angelica Kauffman. She was the daughter of Joseph Kauffman, a Swiss portrait painter, resident at Coire, the capital of the Grisons, where she was born, in 1742. At a very early age she discovered a marked disposition for painting and music, and was taught by her father the elements of design, who also procured her the instruction of the best music-masters of the country. She appeared at first to pay more attention to music than drawing. Her advancement in both was extraordinary, and sufficiently flattering to her father to induce him to accompany her to Italy, for the advantage of improvement. In 1757 he conducted her to Milan, where she applied herself assiduously in designing, and in copying the works of the best masters. She went to Naples in 1763, and in the following year to Rome, where her talents, joined to the charms of an elegant person, excited a more than usual degree of interest and admiration. She appears to have confined herself to portraits. Among her many admirers was the celebrated Abbé Winkelman, who, in a letter to his friend Franck, written in 1764, speaks of her accomplishments in the most flattering terms. "I have just been painted," says he, "by a stranger, a young person of a rare merit. She is very eminent in portraits in oil, mine is a half-length, and she has made an etching of it, as a present to me. She speaks Italian as well as German, and expresses herself with the same facility in French and English, on which account she paints all the English who visit Rome. She sings with a taste which ranks her among our greatest virtuose. Her name is Angelica Kauffman." In 1765 she came to England, whither a very brilliant reputation had already preceded her. Her history, whilst in this country, is so universally and so precisely known, that it will not be thought necessary to notice it here in detail. During a residence of seventeen years, her talents were recompensed with every honour, distinction, and reward that the most exigent ambition or cupidity could desire. In 1769 she received the honours of the Royal Academy, was high in the royal favour, and in the public estimation, affluent, respected, and admired, when she poisoned all these enjoyments by an unhappy matrimonial connexion, which is said to have imbittered the remainder of her life. Angelica left England in 1782, and returned to Rome, where the exercise of her talents was not less distinguishedly rewarded, which she continued with undiminished reputation till her death, in 1807, at the age of 67 [65]. The merit of Angelica has been so highly rated by the zeal of her eulogists, and perhaps so severely judged before the stern tribunal of criticism, that it is probable a just and candid estimate of her faculties will best be formed by steering a temperate course between both. That her powers were considerable, none will deny; that they were transcendent, few of the intelligent will be disposed to acknowledge. In her historical pictures, in which the figures are generally much smaller than life, her compositions are ingenious and poetical; her design is neither incorrect nor ungraceful; and her colouring, at least, as mellow and harmonious as the best painters of the modern Italian school. She was not unacquainted with the beauties of the antique, nor did she neglect them, especially in her female forms. Her pictures are distinguished by an air of mild and virginal dignity; but there is a total want of variety in her forms, of impassioned and characteristic expression in her heads, and of energy in her attitudes. Her figures, both male and female, are cast in the same mould, and appear to have been drawn from an ideal model she had formed of what she conceived to be perfect; hence she could not avoid falling into the foibles of a mannerist. Her Hector, in his departure from Andromache, is not a hero of Homer, but a girl in disguise. We have several etchings by this ingenious lady, executed with taste and spirit, of which the following are the principal:

The Portrait of John Winkelman; Ang. K. fec. 1764.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Coreggio.

The Virgin and Child; from her own design.

A Girl reading.

A Youth in meditation.

Bust of an old Man, with a beard.

Bust of an old Man reading.

Bust of an Artist, with a crayon in his hand.

Two Philosophers, with a book.

Hope; a half-length.

A young Female embracing an Urn.

L'Allegro.

Il Penseroso.

KAUPERZ, JOHN VITUS, a modern German engraver, born at Gratz, in Stiria, in 1741. He was a pupil of James Schmutzer, of Vienna, in which city he chiefly resided, and was a member of the Imperial Academy. He engraved with the burin, and also in mezzotinto, and executed several plates of portraits, and various subjects, of which the following are the principal:

PORTRAITS WITH THE GRAVER.

Maria Theresa, Empress of Germany.
Minerva holding the Portrait of the Empress.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS IN MEZZOTINTO.

The Flute-player; after Gerard Dowd.
A Peasant smoking; after Teniers.
Mary Magdalene; after Guido.
Artemisa; after A. D. Therbusch.
Venus asleep, watched by a Satyr; after Weisskircher.

KAWENBERG. See COWENBERG.

KAY, or KEY, WILLIAM. This painter was born at Breda in 1520, but he resided the greater part of his life at Antwerp. He was a fellow student with Francis Floris, under Lambert Lombard, and was a reputable painter of history and portrait. His historical subjects are well composed; and though his subjects exhibit less spirit and fire than those of Francis Floris, they are tempered with more judgment, and designed with more correctness. As a portrait painter, he was one of the ablest artists of his time. His portraits have been compared to those of Sir Anthony More, to which they are certainly little inferior. He was admitted into the Academy at Antwerp in 1540, and died in that city in 1568. [The name is KEY, not KAY.]

KEISAR, WILLIAM DE. This artist was a native of Antwerp about the year 1647. He was bred a jeweller, in which profession he became very eminent, but having been well educated, and taught to draw, he had a strong inclination for painting, and employed all his leisure hours in practising miniature, enamel, and oil-colours, both in large and small. According to Vertue, he fixed at last wholly on the former. Having painted some altar-pieces at Antwerp, his business called him to Dunkirk, where he drew a picture for the chapel of the English nuns. They were so pleased with it, that they persuaded de Keisar to go to England, and gave him letters of recommendation to Lord Melfort, then in favour with James II. The enthusiastic painter could not resist the proposal; he embarked on board an English vessel, and without acquainting his wife or family, sailed for England. His reception was equal to his wishes. He was introduced to the king, who promised to countenance him, and several persons of rank, who had known him at Antwerp, encouraged him in his new vocation. Transported with this prospect he sent for his wife, ordering her to dismiss his workmen, and convert his effects into money. Within half a year the bubble burst; the revolution happened, de Keisar's friends could no longer be his protectors, his business decreased, and the pursuit of the philosopher's stone, to which he had recourse in his despair, completed his ruin. He died at the age of forty-five, four or five years after the revolution. He left a daughter, whom he had taken great pains to instruct, and with success. She painted small portraits in oil, and copied well. She had several pictures by her father's hand, particularly a St. Catherine, painted for the queen dowager's chapel at Somerset-house, and his own portrait in water colours.

[KELDERMAN, JAN, an amateur painter of flowers, fruit, and birds, was a native of Dort in 1741. He was a scholar of Wouter Dam, and was assisted by several other artists of reputation. He has left several pictures of fruit and flowers, richly composed, in good taste, and of masterly execution. He died at Dort in 1820.]

KELERTHALER, JOHN, a German engraver, born at Dresden about the year 1530. He engraved some plates from the designs of John Nossen, a sculptor, who flourished at Dresden in 1575; among which are the following:

The Building of the Tower of Babel; J. Nossen, inv. Kelerthalers, sculp.
The Destruction of Babylon; the same.
The Roman Empire, with the Death of Cæsar in the back-ground.
The Pope receiving the Homage of Charlemagne.

[Others write his names Johann Kellerdaller.]

KELLER, GEORGE, an indifferent German engraver, who resided at Frankfort about the year 1605. His plates are chiefly confined to book ornaments, and have no great merit to recommend them. They are slightly etched, and sometimes retouched with the graver. He also engraved some views of towns, and camps with soldiers skirmishing, dated in 1605. [Many of his prints bear a considerably later date. It is said that he was born in 1576, and died in 1640.]

[KERKHOFF, D——, was born at Amsterdam in 1766. He was a scholar of Barbier Pietersz. His subjects were landscapes, views of cities, and waterfalls. His countrymen speak highly of his productions, and think him deserving to be placed in the first rank. He died in 1821.]

KERKHOVE, JOSEPH VANDER. This painter was born at Bruges in 1669, and studied at Antwerp, under Erasmus Quellinus, the younger. Mr. Pilkington says the elder, who died when Kerkhove was nine years of age. Under that master his progress was so rapid, that it surprised his instructor. On leaving the school of Quellinus he set out with an intention of travelling through France to Italy, but meeting with encouragement at Paris, he resided there some years, and abandoned his project of visiting Italy. On his return to Bruges, the number of commissions he received was such that he could with difficulty execute them. He was first employed in a series of fifteen pictures of the Life of our Saviour, for the church of the Dominicans at Bruges. In the collegiate church of St. Saviour, are four of the works of Mercy by him, and a fine picture of the Resurrection. At Ostend, he painted in fresco the ceiling of the town-house, representing an Assembly of the Gods, an ingenious composition, correctly designed and well coloured. He died at Bruges in 1724. [Balkema places his birth in 1664; but the better authorities differ from him, and place it either in 1669 or 1670.]

KERVER, JAMES, a German engraver on wood, who, according to Le Comte, resided at Frankfort about the year 1540. To him are attributed a set of wooden cuts of grotesque figures, standard-bearers, &c., in the old German taste, published at Frankfort in 1540, and the heads and small historical subjects for a folio volume, entitled Catalogus Annorum, &c., published at Berne the same year. He usually marked his cuts with the cipher  or , to which he sometimes added a knife, with a snail upon the top of it. A similar mark was used by James Kobel.

[KERVER, THIELMAN, flourished in the early part of the 16th century. There are many devotional books, missals, &c., with wood cuts to the borders, printed at that period, bearing his name on the title. Zani mentions him as a designer and engraver; he was probably a bookseller also.]

KESSEL, JOHN VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1626. He imitated the highly-finished style of John Breughel, and painted small landscapes, birds, reptiles, flowers, and fruit, which he touched with extraordinary neatness and precision. His colouring is clear and agreeable, sometimes approaching the sweet and silvery hues of Teniers. John van Kessel also painted portraits, in which he was surprisingly successful for an artist whose natural inclination led him to a very different branch of the art. Some of his pictures being sent to Spain, he was invited to the court of Madrid by Philip IV., and was so favourably received, that he was, soon after his arrival, appointed painter to the Queen. He returned to Antwerp, munificently rewarded by his royal patron, where he died, but it is not said in what year. [The foregoing article applies to two Van Kessels of the name of John, or Jan, father and son, who both painted the same subjects. John, the younger, went early to Spain in company with his father, and remained there. He was patronized by Philip V. and his queen, and died at Madrid in 1708, at the age of 64. Some of the portraits which he painted in Spain are in the manner of Van Dyck, and not much inferior to that master's.]

KESSEL, FERDINAND VAN, was the son and scholar of John van Kessel, born at Antwerp in 1660. He painted similar subjects to those of his father, and though he never equalled him in the beauty of his pencil, or the purity of his colour, his pictures have considerable merit. The king of Poland invited him to his court, where he executed many ingenious works, for which he was liberally remunerated by that prince, who conferred on him the order of knighthood. He painted landscapes with considerable success, in which, as he was not happy in designing figures, they were often introduced by Peter Eyckens, Dirk Maas, and others. Among his most esteemed works were his pictures of the four quarters of the globe, in the Dusseldorf gallery. [He died in 1696.]

KESSEL, NICHOLAS VAN. This painter was the nephew of the foregoing artist, born at Antwerp in 1684. He adopted the style of David Teniers, as the model of his imitation. In the early part of his life he went to Paris, where he had acquired some celebrity by his pictures of village festivals and merry-makings, when he fell into a dissipated and debauched train of life, which impaired his faculties, and degraded his talent. In the hope of more ready and considerable emolument, he attempted portrait painting, but never rose above mediocrity.

KESSEL, THEODORE, a Flemish engraver, who was probably a relation of the three preceding artists. He was born at Antwerp about the year 1620, and engraved several plates, many of which are etched, and others assisted with the graver, in a free, spirited manner. He etched the plates for a volume of vases, and ornamental compartments, in eight parts, from the designs of Adam de Viane, published at Utrecht. Most of the plates are marked with the initials of the designer, and his own cipher . We have also the following plates by him :

- The Portrait of Charles V.; after Titian.
- St. Gregory in Meditation; after T. Willeborts.
- A Reposo; after Giorgione.
- Magdalene at the feet of Christ, in the house of Simon; after the same.
- Christ and the woman of Samaria; after Caracci.
- The Adulteress before Christ; after the same.
- Susanna and the Elders; after Guido.
- The Virgin and Child, with Angels; after Vanduyck.
- An allegorical subject of Abundance; after Rubens.
- A set of four, representing the Triumph of Galatea. A Triton embracing a Sea Nymph. A Nymph in the - arms of a Sea God. A Faun seated near a Rock, with two Children and a Goat; after Rubens.

- A Boar Hunting; after the same.
- A Landscape, with a Man driving a Cart with Vegetables, and a Man and Woman with Oxen; after the same.
- A Landscape, the companion, called the Milk-maid; after the same.
- A set of Battles, and Attacks of Banditti; after P. Snayers. 1656.

[Brulliot acknowledges that he had not seen the set of prints with the monogram indicated in this article; but he mentions others that have the letters T. V. K. in Italic capitals, or in cursive letters. Nagler gives a list of his engravings.]

[KESSEL, JAN VAN, born at Amsterdam in 1648, imitated the style of Jacob Ruisdael in his landscapes and winter scenes; he particularly excelled in the latter. He died in 1698.]

KETEL, CORNELIUS. This artist was born at Gouda in 1548, and at twelve years of age began to learn design under his uncle, a tolerable painter, but a better scholar. At eighteen he went to Delft, where he studied a year under Anthony Blocklandt. He afterwards went to France, and was employed for a short time, in conjunction with some of his countrymen, in the chateau of Fontainebleau. On his return to Holland he remained at Gouda, little employed, on account of the troubles which then existed in that country, and which at length obliged him to take shelter in England, where he arrived in 1573. He was first occupied in painting portraits, and was seldom engaged on historical subjects, to which his inclination chiefly led him. At length, having painted an allegorical picture of Wisdom vanquishing Strength, it was presented to Sir Christopher Hatton, afterwards lord chancellor. This incident occasioned his introduction to court; he painted Queen Elizabeth, and several of the principal nobility. Ketel left England in 1581, and settled at Amsterdam, where he was first employed on a large picture, representing the portraits of the officers of the trained bands, for the gallery of the Mall. In 1589 he painted another large picture of the principal members of the Confraternity of St. Sebastian; both these considerable works were greatly admired. There is a whimsical tradition of this artist's having discontinued the use of brushes, and painting with the ends of his fingers; a capricious vanity, more worthy of a mountebank than an artist. He died in 1602.

KETERLAER, JOHN. This artist, probably a Dutchman, is mentioned by Le Comte as the engraver of a print representing a Globe, with several animals, supported in the air by a figure of Death, whose head appears above, with two wings and two trumpets.

KETTLE, TILLY. This artist was born in London about the year 1740. He was the son of a house-painter in the city, and studied at the Duke of Richmond's gallery, and in the academy in St. Martin's Lane. After practising portrait painting for some time in London, he went to the East Indies, where he remained a few years. He returned to England about the year 1777, but not meeting with much encouragement he determined to return to India, whither he attempted to travel by land, but died at Aleppo in 1798.

KEULEN, [or CEULEN,] JANSONS VAN. This artist is said to have been born in England, of Dutch parents. He was a portrait painter of considerable eminence in the reign of Charles I., and painted the king and several of the nobility, previous to the arrival of Vanduyck. It is probable he left this country during the civil war, as there is a large picture in the town-hall at the Hague, painted by him, representing the portraits of fourteen of the magistrates, dated 1647. It is well composed, and painted in the style of John van Ravesteyn. He died at the Hague in 1665. [Fuessli says in 1656. Portraits by Janson van Keulen are not rare in England, if those that possess them, and dealers, would not rob him of the credit by attributing them to Van Dyck.]

[KEUNÉ, HENRY, born at Haerlem in 1738, painted, in the style of Berkheyden, views of cities, in which he shows a good knowledge of perspective, and they are enlivened with numerous figures, so as to form very fine pictures. He died in 1788.]

[KEUX, JOHN LE, an eminent architectural engraver, was born at London in 1783. He was a pupil of Basire, with whom he remained about four years, and imbibed a decided taste for architectural subjects, especially those in the Gothic style. Refining on the manner of his master, he formed for himself one combining truthfulness and taste of delineation in a degree almost unprecedented—one equally removed from dry, mechanical, and mere pains-taking correctness on the one hand, and from that sort of freedom which is more spirited than scrupulous on the other. In almost every production of Le Keux there is striking evidence both of his perfect intelligence of, and his sympathy with, the subject; and without them mere exactness of imitation will accomplish comparatively little in architectural drawing, and at most give only approximations to what is professed to be described. John le Keux's peculiar talent has mainly contributed to the celebrity of many architectural publications that have themselves been instrumental in diffusing a taste for the Gothic style. His works may be briefly recorded by merely enumerating nearly all the best publications illustrative of Gothic architecture that appeared in his time: Britton's Architectural Antiquities, Cathedrals, &c.; the elder Pugin's Antiquities of Normandy, Gothic Specimens, and Gothic Examples; Neale's Westminster Abbey (in which the interior of Henry VII.'s Chapel is a wonderful performance). The plates in the first volume of Neale's "Churches" are also by him. To these may be added the "Memorials of Oxford," and the similar work on Cambridge, both of which are chiefly after drawings by Mackenzie, and are two most charming works of their kind. This very distinguished artist died in 1846.]

[KEY, ADRIEN THOMAS, cousin and scholar of William Key, flourished in 1575, as appears by his name and that date on a picture in the Museum at Antwerp. It is an exceeding well painted picture, in the style of Sir A. More, and appears to represent Christ and his Disciples at Supper, but is said to be portraits of the family of Franco y Feode-Briez. Balkema mentions another of females of the same family, also in the Museum. It is surprising that this artist should have so long escaped the notice of his countrymen, with such specimens of his ability constantly before them. The inscription on the first-mentioned picture is "Adrianus Thomæ Keii—fecit, 1575."

KEYL, MICHAEL, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He engraved several plates from pictures in the Dresden collection, and the cabinet of Count Bruhl. Among which are,

The dead Christ; after An. Caracci; in the Dresden gallery. The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; after Spagnoletto; the same.

KEYSER, THEODORE DE. In the gallery of the Louvre is a fine picture by this Dutch painter, representing the Burgomasters of Amsterdam deliberating on the honours to be paid to Mary of Medicis, on her entrance into that city in 1638. It is signed with his name. The heads are admirably painted, and with a richness of colouring nearly approaching to Rembrandt. [There is a picture by him in the National Gallery, bequeathed by the late Mr. Simmons, which may be considered as a fair specimen of his ability. The picture said to be in the Louvre, is now at the Hague, having been returned in 1815. According to the dates on his pictures, he flourished from 1620 to 1660.]

[KEYZER, HENRY DE, a portrait painter, by whom the portraits of Rombout Hogerbeets, his Wife, and Family, and that of the historian Cornelius Hooff, now in the Museum at Amsterdam, were painted.]

KHEL, ANDREW, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He was chiefly engaged in engraving portraits for books. His plates are executed with the graver in a neat style, and possess considerable merit. Among other portraits by him are the following:

Jacob Eldel, in an oval border, with some German verses. Bathol Hiatis; a small upright plate.

KICK, CORNELIUS. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1635. He was the son of a portrait painter, by whom he was instructed in design. For some time he followed the same pursuit, and had gained considerable reputation by his portraits, when he was induced to adopt a different branch, by the extraordinary admiration excited by the pictures of flowers and fruit, by John David de Heem. He abandoned portrait painting, and applied himself to still-life, in which he succeeded, and might have reached an eminent rank among the painters of those subjects, had he not been the slave of an invincible indolence, which was the bane of his talent and reputation. The few pictures he painted are however very highly finished, and delicately coloured. He died in the prime of life in 1675.

KIERINGS, or CIÉRINCX, JAMES. This painter, who is erroneously called Alexander by Descamps, was born at Utrecht in 1590. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he was a landscape painter of some celebrity. He came to England in the reign of Charles I., by whom he was employed to draw views, particularly of his Majesty's houses in Scotland. The landscapes he painted in Holland are generally embellished with figures by Cornelius Poelenburg. His pictures are freely and brightly touched, and his foliage is appropriated to the different kinds of trees he represented; they are generally marked with the cipher

Ɔ. He died in 1646. [It is said that he received instruction from Jan Miel, who was his junior by nine years; but there is no resemblance in their manners.]

KIESER, EBERHARD, a German engraver, who resided at Frankfort about the year 1630. He engraved part of the plates for a publication entitled, Thesaurus Philo-Politicus, hoc est, Emblemata sive Moralia-Politica; consisting of views of cities and towns in Germany, Spain, Italy, and other parts of Europe, printed at Frankfort in 1625. He also engraved some portraits; among others that of Prince John of Austria, on horseback, with a battle in the back-ground.

KILIAN, LUCAS, an eminent German engraver, born at Augsburg in 1579, and was instructed in the art by his step-father Dominic Custos, who, not content with teaching him the rudiments of design, sent him to Italy for improvement. He resided chiefly at Venice, where he engraved several plates after Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese, &c. He possessed an uncommon command of the graver, and he resembles in his style the works of Henry Goltzius and John Muller. His design is not however correct, and the effect of his prints is disturbed by fatiguing the lights with unnecessary work. The following are esteemed his best prints :

PORTRAITS.

- Lucas Kilian; æt. 55; se ipse sc. in argento. 1635; scarce.
Petrus Custos, vulgo Baltens, pictor et poeta Antwerpianus. 1609.
 Prince Henry Frederick of Nassau. 1620.
 Nicholas Christopher, Prince of Radzivil.
 Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden.
 Maria Eleonora, his Queen.
Franciscus Pisanus, scriptor Genuensis; after L. Borzone.
 Albert Durer; from a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after the younger Palma.
 The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes; after Tintoretto.
 The Resurrection; after Paolo Veronese.
 The Pieta, or the dead Christ on the lap of the Virgin; after Michael Angelo Buonaroti.
 The Holy Family; after Cornelius van Haerlem.
 Another Holy Family; after B. Spranger. 1605.
 Wisdom fettered by Love; after the same.
 The Nativity; after J. Rotenhamer. 1601.
 The Crucifixion; after a picture in the style of Tintoretto.
 Christ praying in the Garden; after Fred. Sustis.
 The Adoration of the Shepherds; after J. Heintz.
 The Descent from the Cross; after the same.
 The Rape of Proserpine; after the same.

[He died in 1637; at least that is the latest date on his prints.]

KILIAN, WOLFGANG, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Augsburg in 1581. He was also a pupil of Dominick Custos, and afterwards studied some years at Venice, where he engraved some plates after the works of the Venetian painters. His style resembles that of Lucas Kilian, though he never equalled him in the skilful handling of the graver. His best plates are his portraits, many of which are very neatly executed. He marked his prints WK. The following are among his best productions :

PORTRAITS.

- Wolfgang Kilian; inscribed, Labor improbus omnia vincit, se ipse sc.
 Ernest, Count of Mansfeld.
 Frederick, Baron of Teuffenbach.
 John Godefroi, Bishop of Wurtzbourg.
 Ferdinand III., Emperor.
 John Suicard, Archbishop and Elector of Mentz.
 Ferdinand of Bavaria, Archbishop and Elector of Cologne.
 Lotharius, Archbishop and Elector of Treves.
 John Major, mathematician of Augsburg.
 The Emperors and Archdukes of Austria, from 1229 to 1623; published at Augsburg in 1629.
 A set of neat Heads for a volume, entitled Genealogia sereniss. Borariæ Ducum, et Quorundam Genuina Effigies. 1605.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Baptism of Christ; after P. Veronass.
 The Assumption of the Virgin; after Tintoretto.
 The Merciful Samaritan; after Giac. Bossano.
 The Resurrection; after Francesco Bassano.
 The Descent from the Cross; after Paolo Farinato.

- The Four Evangelists; after his own designs.
 The Festival of the Peace of Westphalia, given in 1649; after J. Sandrart; in two sheets; scarce.
 Part of the plates of the Saints of the order of St. Benedict, for the volume entitled Imagines Sanctorum Ord. S. Benedicti, &c. 1625.
 Part of the Architectural Views, and others, for the history of the Monastery of St. Udalric, at Augsburg; from the designs of Matthias Kager.

[He died in 1662.]

KILIAN, PHILIP, was the eldest son of Wolfgang Kilian, born at Augsburg about the year 1625. He engraved some plates of Theses from the designs of his father, and also several portraits: which, though inferior to his younger brother, mentioned in the succeeding article, are not without merit. [He was born in 1628, and died in 1693.]

KILIAN, BARTHOLOMEW. This eminent engraver was the younger son of Wolfgang Kilian, born at Augsburg in 1630. After being instructed by his father he went to Frankfort, where he became a pupil of Matthew Merian for two years and a half. He afterwards visited Paris, where he engraved some plates from Testelin, and Philip de Champagne. On his return to Germany he settled at Augsburg, where he engraved several plates of Theses, and other subjects, particularly a number of excellent portraits, which are deservedly admired. He worked both with the graver and the point, in a very pleasing style. The following are some of his most admired works :

PORTRAITS.

- Benedict Winkler; after J. Ulric Mayr.
 Michael In Hof, Noriberg.
 Leonhard Fussenegger; Bart. Hopfer, pinx.
 Johan Conrad Bobel; after the same.
 Johan Henrich Fæber; after the same.
 Hartman Creid; after the same.
 Johan Leonhard Schorer; after F. Franck. 1665.
Bernhardus Verascha, Medicus Basiliensis; oval; fine.
Augustus II. Abbas Einsidensis. 1686.
Joannes III. Poloniae Rex; Ad. Bloemaert del.; as large as life.
 Maximilian Emanuel, Electoral Prince of Bavaria.
 The Emperor Joseph on horseback; one of the largest prints known; as large as life.
 A set of Portraits, represented in an emblematical manner; after J. Schreyer.
 Three Medallions of Archbishops of Saltzbourg.

He also engraved the Virgin and Child; after C. Sing; fine. [He died in 1696.]

KILIAN, WOLFGANG PHILIP. This artist was of the same family as those mentioned in the preceding articles, but of very inferior capacity. He flourished about the year 1720, and was chiefly employed in portraits for books, which are executed in a very feeble style. We have by him several heads for a work in folio, entitled, Vita et Effigies Procancelariorum Academiae Altorfinae, published at Nuremberg in 1721; and for another work, Icones Consiliariorum di Illustri Republicâ Noribergensi, published at Nuremberg in 1733. He also engraved the portrait of Christian Ernest, Margrave of Brandenburg, with some German verses. [He was born in 1654, and died in 1732.]

KILIAN, PHILIP ANDREW, was also of the same family, born at Augsburg in 1714, and was first instructed in engraving by Andrew Friederich, of Augsburg; but he afterwards was a pupil of George Martin Preissler, at Nuremberg. He drew correctly, and executed several plates after the pictures in the Dresden Gallery, which attest the able manner in which he handled both the point and the graver. Among others, we have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

Clemens Rezzonico, Venetus, Pontif. Max. G. D. Porta pinz.

Francis I., Emperor of Germany; after Meytens.

Maria Teresa, Empress; the companion.

C. Christopher, Count von Schiden, Prussian Field-Marshal; after Stranz.

Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick; after A. Pesne.

Johan Martin Cristell; A. P. Kilian, del. et sculp.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Christ praying in the Garden; after his own design.

Magdalene washing the Feet of Christ; after Nic. Grassi.

The Adoration of the Magi; after P. Veronese; from the Dresden Collection.

The Adulteress before Christ; after Tintoretto; same collection.

The Baptism of St. Augustine, by St. Ambrose; after Pittoni.

The Daughter of Herodias with the Head of St. John; after C. Dolci.

St. Cecilia; after the same.

The Holy Family; after Carlo Loti.

The Virgin, with a glory of angels; Regina Angelorum; after J. G. Bergmüller; fine.

The Virgin giving plenary Indulgences to St. Francis; after C. T. Scheffler; fine.

St. Cosmus and St. Damian; after J. W. Baumgaertner.

[He died in 1759. Engravers of the name of Kilian are numerous: Zani mentions about twenty.]

KILLEGREW, ANNE. This ingenious lady was the daughter of Dr. Henry Killegrew, master of the Savoy, and one of the prebendaries of Westminster. She was born in London, a little before the Restoration, and at an early age gave proofs of uncommon talents. Dryden has celebrated her genius for painting and poetry in a long ode, in which he is quite lavish in her praise. And Anthony Wood styles her "a grace for beauty and a muse for wit." She was maid of honour to the Duchess of York, and painted the portrait of her mistress, and that of the Duke of York, afterwards James II. She also painted some historical subjects and pieces of still-life. Her poems were published after her death, with a print of her, engraved by Becket, from a portrait painted by herself, which is in the style of Sir Peter Lely. She died of the small-pox, in 1685, in the twenty-fifth year of her age, and was buried in the Savoy chapel, where a neat monument is fixed in the wall, with a Latin inscription, setting forth her beauty and accomplishments, her virtue and piety. [Dryden celebrated her memory in an Ode, remarkable for the sublimity of the opening stanza.]

KILLENSTEYN, or KITTENSTEYN, C., an indifferent Dutch engraver, by whom we have several small prints of subjects taken from the history of Joseph and Potiphar, neatly executed, but without taste. He also engraved a plate representing a gentleman and a lady conversing in a garden; after Theodore Hals.

KING, DANIEL, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He etched some plates in the style of Hollar, but greatly inferior to him; among which are several of the prints for Dugdale's Monasticon. He published the Vale Royal of Cheshire with plates of his own engraving; among which is the cathedral of Chester, and other views of churches and castles.

KING, GEORGE, an obscure English engraver, who lived about the year 1740. He was almost entirely confined to book-plates, which are very indifferently executed. Among others, we have the following portraits by him:

Lady Falconberg.

Mrs. Elizabeth Thomas; affixed to her Memoirs of Py-lades and Corinna; ab originali sculp.

Richard Gwinnet, poet.

KING, GILES, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1762. He engraved some plates of fish, from Arnold van Acken.

[KINSON, FRANÇOIS, born at Bruges in 1774, a portrait painter, who was patronized by imperial and royal personages, from Napoleon down to Charles X. He painted Jerome Buonaparte when king of Westphalia; Bernadotte when prince of Ponte-Corvo; the Prince of Orange, now king of Holland, and the Princess, for which William I. decorated him with the order of the Lion; the Duchess de Berri, and the Duchess of Angoulême; and was appointed painter to Charles X. He also painted the portraits of several marshals and general officers of the imperial reign. He received commensurate honours, and died at his native city in 1839. His biographer says that his portraits are distinguished by a graceful position, a good choice of the accessories, colouring soft and brilliant, and a happy resemblance, which constitutes the essential merit of every portrait. In the account of him in the "Galerie des Artistes Brugeois," his name is written Kinsoen, and his birth placed in 1770.]

KINTS, PETER, a Dutch engraver on wood, who flourished from the year 1610 to 1620. He executed several cuts in imitation of slight sketches with a pen, from the designs of a painter whose monogram is composed of the letters A. S. joined together. Among others, there is a wooden cut by him of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, in which the heads are of a fine expression, and the figures well drawn. He usually signed his prints with the initials P. K. [Kints was living in 1635. The letters A. S. signify Antony Sallaert, a painter of Brussels.]

KIP, WILLIAM. This artist, probably an Englishman, is mentioned by Lord Orford as the engraver of some triumphal arches; dated 1603.

KIP, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, who was a native of Amsterdam, and came to England not long after the Revolution. He engraved a great number of plates of views of the palaces and seats in this kingdom; chiefly after the designs of Leonard Kniff. He also engraved a large View of Greenwich Hospital, and the exterior and interior of the Danish Church, built by Cibber. There is a plate of birds by him, after Barlow, and a few portraits, among which is that of Marcellus Malpighius. He was near 70 years old when he died, in Westminster, in 1722.

KIRKALL, EDWARD. This artist was born at Sheffield in Yorkshire, about the year 1695. He was the son of a lock-smith, and was instructed in the rudiments of drawing in his native town. In search of improvement, he visited London, and for some time was employed in gravings arms, stamps, ornaments, and cuts for books. In 1725 he engraved the plates for the new edition of Inigo Jones's Stonehenge. At this time he applied himself to designing the figure from the model. He invented a mode of producing prints in chiaro-scuro, by a mixture of etching and mezzotinto, with the assistance of wooden blocks. The outline is boldly etched, the dark shadows are supplied by mezzotinto, and the demi-tint is introduced by wooden cuts, producing a curious effect. This process, in the hands of an able artist, might perhaps become very interesting, but it does not appear that the talents of Kirkall were sufficient to bring it to perfection. We have by this artist some etchings and engravings, several prints in mezzotinto, and a number in chiaro-scuro; among which are the following:

PRINTS IN MEZZOTINTO.

- The Cartoons of Raffaele; in eight plates.
- The Bust of the Saviour; after the same.
- Apollo and Daphne; in green.
- A Rustic Family, with their Flocks and Herds; after Rossano; the same.
- A set of ten Sea-pieces; after W. vande Velde; printed in sea-green.
- A set of thirty, of Plants and Flowers; after Van Huisum.

SUBJECTS IN CHIARO-SCURO.

- Aeneas carrying Anchises on his shoulders*; after the cut by Hugo da Carpi, from Raffaele, inscribed, Imitando celsavit E. Kirkhall. 1722.
- The Holy Family, with St. Joseph leaning on a chair; after the same.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Pierino del Vaga.
- St. Jerome contemplating a Crucifix.

[He was much employed in engraving book-plates, and was liberal in his decorations of the portraits of the lady writers of the day. Pope, in the Dunciad, notices him for it: "In flowers and pearls by bounteous Kirkhall drest."]

KITCHIN, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He engraved several book-plates and portraits; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

- Thomas Adams, minister of the Gospel.
- James Foster, D. D.
- John Gill, D. D.; after Highmore.
- Mustapha, a Turk, servant to George I.
- Lewis Maximilian Mahomet, valet de chambre to the same.

He also engraved the south view of Tideswell Church, in the county of Derby.

[KLAASZEN VAN WIERINGEN, CORNELIUS, a landscape and marine painter, born at Haerlem, where he died in 1635. Very little of his history is known, but his pictures are richly ornamented with vessels and figures.]

KLASS, FREDERICK CHRISTIAN, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Dresden in 1752. He was a scholar of Casanova, and became an eminent landscape painter, and a member of the Electoral Academy. By him we have several spirited etchings, from his own designs, of picturesque views in Saxony, and others; among which are the following:

- A set of fourteen small Landscapes, inscribed, Erster Versuch (first essay); Von F. C. Klass.
- Six views in Saxony, with figures and cattle.
- Four larger Landscapes; very pleasing scenery.
- Two Mountainous Landscapes; F. C. Klass, fec. 1775.

[He died in 1827.]

KLAUBER, SEBASTIAN IGNATIUS, a modern German engraver, born at Augsburg in 1754. He was first instructed by his father, John Baptist Klauber, an obscure artist, but afterwards went to Paris, where he became a pupil of John George Wille. He was made a member of the French Academy, and engraver to the king in 1787. During the revolution, Klauber retired to Nuremberg, where he published the Gems in the collection of Baran de Stosch, now in the cabinet of the King of Prussia; the greater part of which are engraved by himself. He worked chiefly with the graver, in a neat, finished style. He engraved several portraits, and other subjects; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

- Gaspar Netscher; se ipse pinx.

The Wife of Francis Mieris; after Mieris.
Charles Vanloo, painter; after F. le Sueur; his reception plate at the Academy in 1787.
Christopher Gabriel Allegrain, sculptor; after Duplessis.
Count de Herzberg; after Schroeder. 1795.

SUBJECTS.

- Salvator Mundi; after Stella.
- Petit ecolier de Haerlem; after Poelenburg.

[There are prints by him as late as 1811; it is supposed that he died in 1820.]

KLEINSCHMIDT, JOHN JACOB, a German engraver, who flourished at Augsburg about the year 1700. He engraved the frontispiece and several of the plates for a folio volume, published in that city, entitled Representatio Belli ob Successionem in Regno Hispanico. They are indifferently executed, and the drawing very defective. He also engraved some plates of horsemen, after George Philip Rugendas.

KLENGHEL, JOHN CHRISTIAN. This artist was born at Kesseldorf, near Dresden, in 1751. He was a scholar of Dietricy, in whose varied style he has painted several pictures, which are much admired in his own country, and which possess sufficient merit to obtain him the distinction of a member of the Electoral Academy. He has etched several plates, chiefly landscapes, which are spiritedly executed in the manner of his master. The following are by him:

- A set of twelve Views in Saxony; by J. Ch. Klenghel.
- Four Landscapes; dated 1770.
- Two Mountainous Landscapes. 1771.
- Twelve Landscapes; after designs by Dietricy; J. Ch. Klenghel. 1773.
- A large Landscape; after Ruysdael. 1787.
- Two views near Rome; K. F. Rome, 1791.

[He died at Dresden in 1824.]

KLERCK, HENRY DE, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1570. He was a disciple of Martin de Vos, and painted history in the style of that master. Several of his works in the churches of the Low Countries, particularly at Brussels, maintain their respectability amidst the productions of the most eminent artists of his time. In the church of St. James, at Brussels, the principal altar-piece is painted by De Klerck, representing the Crucifixion, with the Marys and the Disciples; the composition is good, but the colouring is inferior to some of his other works. In the church of Our Lady, in the same city, is a picture of the Holy Family, well composed, and of a fine effect; and in the convent of St. Elizabeth is an altar-piece representing the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, esteemed his best performance. [It is said that he painted the figures in some of John Breughel's Landscapes.]

KLIM, HANS, or JOHN, a German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1600. Some wooden cuts, published at Wittenberg, between the years 1590 and 1603, are attributed to him. They are marked with the cipher HK., which was also used by an engraver on wood much more ancient than this artist.

KLOCKER, DAVID. This painter was born at Hamburg in 1629, and was a scholar of George Jacob, a Dutch artist, resident in that city. He afterwards visited Italy, and studied some years at Venice and Rome. On his return from Italy he was invited to the court of Sweden, where he painted the Royal Family, and the principal nobility, and executed many historical works, as well as portraits. The pictures of this master are chiefly confined to Sweden, where he passed the greater part of his life, and died there in 1698.

[KLOMP, ALBERT, painted landscapes and cattle in the manner of P. Potter, as far as regards the subjects. He was a respectable artist, and some of his pictures have considerable merit. His works bear date from 1602 to 1622; consequently he could not have been a pupil, nor an imitator of Paul Potter, as most of the writers who have noticed him have stated.]

KLUPFFEL, J. C., an engraver of little note, who was apparently a native of Germany. He engraved several small plates of the Cries of Rome, copied from the prints by Villamena. They are neatly executed, but in a stiff, formal style.

[KLUYT, PIERRE THIERRY, a native of Delft, was one of the best scholars of Mireveldt.]

KNAPTON, GEORGE, an English painter and engraver, born in 1698. He was a scholar of Jonathan Richardson, and was chiefly occupied in painting portraits in crayons. In conjunction with Arthur Pond, he engraved and published a set of prints from the drawings of the most celebrated painters. The work consists of ninety-five plates, sixty-eight of which were engraved by Pond, and twenty-seven by Knapton; they are chiefly landscapes, after Guercino, and are faithfully copied in a very creditable manner. He was also concerned in the publication of the heads of illustrious persons, engraved by Houbraken, and other works. In 1765, Knapton was painter to the Dilettanti Society, and on the death of Slaughter, was appointed surveyor and keeper of the King's pictures. He died at Kensington in 1788.

KNELLER, SIR GODFREY. This distinguished painter was born at Lubeck in 1648. He was the son of an architect, who destined him to a military life, and with that view sent him to Leyden, to study mathematics and fortification. But his genius leading him strongly to painting, his father indulged his propensity, and sent him to Amsterdam, where he entered the school of Rembrandt, and afterwards studied under Ferdinand Bol. When he was seventeen years of age he went to Rome, and became a disciple of Carlo Maratti and Bernini; when he began to acquire some fame as a painter of history, and had made considerable progress in the study of architecture. He afterwards visited Venice, where he received great civilities from the principal nobility, particularly the Donati and Gartoni, for whom he painted several family pictures, and other portraits, particularly the Cardinal Bassadonna. These marks of distinction could not however detain him in Italy; by the importunity of some friends, he was prevailed on to come to England, where he arrived with his brother, John Zachary Kneller, in 1674. They were recommended to a Hamburg merchant resident in London, for whom he painted a family picture, which was much admired. Mr. Vernon, secretary to the Duke of Monmouth, having seen it, sat to Kneller, and the portrait being shown to the duke, he was so much pleased with it, that he introduced the painter to Charles II., and engaged the king to sit to him, at a time when the Duke of York had been promised a picture of the king by Sir Peter Lely. Charles, unwilling to undergo the ceremony of a double sitting, proposed that both the artists should paint him at the same time. Lely, as an established master, chose the light he liked; the stranger was to paint the picture as he could, and performed it with such facility and expedition, that his picture was in a manner finished, when Lely's was only dead coloured. The novelty pleased, and this success fixed Kneller here. The prodigious number of his portraits prove the continuance of his reputation. Charles II. sent him to Paris, to draw Louis XIV., but the king died during his absence. James II. was equally favourable to him; and was sitting for his picture to him when he received the news that the Prince of Orange was landed. King William distinguished Kneller still more; for that prince he painted the Beauties at Hampton-court, and was knighted by him in 1692. His works in the Gallery of Admirals were done in the same reign, and several of them are worthy so noble a memorial. The portraits of the Kit-cat club were the last of Kneller's works in that reign, and the last of his public works. He lived to paint George I., was made a baronet by him, and continued to paint during the greater part of his reign. In 1722, Sir Godfrey was seized with a violent fever, from the immediate danger of which he was rescued by Dr. Meade; he remained however in a languishing condition, and died in 1723.

It has been justly observed of Sir Godfrey Kneller, that he lessened his own reputation, as he chose to make it subservient to his fortune. Had he lived in a country where his merit had been rewarded according to the worth of his productions, instead of the number, he might have shone in the roll of the greatest masters; but he united the highest vanity with the most consummate negligence of character; at least, where he offered one picture to fame, he sacrificed twenty to lucre; and he met with customers of so little judgment, that they were fond of being painted by a man, who would have gladly disowned his works the moment they were paid for. It is, however, allowed that he was a correct and graceful designer of a head; the hair is admirably disposed, and if the locks seem unnaturally elevated, it must be considered as an instance of the painter's art. He lived in an age when the women erected edifices of three stories on their heads: had he represented them in such a preposterous attire, in half a century his works would have been ridiculous. To lower their dress to a natural level, when the eye was accustomed to pyramids, would have shocked their prejudices, and diminished the resemblance. He took a middle way, and weighed out ornament to them of more natural materials. Still it must be owned, there is too great a sameness in his airs, and little imagination in his compositions: see but a head, it interests you; uncover the rest of the canvass, you wonder faces so expressive could be employed so insipidly. [Notwithstanding this censure, there are numerous portraits by Kneller, painted in a very masterly manner: among them are those of Newton and Dryden; but that on which he most prided himself, was the Converted Chinese, at Windsor Castle.]

KNELLER, JOHN ZACHARY, was the elder brother of Sir Godfrey Kneller, born at Lubeck in 1635. After travelling through Italy, he accompanied his brother to England, in 1674. He painted architecture and still-life, in fresco and in oil, and copied some of Sir Godfrey's pictures in water-colours. John Zachary Kneller died in London in 1702.

[KNIP, NICHOLAS FREDERIC, a landscape, fruit, and flower painter, was born at Nimeguen in 1742. Until the age of thirty he led a wandering life, working at gentlemen's country-seats wherever he could obtain employment; he then married, and settled at Tilbourg, where he painted landscape, fruit, and flower pieces, of small dimensions, generally from twelve to eighteen inches, for which his price was from fifty to sixty florins. At the age of 53 he lost his sight, and lived in a state of blindness for nearly fourteen years. He died at the age of 67. His pictures, being painted after nature, have great merit, and his drawings, of which he left many, are thought to equal, in composition, those of the best artists of his class.]

[KNIP, HENRIETTE GERTRUDE, born at Tilbourg in 1783, distinguished herself as a painter of fruit and flowers. She was the daughter of Nicholas Frederic Knip, a flower painter, who unfortunately lost his sight before her birth. She received lessons from Van Spaendonck, and painted in water colours from compositions made by her father previous to his misfortune. In 1824 she took lessons from the celebrated Van Dael, and commenced painting in oil. She produced numerous pictures, which were exhibited in France, Germany, Flanders, Amsterdam, and the Hague, and sold for good prices. She died at Haerlem in 1842.]

KNIPBERGEN, N., a Dutch artist, of whom nothing more is known, than that he painted landscapes in the style of Paul Brill. His sites are generally taken from the romantic scenery of Switzerland and Germany. He is said to have possessed an extraordinary facility of handling, without the appearance of negligence; but there is a want of taste in the arrangement of his forms, and in the disposition of his figures. He was little acquainted with aerial perspective, and his distances do not recede with due degradation.

KNORR, G. W., a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg about the year 1626. He executed some portraits and book-plates in a very indifferent style; among others, he engraved, conjointly with a A. C. Fleischman, the plates for a work entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published at Nuremberg in 1626.

KNUFER, or KNUFFER, NICHOLAS. This painter was born at Leipsic, in Saxony, in 1603. Having shown an early inclination for the art, he was placed under an obscure painter, named Emanuel Nysens, by whose instruction he was so little benefited, that he did not remain with him more than two years. He afterwards visited Magdeburg, where he studied under another indifferent artist, until 1630, when he went to Utrecht, and became a scholar of Abraham Bloemaert. Under that master he became a very respectable painter of historical subjects of a small size. He was commissioned by the King of Denmark to paint some pictures of battles, which gained him great reputation. He resided some time at the Hague, where he met with considerable encouragement. One of his most admired pictures was formerly in the collection of the Greffier Fagel, representing an Assembly of the Gods. He died in 1660.

KOBEL, JAMES, a German engraver on wood, to whom are attributed the cuts for a work, entitled Mapen des heyligen Romischen Reichs, consisting of single figures of soldiers holding banners, with the arms of all the provinces and cities of the German empire. They are executed in a very spirited manner, and are generally marked with the initials I. K. He flourished about the year 1520.

KOBELL, FERDINAND, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Manheim in 1740. He distinguished himself at an early age by some views in the neighbourhood of his native city, and was appointed landscape painter to the Elector of Bavaria. We have several etchings by this artist, executed with taste and spirit; among which are the following:

Four middle-sized Landscapes; dated 1767; F. Kobell, fec.

A set of six small plates of the Sports of Children; F. Kobell, 1769, ag. forti.

Four Landscapes, with ruins; F. Kobell, Manheim. 1770.

Four mountainous Landscapes; F. Kobell. 1772.

[He was an excellent landscape painter; and his etchings amount to upwards of 230, of which the Baron de Stengel has given a catalogue raisonné. He died at Munich in 1799.]

KOBELL, WILLIAM, is the son of the preceding artist, born at Manheim about the year 1766, and was instructed in landscape painting and engraving by his father. He has etched some charming plates, after the works of the principal landscape painters of the Dutch school, in which he has been uncommonly successful in representing the particular style of each master. The following is a list of some of his interesting productions:

A Landscape, with Travellers, and Horses loaded; after W. Romeyn.

Two Landscapes, with Figures and Cattle; after Berghem.

Cavaliers and Horses at the door of an inn; after Wouwerman.

A Landscape, with a Woman carrying a Lamb, with an Ox and some Sheep; after J. le Duq.

A Shepherdess, with a Cow and some Sheep; after Th. van Bergen.

A Landscape, with a Waterfall; after J. Both.

A View in Holland; after J. Wynants.

A Landscape, with a Shepherd playing on his Pipe, and several Animals; after A. vande Velde.

Figures going a hawking; after Karel du Jardin.

[He painted battles, and landscapes with rural subjects, in which he endeavoured to imitate the manner of Wouwerman. His etchings and aquatint engravings, after the best of the Dutch masters, are numerous, and are highly esteemed. He was living in 1834. See Nagler for a list of his etchings.]

[KOBELL, FRANZ, a landscape and architectural designer, for he can scarcely be called painter, was born at Manheim in 1749, and died at Munich in 1822. From a strong predilection for the art of painting he declined trade, and joined his brother Ferdinand, who was secretary to the electoral court of Manheim, and with his assistance arrived at such a proficiency as attracted the notice of the elector, Charles Theodore, who appointed him his principal painter. By the elector's bounty he was enabled to visit Italy, where he remained about nine years, studying the classical scenery and architecture of the country: of each he made numerous sketches. On his return to his native place he disdained, says his biographer, the use of the brush, and confined himself to the use of the pen in sketching and drawing landscapes and buildings, of which it is said he made above ten thousand. His oil pictures are, consequently, rare. This notice is intended to distinguish him from his brother Ferdinand, who signed his works generally F. Kobell, as an engraver and painter.]

[KOBELL, HENDRIK, or HENRI, (sometimes called junior,) a marine and landscape painter, was born at Rotterdam in 1751. His father was a merchant, and intended his son for the same pursuit; but as he was instructed in drawing, probably a part of the education of the day, he showed his predilection by sketching the shipping in the port of his native town, and river scenery. He was sent to England, while a youth, on commercial matters, and remained some time in London, a place congenial to him, as it gave him opportunities of improving himself in his favourite art. On his return home he abandoned trade altogether. He went to Amsterdam, where, in two years, he made such progress that the Academy of that city received him as a member, and reckoned him among the best. His next excursion was to the Rhine and the Meuse, and he painted landscapes and river scenes analogous to those of Zaffleven. On his return, he settled in Rotterdam, and continued to enrich the portfolios of amateurs with his beautiful drawings; among which, there are some of naval engagements that are considered excellent. These drawings are generally with the pen, heightened with Indian ink, or water colour. He did not, however, confine himself to drawing, but painted marine subjects in oil, which were highly esteemed. His touch is bold and spirited; his colouring somewhat too green, and his water vapoury; but he shows taste and judgment in the selection and arrangement of his subject. He died in 1782. It is supposed that there are some etchings of marine subjects by him; one is mentioned by Brulliot with the early date of 1767.]

[KOBELL, JAN, an eminent landscape and animal painter, and engraver, the son of Hendrik Kobell, the marine painter, was born at Utrecht in 1782. As his father died in the same year, and his mother shortly afterwards, he was placed in the Orphan Asylum. When he grew up it was decided by his relatives that he should be an artist, and he was put under the tuition of W. R. Vander Wal, the landscape and animal painter, who paid great attention to his studies, obliging him to design after nature, and to make Paul Potter his model. He made rapid progress, and produced various landscapes and animal subjects, which were received with great approbation, and were admitted into the most important collections. This approbation continued to increase until the time of his death, which occurred in 1814. His pictures, for the truth of the representations, skilful arrangement, and beautiful colouring, are worthy rivals of the works of Paul Potter. They are highly appreciated, not only in his own country, but in every other where there is a love of nature and art. His countrymen are justly proud of them, and consider that they uphold the celebrity of the old Netherland school of painters; and his example has not been lost on the present artists of Holland, who seem determined to rival, and, if possible, to surpass their illustrious predecessors. Though he obtained liberal prices for his works, the commercial value has more than quadrupled since his death. There are a few etchings by him which, as well as his beautiful drawings, are highly esteemed: the latter are very valuable.]

[KOBELL, JAN, JUNIOR, was the son of Jan Kobell, an engraver, the younger brother of Hendrik Kobell, consequently cousin to the preceding. He was born at Rotterdam in 1800, or 1802 (for authorities differ). He obtained a great reputation as a landscape and cattle painter. He died in 1838. An opinion may be formed of the estimation in which his works are held in Holland by the prices at which they were publicly sold within one year after his decease, namely, his pictures from 1000 to 2800 florins, and his drawings from 300 to 400 florins.]

KOCK, MATTHEW. See COCK.

KOCK, M. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1695. Among other prints, he engraved a large plate, representing the Procession of William III., which took place the 5th of February, 1691.

KOEBERGER, WENCESLAUS, a Flemish painter and architect, born at Antwerp in 1554. He studied painting under Martin de Vos, and on leaving that master went to Italy. He remained some years at Rome, where he made designs of the finest monuments of art in that city and vicinity. He afterwards went to Naples, and established himself there, where he formed an intimacy with a Flemish painter, named Franco, whose daughter he married. This union fixed him at Naples for several years, during which time he received many invitations to return to his native country, and was commissioned to paint a picture for the confraternity of St. Sebastian, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint, which was placed in their chapel in the cathedral of Notre Dame at Antwerp; and was considered a popular and interesting work of art, even in that rich assemblage of the best productions of the Flemish school. At the solicitation of the Archduke Albert, Koeberger quitted Italy with regret, and returned to Antwerp. He soon after settled at Brussels, where he was appointed painter and principal architect to the Archduke. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches of Brabant and Flanders; and for several years had the superintendance of the public edifices. Vandyck painted the portrait of Koeberger, which is finely engraved by Lucas Vosterman. He died in 1634, *aged 70. [If he was born in 1554, and died in 1634, he must have been 80. Balkema says he was born in 1560, and died in 1630, which would make him 70.]

KOECK, or COECK, PETER. This artist was a painter, an architect, and an engraver on wood. He was born at Alost in 1500, and educated under Bernard van Orley at Brussels. He afterwards visited Italy, where he principally applied himself to the study of architecture. On his return to Brussels, he was engaged by a company of speculators to paint the cartoons for a manufactory of tapestry they intended to establish in Turkey; on which occasion Koeck visited Constantinople, and made designs of whatever he thought remarkable in the manners and customs of the Turks. The project not succeeding, after a year's absence he returned to Brussels, where he painted several pictures for the churches, and portraits, and died painter to the Emperor Charles V., in 1550. He engraved the designs he had made in Turkey in seven large wooden cuts, which, when joined together, form a very long print, resembling a frieze. They represent, in seven compartments,

The March of the Grand Signior with his Janizaries.

The Suite of the Grand Signior in his Promenade.

A Turkish Marriage, with their Dances.

Their Ceremonies in Burying the Dead.

Their Festivals at the New Moon.

Their Customs at their Repasts.

Their mode of Travelling and making War.

The whole forms a very curious work, containing a great number of figures, habited in their particular modes, and very carefully executed. On a tablet in the first cut is the following inscription, in bad old French, "Les moeurs et fachom de faire des Turcz, avecq les Regions y appartenantes, ont est au vif contrefaictz par Pierre Coeck d'Alost, lui estant en Turque, 'an de Jesu Christ MDXXXIII. le quel

* Mr. Pilkington has dated his death in 1604. This cannot be correct, as Vandyck was then only five years old.

aussy de sa main propre a pour traict ses figures duysantes à l'impression d'y celles." The last of the cuts is inscribed, "Marie ver Hulst, vefue du dict Pierre d'Alost, trespasse en l'an MDL. a fuict imprimer les dict figures, souz grace et privilege de l'Imperiale majesté en l'au MCCCCCLIII."

KOEDYCK, D., a Dutch mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1730, by whom we have a few prints, after Metzcu, and other masters, and a portrait of Michael Musscher, painter.

[KOEDYK, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Zaandam in 1681, was honoured with the favours of Peter the Great of Russia, from which it might be supposed that he was a painter of shipping: this, however, is not stated. Balkema says that there is now no doubt that Koedyk painted the renowned picture called L'Escalier Tournant, (the Winding Stair,) which was purchased in Holland to be sent to Russia. This picture, together with La Chambre de l'Accouchée, by Gerard Dou, and a large herd of cattle by Paul Potter, also intended for the royal collection, never reached its destination; they were all lost in a dreadful storm on their passage. The portrait of Admiral Pieter Pieterz Hein, in the Museum at Amsterdam, is by Koedyk.]

[KOEKKOEK, JAN HERMANN, a marine painter of Holland, born in 1778, was the father of the celebrated Koekkoeks of the present day. The reputation of the sons has thrown that of the father into the shade, but his pictures are still esteemed, and are to be found in good collections. He was living at Amsterdam in 1844.]

[KOEKKOEK, JAN, son of the preceding, was born at Middlebourg in 1811. He painted the same subjects as his father, and was an artist of great promise, but died at the early age of 20, in 1831. Three of his brothers are still living, and hold very distinguished ranks among the present very excellent painters of Holland: their names are Bernard Cornelius, Marinus Adrien, and Herman; their subjects are marine views, and landscapes with figures and cattle, all which are treated by them in a superior style.]

KOENE, ISAAC. This painter was a native of Holland, and is mentioned by Descamps as a scholar of Jacob Ruysdael. He painted landscapes and waterfalls in the style of that master, in which the figures are frequently introduced by Barthelemy Gaal. [He was born at Haerlem in 1650, and died there in 1713. His name is not erased from all his pictures; it is still sometimes found on them.]

KOENIG, ANTHONY BALTHASAR, a Prussian engraver, born at Berlin about the year 1676. He engraved several portraits and other subjects, which are neatly executed with the graver. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick William, King of Prussia; after Weidemann.
Frederick, Baron of Derfflinger, General of Cavalry.
Charles Gottfried Schrader, Aulic-counsellor to the King.
Alexander Hermann, Count of Wartensleben. 1716.
The Monument of Charles Gottfried Schrader.

[KOENRAAT, ———, born at the Hague in 1678, was a scholar of Constantine Netscher; and painted flower-pieces with a good tone of colour and a light pencil. He died in 1747.]

KOETS, ROELOF. This painter was born at Zwoll in 1655, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by his father, an obscure artist, who afterwards placed him under the tuition of Gerard Terburg, with whom he remained until he was eighteen years of age. He devoted himself almost entirely to portrait painting, in which he was much employed at the court of Henry Casimir, Stadtholder of Friesland; and afterwards by William III., whose portrait he painted, and those of the principal English nobility who attended the king at Loo. He died in 1725. [It is said that he painted five thousand portraits with his own hand, all of which were well finished, and without assistance from other artists. Where are they to be found?]

KOHL, ANDREW, an obscure German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1609. Among other things, he engraved an ornamental frontispiece to a folio book of Architecture, marked A. K. 1609. It is executed on copper, in imitation of a wooden cut, in a free, masterly style, resembling a drawing with a pen.

KOHL, CLEMENT, a modern German engraver, born at Prague in 1752. He was a pupil of J. Schmutzer, at Vienna, in which city he chiefly resided. We have several plates by him of portraits, and a few historical subjects, executed with great neatness and delicacy. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick William, Prince of Hohenlohe; after J. Kreutzinger.
Serges, Prince of Gagarin; L. Posch p. Cl. Kohl, sc. Vienna; fine.
The Princess of Gagarin; the same; fine.
Charles William Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick; Ant. Graff, pins.
Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburg; after Ziesents.

SUBJECTS.

Jacob's Blessing; after L. Kohl. 1775.
An Astrologer explaining the Sphere; after the same.
A Professor instructing his Students; after the same.

[He died in 1807.]

[KOK, JAN MATTHEW, born at Amsterdam in 1720, was a scholar of Nicolas Verkolje, and would have been an eminent artist if he had confined himself to a particular class of painting. But he loved variety, and painted landscapes and cattle, views of châteaux, sea-pieces, and figures adorned with accessories. The date of his death is not mentioned, but his collection of pictures was sold in 1771.]

KONINCK, DAVID DE. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1636. He was a scholar of John Fyt, and painted similar subjects of huntings and animals, and particularly excelled in designing all kinds of birds. Having reached a proficiency which is said to have excited the jealousy of his instructor, he went to Italy, and resided some years at Rome, where his pictures pleased. Although the works of De Koninck are greatly inferior to the admirable productions of John Fyt, they possess considerable merit. He died in 1687. [Lanzi notices a "Giovanni Fayt di Anversa," who resided at Venice, and "painted fruit and animals, alive and dead, in a very polished, natural, and novel manner." As no other writer, it is believed, has mentioned that John Fyt ever was in Italy, it is probable that the pictures now attributed to him there were painted by David de Koningh, who, all agree, passed much of his time in Italy. There is no necessity to ascribe to jealousy on the part of Fyt, the departure of De Koningh; for the latter seems to have been fond of travelling, and not only visited Italy, but France and Germany also.]

KONINCK, SOLOMON. See CONINCK.
KONING, CORNELIUS. See CONINCK.

KONING, JAMES. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1650, and was a scholar of Adrian Van de Velde. Under so able an instructor he became an eminent artist, and painted landscapes, with figures and cattle, in the beautiful style of his master, which were much esteemed by the artists and collectors of his country. He also painted historical subjects, of a small size, which possessed considerable merit. He was invited to the court of Denmark, where he probably died.

KONING, PHILIP DE. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1619, and was one of the ablest scholars of Rembrandt. He painted historical subjects and portraits, but was particularly eminent in the latter, in which he was one of the most distinguished artists of his time. His colouring, though rich and harmonious, is clearer than that of Rembrandt, and partakes of the chaste and tender tinting of Vanduyck. There is an uncommon appearance of truth and nature in his heads, with a more tasteful arrangement of his attitudes and habiliments than is usual in the portraiture of the artists of his country. There is a fine portrait of himself in the painter's gallery at Florence. He died in 1689. [It is surprising that so little notice should be taken by writers of the landscapes by P. de Koningh; they are among the finest of the Dutch school, blending the styles of Rembrandt and Ruisdael. They are bird's-eye views of the country, and represent space, and variability of aspect, with wonderful success. They cannot be too highly appreciated. If it be lawful, a doubt might be hazarded, that some portraits attributed to Rembrandt are by P. de Koningh.]

KONING, WILLIAM, a very indifferent engraver, and a printseller, who resided at Amsterdam. He engraved a set of sixteen prints, representing the building, use, and destruction of ships, with which, though wretched performances, he appears to have been perfectly satisfied, as he has signed his name to them.

KOOGEN, LEONARD VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1610. His parents were in affluent circumstances; and on his discovering an inclination for the art, sent him to Antwerp, where he became a scholar of Jacob Jordaens. On his return to Holland, his first efforts were historical subjects, but becoming acquainted with Cornelius Bega, he quitted that line, and painted conversations, and boors regaling, in the style of Bega. The pictures of Vander Koogen are ingeniously composed; his figures are correctly and spiritedly designed, and his colouring is clear and transparent. His works are little known out of his own country, where they are deservedly esteemed. He died in 1681. We have several masterly etchings by Vander Koogen, some of which are in the style of Salvator Rosa. Among others, the following are by him:

A set of six prints of Soldiers; dated 1664, 1665, and 1666.

A set of four, representing Apollo and the Muses; the Battle of the Giants; a Sacrifice near a Tomb; a Standard-bearer, with Soldiers.

Another set of four; a Female Head, 1664; an Ecce Homo, 1664; St. Sebastian, 1665; and two Men playing at Trietrac.

were received with approbation by the public. He died at Leenwarde in 1836.]

KOORNHERT. See CUERNHERT.

KOOTWYCK, or COOTWYCK, JURIAN. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1714. He engraved several plates, in imitation of the drawings of the Dutch masters, in aquatinta and the crayon manner, as well as subjects from his own designs. Among others, we have the following by him:

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A Sea-piece; after Lud. Backhuysen; scarce.

A Landscape, with figures and animals; after Berghem.

Three Landscapes, with cattle; after P. van Bloemen.

SUBJECTS SUPPOSED TO BE FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A Shepherd playing on the Flute to a Shepherdess.

An old Woman sitting, holding a Paper.

A Man Holding his Hat on his Knee.

Three Landscapes.

An Ox and a Cow.

An Ass with Panniers.

[KOUWENHOVEN, JACOB, a painter of landscapes and cattle, was born at Rotterdam in 1777. He was a scholar of Ommegeanck, at Antwerp. Many of his pictures are to be found in English collections. He died at Rotterdam in 1825.]

KOWENBERG, CHRISTIAN VAN. This painter was born at Delft in 1604, and was instructed in the rudiments of the art by John van Es, an obscure painter. He afterwards travelled to Italy, where he studied several years, and became an eminent painter of history. On his return to Holland, he was employed by the Prince of Orange in several considerable works in the chateau of Ryswick, and the Palace in the Wood. He composed in a great style, and his design is more tasteful and correct than is usual in the historical productions of the Dutch school. He died in 1667.

KRAFFT, JAMES LOUIS, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Brussels about the year 1735. He engraved several plates after Rubens, and other masters, in a coarse, tasteless style; among which are the following:

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

Job tempted by his Wife.

Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter.

Christ with Nicodemus.

Jupiter and Danae; after a drawing by Rubens from Titian.

Venus and Cupid; after the same; from Giorgione.

He also engraved a portrait of J. Wiggers; dated 1735.

KRANACH. See CRANACH.

KRAUS, JANE SIBYL. See KUSSEL.

KRAUS, GEORGE MELCHIOR, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Frankfort in 1727. He was a pupil of J. H. Tischbein, at Cassel, and afterwards went to Paris, where he became a scholar of J. B. Greuze. He painted landscapes with figures, which were esteemed, and procured him the patronage of the Duke of Weimar. He has etched several landscapes from his own designs, chiefly views in the vicinity of Weimar, which are neatly executed. We have, among others, the following by him:

A set of six Landscapes, Views near Weimar.

A set of six Views of Chateaux in the Duchy of Weimar.

[KRAUS, JOHN ULRICH, a designer and engraver, was born at Augsburg in 1645, and died in the same city in 1719. He imitated the manner of J. Le Clerc; and copied several of the prints of Albert Durer and Lucas van Leyden. He also engraved landscapes and perspective views; and many biblical subjects for the booksellers. Nagler has given a list of his principal works.]

PORTRAITS.

Christophorus Schultzius, Pastor Memel; after Fischer.
John Dolle, physician; after C. Labert.

SUBJECTS.

The History of the Old and New Testament, in quarto, four subjects in each plate; intended to be bound in octavo, so as to have two subjects on a leaf; the number of leaves would then amount to one hundred and eighty-eight, and they are so numbered.

The Life of Christ, in thirty plates, two compositions on each plate; published at Augsburg in 1705.

A set of six pleasing Views of Gardens.

A set of six Landscapes.

Thirteen plates of the most interesting Views in Nuremberg; after the designs of J. A. Graff.

A View of St. Peter's at Rome; after the same; fine.

KRAUSE, FRANCIS. This painter was born at Augsburg in 1706. He went at an early period of his life to Venice, where he studied some time under Gio. Batista Piazzetta, whose dark and dingy hues he adopted. On leaving that master he visited Paris, where he met with so little success, that he was under the necessity of quitting that capital, and perambulating the provinces in the south of France in search of employment, and was at length obliged to condescend to paint portraits in crayons for subsistence. When he reached Lyons, however, he met with employment more worthy of his talents, which, though not brilliant, were respectable. He was engaged to paint some pictures for the church de la Sainte Croix, and a series of works for that of our Lady, which occupied him for the remainder of his life. His drawing is not incorrect, and his colouring is occasionally forcible; but from a too powerful opposition in his light and shadow, the effect in his pictures is heavy and unharmonious. He died in 1754.

KRIEGER, CHARLES FREDERICK, an obscure German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg, where he engraved some of the heads for a book containing the portraits of learned men, entitled Icones Virorum omnium Ordinum, Eruditione, &c.

KRUG, or KRUGEN, LUCAS, [or rather LUDWIG,] an old German artist, who flourished about the year 1516. He followed the profession of a goldsmith, and was also a painter and engraver. From the few prints which we have by him, which are extremely rare, he appears to have imitated the style of Lucas of Leyden. His drawing is tolerably correct, for the time in which he lived, and he handled the graver with great delicacy. He is sometimes called the master of the pitcher, from his having usually marked his plates with an L. and a K., with a small pitcher between them,

We have the following prints by him:

The Nativity. 1516.

The Adoration of the Magi; the same date.

The Virgin suckling the Infant Jesus.

An Ecce-Homo, with the Instruments of the Scourging. St. John the Evangelist writing, with the Virgin in the Clouds, and below, the Devil emptying his Inkhorn.

Two naked Women holding a Skull, with an Hour-glass upon it.

A naked Female seated, with her back towards the Spectator.

[It is supposed that he died in 1535. There is a dispute respecting the mark; Brulliot and others think that it is that of Lucas Kornelisz, called the Cook. As Krug signifies a jug, or pitcher, it is very likely that an artist of the name would adopt it as his sign. Why an artist who had the soubriquet of Kok, or Cook, should adopt it, admits of question.]

KRÜGER, or CRUGER, THEODORE, a German engraver, born at Munich about the year 1576. He went, when very young, to Italy, and passed the greater part of his life at Rome. He imitated the style of Francesco Villamena, and, like that artist, handled the graver with more vigour than taste. There is also a want of harmony in his light and shadow. He marked his plates with the cipher

The following are his principal prints:

The Life of St. John Baptist; from a series of paintings by Andrea del Sarto, in the vestibule of the Confraternity del Scalza, at Florence; T. Cruger, sc. 1618.

The Last Supper; after the same.

The Return from Egypt; after Francia Bigio.

The infant Jesus, with St. John; after the same.

KRUGER, or CRUGER, MATTHIAS. This artist was the brother to the engraver mentioned in the preceding article. He is said by Florent le Comte to have engraved some plates after the designs of the Cavaliere Borghese, Guido, and other masters, as well as from his own compositions. He used the cipher MC.

KRUGER, ANDREW LOUIS, a modern German engraver, who resided at Potsdam about the year 1760. He engraved several of the plates for the Dresden Gallery.

[KRYNS, EVERARD, born at the Hague in 1568, studied under Karl van Mander, and afterwards at Rome. He painted history and portraits, and died in Holland in 1627.]

[KUICK, JAN VAN, was born at Dort in 1530. He was an eminent painter on glass as well as in oil colours. Having given some offence to the Jesuits, they accused him of heresy, and got him imprisoned. He was kept in irons a long time, though John Van Boudewinze endeavoured to procure his enlargement. In gratitude for these endeavours, Kuick painted a picture of the Judgment of Solomon, in which he introduced the likeness of his benefactor as the principal figure. This gave new offence to the Jesuits, who contrived means to increase the misery of his imprisonment, and never rested till they extorted a final sentence of death, which was immediately executed, and he was burned alive in 1572, at Dort.]

[KULGELGEN, GERHARD and CARL VON, twin brothers, were born at Bacharach, on the Rhine, in 1772. Their father was exchequer councillor in the service of the Elector of Cologne, who, in 1791, sent the twins to complete their studies at Rome. Gerhard painted history and portrait, and Carl, landscape. Gerhard was induced to try his fortune at Petersburg, whither he was soon followed by Carl: they both met with great success, and married two sisters of a noble family of Curland; but Gerhard, after a few years, removed in 1804 to Dresden. Carl remained at Petersburg, where he was appointed court painter. Gerhard had established himself, and obtained a high reputation at Dresden, where he held the appointment of Professor of Painting at the Academy, when his career was suddenly cut off in a most melancholy manner; he was murdered on the road from Pillnitz to Dresden, in 1820. It was a common highway robbery by a private soldier, who had no knowledge of his victim. His works are of a very unpretending character: in most of them an abstract religious sentiment prevails: in execution they are careful, delicate, and somewhat formal, yet pleasing and impressive. His compositions have but few figures; two or three at most. Carl painted many landscapes, and executed numerous drawings of the scenery of Russia, both in the northern and southern provinces. The greater portion of these works are confined in Russia, as they were done by order of the Emperors Paul and Alexander. It is recorded that he painted 171 pictures, and made 200 finished drawings. He died at Revol in 1832.]

[KUNST, CORNELIUS, born at Leyden in 1493, was instructed by Cornelius Engelbrechtsen, who is called his father by some writers, and his father-in-law by others. He painted history, portraits, and views of cities. His design was good, his expression strong, and his colouring warm. He died in 1544.]

KUPETZKI, JOHN. This painter was born at Porsina in Bohemia in 1667. He was the son of a weaver, who intended to bring him up to his trade, at which he worked until he was fifteen years old, when he left his father's house, and being destitute of every resource, his necessities obliged him to solicit charity at the gate of a German nobleman, who took compassion on his youth, and permitted him to take refuge in his castle, where a Swiss painter, named Claus, was employed in ornamenting some of the apartments. The young Kupetzki regarded the progress of the painter with admiration and delight; and in his absence sketched some of the objects he had been painting with such exactness, that it excited the utmost surprise in his protector, who questioning him who had instructed him in design, and finding he had no other assistance than his natural inclination, engaged Claus to take him under his tuition. He accompanied that artist to Vienna, and was soon able to assist him in his works. After studying under Claus for three years, he went to Venice, with letters of introduction to Cavaliere Liberi. He afterwards visited Rome, where he was taken into the patronage of Prince Stanislaus Sobieski, who employed him for two years, and rewarded him with such liberality, that he was enabled to indulge his desire of visiting Lombardy, to study the works of Coreggio and the Caracci. After a residence of twenty-two years in Italy, Kupetzki returned to Germany, and settled at Vienna, where he was made painter to the Emperor Joseph. On the death of that sovereign, he would have been continued in the same capacity by Charles III. of Spain, who succeeded to the imperial throne; but he declined that honour, being desirous of visiting the different courts of the empire. He passed some time at those of the Elector of Mentz, the Duke of Saxe Gotha, and the Margrave of Anspach, whose portraits he successively painted. He is said by Descamps to have been invited to England by George II., when that monarch visited Hanover, and that he declined the proposal on account of his age, and the infirm state of his health. He died in 1740. The German and Swiss biographers are loud in their praise of the talents of Kupetzki, and compare him, as a colourist, to Rembrandt and Vandyck. His powers, however, were almost confined to portraiture, in which he appears to have possessed the faculties requisite to form a distinguished artist. [It is said that Peter the Great wished Kupetzki to enter his service, and accompany him to Petersburg; but the painter was too fond of liberty, and declined the honour. His patron, Joseph I., could not protect him from the attacks of religious bigotry; he was accused of heresy, and to escape the tender mercies of the Holy Inquisition, he withdrew secretly from Vienna and settled at Nuremberg, where he died.]

KUSELL, MATTHEW, [OR MATTHIAS,] a German designer and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1622, and died in the same city in 1682. He engraved several plates of portraits and other subjects, both with the point and the graver, executed in a style that does him great credit. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Christophorus Bender, Prætor Reipubl. Francofurtensis. Carolus Sulzer, Patricius Augustanus, &c.; after Ulrich Mays.

Adolphus Zobelius, Patricius Augustanus; J. Beyschlag, pinx.

Andreas Winkler, Lipsiensis.

Johannes Michael Dilherrus Theologus, &c.; with an octagon border of Sixteen Medallions of Theologians; after Ulrich Mayr; fine and scarce.

Leonardus Weissius; Joh. Werner, pinx.; fine.

SUBJECTS.

The Virgin and Child.

A set of forty-two etchings of the Scenes and Decorations of an Opera; Lodovico Burnacini, inv. Mat. Kussell. 1668.

[The date of his birth should be 1621.]

KUSELL, MELCHIOR, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Augsburg in 1622. After learning the elements of the art in his native city, he went to Franckfort, where he became a pupil of Matthew Merian. We have a great number of plates engraved by this artist, in a highly finished and very agreeable style. His principal work is a set of one hundred and forty-eight etchings, of various sizes, chiefly after the designs of William Baur, known by the name of the Miniatures of the Emperor, consisting of the Life, Passion, and Miracles of Christ; sea-ports and views in Italy, &c. They are etched with great neatness and spirit, and of a charming effect. He also engraved several portraits, and other subjects. The following are among others by him:

PORTRAITS.

Sebastianus Kirchmajerus, professor public. Ratisbonensis; after Ben. Block. 1680.

Johannes Hozius, Augustæ Consul; Melchior Kussell.

Maximilianus Curz. Lib. Baro in Senffenu. 1658.

Antonius Schottinus. 1680.

SUBJECTS.

The Life and Passion of Christ; twenty-five plates; after William Baur.

A set of sixteen Landscapes and Views in Italy; after the same.

Seventeen Marines and Sea-ports; after the same.

Eighteen Views of Country Houses and Gardens; after the same.

Forty different Views; published in 1681; after the same.

The Scenes and Decorations for the Opera of Paris and Helen.

[Died in 1683. For lists of the works of these brothers, see Nagler, Kunstler-Lexicon.]

KUSELL, JANE SIBYL. This ingenious lady was the daughter of Melchior Kussell, born at Augsburg in 1646. She was instructed by her father, and was the wife of the engraver John Ulrich Krauss. She engraved four landscapes, after Elsheimer, and a set of battles, from the designs of Le Clerc. She usually marked her plates with her initials, J. S. K.

KUYP. See CUYP.

KYTE, FRANCIS, an English mezzotinto engraver, who lived about the year 1730. We have by him some portraits, but they are not executed in a superior manner. Among others are the following:

Mr. Gay, the poet; after Askman.
Dryden, Wycherley, Prior, and Pope; on one plate.
The Rev. George Whitefield.
John Sturges. 1733.

L

LAAN, ADRIAN VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at Utrecht about the year 1690. He resided some time at Paris, where he worked for the printsellers. His most considerable performance is a set of landscapes, etched in a neat and finished style, from the designs of J. Glauber, but of an indifferent effect. He also engraved the portrait of Lawrence Coster, of Haerlem, to whom the Dutch attribute the invention of printing, and some plates, after Vander Meulen. [He was living in 1742; the time of his death is not recorded.]

LAAR, PETER DE. See LAER.

LABACCO. See ABACCO.

[LABACCO, MARIO, an Italian engraver, who flourished from 1551 to 1567. He engraved some of the plates to a work on architecture by his father, Antonio Labacco, published at Rome in 1559; and also copied Martin Schoen's print of St. Anthony tormented, and Beatrice's print, after Giotto, of Peter walking on the Sea. No particulars of his life are recorded; but it is suspected that many of his prints are classed under the head Anonymous in the catalogues. Both this artist and his father are sometimes erroneously called Abacco.

LABRADOR, JUAN, a Spanish painter, born at Badajoz about the year 1530, and is said to have been a scholar of the divine Morales. He did not, however, follow the style of that master, but devoted himself to painting flowers, fruit, and still-life; and, according to Palomino, excelled every artist of his country in those subjects. In Mr. Cumberland's catalogue of the King of Spain's collection at Madrid, he highly commends two flower-pieces by this painter; and asserts, "that it had never been his chance to meet with any paintings of the like sort, which he thought comparable to those by Labrador." Surely Mr. Cumberland had never seen the works of Rachel Ruysch, and John van Huysum, or the Spanish artist was a prodigy indeed! He died at Madrid in 1600. [Cean Bermudez corroborates Cumberland's opinion of the superlative beauty of the two flower-pieces in the royal collection.]

[LADENSPELDER, JOHANN, or HANS VON ESSEN, an engraver born at Essen, a frontier city of the duchy of Berg, in the year 1511, according to the inscription on his portrait; but there is no account of any circumstance in his life, or of the time of his death. Bartsch describes twenty prints bearing his monogram, which is composed of the letters J. L. V. E. S., and which he interprets Johann

Ladenspelder von Essen sculptis: one of the prints has the date 1548. Brulliot gives the same kind of monogram, with a difference converting Johann into Hans. He also alludes to prints not mentioned by Bartsch that bear this mark. Ottley, in his "Notices of Engravers," mentions a third set of the cards, called Il Giuoco di Tarocchi, copied towards the middle of the sixteenth century, by one Johan Ladenspelder, an artist of Westphalia. Bartsch thinks he was a painter as well as an engraver, and that all the prints specified by him were after his own pictures, or designs; at least there are several on which he put his name, with the word in. and inventor, besides the monogram mentioned. See Table of Monograms. Nagler describes some of his prints not noticed by either of the other writers.]

LADMIRAL, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, born at Leyden about the year 1680. He executed many prints in colours, of anatomical subjects and natural history, and was much employed by the celebrated Frederick Ruysch.

LAENEN, CHRISTOPHER JOHN VANDER. This artist was a Fleming, born at Antwerp about the year 1570. He painted conversations and subjects of gallantry. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and his figures are well drawn. The works of this artist are rarely seen in this country; but they hold a respectable rank in the collections of Flanders and Brabant. [Some writers name him Jacob: Balkema says he was a scholar of Rubens. His works, since the first publication of this Dictionary, have been more common in England, but they do not resemble the style of Rubens's school. He died in 1628. Balkema calls Jacob the brother of Christopher, but Füssli is probably right in saying Christopher Jan, otherwise Jacob.]

LAER, or LAAR, PETER DE, called BAMBOCCIO. This celebrated painter was born at the village of Laeren, near Naarden, in 1613. His parents were in easy circumstances; and in compliance with a propensity he discovered for the art of painting, at a very early period of his life, had him instructed in the elementary principles of design, and sent him, when young, to Italy for improvement. It has been supposed that he acquired the name of Bamboccio at Rome, from the singular deformity of his body; but it is more reasonably conjectured by Baldinucci and Lanzi, that he was called il Bamboccio on account of his usually painting such subjects as are called by the Italians Bambocciate; such as fairs, rural festivals, huntings, masquerades, &c. It is observable, that nature frequently compensates for her caprices in bodily infirmity, by superior endowments of the mind. Bamboccio was a remarkable instance of this distributive justice. He possessed a lively and fertile imagination, an uncommonly retentive memory, and, above all, was favoured with an inexhaustible fund of gaiety and good humour. During a residence of sixteen years at Rome, he was distinguished by the uncommon vivacity of his genius, and the amiability of his disposition. He lived in habits of intimacy with N. Poussin and Claude, and frequently, in company with those celebrated artists, made designs of the most interesting monuments in the vicinity of Rome. These studies were of infinite use to him in the composition of his pictures, the back-grounds of which usually represent the most remarkable objects in and near that capital. The repeated solicitations of his friends to return to Holland at length prevailed, and in 1639 he quitted Rome with regret, and settled at Haerlem, where his pictures were not less admired than they had been in Italy. Bamboccio had acquired great popularity, and was esteemed the ablest painter of his country in the branch of the art which he practised, when the talents of Philip Wowermans began to develop themselves, and the growing celebrity of his works occasioned Bamboccio the greatest jealousy and chagrin, and is said eventually to have shortened his life. The pictures of Peter de Laer are admirably composed, his figures and animals are spiritedly and correctly drawn, and his colouring rich and vigorous. If he is inferior to Wowermans in the neatness and delicacy of his pencil, he surpasses him in the energy of his touch, a more intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro, and an enchanting variety, proceeding from the fecundity of his invention. He excelled in representing the particular atmosphere of the time of day he wished to describe. The works of Bamboccio are scarce, even in his own country, on account of his long residence in Italy; and they are deservedly held in high estimation. He died at Haerlem in 1673. Peter de Laer has etched several plates from his own designs, in a masterly and painter-like style, which are generally signed with his name. We have the following by him:

A set of eight Plates of Animals and Rural Subjects; inscribed, P. de Laer, Romæ. 1636.

A set of six, of Horses; numbered; same inscription.

A Blacksmith shoeing a Mule; P. v. Laer, f.; scarce.

A Blacksmith's Shop; P. D. Laer, f. Romæ; sometimes attributed to Visscher.

[Bartsch gives a list of twenty etchings by him. Writers differ respecting the year of his death; some place it in 1674, and others in 1675. Why Peter van Laer should have been jealous of Wowerman it is difficult to determine; there can scarcely be greater dissimilarity than between their pictures; Van Laer's may rather be compared with those of Michael Angelo Cerquozzi. He had a particular bias to all that is low and common. The wild haunts of beggars, robber scenes, the court-yards of monasteries with strange-looking monks, or a rabble occupied in gaming or dancing, were his favourite subjects. There are many of his pictures in the Vienna galleries; in the public gallery of Augsburg; in the Uffizi at Florence; and in other places.]

LAER, or LAAR, ROELAND VAN. This artist was the brother of Peter van Laer, and accompanied him to Italy, where he painted similar subjects to those of Bamboccio, but not with equal success. He died young at Venice, in 1640. [According to Füssli he was born in 1610; and Zani says he flourished in 1644.]

[LAFOND, CHARLES NICOLAS RAPHAEL, born at Paris in 1774, was a scholar of Regnault; he holds a distinguished rank among the modern French painters of historic and poetic subjects. His works are numerous, and are to be found in public galleries as well as in private collections. Many of his subjects are ideal, founded on poetical relations; some scriptural; and others of events during the imperial reign, and that of the successor to Napoleon. He painted the ceiling and the four large landscapes in the saloon of M. le Baron Barbier. It is not stated whether he is still living, but his artistic life is no doubt terminated.]

LAGRENEE, LOUIS JOHN FRANCIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1727. He painted history, allegorical subjects, and portraits, and was of sufficient celebrity to be made a member of the French Academy of painting. He etched several small plates from his own designs and others, with great spirit; among which are the following:

The Virgin, with the Infant sleeping; after Guido.
St. Peter and St. Jerome; two prints; from his own designs.

The Virgin and Child.

Charity and Justice, two emblematical subjects

The Sacrifice of Noah.

A Sacrifice to Pan.

[Louis Jean François Lagrénée was born at Paris in 1724. He was a scholar of Karle Vanloo. At an early age his picture of Joseph interpreting the Dream of Pharaoh obtained the great prize from the Academy of Painting, and he was sent, as a pensioner, to Rome. He returned to Paris in 1753, and was admitted a member of the Academy. His picture of admission was the Rape of Dejanira by the centaur Nessus. His reputation induced the empress Elizabeth Petrovna to appoint him to the office of director of the Academy at St. Petersburg, and that of her principal painter. In 1781 he was made director of the French school at Rome; and there he painted some of his best pictures. They are chiefly from sacred and profane history, and the ancient poets. The greater part has been engraved. In 1804 Napoleon named him a member of the Legion of Honour. He was also professor-rector of the School of Fine Arts, and honorary conservator and administrator of the Musée, when he died, in 1805.]

LAGUERRE, LOUIS. This artist was born at Paris in 1663. His father was master of the Menagerie at Versailles, and placed his son to be instructed in the Belles Lettres in the college of the Jesuits, where he acquired sufficient learning to be of use to him in his historical subjects and allegory. He was for some time a scholar of Charles Le Brun, and frequented the Academy at Paris. In 1683 he came to England, and was first employed by Antonio Verrio, to assist him in the numerous decorative works in which he was engaged. Laguerre painted the greater part of his large picture in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and when he was little more than twenty years of age, got into very extensive business in painting saloons, ceilings, &c. in the mansions of the principal nobility. King William employed him at Hampton Court, where he painted, in chiaro-scuro, the Labours of Hercules. Lord Orford states, that he was at first chosen unanimously by the commissioners for rebuilding St. Paul's, to decorate the cupola, but was set aside by the prevailing interest of Sir James Thornhill, a preference not ravished from him by superior merit. Sir Godfrey Kneller employed him to paint the staircase of his house at Witton, where he distinguished himself beyond his usual performances. We have an etching by Louis Laguerre, of the Judgment of Midas. He died in 1721. [Pope has immortalized him and his employer Verrio in one line: "Where sprawl the saints of Verrio and Laguerre."]

LAGUERRE, JOHN, was the son of the preceding artist, by whom he was instructed in the art, and had shown some ability, but having a talent for music and singing, he had recourse to the stage, and met with considerable success. Towards the latter part of his life he painted scenes and decorations for the theatre. He etched a plate representing Falstaff, Pistol, and Doll Tearsheet, with other theatrical characters, in allusion to a quarrel between the players and patentees. He also engraved a set of prints of Hob in the Well, which had a great sale, though indifferently executed. He died in 1748.

[LAIR, JEAN LOUIS CESAR, a painter of history and portraits, was born at Janville, (Eure et Loire,) where he died in 1828, after passing the greater part of his life at Paris. He was a scholar of Regnault and David. He painted many religious subjects of large dimensions for churches; and a multitude of portraits and smaller pictures.]

LAIRESE, GERARD. This eminent painter was born at Liege in 1640. He was the son of Renier Lairesse, an artist of some celebrity, who had him instructed in the Belles Lettres, poetry, and music, and taught him the principles of design. He afterwards studied under Bertholet Flemael, and at the age of sixteen had made himself known as a portrait painter. He was soon after employed in some historical works for the Electors of Cologne and Brandenburg, which established his reputation. An unfortunate propensity to an expensive and dissolute course of life kept him in a state of indigence, although his gains were considerable. Not finding sufficient employment in his native city, he settled at Utrecht, and soon afterwards removed to Amsterdam, where he was regarded as the greatest historical painter of his time. His style is grand and poetical, he was perfectly acquainted with history and the fable, possessed a lively and ready invention, and was an attentive observer of the propriety of costume. In his composition and design he has been compared to Niccolò Poussin, whom he imitated in the choice and arrangement of his subjects; but he has a very slender pretension to the classic elevation of his thought, his profound acquaintance with the antique, the elegance of his taste, or the purity of his design. He painted with an extraordinary facility, and is said to have finished in one day a picture of Mount Parnassus, with Apollo and the Nine Muses; an achievement which Poussin would not have been ambitious of performing. His back-grounds are enriched with architecture, the principles of which he perfectly understood. A visit to Italy might have given his figures more elegance and delicacy, which are occasionally ungraceful and too short. It is, however, surprising that he could arrive at so accomplished a style as is generally visible in his works, without the advantages of travel, and with no better models to consult than those he met with in his own country.

Lairesse usually confined himself to works of an easel size, although he sometimes painted altar-pieces; among which are his two pictures of the Penitence of St. Augustine, and his Baptism, in the church of St. Ursula, at Liege; and the Martyrdom of St. Ursula at Aix-la-Chapelle. Of his easel pictures, the most celebrated are Achilles discovered among the daughters of Lycomedes; the Death of Germanicus; that of Alexander; Moses treading on the Crown of Pharaoh; Antony and Cleopatra; and the History of Heliodorus. He had the affliction of being deprived of his sight in 1690, when he was only fifty years of age; but such was his love for the art, that he continued till his death to communicate his ideas on the theory and practice of it, in discourses to the contemporary artists, from which were collected the materials for the treatise on Design and Colouring, published after his death. As an engraver, Gerard Lairesse claims particular notice. He etched a great number of plates from his own designs, executed with great freedom and spirit; the lights are broad and powerful, and the eye is carried at once to the principal figures of the composition. A great part of his designs were engraved by himself, others by Poole, Glauber, Berge, and other artists. He sometimes marked his prints with the initials G. L. and sometimes with one of these ciphers . The following are engraved by himself:

- The Fall of our first Parents.
- Adam and Eve driven from Paradise.
- Joseph and his Brethren.
- Solomon consecrated by the High-priest.
- The infant Jesus explaining to his Parents the Divine Will.
- The Incredulity of St. Thomas.
- Saint Theresa.
- The Parting of Hector and Andromache.
- Antony and Cleopatra.
- A March of Amazons.
- A large Bacchanalian subject.
- Venus lamenting the Death of Adonis.
- The Four Seasons; designs for ceilings.
- Diana and Endymion.
- Bacchante, with Silenus asleep.

Gerard Lairesse died at Amsterdam in 1711. [For a list of his engravings, and of those of others after his paintings, see Nagler, Kunstler-Lexicon. Alfred Michiels, in his "Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise," expressing his indignation against artists of talent who had debased themselves by vicious indulgences, says "Lairesse, que l'on sur-nommait le Poussin de la Belgique, buvait et perdait la raison, comme le dernier des manants." He does not give his authority; but as he is a lover of truth, and would not, knowingly, give currency to a falsehood, it is hoped, if it be an error, that he will correct it in the next edition of his valuable work; or, if true, give his authority to establish the assertion as a fact.]

LAIRESE, ERNEST. This artist was the elder brother of Gerard Lairesse, born at Liege about the year 1635, and was instructed in design by his father. He painted animals and huntings in distemper, and was sent to Italy to study, by his patron, the prince of Liege, who, on his return, appointed him his painter, in whose service he died at the age of 40. [Balkema erroneously calls him the nephew of Gerard Lairesse, and says that he was born in 1678: all authorities are against him.]

LAIRESE, JAMES and JOHN, were the younger brothers of Gerard Lairesse, and distinguished themselves in painting flowers, fruit, and bas-reliefs. Their chief residence was at Amsterdam. [Here again Balkema gets into confusion, making these artists the brothers and nephews of Gerard Lairesse, in two distinct articles. The one called James should, perhaps, be called Jacob: the sons of Gerard were named Abraham and Jan.]

LALLEMAND, GEORGE, an indifferent French painter and engraver on wood, born at Nancy about the year 1600. He executed some very poor wooden cuts, which have nothing to recommend them.

LAMA, GIOVANNI, [OR GIOVANNI BERNARDO.] According to Dominici, this painter was born at Naples in 1508, the son of an artist of little celebrity, named Matteo Lama. After learning the first principles of design from his father, he was placed under the tuition of Gio. Antonio d'Amato. In 1527 the memorable sacking of Rome drove from that city the greater part of the inhabitants; among others, Polidoro da Caravaggio, who took refuge at Naples, and Lama had the advantage of his instruction, and became a very reputable artist. In the church of S. Marcellino is an altar-piece by this master, representing the Transfiguration; and in S. Lorenzo, a picture of the Stoning of Stephen. In S. Giacomo de Spagnuoli is his admired work of the Deposition from the Cross, so much in the style of Polidoro, that it was by many supposed to be painted by him. He died at Naples in 1579.

LAMA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Naples about the year 1650, and was a fellow student with Paolo de Matteis, under Luca Giordano. He painted history, and was much employed in easel pictures of mythological subjects, some of which were in the gallery of the Duke di S. Niccola Gaeta, at Naples, which were admired for the elegance of his style, and the sweetness of his colouring. [He was born in 1670, and died about 1740.]

LAMBERT, GEORGE. In noticing this artist, Lord Orford expresses his surprise, "that in a country so profusely beautified with the amenities of nature, we should have produced so few good painters of landscape." How infinitely would that zealous admirer of art have been gratified, if he could have seen the admirable productions of his ingenious countrymen, which have since appeared in that fascinating branch of painting! George Lambert was born about the year 1710, and was a scholar of William Hassell, but afterwards imitated the style of Wootton, to whom he was greatly superior. He has the credit of being one of the first of the English painters who treated landscape with a pleasing and picturesque effect; though the judicious and candid observer will not be disposed to admit of his superiority to Gaspar Poussin in the "richness or grandeur of his compositions." His genius was adapted to large decorative arrangements, and perhaps some of his finest works were the beautiful scenery he painted for the theatre. The forms of his trees are grand, and his masses are conducted with taste and judgment. In conjunction with Samuel Scott, he painted some views of the settlements of the East India Company, for their house in Leadenhall Street. Some of his English landscapes have been engraved by Vivares, Mason, &c. George Lambert etched, in a coarse, but painter-like manner, a print which is now become scarce,

An upright Landscape, with ruins, and three small figures; dedicated to Mr. James Robinson, of Wandsworth. [Also a Landscape with figures.]

He died in 1765. [There is probably an error in the date of his death, as he was a member of the Royal Academy. Perhaps it should be 1775. He painted a few small landscapes with sheep and goats, which are neatly executed.]

LAMBERTI, BUONAVENTURA. This painter was born at Carpi about the year 1651. He is said by Mengs to have been one of the last and ablest scholars of Carlo Cignani. He painted some pictures for St. Peter's, which have been executed in Mosaic by Ottaviani, and his fine picture of S. Francesco da Paola resuscitating a dead Child, in the church del Spirito Santo de Napolitani, has been engraved by Jacob Frey. There are several of his easel pictures in the Palazzo Gabrieli, which are deservedly admired. He died in 1721.

LAMBERTINI, MICHELE, an ancient painter of the Bolognese school, who flourished from the year 1443 to 1469. Lanzi mentions a picture by this old artist in the hall of the Fish-market at Bologna, painted in 1443. Though considerably anterior to Francesco Francia, Albano preferred this picture, in point of softness and delicacy, to any work of that master, a sufficient testimony of his merit, to establish his pretension to distinction at that early period of the art.

LAMBORN, P. S. This artist flourished about the year 1760, and engraved some plates for Mr. Boydell's collection, and some portraits; among which are,

Oliver Cromwell; after Cooper.
Richard Penderill, of Boscobell.
Samuel Johnson.

[He was born in 1722, and died in 1780.]

LAME, DELLE. See PUPINI.

LAMSVELT, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, born at Utrecht about the year 1660. His style resembles that of Romeyn de Hooghe. We have by him some portraits, which are scarce, and some other subjects, of which the following are the principal:

PORTRAITS.

Oliver Cromwell; an oval.
John de Wit, pensionary of Holland.
Cornelius Pieterszoon Hooft.
George Cassander.
Hubert Duisuis, of Rotterdam.
The Siege of Tournay, by the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene.

[Some writers confound him with Jan Vander Leeuw, who flourished at the same period, and, in conjunction with Jan Lamsvelt, engraved the portraits for Le Vasseur's "Histoire de Louis XIII."]

LAMSWEEERDE, SIMON ANTONY VAN, a Dutch designer and engraver, born at Utrecht about 1635. He engraved several portraits in the style of Snyderhoef, though very inferior to him; among which are the following:

Francis Gomarius, professor of theology at Groningen.
Henry Altung, professor of Theology at Heidelberg.
Anna Maria Schuurmans. 1657.
Cyprian Regnier, juris-consult of Utrecht.
Charles de Maets, professor of theology at Utrecht. 1659.

[According to the date on one of his prints, he was living in 1683. Nagler says he was born in 1625.]

LANA, LODOVICO. According to Lanzi, this painter was born in the Modenese state in 1597, and was educated at Ferrara under Ippolito Scarsellino. The theatre of his triumph is however at Modena, where there are many admirable productions of his pencil; particularly his celebrated emblematical picture of the city of Modena delivered from the horrors of the plague, in the church del Voto; a production with which few works of art at Modena can be compared, for the originality and ingenuity of its composition, correctness of design, the force and harmony of the colouring, and a copiousness of invention that surprises. Lana was a successful imitator of Guercino, and exhibits the vigorous opposition of his masses, to which he united something of the spirited movement of Tintoretto. He was the rival of Gio. Batista Pesari, who appears to have yielded to him the superiority, by retiring to Venice when Lana established an academy at Modena, which became famous through Italy. He died in 1646. [Some writers place his death three years later. He was an engraver as well as a painter. Bartsch gives a list of his prints in tom. xviii. of "Le Peintre graveur." See also Nagler.]

LANCHARES, ANTONIO DE, a Spanish artist, born at Madrid in 1586. He was a scholar of Eugenio Caxes, and distinguished himself as an eminent painter of history. In the choir of the convent "de la merced Calzada," at Madrid, is a fine picture by him of the Virgin surrounded by angels; and in the church of La Santa Cartuxa de Paular, are two of his most esteemed works, representing the Ascension, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, one of which is signed with his name, and dated 1620. He died in 1658. [Bermudez says he was the scholar of Patricio, and not of Eugenio, Caxes; the latter was his fellow disciple.]

LANCONELLO, CRISTOFORO. This painter was a native of Faenza, and flourished about the year 1587. From the appearance of his style, Lanzi thinks it probable he was a disciple of Federigo Baroccio. In the Palazzo Ercolani, at Bologna, is a picture by him of the Madonna and Bambino, with a glory of angels, and beneath, St. Francis, St. Clara, and other saints. The airs of the heads are beautiful; it is painted with great delicacy of pencil, and the colouring is rich and harmonious, entirely in the taste of Baroccio.

LANCRET, NICHOLAS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1690. He was first a scholar of Claude Gillot, but afterwards was instructed by Anthony Watteau. His chief merit consists in a neat imitation of the style of the latter artist; but he is very inferior to him in the spirit of his touch, and the brilliancy and transparency of his colouring. His pictures were, however, sought after at Paris, and he became a member of the Academy. He died in 1743. [Some place his death in 1745, and others in 1747. The greater part of his pictures have been engraved.]

LANDERER, FERDINAND, a modern German engraver, born at Stein, in Austria, in 1753. He chiefly resided at Vienna, where he has engraved several plates, both etchings and in the crayon manner; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

France Maurice, Count of Lary; after Konolitz.
Joseph de Kurz, author and actor; from his own designs.

SUBJECTS.

Samson and Dalilah; after Rembrandt.
Two Landscapes, with ruins and animals; after Dietricy.
Two mountainous Landscapes; after Pillement.
Two large Landscapes, with figures and cattle; after Louthebourg.
Ten Heads; engraved in a style imitating Rembrandt.

[Nagler says he was born in 1743; this is more likely to be correct than the date given by Bryan, as there are prints with the date of 1760 by F. Landerer.]

LANDFIELD, AHASUERUS DE, an old German engraver on wood, to whom are attributed some small wooden cuts, marked with a curious monogram, XL. See LONDERSEEL.]

LANDRIANI, PAOLO CAMILLO. [He was called DUCHINO.] This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1602. He was a scholar of Ottavio Semini, and painted history with considerable reputation. There are several altar-pieces by him in the churches at Milan, of which, that "alla Passione," is dated in 1602. One of his best performances is his picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Ambrogio, in which he adds to the graceful style of his master, more of the "morbidezza." He died about the year 1619.

LANDRY, PETER, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1630. He was much employed by the booksellers, and engraved a variety of frontispieces, portraits, and other subjects, executed with the graver. His best prints are his portraits, some of which possess considerable merit. We have, among others, the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV. of France; after J. François.
Louis de Bourbon, Prince of Conty; after Gribelin.

Charles de Bourbon, Bishop of Scisson. 1660.
Abel Brunier, Physician to the Duke of Orleans. 1661.
Charles Brulart, Marquis of Genlis.
Eustache de la Salle; after C. Le Febvre.
Anthony Godeau, an ecclesiastic; after Ardisson.
Francis Lescuyer, Cons. Reg. &c.

SUBJECTS.

St. Jerome; P. Landry, sc.
The Virgin and Child.
Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after Albano.
The Head of St. John Baptist; after An. Caracci.

[There is some uncertainty respecting the date of his birth: he was living in 1718.]

LANDULFO, POMPEO. This artist was a Neapolitan, born about the year 1415. According to Dominici, he was of ancient family, and showing an early disposition for the art, he was placed under the care of Gio. Bernardo Lama, where he discovered a superior genius, and whilst he was yet very young, painted an altar-piece for the church of S. Matteo, at Naples, representing the Virgin with the infant Jesus in the clouds, surrounded by angels. He afterwards painted a fine picture for the church of La Pietà, of the Holy Family, with St. Francis, St. Catherine, and St. Lucia, which was considered his best work. He died at Naples in 1590. [The date of his birth should be 1515.]

LANFRANCO, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI. This distinguished painter was born at Parma, on the same day with Domenichino, in 1581. His parents placed him, when a boy, as page to the Count Scotti at Piacenza. While in the service of that nobleman, he was perceived drawing with a charcoal the frieze of one of the apartments; and the Count, desirous of encouraging his apparent disposition for the art, introduced him to Agostino Caracci, who was at that time employed by the Duke Ranuccio at Ferrara. The young pupil made a rapid advancement under so able an instructor, and before he was sixteen, he painted a picture of the Virgin, and several saints, which was deemed worthy of being placed in the church of S. Agostino at Piacenza. So flattering a commencement encouraged him to pursue his studies with redoubled alacrity. By the advice of Agostino Caracci, he studied with particular attention the works of Coreggio: and it was the contemplation of the sublime productions of that master in the cupola of the cathedral and the dome of S. Giovanni, at Parma, which inspired him with the ambition of rivalling the powers of that illustrious machinist. But however capable he was of imitating his great model in the grandeur of his conceptions, and the bold variety of his foreshortening; nature had denied him the faculty of approaching the tender beauty of his expression, and the graceful turn of his forms, the peculiar characteristics of the works of Coreggio. Lanfranco was twenty years old when death deprived him of the lessons of Agostino. He went to Rome, and became a student under Annibale Caracci, who employed him in the Farnesian gallery, and in the church of St. Jago, where he executed some frescoes from Annibale's designs. The works of Raffaello were also the objects of his attentive admiration. In conjunction with his compatriot and fellow student, Sisto Baldocchio, he etched the history of the Bible, from Raffaello's Loggie in the Vatican, which they dedicated to Annibale. After the death of that master, Lanfranco was employed by the Cardinal Sannese in some works, which first brought him into public notice at Rome, and he increased his reputation by his fresco paintings in the chapel of Buon Giovanni, in the church of S. Agostino, the principal picture representing the Assumption of the Virgin, which was greatly admired. He was taken into the protection of Paul V., who employed him in his chapel in S. Maria Maggiore, and in the great saloon at Monte Cavallo, where he painted Moses striking the Rock, Abraham sacrificing Isaac, and a Flight into Egypt. It was about this time that, by the death of Cardinal Montalto, the patron of Domenichino, he procured, through intrigue, the commission to paint the Cupola of S. Andrea della Valle, which had been promised to Domenichino, who had previously painted the four angles, in a style which excited universal admiration. However we may lament that the work was not completed by Zampieri, it is but justice to acknowledge, that on this occasion Lanfranco surpassed himself. In wrestling with so formidable an antagonist, he assembled and put forth all his powers. This celebrated work represents the Virgin seated in the clouds, contemplating the figure of our Saviour, which is in the upper part of the composition; on one side are St. Peter and St. Gaetan; and on the other, St. Andrew and other saints; the principal light emanates from a luminous glory surrounding the body of Christ, and spreads itself in tender and harmonious suffusion over the whole composition. The grandeur of the arrangement, the boldness of the design, the admirable disposition of the groups, and the intrepid daring of the di Sotto in Su, rank this performance among the most extraordinary achievements of the art of that description, after the domes of Coreggio. The increasing fame of Lanfranco spread itself to Naples, whither he was invited, in 1646, to paint the Cupola of the church del Gesu, which occupied him a year and a half. This great work has been destroyed by an earthquake, except the angles, which remain. Lanfranco was at Naples when Domenichino was engaged to paint the Cupola of the Treasury, in which he had made considerable progress, when the cabals of Lanfranco, and some of the Neapolitan artists, occasioned the work to be suspended. After the death of Domenichino, Lanfranco was employed to finish it, who destroyed all that had been done, except the angles, which are still the admiration of the intelligent observer, and loudly proclaim the transcendent superiority of Zampieri over his malevolent competitor. The troubles which soon after took place at Naples, occasioned Lanfranco to return to Rome, during the pontificate of Urban VIII., who employed him to paint a picture for the church of St. Peter, representing that apostle walking on the sea, which has been engraved by Gerard Audran; and in a series of pictures of the Passion of our Saviour, for the chapel of the Crucifix. These productions were so much to the satisfaction of the Pope, that he conferred on him the order of knighthood. The last works of Lanfranco were his pictures in the tribune of S. Carlo Catinari, and they are the feeblest of his performances. He died in 1647.

The compositions of Lanfranco are copious and ingenious, though sometimes tumultuous and confused. His design is rather negligent than incorrect; his groups are artfully combined, and his draperies are thrown with judgment and taste. His animated pencil, guided by a lively genius, and a commanding facility, leaves little to be wished for in point of execution. But he is deficient in expression; his conceptions, though great, want the regulating influence of reflection; and as his imagination readily furnished him with ideas, the impetuosity of his execution left no opportunity of amendment. He has no great claim to the character of an accomplished colourist, though he is sometimes clear, he is seldom harmonious; and in the latter part of his life he indulged in the violent oppositions of Michael Angelo Caravaggio. Perhaps few instances have occurred in which the faculties of two artists, bred under the same master, afford so striking a contrast as those of Lanfranco and Domenichino. The latter, with little appearance of intuitive genius, and little confidence in his powers, invented with care, and digested his compositions with judgment. Lanfranco, yielding to the vivacity of his imagination, and unrestrained by any diffidence of his capacity, rested all on his natural endowments, from whence flowed his greatest celebrity. Domenichino studied with care the particular and the most elevated expression of the passions. Lanfranco was satisfied with a general and sketchy delineation of the ordinary characteristics of human feeling. We have several etchings by Gio. Lanfranco, which are executed in a slight, spirited style, and evince the hand of the great master. The following are by him, which are generally signed with his name, or the letters G. L.

The Messengers of Moses returning from the Land of Canaan.

The Triumph of a Roman Emperor.

An Emperor haranguing his Soldiers.

Part of the plates engraved conjointly with Sisto Badalocchio, from the paintings by Raffaello in the Vatican, called Raffaello's Bible. The whole consists of fifty-one prints, besides the titles, [and many others, of which an account will be found in Nagler.]

[He died on the 30th of Nov., 1648.]

LANG, MAURITIUS, [or MORITZ,] a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1670. He chiefly resided at Vienna, and was much employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved a variety of frontispieces, book-plates, and portraits: the last of which are the best of his prints. He worked with the graver, and executed several of the plates for Priorato's History of the Emperor Leopold. [He was living in 1681.]

[LANGENDYK, THIERRY, or THEODORE, born at Rotterdam in 1748, was a scholar of D. A. Bisschop. He designed and painted combats and battles, in the composition of which he showed extraordinary skill. He depicted the passions with great truth, and gave to the smallest details of his subject the highest degree of finish. His drawings are particularly admired, and some of his landscapes with cows and horses have been engraved. His paintings in oil are not numerous; they are, like his drawings, skirmishes and battles, by sea and land. He died at Rotterdam in 1805.]

[LANGENDYK, JEAN ANTOINE, son of the preceding, was born at Rotterdam in 1780. He painted entirely in the manner of his father. He excelled in drawings in water colours and in Indian ink; and has left some etchings of landscapes with horned cattle and horses. He died at Amsterdam in 1818.]

LANGETTI, GIO. BATISTA. According to Zanetti, this painter was born at Genoa in 1635. He was first a scholar of Pietro da Cortona, but afterwards studied under Gio. Francesco Cassana. Although celebrated by the poet Boschini, his powers appear to have been chiefly confined to heads and busts of old men, hermits and philosophers, of which there are many in private collections in the Venetian states, and in Lombardy. Lanzi notices a picture by him of the Crucifixion, in the church of S. Terese at Genoa. He died at Venice in 1676.

LANGLEY, T. This artist was apparently a native of England, and resided in London. We have by him some plates of antiquities, which are very indifferently executed. [This probably means Thomas Batty Langley, who was considered rather eminent in his day; and though his architectural designs may not compete with the more ornate of the present time, yet they are frequently referred to, and do not deserve the censure that Bryan has passed on them. He flourished during the first half of the last century, and died in 1751. He published works on Gothic architecture, and ornaments pertaining thereto, the plates designed and engraved by himself; and on other matters interesting to the antiquary.]

LANGLOIS, JOHN, [OR JEAN,] a French engraver, born at Paris in 1649. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Rome, and became a member of the French Academy there. He engraved several plates from the antique statues, and some architectural subjects from Andrea Palladio. We have also by him a few portraits, and other prints, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

William Brunetiere, Bishop of Saintonge; after Boulongne.
 Peter Loisel, Doctor of Sorbonne.
 Julian Gardeau, Curate of St. Etienne du Mont; after Lombard.
 John Law.

SUBJECTS.

St. Luke painting the Virgin; after Raffaele.
 The Stoning of Stephen; after P. da Cortona.
 Tobit and the Angel; after Ann. Caracci.
 The Martyrdom of St. Paul; after L. Boulongne.
 Christ curing the Paralytic; after Bon Boulongne.

[He died about 1712.]

LANGOT, FRANCIS, a French engraver of little note. He was chiefly employed in copying the prints of other masters, particularly Cornelius Bloemaert, Huret, and others; and his prints are not without merit.

LANGREMUS, M. F., an obscure engraver, who executed several book-plates of frontispieces, portraits, &c., in a poor style. He lived about the year 1649.

LANIERE, NICHOLAS. This artist, who was a native of Italy, possessed various talents, which were all suited to the taste of Charles I. He was a musician, painter, engraver, and a connoisseur; and had a great share in the purchases made for the royal collection. As a painter, he drew a Holy Family for the king; and his own portrait, by himself, with a pallet and pencil in his hand, and a scrip of paper, with musical notes, is in the music-school at Oxford. He possessed a considerable collection of drawings, several of which he caused to be engraved, and etched some of them himself, on one of which is an inscription in Italian, Done in my youthful age of 74. He died in London in 1646, aged 78. [The inscription referred to says, "Prove primo fatte a l'acqua forte da N. Laniera a l'età sua giovanile di settanta otti anni 1636," which is four years more. Some have transcribed it sessanta instead of settanta, and say that he died at 78. Laniera was a picture-dealer, and not over-scrupulous in such transactions; he measured the capacity of his customer, and used him accordingly. His example has not been lost on his successors.]

LANINI, BERNARDINO. This painter was born at Vercelli about the year 1522, and was a disciple of Gaudenzio Ferrari, whose style he imitated with such precision, that a picture he painted for the church of S. Giuliano, at Milan, representing a Pietà, might be taken for a work of that master, had he not signed it with his name, and the date 1547. At a later period of his life, he operated with more freedom, and painted an altar-piece of St. Catherine, for the church dedicated to that saint, near S. Celso, which is highly commended by Lomazzo, as full of fire, and picturesque feeling, with a colour resembling Titian, and an expression in the head of the saint which Guido would afterwards have been proud to acknowledge. He was much employed at Milan, and in the state, and particularly at Novara, where he painted, in the dome, the personification of the Deity, some subjects from the life of the Virgin, and the Sibyls, which are so justly celebrated. In some of his works he aimed at the impressive style of Lionardo da Vinci, particularly in a picture in S. Ambrogio, of our Saviour after the Scourging, between two Angels; a production so full of pious and beautiful expression, and of such admirable relief, that it is esteemed one of the finest works of art in that Basilica. He died about the year 1578.

LANINI, GAUDENZIO, and GIROLAMO, were the brothers of the preceding artist, and followed, at an humble distance, the style of Bernardino. By the former, Lanzi mentions a picture in the sacristy of the Barnabites, representing the Virgin and Infant, with several saints; and by the latter, a deposition from the Cross, in a private collection at Vercelli.

LANKRINCK, PROSPER HENRY. This painter was a native of Germany, born about the year 1628. His father, a soldier of fortune, brought his wife, and this his only son, into the Netherlands, where he obtained a colonel's commission, and died at Antwerp. The young Lankrinck received a good education, and was intended by his mother for a monk, but discovering an inclination for painting, he was permitted to attend the academy, where his progress was considerable, which was promoted by his having access to study the best pictures in one of the finest collections at Antwerp. Lankrinck made an excellent selection, and attached himself particularly to the landscapes of Titian. On the death of his mother he came to England, in the reign of Charles II., and was patronized by Sir Edward Spragge, and more particularly by Sir William Williams, for whom he painted a great number of landscapes, which were destroyed when that gentleman's mansion was burned down. His pictures were in considerable estimation, and he was occasionally employed by Sir Peter Lely to paint his back-grounds. The scenery in his landscapes is wild and romantic, with rocks and broken grounds, in the style of Salvator Rosa. He died in London in 1672. [Most writers on the subject agree that he died in 1692.]

LANZANI, ANDREA. This painter was born at Milan about the year 1645. After receiving some lessons from Luigi Scaramuccia, a scholar of Guido, then resident at Milan, he went to Rome, where he entered the school of Carlo Maratti. His genius, however, led him to something less placid; and he particularly devoted himself to the study of the energetic productions of Lanfranco. His best pictures were those he painted immediately on his return to Milan, whilst his mind was impressed with the great principles of the Roman school. Such are his picture of S. Carlo in glory; and a subject from the life of Cardinal Fedengo, in the Ambrosian library. He died in 1712. [According to Zani he was living in 1714.]

[LAP, JEAN, a Dutch artist, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century, and painted landscapes with ruins and numerous figures, in the manner of Jan Both. His drawings of landscapes are better known than his paintings in oil. There is, however, no authentic account of him.]

LAPI, NICCOLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He executed some of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino. [Niccolo was born in 1661, and died in 1732: he was a painter and scholar of Luca Giordano. Giovanni Lapi was an engraver, and flourished about 1750. He engraved some of the plates for the Museo Etrusco. There were other engravers of the name of Lapi.]

LAPIS, GAETANO. This artist was born at Cagli, in the Roman state, in 1704, and studied at Rome under Sebastiano Conca. He is described by Rossi as a painter of an original taste, possessing great fire, yet correct in his design. In the Palazzo Borghese at Rome, he painted a ceiling representing the Birth of Venus, a performance which gives a respectable idea of his talent. He died in 1776.

LAPPOLI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO. According to Vasari, this painter was born at Arezzo in 1492, and was first a disciple of Domenico Pecori, but afterwards studied under Jacopo Caruzzi, called Pontormo. He went early in his life to Rome, where he formed an intimacy with Perino del Vaga, and il Rosso, and was favoured with the protection of Clement VII., who employed him in some public works; but the completion of them was interrupted by the sacking of Rome in 1527, when he was obliged to flee. He retired to his native city, where he painted several pictures for the churches and private collections. He died in 1552.

[LAQUY, GUILLAUME JOSEPH, born in 1738, studied in the school of Jean Remmers with Wybrand Hendriks, in whose landscapes he painted the figures. He was patronized by the celebrated amateur Braamcamp, and made copies of the works of Gerard Dou, Metsu, De Hooge, P. Potter, and other eminent masters in that fine collection. He also painted original pictures, of the cabinet size, which are esteemed for the beauty of their colour, and the richness of the accessories. He is not always equal; but his pictures are sought for, and find a place in some of the best collections. He died at Cleves in 1798.]

LARCHER, ANTOINETTE. This ingenious lady was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1725. She engraved some plates of historical subjects, among which is Judith with the Head of Holofernes, after Raffaelle. She signed her name Toinette Larcher.

LARGILLIERE, NICHOLAS DE. Though born at Paris, in 1656, this artist received his technical education at Antwerp, where his father settled as a merchant, and placed him under the tuition of Francis Gobeau, a painter of landscapes and still-life. Having made some proficiency in those subjects, he aspired to a more elevated branch of art, and attempted historical paintings and portraits with considerable success. His father's affairs calling him to England, he accompanied him to this country in the reign of Charles II. He drew the king, and some of the nobility, but did not at that time remain here long. He went to Paris, where he gained the friendship of Charles Le Brun, whose portrait he painted, which has been finely engraved by Gerard Edelinek. He was introduced to Louis

XIV., who sat to him, and he acquired sufficient celebrity to be made a member of the Academy at Paris. On the coronation of James II. he again visited England, where he painted the king and queen, Sir John Warner, with others, but returned to France at the revolution. Of his historical works, the most considerable was the Crucifixion, for the church of St. Genevieve. His colouring is more chaste than is usual with the artists of his country, and he drew with a correctness which rendered his portraits particularly interesting. He died at Paris in 1746.

LARMESSIN, NICHOLAS DE, THE ELDER, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1640. We have by this artist several portraits, engraved in a very agreeable style. They are executed entirely with the graver, and possess considerable merit. He sometimes marked his plates with the initials N. L., and sometimes with the cipher DL.

The following are by him :

PORTRAITS.

Philip de Bourbon, Duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIV.

Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans.

Henry Julius de Bourbon, Duke d'Enguien.

Charles XI., King of Sweden.

Claudia Felcita of Austria, Empress of Leopold I.

Maximilian Henry, Archbishop of Cologne.

Godfrey, Count d'Estrades, Marshal of France.

Gabriel Nicholas de la Reynie, Lieutenant of Police.

Louisa Frances, Duchess de la Valiere, in the habit of a Nun.

Balthasar Moretus.

Paul Manutius, Librarian of the Vatican.

Lawrence Coster; for a history of Printing.

John Guttenberg; for the same.

[According to Zani he died in 1684.]

LARMESSIN, NICHOLAS DE, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1684, and was instructed in engraving by his father. He acquired considerable celebrity by some prints he engraved for the Crozat collection, became a member of the French Academy, and engraver to the king. We have by him a great number of portraits, historical subjects, and others, engraved in a neat, finished style. In the execution of them, he united the point with the graver. There is a want of correctness in the design of his figures, and his prints are without much effect. The following are his principal works :

PORTRAITS.

James II., King of England.

Maria, his Queen.

William and Mary.

Louis XV. on horseback; after J. B. Vanloo.

Maria, Queen of Louis XV.; after the same.

Louis XV. on foot; after the same.

Maria, Dauphiness of France; after the same.

Charles Henry of Lorraine; after Ranc.

Woldemar de Lowndal, Marshal of France; after Boucher.

William Coustou, Sculptor to the King; after Lien; engraved for his reception into the Academy. 1730.

Claud Hallé, Painter to the King; after Le Gros; the same.

Philip Vleughel, Painter; after P. de Champagne.

PORTRAITS FOR THE CROZAT COLLECTION.

Raffaelle and Jacopo Pontormo; half-lengths; after Raffaelle.

Federigo Carondeletto, Archdeacon of Bitonto; after the same.

Cardinal Pole; after Raffaelle, or S. del Piombo.

SUBJECTS FOR THE CROZAT COLLECTION.

St. Michael vanquishing the Evil Spirit; after Raffaelle.
St. George and the Dragon; after the same.

St. John the Evangelist; after the same.
 The Holy Family; after the same.
 The Virgin and infant Jesus; after the same.
 The Vision of Ezekiel; after the same.
 Christ bearing his Cross; after the same.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS AFTER FRENCH MASTERS.

The Four Seasons; after Lancret.
 The Four Ages of Man; after the same.
 A set of four Prints from the Fables of La Fontaine;
after Boucher.
 The Amorous Savoyard; after Pierre.
 The Savoyard Family; after the same.

[Zani places his birth in 1683. If his father died in 1684 he could have received no instruction from him. Neither Nagler nor Brulliot mention the time of the elder Larmessin's death. In a book published by J. F. Foppens in 1739, there are several portraits bearing his mark, which excites the suspicion that there is an error in Zani's date. The younger Larmessin died in 1755.]

LAROON, MARCELLUS. This artist was born at the Hague in 1653, and learned the rudiments of painting from his father, with whom he came young to England. Here he was placed with La Zoon, an obscure portrait painter, and was afterwards some time with B. Flesshier. Sir Godfrey Kneller employed him to paint his draperies, in which branch he was eminent. He possessed the talent of imitating the different styles of the great masters with uncommon success; and painted historical subjects, portraits, and conversations. We have by this artist some slight spirited etchings of Dutch Boors regaling, and similar subjects, in a style resembling Ostade, but very inferior. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher M. [It is supposed that he died in 1705.]

LARRAGA, APOLLINARIO. This Spanish painter was a native of Valencia, and has been erroneously stated to have been a scholar of Pedro Orrente, who most probably died before he was born, as Larraga outlived him upwards of eighty years. He is said, however, to have made his works the model of his imitation, and painted several pictures in his style in the convent of San Dominic, and in the churches of his native city. He died in 1728.

[LASINIO, IL CONTE CAVALIERE CARLO, a distinguished modern Italian engraver, was born at Trevigi about 1757, but operated chiefly at Florence. He is known by several works illustrative of the older painters, particularly of the remains at the Santo Campo di Pisa; L'Etruria Pittrice, published in 1791; the ancient pictures that exist in Florence; portraits of the Archbishops and Bishops convoked at Florence in 1787; and numerous other works, of which an account may be found in Nagler. His death is not recorded; and it would seem that he has exercised his profession on his favourite subjects within these few years, as several of the outline illustrations of Rosini's "Storia della Pittura Italiana," bear his name, as well as those of his sons Giovanni Paolo and Ferdinando. They are remarkable for the correctness of design, and the beauty and force of expression.]

LASNE, MICHAEL. This artist was one of the first of the French engravers who distinguished himself by a free and dexterous management of the graver. He was born at Caen in Normandy in 1595, and appears to have imitated the style of Cornelius Bloemaert, and F. Villamena. He possessed considerable ability; his drawing is tolerably correct, and his stroke is bold and free, though sometimes there is an appearance of dryness in his works.

He was extremely laborious, and has left a great number of prints, consisting of portraits, historical and other subjects. When he did not sign his plates with his name, he generally used the cipher

M. The following are esteemed his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIII. on horseback, the back-ground representing a battle; was engraved by Callot; Michael Asinuz, sculptor Regius.
 Bernard, Duke de la Valette; the back-ground, with the town of Metz, is also engraved by Callot.
 Anne of Austria, Queen of France.
 Armand, Cardinal de Richelieu.
 Julius, Cardinal de Mazarin.
 Charles de Crequi, Marshal of France.
 Francis de Bassompierre, Marshal of France.
 Peter Seguier, Chancellor.
 Nicholas de Bailleur, President of the Parliament.
 Francis Fernandez, Franciscan.
 Father Joseph, celebrated Capuchin.
 John Francis Niceron, Monk, and famous mathematician; rare.
 Giulio Strozzi, Venetian poet; after S. Vouet. 1627.
 Francis Quessel, painter to Henry III.; from a picture by himself.
 Father Nicholas Caussin; engraved in the manner of Mellan.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Rubens.
 St. Francis d'Assise receiving the infant Jesus from the Virgin; after the same.
 St. Francis de Paula receiving the Infant; after the same.
 The Visitation of the Virgin; after Lod. Caracci.
 The Virgin, with the Infant sleeping, and St. John, called the Silence; after Annibale Caracci.
 A dead Christ, with Mary Magdalene; from his own designs.
 An Ecce Homo; after Titian.
 Jesus Christ in glory, with St. Peter and St. Paul; after P. Veronese.
 The Virgin in the Clouds, with a Crescent; after Albano; oval.

[His works are very numerous. He died in 1667.]
 LASTMAN, PETER. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1581, and was a disciple of Cornelius Cornelisz. Vanmader, in his account of the Dutch painters, published in 1604, says he was at Rome in that year, whither he went for improvement, on leaving the school of Cornelisz. He painted historical subjects, generally composed of a great number of figures, in which it appears that his journey to Italy had not contributed to render his design either graceful or correct. His merit consists in a vigorous and forcible colour, and a competent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro. He was for a short time the instructor of Rembrandt, who seems to have adopted his style, to a certain degree, both in his paintings and engravings, though he greatly improved it. There are a few etchings by Peter Lastman, from his own compositions, which are now become scarce; among which we have,

Judith and Tamar, in a landscape; marked P. L.
 A Female seated before an arch, her head covered with a veil, with her hands before her.

[Füssli, Nagler, Brulliot, and Zani, all place Peter Lastman's birth in 1562; Balkema, in 1581. Only the last mentions his death in 1649.]

LASTMAN, NICHOLAS, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Haerlem in 1609. After learning the principles of design from John Pinas, he was instructed in engraving by John Saenredam. His plates are neatly executed, but without much taste. We have, among others, the following by him:

The Portrait of Karel van Mander; copied after J. Saenredam.

Christ praying in the Garden; after Peter Lastman.

St. Peter delivered from Prison; after J. Pinas.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after Guido.

The Merciful Samaritan, in a landscape; after his own design. This print is not generally known, it is executed in a very pleasing style. Nicol. Lastman, inv. et scul.

[Balkema and Nagler place his birth in 1619. Zani calls him Nicolaus Petri, (i. e. Nicolas son of Peter,) and says he worked in 1606 and 1626. A print of Christ in the Garden, after A. P. Lastmann, and signed Nicola Petri, sc. 1648, is mentioned by Nagler. Brulliot quotes the same print, but reads 1608. Others are signed N. Lastmann only, without dates.]

LATER, [or LATRE,] J. DE, a very indifferent engraver, who flourished about the year 1720, and appears to have resided at Amsterdam, as he engraved some Bible-plates from the designs of Picart and others, published in that city, in 1720. He also engraved some portraits in mezzotint; among which is that of William III., with his hat on.

LAUB, T. This artist is miscalled, by Mr. Strutt, Lamb. He was probably of Germany, and engraved in mezzotint. His name, T. Laub, is affixed to a portrait of John James Scheuchzer. [He died in 1761, at the age of 76. His name was Tobias.]

LAVESQUE, JACOB, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1624. He was brought up in the school of Rembrandt, but from a singular capriciousness, instead of profiting by the lessons of that able master, he attached himself to an imitation of the works of John de Baan, a portrait painter of some eminence, but of very inferior capacity to his first instructor. His talents appear to have been confined to portraits, in which he was respectable.

LAULNE, STEPHEN, or STEPHANUS, an ingenious French engraver, born at Orleans in 1520. His prints, which are generally small, are very numerous; they are executed entirely with the graver, with great dexterity of handling, and very highly finished. He copied some of the prints of Marc Antonio with some success; but the greater part of his plates are from his own designs. His compositions are ingenious, and discover great fertility of invention. His drawing, though not always correct, is tasteful. He usually marked his prints with the initial of his Christian name, S., or S. F., or S. fecit, and sometimes Stephanus, fecit. The following are his principal prints:

A set of thirty Prints of Subjects from the Old Testament.

A set of eighteen Mythological Subjects; oval, very small.

The Twelve Months of the Year; circular.

Four; Jupiter, Neptune, Mercury, and Ceres; circular.

Four Subjects of Ancient History; oval.

The Four Monarchies; oval.

Four, of Rural Occupations; oval.

The Three Graces.

David and Goliath; after Marc Antonio.

The Murder of the Innocents; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Felicitas; after the same.

The Rape of Helen; after the same.

The Brazen Serpent; after John Cousin. This is one of his largest prints.

[Füssli and Zani place his birth in 1518; Brulliot maintains that it was in 1520; Nagler says it took place in 1510. The last date found on his prints is 1575; but Füssli says he worked in 1590; and some suppose still later.]

LAUNAY, NICHOLAS DE, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1739. He was a pupil of J.

L. Lempereur, and was received into the French Academy in 1777. We have by this artist a great number of prints, neatly executed with the graver. Among others, the following:

The Portrait of Abbé Raynal; after Cochin.

The Wise and Foolish Virgins; after Schalken.

The March of Silenus; after Rubens.

Christ driving out the Merchandisers; after Jordaens.

Angelica and Medoro; after J. Raoux.

Leda; and its companion, Endymion; after Pierre.

The Good Mother; after Fragonard.

The Favourite Child; after le Prince.

The Lime-kiln; after Loucherbourg.

A pair of Views of Ruins; after Diétricy.

The Triumph of Taste, a frontispiece for the History of the French Theatre; [and many others after painters of his time.]

He also engraved several vignettes, portraits, and book-plates. [He died about 1792.]

LAUNAY, ROBERT DE, was the younger brother and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1754. We have several plates by him, executed in a neat, finished style, like that of Nicholas de Lanay; and he was also much employed in ornaments for books. The following are by him:

The unforeseen Misfortune; after Greuze.

The Marriage Contract; after A. Borel.

The Marriage broken off; after E. Aubrey.

The Egg-sellers; after A. Vander Werf.

The Turkish Bath; after Barbier.

[He died in 1814.]

LAURENT, [or LAWRENCE,] ANDREW. This artist, according to Basan, was an Englishman, and flourished about the year 1750. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he engraved the plates of the great Gallery at Versailles, after the designs of Cochin. We have also by him, Saul consulting the Witch of Endor; after Sal. Rosa.

A Conversation; after Teniers.

The Hay Harvest, and its companion; after Wowermans.

[Andrew Laurent, or Lawrence, was a pupil of Ph. Le Bas. Brulliot misrepresents Bryan, when he says that he indicates that Lawrence died in 1740; whereas Bryan distinctly says that he flourished about the year 1750. If this artist engraved after Loucherbourg, as stated by Nagler, he must have lived still later than 1750. Nagler should have consulted Bryan before he repeated what was said by Brulliot. See the article DE LOUTHERBOURG.]

LAURENT, PETER, a modern French engraver, born at Marseilles about the year 1745. He established himself at Paris, where he has engraved several plates with considerable success, particularly landscapes. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Water-Mill; after Boucher.

The Washer-Woman; after the same.

Saying Grace; after Greuze.

A Caravan; after Vander Does.

The Passage of the Ferry-boat; after Berghem.

The Shepherdess; after the same.

The Fortune-Teller; after the same.

A pair of Landscapes, with figures and animals; after Diétricy.

An Italian Landscape, with figures and cattle; after H. Roos.

Shepherds rejoicing; after Loucherbourg.

A View of Mondragon, in Dauphiny; after the same.

A Sea-port, with architecture; after the same.

The Death of the Chevalier d'Assas; after Casanova.

[And others after P. Potter, K. du Jardin, Wouwerman, Poussin, Van Goyen, D. Feti, &c.]

[He was an excellent engraver. Writers of authority say he was born in 1739, and died in 1809. He published in 1802, in conjunction with Robillard, the beautiful collection, entitled Musée Français.

[LAURENT, PIERRE LOUIS HENRI, son of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1779. He engraved several subjects from the life of St. Bruno, after Lesueur; the Death of the Virgin, after Caravaggio; the Martyrdom of St. Peter, the Dominican, after Titian; which form part of the Musée Français; the Rape of the Sabines, and the Finding of Moses, after Poussin; the Communion of St. Jerome, after Domenichino; and many others after the great masters. He published the collection of engravings of the Musée Royal, which forms a continuation of the Musée Français, published by his father.]

LAURENTIO, C. This artist, who is of little note, is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of some of the portraits in Priorata's History of the Emperor Leopold. 1660.

LAURETTI, TOMMASO, called IL SICILIANO. This painter was a native of Palermo, and is said by Vasari to have been a disciple of Sebastiano del Piombo. At an early period of his life he established himself at Bologna, where he painted several pictures for the churches. To a more vigorous colour than was usual at his time, he added a great style of design, which he had acquired by the lessons of Sebastiano. Of his works at Bologna, the principal are the Martyrdom of S. S. Vitale and Agricola, in the church dedicated to those saints; in S. Giacomo Maggiore, the Resurrection of Christ, and the Burial of S. Agostino; the latter a grand and copious composition; and in S. Mattia, the Coronation of the Virgin. He was invited to Rome by Gregory XIII., to finish the ceiling of the Sala di Constantino, left imperfect at the death of Clement VII. He was no less patronized by Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. By the latter, he was engaged to ornament one of the saloons in the Campidoglio, where he painted in fresco the history of Brutus; one of his most considerable works. He was the second president of the Academy of St. Luke after its foundation, and flourished at Rome in great esteem, until his eightieth year. [He was living at the latter part of the sixteenth century.]

LAURI, BALTHASAR. This artist was born at Antwerp about the year 1570. He went to Rome when he was young, and became a scholar of his countryman, Paul Brill, under whom he proved a reputable landscape painter.

LAURI, FRANCESCO, was the elder son of the foregoing artist, born at Rome in 1610. Having shown an early disposition for historical painting, his father placed him under the care of Andrea Sacchi, who, discovering in him the dawn of uncommon genius, instructed him with the greatest care. On leaving that able master, he travelled through Italy, France, and Germany, and returned to Rome, where the most sanguine hopes were entertained of his reaching a distinguished rank in the art. These expectations were, however, unhappily destroyed by his premature death in 1635, at the age of 25. The only work mentioned by him is a ceiling in the Palazzo Crescenzi, at Rome, representing three Goddesses.

LAURI, FILIPPO. This painter was the younger son of Balthasar Lauri, born at Rome in 1623. He was first instructed by his brother Francesco Lauri, and on the death of that promising artist, became a scholar of Angelo Caroselli. The progress of Filippo was extraordinary, and he soon surpassed his instructor. Nature, who had not bestowed her graces on his person, endowed his mind with many accomplishments. He had a turn for poetry, was well acquainted with history and the fable, and was a master of perspective. He succeeded better in easel pictures than in figures as large as life, though he painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Rome, particularly his picture of Adam and Eve in la Pace. His best works are his bacchanals, and subjects of the fable, which are ingeniously composed, the figures correctly and gracefully designed, with very agreeable landscapes in the back-grounds. He died in 1694. [His works have been favourites with English engravers, and have employed the talents of Woollet, Byrne, Walker, Bragg, Major, C. Watson, Wright, Mason, Ravenet, and others.]

LAURI, GIACOMO, an Italian engraver, a native of Rome, who flourished about the year 1610. He published, in 1612, a set of one hundred and sixty-six prints, entitled, Antiquæ Urbis, Splendor, &c., consisting of views of the ancient buildings, &c. at Rome. They are executed with the graver in a poor style.

LAURI, or LAURIER, PIETRO. This painter was a native of France, though he resided the greater part of his life at Bologna, where he was brought up in the school of Guido. He painted several pictures for the churches at Bologna; some of which have the appearance of having been retouched by Guido. At the Cappucini is a fine picture of the Virgin presenting the infant Jesus to S. Felice; and in La Madonna della Liberta, S. Antonio da Padua. [He flourished about 1650.]

LAURIN, HENRY FREDERICK, [HEINRICH FREDERICK,] a modern German engraver, born at Dresden in 1756. He was a pupil of Adrian Zingg, and has engraved some landscapes in a neat and spirited style. Some of his first essays were after Salvator Rosa, Kobell, &c. We have besides the following by him:

Two Landscapes; after Kleughel.

A pair, the Fishermen, and the Waterfall of Liebethal; after Zingg.

Two large Views of Fano; after Theil.

A Landscape and Cattle; after A. Vande Velde.

[He died in 1830.]

LAURO, GIACOMO. In the Memoire Trevigiane su le opere di disegno, by Federici, is mentioned Giacomo Lauro, a scholar of Paolo Veronese, a native of Venice, though resident at Trevisi. In the church of the Dominicans, in that city, is a fine picture of St. Roch interceding for the persons afflicted with the plague; a grand composition, worthy of the school in which he was educated. He died young in 1605.

LAUTENSACK, HENRY, [or HEINRICH.] This old German engraver is miscalled, by Mr. Strutt, Hans, or John. He was born at Nuremberg about the year 1506, and was the son of Paulus Lautensack, an obscure painter, who taught him the rudiments of design. He engraved some plates in the style of Sebald Beham, though very inferior to him. He usually marked his prints with a cipher composed of the initials H. L. on a tablet, with an instrument resembling a graver, and the date

. We have by him the following:

The Martyrdom of St. Catherine.

The Crucifixion, inscribed, Christum non istum. Sed Christum crede per istum.

The Decollation of St. John; a small circular print.

A Boy holding a Flag.

A Boy standing on a Globe, with a bow in his hand.

He is said to have engraved on wood. [With regard to this artist, real or supposed, the inquirer should consult Bartsch, Brulliot, Nagler, and others that they indicate, as there is much obscurity about him and his works. Some think that Heinrich and Hans are one. Zani says he died about 1590. The word leytzen is inscribed on some of the prints attributed to him: this is a subject for German etymologists.]

LAUTENSACK, HANS SEBALD, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Nuremberg about the year 1528. He is called by Mr. Strutt, Henry. We have by this artist several landscapes, etched in a dark, unpleasant style; and also some portraits, etched and finished with the graver, which possess considerable merit. His prints are generally marked with a monogram composed of the letters H. S. L.

on a tablet, with the date,  The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

- Paulus Lautensack, painter of Nuremberg.
Hans Sebald Lautensack; se ipse, sc. 1552.
Hieronimus Schurstah, half-length; on one side his Arms, and on the other a Village with a Church. M.D.LIII.
Georgius Roggenhack. 1554.
The half-length of a Nohleman, with a beard; on one side his Arms, and on the other a fortified Castle. 1554.

SUBJECTS AND LANDSCAPES.

- A Landscape, with David and Goliath. 1551.
Christ curing the Blind at Jericho. 1559.
A Mountainous Landscape, with the History of Balaam and his Ass. 1559.
Villagers occupied in the Vintage. 1559.
A Landscape, with a Farm-Yard. 1551.
Two pleasing Landscapes; dated 1553 and 1555.
A grand Tournament. 1560; very scarce.
A representation of Public Games. 1560; very scarce.
A large View of Nuremberg, from the east; in three sheets. 1555.
A similar View of that city from the west; the same. 1552.

[Zani says "he was the son of Paul Lautensack, and brother of Heinrich; that his Christian name was Hans, not Hans Sebald. That the mark H. L. S. on the tablet in his engravings, ought to be read Hans Lauten-Sack, and not Hans Sebaldus Lautensack, as it has been improperly interpreted by all writers." If the inscription on his own portrait, as quoted above, be correctly given, this falls to the ground. Nagler, who gives the fullest account of his prints, does not mention it. The latest date is 1560.]

LAUW, or LAW, an English mezzotinto engraver, by whom we have several plates, after Teyniers and other masters.

LAUWERS, NICHOLAS, a Flemish engraver, born at Leuze, near Tournay, about the year 1620. He studied at Antwerp, under the celebrated engravers after Rubens, and attached himself particularly to the style of Paul Pontius, which he imitated with success, without however equalling that eminent artist, either in the firmness of his graver, or the correctness of his design. We have several prints by him from various masters; but his best plates are those he engraved after Rubens. The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

- Isabella, Infanta of Spain, with two Children, one holding a crown, the other her arms; after Rubens.
Fran. Leho Blancatio; after Vanduyck.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Adoration of the Magi; after Rubens.
Christ before Pilate; after the same. In the latter impressions of this print, the name of Bolswert is substituted for that of Lauwers.

The Descent from the Cross; after the same.

The dead Christ on the knees of the Virgin, with Mary Magdalene; after the same.

The Triumph of the New Law; in two sheets; after the same.

St. Cecilia, with Angels; after Gerard Seghers.

Gamesters and Smokers in a Tavern; after the same.

Jupiter and Mercury, with Baucis and Philemon; after J. Jordans.

The Virgin appearing to a Carmelite; after Diepenbeck.
St. Agabus before the Virgin; after the same.

LAUWERS, CONRAD, was the younger brother of Nicholas Lauwers, born at Leuze about the year 1623. He learned engraving at Antwerp, and executed several plates after the Flemish masters, and others, with the graver, in the style of his brother, though inferior to him. We have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

- Aertus Quellinus, Junior, architect; after J. de Decyts.
Peter Verbrugghen, sculptor; after E. Quellinus.
M. A. Capello, Bishop of Antwerp; after Diepenbeck.
Anthony Vigier, Jesuit; after J. Cossiers.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- Elijah in the Desert, with an Angel bringing him food; after Rubens.
Christ hearing his Cross; after the same.
The Penitence of St. Peter; after Cossiers.
The Crucifixion; after the same.
The Virgin, with the infant Jesus, St. Elisabeth, and St. John, in a landscape; after Schiavone.

[LAWRENCE, SIR THOMAS, an English portrait painter, was born at Bristol in 1769. His father was brought up to the legal profession, which, however, he never followed; through the interest of his wife's relations he was appointed to the office of supervisor of excise, which, soon after the birth of his son, he resigned, and became landlord of the White Lion Inn. Not being successful at Bristol, Mr. Lawrence, in 1772, was enabled, by the assistance of his friends, to become landlord of the Black Bear at Devizes, where he remained till 1779. This inn was at that time much frequented by the rich and fashionable who resorted to Bath, and generally stopped at Devizes. It was here that young Lawrence manifested that decided predilection for the art in which he subsequently attained such eminence. He drew striking likenesses with the pencil and pen while yet a child in petticoats. He was likewise remarkable for the feeling and taste with which he recited poetry, in which he had been trained by his father, who never failed to introduce him to his guests, who were delighted with the boy's manners and personal beauty. It appears, however, that his education, in other respects, was very little attended to; for he was removed from school when only eight years old; so it can hardly be said that he received any school education. His father, being again unsuccessful in business, left Devizes, and in 1782 settled at Bath, where he placed his son, for a time, as a pupil with Mr. Hoare, the painter in crayons. It was here he acquired that taste that qualified him to become the most fashionable painter of fashionable female beauty. At the age of thirteen he received from the Society of Arts the great silver pallet, gilt, and five guineas, for a copy in crayons, of the Transfiguration. In 1787 his father brought him to London, and he was introduced to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who gave him good advice and encouragement. In the same year he exhibited at Somerset House seven of his portraits, all of females. From that time his fame and practice increased. In 1791 he was chosen associate of the Royal Academy; in 1792 George the Third appointed him successor to Sir Joshua Reynolds, as principal painter in ordinary, and the Dilettanti Society also chose him for their painter. From that time every exhibition at Somerset House offered proofs of his talents; yet these pictures were but a small portion of those which he executed. The reputation he had acquired induced the Prince Regent (afterwards George the Fourth) to commission him to paint the portraits of the Sovereigns, Statesmen, and Generals, who had been actively engaged in the last great contests with Napoleon; which labour he commenced in 1814, with the portraits of the king of Prussia, Platoff, and Blucher, who were then in England. In 1815 he was knighted by the Regent; in 1818 he proceeded to the congress at Aix-la-Chapelle; thence to Vienna; and in May, 1819, to Rome, where he painted the portraits of Pope Pius and Cardinal Gonsalvi. The portraits he painted, in obedience to his commission, are now in the Waterloo Hall at Windsor Castle. While Lawrence was absent on the continent, Benjamin West, the president of the Royal Academy, died in 1820, and he was elected to the vacant chair. He returned to England loaded with honours and presents received abroad, to meet with equally flattering distinctions at home: these he continued to enjoy till his death, which occurred on the 7th of January, 1830. As a very copious account of almost every matter relating to this artist is given in his "Life and Correspondence," by Mr. Williams, it is unnecessary to give a detailed catalogue here of the very numerous portraits of persons of the highest ranks in society produced by his pencil. Dr. Waagen, speaking of the collection of portraits in the Waterloo Hall at Windsor, says, "Among so great a number all cannot be equal in merit. I was particularly pleased with those of the Pope, Cardinal Gonsalvo, and the Emperor of Austria. Besides the graceful and unaffected design, the clear and brilliant colouring, which are peculiar to Lawrence, these are distinguished by greater truth of character, and a more animated expression, than is generally met with in his pictures." One of his eulogists observes, that he evidently profited by the sound advice given to him by Sir Joshua Reynolds, "not so to imitate the old masters as to give a richness of hue rather than the ordinary hues of nature, but to paint what he saw; but at the same time not to fall into the vulgar error of making things too like themselves." As opinion is not settled respecting his merits as an artist; of the influence his examples are likely to have on the rising generation of portrait painters; of the rank he is entitled to hold with those who have most distinguished themselves in the same line, both ancient and modern; nor is it likely to be during the lives of his contemporaries: it must be left to posterity to pronounce the judgment. Neither praise nor censure will now affect him; but either, justly bestowed, may be of benefit to others.]

LAWRIE, ROBERT, an English engraver in mezzotinto, born about the year 1740. We have by this artist some portraits, and various subjects, which possess considerable merit. Among others, the following:

PORTRAITS.

George III.; after Zoffany. 1772.
The Queen; after the same. 1772.
The Prince of Wales and Duke of York. 1772.
Elizabeth, Duchess of Hamilton; after C. Read.
Stephen Francis, Duke de Choiseul; after Vanloo.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Nativity; after Rubens.

The Holy Family returning from Egypt; after the same.
The Crucifixion; after the same.
The same subject; after Vanduyck.
The Incredulity of St. Thomas; after Rembrandt.
The Adoration of the Magi; after A. Cazali.
Sun-rise, a landscape; after G. Barret.
A hard Gale; after Vernet.
A Squall; after the same.
The Quack Doctor; after Dietricy.

[It is supposed that he died about 1804.]

LAZZARI, DONATO, called BRAMMANTE DI URBINO. This distinguished artist has been so celebrated as an architect, that little has been recorded of his works as a painter. According to Colucci, in his Antichità Picene, he was born at Castel Durante, in the Duchy of Urbino, in 1450, others say in 1444. He first applied himself to painting, and studied the works of Fra. Bartolomeo Corradini, called Carnevale. The few paintings which remain of him are at Milan, and in the state, and are mentioned with distinction by Lomazzo. He painted subjects of sacred and profane history, and portraits, in which his style resembles that of Andrea Mantegna. His fresco works in the churches at Milan have either perished, or are nearly obliterated; but something of him has been preserved in the Palazzo Castiglione, and in that of the Borri family. In the church of the Carthusians at Pavia, there is a chapel painted by Bramante, in fresco, in which the figures are grossly and heavily designed, and the colouring crude and raw. Both his powers and his taste led him to architecture, to which he devoted himself with the most brilliant success. He was superintendent of the buildings to Julius II., and died at Rome in 1514. [There is a print in Rosini (plate 105) which will give a favourable idea of Bramante's style in fresco painting. It should not be omitted that he was a relation, and the instructor of Raphael in architecture. The name Lazzari is merely feigned.]

LAZZARINI, GREGORIO. This artist was born at Venice in 1654, and was a scholar of Francesco Rosa, a Genoese painter, who resided some time at Venice. He soon abandoned the dark and gloomy style of his instructor, and aimed at the higher excellencies of the simple and natural. On viewing the works of Lazzarini, we should suppose him to have been educated in the Bolognese, or rather in the Roman school. Lanzi, however, asserts that he never quitted Venice, and that by the impulse of his genius alone he conciliated the esteem of the most distinguished professors of his time, particularly Carlo Maratti, who was not much accustomed to over-rate the talents of his contemporaries. When the Venetian ambassador, then resident at Rome, proposed a commission to the Roman artists to paint a picture for the Sala dello Scrutinio, at Venice, Carlo Maratti had the liberality to refuse the offer, expressing his surprise that he should apply to the painters of Rome, possessing at Venice such an artist as Lazzarini. Of the justice of Maratti's appreciation of his talents, he has given evident proof in the picture he painted on that occasion, representing the triumphal memorial of the Morosini. He distinguished himself more in his admired picture of S. Lorenzo Giustiniani, at the Patriarcale, which is esteemed by Lanzi the finest oil painting of the Venetian school of the period at which he lived, whether we consider the grandeur of the composition, the elegance of the contours, or the interesting variety in the heads and attitudes. [According to Zanetti, this artist died in 1740, at the age of 86; Longhi says in 1730, at the age of 75; and the author "della Guida di Venezia," says he died in 1733. As these three writers were Venetians, to which are we to give credit?]

LEADER, WILLIAM, an English mezzotinto engraver, by whom we have a few prints; among others, a small upright plate, representing Samson in Prison; after Rembrandt.

LEAL, DON SIMON DE LEON, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1610. He was a scholar of Pedro de las Cuevas, and distinguished himself both in history and portraits. In the latter, he formed his style from the chaste and simple colouring of Vanduyck. Of his historical works at Madrid, the most considerable are, the principal altar-piece, and a series of pictures of the infancy of Christ, in the new church of the Noviciado of the Jesuits; and the Immaculate Conception, in the church of the Capuchins. He was appointed painter to the Queen, and was much employed by the court. He died at Madrid in 1687. [The name of this artist, as given by Bermudez, is LEON LEAL, Don Simon de.]

LEAL, DON JUAN DE VALDES. See VALDES.

LE BAS. See BAS.

[LEBEL, or LE BEL, CHARLES JACQUES, a French historical painter, who flourished from 1806 to about 1827, and produced several interesting works relating to the French nation: among them, that of Napoleon visiting the Hospital at Mount St. Bernard; the Reduction of the City of Paris by Henry IV.; an Incident in the Life of Marshal de Turenne; a Trait of Humanity in a French Grenadier; and others of a similar kind. The picture of Turenne asleep on the field of battle, in winter, and his officers sheltering him with their cloaks from the inclemency of the weather, was in the collection of the late Baron Bolland. Lebel also painted a great number of portraits. The date of his death is not mentioned by Gabet.]

[LEBRUN, JEAN-BAPTISTE TOPINO, a French historical painter, was a scholar of David, and condemned to death in 1801, for conspiring against the life of the First Consul. The most esteemed picture by this artist is The Death of Caius Gracchus, which was purchased by the government, and placed in the Museum at Marseilles, the city of his nativity.]

[LEBRUN, MADAME E. L., whose maiden name was Vigée, received some instruction from Joseph Vernet and Greuze. Gabet is too polite to mention the lady's age. She was living, however, in 1828. She painted a number of very pleasing semi-allegorical subjects, and many portraits of distinguished persons; among which were Lady Hamilton, in the characters of a Sibyl and a Bacchant; Pae-siello; Madame de Stael as Corinna; Madame Catalani at the Piano; La Bruyere; the Abbé Fleury; and several princes and royal personages. In some of her pictures, she imitated the style of Greuze. She was a member of the Academies of Paris, Bologna, Parma, St. Luke, at Rome, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Rouen, Geneva, and lastly of Vaucluse. She was not a member of the Royal Academy of England; for though she painted the portrait of the Prince of Wales, the Academicians were either blind to her merit, or not sufficiently gallant to admit her among them.]

LECCÉ, MATTEO DA, [LECE, or LECCIO]. According to Baglioni, this artist was of some eminence at Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII. He painted chiefly in fresco, and aimed at the great style of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, but without much success. In the church of S. Eligio degli

Orefice, is a picture by him of the Virgin and Infant, with St. Stephen, St. Lawrence, and other saints; and in the Chiesa Nuova, a large altar-piece of the Transfiguration. [This artist is also called Perez de Alesio; he flourished in 1580, and it is supposed died in 1600.]

LEDERER, HANS JOHN. To this artist Professor Christ attributes some engravings marked with the cipher H.L. [There is great uncertainty respecting this artist; at all events the name John, in addition to Hans, is wrong. Brulliot mentions a Jerome Lederer, and says there are four prints by him expressing the characters of men, as the 'Sanguine,' the 'Phlegmatic,' the 'Choleric,' and the 'Melancholic.' The first of these has the name h. lederer, and the last a mark, which may be taken for I. L. or H. L. Malpe, he says, attributes these prints to Hans Lederer. (See plate of monograms.) Nagler gives the latinized name Hieronymus.]

LEDERLIN, JAMES, [or JACOB], a German engraver on wood, born at Tubingen about the year 1565. He executed a set of wooden cuts of the portraits of the professors of the University in that city, which were published by Erhard Zell in 1596. There are other prints by this master, some of which are dated 1590. He usually marked his prints with the monogram L.L.
1530.

LEDERSBASCH, CHRISTOPHER. By this artist, who was apparently a German, we have some slight, incorrect etchings, among which there is a large upright print, arched at the top, representing Samuel presented in the Temple; after Romanelli.

LEDÉSMA, JOSEF DE. According to Palamino, this Spanish artist was a native of Old Castile in 1630, where he learned the first rudiments of the art, but he afterwards studied at Madrid, under Don Juan Carenno, and became a correct designer, and an excellent colourist. There are some pictures by him in the church of the Colegio de San Thomas; but his most admired performance is the Deposition from the Cross, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, in the church of the Augustinos Recoletos, which his biographer asserts is alone sufficient to immortalize his reputation. He died at Madrid in 1670.

LEEPE, JOHN ANTHONY [VANDER]. This painter was of an honourable and opulent family, originally of Brussels, which city his parents left on account of the troubles then prevalent in Brabant, and settled at Bruges, where our artist was born in 1664. Among other accomplishments, he was instructed in drawing, and showed so marked a genius, and so strong an inclination for the art, that his parents permitted him to indulge his desire of becoming a painter. Indefatigable in his studies after nature, he was constantly in the fields and forests, or on the sea-shore, designing every object that attracted his attention, with a truth and precision which appear in all his works. He particularly excelled in the representation of sea-pieces, both when that element is agitated by storms, or in the tranquillity of a calm; subjects which he treated with surprising fidelity. Vander Leepe was also an eminent landscape painter, in which he imitated the grand style of Gaspar Poussin. His pencil is light and flowing, and his colouring is agreeable, though occasionally too cold. As he was not successful in the design of the figure, his pictures are generally decorated with those of his townsmen, Duvenende and Kerckhove. He died in 1720.

LEEST, ANTONIUS VAN. This artist is mentioned by Papillon, who states him to have been an engraver on wood of some talent, and executed, among others, four cuts of the Four Evangelists, which, according to that author, possess considerable merit.

LEEUEW, GABRIEL VANDER. This painter was born at Dort in 1643. He was the son of Sebastian Vander Leeuw, a painter of landscapes and animals, who had been a scholar of Jacob Gerritz Cuyp, from whom he received his first instruction in the art. In a short time he greatly surpassed his father, when he went to Amsterdam, where he formed an intimate acquaintance with David vander Plaas, with whom he formed the project of visiting Italy. In his journey through France he passed four years at Paris, and two at Lyons, in both which cities he was induced to make some stay, by the flattering encouragement he met with. On his arrival at Rome, he improved his style, by studying the works of Benedetto Castiglione, and Rosa da Tivoli. He painted landscapes with cattle, which were ingeniously composed, the animals well drawn, and touched with a fire and spirit rarely found in the painters of the Dutch school. After a residence of ten years at Rome and Naples, he returned to Holland, where his pictures were at first ardently sought after; but such was his facility and despatch, that they became too numerous for the public curiosity, and the demand for them decreasing, he conceived the plan of returning to Italy, where his works were still in great repute. The bold and masterly handling of his pencil was less acceptable to his countrymen than the patient precision and laborious finish of the generality of their painters. With the intention of travelling through France to revisit Italy, he went to Dort, for the arrangement of some family affairs, where he died suddenly in 1688. [Gabriel vander Leeuw etched several plates of animals in the style of Castiglione and H. Roos. When in Italy, he signed these G. Leone, (Leone having the same signification in Italian as Leeuw in Dutch,) which has given rise to a mistake that the prints so signed are by a Guillaume, or William, Leone, and the Italians write him as such, born at Parma in 1664!]

LEEUEW, PETER VANDER. This artist was the younger brother of Gabriel vander Leeuw, born at Dort in 1644, and was also instructed by his father. Finding that the bold style of Gabriel was not agreeable to the taste of his countrymen, he adopted one more finished and minute. The charming pictures of Adrian van de Velde were then deservedly in the highest repute, and he devoted himself to so close and exact an imitation of them, that no painter has so nearly approached the exquisite touch of his pencil, and the tenderness and suavity of his colour. His animals, without the precious finishing and characteristic correctness of Adrian, are not ill drawn, and his figures are neatly and spiritedly touched. His skies are clear and sunny, and his distances are agreeably degraded. The pictures of Peter vander Leeuw may easily be confounded with the early productions of his fascinating model.

LEEUEW, JOHN DE, a Dutch engraver, born at the Hague about the year 1660. In conjunction with John Lamsvelt, he engraved the portraits for Le Vassor's History of Louis XIII. We have also by him the following portraits:

Carolus Niellius, D. Theol. J. de Leeuw, sc.
James William Imhof, Senator of Nuremberg; D. Leeuw, fec.
Joseph Justus Scaliger.

John, Duke of Marlborough; veni, vidi, vici.
Abraham Cowley, poet; for the edition of his works, published in 1700.

LEEUEW, THOMAS DE. See LEU.

LEEUEW, WILLIAM DE, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1610. He was a disciple of Peter Soutman, but instead of following the neat, finished style of that artist, his etching is bold and free. There is a coarseness and want of harmony in his prints, though his manner is well adapted to some of the subjects he engraved, particularly his huntings, after Rubens. The following are his most esteemed prints, which are sometimes signed with his name, and sometimes marked with the cipher WZ.

Lot and his Daughters; after Rubens. The first impressions are before the name of C. Dankertz.
Daniel in the Lions' Den; after the same. The first impressions of this plate are also before the name of Dankertz.

The Virgin, supported by Angels, called Mater Dolorosa; after the same; scarce.

The Martyrdom of St. Catherine; after the same; fine and scarce.

Four large plates of Huntings; after the same. The same subjects are engraved by P. Soutman, viz. the Lion-hunt, the Boar-hunt, hunting the Wolf, and the Crocodile and Hippopotamus.

Tohit and his Wife; after Rembrandt.

David playing on the Harp before Saul; after the same.

The Portrait of Rembrandt's Wife; after the same.

A Female with a Veil; half-length; after the same; inscribed Marianne.

St. Francis in Meditation; after J. Lievins.

A set of four large Landscapes; after Adrian Nieuwant.

These prints are in a more finished style than is usual with him; they are scarce.

[By different writers his birth is placed in 1600, 1602, 1603, and 1610. He died about 1665.]

LEFEBURE, ———. See FEVRE.

LEGAT, FRANCIS. If this artist was not a native of England, he resided in London about the year 1780. He engraved several plates in a very finished style, in which he appears to have imitated the fine manner adopted by Sir Robert Strange; though his prints cannot boast of that power and brilliancy of effect which distinguish the works of that distinguished engraver. Among others, we have the following plates by him, which were engraved for Mr. Boydell:

Mary, Queen of Scots, resigning her Crown; after Gavin Hamilton.

The Continence of Scipio; after N. Poussin.

The King, Queen, and Laertes, in Hamlet; after West.

[Also a Scene in Richard the Third, after Northcote; and another Scene in King Lear, after Barry.]

LEGNANI, STEFANO, called LEGNANINO. According to Lanzi, this painter was born at Milan in 1660. He was called Legnanino to distinguish him from his father, Cristoforo Legnani, a portrait painter, by whom he was instructed in the first rudiments of design. He afterwards studied at Bologna under Carlo Cignani, and at Rome under Carlo Maratti. In both those cities, he proved himself a creditable scholar of those masters. His compositions are sedate and judicious, and there is an impasto and a lucidity in his colouring, not usual in the school of Maratti. He distinguished himself as a fresco painter, particularly in S. Angiolo at Milan, where he has represented a battle gained under the protection of St. James, which is treated with a fire and capacity equal to the most difficult subjects in the art. Many of his works are at Genoa, Turin, and in the Piedmontese. The cupola of S. Gaudenzio at Novara, is esteemed one of his most accomplished works. He died in 1715.

[LEGOTE, PABLO, a Spanish historical painter, established at Seville about the middle of the seventeenth century. He must have been an artist of considerable talent, as his pictures have been attributed by travellers, supposed to be competent judges, to Alonzo Cano and the elder Herrera: among others, that of the great altar-piece of Santa Maria de Lebrixa, and the Apostles, half-lengths, in the church of la Misericordia, at Seville; of which there are documents that prove the payment to Legote for the work. He was patronized by Cardinal Spinola, Archbishop of Seville, for whom he painted the Apostles, full-lengths and life-size, in the archiepiscopal palace. In these pictures will be found those qualities that constitute a great painter; nature, truth, good design, and beautiful colour. He was living at Cadiz in the year 1662, as appears by payments made to him there for painting standards for the naval armaments to the Indies.]

[LEJEUNE, LOUIS FRANÇOIS, BARON, and formerly aide-de-camp to General Berthier, was born at Strasbourg in 1775. He claims a place here as the painter of many of the battles in which he was engaged, and the French had the honour of victory; among them are those of Marengo, Lodi, Aboukir, (on land,) Mount Tabor, the Pyramids, the Passage of the Rhine by Jourdan, the Battle of Moskowa, and several others, all designed at the several actions, and afterwards transferred to canvass. He was a chevalier of the order of St. Louis, and commander of the Legion of Honour in 1831. Some of the battles have been engraved by Coiny and Bovinet.]

[LEIGEL, GODEFREY. This artist was a native of Switzerland, and flourished from the year 1530 to 1550. He engraved a set of wooden cuts of figures for the Bible, which are marked with a cipher composed of his initials G. [The engraver who used this mark, and a similar one on a tablet, (if it be one artist,) must have flourished from 1527 to 1560. See Bartsch and Brulliot.]

[LEISMAN, JOHN ANTHONY, a German painter, born in 1604. Without the help of a master he had acquired some ability in design, by copying the prints and pictures to which he had access, when he resolved to visit Italy in search of improvement, and went to Venice, where he contemplated with admiration the works of the best masters of that school. His natural talent, assisted by the study of such models, soon distinguished itself; and his pictures attracted the attention of the principal admirers of the art in that city. Although he painted historical subjects and portraits, he was more celebrated for his landscapes and sea-ports, which he embellished with architecture, in a fine style. He died in 1698. [The name of this painter was Johann Anton Eismann, not Leisman. His landscapes are of a romantic character, with waterfalls and buildings, somewhat in the manner of Salvator Rosa.]

[LELIE, ADRIEN DE, born at Tilbourg in 1755, was a scholar of Quertenmond at Antwerp. He made copies of many of the portraits by Rubens and Van Dyck, at Dusseldorff, and also of historical pictures by Italian and Dutch masters. By the advice of Professor Camper, he established himself at Amsterdam, where he painted a great number of portraits and cabinet pictures; among the latter is one of the celebrated amateur Joan Gildemeester showing his collection to a party of ladies and gentlemen, in which the principal pictures are readily recognised. In the Museum at Amsterdam there is a picture by him of an interior with a peasant filling his pipe, and a woman with an infant; and one of a young student at his lesson, which obtained great applause, was in the possession of Madame Van den Berghe, of Ghent. His pictures are highly esteemed in Holland and Germany, and are to be met with in the best modern collections. He died at Amsterdam in 1820.]

[LELIENBERG, (CHRISTIAN ?) a painter of dead game, and subjects of the chase, in the manner of Weeninx, flourished about 1663, according to the date on some of his pictures. No particulars of him are recorded by the Dutch writers.]

[LELLI, ERCOLE. This artist was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Gio. Pietro Zanotti. He appears to have applied himself more to the study of the anatomy of the human body than to painting; and is more celebrated for his anatomical preparations in wax, at the Bolognese Institute, than for his works as a painter. The only paintings mentioned of him are his picture of the Virgin and Infant, with S. Antonio di Padoua, and S. Chiara, in the church of S. Andrea delle Scuole, at Bologna; and a S. Fedele, at the Cappuccini, at Piacenza. He was an eminent teacher of design, and had many pupils. He died in 1766.]

[LELLI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO. According to Baglioni, this painter was born at Rome in 1591, and was a disciple of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli. Although he was more employed in easel pictures for private collections, there are some of his works in the churches at Rome, which entitle him to the rank of a respectable historical painter. In S. Matteo in Merulano, is an admired picture by him of the Annunciation; and in the cloister della Minerva, his most celebrated work of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth. He died in 1640.]

[LELY, SIR PETER. This eminent painter was born at Soest in Westphalia, in 1617, where his father, a captain of infantry, was in garrison. His family name was Vander Faes; but his father acquired the name of Lely, on account of his being lodged at a house of which the front was ornamented with a lily. Finding that his son's disposition led him rather to the cultivation of art than the pursuit of arms, he placed him under the care of Peter Grebber, at Haerlem, where he did not remain more than two years, when his master acknowledged that his instruction could no longer be useful to him; and when he was little more than twenty years of age, he had acquired a considerable reputation as a painter of landscapes and portraits. On the death of Vandyck, 1640, he determined to visit England, where he arrived the following year. He first painted landscapes, with historical figures; but on seeing the works of Vandyck, and finding that portrait painting was more encouraged than any other branch of the art, he devoted himself entirely to it, in which he imitated the style of his illustrious predecessor, and soon surpassed all his contemporaries. On the arrival of William, Prince of Orange, in 1643, when he came to England to be united to the Princess Mary, Lely was, under his auspices, introduced to the notice of Charles I., whose portrait he painted, and those of William and the Princess. The tragical events which followed, though generally fatal to the arts, did not occasion Lely to leave England. He remained to paint the rising, as well as the setting sun. It is related on the authority of Captain Winde, who assured the Duke of Buckingham of the fact, that Cromwell sat to him, and whilst he was painting his portrait, said to him, with his characteristic bluntness, "Mr. Lely, I desire you will use all your skill to paint my picture truly like me, and not flatter me at all; but remark all these roughnesses, pimples, warts, and every thing as you see me, otherwise I will never pay you a farthing for it." At the Restoration, Lely's business and reputation increased. He was in great favour with Charles II., who appointed him his principal painter, and conferred on him the order of knighthood. It would be in vain to attempt a recapitulation of the works of this master. They are generally portraits to the knees, and a great majority of them of ladies. Of his historical pictures, few are known; the following are mentioned by Lord Orford. "At Windsor is a Magdalene, with a sleeping Venus; the Duke of Devonshire has the story of Jupiter and Europa; Lord Pomfret had that of Cimon and Iphigenia; and at Burleigh is Susanna and the Elders." Compared with the portraits of Vandyck, those of Lely will be found deficient in the simplicity of his design, and in the purity of his colouring. If those of the former are occasionally tame, they are always natural, and his draperies are properly and tastefully thrown. Lely endeavoured to supply the want of taste with ideal finery; and there is something of affectation in the airs of his heads, and in the capricious arrangement of his habiliments. It must, however, be allowed, that his female portraits are sometimes more beautiful than those of Vandyck; but in those of men, he is every way his inferior. Sir Peter Lely died in 1680, and was buried in Covent Garden, where there is a monument with his bust by Gibbon, and a Latin epitaph by Thomas Flatman. Sir Peter Lely etched a plate of a Shepherd and Shepherdes. [Peter Lely was really a fine portrait painter, superior to any court painter in England since his time. His colouring is beautiful and permanent; there is a graceful air about his females that marks them as persons of high rank and breeding, and not as put on merely while they sat for their portraits; it becomes them. If his draperies sit loosely, it should be remembered that it was the fashion of the period. As far as regards costume Van Dyck was more fortunate. "The sleepy eye that spoke the melting soul," was perhaps an affectation of the ladies of a voluptuous court; the court-painter therefore adopted it. It is one of the distinguishing characteristics of the beauties that fluttered around the dissolute Charles. It has been remarked that his ladies have all beautiful hands. He knew how to paint them; and it was not left to the engraver to mend what the painter had marred. The backgrounds to his portraits were generally painted by others, especially where landscape was required.]

LEMENS, BALTHASAR VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1637, and was one of the first artists who visited England after the Restoration, which held out a prospect of a revival of the encouragement of the art, but his expectations were disappointed. He painted small historical subjects, in which he displayed a fruitful invention, and a neat and ready execution. But the fashion of the time was confined to portrait-painting, and he was under the necessity of finishing the draperies and back-grounds for other artists. He died in 1704.

[LEMIRE, NOEL, born at Rouen in 1723, was a scholar of Lebas. He made numerous illustrative engravings for books; particularly for les Contes de la Fontaine; les Métamorphoses d'Ovide, published by him and Basan in 1770; also an edition of the Temple de Gnide, for which he made all the engravings. Independent of these he engraved for other works a great number of subjects after Cochin, Eisen, and Moreau. There are also by him portraits of La Fayette and Washington; and subjects from Teniers, Caracci, A. del Sarto, and other Italian and Dutch masters. Le Gâteau des Rois, a satirical representation of the partition of Poland, by Moreau, was seized and the plate destroyed. Lemire died in 1801.]

LEMPEREUR, JOHN DENNIS, a French amateur engraver, born at Paris in 1710. He possessed an extensive collection of pictures and drawings. For his amusement he etched a variety of plates after Pietro da Cortona, Benedetto Castiglione, Vandyck, and others.

LEMPEREUR, JOHN BAPTIST DENNIS. This gentleman was the son of John Dennis Lempereur, born at Paris in 1740, and inherited the taste and talent of his father. He etched several plates after various masters, as well as from his own designs. Among others, we have by him the following:

The Angels announcing to the Shepherds the Nativity of Christ; after Boucher.

The Murder of the Innocents; after Pierre.

Two Landscapes; after Ruysdael.

LEMPEREUR, LOUIS SIMON, a French engraver, born in Paris in 1725. He was a pupil of Peter Aveline, and followed the style of his instructor. We have several prints by this able artist, which prove him to have possessed very eminent talents. He was a member of the French Academy. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

E. Jaurat, Painter to the King; after Roslin; engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1775.

P. L. B. de Belloy, a dramatic poet; an emblematical portrait. 1765.

Philip Cayeux, sculptor; after Cochin.

Claude Henry Watelet; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Bathers; after C. Vanloo.

The Triumph of Silenus; after the same.

Aurora and Tithon; after Pierre.

A Sacrifice to Pan; after the same.

Bacchus and Ariadne; after the same.

The Forge of Vulcan; after the same.

The Rape of Europa; after the same.

Pyramus and Thisbe; after J. B. Cazes.

The Garden of Love; after Rubens; the same subject is engraved by Clouet and C. Jegher.

A Spanish Festival; after Palamedes.

A pair, Flemish Merry-makings; after Teniers.

The Rape of Proserpine; after La Fosse.

LEMPEREUR, CATHERINE ELIZABETH. This ingenious lady was the wife of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1726. She was instructed in engraving by L. Cars and Fessard. We have several prints by her, executed in a neat, pleasing manner, among which are the following:

Two Views of Architecture; after Pannini.

The Milkmaid; after Teniers.

The Dangerous Forest; after Wowermans.

The Rural Labours; after the same.

The Departure of Jacob; after Boucher.

A set of six Marine Subjects and Sea-ports; after Ver-net.

LENCKER, HANS JOHN, a German engraver of little note. He lived about the year 1623, and engraved a frontispiece to a book on perspective, published at Nuremberg in that year. [Hans Lencker was an engraver of greater eminence than Bryan seems to have been aware of. There has been much inquiry and discussion respecting his identity. The mark attributed to him resembles, in some cases, that supposed to have been used by Heinrich Lautensach; and works really executed by Lautensach have been ascribed to Lencker from that circumstance. But Brulliot gives other monograms, with dates annexed, that sufficiently distinguish the two artists. He says that Hans Lencker was a goldsmith and engraver, and flourished at Nuremberg in 1573. He cites two prints, one of Pyramus and Thisbe, the other of Birds on the Branches of Trees and the Stalks of Flowers, among which is an owl seated on a mouse, which have the monogram H.

He further observes, that these prints ought to be attributed to Lencker, because we are acquainted with works in the same style engraved and enamelled in silver, which have the mark composed of the letters HL and N, (that is to say, Hans Lencker Nurembergensis), and the year 1573. It is found on arabesques enlivened with small figures, birds, and quadrupeds, engraved in silver and enamelled in colours. The royal library at Munich contains a book of prayers ornamented with beautiful miniatures, the covers of which are executed in the manner above described; they bear also the mark, his name, and the year 1573. There are other works attributed to this artist, which the curious will find described in Brulliot, Dictionnaire des Monogrammes, &c.]

LENFANT, JOHN, [JEAN,] a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1615, [and died at Paris in 1674.] He was a pupil of Claude Mellan, and followed the first style of that master, in which he used the cross strokes. His plates are neatly executed with the graver, but in a cold, stiff style. The greater part of his prints are portraits, which are the best of his works. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

- The Count de Brienne; after Le Brun.
 Jacobus de Souvre; after Mignard.
 Franciscus du Tillet; Lenfant ad vivum faciebat. 1664.
 Nicholas Blasset, architect and sculptor. 1658.
 Franciscus de Harlay, Rothomagensis Archiepiscopus; after Champagne.
 Ludovicus Boucherat, D. de Compans. 1670.

SUBJECTS.

- The Bust of our Saviour; oval; after Raffaella.
 The Virgin suckling the Infant; circular; after An. Carracci.
 The Virgin adoring the Infant; oval; after Guido.

[LENS, ANDRÉ CORNEILLE, born at Antwerp in 1739, was a scholar of Eyckens, and Balthasar Beschey. In the church of the Alexiens at Lierre there are several pictures by him, the subjects taken from the New Testament; at the church of St. Michel at Ghent, an Annunciation; at the Madeleine at Lille, the history of that Saint in several of a large size; in the hotel of a M. Stevens, at Brussels, the principal events in the fabulous account of Bacchus; and at the Museum of the same city, Dalila cutting the locks of Samson. He died in 1822.]

LENS, BERNARD, THE ELDER. This artist was the son of a painter of the same name, of little note. He was a mezzotinto engraver, and also etched a few plates. His prints are but indifferently executed. Among others, we have the following by him:

- David, with the Head of Goliath; after Dom. Fetti.
 The Judgment of Paris; after Sir Peter Lely.
 Bacchus, Venus, and Ceres; after F. Badens.
 Three Landscapes, with Figures and Cattle; after Berg-hem.

Rinaldo and Armida; after J. Vandervaart; [and about twenty more enumerated by Nagler.]

He died in 1725, aged 66.

LENS, BERNARD, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, and became very celebrated for his fine copies, in water colours, from Rubens, Vandyck, and other masters. He was also an eminent miniature painter and drawing-master, in which capacity he had the honour of instructing the Duke of Cumberland. He etched a few portraits, and two or three drawing-books of landscapes and views, which he published for the use of his pupils. He died at Knightsbridge in 1741. [He also engraved in mezzotint; an account of 23 is given by Nagler.]

[LENZEN, J. F., born at Antwerp in 1790, and died there in 1840, is known chiefly by his successful copies of the works of Ommeganck.]

[LEÓN, FELIPE DE, a Spanish historical painter, who imitated and nearly approached the style of Murillo; he also copied the works of that master; many of these were formerly at Seville, and were held in great esteem by the amateurs. He died in that city in 1728, after producing several pictures of his own composition; among others, the Prophet Elijah ascending to Heaven in a Chariot of Fire.]

LEONARD, JOHN FRANCIS, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1670. He engraved the portraits of Merstraten, Syndic of Brussels, and his wife, after Vandyck; and a part of the portraits for the History of the Emperor, published at Vienna in 1674. [He was born at Dunkirk in 1633, and died at Nuremberg in 1687.]

LEONARDIS, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, born at Venice in 1712. He was instructed in design by G. B. Tiepolo; but preferred engraving to painting, and has etched several plates after the pictures of various Italian masters; among which are the following:

- Cupids at Play; after Giulio Carpioni.
 The Triumph of Silenus; after the same.
 Neptune and Thetis; after Seb. Conca. 1765.
 The Rape of Europa; after the same.
 Two subjects of the Amusements of the Carnival; after Tiepolo.
 The Golden Calf; after Tintoretto. 1768.
 The Last Judgment; after the same. 1768.

LEONARDO, FRAY AUGUSTIN. According to Palomino, this artist was born at Madrid in 1580. He was a monk of the convent of Nuestra Señora de la Merced, and painted several altar-pieces for the churches of his order. His portraits are also said to have great merit. Of his historical works, the most considerable is the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, in the refectory of the Convent de la Merced at Toledo, of which his biographer speaks in very favourable terms. He died at Madrid in 1640. [According to better authorities he was a native of Valencia, and died there. He was of the order of St. Philip. He painted a battle between the Moors and Spaniards, in which St. George is introduced assisting the latter. What right he had to interfere it is difficult to say; but the wonder is that a Spaniard should have the honesty to acknowledge assistance from an English soldier, though a Saint.]

[LEONARDO, GIUSEPPE, a Spanish painter of battles, was a distinguished scholar of Pedro de las Cuevas. Palomino says he was born at Madrid in 1616, but Martínez assures us that it was in Catalonia. He died at the age of 40, of poison, supposed to have been administered to him by some who were jealous of his merits. He was painter to the king, and has left at the Retiro works worthy of celebrity: among them the Marquis of Spinola, and Leganes at the Siege of Breda; a March of Soldiers, in which the Duke de Frias is seen conversing with an officer; this is a picture of large dimensions and great merit. There is also a portrait of Alaric the Goth, which is not the least ornament of the royal collection.]

LEONARDONI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a Venetian, born in 1654. He went young to Spain, and settled at Madrid in 1680. Palomino mentions him as an eminent portrait painter, in which he particularly excelled, although he painted several pictures for the churches, in which he evinced a grand manner of designing, a frank and spirited handling, and an intelligent acquaintance with the chiaro-scuro. In the church of the Colegio de Atocha at Madrid, are two pictures of the death of S. Joseph, and his burial; and in the church of San Geronimo el Real, a large altar-piece of the Incarnation. He died at Madrid in 1711.

LEONCINI, FRANCESCO. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a plate representing the Flight into Egypt; it is etched in a slight manner, but in the style of a painter, and signed Francesco Leoncini di S. Geminiano, f. et inv.

LEONE, or LEEUW. See LEEUW.

LEONI, or LIONI, CAVALIERE OTTAVIO. This artist was born at Rome about the year 1585. According to Baglioni, he was the son of a painter, and flourished during the pontificate of Urban VIII. He was esteemed one of the ablest portrait painters of his time, and drew the popes, cardinals, and principal nobility of the period at which he lived. His talents were not, however, confined to portraiture; he painted several altar-pieces for the churches at Rome. In S. Eustachio is a picture by him of the Annunciation; in S. Maria della Minerva, the Virgin and Infant, with S. Giacinto; and in S. Urbano, S. Carlo, S. Francesco, and S. Niccolo. He was made principal of the Academy of St. Luke, and a knight of the order of Christ, on which occasion he painted for the church of the Academy the Martyrdom of St. Martina. Ottavio Leoni was the engraver of a set of heads of painters, executed in a singular manner, but producing a very pleasing effect. The hair and draperies are engraved with strokes; the faces delicately dotted; and the shadows assisted with strokes. The heads are finely drawn, and the plates highly finished. They consist of about twenty, among which are the following, which are signed, Eques Ottav. Leonus, Romanus pictor, fecit.

PORTRAITS.

- Ludovicus Leonus, Pictor et Sculptor celebris. 1625.
Eques. Ottav. Leonus, se ipse fec. 1625.
Joannes Franciscus Barbieri, Centinus pictor. 1623.
Marcellus Provenzalis, Centensis. 1623.
Eques Christophor. Ronchalis de Pomeranciis, pictor. 1623.
Eques Joseph. Cæsar Arpinas, pictor. 1621.
Antonius Tempesta, pictor Florentinus. 1621.
Thomas. Salinus, Romafus, pictor. 1625.
Fr. D. Antonius Barberinus. 1625.

[He was also called Padovino, and Il Cav. Padovano. Zani says he was born in 1606, and died in 1651. Nagler and others, with greater probability, say he was born in 1574, and died in 1628. The latest date on his prints is 1627. Bartsch and Nagler describe about forty.]

LEPICIE, BERNARD, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1699. He was probably a pupil of John Audran, whose style he adopted with success. His prints, though not very correctly drawn, are not without considerable merit. He was invited to England by Claude du Bosc, to assist him in engraving the Cartoons of Raffaele, for the print-sellers, on a smaller scale than those of Dorigny; but the talents of this artist ought not to be estimated from those unfavourable specimens. On his return to Paris, he engraved several plates, which gained him great reputation. He was received into the Academy, of which he was appointed the secretary and historiographer; and in that capacity published two works, entitled, La Description des Tableaux du Roi, and Les Vies des premiers Peintres du Roi, depuis Charles Le Brun, jusqu'a François le Moine. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

- Nicholas Bertin, Painter to the King; after Lien; engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1740.
Louis de Boulongne, first Painter to the King; after Rigaud.
Philibert Orry, Minister of Finance; after Rigaud.
Peter Grassin, Director of the Mint; after Largilliere.
Charles Capperonnier, Librarian to the King; after ved.
Frances d'Aubigné, Marchioness de Maintenon; after Mignard.
John Baptist Moliere; after Charles Coypel.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Circumcision; after Giulio Romano; for the Crozat collection.
Jupiter and Io; after the same; for the same.
Jupiter and Juno; after the same; for the same.
St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after Baciccio; for the same.
Vertumnus and Pomona; after Rembrandt.
Two Subjects; after Teniers.
The Chess-players; after C. de Moor.
The Players at Piquet; after G. Netscher.
Town Love and Village Love; after Charles Coypel.
The Pacha having his Mistress's picture painted; after C. Vanloo; fine.
Charles I. taking leave of his Children; after Raoux.

He died at Paris in 1755.

LEPICIE, RENEE [MARIE] ELIZABETH. This ingenious artist was the wife of the preceding artist, by whom we have the following neatly engraved prints, among others:

- Saying Grace, and the Industrious Mother; a pair; after Chardin.
The Flemish Cook; after Teniers.

[She engraved after Raphael, Boucher, Vanloo, Chardin, Rigaud, and other French painters. She died in 1752.]

[LEPRINCE, A. XAVIER, a French artist, painted landscapes, village fairs, carnivals, corps de garde, and a great variety of other subjects, which are to be found in some of the best collections. He died in 1826, leaving some excellent compositions in progress, which were afterwards finished by M. M. Potdevin and Renou.]

LERCH, J. M. an indifferent German engraver, who flourished at Vienna about the year 1670. He engraved some of the portraits for Priorata's History of the Emperor Leopold; and in conjunction with Hoffman executed a large print, in three sheets, of the Siege of Brandenburg.

LERPINIERE, DANIEL DE. This artist, apparently, from his name, of French extraction, resided in England, and is supposed to have been a pupil of F. Vivares. He engraved several plates of landscapes and views, which possess great merit. Among others are the following:

A Landscape, with the Flight into Egypt; after Claude Lorraine.

The Companion, with St. George and the Dragon; after the same.

A grand Landscape, with the Israelites worshipping the Golden Calf; after the same.

A Sea-piece, a Calm; after Vernet.

The Companion; a Storm; after the same.

Two Italian Landscapes; after the designs of John Taylor.

Two Landscapes, with Cattle; after Cuypp.

A Landscape, Evening; after Pynaker.

Six Views of Sea-fights, &c.; after R. Paton.

[Nagler says he died in 1785, at the age of 40; but he mentions a print with the date 1790. There are naval subjects engraved by him, in conjunction with Fittler.]

LETELLIER, C. F., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1780. He engraved several plates, which were executed with the point and graver, representing conversations, &c., from the French painters, and other masters.

LETH, HENRY DE, a Dutch engraver, noticed by Basan. He lived at Amsterdam, where he engraved a great number of views of Kenneiland, which are very poorly executed.

[LETHIERE, GUILLAUME GUILLON, a very eminent French historical painter, born at Saint Anne (Guadeloupe) in 1760. He received a liberal education, and was well versed in all the departments of literature. He made his literary and scientific acquirements auxiliaries to his love of painting, and at an early period showed the superiority of a well-cultivated understanding in depicting subjects suggested by the classical writers. In 1786 he gained the great premium for painting. His progress was rapid, and he became President of the Academy at Rome. The stirring events resulting from the Revolution in France, acting on the classical reminiscences of Lethiere, suggested the representation of subjects connected with the general feeling; resistance to, and the overthrow of, tyranny, and the preservation of public liberty. These he expressed in his pictures of the Death of Virginia, the Judgment of Lucius Junius Brutus, and the Death of Julius Caesar. The Judgment of Brutus, which was received with the greatest applause in France, and exhibited in London in the year 1816, with no less approbation, placed him at the head of modern historic painters. Homer reciting his verses to the Greeks, was exhibited in London, at the same time with the Judgment of Brutus, and was as much applauded for its pathos and tranquil beauty, as the other for its high patriotic determination, and stern justice. These may be considered as specimens of the artist's attachments; and numerous other magnificent compositions might be named in which he continued to exhibit, from classic story, or poetic fiction, the elevated sentiments with which his mind was so richly stored. Some of his pictures were brought to England by Lucien Buonaparte, with whom he was on terms of intimacy; but the greater number remain in France. The latest date recorded of a picture publicly exhibited by him is 1830: he was living in 1831. For a list of his principal works, see Gabet, Dictionnaire des Artistes de l'École Française au XIX^e siècle.]

LEU, THOMAS DE, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1570. We have by this artist a great number of portraits, and a few other plates, executed with the graver in a neat, finished style, resembling that of the Wierixs, which possess great merit. They are generally signed with his name. Among others, are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Henry III., King of France and Poland.

Henry de Bourhon, Prince of Conde, at the age of nine years.

Cesar, Monsieur, the companion, aged five years.

Bust of Henry IV.; after Bunel.

Busts of Henry IV. and Mary of Medicis; after Quenel.

Mary of Medicis; T. de Leu, fee.

Mary, Queen of Scotland and France; T. de Leu.

Charles de Bourhon, Count of Soisson.

Francis de Bourhon, Prince de Conty.

Charles de Lorraine, Duke du Mayne.

Henry de Savoy, Duke de Nemours.

Henry de Montmorency, Constable of France.

Louisa de Lorraine, Dowager of France.

Anne, Duke de Joyeuse, Admiral of France.

Charles de Biron, Marshal of France.

SUBJECTS.

Twenty-five plates of the Life of St. Francis.

The Twelve Sibyls; from his own designs.

Justice rewarding the Labours of the Husbandman; after F. Zucchero.

The Ecce Homo, with Angels bearing the Instruments of the Passion.

[As there is an engraving by him with the date 1579, it is more probable that 1562 was the year of his birth, as given by Zani, and other writers of credit. It is supposed that he died about 1620.]

LE VASSEUR. See VASSEUR.

LEVESQUE, PETER CHARLES. This artist was born at Paris in 1727. He is perhaps more known for his share in the publication of the Dictionnaire des Beaux Arts, begun by M. Watelet, than his works as an engraver. We have, however, several plates by him, executed entirely with the graver, which possess considerable merit. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Louis Phelippesux, Duke de la Vrilliere; after Vanloo.

Michael Francis Sedaine; after J. L. David.

John Causeur, aged 130 years; after Caffieri.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Venus and Cupid; after Pierre. 1770.

Cupid sharpening his Arrows; after Cazes.

Sleeping and Waking; after Boucher; two prints. 1765.

The Dutch Toilet; after Metzau.

Lot and his Daughters; after Diepenbeek.

LEUPENICIE, J., a Dutch engraver, by whom we have a few slight etchings, retouched with the graver. They represent views in Holland, and appear to be the works of a painter, though but indifferently executed. He flourished about the year 1677.

LEUR, NICOLAUS VANDER. This painter was born at Breda in 1667. After acquiring the rudiments of art in his native country, he went to Italy when very young, and passed some years at Rome, studying and copying with great assiduity the works of the great masters in that capital. On his return to Holland he acquired considerable reputation, both as a painter of history and portraits, in the latter of which he particularly excelled. Probably from his having occupied too much of his time in the servile pursuit of a copyist, his invention was narrowed and confined, and he composed with tardiness and difficulty. His most considerable historical work is the principal altar-piece in the church of the Recolets, at Breda.

LEYDEN, LUCAS JACOBS, called LUCAS VAN. This extraordinary artist may be regarded as the patriarch of the Dutch school. He was born at Leyden in 1494, the son of Hugo Jacobs, an obscure painter, who discovered in his earliest sports the most marked indication of premature and decided genius. In his respect, nature appears to have overleaped the usual period of infancy; and at a season, when ordinary capacities scarcely put forth the tender buds of promise, he produced fruit distinguished by mellowness and maturity. He had scarcely reached his ninth year, when he engraved some plates from his own designs, and having left the instruction of his father, to study painting under Cornelius Engelbrechtsen, he astonished the artists of his time by his picture of St. Hubert, painted when he was only twelve years old. In 1503, when he was fourteen, appeared his celebrated print of Mahomet drunk, having killed the Monk Sergius. Contemporary with Albert Durer, there existed between these distinguished artists the most intimate friendship and correspondence, which was not interrupted by any jealousy occasioned by their noble emulation of excelling each other in the art. He is allowed to have surpassed Albert in his composition, though inferior to him in design. He painted in oil, distemper, and on glass; and treated with equal success history, landscapes, and portraits. His colouring is fresh and clear, and his pencil is light, though finished. His drawing of the figure is stiffly taken from the model, in the Gothic style then universally prevalent through Germany and Flanders, divested of grace and elegance; and though the expression of his heads is not without truth, it is marked with a vulgarity bordering on grimace. These deficiencies may, however, be fairly attributed to the then predominant taste of his country, which he had not an opportunity of improving by the advantages of travel. He was one of the first of the Dutch artists that had an incipient acquaintance with the principles of perspective. His most considerable works as a painter are his picture of the Last Judgment, an immense composition, in the Town-house at Leyden; Christ curing the Blind at Jericho, dated 1531; the Virgin and Infant holding a bunch of Grapes, in the imperial collection at Vienna, painted in 1522; and a Descent from the Cross, in the church formerly of the Jesuits at Paris. As an engraver, Lucas van Leyden claims particular attention. At a period when Albert Durer had carried the art of engraving to such perfection in Germany, and Marc Antonio exercised it with the greatest reputation in Italy, Lucas disputed the palm with those celebrated competitors in the Low Countries. He learned the use of the point and graver from a goldsmith, which he carried to a surprising pitch of perfection for the short time that he lived. His style differs from that of Albert Durer, and seems to have been built on the manner of Israel van Mecheln. His execution is neat and clear; but as his stroke is equally fine in objects in the fore-ground as in those in the distance, and as there is a want of connexion in the masses, his plates, though extremely neat, are inferior to those of Albert Durer in firmness and harmony of effect. His figures are tall and meagre, the extremities rather mannered than correct, and though his attitudes are not ill chosen, they are generally stiff and ungraceful. He engraved on wood as well as on copper, but his cuts are not very numerous. They are spirited and masterly, though inferior to those of Albert Durer. He usually marked his prints with the Gothic letter L, with the date, and sometimes with the letter and the date on a tablet. The following is an ample list of his works, and comprises all his principal prints, of which fine impressions are now very scarce:

SUBJECTS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

- A set of six, of the Creation and Fall of Adam and Eve. 1529.
- Adam and Eve driven from Paradise. 1510.
- Cain and Abel. 1524.
- Abraham and the Angels.
- Abraham sending away Hagar; one of his first plates; very scarce.
- The same subject, differently treated; smaller; called the Little Hagar.
- Lot and his Daughters; 1530; fine.
- A set of five, of the History of Joseph. 1512.
- Jeptna and his Daughter.
- Samson and Dalilah.
- The Triumph of David.
- David praying, with an Angel appearing to him. 1520.
- David playing on the Harp before Saul.
- Solomon worshipping the Idols. 1514.
- Esther before Ahasuerus. 1515.
- Susanna and the Elders; one of his earliest prints.

SUBJECTS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

- St. Joachim and St. Anne. 1520.
- The Annunciation.
- The Visitation.
- The Adoration of the Magi; very fine. 1513. H. Goltzius has engraved the same subject, with little difference.
- The Repose in Egypt; one of his early prints.
- The Baptism of Christ; a composition of many figures.
- Christ tempted by the Devil. 1518.
- The Resurrection of Lazarus; one of his early prints.
- A set of fourteen, of the Passion of our Saviour.
- Another set of nine, circular prints, of the Passion.
- The Ecce Homo; a rich composition; engraved in 1510.
- The Crucifixion; another capital composition; one of his finest prints. 1517.
- Christ appearing to Magdalene. 1519.
- The Prodigal Son; fine.

SUBJECTS OF THE VIRGIN, SAINTS, &c.

- The Virgin and Infant, with St. Anne. 1516.
 - The Virgin and Infant, with a glory of Angels.
 - The Virgin and Infant seated at the foot of a tree.
 - The Virgin and Infant, in a landscape, with two Angels; very fine. 1523.
 - The Holy Family, with St. Joseph presenting an apple.
 - A set of thirteen, of Christ and the Twelve Apostles.
 - The Four Evangelists; in four plates; dated 1518.
 - St. Peter and St. Paul; half-length. 1517.
 - The Conversion of St. Paul. 1509.
 - St. Peter and St. Paul, in a landscape. 1527.
 - St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus. 1521; very fine.
 - St. John the Baptist in the Desert. 1513.
 - The Decollation of St. John.
 - St. Jerome, with a Book, a Skull, and a Lion. 1521.
 - The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian.
 - St. Anthony, the Hermit.
 - The Temptation of St. Anthony. 1509; very fine; engraved when he was thirteen.
 - St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.
 - St. George combating the Dragon.
 - Mary Magdalene in the midst of the Pleasures of the World; the celebrated print called Magdalene's Dance; very fine, and extremely rare.
 - Mary Magdalene in the Desert.
 - St. Catherine; half-length. 1520.
- #### VARIOUS SUBJECTS.
- The Monk Sergius, killed by Mahomet, who is sleeping; dated 1508; very fine; engraved when he was fourteen.
 - The seven Cardinal Virtues; in seven prints. 1530.
 - The Death of Lucretia, by some called the Death of Dido.
 - Pyramus and Thisbe. 1514.
 - Mars and Venus. 1530.
 - Minerva seated; supposed to have been his last plate, which he did not quite finish.
 - The Standard-Bearer.

A young Man at the head of an armed company, listening to a Man who is speaking to him, with his hat in his hand; fine.

The Wedding-Ring; an old Man putting a Ring on the finger of a young Woman; a highly-finished etching; scarce.

An old Woman, with a Bunch of Grapes.

The Musicians. 1524.

The Surgeon performing an Operation. 1524.

The Quack-doctor. 1523.

The scarce and celebrated print called the Uylenspiegel.

It represents a man playing on the Bagpipes, carrying two children in a basket, and a woman with a child on her shoulder, leading an ass with panniers, in which are three more children. This group is preceded by the Uylenspiegel, in the form of a boy, with a hood, having an owl on his shoulder, carrying a pitcher and a staff. The extreme rarity of this print is well known to the collectors. It was for some time believed to be unique, and existing only in the collection of the king of France: but it has since appeared that an impression of it was in Mariette's collection; and it is thought there are not more than four or five of them in existence. Its scarcity constitutes its great value, as it is very inferior to many of his works. It was copied by Hondius and others; and Basan mentions another copy of it, without the name of the engraver, so exact, as easily to be mistaken for the original. It is dated 1520.

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Maximilian I.; after a picture painted by Lucas when he visited Leyden. The head is executed with the graver, the rest etched, and in parts harmonized with the graver. 1520; very fine and scarce.

The Portraits of Lucas van Leyden, inscribed Effigies Lucæ Leidensis propria manu incidere.

A young Man, half-length, with a cap and feathers, holding a skull; usually called his own portrait, though it bears no resemblance to the preceding one.

WOODEN CUTS, ALL SCARCE.

The Kings of Israel; in chiaro-scuro.

The illustrious Women of the Old Testament.

Four large Tournaments.

Lucas van Leyden died in 1533. [The foregoing list will probably be sufficient for the general reader; the more curious inquirer will do well to consult Bartsch's Catalogue, or Ottley's History of Engraving. Bartsch, Zani, and Ottley agree that Lucas van Leyden did not engrave on wood; he merely traced the designs, and employed others to execute the work. Albert Durer visited Lucas at Antwerp in 1521; he makes the following note in his journal: "I was invited to dinner by Master Lucas, who engraves on copper; he is a little man, and is a native of Leyden." Lucas was fond of display and corporal enjoyments; and indulged himself to such excess as to destroy his constitution. His chief companion in dissipation was Jan de Mabuse.

A list of Pictures by Lucas van Leyden, of which there exists what may be considered authentic accounts in various writers.

 93. Another; in the Colonna palace at Rome.
 94. Portrait of a young Knight; in the landscape back-ground St. Hubert is seen with the stag bearing the crucifix between his horns. This is considered to be one of the highest finished pictures of the master. It was formerly in the Griffier Fagel's collection, and is now in the Liverpool Institution.
 95. A Philosopher; in the Cambiaso palace, at Genoa.
 96. Nine Heads of Females; a drawing belonging to the Prince de Ligne.
 97. Six small Heads, each in a separate compartment; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.

98. Bust of a Female reading a Book; in the same collection.

FANCY PICTURES.

99. A Priest celebrating Mass; in the Escorial.

100. Women presenting a Child to a Bishop; a drawing.

101. A party of Men and Women round a table at play; at Wilton House.

102. The Chess Players, fifteen figures; formerly in Charles I.'s collection.

103. A Man standing armed with a Sword; a drawing; Archduke Charles, Vienna.

104. A Man holding a Sword and a Flag; a drawing; in the same collection.

105. A Quack Doctor drawing a Countryman's Tooth; an authentic picture; in the collection of the Duke of Devonshire.

106. A Surgeon performing an Operation on the Ear of a Countryman: an authentic picture; in the Ducal gallery at Gotha.

107. An Operation?—mentioned as in the Museum at Copenhagen.

108. A Cavalier giving Money to Shepherds; a drawing; lithographed by Strixner.

109. A Man holding a Spade, and a Woman a Sack; a drawing; in the Archduke's collection at Vienna.

110. Women on Horseback; a circular drawing; in the same collection.

The foregoing is a tolerably correct list of the pictures attributed to Lucas van Leyden; but it is probable that many of them are by contemporary artists, who availed themselves of his prints and drawings in the imitation of his style. It is desirable, but hopeless, to discover the real painters. It is the fate of all imitators to have their best works attributed to their prototype; the possessor seldom has any doubt of their originality. Such in the list as are unquestionable are indicated; of the rest, every one will determine according to his knowledge.]

LEYSEBETTEN. See LISEBETIUS.

LEYSENS, NICOLAS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1661, and was a scholar of Peter Eyckens. On leaving that master, he went to Rome, where he passed some time, and would have prolonged his studies in that metropolis of art, had he not been under the necessity of returning to his native city for the laudable purpose of succouring an aged parent in his last illness. Leyssens had acquired in Italy a correct and tasteful design, particularly of women and children, and was much employed in ornamenting the saloons and ceilings of the principal mansions at Antwerp, in which he was assisted by Boschaert and Verbruggen, &c., who painted the flowers and other accessories. [He was surnamed Cassenoir, for what reason is not stated; it will bear the interpretation of a nut-cracker, a magpie, or a blackbird. He died in 1710.]

[LEYTO, ANDRES, a painter of historical subjects and interiors, who resided at Madrid in 1680. He painted, in conjunction with Josef de Sarabia, the pictures of the cloister of the convent of S. Francis at Segovia; but his chief excellence lay in painting interiors, in which he had few equals among the Spanish artists of his time.]

LIANO, PHELIPPE. This Spanish artist was born at Madrid in 1575, and was a scholar of Alonso Sanchez Coello. He particularly excelled in painting portraits of a small size, which he executed with such fidelity of resemblance, and beauty of colouring, that he acquired the title of El Titiano Pequeno. He died at Madrid in 1625. [Cean Bermudez observes, in his notice of Felipe de Liaño, that it may be suspected that he had been in Italy, if the prints representing persons in various costumes, signed Teodoro Filippo da Liagno, are by him. The title of the work alluded to runs thus: "Caprici e habitii militari de Ph. de Liagno Napolitano, novamente dati in luce da G. Rossi in Roma 1635." Zani mentions him under the various appellations of Llanos, il piccolo Tiziano, il Napolitano, Teodoro Filippo de Liagno; classes him as a Spaniard, and places his death in 1625. In the next article he says, "LLANOS TEODORO FILIPPO DE;" classes him as a Neapolitan, a designer and engraver, who worked about 1635. Do these varied accounts allude to one or two artists? It would be presumptuous to accuse Zani of inattention; but the title of the work bearing date 1635, says, "novamente dati in luce da G. Rossi in Roma." It may therefore signify a new publication by Rossi in Rome, of a work previously published elsewhere. On the other hand, Bermudez may have been led by the similarity of names to form his conjecture, though he writes doubtfully. It is said that in 1584 he painted the portrait of Don Alvaro de Bazan; if so he could have been only nine years old, as all accounts agree that he was born in 1575.]

LIART, MATTHEW. This artist was born at Paris in 1736, but came to England when very young, where he was employed in engraving some plates for Mr. Boydell's collection. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Sacrifice of Abraham, [of Noah?] after Andrea Sacchi.

The Convention between Jacob and Laban; after P. da Cortona.

The Joyful Companions; after Ostade.

Venus lamenting the Death of Adonis; after West.

Cephalus and Procris; after the same.

LIBERAL, GIORGIO, an Italian painter, and engraver on wood. In conjunction with M. Wolfgang Miererpeck, he executed the large cuts of the animals and plants for Matthioli's Commentaries on Dioscorides, published at Venice in 1548. He is styled by that writer, Homo Artis pingendi peritissimus.

LIBERALE DA VERONA. This painter was born at Verona in 1451, and was first a scholar of Vincenzo di Stefano, but was afterwards a disciple, or rather an imitator, of Jacopo Bellini. There appears, in the Descent of the Holy Ghost, which he painted in the dome at Verona, something of the taste of Andrea Mantegna, in the glory of angels, and in the folding of the draperies. His vicinity to Mantua certainly might facilitate his studies after Mantegna, whose style is discernible in several of the Veronese painters of his time. His colouring is excellent, and there is a graceful expression in his heads. For the extraordinary finish and precision which distinguish his works, he was probably indebted to his being much employed in illuminating missals and books with miniatures. He died in 1536.

LIBERI, CAVALIERE PIETRO. According to Zanetti, this painter was born at Padua in 1605. He was a scholar of Alessandro Varotari, called il Paduanino, and is considered one of the ablest designers of the Venetian school. His studies at Rome, after Raffaello and Michael Angelo Buonroti, at Parma, after Coreggio and Parmegiano, and the most distinguished of the Venetian painters, led him to a style which may be said to partake of every school. Few artists have discovered a greater variety of character in their works than P. Liberi. He was used to say, that when employed for the intelligent, his pencil was frank and expeditious, without the appearance of labour or finish; but when working for the less experienced, his pictures were painted with the utmost minuteness, in which every object, even to each hair, was precisely attended to. In his works for the churches he exhibits a grandeur which is not to be found in his other productions. Such are the Murder of the Innocents, at Venice; Noah leaving the Ark, and the Destruction of Pharaoh's Host, at Vicenza; and the Deluge, and Moses striking the Rock, at Bergamo; in which we find a bold and robust design, an admirable variety of expression in the heads and in the attitudes, with a grand delineation of the naked, resembling the Caracci rather than Buonaroti. He was more employed in subjects of the fable, which he treated with elegance and grace, in the style of Titian; but sometimes with a freedom which procured him the title of Libertino. His colouring is distinguished by tenderness and suavity, though occasionally too red, and his touch is free and masterly. He died in 1687.

LIBERI, MARCO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Venice about the year 1650, and was educated under his father, whose style he imitated without much success, and with little claim to originality. He copied his father's works almost to illusion, and painted easel pictures of fabulous subjects, some of which are in the Palazzo Ercolani, at Bologna.

LIBRI, GIROLAMO DA. This painter was born at Verona in 1474. He was the son of a miniature painter, and illuminator of books, on which account he acquired the name of dai Libri. He was instructed in the rudiments of design by his father; and Vasari reports, that at the age of sixteen he painted a picture of the taking down from the Cross, for the church of S. Maria in Organo, at Verona, which excited universal surprise and admiration. At a more advanced period he painted, in 1529, a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with two Saints, for the church of S. Giorgio, which was admired for the fine expression of the heads, and a finished style, without diminishing the effect. He died in 1555. [Several works of this excellent, but elsewhere little known artist, are to be met with in Verona. His earlier style inclines decidedly to the manner of Andrea Mantegna. An altar-picture in St. Anastasia, a Madonna enthroned, with Saints and donors, contains, for example, strong reminiscences of Mantegna's altar-picture in S. Zeno. A Nativity, with St. Jerome and St. John the Baptist, likewise in the Palazzo del Consiglio, is severe in general treatment, but of a pleasing mild character, and already exhibits considerable softness in the painting. Some later pictures of Girolamo possess these qualities in a much higher degree, and he approaches much nearer the Bellini school. The last-named gallery possesses several of these later pictures; one, of the year 1530, representing a Madonna enthroned, surrounded by various Saints, with Tobias and the Angel, is particularly deserving of attention. Dr. Franz Kugler.]

LICINIO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, called IL PORDENONE. The family name of this eminent painter was Licinio, which he afterwards changed for that of Regillio; but he is generally called Il Pordenone, the name of a small town in Friuli, where he was born in 1484. He discovered an early propensity for the art, and was sent to Udina, where he studied the works of Pellegrino di San Daniello. Having arrived at a respectable proficiency, he went to Venice, where he formed an intimacy with Giorgione, of whom he became the friend, rather than the disciple, as has been asserted. With less probability can he be supposed to have been a fellow student with Titian, under Giovanni Bellini, as stated by Conte Rinaldis in his Pittura Friulana. The other followers of the style of Giorgione acquired something of his manner; but Pordenone appears to have adopted his mind, and the grandeur of his conceptions; than which it would be difficult to produce any thing more elevated, bold, and original, in the Venetian school. After a residence of some years at Venice, he returned to his native town, where he painted, in 1515, for la Collegiata, his picture of the Holy Family, with St. Christopher; and soon afterwards, for the church of S. Pietro Martyre, at Udina, the Annunciation, an admirable picture, which has since been considerably damaged and retouched. He returned to Venice, where he painted his celebrated work of S. Lorenzo Giustiniani, with S. Agostino and S. Giovanni Batista, one of his finest pictures in oil. The celebrity of this performance, and others, brought his talents into comparison with those of Titian, who is said to have conceived some apprehension at his success, and to have expressed no little indignation at being put in competition with Pordenone. This jealousy was considerably aggravated by his being commissioned by the Convent degli Angeli, at Murano, to paint a picture of the Annunciation, instead of one by Titian, which had been rejected, on account of the exorbitant price demanded for it. These animosities proceeded to such a length, that Pordenone thought it prudent to guard himself against violence; and he is said to have painted his frescoes, in the cloister of S. Stefano, with his sword by his side. This state of open hostility, little congenial with the disposition of Pordenone, occasioned him to quit Venice, and he visited Mantua, where he painted the façade of the Palazzo de Cesarei. From thence he went to Piacenza, where he was employed to paint a picture of St. Augustine, in the tribune of S. Maria di Campagna, and two chapels in fresco, in one of which he represented the History of St. Catherine; and in the other the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi. Cremona, Treviso, and Parma, successively occupied his talents. At length he returned to Venice, where he was immediately engaged to paint the Cupola of S. Rocco, one of his most considerable undertakings, where he represented the Four Evangelists, and the Four Doctors of the church. In the great niche over the altar, the Transfiguration, with the Prophets and Apostles. The reputation of Pordenone reached Germany, whither he was invited by Charles V., who employed him to paint the grand saloon at Prague, and some emblematical subjects, representing the Cardinal Virtues. These performances were highly esteemed by the emperor, who remunerated him with great liberality, and conferred on him the honour of knighthood. His last works were his Cartoons, designed for a series of tapestry, for Ercole II., Duke of Ferrara, representing the Labours of Hercules. Pordenone, though unequal to Titian, holds an elevated rank among the painters of his country. Less tender in his tones, and less seductive in his contours, than the head of the Venetian school, he at least rivals him in the energy of his style, and in the boldness of his execution. His fresco works are preferable to those in oil, though he arrived at great excellence in both. To a grand character of design, he added the rich and glowing colouring of Giorgione. He was more successful in the robust and muscular delineation of men, than in the softness and delicacy of female forms. In every thing he exhibits a daring and vigorous mind, capable of encountering the most arduous difficulties of the art. In his works at Venice he seems to have surpassed himself. The rivalry, or rather the enmity, which existed between him and Titian, appears to have acted as a spur, which contributed to the excellency of both, like the competition between Buonaroti and Raffaele, to which it bears a further similarity, as one is distinguished by energy and force, and the other by elegance and grace. To have contended with Titian for the prize of fame, is no ordinary claim to glory; and it will be considered highly honourable to his reputation, that he is entitled to the second rank in the Venetian school, at a period when it was so fertile in able artists. He died at Mantua in 1540, and was strongly suspected to have been poisoned. [There are paintings by Pordenone with the following inscriptions: Joh. Antonius Corticellis P. 1520.—Lycinius P.—Joh. Antonius Regillus P. 1535. In the marriage contract of his daughter with Pomponio Amalteo, he is styled D. (Domino) Jo. Antonio Sacchiense. See note to Licinio in Zani, Enciclopedia delle belle Arti. There are many of his pictures in England, among which are some attributed to Titian.]

LICINIO, BERNARDINO, da PORDENONE, was apparently a relation of the preceding artist; and from the resemblance of their style, discernible in his pictures at the Conventual at Venice, may be presumed to have been his scholar. He was an eminent painter of portraits, which so nearly approach to those of il Pordenone, as to be frequently attributed to that master. [He flourished about 1541; the time of his death is not accurately known.]

LICINIO, GIULIO, da PORDENONE. This artist was the nephew and scholar of Gio. Antonio Licinio, born at Pordenone in 1520. He distinguished himself as an historical painter, particularly in fresco. He resided great part of his life in Germany, where he left many proofs of his ability, especially at Augsburg. He etched some plates from his uncle's designs. [He died about 1561.]

[LIEFRINCK, HANS. See HANS LENCKER.]

LIEMAEKER, NICHOLAS, called ROSE. This painter was born at Ghent in 1575, and was first a scholar of Mark Guerards; but after the death of that master became a disciple of Ottovenius, at the time when Rubens studied under that master. The school of Ottovenius was then the most eminent in the Low Countries, and the emulation that existed among the students contributed to the production of several artists of the greatest celebrity. On leaving that master, he was invited to the court of the Prince of Paderborn, where he met with very liberal encouragement; but the climate not agreeing with his health, he was obliged to return to his native city, where he continued to exercise his talent with great reputation for the remainder of his life. The name of Rose was given him when a boy, and was the appellation he was generally known by. It is reported by Descamps, that Rubens being applied to by the confraternity of St. Michael, at Ghent, to paint them an altar-piece for their chapel, he declined their commission, in the handsomest and most liberal manner, in favour of his friend and fellow student; observing, "that possessing so fine a Rose, they might well dispense with flowers of foreign growth." He was certainly one of the eminent painters of the Flemish school, and he operated with such facility, that a number of his pictures are to be seen in every town of the Low Countries. In the church of St. Nicholas, at Ghent, there are two pictures by this master, one of which is regarded as his most capital work; it represents the Fall of the Rebel Angels; the other is the Merciful Samaritan. In the church of St. James are several pictures by Liemaecker, one of which is a grand composition, representing the Last Judgment. He died at Ghent in 1647.

LIENARD, JOHN BAPTIST, a French engraver, born at Lisle about the year 1750. He was a pupil of James Philip le Bas, and has engraved, in a neat style, several views and landscapes. He executed some of the plates for the Voyage des Royaumes de Naples et de Sicile, by the Abbé de St. Non. We have also by him the following:

The Delights of Summer; after J. B. le Prince.

A View of some of the principal Monuments at Rome; after Robert.

[LIENDER, PIERRE VAN, born at Utrecht in 1727, painted landscapes and views of cities: many of his subjects are scenes on the borders of the Rhine. He died at Utrecht in 1797.]

LIEVENS, JOHN, an eminent Dutch painter and engraver, born at Leyden in 1607. He was instructed in the first rudiments of design by George van Schooten, and at ten years of age was placed under Peter Lastman, with whom he did not continue longer than two years, and it does not appear that he had any further instruction. When he was only twelve years old, he copied the pictures of Democritus and Heraclitus, by Cornelius van Haerlem, with an exactness which made it difficult to distinguish them from the originals. Before he was eighteen, he had established his reputation as a portrait painter, and is said by Descamps to have visited England in 1630, where he was favourably received, and painted the portraits of Charles I. and his queen, with several of the nobility. He is not, however, mentioned by Lord Orford in the Anecdotes. On leaving England, he established himself at Antwerp, and painted several altar-pieces for the churches of the Low Countries. At Brussels, in the church formerly belonging to the Jesuits, was a picture by him of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth; and in the church of St. James at Antwerp, is a fine picture of the Holy Family. In 1641 he returned to Holland, where he painted his two celebrated pictures of David and Bathsheba; the Sacrifice of Abraham; and the Continece of Scipio, in the Town-house at Leyden, one of his finest works. John Lievens distinguished himself not less as an engraver than a painter. His plates are partly etched, and finished with the graver in a manner resembling that of Rembrandt, and little inferior to the admirable engravings of that master, either in the picturesque style in which they are executed, or the charming effect of the chiaro-scuro. His celebrated print of the Raising of Lazarus, is superior to that by Rembrandt of the same subject, in composition, and is in no respect unequal to it in execution. His prints amount to about sixty, and are usually signed with his name, which is sometimes spelled Lycyns, and sometimes with the initials I. L. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS AND HEADS.

Ephraim Bonus, seated in a chair; Joannes Lyvyns, fecit.
 Joost Vondel, Dutch poet.
 Daniel Heinsius, Professor of History at Leyden; very fine.
 Jacobus Gouters, musician; very fine.
 The Bust of an old Man, bald, with a long beard.
 Bust of a Man with a furred cap; after Rembrandt; fine.
 Several Busts and Studies of Heads, &c.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Holy Family, with figures kneeling.
 The Virgin presenting a Pear to the infant Jesus; fine and scarce.
 The Raising of Lazarus; a grand composition; fine and scarce.
 St. John the Evangelist.
 St. Jerome in a Cell, holding a Crucifix.
 St. Francis holding a Skull.
 St. Anthony; one of his early plates; scarce.
 Mercury and Argus.
 An Oriental Figure, with a furred cloak and cap.
 Another Oriental Figure, with a gold chain.
 The half-length of a Man, with long hair over his shoulders; a wooden cut; rare.
 A Landscape, with three trees; a wooden cut; fine and scarce.

[The date of his death is uncertain; Nagler says in 1663.]

LIGARIO, PIETRO. This artist was born at Sondrio, in the Valteline, in 1686, and having learned the first rudiments of the art in his native country, went to Italy, and resided some years at Rome, where he improved his design by frequenting the school of Lazzaro Baldi, and afterwards visited Venice, where he studied the works of the most eminent masters of that distinguished school of colouring. On his return to his native town in 1727, he was employed in painting some historical pictures for the churches and private collections; which are correctly drawn, and very agreeably and harmoniously coloured. He died in 1748. [His names were Giovanni Pietro; some say he died in 1752.]

LIGHTBODY, JOHN, an obscure English engraver, by whom there are a few small etchings of beggars, very indifferently executed.

LIGHTFOOT, WILLIAM, an English painter, engraver, and architect. He excelled in painting landscapes and perspective views; and, as an architect, was employed at the building of the Royal Exchange. In the Sculptura, by Evelyn, he is mentioned as an engraver, in the following terms: "Lightfoot hath a very curious graver, and special talent for the neatness of his stroke, little inferior to Wierix; and has published two or three Madonnas, with much applause. He died about 1671."

LIGNY, FRANCIS DE, a French engraver of little note. He engraved two landscapes after Gaspar Poussin, in a poor, tasteless style.

LIGORIO, PIERO. This painter was born at Naples in 1493. He went early in his life to Rome, where he became a scholar of Giulio Romano. He applied himself more to architecture than painting, and was employed in that capacity by Paul IV. and Pius IV. He executed some fresco works at Rome, of which the principal is the Feast of Herod, in the oratory of the Compagnia della Misericordia. He also painted several friezes and ornaments in the public edifices. He died in 1573. [This is very uncertain; Zani places his death ten years later.]

LIGOZZI, JACOPO, [or GIACOMO.] This painter was born at Verona in 1543, and, according to Baldinucci, was a disciple of Paolo Veronese. His principal residence was at Florence, where he was made painter to the Grand Duke Ferdinand II., and superintendent of the Ducal gallery, a distinction honourable to his talents, as it was conferred on him in preference to the many able Florentine painters of the time. His fresco paintings in the cloister of the Ognisanti are particularly admired, in which he displays an abundant invention, an uncommon freedom of hand, an ornamental style, and something more graceful and pleasing than is usual in the Florentine school. His design, originally tolerably correct, was strengthened by Tuscan rigidity, and though his colouring is not equal to that of Paolo Veronese, it is neither wanting in vigour or truth. There are several of his oil pictures in the churches at Florence. In S. Maria Novella, is a grand picture of S. Raimondo resuscitating a Child; but his most celebrated work is his Martyrdom of S. Dorotea, at the Conventuali at Pescia; described by Lanzi as an admirable and impressive performance, in which is recognised a distinguished follower of Paolo Veronese. Some of his works have been engraved by Agostino Caracci, and other artists. He engraved some prints, both on copper and on wood, from his own designs. He died in 1627. [Zani denies that he ever engraved on wood.]

LILIO, ANDREA. See ANCONA.

LIMBURG, HENRY VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam about the year 1675 [or 1680.] He was a scholar of Adrian Vanderwerf, and painted small historical subjects and portraits in the polished and highly finished style of that master, though greatly inferior to him. One of his best pictures, representing the Holy Family, is placed in the gallery of the Louvre. [His name was Limborgh, or Limborch; he died in 1758.]

[LIN, HANS VAN, called Stillheid, or de Stille, flourished from 1667 to 1675, according to dates on his pictures. He painted battles and hunting pieces, and his works were highly esteemed. Zani calls him Giovanni van Lint; this is no doubt a mistake, as all other writers concur in calling him Hans, or Jan, van Lin. His pictures are marked H. V. L.]

LINCK, HANS, or JOHN VON. This artist is mentioned as an engraver by Professor Christ, who says he marked his prints with the monogram LF.

His works are not specified.

LINGELBACH, JOHN. This eminent painter was born at Franckfort on the Maine in 1625. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed; but the ability of the master may be presumed from the talents of the pupil. He went to Amsterdam when very young; and in 1642, when he was seventeen years of age, he visited Paris. A residence of two years in that city, where his works, at that early age, met with admirers, supplied him with the means of prosecuting his original project of visiting Italy. He passed six years at Rome, assiduously employed in designing the most remarkable objects in and near that capital. In 1650 he returned to Amsterdam, with the studies he had accumulated during his residence in Italy, of which he made an ample use in the composition of his pictures. His works frequently represent Italian sea-ports, in which he introduced an infinite number of small figures, habited according to their different nations, touched with great spirit, and of a character as expressive as varied. His pictures are embellished with architecture, and the ruins of ancient monuments and statues, introduced with the happiest effect. He was equally successful in his representation of fairs, Italian markets, and the amusements of the Carnival, with appropriate figures, ingeniously grouped, of quack doctors, surrounded by a crowd of spectators, and similar assemblages. His animals and cattle are correctly drawn, and painted with a neatness of pencil, which is peculiar to him. The skies and distances are treated with an exact attention to aerial perspective, and his colouring is clear and agreeable. His ability in painting small figures and animals induced several of the landscape painters of his time to have recourse to him to decorate their pictures, particularly Wynants and Ruysdael. We have by John Lingelbach a few slight, but spirited etchings of landscapes, sea-ports, &c., after his own designs. He died in 1687.

LINSCHOOTEN, ADRIAN VAN, a Dutch painter of history, born at Delft in 1590. As soon as he had learned the rudiments of the art, he went to Rome, where he attached himself to the study of the works of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, whose vigorous style he followed with some success. On his return to Holland, he painted some historical subjects with considerable reputation; but being of a very dissipated conduct, his employers could with difficulty get their pictures out of his hands. Two of his most esteemed works were at the Hague, representing St. Peter denying Christ, and the Repentance of that Apostle. He died in 1678.

LINSEN, JOHN, a Flemish painter of little celebrity, who, after learning the elements of the art in his own country, went to Italy, where he resided some years. He painted marines and sea-fights; of which the most remarkable was the representation of an engagement of which he had himself been an eye-witness, and was taken by an African corsair. He is said to have been killed in a quarrel with a gamester.

LINT, PETER VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1609. After being instructed in his native city by an unknown master, until he was seventeen years of age, he went to Italy, and passed several years at Rome. Soon after his arrival, his talents attracted the notice of Cardinal Gevasi, Bishop of Ostia, who employed him in several considerable works for his cathedral, and in the chapel of La Santa Croce, in S. Maria del Popolo, at Rome. After an absence of nine years he returned to Antwerp, and was immediately employed in some altarpieces for the churches, as well as pictures of a smaller size for private collections. Of his large historical works, the principal are the Virgin and Child, with several Saints, in the church of St. James, at Antwerp; and a fine picture in the church of the Carmelites, representing the Virgin presenting to some Monks the Order of their community, painted in the style of Vandyck, and not very inferior to that master. He also painted portraits with great reputation, many of which are highly esteemed in the Low Countries. [He was living in 1675.]

LINT, HENRY VAN, called STUDIO, was the son of the preceding artist, who instructed him in the first principles of the art, and sent him when young to Rome, where he passed the greater part of his life. He was unusually assiduous in designing the most picturesque views in the vicinity of that city, from which he formed the subjects of his landscapes, which are painted in a grand style, resembling that of J. F. van Bloemen, called Orizonti. He acquired the name of Studio from the society of Flemish painters at Rome, from his exemplary application to his studies. He etched a few plates of landscapes, some of which are dated in 1680. [Lanzi complicates this artist with his father. He calls him Francesco Wallint, surnamed M. Studio; and says that he painted small landscapes and sea views, ornamented with very beautiful figures, and that he imitated Claude; all of which is true as regards Henry; but Lanzi adds, "Wallint the younger attached himself to the same manner, but did not equal his father." Lanzi is the only writer that mentions Francesco Wallint, all others write Peter and Henry van Lint.]

[LINTHORST, J——, an excellent painter of fruit and flowers, was born at Amsterdam in 1755, and died there in 1815. Two fine specimens are in the Museum of his native city; and his works are received in the best collections.]

LINTMEYER, or LINDMEYER, DANIEL. This artist was born at Schaffhausen about the year 1540. He was chiefly known as a painter on glass, in which his works were admired for the ingenuity of his compositions, and the lustre and brilliancy of his colouring.

LIONI, CAVALIERE OTTAVIO. See LEONI.

LIOTARD, JOHN STEPHEN, called the TURK. This artist was born at Geneva in 1702, and was intended by his father for mercantile pursuits, but having succeeded in copying a miniature by Petitot, he was permitted to follow his inclination for painting. He went to Paris in 1725, and soon got into practice in painting portraits in crayons, miniature, and enamel. In 1733, he accompanied the Marquis de Puisieux to Rome, where he became acquainted with two English noblemen, who engaged him to accompany them to Constantinople. In his journey to the Levant, he put on the Turkish habit, which he wore, with a long beard. At Constantinople he received some civilities from the English ambassador, who persuaded him to come to England, where he continued to wear his Eastern dress, and was called the Turk. He met with considerable employment, for which he was probably more indebted to the notoriety of his masquerade, than his talents as a painter. In 1776 he returned to Switzerland. We have a few etchings by this artist; among which are the following:

The Empress Maria Theresa, in a Turkish dress.

The Archduchess Maria Christina; the same.

René Herault, Lieutenant-General of police.

The Portrait of John Stephen Liotard, with a long beard.

The Sick Cat, with some French verses.

LIOTARD, JOHN MICHAEL. This artist was the younger brother of John Stephen Liotard, and learned engraving at Paris, under Benoit Audran. He afterwards went to Venice, where he engraved the following prints:

Five large plates; from the Cartoons; painted in fresco, in the Palace of the Duke of Parma; by Carlo Cignani; representing Venus in her Chariot.

Apollo rising from the Waves.

Bacchus and Ariadne.

Pan and Syrinx.

The Rape of Europa.

A set of prints of subjects from the Bible; after Sebastiano Ricci.

LIPPO, FRA. FILIPPO. According to Baldinucci, this old Florentine painter was born about the year 1400. When a boy, he was received into the monastery of the Carmelites at Florence, and appears to have had no further assistance in the art, than the opportunity of copying and studying the works of Masaccio, of which there are several in the church of that community; which has led Vasari to suppose that he was his disciple. Such was the exactness with which he imitated the style of that master, that he was called the "Spirit of Masaccio." His success induced him to quit the monastic life when he was seventeen years of age, and to devote himself to painting. Some of his first performances, on leaving the convent, were some small pictures painted for the sacristy of S. Spirito, and a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with a choir of angels, in the church of S. Ambrogio, in which the expression of the heads is more pleasing and graceful than any thing that had preceded him. In a voyage he made by sea to Ancona, he was taken by a Barbary corsair, and carried into captivity, in which situation he had remained eighteen months, when he drew on the wall the portrait of his master, who was so surprised at the performance, that he considered him as something preternatural, and restored him to liberty. In the parochial church of Prato, he painted in fresco the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, and the Decollation of St. John, the figures larger than life, which are considered by Vasari as his most capital works. He is said to have been of an immoral and depraved character, and is supposed to have been poisoned in 1469, whilst painting the Dome at Spoleto, at the instigation of a family which he had dishonoured by seducing one of their relatives from a convent. [The name should be written Lippi, not Lippo. He was born in 1412. He excelled in invention, drawing, colouring, and chiaroscuro, and, for his time, was certainly a painter of extraordinary merit. He may, even without reference to time, be accounted among the greatest of the Italian painters, from Masaccio to Raphael, both inclusive. It is said that he was poisoned at the instigation of a family which he had dishonoured by seducing one of their relatives from a convent. This may be doubted. Lucrezia Buti, the lady in question, was abducted by him from the convent of Santa Margherita in 1459, and his son Filippino, by her, was in his tenth year when his father died. Lucrezia's relations could do her no service by poisoning a man she evidently loved, and the father of her child, with whom she had lived for nearly eleven years. If it was from a mere spirit of revenge, they were very tardy, and their time was ill-chosen, as he was then in the zenith of his reputation. He was buried in the cathedral of Spoleto, where a marble monument to his memory, executed by his son, was erected by the order and at the expense of Lorenzo de' Medici. A print in Rosini's work, (plate 73,) of the Death and Coronation of the Virgin, exhibits Frà Filippo's style of composition.]

LIPPI, FILIPPINO, was the natural son of Filippo Lippi, born at Florence in 1460, and, according to Vasari, was a disciple of Sandro Boticelli. He excelled in painting grotesque ornaments, trophies, and antiquities, for which he was more celebrated than for the design of the figure. In his picture of S. Bernardo, in the Abbey of that name at Florence; his Adoration of the Magi, in the Florentine gallery; and his two pictures of St. John and St. Philip, in S. Maria Novella; he is more admired for the ornamental accessories by which they are accompanied, than the figures themselves. He was invited to Rome, to paint a chapel in S. Maria della Minerva, where he represented the Assumption, and some subjects from the Life of St. Thomas d'Aquinas, in which he was more successful in his design. He died in 1505.

LIPPI, LORENZO. This artist was born at Florence in 1606. Lorenzo Lippi, like his friend Salween Rosa, divided his attention and his time between painting and poetry. His poem of Il Malmantile raquistato, though perhaps less read than the Satires of Salvator, is more elegant, and is one of the most admired productions in the Tuscan language. In choosing a prototype worthy of his imitation in painting, his taste and feeling directed him to Santo di Titi. To the correct design of that master, he added a more vigorous colouring, and in the taste of his draperies, followed the style of Federigo Barocci. The beauty and softness of his pencil, the good taste and harmony which preside in his works, evince an attention to nature and character, superior to his contemporaries. Matteo Roselli, a celebrated painter of his time, on seeing his works, with a liberality which, Lanzi observes, is not often met in the history of the art, openly acknowledged his superiority. His pictures are not very scarce in Florence, though he passed several years at Inspruch, where he was painter to the court. One of his finest pictures, representing the Crucifixion, is in the Florentine gallery. Baldinucci highly applauds his Triumph of David, painted for the saloon of Angiolo Galli. He died at Florence in 1664.

[LIPS, JOHANN HEINRICH, a designer and engraver, born at Kloten, near Zurich, in 1758, has distinguished himself by his engravings after the old masters, both Italian and Flemish, and also by numerous portraits and book illustrations, executed in a very masterly manner. He was living in 1817. A list of his principal plates will be found in Nagler.]

[LIPS, JOHANN JAKOB, son of the preceding, was born at Zurich in 1790. He studied at Munich. He was an engraver of ability, and his subjects are various in history, portraits, and after the works of preceding artists. He died about 1835.]

[LIS, JAN VAN, born at Oldenburg, in Germany, in 1569 or 70, was a scholar of Henri Goltzius, but travelled in France and Italy, and became so eminent that he was compared with Rubens and Van Dyck. His compositions are spirited; his drawing fine; and his colouring remarkably pleasing. He died at Venice in 1629.]

LIS, JOHN. See LYS.

LISEBETTEN, or LEYSEBETTEN, PETER VAN, an indifferent Flemish engraver, born at Brussels about the year 1610. In conjunction with John van Troyen, he engraved part of the plates for the gallery of Teniers; they are executed in a coarse, tasteless style, and very incorrectly drawn. Among others are the following:

The Portrait of David Teniers, the elder; after P. van Mol.

Jupiter and Danae; after Titian.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after P. Veronese.

The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth; after Palma.

The Virgin, with the infant Jesus and St. John; after Palma.

Cupid presenting Fruit to Venus; after Paris Bordone.
Diana and Endymion; after the same.

LITTRET, CLAUDE ANTHONY, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1735. He engraved several plates of portraits, and other subjects, which are executed with the graver in a neat, clear style, and possess considerable merit. This artist visited England about the year 1763, but not meeting with much encouragement he returned to France, and died at Rouen in 1775. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Madame de Pompadour; after Schenau.

Mademoiselle Clairon, celebrated actress; after the same.
J. J. Rousseau; after la Tour.

P. L. de Belloy.

M. de la Sartine, Lieutenant-General of police; after Viger.

Antoine de Malvin, Archbishop of Lyons; after Vanloo.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Venus sleeping; after St. Quintin.

Diana reposing; after the same.

Love conducted by Fidelity; after Schenau.

Love distributing his Gifts; after the same.

Two Views of the Rhine; after Weiröther.

The Concert of the Grand Sultan; after C. Vanloo.

LIVE, ANGE LAURÉNT DE LA, a French amateur engraver, who etched several subjects after Boucher and Greuze; a set of caricatures, after Salis; and several portraits.

LIVENS. See LIEVENS.

[LIVERSEEGE, HENRY, an English painter of familiar subjects, was born at Manchester in 1803. From his birth he was weak, and deformed in his person, and being neglected by his father, he owed his education to a kind uncle, who watched him with great care and tenderness. It is not said by whom he was instructed in art, but his first attempts were in portraiture: his tetchy sensibility, it is said, prevented success in that line, which requires more than ordinary courtesy as well as talent. Being enamoured of the works of Shakspeare and Walter Scott, he turned from the real to embody the ideal characters in the writings of those great poets: he produced a series of pictures of the dramatic kind, which brought him both money and high reputation. Among these personifications of imaginary characters were Adam Woodcock, from Scott's romance of the Abbot, in which he happily depicted the ridiculous part in that good-humoured worthy; then followed Isabella and the Recluse, from the Black Dwarf; The Inquiry, a scene of quiet humour, representing a simple country lad with a leash of moor-game in his hand, inquiring his way from a burly-looking porter, swollen with his own importance, at the door of a mansion. The Cobbler is of the same stamp; he is reading Cobbett's Register, and spelling his way with a look of pondering sagacity. Percie Shafton and Mysie Happer is another of his happy delineations. As the greater number of his subjects are engraved and well known to the public, it is unnecessary to particularize further; it is sufficient to say that he became a great favourite, and his productions found ready purchasers, and continue to be sought for with avidity. The weakness of his frame sunk under the activity of his imagination; his life was a continued disease, and it was scarcely a surprise to his friends when he expired suddenly on the morning of the 13th of January, in the year 1832. As an artist his power lay in delineation of character; and he has left it doubtful whether he was most successful in the serious or the humorous: he is excellent in both.]

LLORENTE, DON BERNARDO GERMAN, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1685. He was the son of an obscure painter, by whom he was instructed in the first principles of design, and, without the advantage of better instruction, arrived at such ability, that when Philip V. visited Seville, he was made choice of to paint the portrait of the infant Don Philip, which gave so much satisfaction, that he became the favourite painter of the court. This flattering and honourable patronage he abandoned, in the prime of life, to pass the remainder of his life in the solitary seclusion of a hermitage. He still, however, continued to exercise his art in painting pictures of the Virgin represented as a Shepherdess, in the midst of her flocks, which partake of the sweet and simple style of Murillo. He died in 1757.

LOCA, BATISTA. According to Dominici, this painter was a Neapolitan, and flourished about the year 1540. He was first a scholar of Gio. Antonio d'Amato, il Vecchio, but afterwards studied the works of Andrea da Salerno, and became an historical painter of some reputation. In the church of Il Spirito Santo, at Naples, is an admired picture by this master, representing the Conversion of St. Paul, painted in 1543.

LOCATELLI. See LUCATELLI.

LOCHOM, MICHAEL VAN, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1635. According to Basan, he engraved several plates for Crispin de Passe, whose style he attempted to imitate, but with little success. He appears to have been chiefly employed by the booksellers, and worked entirely with the graver, in a poor, stiff style. One of his best prints is a frontispiece to the Life of Louis XIII. with a portrait of that monarch on horseback, with several small figures. He engraved several portraits for the Works of Hippocrates, published at Paris in 1639; and others, after Ferdinand Elle. [He also engraved the plates for "Les Peintures sacrées de la Bible," published, in folio, at Paris, in 1656.]

LOCHOM, or LOCHON, B. V., a Dutch engraver, by whom we have a set of plates of ornaments for goldsmiths, after Tangen, engraved conjointly with H. Janssen, in a neat style. He also engraved a set of small plates of Huntings of various kinds, which, from their shape, appear to have been intended for fans.

LOCHON, RENÉ, a French engraver, born at Poisy about the year 1630. He resided at Paris, where he engraved some historical subjects, and several portraits, in which he seems to have imitated the fine style of Nanteuil, though very inferior to him. We have, among others, the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Charles de Bourbon, Bishop of Soison. 1657.

Eustache de Lesseville, Bishop of Coutances. 1661.

Felix Vialart, Bishop of Chalons.

B. Pheipeaux de la Vrilliere. 1667.

Jerome Bignon.

Louis de Marilla, Doctor of Sorbonne.

Hardouin de Perefiz, Archbishop of Paris; after Champagne.

Antoine Arnauld, Priest of the Oratory; after the same.

SUBJECTS.

Christ bearing his Cross; after Caracci.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. John; after N. Coypel.

LOCKLEY, DAVID, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1719. Among other prints, he engraved a large plate, representing a view of the New Church in the Strand; and his name is affixed to a portrait of Michael Malard.

LODER, a German painter, who, according to Basan, etched several plates after his own compositions. He lived about 1760.

LODGE, WILLIAM. This artist was born at Leeds in 1649. He was the son of a merchant, who left him a handsome patrimony. From school he was sent to Jesus College, Cambridge, and was afterwards a student of law of Lincoln's Inn; but more pleasurable studies sniting his genius, he attended Lord Bellasyse, afterwards Viscount Falconberg, in his embassy to Venice, where meeting with Giacomo Barri's Viaggio Pittoreesco, in which are particularized the principal pictures in Italy, and an account of the celebrated collection of the Canone Settala at Milan; he translated it into English, and published it in 1679, with heads of the most eminent painters, and a Map of Italy, etched by himself. During his travels, he drew various views, which he afterwards etched. On his return to England, he assisted Doctor Lister in drawing rare shells and fossils, which were transmitted to the Royal Society, and are inserted in their Transactions. Mr. Lodge's works, besides those above mentioned, are:

The Pont du Gard, in Languedoc; with cipher W.

A View of Gaeta, with the Mole and Plancus's Tomb.
Pozzuolo, Caracalla's Mole, Baia, &c.
Ruins of the Amphitheatre and Aqueduct at Minturnum.
Promontory of Circe, Temple of the Sun, &c.
Lambeth Palace, from the Thames.
Westminster Hall and the Abbey.
The Monument.
Sheriff Hutton Castle.
Clifford's Tower.
View of York.

Leeds, with a View of Kirkstall and Fountain Abbeys.
The Portrait of Oliver Cromwell, and his Page.
The Portrait of Samuel Malnes; after Claret.

He died at Leeds in 1689. [According to others, in 1699: the date of his birth is also questioned.]

LODI, CALLISTO PIAZZA DA. See PIAZZA.

LOEMANS, ARNOLD, a Flemish engraver and printseller, who resided at Antwerp about the year 1690. He engraved a few plates after the Flemish masters, and some portraits, among which is that of J. Callot.

[LOFVERS, PETER, born at Groningen in 1710, was a scholar of J. A. Wassenburg, and painted sea views with great ability. His pictures were formerly in great request in England, France, and Hamburg. He died in 1788.]

[LOFVERS, HENRI, son of the preceding, born in 1739, was instructed by his father, and painted marine subjects, fruit, and flowers, which had considerable merit. He died at Groningen in 1805.]

LOGGAN, DAVID. This artist was born at Dantzic about the year 1630. He is said to have received his instruction in engraving from Simon de Passe, in Denmark, and afterwards passing through Holland, he studied under Hondius, and came to England before the Restoration. He was first employed in engraving views of the public buildings of the University of Oxford, [which were published collectively in 1675, in a folio volume, under the title of Oxonia Illustrata, and comprised 40 plates. He also engraved and published a similar volume for Cambridge, in 1688, comprising 30 plates.] He executed also a set of eleven plates, entitled, Habitus Academicorum Oxoniæ à Doctore ad Servientem, [which form a distinct series from the plates of costumes engraved in the Oxonia Antiqua.] We have also a great number of portraits, which are esteemed his best works. They are generally executed with the graver in a neat but formal style: the following are the principal:

Charles I. on horseback; scarce.
Henrietta Maria, his Queen.
Charles II.; four plates.
Catherine, his Queen.
James, Duke of York.
George, Duke of Albemarle; fine.
Sir Edward Coke, Chief Justice.
Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; fine.
James Stanley, Earl of Derby; rare.
Lord-keeper Guilford; fine.
James, Duke of Monmouth; fine.
James, Duke of Ormond.

Crew, Bishop of Durham.
Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury.
Sir Henry Pope Blount.
Pearson, Bishop of Chester.
Sir George Wharton.
George, Prince of Denmark.
Mother Louse, of Louse-Hall; one of his earliest prints.

LOIR, NICHOLAS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1624. He was the son of a goldsmith, who, perceiving his inclination for painting, placed him under the tuition of Sebastian Bourdon, with whom he studied until he was twenty-three years of age, when he travelled to Rome. In that city he passed two years, and as his easy circumstances relieved him from the necessity of painting for subsistence, he occupied his time in contemplating, rather than in copying, the works of the principal masters; and he possessed so retentive a memory, that on returning to his apartment, he could trace sketches of the pictures which had most attracted his attention. The works of Niccolo Poussin were the objects of his particular admiration, and his best pictures are those of an easel size, painted in the style of that master. On his return to Paris he met with immediate employment, and was engaged in several considerable works for Louis XIV., in the palace of the Tuilleries and at Versailles. In 1663 he was made a member of the Academy at Paris, and painted for his picture of reception the Progress of Painting and Sculpture. In the church of St. Bartholomew is one of his best public works, representing the Marriage of St. Catherine. Nicholas Loir possessed a ready invention, and an unusual facility of handling. He is accused of negligence in his compositions, of a want of elevation in his conceptions and of dignity in his forms, although he is not without grace in his female figures and children. He died at Paris in 1679. We have by this artist a great number of etchings from his own designs; they are slightly, but spiritedly executed, in the style of a painter. They amount to nearly one hundred and fifty; among which are the following:

Set of Twelve, subjects, Virgin and Holy Families.

The infant Jesus embracing the Cross.

The Judgment of Paris.

Apollo and Daphne.

Cleobis and Biton drawing the Chariot of their Mother to the Temple of Juno.

Two Landscapes.

[See Dumesnil, P. G. Français, tom. iii., for a description of 113 prints by Nicolas Loir. He conjectures that the number mentioned in the text is an exaggeration by D'Argenville, who probably included some of the anonymous pieces, which were executed by his brother Alexis.]

LOIR, ALEXIS. This artist was the younger brother of Nicholas Loir, born at Paris in 1630. He was brought up to his father's profession of a goldsmith, to which he added that of an engraver, in which he became eminent. His drawing is correct, and he handled the point and the graver with great spirit and facility. The particular style of the master he engraved from is well preserved in his prints, which possess considerable merit. The following are esteemed his best plates:

The Education of Mary de Medicis; after the picture by Rubens in the Luxembourg gallery.

Time discovering Truth; after the same.

The Fall of the Rebel Angels; after Le Brun; fine.

The Massacre of the Innocents; after the same; fine.

The Dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin; after Mignard.

The Finding of Moses; after N. Poussin.

Venus giving the Arms to Æneas; after the same.

The Presentation in the Temple; after Jouvenet.

The Descent from the Cross; after Jouvenet; fine.

The Virgin with the Infant sleeping; after N. Loir.

The Holy Family; after the same.

Mary Magdalene praying; after the same; fine.

He also etched several plates from his brother's designs. [The greater number of writers agree that he was born in 1640, and died in 1713.]

LOISEL, an obscure French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1645. He executed part of the plates for the folio volume of Plans and Views published by Beau lieu.

LOISI, or LOISY. This artist was a native of Burgundy, and flourished about the year 1620. He engraved some portraits, among which is that of Bonaventura Comes Abnquois. [This is supposed to be Jean de Loisi, born at Besançon about 1603, who engraved "Portraits de S. S. vertus de la Vierge contemplées par feue S. A. M. Isabelle Claire Eugenie, infante d'Espagne," published in 1635. There are three other engravers of the same name, but neither of distinction: their names are, Peter the elder, Peter the younger, and Claude. They all lived in the 17th century.]

LOLI, LORENZO. This painter and engraver was born at Bologna about the year 1612. He is sometimes called Lorenzino del Sig. Guido Reni, from his being a favourite disciple of that master. He painted some pictures for the churches at Bologna, of which the most admired is his S. Antonio di Padoua, in S. Caterina di Strada Maggiore. We have by this artist several etchings after Guido and Sirani, as well as from his own designs. They are executed in a slight, but spirited manner, in imitation of the style of Guido, but very inferior. He sometimes signed his prints with his name, and sometimes L. LL. F. or Lo. F. or Laur Lol. The following are his best prints:

The Flight into Egypt; after Guido. There is a fine print by Pouilly of this subject.

The Holy Family, with St. John, in which St. Joseph is leaning on a Pedestal; after the same.

The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after Sirani.

The Virgin with the Infant sleeping; after Elis. Sirani.

The Virgin, with the Infant, to whom an Angel presents a Basket of Flowers; after Sirani.

The Assumption of the Virgin; after the same; fine and scarce.

St. Jerome; after the same.

Mary Magdalene, with a Crucifix; after his own design.

The Virgin appearing to St. Francis and St. Augustine; after the same.

Fame flying over a Globe; after Sirani.

Perseus and Andromeda; after the same.

Cupid breaking his Bow; after his own design.

Infant Bacchanalians; after the same.

A similar subject; after the same.

LOMAZZO, GIOVANNI PAOLO. This painter and writer on art was born at Milan in 1538, and was a scholar of Giovanni Batista della Cerva. Of his works as a painter little is known; and it is probable he did not paint much, as he became blind when he was thirty-three years old, and was chiefly occupied as an author on various subjects. In 1584 was published at Milan his Trattato dell arte della Pittura, &c.; and in 1590 his Idea del Tempio della Pittura, &c.

LOMBARD, LAMBERT. Considerable confusion for some time existed respecting this artist, from Sandrart's having erroneously asserted that Lambert Lombard and Lambert Suavius were one and the same artist, although the more respectable authority of Van Mander mentions them as two distinct persons. All doubt on the subject has, however, been removed by M. Heineken, who has proved that Lambert Suavius, an engraver as well as a painter, was a disciple of Lombard, and engraved several plates after his master's designs, which are inscribed Lambert Lombard, invent. I. S. fec. L. Lombard never engraved. He was born at Liege in 1500, and having received some instruction in his native city, he travelled to Italy, where he studied some time at Florence, under Andrea del Sarto. During his residence in Italy, he applied himself as much to the study of architecture as painting; and on his return to Liege, was the means of introducing a better taste in both than had prevailed before him. His academy became the most celebrated of his time in that country, and he has the credit of having been the instructor of some of the most eminent artists of that period. Francis Floris, Hubert Goltzius, William Key, and others, were among his disciples. Several of his works have been engraved by L. Suavius, particularly a Charity, and the Raising of Lazarus, which give a respectable idea of his talents. He died in 1560. [According to the account given by Lampsonius, the intimate friend of Lambert Lombard, he was born in 1506. His parents were poor, and could not afford him much school education. When he grew up they placed him with a painter, not with the expectation of making him an artist, but merely to obtain a livelihood. By some means, it is not said how or when, he became a disciple of Arnold Beer and of Jan Gossart (Mabuse). It was not till he arrived at the age of 32 that he went to Italy, which he did in the suite of Cardinal Pole, at the recommendation of Erard de la Marck, bishop of Liege. With a mind fitted for the reception of knowledge, and a persevering disposition to acquire it, he, no doubt, availed himself of the opportunity to investigate the beauties of Raphael, Andrea Mantegna, and Titian; but as he evinced as strong a predilection for architecture as for painting, he contemplated with equal attention the stupendous works of Michelangiolo and other architects of that period. The stay that he made in Italy was too short to enable him to acquire more than a mind gifted like his could seize almost by inspection; it is doubtful, therefore, whether he did in a strict sense study under any particular master there. The death of his patron Erard de la Marck obliged him to return to Liege, where he continued in favour with three succeeding bishops, but it seems he did not profit by their liberality. His biographer, Lampsonius, describes him as a man possessed of uncommon knowledge in antiquities and literature, self acquired, and as an artist one of the most consummate in design. He had so lofty an opinion of his art, that he would not degrade it for mercenary considerations, nor solicit employment, though he was straitened in his circumstances. He expected his country to require him to perform some great public work, for which he felt himself qualified, but this, without disturbing his equanimity, never occurred. Allowing for the embellishments of a friendly and admiring biographer, Lambert Lombard must have been, in the truest sense, a great man. As a painter, it is said, he was so rapid with his pencil that he could produce in a short time more works, and better finished, than others could by long-continued application; and that he availed himself of this facility to copy promptly the beautiful creations of the best Italian masters. The artists of Italy, always chary in their praise of foreigners, were compelled to acknowledge his ability; Salviati, among others, candidly expressed his admiration at the celerity of his performances and the perfection they displayed. Being thus imbued with a love of Italian art, he made himself master of the style in a manner so astonishing, that several of his pictures passed as the productions of Correggio. Whether the works now ascribed to him be his is doubted by some acute connoisseurs, on account of their manner not corresponding with the statements of Lampsonius. The king of Holland possesses three, which Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys has fully described in his excellent catalogue of his Majesty's collection. Remarking on the "Allegorical Vision," he says, that "in attentively examining this work one would be tempted to believe that Lambert Lombard had studied under Bernard van Orley; at least a great resemblance to the manner of painting of the latter may be observed in it." This is saying a great deal in confirmation of Lampsonius. What renders it difficult to decide on the merits attributed to him as a painter is, that Henry Maximilien of Bavaria removed the most beautiful pictures by Lambert Lombard from Liege to ornament his palace at Bonn, where they fell a prey to the flames on the bombardment of that city. There is some uncertainty about the date of his death. It is singular that Lampsonius, who has made us acquainted with so many circumstances of the early part of his life, should not have mentioned any of the concluding part, nor when he died. Perhaps it was from delicacy that he did not record his having taken refuge in the hospital of Mont Cornillon in his latter days, as is related by an historian of Liege. The account written by Lampsonius was printed at Bruges in 1565, by Hubert Goltzius, who had been a pupil of Lombard in the study of Numismatics, and probably well acquainted with the matters related: it, therefore, can hardly be supposed that the date of his death would have been omitted, had he been dead at the time of publication. This strengthens Zani's statement that he was living in 1565. On the other hand, the print of his portrait, engraved by Theodore Galle, bears the following inscription: Floruit et obiit apud Leodienses, anno 1560. This, however, is not conclusive, as Theodore Galle flourished about 1600. The date of his birth is stated by Lampsonius, and the portrait prefixed to his account has this inscription; Lambertus Lombardus pictor eburonensis, anno aet. XLV., MDLI., corresponding with that date.]

LOMBARD, or LOMBART, PETER, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1612. He is said to have learned the principles of design under Simon Vouet, but it is not known who instructed him in engraving. After acquiring some reputation at Paris he came to England, some time before the Restoration, as he engraved a portrait of the Protector; a frontispiece to Ogilby's Virgil, published in 1654; a title to a small octavo, in 1658; and Sir Robert Stapleton's portrait for his Juvenal, before 1660. During his stay in this country, he was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he executed a great number of subjects, as well as portraits. They are generally executed with the graver, in a neat, laboured style, but without much taste. His portraits, however, which are the best of his works, possess considerable merit. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

A set of twelve plates, half-length, two of the Earl of Arundel and Earl of Pembroke, and ten of Ladies, called the Countesses; after Vandyck. Charles I. on horseback; from the same. After the death of that monarch, the head of Cromwell was substituted for that of the King.

Oliver Cromwell, with his Page; after Walker. Walker, the Painter; after a picture by himself; oval. Sir Samuel Morland; after Lely. Anne Hyde, Duchess of York; after the same. Brian Walton, Bishop of Chester; scarce. Jeremy Taylor, Bishop of Downe. De la Fond, Gazetteer of Holland. 1667; scarce. Samuel Malines. Sir Henry Wootton. Dr. Charlton.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

St. Michael vanquishing the Demon; after Raffaele. The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Ann. Caracci. The Nativity, or Adoration of the Shepherds; after N. Poussin. The Last Supper; after N. Poussin. The Angel appearing to St. Joseph; after Ph. de Champagne. The Crucifixion; after the same. The Holy Family; after C. le Fevre.

LOMBARDI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO. This painter was born at Lucca in 1682, and was a scholar of Pietro Paolini, whose style he followed and improved, by studying the works of the best Venetian colourists, and the great style of design of the Carracci. Lanzi speaks of the talents of this artist in the most favourable terms. His ingenious and tasteful compositions, the grand and resolute character of his design, rank him among the ablest artists of his time. Such are his two laterals in the choir of the Olivetani representing S. Bernardo succouring the persons afflicted with the plague. There are two other pictures by him in S. Romano, painted with such force of colour and relief, that they approach the best style of Guercino. His reputation would have stood higher, if he had always painted with equal care, and had not degraded his talents by painting pictures at all prices. He died in 1752.

LOMMELIN, ADRIAN. This artist was born at Amiens about the year 1636, and was instructed in engraving at Antwerp, where he passed the greater part of his life. It would have been unfortunate for the fame of Rubens, if his ability was to be appreciated by the prints executed by this indifferent burinist, by whom some of his most distinguished works have been engraved; and though it is necessary to notice his prints at some length, it is more on account of the interesting subjects he has selected, than the merit of their execution. The portraits he engraved, after Vandyck, however, are not without merit. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS AFTER VANDYCK.

Charles I. Ferdinand of Austria, Governor of the Low Countries. Jacob le Roi, Seigneur of Herbaix. J. C. de la Faille, Jesuit. Alex. de la Faille, Senator of Antwerp. Zegher van Houtsum, Canon of Antwerp. Adrian Stevens, Ecclesiastic. J. Malderus, Bishop of Antwerp. John de Wael, painter of Antwerp. John Baptist de Bisthoven, Jesuit; one of his best prints.

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

Abigail appeasing David with her presents. The Adoration of the Magi. The Circumcision. The Baptism of Christ. Christ washing the Feet of his Apostles. Christ appearing to Magdalcene. The Triumph of Charity. Time discovering Truth. The Assumption of the Virgin. St. Cecilia. The Judgment of Paris.

Christ taken in the Garden; after Vandyck.

The Virgin and Infant, with the four Doctors of the Church; after Diepenbeck.

LOMI, AURELIO. This painter was born at Pisa in 1556, and was first a disciple of Bronzino, but afterwards studied under Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli, and is considered as the head of the Pisanese school. His fresco works in the Dome at Pisa partake of the style of both those masters, though, compared with that of Cigoli, he appears more minute, and less harmonious. His object appears to have been to surprise by a splendour of colour, and an ostentatious display of ornaments and drapery, attractive to the multitude, and, with these pretensions to celebrity, acquired many admirers at Rome, Florence, and, above all, at Genoa; where his works were preferred to those of Pietro Sorri, though previously held in the highest estimation. Of his numerous works in that city, the most worthy of notice are, his picture of S. Antonio di Padoua, at the Franciscans; and his Last Judgment, in the church of S. Maria di Carignano; the former distinguished by grace, and the modest tranquillity of its tones; the latter, by a robust and daring design, and the most vigorous colouring. Less strikingly effective, but esteemed by the Pisanese as his chef d'œuvre, is his S. Girolamo, in the church of il Santo Campo at Pisa, which is marked with his initials, and the date 1595. [He died in 1622.]

LOMI, ORAZIO. See GENTILESCHI.

LONDERSELL, [or LONDERSEEL,] AHASUERUS VAN. This artist is supposed to have been a native of Germany. He was an engraver on wood, and flourished from the year 1576 till 1599. He executed several small wooden cuts in a very neat style, resembling that of Virgilius Solis. We have some Bible cuts by this artist, and some small prints for an Herbal, by Matthias de Lobel. He also executed the cuts for The Travels of Nicolas de Nicolay into Turkey, published at Antwerp in 1576. He usually marked his prints with one of these monograms XL. AV. [He was born at Amsterdam in 1548, and was living in 1594.]

LONDERSELL, [or LONDERSEEL,] JOHN VAN, a Flemish engraver, born at Bruges about the year 1590. We have by this artist several plates of landscapes, and other subjects, engraved in a stiff, formal style, resembling that of Nicholas de Bruyn, of whom he is supposed to have been a pupil. His prints are executed with the graver, and some of them possess considerable merit. He usually signed them with his name abbreviated, J. Lond. or J. Londer, fec. Among others we have the following by him:

Faith, Hope, and Charity; represented by allegorical figures; from his own designs.

The Five Senses, emblematically represented; the same.

A set of Landscapes, with figures; after J. Savary.

Four Landscapes, with biblical subjects; after G. Hondcooter.

Four Landscapes, with the same; after G. Coninzloo.

Nine Landscapes, with the same; after D. Vinckenbooms.

A View of the interior of St. John of Lateran; after Hendrick Arts.

[He was born at Bruges in 1582: the date of his death is not recorded.]

LONDONIO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Milan in 1723. He at first attempted historical painting, but abandoned that branch for landscapes, with animals, in which he was much more successful. His pastoral subjects are highly esteemed at Milan, Genoa, and Naples, where they are found in the best collections. F. Londonio etched about seventy plates of landscapes, with figures and cattle, from his own designs. They are executed in a spirited and agreeable style. He died in 1783. [Nagler enumerates 94 pieces by him. Some years ago a great number of his studies in oil, on paper, were brought to England; they were chiefly of goats and horned cattle.]

LONGEUIL, JOSEPH DE, a modern French engraver, born at Lisle in 1736. He engraved in a neat style several vignettes for the Henriade, by Voltaire, and the Contes de la Fontaine. His talents were not confined to book-plates; he executed some subjects after various masters, which are not without merit; among which are the following:

Two Allegorical Subjects; after Cochin.

Heroic Fidelity; after Moreau.

Two Rural Subjects; after Lepicé and Aubrey.

A pair of Dutch Merry-makings; after Ostade.

The Fishermen; after Vernet.

A View of the Environs of Naples; after Mettai.

A Sea-storm; after the same.

LONGHI, ALESSANDRO, a modern Venetian painter and engraver, born at Venice in 1733, and was a scholar of Giuseppe Nogari. He is chiefly known as a portrait painter. In 1763 he published a volume of the Lives of the modern Venetian Artists, with portraits etched by himself. He etched several other plates of various subjects. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS OF PAINTERS.

Giacomo Amiconi.

Antonio Balestra.

Sebastiano Ricci.

Gio. Batista Piazzetta.

Gio. Batista Tiepolo.

SUBJECTS.

A Venetian Masquerade.

A Gondolier dancing with a Lady.

A Quack Doctor on his stage.

A Moor beating a Drum.

The Philosopher Pythagoras.

[He died in 1813.]

[LONGHI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian painter, and one of the most distinguished engravers of the 19th century, was born at Monza in 1766. His father was a silk mercer, and intended his son for the church, but, through his own determination, Giuseppe was finally placed with the Florentine, Vincenzo Vangelisti, professor in the Brera at Milan, under whom he learnt engraving. He studied afterwards, for some time, in Rome, where he became acquainted with Raphael Morghen. Longhi soon obtained a reputation himself by his print from the Genius of Music, a picture by Guido, in the Chigi Palace. After his return to Milan, he was chiefly employed in miniature painting, until he was ordered by Napoleon to make an engraving of Gros's portrait of him; and he was appointed about the same time (1798) to succeed Vangelisti, deceased, as Professor of Engraving in the Academy of the Brera, to which, during Longhi's professorship, many distinguished engravers of the present time in Italy owe their education. It was one of Longhi's first principles to make the means subservient to the end, and not the end to the means: he always deprecated cleverness of line as a principal object, and in his own works, manual dexterity is invariably subordinate to conformity of style. His first object was to give, as nearly as possible, the general character, colour, and texture of the original, and the etching needle was accordingly his chief instrument. He excelled in light and shade. Among his principal works are, the Vision of Ezekiel, the Spozalizio, or Marriage of the Virgin, and a Holy Family, all after Raphael; the Entombment, after D. Crespi; the Magdalene, after Correggio; the Madonna del Lago, after L. da Vinci; Galatea, after Albano; and many heads, after Rembrandt. It would occupy more space than the limits of this work will permit, to enumerate all the productions of Longhi's graver worthy of being specified. In the fine series of portraits published at Milan, under the title "Vite e Ritratti di Illustri Italiani," he engraved the portraits of Napoleon, with the iron crown on his head, as king of Italy; Michelangiolo Buonarroti; and Dandolo, Doge of Venice: all superb in execution. But his "Fasti di Napoleone il grande" must not be omitted. This beautiful work, after the designs of Appiani, was executed in part by Longhi, and the whole of it, as far as it exists, under his direction. Six of the plates were engraved entirely by him; in what the Italians call the semibbero manner; five of them represent the Battle of Marengo; the sixth, Time with the Fates: the rest are by Michele Bisi, Giuseppe Benaglia, and the two brothers, Rosaspina; all worthy disciples of this great master. This work is especially deserving of notice, as being done at the expense of the Emperor Napoleon. It is said, that not being completed at the time of his abdication, its further progress was forbidden, and the plates destroyed. By whose soever order this destruction was committed, it deserves execration. Works of genius belong to the world; heroic actions are entitled to preservation, historically and artistically, for the glory of the nation by which they are performed; and he that would sacrilegiously destroy them, shows that he is governed by a baseness of soul which renders him incapable of performing deeds worthy of record, or of appreciating the talent of the poet, or the painter, who immortalizes them by the efforts of his genius. He commenced in 1827 the engraving of the Last Judgment, after Michael Angelo, from a drawing by Minardi, but died without finishing it; it was, however, considerably advanced, and will probably be completed by one of his distinguished scholars. The Madonna del Velo, after Raphael, he also left unfinished, but it was completed in 1834 by his pupil the Cavaliere Toschi, whose name deserves to be remembered with gratitude by the latest posterity, for rescuing from oblivion some of the finest works of Antonio Allegri, (Correggio,) and adorning them with all the graces of his matchless graver. Longhi died of apoplexy in 1831.]

LONGHI, LUCA. This painter was born at Ravenna, and flourished about the year 1580. There are several of his historical works in the churches of Ravenna, Ferrara, and Mantua. In the church of S. Benedetto at Ferrara, is an admired picture by him representing the Circumcision; but his principal works are in the churches of S. Vitale, S. Agata, and S. Domenico, at Ravenna. His compositions are generally confined to a few figures, but his pictures are highly finished, and very agreeably coloured. He also distinguished himself as a portrait painter. [Zani places his birth in 1517, and his death in 1590. Oretti says that he painted in 1531; it is certain he painted in 1580. Kügler says he inclined to the old manner of Francia's school; but instead of the deep feeling of that master, we find in his pictures only an expression of an affected devotion.]

LONGHI, FRANCESCO, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, and painted history and portraits in the style of his father, though greatly inferior to him. One of his best pictures is in the church of the Carmelites at Ravenna.

LONGRAFF, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1698. He engraved a set of ornamental subjects for goldsmiths. They are executed with the graver in a very neat style.

LONI, or LOMI, ALESSANDRO. This painter was born at Florence in 1655, and was a scholar and imitator of Carlo Dolci. He was chiefly employed in copying the pictures of his master, which he did with a precision and a finish that render it difficult to distinguish them from the originals. He died in 1702.

LONS, D. E., [DIRCK EVERSEN,] an obscure engraver, by whom there is an etching of the Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after A. van Neulandt. It is spiritedly executed, but the drawing is very incorrect. It is dated 1612. [He was living in 1622. There are four landscapes by him, each having a large wind-mill, with the titles, Seem Moolen, Got Moolen, Meel Moolen, Meel Moolen.]

[LONSDALE, JAMES, an English portrait painter, was a native of Lancashire, but came to London at an early period of his life. It is not said where or from whom he received his artistic education; but he was one of the founders and chief supporters of the Society of British Artists. He was a man of independent mind and manners, and perhaps his neglect of the suaviter in modo, was the reason that his practice was chiefly confined to male sitters. He had a masculine style of painting, and showed great discrimination of character in the likenesses; and, as he painted some of the really great men of his time, his pictures are likely to be appreciated long after the works of more fashionable portrait painters are forgotten, especially of those who painted mere rank without the adjunct of greatness. He died at London in 1839, it is said at the age of 62. It should be added, that his independence was not exhibited in moroseness of manner; for, on the contrary, his manners were cheerful and bland in the highest degree; and his conversation was replete with sagacity, rich in anecdote, and always impressive from justness of thought, clearness of judgment, and undeviating veracity. He was not a member of the Royal Academy.]

[LONSING, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, was born at Brussels in 1743. He was intended for the military profession, and entered as a cadet in one of the Belgian regiments in the service of Austria, called the Walloons. Being in garrison at the citadel of Antwerp he showed a love of art, and under the patronage of Prince Charles de Lorraine, governor of the Low Countries, he frequented the academy which that prince had organized; and in 1759 obtained the principal prize, a chain of gold and a medal bearing the effigy of the Prince, with the inscription, 'Artis delineatoricæ præmium.' After this he entered the school of Martin J. Geeraerts, a distinguished painter of bas-reliefs, who had been a scholar of Theobald Michau. In this school, Lonsing made such progress that Prince Charles and Count de Cobentzel sent him to Italy, with a pension, to perfect his studies. At Rome he entered the school of Raphael Mengs, and there made acquaintance with Sir W. Hamilton, for whom, in 1772, he engraved several of the prints for the Scholæ Italicæ Picturæ. He is afterwards found pursuing his art at Paris, Lyons, and Bourdeaux: at the last-named city he died in 1799, while engaged in painting the mansion of a rich merchant there. His pictures are chiefly portraits, some of which have been engraved; his easel pictures are rare and much sought after; the major part of his works are at Bourdeaux. His general style is a mixture of the Italian and Flemish, which gives his pictures a peculiar air, differing from every other master, yet reminding the observer of the works of older date. He designed and composed with facility, disposing his groups with much intelligence, and was a good colourist. Balkema has committed an oversight in his account of this painter, in saying that he profited by the conversations held by Michau with the scholars of Geeraerts, his former pupil, whom he delighted to instruct in the principles of the Flemish school, although in his ninetieth year, and blind. Michau died in 1755, at the age of 79, as stated by Balkema himself, and by every writer of credit; Lonsing was then only 12 years old, and did not enter the school of Geeraerts till after 1759, consequently knew nothing of Michau personally.]

[LOO, PETER VAN, born at Haerlem in 1731, painted landscapes, fruit, and flowers. He commenced by painting for the florists of his native city the choicest specimens, to exhibit as signs of their periodical return, by which he acquired great truth in the representation. He died in 1784.]

[LOOFF, PETER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. He engraved some portraits, among which is one of A. Vanden Bromen. He also executed a print of Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange, drawn in a triumphal car.]

[LOON, PETER VAN, a painter of architecture and perspective, was born at Antwerp, and flourished in 1600; his pictures are very carefully finished. The year of his death is not recorded.]

[LOON, THEODORE VAN. This painter was born at Brussels in 1629. It is not said by whom he was instructed in his native country, but he went to Italy when he was young, and at Rome became acquainted with Carlo Maratti, whose style he particularly admired, and with whom he lived in habits of friendship. On his return to Brussels he painted a fine picture of the Nativity for the Abbey of Dillinghem, near that city, which gained him great reputation. In the church of St. Gery, at Brussels, there is a series of pictures of the Life and Passion of our Saviour, which are much admired; but his most esteemed performances are seven pictures of the History of the Virgin, at Aerschot, near Mechlin, which appear rather productions of the Roman than the Flemish school, and are entirely in the style of Carlo Maratti. His design is correct, and the characters of his heads noble and dignified; his colouring is excellent, though he is occasionally rather sombre and heavy in his shadows.]

[LOON, H. VAN, a Flemish engraver, who was probably a relation of the preceding artist. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he engraved some plates for a work entitled Les Forces de l'Europe, published at Paris in 1695. They consist of fortifications, plans of towns, &c., and are neatly executed.]

[LOON, _____ VAN, a painter of Amsterdam, whose subjects are birds, fruit, and flowers. He died in 1787, at the age of 60.]

[LOPEZ, JOSEF, a painter of Seville, and disciple of Murillo; he followed the style of that distinguished master, but confined himself chiefly to painting representations of the Virgin, by which he obtained great credit.]

[LOPEZ, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, scholar of el Greco, painted the magnificent picture of the Adoration of Kings, in the convent of the Trinitarians at Toledo, which bears his name, and the date 1608. He painted many others, but his reputation rests on that.]

LORCH. See LORICH.

LORENZETTI, AMBROGIO. This old painter was born at Siena in 1257, and has been incorrectly styled to have been a disciple of Giotto, from whose style he differs in design, colour, and drapery. His principal work is described by Lanzi to be a large picture in the public palace at Siena, representing an emblematical subject of the effects of a good and vicious government, and is spoken of as an ingenious production for that early period. There is a greater variety in the characters of the heads, and a superior arrangement in the disposition of the figures, than appear in the contemporary productions of the art. He died in 1340. [Ambrogio Lorenzetti was an excellent painter for the time in which he lived. Lanzi says, "had there been a greater variety in the countenances of his figures, and a superior arrangement in the composition, his picture would have been little inferior to the finest in the Campo Santo of Pisa." His brother Pietro, whom Vasari mistakingly calls Pietro Laurati, painted in conjunction with him, and was no less excellent. On a picture painted by them conjointly was inscribed, Hoc opus fecit Petrus Laurentii et Ambrosius ejus frater, 1335; and on one painted by Pietro alone, Petrus Laurentii de Senis me pinxit anno 1342. There were a great number of artists of the name Lorenzetti, natives of Siena, who flourished in the fifteenth century.]

LORENZINI, FRA ANTONIO, [GIANANTONIO,] a Bolognese painter and engraver, born in 1665, and was a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli. He is little known as a painter, as he devoted himself in the early part of his life entirely to engraving. In 1699 he was employed at Florence, in conjunction with Theodore Ver Cruys, Mogalli, and others, to engrave the pictures in the gallery of the Grand Duke. [These are sometimes found collected in a single volume under the title of "Gallery of the Grand Duke of Tuscany," of which a set containing 147 subjects, engraved on 167 plates, is described in Bohn's Guinea Catalogue, page 66, as extremely rare.] His plates are almost entirely etched, of which the following are the principal:

St. Anthony of Padua working a Miracle; after Pasinelli.

The Martyrdom of St. Ursula; after the same.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after the same.

The Ascension; after L. Caracci.

The Virgin and Child; after Ag. Caracci.

St. Dominick taken up into Heaven; after Guido.

St. Philip Neri kneeling before the Virgin; after C. Maratti.

St. John, surrounded with Angels; after Coreggio.

The Annunciation; after P. Veronese.

The Baptism of Christ; after the same.

The Raising of Lazarus; after the same.

Noah building the Ark; after Giac. Bassano.

St. Augustine, with a glory of angels; after Tintoretto.

Joseph sold by his Brethren; after Andrea del Sarto.

Joseph governing Egypt; after the same.

David with the Head of Goliath; after Guercino.

Christ, with the Disciples at Emmaus; after the same.

St. Peter delivered from Prison; after the same.

The Holy Women at the Sepulchre; after P. da Cortona.

Venus and Cupid; after Carlo Cignani.

[Nagler gives a list of 76 engravings by him. He died in 1740.]

LORENZINI, LORENZO, a modern Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1759. He engraved part of the plates from the pictures in the cabinet of the Marquis Gerini.

LORICH, or LORCH, MELCHIOR, a German engraver on wood and on copper, born at Flensburg, in the duchy of Sleswic, in 1527. His wooden cuts are executed in a bold, free style; and his copper-plates are engraved with great neatness and delicacy. His drawing of the figures is tolerably correct. He sometimes signed his prints with his name, and sometimes marked them with the monogram ML, with the date. We have the following by him :

COPPER-PLATES.

- The Portrait of Martin Luther; inscribed, Faciebat Flensburg. 1548.
 The Portrait of Albert Durer. 1550; scarce.
 Aristoteles Stagiritis Philosophus; with the cipher. 1561.
 St. Jerome at prayer. 1546.
 A Woman's Head. 1551.
 Two Portraits of the Grand Signior and his favourite Sultana; very scarce.

WOODEN CUTS.

- A Set of Prints of the Habits, Customs, &c. of the Turks; dated from 1570 to 1581.
 A Sibyl. 1571.
 A Woman standing, pressing her breasts, with a variety of animals below, with an inscription at the top, Ops Saturni conjux que Mater Deorum; dated 1565.
 A Lady in full dress. 1551.
 The Deluge; a large print, in two sheets.

[Zani says "Non ha mai inciso in Legno." He places his death in 1586.]

LORIONE. This name is affixed to a slight etching of ruins in a landscape, with several figures. It appears to be the work of a painter.

[LORME, or DE L'ORME, A. DE, a painter of interiors of churches and other public edifices. His pictures are remarkable for the delicacy of the pencilling, and the peculiar manner in which the lights are introduced and distributed. Terburg painted the figures of some of them. It is surprising that he is not better known. Zani censures, in very strong terms, an Antonio Delorme, a French designer and engraver of free subjects, who was born in 1653, and died in 1723. This artist ended his days miserably in prison. The painter was probably a native of Holland, or, at all events, a resident there; as his pictures are representations of the interiors of churches of that country, and the figures in them by known Dutch painters. He flourished about 1660.]

LORRAINE, CLAUDE GELÉE, called. This celebrated landscape painter was born at the village of Chamagne, in Lorraine, in 1600. His parents, who were very poor, put him as an apprentice to a pastry-cook. When his time was expired, he was engaged by some young artists, who were going to Italy, to accompany them in the capacity of a valet, with whom he travelled to Rome; and soon after his arrival entered the service of Agostino Tassi, a landscape painter, who had studied under Paul Brill. His occupation was to cook for his employer, and to prepare his colours. In that servile situation he had lived some time, when he was emboldened to attempt some humble efforts in design, by imitating the works of his master, in which he did not evince much natural disposition, and his progress was difficult and slow. By dint of industry and perseverance, he at length acquired sufficient ability to enable him to subsist on the produce of his labour. The love of independence redoubled his emulation, and his prosecution of his studies was indefatigable. As he was more indebted to an obstinate application than to any marked indication of natural genius, he never operated with facility, and he frequently painted his pictures several times over, before he could finish them to his satisfaction. The simple pupil of nature, he had no other instructor, and could derive no assistance from the resources of literature, as he was so ignorant as scarcely to be able to read or write. By his astonishing success, he has proved that a determined resolution to excel, will generally vanquish every obstacle which circumstances may have placed in the way, although there will always exist a limit, beyond which human intellect cannot extend without peculiar natural endowments. Thus, if Claude had attempted historical painting, or even portrait, it is almost certain his utmost assiduity would have been ineffectual, as he never could arrive at a tolerable design of the figure, although he was constant and exemplary in his attendance at the academy, to draw from the model; and so sensible was he of this deficiency, that, when the figures in his pictures were painted by himself, he was accustomed to observe, that "he sold the landscape, and gave away the figures." They are frequently introduced by Filippo Lauri or Courtois. His studies were made on the banks of the Tiber, or from the splendid prospects of the Campagna. From morning till night he was seen in the fields, contemplating, with an attentive eye, the effects produced by the sun at the different hours of the day, and the vapoury veil which air and distance throw over the various objects as they recede from the sight. These were stamped so precisely on his remembrance, that he could from memory trace them on his canvass, with a fidelity that is unexampled. His scenery is not, however, always rigidly copied from nature, it is more frequently the ideal produce of his creation, or composed from the most picturesque materials, put together with consummate art, and the most polished taste. His landscapes do not, like those of the Dutch painters, exhibit the cold portraiture of a prescribed portion of a country; he soars above the servile representation of ordinary nature, and transports his spectators into the regions of poetry and enchantment. In this point of view, Claude will ever be regarded as the first of landscape painters; and it will not be disputed, that his compositions are the richest and most studied of all those who have excelled in that branch of art. The landscapes of Gaspar Poussin, or Salvator Rosa, engage little of our time and contemplation, to run over the scanty confines of their scenery, compared with the august and boundless expanses of Claude. He presents to the beholder such an infinity of objects, and conveys him over such a "variety of hill and dale, and misty mountains," that the eye may be said to be constrained, as it wanders, to repose itself on the way. The superb temples, the lofty architecture, with which he embellished his compositions; his ample lakes, peopled with aquatic birds; the glittering lustre of his skies; the diversity of his foliage, strictly suited to each plant or tree; every object is stamped with the genuine feature of selected nature. In his pictures of morning, the rising sun dissipates the dews, and the fields and verdure brighten at the approach of day; his evening skies expand a glowing splendour over the horizon; vegetation, oppressed by a sultry aridity, sinks under the burning heat of the sun. It is thus that Claude, with an unexampled felicity, represents the vicissitudes of air and atmosphere, in which he may be said to dispute the veracity with nature herself. His marines, and magnificent sea-ports, contend for the superiority with his inimitable landscapes, in the purity and freshness of the air, and the gently undulating swell of the water, sparkling with the lucid reflection of a clear and brilliant sunshine. England has long possessed many of his most accomplished works, and since the acquisition of his celebrated pictures, formerly in the Altieri palace at Rome, and in the collection of the Duke de Bouillon at Paris, it may be confidently asserted, that we possess more of his capital works than the rest of Europe. He was accustomed to preserve in a book the drawings of the different subjects he painted, for the purpose of ascertaining the pictures he had painted for those by whom he was commissioned, and of detecting the impositions of his contemporaries, by whom his works were copied or imitated. Of these registers, which he called his Libri di Verità, six remained at his death. One of them, containing two hundred drawings, is in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire. They have been admirably engraved in the style of the originals, by Mr. Earlom. Some of his principal pictures have been engraved by Woollet, Vivares, &c. We have several etchings of landscapes and sea-ports by Claude, amounting to about twenty-eight. They are spiritedly, though not dexterously, executed, with great intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, and of an admirable effect. He died in 1682.

[The following account of the Life of Claude Gellée, called Lorraine, with some observations on his works, prefixed to the list of his pictures in Smith's Catalogue raisonné, will present the reader with more satisfactory details than are contained in the foregoing; and it is hoped will correct the absurd traditional error respecting Claude having been brought up a pastry-cook, and other inaccuracies.]

"Upwards of two centuries have elapsed since the birth of this enchanting painter, and during this long period, no successful rival has appeared to compete for the wreath of fame, he therefore stands alone pre-eminent in excellence, the admired of all beholders. A reputation so based, and so universal, can receive no augmentation from the encomiums of writers, and all that their pen can offer in the cause of such high merit, is a faithful record of the works which have so raised the artist, and thereby render still more durable his well-deserved fame.

"This illustrious painter was born in the obscure town of Chamagne, situate in the diocese of Toul in Lorraine, in the year 1600. His parents, Giovanni Gellée and Anna Podosa, had several children, of whom, according to Baldinucci, Claude was the third of five sons. Of the nature of their occupation and situation in life, no mention is made; but from the events which attended their decease, it is reasonable to conclude, that their circumstances were narrow and humble. Claude, who had only just attained his twelfth year when this calamity occurred, was under the necessity of exerting himself for his own support. Driven at this early age from his natal abode, he travelled alone and on foot to Fribourg, in order to seek the protection of his eldest brother, who was a carver or engraver in wood. Here he found a refuge, and here he first became acquainted with the pencil; it was here also that, while tracing the forms of arabesque and other ornaments, preparatory to initiation to his brother's business, the latent seeds of genius began to germinate, and he soon evinced the most decided proofs of taste for a pursuit, which he afterwards carried to such high perfection. How long he remained under the limited instruction of his brother is uncertain, perhaps not many months; but his continuance there was broken off by the arrival of a relation, a dealer in lace, and then on his journey through Fribourg to Rome. Possibly this person had some knowledge of art, and was consequently induced, by the promising productions of the young artist, to take charge of him, with a view of placing him under a suitable master, in the capital to which he was going. He, however, no sooner arrived at Rome with his charge, than some unforeseen event compelled him to quit with such haste, that he had no time to make any provision for his young relative; and the youth was again thrown on his own resources, with little money in his pocket, and neither a friend or a guide to direct him, in a strange city, and far from all his relations. In this forlorn situation, his courage never forsook him; but stimulated by a growing attachment to his profession, he applied himself with unremitting diligence, until, by dint of studying and copying such works as he could obtain, he acquired a considerable knowledge of the rudiments of the art. While thus engaged, he accidentally saw, at one of the periodical fairs, some pictures of architectural views by Godfrey Waal, which had been sent from Naples for sale: these so won his admiration, that he at once determined, if possible, to place himself under the tuition of that master, for he had hitherto seen nothing in art which so well accorded with his taste. Thus resolved, he waited with anxious impatience for the promised remittance from his relation; but, instead of the expected help, a letter arrived which gave him the mortifying intelligence, that, in consequence of heavy losses, sustained by the conquests and pillages of the Swedish armies, it was not in his power to afford him any further assistance. Notwithstanding this untoward event, Claude departed for Naples, animated with zeal, and fully determined to triumph over every difficulty. On this occasion fortune favoured him, for, on making himself known to Waal, (perhaps by the relation of a simple, unaffected tale, expressive of his attachment to the art, and admiration of his style, accompanied by an earnest look of entreaty,) he won the good will of the painter, who kindly acquiesced in his request, and instantly received him into his academy. With this master he is supposed to have remained about two years, during which time, by a close application to his studies, he became proficient in architectural painting, and the science of perspective, which he subsequently used to such advantage in his beautiful landscape scenery. His urbane and obliging behaviour gained him the esteem and respect of his instructor, who, in return, took every occasion to promote the advancement of his pupil.

"Claude now felt that this class of art, however well performed, was only a part, or adjunct to the lovely scenery around him, whose wide expanse and various beauties daily attracted his admiration; he now sighed for the power to represent in painting that which gave such intense pleasure to his eye. In order to accomplish these enlarged conceptions, he became sensible that some instruction in landscape painting would shorten the path to its attainment. Having accidentally learnt that Agostino Tassi had just arrived at Rome, he became instantly desirous of placing himself under that master, and lost no time in communicating his wishes on the subject to Waal. The favourable impression which Claude first made on his master, had, by his subsequent conduct, ripened into friendship; and it was, therefore, with regret, that Waal learnt the intention of his pupil, and with reluctance that he suffered him to depart. Although not stated by biographers, it is more than probable that he was furnished with letters of introduction to Tassi, as, on his arrival at Rome, he was most kindly received by the painter, and readily admitted into his studio. There was evidently something in the character and manners of Claude, which recommended him to the friendship and esteem of those with whom he became acquainted, and, in the present instance, Tassi soon added to the benefit of instruction, the generous offer of board and lodging in his house, and he henceforward became his familiar companion. Under such a master, combined with other advantages, the zeal and assiduity of the scholar were proportionately incited to exertion; the result was, that he successfully imbibed the style and principles inculcated, and therefore his early productions, both in composition, execution, and effect, bear a close affinity to those by Tassi.

"The happy change which he had for some time past experienced in his affairs, together with his success in his profession, made a deep impression on his mind, and under the influence of a grateful feeling for these benefits, he quitted Rome about the year 1625, in order to perform a pilgrimage to the Holy Virgin of Loretto, where he remained some days engaged in devotional meditation. From thence he departed on a tour through Italy, traversing Romagna, Lombardy, and on to Venice: here he is supposed to have remained some time, engaged in the pursuit of his profession; for there were then living at Venice many wealthy individuals of taste, who encouraged extensively the arts; there was also a school of painting to engage his leisure hours; and, lastly, the numerous beautiful palaces that might have occasionally occupied his pencil. About this period some occurrence induced him to change his original intention of returning to Rome, and, on quitting Venice, he bent his course towards his native country, taking a circuitous route, by the way of Germany, in order to see and study the beautiful scenery of the Tyrol, and other places of picturesque interest, in that direction. This journey was, however, far from being propitious, as, in addition to his being taken ill on the road, he was robbed of the little property he had, while confined to his bed; and after much delay he arrived, wearied and discouraged, at Lorraine, where he remained but a short time, and then went on to Nantes. During his residence in the latter city, he received a visit from a relation, who was also an artist, and at that time extensively engaged for the Duke de Lorraine. This person no sooner learnt that Claude was also a painter, and saw some of his productions, than he invited him to his house, and made him advantageous offers, to induce him to assist in a work he had undertaken. Claude, with some difficulty, and under certain conditions,* accepted his propositions,

* "Baldinucci gives rather a different version to this statement; for he says that 'Claude's relation introduced him to one Carlo Derwent, painter to the Duc de Lorraine, and Knight of Portugal: with this person he entered into an engagement, the conditions of which were that he should be employed to paint the figures in the several pictures, as he was anxious to improve himself in that department of the art; but long before the year was elapsed, he was compelled to paint the architectural portions of the decorations.'" and remained with him above a year, working conjointly with his relation on several pictures, most of which were of a colossal size, and done expressly to decorate the church of the Carmelites. The architectural and landscape portions of these works were by Claude.

"Claude at length grew weary of this most unprofitable employment, and resolved to seize the first opportunity to put an end to an engagement which offered so little scope to his genius, and became increasingly humiliating to his feelings. He recollected with pleasure the beautiful scenes he had quitted, and sighed to return to the soil so sacred and genial to art. His relation in vain endeavoured to dissuade him from these intentions, both by entreaty and tempting offers, but his mind was fixed on going, and each day's delay served only to augment his impatience. This resolution was somewhat hastened by an event which was near being attended with fatal consequences. Claude, while closely engaged with his relation on a scaffold, completing some work preparatory to his leaving, the erection suddenly gave way, and precipitated them both to the ground; and although they escaped any serious injury, yet the effect from fright acted so strongly on his nerves that he fainted, and on recovering, the impression on his mind of its being an evil omen was so strong, that from that moment he abandoned his work, his relation, and his country.

"He chose the route of Italy, by the way of Lyons, where, during a delay of a few days, he formed an acquaintance with some brother artists, who accompanied him to Marseilles: here his progress was impeded by a severe and dangerous fever, which, for some time, threatened his life. While thus suffering, some villain stole his box, containing the little money he had provided for his journey. This loss, like the former robbery, was so greatly counterbalanced by returning health, that the only regret he expressed was, the delay it would occasion in his return to Italy. Such, indeed, was the buoyancy of his spirits on the occasion, that he jestingly held up to his friends the only piece of money he had left, and good-humouredly observed, "this also shall go," and the same evening spent it gaily amongst his companions. This act of defiance to fortune has been practised by many, who, like Claude, were confident of their powers; and under this conviction, he rose early the following morning, and having learnt that there resided at Marseilles a wealthy merchant, who had the reputation of being a patron of the arts, he waited on him, and had the good fortune to obtain a commission to paint two pictures. These, when finished, gave so much pleasure to the amateur, that he instantly gave him an order for two more; this favour the artist civilly declined, alleging his anxious wish to depart for Italy. He accordingly embarked in the first vessel sailing for an Italian port. Here again he was doomed to experience the inconstancy of fortune, for during the voyage they were overtaken by a violent tempest, and every one on board, for some time, despaired of life; the ship, however, weathered the storm, and, after much delay, reached in safety her destination.

"Claude arrived at Rome on the day of the Feast of St. Luke, 1627, after an absence of upwards of two years. His first object was to establish himself in a suitable residence, and to prepare every thing necessary in furtherance of his profession. The news of his return rapidly spread among his friends and the amateurs of the art, and as he had previously left a favourable impression of his talents, he very soon had abundant employment for his pencil. One of his earliest patrons was the Cardinal Bentivoglio, for whom he painted two pictures; these so delighted his Eminence, that he showed them to the pope,* who commended them exceedingly, and desired to see the artist. The interview was highly flattering to Claude, and ended with an order to paint four pictures, representing the following scenes: a View of the Port of Marinella, on the coast of Tirreno; a Sea-port, embellished with noble edifices and numerous vessels; a Pastoral Scene; and an Arcadian Landscape, with Nymphs and Satyrs dancing. The production of these pictures established the reputation of the artist; for although he was little more than thirty years of age, yet they exhibited all the skill and science of an experienced master, and his works after this period rose exceedingly in public estimation. About this time he was employed by the Cardinal Crescenzi to decorate the rotunda of his palace: he was, also, similarly engaged in the Muti of the Holy Apostles, and of the Medici alla Trinità de' Monti. These were succeeded by the following engagements: the Duke of Bracciano, the Duke de Bouillon, and the Prince de Leancour, for each a picture; the Signor de Bourlemont and the Cardinal Mellini, for each five pictures; for the Cardinal Giori, seven; the Constable of Colonna, eight; for Prince Paul Falconieri he painted four; and a like number for Count Valdestain and the Prince Pamphili. He also painted, by order of Pope Alexander, for the Ghigi family, several excellent pictures, two of which are distinguished by the Rape of Europa, and a Battle on a Bridge. The fame of Claude now extended into every quarter of Europe, and commissions from the most distinguished persons, and also amateurs, poured in, much beyond his abilities to supply them. A reference to the Liber Veritatis shows that his orders were not confined to Milan, Parma, Lombardy, and Venice, but extended also to Paris, Lyons, Marseilles, Montpellier, Avignon, and Madrid. He painted eight pictures for the king of Spain, embellished with subjects taken from the Old and New Testament. He also executed two pictures for an amateur at Antwerp, and a like number for a gentleman at Amsterdam.

"Among the many pictures which emanated from his pencil, Pascoli mentions one in particular, representing a woody scene, which he painted with extraordinary care, from the choicest groups of trees in the neighbourhood of the Madama Villa and Mount Marius. This he constantly placed near his easel, as a model to work from. This beautiful study so delighted the pope, that he repeatedly offered to cover it twice over with gold, if the artist would part with it; but such was its value and importance to the painter, that he respectfully declined to do so on any terms, alleging that such a picture was not only indispensably necessary as a model to govern his own eye, but would be still more needful should he leave behind him any unfinished works. This apprehension was not without reason, for towards the middle of his life he was troubled with symptoms of the gout; as he advanced in years this painful disorder increased in violence, and at times rendered him incapable of pursuing his profession. Notwithstanding these severe visitations, his patience and good humour never forsook him, and at intervals of relief from pain, if unable to paint, his greatest pleasure was in conversing on the subject of his profession, and freely communicating his opinions on the principles and practical department of painting. On such occasions he would illustrate his observations by apposite allusions to certain of his productions, one of which was generally the woody scene above noticed; and another was Queen Esther, with her maidens, approaching the palace of Ahasuerus. When surrounded by his particular friends, he took great delight in recounting the events of his youth, the struggles and privations endured in his boyhood, and the difficulties and dangers he had experienced in his maturer years; he would dilate on the tricks which had been imposed on him, and the insidious snares he had escaped. Some, who had pretended to be his friends, would often visit him while painting, with a view of borrowing his ideas and compositions; they would afterwards imitate his works, and then sell them secretly under his name: thus they deceived the amateur, and robbed him of his reputation.

"In order to prevent a practice so injurious to himself and others, he determined in future to make drawings of every picture he painted, and to record on them the names of the persons for whom they were done, and the places to which they were sent.† This precaution was still further rendered necessary by the frequent applications from persons possessing spurious pictures, which they continually sent him to be identified, having purchased them as his productions. The enemies of his fame and prosperity, being thus checked, and their designs frustrated, spread a report that he now rarely wrought with his own hands, but employed a clever youth of the name of Giovanni Domenico, a cripple, whom he had compassionately taken into his service to grind his colours, and attend upon him while painting. His enemies, at length, carried their malice so far as to suborn this servant, who, instead of requiring a kind master with gratitude, lent himself to their machinations, assumed an air of importance, and demanded payment of a suitable salary for the thirty years he had been with him, not as a servant, but in the capacity of an assistant.

"Claude, who had throughout a long life scrupulously avoided every kind of litigation, and patiently submitted to many provocations, determined, in the present instance, in order to avoid the trouble and vexation of a process at law, to comply with the unjust claim of the ungrateful domestic, and he therefore paid him his demand. This event, together with others of a trivial nature, tended greatly to disturb the calm and peaceful disposition of the artist, and embittered many hours of his latter days: the gout also, which had been an occasional visitor for nearly forty years, now increased in virulence, and, although at intervals he continued to paint, even to a very late period of his life,‡ he at length sunk under a severe attack of this disease, attended with acute fever, and died on the 21st of November, 1682.

† "This curious compilation, known under the appellation of the Liber Veritatis, consists of two hundred drawings, done in bistre, occasionally heightened with white. After the decease of the artist, they became the property of his heirs, and were sold by one of his nephews, for two hundred scudi, to a Frenchman, who took them to Paris, and offered them to the king; the purchase being declined, they were shortly after bought by the late Duke of Devonshire, and they now adorn the magnificent mansion of his Grace at Chatsworth. Richard Earlom has most admirably imitated them in mezzotinto."

‡ "The dates on pictures show that, notwithstanding his infirmity, he painted a great number between the years 1670 and 1680."

* Urban VIII.

"Claude added to a kind and amiable disposition, an unimpeachable moral character, and this feeling he extended even to the subjects which embellish his pictures.

"He was a well-proportioned person, about five feet eight inches high, with a strongly-featured countenance, a prominent nose, a high forehead, black eyes and hair, with whiskers of a similar colour. His expression was grave, tending to severity.

"It might be supposed, from the liberal encouragement he experienced in his profession, that he would have left considerable wealth to his successors: this, however, was not the case, for the sum total of his property did not exceed 10,000 scudi; and this, together with the whole of his effects, he bequeathed equally to three of his nephews, for whom, as well as other relations, he had ever shown a warm regard. To this feeling of affection towards his necessitous relations may be attributed the smallness of the residue of his property.

"A very brief knowledge of the works of Claude Lorraine must convince the amateur, that the superlative beauty and excellence which most of them exhibit, could only have been the result of the most indefatigable study, governed by great taste and genius; for, however admirably they represent nature, it is a question whether any picture by his hand was a faithful transcript of the scene from whence it was taken. His works may therefore be considered combinations of beautiful objects, borrowed from the inexhaustible source of nature, and exhibited under the most lovely forms and alluring medium.* If the scene represents the early morning, when 'Aurora with her rosy fingers unbars the gates of day,' the hemisphere is suffused with light and heat, and all nature visibly feels their influence; the mists are seen dispersing, and the cooling freshness of the dawn of day is yielding to the absorbing rays of the rising luminary; the soft zephyrs appear to agitate in gentle ripples the surface of the lucid streams, and to breathe in whispers among the foliage of the surrounding groves. Either the shepherd is there seen leading his flocks and herds to pasture, or the goddess Diana, with her attendants, sallying forth to the chace. Every period of the day, with all its elemental vicissitudes, has been successfully embodied by his magic pencil, and even the gorgeous splendour of a summer's evening, with all its dazzling brightness, was not beyond the reach of his master-hand.

"Architecture appears to have been, from an early period of his life, a favourite branch of the art; for this, he evidently possessed a refined taste and a ready invention, and he lost few opportunities of showing his predilection for such objects whenever his scenes permitted it. Palaces, temples, and other noble edifices, or the ruined remains of such structures of Greek or Roman origin, are appropriately introduced, whether the picture exhibit sea-ports or inland scenes, and these are composed with so much skill and apparent propriety, that it is easy to imagine they once had an existence at some glorious era of the Greek or Roman states. This illusion is still further heightened by the representation of some event from sacred or profane history, poetry, or romance, which accords (with some few exceptions) with the style of the buildings and the nature of the scenes depicted.

"Claude is reported to have taken much pains, by frequenting the academy, in order to acquire a correct knowledge of the drawing of the human figure; but although he succeeded sufficiently well not to offend the eye, even of the critic, he was so sensible of his defect, that he would sometimes jocosely say, that he sold the landscapes and gave his figures into the bargain. His deficiency in this department was sometimes supplied by Filippo Lauri, Courtois, or Jan Miel.

"The pictures by Claude bear visible evidence that they are the result of much thought, deliberation, and cultivated taste. In their execution, both patience and elaborate care are equally manifest. His best works are painted throughout with a full body of colour, and a liberal use of ultra-marine. He appears to have commenced his operations entirely in grey, in which that valuable colour is freely used; so that when the super colours in the completion of the work are applied, the silvery hues beneath contribute greatly to the atmospheric effect, which constitutes one of the chief charms in his pictures. It is also worthy of notice, that the same careful attention to the details is as observable in the half tones, shadows, and distances, as in the more prominent and luminous parts. Above all, the high quality of his genius is best discovered, in the selecting of objects of the most pleasing forms, tastefully grouping them together, so as to produce, by the various combinations, a scene replete with the most enchanting beauties. Such are the productions of this inimitable artist."

[In Smith's Catalogue raisonné, part viii., will be found a descriptive account of upwards of 400 of Claude's landscapes; their sizes; the prices at which they have sold in various sales; the names of those who formerly had them in their collections, and of the present possessors.—These and many other particulars relating to the works of this Prince of Landscape Painters, there recorded, will be found the best history the amateur can have recourse to for information on the subject.]

LORRAINE, JOHN BAPTISTA, a French engraver, mentioned by Basan, who lived about the year 1760, and engraved some plates of portraits, and other subjects.

LORRAINE, LOUIS JOSEPH DE, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1715. He was a scholar of Dumont. He went to Petersburg, where he chiefly distinguished himself as a painter of theatrical decorations. He engraved some prints from his own designs, and the following after J. F. de Troy.

The Judgment of Solomon.
Solomon sacrificing to the Idols.
Esther before Ahasuerus.
The Death of Cleopatra.

LOTEN, JOHN. This artist was a native of Holland, but he came to England in the reign of Charles II., where he resided several years, and died in London about the year 1680. He painted landscapes, and particularly excelled in representing dark oaken groves and glades, land-storms, and waterfalls. He was generally very cold in his colouring, and his landscapes are for the most part too dark. But he was well acquainted with the principles of the chiaro-scuro; and there is a gloomy grandeur in his pictures, which interests the specta-

* "Sir Joshua Reynolds, in his Discourses, observes, that Claude Lorraine 'was convinced, that taking nature as he found it seldom produced beauty. His pictures are a composition of the various drafts which he had previously made from various beautiful scenes and prospects.'"

tor. They are usually of a large size, and are painted in a free, bold style. [It is uncertain whether he was a native of Holland or Switzerland, or whether he was baptized John or Jacob: in England he has always been called John. His style of painting is correctly described in the text. He is quite original; his scenery is English, and his pictures would be entitled to a high rank, if it were not for the faults above noticed. Time has increased the bad effect. It is generally believed that he died in 1681.]

LOTTI, or LOTH, GIOVANNI CARLO. This painter was born at Munich in 1632. Zanetti states him to have been a scholar of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, who died before he was born. He appears, however, to have formed his style by studying the works of that master, to which they bear a similar character, of a vigorous colour, and a striking contrast of light and shadow. He studied some time at Venice, under Cavaliere Pietro Liberi; but instead of following the cheerful and agreeable style of that painter, he aimed at the robust and effective manner of Guercino. He was invited to Vienna, where he painted several historical subjects for the imperial collection. He painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Venice, of which one of the most admired is the Death of St. Joseph, in the church of St. Chrysostom, a grand composition, and finely coloured, though rather dark in the shadows. Lanzi mentions his picture of the Death of Abel, in the Florentine gallery, as one of his best performances. He died in 1698. [Balkema places his birth in 1611; in which he is not supported by any writer of authority.]

LOTTO, LORENZO. This painter was born at Bergamo about the year 1490, and, according to Tassi, was instructed in the rudiments of the art by Andrea Previtali at Bergamo, and afterwards studied at Venice, under Giovanni Bellini. On leaving the school of that master, the grander principles of Giorgione, and the harmony of his colouring, attracted his admiration, and he became the professed imitator of his style. Less resolute in his touch, and less glowing in his tones, he equals him in the truth of his carnations, the copious cast of his drapery, and perhaps surpasses him in the choice and elegance of his forms, and in the beauty and expression of his heads. His principal works are at Bergamo, Venice, and Recanati. Ridolfi particularly applauds his celebrated picture in the church of St. Bartholomew at Bergamo, which he distinguishes by the title of Maravigliosa. It represents the Virgin and Infant, with St. Stephen, St. Sebastian, and St. Dominick. In S. Spirito is another admired picture by Lorenzo Lotto, representing the Madonna and Bambino, with St. John embracing a Lamb, designed with such simplicity and grace, that, Lanzi observes, would not have been greatly surpassed by Raffaello or Coreggio. He died old at Loretto in 1560. [Lorenzo Lotto varied his manner according to the master under whom he studied, or whose works he admired. "These different influences appear in the different pictures of the artist. Thus one in the Museum at Naples, inscribed with his name, is in the style of Bellini's school; another in the Pitti palace inclines to the Milanese, (L. da Vinci,) and others to the Venetian manner."—Küglcr.]

[LOTYN, JEAN, a native of Brussels, was a flower painter employed a long time by Queen Mary of England, after whose death he returned to his native city, where he died.]

LOUTHERBOURG, PHILIP JAMES DE. This ingenious artist was born at Strasburg about the year 1734. He was the son of a miniature painter, who afterwards established himself at Paris, where his son was placed under the tuition of Francesco Casanova, and on leaving the school of that master became a very popular painter of battles, huntings, sea-pieces, and landscapes, with figures and cattle, in which last he at that time appears to have imitated the charming style of Nicholas Berghem. His works were universally admired, and in 1763 he was made a member of the Academy of Painting at Paris. Though he met with very flattering encouragement, he soon afterwards quitted France, and settled in London, where he passed the remainder of his life. Soon after his arrival in England he was employed to make the designs for the scenes and decorations of Drury Lane Theatre, and in that province of the art he discovered extraordinary ability for several years.

Besides a great variety of easel pictures, which were generally esteemed, Mr. de Louthembourg occasionally employed his talents on a larger scale, in commemoration of the most remarkable events of the time, and of the achievements of British valour. Among these, perhaps the most popular were his pictures of the Review of Warley Camp, now in the King's collection, Lord Howe's Victory of the First of June, and the Siege of Valenciennes.

When Mr. Macklin projected his publication of the Bible, Mr. de Louthembourg was engaged to exercise his powers as an historical painter; on which occasion he painted two pictures, representing the Angel destroying the Assyrian Host, and the Universal Deluge; the latter was considered as his best performance in that department.

As an artist, Mr. de Louthembourg exhibits an uncommon example of the possession of faculties directly opposed to each other. In his landscapes, and indeed in his performances in general, he is not less remarkable for the most admirable dexterity of hand, and the most captivating facility of pencil, than for a seductive, though a meretricious gaudiness in his colouring, which is too frequently in opposition to the chaste and sober tinting of nature. The readiness with which he composed and executed his pictures could scarcely fail of betraying him into the foibles of a mannerist. Individual parts of his pictures are frequently uncommonly fine; but, either from an inattention to or an ignorance of the best principles of the chiaroscuro, there is often a want of generality in the effect, which is frequently scattered and fluttering, and we look in vain for that tempered harmony in the whole, which distinguishes the most admired productions of the art.

Mr. de Louthembourg was a member of the Royal Academy of London, and resided the latter part of his life at Chiswick, where he died, in 1812.

[With regard to the year of Louthembourg's birth the reader will have ample room for choice. Five different writers have given five different dates; they are as follow: 1728, 1730, 1734, 1740, 1741. As Louthembourg, like his friend Cosway, was a believer in Judicial Astrology, he may have varied the date of his birth from time to time to suit his whimsical speculations. His works are generally known by the gaudiness of their tints; but some of his sea-coast scenes are excellent. It may be of service to amateurs to inform them that there are many of his subjects multiplied by a body of artists, who associated some years back for the purpose of imposing on the public a spurious article called Polygraphic Painting. These pictures, with a little assistance from other knaves, pass with the ignorant for originals. He also published some aquatinted etchings of soldiers, marine subjects, and landscapes; among the last, The Four Times of the Day, the paintings of which were also Polygraphed.]

LOUUMENT, FRANCIS DE, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. He is said by Florent le Comte to have resided some time in Italy, at the time when Francis de Poilly studied at Naples. He engraved several plates after the Italian masters; among which are the following:

The Stoning of Stephen; after P. da Cortona.

St. Francis Xavier interceding for the Persons afflicted with the Plague; after Ciro Ferrri.

He also engraved from Lanfranco, Solimenei, and others.

LOUYS, or LOYS, JOHN, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1600. He was a pupil of Peter Soutman, at the time when Suyderhoef studied under that master. His style resembles that of his instructor, and is chiefly dotted in the carnations. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy.

Louis XIII., King of France; after Rubens.

Anne of Austria, his Queen; after the same.

Philip IV., King of Spain; after the same.

Elizabeth of Bourbon, his Queen; after the same.

Francis Thomas of Savoy, Prince of Carignan; after Vandych.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Resurrection of Lazarus; a fine copy, from the print by J. Lievens.

Diana and her Nymphs reposing after the Chace; after Rubens.

The Interior of a Dutch Kitchen; after Ostade.

Peasants amusing themselves; after A. Both.

A Dutch Kitchen; after W. Kalf.

[LOWRY, WILSON, a very eminent English engraver, so excellent in the department he pursued, that the mechanical perfection to which he carried the art excited general admiration. He was an apprentice to John Browne the landscape engraver, and first began in that line, though few of the plates bear his name, having been executed for other artists, whose fame they contributed to exalt. He engraved most of the plates on mechanical subjects in Rees's Cyclopædia, Crabbe's Technological Dictionary, the Philosophical Magazine, and other works of a like kind. His mathematical knowledge of drawing, his deep researches in the laws of mechanics, his extensive acquaintance with physics and the general properties of matter and form, combined with the correctness of an eye that never erred, and a hand that could not deviate, highly qualified him for such works. Some of the finest specimens of his abilities, as an architectural engraver, are to be found in the plates of Murphy's Batalha, Nicholson's Architecture, the print of the House of Commons at Dublin, and Gandon's designs. This estimable man died in 1824, leaving a son and daughter, inheritors of his talents, whose highest praise will be, when their names are recorded in some future Dictionary, that they sustained the honour devolved on them from such a father.]

LOYER, ———. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints, he engraved some plates of architectural subjects from the designs of Dumont; [also after Marieschi, Bernini, and others.]

LUBIENETSKI, THEODORE, a Polish painter and engraver, born at Cracow in 1653. He was instructed in design by Jurian Stur, a painter of Hamburg; from thence he went to Amsterdam, where he became a scholar of Gerard Lairese. On leaving that master he went to Italy, and resided some time at Florence, where he was particularly patronized by the Grand Duke. On his return to Germany he was invited to the court of Berlin, and was made painter to the Elector of Brandenburg, and director of the Academy. He painted history and landscapes in the style of Lairese. He etched a set of six grand landscapes and figures, inscribed Th. de Lubienetzki, fecit. 1698. He died in 1716. [Zani says he died in 1720.]

LUBIENETSKI, CHRISTOPHER, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Stettin in 1559. After receiving some instruction in design, with his brother, from J. Stur, he accompanied Theodore to Amsterdam, where he entered the school of Adrian de Backer, and followed the style of that master, both in history and portraits. In 1706, he returned to Poland, where he died about the year 1719. [Füssli says he died in 1729; Zani, in 1731.]

LUBIN, JAMES, [OR JACQUES,] a French engraver, born at Paris in 1637. From the resemblance his style bears to that of Gerard Edelinck, he is supposed to have been a pupil of that able artist. Though very inferior to his instructor, his prints possess considerable merit. We have, among others, the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Armand John du Plessis, Cardinal de Richlieu.

John Peter Camus, Bishop of Belley.

John Papire Masson, celebrated advocate.

Vincent Voiture, of the French Academy.

Peter Corneille, Dramatic Poet.

Olivier Patru, of the French Academy.

Robert Arnauld D'Andilly.

John Baptist Colbert, Minister of State.

[And many others; particularly 38 portraits in Perrault's "Hommes illustres de France,"]

SUBJECT.

The Entombing of Christ; after Le Sueur.

[The exact time of his death is not known, but he was living in 1694.]

LUCAS, OF LEYDEN. See LEYDEN.

LUCAS, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He engraved, in a very neat style, several plates of architecture, for the collection of Views of Versailles, published by P. Menant. He had a son who engraved, but his prints are not specified.

[LUCASZ, PIERRE FRANÇOIS, born at Malines in 1606, was a scholar of Gerard Seghers; he painted landscapes ornamented with small figures, which he designed and touched with great superiority. He was patronized by the Arch-duke Leopold, for whom he painted a great number of pictures. He died in 1654. The portrait of Phidippe, a Flemish sculptor, in the Museum at Brussels, is by him.]

LUCATELI, or LOCATELLI, PIETRO. This painter was a native of Rome, and was a disciple of Pietro da Cortona. He painted history, and, according to Orlandi, was employed for some of the public edifices at Rome, particularly the church of St. Agostino, and the Collegio Fuccioli. He flourished about the year 1690, in which he was received into the Academy of St. Luke. [He was born in 1660, and died in 1741.]

[LUCATELLI, or LOCATELLI, ANDREA, a Roman landscape painter, whose pictures are analogous to those of Orrizonte, flourished at the same period as that artist, and occasionally worked in conjunction with him, and with Marco Ricci, and Paolo Pannini. This circumstance is mentioned in consequence of the confused accounts that are given by different writers respecting the dates of his birth and death. Both are confounded with those of Pietro Lucatelli. The date of his birth, 1696, as given by Zani, appears to be too late, as it is certain he painted with the above-named artists, and that of 1660 would be the likely period if it were not assigned to Pietro; and also the time of his death, 1741, which is given to that artist also. It is, however, likely that Pietro and Andrea mean one and the same painter. Lanzi says, "Andrea Lucatelli, a Roman, whose talents are highly celebrated in every inferior branch of the art. In the archbishop's gallery at Milan are a number of his pictures, historical, architectural, and landscapes. In these he often appears original in composition, and in the disposition of the masses; he is varied in his touch, delicate in his colouring, and elegant in his figures, which he was also accustomed to paint in the Flemish style, separate from his landscapes." He then mentions other painters of that period (1686—1690) then at Rome; among them Peter van Bloemen, the brother of Orrizonte, who painted battles and what are called Bambocciate; and says, "in Rome, and throughout the ecclesiastical state, we find many pictures of this sort by that Lucatelli who has been mentioned among the landscape painters. The connoisseurs attribute to him two different manners; the first good, the second still better, and exhibiting great taste, both in colouring and invention." Many of his landscapes are in England; they are considered of the decorative class, blending the manners of Francesco Mola, occasionally, with that of Van Bloemen, called Orrizonte; with less of depth than the former, and more of freedom than the latter. They represent Arcadian scenes, and are, sometimes, very beautiful. They do not obtain high prices in commerce, but they deserve to be better appreciated, especially those on which he has bestowed care in the finishing.]

LUCHESE, IL. See RICCHI.

[LUCENA, D. DIEGO DE, of an illustrious family of Andalusia, was a scholar of Velasquez, and imitated that master in his portraits, both large and small; he acquired great credit for that of the poet Pantaleón, who repaid him with a sonnet. He died young in 1650.]

LUCENSIS, or LUCHESE, MICHAEL, an Italian engraver and printseller, who resided at Rome about the year 1550. He engraved some prints, after Michael Angelo, Raffaelle, and Polidoro di Caravaggio, which he usually marked with the monogram MF.

LUCESINO. See TESTA.

LUCINI, ANTONIO FRANCESCO, a Florentine engraver, who flourished about the year 1646. He was a contemporary of Stephen della Bella, and engraved some plates in the style of that master, and copied some of his prints. He usually marked his plates with the cipher FLF. We have by him, among others, a copy of della Bella's print of the Festival on the Arno.

LUGRENCELSIS. This name is affixed to a bold, spirited etching of a Bacchanalian subject, in the style of Benedetto Castiglione. It is inscribed, Lugrenceles inc. et scul.

LUIKEN. See LUYKEN.

LUINI, or LOVINI, BERNARDINO. The name of this painter, as signed by himself on his pictures, is Lovini. He was born at Luino, a small town in the Milanese, on the Lago Maggiore, about the year 1480, and is generally considered as a scholar of Lionardo da Vinci, of whose style he was the most celebrated imitator. The Padre Resta, in his Galleria Portatile, asserts, that Luini did not visit Milan until after the departure of Lionardo in 1500; and that he was a student under Stefano Scotto. This is however contradicted by the Abate Bianconi, in his Guida di Milano, a better authority, by whom he is numbered among the disciples of Lionardo. It is impossible for one artist to approach nearer to the style of another, than Luini does to that of da Vinci; the same taste in his composition and design, the same peculiarity of colour and extraordinary relief; and it requires an intimate acquaintance with the works of Lionardo, to discriminate between them. His two pictures, of Mary Magdalene, and St. John embracing his Lamb, in the Ambrosiana at Milan, can hardly be called inferior to the works of Lionardo, in the suavity and beauty of his pencil, and the piety and feeling of his expression. To form a just idea of the powers of Luini, it would be necessary to contemplate his series of pictures of the Life of the Virgin, at Saronno, in which our Lady is represented with a beauty, dignity, and modesty which resemble the works of Raffaello. Of his fresco paintings, in which he was not less distinguished, the principal are, the Saviour crowned with Thorns in the Collegio del S. Sepolero; and the choir of the Monistero Maggiore at Milan. He was living in 1530. [It is probable that Luini was born at an earlier period than that above mentioned, as in a picture with the date 1525 he has introduced his portrait as that of an old man. Neither is the year of his death accurately ascertained. The picture in the English National Gallery representing Christ disputing with the Doctors, attributed to Lionardo da Vinci, is, in the opinion of very competent judges, a work of Luini; much of its original beauty is destroyed by unfortunate repairs. There is no positive proof that he was a scholar of Lionardo, though it is obvious that he made him his model. His fame would have been greater in foreign countries had his works less resembled those of that celebrated master. Every possessor of a picture by Luini readily attributes it to Lionardo da Vinci, because the name regulates the estimation. Several of his best pictures have been engraved by eminent modern Italian engravers, which will diffuse a better knowledge of him than formerly prevailed. In Luigi Bossi's "Guida di Milano," there is an account of many pictures, in fresco and in oil, painted by B. Luini, in the churches of that city.]

LUINI, AURELIO, was the son of Bernardino Luini, born in 1530. When Lomazzo published his Trattato dell' Arte in 1584, Aurelio Luini was considered one of the most eminent artists at Milan. His best performance is his picture of the Baptism of Christ by St. John, in the church of S. Lorenzo. It is painted in the style of Bernardino, but is greatly inferior in the expression of the heads, and in the design and relief of the figures. He died in 1593.

LUINI, TOMMASO. This painter was born at Rome about the year 1597. He was of Venetian parentage, and, according to Baglioni, painted history with some reputation during the pontificate of Urban VIII. He attached himself to the style of M. Angelo Caravaggio, and his pictures are distinguished by a bold and striking contrast of light and shadow, so much in the manner of that master, that he acquired the name of il Caravaggino. His best works at Rome are, his picture of S. Filippo Benizi working a Miracle, in the church of S. Maria in Via; and a Flight into Egypt, in S. Giuseppe. He died at Rome, at the age of 35.

LUMLEY, GEORGE. We have several portraits, &c. engraved in mezzotinto by this gentleman, who was not an engraver by profession, but an attorney, and resided at York, about the year 1720; where he lived in habits of intimacy with Francis Place.

LUNARDUS, ———, an old engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1520. He executed some cuts of frontispieces and book ornaments in a spirited and masterly style, which appear to be from his own designs.

[LUNDENS, GERRIT, or GERARD, a Dutch painter of interiors and conversations in humble life. There are no particulars of his life recorded; but from the style of his pictures, which resembles that of several Dutch artists who flourished from 1650 to 1670, and painted interiors, with boors merry-making, it may be conjectured that he lived about that period. His pictures were for a long time confined to Holland, and were admitted into good collections; of late years several have been imported by English dealers, and rank with the productions of Jan Molenaer, and others of that class.]

LUNGHI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Bologna, about the year 1685, and was a scholar of Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole. He painted historical subjects with some reputation, of which the principal are in the churches at Bologna. In S. Maria Madalena, is a picture of Christ appearing to Magdalene; and in S. Bartolomeo, an altar-piece representing S. Rita. He died in 1757. [Zani says he was born about 1677, and he marks him BB.]

LUTI, CAVALIERE BENEDETTO. This painter was born at Florence in 1666, and was for some time a scholar of Ant^o. Domenico Gabbiani. On leaving that master, he was favoured with the patronage of the Grand Duke; and expressing a strong desire to visit Rome, his protector promoted his wishes by supplying him with the means, and accommodated him with apartments in his palace in the Campo Marzio. He was desirous of studying under Ciro Ferri, but on his arrival at Rome, he had the affliction of being informed of the death of that master. He did not have recourse to any other instructor, but applied himself diligently to study the works of the different masters, and formed to himself a style, which without exactly resembling that of any other master, was distinguished by elegance of design and suavity of colour, together with an intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro. We have to regret that this able artist should have occupied so much of his time in crayon painting, so transient in its nature, as he possessed powers formed for nobler exertions. One of his earliest works at Rome was his picture of the Death of Abel, which was publicly exhibited on the festival of St. Bartholomew, when it excited universal admiration, by the sublimity of the composition, and the characteristic expression in the head of the murderer. He was commissioned by Clement XI. to paint his fine picture of the Prophet Isaiah in St. John of Lateran, and other works, who conferred on him the order of the Cross. Among his most admired works at Rome may be noticed his St. Anthony of Padua, in the church of the Apostles, and his Magdalene, in S. Caterina da Siena, at Monte Magna Napoli. The portrait of Benedetto Luti, by himself, is in the gallery at Florence, where he is regarded as the last painter of the Florentine school. He died in 1724. We have two etchings by this artist, which are become scarce:

The Crucifixion, with St. John and Magdalene at the Foot of the Cross.

A Landscape; after Guercino.

[LUTMA, ABRAHAM. There is an engraved portrait of Rubens, after Van Dyck, by this artist, but there is no account of him.]

LUTMA, JANUS or JOHN, a Dutch engraver and goldsmith, born at Amsterdam about the year 1629. We have by this artist a set of four portraits represented as antique busts, which are executed in a peculiar manner, with a punch or chisel, and a mallet, which he calls opus mallei. Fine impressions of these plates are extremely scarce. They are as follow:

The Portrait of his Father; Janus Lutma, Posteri fuit; opus mallei per Janum, fec.

His own Portrait; Janus Lutma Batavus, per se opere Mallei. 1681.

J. Vondebus. Olor Batavus. Opus mallei, per J. Lutma.

P. C. Hoofi. Alter Tacitus. Opus mallei, per J. Lutma.

We have also by him two portraits, engraved in the style of Rembrandt, which are scarce, and highly esteemed, viz.

Joannes Lutma Aurifex. It is the portrait of his father in a furred robe, holding a port-crayon in one hand, and his spectacles in the other; signed Joannes Lutma Junior, fecit Ao. 1656.

Joannes Lutma Junior. He is seated at a table drawing, with a large hat, which throws a shadow over the face; this portrait is extremely scarce.

He also engraved some views of ruins, &c. in a style executed with the point, and assisted with the mezzotinto tool, one of which represents a Fountain, with Statues, and the Trajan Column; dated 1656.

LUTMA, JAMES. This artist was of the same family as the preceding engraver. He etched and finished with the graver a set of plates of ornamental shields and foliage; they are executed in a neat style, from the designs of John Lutma the elder. He also engraved a plate of three portraits in a frame, inscribed, Jan Lutma d'Oude, inv. Jac. Lutma, fecit aqua forti, et exc.

LUTTEREL, HENRY, was born in Dublin about the year 1650. He came early in his life to London, and was bred to the law, in New Inn; but having a disposition for the arts, he abandoned the profession, and applied himself to painting portraits in crayons. He possessed an inventive mind, and observing the admiration excited by the new art of engraving in mezzotinto, he was desirous of discovering the process, and contrived the means of laying the grounds with a roller, which succeeded to a certain degree, but not to his satisfaction. At this time, the mezzotintos of Blooteling were in great repute, and Lutterell persuaded his friend Lloyd, a printseller, to bribe a person of the name of du Blois, who used to lay the grounds for Blooteling, and who was then returning to Holland, to discover the mystery. He afterwards connected himself with Isaac Becket, and they became the earliest English engravers in mezzotinto. The best of his portraits, which were his principal works, was that of Le Piper the painter. We have also the following by him:

The Duchess of Cleveland; after Lely.
 Arthur, Earl of Essex; after the same.
 Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury; after Greenhill.
 William, Viscount Stafford; after his own design.
 Ben Hamet.
 Robert Cony, M. D.

[LÜTZELBURGER, or LEUTZELBURGER, HANS, called also HANS FRANK, an early Swiss wood engraver, of Basle, about whom much has been written, but as yet little is known. He lived in the early part of the 16th century, and is supposed by some to have cut the blocks of the celebrated "Dance of Death," attributed to Hans Holbein. This supposition is founded on the facts of his being contemporary with Holbein, and of one of the cuts being marked H. L. This is maintained by some writers, and combated by others, especially by Zani, in his "Enciclopedia metodica delle belle Arti," and Rumohr, in his work entitled "Hans Holbein der Jüngere in seinem Verhältniss zum Deutschen Formschneitwesen" (Hans Holbein the younger, in his relation to German wood engraving). There are many other celebrated old cuts, singly and in sets, some from drawings by Holbein, which are attributed to Lützelburger, and which are described at length in the "Kunstblatt," and in the works of Bartsch, Heller, Massman, and other writers on wood engraving. The views of all parties are stated with considerable detail in Dr. Nagler's "Neues Allgemeines Künstler-Lexicon."]

LUYKEN, JOHN. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1649. He was a scholar of Martin Zaagmoelen, and for some time applied himself to painting, but not succeeding to his expectation, he turned his thoughts to engraving, in which he became a very eminent artist. He usually engraved after his own designs, and discovers a fertility of invention, and a facility of execution, which procured him the title of the Callot of Holland. This honourable appellation he has, however, not so much merited by the neatness and spirit of his point, as from his crowding his compositions with an infinite number of figures. His prints, notwithstanding, possess considerable merit. His principal work is the set of plates he engraved for the Bible published by Mortier, in two volumes. [Only a few of the plates of the so called "Mortier's Bible" are by Luyken, but there is another series published by Mortier and Covens, consisting of 62 very elaborate engravings of important occurrences recorded in Bible history, the whole of which are by him, and exhibit uncommon powers of invention and freedom of execution. There is an article in Bohn's new Catalogue mentioning upwards of 900 engravings, all bearing the name of this most ingenious and indefatigable artist.] We have also the following by him:

A set of ten plates of the Commandments.
 Seventeen plates for the History of Finland.
 Seventeen plates for the Voyages orientaux de M. Thevenot.
 One hundred and five plates for the History of the Martyrs.
 The Prophet Jonas preaching to the Ninevites.
 The Assassination of Henry IV. of France.
 The Massacre of St. Bartholomew; in two sheets.
 A great variety of emblematical subjects, fairs, public ceremonies, book ornaments, &c.

[He died in 1712.]

LUYKEN, GASPAR, was the son and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Amsterdam about the year 1670. His prints are very inferior to those of his father, and consist chiefly of book-plates, in which he was almost entirely employed. Among others, we have the following by him:

Twelve plates of the Months of the Year.
 Four, of the Seasons.
 St. Francis Xavier preaching before the Emperor of Japan.
 The Miracle of the Loaves.

LUZZO, PIETRO, DA FELTRO. See MORTO DA FELTRO.

[LYS, or LIS, JAN VANDER, born at Breda in 1600, was a scholar of Cornelius Poelemburg, whose manner he imitated so successfully that many of his pictures are attributed to that master; the connoisseur, however, can discriminate them. He painted historical subjects, landscapes, and conversations; some of which he engraved. He is supposed to be the same as Gio. Lutz, after whom Mogalli engraved the subject of Abraham about to sacrifice his son Isaac. He died in 1657.]

M

MAAN, or MAN, CORNELIUS DE. This artist was born at Delft in 1621. He was instructed in the rudiments of the art by an obscure painter, and having a strong inclination for travel, he went to Paris when he was very young, where he met with sufficient encouragement to supply him with the means of extending his journey to Italy, which was the ultimate object of his wishes. He travelled through Lyons to Lombardy, and made a stay of two years at Florence, where he executed some considerable works for a nobleman, who was desirous of retaining him longer, had not his anxious wish to visit Rome prevailed over the flattering offers which were made to him. Arrived in the metropolis of art, he was indefatigable in his studies, and by the most assiduous application, during a residence of three years, he became an able and correct designer. He afterwards went to Venice, where the works of Titian, particularly his portraits, were the chief objects of his attention. He at length returned to Holland, after an absence of nine years, and established himself in his native city, where he distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits, in the latter of which he particularly excelled. One of the most admired paintings at Delft, is a large picture, by C. Maan, of the portraits of the most eminent medical characters of his time, painted for the hall of the surgeons, which has more of the attributes of the Venetian than the Dutch school. He died in 1706. [Brulliot, who erroneously calls this artist Charles, says he engraved several portraits approaching the manner of Jean Morin, which are marked with the same cipher, but always accompanied with the syllable an.]

MAAS, or MAES, ARNOLD, was born at Gouda in 1620, and was a scholar of David Teniers the younger. He painted, with considerable success, similar subjects to those of his instructor. Village festivals, wakes, and merry-makings, are the subjects of his pictures, which are ingeniously composed, and touched with neatness and spirit, though infinitely inferior to those of his charming model. Aspiring to a higher department of the art, he visited Italy, for the purpose of studying the works of the great historical painters. After residing a few years at Rome, he returned to Holland, and died soon after his arrival. M. Descamps asserts, that he etched some plates, and was instructed in engraving by Renier Persyn; but I have never met with any of his prints, nor is he mentioned as an engraver by any other authority. [He is mentioned as an engraver by Zani. Balkema says he died in 1664.]

MAAS, or MAES, DIRK, or THEODORE. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1656. After studying some time under Henry Mommers, he became a scholar of Nicholas Berghem, whose works were in the highest estimation; but by a singular capriciousness of disposition, was induced to leave that admirable painter, to place himself under John van Huchtenburg, the battle-painter, whose style he afterwards followed with considerable reputation. He studied, with great attention, the design and anatomy of the horse, and drew that animal in all its various attitudes with surprising correctness. He painted battles, skirmishes, huntings, and horse-fairs; and his pictures were ingeniously composed, and touched with an intelligent and spirited pencil. He visited England in the reign of King William, where he met with some encouragement, and, among other works, painted the Battle of the Boyne, for the Earl of Portland, of which there was a print engraved in two sheets. We have a few very spirited etchings by this artist: among which is a Cavalier on Horseback; fine, and scarce. [He died in 1715.]

MAAS, or MAES, P. By this artist, who was probably a relative of Dirk Maas, there is an etching, in a slight but spirited style, of the Virgin and Child, with two angels, which appears to be the work of a painter. It is inscribed, P. Maas, fecit, in aqua forti. [Peter Maes flourished about the year 1578. There are prints by him, copied after Henry Goltzius, with his name in full, Pierre Maes. Bruliot also gives his monogram with the dates 1577 and 1578, one of which is on a portrait of Mary Queen of Scots. Zani must have seen some of his prints, as he quotes him operating in 1577.]

MAAS, or MAES, NICHOLAS, was born at Dort in 1632, and after being instructed in the rudiments of design by an obscure artist in his native city, he went to Amsterdam, where he entered the school of Rembrandt. Under that master he became an excellent colourist, and on leaving his academy, distinguished himself as a painter of historical subjects of a small size, which, in richness of tone and harmony of effect, approached the admired works of Rembrandt; but finding portrait painting a more profitable pursuit, and possessing a surprising facility, he adopted that branch, in which he became one of the most successful artists of his time. He died in 1693. [Nicholas Maes in some of his larger portraits approximates to Rembrandt, but still there are great characteristic differences. The handling of Rembrandt is peculiar to himself; Maes in many respects shares with others. The vigour of his portraits and the brilliant effect of the colour, make them very attractive; they are, however, to be distinguished from those by Rembrandt, by his manner of bringing out the principal features of his subjects by means of broad masses of shadow, in which a blackish tone generally predominates, and which he managed with considerable skill, without any appearance of heaviness. There are some of his finest cabinet pictures in England, among which may be mentioned two in the National Gallery, The Idle Servant, bequeathed by the late Richard Simmons, Esq.; and a Girl seated by a Cradle, in which there is a Child asleep: The Milk-Maid, in the possession of Charles Brind, Esq.; two in the collection of the Duke of Wellington; and one in the Royal Collection; and others of great excellence in the possession of Ralph Bernal, Esq., Mr. Wells of Redleaf, Mr. Robarts, and other gentlemen. As his compositions are not numerous, (Mr. Smith, with all his research, specifies only 45 in the Catalogue raisonné and Supplement,) and are chiefly in public collections, or in the cabinets of opulent persons, they now obtain large prices whenever they appear in sales, and fine specimens are really deserving of it. He signed his name N. MAES, not MAAS.]

MAAS, or MAES, GODFREY, an eminent painter of the Flemish school, born at Antwerp in 1660. He was the son of an indifferent painter, by whom he was taught the elements of design; and it does not appear that he had the advantage of superior instruction. He was, however, envired by the chefs-d'œuvre of Rubens, Vandyck, and the other distinguished artists of his country; and by an assiduous study of them, aided by a decided disposition for the art, he became one of the most celebrated historical painters of his time. The churches in the different cities of the Netherlands bear ample testimony of his ability; but it is at Antwerp that he is seen to the greatest advantage; though surrounded with the works of the many able painters who had preceded him. In the cathedral of that city is a fine picture by this master of the Death of St. Lucia; and in the church of St. George, is his celebrated altar-piece, representing the Martyrdom of that saint. In the church of the hospital is a picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, composed and painted in the great style of Rubens. In 1682, he became a member of the Academy at Antwerp, on which occasion his picture of reception was an emblematical subject of the liberal arts, which is one of the admired pictures of their hall. His compositions are ingenious and copious, his design more correct than is usual in the works of the Flemish painters, and, like the generality of his countrymen, he was an excellent colourist. [It is supposed that he died about 1722. There were many other artists of the name of Maes, but the foregoing are the principal. There are several now flourishing in Holland whose names will do credit to some future Dictionary.]

MABUSE, or MALBEUGIUS, JOHN DE. This extraordinary artist was born at Maubeuge, a small town in Hainault, according to Harms, in the Chronological Tables, in 1492, M. Descamps says, in 1499. Both these dates are, however, erroneous, as he was in England in the reign of Henry VII., whose portrait he painted, with that of Prince Arthur, who died in 1502. He was a contemporary, and nearly of the same age, with Albert Durer, who was born in 1470. It is no where mentioned by whom he was instructed, but he had the advantage of studying in Italy, and was one of the first artists of his country who attempted to reform the dry, stiff style that prevailed before him. His works were of sufficient merit to excite the curiosity and to obtain the applause of Albert Durer, and Lucas of Leyden, both of whom visited him, and expressed the most marked admiration of his works. To appreciate the extraordinary merit of John de Mabuse, it is necessary to have seen his genuine pictures, instead of the wretched remnants of Gothicity which are frequently ascribed to him. His colouring is fresh and clear, his design as correct as that of Albert Durer, and much in the style of that master; and his pictures are of a finish so precious and polished that they are not surpassed by the surprising productions of Mieris and Gerard Douw. One of his admired works was a picture of the Descent from the Cross, painted for a church at Middleburg, which was considered one of the most surprising productions of the age. His most capital and distinguished performance was a picture painted for the altar-piece of the church of the Abbey at Grammont; it represents the Wise Men's Offering, a composition of several figures, admirably grouped, with a fine expression in the heads; and the draperies, and ornamental accessories, coloured and finished in the most beautiful manner. It appears by the register of the Abbey, that this admirable production occupied the painter seven years, and that he was paid two thousand golden pistoles for his labour. When Albert and Isabella were governors of the Netherlands, they purchased it of the monks, and placed it in the private chapel of their palace. After the death of Prince Charles of Lorraine, it was sold, with the rest of his pictures, and was afterwards brought to this country. It is now in the possession of the Earl of Carlisle. We are informed by Karel van Mander, that John de Mabuse visited England, which is proved by the various portraits which remain by him in this country of the royal family and the nobility. Among others, there is at Windsor a picture of Arthur, Prince of Wales, with Prince Henry, and the Princess Margaret, which is engraved by Virtue. It appears that he died in 1532, from an inscription on a print of his portrait, published by Galle, Pvnt Hanno patriâ Malbodensis; obiit Antwerpiae anno 1532. His death is dated by M. Descamps in 1562. [The family name of Jan de Mabuse was GOSSAERT, or GOSSARD. By the general concurrence of all writers of authority he was born between 1496 and 1500; but even allowing the chronological tables to be correct, it is quite improbable that he should have painted the portraits of Henry VII. of England and his family in 1495, the date which one of the portraits bears. Indeed there is no authentic account of his ever having been in England; Fiorillo emphatically denies it. He was the boon companion of Lucas van Leyden, who was born in 1494; and his name is affixed to a picture with the date 1516, the earliest that is known with his signature. Some of his best pictures are dated about 1521, and 1527 is the latest discovered. As he led a life of dissipation, it probably was a short one; the date on the print is therefore likely to be correct, that he died in 1532. He signed two of his pictures thus: JOHANNES MELBOGIUS PINGEBAT, 1516; JOAES MALBOGIUS PINGEBAT, 1521. He is entitled to all the praise bestowed on his genuine works; and, if what is recorded of his course of life be true, to the severest censure for his general depravity.

Pictures by, and attributed to, Jan de Mabuse.

1. Neptune and Amphitrite. This picture is signed Johannes Malbodius pingebat, 1516. In the Royal Museum at Berlin.
2. Danaë receiving the Shower of Gold. This picture is signed Joannes Malbodius pingebat, 1527. In the Pinacothek.
3. Justice, drawing of the figure of a Female in a circle. In the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.
4. Lucretia, a picture mentioned by Karel van Mander.
5. Adam and Eve, formerly in Charles I.'s collection, and now, or lately, at Kensington Palace.
6. Adam and Eve, mentioned by K. van Mander, formerly at Amsterdam.
7. Adam and Eve, near the Tree of Knowledge. In the Musée at Berlin.

8. Noah drunk and asleep. The figures are imitations of the fresco of Michelangiolo in the Sistine chapel.
9. Abimelech offering Presents to Abraham; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.
10. The Visitation, right wing only, at Althorp.
11. Adoration of the Shepherds, in the royal chateau at Wurzburg.
12. Adoration of the Magi, a rich composition, with about thirty principal figures. This is one of the most important works of Jan de Mabuse. It was formerly in the Orleans gallery, and is now at Castle Howard.
13. Adoration of the Magi, (probably by Mabuse,) in the gallery at Dresden.
14. The Holy Family. Mary and Anne are seated on a throne, surrounded by their relations of both sexes. In the Pinacothek.
15. The Virgin and Child, on a Throne, St. Joseph, St. Catherine, and another Saint, who is offering a Pear to the Virgin. At Corsham House, if it has not been sold recently.
16. The Virgin, Child, and St. Joseph. In the chapel St. Maurice, at Nuremberg. Another of the same subject, formerly in the Boisserée collection, in which Christ extends his hand to take an apple. This has been lithographed by Heindel.
17. Holy Family. In the Pinacothek.
18. The Virgin. A picture mentioned by Karel van Mander.
19. The Virgin and Infant under a Gothic Canopy, surrounded by six angels. In the collection of Sir Thomas Baring.
20. The Virgin holding the Child on her Knees, who has his hands full of Cherries; after a composition of L. da Vinci. At Berlin.
21. The Virgin offering a Grape to the Child. At Berlin.
22. Mary holding the sleeping Child to her Breast. In the style of Mabuse. At Berlin.
23. Mary holding the Child on a Cornice. In the chapel St. Maurice, at Nuremberg.
24. Mary holding the Child on a Cornice, on which she is seated; the picture is signed Johannes Malbodius pingebat, 1527. In the Pinacothek.
25. The Virgin seated in a Niche, holding the Infant on her Knees. At Vienna.
26. The Virgin on a Throne. In the ducal palace at Genoa.
27. Mary, with the Child seated on a Throne, in the form of a shell, with two Saints and a third person. The Archduke Charles, at Vienna.
28. Mary, with the Child asleep on her Knees. Engraved by G. Wyna.
29. Mary seated, the Infant standing. An engraving with the date 1589.
30. Jesus with the Rich Young Man. In the palace at Kensington.
31. Christ led out from before Pilate. A grisaille, in the collection of the councillor Kirschbaum, at Munich.
32. The Crucifixion, a picture containing a great number of figures. In the lower part, in a separate compartment, is seen the flagellation, and the crowning with thorns. In the Pinacothek.
33. Descent from the Cross. Formerly at Middelbourg, but destroyed by fire. Vasari mentions it: "di sua mano in Silando è una gran tribuna nella badia di Middelborgo."

34. Descent from the Cross, mentioned by Karel van Mander.
35. Descent from the Cross; on the wings are St. John the Baptist and St. Peter, in the middle of rich architecture. This picture formerly ornamented the church of St. Donat at Bruges, and was afterwards in the possession of Mr. Edward Solly, of London; it is signed Joas Malbogi pingebat, anno 1521.
36. Christ at the house of Simon the Pharisee; the middle part of a triptique. In the Museum at Brussels.
37. The Resurrection of Lazarus; the left wing of the preceding. In the Museum at Brussels.
38. Resurrection of the Magdalene; right wing of the same. In the Museum at Brussels.
39. The Dead Body of Christ, surrounded by three men and two women; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles.
40. Mary seated at the foot of the Cross, with the body of Christ extended on the ground and supported by her knees; in the distance is the city of Jerusalem. An engraving which bears the following inscriptions: Joan. Mabustus inventor. Hieronymus Wierinx (Wierix?) sculpsit; Gerardus de Jode excudit.
41. Christ in Glory, with the symbols of the four Evangelists. In the Pinacothek.
42. Twelve subjects from the Life of St. Augustine. Collection of the king of Holland. These form one picture, the subjects being separated by ornaments.
43. The Pope reading the Mass, surrounded by Cardinals and Priests. In the church of St. James at Lubeck.
44. Jesus appearing on the Altar, while a Priest is consecrating the Host. A very rare engraving; in the possession of the Chevalier Van Eersel.
45. Bust of St. Jerome; middle of an altar-piece. At Althorp.
46. The Decollation of St. James, en grisaille. Formerly at Amsterdam, according to Van Mander.
47. St. John the Baptist; one of the wings of a folding picture, formerly in the church of St. Donat, at Bruges, and afterwards in the collection of Mr. Edward Solly, at London.
48. The Archangel Michael. In the Pinacothek. Lithographed by Strixner in 1821.
49. The Apostle St. Peter, formerly in the church of St. Donat, at Bruges, afterwards in the collection of Mr. Edward Solly.
50. The legendary Tale of Albanacht presenting his three daughters naked to King Alfred; a drawing in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.
51. Portrait of the Mother of Henry VIII.; at Corsham. Waagen believes it to be of the time of Holbein.
52. Marriage of Henry VII. with Elizabeth of York; attributed to Mabuse.
53. The Three Children of Henry VII.; at Hampton Court; attributed to Mabuse.
54. A repetition of the same; at Kensington.
55. A copy of the same; at Corsham House.
56. Francis and Maximilian Sforza, dukes of Milan; left wing of a triptique; at Althorp.
57. Portraits; formerly in the gallery at Whitehall.
58. At Lee Priory there were formerly some pictures attributed to Mabuse.
59. A small painting in one of the armouries, in the library of the Vatican.

Many others have been cited by writers, but in such general terms that it is impossible to specify them; nor would it be safe to affirm the authenticity of all above quoted: the reader, however, has as good a list as can be obtained.]

MACCHI, FLORIO. According to Malvasia, this painter was a native of Bologna, and a worthy disciple of Lodovico Caracci. He flourished about the year 1620, and painted several pictures for the churches at Bologna. In S. Andrea del Mercato, is a picture by him of the Crucifixion, with two laterals; and in la Morte, the Raising of Lazarus. But his most admired work is his fine fresco of the Annunciation, in the church of Il Spirito Santo, which has been frequently mistaken for a work of Lodovico. Florio Macchi is mentioned by Orlandi, in the Abecedario, as an engraver, but his prints are no where specified.

MACCHIETTI, GIROLAMO, called DEL CROCISSAJO. This painter was born at Florence in 1535. He was called del Crocifissajo, from his father being a carver of crucifixes. After studying some time under Michele Ridolfo del Ghirlandajo, he became a scholar of Giorgio Vasari, whom he assisted for six years in the works he executed in the ducal palace at Florence. He afterwards visited Rome, where he studied two years. On his return to Florence, he acquired considerable reputation by his two pictures of the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Lorenzo, and the Martyrdom of S. Lawrence, in the church of S. Maria Novella. His best works are at Naples, Pisa, and Benevento. Lanzi asserts that he resided some time in Spain.

MACÉ, or MASSÉ, CHARLES, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1631. He was employed by M. Jabach to make designs from his celebrated collection of drawings, and to etch them. The set consists of two hundred and eighty prints, engraved by this artist, in conjunction with the two brothers Corneille, Rousseau, and Pesne. M. Huber attributes to Macé a set of twelve etchings from landscapes, with biblical subjects, after Benedetto Castiglione. They are executed in a bold and free style. [It is not certain that his name was Charles; the prints engraved by him in the Jabach collection are marked Massé only; some of the etchings after Castiglione have C. Macé sculp. in the margin. For an account of 123 prints by him, see Dumesnil, tom. vi.]

MACERATA, GIUSEPPINO DA. This painter was born at Macerata about the year 1600, and is said to have been a disciple of Agostino Caracci. His style exhibits the principles of that school, as is evident in his works in the two colleges at Fabriano; of the Annunciation, painted in oil, at S. Niccolo; and his frescoes, in S. Venanzio, representing some of the miracles of the Apostles; which are distinguished by the fine expression of the heads, and the grand style of their composition. In the church of the Carmelites at Macerata, is a picture by him of the Virgin and Infant, with a glory of angels, and S. S. Nicola and Girolamo; and at the Cappuccini, Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter; both of which are stamped with the character of the school of the Caracci. The latter is so nearly the composition of Guido's picture of the same subject, in the church of the Filippini at Fano, that it may almost be considered as a copy. It is signed, Jos. Ma. fariabat. 1630.

[MACHÈREN, PHILIP VAN, a marine painter, who lived at Middelbourg towards the end of the 17th century. In 1672 he entered one of the vessels of war of the republic, for the express purpose of seeing a naval combat, a subject which he delighted to represent. He also made several voyages in Danish and Swedish vessels for the same purpose. His works are rarely seen with his name, nor are there any further particulars recorded of him, except that Balkema says he died at Amsterdam, and Immerzeel, at Rotterdam.]

[MACHUCA, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, sculptor, and architect, who is spoken of in high terms by several writers, but whose works as a painter are but little known. It is said that he lived at Grenada, and that he executed several grand works in that city both as an architect and painter, and that the latter were in the manner of Raphael, whose works he had studied in Italy. It is certain that he had been to Italy; for he is named among the Eagles, that is to say, the most illustrious artists of the time, by François de Hollande, who knew him there, and whose book respecting ancient painting was finished in 1548. Zani says he operated between 1527 and 1548; probably to a much later period. Pachecho, Lazaro Diaz del Valle, and Palomino, all speak of Machuca having been in Italy. His fame now rests on his works of sculpture and architecture in the Alhambra.]

MACOURT, C. According to Lord Orford, this artist was a native of Germany. He resided in London several years, where he practised portrait painting, both in oil colours and miniature, and was a member of the Chartered Society of Artists, with whom he exhibited, from the year 1761 till 1767. In the Addenda to the Anecdotes, he is said to have died in January, 1768. He is also stated to have engraved some plates in mezzotinto.

MACRET, CHARLES FRANCIS ADRIAN, a modern French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1752, and died at Paris in 1783. He was a pupil of N. G. Dupuis, and engraved a few plates in a neat, pleasing style. Among others, we have the following by him :

Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after Vanderwerf.

The Arrival of Rousseau in the Elysian Fields; after Moreau.

The Reception of Voltaire in the Elysian Fields; after Flauvel.

The Sacrifice to Cupid; after Greuze.

The First Fruits of Self-love; after Gonzalez.

MADDERSTEG, MICHAEL. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1659, and is called by Houbraken the ablest scholar of L. Backhuysen. His sea-pieces and storms approach so near to the pictures of that master, in the forms of his vessels, the movement of the waves, and the lightness of the skies, that they are sometimes mistaken for those of Backhuysen. He was invited to the court of Berlin, where he passed the greater part of his life. He died in 1709.

MAENNL, JACOB. See MANNL.

MAES. See MAAS.

MAFFEI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Vicenza, and a scholar of Santo Peranda, though he afterwards became a follower of the style of Paolo Veronese. He flourished about the year 1640, and painted history with considerable reputation. He is accused by Boschini of extravagance and manner, and is styled by that author "a painter of giants;" but there appears in his works an originality of design, accompanied by a grace, which acquit him of the accusation of being a mannerist. His picture of S. Anna, in the church of S. Michele at Vicenza, and other works by him in the public palace, exhibit a poetical fancy, and are coloured in the best style of the Venetian school. It is to be regretted that he adopted a hasty and slight mode of finishing his pictures, little calculated to preserve his reputation to posterity, as many of them have already become nearly obliterated. Of his large picture of Paradise, in the church of S. Francesco at Padua, scarcely a trace remains.

MAGANZA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, the ELDER, was born at Vicenza in 1509, and was the head of a family of artists, who did credit to their country. He was brought up in the school of Titian, whose style he followed with some success. He was more distinguished as a painter of portraits than historical subjects; but in the few he has left, he evinced a chaste and refined taste. He was one of the reputable poets of the day, and published several works under the name of Magagno. He died in 1589.

MAGANZA, ALESSANDRO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Vicenza in 1556. After receiving some instruction from his father, he became a scholar of Giovanni Antonio Fasolo, and studied the works of Paolo Veronese and Zelotti. His principal works are the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Domenico; and the Martyrdom of S. Giustina, in S. Pietro; at Vicenza. He died in 1630, aged 74. [According to Füssli and Zani he died in 1640, which would make him 84.]

MAGANZA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, the YOUNGER. This artist was the son and scholar of Alessandro Maganza, born at Vicenza in 1577. He painted history in the style of his father; to whom he showed himself little inferior in his picture of S. Benedetto, in the church of S. Giustina at Padua. He assisted Alessandro in many of his principal works at Vicenza, where he died of the plague in 1617.

MAGGI, GIOVANNI. This artist was a native of Rome, and flourished about the year 1600. He painted landscapes and architectural views, but is more known as an engraver than a painter. In 1618 he published a set of plates of the principal fountains in Rome, engraved in conjunction with Domenico Parasachi. He had undertaken to engrave the plan of Rome, on a very large scale, with all the principal buildings; but from the want of encouragement he was not able to carry his object into execution. We have by him the following prints :

A Landscape with Ruins and a Waterfall, with figures; J. Maius, in. et fec. 1595.

Figura della Vita humana; Joh. Maius, fec. 1600.

The Portrait of a Cardinal; as large as life.

[The time of his death is uncertain. Brulliot says he was born in 1566, and Füssli that he died in his fiftieth year. One must be incorrect; for if born in 1566 he would have been 52 in 1618.]

MAGISTRIS, SIMONE DE. This artist was a native of Caldarola, in the ecclesiastical state, and flourished about the year 1585. He distinguished himself as a painter and sculptor. His picture in the dome at Orsino, representing St. Philip and St. James, painted in 1585, evinces a better style of composition than dexterity in the execution. The works he produced at Ascoli, at a more advanced period of his life, particularly his Madonna del Rosario, in S. Domenico, are highly applauded by Orsino in his Guida d'Ascoli.

MAGLIAR, ANDREA, an Italian engraver, born at Naples about the year 1692. He engraved some plates after Francesco Solimene.

MAGLIAR, GIOSEFFO, was the son of the preceding artist, by whom he was instructed in engraving, and gave unusual promise of ability, but died very young. He engraved a plate representing Christ appearing to S. Guglielmo; after Solimene.

MAGNANI, CRISTOFANO. This painter was born at Pizzichitone, a castle in the vicinity of Cremona, and was a scholar of Bernardino Campi. He flourished about the year 1580, and painted history and portraits with no little reputation. He is said to have possessed so retentive a memory, that he could draw the likeness of any person he had once seen, of a most correct resemblance. He painted some considerable works in fresco, in conjunction with Cavaliere Malosso and Mainardi.

MAGNASCO, ALESSANDRO, called LISSANDRINO, was born at Genoa in 1681, the son of Stefano Magnasco, an obscure painter, who had been a scholar of Valerio Castelli. He studied at Milan, under Filippo Abbiati, and though he painted on a smaller scale, and different subjects from those of his instructor, he acquired the boldness and spirit of his touch. He painted public processions, military exercises, and subjects called by the Italians Bambocciate, and is styled by Lanzi the M. A. delle Battaglie of the Genoese school. There are several of his pictures in the Palazzo Pitti at Florence, where he resided some time, and was particularly patronized by the Grand Duke Gio. Guastone. He died in 1747.

[MAHUE, GUILLAUME, born at Brussels in 1517, and died at the same city in 1569, was a portrait painter of great reputation in his time; his pictures are rare, and we have no particulars of his life.]

MAILLET, JOSEPH. This artist was a native of France, and flourished at Paris about the year 1775. He engraved several plates of landscapes, which are executed in a neat style.

MAINARDI, ANDREA, called IL CHIAVEGHINO. This painter was a native of Cremona, and flourished from the year 1590 till 1613. He was brought up in the school of Bernardino Campi, and was one of his ablest disciples. In conjunction with his nephew Marc Antonio Mainardi, he executed several considerable works at Cremona. One of his best pictures is the Marriage of S. Anna, in the church of the Eremitani; a performance which would do honour to any school, in the beauty of the forms, the splendour of the vestments, and the pleasing and harmonious tones of its colouring; a more intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro would have left little to be wished for. Unfortunately for his fame, he did not always bestow upon his works equal care and attention; and some of them appear to have been the production of negligence and haste.

MAINERO, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was born at Genoa about the year 1610, and was a disciple of Luciano Borzone, under whom he made a rapid improvement, and at an early age distinguished himself by the production of some historical subjects, of a small size, which were greatly admired. Notwithstanding this encouraging success, he abandoned historical painting, and applied himself to portraiture, in which he was employed by the principal persons of his time. He died of the plague in 1657.

MAJOLI, or MAJOLA, CLEMENTE, was born at Ferrara about the year 1640, and studied at Rome under Pietro da Cortona. He was a reputable painter of history, and some of his pictures in the churches at Ferrara, and in the Rotundo at Rome, are mentioned in very favourable terms. In the church of S. Paolo, at Ferrara, is a picture of S. Maria Maddalena dé Pazzi; and in S. Giuseppe, S. Niccolo da Tolentino, supported by an angel.

MAJOR, ISAAC, a German painter and engraver, born at Frankfort about the year 1576. Early in his life he went to Prague, where he became a scholar of Roland Savery, at that time painter to Rodolphus II. He was instructed in engraving by Giles Sadeler, in whose style he engraved several plates, though very inferior to that artist. In the execution of his prints he united the point with the graver. We have by this artist the following:

A set of six Landscapes, Views in Bohemia; after P. Stephani.

A set of nine romantic Views, numbered; Isaac Major, fec.

A very large Landscape, with the figure of St. Jerome; after Roland Savery. Isaac Major, scul. Vienna. 1622.

The Emperor in a Triumphal Car, with Swans and Eagles; inscribed Itē Triumphalis felices, &c.

MAJOR, THOMAS, an eminent English engraver, born about the year 1715. He resided some years of the early part of his life at Paris, where he engraved several plates after Berghem, Wouwerman, &c. On his return to England, he distinguished himself by a variety of plates of portraits, landscapes, and other subjects, executed in a neat, firm style. In 1768, he published a set of twenty-four prints, entitled The Ruins of Pestum, otherwise Posidonia, in Magna Græcia, after the designs of J. B. Borra. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

John Carteret, Earl of Granville. 1757.
Cardinal Pole.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Departure of Jacob; after F. Lauri.

The Good Shepherd; after Murillo.

Two Landscapes; after Gaspar Poussin.

A Landscape, with a Man driving Sheep; after Rubens.

Two Flemish Festivals; after Teniers.

The Manege; after Wouwermans.

The Travellers; after N. Berghem.

Two Landscapes; Morning and Evening; after the same.

The Four Seasons; after Ferg.

A View near Haerlem; after Vander Neer.

A Sea-port; after Claude.

A View of Ponte Mole, near Rome; after the same.

[On some of his prints after Berchem, and Arnold Maas, he has put his name in an anagram, Jorma, or Jor, sculp.]

MAIR, an old German engraver, who flourished about the year 1499. From the resemblance of the style of his engraving to that of Martin Schoen, it has been conjectured that he was his disciple. His design is equally Gothic; but he is very inferior in every respect to that master. He is said to have been the inventor of that species of engraving called chiaro-scuro. Among others, we have the following prints by him, which are generally signed with his name, and dated about the year 1499:

Samson carrying the Gates of Gaza.

The Wise Men's Offering.

The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian.

A Man talking to a Woman, seen through the door of a house, with a Dog snarling at a Monkey.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Anne.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Joseph holding a Candle; in chiaro-scuro.

[Bartsch mentions only 12 prints by this engraver, and one doubtful: among them are but two of the foregoing list.]

MAIR, ALEXANDER, a German engraver on wood and on copper, who flourished about the year 1660, and chiefly resided at Augsburg. We have by this artist some book-plates and frontispieces, executed with the graver in so masterly a style, that it is to be regretted an engraver of such talents should not have been employed on more important subjects. He engraved the Frontispiece to Vesler's Dissertation on the Antiquities of Augsburg, published in 1596, and that of the Uranometria, by John Bayer, dated 1603. He usually marked his plates with the cipher A.

[MAIR, ——— LA, a painter of serpents, lizards, and other reptiles, in the manner of Otho Masseur, or Marcellis, as he is frequently named. He particularly excelled in the representation of butterflies; and his works are generally attributed to Massens, but they are painted on a lighter ground. Neither the year of his birth or death is known, but he lived at Nimeguen in the eighteenth century.]

MAISON-NEUVE, a modern French engraver, mentioned by Basan. He engraved the French Parnassus, from a bronze, and several portraits; among which is that of Jacques Theodore Klein.

MATRE, ROUX. See Rosso.

MALAGAVAZZO, CORIOLANO. This painter was born at Cremona about the year 1555, and was a disciple of Bernardino Campi, whom he assisted in some of his great works in the church of S. Gismondo. He is more known as the coadjutor of that eminent artist than by any original productions of his own. His principal work is his picture in the church of S. Silvestro, at Cremona, representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. Francis and St. Ignatius, which, according to Lanzi, is supposed to have been designed by Bernardino.

MALEUVRE, PETER, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1740. He was a pupil of Beauvarlet, and visited London, where he was for some time under Sir Robert Strange. On his return to Paris he engraved some portraits, and other subjects, in a neat style. We have, among others, the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden.
Count d'Aranda.
M. d'Alembert.
M. de Lalande.

SUBJECTS.

The Dozer; after Craesbeck.
 The Satyr and the Peasant; after Dietrichy.
 The Spoiled Child; after Greuze.
 A Sea-storm; after Backhuysen.
 Boors regaling; after Brouwer.
 The Bath of Diana; after Marillier.

MALINCONICO, ANDREA. This painter was born at Naples about the year 1600, and was one of the ablest scholars of Cavaliere Massimo Stanzioni. Of his fresco works little is known, but, according to Dominici, the churches at Naples abound with his oil paintings, particularly in that of de Miracoli, of which the most esteemed are the Four Evangelists, and the Doctors of the church. These are, however, very superior to the generality of his works, which are not unfrequently slight and negligent.

MALLERY, CHARLES DE, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1576. From the neatness of his style, it is probable that he formed his manner from the prints of the Wierixes, or that he was instructed by them. He worked entirely with the graver in a highly finished style, though his drawing is not very correct. He must have been extremely laborious, as his prints are very numerous, and all of them executed with the greatest delicacy. The Abbé de Marolles possessed three hundred and forty-two prints by him. Vandyck painted his portrait among the celebrated artists of his time, which is engraved by Lucas Vorsterman. The following are his principal prints:

The infant Jesus, with two Angels, in a landscape; C. de Mallery, fec.

The Adoration of the Magi.

The Holy Family, with Mary Magdalene.

St. Francis.

Several Heads of Christ, the Virgin, Saints, the Apostles, and other devotional subjects; from his own designs, and after Anthony Salaert, and other masters.

Part of the plates of the great Huntings; after Stradan: engraved in conjunction with the Collaerts, the Galles, and others.

The History of the Silkworm; in six plates; after Stradan.

A set of plates of Horses, for a book, entitled La Cavalerie Française. 1602.

Four plates of the Miller, his Son, and the Ass; after Ambrose Franck; scarce.

MALLERY, PHILIP DE. According to Professor Christ, this artist was a native of Antorf, in Germany. He engraved several small historical subjects on copper, which were well executed, and were published about the year 1650.

MALO, VINCENT, was born at Cambray about the year 1625, and was first a disciple of Rubens. After the death of that celebrated master he became a scholar of David Teniers the elder, who had been brought up in the same academy. He afterwards went to Italy, where he passed the remainder of his life, and distinguished himself as a painter of battles and landscapes; and also painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Genoa. He died at Rome about the year 1670.

MALOMBRA, PIETRO. This painter was born at Venice in 1556, and was a scholar of Giuseppe Porta, called Salviati. Although an imitator of the works of Palma, he avoided the feebleness of a mannerist. His compositions and design are more studied and correct than is usual in the works of the Venetian painters. Such are his pictures of the miracles wrought by St. Francis of Paula, in the church dedicated to that Saint, at Venice. He is still more admired in his historical subjects of an easel size, and painted with great success architectural views of the principal places in Venice, enriched with groups of numerous figures, ingeniously composed, and designed with elegance and grace. He was also a distinguished portrait painter. He died in 1618.

MALOSSO. See Trotti.

MALTESE, an indifferent painter of fruit, flowers, and still-life, whose works have little more to recommend them than a spirited touch and a forcible effect. [He was called Francesco Maltese from the place of his birth, Malta. He was by no means an indifferent painter. His pictures represent the objects faithfully; his handling is large and vigorous, his colouring bold and striking; he excelled in painting carpets and musical instruments. Two of his pictures are in the gallery at Munich; and there are some in England. He lived about 1670, or later, but there are no particulars of his life recorded.]

[MALTON, THOMAS, an English designer and engraver, was born in 1748. His "Treatise on Perspective in Theory and Practice," and his "Picturesque Tour through London," are well known. He published also aquatinted plates of many of the public buildings of the metropolis, among which are, The (old) Royal Exchange, The Bank, Royal Academy, Banqueting House, Guildhall, Mansion House, the church of St. Paul, Covent Garden, Old and New Palace Yard, and other places, the memory of which would be lost through the recent alterations and improvements, were it not for his accurate representations of them as they appeared in his time. The date of his decease is not correctly ascertained.]

MAN, CORNELIUS. See MAAN.

MANAIGO, SILVESTRO. This painter was born at Venice about the year 1680, and was a scholar of Gregorio Lazzarini. He possessed a fertile invention, and his compositions evince both genius and taste; but the love of gain seduced him into a rapidity and negligence of operation, and he fell into the tameness and repetition of a mannerist. His most creditable work is his picture of Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple, in the church of S. Felice, at Venice.

MANASAR, DANIEL, a German engraver, who resided at Augsburg about the year 1626. He engraved chiefly plates of architecture, plans of buildings, &c., which are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat but stiff style. Conjointly with Wolfgang Kilian, he engraved the plates for a work entitled Basilicæ S. S. Udalrici et æfræ Augustæ Vindelicorum Historiæ, published at Augsburg in 1626. His prints are usually marked with the initials of his name, with an F. for fecit, D. M. F.

MANCHETTI, MICHELE. According to Dominici, this painter was born at Genoa about the year 1550, and studied at Naples, under Marco di Pino, where he acquired some reputation as an historical painter. One of his best works was a picture in the church of S. Agnello at Naples, representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. John, Mary Magdalene, and St. Lucia; painted in 1586.

MANDER, KARL VAN. See VANMANDER.

MANDYN, JOHN. This artist was born at Haerlem in 1450. He painted drolleries and incantations, in the manner of Jerome Bos. His chief residence was at Antwerp, where he died. [Mandyn, Mandin, Madyn, Madin, (for so his name is written by different authors,) Jan, was born at Haerlem, and painted grotesque subjects, in the manner of Jerome Bos, conflagrations, and landscapes of rocky and wild appearance. Balkema says he was born in 1450, and died in 1568, thus making him 118 years old. Immerzeel says he was born in 1568, and that he instructed Bartholomew Spranger. Spranger was born in 1546, so that is not likely to be correct. Füssli places his birth in 1450, and says that he died at Antwerp, but does not mention in what year. He says nothing about Spranger on this occasion, but in his account of that artist he states that he was instructed by Johann Mandyn. Let those who can, reconcile these discrepancies of writers of credit. Jerome Bos, it should be noted, was born in 1470, and died about 1530, so that Jan Mandyn, though his senior by twenty years, may have imitated his subjects from a similarity of taste; or it may be that Bos made Mandyn his prototype, and went beyond him in devilry. Zani says that Mandyn died in 1500; others say in 1510.]

MANENTI, VINCENZIO. This painter was born at Canimorto, in the province of Sabina, in 1600. He was the son of Ascanio Manenti, an obscure artist, by whom he was instructed in the first principles of design. He afterwards studied at Rome, under Giuseppe Cesari and Domenichino. There are several of his pictures in the churches of his province; and Lanzi speaks favourably of his S. Stefano, in the dome at Tivoli, and his S. Saverio, in the church of Il Gesu. He died in 1674.

MANETTI, RUTILIO. This painter was born at Siena in 1576, and was a scholar of Francesco Vanni. He did not, however, attach himself to the graceful style of that master, but sought the vigorous colouring and robust character of M. A. Caravaggio. His pictures at Siena are remarkable for a tenebrosity which destroys the just equilibrium of light and shadow, by which illusion is essentially supported. This deficiency is the more to be regretted, as he possessed a correct design, and his ideas are neither mean nor ignoble. He was well versed in architecture; and in some of his best works reminds us of Guercino. There are several of his pictures at the Certosa at Florence, and in the churches at Pisa, among which is particularly admired a Riposo of the Holy Family, in S. Pietro di Castelvecchio. He died in 1637, aged 66. [According to Zani, Manetti was born in 1571, and died in 1639, which would make him 68 years old; Füssli says he died in 1639, at the age of 69; it is quite clear that Bryan was either wrong in his dates, or out in his arithmetic, as from his data the age would be 61.]

MANETTI, DOMENICO, was probably a relation of the preceding artist. He chiefly distinguished himself in painting historical subjects of an easel size, of which there are many in the private collections at Siena, one of which is particularly mentioned by Lanzi, in the Casa Magnoni, representing the Baptism of Constantine.

MANFREDI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was born at Mantua in 1574. Although Manfredi was a scholar of Cristofano Roncalli, called dalle Pomerance, he might be styled another Michael Angelo Caravaggio, if his works were not distinguished by a superior choice of forms, and a more dignified taste of design. He painted few pictures for the churches; the subjects he made choice of were usually banditti, assemblies of gamesters and armed soldiers, which he represented with an appropriate ferocity of character, and an extraordinary effect of light and shadow. The works of Manfredi are rarely to be met with, as he died young; and of the few pictures he painted, some are attributed to M. Angelo Caravaggio, or to Valentin. [Zani places his birth in 1580, and his death in 1617.]

MANGLARD, ADRIAN, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1688. At an early period of his life he went to Rome, where he met with considerable encouragement, and painted several landscapes and sea-pieces for the Villa Albani, and for the Palazzi Colonna and Rospigliosi. Joseph Vernet was his scholar, who surpassed him. He died at Rome in 1761. We have several pleasing etchings by this artist, of landscapes and marines, from his own designs. [Dumesnil describes forty-four pieces by him; he says that Manglard was born in 1696.]

MANINI, GAETANO. This artist was born at Milan about the year 1730. He painted history in the gaudy and frivolous style of the modern Italian school, and came to England a little before 1775, in which year he was an exhibiter with the Chartered Society of Artists. He died between the years 1780 and 1790.

[MANNINI, or MANINI, GIACOMO ANTONIO, a painter and engraver of perspective and architectural ornaments, was born at Bologna in 1646, and died in the same city in 1732. He was a disciple of André Monticelli and Domenico Santi, and became very eminent in his profession. There is a series of sixteen perspective views by him, etched with a light point and full of taste, of which Bartsch has given a detailed account (P. Gr. tom. xix. p. 322).]

MANNL, or MAENNL, JACOB, a German engraver in mezzotinto, born at Vienna about the year 1695. In 1720, Christopher Lauch, the inspector of the Imperial Gallery, which had been augmented by the Collection of the Archduke Leopold, undertook to have the whole of the pictures engraved, and Jacob Mannl was employed for that purpose. The death of the undertaker and of the artist prevented the completion of the project, and only thirty-one plates were finished. These prints are now become extremely rare. M. Heineken, in his idea of a complete collection of prints, gives a particular description of them from those in the possession of Mariette. They are as follow :

The Portrait of the Emperor Charles VI.

The dead Christ, supported by an Angel; after Palma.

The Virgin, with the infant Christ, who is caressing St. John; after Vanduyck.

Mary Magdalene penitent, accompanied by an Angel; after Coreggio.

St. Francis praying; after Bassano.

St. Clara kneeling; after the same.

The Repentance of St. Peter; after Spagnoletto.

The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew; after L. Giordano.

Christ praying in the Garden; after M. A. Caravaggio.

Judith; after Carlo Veneziano.

A Child holding a Dog; after P. Veronese.

MANNOZZI, GIOVANNI, called DA SAN GIOVANNI. This painter was born at San Giovanni, in the Florentine state, in 1590. He was a scholar of Matteo Roselli, whose correct and finished style was no way congenial with the vivacity of his invention, and the prompt facility of his execution. The capricious flight of his imagination occasionally led him into the most absurd extravagance; but when he chose to restrain this impetuosity, and to reflect on his subjects, he discovers both judgment and taste. Such are his works in the churches at Florence, and in the tribune of the S. S. Quattro, at Rome. Lanzi observes, that although he did not begin to study the art until he was eighteen years of age, and died in his forty-eighth year, the number of his works at Rome, in the pontifical states, and at Florence, appears almost incredible. He died in 1648, and left a son, Giovanni Garzia Mannozi, who painted some frescoes at Pistoja, in a respectable style. [Mannozi died in 1636, at the age of 46.]

[MANRIQUE, MIGUEL, a native of Flanders, but who practised painting in Spain about 1650. It is said that he had been a scholar of Rubens, but obtaining a commission as captain of a troop in the Spanish service, he went to that country, and settled at Malaga, where several of his pictures are to be seen. He was a good colourist, and his pictures have the characteristics of the school in which it is said he first studied.]

[MANS, F. H., (Franz Herman ?) a Dutch painter, who has left numerous pictures, views of towns, villages, and coast scenes, with figures. His winter-pieces are in the manner of Klaas Molenaer, but somewhat superior, and are painted with great truth. They are generally of small dimensions, and signed with his name, and some are dated as late as 1677.]

MANSFELD, JOHN ERNEST, a modern German engraver, born at Prague in 1738. When he was sixteen years of age he visited Vienna, where he learned design in the Imperial Academy, and was instructed in the art of engraving. His best plates are small portraits, with accessorial ornaments, of eminent personages of Vienna, and others, neatly executed with the graver. The following are his principal prints :

PORTRAITS.

The Empress Maria Theresa; J. E. Mansfeld, sc.

The Emperor Joseph II.; the same.

Pope Pius V.; Hagenauer, pinx. 1782.

Wenceslaus, Prince Kaunitz; after Vimazer.

Francis Anthony, Count Kollowrat; after the same.

Maurice, Count Lacy; after Kollonitz. 1776.

Frederick, Baron Trenck; J. E. Mansfeld, fec.

Joseph Haydn; the same.

Anthony Stoerk; the same. 1773.

Sir Robert Murray Keith; after Graff.

SUBJECTS.

A Waterfall on the Danube; after Wenzely.

The Coronation of the Emperor Leopold; after Schutz.

MANTEGNA, ANDREA. This distinguished painter and engraver was born at a village near Padua in 1431, as appears from the date of his first public picture in the church of S. Sofia at Padua, painted in 1448, when he was seventeen years of age. He was the son of a herdsman, and his first occupation was watching cattle, which his passion for drawing sometimes occasioned him to neglect. This decided disposition for the art induced Fran-cresco Squarcione to take him under his tuition, and such was his extraordinary progress under that master, that he adopted him as his son. At an age when others usually commence the study of the art, he was fixed on to paint an altar-piece for the church of S. Sofia, at Padua, which he inscribed Andreas Mantinea Patavinus annos VII. et X. natus sua manu pinxit 1448. He soon after painted the Four Evangelists, for the same church. The celebrity he acquired by these and other performances induced Jacopo Bellini, a painter then in great reputation, to bestow on him his daughter in marriage. This union was by no means agreeable to Squarcione, the enemy of Bellini, who in consequence became as inveterate in his detraction of the works of Mantegna, as he had before been strenuous in his praise of them. F. Squarcione had collected, in a journey through Greece, a rich assemblage of statues and bas-reliefs, which were the models of study in his numerous school; but by none were they so profoundly contemplated as by Mantegna, by which he acquired a pure and correct design, a select choice of forms, and a simplicity of composition superior to his contemporaries. His devout adherence to the antique had however seduced him into a neglect of nature, and of that animated expression of character which she alone affords. For this deficiency, he was severely satirized by Squarcione, particularly for his picture of the Martyrdom of St. James, in the church of the Eremitani, which is designed in a dry, formal style. This rebuke occasioned him to change his manner; and in a picture he painted soon after, for the church of S. Giustina, of St. Mark writing his Gospel, he represented the head of the Evangelist with an admirable expression of the most fervid devotion. He was invited to Rome by Innocent VIII., for whom he painted a chapel in the Vatican, and other considerable works, in which his style was improved by his study of the remains of antiquity in that metropolis. His chief residence was at Mantua, where he was particularly patronized by the Marchese Lodovico Gonzaga, for whom he painted some of his finest works, both in oil and in fresco. His most celebrated performance in oil is his picture called della Vittoria, painted in 1495, for a chapel of the Marchese Francesco Gonzaga, in the church of the Filippini, in commemoration of a victory gained by that prince over Charles VIII. of France at the battle of Formoni. It represents the Marquis in armour, kneeling before the Virgin and Infant seated on a throne, surrounded by several saints, and near her St. Elisabeth, which is the portrait of the Marchioness, with the young St. John. In this extraordinary production, the surprising delicacy of the carnations, the elegant cast of the draperies, the glittering lucidity of the armour, and the tasteful accessories by which it is accompanied, equally surprise and charm us. Each head is a model worthy of study for the grace and vivacity of expression, and the truth of character; and the design, both in the naked and in the vestments, completely contradicts the commonly received opinion, that the Gothic style and that of Mantegna are the same. This interesting picture, which was long the admiration of every visitor of Mantua, was carried off by the French, with their other plunder, and is now one of the ill-acquired ornaments of their Museum. Mantua appears to have been destined to be stripped of the best productions of this estimable artist by the spoils of war; as the fine series of pictures of the Triumph of Julius Cæsar, formerly in the Palazzo di S. Sebastiano, and now in his Majesty's collection, which Vasari considers as his most distinguished works, and for which he was knighted by the Marquis of Mantua, became the plunder of the Germans at the sacking of the city. As an engraver, Andrea Mantegna claims our veneration as one of the earliest practisers of the art, and as having contributed more than all his contemporaries to its perfection, by his superior knowledge of design. Coeval with Antonio Pollajuoli, he resembles him in the style of his engraving, but he greatly surpasses him in the drawing of his figures, particularly in the naked. His plates are generally executed by single strokes from one corner of the plate to the other, in a manner resembling drawings made with a pen, without hatchings, or cross lines. Several of his prints are engraved from his own designs, which are distinguished by a simplicity and correctness of outline unusual at the early period in which he lived. He sometimes marked his plates with a monogram similar to one afterwards made use of by Marc Antonio Raimondi, MR. and sometimes with a tablet, also made use of by that celebrated engraver, . The following are his principal plates :

The Virgin seated, with the infant Jesus in her arms.

The Scourging of Christ.

The Entombing of Christ, inscribed, Humani generis Redemptori.

Christ descending into Hell.

Christ holding the Standard of the Cross between two Saints.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes.

A Battle of Sea Monsters, with the figures of two armed Warriors.

A Battle of Sea Gods, with the figure of Neptune.

Hercules between Virtue and Vice. This print is sometimes attributed to Marc Antonio.

Hercules strangling Anteus, inscribed, Divo Herculi victo.

Four Female Figures dancing.

Bacchus, supported by Fauns and Satyrs.

The Triumph of Julius Cæsar; in nine plates; after his pictures now in the King's collection.

It is difficult to meet with a complete set of these plates. They have been copied in chiaro-scuro by Andrea Andreani.

[In addition to the 23 prints described by Bartsch, there is in the British Museum one representing St. George and the Dragon, of large dimensions, which cost £60 sterling; also The Chalice, (of which Hollar engraved a copy,) measuring 17½ inches H. by 8¼ W.]

Andrea Mantegna died at Mantua in 1505, where a monument was erected to his memory by his sons, in the church of S. Andrea, in 1517, which has occasioned Vasari, with his usual inaccuracy, to date his death in that year. [Andrea Mantegna, according to Pungileoni, died the 13th of August, 1506; Zani says the 15th of September in the same year. It is better to say nothing than to say little concerning this great artist; and, as it would fill a volume to dissertate on the controverted points, it may be more convenient to refer the inquirer to the pages of Zani and Pungileoni for satisfaction. Even after consulting those two great authorities, there will remain matter for further investigation.]

MANTEGNA, FRANCESCO. Among the best scholars of Andrea Mantegna, were Francesco, and another of his sons, who finished the frescoes left imperfect by their father in the Camera degli Sposi, in the castle at Mantua, and painted the ceilings, so much admired for the infantine and playful beauty of the angels. Francesco also painted two laterals for an altar-piece in S. Andrea, a work of his father's.

MANTOUANO, RINALDO. This painter was born at Mantua, and was one of the most distinguished scholars of Giulio Romano. Vasari regrets the premature death of this promising artist, who was regarded as one of the ablest painters of his time. In the church of S. Agnese at Mantua, is a fine picture by him of the Virgin and Infant, with S. Agostino and S. Girolamo, composed and designed with a grandeur so much beyond his age, that it gave rise to a suspicion that it was painted from a design of his instructor. He died in the flower of his life.

MANWAIRING, ———. This artist, who flourished about the year 1760, is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of the Reverend Mr. Madan.

MANZUOLI, MASO, called MASO DI S. FRIANO. This painter was born at Florence in 1536. He was first a disciple of Pierfrancesco di Jacopo, and afterwards of Carlo Portelli. Vasari does not hesitate to place this artist on an equal rank with Battista Naldini and Alessandro Allori. This honourable testimony will not appear unmerited to those who have seen his picture of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, formerly in the church of S. Pietro Maggiore at Florence; afterwards taken to Rome, and placed in the gallery of the Vatican. This graceful and impressive picture was painted when he was thirty years of age, and is not only the most admired of his works, but is regarded as the ablest production of the Florentine school at the period in which he lived. There are other works by him in the church of the S. Trinità, and in the Florentine gallery. He died in 1575.

MARACCI, GIOVANNI. See MARRACCI.

MARATTI, CARLO. This eminent painter was born at Camurano, in the Marquisate of Ancona, in 1625. At twelve years of age he showed so strong a propensity for design, that his parents sent him to Rome, where he entered the school of Andrea Sacchi, under whom he studied several years, and was his most favoured disciple. By the recommendation of his instructor, he made the great works of Raffaële the chief objects of his contemplation; he studied them with the most exemplary assiduity, and became a correct and elegant designer. He was much employed in painting Holy Families, pictures of the Virgin, and female saints, on which account the contemporary artists, particularly Salvator Rosa, supposing him incapable of higher or more arduous exertions, satirically styled him Carluccio delle Madonne. To counteract the efforts of his enemies, Andrea Sacchi procured him the commission to paint a picture for the Battisterio of St. John of Lateran, where he represented Constantine destroying the idols, a performance which stifled the voice of calumny, and was esteemed one of the ablest productions of the time. It procured him the patronage of Alexander VII., under whose protection, and that of his successors, he became the most popular and most employed artist at Rome. His most admired works are those he painted in the style of Andrea Sacchi, of which the following are the most worthy of notice. The Death of St. Francis Xavier, in the church of Il Gesu, which is engraved by J. Frey; the Visitation, in la Pace; and the Conception, in S. Isidore: but his most celebrated work is the Martyrdom of S. Biagio at Genoa, which, Lanzi observes, is worthy of the ablest emulator of the style of Sacchi. Carlo Maratti was a correct designer, but his forms discover little acquaintance with the beauties of the antique. His compositions are rich, and even magnificent, but they bear the character of coldness and languor, and appear rather the productions of labour, than the inspirations of genius. The expression of his heads is sweet and amiable, though not distinguished by peculiar dignity or grace. He prided himself on the copious casting of his draperies, but in these he was governed by manner and practice, and the confused multiplicity of his folds exhibits little of the beauty of the figure. His colouring in general is silvery and pleasing; but towards the latter part of his life it was occasionally chalky and cold. He seems to have been more indebted for what is approved in his works to the great models he consulted, than the originality of his invention; and though his pictures will always be thought worthy of our esteem, they possess neither the fire nor the sentiment that excites our admiration. We have by this painter several etchings, executed in a free, spirited style, though neater and more finished than those of painters usually are. Some of them are from his own designs, and others after the celebrated Italian masters. The following are by him:

A set of ten plates of the Life of the Virgin; from his own compositions.

Several Holy Families, and subjects of the Virgin; after the same.

Heliodorus driven from the Temple; in two sheets; after Raffaële.

Christ, with the Woman of Samaria; after An. Caracci.

The Flagellation of St. Andrew; after Domenichino.

Joseph discovering himself to his Brethren; after Mola.

St. Charles Borromeo interceding for the Persons afflicted with the Plague; after Cavaliere Peruginio.

[Bartsch describes only 14 etchings by him. Those of Christ with the Woman of Samaria, and Joseph and his Brethren, he considers to be by P. F. Mola.] Carlo Maratti died at Rome in 1713.

MARC, ESTEVAN, [OR MARCH, ESTÉBAN.] According to Palomino, this Spanish artist was a native of Valencia, and a scholar of Pedro Orrente, under whom he became an eminent painter of battles. He also painted historical subjects, though less distinguished in that branch than the former. In the church of San Juan de Mercado, at Valencia, is an altar-piece of the Last Supper, highly commended by his biographer. For the Bueno Retiro he painted a large picture of the Marriage at Cana, where there is also one of his most capital battle-pieces. He died at Valencia in 1660, at an advanced age. [Estéban March adopted the Venetian style of painting, from his master, Orrente, who was a great imitator of the Bassans. He was an enthusiast, a kind of Quixote in his art; in order to rouse his imagination he would arm himself cap-à-pié, place lance in rest, and to the sound of drums and trumpets make a furious attack on the walls of his atelier. Having finished this preliminary exercise, he would commence painting the inspirations of his exalted imagination. He also attempted history, but did not succeed; it required more sobriety. His battle-pieces, however, were much esteemed by the amateurs; they exhibited vigour in the action, freshness in colour, facility of handling, and a density in the atmosphere of that part where the affair appeared to be most serious. His works are chiefly at Valencia and Madrid.]

MARC, [or MARCH,] MIGUEL, was the son and scholar of Estevan Marc, born at Valencia in 1633. He painted history and battles in the style of his father, though greatly inferior to him. One of his best performances is the Death of St. Francis, in the church of the Franciscans at Valencia. He died at Valencia in 1670.

MARC, ANTONIO. See RAIMONDI.

MARCA, GIOVANNI BATISTA LOMBARDELLI, called DELLA. This painter was born at Montenuovo in 1532. He was first a scholar of Marco Marchetti da Faenza, and, according to Baglioni, visited Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., where he attached himself to an imitation of the works of Raffaellino da Reggio, of whom he became an assistant and coadjutor in some fresco paintings in the Vatican. In the church of S. Pietro Montorio he painted a series of pictures of the Life of St. Francis; and in S. Maria de Monti, the Resurrection. There are several of his works in the churches at Montenuovo. He died in 1587. [Zani says he was born at Perugia, and that he was living in 1592: he is also called il Montano.]

MARCEL, N. This artist was born at Frankfurt in 1628, and was a scholar of George Vlugels, an indifferent painter of still-life. Marcel greatly surpassed his master, and his pictures of flowers, fruit, shells, &c., are very highly finished and delicately coloured. They are held in considerable estimation in Germany. He died at Frankfurt in 1683.

MARCELLIS, ΟTHO, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1613. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he acquired considerable celebrity by his excellence in a very singular branch of the art. He painted reptiles, insects, and curious plants, which he designed with surprising fidelity, and finished with extraordinary care. The admiration of these exotic productions was not confined to his own country. He resided some time at Paris, where he was greatly encouraged by the Queen-mother, by whom he was munificently rewarded. He afterwards visited Florence, where his talents were equally distinguished by the Grand Duke. His works were not less admired at Naples and Rome, where he passed several years. He painted every thing from nature, for which purpose he is said to have kept a kind of museum of serpents, vipers, rare insects, and other curiosities, which he copied with unexampled precision, and a singular beauty of pencil. His pictures are found in the choicest collections in Holland. He died at Amsterdam in 1673. [Füssli says his name was Smuffelaer; he signed many of his pictures O. Masseus, but no writer mentions the circumstance.]

MARCENAY, ANTHONY DE GHUY, a modern French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He was one of the most successful imitators of the style of Rembrandt, and has engraved several plates of portraits and other subjects, in which the dry point is used with great dexterity. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Henry IV. of France; after Janet.
The Duke of Sully; after Porbus.
The Chevalier Bayard.
The Maid of Orleans.
Viscount Turenne; after Champagne.
Prince Eugene; after Kupetzki.
Marshal Villers; after Rigaud.
General Paoli.
Stanislaus Augustus, King of Poland; after Baccierelli.
Marshal Saxe; after Liotard.
The Portrait of Tintoretto; after a picture by himself.
A half-length of Rembrandt, with a palette.

SUBJECTS.

Sun-set; after Vernet.
A View of the Sea-coast, with Fishermen; after the same.
A Land-storm; after Vanuden.
A Skirmish of Cavalry; after Parrocel.
The Testament of Eudamidas; after N. Poussin.
Tobit recovering his Sight; after Rembrandt.
[The Lady with the Pearl, an oval, with the date 1768; after Rembrandt.
The (lady) Gardener; after G. Dou, with the date 1766; and others to the number of 66.]

[He was born in 1722, and died in 1811.]

MARCHAND, or MARCHANT, PETER. Florent le Comte mentions an old artist of this name, who lived about the year 1577, and engraved both on wood and on copper; but he does not specify any of his works. Professor Christ attributes to this engraver a monogram composed of a P. and an M.

PM. with the above date.

MARCHANT, J. There is a portrait of Mrs. Cibber engraved by this artist, after Hudson, in 1749.

MARCHANT, PETRUS. The name of an engraver affixed to a book of goldsmith's ornaments, executed with the graver in a neat, free style. It is signed, Petrus Marchant, fecit. -1623.

MARCHESI, GIROLAMO. See COTIGNOLA.

MARCHESI, GIUSEPPE, called IL SANSONE. This painter was born at Bologna in 1699, and was first a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini, but afterwards studied under Aureliano Milani. To the vigorous colour and the bold fore-shortening of his first instructor, he united the correct design of Milani, and distinguished himself by many admired works in the churches of Bologna. In S. Pietro is a fine picture of St. Ambrose refusing the Emperor Theodosius the Entrance to the Temple. His picture of the Birth of the Virgin, in la Madonna di Galeria, and that of the Resurrection in S. Croce, are painted in the great style of Franceschini. One of his most esteemed works is the Martyrdom of S. Prisca, in the dome of Rimini, in which he appears to have had in view the St. Agnes of Domenichino. Lanzi ranks his picture of the Four Seasons among the happiest productions of the modern Bolognese school. [Died in 1771.]

MARCHESINI, ALESSANDRO. According to Orlandi, this painter was born at Verona in 1664, and received his first instruction in the art from Biagio Falcieri. At the age of sixteen he was sent to Bologna, and placed under the tuition of Carlo Cignani. Under that master he became a reputable painter of history, and on his return to Verona was employed in several works for the churches of S. Biagio, la Madonna della Scala, and other public edifices. He resided some time at Venice, where he was chiefly occupied in painting easel pictures of historical and fabulous subjects, which were more remarkable for facility of execution than correctness and study. He died in 1738.

MARCHETTI, MARCO, called DA FAENZA. This painter is called by Baglione Marco da Faenza. He flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., who employed him in ornamenting the loggia of the Vatican with grotesque and arabesque subjects, in which he particularly excelled. His talents were not however confined to that branch of the art. He painted historical subjects, which were correctly and elegantly designed, with a more than usual acquaintance with the nude. Such is his picture of the Murder of the Innocents in the Vatican. In the church of the Trinità de Monti, he painted a series of pictures of the Life of St. Francis di Paola. Cosmo I. employed him sometimes in the Palazzo Vecchio, at Florence. He died in 1588.

MARCHI, GIUSEPPE, was a native of Rome, and was brought to England by Sir Joshua Reynolds, when he returned from Italy, by whom he was much employed in painting draperies, and in forwarding his pictures. He engraved several plates in mezzotint, from portraits by Sir Joshua, among which are the following:

Lady Mulgrave, when Miss Cholmondeley.
Mrs. Crewe and Mrs. Bouverie.
Miss Oliver.
Doctor Goldsmith.
Mrs. Hartley, with her child.

[He assisted Sir Joshua in preparing his palette, and in painting his draperies; and made several successful copies of heads by that master. He died in 1808.]

MARCHIS, ALESSIO DE. This artist was a Neapolitan, and flourished about the year 1710. He painted landscapes, sea-ports, and towns on fire; in which he followed the great style of Salvator Rosa. His principal works are at Perugia and Urbino, where they are held in high estimation. Lanzi reports of this painter, that in order to imitate nature more exactly in his conflagrations, he set fire to a barn, for the purpose of study; the fact being discovered, he was sent to the galleys for some years, but was released from his punishment in the pontificate of Clement XI., who employed him in his palace at Urbino, which he decorated with several of his best works. One of his most celebrated pictures is the Burning of Troy, in the Palazzo Sempioni. [He died about 1742.]

MARCILLA, or MARSIGLIA, GUGLIELMO DA. This painter was born at Marseilles in 1475. Vasari reports, that having been concerned when he was young in an unfortunate quarrel, in which one of the parties was killed, to avoid the rigour of justice, he took refuge in a cloister, and became a monk. He afterwards fled from his monastery, and travelled to Arezzo, and on his arrival in Italy was secularized. At Arezzo he distinguished himself by some very extraordinary paintings on glass, the fame of which reached Rome, whither he was invited by Julius II. For that pontiff he executed some considerable works on glass, as well as several paintings in fresco. In the dome at Arezzo he painted the Evangelists, designed in the great style of M. A. Buonaroti, and like the frescoes of that sublime master, are coloured in a low and subdued tone. His glass-paintings, on the contrary, have all the richness and glow that colour can give, and when assisted by the brightness of the sun, are of undescrivable brilliancy. He died in 1537. [Lanciolotti calls him Magolze, or Magollo, FRANCESCO, i. e. a Frenchman: it is also said by some that he was born in 1462, and died in 1524.]

MARCOLINI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver on wood, born at Forli about the year 1500. In 1540 he published a book entitled Il Giardino de Pensieri, with wooden cuts, executed by himself, after the designs of Giuseppe Porta, called Salviati, which possess considerable merit.

MARCONI, Rocco. This painter was a native of Treviso, and flourished about the year 1505. Ridolfi ranks him among the disciples of Palma, but Zanetti, with more probability, asserts that he was a scholar of Giovanni Bellini. He excelled as a colourist, and was a tolerably correct designer, although coarse and austere in his forms, and ignoble in his characters. His picture in the church of S. Niccolo, which is considered one of his earliest works, is dated in 1505. One of his best performances is the Adulteress before Christ, in S. Giorgio Maggiore. [Kügler, in his "Italy," mentions two others at Venice: an altar-piece of Christ between two Angels, in S. S. Giovanni e Paolo; and a very excellent Descent from the Cross, in the collection of the Academy. In the Berlin Museum there is The Supper at Emmaus, dated 1507.]

[MARCQUARD, ROBERT SAMUEL, an English designer and engraver, born in 1751, and died in 1792. He was a pupil of Bartolozzi, whose manner he followed, and was considered one of the best scholars of that eminent master. His engravings are chiefly after the works of contemporary painters, particularly Cipriani, Angelica Kauffman, W. Hamilton, Hoppner, Ramberg, Flaxman, (sculptor,) Stothard, Peters, and Sir J. Reynolds.]

MARCUCCI, AGOSTINO, was a native of Siena, though educated at Bologna, and had the advantage of studying in the school of the Caracci, until Pietro Facini attempted the establishment of a rival academy, to which Marcucci attached himself. He painted some pictures for the churches at Bologna, among which is the Death of the Virgin in la Concazione. [He flourished about 1600.]

MARESCALCO, GIOVANNI. See BUONCONSIGLI.

MARESCOTTI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and was brought up in the school of Guido Reni, of whose style he was a slight and unsuccessful imitator. There are some of his works in the churches and public edifices at Bologna; in S. Martino Maggiore, the Martyrdom of S. Barbara; in S. Stefano, the Crowning of the Virgin; and S. Sigismondo condemned to death, in the church dedicated to that saint. [Died in 1630.]

MARGARITONE. This venerable artist is regarded as the most ancient painter of whom we have any account in the history of modern art, who, with Cimabue, contributed to the revival of painting. He appears to have been born at Arezzo in the year 1198, about forty years before the birth of that master. He is said by Vasari to have been instructed by some Greek painters in the rude and barbarous exercise of the art, practised at that remote period. His works were almost confined to images of the Virgin and Crucifixes, a few of which remain in the churches at Arezzo; and in S. Croce, at Florence, where there is a picture of St. Francis, by Cimabue, to which the works of Margaritone are little inferior. He also distinguished himself as a sculptor and an architect. On the death of Gregory

X., at Arezzo, Margaritone was appointed to erect his monument, on which occasion he carved a marble statue of the Pope, and decorated the chapel with his portrait, and other paintings. He died in 1275. [Several writers say that he died at the age of 77, but they do not agree in the dates. Zani says he was born in 1240, and died in 1317, which would make him 77; Lanzi says he died after 1289, at the age of 77. As all his pictures are lost, with the exception of one engraved in Lastrì's "Etruria Pittrice," it would answer no good purpose to enlarge this article.]

MARGHUCCI, GIACOMO. According to M. Heineken, this artist was an engraver and print-seller, by whom we have some plates of antique busts, statues, &c.

MARI, ALESSANDRO, was born at Turin in 1650, and was first a scholar of Domenico Piola of Genoa, but afterwards went to Venice, where he studied some time under Cavaliere Liberi. He next visited Bologna, and passed some years in the school of Lorenzo Pasinelli, and on leaving that master, painted some pictures for the churches in that city, of which the most esteemed were the Crucifixion, and the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in S. Barbaziano. His principal residence was at Milan, where he gained considerable reputation by painting symbolical subjects, in imitation of the old masters. According to Lanzi he went to Spain, and died at Madrid in 1707.

MARIA, CAVALIERE ERCOLE, called ERCOLINO DI GUIDO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a favourite disciple of Guido Reni. He imitated and copied the works of his instructor with such precision, that he is said to have deceived the master himself. Malvasia reports, that Guido having left a picture in a half-finished state, Ercole copied it, and placed his work on the easel of his master, who proceeded to finish it, without discovering the deception. His powers appear however to have been confined to the humble pretensions of a copyist, although they were such as to procure him the most flattering encouragement, even at Rome. He was particularly patronized by Urban VIII., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He died young at Rome, about the year 1640.

MARIA, FRANCESCO DI, was born at Naples in 1623, and became a disciple of Domenichino, when he resided in that city. Like his admirable instructor, he studied the subjects he painted with the most profound attention; and, like him, endured with patient suffering the taunts and scoffings of his contemporaries for tardiness and irresolution, which accompanied Zampieri to the tomb. His historical works are not numerous; but the few that exist are held in the highest estimation, and may be mistaken by the inexperienced for the works of Domenichino. He particularly excelled in portrait painting; and Lanzi reports, that a portrait by him being exhibited at Rome with one by Rubens, and another by Vandyck, the preference was given by the judges, Niccolò Poussin, Pietro da Cortona, and Andrea Sacchi, to that of Maria. He died in 1690.

MARIANI, GIOVANNI MARIA. This painter was a native of Ascoli, and flourished about the year 1655. He was a scholar of Domenico Piasella at the time when Valerio Castelli studied under that master, and in conjunction with him distinguished himself by several works at Genoa, both in oil and in fresco. His picture in the oratory of S. Jacopo, of the Baptism of that Saint, may be ranked with the best productions of his time. He passed some part of his life at Rome, and was received into the academy there in 1650. He sometimes painted historical subjects of an easel size, which are found in the first collections at Genoa and Florence. One of his most admired works of this description is his picture of the Rape of the Sabines, in the Florentine gallery.

MARIENHOF, A., a Dutch painter, born at Gorcum in 1650. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but according to M. Descamps he passed the early part of his life in studying and copying the works of Rubens. He afterwards settled at Brussels, where he was much employed in painting small historical pictures, which were touched and coloured entirely in the manner of Rubens. He died young. [The date of his death is uncertain; Balkema says in 1712; but this is unsupported. He was more of a copier than an original painter.]

MARIESCHI, MICHELE. This artist was a native of Venice. He excelled in painting architectural views and perspective, and passed the first part of his life in Germany, where his works were much esteemed. On his return to Venice, he painted the most remarkable views in that city, several of which he has etched in a pleasing and spirited style. He died in 1743.

MARIESCHI, JACOPO, [or GIACOMO,] was the son of the preceding artist, born at Venice in 1711. After being instructed in design and perspective by his father, he became a scholar of Gasparo Diziani. He painted architectural subjects, and views of Venice, in which he imitated the style of Canaletto, but with less success than Francesco Guardi. He died in 1794. [His pictures are oftener mistaken for the works of Canaletto than are those of Guardi, who painted with more freedom than either.]

MARIETTE, JOHN, an eminent French engraver and print-seller, born at Paris in 1654. He was instructed in drawing by his brother-in-law, J. B. Corneille, with the intention of becoming a painter, but by the advice of Charles le Brun, he changed his pursuit, and devoted himself to engraving. Several of his plates are from his own designs; and his compositions possess considerable merit, though his drawing is not very correct. He worked both with the point and the graver, in a slight, and rather a coarse style. We have a great number of plates by him, the greater part of which are frontispieces, vignettes, and other book ornaments. The following are esteemed his best prints:

- The Descent from the Cross; after le Brun.
- The Angels ministering to Christ in the Desert; after the same.
- St. Peter delivered from Prison; after Domenichino.
- Moses saved from the Nile; after Poussin.
- Joseph making himself known to his Brethren; after M. Corneille.
- Christ curing the Paralytic; after the same.
- St. Louis receiving the Communion; after J. B. Corneille.
- St. Louis received into Heaven; after the same.

John Mariette died at Paris in 1742.

MARIETTE, PETER JOHN, was the son of the preceding artist, from whom he inherited a very considerable property, and an extensive collection of prints, which, by continual additions, he rendered the most numerous and select of any private individual in Europe. His immense assemblage of prints and drawings was sold in Paris in 1775. For his amusement he etched a few plates of landscapes, after Guercino; and some heads and studies, after Caracci and Pierino del Vaga; [also Traité des Pierres gravées, with 250 engravings of antique gems, in 2 vols., folio.] He died at Paris in 1774.

[MARIGNY, MICHEL, a French historical painter, born at Paris in 1797, and died there in 1829, was a scholar of M. Lafont and the Baron Gros. He painted several pictures of large dimensions for churches at Paris and Rouen, and one of Moses, as the legislator, for the council-chamber at the Louvre. His last production, a wounded soldier, was exhibited at the Luxembourg in 1830.]

[MARILLIER, CLEMENT PIERRE, a French designer and engraver, was born at Dijon in 1740, and died in 1808. He made numerous drawings of subjects from the Bible, and for the works of Dorat, the Abbé Prevost, de Roucher, Amand Baccular, and Sauvigny. He also engraved from his own designs the landscapes for "Les Voyages en France, à Naples et en Grece," and for various other works.]

MARINARI, ONORIO. This painter was born at Florence in 1627. He was the cousin and disciple of Carlo Dolci, and for some time followed the finished and laboured manner of his relative, but afterwards adopted a grander and more dignified style; more ideal and less constrained. His principal works are in the church of S. Maria Maggiore, and in that of S. Simone at Florence. Of his easel pictures there are several in the private collections, which are highly esteemed. He died in 1715. [This artist was in the former edition erroneously named Mariani. There are many of his pictures in England, but they are generally attributed to C. Dolci: he painted with a freer pencil, and with a greater glow of colour, than his master, and more harmony of tone. After C. Dolci's death he finished several of his pictures, perhaps not to their disadvantage.]

[MARINAS, HENRIQUE DE LAS, a Spanish marine painter, was born at Cadiz in 1620. He was celebrated for his representations of scenes of embarkation in the bay of his native city, which he gave with so much truth and beauty that he pleased both artists and seamen; and in such compositions the latter are not bad critics. He is praised for the transparency of his water and his aerial gradations. He realized a large fortune by his pictures, and afterwards indulged himself in travelling; but having arrived at Rome he never quitted it, but died there in 1680. His pictures are still sought for by intelligent amateurs, but it is uncertain under what name they are sold in Italy.]

MARINI, BENEDETTO. This painter was a native of Urbino, and flourished about the year 1625. According to Lanzi, he was one of the most distinguished scholars of Claudio Ridolfi, and on leaving that master resided some years at Piacenza, where he painted several altar-pieces, and other works, in which he united the Lombard with the Venetian style. The most celebrated of his performances is his picture of the Multiplication of the Loaves, in the refectory of the Conventuali, painted in oil, in 1625; an immense composition, arranged with surprising ingenuity and variety. Lanzi gives him the preference to his instructor in the extent and vivacity of his genius, though perhaps inferior to him in the fundamental principles of the art.

MARINUS, [IGNATIUS,] a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. His principal residence was at Antwerp, where he executed several plates, in a neat but singular style. They are worked entirely with the graver, with very delicate strokes crossing each other, and filled up with long dots. They are very highly finished, though the drawing and the folds of the draperies are not very correct. The prints of this artist are held in considerable estimation, particularly fine impressions of them. Among others we have the following by him:

The Flight into Egypt; a night-piece; after Rubens.

St. Ignatius curing the Diseased; after the same.

St. Francis Xavier resuscitating a Dead Person; after the same.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Jordaens. Christ before the High-priest Caiaphas; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Apollonia; after the same. Village Children forming a Concert; after C. Sachtleven. 1633.

He also engraved some plates, after M. A. Caravaggio, Vandyck, and others. [He is also called Ignatius Cornelius Marinus; writers differ respecting the time of his birth; some place it in 1587, and others in 1626. The time of his death is not known.]

MARIO DA FIORI. See NUZZI.

MARIOTTI. By this artist, who was a native of Italy, and probably a painter, we have a slight, spirited etching of a frontispiece to a collection of altar-pieces, published at Rome by Giacomo Rossi. The figures are well drawn, and it is executed in the style of a painter. It is after a design by Ciro Ferri.

MARK, QUINTIN, or QUIRINUS, a modern German engraver, born at Littau in 1753. He visited Vienna when young, and was instructed in engraving by Schmutzer, under whom he became an eminent artist, and was made a member of the Imperial Academy. His plates are neatly executed with the graver. The following are among his best prints:

The Virgin and Infant, with St. John; after L. Giordana.

Susanna and the Elders; after Rubens.

Alexander and Diogenes; after the same.

Herodias with the Head of St. John; after T. van Thulden.

Cleopatra showing Augustus the Bust of Julius Cæsar; after P. Battoni.

Venus and Cupid asleep; after Franceschini.

The Amorous Miser; after Braun. 1786.

[He died in 1811.]

[MARLET, JEAN HENRI, a French poetical, historical, and portrait painter, born at Autun in 1771, was a pupil at the Academy at Dijon, and afterwards of the Baron Regnault. His compositions are numerous, embracing a great variety of subjects from poetry, history, anecdote, and fancy. He has published some works in Lithography, among them Les Tableaux de Paris. He was living in 1831.]

MARLIE, RENE ELIZABETH. See LEPICIE.

MARLOW, M., an obscure English engraver, who lived about the year 1675. He appears to have been employed only by the booksellers, and in that capacity engraved a portrait of John Mayne, Arithmetician, prefixed to his Clavis Commercialis; dated 1674.

[MARLOW, WILLIAM, an English landscape painter and engraver, born in 1740, was a scholar of Scott the marine painter. Like his instructor he painted scenes on the lower banks of the Thames, and also in the neighbourhood of Richmond and Twickenham. His pictures are very pleasing, and sometimes approach the manner of R. Wilson in his English subjects. He also painted and etched some

Italian views: to these he has put his name, with the addition of F. S. A. He died in 1800.]

MARMION, EDMUND, an English designer and engraver, by whom we have a few etchings of domestic subjects of ladies and gentlemen, from his own designs. His prints bear some resemblance to those of Gaywood, though inferior to him. There is a portrait of George Tooke, of Popes, by him, which is scarce.

MARMOCCHINI, GIOVANNA CORTESI. This lady was born at Florence in 1670. She was first a pupil of Livio Mehus, and afterwards of Pietro Dandini. She was afterwards taught miniature painting by Ippolito Galantini. Although she chiefly excelled in portraits in miniature, she practised both in oil and in crayons, and under the patronage of the Grand Duchess, met with very extensive encouragement. She died in 1736.

MARMOLEJA, PEDRO DE VILLEGAS, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1520. He travelled to Italy for improvement; and from the great style of his design, has been incorrectly said to have been a disciple of Raffaele, who died in the year in which Marmoleja was born. His principal works are in the churches, and in the hospital of San Lazaro, at Seville, and are said to be distinguished by beauty of form and dignity of character. He died in 1599. [Bermudez classes him among the greatest artists of Andalusia.]

[MARNE, JEAN LOUIS. See DEMARNE.]

MAROLI, DOMENICO. This painter was born at Messina in 1612. He was a scholar of Antonio Ricci, called Barbalunga; and on leaving the school of that master visited Venice, where he studied with attention the works of the great masters of that school, and returned to Sicily with the powers of an accomplished colourist. His carnations are fresh and delicate; and the airs of his heads expressive and full of character. Such are his pictures of the Martyrdom of S. Placido, in S. Paolo; and the Nativity, in the Chiesa della Grotta, at Messina. Whilst at Venice, he painted with success some pastoral subjects, in the style of Giacomo Bassano, which were much admired. This artist fell a victim to the revolution which took place in Sicily in 1674.

MARONE, JACOPO, was a native of Alexandria, and flourished from about the year 1451 till 1484. His principal residence was at Genoa, and in the state, where he painted several altar-pieces for the churches. In the church of S. Jacopo at Savona, is a picture of the Nativity by him, painted in distemper, in a careful, high-finished style. In S. Brigada, at Genoa, are two pictures by this master, dated in 1481 and 1484.

MAROT, JOHN, a French architect and engraver, born at Paris in 1620. We have by this artist several architectural plates of plans and elevations of the most remarkable edifices in Paris and the vicinity. In conjunction with S. de la Boissiere, Is. Silvestre, I. le Paultre, Seb. le Clerc, F. Chaveau, and other artists, he executed several of the plates for the great cabinet of the King of France. The following are his principal prints:

A set of thirteen plates of Churches and public edifices at Paris; designed and engraved after their measurement by J. Marot.

A second set of twelve plates of the same.

Twenty-one plates of Views of the Chateau de Richelieu.

The Plans and Elevations of the Louvre; three plates.

The Plans and Views of the Chateau de Vincennes; three plates.

The Plan and Elevation of the Chateau de Madrid; two plates.

MAROT, DANIEL, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1650, and distinguished himself as an architect and an engraver. He is usually styled architect to William III., King of England; and engraved several plates in the style of his father, which were published at Paris, with some of those of John Marot, entitled Recueil des planches des Sieurs Marot, pere et fils. He also engraved a set of architectural plates, which were published at Amsterdam in 1712; and the statues and vases in the palace at Loo. We have also the following prints by him:

The great Fair at the Hague, with the Burghers under arms, saluting the Prince and Princess of Orange; in two sheets.

The great Fair at Amsterdam, with the Citizens under arms.

The Festival of the Birth-day of the Prince of Orange. 1686.

The Interior of the Audience-chamber at the Hague.

A perspective View of Voorst.

MAROT, FRANCIS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1667. He was a scholar of Charles de la Fosse, and painted history in the style of that master. He was made a member of the Academy at Paris in 1702. One of his most esteemed works is a picture in the church of Notre Dame, representing Christ appearing to the Three Marys. He died in 1719.

[MARQUEZ, ESTEBAN, a Spanish historical painter, born at Estremadura, was a scholar of his uncle Fernando Marquez Joya, who followed the school of Murillo. At the death of his uncle Marquez went as a workman to one of the establishments where they manufactured pictures for exportation to America; but not having had sufficient practice and experience in this sort of work, he became the butt of his fellow labourers, and was obliged to quit Seville and return to his native place. After a while he returned to Seville, and having by close application acquired a correctness of design, a knowledge of colouring, and a tolerable imitation of the style of Murillo, he surpassed all those who had before made him the object of their mockery. He painted an Ascension for the cloister of the Trinitarios descalzos, which has considerable merit; also an Apostolat of the size of life, for the hospital de la Sangre, and pictures for the churches of the Augustines, Recolets, and others. He died at Seville in 1720.]

[MARQUEZ JOYA, FERNANDO, uncle of the preceding, was a portrait painter, and painted in 1649 that of Cardinal Spinola, which is engraved by Van Goyen. He followed the manner of Murillo; and was a frequenter of the Academy at Seville from 1668 to 1672, when he died.]

MARRACCI, GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Lucca in 1637, and was first a scholar of Pietro Paolini. When he was fourteen years of age he went to Rome, where he had the advantage of being received into the school of Pietro da Cortona, under whom he studied some time; and before he was twenty-five had distinguished himself as an historical painter at Rome. On the death of his father he returned to Lucca, where he painted several pictures for the confraternity of S. Lorenzo, and the Collegiate di S. Michele. In the dome of S. Ignazio, at San Giovanni, he painted some considerable fresco works. He died in 1704.

MARREBECK, J. This artist was probably a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1700. We have a few portraits by him, engraved in mezzotinto.

MARSHALL, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who, from the persons he represented, must have begun to practise the art early in the reign of James I. He engraved chiefly for the booksellers, by whom he was employed upwards of forty years. He worked entirely with the graver, in a stiff style, without taste. His best prints are his portraits, of which he engraved a great number, most of which are supposed to have been done from his own designs, after life. Although they are very indifferently executed, they are interesting to the collector, on account of the personages they represent. He also engraved several frontispieces, and other book ornaments. We have, among others, the following portraits by him:

Sir Thomas More, Chancellor.
Desiderius Erasmus.
William Cecil, Lord Burleigh.
Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester.
Nicholas Ridley, Bishop of Rochester.
Lady Jane Grey.
James I.
William Camden, Historian, &c.
William Shakspeare.
Benjamin Jonson.
Charles I.; three prints.
Francis, Lord Bacon.
George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.
Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex; scarce.
William Alexander, Earl of Stirling; scarce.
William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury.
Nathaniel Bernard, Rector of Ramenham; scarce.
Dr. Donne, when 18 years of age. 1635.
The Reverend Dr. John Taylor.
The Reverend John Sym.
The Reverend Josia Shute.
James, the first Duke of Hamilton.
John Milton.
James Shirley, Poet.
Sir Robert Stapleton, Poet. 1646.
Sir John Suckling, Poet.
The Frontispiece to the Arcadian Princess. 1635.
————— to the Evangelical Harmony.
————— to Virgil's Works, by Ogilby.

1649.

MARSIGLIA, GUGLIELMO. See MARCILLA.

MARTEAU, GILES DE, the ELDER. This artist was born at Liege in 1722. He went to Paris when he was young, where he acquired considerable reputation as one of the most successful revivers of the dotted style of engraving, which he brought to great perfection. He was received into the Academy at Paris in 1764. He engraved several plates of academical figures, after the designs of some of the most eminent French artists. We have also, among others, the following prints by him:

The Portrait of C. Vanloo, Painter.
The Education of Cupid; after Boucher.
Venus and Cupid; after the same.
The Head of Heliodorus; from a design by Pierre; after Raffaele.
The Bust of the Virgin; after Pierre.
The Entombing of Christ; after Stellaert.
Justice protecting the Arts; after Cochin.

Lycurgus wounded by a Plebeian; after the same; his reception plate.

An allegorical Subject on the Death of the Dauphin; after the same.

A set of six Landscapes; after J. Houel.

MARTEAU, GILES DE, the YOUNGER, was the nephew and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Liege about the year 1750. He engraved some plates in the style of his uncle, which are not without merit. Among others, we have the following by him:

Innocent Pleasure; after Huel.

The favourite Lamb; after the same.

Two Hunting-pieces; after the same.

Cupid crying; after the same.

MARTENASIE, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who was a native of Antwerp, and was instructed in engraving at Paris by J. P. le Bas. We have the following prints by him:

The Watering-place; after Berghem.

The Father of a Family; after Greuze.

The Rape of the Sabines; after Rubens.

MARTIN, DAVID, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1765. He engraved several portraits, among which are,

L. F. Roubillac, Sculptor; after A. Carpentiers. 1765.

Lady F. Manners, daughter of the Marquis of Granby. 1772.

J. J. Rousseau; after Ramsay.

David Hume; after the same.

[He was also a portrait painter; he painted a half-length of Dr. Franklin, of which there is a mezzotinto print.]

MARTINELLI, GIOVANNI. This painter was a Florentine, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He was an artist to whom, Lanzi remarks, history attributes less merit than he deserves. In the Florentine gallery is a fine picture by this master of the Feast of Belshazzar; and in S. Lucia de Bardi, the Guardian Angel; but his most esteemed work is his picture of a miracle wrought by St. Anthony, at the Conventuali at Pescia.

MARTINET, ———. This lady was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1760. She was the daughter-in-law of Nicholas Dupuis, by whom she was instructed in the art of engraving. Among other prints, she engraved a large plate, representing the Death of Adonis, from a picture by Bianchi. She had a brother, who engraved several small plates of views, vignettes, animals, &c.

MARTINEZ, AMBROSIO, was born at Granada about the year 1630, and was brought up in the school of Alonzo Cano. By the instruction of that distinguished artist, he became a reputable historical painter. His principal works are in the church of the Monastery of San Geronimo, and at the Carmelites, in his native city. He died at Granada in 1674.

MARTINEZ, JUSEPE. This Spanish painter was born at Saragossa in 1612, and went young to Italy, where he studied some years at Rome. On his return to Spain he was employed in several considerable works for the churches and convents at Saragossa. Palomino mentions a series of pictures of the life of our Saviour in the cloister of S. Geronimo. He died in 1682.

MARTINEZ, SEBASTIAN, a Spanish artist, born at Jaen in 1602. He was a reputable painter of history, and, according to Palomino, resided the early part of his life at Cordova, where he painted several pictures for the churches, particularly three altar-pieces in the Convent of Corpus Christi, representing the immaculate Conception, San Francisco de Assis, and the Nativity. On the death of Don Diego Velasquez, he visited Madrid, and was appointed painter to Philip IV. He died at Madrid in 1667. [Sebastian Martinez was an excellent landscape painter; and he painted many beautiful cabinet pictures, which are to be found in private collections at Jaen, Cordova, Seville, Cadiz, and Madrid. The Jesuits at Jaen had several of them, but they are dispersed, and it is not known what has become of them.]

MARTINI, GIOVANNI. This artist was a native of Udina, and flourished from the year 1501 till 1515. He was a co-disciple with Pelligrino di S. Daniello, under Giovanni Bellini. His principal work is a picture of S. Marco, in the Dome at Udina, painted in competition with his fellow student, which, according to Vasari, is little inferior to him.

MARTINI, PIETRO ANTONIO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Parma in 1739. He visited Paris when young, where his first productions were some plates, etched after Teniers, and other Flemish artists, which were finished by Le Bas. Martini was some time in London, where he engraved several plates. We have, among others, the following by him:

Heliodorus driven from the Temple; after Solimene.

Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple; after the same.

Architectural Ruins; after Robert.

The Pleasures of Summer; after Vernet.

A View of Spoleto; after the same.

A View of Porto Ercole; after the same.

A View of Avignon; after the same.

The Augurs; after Sal. Rosa; etched by Martini, and finished by Le Bas.

[MARTINO, MARCO SAN, an Italian landscape painter and engraver, who flourished about 1680. It is a dispute whether he was a native of Venice or Naples. Lanzi says he resided at Rimini, where his pictures are more generally to be met with. He ornamented his landscapes with very beautiful small figures, in which he excelled. Landscape painting, indeed, was his profession, but he did not confine his talents to that alone; he attempted works of a higher order, such as the Baptism of Constantine, in the cathedral of Rimini, and the Saint preaching in the Desert, in the college of S. Vincenzio, at Venice. Bartsch (P. gr. tom. xxi.) has described 33 prints by him of scriptural, mythological, and familiar subjects, many of which have his name, Marco San Martino. Yet some writers persist in calling him Sammartino, Sanmartino, and Sanmarchi; as Zanetti and Guarienti. The latter, after naming him Sammartino, and saying he remained most part of his life at Venice, in the next article gives the name of Marco Sanmarchi, a landscape and figure painter, much extolled by Malvasia, and flourishing about the time of Sanmartino; thus creating two artists out of one: a very common occurrence when familiar appellations are used instead of baptismal names.]

MARTINOTTI, EVANGELISTA. This painter was born at Castel Monferrato in 1634. He was a scholar of Salvator Rosa, and, according to Orlandi, excelled in painting landscapes, with figures and animals. Lanzi mentions him as a painter of history, and commends his picture of the Baptism of Christ by St. John, in the dome of Casale. He died in 1694. He had a brother, FRANCESCO MARTINOTTI, who was also a disciple of Salvator Rosa, and painted history. He died in 1674.

MARTIRELLI. This painter was born at Naples in 1670, and was a scholar of Giacomo del Po. His first attempts were in historical subjects, but not succeeding to his wishes, he abandoned that branch of the art, and applied himself to landscape painting, to which his powers were better adapted, and became a reputable artist. He imitated the style of Salvator Rosa, in the romantic wildness of his scenery, as well as in the figures with which he embellished his pictures. He died in 1720. [This is probably Gaetano Martorelli, who died in 1723.]

MARTIS, OTTAVIANO, was a native of Gubbio, and flourished from the year 1400 till 1444. Lanzi mentions a picture by him, in the church of S. Maria Nuova, painted in fresco in 1403, representing the Virgin and Infant, with a glory of angels, in which, though in a dry style, the attitudes are as graceful as any of his contemporaries.

[MARTSS, or MARSSSEN, JAN, called DE JONGE, a painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1632. Very little of his history is known. Bartsch describes six prints of battles by him, and others are mentioned by Brulliot and Nagler. Bartsch observes that he is learned in the ordonnance of his groups, and skilful in his drawing. It is only in the horses that he has not always succeeded; they are not correctly designed, and their limbs are heavy, resembling those that are condemned in the prints of Peter van Laer. His manner is somewhat peculiar; it consists of short strokes a little bent, and rarely crossed with counter-strokes; the marks of the graver are but little apparent in them. He marked his prints J. M. D. Jonge fecit, and J. M. D. J. fe.]

MARUCELLI, [or MARUSELLI] GIOVANNI STEFANO. According to Baldinucci, this artist was born in the province of Umbria in 1586. He was a scholar of Andrea Boscoli, and distinguished himself as a painter of history, although he was more celebrated as an architect and engineer. His principal residence was at Pisa, where he painted, in the tribune of the dome, Abraham and the Angels, which is admired for the elegance of the composition, and the harmony of the colouring. He died in 1646.

MARZIALE, MARCO. This painter was a native of Venice, and, according to Lanzi, flourished from 1488 till 1506. He was a scholar, or at least an imitator, of Giovanni Bellini, and painted historical subjects in a dry, stiff style. In the Conservatorio delle Penitenti at Venice, is a picture of the Purification, signed Marcus Martialis Venetus, 1488. He was living in 1506, as appears from a picture of Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, dated in that year, in the Contarini collection.

MASACCIO, MASO DI S. GIOVANNI, called. This eminent painter was born at S. Giovanni di Valdarno, in the Florentine territory, in 1401. He was first a disciple of Masolino da Panicale, whom he soon surpassed, and after the death of that master finished the works left imperfect by him. He formed his principles by studying the works of Lorenzo Ghiberti and Donatella. He learned perspective under Filippo Brunelleschi, and went to Rome to improve his design by the study of the antique. The powers of Masaccio form an epoch in the history of the art, and he is regarded as the founder of a new style characterized by the incipient grandeur of the Florentine school. Vasari observes, that the productions of his predecessors may be said to be painted; but the works of Masaccio are stamped with the genuine attributes of truth and nature. His first performances retained somewhat of the dry and Gothic stiffness which prevailed before him. Such are his S. Anna, in the church of S. Ambrogio at Florence; and his series of pictures of the Passion of our Saviour, in the chapel of S. Catherine, in the church of S. Clemente at Rome. But his celebrated fresco works in the church of S. Pietro del Carmine at Florence, are distinguished by a greatness of style unknown to his contemporaries. His compositions are studied and combined, his design daring, though correct, and his colouring tender and true, with a harmony of effect, little known at that period. The airs of his heads are distinguished by extraordinary animation and truth of expression, and are compared by Mengs to those of Raffaelle. The folds of his draperies, though minute, are simple and natural. His works became the study of the best painters who succeeded him, and were the models from which Pietro Perugino, and even Raffaelle, formed their style. There are few of his pictures to be met with in private collections. In the gallery at Florence is a portrait of a young man, which is highly esteemed. He died in 1443, in the prime of life, and was suspected to have been poisoned. Some of his works, left imperfect at his death, were finished by Filippo Lippi. [His real name, according to Zani, was Tommaso Guidi. With regard to his birth and death there is great diversity of opinion. Baldinucci says he was born in 1417, and died in 1443, which would make him only 26 years of age; Landino, the commentator on Dante, who was his contemporary, says he died at the age of 26; and so says the author of the inscription on his monument. Vasari says he was born in 1402, but does not state any thing satisfactory respecting his death. They who do not give exact dates say he died very young; 41 is not very young, but 26 is so, with regard to a painter who made such great advances in his art.]

MASCAGNI, DONATO, called FRA ARSENIO. This painter was born at Florence in 1579, and was one of the ablest scholars of Jacopo Ligozzi. Soon after leaving the school of that master, he became a monk of the order of the Servi, and took the name of Fra Arsenio, by which he is generally known. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches at Florence, particularly for that of his monastery. His principal performance is a large picture in the library of the Servi, at Vallombrosa, which Lanzi mentions in very favourable terms. It is a copious and ingenious composition, representing Matilda, Countess of Ferrara, yielding up that state to the see of Rome. His style is more distinguished by minuteness and precision, than for elegance of design, or suavity of colour. He died in 1636.

MASCALL, EDWARD, an English portrait painter, who flourished about the year 1650. He painted a portrait of Oliver Cromwell, which was in the possession of the Duke of Chandos. We have a print of a portrait of Mascall, from a picture painted by himself, engraved by James Gammon.

MASÉ, F. DE LA, an obscure French engraver, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as having etched a plate representing St. Jerome in his Cavern, after L. de la Hire, which proves him to have been a man of ability.

MASO, DI S. FRIANO. See MANZUOLI.

MASOLINO DA PANICALE. See PANICALE.

MASON, JAMES, an eminent English engraver, who flourished about the year 1770. He engraved a great number of landscapes, after the pictures of Claude, Gaspar Poussin, and other masters; and several views in England, from the designs of Lambert, Scott, Smith, &c. [James Mason, an English landscape engraver, was born in 1710, and died in 1780. He was very eminent in his line, and his works are held in great esteem by foreign amateurs. His principal pieces are after Claude, G. Poussin, Swaneveldt, Hobbema, Wilson, Lambert, Scott, and Zuccarelli. The Landing of Æneas in Italy, after Claude, is one of his finest landscapes; and he is no less admired in the print, after Andrea Sacchi, of Venus at the Bath, surrounded by Cupids. He sometimes engraved in conjunction with Canot, Vivares, and other masters of the period, who, like himself, were employed by the enterprising Boydell.]

MASQUELIER, LOUIS JOSEPH, a modern French engraver, born at Lisle about the year 1741. He was a pupil of J. P. le Bas at Paris, where he engraved several plates, in the neat, spirited style of his instructor, which possess considerable merit, particularly his landscapes. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The arrival of Voltaire in the Elysian Fields; after le Barbier.

An old Man kneeling near a Skull, called Dio-genes; after G. Douvo.

A View in Flanders; after Teniers; etched by Masquelier, and finished by Le Bas.

A Landscape, with Cattle; after P. Potter.

A pair of Landscapes; after Ruysdael; by Masquelier and Le Bas.

A View in Italy; after Vernet.

A Shipwreck; after the same.

Two Views of Ostend; after le Moay.

A Landscape, with a Waterfall; after Dietricy.

He engraved several of the plates for Le Voyage d'Italie, by St. Non. [Louis Joseph Masquelier was born at Cisoing (north) in 1741, died in 1811. He engraved several of the French battles and victories, and other subjects after Monnet and Vernet; some of the plates for the voyage of La Peyroune; and numerous designs illustrative of the Metamorphoses of Ovid, the Fables and the Kisses of Dorat; and, in conjunction with M. Née, the work entitled, "Tableaux de la Suisse," consisting of 216 plates in folio. He was also director of the publication of "La Galerie de Florence," for which he engraved several of the pictures, statues, cameos, and bas-reliefs. Numerous other works were produced by him, well known to the amateurs of engraving.]

[MASQUELIER, NICOLAS FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, called THE YOUNG, was a relation and scholar of the preceding. He was born at Lille in 1760, and died in 1809. He received lessons also from Vatteau and Guéret. He engraved a Corps-de-garde, after Leduc; Cæsar at the Tomb of Alexander, after S. Bourdon; Extreme Unction, after Jouvenet; Christ at the Column, after Vouet; for the Musée Robillard; and several other pieces for the same collection. He also assisted in engraving the cameos and bas-reliefs for the "Galerie de Florence."]]

MASSARD, JOHN, a modern French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1740. He was a pupil of J. G. Wille, and has engraved several plates in the neat, finished style of that artist. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

The Family of Charles I.; after Vandyck.
Louis XVI. of France, when Dauphin.

Marie-Antoinette, his consort.
Nicholas de Livri, Bishop of Callinique; after L. Toqué.

SUBJECTS.

The Virgin and Infant; after Vandyck.
Abraham and Hagar; after the same.
Eve presenting the forbidden Fruit to Adam;
after Cignani.
The broken Pitcher; after Greuze.
The benevolent Lady; after the same.

[Gabet ("Dictionnaire des Artistes de l'École Française") says he was born at Bèlesme in 1740, and died in 1822, and that he had no other master than his own taste and aptitude for design. He engraved several of the plates for "Le Galerie de Florence," and for the collection of the "Musée," published by Filhol. Among his most esteemed works are, the Death of Socrates, after David; and La plus Belle des Mères, after Van Dyck; several of his engravings after Raphael, Domenichino, Cignani, and Rembrandt, are deservedly held in estimation. For a list of his principal works, see Nagler.]

[MASSARD, JEAN BAPTISTE RAPHAEL URBAIN, son and scholar of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1775; he studied design in the school of David. He engraved many of the plates for the beautiful editions of Virgil and Racine, published by Didot, and also for "Le Musée Robillard," and other collections. The St. Cecilia, after Raphael; Apollo and the Muses, after Giulio Romano; and Hippocrates refusing the Presents of Artaxerxes, are among his most esteemed works: but there are many others entitled to high commendation. He was living in 1831. Nagler has given a list of a great part of his best prints.]

MASSARI, LUCIO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1569, and was some time a scholar of Bartolomeo Passerotti; but he afterwards studied in the great school of the Caracci. His style resembles that of Annibale, rather than Lodovico; and in some of his works he approaches so near to his manner, that they may easily be mistaken for those of that master. Of this description are his pictures of the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the church of S. Benedetto at Bologna; Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, at the Celestini; and his two altarpieces in S. Michele in Bosco. In his picture of S. Gaetano, in the church of the Theatins, he appears to have imitated the style of his friend and fellow student, Albano, particularly in the glory of angels, which is entirely in the graceful manner of that master. Although he generally made choice of cheerful and pleasing subjects, his powers were not competent to the more arduous exhibition of the tragical and terrific. Such are his pictures of the Murder of the Innocents, in the Palazzo Bonfigliuola; and Christ bearing his Cross, at the Certosa, a grand and copious composition, with an admirable variety in the expression of the heads, and of the most impressive effect. He died in 1633.

MASSARO, NICCOLO. This artist was a Neapolitan, and a scholar of Salvator Rosa. He painted landscapes, which resemble those of his instructor more in his forms and scenery than in his colouring, which is languid and weak. As he was not successful in the design of the figure, he was assisted in the decoration of his pictures by other artists, particularly by Antonio di Simone, a painter little known. He died in 1704.

MASSAROTTI, ANGELO. He was born at Cremona in 1655, and for some time studied under Agostino Bonisoli, in his native city. He afterwards visited Rome, where he became a scholar of Carlo Cesi. One of his first performances was an altarpiece for the church of S. Salvatore in Lauro. Although he resided several years at Rome, his style partakes more of the Cremonese than the Roman taste. He trusted little to his imagination, but usually painted each individual figure from a portrait before him. By this servile habit, he could hardly avoid the vices of a mannerist. His principal work is a large picture in the church of S. Agostino, representing that saint distributing his regulations to his different orders. He died in 1723.

[MASSÉ, CHARLES. See MACÉ.]

MASSÉ, JOHN BAPTIST, a French miniature painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1681. In the early part of his life he applied himself to engraving, but having made some attempts to paint portraits in miniature, he met with such success, that he adopted it as his principal profession, although he arrived at a celebrity as an engraver, which procured him a reception into the Academy at Paris. He undertook the direction of the engravings from the pictures by Le Brun, in the gallery of Versailles, for which he made some of the designs. The work consists of fifty-two plates, entitled La grande galerie de Versailles et les deux salons qui l'accompagnent, dessinée par J. B. Massé et gravée par les meilleurs maîtres du tems, Paris, 1752. He engraved, himself, the following prints:

Mary de Medicis, Queen of Henry IV., a frontispiece to the Luxembourg gallery; after Rubens.
The Portrait of Anthony Coppel, Painter; after a picture by himself; engraved by Massé, for his reception at the Academy.

Mercury sent by Venus to dispose Dido in favour of Æneas; after J. Cotelie.

The Abbé Fontenai says he was born on the 29th of December, 1687, and died the 26th of September, 1767.]

MASSEI, GIROLAMO. This painter was a native of Lucca, and, according to Baglione, flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Paul V., where he painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices. In S. Luigi de Francesi is an altar-piece by him, representing the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; and in the Trinità de Monti there are several pictures in fresco of the Life and Miracles of St. Francis of Paula. Agostino Taja, in his Descrizione del Vaticano, says, he was one of the artists selected by Fra Ignazio Danti, superintendent of the works, to ornament the loggie of the Vatican, where he was employed several years. He returned to Lucca towards the latter part of his life, where he died at the age of 80.

MASSI, G. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of Cardinal Alaman Salviati; after P. Nelli; dated 1730.

MASSINI, C. The name of this artist, who was apparently a painter, is affixed to a slight etching, after G. F. Greut, representing Penelope weaving her web.

MASSON, ANTHONY. This celebrated French engraver was born near Orleans in 1636. He was bred to the business of an armourer, and first exercised the burin in gravng ornaments on steel. Early in his life he settled at Paris, where he applied himself to drawing with great assiduity, and acquired some celebrity in painting and designing portraits.

But he is principally distinguished as an engraver; and in some of his plates, particularly his portraits, he reached an excellence which has seldom been surpassed. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with surprising firmness and facility, and at the same time with the utmost delicacy. His portrait of Brisacier, known by the name of the Grey-headed Man, is a model of lightness and precision. That of Olivier d'Ormesson is also admirable. Of his subjects, the celebrated print of Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, after Titian, commonly called the Table-cloth, may be regarded as a chef-d'œuvre in that style of engraving. The following is an ample list of the works of this eminent artist:

PORTRAITS.

Anne of Austria, Queen of France; after P. Mignard.
 Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France; after N. Mignard.
 Maria Anne Victoria of Bavaria, Dauphiness.
 Louis Augustus, Duke du Maine, ad vivum sc.
 John James de Mesmes, Count d'Avaux. 1683.
 Francis de Beauvilliers, Duke de St. Aignau.
 Francis Rouxel de Medavi, Archbishop of Rouen. 1677.
 Maria de Lorraine, Duchess de Guise; after N. Mignard.
 The Count D'Harcourt, called the Cadet de la perle; after N. Mignard; extremely fine.
 Nicholas de Lamoignon, Count de Courson. 1676.
 Jerome Bignon, Librarian to the King. 1686.
 Denis Marini, Secretary to the King. 1672.
 Louis Verjus, Count de Crecy. 1679.
 Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg. 1683; scarce.
 Guido Patin, Med. Doct.; engraved in a singular style; rare.
 Charles Patin, his son, M. D.
 Francis Maria, Doge of Genoa. 1685.
 Hardouin de Beaumont, Archbishop of Paris; after N. Mignard.
 Emanuel Theodore, Duke d'Albert; after the same.
 Gaspar Charrier, Secretary to the King; after Blanchet.
 Alexander du Puy, Marquis of St. André; after de Seve.
 Louis, Duke de Vendome; after P. Mignard.
 G. de Brisacier, Secretary to the Queen, called the Grey-headed Man; very fine.
 Olivier le Fevre d'Ormesson, President of the Parliament. 1668; very fine.
 Peter Dupuis, Painter to the King; after N. Mignard.
 Anthony Massou, engraver to the King; se ipse fecit.
 The following heads, as large as life, though finely engraved, are less happy in the execution than the preceding portraits.
 Louis XIV. with a Hat; ad vivum fecit. 1687.
 Louis XIV.; a large oval; after C. le Brun.
 Louis the Dauphin, his son, with a Hat.
 Philip, Duke of Orleans.
 John Baptist Colbert, Prime Minister. 1677.
 Francis de Harley, Archbishop of Paris. 1684.
 Claude du Housset. 1681.
 Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount de Turenne.
 Nicholas Potier de Novion, President of the Parliament. 1679.
 William de Lamoignon, President of the Parliament. 1675.

Charles Colbert, Marquis de Croissi; after H. Gascar.

SUBJECTS.

St. Jerome in Meditation; Masson, sc.
 The Holy Family; after N. Mignard.
 Christ with the Pilgrims at Emmaus; after Titian. This print is celebrated by the name of the Table-cloth; very fine.
 The Assumption of the Virgin; after Rubens; fine and scarce.
 The Brazen Serpent; after the same; in two sheets; fine.

[He died at Paris in 1700. For a critical account of his prints, see Dumesnil, tom. ii.]

MASSON, MAGDALENE. This ingenious lady was the daughter of the preceding artist, born at Paris about the year 1660, and was a pupil of her father, in whose fine style she engraved several portraits, or heads, as large as life. Among others, we have the following by her:

Elizabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans; Mad. Masson, sc.
 Elizabeth of Orleans, Duchess of Alençon; after P. Mignard.
 Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France; after Habert.
 Elizabeth Maria Josephine, Infanta of Spain.
 Victor Amedeus II., Duke of Savoy.

MASTELLETTA, IL. See DONDUCCI.

MASUCCI, AGOSTINO. This painter was born at Rome in 1691, and was the last scholar of Carlo Maratti. Without the possession of great vigour or energy, his powers were equal to the subjects he usually treated, which, for the most part, were holy families, and subjects of the Virgin. In his small pictures he rivals his master in the amiable character of his Madonnas, and the pleasing arrangement of his compositions. Of his works in the churches and public edifices at Rome, the most esteemed are his picture of S. Anna, in the church del Nome SS. di Maria; and the Holy Family, in S. Maria Maggiore. In the church of the Osservanti, at Macerata, is an admired picture of S. Francesco; but his most considerable work is his S. Bonaventura, at Urbino, an ingenious and abundant composition, mentioned by Lanzi in very favourable terms. He died in 1758.

MATHAM, JAMES, [OR JACOB,] a Dutch engraver, born at Haerlem in 1571. He was the son-in-law of Henry Goltzius, by whom he was instructed in the art; and, by his advice, went to Italy, where he engraved several plates after the works of the most eminent Italian masters. On his return to Holland he worked under the eye of Goltzius, and executed a great variety of prints, after the ablest painters of the Low Countries. He worked entirely with the graver, which he handled with great freedom and facility. It is to be regretted that his drawing is not more correct. He sometimes marked his prints with a monogram, composed of I. M. A. IA. The following are his principal works, many of which are highly esteemed:

PORTRAITS.

Philip William, Prince of Orange; after M. Mirevelt.
 Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange. 1610.
 Bust of Philip Winghius, inscribed Henricus Goltzius Amicitia ergo delineabat Romæ.

Michel Angelus, Buonarotus.
Abraham Bloemaert; after Paul Moreelse.

SUBJECTS AFTER ITALIAN MASTERS.

The Holy Family, with St. Anne; after Raffaëlle.
Mount Parnassus, with Apollo and the Muses;
after the same.
The Holy Family, with St. Catherine; after Titian. 1592.
The Alliance of Venus with Bacchus and Ceres;
after the same.
The Visitation of the Virgin; after Salviati.
Christ washing the Feet of his Disciples; after Taddeo Zuccaro.
Christ praying on the Mount; after the same.
The Nativity; after the same.
The Assumption of the Virgin; after the same.
The Adoration of the Kings; after Fed. Zuccaro.
Christ curing the Sick; after the same.
Christ raising the Widow's Son; after the same.
The Visitation of the Virgin; after Paolo Veronese.

SUBJECTS AFTER GOLTZIUS.

The Fall of our first Parents.
The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth.
The Crucifixion, with the Virgin and St. John.
Christ appearing to Magdalene. 1602.
Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus.
The Loves of the Gods, Jupiter and Europa, Apollo and Leucothoe, Mars and Venus, and Hercules and Dejanira; four plates.
Perseus and Andromeda. 1597.
The Four Seasons; in four circular plates. 1589.
Faith, Hope, and Charity. 1590.
The seven Cardinal Virtues; in seven plates.
The seven Mortal Sins; in seven plates.
The Type of Human Life; in three plates. 1592; scarce.

SUBJECTS AFTER GERMAN AND DUTCH MASTERS.

Abraham sending away Hagar; after Ab. Bloemaert.
The Annunciation; after the same.
The Adoration of the Shepherds; after the same.
Jupiter and Danaë; after the same.
Cupid and Psyche; after the same.
Samson and Dalilah; after Rubens.
The dead Christ, with the Marys; after Jer. Franck.
The Crucifixion; after Albert Durer; scarce.
Venus asleep, surprised by Satyrs; after Rottenhamer.
A set of five prints of Fruit-pieces, and the Interiors of Kitchens; after Peter van Aertsen, called Long Peter; scarce.

[He died in 1631.]

MATHAM, THEODORE, was the son and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Haerlem about the year 1600. After engraving a few plates in his own country he went to Italy, where he entered the school of Cornelius Bloemaert; in conjunction with Michael Natalis, Renier de Persyn, and others, he engraved the statues in the Palazzo Giustiniani. On his return to Holland, he engraved a variety of plates, principally portraits, which are executed with the graver, occasionally assisted with the point, in a clear, free style. He usually signed his plates with his initials T. M., with the addition of fecit or sculpsit. We have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Michael le Blon, Agent to the Crown of Sweden;
after Vandycck.
Joost van de Vondel, Dutch Poet; after Sandrart.

Vopiscus Fortunatus Plempius, Med. Doct.; after Backer.

D. Gerardus Vossius, Canonicus Cantuariensis;
after Sandrart.
Gaspar Barlæus, Med. Doct.; after the same.
Philip William, Count Palatine of the Rhine;
after J. Spilberg.
Wolfgang William, Count Palatine; after the same.
Stephen Vacht, Dean of Sarten; after the same.
Claudius a Salmasi; after Dubordieu.
Henricus Regius, Med. Doct.; after H. Bloemaert.
D. Leonardus Marius Gozeanus, Professor Coloniensis; after N. Moyaert.

SUBJECTS.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. John; after Bassano.
The Holy Family; after J. Sandrart.
Diana and Acteon; Th. Matham, fec.
The Descent from the Cross, with the Marys, St. John, and Joseph of Arimathea; after Gerardus Leydamus; fine.

[According to Zani he was the third son of James, or Jacob Matham, and was living in 1678; but Nagler places his birth in 1589, when his father was only 18. It may therefore be concluded that he was the eldest son of Jacob.]

MATHAM, ADRIAN. This artist was of the same family as the two preceding engravers, born at Haerlem about the year 1600. He engraved part of the plates for the Académie de l'Espée, published at Antwerp in 1628. We have also some portraits and a few grotesque subjects by him. He worked entirely with the graver, in a style resembling that of J. de Gheyn the elder, though very inferior to that artist, both in execution and design. The following are his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

James Graham, Marquis of Montrose.
Peter Bor Christiaensz, Historian; after F. Hals.
D. Sibrandus Sixtius Oistervirius; after N. Moyaert.

SUBJECTS.

The Golden Age; after H. Goltzius. 1620.
An old Man caressing a Woman, to whom he presents his Purse; after the same.
Two Beggars, the Man playing on a Viol, the Woman singing; after A. Vander Venne.
A Combat of six grotesque Figures; after the same.

[Zani says he was the second son of James, and flourished to the middle of the 17th century. There is an error in the date of his birth, or that of his brother Theodore. Of Jan Matham, mentioned by Zani as the first son of Jacob, and as a portrait painter, no notice is taken by any other writer.]

MATHEUS, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1620. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and engraved several plates of frontispieces, and other book ornaments, in a neat, finished style. They possess considerable merit, and are, for the most part, from his own designs. Among others, we have the following by him:

The Adoration of the Magi; from his own designs.
The Frontispiece to a General History of France; published at Paris in 1619.
A Frontispiece to the Works of Thomas Aquinas. 1622.
Another Frontispiece to Amours d'Endimion et de la Lune. 1624.

MATHEY, C. The name of this engraver is affixed to the portrait of Arcangelo Corelli, the Musician, after Howard.

MATHIEU, A., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1656. We have by him some spirited etchings, retouched with the graver, in a style somewhat resembling the works of Callot, for a thin folio volume, entitled Les Armes triomphantes de son Altesse Monseigneur le Duc d'Esperon pour le sujet de son heureuse entrée, faite dans la ville de Dijon. 1656.

[MATHIEU, or MATTHIEW, JEAN, an engraver born in 1749, was a pupil of Longueil. He was one of the artists employed in the "Voyage de la Grece," by Choiseul Gouffier, in the "Voyages des Royaumes de Naples et de Sicile," by St. Non, and "Voyage d'Espagne," by Laborde. Some of his engravings are in the Poullain Cabinet, and in the Galerie de Florence. He engraved La Vierge aux Candelabres, after Raphael; and subjects after Caracci, Claude, G. Poussin, F. Mola, K. du Jardin, J. Veret, Ruisdael, and Wouwerman. He died at Fontainebleau in 1815.]

MATHYSSENS, ABRAHAM, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp about the year 1570. According to M. Descamps, he was a reputable painter both of history and landscapes. In the cathedral at Antwerp is a picture by him of the Death of the Virgin; and in the church of the Recollets, an altar-piece, representing the Virgin and infant Saviour, with St. Francis.

[MATON, B., a Dutch painter, who copied the works of Gerard Don and William Mieris. He was particularly successful in his copies of Dou's candle-light pieces, giving them great force and brilliancy, but with less of finish than in the originals. His pictures are to be found in some of the best collections; sometimes his name is suffered to remain, that is to say, when the picture belongs to an honourable collector. There are no particulars of him recorded, but from the appearance of his works he lived about the time of William Mieris. His pictures are of small dimensions, and on panel.]

MATSYS, [METSYS,] or MESSIS, QUINTIN, called the BLACKSMITH of ANTWERP. According to Van Mander, this painter was born at Antwerp in 1450, and, until he was twenty years of age, followed the laborious calling of a blacksmith. The cause of his quitting the anvil for the palette, is said to have originated in his having conceived a strong attachment to the daughter of an artist of his time, who had determined she should marry no other than a painter. Finding her father inflexible in his resolution, he abandoned his devotion to Vulcan, and became an humble worshipper at the shrine of the Muses. This account of his conversion to the art is supported by the verses of Lampsonius, affixed to his portrait, engraved by Jerome Cock; and by the inscription on his monument, in the cathedral at Antwerp; Connubialis amor de Muleibre fecit Apellem. It is not known under whom he studied, or whether he had the advantage of any particular instruction; but he became one of the most eminent painters of his time in the dry minute style prevalent at that period. His most considerable work is an altar-piece, with two folding-doors, in the chapel of the Circumcision, in the cathedral at Antwerp. The centre picture represents the dead Christ on the knees of the Virgin, with Mary Magdalene, and other figures. On one side of the shutters is the daughter of Herod with the Head of St. John; and on the other St. John in the cauldron of boiling oil. Of this curious performance, Sir Joshua Reynolds gives the following description. "In the Pietá, the Christ appears starved to death, in which manner it was the custom of the painters of that age always to represent a dead Christ; but there are heads in this picture not exceeded by Raffaele, and indeed not unlike his manner of painting portraits, hard and minutely finished. The head of Herod, and that of a fat man near the Christ, are excellent. The painter's own portrait is here introduced. In the banquet, the daughter is rather beautiful, but too skinny and lean." In his Majesty's collection is his well-known representation of the Misers; and in the gallery of the Louvre are three pictures by him, which, in the French invasion of Flanders, were deemed sufficiently curious and interesting to become the objects of their plunder. They represent the Holy Family; the Marriage of Zachary and St. Elisabeth; and Zachary struck dumb, for his incredulity. He died at Antwerp in 1529. [Guicciardini says he was of Louvain, and other circumstances support the assertion. The story of his conversion from a blacksmith to a painter is romantic, and it is a pity to disturb it, especially as it is of no moment, and is a pleasing vulgar error. The much-talked of Misers, at Windsor Castle, is one of a numerous family of the same subject, all claiming the same paternity, and having only such slight differences as appear in children of one father. The pictures taken by the French are not now in the Louvre. It may be conjectured that the works in iron at Antwerp, at Arschot, and in England, are rather from his designs than the actual labour of his hands: he was too much employed with the palette to bestow much time on the anvil. He made a medallion bust of the celebrated Erasmus, four inches and a quarter in diameter. The head is in profile, similar to that by Holbein; it is surrounded by the following inscription in Greek capitals: ΘΗΝ ΚΡΕΙΤΤΟ ΤΑ ΣΥΓΓΡΑΜΜΑΤΑ ΔΕΙΞΕΙ: and in Roman, IMAGO AD VIVA EFFIGIE EXPRESSA, 1519. In the field ER. ROT. On the reverse is the figure of the god Terminus, the word TERMINUS on the cube block, and in the field CONCEDO NULLI. The first part of the inscription is in Greek, and the second in Roman capitals: ΟΡΑ ΤΕΛΟΣ ΜΑΚΡΟΥ ΒΙΟΥ: MORS ULTIMA LINEA RERU. Erasmus alludes to it in one of his epistles, in which he says Quintin Metsys has got his head in metal. The editor has one in Teutonic metal. In Roscoe's Life and Pontificate of Leo X., Bohn's 8vo edition, 1846, vol. ii. p. 128, is one closely resembling it, but bearing the date 1531, having no Greek inscription.

List of Pictures by, and attributed to, Quintin Matsys.

1. Joachim and St. Anne, at the golden gate; at Schleissheim.
- 2, 3. Death of St. Anne, and Joachim driven from the Temple; wings of a triptique, in the church of St. Peter, at Louvain.
4. An Angel announces to Zachariah the pregnancy of Elisabeth; formerly in the church of St. Peter, at Louvain. (Descamps.)
5. Mary and the Infant Jesus surrounded by Saints of both sexes; a centre panel, in the same church.
6. Holy Family, with the infant St. John; a drawing in the collection of the Prince de Ligne.
7. Holy Family, Joseph holding a shell.
8. A Virgin, mentioned by Karel van Mander.
9. Mary and the infant Jesus; formerly in the church of the Nuns of St. Elisabeth, or of Sion, at Brussels. (Descamps.)

10. Mary kissing the infant Jesus; at Keddleston. Waagen is of opinion that it is by Jan Matsys.
11. The same subject in the Berlin Museum.
12. Mary and the infant Jesus; the latter holds an apple near his mouth; engraved by Ralph Sadler.
13. The Virgin as Queen of Heaven, holding the Infant in her arms, surrounded by angels, and resting her feet on a crescent; above is a representation of the First and Third Persons of the Trinity. In the collection of the king of Holland. At the demolition of the church of St. Donat, at Bruges, this picture was found between two walls, where it was enclosed, probably to preserve it from the Iconoclasts. It received some injury from the bricks on its removal, but has been very carefully restored.
14. Adoration of the Magi; in the royal Museum, at Naples.
15. Adoration of the Magi; in the Pinacothek; in his manner.
16. The Circumcision; a circular drawing with the pen; cabinet de M. Villenave.
17. The Circumcision; at Munich.
18. Riposo of the Holy Family; an engraving mentioned by Zani and Brulliot.
19. The Head of John the Baptist presented to Herodias; left wing of the famous triptique, at Antwerp.
20. Parable of the Unjust Steward; at Vienna.
21. The same subject, half-size figures; in the Doria Gallery.
22. Christ before Pilate; in the ducal palace, at Venice.
23. Jesus crowned with Thorns; the heads only of the people seen; formerly in the church of the Nuns of St. Elisabeth, or Sion, at Brussels. (Descamps.)
24. The Crucifixion; in the chapel of St. Maurice, at Nuremberg.
25. Mary embracing the body of Christ; in the lower part are the crown of thorns and the nails; half-figures. A drawing in the royal cabinet of engravings at Dresden.
26. Descent from the Cross; the centre panel of the famous triptique, at Antwerp.
27. Death of St. Anne; right wing of the triptique, at Louvain.
28. Simon Magus offering money to St. Peter; formerly at Paris. (See Landon, Musée Français, tom. xiv. p. 121.)
29. Christ crowned with Thorns; in the possession of M. Boek, at Brussels.
30. Christ blessing the World; in the Museum, at Antwerp.
31. Head of the Virgin; in the Museum, at Antwerp.
32. St. Bartholomew, St. John the Evangelist, and St. John the Baptist in the middle of a landscape; in the Pinacothek.
33. St. Barbe, St. Christine, and St. Madelaine; in the Pinacothek.
34. St. Anthony in the Desert, and four other figures; devils tormenting him in the distance; a circular drawing with the pen: in the cabinet of M. Villenave.
35. The Betrothing of St. Elisabeth; formerly at Paris. (Landon, M. F. tom. xvi.)
36. St. Jerome; an old copy at Schleissheim.
37. St. Jerome in the Desert; signed QUINTIN MASTUS F. 1513; in the Lichtenstein gallery, at Vienna.
38. St. Jerome in his Study, full Daylight; at Vienna.
39. St. Jerome, a night scene; at Vienna. In the manner of Q. M.
40. St. Jerome, bust only; at Florence.
41. St. John in the Cauldron of boiling Oil; right wing of the triptique, at Antwerp.
42. St. Luke painting the Virgin, who is seated on a throne with the Infant in her arms. Engraved by A. Wierix.
43. Mary Magdalene; at Corsham House.
44. The Usurer's Family; at Dresden.
45. The Money-changer and his Wife; formerly belonging to a merchant of the name of Steneens, at Antwerp.
46. The Usurer, with his Wife leaning on his shoulder; formerly in the collection of M. Winckler, at Leipsic.
47. A Man sitting at a table weighing Gold, a young woman near him; at Dresden, but thought by some to be by Jan Matsys.
48. A Man and Woman counting Gold; in the Pinacothek.
49. The two Misers, the husband counting money, a perroquet on the left. In the castle at Windsor. There are a great many repetitions of this subject, with differences in the accessories, that have an equal claim to originality.
50. Two Usurers counting Money; in the Pinacothek.
51. Two Misers; at Vienna.
52. A Jeweller weighing pieces of Gold, his Wife examining a book of Miniatures; in the Louvre.
53. The Card-players; formerly at Antwerp.
54. An old Man courting a young Woman.
55. The Burgomaster of Aelst, Sieur Smits, possessed two monstrous caricatures by him; and there are drawings of beggars holding rosaries in their hands, and reading books of piety, in collections at Brussels.
56. Portrait of Erasmus, and his friend Peter Egidius, holding a letter from Sir Thomas More; formerly in the collection of Charles I.
57. Another portrait of Erasmus.
58. Portrait of himself; formerly in that part of the Bourse, at Antwerp, which was given to the Academy of Painting. (See Descamps.)
59. His own Portrait; in the gallery at Florence.
60. Portrait of his wife, dated 1520; in the gallery at Florence.
61. Portrait of an Abbé; at Vienna.
62. Portrait of a Dignitary of the Church; at Vienna.
63. Portrait of a Man without a beard, wearing a furred black bonnet; in his right hand he holds a ring which he appears to be showing; in the left is a rouleau of paper, on which there are four rings set with precious stones; at Vienna.
64. Portrait of a Man wearing a black habit and a barrette, with a ring on his finger; in the Uffizi gallery at Florence.
65. Portrait of a young Man holding a small drinking-glass in his right hand, and his left placed against his breast; above are two coats of arms, each containing three crows; in the gallery at Gotha.
66. Portrait of a Man in a black hat; at Berlin.
67. Portrait of a Man; in the Lichtenstein collection, at Vienna.
68. Portrait of a Jewel Merchant; formerly belonging to Rubens.

69. Portrait of a Man in a red barrette; in the style of Q. Matsys.

The foregoing list, without pretending to be complete, may be considered as tolerably accurate; no doubt there are many more in existence, but the desire is not to attribute to Quintin Matsys the copies and imitations by inferior hands. There are some eight or ten by his son Jan, which approach very near to the father: they bear date about 1563 and 1565, if they be found in their genuine state.]

MATSYS, or MESSIS, JOHN, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1480. He followed the style of his father, but was in every respect greatly inferior to him. Some of his best pictures are at Amsterdam, among which is one representing two old Men counting their Money, which is favourably spoken of by Van Mander.

MATSYS, MET, or METENSIS, CORNELIUS, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1545. We have a variety of prints by this artist, principally from his own designs, which are executed in a style resembling that of Francis de Babylone, [Jacob da Barbary?] though more correct in the drawing. It was for some time supposed that Matsys and Metensis were two different artists; but M. Heineken, with more appearance of probability, considers the prints marked with the monograms

CNE. and CMA. to have been executed by the same engraver. He sometimes signed his plates Corn. Met. He appears to have visited Italy, from the taste of his design, and the masters from whom he engraved. He is not very successful in his female heads, which are neither handsome nor expressive. The following prints are attributed to him:

The Portrait of Ernest, Count de Mansfeld, [and his wife Dorothea.]

The Cardinal Virtues.

[Portrait of Henry, King of England, with the date 1544.]

The Death of Cleopatra. 1550.

An old Man, with two old Women, one of whom holds a Basket of Eggs. 1549.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes. 1539.

A Battle; after G. Penz.

The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth; after Raffaele, Corn. Met.

The miraculous Draught of Fishes; after the same; Corn. Met. fecit.

The Entombing of Christ; after an etching by Parmigiano.

A set of Prints from the Old Testament; on some of these he has put one of the above-mentioned monograms, and also signed his name at length, Cornelius Matsys, fecit. They are dated 1549 and 1550.

[Bartsch gives a list of 58 prints by him, which Nagler has increased to 83.]

MATTEIS, PAOLO DE. This painter was born at Naples in 1662, and, according to Lanzi, was the most celebrated scholar of Luca Giordano, and an artist who might compete with the ablest of his time. In the early part of his life he went to France, where he was employed for three years in some considerable works for the court. He was invited to Rome by Benedict XIII., where he painted several pictures for la Minerva, and the church of Ara Cœli. At Genoa, in the church of S. Girolamo, are two of his admired works, representing the Immaculate Conception, with a glory of angels, and St.

Jerome appearing to S. Saverio in a dream. But the theatre of his best exertions is Naples, his principal residence, where he distinguished himself by numerous works in the churches and palaces; in which he appears to have emulated the promptness and surprising facility of his instructor, without equalling him in the vigour of his colouring, or the general effect of the chiaro-scuro. He chiefly prided himself on having painted the great Cupola of Gesu Nuovo in sixty-five days, in which there are passages which remind us of the genius and despatch of Lanfranco. He died in 1728.

MATTEUS, CORNELIUS. The name of this artist is affixed to a spirited etching of a landscape, with a ruin in the back-ground; it is executed in the style of a painter, resembling that of Herman Swanevelt. [He flourished about the year 1637. He painted landscapes and animals. Bartsch describes three etchings by him, which are very rare: they are named the Goat-herd, the Bridge, and the Muleteer.]

MATTIOLI, LODOVICO. This artist was born at Bologna in 1662, and learned design in the school of Carlo Cignani, with the intention of becoming a painter, but having made some essays in etching, he met with such encouragement that he was induced to devote himself entirely to engraving. We have a variety of etchings by him, after the Bolognese masters, as well as from his own designs; among which are the following:

The Annunciation; after Lod. Caracci; scarce.

The Circumcision; after the same.

The Nativity; after Agos. Caracci.

Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after An. Caracci.

The Death of St. Joseph; after Franceschini.

The Presentation in the Temple; after G. M. Crespi.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after the same.

[Bartsch gives a list of 140 pieces known to him, and of 23 others noticed by Gori and Füßli. Bruliot mentions several more. He died in 1747.]

MATURINO. This eminent painter was born at Florence in 1490. He was one of the artists who had the advantage of studying under Raffaele, and was employed by him in ornamenting the loggie of the Vatican. He became the intimate friend and coadjutor of Polidoro da Caravaggio, with whom he applied himself to an assiduous study of the antique bassi-rilievi, and other relics of Grecian sculpture, by which he acquired an elegance of taste, and a purity of design, in which he was only surpassed by Polidoro. In conjunction with that great master, he was much employed in ornamenting the exterior of the palaces at Rome, many of which were of extraordinary beauty; and it is much to be lamented, that, from their exposed situation, few of them have escaped the injuries of time, or the destructive fury of barbarism. One of the most celebrated of their united works was the Death of the Children of Niobe, at the Maschero d'Oro, which is now unfortunately perished; the admirable composition is however preserved to us by the print of Cherubino Alberti. The sacking of Rome by the Spaniards in 1527, separated the two friends, and interrupted their conjunctive exertions. Maturino did not long survive that disaster, but is said to have died of the plague when he was little more than 37 years of age.

MAUBERT, JAMES. This artist was probably a native of France. According to Lord Orford, he resided in England in the reign of George I. He distinguished himself by copying all the portraits of English poets he could meet with. He painted Dryden, Wycherley, Congreve, and some others, from the life. He died in the year 1746.

MAUCOURT, CHARLES, a French mezzotinto engraver, born at Paris about the year 1743, and died in London in 1768. Among other prints, we have the following by him, which is become scarce :

The Expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain; C. Maucourt, fec.

MAUPERCHE, HENRY, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1606. He painted landscapes with considerable reputation, and was received into the Academy at Paris 1655. In the apartments at Fontainebleau are several works in fresco by him. We have by him several etchings, some of which are from his own designs, and others after H. Swanevelt. The following are by him :

A set of six plates of the History of Tobit.

A set of six plates of the History of the Virgin, from the Annunciation till the Flight into Egypt.

Twelve Landscapes; after Hermann Swanevelt.

Two plates of the Prodigal Son.

Four Landscapes, with Figures and Ruins.

[Dumesnil enumerates 51 pieces by him, which he says are of great rarity on account of the extreme lightness of his point, which he did not strengthen with the aid of the graver. He died in 1686.]

MAUPIN, or MAUPAIN, PAUL. According to Basan, this artist was a native of Abbeville, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He executed some wooden cuts in chiaroscuro, after J. Stella. Basan mentions another engraver on wood, of the name of Maupain, a relation of the above-mentioned artist, but he does not specify any of his works.

MAURER, CHRISTOPHER. This artist was born at Zurich in 1558. His father, Joshua Maurer, was a painter of some merit, by whom he was instructed in the first elements of design, but he afterwards studied at Strasburg, under Tobias Stimmer, whose style he adopted. He was a reputable painter in distemper and on glass, but he distinguished himself more as an engraver, both on wood and on copper. In conjunction with Stimmer, he published some prints of animals of the chace. He executed a set of wooden cuts for the Bible, which are admired for their neatness. He also etched a set of forty plates of emblems, which were published after his death, in 1622, entitled, Emblemata miscel. nova. &c. He died at Zurich in 1614. He sometimes used the cipher M.

[For a more detailed account of his works, see Bartsch and Brulliot.]

MAURER, J. This artist was a native of Switzerland. He came to England about the year 1745, where he engraved several views of buildings, &c. in London, which are neatly executed.

[MAYER, MADEMOISELLE CONSTANCE, was instructed by Suvée, Greuze, and Prud'hon. She exhibited many portraits and subjects of fancy at the several expositions in France, from 1800 to 1821, at which time it is supposed she died. Among her works the most popular were, Innocence between Love and Riches; Venus and Cupid asleep, caressed and awakened by Zephyrus; The Torch of Venus; The happy Mother; A young Naiad repelling a Troop of Lovers who are disturbing her in her retreat; A Dream of Happiness; and a few of a less poetical character.]

MAYNO, JUAN BAUTISTA, a Spanish painter, born at Toledo in 1594. He was a scholar of Domenico delle Grecche, or Domenico Teotocopoli, under whom he proved an eminent artist. At an early period of his life he became a monk of the order of the Predicadores; but this seclusion from the world did not prevent the exercise of his talents, and he was reputed as one of the ablest painters of his time. In the convent of San Pedro the Martyr, at Toledo, there are four of his principal works, representing the Nativity, the Resurrection, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the Mystery of the Trinity; and in the same church another fine picture by Mayno, of the Repentance of St. Peter. He had the honour of being drawing-master to Philip IV., who was not only a lover of the art, but a proficient; and was employed by him to paint his celebrated battle-piece in the Buena Retiro, into which he has introduced the Duke d' Olivarez animating the troops to victory, by showing them the portrait of their King Philip. He died at Toledo in 1654. [He was born in 1569, and died in 1649, at the age of 80. He instructed Philip IV., when prince, in the art of painting, and was the patron of Alfonso Cano, and of other distinguished artists. He belonged to the order of St. Dominic.]

MAZO, DON JUAN BAUTISTA. This Spanish painter was born at Madrid in 1620, and was educated in the school of Don Diego Velasquez. He is said by Palomino to have been a universal painter, and to have equally excelled in history, portraits, and landscapes. He possessed an extraordinary talent in copying with surprising exactness the works of other masters, particularly those of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese: and was much employed by Philip IV. in copying the celebrated Venetian pictures in the royal collection, which could with difficulty be distinguished from the originals. He died at Madrid in 1670. [His name is properly Don Juan Bautista del Mazo Martinez; he died on the 10th of February, 1687, and not, as Palomino says, in 1670. He married the daughter of Velasquez, a proof of the estimation he was held in by that master. His landscapes, which are of large dimensions, are considered by his countrymen as inappreciable.]

MAZOT, ———. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as an engraver of no note, by whom we have a few very indifferent portraits; among others, that of Christian IV., King of Denmark.

MAZZA, DAMIANO. This painter was a native of Padua, and was one of the ablest disciples of Titian. He chiefly resided at Venice, where he painted some pictures for the churches, which approached nearer to the fine style of his instructor than any of his contemporaries. His most celebrated work was his picture of Ganymede taken up by the Eagle, in the Casa Sonica at Padua, which was regarded by many as a production of Titian. This promising artist died in the flower of his life, to the great regret of the admirers of art, who had formed the most sanguine expectations of his growing talent.

MAZZIERI, ANTONIO DI DONNINO. According to Vasari, this painter was a native of Florence, and a disciple of Francia Bigio. He flourished about the year 1520, and distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes and battle-pieces, which were well coloured, and touched with great spirit.

MAZZOCCHI, PAOLO. See UCCELLO.

MAZZOLINI, LODOVICO, called MAZZOLINI DI

FERRARA. This painter was born at Ferrara about the year 1481. He must not be confounded with Mazzolino, a Milanese, mentioned by Lomazzo in his Idea del Tempio della Pittura. Mazzolini of Ferrara is stated by Barrufaldi to have been a scholar of Lorenzo Costa. He was less successful in his large pictures than those of an easel size, which are spoken of by Lanzi in very favourable terms. In the church of S. Francesco at Bologna is an altar-piece of Christ disputing with the Doctors, and a small picture below it of the Nativity, which is much superior to the large picture. His works are very highly finished, and each object is designed with great neatness and precision. In the Florentine gallery is a small picture by him of the Holy Family, with St. Anne and St. Joachim. He died in 1530. [Two easel pictures by this painter in the English National Gallery, will give a better idea of his style than can be conveyed by description. In Mr. Edward Solly's collection there was one of extraordinary size, 5 feet by 4 feet, representing the Destruction of Pharaoh and his Host in the Sea. It was dated 1521, and is engraved in Agincourt's work.]

MAZZONI, CESARE, was born at Bologna in 1678, and was first a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli, and afterwards studied under Giovanni Gioseffo da Sole. There are several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Bologna, which prove him to have been a respectable painter of history. In S. Colombano, the chief altar-piece is by him, representing that saint kneeling before the Virgin and Infant. In S. Tommaso di Strada Maggiore is the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and other figures; and in S. Giovanni in Monte, St. Peter delivered from Prison. He died in 1763.

MAZZONI, GIULIO, was a native of Piacenza, but studied at Rome under Daniele di Volterra, and flourished about the year 1568. He is mentioned by Vasari, in the life of that distinguished master, as a painter of considerable merit. His principal work is the Four Evangelists in the dome at Piacenza. Though deficient in foreshortening, he was respectable in every other branch.

MAZZUCHELLI. See MORAZZONE.

MAZZUOLI, FRANCESCO, called IL PARMIGIANO. This admired painter was the son of Pier Ilario Mazzuoli, an obscure artist, born at Parma, according to the Padre Affò, who has written his life, in 1503; Vasari says, in 1504. His father dying when he was very young, he was brought up under his uncles, Filippo and Michele, who taught him what they knew of the art; and such was the vivacity of his genius, that, without the advantage of superior instruction, at the age of sixteen, he painted his picture of the Baptism of Christ by St. John, in the church of the S. Annunziata, at Parma, which was the astonishment of his contemporary artists. Surrounded with the admirable productions of Coreggio, he appears to have studied them with the greatest attention and success. The congeniality of their taste is not unaptly expressed by an elegant modern poet:

"Soft as Catullus, sweet Coreggio play'd,
With all the magic charms of light and shade;
Though Parma claim it for her rival son,
The praise of sweetest grace thy pencil won."

Hayley.

His earliest works were entirely in the style of that exquisite painter; such are his S. Bernardo at the Osservanti at Parma, and the Holy Family, in the collection of the Presidente Bertoli. The desire of seeing the works of Michael Angelo and Raffaele, led him to Rome when he was twenty years of age, where his talents recommended him to the notice of Clement VII., for whom he painted a picture of the Circumcision, for the palace of the Vatican, his first production in that metropolis. He now embellished his taste by imitating the grace and dignity of Raffaele, and invigorated his design by contemplating the gigantic energy of Buonaroti. Vasari reports that it was said at Rome, "that the soul of Raffaele had passed into the person of Parmigiano." Mazzuoli was high in his patron's favour, and in the public estimation, when his flattering career was interrupted by the sacking of Rome in 1527. This event, so disastrous to the arts and artists of that capital, obliged him to take refuge at Bologna, where he painted some altar-pieces for the churches, among which was his celebrated picture of the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John, St. Margaret, and St. Jerome; in S. Margherita. This distinguished performance was long the admiration and the study of the Caracci; and is now in the gallery of the Louvre. In the church of S. Petronio is a grand picture of S. Rocco, a noble and dignified performance. On his return to Parma he was engaged to paint in fresco the vault of la Madonna della Steccata, where he represented Adam and Eve, and his famed chiaro-scuro of Moses breaking the Tables of the Law, in which the sublimity of the idea, and the great style of the design, render it one of the grandest productions of the Lombard school. Of his easel pictures, one of his most admired compositions is the Virgin and Infant, with St. Catherine, St. John, and St. Jerome, in the Florentine gallery, of which there are several repetitions. Another celebrated picture by him, representing the Virgin and Child, with Mary Magdalene and Angels, called La Madonna del collo lungo, was formerly in the same collection, and is now in the French Museum. To the prejudice of his reputation, and the detriment of the art, this accomplished painter was unfortunately addicted to the ruinous mania of alchymy, and wasted his substance and his health in the absurd pursuit of the philosopher's stone. This fatal infatuation occasioned him to neglect, and at last to abandon, the important works he was engaged in at the Steccata, and having received several sums of money in advance, he was prosecuted by the confraternity. He fled to Casale Maggiore, where he died of a fever, brought on by disappointment and chagrin, at the age of 37.

The style of Parmigiano is distinguished by a seductive elegance of contour, and the most captivating grace in his attitudes. His design, though sometimes learned and severe, is frequently more tasteful than correct; and though his forms are beautiful, and the characters of his heads full of sweetness and expression, they are not always exempt from the appearance of affectation. In aiming at extreme delicacy, he occasionally fell into meagreness and manner. He was generally an enchanting colourist, and was a profound master of the magic of chiaro-scuro. As an engraver Francesco Mazzuoli has been erroneously supposed to have been the inventor of etching; but it was practised in Germany a considerable time before him; though he is considered as the first artist who exercised the point in Italy. This is rendered extremely probable, by the difficulty he appears to have laboured under in the mechanical part of the execution of some of his first prints. His plates are scratched in with the point, and being sometimes not well corroded with the aqua fortis, they are retouched with the graver, without much delicacy of execution. From his inexperience in the process, his earliest etchings are seldom clear, or perfect, though some of those executed in the latter part of his life are greatly superior. These defects are, however, amply compensated by the tasteful arrangement of his subjects, and the spirit and animation of his design. It is very difficult to meet with fine impressions of his prints, as the plates have been much retouched, and have been frequently copied. The originals are distinguishable by the superior expression in the heads, and the elegance of the outline. We have a number of wooden cuts from his designs, printed in chiaro-scuro, which have been incorrectly said to have been executed by himself; but it is perfectly ascertained that he only superintended their execution by Ugo da Carpi, Antonio da Trento, Andrea Andreani, and others. Antonio Zanetti has lately considerably added to their number. We have the following etchings by this distinguished artist:

Moses and the Burning Bush; supposed to have been his first plate.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes.

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife.

A set of thirteen plates of Christ and the Apostles. The Nativity.

The Marriage of St. Catherine.

The Holy Family, with St. John presenting a Basket of Flowers.

The Holy Family, with Zacharias.

Another Holy Family, with St. John embracing the infant Jesus.

The Entombing of Christ. Guido has copied this print.

The Resurrection, with several Soldiers.

A Man and a Woman seated, in a landscape.

A Mother instructing her four Daughters.

A Shepherd resting on his Crook.

Diogenes seated near his Tub. There is a wooden cut of this subject, by Ugo da Carpi.

St. Peter and St. Paul healing the lame Man; after Raffaello; fine.

[The real name of this painter was GIROLAMO FRANCESCO MARIA MAZZOLA, though he is better known by that of Parmigiano, or Parmigianino. He was the son of Filippo Mazzola, and was brought up by his uncles Michele and Pier Ilario Mazzola. The picture mentioned as being in the French Museum is not there now. The Vision of St. Jerome is in the English National Gallery. This picture was painted in his twenty-fourth year. Zani denies that he was ever addicted to alchymy, or that he engraved on wood. Bartsch has given a description of fifteen etchings by him, the titles of which are given below: and twenty-six more, marked with the letters F. P., formerly attributed to Parmigiano; but which, with various others, will be found to be only after his designs, and more likely to be by Andrea Meldolla, and other contemporary artists. See MELDOLLA.

List of Prints by Parmigiano, as given by Bartsch.

1. Judith holding the Head of Holofernes and the Sword, &c.
2. The Annunciation, with the Holy Spirit descending, &c.
3. The Nativity. The Virgin seated and covering the Infant.

4. The Holy Virgin, holding the Infant in her Arms.
5. The Entombment of Jesus Christ.
6. The Resurrection of Christ.
7. St. Peter and St. John curing the lame Man at the Temple Gate.
8. St. James the Great.
9. St. Philip.
10. Ste. Thais, or some other holy recluse.
11. Love Asleep.
12. A Shepherd standing, supporting himself with a Stick.
13. A young Man and two old ones.
14. The two Lovers.
15. The Astrologer.

Of these, No. 9, St. Philip, is not by Parmigiano; Bartsch himself describes it among the prints of Guido, No. 47: neither is the print of the Astrologer, No. 15, by this master. There are two other prints by Parmigiano which were unknown to Bartsch; a Judith, and the Study of an Arm.]

MAZZUOLI, GIROLAMO, was the son of Michele Mazzuoli, and the cousin and scholar of Parmigiano, whose graceful style he followed with considerable success. His works are chiefly confined to Parma and its vicinity, although there are some of his pictures in the churches at Mantua and Pavia. He did not accompany Francesco to Rome, preferring the study of the works of Coreggio. It is believed that several of his pictures have, from the similarity of their manner, been attributed to Parmigiano, which will account for the paucity of his productions, though he lived to an advanced age. After the death of Francesco, he was employed to finish the pictures at the Steccata, left imperfect by that master, and painted his celebrated fresco of the Last Supper, in the refectory of the monks of S. Giovanni Evangelista, a grand composition, in which he displayed the fecundity of his invention and the facility of his hand. In the church of S. Benedetto, at Mantua, is another of his most considerable fresco works, representing the Multiplication of the Loaves. Of his pictures in oil, one of the most admired is the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the church of the Carmelites, in which he appears to have emulated the graces of Coreggio. He was living in 1580. [Zani says this painter's real name was Girolamo di Melchiorre Bedolo, but commonly called Girolamo Mazzola, because he was the son-in-law of Pier Ilario of that name, whose daughter Elena he married. As Pier Ilario was uncle to Parmigiano, Bedolo became his cousin by marriage. Punglione notices, that of the ten colossal figures of Children in the arches of the cupola of the cathedral at Parma, painted in chiaro-scuro, six are by the hand of Coreggio, and the other four are by Girolamo Bedoli detto Mazzola.]

MAZZUOLI, ALESSANDRO, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, and painted history in the style of his father, but was greatly inferior in every respect. In 1571 he was employed in some fresco works in the dome at Parma. [This painter, being the son of the preceding, should also be called Bedolo. He died in 1608.]

MAZZUOLI, GIUSEPPE, called IL BASTARUOLO. In the index to his Storia Pittorica, Lanzi, by an oversight, calls this painter Filippo; but in the body of the work he styles him Giuseppe, by which name he is designated by Cesare Barotti, in his Pitture e Sculture di Ferrara. He was born at Ferrara about the year 1525, and was a fellow student with Gio. Francesco Surchi, in the school of Dosso Dossi. He acquired the name of Il Bastarnoli from the profession of his father, who was a dealer in grain. With the exception of a deficiency in perspective, which is occasionally discernible in his works, he may be ranked among the most eminent painters of the Ferrarese school. In the middle part of his life he corrected this defect, and acquired a snavity of colouring, which partook of the purity of Titian; and a breadth, and an intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, worthy of the school of Coreggio. His pictures were in such estimation, that there is scarce a public edifice in his native city which does not possess some of his works. In the cathedral at Ferrara is a fine picture of the Virgin and Infant, crowned by angels; in S. Maurelio, the church of the Capuchins, the Ascension, one of his most admired works; in Il Gesu, the Annunciation, and an esteemed picture of the Madonna and Bambino, with Mary Magdalene and St. John; but his most celebrated performance is his picture in the Conservatorio of S. Barbara, representing that saint and St. Ursula, with a number of female figures, composed and painted with extraordinary beauty and simplicity. This able artist was drowned, whilst bathing in the Po, in 1589. [He was also called Lodovico.]

MECHAU, JAMES, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Leipsic in 1748. He was for some time a pupil of Bernard Rode, at Berlin, and afterwards frequented the academy at Leipsic. He painted history and landscapes, in which he acquired considerable reputation in Germany; but he is more generally known as an engraver. He etched several plates, some of which are from his own designs; and engraved a variety of views in Italy in aqua-tinta. He handled the point with tolerable dexterity. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

St. Michael vanquishing the Demon; Mechau, fec. aqua forti.

The Resurrection of Lazarus. Mechau, fec. 1761.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after C. Schut.

A Dance of Nymphs and Fauns; after Giulio Carpioni.

A set of six Italian Landscapes; in the style of Swanevelt. 1792.

A set of six Views in and near Rome. 1792, 1793.

[And numerous others which will be found in Nagler. According to several authorities he was born in 1745, and died in 1808. His name was Jacob Wilhelm Mechau.]

MICHEL, CHRISTIAN DE. This artist was a native of Basle, in Switzerland, in 1737. He was for some time a pupil of J. G. Wille, at Paris, and afterwards resided at Basle, where he carried on a considerable commerce in prints. We have by him, among others, the following plates:

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Joseph II. on horseback, reviewing his troops; after J. C. Brand.

Frederick II. King of Prussia, on horseback; the companion.

General Elliot, Lord Heathfield.

Christianus à Mechel, Chalceographus, &c.

SUBJECTS.

An old Man mending a Pen; after Metzua.

Cupid shooting an Arrow; after Carlo Vanloo.

Four Views of the Rhine: after Brinckman and Weirötter.

[The works of Christian von Mechel are very numerous, and in general remarkably well executed. He engraved and published the medals of Hedlinger; the Dusseldorf Gallery, with a Catalogue raisonné; the works of Hans Holbein, with explanatory and critical remarks; and many pictures of contemporary painters. He died in 1813.]

MECHELN, or MECKENEN, ISRAEL VON, FATHER and SON. It was for some time supposed that the various prints which are attributed to Israel von Mecheln, were the works of one and the same person; but on account of the great difference observable in their style, as well as from the dates inscribed on some of them, M. Heineken and others have very reasonably concluded, that both the father and the son practised engraving. Israel von Mecheln the elder, is stated by M. Huber to have been born at Mecheln, a village near Bocholt, a small town in the bishopric of Munster, in Westphalia, about the year 1424. He is regarded as one of the earliest engravers of whom we have any account, and immediately succeeded, or was rather a contemporary of Martin Schoen. That he was not a disciple of Schoen is evident from the total difference in their style. It has not been found practicable to distinguish precisely the prints of the elder Mecheln from those of his son; but it may be naturally concluded, that the ruder part of them, in point of design and execution, should be ascribed to the father. M. Heineken estimates the number of their prints at about two hundred and fifty. They are usually signed with the initials I. M. or I. V. M. or Israhel V. M., or sometimes at length, Israhel van Mekenen Goldschmit, or Israhel tzu Bockholt; the letters in the Gothic character. The following are among their most remarkable prints:

The Portrait of Israel von Mecheln the elder, with a beard, and a kind of turban; signed Israhel von Meckenen Goldschmit.

The Portraits of Israel von Mecheln the younger and his Wife; inscribed Figuracio facierum Israhelis et Ide Uzoris, I. V. M.

A set of Prints of the Life of Christ. These, as well as the two following prints, are supposed to be some of the earliest works of the elder Mecheln.

The Descent of the Holy Ghost.

St. Luke painting the Virgin.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes. In the background is a battle, and cannons, with other warlike instruments.

The Death of the Virgin. M. Schoen, and others, have engraved this subject.

The Virgin standing upon a Crescent, crowned by angels.

The Annunciation; the Angel holds a Scroll, on which is inscribed A VE. GRA.

The Virgin seated, in a landscape, embracing the Infant, and St. Joseph reposing. On the right of the print is a Grasshopper, on which account it is called the Virgin with the Grasshopper. The same subject has been engraved by Albert Durer, and copied from him by Marc Antonio.

The Virgin and Infant surrounded by four Angels. 1480.

The Virgin seated, holding the Infant, with a garden-wall in the back-ground, inscribed in Gothic letters, Ave potissima Maria. The same is engraved by M. Schoen.

The Feast of Herod; Herodias with the Head of St. John.

Herod's Cruelty.

Christ bearing his Cross.

The Scourging of Christ.

The Crucifixion; Israhel, M.; with a light ground.

The Crucifixion; Israhel, V. M.; with a dark ground.

St. George and the Dragon; I. V. M.

St. Jerome seated in a room, pointing to a Skull which lies on the table. This is considered one of their best prints. It has been copied by Lucas van Leyden.

St. Anthony tormented by Devils. The same subject is engraved by Martin Schoen.

The Death of Lucretia.

A Man and a Woman walking, with Death behind a tree, shaking an hour-glass. This print has been copied by Albert Durer and others.

Several single Figures of male and female Saints.

A Woman singing, and a Man playing on the Lute.

A Man playing on the Organ.

Three naked Women, with a Globe hanging above them. Albert Durer and others have copied this print.

A Man holding a Skull, inscribed Respice finem.

A Cup, richly ornamented. The same has been engraved by M. Schoen.

A variety of goldsmith's ornaments, and a great number of other subjects.

M. Israel van Mecheln the younger died in 1523.

[As it is certain that all who feel interested respecting these artists and their works, will prefer going to the highest authorities for information, it would be superfluous to enter into a dissertation here. Bartsch, P. G. tom. vi., and Zani, in his Materiali, and Enciclopedia delle belle Arti, parte I. vol. xiii. note 40, have so fully discussed all the points, that scarcely any thing more can be elicited, pro and con, than what they have produced. But it may be necessary to say something respecting the paintings at Cologne and Berlin, supposed to be by one of them, and of which engravings are to be found in the lithographed "Gallery of the early German Masters, formerly at Stuttgard, in the possession of the Brothers Boisserée, now at Munich." Dr. Franz Kugler is unexceptionable evidence in the matter, and therefore it will be better to quote him than to enter into any speculation on the subject. He says, First in the school of Cologne, about the latter half of the 15th century, we meet with an excellent artist, who, with many traces of the elder Cologne school, unites a conscious familiarity with the models afforded by that of Van Eyck. The name of this master is unknown; formerly, though without sufficient ground, that of a contemporary goldsmith and engraver, Israel von Mecheln, or Meckenen, was given to him. His chief work, a representation of the Passion, on eight panels, is in the possession of Herr Lyversberg, at Cologne, and it is now usual to designate him as the "Master of the Passion." His pictures have still, indeed, a gold ground, and resemble the older school in this circumstance, as well as in the style of colouring, which is lively, powerful, and clear; but they are painted in oil, and moreover, the manner of treatment, the attitudes, and the arrangement, are generally borrowed from the school of Van Eyck. He appears to have been an able, intelligent, and highly-gifted artist, earnest in seeking an insight into life, zealous and careful, but for the most part, it must be confessed, devoid of original inspiration. The general character of his drawing is precise and hard; his efforts to mark character in the lower class of persons, such as the persecutors of Christ, degenerates into exaggeration. Besides this excellent work of the Passion, there are several paintings evidently by the same hand. The most important of those in Cologne are, a Descent from the Cross, of the year 1488, in the city Museum, less powerful than the Passion, and probably of the latest time of the artist; the wings, added later, are probably by a scholar or imitator;—two very good pictures in the possession of Herr Zanoli;—the paintings in the windows and on the walls of the Hardenrath chapel in Sta. Maria, in Capotolio, of the year 1466; the first of which, however, are injured, and the last considerably retouched. The Crucifixion, on the walls of the same place, belongs to a later period. There are, besides, excellent altar-pieces by him in the churches of Linz and Sinzig; and a considerable number at Munich, in the former Boisserée collection, particularly an altar-piece with very dignified figures of the apostles (John the Baptist in the place of Judas). Several are in the chapel of St. Maurice, at Nuremberg; and a beautiful picture, with female Saints, is in the Berlin Museum. The influence of this artist on his contemporaries was very important, as is proved by the various works of his scholars, or imitators, extant at Cologne, and in the neighbourhood, or in the Boisserée collection and Berlin Museum. Of those in the Berlin Museum, two panels with male and female Saints are particularly remarkable, being distinguished as much by the dignity of the figures and their noble drapery, as by the powerful painting and expression of their heads. So it appears that, in the opinion of this impartial judge and real connoisseur, the application of the name of Israel von Mecheln to these paintings is merely conjectural, founded probably on their analogy to his engraved subjects, and their being painted at the period in which he lived.]

MECHELN. The name of this artist is affixed to a portrait of Pope Urban VIII., dated 1623.

MECHERINO. See BECCAFUMI.

MEDICI, PIETRO. This artist was born at Florence in 1586, and was a scholar of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli. By the instruction of that eminent master, he became a reputable painter of history, and was employed in painting several altar-pieces for the churches at Florence, which possess considerable merit. He died in 1648.

MEDINA, SIR JOHN [BAPTIST]. This painter was the son of Medina de Asturias, a captain in the Spanish service, born at Brussels in 1660. He was a scholar of Francis du Chatel, and afterwards improved himself by studying the works of Rubens. When he was twenty years of age he came to England, and for some time painted portraits with considerable success. He was invited to visit Scotland, under the patronage of the Earl of Leven, who procured him many commissions; and he painted the portraits of most of the Scotch nobility. At Wentworth Castle is a large picture of the first Duke of Argyle, with his two sons, John and Archibald, painted in the Italian style; and, according to Lord Orford, superior to most of his contemporaries. The portrait of Medina, by himself, was sent to the Grand Duke of Tuscany by the Duke of Gordon, and was placed in the Florentine gallery. He occasionally painted history and landscapes. Two small historical pictures by him are said to be in Surgeons' Hall, at Edinburgh; where there are also the portraits of the principal professors. Sir John Medina was knighted by the Duke of Queensberry, then Lord High Commissioner. He died at Edinburgh in 1711.

[MEELE, MATTHIEW, a portrait painter, born at the Hague in 1664, was for some time in England, and practised under Sir Peter Lely. On his return to the Hague he was appointed one of the principals of the Academy, and died there in 1724. His portraits are very good.]

MEER, JOHN VANDER, THE ELDER. This painter was born at Schoonhoven in 1627. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but when he was young he visited Italy, accompanied by Lieven Vander-schur. On his return to Holland he met with the most flattering encouragement, and his pictures were sought after with unusual avidity. He painted landscapes with cattle and figures, and marines. His sea-pieces are particularly admired, in which the different vessels are designed with correctness and precision; his skies are light and floating, and the water clear and transparent. His tints are warm and tender; and there is a sunny brilliancy in his colouring, which reminds us of the sea-ports of Claude. He also painted battle-pieces with considerable success, and designed his figures and horses with great fire and animation. He has been reproached with too great a predominance of blue in his distances, a peculiarity not uncommon to those who have studied in Italy, where nature frequently assumes a brightness of atmosphere unknown in more northern climates. He died at Haerlem in 1691. [Balkema applies this account to an artist of the same name born in 1628, and who died in 1711.]

MEER, JOHN VANDER, THE YOUNGER, [called VANDER MEER DE JONGE,] was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Haerlem in 1665, and was first instructed by his father, but he afterwards had the advantage of studying under Nicholas Berghem, of whom he became one of the most celebrated scholars. He painted similar subjects to those of Berghem, representing landscapes, with cattle and pastoral figures, and was so successful in painting sheep, that he has been said, in those particular objects, to have equalled, if not surpassed, his instructor. His landscapes exhibit very pleasing scenery; the forms of his trees are well chosen, and the freshness of the verdure in his plants and foliage is very agreeable. Though certainly very inferior to the works of Berghem, the pictures of Vander Meer the younger are found in the best collections, particularly in Holland, where they are highly esteemed. He died in 1688, aged 33. We have a few charming etchings by this artist, which are now become scarce; viz.

A set of four landscapes, with sheep.

An Ewe suckling a Lamb; I. v. der Meer de Jonghe, fecit. 1683; very fine and rare.

[Balkema applies this to an artist, also called de Jonge, and born at Utrecht in 1665, who died in 1722.]

MEER, N. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He engraved some of the plates for Le Brun's gallery, consisting of the insides of churches, flowers, &c., which are executed in a very neat style.

MEER, VANDER, OF DELFT. See VERMEER.

[MEERT, PETER, born at Brussels, had considerable reputation as a portrait painter: he imitated the style of Van Dyck. In the Museum at Brussels there are portraits of some of the ancient magistrates of that city by him. As there are prints by him with the date 1621, Descamps must be in error when he dates his birth in 1618.]

MEHEUX, JAMES. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1680. He engraved some plates in mezzotint, among which is a copy of the print of the Ratcatcher, by Cornelius Visscher.

MEHUS, or MEUS, LIVIO. This painter was born at Oudenarde in 1630. The troubles which soon afterwards took place in that country, obliged his family to leave Flanders, and they settled at Milan, where he received some instruction from a Flemish artist, then resident in that city. At an early age he visited Florence, where he was favoured with the protection of Prince Mattias, and placed under the tuition of Pietro da Cortona, who was at that time employed by the Grand Duke Ferdinand II. in the Palazzo Pitti. He accompanied his instructor to Rome, where he studied the antique and the best models, and became a correct and careful designer. He afterwards visited Venice, where he improved himself in colouring, by contemplating the works of the great masters of that school. On his return to Florence he was employed by the Marquis Gerini to ornament his palace, in conjunction with Ciro Ferri, who had been his fellow student under P. da Cortona, where he painted his celebrated picture of Bacchus and Ariadne. Although he was more engaged in embellishing the palaces of the nobility, by whom he was much employed, than in painting for the churches, he was fixed on to paint the dome of the church of La Pace; a performance in which he appears to have outdone himself. It is composed and designed in the best taste of the Lombard school. He was afterwards employed by the Grand Duke in the Palazzo Pitti, where he painted his fine picture of the Sacrifice of Abraham. He possessed a fertile and inventive genius; his pencil is resolute and prompt, and his colouring chaste and harmonious. His portrait, by himself, is in the collection of Painters, in the Florentine gallery. He died in 1691.

MEL, BERNARDINO, was a native of Siena, and flourished from the year 1636 till 1653. It is not said under whom he studied, but the Padre della Valle, who had seen several of his works, says his style sometimes resembles the Caracci, and sometimes Guercino. There are some of his pictures in the churches at Siena. One of his best performances is a ceiling in fresco, representing Aurora, in the Casa Bandinelli.

MEIGEL, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg, where he published a folio volume of prints, engraved by himself, representing the follies of different people of all professions. They are executed in a very indifferent style.

MEIGHAN, R., an English engraver and bookseller, who flourished about the year 1628, and carried on the business of a bookseller and publisher in St. Dunstan's Churchyard. He has been supposed to have been the engraver of a scarce portrait of John Clavel, a reclaimed criminal, prefixed to his Recantation of an ill-spent Life. It is probable, however, that he was only the publisher of it, as it is inscribed, R. Meighan, exc., 1628.

MEIL, JOHN WILLIAM, a modern German designer and engraver, born at Altenbourg in 1732. He resided chiefly at Berlin, where he was for some time employed in engraving vignettes and book-ornaments, from his own designs. He has engraved a great number of plates, in a neat, spirited style, in which he appears to have been emulous of imitating the charming works of Della Bella, in which he has not been entirely unsuccessful. Among a variety of other prints, we have the following by him:

A set of eight small plates of Heads and Caricatures; scarce.

Four of Quack-doctors and Ballad-singers; in the manner of Diétricy.

A set of ten Vignettes for the Poem of Joseph and his Brethren; by Bitaubé.

Twelve Allegorical Vignettes.

Hercules playing on the Lyre.

A set of four Landscapes, with figures.

Fifty-two subjects, entitled, Spectaculum Nature et Artium; published at Berlin in 1765.

[He died about 1798.]

MEIRE, GERARD VANDER. This old painter was a native of Ghent, and flourished about the year 1450. He was one of the earliest painters in oil, after Van Eyck. Van Mander mentions a picture by this master, representing the Death of Lucretia, which was very highly finished, well coloured, and tolerably correct in the design. [This is one of the artists of the early period, of whom most that is said is conjectural.]

[MEIRE, JAN VANDER, is also mentioned as brother of Gerard, and scholar of the Van Eycks. It is said that he painted a picture of the Institution of the order of the Golden Fleece for Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, whom he followed in all his campaigns, and that he died at Nevers in 1471. If this be correct, Hans Hemling and Jan Vander Meire were fellow soldiers.]

MEIRERPECK, M. WOLFGANG, a German designer and engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1550. In conjunction with G. Liberal, he designed and executed the wooden cuts for the Commentaries of Matthiols on Dioscorides, published at Venice in Latin, in 1548, and in Germany in the Bohemian language, in 1560.

MEIS, B. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a print representing a poet writing. It is etched in a style somewhat resembling that of Benedetto Castiglione, and subscribed B. Meis, fecit.

MELAN. See MELLAN.

MELANI, GIUSEPPE and FRANCESCO. These brothers were natives of Pisa. Giuseppe, a scholar of Camillo Gabrielli, was a reputable painter of history, as is evident from his large picture in oil, of the Death of S. Ranieri, in the dome at Pisa, which, according to Lanzi, without being ranked among the most distinguished works of art in that sanctuary, does him considerable honour, as an ingenious composition, and freer from manner than most of his contemporaries. His chief merit is in fresco painting, in which he never appears to more advantage than when he painted the figures in the architectural views of his brother Francesco, in which they both seem to have imitated the splendid style of Pietro da Cortona. Francesco was esteemed one of the ablest painters of perspective of his time. Their most celebrated joint performance is the vault of S. Matteo at Pisa. Francesco died in 1742; Giuseppe in 1747.

MELAR, ADRIAN, a Flemish engraver, who resided at Antwerp about the year 1650. He attempted to imitate the style of Paul Pontius, but with very little success. We have several portraits by him, among which are those of Francis de Moura, and Christopher Bernhardt. He also engraved a plate representing St. Michael overcoming the Evil Spirit; after Rubens.

MELCHIORI, GIOVANNI PAOLO. This painter was born at Rome in 1664, and was brought up in the school of Carlo Maratti. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was employed for some of the public edifices at Rome. His most esteemed work is his picture of the Prophet Ezekiel, in the Basilica of St. John of Lateran. [He was living in 1718.]

MELDER, GERARD. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1693. He showed an early inclination for the art; and when a boy, neglected the usual amusements of his age to devote his time to drawing. He became possessed of some miniatures by Rosalba, and by copying and imitating them, he arrived at great proficiency in that branch of painting. He drew the portraits of many of the principal persons of his time, and was much employed in copying, in water-colours, the pictures of Mieris, Vander Werf, and others, which he finished with surprising delicacy. He also painted in enamel; but is more distinguished for his miniatures. He died at Utrecht in 1740. [Balkema says he died in 1746; and Immerzeel, in 1754.]

[MELDOLLA, ANDREA, an Italian designer and engraver, who flourished between 1540 and 1550. There has been much discussion respecting his works, but very little has been accurately ascertained of his history. Until a recent period the etchings now allowed by competent judges to be by him, were attributed to Andrea Schiavone, called Medula; or to Francesco Mazzuoli, better known as Parmigiano, because the greater number of them are from pictures, or drawings, evidently by that distinguished painter. Zani claims the honour of making the discovery that Meldolla (or Meldola, for it is written both ways) was a different artist from Schiavone, or Parmigiano. He establishes the fact that Meldolla was the engraver of the print of Heliodorus driven from the Temple, from a drawing by Parmigiano after the painting by Raphael. He had heard in the course of his researches respecting this master, that an impression was in the possession of Count Antonio Remondini, which had the inscription Andrea Scлавonus Meldola fecit; to ascertain the fact he wrote to the Count, who replied, "It is true that I possess the print in question, with the inscription Andreas Meldola, but without Scлавonus." È vero ch'io tengo la citata stampa dell' Eliodoro, ma senza lo Scлавonus. As the subject of this artist's works has been ably investigated by the admitted knowledge and judgment of Zani, Bartsch, and Nagler, who have restored the property to the rightful owner, it is better to refer the inquirer to their dissertations than to present him with less competent authority; but it may be permitted to make him cognisant of an additional fact. Zani says he was acquainted with one hundred prints by Meldolla; Bartsch enumerates and describes eighty-seven; Nagler mentions one more; but Messrs. Smith, brothers, the eminent dealers in ancient prints, of Lisle Street, Leicester Square, London, possess one hundred and ten, and have a descriptive account of nine others, which are in various cabinets abroad. This superb collection was made by Mr. Ford, so well known for his judgment and love of pictorial art, and has been inspected by the editor of the present work. The monogram or marks of this engraver are frequently made in a manner so slight and negligent that it is difficult to find them; but on some he has very distinctly etched his name Meldolla, and in a few instances with his Christian name, Andrea, prefixed.

By the courtesy of Messrs. Smith the editor is enabled to gratify the curious with the following list of those not described by Bartsch or Nagler, but which are in the possession of those gentlemen; and also of the nine others in foreign cabinets, with which they are acquainted, and the places are mentioned after each print. The list is arranged according to the order in Bartsch, (Peintre Graveur, tom. xvi.) to No. 87, being all that were known to that eminent connoisseur, and continued to the number of 119, with several previous duplicates, or varied repetitions, intercalated with the marks a, b, c, or with stars. The different states of the impressions are noticed as they present themselves in Messrs. Smith's collection, and some differences in measurement from those that are given by Bartsch. The measure adopted is the French scale, so that it may be in accordance with Bartsch, or other foreign writers. Where there is a discrepancy, it does not impugn the accuracy of that distinguished writer, as alterations in the plate, or accident to the impression under his view, may make the difference, and sometimes a typographical error. Such differences only as appear important are noticed, as this work must necessarily be compressed as much as possible. It is now generally believed that the plates on which Meldolla etched were of pewter, which will account for the scratches and corrosions that appear on the later impressions, and for the frequent alterations made in the treatment of the subject and the accessories. As the greater part of these etchings are evidently from designs by Parmigiano, or, as he was affectionately called by his contemporaries, Parmigianino, it is probable that they were much in request at the time of their production by the artists, who may have suggested the alterations in the draperies and chiaro-scuro that appear in the different states of the impressions; suggestions that he would adopt in deference to his chief customers. The rarity of impressions in fine condition is a corroboration of this conjecture; for every collector knows the condition of prints that have occupied a place in an artist's portfolio: like Dr. Johnson's library, they present a ragged regiment of veterans who have gone through much service.

A Catalogue raisonné of the Etchings of Andrea Meldolla, and their variations; with an account of those not mentioned by Bartsch.

1. Jacob's Ladder. In this print there is no ladder to be seen: it appears to have been retouched, but at present no variations are known.
2. Moses saved from the Nile. There are four variations: first, before the cross-lines on the left arm of the woman in the fore-ground on the left were continued beyond the outline forming the arm; second, the cross-lines extend over the outline of the arm, so as to give it a rough and unfinished appearance; third, retouched all over, easily distinguished by the strength and harshness of the outlines; fourth, with a hole in the centre at top and bottom, for the purpose of fixing a chiaro-scuro block. This etching has also been copied by Demon on a somewhat larger scale.
3. God appearing to Moses. Of this there are three variations; first, pure etching before the retouch, the face and head of Moses nearly white; second, retouched all over, the hair on the head of Moses formed by deeply cut lines; third, nearly worn out, the plate covered with scratches, and the town in the back-ground indistinct.
4. Moses showing the Quails to the Israelites. First, a pure etching before the monogram; second, retouched all over, especially the mitre of Aaron, and the back of Moses. The mark

M is introduced in the centre of the foreground, below a quail which is running away.

5. The Annunciation. First, before the flutings on the pillars; second, has these flutings, but before the injuries to the upper part of the plate; third, the upper part of the plate damaged, particularly by a strong scratch across the upper portion of the figure of the angel.
6. The Nativity. First, before the retouch, the head of the ass near the Infant is scarcely shaded, and its right ear is not made out; second, these alterations made and the plate retouched all over. Though considered by Zani to be very rare, this print is by no means so in the second state; the first is in reality of great rarity.
7. The three Kings. First, a pure etching very much unfinished, before the fluting on the pillar on the right; (this is probably unique;) second, the plate retouched all over, the outlines very hard, and the pillar fluted.
8. The three Kings. First, before retouch; the second retouched all over, and several scratches and other injuries on the plate.
9. The Flight into Egypt; as in Bartsch.
10. Presentation in the Temple. There are four: first, there is no necklace on the female holding the two doves, and standing near the high priest in the centre; second, the necklace is added and the outlines strengthened; third, the mitre of the high priest is altered from the second, where it is white, having additional strokes, and varied in form; the boy's foot on the right has on it the indications of a sandal; fourth, entirely and harshly retouched all over with a graver.
11. Presentation in the Temple. As in Bartsch. This print, which is excessively rare, was etched by Meldolla, after Parmigiano.
12. The Circumcision. As in Bartsch. It is extremely scarce.
13. The Circumcision. First, before the monogram in the upper corner on the right; second, retouched and the monogram M added; third, the monogram altered to M. Bartsch and Zani consider this print to be extremely rare; except in the first state, it is by no means so.
14. Jesus with the Woman on the Steps. As in Bartsch. This fine print is by no means common.
15. Christ healing the Sick. The print from which the description by Bartsch is taken is in the Archduke Charles's collection at Vienna; it is very rare, as the only other known is in the Ortalli collection at Parma, belonging to the late Archduchess. In the one described, part of the outlines of Christ, two of his disciples, and the dog, are touched with a pen.
16. Christ healing the Lepers. As in Bartsch.
17. The Entombment. Of this there are four; first, before the retouch; second, retouched all over, the outlines very hard, and the trees in the back-ground very indistinct; a crooked line is introduced across the shoulder of the figure of a man on the right; third, still further retouched; the leg and foot of the man on the right shadowed with strong engraved lines; fourth, the cap of the man, the second figure behind the Virgin, is altered from the helmet form which it has in the third.

18. The Entombment. Three: first, with the monogram distinct; second, retouched, so that a portion of the print in which is the monogram is covered with lines forming the appearance of a step; third, still further retouched, the pointed top of the cover of the vase of ointment is effaced, and the knee of the Magdalene extended to the middle of the box or vase.
19. The Entombment. Two: first, before cross hatchings on the under leg of Christ; second, the leaves in the fore-ground and on the tree above are touched with the graver, and the under leg of Christ is shaded with cross hatchings.
20. The miraculous Draught of Fishes, (after Raphael.) Two: first, before the letters M. A. F.; second, has a monogram composed of the letters M. A. F. similar to that of Marc Antonio, at the bottom on the right.
21. St. Peter and St. John curing the Lame Man. Three: first, before the monogram; the neck of St. John is shaded with horizontal strokes only; second, also before the monogram; St. John's neck has additional cross hatchings from left to right; third, retouched, and has the monogram.—Lord Spencer has an intermediate state between the second and third, in which the upper parts only of the figures are retouched.
22. St. Paul preaching at Athens. As in Bartsch; but H. 11p. 14., W. 7p. 111. The first impression very rare.
23. The Pentecost, or the Descent of the Holy Ghost. Two: first, the back of the figure of the Apostle on the left, who is holding up both hands, is very slightly shaded; second, dark shadows added by strong horizontal lines.
24. The Saviour. Bartsch says he is holding his banner; in this he is holding his drapery in his left hand, and giving his benediction with the right. Query, Is that of Bartsch an earlier state?
25. St. Peter. As in Bartsch.
26. St. Andrew. As in Bartsch.
27. St. James the Great. He is a profile figure turned towards the left, holding in his left hand a long staff which reaches to the top margin of the plate; his right hand is placed against his side.
28. St. John. As in Bartsch.
29. St. Philip. As in Bartsch.
30. St. Bartholomew. He is standing in the centre, the head only in profile, directed to the left; he holds the knife in his right hand, which is concealed by his cloak, and has the other placed over it on his bosom.
31. St. Matthew. As in Bartsch.
32. St. Thomas. As in Bartsch, but two variations: first, before the retouch; second, retouched in a harsh manner. The small shadows in the fore-ground, in the left corner, formed by horizontal strokes in the former impression, is in this crossed over by strong diagonal lines.
33. St. James the Less. Profile, directed to the left. He appears in the attitude of meditation, and his right hand is placed on his left shoulder, from which hangs a quantity of drapery.
34. St. Simon. As in Bartsch.
35. St. Judas Thaddeus. Full-face figure, the head slightly inclined to the right; his arms folded; his left hand is seen, but the other is concealed under his drapery.
36. St. Mathias.
37. St. Paul. As in Bartsch.
38. The Saviour. As in Bartsch. Variations: first, before the zodiac on the globe; second, has the zodiac introduced.
39. St. Peter. As in Bartsch.
- 39.* St. Peter. A repetition of the preceding, unknown to Bartsch. It is nearly the same in design, but reversed. H. Sp. 11., W. 4p. 77.
40. St. Andrew. He is in the centre of the print, with his head leaning down towards the right; he supports his cross with both hands on the left. Two: in the first the drapery descends a very short distance below his left shoulder and ends in a point; in the second, additional drapery, so as to descend in nearly a straight line to the cross.
41. St. James the Great. As in Bartsch.
42. St. John. As in Bartsch. Three; the first, the drapery under the Saint's left elbow is not shadowed with diagonal strokes, and the outline is generally very light; second, the outline strengthened, with these shadows added; third, retouched in a harsh manner, easily distinguished by the strong engraved shadow lines. The upper edge of the dress from shoulder to shoulder, formed by two lines in the previous impression, is made with three in this state.
43. St. Philip. As in Bartsch; but three variations: first, pure etching, the space between the two fingers of the Saint's left hand is formed of perpendicular strokes only; second, additional work, and the portion above mentioned crossed by diagonal lines; third, harshly retouched, and the plate scratched and injured all over.
44. St. Bartholomew. As in Bartsch.
- 44.* St. Bartholomew; the same in design as the preceding, but reversed. Unknown to Bartsch.
45. St. Matthew. As in Bartsch. Three variations: first, less shaded, the edge of the drapery on the Saint's right leg shaded with horizontal strokes only; second, these are crossed by diagonal, or almost perpendicular lines; third, a fringe is added to the edge of the dress below the knee.
46. St. Thomas. As in Bartsch.
- 46.* St. Thomas. The same design as the preceding, but etched in the reverse direction. Unknown to Bartsch.
47. St. James the Less. As in Bartsch; but, first, pure etching; second, harshly retouched, and the plate scratched and corroded.
48. St. Simon. As in Bartsch; but, first, before the small strokes on the bottom of the drapery resting on the Saint's left foot; the second has these strokes.
- 48.* St. Simon. A repetition of the preceding in the same direction. It differs from the former, inasmuch as the stomach is scarcely shaded, and there are strong horizontal lines on the leaf of the book. Unknown to Bartsch.
49. St. Judas Thaddeus. Profile directed to the left, and looking upwards. He has a large book under his left arm, and his right hand is placed on his bosom.
- 49.* St. Judas Thaddeus. Same design as the preceding, but etched in the reverse direction. Unknown to Bartsch.
50. An anonymous Saint, as described by Bartsch; measures H. 7p. 111., W. 4p. 81.
- 50.* A Saint walking to the right, but having his head inclined towards the left. He holds a

- lance in his left hand, and has a large book under his right arm. Unknown to Bartsch. H. 7p. 9l., W. 4p. 7l.
- 50. The same design as the preceding, but differing from it in many respects, principally that the lance in this ends in a kind of flower, and that the back of the book is seen, which in the former is covered by his cloak. Unknown to Bartsch.
51. The Saviour, a repetition of No. 38, but with variations, inasmuch as a small fold, coming to a point, falls from the right shoulder; the chest and body are not so much covered with drapery. In this plate the fold of drapery which passes from shoulder to shoulder and covers the breast of the figure, reaches to the middle of the globe in his left hand, while in the other print it is carried to the bottom of the globe. The variations are, first, before the dark shadows on the fold of the drapery across the centre of the figure; the right side of the body is white; second, shadows added all over the drapery; third, the lines of the fingers supporting the globe made very strong, and the shadows generally heightened. H. 7p. 9l., W. 4p. 9l.
52. St. Andrew, a repetition of No. 40, the reverse way. There is much variation in the drapery; this print has no fringe to the mantle, and no pointed fold falling down on the side of the cross. The surface of the cross on which the holes of the four nails are seen is white, and not covered with lines. H. 7p. 9l., W. 4p. 10l.
53. St. James the Great. As in Bartsch; but in the first impression the whole of the background is formed of horizontal strokes only; in the second the centre of the back-ground has perpendicular strokes carried over the horizontal. H. 7p. 9l., W. 4p. 10l.
54. The Holy Virgin, (or the Holy Family,) as in Bartsch; but first, before the retouch; second, worn out and retouched all over; the shadows on the Infant's forehead quite obliterated.
55. The Christian Religion triumphant over Heresy. As in Bartsch: but, first, pure etching before the plate was broken, no marks of nails on the cross; second, a piece of the upper part of the plate broken off close to the left side of the female, so that her floating drapery is not seen. This is the only state with which Bartsch was acquainted. Third, the plate still further broken, so that a portion of the head and nearly the whole of the left thigh of the female is taken away.
56. The Marriage of St. Catherine. As in Bartsch; but, the wings of the angel are not finished, and there are very slight indications of the knives on the wheel; second, additional work all over; the angels' wings finished, and the knives on the wheel strongly marked.
57. The Virgin. As in Bartsch: but first, pure etching; second, the head on which she stands is retouched.
58. The Virgin surrounded by several Saints. As in Bartsch.
59. The Virgin accompanied by Saints. A similar design to the preceding, but engraved in the opposite direction. It differs from the former, inasmuch as a fluted pillar is behind the Virgin on the right, and St. Luke, writing his Gospel, is kneeling in the right hand corner at bottom, and a portion of the figure of the bull is seen above St. Luke's shoulder; on the base of the pillar is the monogram. The variations are, first, the fold of the curtain above the head of the Virgin is not fringed; second, additional strokes, so as to give the edge of the curtain the appearance of fringe, another side is added to the base of the pillar, by which the foot of the angel lifting up the curtain, which is visible in the former impression, is concealed; third, retouched, perpendicular strokes of shadow introduced on the upper edge of the base of the pillar, above the head of St. Luke, and short strong perpendicular strokes between the leg of the angel and back of the Virgin.
60. The Virgin and Saints. A similar subject to the last: the Virgin is seated in the centre of the print, giving the Infant to St. Catherine, who is kneeling on the left; behind the Virgin, on the right, are half-length figures of St. Joseph and St. Elisabeth. A portion of St. Catherine's wheel is in the left corner at bottom, and a basket with scissors, &c. in the fore-ground. H. 8p. 5l. (? 4.) W. 5p. 7l.
61. The Holy Family. As described by Bartsch, except that he says it is an open book on the table, whereas in this it is a wreath which the Virgin holds with both hands. Bartsch was doubtful respecting the size of the print, and puts it Hauteur 9 pouces? Largeur 7p. 9 lignes? this is H. 12p. 1l., W. 7p. 11l. The variations are, first, before the retouch and before the monogram; second, retouched, a shadow added on the left shoulder of St. Anne beyond her two fore fingers, and a monogram added on the left just below the drapery of the Virgin; third, the plate corroded and a piece broken out near the middle on the left, near the wreath on the table.
62. The Infant Jesus in the Cradle surrounded by Saints. As described by Bartsch, who, however, was doubtful of the measurement, for he puts it Hauteur 10p. 10 lignes? Largeur 7p. 8 lignes? whereas this measures H. 12p. 5l., W. 7p. 10l. The variations are, first, before the monogram; second, retouched, the monogram is on the seat of the Virgin, near the bottom on the right.
63. The Infant Jesus and St. John embracing in the presence of several Saints. As described by Bartsch. The variations are, first, the shadow on the right cheek of St. Anne formed by slight single strokes only; second, additional cross lines to this shadow; third, retouched, a corrosion extends across the thigh of St. Anne to the thigh of St. John.
64. Different Saints present at the homage paid by St. John to the Infant Jesus. As described by Bartsch. There is, however, a difference in the measurement; Bartsch says H. 12p., L. 7p. 9l., whereas this is H. 12p. 7l., L. 8p. The variations are, first, the left knee of the Virgin is quite white; second, the knee shaded with light strokes going from right to left.
65. Saints adoring the Infant Jesus in his Cradle. This is the same print described by Bartsch as No. 62, the measurement of which is corrected above, and the introduction of the monogram noticed in the second impression.
66. The Present of Flowers. This is described by Bartsch also as 61: it is the same print.
67. Heliodorus driven from the Temple, after Raphael. As described by Bartsch there is a slight difference in the measurement, this being one line each way longer. The variations are: first, before additional fluting to the pillars, and before diagonal strokes on the pillar above the lower part of the lance of Heliodorus; the second has these alterations.

68. Bellona. A back figure turned towards the right, but with her head in profile looking up to the left; she holds her Ægis in her left hand over her head, and has a javelin in her right. This description differs somewhat from that of Bartsch, as also does the measurement: he says H. 4p. 4l., L. 2p. 9l.; this measures H. 6p. 5l. ? L. 3p. 4l.
69. Diana. As described by Bartsch.
70. The Coronation of Pegasus. As described by Bartsch.
71. Mercury. As described by Bartsch. The variations are: first, less worked and before the monogram; second, has the monogram. This print is 5 lines in height and 2 in width more than given by Bartsch.
72. Hercules, Dejanira, and Nessus. As described by Bartsch.
73. Mars and Cupid. As described by Bartsch.
74. Ganymede and Hebe. As described by Bartsch; a slight difference in the measurement, this having the advantage of a few lines. The variations are: first, before the retouch; second, retouched, the outline of Ganymede made very strong and harsh.
75. Venus after Bathing. As described by Bartsch; the width is, however, 5 lines more in this.
76. Bellona. As described by Bartsch; but this is H. 8p. 3l., W. 4p. 3l. The variations are: first, before the rays of glory at the top, and before the monogram; second, has rays of glory at top from left to right, and the monogram M towards the centre at bottom, near to the foot of Bellona; retouched, and plate cracked and corroded; third, still further retouched, and more corroded.
77. Bellona. As described by Bartsch. The variations are: first, has no shading on the wall on the left hand, it being quite white; the right leg of the goddess is naked; second, horizontal shadows on the wall on the left added, a sandal is placed on the right leg, and the drapery is continued lower down the thigh.
78. Mars. As described by Bartsch: a slight difference in measure.
79. Minerva and the Muses. Minerva is seen conversing with the nine Muses on Parnassus; she is standing, a profile figure, on the right directed to the left, holding her lance in her left hand over her shoulder, and extending her right hand towards the nine Muses, who are on the left of the print. A guitar, pipe, &c. are on the ground in the centre in front, and in the background on the left are rocks and trees. A single tree, which reaches to the top of the plate, is on the right behind the goddess. It appears doubtful whether this print is really by Meldolla. The subject is very imperfectly described by Bartsch; but his measurement corresponds. H. 8p. 6l., L. 6p. 3l.
80. The Judgment of Paris. As described by Bartsch. This print is formed of two plates joined together in the middle: the monogram is on each of them; on that on the right, under the goat's head; and on that on the left, under the right leg of the female in the corner. The variations are: first, pure etching, before the monogram on the left; second, also pure etching, but has the monogram; third, retouched, strong and harsh shadows all over, particularly on the left side of Paris; fourth, still further retouched, strong engraved lines on the right leg of Venus, &c.

81. The Rape of Helen. As described by Bartsch, but there is a difference in the measurement. Bartsch has, Largeur 18p. 2l., H. 14p. 8l.; this measures, L. 19p. 1l., H. 14p. 11l. The variations are: first, pure etching, the under part of the head of the fallen horse on the right is white; second, the under part of the horse's head is shadowed, but the stone on the right has no inscription and is white; third, has the inscription in five lines on the stone, and Meldolla's monogram; fourth, the stone, which has the inscription, white in the preceding impression, is shaded with single strokes in this. Near the middle, at bottom, ANDREA MELDOLLA IN VENTOA; fifth, a large dolphin introduced in the fore-ground, near the centre, under the head of the fallen horse, so as to cover the name of Meldolla; sixth, an arm of a figure is introduced between the man falling from his horse and the figure of Paris; it is also retouched all over.
82. Virtue victorious over Vice. As described by Bartsch.
83. A Prophet. He is standing full length, turned slightly to the right, holding a long scroll in both hands, at which he is looking; a glory in the back-ground. H. 4p. 7l. ? W. 2p. 7l. ?
84. A Woman carrying a Vase. As described by Bartsch. The variations are: first, the floating drapery on the right is nearly white; second, it is nearly covered with shading.
85. The same print as described No. 74.
86. A Woman accompanied by a Child. As described by Bartsch.
87. A Woman writing. As described by Bartsch.
- Prints by Andrea Meldolla not described by Bartsch.*
89. The Adoration of the Shepherds. The Virgin kneeling in the centre of the print supports the Infant with both hands. On the left are three shepherds, one in the centre, a back figure, is stooping holding a bundle which he appears to be about to place on an ass. In the background, in the centre, is the head of an ox, and on the left two figures, each holding a torch. In the back to the left is a large glory, and in the centre on the right a grand building. H. 5p. 10l., W. 8p. 7l.
90. The Adoration of the Kings, a grand composition of sixteen figures. The Virgin is seated on the ground on the right having the Infant on her knees; the Child holds up his right arm to-

- wards a vase on a plate, which one of the kings, a profile figure with a large beard, bending on the left, offers to him. Behind the latter is a young man holding a similar vase and a plate with both hands above the head of the other. Joseph is standing in the centre of the background with his hands joined. In the background to the left is another of the kings with a crown on his head, several attendants, and the heads of two horses and a camel. Behind the Virgin on the right are the heads of two oxen, and above them the inclined back of a man with his head turned in profile looking down towards the Virgin. H. 11p. 3l. W. 8p. 11l. ?
91. The Holy Family. The Virgin seated in the centre looks towards a female saint, who, kneeling on the left, holds the Infant with both hands. Joseph, whose head and left hand only are seen, is in the back-ground behind the Virgin, and appears conversing with a mitred bishop who has his hands together in the attitude of adoration. At the top is a trellis, on which a vine is trained. H. 8p. 2l., W. 5p. There are two of this; the first, little more than pure etching; the belly of the Virgin is white; the second retouched; the belly of the Virgin covered with lines.
92. Marriage of St. Catherine. The Virgin seated on the right on a throne approached by steps, and supporting the Infant with both hands; the Child leans towards St. Catherine, who is kneeling on the left on the steps, extending her left hand to receive the ring. Behind the Virgin, on the right, is an angel playing on the organ. In the back-ground, in the centre, may be perceived St. Anne, and on the left a back figure looking out of a door-way. In the right corner at the bottom is St. Joseph, a profile figure half-length, and St. Catherine's wheel is in the left corner. H. 8p. 1l., W. 5p. 10l. This measurement includes a margin of about 3 lines going all round. There are two of this: the first a pure etching, very light all over; the beard of Joseph is nearly white. The second is retouched, and the beard of Joseph made very strong and dark.
93. The Holy Family. The Virgin seated in the centre has the Infant lying across her knees; on the right sits St. Joseph with a large book open on his knees, and his head turned towards the Virgin. Behind him is a figure, (probably St. John,) holding a staff, round which is a scroll. Above this figure are some fluted and ornamented columns. On the left is an angel stooping to pour water on the Infant from a vase which he holds with both hands, and behind him a figure holding a basket of fruit with both hands on his head. H. 11p. 1l. W. 7p. 10l.
94. Christ and his Disciples. This print appears to be the right half of a subject, probably that of Christ healing the Lepers, similar to No. 16. The composition is exactly the same, but the expressions are different, and the Saviour's feet are naked, whereas in No. 16 he has sandals on them. In the right corner at the bottom is the monogram M. H. 10p. 3l., W. 7p. 2l.
95. Christ healing the Lepers. The Saviour, a full-face figure, is standing on the left in front of eight of his disciples, and extending his left hand towards the crowd of Lepers on the right. On that side may be remarked two men, back-figures, sitting with their heads turned in profile towards the Saviour. In the back-ground, in the centre, is a small pyramid surmounted by a kind of vase. A large tree is behind Christ and his disciples. H. 7p. 4l., W. 10p. 3l.
96. Boy bending a Bow. A boy standing in the centre of the print, with his head to the left, holding the top of his bow above his head with both hands, and pressing his left foot raised against it. On the left is a large tree, and a goat with its head to the ground near the boy's right leg. H. 5p. 11l., W. 3p. 4l.
98. Return of the Prodigal Son. He is kneeling, one knee on a step in the centre of the print directed towards the right, on which side his father stoops to kiss him. Behind the latter are two men, little more than the heads are seen, and behind the Prodigal is a servant who appears to be putting some clothes on his back. On the step, under the left foot of the Prodigal, is the monogram M. H. 5p. 3l., W. 3p. 3l.
- There are three impressions of this: first, before any monogram; second, with the monogram as described; third, with the monogram altered AP. This subject has been copied by Reveidinus. Bartsch, XV. 14.
99. Mercury. Mercury walking towards the right holding up his Caduceus in his right hand, and having his lyre under his left arm. A goat is lying on the ground with its head to the right. In the back-ground to the left is a portion of a tree, and in the bottom corner on the same side the monogram reversed. H. 6p. 3l., W. 3p. 3l. There are two impressions: in the first the neck of the goat is completely covered with shading; the second is worn out and retouched; the neck of the goat is shaded half-way over only.
100. Apollo and Daphne. Apollo, a profile figure, is running on the right, but towards the left holding up his right arm towards Daphne, and having his bow in his left hand. She is a back figure, with her head in profile looking towards him, and is running up a hill on the left with both arms raised, and her fingers ending in branches, which extend to the top of the print. A half-length figure of a river god with his left arm over his vase, is seated at the bottom on the left. H. 6p., W. 3p. 9l.
101. Apollo and Daphne. He is standing, a full figure, with his head in profile, on the right side of the print. He is naked, except some drapery which floats behind his back, and extends his right arm towards Daphne, who, standing on the left in an attitude of terror, is metamorphosing into a tree, the roots of which terminate her right leg, and her hands, ending in boughs, are raised. At her feet, nearly across the print, with his head to the left, is a river god. H. 5p. 4l., W. 3p. 8l. There are two impressions; the first a pure etching, the right arm of Daphne from the elbow to the wrist is shaded with a - single stroke only; the second retouched, and the arm of Daphne crossed with strong lines.

103. Judith. A copy of Parmigiano's etching, No. 1, but differing from it inasmuch as there are no shrubs in the left at bottom, as in the original print. In this etching the head of the attendant is younger, and reaches only up to the elbow of Judith, whereas in the original she is old, and her head reaches nearly the shoulder of Judith. H. 5p. 10l., W. 3p. 2l. There are three impressions of this: the first, pure etching before any retouch, the blade of the sword not made out; the second retouched, the right shoulder of the attendant, white in the preceding impression, has some lines on it, and the blade of the sword distinctly made out; the third, the plate cracked in the middle and on the left side, into the figure of Judith, so that her right arm is nearly taken away entirely. It measures merely 2p. 5l. in the widest part.
104. St. James the Great? The figure is profile, whole length, walking towards the left, and having a lance under the left arm; he has a closed book under the other, and appears to be meditating. Probably this is one of the same set as 83. He is surrounded by a glory. H. 4p. 3l., W. 2p. 10l.
105. St. Paul. Full-face figure standing in the centre, but looking up to the right. His right hand is placed on the pommel of a sword, the point of which is on the ground, and he has an open book under his left arm. This figure is also surrounded by a glory, and is probably one of the same series as No. 83. H. 4p. 3l., W. 2p. 11l.
108. Bellona, whole-length figure looking towards the right. She is in profile, throwing a javelin with her right hand, and the other is placed on a large shield on the right before her. H. 4p. 4l., W. 2p. 10l.
109. Bellona. The same design as the preceding, but etched in the reverse direction. The shield in this print has a kind of spike at the top and bottom, which are not in the former. H. 4p. 4l., W. 2p. 11l.
110. Virgin and Child with St. John. The Virgin is seated in a chair on the right of the print, but looking towards the left. The Infant appears to be leaping off her knees to the infant St. John, who, standing on the left, supports him with both hands. H. 5p. 6l., W. 3p. 1l.
111. Apollo and Python. Apollo naked, all but a floating drapery behind him, is standing near the centre, extending his left arm towards a little Cupid, who, standing on the right, raises his left arm. Behind the feet of the god, with his head to the right, lies the serpent. H. 4p. 11l., W. 3p. 1l.
112. Diana. The goddess is standing in the centre of the print, her head in profile looking up towards the left; she holds a bow in her right hand, and points with the other towards the right. In the bottom corner on the right is the stump of a tree and some shrubs, &c. H. 6p., W. 3p. 4l.
113. Bellona. She is in profile, walking towards the left, and holding up her shield on her right arm; she holds a lance, directed upwards, behind her in the other. Near the bottom, on the left, is the stump of a tree on a small hillock. H. 5p. 1l.? W. 2p. 10l.
115. Five Figures. In the centre is a young woman, face in profile, who points with her right hand towards the left. In the back-ground on that side are two figures, one of which points with the left hand. A child is standing on the left, also pointing. In the right is another female figure extending her right arm. H. 4p. 2l., W. 2p. 9l.
116. Faith. Faith is standing in the centre supporting a cross towards the right with both hands; her left foot is placed on a book, and her right is on the shoulder of Incredulity, who lies on three books across the print with her head to the left. At bottom to the right is a tablet with the monogram  (At Paris.) H. 9p. 3l., W. 5p. 11l.
117. Quos Ego. Neptune appeasing the storm: copy of the centre compartment of the celebrated print by Marc Antonio. (At Paris.) H. 8p. 6l., W. 5p. 10l.
118. St. Christopher. The saint is walking towards the right, having the infant supporting a globe, only a portion of which is seen on his left shoulder. The saint holds a staff, formed of the branch of a tree, in his right hand. In the back-ground on the left is an outline indication of another figure. (At Paris.) H. 8p. 5l., W. 5p. 6l.
119. Woman pouring Water from a Vase. A young woman is standing in the centre between two vases, one on the bottom on the left, and the other on the right; she is pouring water into that on the left from a jug which she holds in her right hand, and holds up another in her left. (British Museum.) H. 5p., W. 3p. 1l.

For the foregoing catalogue amateurs should feel grateful: it would have rejoiced the hearts of Zani and Bartsch. No doubt further research will bring more of his prints to light.]

MELEUN, COUNT DE, a French amateur engraver, mentioned by Basan. He lived about the year 1760, and etched for his amusement several small plates from Berghem, Callot, and other masters.

MELINI, CARLO DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, born at Turin about the year 1745, but chiefly resided at Paris, where he became a pupil of Beauvarlet. We have several plates by him, executed in a neat, finished style, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The King of Sardinia.
The Children of the Prince of Turenne.

SUBJECTS.

La belle Source; after Natthier.
The Education of Cupid; after Lagrenée.
Morning, a landscape; after Louthembourg.

MELISSI, AGOSTINO. This painter was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1675. According to Baldinucci, he was much employed by the Grand Duke in painting cartoons for tapestry, from the designs of Andrea del Sarto. He also painted several pictures of his own composition; among which, the above-mentioned author commends his picture of Peter denying Christ, in the Palazzo Gaburri.

MELLAN, CLAUDE, an eminent French designer and engraver, born at Abbeville in 1601. His disposition for the art discovering itself at an early age, he was sent to Paris, where he learned the elements of drawing in the school of Simon Vouet. An inclination for engraving induced him to attempt the management of the graver, which he soon handled with extraordinary facility. To improve himself in design he went to Rome, when he was sixteen years of age, where he studied some years with great assiduity, and became one of the ablest burinists of his time. He executed several plates, which were highly esteemed, and was engaged to engrave the busts and statues in the Giustiniani collection. The greater part of the plates he engraved at Rome are executed in the usual manner, with the strokes crossed a second and a third time, as the strength of the shadows require. He afterwards adopted a novel and singular method of working, with single parallel lines, without any cross strokes over them, the shadows being expressed by the same lines being made stronger, and consequently nearer to each other. By this new mode of engraving he acquired considerable celebrity; and the effect he produced by it, particularly in plates of a small and middle size, is clear, soft, and agreeable. It is certainly surprising, that he has been able to give such force and harmony to his plates, by so simple an effort, and such economy of labour; but his success is rather to be attributed to the singular dexterity with which he handled the graver, than to the peculiarity of the process. His print of Rebecca, after the picture by Tintoretto, is of an admirable colour, and of the most mellow effect. It is evidently engraved from the work of a great colourist, of which he appears to have seized the very tones of the painter; yet it is only in some of the accessories that he has introduced any cross lines. The number of his prints is very considerable, among which there are many admirable portraits, several of them from his own designs, as well as the greater part of his historical plates. He lived to the advanced age of 87, and died at Paris in 1688. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Urban VIII.; after Bernini. 1631.
Cardinal Bentivoglio.
The Marquis Justiniani.
Anne of Austria, Queen of France.
Henry, Duke of Montmorency.
The Cardinal, Duke de Richelieu.
The Cardinal de Mazarin.
Francis de Villemontée, Bishop of St. Malo. 1661.
Peter Seguier, Chancellor of France.
Nicholas Cæffeteau, Bishop of Marseilles; after Du Moustier.
The Cardinal du Perron; after Herbin.
Victor le Bouthillier, Archbishop of Tours. 1658.
Nicholas Claude Fabri de Peiresc; one of his finest portraits.
Charles de Crequis Lesdigueres, Marshal of France. 1633.
Peter Gassendi, Professor of Mathematics.
Louisa Maria de Gonzaga, Queen of Poland. 1645.
Claude Mellan, painter and engraver. 1635.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Lot and his Daughters. Rome, 1629.
Samson and Dalilah.
Moses and the Burning Bush. 1663.
The Miracle of the Manna.
The Annunciation; inscribed Ecce Virgo concipiet. 1666.
The Virgin, with the infant Jesus on her knee. 1659.
The Holy Family. Rome, 1635.
Christ praying in the Garden; a night-piece; fine.
Christ seized by the Soldiers; inscribed Pater, ignosce illis, &c.
St. John, with Magdalene embracing the Cross. Rome.
The Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Magdalene, and St. John.
The Entombing of Christ, with an inscription, Terra mota est.
The Resurrection; inscribed Per se resurgens. 1683.
The Face of Christ, called the Sudarium of St. Veronica; executed entirely by a single spiral line, begun at the extremity of the nose, and continued, without quitting, over the whole face and back-ground.
St. Peter Nolasque, supported by two angels. One of the finest and the rarest print of the artist.
Four large plates of the Life of St. Bruno.
St. Bruno praying in the Desert.
St. Francis praying. 1638; very fine.
Several other Saints in acts of Devotion.
Mary Magdalene expiring, supported by angels.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Herodias with the Head of St. John; after S. Vouet.
The Roman Charity; after the same.
The Death of Lucretia; after the same.
St. Catherine kneeling, to whom an angel is presenting the palm of martyrdom; after the same.

Rebecca meeting the Servant of Abraham; after Tintoretto; esteemed the finest of his prints.

He also engraved part of the plates of the antique statues in the Justiniani gallery, the whole of which consists of 322 prints, [published collectively in 2 vols. folio, Romæ, 1640,] and a part of the antique marbles in the royal palaces of France, which were completed by S. Baudet.

Mellan did not always sign his prints with his name at length, but sometimes with the initials C. M., or with the abbreviation C. Mel. or Cl. Mell.

MELONE, ALTABELLO. This painter was a native of Cremona, and flourished about the year 1497. According to Vasari, he painted for one of the churches at Cremona a series of pictures of the Passion of our Saviour, which are described by that author as superior to the productions of the coeval artists of his country. He was less successful in fresco than in oil. Of the latter, his best performance is a picture of Christ descending into Limbo, in the sacristy of the church del Sacramento. It is a composition of many figures, and though they are not very correctly drawn, and generally too long, it is coloured with force, and at the same time with tenderness, with a grace in the forms and attitudes, unusual in the Cremonese school at the period at which he lived. [Altobello Melone flourished somewhat later; there are pictures by him with the dates 1517 and 1520. Rosini has given a print of the Flight into Egypt by him, (plate 75,) which will give an idea of his style of design and composition.]

MELONI, FRANCESCO ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Bologna about the year 1670. His first intention was to study painting, for which purpose he became a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini; but not succeeding to his wishes, he etched some plates after the designs of that master, which encouraged him to devote himself entirely to engraving. Among others, we have the following by him:

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after C. Cignani.
Aurora; from a ceiling painted at Forli; by the same.

[F. A. Meloni was born in 1676, and died in 1713. His design is correct and pure; he finished his etchings very carefully with the graver. His prints are not numerous; Bartsch mentions only sixteen; he does not, however, consider the list complete. Nagler has added ten more.]

MELOZZO, DA FORLI. Lanzi supposes the baptismal name of this painter to have been Francesco, and thinks it probable that he was a disciple of Ansovino da Forli, who had studied under Francesco Squarcione; though he is said by others to have been a scholar of Pietro della Francesca. He was a native of Forli, and, according to Vasari, flourished about the year 1472. Such was his desire of learning the best principles of the art, that it is asserted by Scanelli, in Il Microcosmo della Pittura, that, though of a noble and affluent family, he submitted to the menial duties of a domestic servant and colour-grinder to some of the principal painters of his time. To this venerable artist is attributed the first invention of fore-shortening, which was afterwards carried to such perfection by Coreggio. In the study of perspective, considerable progress had been made by Pietro della Francesca, since its alleged invention by Paolo Uccello, the Florentine; but the merit of first painting figures in perspective, on vaults and ceilings, by which the illusion is rendered completely effective, was reserved for Melozzo. He appears to have resided at Rome some time previous to 1472, in which year he painted, for Cardinal Riario, nephew of Sixtus IV., on the vault of his chapel, in the church of the Apostles, a fresco of the Ascension, which is spoken of by Vasari as a work of surprising effect. In 1711, when the chapel was taken down and rebuilt, this painting was sawed out of the wall, and placed in one of the apartments of the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo, with the inscription, Opus Melotii Foroliviensis, qui summos fornices pingendi artem vel primus invenit vel illustravit. The style of Melozzo resembles that of Andrea Mantegna. His design is rigidly correct, and the expression of his heads noble and dignified. This eminent artist was still living in 1494, as appears from Luca Paccioli's work, entitled, Summa d'Arithmetica e Geometria, published in that year, in which he mentions Melozzo da Forli among the most celebrated painters of perspective then living. [Zani says he was born in 1436.]

[MELZI, FRANCESCO, IL CONTE, the pupil and friend of Lionardo da Vinci, was a native of Milan, and lived to the year 1568. He was of noble birth, and practised the art of painting as a delightful employment rather than as a profession. He approached nearer to the manner of Lionardo than did any other of his pupils or imitators; indeed so close is the resemblance, that his pictures have been universally ascribed to that master. Kügler speaks of a Vertumnus and Pomona in the Berlin Museum formerly supposed to be by Lionardo, which now bears the name of Francesco Melzi; and there is, or was, in England a female head with a wreath of flowers, called "The Flora" of Lionardo da Vinci, but which is no doubt the work of Melzi, as it is attributed to him by an early writer on art. Melzi was highly esteemed by Lionardo for his various good qualities, and he felt a reciprocal attachment to his great master. He followed him to France, and attended him at his death; and became heir to the whole of his designs, instruments, books, and manuscripts. He furnished Vasari and Lomazzo with notices of Lionardo's life; and it is to him that posterity is indebted for the preservation of the valuable collection of his writings.]

MEMMI, SIMONE, sometimes called SIMONE MARTINI. Simone Memmi, one of the earliest painters after the revival of the art, was born, according to Vasari, in 1285. He is said by some to have been a scholar and coadjutor of Giotto, and to have aided him, at Rome, in his celebrated mosaic of the Navicella. The Siënese writers state him to have been a disciple of their venerable compatriot Maestro Mino. Although he might not be a scholar of Giotto, he is known to have assisted him in his works, and to have painted some frescoes in St. Peter's, in imitation of his style, which occasioned the Pope to invite him to Avignon, where he painted the portrait of the famed Laura, for which he has been celebrated by Petrarch in two of his sonnets. His pictures in the Vatican have perished; but several of his works remain at Siena, Pisa, and Florence. At Pisa, in the Campo Santo, are some frescoes of subjects from the life of S. Ranieri, and his much-admired Assumption of the Virgin. In the Capitolo degli Spagnuoli, at Florence, are some of his works of more extensive compositions, of the Life of Christ, St. Peter Martyr, and others. He painted several portraits of the most eminent personages of that time. He died in 1345. [His family name was Martino, and he was called Simone di Martino da Siena. He signed his pictures Simon de Senis on several occasions; the last in 1344, in which year he died. The date of his birth is less certain; Zani and others place it in 1274, which would make him 70 when he died. He also painted in miniature, and for his friend Petrarch embellished a MS. Virgil, which is now in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. Rosini has given a print (plate 15) of a painting by Simone Memmi in S. Maria Novella, in Florence, which gives a very exalted idea of the talents of the artist.]

MEMMI, LIPPO. This artist was a native of Siena, the brother-in-law and scholar of the preceding artist, and flourished about the year 1360. Although unequal to Simone Memmi in invention, he was a successful imitator of his style, and with the advantage of his designs, executed several works which would have been regarded as the productions of Simone, if he had not signed them with his name. When he was not supported by such assistance, his performances were deficient in composition, though well coloured. He sometimes painted in conjunction with his relative, as appears from a picture formerly in S. Ansano di Castel Vecchio, at Siena, now in the Florentine gallery, inscribed A. D. 1333. Simon Martini et Lippus Memmi de Senis, me pinxerunt. At Ancona and at Assisi, are some pictures begun by Simone, and finished by Lippo Memmi.

[MENAGEOT, FRANÇOIS GUILLAUME, an historical painter, born of French parents at London in 1744, and died at Paris in 1816. He was a scholar of Boucher and the celebrated Vien. He distinguished himself by several classical subjects, for which he obtained prizes; and became one of the professors of the Academy, and director of the French School at Rome. At the Revolution he returned to France, where he painted Polyxenus taking leave of Hecuba, Astyanax torn from the arms of his Mother, Cleopatra at the Tomb of Mare Antony, Diana and Venus, and Dagobert giving orders for the construction of the Church of St. Denis; this last picture is placed in the sacristy of that church.]

MENAGEOT, ROBERT, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1748. He was for some time a pupil of Boucher, and at first practised painting, but he afterwards devoted himself entirely to engraving. We have several plates by him, executed in the dotted manner, some of which were engraved for Mr. Boydell, during his residence in London. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

Friendship; a circular print; after Coreggio.
Innocence; the companion; Menageot, fecit.
The Virgin and Infant, with St. Elisabeth; after Guido.

An African Woman; after Louthembourg.

MENANT, P., a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about the year 1715. In conjunction with Raymond, Fonbonne, Scotin, and others, he executed part of the plates of the Views of the Palace and Gardens at Versailles. They are neatly executed, but in a stiff, formal style, and without effect.

[MENESES. See OSORIO.]

MENGOZZINO. See SANTI.

MENGS, ANTONIO RAFFAELLE. This celebrated artist was born at Auszig, in Bohemia, in 1728. His father, Ishmael Mengs, a miniature painter of little celebrity, instructed him in the first rudiments of drawing, and having removed to Dresden whilst his son was young, our artist had an opportunity of improving himself, by studying the works of the best masters in that celebrated gallery. When he was thirteen years of age, his father took him to Rome, in 1741, where he was employed in copying, in miniature, some of the works of Raffaele, for Augustus III., Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, which were sent to Dresden, and which were much admired. He remained at Rome three years, and on his return to Saxony was appointed one of the painters to the Elector and King, with a salary, and was permitted by his royal patron to visit Rome a second time, where he resided four years, and exhibited a picture of the Holy Family of his own composition, on a larger scale, which gained him great reputation. He married at Rome, and was desirous of fixing his residence in that capital, but his father would not permit him to indulge his inclination, and he was compelled to return to Saxony, where he arrived in 1749. He remained three years at Dresden, where the tyranny of his father rendered his situation so distressing, that he found his health and spirits impaired, and he requested and received the king's permission to return to Rome. He was soon afterwards reduced to very embarrassed circumstances, by the discontinuance of his salary, which was stopped, from the distressed state of the king's finances, occasioned by the war. He worked at Rome for support, at very low prices, when he was employed by the Duke of Northumberland to paint a copy of the celebrated School of Athens, by Raffaele. It was about this time that he was engaged to paint the ceiling of the church of St. Eusebius; and soon afterwards he executed his admired fresco of Mount Parnassus, in the Villa Albani, which has been finely engraved by Raphael Morghen. In an excursion he made to Naples, to execute a commission for the Elector of Saxony, he became known to the king, afterwards Charles III. of Spain, who, on his succession to the throne, invited Mengs to Madrid, with the offer of a very considerable appointment. This proposal was not likely to be refused, and he arrived at the court of Spain in 1761. His first undertaking was the ceiling of the king's antechamber, representing the Graces; and afterwards that of the queen's apartment, where he painted one of his most celebrated works, the Aurora, a grand and beautiful composition. The climate of Spain not agreeing with his constitution, he was permitted by the king to return to Rome, for the re-establishment of his health. On his arrival he was employed by Clement XIV. in the Vatican, where he painted his picture of Janus dictating to History, who writes, and a Holy Family, which have been engraved by Dom. Cunego. He remained three years at Rome, and on his return to Madrid was received with great kindness by his royal protector. It was soon after his return that he undertook his famous work of the ceiling of the great saloon, in the palace at Madrid, where he represented the Apotheosis of the Emperor Trajan, a composition of extraordinary ingenuity and judgment. The colouring and general effect of this magnificent work are admirable. The fresco paintings of Mengs are greatly superior to his pictures in oil; and in them his style is infinitely preferable. Of his works in oil, perhaps the most esteemed is his picture of the Nativity, in the royal collection of Spain. It is painted on the same principle as the famous Notte by Coreggio, in which the whole light emanates from the infant Saviour. It was so highly valued by the king, that he ordered it to be covered with a single plate of glass, to preserve it from injury. It measures nine feet ten inches, by seven feet.

Through his whole life, Mengs devoted himself entirely to the study of his art, without the necessary relaxations of exercise or society; and after a residence of little more than two years, from his return to Madrid, he found that incessant application, and the unfavourable climate, had reduced him to a state of weakness, which made it necessary for him to return, without loss of time, to the more friendly temperature of Rome. To that emporium of the arts, his inclinations and habits of study had at all times bent; and it was with the most heartfelt gratitude that he received his royal patron's permission to return to Italy, with an increased pension, and the most munificent marks of his esteem. His enfeebled frame felt returning vigour as he journeyed, and when he approached Rome, his languid spirits brightened, at the hope of passing the remainder of his life in the sacred residence of virtù and taste. But these endearing prospects were of short duration. Soon after his arrival at Rome, the death of his wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, occasioned him the deepest affliction. He sunk into a state of the most melancholy despondency, which brought on a return of his former indisposition. In this state of debility, he called in the assistance of an ignorant empiric, whose injudicious and violent treatment occasioned his death, in 1779, in the fifty-first year of his age.

The talents of an artist are seldom duly appreciated during his life. The inflated eulogium of friends must subside, and the heated rancour of enemies cool, before his true character can be established by the dispassionate and judicious. The indiscreet zeal of his partisans has not hesitated to exalt his powers to a level with those of Raffaele; and some of his admirers, particularly the celebrated Winkelman, place him in a still more elevated rank. He has been gazed at by some, as the sole bright luminary of modern times, who attribute to him the purity of the antique, the composition and expression of Raffaele, the grace and chiaro-scuro of Coreggio, and the colouring of Titian. Should these attributes appear strained, as they probably will to the rational, they may be contrasted with opinions less favourable to his reputation, though perhaps quite as consistent with what is due to his undoubted ability, and with that justice which we owe to his illustrious predecessors. He is said to have been an artist, who had seen much and invented little; that he dispenses neither life nor death to his figures; excites no terror, rouses no passions, and risks no fights. By studying to avoid particular faults, he runs into general ones, and his execution bears the marks of tameness and servility. The contracted scale and idea of a painter of miniature, is to be traced in all, or most, of his compositions, in which the finished delicacy exhibits the hand of the artist, but gives no emanations of the soul of the master. If it is beauty, it does not warm; if it is sorrow, it excites no pity.

To form a just idea of this painter's ability, it is necessary to have seen his most studied and distinguished works, which are unquestionably in Spain. If the powers of Mengs do not surprise us by the fiery soaring of his imagination, or the daring display of novel and inventive genius, they satisfy the most scrupulous, by the chaste arrangement of his ideas, and his careful and learned attention to the propriety of costume. His acquaintance with the antique is studied and profound, and his characters are distinguished by a quiet correctness, and a placid expression of tranquil and inanimate beauty; though he was perhaps unequal to the delineation of the sublime and terrific, or the development of the passions, agitated by the varied impulses of human feeling. As a theorist, and a writer on art, Mengs is entitled to a distinguished reputation. He supplied the Abbé Winkelman with very important materials for his Storia delle Belle Arti, and has himself written some excellent treatises on painting, which, though his ideas are occasionally wrapt up in pedantic mystery, and enveloped in difficulties, little intelligible to the incipient understanding of the student, are however calculated to elevate the mind of the painter to the most consummate idea of the grandeur and sublimity of his art.

[MENHEERE, CORNELIS LAURENSZ, a Dutch marine painter, who lived at the beginning of the 18th century. He resided at Flushing, and the greater part of his pictures represent views of that city taken from the sea-coast.]

MENICHINO, DEL BRIZZIO. See AMBROGI.

MENTON, FRANCIS. According to Van Mander, this painter was born at Alkmaer in 1550, and was a disciple of Francis Floris. He painted history and portraits. His pictures were well composed, and his drawing tolerably correct. The encouragement he met with as a portrait painter prevented him from painting many historical pictures, but in the few he has left he proves himself to have been a reputable artist. He was living in 1604. [He died in 1615.]

MERANO, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Genoa in 1632. He was a scholar of Valerio Castelli, and by the recommendation of his master studied with attention the works of Coreggio, at Parma, where he was employed by the Duke, and for many private collections. One of his best performances is the Murder of the Innocents, in the church del Gesu, at Genoa, which Lanzi describes as a copious and ingenious composition, with great variety of expression and character, and of an harmonious colouring. He died in 1700. [Zani says he died in 1698.]

MERCATI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. A Florentine painter and engraver, born at Citta San Sepolcro, about the year 1600. He was an imitator, if not a scholar, of Pietro da Cortona, and painted history in the style of that master. In the church of S. Chiara, in his native city, he painted two subjects from the life of the Virgin; and in S. Lorenzo, an altar-piece representing the titular, with other Saints, which resembles the style of the Caracci, in the variety and expression in the heads, and the ample folding of the drapery. We have several spirited etchings by this artist, some of them are from his own designs, of which the following are the principal:

A set of fifty-two plates of Ruins and Views in Italy; engraved in the manner of Sylvestre; Gio. Bat. Mercati, fec.

Four Antique Figures, from the arch of Constantine; engraved in the style of Gallestrucci; circular; Gio. Bat. Mercati.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Coreggio. St. Bibiana refusing to sacrifice to false Gods; after P. da Cortona.

[It is probable that he was born earlier, as there are prints by him dated 1616. His etchings are well designed, and assisted by the graver in a bold manner, which gives them a vigorous and brilliant effect. The latest date on them is 1637.]

MERCIER, ANTOINE LE. We have by this artist some slight but spirited etchings of architectural ornaments, &c., after the designs of P. Collo. [He flourished about 1633: he must not be confounded with Jacques Le Mercier, the architect, who also engraved. Three prints by the latter are described by Dumesnil, which he says are of the greatest rarity. They are the design of a model (not executed) by Michael Angelo, of the church S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini, 1607; a design of the statue of Henry IV., erected at S. Giovanni de Lateran, in 1608; and the Catafalco at Rome for the obsequies of Henry IV., July 1, 1610. He was born about 1590, and died in 1660.]

MERCIER, PHILIP. This painter was originally of French extraction, but was born at Berlin in 1689, and was brought up in the Academy there. After visiting France and Italy, he went to Hanover, where he painted the portrait of Prince Frederick, which he brought with him to England, and when his Royal Highness came over Mercier was appointed his painter, became a favourite, and was taken into his household, and by the Prince's order drew several of the royal family, particularly the three eldest princesses, which were engraved in mezzotint by J. Simon. After nine years, he lost the favour of the Prince of Wales, and was dismissed from his service. He afterwards lived in Covent Garden, painting portraits and pictures of domestic subjects, in the style of Watteau, in whose manner there is an etching of Mercier, with his wife and two children. He died in 1760. [Some of his portraits blend the manners of H. Rigaud and Godfrey Kneller.]

MERIAN, MATTHEW, the ELDER, an eminent designer and engraver, born at Basle in 1593. Having discovered an early disposition for the art, he was sent to Zurich, and placed under the tuition of Dietrich Meyer, a glass painter and engraver, with whom he studied four years, and in that time had already acquired some celebrity. On leaving that master he went to Frankfort, where he formed an intimacy with Theodore de Bry, and improved his talent by the instruction and advice of that able master, whose daughter he married. He was at this time employed in engraving his topographical plates of the Views in the environs of Heidelberg, Stuttgart, Schwabach, &c., which he afterwards published at Frankfort, and which are the best of his works. They are etched from his own designs, in a slight free style, and finished with the graver, and give a perfect idea of the places they represent, though without much taste in the execution. He has the credit of having been the instructor of the estimable Hollar. The following are his principal prints, which are sometimes marked with one of these ciphers,  or .

PORTRAITS.

David Pareus; Prof. Academiae Heidelberg.
Daniel Sennertus; oval.
Arnold Weickerdus, Med. Doc. 1626.

SUBJECTS.

A set of plates from Sacred History.
The Last Supper, inscribed, Accepti Jesus panem; a large plate; very scarce.
A large plate of the Picture of Human Life; inscribed, Tabula Cebetis, continens totius vitæ humanæ descriptionem; scarce.

A set of seven Views in France.

Six Views in Germany.

Sixteen Views in Germany and Switzerland.

Twelve Views of Gardens, &c.

Twenty-four Picturesque Landscapes, with figures.

He died at Frankfort in 1651. [For a full account of his works, see Nagler.]

MERIAN, MATTHEW, the YOUNGER, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Basle in 1621, and is said to have been successively the scholar of Sandrart, Rubens, and Vandyck. He painted history and portraits, and is mentioned by Fuessli, his countryman, as a very reputable artist. Of his historical works, that author particularly notices the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, in the dome at Bamberg. He was a tolerably correct designer, and his colouring partook of the vigour of the Flemish school. As a portrait painter, he was employed by the most distinguished personages in Germany. He was also an engraver, and is supposed to have been in England about the year 1640, as there is an emblematical frontispiece by him, with the portrait of Dr. Donne, prefixed to his Sermons, published in that year.

MERIAN, MARIA SYBILLA. This celebrated lady was the daughter of Matthew Merian the elder, born at Frankfort in 1647. She had the misfortune of losing her father when she was only four years of age, but her mother having some time afterwards married Jacob Murel, a reputable painter of flowers and fruit, he encouraged the disposition she discovered for drawing, and taught her the first rudiments of the art. With the advantage of his instruction, she made a surprising progress, and soon arrived at a proficiency in painting flowers, fruit, insects, and still-life, in miniature, which astonished her master. Her inclination led her particularly to the study of natural history, and she had formed an extensive collection of insects and reptiles, which she designed with the nicest precision. To render her more perfect in that branch, her father-in-law placed her under the care of Abraham Mignon, the celebrated flower-painter, who had been his scholar, and who excelled particularly in painting insects; and it was not long before she arrived at a perfection little short of her instructor. She usually painted in water-colours, on vellum, and represented butterflies, caterpillars, and other insects, in the various changes they undergo, with a fidelity and beauty of finishing, which has never been surpassed. In 1665, she married John Andrew Graff, an ingenious artist of Nuremberg, who had been a scholar of Murel, and settled in that city. Not satisfied with the description of insects and their metamorphoses, which she found in the works of the natural historians of her time, she formed the project of giving to the world her own observations and researches, accompanied with plates, from her designs, and partly etched by herself. In 1679, she published the first volume of her interesting work, at Nuremberg, written in German, under the title of The History of the Insects of Europe, drawn from nature, and explained, by Maria Sybilla Merian, with their Generation and Changes, with the Plants on which they feed. The second volume appeared in 1683. Her zeal in the pursuit of her favourite study induced her to undertake a voyage to Surinam, for the purpose of designing from nature the insects and plants peculiar to that climate. In 1698 she embarked at Amsterdam, where she had resided some time; and after an absence of two years returned to Holland, with the fruits of her voyage. In 1705 she published an account of them at Amsterdam in Latin, entitled, Dissertatio de Generatione et Metamorphosis Insectorum Surinamensium, containing sixty plates. This work was augmented, in a later edition, with twelve additional plates, by her daughter, Dorothea Graff. The miniatures of this lady have a delicacy and beauty of colouring which have seldom been equalled, and they are still in the highest estimation, notwithstanding the extraordinary attention which has since been paid to the accurate execution of such works. There are two large volumes of the drawings of this artist in the British Museum, one containing the insects of Europe, and the other those of Surinam. They were purchased at a great price by Sir Hans Sloane, who is said to have given five guineas for each drawing. She died at Amsterdam in 1717.

MERIAN, GASPAR. This artist was a native of Germany. He engraved a set of plates representing the Ceremonies of the Election of the Emperor Leopold, published at Frankfort in 1660.

MERLIN, JAMES VAN. According to Florent le Comte, this artist, conjointly with Theodore van Merlin, who was probably his brother, engraved a few plates after Martin de Vos, and others. They flourished about the year 1600.

MERSION, MADELAINE LE. This French lady etched a plate of a Landscape and Cattle, in a style resembling that of Dankerts, when he engraved after *Berghe*m. It was published at Paris, without date, or the name of the painter.

MESA, ALONSO DE. According to Palomino, this painter was born at Madrid in 1628, and was a scholar of Alonso Cano. He painted history with considerable reputation, and executed several works for the public edifices in that capital, of which the most admired are said to have been a series of pictures of the Life of St. Francis, in the cloister of the Franciscans. He died at Madrid in 1668.

[MESA, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, who resided at Madrid at the commencement of the seventeenth century. He painted for the college of the Jesuits de Alcalá de Henares, a series of pictures illustrative of the Life of St. Ignacius Loyola, by Father Ribadeneyra, which were engraved in Flanders.]

MESNIL, E., a modern French engraver, mentioned by Basan. He was living in 1760, at the time he published his dictionary, and had engraved several plates after Mieris, Karel de Moor, and other Dutch masters.

MESSINA, ANTONELLO DA. This painter was born at Messina in 1426. After learning the rudiments of the art in Sicily, the fame of Masaccio induced him to visit Rome, where he studied some time. He afterwards went to Naples, where he resided at a period when some of the works of John van Eyck, or John of Bruges, who had some time before made his discovery of painting in oil, were brought from Flanders by some Neapolitan merchants, and presented to Alphonso I., King of Naples. The novelty of the invention, and the beauty of the colouring, inspired Antonello with a strong desire of becoming possessed of a secret which had excited such universal admiration. He determined on visiting the author of so interesting a discovery, and of using all the means in his power to become acquainted with the mystery. With this resolution he travelled to Bruges, and so far insinuated himself into the good graces of Van Eyck, who was then advanced in years, that he instructed him in the process, with which he returned to Italy, and was the first artist who painted in oil in that country. From him the secret is said to have been communicated to Domenico Veneziano. Such is the account given of this event by Vasari, but its accuracy is much doubted by later and more correct authorities; and even the authenticity of the invention by Van Eyck is considered as very questionable, if not entirely unfounded, as may be seen by a reference to the article of Van Eyck. Of the works of Antonello, history furnishes us with a very parsimonious account. Lanzi mentions two altar-pieces by him in the two churches della Dominante at Venice, and some pictures of the Virgin, in private collections. He also notices a portrait in the possession of Sig. Martinengo, inscribed, Antonellus Messaneus me fecit, 1494, and a Pietá in the hall of the Consiglio de Dieci, signed Antonius Messinensis. The time of his death is not precisely ascertained. [Writers are not at all agreed respecting the birth of this painter; some with great probability place it in 1414, others in 1447. It would be a work of great difficulty to reconcile their differences. The principal belligerents on this and other matters concerning Antonello, are Lanzi, Zani, and Rosini; their auxiliaries, Gallo, Puccini, Summonzio, Maurolico, and Zanetti: to these, therefore, it will be safer to refer the inquirer, than to give an opinion on either side. See Lanzi, Storia Pittorica, tom. ii.; Zani, Enciclopedia delle belle Arti, vol. ii., parte prima, note 115; Rosini, Storia della Pittura Italiana, tomo iii.; and the other writers as quoted by them. Vasari's account of this painter is not considered as sufficiently supported by facts to make it of any authority.]

MESSINA, SALVO DA. According to Hakert, in his Memorie de' Pittori Messinesi, this painter was the nephew of Antonello, and flourished about the year 1511. He is said, by that author, to have been a successful follower of the style of Raffaele; and he mentions with distinction a picture by him, in the sacristy of the cathedral at Messina, representing the Death of the Virgin, which, he says, is painted del più puero Raffaellesco stilo.

METELLI. See MITELLI.

METENSIS, CORNELIUS. See MATSYS.

METGER, J. J. The name of an obscure engraver, affixed to a portrait of Cardinal Giovanni Nitardo, very indifferently executed, for "Priorata's History of the Emperor Leopold," published in 1672.

METRANA, ANNA. According to Orlandi, this lady was a native of Turin. She flourished about the year 1718, and distinguished herself as an eminent painteress of portraits.

[METZ, CONRAD MARTIN, an eminent engraver in the chalk manner and aquatint, was a native of Bonn, but received his education in art at London, under the celebrated Bartolozzi. His principal works consist of imitations and fac-similes of the drawings of the old Italian masters, of which he published a great number; particularly of the drawings by Parmigiano in the royal collection, those of Polidoro Caravaggio in the possession of Sir Abraham Hume, and numerous detached pieces in various cabinets. In 1801 he left England for Rome, where he continued to exercise his ready talent at imitation, and otherwise engraving from works of the highest order, till the time of his decease, which occurred in 1827, at the age of 72. Nagler enumerates upwards of 200 of his engravings.]

METZU, GABRIEL. This charming painter was born at Leyden in 1615. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he appears to have made the works of Gerard Terburg the models of his imitalion, whom he equalled in the silky softness of his pencilling, and surpassed in the elegance and correctness of his design. At an early period of his life he established himself at Amsterdam, where his works soon rose into the highest estimation. His pictures generally represent domestic scenes, and what are called conversations, ladies at their toilet, or playing on musical instruments; and sometimes subjects from low life, as fish stalls, women selling game, fruit, vegetables, &c. These objects have been treated by several of the Dutch painters, but by none more successfully, than by Metz. Less minute in detail, and less laboured in the finishing, than the works of Gerard Douw and Mieris, he excels them in the lightness and spirit of his touch, and the chasteness and harmony of his colouring. Though he painted on so small a scale, his style may be compared to that of Vandyck, in the correct drawing of the heads and hands, the delicacy of his carnations, and the breadth and facility of his pencil. An enemy to manner, his touch is vague and free, and always adapted to the particular object he had to represent. The attitudes of his figures are easy and natural, and there is a truth and naïveté in the expression of his heads which may be said to be peculiar to him. The works of Metz may perhaps be justly proposed as models of perfection, in the particular branch of art in which he excelled, as combining freedom with finish, and as exhibiting a transparence and purity of colouring, which is disturbed and destroyed by the torment of extreme and laborious polishing. The pictures of this admirable artist are not frequently to be met with, as he died in the prime of life. An uninterrupted assiduity in his profession, and constant confinement, is said to have impaired his health, and brought on the afflicting complaint of the stone. He was under the necessity of submitting to the operation, which he did not long survive, but died in 1658. [In Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. iv., and Supplement, will be found descriptions of 160 pictures by Metsu. No other written account will convey to the reader any information equal to what is to be found there. One of the pictures described is in the Dresden gallery, and has the date 1667; if this be correct, it, in some measure, corroborates Balkema, who says he died in 1669. On the few pictures that have his name, it is Metsu, not Metzu.]

MEULEN, ANTHONY FRANCIS VANDER. This distinguished artist was born at Brussels in 1634, though from his long residence at Paris he is generally considered of the French school. His parents, who were in affluent circumstances, perceiving his early inclination to the art, placed him as a disciple of Peter Snayers, a reputable painter of battles, whom he surpassed before he quitted his school. Some of his first productions, after leaving that master, found their way to Paris, and possessed sufficient merit to attract the attention of Charles le Brun, at that time the arbiter of taste in the French metropolis. As the object of the arts, as well as every consideration of the court, was to flatter the ambition of Louis XIV., it was with this view that Le Brun recommended Vander Meulen to M. Colbert, as possessing a proper talent to commemorate the military achievements of that monarch. The minister, always ready to seize every opportunity of tickling the vanity of his sovereign, eagerly listened to the proposal. Vander Meulen was invited to Paris, and was soon afterwards pensioned by the king, and accommodated with apartments at the Gobelins. The brilliant exploits of Louis XIV.

afforded ample employment for the ability of the painter; and Vander Meulen was appointed to attend his royal patron to the field in his different campaigns. He painted for the Chateau of Marly the principal battles and sieges of that monarch in Flanders. It is perhaps to be regretted, that the eminent talents of this painter were confined to the precise representation of modern warfare, and the linear designation of troops drawn up by the regularity of tactics, with the monotonous uniformity of habiliments, than which nothing can be less picturesque. Shackled with such restrictions, the works of Vander Meulen lose a considerable share of the interest they would otherwise have possessed with posterity. It will not, however, be denied, that he acquitted himself, under this constraint, with great ability. He also painted huntings, and cavalcades, in which the figures and horses are correctly drawn, and touched with great spirit. The works of Vander Meulen are admired for an exact and local representation of events, a bold design, an animated pencil, and a clear and silvery tone of colour. His landscapes are distinguished by the freshness of his verdure and foliage, the pleasing degradation of his distances, and the lightness and brilliancy of his skies. If his pictures are less effective, and less vigorous in light and shadow, than the battles of Il Borgognone, it may in a great degree be attributed to the formality before mentioned, and to the prevalent taste of the country in which he resided. Although he was principally employed in painting for the court, there are several of his pictures in private collections. He died at Paris in 1690. [The battles and sieges of Louis XIV., painted by Vandermeulen, are engraved, on a large scale; some of them by Hughtenburg.]

MEULEN, PETER VANDER, was the brother, and probably the scholar, of the preceding artist. He painted battles and huntings, and in 1670 came to England, where he was afterwards employed in celebrating the exploits of King William, Louis's rival. He was originally bred a sculptor, but abandoned that art for painting. Largilliere painted a portrait of this artist, of which there is a mezzotinto print by Becket.

[MEUNIER, LOUIS, an architectural designer and engraver, who flourished about 1665. His prints consist chiefly of views of the royal residences and public places in Spain. Dumesnil (tom. v.) has given a description of 88. His manner of engraving resembles that of Perelle and I. Silvestre, and in some of his pieces a greater analogy to Thierry Stoop.]

MEURS, J. V. The name of this artist is affixed to the portrait of Tycho Brache, the astronomer. It is executed with the graver in a neat, finished style. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and engraved several frontispieces, and other book ornaments.

MEURS, C. H. VAN. This engraver was a native of Holland, and resided at Amsterdam about the year 1760. According to Basan, he engraved several plates after Mieris, Vanderwey, and other masters.

MEUSNIER, PHILIP, a French painter of perspective and architectural views, born at Paris in 1655. He was a scholar of Jacques Rousseau, and on leaving that master went to Rome, where he passed several years, designing the most magnificent buildings in that metropolis. On his return to Paris he was patronized by Louis XIV. and his successor. He was a member of the Royal Academy at Paris, and his works were held in considerable estimation. He died at Paris in 1734.

MEYER, ANDREW. This artist, according to Professor Christ, was a native of Zurich in Switzerland. He is said to have been a painter, and to have engraved some views of towns, which are marked with a curious monogram .

MEYER, DIETRICH, a Swiss painter and engraver, born at Zurich in 1571. He painted portraits and history with some reputation. We have engraved by him a set of portraits of illustrious personages of Switzerland, which are usually marked with a cipher composed of a D and an M. M.

[According to Nagler he was born at Eglisau in 1572, and died in 1658.]

MEYER, JOHN. This artist was probably of the same family. He was a painter, and usually resided at Nuremberg. We have several prints by him, some of which are from his own designs. Among others, a set of battles, etched in a spirited style. He also engraved a set of the principal fountains at Rome, which were published at Nuremberg in 1600.

MEYER, RODOLPH, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, [Dietrich Meyer,] born at Zurich in 1605. He painted history and portraits with considerable reputation, but was more distinguished as an engraver than a painter. We have by him several plates of emblematical subjects and portraits, some of which were published with those of his brother Conrad, who is the subject of the succeeding article. He made the designs for Death's Dance, which were engraved by Conrad.

MEYER, CONRAD. This artist was the younger son of Dietrich Meyer, and the younger brother of Rodolph, born at Zurich in 1618. After receiving some instruction from his father he went to Frankfurt, where he became a scholar of Matthew Merian. He painted a few historical subjects, and was more employed in portraits, which are said to be designed with energy and spirit, and well coloured. As an engraver, he may be considered as one of the most laborious artists of his time, and the number of his prints is very considerable. Caspar Fuesslin, who had endeavoured to collect an entire set of them, had got together upwards of nine hundred, without being nearly complete. The following are his principal works:

A set of thirty Portraits of the Burgomasters of Zurich.

Twenty portraits of the Clergy of Zurich.

Forty Portraits of Laicks and Artists; some of which are from the designs of his father and brother.

One hundred and three Portraits of the Reformers, Ecclesiastics, and literary characters.

A set of sixty-one plates of the Dance of Death; principally from the designs of Rodolph Meyer.

A set of fifteen prints; entitled the Mirror of a Christian.

Twenty-six prints of the Sports of Children.

Ten plates of the Ages of Man.

One hundred and twenty-two subjects from the Old Testament.

He also engraved a great variety of views, landscapes, and emblematical subjects. Conrad Meyer died at Zurich in 1689.

MEYER, FELIX. This painter was born at Winterthur, in Switzerland, in 1653. He was the son of a clergyman, who was desirous of bringing him up to the church; but his inclination for drawing interfered with his studies, and he was at length permitted to indulge his propensity. He was sent to Nuremberg, where he became a scholar of John Francis Ermels, a very reputable painter of landscapes. His progress under that master was surprisingly rapid, and at an early age he found himself capable of drawing from nature with facility and correctness. In company with Roos and Rugendas, he was indefatigable in designing the most picturesque views of Switzerland, so favourable to the studies of the landscape painter. He afterwards visited Italy, to study the more cultured scenery of the environs of Rome; but the climate proving obnoxious to his health, he returned to Switzerland. He possessed an uncommonly fertile imagination, and an extraordinary readiness of hand; of which M. Descamps gives a remarkable instance. In his travels through Germany, he visited the celebrated Abbey of St. Florian, at a time when the abbot was desirous of having two of the saloons decorated with landscapes in fresco. An artist of the country had been applied to for the purpose, who was so tedious in his progress, that he had been occupied several months in preparing sketches for the work. Our artist being introduced to the superior as a painter, was shown the apartments, and was consulted by the abbot in what manner the work could be best accomplished. After examining the rooms, Meyer took a long stick, to which he attached a piece of charcoal, and immediately commenced sketching on the wall. "Here in the front," said he, drawing as he spoke, "I would have a large tree, further in the distance a forest; rolling from these rocks I would represent a waterfall," and so on. The abbot was astonished to see the wall covered with a design executed with such taste and facility. He engaged Meyers to finish the two apartments, which he accomplished in less time than the artist had employed in making the designs.

The celebrity of Meyer soon became known throughout Germany, and he was employed by several of the princes of the empire in ornamenting their apartments. As he was not very successful in the design of the figures, he was frequently assisted in them by Melchior Roos and George Philip Rugendas. In the earlier part of his life his pictures were finished with care and attention, but at a later period he painted with negligence and haste. His works were no longer studied from nature, but the productions of manner and despatch. He died in 1713. F. Meyer has etched several plates of landscapes from his own designs, which are executed in a slight but pleasing style; among which are:

A set of twelve Views of Switzerland, nearly square; Felix Meyer, fec.

Four Landscapes, with ruins and figures; same mark. 1701.

Four Views in Switzerland, with figures.

Four Mountainous Landscapes, with buildings.

MEYER, OR MEYERLE, FRANCIS ANTHONY. This painter was born at Prague in 1710. According to Lanzi, he resided several years at Turin, where he acquired the name of Francesco Antonio Meyerle. He painted small highly-finished pictures of domestic subjects and portraits, which were greatly admired, although he was less successful when he painted on a larger scale. He passed the latter part of his life at Verceili, where there are many of his works, which are highly esteemed. He died in 1782.

[MEYER, HEINRICH, a German designer and painter, but more distinguished as a writer on art, was born at Zurich in 1759. As a painter he produced little. His works are chiefly in water colours and other drawings from antique remains, or from the works of the great Italian painters. His principal work is an allegory of human life, represented by children, as a painted frieze, in the palace at Weimar. He died in 1832.]

[MEYER, HENDRIK, a landscape and cattle painter, chiefly in water colours and Indian ink, was born at Amsterdam in 1737. He was one of the directors of the Academy at Haerlem, where he resided. Late in life he visited England, in company with W. Hendriks, the painter of dead game, and established himself in London, where he died in 1793. His works are held in estimation; his design is correct, his compositions well understood, and his landscapes well furnished with objects, but somewhat deficient in vigour in his oil pictures, from his having practised so long in water colours.]

[MEYER, HENRY, born at London in 1782, was a pupil of Bartolozzi. He engraved in mezzotint and the dotted manner, and was very skilful in his management of portraits, on which he was principally engaged. Of these the most distinguished are, Admiral Nelson and Lord Cathcart, after Hoppner; the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold, after Chalon; Miss O'Neal in the character of Belvidera, after Devis; Mr. Matthews in various characters, after Harlowe; and Sir John Nicholl, after Owen. He also engraved Mary anointing the feet of Jesus, after Hilton; Sir Roger de Coverly, after Leslie; the Proposal and the Congratulation, after Harlowe; the Stolen Kiss, after Kidd; the Dancing Bear, after Witherington; and other popular subjects of the day. It is believed that he died in 1846.]

MEYER, JOACHIM. This artist was a native of Strasburg, and flourished about the year 1570. We have by him a set of sixty-two wooden cuts, of a variety of combats with the sword.

MEYERING, ALBERT. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1645. He was instructed in the elements of design by his father, Frederick Meyering, who was chiefly employed in painting skreens, and other subjects of furniture. Albert was, however, destined to exercise his talents in a more respectable walk. Whilst he was yet young, he formed the project of travelling in search of improvement, and before he was twenty years of age he visited Paris, where he resided some time, but with no great encouragement. By assiduity and labour he procured the means of continuing his journey to Italy. At Rome, he met with his countryman and friend John Glauber, with whom he studied with unremitting attention the most remarkable views in the vicinity of that city. His abilities procured him the esteem of the first artists at Rome; and he met with sufficient employment to induce him to continue his residence in that capital for some time. On his return to Holland, after an absence of ten years, he was employed by William, Prince of Orange, in conjunction with Glauber, in painting the ceilings and ornamenting the palace of Loo, and the chateau of Soesdyck. The freedom of his hand, and the style of his composition, were particularly adapted to the works he was principally engaged in, which, for the most part, were large landscapes for saloons, and the ornaments of apartments. His views are agreeably varied, they are frequently embellished with the ruins of ancient architecture, and decorated with figures representing historical or fabulous subjects, in the style of Gerard Lairesse. He died at Amsterdam in 1714. We have about twelve etchings by Albert Meyering, of landscapes from his own designs. They are executed in a spirited, painter-like style. [Bartsch describes twenty-six.]

MEYERS, JEREMIAH. This artist was born at Tubingen about the year 1728. He visited England when he was fourteen years of age, and became a pupil of Zinck, who was at that time in great reputation as a miniature painter and enameller. He was one of the most eminent artists of his time in the particular branch he adopted, and was made miniature painter to the queen. Mr. Meyers was one of the original members of the Royal Academy at its foundation, in 1768. He died in 1789.

MEYSSENS, JOHN, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Brussels in 1612. He was first a scholar of Anthony van Opstal, and afterwards of Nicholas vander Horst, both obscure artists. He attempted both historical subjects and portraits, but was particularly successful in the latter, in which he was very generally employed. The greater part of his life was passed in Holland, where he painted the portrait of Henry of Nassau, the Count of Bentheim, and the principal persons of the court. He afterwards resided at Amsterdam, where he carried on an extensive commerce in prints, and engraved many plates from his own designs, as well as after other masters, among which are several portraits of artists. As an engraver, he is not entitled to great celebrity, and his plates are executed in a style very inferior to what might have been expected from his abilities as a painter. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Charles I.
Henrietta Maria, his Queen.
Henry de Keyser, Architect and Sculptor; J. Meyssens, fec.
Guido Reni; se ipse pinx. J. Meyssens, fec.
Francesco Padouanino, Painter; se ipse pinx.
Daniel Segers, Flower-painter; after Lievens.
Cornelius de Bie; after Eras. Quellinus.
William de Nieulant, painter.

SUBJECTS.

The Virgin and Child; after Titian.
Meleager presenting the Boar's Head to Atalanta; after Rubens.

[Balkema notices this artist under the names Jan Meyssens and Jan Mytens, and says that he died at Brussels in 1666; Immerzcel mentions him shortly as Jan Mytens; and both quote the portrait of Admiral van Tromp, painted by him, in the Museum at Amsterdam. It is clear by the inscriptions on his prints that his name was Meyssens, and there was no necessity to add to the confusion that existed, and still exists, in the history of painters of the name of Mytens, and in the ascription of their works. Pilkington and his editors have all fallen into the same mistake.]

MEYSSENS, CORNELIUS, was the son of John Meyssens, born at Antwerp about the year 1636, and was instructed in engraving by his father. His principal plates are portraits, many of which are from the designs of John Meyssens. They are executed with the graver, in a stiff, tasteless style. He also engraved several frontispieces, and other book ornaments. The following are his most esteemed works :

A set of Portraits of the Emperors of the House of Austria; entitled, Effigies Imperatorum domus Austriacæ, delineatæ per Joannem Meyssens, et æri insculptæ per filium suum Cornelium Meyssens.

The Portrait of the sovereign Princes and Duke of Brabant; entitled, Les Effigies des Souverains Princes et Ducs de Brabant. A part of these are engraved by P. de Jode, Waumans, and others.

DETACHED PORTRAITS.

Charles II.; for the History of Leopold.

Octavius, Duke of Aremburg: C. Meyssens, sc.

Cardinal Antonio Barberini.

Cardinal Rinaldo, Principe Estense.

John de Witt, Pensionary of Holland.

David, Count of Weissenwolf, &c.

[Nagler says he was born in 1646: this is probably a misprint, as the portrait of Charles II. is dated 1660, and it is not one of his earliest.]

MEYSSONIER, JUSTUS AURELIUS. This artist was born at Turin in 1695, and is mentioned by Basan as a painter, a sculptor, an architect, a goldsmith, and an engraver. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he was made goldsmith to the king, by patent, and was appointed first designer in his cabinet. He etched some plates of ornaments, &c., and left a great number of architectural drawings, and designs for goldsmiths, several of which were afterwards engraved by Huquier.

MEZIOS, M., an artist mentioned by Mr. Strutt as an engraver of great merit, though little known. He is said to have engraved a few portraits, in a neat, clear style: among others, that of Joannes Petrus Lothicus, Medicus et Poeta, prefixed to his works, published in 1626.

MEZZADRI, ANTONIO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1688. According to Lanzi, he excelled in painting fruit and flowers, in which he was scarcely surpassed by the celebrated Gobbo of the Caracci.

MICARINO. See BECCAFUMI.

MICHAELIS, J. W., a very indifferent engraver of portraits, who resided at Frankfort about the year 1700. He engraved several heads for a work entitled, Notitia, Universitatis Francofurtanæ; published in 1707.

MICHAU, THEODORE. This painter was born at Brussels in 1676. He painted landscapes and merry-makings, in which he imitated the charming style of David Teniers the younger, but with little success, either in the spirit and character of his figures, or the sweet and silvery tone of his landscapes. [His name was Theobald, not Theodore. His manner of painting differed essentially from that of David Teniers; it partakes more of the garish hues of Breughel without his mastery of handling: in his later pictures it is generally loose, sketchy, and rapid. The only comparison that can be instituted with Teniers is, that both painted village festivals. Michau's landscapes with cattle and figures are of frequent occurrence in public sales, but do not obtain high prices. He died in 1755. It is said that he was blind for some years before his death, but delighted to converse on the art, and relate circumstances connected with it, which he had learnt in his youth from the older painters of the Flemish school.]

MICHAULT, GEORGE, a modern French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1752. He was a pupil of Francis Aliamet, and has engraved several plates in the style of his instructor; among which are a part of the views of the Garden of Monceau, near Paris. We have also the following by him:

Acis and Galatea; after la Fosse.

The dead Christ; after Schiavone; in the Orleans Gallery.

MICHEL, JOHN BAPTIST, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1738. He is said to have been a scholar of Chenu, whom he has greatly surpassed. He came to England about the year 1780, and was employed in several plates for Mr. Boydell. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Sir Thomas Gresham; after Sir A. More.

Rubens' Wife; after Rubens.

Francis Hals; after a picture by himself.

La Joconda; after Lionardo da Vinci.

M. F. A. de Voltaire.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Hercules and Omphale; after Romanelli.

Venus and Cupid; after Carlo Maratti.

The Death of St. Joseph; after Velasquez.

The Three Graces; after Rubens.

Faith, Hope, and Charity; after the same.

The Nativity; after Carlo Cignani.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Guido.

Clytie; a circular print; after An. Caracci.

Cupid stung by a Bee; after West.

Alfred dividing his last Loaf with a Pilgrim;

after the same.

The Continence of Alfred; after the same.

[According to Nagler and Zani he was born in 1748: he died in 1804.]

MICHELE, PARRASIO. This painter was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1590. He was a scholar of Paolo Veronese, whose style he followed with some success. There are several of his works in the churches at Venice; among which his picture of the Pietà, in S. Giuseppe, is spoken of by Ridolfi in very favourable terms.

MICOCARD. Papillon mentions a wooden cut by this artist, representing Diogenes; after Parmigiano. It is probably a copy of the print of the same subject, cut in wood, by Ugo da Carpi.

[MIDDIMAN, SAMUEL, a distinguished English engraver, was born in 1746. He studied under Woollett and Bartolozzi, and excelled in the various manners of engraving. His forte was in landscape, of which he left many beautiful examples; two of the large prints for Boydell's Shakspeare, A Scene from the Winter's Tale, and the melancholy Jaques, may vie with the productions of Woollett. He engraved several other plates for the same work, and landscapes after Berghem, Gainsborough, Barret, Zuccarelli, and Hearne. His Select Views in Great Britain is a charming work, and was very popular both in England and on the continent. This excellent artist, and no less excellent man, died in 1818.]

MIEL, JAN, [also called BICKER, and by the Italians GIOVANNI DELLA VITE.] This eminent painter was born at a village near Antwerp in 1599. He was a scholar of Gerard Seghers, and was one of his ablest disciples. On leaving that master he went to Rome, where he attached himself to the works of Andrea Sacchi, and was received into his academy. From the favourable opinion his instructor conceived of his talents, he was intrusted to assist him in some of his most considerable works. Being employed by Sacchi to co-operate with him in a picture he was engaged in for the Palazzo Barberini, representing a Procession of the Cavalry of the Pope, Miel, whose disposition naturally led him to the grotesque, and what the Italians call Bambocciate, introduced something of the ludicrous, which was deemed inconsistent with the gravity of the subject. This occasioned a sharp rebuke, and a consequent separation. Stung with the reproach of his master, and encouraged by the advice of his friend Bernini, Miel determined to improve and strengthen his powers, by visiting Lombardy, for the purpose of studying the works of Coreggio and Caracci; and passed some time at Parma and Bologna. On his return to Rome he was employed by Alexander VII. to paint a picture of Moses striking the Rock, for the gallery of Monte Cavallo. He also painted for the churches of S. Martino de Monti, the Baptism of S. Cyrillio; and in S. Maria dell Anima, some frescoes of the life of S. Lamberti, and the Annunciation. In these considerable works he showed himself capable of treating the dignity of historical painting, though his genius was more inclined to the familiar and lighter subjects treated by Bamboccio and M. Angelo delle Battaglie. He was made a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1648. It will not, however, be disputed, that his best performances are his easel pictures, representing fairs, markets, huntings, festivals of the Carnival, and similar subjects; and that in his historical works, though we admire the brilliancy of his colouring, and his intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, there is a want of elevation in the character of his heads, and we desire a more select choice of forms, and more graceful attitudes. He was invited to the court of Turin by Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, who favoured him with his protection, and retained him in his service for the remainder of his life. It was at this time that he painted his celebrated hunting-pieces, and subjects of the fable, in a saloon in the Chateau of the Venerie, which have been engraved by G. Tassiere. For these admired works, the Duke conferred on him the order of knighthood of St. Maurice. He died at Turin in 1664.

Jan Miel has etched several plates from his own designs, which are executed in a masterly style, and produce a charming effect. His point is free and playful, and his figures and animals are designed with great spirit. We have the following by him:

The Holy Family.

The Assumption of the Virgin.

A set of Four Pastoral Subjects; in one of them is a figure seated on a bank, picking a thorn from his foot. These are charmingly etched.

Three Battle Pieces; for the History of the Wars in Flanders, by Flaminius Strada.

MIERHOP, FRANCIS VAN CUYCK DE. This painter was born at Bruges in 1640. He was of a noble family, and at first only studied drawing as an amusement, but having an uncommon inclination for the art, he followed it with perseverance, and became a considerable proficient. The vicissitude of fortune at length reduced his family to indigence, and on that disastrous occasion he found the advantage of having cultivated his talent. He withdrew himself from Bruges, perhaps under the impulse of a false pride, and settled at Ghent, where he soon distinguished himself as an artist. He particularly excelled in painting game, fish, fruit, and animals, in the manner of Francis Snyders; and some of his pictures approach the admired works of that celebrated painter. In the refectory of the monastery of the Alexines, at Ghent, is an excellent picture by this master, representing fish, dead game, dogs, &c., which has been frequently mistaken for a work of Snyders.

MIERIS, FRANCIS, the ELDER. This admired painter was born at Leyden in 1635. He was the son of a goldsmith and lapidary, who seconded the inclination for the art which he discovered in his son, by placing him under the tuition of Abraham Toornevliet, an eminent painter on glass, by whom he was instructed in the elements of design. Having seen some of the admirable productions of Gerard Douw, he was ambitious of imitating a style which had raised that artist to the greatest celebrity. He became his scholar, and was not only the ablest of his disciples, but is considered by many as superior to his instructor. His first productions excited universal admiration, and it soon became difficult to obtain a work of his hand. He was commissioned to paint a picture for the Archduke of Austria, on which occasion he exerted all his talents. He painted the interior of a mercer's shop, with a beautiful young woman presenting various silks to a gentleman, who was evidently admiring the shopwoman more than her goods. The Archduke was so much pleased with the performance, that he invited him to Vienna, and offered him a munificent establishment, which his engagements did not permit him to accept. When the Grand Duke of Tuscany visited Leyden, he was particularly struck with the exquisite finishing of his works, and engaged him to paint a picture, which is regarded as one of his most admirable productions. It represents a young lady dressed in white satin, playing on the lute, with another female and a young man seated on a couch, to whom a domestic presents a silver salver with refreshments. He also painted for that prince a portrait of himself, which was placed in the Florentine Gallery. The pictures of Francis Mieris the elder are extremely rare, and are only to be met with in the choicest collections, where they, at least, hold an equal rank with those of Gerard Douw. The same minute accuracy, the same polished finishing, are found in both their works; though the subjects made choice of by Mieris are generally more select and agreeable. His design is more correct; his pencil is more free and spirited; and his colouring, by being less disturbed, is purer and more delicate.

Francis Mieris occasionally painted portraits, which he finished in the same admirable manner as his other works. They are very correctly drawn, and have the appearance of great truth and nature. He died in 1681. [In Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vols. i. and ix., will be found descriptions of 150 pictures by this master; yet his best works are so located, that it is almost impossible to obtain a specimen. Pictures by William Mieris, and his son Francis, are sometimes attributed to this master, but any one acquainted with his works will readily perceive the difference. It is too much, with all his merits, to say he is superior to, or even equal with, Gerard Dou: his admirers should be content with placing him at the head of the next rank.]

MIERIS, JOHN, was the elder son of the preceding artist, born at Leyden in 1660, and received his first instruction in the art from his father. Despairing of being able to equal Francis Mieris in the minuteness and delicacy of his finishing, he devoted himself to a different pursuit, and attempted historical painting, and portraits as large as life. After the death of his father he went to Italy, and on his arrival at Rome applied himself to his studies with an assiduity which proved fatal to him. He was unfortunately afflicted with the stone; and his malady was increased by his sedentary habits, to such a degree, that he fell a victim to it in the thirtieth year of his age.

MIERIS, WILLIAM. William was the younger son of Francis Mieris, born at Leyden in 1662. He studied under his father, whose style he adopted with great success. At the age of nineteen he was already an able artist, when the death of his father deprived him of the advantage of his instruction. He continued to pursue the same track which had led the elder Mieris to such merited celebrity, and he can scarcely be said to have been inferior to his father in the exquisite finishing of his pictures, though certainly very unequal to him in the arrangement of his compositions, the correctness and taste of his design, the purity and delicacy of his colouring, the suavity and mellowness of his touch, and his intelligence of the chiaro-scuro. His best pictures represent subjects taken from ordinary life, such as confectioners' shops, women selling game or vegetables, the interiors of apartments, and conversations. In these, every minute object is finished with the utmost care, and sometimes to a degree which approaches to hardness. The works of Gerard Lairese had at that time excited universal admiration; and William Mieris was encouraged by his friend and patron, M. de la Court, to aim at a more elevated style; and, in imitation of the Pousin of Holland, to paint landscapes, with historical or fabulous subjects. The attempt was not, however, very favourable to his fame, as his incapacity of designing the naked, and his ignorance of costume, rendered him totally inadequate to the dignity of history. The extreme labour and precision with which the most trifling objects are finished, prevents the effect of the whole; his carnations, from their smoothness and polish, have the appearance of ivory; and his landscapes, without effect, or degradation in the plans, appear to be the work of a flower-painter. His pictures of domestic subjects are, however, deservedly held in very high estimation, and are placed in the choicest collections. William Mieris died at Leyden in 1747. [In Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vols. i. and ix., there are 160 pictures described by this master. It cannot be said, with justice, that in the finishing of his pictures he is equal to his father: the labour is too apparent.]

MIERIS, FRANCIS, the YOUNGER, was the son of William Mieris, born at Leyden in 1689, and was instructed by his father. He painted similar subjects, but was extremely inferior to him in every respect. His design is heavy and tasteless, his touch is dry and hard, and his colouring false and unnatural. He sometimes attempted to copy the works of his father, but their decided inferiority will prevent the least experienced collector from mistaking them for the works of William Mieris.

MIGER, SIMON CHARLES, a modern French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1745. He was a pupil of Charles Nicholas Cochin, the younger, and has engraved several plates of historical subjects and portraits, in a neat, clear style. He was a member of the French Academy. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

David Hume, Historian; after Cochin.
 John Stanley, Musician; after the same.
 Count Maurice de Bruhl; after the same.
 Christopher Gluck, Musician; after Duplessis.
 Laurent Cars, Engraver; after Perrenneau.
 John James Rousseau; after Le Moyne.
 Francis Mieris, Painter; after a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Hercules strangling Anteus; after Vovriot; engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1777.
 The Flaying of Marsyas; after C. Vanloo; his other reception plate.
 Hercules and Omphale; after Dumont.
 The Rape of Europa; after Hallé.
 A View of the Coast near Civita Vecchia; after Vernet.

[Nagler says he was born in 1747, and died in 1805: he gives a list of his prints.]

MIGLIONICO, ANDREA. According to Dominici, this painter was a native of Naples, and a scholar of Luca Giordano. He painted history with some reputation; and there are several of his works in the churches of his native city, of which the most esteemed is his picture of the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the S. S. Nunziata. He died soon after Luca Giordano.

MIGNARD, NICHOLAS. According to M. Watlet, the family of the Mignards was of English extraction, and their name was originally More. He reports, that the father of our artist, and six of his brothers, were officers at the same time in the army of Henry IV. of France; and being all of them handsome, and of a martial appearance, on their being all presented at the same time to that monarch by the name of More, the king facetiously exclaimed, Ce ne sont pas la des Mores, mais des Mignards. The name of Mignard remained to them. Nicholas Mignard was born at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1608. He received his first instruction in the art from an obscure painter of his native city; but he soon afterwards went to Fontainebleau, where he had the advantage of studying the works of Primaticcio and Il Rosso, and the antique statues which had been collected by Francis I. He afterwards visited Italy, and passed two years at Rome. On his return to France he passed some time at Avignon, where he married, and from his long residence in that city, was called Mignard of Avignon, to distinguish him from his brother Peter Mignard, called the Roman. By the recommendation of Cardinal Mazarine, he was invited to Paris, and employed in several works for the palace of the Tuilleries, among which are Apollo crowning the Muses of Poetry, Painting, and Music; Apollo and Daphne; and Mercury presenting a Lyre to Apollo. He was also much employed as a portrait painter, and drew many persons of distinction, some of which have been admirably engraved by Anthony Masson. He was a member of the Academy at Paris, where he died in 1668. Nicholas Mignard has etched eight plates of subjects, after Annibale and Agostino Caracci, from the Farnesian gallery. They are exected in a bold, spirited style. [For an account of his prints, see Dumesnil, who describes nine.]

MIGNARD, PETER, called the ROMAN. This eminent painter was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Troyes in 1610. His father intended him for the profession of physic, and for that purpose he received the necessary education, and was placed under one of the most eminent practitioners of his time. His decided inclination for the art occasioned him to devote all his leisure moments to the study of design. Without the help of an instructor, he painted a picture of the portraits of the professor and his family, which excited universal surprise. He was induced to abandon his medical pursuits, and placed himself under the tuition of John Boucher, a painter of some reputation at Bourges. After passing two years under that master he went to Paris, where he entered the school of Simon Vouet, where he studied some time. The Marquis de Crequy having brought from Rome, where he had been ambassador, some valuable pictures of the Italian masters, the young Mignard was allowed access to them, and he was soon convinced that Italy was the only centre of the art, the true focus of its light, of which France had, till then, only received very feeble rays. He soon afterwards visited Rome, where he resided twenty-two years, and acquired the title of Mignard the Roman. At Rome he renewed his intimacy with Charles Alphonse du Fresnoy, who had been his fellow student under Vouet. They lived in habits of the closest friendship during du Fresnoy's residence in that capital; and the counsels of that excellent theorist were of considerable advantage to him in his studies. His attention was particularly directed to the works of Raffaele and Annibale Caracci, particularly the former, whose graceful and dignified style he imitated in his pictures of the Virgin, which were greatly admired at Rome. He was patronized by Urban VIII., and by all his successors to Alexander VII., whose portraits he painted, and distinguished himself in that branch, as well as in historical subjects. His principal works at Rome are the Annunciation, and a picture of the Trinity, in S. Carlo alle Quattro Fontane; and a Holy Family in S. Maria in Campitelli. He was invited to return to France by Louis XIV., who employed him in several important works, and he painted the portrait of the King several times, as well as those of the principal nobility. D'Argenville reports, that the last time he painted the King, the monarch, perceiving that he regarded him with more than usual attention, said to him, "You find me grown older?" "Sire," replied the artist, "I perceive the traces of a few more campaigns in your Majesty's visage." On the death of Charles le Brun, he was made first painter to the King. His most considerable works in France, are his great cupola in the church of Val-de-Grace, and his twelve pictures in fresco, in the gallery of St. Cloud. Though the productions of Mignard are not distinguished by decided originality of invention, and a commanding facility of hand, they lay claim to our approbation, by a correct design, a captivating amiability in his forms, and an harmonious, if not a vigorous, effect in his colouring. Several of his pictures have been engraved by some of the most celebrated of the French burinists, among which are Gerard Audran, Poilly, Roulet, Nanteuil, &c. We have only one etching by himself, representing St. Scholastique kneeling before the Virgin. He died at Paris in 1695.

MIGNON, ABRAHAM. This celebrated artist was born at Frankfort in 1639, [or 1640.] He was the son of a merchant, who designed him for his own profession, but finding his inclination for the art, he placed him under the tuition of Jacob Murel, an eminent flower-painter, with whom he continued till he was seventeen years of age, when he already surpassed his master. Murel carried on a considerable commerce in works of art, and his business leading him to Holland, he was accompanied by his pupil, whom he recommended to the care of John David de Heem, whose works were then in the highest reputation. The assiduity and progress of the scholar increased the esteem and attention of the master, and the pictures of Mignon were in a short time universally admired. His works were anxiously purchased at considerable prices, and, with an unusual share of industry, he found it difficult to keep pace with the demand for them. The beauty and freshness of his flowers and fruit, and his picturesque manner of disposing them, have perhaps only been surpassed by John van Huysum. The insects he introduced into his pictures are exquisitely finished, and the dew-drops on the leaves of his flowers and fruit have all the transparency of real water. He died in 1679. [His first master, Jacob Murel, or Moreels, was born in 1628, and died in 1683, according to Füssli; but there are no particulars recorded of him, except that he married the widow of Matthew Merian, and was the instructor of his daughter Maria Sibylla. There is great inferiority in the pictures of Mignon compared with those of Jan van Huysum and John David de Heem; in the elegant compositions and easy flow of pencil of the one, and in the vigorous colouring and very artistic arrangements of the other. His pictures frequently want unity, and betray too much of labour in the very careful manner of the finishing. Some of his larger pictures painted for the garniture of portraits, have been divided into groups of fruit or flowers, as distinct compositions, and appear better for the separation. His works will always be prized for the beauty of the colours, the natural bloom on the fruit, the transparency of the foliage, and the wonderful accuracy of the microscopic objects. They are now rare in commerce.]

MIGNOT, DANIEL. According to Florent le Comte, this artist engraved some plates, which he marked with a monogram composed of a D and an M, thus, M. His works are said to consist chiefly of architectural ornaments. [Daniel Mignot flourished about 1593. He was probably a goldsmith, as his mark is found on prints of ornaments used in that trade. M]

MIGNON, I., an obscure artist, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a coarse, incorrect etching, representing Abraham purchasing the Cave of Machpelah from the Children of Heth. It is inscribed, Io. Mignon, fec.

[MIKCKER, JAN, a landscape painter, who lived in the early part of the 17th century. It is said that he was one of the masters of J. B. Weenix; for this reason he is noticed, as he painted well-wooded landscapes ornamented with buildings, in a dark tone of colour, which manner was sometimes followed by Weenix; and these landscapes of Mikecker try the judgment of amateurs, till the difficulty is overcome by dealers, who pronounce them early works of Weenix.]

MILANESE, IL. See CITTADINI.

MILANESE, FELICE. By this artist, who was probably a painter, we have a small upright etching, representing the Virgin and Infant seated on a pedestal, with a Bishop, and several children before her; it is signed, Felice Milanese, fec.

MILANI, GIULIO CESARE. This painter was born at Bologna in 1621, and was a disciple of Flaminio Torre, of whose style he was one of the most successful followers. His works in the churches at Bologna are not degraded by the vicinity of such powerful competitors. Of these, his most esteemed productions are his Marriage of the Virgin, in S. Giuseppe; S. Antonio di Padova, in the church of S. Maria del Costello; and the Holy Family with St. John, at the Servi. He died in 1678.

MILANI, AURELIANO, was the nephew of Giulio Cesare Milani, born at Bologna in 1675, and was a scholar of Cesare Gennari, and afterwards of Lorenzo Pasinelli. He did not however attach himself to their manner, but, enamoured of the works of the Caracci, he devoted himself to an attentive study of their style. According to Crespi, no painter of his time approached nearer to the admired principles of that academy, and with the exception of Carlo Cignani, he was the artist whose talents contributed most to support the credit of the Bolognese school. His principal works at Bologna are, his S. Girolamo, in S. Maria della Vita; the Stoning of Stephen, in S. Maria Mascarella; and the Resurrection, in La Purità. He died in 1749.

MILANI, GIOSEFFO MARIA. This painter was born at Pisa in 1678, and was a scholar of Camillo Gabrielli. Following the example of his instructor, he attached himself to an imitation of the style of Pietro da Cortona and Ciro Ferri. On leaving that master, he applied himself with great assiduity to the study of architecture, and particularly excelled in painting perspective, and views of the most magnificent buildings, which he embellished with figures, elegantly designed, grouped with great ingenuity, and his colouring is splendid and harmonious. There are several of his fresco works in the churches at Pisa, of which the most considerable is a ceiling in the church of St. Matthew.

MILÉ, [or MILLET,] FRANCIS, sometimes called FRANCISQUE. The family of this artist was originally French, though he was born at Antwerp in 1644. His father had accompanied the Prince of Condé, to whom he was attached, into the Netherlands, at the time of his revolt. Having shown an early inclination for the art, the young Milé was placed as a pupil of Laurent Franck; and it was not long before he surpassed his master. His father dying when he was still young, he had no other resource than the exercise of his talents; and when he was eighteen years of age, he had acquired sufficient reputation to induce his instructor to bestow on him his daughter in marriage. He soon afterwards visited Paris, where he was particularly struck with the works of N. Poussin, which were in the possession of M. Jabach, to which he had free access. They became the models of his study; and in his best works he approached nearer to the grand style of that painter than any of his imitators. He painted history, but was more successful in what are called heroic landscapes, adorned with figures representing some historical or fabulous subject. He is said to have possessed so retentive a memory, that he could recollect the scenery or composition of any particular picture which had struck his attention; and in his observation of the effects of nature, he could recollect, at a distant period, any thing remarkable, with extraordinary precision. He is stated by M. d'Argenville to have visited Holland and England, in both of which countries he left proofs of his ability. On his return to Paris he was received into the Academy, and his works were held in high estimation. The landscapes of Milé exhibit a grandeur of scenery, in which, though he has been surpassed by the Poussins, has been approached by few of the artists of his country. It is always appropriate to the history he wished to represent, and, like his distinguished model, he is a strict observer of the propriety of costume. His pencil is broad and facile, and his colouring generally agreeable, though in some of his pictures there is too great a monotony, and a want of intelligence in his masses of light and shadow. We have a few etchings by this able artist, which are esteemed for the picturesque subjects they represent, and the light and spirited style of their execution. Among others, are the following:

A Landscape, with Egyptian Ruins, with the subject of Moses saved from the waters of the Nile: Francisque, inv.

Another grand Landscape, with the History of Cephalus and Procris.

A Mountainous Landscape, with figures, and a town in the middle.

Six other Landscapes, of various sizes.

He died in 1680. [Bartsch doubts whether F. Milé engraved the prints attributed to him. He describes twenty-eight subjects engraved after his paintings; but declares he never found any account of the three spoken of by Basan and others, who have merely followed Dezallier d'Argenville, who was the first that mentioned them. Bartsch, however, quotes one, Les deux Amans; and Dumessnil describes the three which Count Rigal possessed, which are of extreme rarity: they are, 1. Les deux Amans. 2. Le Voyageur. 3. Ville antique. The first only has the monogram, at the bottom on the left, F. M. in., reversed.]

MILLER, ANDREW. This artist was a native of Ireland, and flourished about the year 1740. He resided at Dublin, and engraved several portraits in mezzotint, which are by no means destitute of merit. Among others, we have the following portraits by him:

Dean Swift; after F. Bindou. 1743.

Robert Boyle, Philosopher.

Charles Lucas, M. D. of Dublin.

Robert Josleyn, Lord of Newport, Chancellor of Ireland. 1747.

Josiah Hort, Archbishop of Taum.

Eaten Stannard, Recorder of Dublin.

Joseph Baudin, Painter.

Joseph Miller, Actor, in the Character of Teague.

John Harper, in the Character of Jobson.

Snowdon, in the character of Calcd, in the siege of Damascus.

Turbutt, in the Character of Sosia, in Amphitruon.

MILLER, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. We have a variety of prints by him, chiefly portraits, which possess considerable merit. Among many others are the following:

King George III.; ad vivum.

Queen Charlotte; the same.

Jeffery, Lord Amherst.

George Bridges Rodney, Lord Rodney.

Charles Townsend, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Thomas Gray, Poet.

Charles Churchill, Poet.

Sir John Vanbrugh.
John Wilks, M. P. and Chamberlain of London.

MILLER, JOHN SEBASTIAN. See MULLER.

MILN, ROBERT. By this artist we have some plates of Scottish antiquities, engraved for a book published at Edinburgh in 1710, entitled Miscellanea quædam Erudite Antiquitatis, quæ ad Borealem Britannicæ majoris partem pertinent, &c.

MILOT, an obscure artist, mentioned by Mr. Strutt. He resided at Antwerp about the year 1620, and is said to have worked for the booksellers only. He engraved several frontispieces and portraits, in a neat, but stiff and tasteless style.

MINDERHOUT, [HENDRIK.] This painter was born at Antwerp in 1637, and was a member of the Academy in that city, as appears from his picture of reception preserved in their hall, representing a view of the Port of Antwerp, with a variety of vessels, and a great number of figures. At an early period of his life he settled at Bruges, where he afterwards continually resided, and was received into the society of painters in that city in 1662, where there are several of his pictures in the public edifices and in private collections. The works of this master generally represent marines and sea-ports, frequently those of Antwerp and Bruges. They are usually of a large size, and possess the merit of a bold design, a spirited touch, and an intelligent management of the chiaro-scuro. His pictures are very unequal; and towards the latter part of his life they seem to have been executed with negligence and haste. His best works are, however, to be found in the principal collections in Flanders. [He died in 1696.]

MINGOT, TEODOSIO. This Spanish painter was a native of Catalonia, born in 1551, and was a disciple of Gaspar Becerra. He is erroneously stated by Palomino to have studied at Rome under Michael Angelo Buonaroti, who died when he was only thirteen years of age. He is believed to have visited Italy, where he acquired a correct style of design, and was a vigorous colourist. He was employed by Philip II. in the palace of the Pardo, where his principal works perished in the conflagration by which that edifice was destroyed. He died in 1590.

[MINNEBROER, FRANS, an historical painter, who flourished at Malines in 1540, where he painted for the church of Notre Dame a picture of the Flight into Egypt; the church of Notre Dame at Hanswick also possesses a picture by him of the Visitation to S. Elisabeth. They are considered as remarkable productions.]

MINZOCCHI, FRANCESCO, called IL VECCHIO DI SAN BERNARDO. This painter was born at Forli in 1513. He formed his first manner by studying the works of Marco Palmeiano, whose stiffness and formality are visible in his first productions, particularly in his picture of the Crucifixion, at the Osservanti. He afterwards reformed his style of design in the school of Girolamo Genga, and became an excellent colourist, by imitating the works of Pordenone. Among his best works are noticed the Sacrifice of Melchisedech, and the Miracle of the Manna, painted in fresco in a chapel in the Basilica di Loreto, in which the prophets and principal figures have a grandeur of character, and a splendour of colour, worthy of an able follower of Pordenone, though in other respects deficient in the dignity and propriety which the subjects require. Scanelli celebrates a great fresco work by this master, in the church of S. Maria della Grata at Forli, representing the Trinity, painted with a force of colouring, and an intelligence in fore-shortening, which deserves a higher reputation than is generally attributed to him. [He died in 1574.] He left two sons, PIETRO PAOLO and SEBASTIANO MINZOCCHI, who painted history, but were very unequal to their father. There are some indifferent works by them in the church of S. Agostino, and at the Franciscans at Forli.

MIRADORO, LUIGI, was a native of Genoa, and, according to Lanzi, flourished from the year 1639 till 1651. After learning the first principles of the art in his native city, he went to Cremona about the beginning of the 17th century, where he studied after the works of Panfilo Nuvolone. He afterwards adopted a style which bears some resemblance to that of the Caracci, though less select in his forms, and less studied and expressive in his characters. His design is bold and free, and his colouring chaste and harmonious. Although this artist is little known in his own country, and is unnoticed by Orlandi, his works are highly esteemed throughout Lombardy, particularly at Cremona, where he chiefly resided. He frequently made choice of, and was the most successful in, the most terrific subjects he could select. Among his most esteemed works are, a dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin, in the hall of the Merchants at Piacenza; and his picture of S. Giovanni Damasceno, in the church of S. Clemente, at Cremona.

MIRE, NOËL LE, a modern French engraver, born at Rouen in 1723. He was a pupil of Le Bas, and has engraved several plates in the neat style of that artist. We have, among others, the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Alexis Piron; after L'Epicié.
Mademoiselle Clairon, crowned by Melpomene, with four French verses by Garrick; after Gravelot.
General Washington; after le Paon.
The Marquis de la Fayette; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Sebastian; after Parmigiano; for the Dresden gallery.
Jupiter and Danae; after Ann. Caracci.
The Death of Lucretia; after Andrea del Sarto.
A pair of Views in Flanders, with figures; after Teniers.
A View of Mount Vesuvius in 1755; after La Croix.
The Triumphal Arch of Titus Vespasian; after the same.

MIREVELT, MICHAEL JANSON. This artist was born at Delft in 1568. He was the son of a goldsmith, who, perceiving his disposition for drawing, placed him under the care of Jerome Wierix, an eminent engraver, with the intention of his pursuing that profession. When he was twelve years of age he executed a plate of Christ and the Woman of Samaria; and soon afterwards another of Judith with the Head of Holofernes. These juvenile performances attracted the attention of Anthony de Montfort, called Blocklandt, who persuaded him to apply himself to painting, and offered to receive him into his school. So flattering a proposal induced him to quit the graver for the pencil, and for some years he studied historical painting under that able master. His first productions on leaving the school of Blocklandt, were some altar-pieces for the churches at Delft; but having painted the portraits of some of the princes of the house of Nassau, they were so universally admired, that he afterwards met with continual employment in that branch, and as he lived to an advanced age, he is supposed to have painted a greater number of portraits than any artist of his country. He is said, by Descamps, to have been invited to England by Charles I., and that he declined the proposal on account of the plague, which at that time raged in London. If this statement is correct, it must have been in 1625, the first year of that king's reign, at which time the capital was afflicted with that dreadful visitation. The portraits of Mirevelt are finely drawn, and are full of expression; several of them have been admirably engraved by his brother-in-law, James William Delft. Vandyck painted the portrait of Mirevelt, among the most eminent artists, which is also engraved by Delft. He died at Delft in 1641. [He is also called Michael Janszen Miereveldt; he was a most indefatigable painter; some writers are content to say he painted 5000 portraits, but Descamps swells the number to 10,000! The portraits really painted by him are so good, that there must be exaggeration in either account.]

MIREVELT, PETER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Delft in 1596, and practised portrait painting, in the style of his father, with considerable reputation. One of his most esteemed works is a large picture in the hall of the Surgeons at Delft, representing the portraits of the principal members of that society at that time. He died young, in 1632.

[MIROU, ANTOINE, a Flemish landscape painter, who flourished about 1640. He also painted scriptural subjects, of which the design is correct and the handling spirited. There are no particulars respecting him.]

MIRUOLI, GIROLAMO. According to Vasari, this artist was a native of Romagna, and flourished about the year 1570. He was a disciple of Pellegrino Tibaldi, and was a reputable painter of history. There are some of his fresco works in the church of the Servi at Bologna. He also distinguished himself at Parma and Modena, where he was employed by the Duke, and died painter to the court.

MISEROTTI, D. [DOMENICO.] This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of several plates for the collection of prints, from the paintings in the gallery of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. [He flourished about 1750, or later.]

MITCHELL, J. This artist was a native of Scotland, and resided at Glasgow about the year 1765. He engraved some plates of historical subjects, which are mostly executed entirely with the graver.

MITELLI, AGOSTINO. This eminent artist was born at Bologna in 1609. Although he distinguished himself as a painter of perspective and architectural views, he was not incapable of designing the figure, which, according to Passeri, he studied in the school of the Caracci. When, in conjunction with Michael Angelo Colonna, he painted the decorations of the archiepiscopal palace at Ravenna, he sometimes designed the figures, and sometimes the perspective; but he afterwards devoted himself entirely to the latter. If the works of Mitelli are inferior to those of Il Dentone in vigour and solidity, they charm by the grace and elegance of his choice, and the tender tinting of his colour. His ornaments were always happily appropriated to the character of the edifice he had to embellish, and strictly suited to the solemnity of the temple, the elegance of the saloon, or the splendour of the theatre. In these he was ably supported by the figures of M. A. Colonna, with whom he long worked in conjunction, and formed an intimacy which lasted twenty-four years, and was only terminated by the death of Mitelli. Of their numerous works at Bologna, the most admired are la Capella del Rosario, and the saloon in the Palazzo Caprara. They equally distinguished themselves at Parma, Modena, and Genoa. In 1658, they were invited to the court of Spain by Philip IV., where they ornamented the palaces with some of their finest works, particularly a grand saloon, in which Colonna has introduced his celebrated fable of Pandora. He died at Madrid in 1660. We have several spirited etchings by this master, consisting chiefly of architectural ornaments; and a set of forty-eight friezes, dated 1645.

MITELLI, GIUSEPPE MARIA, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1634. After receiving some instruction from his father, he entered the school of Flaminio Torre. He painted history with some reputation, and occasionally introduced the figures into the perspective views of Agostino. There are several of his pictures in the churches at Bologna, of which the most worthy of notice are, S. Riniere healing the Sick, in S. Maria della Vita; a Pietá, in the Annunziata; and Christ taken in the Garden, at the Cappuccini. He was more distinguished as an engraver than a painter, and has etched a great variety of plates from his own designs, and after some of the most celebrated of the Italian masters. They are executed in a slight, feeble style, and the drawing is generally incorrect. He possessed, however, an inventive genius, and his works are not unworthy of the attention of the curious. He usually marked his plates

G^{MA} M^{TI}, or with the cipher . The following are his principal works:

- A set of twelve plates, after the most esteemed pictures in the churches at Bologna.
 - The history of Æneas, in twenty plates; after the pictures by the Caracci, in the Palazzo Favi, at Bologna.
 - The Cries of Bologna, in forty-one prints; after An. Caracci.
 - The Adoration of the Shepherds, called the Notte; after Coreggio.
 - The Martyrdom of St. Erasmus; after Poussin.
 - David and Goliath; after Titian.
 - The finding of the Cross; after Tintoretto.
 - The Rich Man and Lazarus; after P. Veronese.
 - The twenty-four Hours of Human Felicity.
- There are two additional prints, making a set of twenty-six, probably from his own designs. They were published at Bologna in 1675, and are now become scarce.

He died in 1718. [Bartsch describes 162 pieces by him, and Nagler has increased the number.]

MOCETTO, GIROLAMO, or HIERONYMUS MOCERUS. This artist was born at Verona about the year 1454, and was a disciple of Giovanni Bellini. Little is known of his works as a painter; and Lanzi merely notices a picture by him, dated in 1493, in the church of SS. Nezario e Celso at Verona. He engraved a few plates in a neat but stiff style, executed entirely with the graver. His prints are very scarce, and their rarity may be said to constitute their greatest value. They are usually marked with his baptismal name, thus, .

We have by him,

The Resurrection, with four Soldiers near the Tomb.

A Sacrifice, with many figures; from an antique bas-relief.

He also engraved some battles, and other subjects; and is said to have executed a wooden cut of the Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem, which is dated 1500. [Bartsch has described eight pieces by this artist, under the name of Jerome Mozzetto, tom. xiii. P. G., but he has not mentioned the Virgin and Child, with St. John the Baptist and another saint, with the monogram, reversed, in the centre at bottom: H. 18½ in., W. 14 in., formerly in Sir Mark Sykes's Collection, and now in the British Museum. Neither has he noticed two others, Men sacrificing a Pig, from an antique bas-relief; and the Virgin and Child seated on a throne, with lattice-work and trees, without the name. It is mentioned in Lloyd's Catalogue of 1817, No. 737. There is also one of Judith, No. 1, in Bartsch, before the tree was introduced. Ottley, in addition, describes two prints, The Calumny of Apelles, and a Nymph sleeping on a Bank, with a curious inscription, which he ascribes to Mocetto: Bartsch, on the contrary, places them among the "anonymous" old Italian masters. See Peintre Graveur, tom. xiii. pp. 113, 114, Nos. 10 and 11; and Ottley's History of Engraving, p. 156. Zani denies that Mocetto ever engraved on wood.]

MODENA, PELLEGRINO MUNARI, called DA. Pellegrino Munari, sometimes called Aretusi, but more generally known by the name of Pellegrino da Modena, was born in that city about the year 1485. It is not known by whom he was instructed at Modena, but in 1509, when he was little more than twenty years of age, he painted an altar-piece for the church of S. Giovanni, which gained him great reputation. The celebrity of Raffaele, then in the zenith of his fame, drew him to Rome, where he had the advantage of being admitted into the school of that inimitable painter. His talent was soon discovered by his able instructor, and he was selected by him to assist in the great works he was then engaged on in the Vatican. He was entrusted to paint, from the designs of Raffaele, the histories of Jacob and Solomon, which he executed entirely to the satisfaction of his master. After the death of Raffaele he painted some pictures of his own composition for the churches at Rome, particularly in S. Eustacio, and in S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli, where he painted in fresco the life of S. James. On his return to Modena, he was employed for several of the public edifices, and painted his celebrated picture of the Birth of the Virgin, in the church of S. Paolo, designed with all the grace and dignity of his admirable instructor. This eminent artist was high in the public esteem, and in the midst of a brilliant career, when the world was deprived of his talents by an unforeseen and dreadful catastrophe. His son happened to quarrel with one of his companions, which ended in the death of his antagonist. Pellegrino, apprized of the fatal accident, ran out into the street, to endeavour to save his son from the pursuit of justice; he was encountered by the relatives of the deceased, who fell upon him with the greatest fury, and put an end to his existence. This tragical event happened in 1523, when he was about 38 years of age. No scholar of Raffaele approached nearer to him in the sublime character of his heads, and the grandeur of his forms. [Pellegrino must have been born earlier, as it has been ascertained that he painted in 1497. In the article Cesare Aretusi it is stated that Tiraboschi conjectured that he was the son of this Pelligrino. Such is not the fact. Cesare was the son of another Pelligrino, a painter of Bologna, and nephew to the present. See Zani, Enciclopedia, vol. ii., parte i., note 143.]

MODENA, NICCOLETTO DA. This artist was born at Modena about the year 1460. He painted perspective and architecture, but is more known as an engraver, and is considered one of the earliest artists who practised engraving in Lombardy. His plates are rudely executed with the graver, and sufficiently prove that he had received no instruction in the art, but was obliged to work out his own system. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, and sometimes with one of these monograms,

M. or NE. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Adoration of the Shepherds; with his name. St. Sebastian; marked Niccolotto, on a Tablet.

Another St. Sebastian; inscribed, Ora pro nobis Sancte Sebastiane.

St. Jerome reading; with the monogram.

St. George; with his name.

St. Martin; inscribed, Divo Marti; with his name on a tablet.

A Triton embracing a Syren; marked N. M. on a tablet.

[Niccolotto da Modena, also called ROSEX, flourished from 1500 to 1512, as appears by two prints by him bearing those dates. Bartsch has given a list of upwards of sixty prints by him, of which thirty-six have his mark; but in this matter he was very capricious, using various characters, rebuses, and initial letters. Zani has taken some pains to explain them. See Enciclopedia delle belle Arti, vol. iii., parte seconda, in the Annotations on David and Goliath; and vol. xvi., parte prima, note 50. It will be seen by the following list that he sometimes omitted putting any distinguishing sign to his plates. It will no doubt be a gratification to amateurs and collectors to have a descriptive account of twenty-six prints by this master not given by Bartsch, Ottley, nor any other writer on the subject. For this gratification they will be indebted to Messrs. Smith, Brothers, the Dealers in Ancient Prints, of Lisle Street, London, who have permitted the Editor to transcribe the list from accurate memoranda made by them on actual inspection of the prints, or from accounts transmitted to them from persons of probity and judgment, on whom they could place the most implicit reliance.

List of Prints by Niccolotto da Modena not described by Bartsch.

1. A whole-length figure of Christ standing on a pavement of square stones, &c. Monogram in the middle, at bottom: H. 7¼ in., W. 4½ in. Ottley, p. 536.
2. St. Sebastian, his arms tied over his head to a column, pierced with six arrows. Name at full length on a step: H. 5½ in., W. 4½ in. Ottley, p. 540.
3. St. Sebastian, his arms tied over his head to a column, he is pierced with three arrows. Monogram at bottom on the left: H. 11¼ in., W. 8½ in. Ottley, p. 541.
4. St. George in complete armour, standing in the centre of the print. Name at full length on the frieze of a triumphal arch: H. 5½ in., W. 4½ in. Ottley, p. 541. In the British Museum.

5. St. Catherine standing, holding a palm branch in her left hand, &c. Name at full length on the base of a pillar on the right: H. $5\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. $4\frac{1}{2}$ in. Ottley, p. 542.
6. Mars in Armour, standing in the middle of the print, companion to the St. George, (No. 4.) Name on a tablet hung to a tree on the left: H. $5\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. $4\frac{1}{2}$ in. Ottley, p. 545.
7. Three Children; one kneeling in the centre, one on the left raising his left hand, and one on the right raising his right hand. Name at full length on a scroll hung to a tree in the centre: H. $5\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. $3\frac{3}{4}$ in. Ottley, p. 546.
8. A Female wearing a Helmet, &c., pouring incense on an Altar. No mark: H. $8\frac{1}{4}$ in., W. $5\frac{3}{4}$ in. Sykes's Catalogue, No. 1080.
9. Perseus and Pegasus. Perseus holding the bridle of the horse with both hands; NM. at top: H. $6\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. $4\frac{1}{2}$ in.
10. The Nativity, in a richly decorated ruined Stable.
11. St. Cecilia, standing. Sykes's Cat. No. 1047.
12. Christ crowned with Thorns; beneath a Bishop and a King, with their attendants kneeling. Sykes's Cat., No. 1044.
13. St. Jerome in penitence.
14. Group of four Women. Copy from Albert Durer.
15. Hercules and the Cretan Bull.
16. Two whole-length Figures on one plate.
17. Two winged Boys supporting a Standard. British Museum.
18. St. Roch, with a long staff in his right hand, sitting in an arched building. Landscape with the sun rising in the distance.
19. A Marine Monster holding a Sea-Horse; a Boy with a Torch and Olive Branch sitting on its tail. On a tree on the left a tablet with N. M.: H. $4p. 10l.$, W. $4p.$
20. A Man crowned with Laurel looking at some geometrical figures: "Apelles Poeta," &c. British Museum.
21. David holding the head of Goliath. The monogram at bottom on the left: H. $3p. 7l.$, W. $3p.$
22. St. Anthony standing amidst Ruins, turned to the left, holding a book in his right hand to his breast, and in his left hand a crutch and a bell; landscape in the distance, and the pig is partly seen on the left. Monogram at bottom on the right: H. $3p. 1l.$, W. $2p. 6l.$
23. A Saint, with a large bag on his back, running towards the left. In the back-ground a landscape with ruins. The monogram is on a stone on the left: H. $3p. 7l.$, W. $3p.$
24. Lazarus, with two Dogs licking his Sores. Monogram at bottom on the right: H. $3p. 7l.$, W. $3p.$
25. Victory. A winged female figure standing on the ruins of a large building, holding a lance in one hand, and a laurel wreath in the other. On a pillar on the right, VICTORIA, and above, N R.: H. $5p.$, W. $3p. 5l.$
26. Fame. A winged female sitting on some armour, writing FAMA VOLAT on a shield. N M on a pillar on the right: H. $5p.$, W. $3p. 6l.$
27. Neptune, holding a Trident, sitting directed to the left; his left hand is on an urn from which water flows; on the right is a niche with an altar, and a tablet with the letters ONRM. On Neptune's chair, NEPTUNI SIMOLACRON: H. $5p.$, W. $3p. 6l.$
28. Mercury standing, the winged cap on his head

- and the caduceus in his right hand. On the pedestal of a pillar N. J. R. O.: H. $5p.$, W. $3p. 6l.$
29. Mercury standing, caduceus in his left hand, a flute in his right; head three quarters turned to the right. On the pedestal of a pillar, MERCURIO. At bottom in front, N. R. at the side of a vase. A Niello, not described by Duchesne.
30. Four Children round a Tree. One on the right sits on a round pedestal; the second leans its head on the knee of the first; the third is on horseback; and the fourth standing. In the centre is a tree with a tablet suspended, on which is inscribed, OPUS NICOLETTI DE MUTINA: H. $4p. 11l.$, W. $3p. 4l.$
31. The Vestal Lucia carrying Water in a Sieve, to prove her virginity. At top on a scroll hangs a tablet with the artist's monogram: H. $4p. 11l.$, W. $3p. 3l.$
32. Goldsmith's Ornament. A Vase surrounded by four Wreaths of Roses. The letters N. R. are by the side of a smaller Vase with pointed top: $5p. 5l.$ square.
33. A similar Ornament with the letters N. R., but without the smaller Vase; same size as the preceding.

Remarks. The first print described by Bartsch, David with the Head of Goliath, holding the Sling in his right hand, is a Niello. See Duchesne, No. 16. Bartsch, Nos. 6 to 20, The Life of the Virgin. There are two states of these plates. In the second they are coarsely retouched. For the variations, see Bartsch, tom. xiii.]

[MODENA, or MUTINA, TOMMASO DA. This name is on pictures painted in the fourteenth century. With respect to the painter, it is difficult to say little, and useless to say much; so great is the uncertainty that exists among all that have written concerning him and his works. No doubt much of this uncertainty has arisen from artists of that early period being called after the places of their birth, or where they had acquired the right of citizenship, instead of their family name. It appears that his father's name was Barisino, and that he was nominated to the citizenship, and to the public notaryship of Trevisi in 1315; in which his family was called di Modena. Whether Tommaso was born at Trevisi or at Modena has not been discovered, but on the series of pictures painted by him at the former place, in the chapter-house of the Dominicans, is inscribed "Anno Domini MCCCLII. Prior Tracisimus ordinis predicatorem depingi fecit istud Capitulum, et Thomas Pictor de Mutina pinxit istud." so it may be concluded that he there gave the name of his real country, either because he was born in Modena, or because, descended from a Modenese family, he retained his citizenship, and rather wished to appear of Modena than of Trevisi. But his name is of more importance than it otherwise would have been, on account of various pretensions which works attributed to him have given rise to. The altar-piece, in three compartments, of the Virgin and Child, with Saints Wencelas and Palmatus, patrons of Bohemia, formerly at Carlestein, but now in the gallery of the Belvidere at Vienna, was said to be an oil painting, and to have been painted in 1297; it was, therefore, eagerly caught at by the writers of Germany and Italy, to confute Vasari, and to vindicate the title of their respective countries, in opposition to the Flemish claim. This picture, however, bears no date at present, (though Zani asserts that it had the date 1357, which Michel read erroneously 1297,) and more recent chemical analysis has shown that it is a tempera, and not an oil painting. The figures are half-length, about half the size of life; and the picture bears the following inscription:—

Quis opus hoc finxit? Thomas de Mutina pinxit, Quale vides lector Barisini filius auctor.

Vor Michel reads "Rarisini," but Federici, Tiraboschi, and Lanzi show that Barisini should be the reading. This is all that can be gathered of certainty with regard to Tommaso da Modena, or Mutina, though much conjecture might be hazarded in reference to Tommaso Bassini, and others simply called Maso, of whom mention is made as flourishing about the same period.]

MODIGLIANI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Forli, and flourished about the year 1600. Lanzi notices some of his works at Urbino, where he is called Francesco da Forli, representing a Deposition from the Cross, and some frescoes in the church of S. Lucia. But his best productions are at the Osservanti at Forli, and in the church of S. Maria del Rosario; they are subjects of the Old Testament, among which are Adam and Eve driven from Paradise, the Deluge, the Tower of Babel, and others.

MOELART, JACOB, was born at Dort in 1649, and was for some time a scholar of Nicholas Maas. His progress under that master was considerable, and he proved a reputable painter both of history and portraits. Of his historical works, Houbraeken particularly commends his pictures of Moses striking the Rock, and the Destruction of Pharaoh and his Host. He distinguished himself as a portrait painter, and was employed by the principal persons of his country. He died in 1727.

MOFFEL, C. F. This obscure artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a coarse, incorrect etching, representing the Death of St. Francis. It is inscribed, C. F. Moffel, fecit.

MOGALLI, COMO, [or Cosimo,] an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence in 1667. He was instructed in design by Giovanni Batista Foggini, a Florentine sculptor, and applied himself chiefly to engraving. He executed part of the plates for a book of Etruscan antiquities, published at Florence in 1724, by Thomas Dempster; and was employed, in conjunction with Antonio Lorenzini and others, to engrave the plates for the Museo Fiorentino. We have also some prints by him, after Santo di Tito, F. Perucci, and others. The following are from the pictures in the Florentine gallery:

The Holy Family reposing; after Albano; circular.
Apollo and Marsyas; after Guercino.

Magdalene carried up to Heaven by an Angel;
after Guido Cagnacci.

The Holy Family; after Coreggio.

Eve presenting the Apple to Adam; after Gab. Cagliari.

Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; after the same.

Christ and the Disciples at Emmaus; after Palma.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Fra Bartolomeo.

David and Bathsheba; after Salviati.

The Annunciation; after Andrea del Sarto.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Titian.

A Bacchanalian Dance; after the same.

Philip II., King of Spain; after the same.

[He died about 1730.]

MOGALLI, NICCOLO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Florence in 1723. After learning the principles of design under Francesco Conti, he was instructed in engraving by J. D. Picchianti. About the year 1750 he went to Rome, where he resided several years, and was employed by the celebrated Winkelman to engrave, from the designs of Casanova, the plates for his work, entitled, Monumenti antichi, inediti, spiegati et illustrati da Giovanni Winkelmann. Roma, 1767. He also engraved some plates for the Florentine gallery, and for the cabinet of Portici.

MOHEDANO, ANTONIO, a Spanish historical painter in fresco, and considered one of the best painters of Andalusia, was born at Antequera in 1561. He studied under the celebrated Pablo de Céspedes, but preferring fresco to painting in oil he devoted himself to that, and became the most eminent artist of his time. In his practice he followed the system of his master; first to meditate, next to study the composition, and last to trace and design his figures after nature, or from models arranged by himself, and with the assistance of the lay figure. Hence he became very happy in his compositions, learned in the art of contrasting his groups, and gave fine character and grandeur of form to his figures. He painted fruit and ornaments with equal skill; and successfully imitated the grotesques in the Loggie of the Vatican by Giovanni da Udine. He left many proofs of his merit as a painter, particularly in four pictures for the convent of S. Francisco de Seville, and in the frescoes painted at the same place in conjunction with Alonso Vasquez. At the latter part of his life he returned to Lucena, where he finished the pictures for the great altar of the cathedral of that city, and died there in 1625. Mohedano had also a talent for poetry, of which specimens may be seen in Flores de poetas ilustres de España, published by his friend Pedro Espinosa in 1605.]

MOINE, or MOYNE, FRANCIS LE, a French engraver, who was concerned with Berain and Chaveau, in designing and engraving the ornaments of painting and sculpture, which are in the gallery of Apollo in the Louvre.

MOINE, FRANCIS, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1688. He was a scholar of Louis Galloche, under whom he became one of the most promising young artists of his country, and obtained the first prize at the Academy. He did not, however, enjoy the advantage of studying in Italy under the pension of the king, being prevented by the difficulties of the time; and his parents, who were in indigent circumstances, had not the means of supporting him in his travels. By an assiduous study of the best models he could meet with in his own country, he acquired a distinguished reputation, and became a member of the Academy at Paris in 1718. His picture of reception was Hercules and Cacus, which, though not one of his best performances, is remarkable for the correctness of the design. In 1724, Mr. Berger, one of his patrons, formed the project of visiting Italy, and invited Le Moine to accompany him. The proposal was readily accepted, though he may be said to have rather run through the country, than visited it for the purpose of study, being only six months on their journey, and that at a time of life when his principles were already formed. In his short visit to Rome he appears to have been more captivated with the splendid sumptuousness of Pietro da Cortona, and the daring despatch of Lanfranco, than the sublimity of Michael Angelo, or the graceful dignity of Raffaele. On his return to Paris he was engaged to paint the cupola of the chapel of the Virgin in St. Sulpice, where he distinguished himself by the beauty of his groups, and the freshness of his colouring. This undertaking, which occupied him three years, established his celebrity. He was commissioned by Louis XV. to paint the ceiling of the grand saloon at Versailles, representing the Apotheosis of Hercules, an immense machine, which, in dimensions, is the most stupendous in Europe, as it measures sixty-four feet by fifty-four. It consists of nine compartments, and was finished in four years. This prodigious work procured him the appointment of principal painter to the king at the death of Louis de Boullogne, with a liberal pension. Notwithstanding this flattering patronage, he fell into a state of melancholy and despondency, which his friends endeavoured in vain to dissipate. M. Berger calling on him one day to invite him to his country-seat, he conceived that the officers of justice were come to conduct him to prison; he snatched up his sword, stabbed himself in several places, and as his friend entered his apartment, fell lifeless at his feet. This event happened in 1737, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

MOÏTTE, PETER STEPHEN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1722. He was a pupil of P. F. Beaumont, and has engraved several plates of portraits and various subjects, in a clear, neat style. His most considerable works were the plates he executed for the gallery of Dresden, and the cabinet of Count Bruhl. We have, among several others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

J. Restout, Painter to the King; after de Latour.
Charles John Francis Hénault, Historian; after St. Aubin.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Andrea del Sarto; Dresden collection.

Another Holy Family; after F. Vanni; the same.
The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Coreggio.

Christ praying on the Mount of Olives; after the same.

A Halt of Travellers; after Wowermans.

The Watering-place; after the same.

The Dutch Cook; after Gerard Douw.

The Fish Woman; after the same.

Æneas saving his Family from the Burning of Troy; after M. Corneille.

The Triumph of Venus; after Boucher.

The Pleasures of Summer; after the same.

Several Prints after Greuze, Cochin, and other masters.

[He died about 1780.]

MOÏTTE, F. A., [FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE,] was the son and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Paris, about the year 1748. We have by him several plates after Greuze, and other masters; among which are the following:

A pair, Poetry and Painting; after Greuze.

A Flemish Repast; after Jordaens.

[MOL, JAN BAPTIST VAN, a contemporary and imitator of Rembrandt, of whom there are no further details.]

MOL, PETER VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1590, and was brought up in the great school of Rubens. He painted history with no mean reputation, and was employed for some of the churches in Flanders and Brabant. In the cathedral at Antwerp is a picture by him of the Adoration of the Magi, finely coloured, in the style of his master; and in the gallery of the Louvre is a dead Christ, with the Holy Women, St. John, and Joseph of Arimathea. He died at Paris in 1650. [Immerzeel and Balkema say he was born in 1580. His pictures are coarse imitations of Rubens, but are too frequently ascribed to that master.]

MOLA, PIETRO FRANCESCO. This eminent painter was born at Coldra, in the Milanese state, in 1609. He was the son of an architect, who placed him under the tuition of Giuseppe Cesari d'Arpino, at Rome; but his father's affairs calling him to Bologna, he was accompanied thither by his son, and he became a disciple of Francesco Albano. He did not however adopt the principles of either of those masters, but sought a bolder style of design, and a more vigorous colour. The works of Guercino were particularly the objects of his admiration, and he was ambitious of acquiring the energy and powerful effect of his chiaro-scuro, and the magic of his relief. Aiming at a fresher and more harmonious system of colour than he found in the works of Guercino, he went to Venice, where he studied the best productions of the great masters of the Venetian school. He returned to Rome in the pontificate of Innocent X., by whom he was employed in several considerable works, particularly a chapel in the church del Gesu, where he painted in fresco St. Peter delivered from Prison, and the Conversion of St. Paul, which gained him great reputation. He was not less patronized by Alexander VII., for whom he painted his most celebrated work of Joseph making himself known to his Brethren, in the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo. In the church of S. Maria della Vita, at Milan, are two of his most admired performances, representing St. John in the Wilderness, and St. Paul the Hermit. The figures are designed with a correctness and dignity worthy of the Caracci; and in the latter he has introduced a noble landscape, resembling that in the famed St. Peter Martyr by Titian. Although Mola reached a distinguished rank as an historical painter, he is still more esteemed for his admirable landscapes, to which his genius and inclination seem to have particularly directed him. His scenery is sometimes solemn and sublime; and when his sites are more pleasing and extensive, they are always marked with a grandeur, which is hardly surpassed in the best productions of Caracci or Domenichino. His touch is firm and free, and his colouring unusually vigorous and glowing. The figures with which they are decorated generally represent some subject of history or the fable, and are introduced with infinite taste and intelligence. He died at Rome in 1665. We have a few etchings by P. F. Mola, executed in a spirited and masterly style. The following are by him:

The Virgin suckling the Infant Jesus; after his own design.

The Holy Family, with Angels. This plate was first etched by Mola, and was afterwards finished with the graver by a clumsy, unskilful hand.

Joseph discovering himself to his Brethren. This print has been sometimes attributed to Carlo Maratti.

The Holy Family, with Angels presenting Flowers to the Infant Jesus; after Albano.

[There is a difference in writers respecting the dates of this artist's birth and death. Passeri says he was born in 1612, and died in 1668; Pascoli, that he was born in 1621, and died in 1666. There are three pictures by him in the National Gallery.

MOLA, JOHN BAPTIST. This artist has been said to be the brother of Pietro Francesco Mola, but, according to the authorities of Malvasia, Orlandi, and others, which have been followed by Lanzi, and adopted by d'Argenville, he was of a different family, and was a native of France, born about the year 1620. After passing some years in the school of Simon Vouet at Paris, he went to Italy, and studied at Bologna, under Francesco Albano, by whose instruction he became a reputable painter of history and landscape. When Albano was invited to Rome, he was accompanied to that capital by Mola, where he passed some time, studying the works of the best masters, and particularly the Farnesian Gallery, by Annibale Caracci. Among his best performances at Rome are four large landscapes, in the Salviati palace, painted entirely in the charming style of his instructor. We have a few etchings by this artist; among others, Cupid in a Car, drawn by two little Loves; after Albano.

[Zani places his birth in 1616, and his death in 1661.]

MOLENAER, JOHN, a Dutch painter of drolls and merry-makings. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and are coloured with a richness and harmony approaching the admirable productions of Adrian Ostade, though greatly inferior to that artist in the beauty of his pencil, and the expression of his heads.] Jan, Jan Miense, Nicolas Miense, and Nicolas Molenaar, are strangely mixed up in the accounts of the Dutch writers. They were probably relations, if not brothers, and flourished at the same period. The name of J. Molenaar (sometimes Molenaar) is of most frequent occurrence. His subjects are interiors, with merry-makings of the lower classes, very well painted, with a good management of light and shade, and characteristic expression; but not to be compared with Adrian Ostade. His name is found on landscapes under the influence of winter, with figures skating, and other amusements, in which he gives a true representation of the season as it appears in Holland: in these his skies and atmosphere are excellent. The other three named, are said to have painted similar subjects; it is probable that they frequently assisted each other. Pictures occur with the name Molenaar only; these are generally of an inferior quality.]

MOLIGNY, C. D., a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He engraved several portraits, principally after Cochin, among which is that of Jean Brute, Curé de St. Benoît.

[MOLITOR, MARTIN VON, a landscape painter and engraver, born at Vienna in 1759, and died in the same city in 1812, was a pupil of Christian Brand. His landscapes, both in oil and in water-colours, were much admired and sought for by amateurs and connoisseurs. Bartsch published a Catalogue raisonné of his etchings, consisting of 52 pieces, which Nagler has copied into his work. Some of his designs have been engraved by Gabet and Bartsch; these are distinguished by their initials, in addition to M. M. with which he marked his etchings; as for example, M. M. inv. A. Btch f. — M. M. d. G. S., the last signifying, Martin von Molitor delineavit, (François.) Gabet, sculptsit.]

MOLYN, PETER, the ELDER. This artist was born at Haerlem about the year 1600. He painted landscapes in a very pleasing style. His skies and distances are touched with lightness and delicacy, and his fore-grounds are enriched with buildings and ruins in a picturesque manner. We have several spirited etchings by this artist, which are incorrectly attributed by Mr. Strutt to his son, Peter Moly, called Tempesta. They are executed in the style of John Vandevelde. His prints are generally signed with his name, the P. and M. being joined thus M. Among others are the following:

A set of four Landscapes; inscribed, P. de Moly, fec. et exc. 1626.

Another set of four Landscapes; P. Moly, fecit. 1626.

Several Candle-light pieces and dark subjects.

MOLYN, PETER, the YOUNGER, called TEMPESTA, or PIETRO MULIER. This painter was the son of the preceding artist, born at Haerlem in 1637. He learned the principles of the art from his father, but having seen some of the hunting-pieces by Francis Snyders, he applied himself with great zeal to imitate the style of that master, and with so much success, that his pictures were scarcely less esteemed than those of Snyders. He did not confine his talents to huntings and animals, but equally excelled in painting sea-storms and tempests, in which he represented the violent agitation of the waves, and the horrors of shipwreck, in the most impressive manner. When he was twenty-five years of age, he went to Italy, where his ability in depicting these disastrous subjects acquired him the name of Il Tempesta. At Rome his works were particularly admired; and he was so much employed, that he was under the necessity of calling in the assistance of a coadjutor, whose sister he married. His reputation reached Genoa, whither he was invited, with offers of the most tempting kind, and, in an evil moment, he was induced to accept them. His reception, and the encouragement he met with, were most flattering; and he was in the most brilliant career of fortune and fame, when the indulgence of a fatal passion blasted all his prospects, and from the enviable height of the public esteem and admiration, plunged him into the abyss of guilt, remorse, and infamy. He conceived a violent attachment to a Genoese lady of great beauty, and finding that it was in vain to hope for a return of it whilst his wife lived, he formed the horrible project of putting an end to her life. To accomplish his dreadful purpose, he invited her to join him at Genoa, and employed assassins to murder her on the way. His crime did not long escape the vigilant eye of justice; he was arrested on suspicion, and many circumstances appearing to corroborate his guilt, he was sentenced to an ignominious death. The intercession of his powerful friends, and perhaps some consideration for his talents, occasioned his punishment to be changed to perpetual imprisonment, of which some years had passed, when the French bombarded Genoa, and as the city was in danger of being burned, the doge ordered the prisons to be opened, and Tempesta escaped into the duchy of Parma. It is said that some of his finest works were those he painted during his imprisonment. He passed the remainder of his life at Parma and Milan, where his pictures were held in the highest estimation. He died in 1701. [Balkema, differing from all writers of credit, says that he was born in 1643, and died in 1699.]

[MOMMERS, HENDRIK, born at Haerlem in 1623, studied at Rome, and was called by the associated artists there Meleager. His subjects are Italian vegetable markets with peasants, landscapes and animals, seldom without an ass. Occasionally he painted sea-ports, which may easily be mistaken for the work of Weenix. His colouring is warm and pleasing, and his handling vigorous and clean. On his return to his native country he received scholars, some of which proved respectable painters; Brackenbourg, Bernard van Schendel, and Thierry Maes, were of the number. He signed his pictures with his initials, H. M., and sometimes in full. He died in 1697. Balkema mentions an artist of the same name, who went to Italy, painted the same subjects, and who he says was a scholar of Karel du Jardin. He says that he was born at Haerlem in 1650, and died in 1708. There is but little doubt that it means the same painter.]

MOMPER, or MOMPERT, JOOS, or JODOCUS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1580. As it is not known under whom he studied, and as his manner does not resemble that of any painter of his country, it is probable that he had no other instructor than nature. He painted mountainous landscapes in a bold, free style, and appears to have taken his views from the romantic scenery of Switzerland, rather than the confined prospects in his own country. Contrary to the usual style of the Flemish artists, his works have nothing of the precise finishing which was so much admired in the pictures of Breughel and Savery. His pencil is broad and facile, and his colouring clear, and of an agreeable effect, though in the forms of his trees and mountains there occasionally appears the stiffness and formality of a mannerist. His pictures are frequently decorated with figures by the elder Teniers, [Franks,] or John Breughel. Vandyck painted the portrait of Momper, among the celebrated artists of his country, and has etched a plate of it himself. He etched a few plates of landscapes from his own designs, which are scarce. [He died in 1638.]

MONA, or MONNA, DOMENICO, was born at Ferrara in 1550, and was a disciple of Giuseppe Mazzuoli, called il Bastaruolo. He possessed a prompt and ready invention, and an astonishing facility of execution, which accounts for the extraordinary number and magnitude of the works he has left at Ferrara, where there is scarcely a church or public edifice which does not possess something of his hand. There is a surprising inequality in his works; and in viewing his best performances, such as the Birth of the Virgin, and the Nativity of our Saviour, in S. Maria in Vado; and the Entombing of Christ, at the Servi; it appears unaccountable, that, with the possession of such powers, he could be so negligent of his fame, as to expose to public view the slight and imbecile productions which form the majority of his works. Lanzi attributes this incoherence to occasional derangement of mind, and reports, that in a fit of insanity he killed an officer of the household of the Cardinal Aldobrandini, which obliged him to take refuge in the duchy of Parma, where he died in 1602.

MONACO, PIETRO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Belluno about the year 1738. He chiefly resided at Venice, where he published, in 1763, a set of one hundred and twelve plates, after the most celebrated pictures at Venice. These prints are very unequal; some of them, however, possess considerable merit. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Giovanni Batista Tiepolo; after a picture by himself.

Jacopo Tatti, called Sansovino, Sculptor; after Titian.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Tobit restoring his Father's Sight; after Dom. Feti.

The Adulteress before Christ; after P. Veronese.

The Nativity; after Seb. Ricci.

The Murder of the Innocents; after Giulio Carpioni.

The Last Supper; after Pittoni.

Lot and his Daughters; after P. Liberi.

Christ conducted to Mount Calvary; after Gio. Bat. Tiepolo.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after Gio. Bellini.

The Presentation in the Temple; after Anto. Balestra.

[Zani says that P. Monaco worked in 1743 and 1751; if so, he must have been born earlier than is stated in the text.]

MONAMY, PETER. This painter was a native of Jersey, born about the year 1670. His parents were in indigent circumstances, and he was sent to England when a boy, and apprenticed to a house-painter on London Bridge. But, as Lord Orford observes, speaking of this artist, "where nature gives talents, they break out in the homeliest school. The shallow waves which rolled under his window, fitted him to imitate the turbulence of the ocean." The sea-pieces of Monamy are inferior to those of William Vandevelde, but they are equalled by few painters of those subjects. His calms, particularly, are sunny and transparent, and his vessels are designed and equipped with the greatest correctness and precision. He died in Westminster in 1749. [The pictures of Monamy should not be named with those of W. Vander Velde; they are very inferior productions, and seldom admitted in choice collections. It is true that his works were at one time popular, but it was in the age of ignorance of these matters, when such critics in art as Walpole guided the public taste.]

MONANNI, MONANNO. According to Baldinucci, this painter was a native of Florence, and was a disciple of Cristofano Allori. He went early to Rome, where he painted history with some reputation, and was received into the Academy there in 1652. In the church of S. Giovanni Decollato at Rome, is a picture by him of the Baptism of Christ by St. John.

MONCALVO, IL. See CACCIA.

MONCORNET, BALTHAZAR, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He chiefly resided at Paris, where he followed the business of a printseller. Basan styles him one of the most indifferent engravers of his country, which is treating him with more severity than he merits, as France has certainly produced many artists inferior to him. He engraved an almost incredible number of portraits, and a few subjects after Rubens, and other masters, among which are the following:

The Battle between Constantine and Maxentius; after Rubens.

The Triumph of Constantine; after the same.

A set of Ornaments for goldsmiths.

A small etching of Rabbits, in imitation of the style of Hollar.

[Nagler says he was born in 1630, at Rouen, and died in 1670. He gives a long list of portraits and other prints by him, among which he mentions "Le Branle des Modes depuis François I. jusqu'en 1695." Perhaps the figure 9 should be 6. Zani says Moncornet flourished from 1622 to 1663.]

MONDINI, FULGENZIO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1658. He was a scholar of Guercino, and painted history with considerable reputation. This able artist is particularly commended by Malvasia, who asserts that he was one of the most promising young painters of that period, and would have reached a distinguished rank in the art, if his talents had been permitted a longer career. He died young, at Florence, where he had been employed by the court. There are several of the works of this artist in the churches at Bologna, of which the following are the most worthy of notice. In the Annunziata are two admired pictures by him, of the Angel appearing to St. Joseph in his Dream; and the Rest of the Holy Family in Egypt. In S. Petronio, two frescoes of subjects from the Life of S. Antonio di Padoua.

MONERI, GIOVANNI. He was born at Visone, a small town near Acqui, in Piedmont, in 1637, and studied at Rome under Romanelli. In 1657 he returned to his native town, and gave proof of his ability in a picture of the Assumption, painted for the Cathedral at Acqui. At a more advanced age, and with an improved talent, he painted an esteemed picture of the Presentation in the Temple, for the church of the Capuchins. He died in 1714.

MONGEROUX, M. DE, a French amateur engraver, who, for his amusement, etched some plates, among which is a landscape with figures and animals; after Casanova.

MONI, J. According to Papillon, this artist was a native of Lyons, and flourished about the year 1570. He was an eminent engraver on wood, and executed a set of cuts from his own designs, for the Bible History, published at Lyons, by William Rouille, in 1570. He also copied the engravings on wood from the Bible, executed by Solomon Bernard, called Little Bernard, which copies were published at Lyons in 1582. He sometimes marked his prints with the initials of his name, and sometimes with the monogram M.

[MONI, LOUIS DE, born at Breda in 1698, was a scholar of Van Kessel, Emanuel Biset, and Philip Van Dyck. He painted small pictures, in which he endeavoured to imitate the manner of Gerard Dou. His compositions are simple and animated, and are deserving of high commendation. He understood the principles of light and shade, and the harmony of colour. His handling is free, light, and firm. His pictures are found occasionally in the best collections. He died at Leyden in 1771.]

MONNICKS, or MONNIX. This painter was born at Bois-le-Duc in 1606. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he went early to Italy, and studied several years at Rome. He chiefly excelled in architectural views, markets, and conversations. His talents recommended him to the notice of Urban VIII., who took him into his service with a liberal establishment, and employed him in several important works during his residence at Rome. He painted the most remarkable views in that capital, the Colosseum, the Columns of Trajan and Vespasian, the Campo Vaccino, and the other interesting scenery of that city and its vicinity. He was a perfect master of perspective, and the figures which decorate his pictures are correctly drawn, and touched with great spirit. The works of this master are almost entirely confined to Italy, where he passed the greater part of his life. He did not return to Holland until he was upwards of seventy, and died at Bois-le-Duc in 1686.

MONNOYER, JOHN BAPTISTE, called BAPTISTE. This eminent flower-painter was born at Lisle in 1635. He studied at Antwerp, and for some time applied himself to historical painting; but finding that his genius led him to another branch of the art, he attempted to paint flowers and fruit, in which he greatly distinguished himself. He went young to Paris, where his works were greatly admired; and in 1663 he was received into the Academy with distinction. He was employed in ornamenting the palaces of Versailles, Trianon, Marly, and Meudon. This flattering encouragement did not prevent him from accepting the invitation of Lord [the Duke of?] Montague, then our ambassador to France, to accompany him to England. His first performances were several pictures of flowers and fruit, for the embellishment of Montague House, now the British Museum, which are amongst the finest of his works. During a residence of nearly twenty years in London, he painted an infinite number of pictures, which decorate the mansions of the nobility, and the collections of individuals. If the pictures of John van Huysum, Rachel Ruysch, and Mignon, are admired for the velvet softness of their pencil, and the polished finishing of every object, those of Baptiste claim our admiration, by the boldness of his compositions, the energy of his touch, and the force and vigour of his colouring. J. B. Monnoyer etched a few plates from his own designs, representing vases with flowers, which are executed in a tasteful and spirited style. He died in 1699. [The pictures by Baptiste, (for so he chose to call himself,) though deserving of the praise bestowed on them, are held, comparatively, in little estimation by collectors; he etched some, and others have been engraved to the number of 80, forming a folio volume. He exercised his talent at Burlington House, at Lord Carlisle's, at Hampton Court, at the Duke of St. Alban's, at Windsor, and at Kensington Palace, where he painted a looking-glass for Queen Mary.]

MONNOYER, ANTHONY, called YOUNG BAPTISTE, was the son and scholar of the foregoing artist, and painted flower-pieces in the style of his father, which, though not destitute of merit, were greatly inferior to those of John Baptiste Monnoyer.

MONOSILIO, SALVATORE. This painter was born at Messina about the year 1700, and studied at Rome under Sebastiano Conca, whose style he followed with some reputation. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Rome. He painted the ceiling of one of the chapels in S. Paola della Regola; and a picture of S. Pascale in the church of SS. Quaranta. In the church of the Priests of the Mission, is one of his best works, representing the Conversion of St. Paul.

MONSIGNORI, FRANCESCO, was born at Verona in 1455, but was brought up in the school of Andrea Mantegna at Mantua. He painted history with considerable success, and was much patronized by the Marchese Francesco Gonzaga. Less learned and correct in his design than Mantegna, he is more modern in his style; and his colouring, particularly in the carnations, has more of the morbidness. He excelled in painting animals, which he was fond of introducing into his works. In the church of the Franciscans, at Mantua, is one of his best pictures, representing S. Lodovico; and in the refectory some perspective views, which show him to have been a perfect master of that branch of the art. He died in 1519.

MONSIGNORI, GIROLAMO, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Verona about the year 1460. At an early period of his life he became a monk of the order of the Dominicans, and painted some altar-pieces for the church of his monastery. In the great library of S. Benedetto is a fine copy by this artist of the celebrated Last Supper, by Lionardo da Vinci, which, according to Lanzi, is considered the best that has been painted of that miracle of art. He died in 1520.

MONT, DEL. See DELMONT.

MONTAGNA, BENEDETTO. This artist was a native of Vicenza, and flourished about the year 1500. According to Ridolfi, he painted some pictures for the churches in his native city, which are so much in the style of Giovanni Bellini, that they may be mistaken for the works of that master. He is, however, better known as an engraver than a painter; and though his works are very feeble and imperfect, both in design and execution, they are deserving of notice, as among the earliest specimens of the art in the Venetian states. It is probable that some of the prints of Albert Durer, which were brought to Venice, and the early works of Marc Antonio, who resided some time in that city, might have encouraged him to attempt the art, which may be said to have been then in its infancy in Italy, as at that time Marc Antonio had not produced any of his capital works. The prints of Benedetto Montagna bear a slight resemblance to the earliest and rudest engravings of Marc Antonio. They are from his own designs, and are usually signed with his name at length; they are now become very scarce. We have, among others, the following by him:

The Virgin seated, holding the infant Jesus, St. John is standing by her side, and St. Joseph appears below. In the back-ground is a town, with a river and a bridge over it.

A young Man sitting on a Rock.

Venus punishing Cupid.

The Rape of Europa.

The Judgment of Midas.

A Naked Figure standing by a Tree.

Two Figures, an elderly Man playing on the bagpipes, and a young one playing on the violin.

Three Women, in a landscape, one of them taking a Child from a Tree. [Birth of Adonis.]

A Landscape, with a Cottage, and an old Man seated on a bank.

[Zani gives inscriptions with dates that show Benedetto painted in 1524 and 1533. Bartsch describes 33 prints by him; many of them have his name in full. Some writers confound Benedetto, as a painter, with his father, Bartolommeo.

The following twenty prints by Benedetto Montagna are not described by Bartsch.

1. The Nativity, with Joseph at the Well; copy of Albert Durer. H. 7¼ in., W. 4¾ in. B. M. on a tablet hung from the upper part of the house. (Sykes, 1095.)

2. St. Anthony standing praying; pig on the right at bottom. B. M. in the middle at bottom. H. 10¼ in., W. 7½ in.

3. Two Hunters observing a Stag which lies on the ground, pierced by a javelin. In the sky on the right the name. H. 5½ in., W. 3¼ in.

4. Venus standing Naked, holding a mirror in her right hand; no name. H. 11¼ in., W. 6¾. (Sykes, 1098.)

5. River God seated on a Rock on the right; Cupid, a back figure, on the left. H. 6¾, W. 4¾. (Ottley, p. 529.)

6. The Saviour standing, in a landscape, after his resurrection; a banner in his right hand, and a scroll in his left; Jerusalem in the distance. H. 10p. 5l., W. 8p. 1l.

7. A Woman with two Children, and a Man seated, in a landscape.

8. A Nymph with two Children and two Satyrs; she is lying naked in a garden suckling a Child at her right breast; the Satyrs are lifting the curtain on the right. H. 6p. 5l., W. 8p. 5l.

9. The Holy Family seated near a fountain.

10. River Goddess, with winged Boy holding a sphere. (British Museum.)

MONTAGNA, MARCO TULLIO. According to Baglione, this painter was a native of Rome, and flourished in the pontificate of Clement VIII. He was a disciple of Federigo Zuccaro, and painted history both in oil and in fresco, with some reputation. In the church of S. Cecilia, the ceiling is painted by this master; and in S. Niccolo in Carcere, is an altar-piece by him, representing a subject from the life of St. Nicholas.

MONTAGNA, MATTHEW. See PLATTENBERG.

MONTAGNANA, JACOPO. This painter was a native of Padua, and flourished from the year 1495 till after 1508. Vasari and Ridolfi call this artist Jacopo Montagna, but his real name was Montagnana, as appears from a signature on a picture of the Resurrection by him, in the Vescovado at Venice, which he has marked, Jacopus Montagnana, 1495.

In the Sala del Consiglio, at Belluno, there is a picture by him, representing a subject from the Roman History, which, if we may judge from an epigram written under the work, in ancient characters, must have been regarded as one of the most esteemed productions of the time. It is a copious composition, and at first sight might be attributed to Andrea Mantegna, from the correctness of the design, and the draping of the figures. The inscription is as follows :

Non hic Parrhasio, non hic tribuendus Apelli,
Hos licet auctores dignus habere labor.
Euganeus, vixdum impleto ter mense, Jacobus
Ex Montagnana nobile pinxit opus.

MONTAGU, ———. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several architectural subjects and views in Rome.

MONTALTO. See DANEDI.

MONTANINI, PIETRO, called PETRUCCIO PERUGINO. This painter was born at Perugia in 1619. He was first a scholar of Ciro Ferri, but his genius leading him more to landscape painting than historical subjects, he left that master, and became a disciple of Salvator Rosa. His landscapes are designed in the bold and romantic style of his instructor, though very inferior in the design of his figures. There are many of his works in the private collections at Perugia. He died in 1689. [Pascoli and Zani say he was born in 1626.]

MONTELATICI, FRANCESCO, called IL CECCO BRAVO. According to Orlandi, this painter was born at Florence about the year 1600, and was a scholar of Giovanni Bilivert. He did not, however, attach himself entirely to the style of that master, but blended the taste of his instructor with that of Domenico Cresti, called Passignano. He was a tolerably correct designer, and no vulgar colourist. The name of Il Cecco Bravo was given him on account of his touchy and quarrelsome disposition. Of his works at Florence, the most remarkable are, the Fall of Lucifer, in the church of the Teatini; and a fine picture of S. Nicollo Vesovo, in S. Simone. He was invited to inspruch by the Archduke Ferdinand, and died there, painter to the court, in 1661.

MONTEMEZZANO, FRANCESCO, was born at Verona about the year 1555, and was brought up in the school of Paolo Veronese, whose style he followed in the copiousness of his compositions, the airs of the heads, and the splendour of his draperies; but his pencil is tame and spiritless, and his colouring languid and weak. His most respectable performances are, his picture of the Annunciation, in the church of the Osservanti alla Vigna, at Venice; and Christ appearing to Magdalene, in the church of S. Giorgio, at Verona. He died in 1600, in the prime of life.

[MONTEN, DIETRICH, an eminent German battle painter, was born at Dusseldorf in 1799. He showed from his earliest youth a great love for accounts of wars and battles, and Homer, Tasso, and Ariosto were his favourite authors. In order that he might have some practical knowledge in military matters he enlisted, as a volunteer, in the Prussian army, and served for twelve months. At the expiration of his term of military service he entered the Academy of Arts at Dusseldorf, and after studying there for two years, removed to Munich, in order to benefit by the instruction of Peter Hess. He soon attracted the attention of Cornelius, then at the head of the painters at Munich, who intrusted him with the execution of three of the frescoes of the arcade of the Hofgarten; namely, the Storming of the Turkish Entrenchment by the Bavarians at Belgrade, in 1717, the Battles of Arcis sur Aube, and the granting of the Bavarian Constitution by Maximilian Joseph in 1818. He painted many other large battle-pieces, in which the Germans figure as the victors; and also many smaller pictures, in all of which, it is said, extraordinary spirit in the incidents and in the execution, and a display of fine drawing and good colouring, are conspicuous, though in some parts too sketchy and undefined. He wanted the necessary patience for elaborate modelling and uniform finish. All his works have an agreeable effect; their greatest defect is an occasional extravagance of action. His horses are always very spirited. He died in 1843.]

MONTENAT. This artist was an engraver on wood, and, according to Papillon, executed several cuts from the designs of Simon Vouet. [Dumesnil mentions a print by him of the Virgin and Child, inscribed J. Montenat, fecit.]

MONTEPULCIANO. See MOROSINI.

MONTERO, DE ROXAS, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1613. He was a disciple of Pedro de las Cuevas, and studied in Italy. Of his pictures in the churches at Madrid, Palomino particularly commends the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of the Colegio de Atocha; the Angel appearing to St. Joseph, in San Juan de Alarcon; and the Destruction of Pharaoh's Host, in the sacristy of the convent of la Merced. He died at Madrid in 1680, aged 70. [He copied and imitated the pictures of Caravaggio; he died in 1683, aged 70.]

[MONTERO, LORENZO, born at Seville in 1656, excelled in architectural decorations, landscapes, fruit and flowers, which he painted in distemper. He was much employed at the Retiro, but his works there have perished. In the chapel of St. Martha in the church of St. Jerome at Madrid, are still to be seen traces of his skill in ornamental design. He was not equally successful in oil painting; the only work worthy of notice, in this way, being the portrait of Philip V., which is dated 1701. He died at Madrid in 1710.]

MONTI, FRANCESCO, called IL BRESCIANO DELLE BATTAGLIE. This painter was born at Brescia in 1646, and was first a scholar of Pietro Riechi, but afterwards studied under Il Borgognone. He excelled in painting horses and battles, which he designed in a spirited and masterly style, and acquired the name of Il Bresciano delle Battaglie. There are many of his works at Rome, Genoa, and Parma, where they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1712. [Zani says in 1703.]

MONTI, FRANCESCO, BOLOGNESE, was born at Bologna in 1685, and was brought up in the school of Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole. On leaving that master, he was taken into the protection of the Conti Ranuzzi, for whom he painted one of his finest pictures of the Rape of the Sabines. He was afterwards employed at the court of Turin, where he painted the Triumph of Mordecai, an ingenious and copious composition, which is highly commended by Crespi. Of his numerous works in the churches at Bologna, the most esteemed are, Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, at the Osservanti; the Virgin in glory, with S. Barbara and S. Filippo Neri, in the Madonna di Galeria; and the Martyrdom of S. Fedele, at the Cappuccini. He died in 1768.

[MONTFORT. See BLOCKLAND.]

MONTI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to

Soprani, this artist was the son of a poor mendicant, born at Genoa about the year 1610. When a boy, he discovered an uncommon disposition for the art, by sketching on the walls of the houses, which being noticed by a Genoese nobleman, he charitably took him under his protection, and placed him as a pupil under Luciano Borzoni. His progress under that master was so rapid, that it surprised his instructor, and he became a respectable painter of history. He was, however, more distinguished for his excellence in portraits, and painted the principal personages of his country. He died of the plague in 1657.

MONTICELLI, ANDREA. According to Orlandi, this painter was born at Bologna in 1640, and studied perspective under Agostino Mitelli. He designed some architectural views in imitation of that master, but he chiefly excelled in painting flowers, fruit, vases, and other still-life, which he touched with freedom and spirit, and he was a tolerable colourist. He died in 1716.

MONTICELLI, MICHELE ANGELO, was born at Bologna in 1678, and was first a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini, but afterwards studied under Domenico Viani. He excelled in painting landscapes and battles, of which his biographer Crespi speaks in terms of the highest approbation. No painter of his time surpassed him in the degradation of his distances, the forms and foliage of his trees, and the judicious arrangement of his plans; and his figures were designed with correctness and spirit. In the midst of a promising career, he had the misfortune of losing his sight in the prime of life. [According to Zani he was born in 1670, and died in 1748.]

MONTMIRAL, THE MARQUIS OF. This French nobleman is said by Basan to have etched several plates of landscapes, from his own designs, and others after Albert. They are dated about the year 1733.

MONTORFANO, GIOVANNI DONATO. This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1495. In the refectory of the Dominicans delle Grazie, he painted a picture of the Crucifixion, a composition of many figures, which would have been more the object of public admiration, if it had not been placed so near the celebrated Last Supper, by Lionardo da Vinci. With such a rival, he was not likely to be able to compete, to whom the greatest masters would be little degraded by yielding the palm. There is a just and natural expression in the heads, which, if it had been accompanied by a more elegant turn of the figures, and more graceful attitudes, he would have been equalled by few of his contemporaries. In the picture is a group of soldiers at play, in which every face is impressed with the character of attention, and the impatient desire of gain, which is admirably depicted. The back-ground represents the City of Jerusalem, in which the perspective and distance are correctly observed. [Zani says he was born in 1440, and died in 1510.]

MONVERDE, LUCA. This painter was born at Udina in 1501, and was a disciple of Pellegrino di San Daniello. This promising artist was only permitted a short career in the art, in which he would otherwise have probably acquired a distinguished reputation. He painted an altar-piece for the church of S. Maria delle Grazie at Udina, representing the Virgin and Infant, with SS. Gervasio e Protasio, which rendered his premature death lamented by every admirer of the art. He died in 1522.

MOOJAERT, or MOOYAERT, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1600. He is said to have formed his style by imitating the works of Adam Elsheimer, and painted landscapes with figures, in the manner of that master. He has the credit of being the instructor of Jacob vander Does, Solomon de Coninck, John Baptist Weenix, and other eminent artists. He engraved several plates from his own designs, among which are the following:

A set of six of different Animals.

Lot and his Daughters; in the style of Elsheimer.

A Landscape, with cattle.

[See MOYAERT.]

MOOR, KAREL DE. This eminent painter was born at Leyden in 1656. He was intended by his parents for one of the learned professions, but a decided inclination for the art induced his father to place him under the care of Gerard Douw. His progress was considerable, but being desirous of distinguishing himself on a larger scale than was practised by that master, he was sent to Amsterdam, where he became a scholar of Abraham vanden Tempel. The death of that painter, when he was only sixteen years of age, obliged him to search after another instructor, and his election fixed on Godfrey Schalcken, under whom he studied at Dort for some years. His first productions on leaving that master, were portraits and domestic subjects, which were generally admired, and procured him immediate employment, and he was esteemed one of the ablest artists of his time. The states of Holland commissioned him to paint a picture for their council chamber, and left the choice of the subject to himself, provided that it related to the administration of justice. On this occasion, de Moor proved himself capable of nobler exertions than those which had hitherto engaged his pencil. He painted the terrible Judgment of Brutus condemning his two Sons to Death, which he represented in the most awful and impressive manner. The celebrity of Karel de Moor reached Italy, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany expressed a desire to have his portrait, painted by himself, to be placed among the illustrious artists in the Florentine Gallery, which was sent to Florence in 1702, and the painter was honoured in return with a gold medal and chain. He was commissioned by the Emperor of Germany to paint the portraits of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, which he executed so much to the satisfaction of that monarch, that he conferred on him the order of knighthood. One of his most capital performances is in the hall of the magistrates at the Hague, representing the Burgomasters and Echevins, in the year 1719. The pictures of de Moor are ingeniously composed, his figures are correctly designed, and his colouring is clear and transparent. In some of his larger portraits he seems to have aimed at a style, partaking of the chaste delicacy of Vandyck, with somewhat of the vigour of Rembrandt. Although his works are always very highly finished, his touch is firm and free, and they have nothing of the appearance of labour. He died at the Hague in 1738. He etched a few portraits, from his own designs, among which are those of Gerard Douw, John van Goyen, and Francis Mieris.

MOORE, JACOB, [or JAMES.] This painter was born at Edinburgh about the year 1740, and was brought up in a school of design established in that city, under the direction of Alexander Runciman. About the year 1770, he went to Italy, where he acquired considerable celebrity as a landscape painter. He appears to have formed his style by studying the works of Claude, and his pictures, like those of that celebrated master, generally represent views of the Campagna, and the environs of Rome. Moore was much employed by the British nobility and gentry who visited that capital, and the indiscretion of some of his admirers went so far as to compare his merit with that of Claude. A more rational estimate of his talents, will admit that his scenery is always picturesque, and his forms well chosen; but there is a mealy mawkishness in his aerial tints, and a poverty of tone throughout, which keeps him at a fearful distance from his admirable model. He died at Rome in 1795. [He is generally called Moore of Rome.]

MOORE, SAMUEL. According to Lord Orford, this gentleman held a situation in the Custom-house. He flourished about the year 1715, and appears to have dedicated much of his time to drawing and engraving. His prints are not executed with much delicacy, they are coarsely etched, and afterwards retouched with the graver. Among other plates, he engraved the Coronation Procession of King William III. and Queen Mary, which, as it is without the name of the designer, may be presumed to be from his own composition. Vertue informs us, that "he made a medley of things drawn, written, and painted, which he presented to Sir Robert Harley, Speaker of the House of Commons, afterwards Earl of Oxford;" it was an imitation of several sorts of prints.

MOORTELE, [or MORTELE,] JOHN, [or JAN.] This artist was born at Leyden in 1650. He was an eminent painter of fruit, flowers, and still-life. Although his flower-pieces are inferior to those of John van Huysum and Rachel Ruysch, there is a mellowness and relief in his pictures of fruit, which approach to illusion. His works are chiefly confined to Holland, where they are justly esteemed, and are found in the choicest collections. He died at Leyden in 1719. [He copied the works of De Heem and Mignon so skilfully as to deceive the amateurs of his time; and no doubt many of his copies pass now for the works of those masters.]

[MORACE, ERNEST, engraver, was born at Stuttgart in 1766, and was a pupil of J. G. Müller. He engraved several of the prints in the "Galerie de Florence," "Musée Français," and "Galerie de Orleans." He died in 1820.]

MORALES, called EL DIVINO. This admired Spanish painter was born at Badajoz, in Estremadura, in 1509, and was a scholar of Pedro Campaña. From his constantly making choice of devout subjects, and the beauty of his pencil, he acquired the appellation of El Divino Morales. His pictures generally represent the head of our Saviour crowned with thorns, or that of the Virgin in grief; and it is said there are few instances of his having drawn the figure at length. His heads are of a most admirable and touching character, and are finished with the greatest care, without weakening the force, or diminishing the expression. In this respect, his works bear some resemblance to the highly characteristic heads of Lionardo da Vinci. It must be allowed, however, that he was an artist of a contracted genius, and of a barren invention, never venturing beyond the simple delineation of a head, though it will be confessed that in this limited scope he has carried the art to the highest possible perfection. His Ecce Homo exhibits the height of human suffering, borne with more than human complacency; and his Mater Dolorosa is the very extremity of sorrow. Some of his pictures are preserved at Cordova and at Seville; and in the chapel of Our Lady of the Soledad, at the convent of the Trinitarians, at Madrid, is a Santa Veronica, by his hand. There is also a fine picture of an Ecce Homo in the convent of Corpus Christi, in that city. He died in 1586. [It is a mistake of Palomino to say that Luis de Morales was a scholar of Pedro Campaña; the latter did not arrive in Spain till 1548, and there are pictures in the church of the Conception at Badajoz by the former with the date 1546. There were many good painters in Spain before Campaña's visit, of whom Morales might have learned the elements of the art. Whatever may have been the cause of his being titled El Divino, he must not be judged of by the execrable pictures so often attributed to him. As his larger pictures are confined to the churches, and his smaller are rarely seen out of Spain, it may suffice to say that the latter are painted either on wood or copper, and seldom exceed the bust. For an account of his pictures in the churches, and other public buildings, see Cean Bermudez, tom. iii.]

[MORAN, SANTIAGO, a Spanish historical and landscape painter, was living and practising at Madrid about 1640. Bermudez mentions three pictures by him, which would show that he is deserving of more notice than he has received. One is a St. Jerome, in the possession of an amateur of the name of the Baron de Casa-Davalillo, who had a fine collection, in which he says the design, anatomical science, and brilliant colour in every part, are admirable, and the landscape part enchanting. Another, the head of St. Jerome, was in the possession of D. Nicholas Lameyra, which Le Brun mistook for the work of Albano. A third, St. Jerome on his knees and quite naked, has been engraved; but the engraver, not being acquainted with Moran's works, has put the name of Guercino to the print. Moran invented and designed the Muses which are in the beautiful work of Quevedo, edition 1670; and produced many fine landscapes.]

MORANDI, GIOVANNI MARIA. According to Lanzi, this painter was born at Florence in 1622. He was a disciple of Giovanni Billivert, and, on leaving that master, visited Venice, where he studied for some time the works of the great colourists of that school. He afterwards went to Rome, where he painted several altar-pieces for the churches, and was also employed for private collections. Of his works at Rome, the most deserving of notice are his Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, in the church of La Madonna del Popolo; and the Death of the Virgin, in La Pace. The latter is considered his masterpiece, and has been engraved by Pietro Aquila. He was also much employed as a portrait painter, and in that capacity was invited to Vienna by Leopold I., where he painted the family of the Emperor, and the portraits of many of the most distinguished personages of Germany. His design bears the character of the Roman school, and in his compositions and colouring he appears to have aimed at the splendid style of Pietro da Cortona. He lived to the advanced age of 95, and died at Rome in 1717.

MORANDINI, FRANCESCO, called IL POPPI. This painter was born at Poppi, a small town in the Florentine state, in 1544. He was a scholar of Giorgio Vasari, whose style he followed, though more minute in detail, and more addicted to the gay and festive in his compositions. Of his works in the churches at Florence, Vasari particularly notices his picture of the Conception, in S. Michelino; and his still more admired Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in S. Niccolo.

MORAZZONE, PIER FRANCESCO MAZZUCHELLI, called IL, was born at Morazzone, in the Milanese, in 1571, and, from the place of his nativity, is generally called li Morazzone. He resided at Rome in the early part of his life, where he painted for the church of S. Maria Maddalena al Corso, the Assumption of the Virgin, with the Apostles; and for S. Silvestro in Capite, the Adoration of the Magi. He afterwards went to Venice, where he studied the works of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese, by which he greatly improved his style of colouring; and on his return to Milan he painted the Adoration of the Kings, for the church of S. Antonio Abate, in a style so superior to the picture of the same subject which he had painted at Rome, that it appeared to be by a different hand. At Como, in the church of S. Giovanni, is one of his principal works, representing St. Michael discomfiting the rebel Angels. He was employed and patronized by the King of Sardinia, by whom he was knighted. In 1626 he was invited to Piacenza, to paint the great cupola of the cathedral, which he only lived to commence. It was afterwards finished by Guercino, and was one of his grandest works. He died in that year.

MORE, SIR ANTHONY. This eminent painter was born at Utrecht in 1519, and in the early part of his life was a scholar of John Schoreel. He afterwards went to Italy, where he passed some time in studying the works of Michael Angelo Buonaroti and Raffaello. On his return to Holland he devoted himself to an imitation of the style of Holbein, in which he was more successful than in attempting the grandeur of the models he had contemplated at Rome. Like Holbein, he was a precise follower of nature, but without reaching the delicacy and clearness of that master, though he designed and painted in a bold and masculine style, and possessed a tolerable acquaintance with the chiaro-scuro. He was recommended to the protection of the Emperor Charles V., by his countryman Cardinal Granville; and in 1552 arrived at the court of Spain, where he drew Prince Philip, and was sent into Portugal, to paint the portrait of King John III. and Catherine of Austria, his queen, sister to Charles, which were executed so much to the satisfaction of the Emperor, that he was afterwards sent to England to paint that of the Princess Mary, previous to her marriage with Philip of Spain. On this occasion he is said to have employed all the flattering aids of his art, and accompanied the King to England, where he continued till the death of Mary. He returned with Philip to Spain, who treated him with an intimacy and familiarity which had nearly proved fatal to him. Philip was accustomed to honour him frequently with a visit when he was painting, and in a moment of condescension and admiration, slapped him jocosely on the shoulder, which the painter indiscreetly returned, by smearing the hand of the monarch with carmine. The jest was rash and inconsiderate, and the King was not of a disposition to be played on with impunity. The attendant courtiers revolted from the sight with disgust and amazement; but Philip, recollecting himself, passed it over with a smile of complacency. The artist threw himself on his knees, in atonement of his offence, and every thing appeared to be forgotten; but he was secretly advised to withdraw himself from Spain, and he lost no time in returning to the Netherlands, where he was afterwards patronized by the Duke of Alva. The talents of Sir Anthony

More were not confined to portraits, he painted several historical subjects for the royal collection in Spain, most of which perished in the conflagration of the palace of the Pardo. He died at Antwerp in 1576. [Writers differ respecting the date of his birth; some place it in 1512, others in 1518 and 1519; Immerzeel says in 1525. Neither are they agreed in the date of his death; Füssli says he died at Brussels in 1575, others that he died at Antwerp in 1581, and in 1588. The latest date seen by the editor on any of his works, is 1575.]

MORE, JOHN GASPAR. This artist was a native of Zurich, and flourished about the year 1694. He was principally employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers, which are very indifferently executed.

MOREAU, EDMÉ. According to Florent le Comte, this artist was a native of Rheims, and flourished towards the end of the seventeenth century. He engraved several plates from his own compositions, and from the designs of St. Igny and other masters.

MOREAU, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1712. He was chiefly employed in engraving ornamental subjects and theses. We have also by him the following prints:

PORTRAITS.

Ludovicus de Ponte Societatis Jesu; L. Moreau, fec.

J. B. Bebel; after Watteaux.

SUBJECT.

Christ raising the Daughter of Jairus from the Dead; after La Fosse.

MOREAU, JOHN MICHAEL, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1741, and was probably of the same family as the preceding artist. He was an artist of considerable merit, and was received into the Academy at Paris in 1781. He engraved a great variety of vignettes and other book ornaments, in a neat style. His plates are chiefly etched and assisted with the graver. We have also the following prints by him:

The Bath of Bathsheba; after Rembrandt.

The Consecration of Louis XVI. at Rheims.

Four plates, forming a large print of the Fête given at Paris in 1782, for the Birth of the Dauphin.

The Tomb of J. J. Rousseau; J. M. Moreau, fec. 1778.

A set of twenty-five small plates for the first volume of the Chansons de la Borde.

[His designs amount to upwards of 2000; there are about 200 which form vignettes to the works of Voltaire and Rousseau; and an infinite number to illustrate Ovid, Moliere, Lafontaine, Regnard, Marmontel, Delille, Barthelemy, Laborde, and other favourite writers. He died in 1814.]

MOREAU, P., a French architect, who flourished from 1750 to 1760. He designed with great taste, and etched some plates of architectural subjects from his own compositions.

MOREELZE, PAUL. This artist was born at Utrecht in 1571, and is distinguished by Van Mander as a painter, an architect, and an engraver. At first he practised portrait painting, under Michael Mirevelt, but he afterwards went to Rome, where he studied some time. On his return to Holland he painted some historical subjects and architectural views, which were not without merit, though he was more employed in portraiture, in which he was little inferior to Mirevelt. As an engraver, we have a few excellent wooden cuts by him, executed in chiaro-scuro; they are designed in a masterly style, and in the union of the three tints, produce a very pleasing effect. They are now become scarce. He sometimes signed them with his name at length, the P. of the baptismal name being joined to the M. thus, M. and sometimes with the cipher only.

Among others, we have the following by him:

Cupid led by two Females, dancing; P. Moreelze. 1612.

The Death of Lucretia; the same mark and date.

[It is supposed that he died about 1638.]

[MOREL, ANTOINE ALEXANDER, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1764, was a scholar of Massard and Ingouf. He engraved several of the plates for the "Musée Français," and for the "Galerie de Florence," and many detached pieces after David, Ingres, Giraud, and other contemporary painters. His death is not recorded by Gabet; he was living in 1827. Nagler has given an account of about thirty of his principal pieces.]

MOREL, FRANCIS, a modern French engraver, by whom we have some landscapes, after P. Hackert.

[MOREL, JAN EVERT, a painter of fruit and flowers, was born at Amsterdam in 1777, and was a scholar of Linthorst; he had previously studied under Troost van Groenendoele, and at the Hague with F. Vander Aa. On his return to his native city he made the works of Jan van Huysum his objects of study, and by perseverance he became one of the best painters of fruit and flowers of his time. His touch is light and his colouring delicate, nearly approaching that of the master he so much admired. There is a vase of flowers by him in the Museum at Amsterdam. He died in 1808.]

MORELL, N. [NICOLAS,] was born at Antwerp in 1664, and was a scholar of N. Verendael, an eminent painter of flowers and fruit. He painted similar subjects to those of his instructor, and also excelled in painting vases with bas-reliefs, and other objects of still-life, in which he acquired a celebrity which occasioned him to be invited to the court of Brussels, where he was engaged in ornamenting the palaces, and in painting for the collections of the principal nobility. The pictures of Morell are elegantly composed; his pencil, though precious, is facile and spirited; and there is a freshness in his colouring particularly adapted to the subjects he represented. His works were highly esteemed in his lifetime, and though his prices were considerable, he met with constant employment, which enabled him to maintain a magnificent establishment, and to live in terms of intimacy with persons of the first rank, by whom he was greatly respected. He died at Brussels at a very advanced age. [Not so very advanced, if Balkema be correct; he says that N. Morell died in 1732.]

MORELLI, BARTOLOMEO, called IL PIANORO. This painter was born at Pianoro, a small town in the Bolognese state, about the year 1629, and studied at Bologna under Francesco Albano. He painted history with great reputation, particularly in fresco, and some of his works are compared by Crespi to those of Albano. Among his numerous pictures at Bologna the most remarkable are, his S. Teresa, in the church of La Madonna delle Grazie; and the Resurrection, in Buon Gesù. But his most admired performance is the chapel of the Casa Pepoli, in S. Bartolomeo di Porta, in which the elegance of the design, and the beauty of the colouring, is little inferior to his instructor. He died in 1683.

[MORGENSTEERN, JOHANN LUDWIG ERNST, an excellent painter of perspective views of the interiors of churches, was born at Rudelstadt in 1738, and died at Frankfort in 1819. His subjects are similar to those of Peter Neefs, but have no appearance of imitation. They are painted with a full, rich pencil, a spirited touch, and a true knowledge of light and shade. They are also ornamented with elegant figures very skillfully introduced. Some few were brought to England about thirty years ago, and were much prized; since that time they have become rare, and are considerably increased in commercial value.]

MORGHEN, JOHN ELIAS, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1757. He resided chiefly in Italy, and was employed by the Marquis Gerini to engrave part of the plates after the works of the Florentine artists, in the Ducal Gallery. In 1767 he published six plates of the Antiquities of Pestum, after the designs of Antonio Joli.

MORGHEN, PHILIP, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Naples about the year 1730, and was instructed in engraving by his father, in conjunction with whom he executed part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples in 1757. We have also by him:

A set of the Twelve Apostles; after the Statues by Baccio Bandinelli, at Florence.

Thirty-one Views and Ruins in the environs of Naples.

[It is probable that he was brother to the preceding engraver, and certain that he was father to the celebrated Raphael Morghen.]

MORGHEN, RAPHAEL. This celebrated artist is presumed, by M. Huber, to be the son or the nephew of Philip Morghen. He was born at Naples about the year 1755. After receiving some instruction in his native city, he was sent to Rome, where he became a pupil of Giovanni Volpato. Under that able artist he became one of the most accomplished burinists of the day, and has engraved several plates after the most distinguished works of art in Italy. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Francesco Monaco, Duke of Ossono, on horseback; after Vanduyck.

The Family of Earl Spencer; after Angelica Kauffman.

The Family of Holstien Beck; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Miracle of the Mass of Bolsena; after Raffaele.

The Transfiguration; after the same.

The celebrated Madonna della Seggiola; after the same.

La Madonna del Sacco; after A. del Sarto.

The Virgin and Infant with a Book; after Fra. Bartolomeo.

St. John crying in the Wilderness; after Guido.

The Aurora; after the celebrated painting by Guido, in the Rospigliosi palace.

The Seasons dancing before Time; after N. Poussin.

The Holy Family reposing; after the same.

Diana and her Nymphs; after Domenichino.

Apollo and the Muses on Mount Parnassus; after Mengs.

[Raphael Morghen, one of the most celebrated engravers of recent times, was born at Florence, June 19, 1758, by his own account, according to the authority of Nicolo Palmerini, his pupil, who published a complete Catalogue of his works. Joubert and others say that he was born at Naples in 1760; and Melchior Missirini says the 14th of June, 1761. As Palmerini was in the confidence of the artist, and published his account of him during his life, the first date may be considered the correct one. By his father, Filippo, who was an engraver, he was very early instructed in the first principles of his art, and he could engrave a tolerable plate even in his twelfth year. His first engravings, however, of consequence, were seven plates from the Masks of the Carnival of 1778, the Pilgrimage of the Grand Signior to Mecca; a work of such extraordinary merit for a youth of twenty, that his father was desirous he should receive the best instruction that could be procured, and sent him accordingly to the celebrated Volpato at Rome. His first employment was copying a print of E. Sadler, Christ and Mary Magdalene in the Garden, and shortly after Gavin Hamilton's allegoric figure of Painting, for the brothers Hackert. In 1781 he engraved Raphael's figures of Poetry and Theology, in the Vatican; and in the same year married Volpato's only daughter, Dominica. He now worked in conjunction with his father-in-law, and assisted him in his plate of the Parnassus of Raphael, or the historical illustration of Poetry, in the Vatican. In 1787 he engraved the Aurora of Guido, in the Rospigliosi Palace, which, for some time, was considered his finest work. Many other important works rapidly followed, among which, the Last Supper, after Leonardo da Vinci; the Transfiguration, and the Madonna della Seggiola, after Raphael, the Duke de Moncada, after Van Dyck, the Portraits of Raphael, the Fornarini, Lionardo da Vinci, the Five great Poets of Italy—Dante, Boccaccio, Petrarch, Ariosto, and Tasso, are brilliant specimens. Many others might be named, but the whole of his works have been fully described by his scholar, Palmerini, to whom it was his custom to give an impression, in every state of the plate, from the first outline to the finished proof. Nagler has copied Palmerini's Catalogue in his Kunstler Lexicon, and added some discriminating particulars; and the collection was purchased by the late Duke of Buckingham for £1200: it may be considered the most complete and valuable in Europe. Raphael Morghen died at Florence, April the 8th, 1833. Dr. Giulio Ferrario has written largely and critically on Raphael Morghen's principal productions, and has given an account of the increased prices that several obtained after publication for their particular beauty, or for some distinguishing peculiarity that gave them value with virtuosos and collectors.]

MORIER, DAVID. This artist was born at Berne, in Switzerland, about the year 1705. He came to England soon after the battle of Dettingen, and was presented to the Duke of Cumberland, by Sir Edward Faulkener, who settled on him a pension of two hundred pounds a year. He distinguished himself as a painter of battles, managed horses, &c., and also painted portraits, in which he was extensively employed. He died in 1770, and was buried in St. James's, Clerkenwell.

MORIN, JOHN, an eminent French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1612. He was a disciple of Philip de Champagne, and for some time practised painting, which he afterwards abandoned, to apply himself entirely to engraving. His plates are executed in a singular style, being a mixture of strokes and dots; and they are harmonized with each other, so as to produce a very pleasing effect. They are chiefly executed with the point. His best prints are his portraits, many of which are executed in a masterly manner; and though they are not finished with all the neatness and delicacy which the graver is capable of producing, they are etched with uncommon taste, and great freedom of hand. The extraordinary merit of his portraits will render an ample list of them acceptable to the collector. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS AFTER PHILIP DE CHAMPAGNE.

Louis XIII. King of France; octagon.
 Anne of Austria, Regent; octagon.
 Armand, Cardinal de Richelieu.
 John Baptist Amador, Abbé de Richelieu.
 Julius, Cardinal de Mazarin.
 Cornelius Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres.
 John Paul de Gondy, Cardinal de Retz.
 Francis de Sales, Bishop of Geneva.
 S. Charles Borromeus, Cardinal, and Archbishop of Milan.
 John Peter le Camus, Bishop of Bellay.
 John du Verger, Abbé de St. Siran.
 Michael de Morillac, Keeper of the Seals.
 Michael le Tellier, Secretary of State.
 James Tubœuf, President of the Chamber of Accounts.
 René de Longueuil, President à Mortier.
 Henry de Lorraine, Count d'Harcourt.
 Nicholas de Neufville, Marquis de Villeroy.
 Charles de Valois, Duke d'Angoulême.
 Robert Arnauld, Seigneur d'Andilly.
 Vincent Voiture, of the French Academy.
 James le Mercier, Architect to the King.
 Anthony Vitré, celebrated Printer of Paris.

 Another Landscape, with figures; after the same.
 A set of four Landscapes, with Ruins and Figures; after Cornelius Poolemburg.
 A Landscape, with Ruins and a Fountain; after J. B. Corneille.

[According to the best authorities, he died in 1666. Nagler has given a copious descriptive list of his works; and also Dumesnil, P. G. F. tom. ii.]

MORINA, GIULIO. According to Malvasia, this painter was a native of Bologna, and was first a scholar of Lorenzo Sabatini; but he owed his best improvement to an attentive study of the works of the Caracci. He painted history with considerable reputation, and appears from the airs of his heads to have been emulous of imitating the expression of Coreggio. There are many of his works in the churches at Bologna, of which the most worthy of notice are, the Crucifixion, in SS. Sebastiano e Rocco; the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, in S. Uomobono; and the Presentation in the Temple, at the Servi.

[MORIS, R——, a scholar of Godfrey Schalken. There is a cabinet picture by him, representing an old Man holding a small Owl in his hand. He died young.]

MORLAND, GEORGE. This ingenious artist was the eldest son of Henry Morland, a reputable painter in crayons, born in 1764. The young Morland discovered very early symptoms of decided genius; and it was highly gratifying to his father to perceive so marked an inclination for a pursuit, to which he had destined him from his birth. He had no other instructor than his father, to whom he was articled when he was fourteen, and during his pupilship his application was assiduous and exemplary. He was not permitted by his father to prosecute his studies regularly at the Academy; and it is asserted by his biographer, that he drew there only three nights, though he occasionally attended the lectures. On the expiration of his indenture he left his father's house, and the remainder of his life is the history of genius degraded by intemperance and immorality, which alternately excites our admiration of his uncommon ability, and our regret at the profligacy of his conduct.

In estimating the faculties of Morland, it is observable, that notwithstanding the shortness of his life, the periods of preparation, maturity, and declension, are more decisively marked than in those of most other men, and do not comprehend a space of more than six years, during which he produced the pictures that have established his reputation. In these he has described the manners and habits of the lower class of people in this country, in a style peculiarly his own. Of his powers as a painter, we cannot give a more satisfactory account, than by inserting an abstract from his Life, published by Mr. Dawe, where a particular and interesting account of him will be found, written with intelligence and impartiality. Most painters who have arrived at eminence, have marked their outset by finishing highly; this was the case with Morland, who surmounted those difficulties of execution in his youth, which too many are obliged to encounter after they have acquired a taste for higher excellencies in their profession. His productions when a boy were hard, formal, and laboured; even after he had rejected the style in which his father had instructed him, his pictures were carefully finished, and every object was painted immediately from nature, with considerable attention to detail. He, however, imperceptibly neglected the parts, and adopted a broader style; and finding that it pleased others, it pleased himself.

About the year 1790, he appears to have arrived at his meridian: he was then able to paint whatever he chose, and to bestow on his pictures as much time as he thought proper. He had acquired confidence in his powers, and a knowledge of nature, which he had not yet ceased to consult. At this period, we find truth in his representations, without the particularity of individual imitation; and freedom, without the looseness and manner of his latter productions. He had learned, in some degree, to generalize his ideas of form and character; his faculties were mature, and invigorated by success and applause. But even at this period his pictures seldom possessed sufficient interest when of a large size; and he never chose an action that was important enough to give energy and employment to any considerable number of figures. His subjects were, however, well adapted to his talents: of powerful exertion, or refined expression, he was in a great degree incapable, for his knowledge of anatomy was slight, and the habits of his life must have destroyed all nice discrimination of passion or sentiment, whatever he might have once possessed. In his landscapes, the scene is seldom intrinsically fine, or rendered so by accidents of nature, as in the works of Rubens and Rembrandt. Indeed he was ignorant of the principles of extensive landscape; nor was his colouring or effect appropriate to subjects of that description. His studies were confined to the animals, the figures, and the more obvious parts of his pictures; and he neither had a sufficiently extensive knowledge of nature, nor bestowed time enough on his paintings to avail himself of that which he possessed. His scenes are such as he was most accustomed to, and seldom having visited mountainous countries, except Derbyshire, he did not attempt romantic subjects. He generally exhibits with truth the most common but interesting species of English scenery, consisting of fields and hedges, with ponds of water and clay banks. His storms, though not grand, are sometimes replete with familiar incidents, local circumstances, and partial effects, that denote observation. In short, he was little capable of landscape, except as a background and accompaniment to his figures; but there it often possessed considerable merit.

Morland's best productions are his interiors. Indeed, the more confined the subject, the greater was his success, and his faults increase as the scene extends. He was peculiarly happy in the description of the stunted dwarf pollard oak, with a group of sheep under it. In the general conception of such subjects he has scarcely been excelled. He succeeded best in those animals that required least correctness of drawing, such as pigs, guineapigs, sheep, asses, &c. In these he is often extremely happy; for no artist ever painted such subjects with greater feeling: he avoided the delicate proportions of the horse, by selecting such as were old, rough, and clumsy. A white horse was a favourite object with him, as it must be with every painter, from its affording a mass of light, with a most desirable opportunity for the display of colouring, owing to the variety of yellow, and other tints, with which it is diversified. Indeed, an old white horse, of this description, is one of the most picturesque objects to be met with in rustic scenery. But the pig was his favourite animal, and that which he introduced most frequently, and with great success. His touch was well adapted to the representation of its bristly hide, and he seldom fails faithfully to depict the gluttonous and lazy character of the animal. The innocence of the sheep he has also pourtrayed with considerable success.

It may be interesting to compare Morland with a painter of his own country. The rural pieces of Gainsborough are more highly esteemed than those of Morland; and in sentiment, composition, and effect, greatly surpass his best performances. In genius, Morland might perhaps be equal to Gainsborough; but the latter best cultivated his talents. In colouring, each artist had his respective excellencies and defects. Gainsborough is rich, but by endeavouring at transparency, often becomes flimsy. Morland is natural, but ochrey. The one had too little solidity, the other carried it to excess; but in effect of light and shadow, Gainsborough had greatly the advantage, for he preserved fine keeping, which, when Morland attempted, he produced only mist and fog, representing his extreme distance no farther off than his middle ground, and there is no depth in his pictures. In each artist too great a sameness of colouring and chiaro-scuro is observable, and both are incorrect in drawing, and loose in execution. Gainsborough in all his works displayed refined feeling and an elegant mind, and he has given to the eye the most interesting representations of rustic innocence; while the taste of Morland was of a lower kind, though he delineated the characters he selected with equal success. Those who have visited the cottage of the peasant, who have enjoyed rural sports, or engaged in rustic occupations, will feel a peculiar charm in the works of Morland, arising from associations which the truth of his pencil never fails to excite. But Gainsborough seems most calculated to delight those whose ideas of such employments have been refined by the descriptions of pastoral poetry. Towards the latter part of his life his defects rapidly increased: he then worked merely to supply the exigencies of the moment, and grew more confident and careless. His paintings declining from their original peculiar excellence, fell to vapid imitations of his former works, poor, meagre, and monotonous, deprived of force and character, with all the defects of manner and negligence. These feeble glimmerings of expiring genius show, according to their dates, a regular decay. His earlier works evince an intuition into the feelings of nature, and display combinations that few could produce. Upon the whole, Morland's paintings indicate a mind which, with due cultivation, was capable of very high attainments, and excite our admiration, that so much could be effected during a life spent like his. He died the 29th of October, 1804. [It is said that George Morland painted upwards of 4000 pictures; no doubt there are as many bearing his name or initials. But it should be known that he permitted his cronies, Hands, Taylor, and dirty Brooks, to use that privilege when it suited his or their purpose. The dealers of the day also found it to be a good speculation to pay him handsomely for one genuine picture, which they increased seven-fold. His brother Henry has frequently boasted that he kept a regular manufactory of them; and he would gravely assure the purchasers that he knew them to be genuine, as he saw them painted. Indeed the public may be assured that no modern artist's pictures have been so surreptitiously multiplied as those of George Morland. Fine pictures by him are still in request, and obtain larger prices than during his lifetime.]

[MORLAND, HENRY ROBERT, the father of the celebrated George Morland, was an excellent portrait painter in oil and crayons, and also an engraver in mezzotinto. He did not confine himself to portraiture, but produced several interesting domestic subjects; and was particularly successful in representing scenes by candlelight. His portraits are carefully finished, and in the management of the chiaro-scuro he is superior to most of his contemporaries. He died in 1797, at upwards of 70.]

MORO, IL. See TORBIDO.

MORO, GIOVANNI BATISTA D'ANGELI. This painter was born at Verona about the year 1512. He was a scholar of Francesco Torbido, called Il Moro, but improved his style by studying the works of Titian. He painted several pictures, both in oil and fresco, for the churches at Verona, and sometimes in competition with Paolo Veronese. In S. Eufemia he had painted a fresco of Paul before Ananias, which, on the demolition of the wall on which it was painted, was sawed out with great precaution and expense, and removed to another part of the church. His colouring is more vigorous than that of his instructor, and his design more graceful. Such is his picture in S. Stefano of an Angel presenting the Palms of Martyrdom to the Innocents. We have several slight but spirited etchings by this master, in which the extremities of the figures are drawn in a very masterly style. In conjunction with Batista Vicentino, he engraved a set of fifty landscapes, mostly after Titian, which are executed in a bold, free style. We have also the following by him:

- The Nativity, or Adoration of the Shepherds; after Parmigiano.
- The Virgin, with the infant Christ and St. John; B. A. del Moro, fec.
- The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after Raffaele.
- Another Holy Family; after the same.
- The Martyrdom of St. Catherine; after Bernardino Campi.
- The Baptism of Christ by St. John; after the same.

MORO, MARCO and GIULIO D'ANGELI, the son and brother of the preceding artist. By the latter is the Quattro Coronati, in the church of S. Apollinari at Venice; and by the latter a picture of Paradise, in S. Bartolomeo. Marco died young.

MORONI, DOMENICO, was born at Verona in 1430, and was instructed in the art by some of the disciples of Stefano Veronese. In the church of S. Bernardino at Verona is an altar-piece by this master, which was highly esteemed, and preserved with great care.

MORONI, FRANCESCO, was the son and disciple of the preceding artist, born at Verona in 1474, and is said by Vasari to have greatly excelled his father in the graceful style of his design, and in the tenderness and suavity of his colouring. The latter part of his life was passed at Rome, where he was employed in painting several altar-pieces for the churches and convents, which hold a respectable rank even in that emporium of art. He died at Rome in 1529. [There are several interesting pictures with Moroni's name inscribed on them in the Museum at Berlin; the subjects are Madonnas and saints. They are simple and well painted, and have a character of mild seriousness.]

MORONI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Albini, in the Bergamese state, and flourished from the year 1557 till 1578. He was a scholar of Alessandro Bonvicino, called Il Moretto, and, according to Tassi, was one of the most assiduous of his disciples, and the most successful follower of his style. That author gives a detailed account of his numerous works in the churches of Bergamo and the vicinity. His pictures are, however, inferior to those of his instructor in invention and design, and particularly in the graceful expression which distinguishes the productions of Il Moretto. He was, however, an excellent colourist. Among his most esteemed works are his picture of the Crowning of the Virgin, in the church of La Trinità; the Assumption, with the Apostles, in S. Benedetto; and at the Cappuccini, the dead Christ in the arms of the Virgin, with several saints. He was one of the best portrait painters, except Titian. [The picture of a Jesuit, in the Duke of Sutherland's collection, called Titian's Schoolmaster, will give a good idea of the talent of Moroni as a portrait painter.]

MORONI, PIETRO, was the son of the preceding artist, and, according to Averoldi, was first instructed by his father, but afterwards became a disciple of Paolo Veronese, and also studied after the works of Titian. He was esteemed one of the most correct designers of the Venetian school, and yielded to none of his contemporaries in the impasto and lucidity of his colouring. Such is his picture of Christ bearing his Cross, in the church of S. Barnaba; and in his several works in the public edifices at Brescia. He died at Riva di Soldo about the year 1625.

MOROSINI, FRANCESCO, called IL MONTE PULCIANO. According to Baldinucci, this painter was a Florentine, and a scholar of Orazio Fidano, in whose style he painted a picture of the Conversion of St. Paul, for the church of S. Stefano at Florence.

MORTIMER, JOHN HAMILTON. This ingenious artist was born at Eastborne, in Sussex, in 1739. His father was collector of the customs of that port, and his uncle is said to have been a painter of talents above mediocrity. As he was frequently admitted into the painting-room of his relation, he conceived an early inclination for the art, and with the assistance of his uncle, arrived at a proficiency in drawing sufficient to enable him to sketch whatever objects appeared to him to be interesting. It is not improbable that he originally imbibed his taste for the terrific from the romantic scenery which was the haunt of his youth, and the savage hardihood which marked the countenances of the bands of ferocious smugglers by which the place was infested. He was sent to London, and placed as a pupil under Hudson, from whose instruction a mind of his cast could derive no advantage. He was indebted for his greatest improvement to his constant attendance in the Duke of Richmond's gallery, to design after the select objects of art in the possession of that nobleman, which were liberally opened for the study and advancement of the young artists of the time. He was encouraged and assisted in his studies by the benevolent Cipriani, who recommended him to the particular patronage of the Duke, who was desirous of detaining him in his house, but the offer was rejected. He soon afterwards gained the premium of one hundred guineas given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, for the best historical picture, which was adjudged to his painting of St. Paul converting the Britons, which some time afterwards became the property of Dr. Bates, who presented it, in 1778, to the church of Chipping Wycombe in Buckinghamshire. The reputation of Mortimer was now established, and he successively increased his celebrity, by the production of his pictures of King John granting Magna Charta to the Barons, the Battle of Agincourt, Vortigern and Rowena, and his other admired works. He was for some years a member of the society of artists, who exhibited at the room now called the Lyceum, in the Strand; but in the year 1779, without solicitation or expectation, was created a royal academician, by the especial grant of his Majesty; but he did not live to receive his diploma. After an illness of a few days, he died at his house in Norfolk Street, the 4th of February, 1779. We have several etchings by Mortimer, mostly from his own designs, which are executed in a bold, free style. Among others are the following:

The Virgin teaching St. John to read; after Guercino.

A set of twelve circular plates of characters from Shakspeare.

Nature and Genius introducing Garrick into the Temple of Shakspeare.

A set of fifteen Studies; after S. Rosa, Laïresse, and others.

MORTO DA FELTRO. This artist was born at Florence in 1468, and was instructed in the first rudiments of design in his native city; but he went early in his life to Rome, where he devoted himself to the study of what are called grotesche, in which he arrived at a great perfection. In 1505 he resided at Venice, where he was employed by Giorgione to paint the grotesque ornaments in some of the important works he was engaged in. From an unsettled and capricious disposition, he abandoned painting when he was about forty years of age, and entered the army. He was killed in battle at Zara, in the year 1513, in his forty-fifth year.

[MOSCA, (GIAMMARIA?) As there are accounts of Giammaria Mosca, who is called of Padua and of Milan, and spoken of for some works of sculpture at Orvieto; and of a Mosca of Mantua, a painter, who flourished at the same period, namely, the early part of the sixteenth century, it is probable that they relate to one and the same artist. Lanzi says mention is made of one Mosca, whether a native or foreigner I know not, as a disciple of this school (the Roman). Christ on his way to Mount Calvary, now in the Academy of Mantua, is certainly a Raffaellesque picture, but we may rather consider Mosca an imitator and copyist than a pupil of Raphael. In the curious collection of ancient pictures in the possession of Messrs. Woodburn, is one of the Virgin and Child in a landscape, which is supposed to be by this master, as it is marked with a fig. his rebus. Attention is drawn to this circumstance in the hope that it may throw some light on the history of this artist and his works; the first being involved in uncertainty, and the latter comparatively unknown from ignorance of his distinguishing mark.]

MOSER, GEORGE MICHAEL, was a native of Switzerland, but came to England very young, to follow the profession of a chaser in gold, in which art he arrived at great eminence. But his talents were not confined to that branch; he likewise painted in enamel with considerable success. He was well skilled in the construction of the human figure, which perfectly qualified him for the office he held of Keeper of the Royal Academy, to which he was appointed at its foundation in 1768, the business of which situation principally consists in superintending and instructing the students, who draw and model from the antique figures. Mr. Moser continued to fill that place with the greatest respectability till his death, which happened January 23, 1783. [His daughter, Miss Moser, was a painter of flowers, and was also a member of the Royal Academy. She died in 1803.]

MOSES, called LITTLE MOSES. See UYTEN-BROECK.

MOSIN. See MOUZVN.

MOSLEY, CHARLES, an English engraver, who resided in London about the year 1760, and was chiefly employed by the booksellers. His best prints are his portraits, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

Charles I. on horseback; from the picture by Vandyck at Kensington.

Marshal Belleisle on horseback.

MOSNIER, JOHN. According to Felibien, this artist was born at Blois in 1600. He was the son of a painter on glass, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of design. He afterwards travelled to Italy, and resided some time at Florence, where he studied under Cristofano Allori. On his return to France he distinguished himself as a reputable painter of history. Some of his most esteemed works are in the church of St. Martin, at Paris, where he died, in 1656.

MOSTAERT, JOHN. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1499. He was a disciple of Jacob van Haerlem, an artist of some reputation, under whom he became a very eminent painter of history and portraits. Van Mander describes several of his works, which remained, in his time, in the churches and public edifices in Holland. He particularly commends a picture by him of the Nativity, in the church of the Jacobins at Haerlem, and an Ecce Homo, in another church in that city, a grand composition of several figures. But one of his most esteemed productions was a Feast of the Gods, in the possession of the Count de Borsele. At the Hague were two celebrated pictures by him, of Abraham and Sarah, and Hagar and Ishmael. His talents recommended him to the patronage of Margaret, sister to Philip I. of Spain, in whose service he remained till his death. He was not less successful in portraits than in historical subjects, and painted that of his patroness, and the principal personages of his time. He died in 1555. [Immerzeel and Balkema both state that Jan Mostaert was born in 1474; in which they differ from all others, who place his birth as in the text.]

[MOSTAERT, FRANZ and GILLIS, twin brothers, born at Hulst, near Antwerp, in 1520. Gillis was a scholar of Van Mandyn, and Franz of Joachim Patenier and Henri de Bles. Franz excelled in landscape, and Gillis in figures, so they mutually assisted each other. Franz died in 1557, and Gillis in 1593, or according to some in 1601. In the Museum at Antwerp is a picture by the latter, representing Christ on the Cross, between the Virgin and St. John, and eight other figures.]

MOUCHERON, FREDERICK. This painter was born at Embden in 1633. At an early age he showed a strong inclination for the art, which, not meeting with any obstacle on the part of his parents, and as his genius seemed to lead him to landscape painting, he was placed as a pupil with John Asselyn. Under that able master he was indefatigable in his studies, and his advancement was commensurate with his assiduity. When he was little more than twenty years of age, he found himself able to undertake a journey to France, on the produce of his talents, where he passed some years, and met with the most flattering encouragement. It was his intention to have visited Italy, by the advice of his instructor, who had studied at Rome; but his works were so much admired at Paris, that he abandoned his project. After a residence of several years in that capital he returned to Antwerp, and afterwards settled at Amsterdam, where his pictures were held in equal estimation. He had now the advantage of having his pictures embellished with figures by Adrian Vandevelde and John Lingelback; and his best productions are those which he painted in the latter part of his life. The landscapes of Moucheron exhibit very pleasing scenery; the forms of his trees are generally well chosen, and his foliage is light, and apparently in motion. He frequently introduced a waterfall rushing through the different plans of his pictures, and enriched them with picturesque buildings and architecture. Though the works of Moucheron are unequal to those of Both, Berghem, and other distinguished artists of the Dutch school, they are considered worthy of a place in the choicest collections in Holland. He died in 1686.

MOUCHERON, ISAAC, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1670. When he was only sixteen years of age he had the misfortune of losing his father, but he was already sufficiently advanced to be able to dispense with any other assistance than that of studying after nature. In 1694 he visited Rome, and the enchanting environs of that city became the object of his admiration and study, particularly the vicinity of Tivoli, of which he made a number of designs; and after a residence of four years in Italy returned to Holland, with a rich assemblage of drawings, from the most remarkable views near Rome. He was well versed in perspective and architecture, with which he embellished his works. On his return to Amsterdam he was chiefly employed in painting large landscapes for the ornaments of saloons, in which the figures were generally introduced by Nicholas Verkolie, and others. In the scenery, as well as the style of his landscapes, he appears to have emulated the grand manner of Gaspar Poussin. He possessed a prompt and commanding facility, his forms are always select, and his colouring is fresh and clear.

Isaac Moucheron etched several plates, in a neat, spirited style, among which is a set of nineteen views of Heemstede, in the province of Utrecht, from his own designs. We have also the following by him:

A set of four Views of Gardens, with Buildings and figures, inscribed J. Moucheron, inv. pinx. et fec.

Another set of four Views of Gardens and Buildings, inscribed J. Moucheron, inv. et fec.

Four Landscapes, with Figures; after Gaspar Poussin; inscribed Einige Landschapen, geschildert door G. Poussin, &c.

He died at Amsterdam in 1744.

MOUCHY, MARTIN DE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1746. He was a pupil of Augustine de St. Aubine, and engraved several plates for the booksellers; among which are sixteen prints for the History of Telemachus, after the designs of Monnet and Cochin. We have also the following by him :

A pair of Views in the environs of Triel; after Haekert.

A View of Marienberg, near Stockholm; after the same.

Another View in Sweden; after the same.

MOUZYN, or MOSIN, MICHAEL, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1630. He endeavoured to unite the point with the graver in the execution of his plates, but with no great success. His style is laboured and heavy, and his drawing incorrect. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Jacob van Wassenaer, Admiral of Holland.

Michael Ruyter, Dutch Admiral; after H. van Alde.

Cornelius de Witte, Pensionary of Holland; after the same.

John van Galen, Admiral of Holland; after J. Livius.

SUBJECTS.

Venus sleeping; after J. A. Baeker.

The Four Elements under the empire of Venus; after C. Holsteyn.

A Satyr presenting a Bunch of Grapes to a Woman and Child; after the same.

MOYA, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Granada in 1610. He was for some time a disciple of Juan del Castello. A desire to see the works of Rubens, and other distinguished painters of the Flemish school, induced him to visit Antwerp, where he was particularly captivated with the works of Vandyck, who was at that time in England. He resolved on visiting London, for the purpose of becoming his pupil, where he had not arrived many months, when his intentions were frustrated by the death of Vandyck. He returned to Granada, where he painted several pictures for the churches, of which the most esteemed is an altar-piece of the Conception, in the church of Nuestra Sennora de Gracia. He died at Granada in 1666.

[MOYAERT, or MOOJAERT, NICOLAS, or CLAAS, a Dutch painter of history, landscapes, and animals, was born about the year 1600; he was in high repute in 1624, and flourished till 1652. He was one of the best imitators of Adam Elsheimer, Rembrandt, and Lievens, several of his pictures being mistaken for their works. Among his scholars may be named N. Berchem, Vander Does, Salomon De Koning, and Jan Baptist Weenix; the pictures of the last bear a strong resemblance, in many respects, to those of his master. It is not stated when or where he died.]

MOYART, CHRISTIAN LOUIS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1600. He engraved a set of emblematical plates of the History of Mary of Medicis, consisting of eight subjects from his own designs. They are marked with the cipher C. M. [Zani and Brulliot both assert that this is the same as Nicolas Moyaert, and that the cipher C. signifies Claas (Nicolas) and not Christian Louis. It is certain that the prints of the History of Marie de Medicis were published by Blaeu at Amsterdam, from designs by Claas, engraved by Pieter Nolpe, in the year 1639.]

MOYREAU, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1712. His principal works are his plates after Philip Wouwermans, consisting of eighty-nine prints, which are very unequal in point of merit. It is indeed to be regretted, that so few of the pictures of this admirable painter have been engraved by the Visschers, the Danckerts, and the other able artists of his country; and that it should have fallen to the lot of the most exquisite of his works, to be handed down to us by the tame and heavy graver of Moyreau, so incapable of exhibiting the spirit and elegance of his pencil, and the correctness of his design. He engraved various prints after other masters, among which are the following :

Rebecca receiving the Presents from the Servant of Abraham; after Paolo Veronese; for the Crozat collection.

The Resurrection of Lazarus; after Bon Boulongne.

The Parting of Hector and Andromecha; after the same.

Bacchus and Ariadne; after the same.

A Halt of Hunters; after Van Falens.

The Rendezvous of the Chase; after the same.

The two last plates were engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1736, and are among his best prints.

A Sea-port; after Claude.

La Partie Quarrée; after Watteau.

A Waterfall; after the same.

Of his best prints after Wouwermans, may be mentioned those entitled,

Le Colombier du Maréchal.

La grande Chasse a l'oiseau.

La Fontaine du Dauphin.

La Fontaine de Neptune.

MUDO, JUAN FERNANDEZ ZIMENES DE NAVARRETTE, called EL. This eminent Spanish artist was born at Logrono in 1526, and was called El Mudo, from his being deaf and dumb from his infancy. The defects of nature were in some degree compensated to him by the endowment of a quick and lively imagination, which enabled him to arrive at a celebrity in the art, which acquired him the honourable appellation of the Titian of Spain. He received his first instruction in design from Fray Vicente de Santo Domingo, a monk of the order of the Geronomytes; and such were the marks of early genius he displayed, and his progress under that master, that his instructor recommended his parents to send him to Italy for improvement, and he accordingly visited Rome, Florence, and Naples, but passed the greater part of his time at Venice, where he formed his style, by an attentive study of the works of Titian. On his return to Spain, his talents recommended him to the favour of Philip II., who appointed him one of his painters in the Escorial, where there are many of his principal works. Of these the most remarkable are his celebrated picture of the Nativity, in which, like the Notte of Coreggio, the principal light emanates from the infant Saviour; the Baptism of Christ; the Twelve Apostles, on the great pillars of the church, near the principal altar; and his last work, representing Abraham entertaining the Angels. There are also several of his works at Valencia and Salamanca. He died in 1579. [The name of this painter was JUAN FERNANDEZ NAVARRETE. He was not born deaf and dumb, but an acute malady at the age of three years deprived him of the sense of hearing, and consequently of the power of learning to speak.

Having received instructions in the elementary parts of painting, as above related, he was sent to Italy, and became a pupil of Titian, with whom he remained for a considerable time. His sojourn in Italy lasted for at least twenty years, and he availed himself of the opportunity of visiting the ateliers of the most renowned masters there. Although there is no account of any production of importance by him during his stay in that country, yet it is certain that he obtained a great reputation among the artists, which no doubt was augmented by the circumstance of his infirmity. The fame of el Mudo, by which name he was known in Italy, reached Philip II., who was commencing the decorations of the Escorial, and he was commanded to attend at Madrid for the purpose of being employed on that work. He arrived there in 1568, and was appointed painter to the king, with an annual pension of 200 ducats, in addition to the price of his works. He had scarcely commenced his labours, when a serious malady compelled him to retire to the country for the benefit of air, and he remained for three years at his native place, Logroño, on leave of absence, but receiving his pension as painter to the king. In 1751 he returned to the Escorial, bringing with him four large pictures which had been commanded, and for which he received 500 ducats. These were an Assumption, The Martyrdom of St. James the Great, a St. Philip, and a St. Jerome. It is believed that in the first the face of the Virgin was the portrait of his mother, Dona Catalina Ximenes, who in her youth had been beautiful. When this picture was about to be placed, el Mudo, who was severely critical with regard to his own works, wished to destroy it, because he considered the principal group defective, and that the Angels pressed too closely on the Virgin; but Philip would not permit it. There was also a fabricated story, founded perhaps on those related of Michael Angelo and Lionardo da Vinci, that in the Martyrdom of St. James, in revenge for some supposed injury received from Santoyo, the king's secretary, he had introduced his portrait as the executioner, and that Philip protected this picture also, against the resentment of his secretary. But Siguenza, who has written much respecting el Mudo, and who at that time resided in the Escorial, affirms that the figure of the executioner is that of an artisan at Logroño. In addition to the four pictures mentioned, he painted for the Escorial The Nativity, Christ at the Pillar, a Holy Family, and St. John writing the Apocalypse: these he finished in 1575, and received 800 ducats. These eight pictures were Navarrete's principal works: unhappily three of them, The Assumption, St. Philip, and St. John, were destroyed by a fire; the other five were saved and placed in the principal cloister of the monastery. Besides their unquestionable merit, each picture is remarkable for some peculiar circumstance. Thus the Martyrdom of St. James and the St. Jerome are most minutely finished; a manner which he did not continue in his other compositions. The Christ at the Pillar, seen in front, is an admirable head, which, by its meekness and beauty, contrasts marvellously with the ignoble features of the flagellators. In the Holy Family, the heads are equally beautiful and expressive; but, by a strange caprice, the painter has placed on one side of the fore-ground of the picture a partridge, and on the other, a dog and cat contesting for a bone, with such comical contortions that it is impossible to regard them without laughing. In the Nativity, el Mudo essayed to vanquish a formidable difficulty in painting. He has introduced three lights in the picture: the effluence from the holy Infant; that which proceeds from the glory above, and which extends over the whole composition; and that emitted from the torch which Joseph holds in his hand. The group of shepherds is the best part of the picture. It is related that Pelligrino Tibaldi, on seeing it, cried out in raptures, "Oh! gli belli pastori!" This exclamation gave name to the picture, and it continues to be known as the beautiful Shepherds. In 1576, he painted his famous picture of Abraham and the three Angels, for which he received 500 ducats. About this time he entered into a contract with the prior, inspector, and treasurer of the Escorial, to paint thirty-two pictures, which he engaged to deliver in the course of four years. Twenty-seven of these pictures were to be seven feet and a half in height and seven feet and a quarter in breadth, and the other five thirteen feet high and nine feet broad. In the contract, which is preserved in the archives of the monastery, all the details are specified: for example, the canvass of each is to be of one piece without seam; the work to be entirely by the hand of Juan Fernandez Navarrete; it is to be done either at the convent, at Madrid, or at Logroño; the figures to be just six feet and a quarter in height; if the same Saint is repeated several times in the pictures he is always to have the same visage and the same vestments; the painter shall not put in the pictures either cat, or dog, or any immodest figure. He did not, however, live to complete this vast undertaking; he painted in 1577 and 1578 the eight which represent the Apostles, the Evangelists, St. Paul, and St. Barnabas; the rest were finished in the following years by Alonso Sanchez Coello and Louis de Caravajal. El Mudo's health had always been delicate, and he was now attacked by an obstruction of the stomach, and he died at Toledo in 1579. It may be said that the works of this eminent Spanish painter are altogether unknown to the world in general. The pictures above referred to having been commanded for the Escorial, have remained to the present time buried in the royal solitude, and almost inaccessible. All his Spanish works are there; even the Museum at Madrid has been able to obtain only the little picture of the Baptism of Christ, which he presented to Philip on his arrival from Italy. His name, however, shines in the accounts of many collections visited and described by tourists. The limits of this work will not allow of further details respecting this artist, else many interesting circumstances might be related of him that would probably be gratifying to the reader.

Note. There were two other Spanish painters who were dumb, and are surnamed el Mudo: one is Diego Lopez; the other is only known under the name Pedro el Mudo: their works must not be confounded with those of the illustrious Navarrete.]

MULDER, J., a Dutch engraver, who resided at Amsterdam about the year 1720. He engraved a set of plates of subjects from the Bible, published in that year, entitled Figures de la Bible, from the designs of Picart and others. They are executed with the graver in a stiff, tasteless style, and are very incorrectly drawn. We have also by him several views of churches and public buildings, which are his best performances. He also engraved a set of small plates, entitled, Vues de Gunterstein, inscribed J. Mulder ad vivum del. et fecit.

MULIER. See MOLYN.

[MULINARI, or MOLINARI, STEFANO, an Italian engraver, known for his numerous prints after drawings by the early Italian masters. He was born at Florence towards the middle of the eighteenth century, and was the pupil of A. Scacciati, whom he assisted in a series of engravings after the most beautiful drawings in the Florentine collection. Forty-one only were executed during Scacciati's life; the remaining fifty-nine were engraved entirely by Mulinari. These were succeeded in 1775 by a collection of prints after drawings of the earliest masters, from Cimabue to Pietro Perugino, under the title "Istoria pratica dell' Incominciamento e Progressi della Pittura; o sia Raccolta di 50 stampe estratte da ugual numero di disegni originali esistenti nella Galleria di Firenze." This was followed in 1780 by a still more interesting work on the great Italian schools of painting; "Saggio delle cinque Scuole di Pittura Italiana." Mulinari died near the close of the eighteenth century, aged about 55. Among the above-mentioned works are four after Lionardo da Vinci, five after Michelangelo, twenty-two after Raphael, eight after Giulio Romano, six after Polidoro da Caravaggio, twenty-six after Parmigiano, five after Daniele da Volterra, eight after Barocci, seven after Giulio Cesare Procaccini, three after Guido, three after Andrea Sacchi, thirteen after Guercino, and many others. Nagler has given a list of about 200 of them in his Kunstler Lexicon.]

MULLER, HERMAN. This artist is said by Huber to have been a native of Amsterdam, though he resided the greater part of his life at Antwerp, where he engraved several plates, in conjunction with Cornelius Cort, for Jerome Cock. He flourished about the year 1583, and is supposed to have been a disciple of Henry Goltzius, and to have studied afterwards in Italy. The plates of Herman Muller are executed entirely with the graver, in the laboured, formal style which distinguished the Flemish school at that period. His drawing is tolerably correct, and some of his best prints are not devoid of expression. In conjunction with the Galles, the Sadeliers, and others, he engraved several subjects of the Bible, after John Stradan, Martin de Vos, and other masters. We have also the following by him :

- The Fates; after Cornelius van Haerlem.
- The Four Cardinal Virtues; after Martin Hemskerck.
- The Ten Commandments; after the same.
- A set of seven plates of the Creation; after H. Goltzius.
- The Death of Cleopatra; after C. van Haerlem.
- The Death of Lucretia; after Cornelius Ketel.

MULLER, JOHN. This eminent engraver is supposed to have been of the same family with the preceding artist. He was born at Amsterdam about the year 1570, and was a disciple of Henry Goltzius, whose vigorous style he followed with an enthusiasm bordering on extravagance. John Muller is, perhaps, the artist who has handled the graver with the most daring facility, and his works are worthy of the admiration of those who wish to distinguish themselves in the free use of the burin, though it is to be regretted that his design was not more tasteful and correct. His plates are numerous; and though they are inferior to those of Goltzius, they are very estimable and extraordinary productions. Many of his prints are from his own compositions; and they are very creditable to his talents as a designer.

He engraved several portraits, which are highly esteemed. The following are among his most admired works :

PORTRAITS.

- Bartholomeus Spranger, Pictor celeberrimus; J. ab Ach, pinx.
- Maurice, Prince of Orange; after Mirevelt.
- John Neyen, of Antwerp, his hand resting on a skull; after the same.
- Ambrose Spinola; after the same.
- Albert, Archduke of Austria; after Rubens.
- Isabella, Infanta of Spain; after the same.
- Christian IV. King of Denmark; after P. Isachs.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN COMPOSITIONS.

- The Baptism of Christ.
 - An Ecce Homo, with angels.
 - Balthasar's Feast; fine and rare.
 - The Adoration of the Magi; fine and rare.
- SUBJECTS AFTER BARTHOLOMEW SPRANGER.
- Hagar in the Desert, comforted by an Angel.
 - Lot and his Daughters.
 - The Nativity; J. Muller, scul. 1606.
 - The Holy Family, with two Angels.
 - Venus and the Graces.
 - Venus, Bacchus, and Ceres.
 - A Satyr taking a Thorn from the Foot of a Faun.
 - Venus and Mercury.
 - Perseus armed by Minerva and Mercury; one of his finest plates.
 - Cupid and Psyche.
 - The Apotheosis of the Arts.
 - Fortune distributing her Gifts.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Raising of Lazarus; after Ab. Bloemaert; fine.
- Cain slaying Abel; after Cornelius van Haerlem.
- The Rape of the Sabines; after the sculpture of A. de Vries.
- Mercury and Pandora; after the same.
- The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; after J. van Aehen; fine.

MULLER, SOLOMON, was probably of the same family, and flourished about the year 1610. From the style of his engraving, it is probable he was brought up in the school of the Wierixes, whose neat manner he imitated with some success, though his drawing is not correct, and his heads are sometimes without expression. He engraved a set of small prints of sacred subjects, which, as they are without the name of the painter, are probably from his own designs.

MULLER, G. A. This artist was born at Vienna about the year 1700. He was a contemporary of Andrew and Joseph Schmutzer, and in conjunction with them executed a part of the plates of the life of Decius, from the designs by Rubens, in the possession of the Prince of Lichtenstein. We have also, among other prints, the following portraits by him :

- Philip Louis, Count de Sintzendorf, Minister of State.
- Jacob van Schuppen, Director of the Academy at Vienna.
- The two Children of Rubens; from a picture by that master, in the Lichtenstein collection.

MULLER, JACOB. The name of this artist is affixed to the frontispiece and plans for a book of gardening, from the designs of George Hatzel, published at Augsburg by Jeremiah Wolf. They are neatly executed with the graver, in a dry, tasteless style. He also engraved some landscapes, in the style of Perelle.

MÜLLER, JOHN GOTTHARD, [VON,] a modern German engraver, born at Bernhausen, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, in 1747. He was favoured with the protection of the Duke, and was sent to Paris in 1770, where he became a pupil of J. G. Wille. His progress under that master was considerable, and his talents procured him a reception into the Academy at Paris in 1776. He soon afterwards returned to Stuttgart, and was appointed Director of the Academy of Design. We have by him several plates, engraved in the neat, finished style of his instructor, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

- Louis XVI. full-length ; one of his finest plates.
 John George Wille, Engraver ; after Greuze.
 Louis Galloche, Painter ; engraved for his reception into the Academy.
 Louis Leramberg, Sculptor to the King ; the same.
 Augustus Gottlieb Spangenberg ; A. Graff, pinx.
 F. Schiller ; after the same.

SUBJECTS.

- Ceres ; after Goltzius.
 The Nymph Erigone ; after Jollain.
 A Lady playing on the Guitar ; after P. A. Wille.
 Lot and his Daughters ; after Gerard Honthorst.
 A subject from the Life of Alexander ; after G. Flinck.

[Müller engraved only thirty-three plates, a small number, but some of them are large and elaborate works ; they are, however, chiefly portraits. His principal pieces, in addition to those above mentioned, are—The Battle of Bunker's Hill, after Trumbull, engraved in 1799 ; the Madonna della Seggiola, for the Musée Français, engraved in 1804, and by many considered superior to the print of the same subject by Raphael Morghen ; a St. Catharine with two Angels, after Lionardo da Vinci ; and St. Cecilia, after Domenichino. He was elected successively a member of the principal German Academies ; was presented in 1808 by the king, Frederick of Wurtemberg, with the order of Civil Merit ; and in 1818 was made a knight of the Wurtemberg Crown. He died at Stuttgart in 1830.]

[MÜLLER, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH VON, son of the preceding, surpassed his father, but owing to the shortness of his career his prints are even less numerous than those of the elder Müller. He was born at Stuttgart in 1783, and he died at Pirna, near Dresden, in 1816. He was carefully educated by his father in all those branches of the art, which he knew by experience to be essential to constitute an excellent engraver ; and in 1802 he sent him to Paris to complete his studies. In 1808 Müller engraved the St. John about to write his Revelation, after Domenichino, in which the eagle brings him his pen ; and Adam and Eve under the Tree of Life, after Raphael. He was commissioned shortly after by Rittner, a printseller of Dresden, to engrave his last and greatest work, the Madonna di San Sisto of Raphael in the Dresden gallery. He was occupied for the remainder of his life on this plate, which he just lived to complete, but he never saw a finished print from it. His existence seems to have been almost wrapped up in the execution of this plate ; he was occupied with it day and night ; and being of a sickly constitution, the infallible result of such constant application and excitement soon made its appearance. He completed the plate and sent it to Paris to be printed ; but with it the artificial excitement which supported him departed also : he had just strength enough left to admit of his being carried to the Sonnenstein, near Pirna, where he died in 1816, only a few days before the proof of his plate arrived from Paris. It was suspended over the head of his bier as he lay dead ; thus reminding the spectators of the similar untimely fate of the great master of the original. C. F. Müller engraved only eighteen plates, but the Madonna di San Sisto is in itself a host ; his other works are nearly all portraits.]

MÜLLER, JOHN SEBASTIAN, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg about the year 1720. He resided in London in 1760, and engraved several plates for the collection of Boydell, which possess great merit. He is generally known in this country by the name of Miller. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

- The Holy Family ; after Federigo Baroccio.
 Another Holy Family ; after Murillo.
 Nero depositing the Ashes of Britannicus ; after Le Sueur.
 A Landscape, with Apollo and Marsias ; after Claude.
 A Moonlight ; after Vander Neer.
 Two Views in Rome ; after Gio. Paolo Panini.

[It is probable that he came to England at an early age and worked for the booksellers : he engraved the plates for Newton's edition of Milton.]

[MÜLLER, WILLIAM JOHN, an eminent landscape and costume painter, was born at Bristol in 1812 ; his father, a native of Germany, was Curator of the Bristol Museum, and from him he acquired a taste for science, especially botany and natural history, which continued with him during his whole career, and enriched his sketch books beyond those of any of his contemporaries. From J. B. Pyne he received the primary instructions in painting ; and soon after made the tour of Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, studying only under the guidance of nature, and hence his works bear the impress of originality in a greater degree than those of most modern landscape painters. On his return to his native city he pursued his profession, but with very partial success. Bristol has the character of producing men of talent, but they must look elsewhere for support, if that talent should be allied with genius, and disposed to more elevated pursuits than manufacture or commerce : refinement does not flourish there as an indigenous plant. He therefore visited Greece and Egypt, enriching his portfolio with a large number of sketches of the most interesting objects. In 1839 he settled in London, where his pictures found ready purchasers. Two years afterwards he published " Picturesque Sketches of the Age of Francis I.," which extended his fame beyond his own country. He next, at his own expense, joined the expedition to Lycia, projected by the government, and from the valuable sketches he made there produced the pictures which were exhibited at the Royal Academy and British Institution during the three last years of his life. Of the treatment he received at both places, from the improper positions in which his pictures were placed, he complained with bitterness, and, it must be admitted, with justice. There is yet too much of favouritism, caprice, or ignorance, shown in both establishments, if half the complaints of the rising generation of artists be founded on truth. In 1845 Müller left London for Bristol for the benefit of his health ; but his strength gradually failed, and he died, of disease of the heart, on the 8th of September, in that year. At the sale of his oil pictures, finished and unfinished, and the series of sketches made by him in Lycia, (which took place in the following year,) competition to possess them was extreme; the sketches sold at prices varying from £20 to £60 sterling for each, and the total amount of the three days' sale was about £4600. These were not factitious prices, for the dealers reaped a rich harvest by the purchases they made at the sale; and his works are still increasing in value. Copies and imitations are being palmed already on the unwary, at exorbitant prices, by unprincipled traffickers in the Fine Arts.]

MUNARI, PELLEGRINO. See MODENA.

MUNIER, JOHN, a French engraver on wood, who resided at Toulouse about the year 1553. He executed several wooden cuts, in conjunction with John Perrin. Among others, we have by these artists the prints for a small octavo volume of emblems, entitled La Morosophie de Guillaume de la Perriere Tolsain, contenant cent Emblemes, published at Lyons in 1553.

MUNNICKHUYSEN, JOHN, a Flemish engraver who flourished about the year 1680. We have several plates by him, executed with the graver, which possess considerable merit, among which are some portraits, engraved in a neat, clear style. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Hendrick Dirksen Spiegel, Burgomaster; after Limburg.

Francis Burmann, Professor of Theology; after C. Maas.

Henry Vander Graft.

Cornelius Tromp, Admiral of Holland; after D. Vander Plaas.

Peter van Staveren, of Amsterdam; after W. Mieris.

Peter Zurendonk, Rector of the Latin School at Amsterdam.

He also engraved an upright plate of two boys, emblematical of Autumn and Winter; after Gerard Lairesse. The companion print, of Spring and Summer, was engraved by H. Bary; after Vandyck.

MUÑOZ, SEBASTIAN. This Spanish painter was born at Navalcarnero in 1654, and was a disciple of Claudio Coello. In 1680 he visited Italy, and studied six years in the school of Carlo Maratti. On his return to Spain, he first settled at Saragossa, where he executed some considerable works, in conjunction with Coello. He visited Madrid in 1683, and was made painter to the king. He was employed in the royal palaces, where he painted a series of frescoes of the history of Cupid and Psyche. He painted in the flimsy style of the modern Italians, in which all is sacrificed to gaudiness and frivolity, without sobriety in the composition, beauty in the forms, or expression in the characters. He is said to have died, in consequence of a fall from a scaffold, in 1690.

MUNTINCK, GERARD, a Dutch engraver, born at Groninguen, who flourished about the year 1640. He engraved several portraits, which are executed with the graver in a neat style, but without much taste.

[MUOLTSCHER, HANS, a painter of Ulm in Suabia, of whom there are no particulars recorded in any of the writers on early painting. Ottley mentions an altar-piece by him, with the date 1436, which was in the Truchsessian Gallery of Pictures, exhibited and sold at London, more than forty years ago. Lord Lindsay conceives that he was the parent of the succession of painters at Ulm; it is therefore surprising that he has not been noticed by any of the German writers. This hint may awaken their attention.]

MURA, FRANCESCO DE, called FRANCESCHIELLO. This painter was a native of Naples, and flourished about the year 1743. He was one of the numerous scholars of Francesco Solimene, and was much employed in ornamenting the public edifices in his native city; but perhaps his most celebrated performances are his frescoes in the royal palace of Turin, which he painted in competition with Claudio Beaumont, where he represented the Olympic Games, and the Life of Achilles. [He died in 1759.]

MURANO, NATALINO DA. According to Ridolfi, this painter was a disciple of Titian, and flourished about the year 1558. He painted historical subjects of an easel size, but was more celebrated as a portrait painter, in which he particularly excelled. He died young.

MURANT, EMANUEL. This artist was born at Amsterdam, according to Descamps, in 1622; this is, however, disputable; it is probable that his birth was at a later date, as he was the scholar of Philip Wowermans, who was born in 1620. Though he did not adopt the same subjects as those painted by his master, he acquired somewhat of the neatness of his pencil, the truth and purity of his colouring, and the correctness of his design. Instead of horse-fairs and huntings, the usual representations of Wowermans, he painted the views of towns and ruined buildings in Holland, which he finished with a precision and accuracy, which has only been surpassed by the extraordinary productions of John Vander Heyden. He visited France, and resided some time at Paris, where his works were greatly admired for the delicacy of his style. On his return to Holland, he settled at Lewarde, in Friesland, where he died, in 1700. The works of E. Murant have the rare merit of exhibiting the most exquisite finish, without the appearance of stiffness or labour, and without the interruption of that harmony of colour, and union of effect, which are almost exclusively the attributes of a process less tedious and precise. His tones are artfully broken, and there is a vagueness and neutrality in his tints, which are only to be found in the works of the most intelligent colourists. His pictures are not frequently to be met with, and are highly esteemed.

MURATORI, DOMENICO MARIA, was born at Bologna in 1662, and was a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli. He resided chiefly at Rome, where he was much employed for the churches and public edifices. In the church of the SS. Apostoli, the principal altar-piece is by him, representing the Martyrdom of St. Philip and St. James, one of the largest pictures in Rome, composed and designed in a grand style, with a fine effect of chiaro-scuro, though not equally successful in the colouring. His picture of Christ crowned with Thorns, in the church of the Stimato, is not less creditable to his talents, which were of sufficient respectability to procure him the commission to paint one of the prophets in the Basilica of St. John of Lateran. At the Primaziale, at Pisa, is a fine picture by him representing S. Ranieri working a Miracle, which is considered by Lanzi as one of his most esteemed works. We have by him a few etchings, which are executed in a spirited and masterly style. He died in 1749. [There is an etching by him of a Holy Family, after Cantarini, with the date 1685. Zani says he was born in 1655, and died in 1742.]

MURATORI, TERESA. This lady was born at Bologna in 1662. She was the daughter of an eminent physician, and at a very early age discovered an uncommon genius for drawing and music. She was first instructed in design by Emilio Taruffi, was afterwards a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli, and lastly studied under Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole. She proved a very reputable paintress of history, and executed several considerable works for the churches at Bologna, of which the most deserving of notice are, S. Benedetto resuscitating a dead Child, in the church of S. Stefano; the Annunciation, in S. Trinitá; and the Incredulity of St. Thomas, in La Madonna di Galeria. She died in 1708.

MURILLO, BARTOLOMÉ ESTEVAN. With the works of this admirable artist the English collector is more intimately acquainted, than with those of any painter of the Spanish school; and their intrinsic merit amply justifies the admiration which is bestowed on them. Bartolomé Estevan Murillo was born at the small town of Pílas, about five leagues from Seville, in 1613. He was descended from an ancient family, who had formerly held ample possessions in the province of Andalusia. Don Juan del Castillo, a painter of some eminence, was his uncle by his mother's side, and had established an academy at Seville, which was in considerable reputation.

The young Murillo having discovered an early inclination for the art, he was placed under the tuition of his relative, where he received his first instruction. On leaving the school of that master, his manner was dark and inky, distinguished by a blackness and heaviness in his shadows, by which defects the works of Castillo were characterized, who was an indifferent colourist, though in all other respects was competent to the profession of a teacher. The first subjects he painted were rustics and beggar-boys, in which he discovers a faithful and accurate attention to nature, and a charming simplicity of character, which is peculiar to him. His pictures of this description are vigorously coloured, though without the tenderness and suavity which afterwards distinguished his more important productions in historical painting. Sandrart, with his usual inaccuracy, has stated that Murillo made a voyage to South America, where he passed some years, and on his return to Europe travelled to Italy, in search of improvement. Both these assertions are unfounded.

At the time when Murillo left the school of Castillo, it was customary for the young artists to expose their works for sale at the fair held annually at Seville, and many of his earliest productions were purchased in this manner, and exported to Spanish America, which probably gave rise to the false tradition of his having gone thither in person. The fallacy of the report that he studied in Italy is completely proved by all the Spanish biographers, who have satisfactorily ascertained that he never left Spain.

The fame of Don Diego Velasquez, who was then in the height of his reputation, reached Seville, and Murillo conceived the project of visiting Madrid, and of endeavouring to introduce himself to the notice of that distinguished artist. On his arrival in that capital, he paid his court to Velasquez with success, and he not only admitted him into his academy, but treated him with the greatest kindness and liberality. He procured him the best means of improvement, independent of his own instruction, and obtained for him access to the rich treasures of art deposited in the royal collections. A new scene was now opened to his view, and his zeal for advancement was increased by the continued contemplation of such admirable productions. His attention was particularly directed to the works of Titian, Rubens, and Vandyck, whose works he studied and copied, by which he greatly improved his style of colouring. After a few years passed under such favourable circumstances, and with the advantage of the counsels of Velasquez, Murillo returned to Seville, and resumed the practice of his art with redoubled alacrity, and with the most flattering success. He was now engaged in his first great work in fresco, in the convent of San Francisco, or the Capuchins; it consists of sixteen compartments, among which is his celebrated work of St. Thomas of Villanueva, distributing alms to a group of poor, which he is said to have distinguished by the name of his favourite picture. In this subject, the particular bent of his genius had full scope for the display of its powers, which were peculiarly adapted to the representation of nature in her most simple and unsophisticated forms. The group of paupers who surround the Saint, and are eagerly pressing forward to partake of his charity, is admirably composed, and the varied character of their wretchedness is portrayed with wonderful art and expression. At the principal altar, in the same church, is a large picture representing the Jubilee of the Porciuncula, representing Christ holding his Cross, and the Virgin interceding for the grant specified in the picture, with a group of angels, of extraordinary beauty. He was about this time engaged by the Marquis of Villamanrique, to paint a series of pictures of the Life of David, in which the back-grounds were to be painted by Ignacio Iriarte, an eminent landscape painter of Seville. Murillo proposed that the landscapes should be first painted, and that he should afterwards put in the figures, but Iriarte contended that the historical part should be first finished, to which he would adapt the back-ground. To put an end to the dispute, Murillo undertook to execute the whole, without the assistance of Iriarte, and changing the history of David to that of Jacob, he produced the famous suite of pictures now in the possession of the Marquis of Santiago at Madrid, in which the beauty of the landscapes contends with that of the figures, and which remain a monument of his powers in the different departments of the art. In the same collection are two pictures, which are said to be among the finest of his works, and superior to those in the royal collection: one represents Saint Francis Xavier, in a dignified and sublime attitude, his eyes devoutly raised to heaven, with great fervour and devotion, with a stream of light beaming on his breast, as if receiving the divine inspiration previous to his entering on his mission to the Indians, a group of which is seen in the distance; the other represents St. Joseph leading by the hand the young Saviour, apparently of the age of eight or ten years, over their heads is a glory of beautiful angels, and a fine landscape in the back-ground. He painted for the cathedral at Seville his admired picture of San Antonio, with the infant Christ, and a glory of angels, with a back-ground of admirable architecture; a Miraculous Conception; and his two portraits of Leandro and Isidore, Archbishops of Seville, which are painted in his finest manner. In the church of the hospital of the Charity is one of his highly esteemed works, representing St. John supporting a poor man, who is aided in his charitable office by an angel, whom the Saint regards with a look of reverence and gratitude, which is beautifully expressed. In the same sanctuary are two other fine pictures, representing Moses striking the Rock, and the Miracle of the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes, a composition of a numerous assemblage of figures, exhibiting a striking variety of character, and grouped with surprising ability.

Murillo painted several pictures for the churches of Cadiz, Granada, and Cordova. At Cadiz, in the church of San Philippe Neri, is an altar-piece of the Conception; and at the Capuchins, a picture of St. Catherine. In the chapel of the Nuns of the Angel at Granada, is one of his most interesting productions, representing the good Shepherd. His works had been hitherto chiefly confined to Seville; but in the year 1670, a picture by him of the Immaculate Conception was carried in procession on the great festival of Corpus Christi, which excited universal surprise and admiration, and was regarded as a phenomenon. Charles II. directed him to be invited to Madrid, with a promise of appointing him one of his painters; but Murillo, whose natural humility, and love of retirement, with his attachment to his native city, prevailed over every consideration of advantage or promotion, excused himself from accepting the invitation, on account of his age. He was at all times equally insensible to the allurements of ambition or interest; and such was his charitable disposition, that though economical in his habits, constantly employed, and not illiberally remunerated, he is said to have died in narrow circumstances. His last work was his picture of St. Catherine, in the church of the Capuchins at Cadiz; and when he was painting it, he fell from the scaffold, which brought on a complaint that put an end to his life in 1685, in his seventy-second year. Few painters have a juster claim to the originality of style than Murillo. It is distinguished by a close and lively imitation of nature. His forms have a national peculiarity of air, habiliment, and countenance. His pictures of the Virgin, his Saints, and even his Saviours, are stamped with the features of his country, and a characteristic expression of the eye, which is remarkable. There is little of the academy discernible in his design or composition; it is a chaste and faithful representation of what he saw, or conceived; truth and simplicity are never lost sight of. His colouring is clear, tender, and harmonious; and though it possesses the truth of Titian, and the sweetness of Vanduyck, it has nothing of the servility of imitation. Though he sometimes adopts a beautiful expression, there is usually a portrait-like simplicity in the airs of his heads, in which there is seldom any thing of the ideal. His style may be said to hold a middle rank between the unpolished naturalness of the Flemish, and the graceful and elegant taste of the Italian school. [Bartolomé Estéban Murillo was born at Seville in 1618. There are numerous fine specimens of his works in England, particularly in the collections of the Duke of Sutherland, Lord Ashburton, the Marquis of Westminster, Mr Tomline, Baron Rothschild, and other noblemen and gentlemen. In the Dulwich Gallery there are several; and the National Gallery possesses two, a Holy Family, which cost about 4000 guineas, and St. John and the Lamb, purchased at Sir Simon Clarke's sale for 2000 guineas.]

[MURPHY, JOHN, an excellent engraver in mezzotinto, was born in 1748, and flourished till the early part of the present century. He engraved some of the prints in the Houghton Collection, and after other works of the Italian masters; and also after Reynolds, Northcote, Romney, Stothard, Ramberg, and B. West. Though all his productions are good, perhaps the most esteemed, especially by foreign amateurs, are Mark Antony's Oration over the body of Cæsar, after West; Elisha restoring the Widow's Son, after Northcote; the Tiger, after the same; the Brothers of Joseph showing his bloody Garment to Jacob, and Joseph interpreting Pharaoh's dream, both after Guercino.]

MURRAY, THOMAS. This painter was a native of Scotland, born about the year 1666, and was a scholar of John Riley, at the time he was painter to William and Mary. He was one of the most eminent artists of his time, and was employed to paint the portraits of the royal family, and many of the principal nobility. His pictures had the merit of a faithful resemblance, and were freshly and chastely coloured. The portrait of Murray, painted by himself, is among those of the great artists in the Florentine Gallery. He died in 1724.

MUSIS, AGOSTINO DE, called AGOSTINO VENEZIANO. This eminent engraver was born at Venice about the year 1490, and was a disciple of Marc Antonio Raimondi, of whose fine style he was one of the most successful followers. Several of his earliest plates were executed in conjunction with Marco da Ravenna, who had been his fellow student under Marc Antonio. After the death of Raffaele, in 1520, they separated, and each of them worked on his own account. On the sacking of Rome, in 1527, the artists resident in that capital sought refuge in the other cities of Italy; and Agostino went to Florence, where he applied to Andrea del Sarto for employment. But having engraved, in 1516, a plate from a picture by him, representing a dead Christ, supported by Angels, which did not meet with the painter's approbation, he would not permit any more of his pictures to be engraved. The earliest dated print by Agostino is in 1509; and as none of his works bear a later date than 1536, it may be presumed, that he did not long survive that period; and he is said by Huber to have died at Rome about the year 1540. This artist claims a distinguished rank among the engravers of his time. His graver is equally neat and finished with that of Marc Antonio; but he is very inferior to that celebrated artist in the purity and correctness of his drawing, and in the tasteful expression of his heads. The prints of Agostino de Musis are extremely scarce, particularly fine impressions of them. He sometimes marked them with a tablet similar to that used by Marc Antonio, and more frequently with the initials A. V. with the date. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Pope Paul III., in profile; inscribed Paulus III. Pon. Max. 1534.

The same Pontiff, with the papal crown; dated 1536.

Charles V. holding a sword; after Titian.

Another Portrait of Charles V.; dated 1536.

Ferdinand, King of the Romans; inscribed Proximus a summo Ferdinandus, &c. 1536.

Francis I. of France; dated 1536.

The Emperor Soliman; dated 1535.

SUBJECTS OF SACRED HISTORY.

- The Creation; engraved in conjunction with Marco da Ravenna; after Raffaele.
 The Sacrifice of Isaac; after the same.
 The Benediction of Isaac; dated 1522; after the same; very scarce.
 The same subject; dated 1524.
 The Israelites passing the Red Sea; after the same.
 The Israelites gathering the Manna; after the same. This plate is supposed to have been begun by Marc Antonio.
 Samson bound by the Philistines; circular; from his own design.
 The Nativity; after Giulio Romano. 1531.
 The Four Evangelists; in four plates; after the same. 1518.
 The Murder of the Innocents; copied from the print by Marc Antonio. A. V.; very scarce.
 The Nativity; copied from a wooden cut by A. Durer; very scarce.
 Christ bound to the Pillar; the same; very scarce.
 The Last Supper; the same; 1514.
 The dead Christ, with Angels; after A. del Sarto. 1516.
 The Archangel Michael; after Raffaele.
 The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after Francia.
 St. Jerome, with the Lion; after Raffaele.

HISTORICAL AND MYTHOLOGICAL SUBJECTS.

- Diogenes seated by the side of a River; after Baccio Bandinelli.
 Tarquin and Lucretia; after Raffaele.
 The Death of Lucretia; copied from the print by Marc Antonio; after Raffaele.
 Cleopatra; after Baccio Bandinelli. 1518.
 Vulcan giving Cupid's Arrows to Venus; after Raffaele. 1530.
 Venus riding on a Dolphin, with Cupid holding a Torch; after Raffaele.
 Jupiter and Leda.
 Apollo and Daphne; after Raffaele; attributed by some to Marc Antonio.
 The Fall of Phaeton; marked A. V. on a tablet.
 The Triumph of Silenus; after Raffaele; the same mark.
 The infant Hercules destroying the Serpents; after Giulio Romano.
 Hercules strangling Anteus; after M. Angelo Buonaroti.
 Hercules destroying the Nemean Lion; after Raffaele.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

- The Burying-place, an assemblage of emaciated figures with skeletons, and a figure of Death holding a book; after Baccio Bandinelli; inscribed Augustinus Venetus de Musis faciebat. 1518.
 A large print, called the Climbers; after the famous cartoon of Pisa, by M. Angelo Buonaroti, dated 1523. This print is very different from that of the same subject engraved by Marc Antonio, which consists of many more figures. It is marked with the name of the painter on a tablet, and dated 1524.
 The Academy of Baccio Bandinelli, in which that artist is represented in the midst of his disciples. 1531.
 The Battle of the Sabre, so called from a sword which lies on the ground, fallen from the hand of a warrior, who is represented as dead, on the right-hand side of the print.

- An Emperor on horseback, with attendants, called by some the Triumph of Marcus Aurelius. This print is marked with the tablet used by Marc Antonio, who is supposed to have partly engraved it.
 An old Philosopher, or Magician, seated on the ground, measuring with his compasses a circle, in which are seen the sun and moon; dated 1509; after Dom. Campagnola.

He also engraved a variety of plates of grotesque subjects, after Raffaele, and several busts and antique vases.

MUSIS, LORENZO and GIULIO DE. These artists are supposed to have been the sons of Agostino de Musis. They engraved some plates in the style of their father, but with no great success. By the former we have a portrait of Barbarossa, King of Algiers, inscribed Lorenzo de Musis, Faciebat. 1535. By the latter there is a large print lengthways, entitled Antiqua Species Urbium, Portus, par Pyrrhum Ligorium facta, &c. Julius de Musis in aes incidit. 1554.

MUSSCHER, MICHAEL VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1645. He was first placed under the tuition of Martin Zaagmoolen, an obscure artist, with whom he did not continue long, and was afterwards successively the scholar of Abraham Vanden Tempel, Gabriel Metsu, and Adrian van Ostade. He did not, however, exactly follow the style of any of his instructors, but adopted one more resembling that of Francis Mieris, without arriving at the harmony of his colouring, or the exquisite polish of his finishing. He painted conversations and small portraits, which are clearly and agreeably coloured; and though his figures are not very correctly drawn, his portraits have the merit of fidelity and truth. According to M. Descamps, he occasionally attempted historical subjects, which he presumes were above mediocrity, as he was liberally paid for them. His works of that description, like those of the other painters of his country, are estimable for the beauty of the colour, and the neatness of the penciling, though greatly deficient in character, expression, and the propriety of costume, so essential to the dignity of historical painting. His principal residence was at Amsterdam, where his pictures are to be met with in the choicest collections. They are little known out of his own country. He died at Amsterdam in 1705. [At the time Bryan wrote Musscher's pictures were scarcely known in England; since that period several fine specimens have been imported, and the amateur's knowledge of them enlarged by visits to Holland. His conversation pieces sometimes blend the qualities of Jan Steen and Metsu. His portrait, with his wife and son, is in the Museum at the Hague.]

MUSSO, NICCOLO, was a native of Casalmonteferrato, and flourished about the year 1618. According to Orlandi, he went to Rome when he was very young, and entered the school of Michael Angelo Caravaggio. After passing ten years at Rome he returned to his native city, where he painted several altar-pieces for the churches, of which Lanzi particularly mentions a picture of St. Francis kneeling before the crucified Saviour, in the church dedicated to that Saint. His style resembles that of Caravaggio, though less violent in his chiaro-scuro, and more select in his forms, and in the expression of his heads.

MUTEL, ———. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of Thomas Fantel de Lagny.

[MUYS, GUILLAUME, was born at Schiedam in 1712, and resided at Rotterdam. He painted portraits and other subjects of large dimensions; and also cabinet pictures in the taste of Mieris and Vander Werf. He died at Rotterdam in 1763.]

[MUYS, NICOLAS, son of the preceding, was born at Rotterdam in 1740. He was instructed by his father, and also by Aart Schouman at the Hague. He painted portraits and cabinet pictures, chiefly interiors. His pictures exhibit a fine genius in composition, correct design, and freedom of touch, with careful finish. He died in 1803.]

MUYS, R., an obscure Dutch engraver, by whom we have, among others, a portrait of William, Prince of Orange.

MUZIANO, GIROLAMO. This reputable artist was born at Aquafredda, in the territory of Brescia, in 1528. After receiving some instruction in the art in his native city, under Girolamo Romanino, he went to Venice, where he studied the works of Titian, and the other great masters. When he was about twenty years of age he visited Rome, accompanied by Federigo Zuccaro, where it was not long before his abilities recommended him to the notice of Gregory XIII., who employed him in the Capella Gregoriana, and commissioned him to paint two pictures for the church of St. Peter, representing St. Jerome and St. Basil, which procured him considerable celebrity. Muziano distinguished himself also as a landscape painter, and acquired at Rome the appellation of Il Giovane de' paesi. The Cardinal Farnese employed him to decorate his Vigne at Tivoli, in conjunction with Federigo Zuccaro and Tempesta, where he evinced the superiority of his talents over both his competitors. He now produced his celebrated picture of the Resurrection of Lazarus, painted for the church of S. Maria Maggiore, afterwards removed to the pontifical palace of the Quirinal, and now among the spoils in the gallery of the Louvre. This capital production excited the admiration and procured him the esteem of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, who assisted him with his instruction and advice. He soon afterwards painted his picture of the Circumcision, for the church del Gesu; the Ascension, for Ara Caeli; and St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, for the church della Concezione. His other esteemed works at Rome are, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the hall of the Consistory; a picture of the Nativity, in S. Maria de Morti; and Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in S. Maria degli Angeli. The works of Muziano exhibit a grandeur of design, and an intimate acquaintance with muscular anatomy, in which he appears to have emulated the learned design of Buonaroti. His compositions are copious and ingenious, and the characters of his heads are dignified and expressive. His colouring partakes of the truth and harmony of the Venetian school, and the back-grounds of his pictures are frequently embellished with landscapes, which remind us of the fine style of Titian. Girolamo Muziano was much employed in designing after the antique; and it is to him we are indebted for the accomplishment of the design of the bas-reliefs of the Trojan column, which had been begun by Giulio Romano, and which were afterwards engraved. He died at Rome in 1592.

[MY, JEROME VANDER, born at Leyden in 1688, was a scholar of William Mieris. He painted history, portraits, and familiar subjects. His portraits are painted in the manner of his master, with great attention to the finishing, but in some parts deficient in vigour.]

[MYIN, HENRI ARNAULD, born at Antwerp in 1760, was instructed by B. P. Ommeganck, whose manner he followed both in his landscapes and animals. There were two landscapes, with sheep, by him in the Brentano collection at Amsterdam, a proof of their merit; and others may be found in the cabinets of the tasteful amateurs of Holland.]

MYN, A. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, who resided some time in London, by whom we have a portrait of Richard Leveridge.

[MYN, GEORGE VANDER, born in 1725, resided at Amsterdam, where he died in 1763. He painted portraits, and subjects in the manner of Watteau, which are very cleverly handled.]

MYN, HERMAN VANDER. Herman Vander Myn was born at Amsterdam in 1684. He was the son of a clergyman, who intended him for the church, and with that project bestowed on him a suitable education. His love of the arts, however, was more prevalent than his attention to his studies; and his father, yielding to his natural propensity, placed him under the tuition of Ernest Stuken, an eminent painter of fruit and flowers, under whom he continued until he surpassed his master. Aspiring to a higher department of the art, he quitted Stuken and flower-painting, and devoted his studies to the more elevated branch of historical subjects. It is not known by whom he was instructed in his new pursuit; but he acquired sufficient celebrity to be invited to the court of the Elector Palatine, in 1716, where he passed some time. He returned to Holland, where he painted a picture of Jupiter and Danae, which excited universal admiration. The applause bestowed on this performance, instead of contributing to his advantage, proved extremely prejudicial to his interest, by prompting his avarice to demand so unreasonable a price for it, that it was left on his hands. He afterwards visited Antwerp, and from thence, in 1718, went to Paris, where he was patronized by the Duke of Orleans, and where he painted a picture of Peter denying Christ, which is considered as his most capital work. By the recommendation of Lord Cadogan, he came to England about the year 1722, and was employed in painting the portraits of several of the nobility, in which he carried to excess the laborious minuteness of his countrymen; faithfully imitating the details of lace, embroidery, and fringes, with the most patient precision. Frederick, Prince of Wales, and the Prince of Orange, sat to him; and he painted a picture of the Duke and Duchess of Chandos, for which he is said to have received five hundred guineas. Vander Myn died in London in 1741. He had a sister, AGATHA VANDER MYN, who, according to Lord Orford, came with him to England, and painted fruit, flowers, and dead game.

[MYN, ROBERT VANDER, a painter of portraits, landscapes, and flower-pieces, was born in 1724. He painted a great number of pictures of each sort in London, where they are occasionally met with; for this reason he is selected from the numerous painters of the same name who exercised their talent on similar subjects, and nearly at the same period.]

MYNDE, J. This artist resided in London about the year 1760, and engraved several plates for the booksellers. His prints are very indifferently executed. We have by him some anatomical figures, and a few portraits, among which are,

Roger, Earl of Orrery, and William Harris, D. D.

MYRIGINUS, or MYRICINUS, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1550. He engraved several eccentric and strange compositions, after Jerome Bos, Breughel, and others. There is also a portrait of Albert Durer at the age of 56, copied by him from a larger print.

He marked his plates with the cipher . [This artist is said to be the same as Peter Martini, a printseller of Antwerp. The name appears on several prints published by Jerome Cock; one has the date 1567; it is signed Pet. Mercicinus, sc.]

MYTENS, ARNOLD. This painter was born at Brussels in 1541. After receiving some instruction in his native country, he travelled to Italy, in company with Anthony de Santwort, and studied some years at Rome. He afterwards visited Naples, where he painted an altar-piece, which gained him great reputation, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, with the Apostles; and in the church of S. Lodovico, a picture of the Miraculous Conception. On his return to Rome he was employed in some considerable works in the church of St. Peter, and died in that city in 1602.

[MYTENS, A———, a portrait painter of great merit, who resided at the Hague from 1612 to 1660, but of whom there is no other record except in his works. He painted the portraits of the eminent Dutch poet, Jacob Cats, and his house-keeper, named Havius; and of the Prince of Orange Nassau. At the Hague is The Celebration of the Marriage of the Elector of Brandenburg with the daughter of Frederic Henri, Prince of Orange, by this artist. This was formerly in the Lormier collection. The conformity that exists in these works and those of Daniel Mytens, and the epoch in which both lived, would warrant the supposition that this artist was the father and master of Daniel, were it not that little dependence is to be placed on the accounts by the Dutch writers, who too often ascribe to one artist of the name what belongs to another. Immerzeel felt the difficulty of giving an authentic and satisfactory account of the many painters of the name of Mytens, and has therefore placed them under one head.]

MYTENS, DANIEL, the ELDER. This artist was a native of the Hague, and, according to Lord Orford, was an admired painter in the reigns of King James and Charles I. The date of his arrival in England is not certain; but it was probably in the latter part of the reign of James. Although he drew several of the court, he was not formally employed as painter to the King, until the first year of the reign of King Charles. His patent was dated the 30th of May, 1625. He had studied the works of Rubens previous to his coming. His landscape, in the back-grounds of his portraits, is evidently in the style of that school; and some of his works have been taken for those of Vandyck. At Hampton Court are several whole-lengths of the princes and princesses of the House of Brunswick Lunenburg, and the portrait of Charles Howard, Earl of Nottingham. At Kensington is a Head of himself; and at St. James's is a fine picture by Mytens, of Hudson, the dwarf, holding a dog with a string, in a landscape, warmly coloured and painted freely, like Rubens or Snyders. Mytens remained in great reputation till the arrival of Vandyck, who being appointed the King's principal painter, the former, in disgust, asked his Majesty's leave to retire to his own country; but the King, learning the cause of his dissatisfaction, treated him with much kindness, and told him that he could find sufficient employment both for him and Vandyck. Mytens consented to stay, and even grew intimate with his rival; for the head of Mytens is one of those painted among the professors by that great master. Whether the same jealousy operated again, or real decline of business influenced him, or any other cause, Mytens did not stay much longer in England. We find none of his works here after the year 1630; yet he lived many years afterwards. Houbraken quotes a register at the Hague, dated in 1656, at which time Mytens painted part of the ceiling of the town-hall there. [In the notices of Van Dyck and his contemporaries, by Mr. W. H. Carpenter, there is a letter from Daniel Mytens addressed to Sir Dudley Carleton, dated the 18th of August, 1618; it relates to the portraits of Lord Arundel and his Lady, and hints at his endeavour to find occasion "to draw the Princes highness picture." As it is written in good English, the probability is that he had lived previously in England for some time. The original letter is in the State Paper Office.]

MYTENS, DANIEL, the YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at the Hague in 1636. After being instructed for some time by his father, he travelled to Rome, where he studied in company with his countrymen Doudyns and Vander Schuur. The works of Carlo Maratti were particularly the objects of his admiration; and he formed an acquaintance with that master, whose advice and instruction contributed in no small degree to his advancement. Having inherited a considerable property from his father, he was not very assiduous in his application, but divided his time between his amusement and his studies. His abilities were, however, respectable, and he distinguished himself at Rome, both as a painter of history and portraits. In 1664 he returned to the Hague, where he continued to exercise his profession with reputation, and was received into the Academy there, of which he afterwards was appointed director. His principal work at the Hague is the ceiling in the hall of the painters, which is ingeniously composed, and designed in the style of Maratti. Towards the latter part of his life he sunk into a state of dissipation and intemperance, which degraded his talents and injured his health. He died in 1688.

[MYTENS, JAN. See MEYSSSENS, JOHN.]

MYTENS, MARTIN, a Swedish artist, born at Stockholm in 1605. He is said to have distinguished himself as a portrait painter at the different courts of Europe, and to have died at Vienna in 1755. [This painter seems to have visited every city of note in Europe, for the purpose of studying his art, and finally settled at Vienna as court painter. One picture by him is mentioned as a capital performance; it is taken from the history of Esther and Ahasuerus. As his portraits are chiefly of crowned heads, they are probably confined to the places where they were painted.]

N

NACHTGLAS, ———. This artist was an indifferent engraver of portraits, which are executed with the graver, in a stiff, tasteless style. They are probably from his own designs, as he usually adds the word fecit to his name.

NADAT, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1530. We have by him a considerable number of prints, marked with a mouse-trap, and his name NA DAT. Some authors doubt this being his name, from the apparent division between the two first letters and the three last. The prints thus marked are executed entirely with the graver, and consist chiefly of small prints, representing processions, and armies on their march. From the resemblance of the style of this engraver to that afterwards adopted by Theodore de Bry, it is probable that the latter was his pupil. Among others are the following prints by him :

The Virgin and Child, with St. Elisabeth ; in an arch to the right is the Angel appearing to St. Joseph, and to the left an Angel appearing to St. Joachim.

An Army on the march ; dated 1530.

An Army exercising.

[A Monstrous Infant, or two Infants joined back to back, inscribed Duo Gemini, &c. ; H. 4in., W. 6½ ; not mentioned by Bartsch.

It is feared that Bryan committed himself by the expression, " We have by him a considerable number of prints, marked with a mouse-trap, and his name NA DAT : " if so, where are they to be found ? Bartsch was acquainted with two only, The Virgin and St. Anne, and The two Armies, which he has described. A third, A monstrous Infant, inserted above, has been discovered since by Messrs. Smith, brothers, of Lisle Street, London ; and these three constitute all at present known. With regard to the name of the artist, there are various opinions. He was formerly designated " The Master of the Rat-trap," because that figure, accompanied by the two syllables NA DAT, appears on the two known prints. Zani calls him Natalis Dati ; but others suppose that Na dat and the rat-trap together form a rebus, of which it is difficult to discover the sense. Bartsch states that in the imperial library at Vienna there is a first proof of The two Armies, on which is written with a pen, in a very ancient hand, ROTA DE RAVENNA. 1512. These words, no doubt, designate the name of the engraver, or that of the designer after whom the piece was executed. The rat, RATO, he says, appears to have allusion to it. What is very remarkable, the year 1512, written by the same ancient hand, proves that this print is more ancient than that by Agostino Veneziano. It is true that a second proof bears the date 1530, but that date was added after the plate was much used, as may be supposed by the bad impressions on which it appears. The letters T N, which are on a stone in the same print, require explanation, but at present their signification is unknown. It is somewhat surprising that the accurate Bartsch should endeavour to solve the enigma by substituting Rato for Rota, a word that he did not find written.]

NAGEL, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about the year 1580. He is said to have been a disciple of Philip Galle, whose style he imitated, but without much success. His plates are coarsely executed, and his drawing is generally incorrect. He engraved several sacred subjects after Martin Hemskerck, and other Flemish painters. He sometimes signed his prints with his name at length, but more frequently marked them with a cipher composed of a P. and an N. joined thus,

PN. FE., or with the initials P. N., fec. or P. Na. fec. Among other prints by him we have,

The Seven Works of Mercy ; after M. Hemskerck.

NAGTEGEL, ARNOLD. The name of this artist is affixed to a very indifferent print in mezzotinto, representing the portrait of Ishach Aboab Rabin.

It is apparently from a design of his own, as he adds to his name the words delin. et fecit.

[NAIGEON, JEAN, a French historical and portrait painter, was born at Baune (Côte d'Or) in 1757, and was a scholar of the Academy at Dijon, and of David. His principal pictures are, The Infant Pyrrhus presented at the Court of Closias ; Eneas going to Battle ; Numa Pompilius consulting the nymph Egeria ; two bas-reliefs in the gallery of the Luxembourg, being allegories (en grisaille) of the glory of Rubens and Le Sueur ; the design for the grand Vignette engraved by Rôger for the brevets and acts of the government of the French republic. He also painted theatrical decorations, and portraits of distinguished persons of the day. He was conservator of the Museum of the Luxembourg, and a member of the Legion of Honour. He was living in 1831.]

NAIN, LE, ———. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1650. He excelled in painting domestic subjects and assemblages of peasantry, which are ingeniously grouped, and painted in a sweet and simple tone of colouring, which is extremely interesting. There is an appearance of truth and nature in the expression of his heads, which is admirable, and in a manner peculiar to himself.

[NAIN, LOUIS, ANTOINE, and MATTHIEU LE, three brothers, supposed to be natives of Laon, in France, and born respectively in the years 1583, 1585, and 1593 ; and that the two first died about the year 1648, and Matthieu at a much later period, but the date is uncertain. It is probable that the very interesting and pleasing subjects known as the works of LE NAIN, were painted by Louis and Antoine conjointly. They consist of familiar objects and incidents, such as interiors of inns, rustic habitations, domestic enjoyments, card-players, and village pastimes. Their pictures have characteristic peculiarities that distinguish them from those of all other masters. They are unequalled for natural expression and an air of truth. The subjects are generally simple, and the story is manifest ; it requires no explanation. Their young persons are specimens of unsophisticated nature. Their manner of painting is broad ; their colouring clear and sober, at the same time rich and juicy ; it partakes more of the Dutch than of the French school, and there is an occasional approach to the Spanish. The pictures by them, which are best known, are of the cabinet size. There was one of unusual large dimensions in Watson Taylor's collection, and is probably still in England ; it represented the interior of an inn, with a party of travellers, an itinerant performer on the hurdy-gurdy, and several other figures. Specimens are to be found in some of the richest cabinets in England, France, and Germany. Matthieu, it is conjectured, was more occupied in painting portraits and historical subjects for churches ; whether he was assisted in the latter by his brothers, has not yet been ascertained. Antoine is supposed to have been the most eminent, and Louis the next in degree ; but how are their performances to be distinguished ? It is surprising that so little should be recorded of artists whose works must have been popular at all times, as speaking directly to the apprehension of all. Some of their pictures have been engraved by Lebas, Daullé, Strange, Earlom, and others.]

NAIWINCK, or NAIWYNCX, HENRY, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Utrecht about the year 1620. He painted landscapes in the style of Anthony Waterloo, which are little known out of his own country, but he has distinguished himself as an engraver by some admirable etchings, which are deservedly esteemed by the intelligent collector. They are executed in a free and original style, and produce a picturesque and charming effect. They consist of two sets of landscapes, eight in each, one of upright plates, and the other length-ways. They are both numbered 1 to 8. The plate No. 1 in each set is inscribed, H. Nanteuil, fe. et inv. [Balkema, who writes the name Naeuwincx, says he was born at Schoonhoven, and that he painted woody and mountainous landscapes, views of villages, and fortifications; and that the figures and animals in his pictures are by Jan Asselyn. Bartsch, who has described the two sets of landscapes above mentioned, says it is uncertain what was his baptismal name, as some call him Henry, and others Herman, merely at a venture, from finding the letter H preceding his family name.]

NALDINI, BATISTA. This painter was born at Florence in 1537, and was first a scholar of Jacopo Carrucci, called Il Pontorno, but afterwards studied under Angioli Bronzino. According to Baglione he visited Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., where he painted several altar-pieces for the churches, of which the following are particularly noticed by that writer. In la Trinità de Monti, is a picture by him of the Baptism of Christ, and several subjects in fresco, of the life of St. John; and in the church of S. Giovanni Decollato, the Martyrdom of St. John the Evangelist. On his return to Florence he was engaged by Giorgio Vasari, as his coadjutor, in the works in which he was employed in the Palazzo Vecchio, where he was occupied fourteen years. He is commended by Vasari as a bold and ready designer, and as possessing uncommon facility of hand. His pictures of the Purification and Deposition from the Cross, in S. Maria Novella, at Florence, are extolled by Borghini for their composition and design, as well as the beauty of his colouring, and the elegance of his attitudes. He was living in 1590. [Zani supposes that he died about 1600.]

NANNI, GIOVANNI DA UDINE. See UDINE.

NANNI, GIROLAMO. This painter was a native of Rome, and flourished about the year 1642, during the pontificate of Sixtus V., by whom he was employed in several considerable works. He was generally known by the name of poco e buono, from the following circumstance. Being of a very studious disposition, and rather slow in his operation, he was reproached for his tardiness by Giovanni da Modena, a contemporary artist, when he replied, faccio poco e buono; and he bore that name ever afterwards. His works are to be seen in several of the public edifices at Rome. In the church of the Madonna dell' Animà is a picture by this master, representing the Annunciation; and in S. Bartolomeo dell' Isola, two subjects from the life of S. Bonaventura.

NANTEUIL, ROBERT, a celebrated French engraver, and painter in crayons, born at Rheims in 1630. He was the son of a merchant, who gave him a classical education, but a decided inclination for the art of design induced him to adopt it as a profession. He was instructed in engraving by his brother-in-law, Nicholas Regnesson, and became one of the most distinguished artists of his country. He acquired considerable reputation as a painter of portraits in crayons, and his talent in that branch recommended him to the protection of Louis XIV., whose portrait he painted, and was appointed designer and engraver of the cabinet, with a pension. In his first works, as an engraver, he appears to have imitated the style of Claude Mellan, in single strokes only, without being crossed; but he afterwards adopted one infinitely superior, which in clearness and beauty of effect has never been surpassed. His portraits will ever hold a rank among the most admired productions of the art; and their extraordinary merit will authorize our giving an ample list of them. Nanteuil died at Paris in 1678, at the age of 48, and it appears extraordinary, that in so short a life he could accomplish so many plates in so finished a style. Mariette possessed two hundred and eighty prints by this artist. The following are his most esteemed plates:

PORTRAITS.

- Anno of Austria, Queen of France; after Mignard.
 Several Portraits of Louis XIV.; from his own designs, Mignard, and others.
 Louis, Dauphin; son of Louis XIV. 1677.
 Louis Bourbon, Prince de Condé; after his own designs. 1662.

NAPOLITANO. See ANGELO.

NAPPI, FRANCESCO. According to Baglione, this painter was a native of Milan, and visited Rome, with some proficiency in the art, during the pontificate of Urban VIII. He was employed for some of the public edifices at Rome; but his works do not rank above mediocrity. His best productions are, his pictures of the Resurrection, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the cloister della Minerva; and the Annunciation, in the Monasterio dell' Umltà. [He was born in 1573, and died in 1638.]

NARDI, ANGELO. This painter was an Italian; but, according to Palomino, passed the greater part of his life in Spain, where he was painter to Philip IV. He is said by that author to have been a scholar of Paolo Veronese, whose style he imitated in all his works. Of his pictures in the churches of Madrid, the most esteemed are the Nativity and the Conception, in the church of the Franciscans; the Archangel St. Michael, and the Guardian Angel, in the church of the Barefooted Carmelites; and the Annunciation, in the Society of San Justo. He died at Madrid in 1660.

NASELLI, FRANCESCO, was born at Ferrara, and flourished about the year 1610. When young, he studied the works of Caracci and Guercino, which he copied with surprising success, but afterwards devoted himself to the manner of his countryman Giuseppe Mazzuoli, called Bastarnolo. He became an eminent painter of history, and was employed for several of the churches in Ferrara. In the cathedral is an altar-piece by him, representing the Nativity; in the church of S. Maria de Servi, a large picture of the Last Supper; and in the church of S. Francesca, the Assumption of the Virgin. He died at Ferrara in 1630.

NASINI, CAVALIERE GIUSEPPE [NICOLÒ.] This painter was born at Siena, in 1664. His father, Francesco Nasini, an artist little known, instructed him in the first rudiments of the art; but he afterwards became one of the ablest disciples of Ciro Ferri. He possessed a fertile imagination, and a resolute and commanding execution, which particularly qualified him for the great machinal works in fresco, in which he was chiefly employed, although he was deficient in correctness of design and dignity of character. By the recommendation of Ciro Ferri, he was employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, to paint from the designs of Pietro da Cortona, the Four Ages of Man, in emblematical subjects, in the Palazzo Pitti, which he executed to the satisfaction of his employer. On his return to Rome he was commissioned to paint the ceiling of the Capella Bracciana, in the church de S. S. Apostoli; and his picture of the Prophet Amos, in the Basilica of St. John of Lateran. There are many of his works at Siena, Florence, and Foligno. He died in 1736. [Gandellini says he was born in 1650. Bartsch describes a print by him of the Virgin and the infants Jesus and St. John in a landscape, with Cherubs flying in the air. It is designed in the taste of Ciro Ferri, and engraved with a delicate point in the manner of P. S. Bartoli, not quite so neatly, but with more freedom.]

[NASMYTH, ALEXANDER, a Scotch landscape painter, was born at Edinburgh in 1758. He went early to London, and was a pupil of Allan Ramsay;

he afterwards went to Rome, where he remained several years, and studied historical painting, landscape, and portraiture. On his return to Edinburgh, he commenced as a portrait painter, and had Robert Burns as one of his sitters. His inclination, however, being towards landscape painting, he ultimately confined himself to that branch; but much of his time was occupied in teaching, in which he was very successful. He died at Edinburgh in 1840. His landscapes are numerous; his style is picturesque and simple; his objects are seldom made grand and striking, though the subjects of his pencil would seem to demand something of artistic display. His colouring is weak and his pencilling timid, but his pictures exhibit the careful attention of the drawing-master in their finishing, and the exactness of the painter who adheres to a rule.]

[NASMYTH, PATRICK, son of Alexander Nasmyth, was born at Edinburgh in 1786, or 1787. He showed an early and decided predilection for landscape painting; and his zeal in pursuit of his favourite art left him little opportunity of acquiring any other instruction. Early in life he injured his right hand, and learned to use the pencil and brush with his left. At the age of twenty he went to London, and his productions became very popular, obtaining for him the designation of "the English Hobbema," though his manner of painting has very little in common with that of the great Dutch master; Wynants would be more appropriate, as the minuteness of detail in some of his smaller pictures seems to have been successfully imitated in many of Nasmyth's finished pieces. He improved on the style of his father, and his pictures have less of the spotted chalky character which, from its having been followed by several other members of this clever family, is considered as a chief feature of "the Nasmyth school." Patrick Nasmyth's landscapes are eminently pleasing, but there is too much attention to detail; they are deficient in breadth and vigour. He painted Scottish scenes, but the character of his landscapes is entirely English. His style was not sufficiently massive to represent properly the wild mountainous character, and striking atmospheric peculiarities of Scotland. Light clouds, sunshine, smooth water, or small pattering brooks, meadows, gently rising grounds, and green trees, are the objects which his pencil was best qualified to represent. He died at Lambeth, near London, on the 17th of August, 1831, during a thunder storm, which, at his own desire, he was raised in his bed to behold; thus exhibiting "the ruling passion strong in death." He is frequently called Peter, but his pictures are signed Pat^r Nasmyth, as the editor knows well, having had many of them.]

[NASON, PETER, a Dutch painter of portraits and still-life, who lived about the year 1670. It is said that he visited England, and painted Charles II.; certainly there are portraits by him in the country, neatly pencilled and delicately coloured. His still-life pieces, however, are most esteemed, and are to be found in some of the principal collections in Germany.]

NATALI, CARLO, called IL GUARDOLINO, born at Cremona about the year 1590. He was first a disciple of Andrea Mainardi, but afterwards studied at Bologna, under Guido Reni. There are several of his works at Genoa and Cremona, where he also distinguished himself as an architect. One of his best works, as a painter, is a picture of S. Francesca Romagna, in the church of S. Gismondo at Cremona, which, according to Lanzi, if it does not reach excellence, is above the rank of mediocrity. He died in 1683. [He was living in 1683; the exact time of his death is not ascertained.]

NATALI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Cremona about the year 1630, and distinguished himself as a painter and engraver. After receiving some instruction from his father he went to Rome, where he entered the school of Pietro da Cortona. On his return to Cremona, he painted several pictures for the churches, and established an academy, in which he cultivated the principles of Cortona, though without many followers. In the church of the P. P. Predicatori, is a large picture, embellished with architecture, representing S. Patriarca burning the Books of the Heretics, which Lanzi says is not unworthy of a follower of Pietro da Cortona. He died about the year 1700.

NATALINO, DA MURANO. See MURANO.

NATALIS, MICHAEL. This artist was born at Liege about the year 1589, and was instructed in design by Joachim Sandrart. He afterwards went to Antwerp, where he learned engraving, under Charles Mallery. From thence he went to Rome, where he adopted the style of Cornelius Bloemaert, which he followed with some success. In conjunction with that artist, Theodore Matham, and Regnier Persyn, he engraved part of the plates for the statues and busts in the Giustiniani Gallery, consisting of one hundred and fifty prints. He engraved several plates after works of some of the greatest Italian painters. On his return to Flanders he was invited to Paris, where he resided some time. The plates of Natalis are executed with the graver, in a free, open style, but without much taste. He handled the burin with great facility; his strokes are clear and regular, but the effect is generally cold and heavy, and his drawing is usually incorrect. He engraved a few portraits, which are among the best of his prints. We have, among others, the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

Josephus Justinianus Benedicti Filius; Mich. Natalis, fec.

Jacob Catz, Pensionary of Holland, and Poet.

Eugene d'Alamond, Bishop of Ghent.

Maximilian Emanuel, Elector of Bavaria; after J. Sandrart.

Frederick, Count of Merode.

Ernestine, Princess of Ligne; after Vanduyck.

The Marquis del Guasto, with his mistress represented as Venus; after Titian.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Raffaele.

The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Joseph seated behind, leaning his head upon his hand; after A. del Sarto.

The Holy Family; after N. Poussin. The first impressions are before the nudity of the child was covered with linen.

St Paul taken up into Heaven; after the same.

The Holy Family, with angels presenting flowers; after S. Bourdon.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.

The Virgin holding the infant Christ, who is sleeping, with St. John by her side; after the same. The first impressions are before the bosom of the Virgin was covered with linen.

St. Bruno at prayer; after Bertholet Flemael.

The Assembly of the Carthusians; in four sheets; after the same.

Mary washing the Feet of Christ; after Rubens.

The Last Supper; after Diepenbeck.

St. Francis with a Lamb; after the same.

[Michael Natalis was born in 1606 or 1609, about the same time as Sandrart: the date of his death is uncertain, but it is known that he was working in 1670.]

NATOIRE, CHARLES [FRANÇOIS,] a French painter and engraver, born at Nismes in 1700. He was a scholar of Francis Le Moine, and after the death of that master was employed to finish the works he left imperfect. His principal works at Paris are the pictures he painted for the chapel of Les Enfants Trouvés, which are now much damaged. He was appointed Director of the French Academy at Rome, where he died in 1775. We have a few etchings by Natoire, executed in a free, spirited style; they are from his own designs. Among others are the following :

The Crucifixion, with Mary Magdalene at the foot of the Cross.

The Adoration of the Magi.

The Martyrdom of St. Fereol.

Two, of the Sports of Children.

Spring and Winter; etched by Natoire, and finished with the graver by P. Aveline.

[Dumesnil's list of his prints differs from the foregoing. He also says that he died at Castel-Gandolfo in 1777, and not in 1775, as stated by several writers; the latter being the year in which Vien succeeded him as director of the school at Rome, he having retired on account of his age. Proof-etchings of the Crucifixion, and of the four Seasons, are more rare than those finished with the graver.]

NATTIER, JOHN MARK, a French artist, born at Paris in 1685. He chiefly distinguished himself as a portrait painter, in which he was much employed, and became a member of the Academy at Paris. He made the designs for the engravings of the Luxembourg Gallery, painted by Rubens. He died in 1776, aged 82.

NAVARETTE. See MUÑOZ, EL.

NAVARO, JUAN. This Spanish engraver is stated by Strutt to have resided at Seville about the year 1598. He engraved several frontispieces for books, which are executed with the graver in a very indifferent style.

[NAVARRO, JUAN SIMON, an historical and flower painter, who lived at Madrid about the middle of the 17th century, as appears by a picture bearing the date 1654. It represents the Virgin, of the size of life, employed in the workshop of Joseph, who is sawing a board, and the infant Jesus is forming a cross in the midst of a group of angels. It is more remarkable for colour than for correctness of design or skill in the management. As a painter of flowers he holds a more respectable rank. In the convent of the shod Carmelites at Madrid, are a Nativity and an Epiphany by him, which were formerly in the convent of the same order at Valdemorly.]

NAZZARI, BARTOLOMEO. According to Tassi, this painter was born in the territory of Clusane, in the Bergamese state, in 1699, and was first a scholar of Angelo Trevisani at Venice. He afterwards studied at Rome, under Benedetto Luti and Francesco Trevisani, and became a reputable painter of history and portraits, but particularly excelled in the latter, in which he was much employed at the different courts in Germany. One of the most esteemed of his historical pictures is a Holy Family, with St. Anne, at Pontremoli. He died in 1758.

[NEALE, JOHN PRESTON, a very eminent English architectural designer and engraver, was born in 1770. In 1818 he published the first portion of the "History and Antiquities of Westminster Abbey," and in 1823 the second part, forming together two volumes royal quarto, containing 61 beautiful engravings. The literary part, consisting of Notices and Biographical Memoirs of the Abbots and Deans of that foundation, was written by E. W. Brayley. Coeval with the first portion of this work, he published six volumes, royal quarto, of "The Seats of Noblemen and Gentlemen of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland;" and in 1829 a second series in 5 vols., containing, in the whole, 737 plates. The labour of producing two such important works in the period would have been sufficient employment for the most industrious designer; but Neale was indefatigable. During the years 1824 and 1825 he published, in conjunction with Le Keux, "Views of the most interesting Collegiate and Parochial Churches of Great Britain, including Screens, Fonts, Monuments, &c., with historical and architectural descriptions," containing 98 plates, in which the talents of both artists appear to the greatest advantage. In the earlier part of his artistic career he painted many architectural subjects in oil, with views of their several localities, in which he exhibited the feeling and power of a great landscape painter. The success that attended his publications, however, induced him to abandon the palette and devote his energies and skill to a department in which he particularly delighted, and in which, for a long time, he stood unrivalled. Many detached pieces were designed and executed by him for the embellishment of other publications; but the works already noticed are sufficient to place him among the most eminent pictorial recorders of our national architecture. This distinguished artist closed his long industrious life at the commencement of the present year, 1848.]

NEALE, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He resided in London, where he etched the portrait of Bindo Altoviti, after Titian. It is executed in the style of Gaywood, and possesses considerable merit. Strutt conjectures that he had a share in engraving the plates for the octavo edition of Ogilby's Fables. If this should be the fact, they afford no favourable specimens of his talents. [He is supposed to have been a disciple of Hollar, and engraved after him 24 pieces of Holbein's Dances of Death, the first of which is marked, Paris, 1657. He signed his prints with his name in full, or with the letters T. N. He etched several of the plates of birds after Barlow; these were executed at Paris in 1659. It is very probable that he did engrave some of the plates for Ogilby's Æsop.]

[NEAPOLI, FRANCISCO, a Spanish historical painter, supposed to have been a scholar of Lionardo da Vinci, from the resemblance of his works to those of that great master. In conjunction with Pablo Aregio, it is said that he painted the doors that enclose the great altar of the cathedral of Valencia. This work was finished in 1506, and for it the artists received 3000 ducats. Villanueva, however, thinks them to be the work of Felipe Paulo di S^t. Leucadia, a Burgundian artist, and that they were ordered, and paid for, by Rodriga Borja, in 1471. See Ford's Handbook for Spain, p. 439.]

NEBBIA, CESARE. This painter was born at Orvieto about the year 1536, and was the ablest scholar of Girolamo Muziano, whose style he adopted, and assisted him in the considerable works he executed for Gregory XIII., in the Vatican, and in the Capella Gregoriana. He was himself employed by Gregory's successor, Sextus V., in superintending the works undertaken by order of that pontiff, in the palaces of St. John of Lateran, and Monte Cavallo, in the library of the Vatican, and in the Scala Santa, in which he was assisted by Giovanni Guerra da Modena. He painted several pictures for the churches in Rome, which are particularly noticed by Baglione, of which the most considerable are the Resurrection, in S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli; some subjects of the life of the Virgin, painted in fresco, in the Capella Borghese, in S. Maria Maggiore; and the Crowning of the Virgin, in S. Maria de Monti. Though Cesare Nebbia possessed a ready invention and uncommon dexterity of hand, he is very inferior to Muziano in the grandeur of his style and the dignity of his characters. He died at Rome about the year 1614.

NECK, JOHN VAN. This painter was born at Naarden in 1636. He was the son of a physician, who destined him to his own profession, but yielded to the marked disposition his son evinced for the art, and placed him under the tuition of Jacob de Backer, an eminent painter of history and portraits, whose style he followed with great success. Houbraken speaks of his talents as an historical painter in the most flattering terms, and particularly commends a picture by him representing the Presentation in the Temple, in the French church at Amsterdam, which is finely composed and correctly drawn. He was still more successful in painting subjects of the Fable, in which he discovers a perfect acquaintance with the nude, and his female figures are designed with an elegance and taste unusual in his country. He was also an eminent portrait painter, in which he was very extensively employed. He resided chiefly at Amsterdam, where he died in 1714.

[NECKER, or NEGKER, JOBST, or JOSSE DE, of Nordlingen, was one of the most skilful engravers in wood of the 16th century. He was much employed by Hans Burgmaier, for whom he executed part of the prints in the Triumph of Maximilian. He generally marked his name in full letters; there is but one print known with his cipher only, †st d n in old German characters. By some writers he is supposed to be the same as Josse de Necker, or Dennecker, who worked at Augsburg in the middle of the 16th century, and engraved the prints of Holbein's Dance of Death, published in 1544; at the end of that work the artist calls himself Jobst Dennecker Formschneyder. Brulliot does not agree in this opinion; he thinks the engraver of Augsburg was son of the engraver of Nordlingen. Nagler, under the head of Necker, or Negker, Danneker, or Denneker, has given a detailed account, in which will be found all that probably can be known with certainty respecting the artist or artists, his or their works, that are specified under those names.]

[NEDEK, PIETER, born at Amsterdam in 1616, was a scholar of P. Lastman. He painted history, portraits, and landscapes; the last have considerable merit. He died in 1678.]

NEE, DENIS, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1732, [or 1735.] He was a pupil of J. P. Le Bas, and has engraved several plates in the neat style of that artist, with considerable success. Among others, he executed several vignettes for Ovid's Metamorphoses, published at Paris, and engraved several landscapes, after A. Vande Velde, and other Dutch masters. We have also the following by him:

Several Views in Switzerland; after Chatelet.

The Massacre of St. Bartholomew; after Gravelot.

Three Views in Martinique; after the Chevalier d'Epemay.

Benjamin Franklin; after Charmontel.

A View of the City of Lyons; after Lallemand.

The Environs of Frascati; after the same.
A View of Tivoli; after the same.

[He died about 1818. He engraved for numerous picturesque works, published in his time, conjointly with other eminent French engravers; an account of them is given by Nagler in his Kunstler-Lexicon.]

NEEF, or NEEFS, PETER, the ELDER. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1570, and was a scholar of Henry Steenwyck the elder. He painted similar subjects to those in which his instructor had acquired much celebrity, representing the interiors of churches and temples, which he finished with a precision and a neatness of pencil that is altogether surprising. His knowledge of perspective was so correct, that he would exhibit in the small space of a cabinet picture the most vast and magnificent Gothic edifices, in which the beholder is deluded into a belief in the reality and immensity of the space the building represents. Every ornament of the architecture, and the various decorations of the churches, are designed with the utmost correctness, and touched with a delicacy that is inimitable. To avoid the monotony almost inseparable from such a subject, in which the regularity of lines and the uniformity of tints would appear cold and insipid, he introduced, with infinite art, a variety of objects, to animate and diversify the scene, and by a judicious management of the chiaro-scuro, he gave a lively and pleasing effect to what in less able hands would have been tame and uninteresting. He frequently represented these objects by torch-light, in which the degradation is managed with singular skill, and they are perhaps the most picturesque and the most desirable of his works. Peter Neefs was not successful in the design of the figure, and some of his pictures have the additional recommendation of being decorated with those of the elder Teniers, John Breughel, and others. [Balkema says he died in 1651. The figures in some of his pictures are by Van Tulden and Francks.]

NEEF, or NEEFS, PETER, the YOUNGER, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1600. He painted similar subjects to those of his father, but they are greatly inferior, both in the neatness of the finishing and the correctness of the perspective. [According to Immerzeel and Balkema he was born in 1601, and died in 1658; but the latter is not correct, as there are pictures by him with the date 1660, and perhaps still later.]

NEEF, or NEEFS, JAMES, [OR JACOB,] a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1630. It is probable that he was of the same family with the two preceding artists. He distinguished himself, with several of his contemporaries, by the plates he engraved after Rubens, Vandeyck, and the other celebrated painters of the Flemish school. His plates are principally executed with the graver, which he handled with great facility. His drawing, without being incorrect, is stiff and mannered, and the expression of his heads is occasionally outré and extravagant. His best prints are, however, justly esteemed. The following are his most esteemed works:

PORTRAITS.

Gaspar Nemius, Bishop of Antwerp; after Gerard Segers.

John Tollenario, Jesuit; after P. Fruytiers.

Francis Snyders, Painter; after Vandeyck.

Anthony de Tassis, Canon of Antwerp; after the same.

The Marchioness of Barlemon, Countess d'Égmont; after the same.

Josse de Hertoghe; after the same.

Martin Ryckart, Painter; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Fall of the Angels; after Rubens.

The Meeting of Abraham and Melchisedec; after the same.

The Crucifixion, with the Virgin and St. John; after the same.

St. Augustine; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Thomas; after the same.

The Judgment of Paris, and the Triumph of Galatea, called the Ewer of Charles I.; after the same; scarce.

Christ and the Six Penitents; after Gerard Segers.

Job and his Wife; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Lievin; after the same.

Christ appearing to Magdalene; after Gerard Segers.

Christ brought before Pilate; after J. Jordans.

The Satyr, with the Peasant blowing Hot and Cold; after the same.

St. Roch interceding for the Persons attacked by the Plague; after Erasmus Quellinus.

[Zani and Ferrario say he was born in 1639; Nagler says about 1610: the last is nearest the truth, as there are prints by him with the dates 1632 and 1633. The time of his death is not known, but the latest date noted is 1645. For a detailed account of his prints see Nagler.]

NEER, ARNOLD, [OR AART,] VANDER. This eminent painter was born at Amsterdam in 1619. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he distinguished himself in a peculiar but interesting style. He excelled in painting views in Holland by moonlight, representing groups of cottages or fishermen's huts on the banks of a river or canal with boats and figures. The moon, "rising in clouded majesty," or from her lustrous height, sheds her silvery beams on every object, and their light, reflected by the respondent glittering of the water, produces the most fascinating and picturesque effect. Vander Neer was a perfect master of the chiaro-scuro. He occasionally painted pictures of sun-set, and in the glowing richness and harmony of his colouring he sometimes approaches the excellence of Rubens and Rembrandt. He was not less successful in painting winter pieces, with figures amusing themselves on the ice, in which he is only surpassed by the admirable productions of Albert Cuyp. He died in 1683. [Some place his birth in 1613; and it is said that he was living in 1691. The picture by Vanderneer and Cuyp in the National Gallery was offered for sale in Lucien Buonaparte's collection, and bought in at 360 guineas; at Énard's sale at Paris it was purchased by Lord Farnborough for more than double that sum, and bequeathed by him to the nation.]

NEER; EGLON HENDRICK VANDER, was the son of Arnold Vander Neer, born at Amsterdam in 1643, and received his first instruction from his father, but his taste leading him to a different branch of the art, he was placed under the care of Jacob van Loo, a painter of history and portraits at Amsterdam. When he was twenty years of age he went to Paris, where he passed four years, and painted some small portraits and domestic subjects, which were generally admired. On his return to Holland he attempted some historical and fabulous subjects, which have little to recommend them but delicacy of colour and careful finishing. He was more successful in his pictures of conversations and gallant subjects, which are tastefully composed and correctly drawn, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Terburg and Netscher. His pictures of this description are justly held in high estimation; they are very highly finished, and though less mellow and harmonious than those of Metzu and Mieris, they are well coloured, and touched with great delicacy. Eglon Vander Neer has the credit of having been the instructor of Adrian Vanderwerf, and his portrait by himself is honoured with a place among the illustrious painters in the Florentine Gallery. He was for some time employed by the Elector Palatine at Dusseldorf, where he died in 1703. [See Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the Works of the Dutch and Flemish Masters, vol. iv. and Supplement, for descriptions of about 40 pictures by this master. His pictures are very rare.]

[NEGKER, DE. See NECKER.]

[NEGRE, MATTHIAS VAN, an historical and architectural painter, who lived about 1620 or 1630. In the cathedral of Tournay is a Holy Family by him, with a glory of angels. Descamps mentions him, but there are no particulars of his life, or where his other works are to be found.]

[NEGRE, NICOLAAS VAN, a portrait painter, who flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. Suyderhoef, Van Dalen, and Crispin de Pass have engraved after him.]

NEGRI, PIER MARTIRE. This painter was a native of Cremona, and flourished about the year 1600. According to Zaist, he was a disciple of Giovanni Batista Trotti, called Il Malosso, and distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits. He afterwards studied at Rome, and was received into the Academy of St. Luke. In the church of the Hospital, at Cremona, is an admired work by this master, representing Christ restoring Sight to the Blind; and, according to Lanzi, a finer picture of St. Joseph, at the Certosa at Pavia.

NEGRONE, [OR NIGRONE,] PIETRO. This artist was a native of Calabria, born about the year 1495. According to Dominici, he was a disciple of Giovanni Antonio d'Amato, and also studied under Marco Calabrese. At Naples, in the church of S. Maria Donna Romata, are two pictures by this master, representing the Adoration of the Magi, and the Scourging of Christ, painted in the year 1541. And in the church of S. Agnello a picture representing the Virgin Mary and infant Christ in the clouds, with a glory of angels, and below St. Catherine, St. Gerome, and St. Onofrio. He died in 1565, aged about 70. [Both Lanzi and Zani say he was about 60 when he died. He was called il giovane Zingaro, the young gipsy.]

[NEGROPONTE, FRÀ FRANCESCO, OR ANTONIO, DA, a Venetian painter, who flourished in the early part of the fifteenth century: he was of the order of Cappuccini. Kugler says his works are in a similar style to those of Jacobello del Fiore, but are distinguished by a peculiar dignity allied to the early Christian art.]

NELLI, SUOR PLAUTILLA. According to Lanzi, this lady was of a noble family, born at Florence in 1523. Without any other assistance than the study of some designs of Fra. Bartolomeo di S. Marco, of which she was in possession, she acquired a respectable talent as a paintress. She became a religious of the Dominican convent of St. Catherine at Florence, and painted for their church a Descent from the Cross, which is said to have been from a design by Andrea del Sarto, and a picture of the Adoration of the Magi, a work of great merit, of her own composition. She died in 1588.

NELLI, NICCOLO. This artist was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1568. From the style of his engraving, he is supposed to have been a disciple of Marco da Ravenna. He engraved an architectural frontispiece, with figures, for a book of plans and views of the most illustrious cities and fortresses in the world, published in 1568. It is inscribed Nicolo Nelli Veneziano, f. The figures are well drawn, and the print is executed with considerable ability. Strutt observes, that many of the prints without marks, of the above date, particularly those which bear a resemblance to the works of Marco da Ravenna, may be attributed to this engraver.

[NERANUS, A———. This painter flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century, and imitated the manner of Rembrandt. In Cardinal Fesch's collection was a picture by him representing Pilate washing his hands on delivering Christ to the Jews to be crucified. It is also said that he painted in the style of Van Vliet. There are no particulars of him recorded.]

NERONI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was a native of Siena, and flourished about the year 1573. He was a disciple of Giovanni Antonio Razzi. He painted history, but was more celebrated for his perspective and architectural views. At the Osservanti at Siena is a Crucifixion, with a great number of figures; and in the church of the Derelitte, a Descent from the Cross, which is painted entirely in the style of his master.

NES, OR NEES, JOHN VAN, was born at Dord about the year 1600, and was a scholar of Michael Mirevelt. By the advice of his instructor he travelled to Italy, and studied some time at Rome and at Venice. On his return to Holland he painted some historical pictures, which were deservedly admired; and he would probably have distinguished himself in that branch of the art, had not the general demand for his portraits, which he painted in the fine style of Mirevelt, induced him, for the sake of emolument, to devote himself entirely to portrait painting, in which, to a perfect resemblance, he added dignity of character, and a chaste and vigorous colouring. He died in 1650. [Füssli says he was a native of Delft, and flourished in 1670; Balkema, that he was born at Utrecht in 1635, and died in 1692; Immerzeel says he was of Delft, and died in 1650.]

NETSCHER, GASPAR. According to d'Argenville, this painter was born at Prague in 1636; but Descamps, who follows the authority of Houbraken, asserts that he was born at Heidelberg, in 1639. His father was a sculptor, and an engineer in the Polish service, who died when he was only two years of age, leaving a widow with three children, of which Gaspar was the youngest. The calamities of war obliged her to fly from Germany, and make the best of her way towards Holland. Two of her children perished with hunger on the road, and she arrived at Arnheim in Guelderland in a state of the utmost wretchedness. An opulent physician, named Tullenkens, compassionated her miserable situation, took the young Netscher under his protection, and brought him up as his own son. He educated him with the intention of his following the medical profession, but his genius strongly inclining to the art of painting, it was judged best to give way to it; he was in consequence placed under a painter of dead game and still-life, with whom he did not remain long, as these were not subjects in which he was ambitious of excelling. He became a disciple of Gerard Terburg, whose style, and the beauty of his pencil, were more congenial to his taste, and his progress under that master was so extraordinary, that in a few years his pictures were held in nearly as high estimation as those of his instructor. On leaving the school of Terburg, he determined to visit Italy, and with that intention embarked at Amsterdam for Bourdeaux, where he was induced to remain some time, by the encouragement he received on his arrival, as a painter of portraits. His intended journey was perhaps more effectually interrupted by an attachment he conceived for the niece of the person at whose house he lodged, whom he married. This union prevented his proceeding to Italy, and he returned to Holland, where his talents promised him a more certain establishment. The pictures of Netscher usually represent domestic subjects and conversations, which are treated with a delicacy of penciling and a lustre of colour, that remind us of the exquisite productions of Francis Mieris and Terburg. His design is more correct than that of the latter painter, and his compositions are arranged with more taste. His touch is spirited, yet mellow, and, like his instructor, he particularly excelled in painting white satin, silk, ermine, &c., which are represented with a fidelity approaching to illusion. He sometimes painted historical and fabulous subjects, but they are not the most esteemed of his works; he was more successful in portraits of a small size, in which he was much employed. He is said, in the Anecdotes, to have visited England by the invitation of Sir William Temple, in the reign of Charles II., but did not remain long here. Among other persons of distinction, he painted the portrait of Lord Berkeley of Stratton and his lady, dated 1676. He died at the Hague in 1684. [See Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. iv. and Supplement, for accurate descriptions of 120 pictures by this very estimable master.]

NETSCHER, THEODORE, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Bourdeaux in 1661. At the age of eighteen he visited Paris, under the protection of the Count Davaux, who had been ambassador from France to Holland, by whom he was recommended, and received great encouragement as a portrait painter, during a residence of twenty years. The love of his country induced him to return to Holland; he fixed his residence at the Hague, and was employed by the principal personages of the court. The states of Holland having determined to send to England six thousand auxiliary troops at the time of the rebellion in 1715, Netscher had interest enough to be appointed paymaster, and came to this country in that capacity, where he resided six years, and met with great encouragement as a portrait painter. This circumstance is related by M. Descamps with an appearance of precision and plausibility that entitle it to our credit, although it is remarkable, that his being so long in England, and so extensively employed here, should have escaped the notice of the noble author of the Anecdotes. He is said to have returned to Holland in 1722, where he died in 1732. [In his larger pictures he introduced fruit, flowers, turkey carpets, and other decorations, to give them richness. He was particularly successful in his representations of grapes and peaches, which he coloured with great beauty and transparency. His manner of painting was, however, very different from that of his father.]

NETSCHER, CONSTANTINE. This artist was the younger son of Gaspar Netscher, born at the Hague in 1670. He learned the first principles of art from his father, but when he had reached the age of fourteen, death deprived him of the advantage of his instruction. It does not appear that he studied under any other master, but contented himself with consulting the pictures, sketches, and drawings left by his father, and by an assiduous and constant imitation of them, he became an expert and successful follower of his style. He was very extensively employed in painting portraits, and was encouraged by the principal personages of his time. Among his other protectors, were the families of Wassenaer and Duivenvoorden, whose portraits he painted, with those of the Earl and Countess of Portland. Descamps reports, that the Earl used every persuasion to prevail on him to visit England, which he declined, on account of the infirm state of his health. His talents were not confined to portraits, he occasionally painted domestic subjects and conversations; but in these he was very inferior to Gaspar. He was received into the Society of Painters at the Hague in 1699, of which he was afterwards appointed the director. His best works are his portraits, in which he possessed a talent infinitely calculated to secure success to an artist in that branch. To a faithful resemblance, he united the most flattering and favourable representation of his model, particularly in his portraits of women, which are gracefully designed and delicately coloured. He died in 1722. [The inelegant costume of persons of fashion, at the period in which he flourished, militates much against the beauty of his portraits, which are finely executed.]

NEVE, FRANCIS DE, was born at Antwerp about the year 1627, and for some time studied the works of Rubens and Vandyck. He afterwards visited Rome, where he resided some years, and on his return to his native country gave proof of considerable ability as a painter of history; but he afterwards distinguished himself more as a painter of what are called heroic landscapes, with subjects from history or the fable, in which he exhibits the fertility of his genius, and the refinement of his taste. We have by this artist several etchings, executed in a slight, but very masterly style. They are embellished with figures, correctly drawn and ingeniously grouped. [Balkema and others say he was born in 1625, and died in 1681. Bartsch describes fourteen etchings by him; on several of which is inscribed Fran. de Neue; and it appears that they were published at Rome by Giacomo de Rossi.]

NEVEU, [or NAVEU,] MATTHEW. This painter was born at Leyden in 1647, and was first a scholar of Abraham Toren Vliet, but he had afterwards the advantage of being instructed by Gerard Dou. He painted domestic subjects and conversations, in the highly finished style of that painter, which, though inferior to the extraordinary productions of Dou, are correctly drawn, and well coloured. Houbraken highly commends a picture by Neveu at Amsterdam, representing the works of Mercy, a composition of a great number of figures, ingeniously grouped, the heads full of character and expression. His works are principally confined to Holland, where they are justly esteemed. He died in 1721. [Some of his pictures have been imported into England; they are excellent of their class, but differ widely from the works of G. Dou.]

NEURAUTTER, A., a German engraver, who resided at Prague about the year 1715. He engraved a set of figures, entitled Statue Pontis Pragenensis, published in that year. They are executed with the graver, in a laboured, formal style, with more finish than taste.

NEWTON, EDWARD. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of William Tansur, the musician, published with his Melodia Sacra. It is inscribed E. Newton, j. ad vivum, f.

NEWTON, JAMES. This English engraver was probably a relation of the preceding artist. He resided in London about the year 1778. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Sidney Parkinson, Draftsman on board of the Endeavour, Capt. Cook.
William Newton, Clerk of the Works at Greenwich Hospital.
Edward Sergeant, Secretary to the Protestant Association in 1780.

LANDSCAPES.

Two Views in Italy; after Marco Ricci.
A Landscape, with Cattle passing a River; after Claude.
The Herdsman, a pastoral Landscape; after Zucarelli.

NEWTON, FRANCIS MILNER, was born in London about the year 1720, and was a pupil of M. Tuschler. As an artist, he confined himself to portrait painting, in which he was considerably employed. At the foundation of the Royal Academy Mr. Newton was chosen a member, and was appointed the first secretary to that institution, which situation he filled until 1788, when he resigned. He died in 1794.

[NEWTON, GILBERT STUART, was born at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, in 1794, or 1795. He commenced his studies with his maternal uncle, Gilbert Stuart, at Boston. He came to England about 1820, and, after making a tour in Italy, entered as a student of the Royal Academy. He adopted Watteau as his model, and produced several small pictures much in the affected style of that master, as regards the figures, but with more of distinctive character and expression. His first works that attracted notice were the Forsaken, and the Lovers' Quarrel, engraved for the "Literary Souvenir" of 1826. The Prince of Spain's Visit to Catalina was engraved in the same Annual in 1831, and he received 500 guineas from the Duke of Bedford for the picture. His other works, best known to the public by the engravings, are Shylock and Jessica, Yorick and the Grisette, the Abbot Boniface, Portia and Bassanio, and Lear attended by Cordelia and the Physician. He also painted a small picture of Abelard in his Study, said to be a work full of sentiment and expression; the Vicar of Wakefield restoring his Daughter to her Mother; the Poet, reading his Verses to an impatient Gallant, a piece of genuine humour; Macheath, and a few portraits. The Macheath was purchased by the Marquis of Lansdowne for 500 guineas. His Abelard was the last picture he exhibited at the Royal Academy, in 1833, and it was about this time that he evinced signs of aberration of mind, and these were followed by unequivocal insanity, from which he recovered only four days before his decease. His death occurred August the 3rd, 1835, at Chelsea. He was a member of the Royal Academy. It is said that he painted slowly, and was laborious and fastidious in his execution; but his pictures show nothing of the fine handling and exquisite finishing of the Dutch masters; they have, however, all that is requisite for his subjects. It is said that he was irritable and capricious; the best answer to the charge is that he enjoyed the friendship and esteem of Washington Irving and Charles R. Leslie.]

[NEYN, PETER DE, born at Leyden in 1597, studied for some time under Esaias Vander Velde, and gave promise of becoming a good landscape painter, in the manner of his master; but afterwards applied his talents to architecture, in which he succeeded so well as to be appointed architect to his native city, Leyden, where he died in 1639.]

[NEYTS, GILES, a painter and engraver, of whose history little is known, except that he flourished towards the latter part of the 17th century, as appears by the date 1681 on one of two pictures preserved in the electoral gallery at Dresden. Bartsch speaks in praise of his manner of etching and finishing with the graver. He describes ten subjects by him, (P. G. tom. iv. p. 307,) all with which he was acquainted; but Nagler adds eleven to the list. Brulliot, with great probability, conjectures that the mark Cy on pictures of landscapes, belongs to this artist. There are small landscape-drawings with the pen, washed with Indian ink, the trees of which are in the manner of Swaneveldt, supposed to be by this artist; they are marked A. E. Neyts, perhaps for Ægidius instead of Giles.]

[NICASIUS, BERNARD, a pupil of F. Snyders, whose manner he imitated, and sometimes closely approached, in landscape, hunting-pieces, fruit, and still-life subjects. He was born at Antwerp in 1618, and, having travelled in Italy and France, died at Paris in 1678. It would be useless to refer to any of his pictures in private collections, as the possessors are fully persuaded that they are by Snyders: the dealers of old have much to answer for.]

NICCOLO, DEL ABATI. See ABATI.

NICHOLS, STUTON, an indifferent English engraver, who resided in London about the year 1710. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he executed a considerable number of plates. His best prints are slight etchings of shells, and other trifling subjects; when he made use of the graver, his productions were miserably deficient both in execution and drawing.

NICOLAI, G. D. C. This artist resided at Vienna about the year 1760. Conjointly with A. J. Prenner, he executed part of the plates from the pictures in the grand gallery at Vienna, which were published in four sets in folio.

[NICOLAY, JAN HENDRIK, was born at Leeuwarden in 1766. He was a great ornithologist, and delighted in painting dead birds, which he did with great skill. He was a frequent exhibitor at Amsterdam, and his works are much esteemed in Holland. He died in 1826.]

NICOLE, D. The name of this artist is affixed to a set of views slightly etched, in the style of a painter. They are marked with a monogram, composed of a W. and an R. joined thus, WR., which probably are the initials of the designer.

NICOLET, BENEDICT ALPHONSUS, a Swiss engraver, born at St. Imer, in the bishopric of Basle, in 1740. He went to Paris when he was young, where his first performances were some plates, engraved in conjunction with Longueil, after the marines of Vernet. He also engraved several of the plates which embellished the Voyage Pittoresque du Royaume de Naples, by the Abbé de St. Non. The following are esteemed his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Noel Hallé, Painter to the King. 1775; after Cochin.
Thomas Le Sueur, Professor of Mathematics at Rome; after the same.
Francis de Paul Jacquier, Professor of Mathematics; after the same.
Nicholas de Monthanon; after the same.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

St. Apollonia; after the picture by Guido; in the Orleans collection.

Milo Crotoniate; after Giorgione; the same.

Susanna and the Elders; after Deshaets.

A View of Naples; after Vernet.

A Shipwreck; after the same.

A View of the Interior of the Church of St. Januarius at Naples; after Dupres.

[There is some confusion in the accounts of this artist. Nagler calls him Bernhard Anton, and says he was born in 1740, and died in 1807: Zani agrees in the date of Bernard Antonio's death, but places his birth in 1754; Benedict Alfonso he says was born in 1740, and operated in 1784: Nagler does not mention him, but it is evident that he means the engraver of the above-named works; and to which he has added several others.]

[NIEULANT, ADRIAN, born at Antwerp, was a good painter of landscapes, which he ornamented with small figures. In the Museum at Brussels is a Carnival Scene by him, representing masked figures skating on the fosse that surrounds the citadel of Antwerp; it appears to be the depth of winter, as the trees and tops of the houses are covered with snow. He died about 1601; but no particulars of him are recorded.]

[NIEULANT, JAN, born at Antwerp in 1569, painted historical pictures of small dimensions; but excelled in landscapes, which he finished with infinite pains: he died in 1628.]

NIEULANT, WILLIAM VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1584. After being instructed in the first principles of the art by Roland Savery, he went to Rome, where he became the scholar of Paul Bril, under whom he studied three years, and for some time followed the style of that master; but he afterwards adopted one more bold and expeditious. On his return to Holland he established himself at Amsterdam, where he was much employed in painting views of the ruins of ancient architecture in the vicinity of Rome, from the designs he had made during his residence in Italy. His buildings are drawn with exactness and precision, and his colouring is bold and effective. William van Nieulant has etched several plates of landscapes and ruins, from his own designs, and from those of Paul Bril. They are executed in a free, spirited style, and are occasionally assisted with the graver. Among others, we have the following by him:

A Landscape, with ruins, and figures representing the Merciful Samaritan; P. Bril, inv. G. Nieulant, fecit.

A Mountainous Landscape, with Tobit and the Angel; the same.

Two Views of the Sea Coast; the same.

Three Views of Ruins in and near Rome; Guil. Nieulant.

A large Print, representing three Bridges on the Tiber, and part of the City of Rome; in three sheets, inscribed, Guilielmus van Nieulant, fecit et eacud. Antverpiæ. 1600.

[All writers on the subject are agreed that this artist was born in 1584; he was therefore only 16 years old when he published the large print of the Bridges on the Tiber and part of the City of Rome. How is this to be reconciled with his being instructed by Roland Savery, and afterwards being a scholar of Paul Bril for three years? He died in 1635.]

NIKKELËN, JOHN VAN. This artist was born at Haerlem in 1649. His father was an obscure painter of perspective views, and the interiors of churches, who instructed him in the first principles of design. He did not pursue the same branch of art, but applied himself to landscape painting, in which he acquired considerable reputation. He passed some time at the court of the Elector Palatine, for whom he painted several pictures, and was afterwards made painter to the Prince of Cassel. He died in 1716. [The J. van Nikkelen, whether Isaac or Jan, ought not to be called an "obscure painter of churches"; pictures bearing that inscription are in the manner of Van Vliet, and are very good. It is difficult now to say whether they are by the father or son. The landscapes of Jan van Nikkelen have a resemblance to those of Karel Dujardin. His daughter Jacoba Maria, was a pupil of Vander Myn, and excelled in painting fruit and flowers. She married William Troost, a portrait painter. The pictures she painted at Dusseldorf have been erroneously ascribed to her father.]

NILSON, JOHN ELIAS, a German miniature painter and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1721. He engraved several portraits of eminent persons, which are executed in a stiff, formal style. Among others are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Clement XIII., Pontif. Max.; Nilson, inv. et fec.

Petrus III., Rurorum Imperator.

Catherina Alexiewna, Rurorum Imperatrix.

Stanislaus Augustus, Rex Pol.

NIMECIUS, BALTHASAR MENEIUS, was an indifferent engraver on wood, and is said to have been a native of Saxony. Professor Christ attributes to him a monogram composed of a B. an M. and an N., thus M. He sometimes used the initials only.

NIMEGUEN, [OR NYMEGEN,] ELIAS VAN, was born at Nimeguen in 1667, and was taught the first elements of the art by his elder brother, who was an indifferent painter of flowers and portraits; but on the death of his instructor, when he was little more than fourteen years of age, he resolved to dispense with further assistance, and applied himself to an assiduous study of nature. By an indefatigable attention to his profession, he became a tolerably correct designer of the figure, and acquired a competent acquaintance with perspective and architecture. He also excelled in painting landscapes and flowers. His principal occupation was ornamenting the ceilings and saloons of the principal mansions in Holland, with emblematical and historical subjects, embellished with bas-reliefs and other accessories. His talents recommended him to the patronage of the Princess of Orange, who employed him in adorning the apartments of her different palaces, where he was occupied several years. He possessed a ready invention, and his continual practice gave him great promptness and facility in his execution; his colouring is clear and agreeable, and his style was happily adapted to the decorative department, to which he devoted himself. He died in 1745, aged 78. [Most writers place his death in 1755, at the age of 87.]

NIMEGUEN, [OR NYMEGEN,] TOBIAS VAN, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Nimeguen about the year 1670. His technical education was similar to that of Elias van Nimeguen; and he pursued the same branch of the art, in which he gained considerable reputation. Tobias was invited to the court of the Elector Palatine, in whose service he remained till his death. [When that occurred is not ascertained.]

[NIMEGUEN, OR NYMEGEN, DIONYSIUS VAN, son and scholar of Elias, was born at Rotterdam in 1705. He painted similar subjects to those by his father, and also excelled in portraiture. It is related that at the age of 81 he painted, without the aid of spectacles, a perfect likeness of a young lady. He died in 1798.]

[NIMEGUEN, or NYMEGEN, GERARD VAN, was the son of Dionysius, and was born at Rotterdam in 1735. He was instructed by his father, and at a very early age painted the portrait of Prince William V.; but he applied himself more particularly to landscape, in which he made the works of Ruissdael, Everdingen, and Pynacker his models. His best pieces are mountainous landscapes, and forest scenery with rivulets, ornamented with animals and figures, which are held in great estimation, and are to be found in first-rate collections. He painted many portraits, and made drawings and copies after Jacob Ruissdael, Wynants, Hakkert, and Hobbema. Brulliot mentions twelve etchings of landscapes by him. He died at Rotterdam in 1808.]

NINFE, CESARE [DALLE.] Zanetti mentions this Venetian among the imitators of Tintoretto, of whom he is supposed to have been a disciple. He possessed the readiness of invention, and the facility of hand, for which that painter was remarkable, and was an excellent colourist, though deficient in design. [He flourished about 1590 to 1600. There is no accurate account of his birth or death; and it is mere conjecture that he was a disciple of Tintoretto.]

NINNO, JUAN DE GUEVARA. See GUEVARA.

[NIQUET, THE ELDER, one of the engravers employed on the Galerie du Musée Napoleon, published by Filhol. He also engraved the Death of St. Bruno, after Le Sueur; the Triumph of Flora, after N. Poussin; the Apollo Belvedere; Diana hunting; the Laocoon; Cupid and Psyche; and the Transfiguration, after Raphael. He was living in 1831.]

NIXON, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. His best prints are small portraits, which he executed in a surprisingly neat style, in which the faces are entirely finished with dots. Among others we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick, Prince of Wales.
William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland; two plates.
Archbishop Tillotson.
John, Earl of Granville.

NOBLESSE. According to Basan, this artist was a native of France, and resided at Paris, where he died at an advanced age in 1730. He excelled in drawing with a pen, and appears to have formed his taste by studying the works of Callot. He etched a few small landscapes, which are executed in the neat and spirited style of that master.

NOBLET. This artist is noticed by Mr. Strutt as an indifferent engraver of vignettes, and other book ornaments, to which his labours were confined.

NOBLIN, H., an indifferent engraver of portraits, who flourished about the year 1680. Among others, we have by him a head of Cardinal Howard.

NOCHER, J. E., a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He was a pupil of Stephen Fessard, and has engraved several book-ornaments, and a few portraits; among which is that of J. J. Rousseau.

[NOCRET, JEAN, a French painter and engraver, born at Nancy in 1618, was a scholar of Leclerc, but finished his studies in Italy. On his return to France he was much employed at St. Cloud and the Tuileries. He painted the portraits of several of the royal family of France, which have been engraved. Felibien speaks in praise of his knowledge, and his rare sagacity in all the departments that he cultivated. Dumesnil describes an engraving by him, which he calls L'hommage du petit St. Jean, and which has hitherto escaped the researches of collectors. He says the attitudes are simple and graceful, the draperies finely cast, and much knowledge is shown in the gradations of the distances. He was rector of the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture at Paris, where he died in 1676, or, according to Nagler, in 1672.]

[NOEL, ———, a French marine painter, was a scholar of Silvestre and Joseph Vernet. He painted several marine subjects on the coasts of Spain and Portugal, under the aspect of tempests, gales of wind, fogs, conflagrations, moon-light, and falls of snow. He also made a sketch of the combat of the French corvette, La Bayonnaise, with the English frigate, L'Embuscade, but it is believed he did not complete the picture; but he did finish that of the French frigate passing by night before Alexandria. He painted views of Gibraltar and Lisbon; and was an industrious exhibitor till the year 1822. He was living in 1831.]

[NOGARI, GIUSEPPE, a Venetian painter, born about 1700, was a scholar of Antonio Balestra. Lanzi describes him as a portrait painter as well as of half-length figures. In pieces of composition, such as his San Pietro, placed in the cathedral of Bassano, he appears a respectable artist, and somewhat ambitious of reconciling his master's style with that of Piazzetta. From the numerous heads by him which have been brought to England during the last thirty years, it may be concluded that he was an excellent portrait painter, as far as regarded resemblance and powerful expression. He is very rich in his colouring; and some of his Oriental heads have the truth and boldness of Rembrandt, but not his artistic management of light and shade. He died in 1763.]

NOGARI, PARIS, was born at Rome, and flourished during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. He imitated the manner of Raffaello da Reggio, and was employed in the library of the Vatican. He also painted several pictures for the churches, both in oil and fresco. In the church della Madonna de Monti, in the chapel della Pietá, is a picture by this master representing our Saviour bearing his Cross; in S. Spirito in Sassia, the Circumcision; and in the Trinitá de Monti, the taking down from the Cross. He died at Rome at the age of 65. [That is to say, he was born in 1512, and died in 1577; but Zani says he was living in 1588.]

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH FRANCIS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1706. He came to England when he was young, and was for some time a scholar of Peter Tillemans. He painted landscapes and domestic subjects, and was much employed in copying the works of Watteau, and the architectural views of Giovanni Paolo Pannini. Lord Cobham employed him in several ornamental works at Stowe; and he was also patronized by the Earl of Tilney. He died in London in 1748. [He was the father of the celebrated sculptor, Joseph Nollekens. His subjects, like Watteau's, were musical and fashionable conversations, al fresco, but are not imitations of that master: the scene is generally the gardens at Wanstead, the seat of the Earl of Tilney. In his domestic subjects there is a resemblance to the manner of Hogarth, when he painted family portraits in small, or to that of Horreman.]

NOLLET, DOMINICK. This painter was born at

Bruges in 1640, and was a scholar of Jacob van Oost the elder. He painted history, but was more distinguished as a painter of landscapes, battles, and sieges. His talents recommended him to the patronage of Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria, the governor of the Low Countries, who appointed him his principal painter. He was made a member of the society of painters at Bruges in 1687. His landscapes are painted in a grand style, and his figures and horses are correctly drawn, and touched with freedom and spirit. There is great similarity between his pictures and those of Vander Meulen, to which they are little inferior. In the church of the Carmelites at Bruges is an altar-piece representing St. Louis embarking for the Holy Land. There are several of his battle-pieces and landscapes in the collections in Flanders. He died in 1736. [His pictures on close inspection have more the appearance of crude sketches than finished works, but viewed at a proper distance, the colours become warm, and the arrangement harmonious.]

NOLLI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, who resided at Naples about the year 1760. He was employed in the plates engraved by command of the King of the Two Sicilies, of the Antiquities discovered at Herculaneum. [He also etched some plates in imitation of the drawings of Parmigiano.]

NOLLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1755. He engraved several plates of plans and views of buildings. [He was the father of Carlo Nolli.]

NOLLIN, or NOLIN, J. B., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1687. He studied in Italy, where he executed some plates after An. Carracci, Nic. Poussin, and other masters. He engraved several of the prints in a work entitled, Les vues, plans, coupes, se elevations de Versailles.

NOLPE, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at the Hague in 1601. Of the works of this artist as a painter little is known; but we have several prints by him which evince the hand of the master. His plates are usually executed with the point, and finished with the graver, which he handled with considerable ability. It is to be regretted that he is not more correct in his drawing, and that his light and shadow is not conducted with more intelligence. His best productions are his landscapes, which are engraved in a bold, free, and masterly style. He usually signed his prints with his name at length, joining the initials P and N together, thus, PN. or N., and in a few instances with the cipher only. The following are esteemed his best works:

The Portrait of John Adler Salvius, Swedish Minister Plenipotentiary.

A set of eight Cavaliers; etched, scarce.

A set of eighteen etchings of Beggars; in the style of P. Quast.

St. Peter delivered from Prison; after J. V. Vucht.

Judah and Tamar, in a large landscape; from his own design. The same figures were afterwards introduced into another landscape, of a smaller size.

The Broken Dyke; from his own design. The fine impressions of this print are very scarce; it is one of his most esteemed plates.

Daniel in the Den of Lions; after Blancert.

The Departure of King William from Holland to England in 1660.

An Emblematical Print on the Marriage of the Prince of Orange with the Princess Mary of England.

A set of six Landscapes; after Adrian van Nieuland; fine.

A set of six Landscapes; after R. Rogman; fine.

Eight Months of the Year; Peter Nolpe, fec. et exc.; fine. The Prophet Elias speaking to the Widow of Sarepta. St. Paul, the Hermit, fed by an Eagle in the Desert; after Peter Potter.

The Cavalcade made in 1638 by the citizens of Amsterdam, on the entry of Mary of Medicis into that city; after C. Moly'n; a large print in six sheets.

[For a list of his prints, see Nagler, who is of opinion that he flourished till 1670.]

NON, RICHARD ABBÉ DE ST. This distinguished author and amateur engraver was born at Paris in 1730. He has etched a variety of subjects, from his own designs and after other masters, and has engraved several plates in a style resembling washed drawings. He was the author of a considerable work published at Paris, in five volumes, folio, entitled, Voyage Pittoresque des Royaumes de Naples et de Sicile, embellished with plates engraved by several of the most eminent French artists of the time, under his superintendence. Of his own engravings, the following are the most worthy of notice:

ETCHINGS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A set of six Landscapes, with rural occupations and amusements; oval.

A set of seven Landscapes and Cottages.

Six Views in Italy, with figures; in the style of Sal. Rosa.

ETCHINGS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Six Views in and near Rome; after Robert.

Six Views near Rome and Tivoli; after Fragonard.

Two Landscapes, with figures; after Boucher.

Two, a Village Festival, and a Cattle Market; after Bernard.

A Landscape, with a figure drawing; after Berghem.

A variety of Views and other subjects, in aquatinta; after Boucher, Le Prince, Robert, Fragonard, and other artists.

[Nagler calls him Jean Claude Richard de St. Non, and gives a list of his engravings; he places his death in 1792, in which Zani agrees.]

NOOMS, RENIER. See ZEEMAN.

NOORDT, J. V. This engraver is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as an artist of great merit. He notices a spirited etching by him of a landscape, with ruins, executed in a broad, masterly manner, with the figures designed in a superior style. [Jan van Noordt was a painter. His subjects were emblematical, nymphs bathing, and portraits. Some of them have been engraved. The etching noticed by Strutt is, probably, a landscape after P. Lastman, which he engraved in 1645. Bartsch mentions another after P. van Laer; they are both very scarce.]

NOORDT, CORNELIUS. By this artist, who was probably a relation of the preceding engraver, we have his own portrait, executed by himself.

NORDEN, JOHN. This English artist was an eminent engraver of topographical subjects. Anthony Wood conjectures, with great probability, that he was the author of several tracts, which he enumerates, and thinks he was born in Wiltshire, about the year 1546. He was a commoner of Hart-hall, Oxford, in 1564, and took the degree of master of arts in 1573. He resided at Hendon, in Middlesex, was patronized by Lord Burleigh, and his son, Robert, Earl of Salisbury, and was surveyor of the King's lands in 1614. His principal work, as an engraver, was his Speculum Britannia, or an Historical and Chorographical Description of Middlesex and Hertfordshire, with a frontispiece and maps. He also engraved a View of London, in 1603, with a representation of the Lord Mayor's Show, with a variety of habits.

NORISINI. See PARASOLE.

[NORTHCOTE, JAMES, an English historical and portrait painter, was born at Devonport in 1746. His father was a watchmaker, and he for some time followed the same business, that is to say, in cleaning and repairing clocks and watches, but with his whole mind bent to be a painter. The fame of his countryman, Joshua Reynolds, inflamed his desire; and the kind view that some of his townsmen took of his attempts in art, and their friendship, or acquaintance with the President, introduced Northcote to his notice. In his 25th year he was permitted to enter the studio of Sir Joshua, and he remained in the employment of that master for about five years. In 1777 he went to Rome, to see, as his biographer says, "if fame reported truly of the prime works of the chiefs of the calling. He found that report had not reached to the whole of the truth, and that the great and enduring works of the Italians were founded alike in science and poetry; and that, compared to the scriptural and historic epics of Angelo and Raphael, the finest portraits were gross and unrefined." But as Northcote observed that a late leading portrait painter had the finest collection of drawings by Raphael and Michael Angelo in Europe, and they were not of the least use in the world to him; so it would seem that the inspection of the masterpieces of Italy had little or no influence on his prosaic mind. "Original flights were beyond his power; beau idéal beauty he could not delineate; the characters which act in the drama of his pictures incline to the ordinary and the heavy; they have dignity, but not enough for the parts they have to play; they have life, but it is without graceful ease or heroic ardour." And yet his journey to Italy was not entirely thrown away; it enabled him, like others who go there to imbue themselves with artistic knowledge, to talk of Michael Angelo, Raphael, and Titian. This he never ceased doing, and his productions served as commentaries. The works on which his reputation rests have been preserved by the engravers, who by their skill diffused a knowledge of them to the last generation, and will enable succeeding to judge of their merits as compositions. Among the most popular of his pictures may be named, the Death of Wat Tyler; the Murder and Burial of the Children in the Tower; the Entry of Bolingbroke and Richard II.; Hubert and Arthur; the Earl of Argyll asleep; Lady Jane Grey; Prospero and Miranda; a Vulture and Snake; a Lion Hunt, and some others of the like kind, in which he showed great talent in animal painting. His portraits are numerous; but whatever veneration he felt for Titian, or his master Sir Joshua Reynolds, he scorned to make their works his models of imitation. He was a member of the Royal Academy, more feared than beloved by his brethren; lived a long, penurious life; and died in 1831.

Northcote exercised the pen as well as the pencil. His earliest known literary productions are some papers published in "The Artist," entitled "Originality of Painting;" "Imitators and Collectors;" "A Letter from a discontented Genius;" "Character of John Opie;" "Second Letter of a discontented Genius;" "On the Imitation of the Stage in Painting;" "The History of the slighted Beauty;" "The Dream of a Painter, an allegory." His most important performances, as a writer, are his Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, containing anecdotes of many distinguished personages, and a brief analysis; to which are added, Varieties on Art, published in 1813, in quarto. A supplement appeared in 1815; and an octavo edition in 1819, with considerable additions. In 1828 he published an octavo volume of "One hundred Fables," original and selected, with engravings on wood from his designs. In 1830 appeared the "Life of Titian;" and, after his decease, a second volume of Fables, published under the title of "The Artists' Book of Fables," and illustrated with numerous beautiful wood-cuts, executed under the direction of Harvey by the most eminent engravers in that department. To the sketch of the Life of Northcote prefixed to that work, the editor has appended a note, explanatory of the mode in which the designs for the first volume of Fables were composed. He says, "It was by a curious process that Mr. Northcote really made the designs for these Fables the amusement of his old age, for his talents as a draftsman, excelling as he did in animals, were rarely required by this undertaking. His general practice was to collect great numbers of prints of animals, and to cut them out; he then moved such as he selected about upon the surface of a piece of paper until he had illustrated the fable by placing them to his satisfaction, and had thus composed his subject; then fixing the different figures with paste to the paper, a few pen or pencil touches rendered this singular composition complete enough to place in the hands of Mr. Harvey, by whom it was adapted or freely translated on the blocks for the engravers. The designs made by this ingenious mode are the more curious as having been executed by a painter, whose masterly hand knew so well how to give that beauty of arrangement which makes them so admirable and interesting."

NOTHNAGEL, JOHN ANDREW, a German painter and engraver, born at Buch, in the principality of Saxe Cobourg, in 1729. He resided at Frankfort, where he acquired considerable reputation as a painter of landscapes, with merry-makings, in the style of Teniers; but he is more known as an engraver. His best productions are several heads and busts, in which he has imitated the style of Rembrandt with great success. The number of his plates amounts to about sixty, of which a descriptive catalogue was published at Frankfort in 1790, by H. S. Husgen. [Nagler has described 66 prints by Johann Andreas Benjamin Northnagel, and says that he died in 1800.]

[NOTRE, PIERRE FRANÇOIS DE, was born at Waelhem, near Malines, in 1779, and was for some time a pupil of Van Geel, the sculptor. In 1811 he abandoned sculpture and devoted himself entirely to painting. He became eminent as a painter of landscapes, marine subjects, winter scenes, views of the interiors of cities, and cathedrals. His most esteemed pictures are the views of cities and winter scenes; and for the latter part of his artistic career he confined his talents almost exclusively to the representation of such objects. He was a faithful imitator of nature, and never sought to embellish her with graces that were not her own. His pencilling was delicate; and in this respect he may be considered as belonging to the Dutch school. His pictures are numerous and various, and are to be found in the richest cabinets of Belgium, Holland, and the north of France. There are three of his pictures in the Museum at Brussels. He also engraved and published a collection of landscapes, several of which are after Hobbema: these are in great request. He received many medals, as testimonies to his talents, from several societies of artists, was a member of the Academy at Amsterdam, and Professor of Painting to the Academy at Ghent. He died in 1842.]

[NOTRE, HERMAN AUGUSTE DE, the son of P. F. de Notre, was born at Ghent in 1806. He was instructed by his father, and gave early promise of success in his profession. He painted landscapes, winter scenes, marine views, and subjects in the manner of Wouwerman. He died in 1839.]

NOTTI, GHERARDO DALLE. See HONTHORST.

NOUAL, the name of an engraver affixed to the portrait of Thomas Wilson, Bishop of Sodor and Man.

NOVELLANI, SIMONE. In conjunction with Francis Hogenbergh, this artist etched, in a coarse style, twenty-one plates, of The pompous Funeral of Frederick II. King of Denmark, published in 1592. He also etched several of the plates for Braun's Civitates Orbis Terrarum, published at Cologne in 1572.

[NUÑEZ, JUAN, one of the earliest of the painters of Seville. He lived at the commencement of the 16th century, and was a scholar of Sanchez de Castro. The greater number of his pictures have been destroyed by various circumstances. In the cathedral of Seville there is still a picture by him representing the Virgin with the dead Christ in her arms, accompanied by S. Michael and S. Vincent martyr; in the fore-ground are several figures on their knees adoring the Virgin. This picture is said to be in such a brilliant state of preservation as to appear to be just from the hands of the painter. On it he has bestowed all the accessories of embroidery with which the artists of that period ornamented their productions. Although the drawing and proportions of the body of Christ are Gothic, the beautiful draperies, and the highly finished details of the whole composition, entitle this picture to be considered, in Spain, a chef d'œuvre in the style which Albert Dürer diffused through Germany.]

[NUÑEZ, PEDRO DE VILLAVICENCIO, a chevalier of the order of St. John, was born at Seville in 1635, of an illustrious family. He studied painting for amusement, and placed himself under the direction of Murillo, to whom he became the most attached friend. Such was his progress in the art, that from an amusement it became his constant occupation, as though he intended to become a professor. As a knight of the order of St. John, he was obliged to the usual expedition (las carabanas); and on his arrival at Naples he placed himself under Matteo Preti, called il Calabrese, who was also a knight of the same order; with him he increased his knowledge, particularly in chiaro-scuro. On his return to Spain he rejoined Murillo, who loved him tenderly, and for whom he felt such attachment and veneration that he always resided with him. The master died in the arms of his scholar. Villavicencio, like Antolinez, Tobar, and Meneses Osorio, approached so near to the manner of Murillo in painting children, that it is difficult to decide to which the picture belongs. Nunez de Villavicencio was also an excellent portrait painter. He died in 1700. There is a picture by him at Altou. Tower, the seat of Lord Shrewsbury, partaking of the dark manner of Calabrese. It represents the Virgin sewing, and Joseph embracing the child Jesus.]

NUNNEZ, [or NUÑEZ,] PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1614. He visited Rome, and is said to have been a scholar of Guercino. He was a reputable painter of history and portraits, and, according to Palomino, was one of the artists employed to paint the portraits of the kings of Spain, in the saloon of the theatre at Madrid; and painted some pictures for the church of the convent of La Merced. He was a correct designer, and a tolerable colourist, with a firm and vigorous execution. He died at Madrid in 1654. [It is probable that he was born earlier, as, according to Ceán Bermudez, he was employed in the year 1625 in the convent de la Merced.]

NUTTING, JOSEPH, an English engraver, who resided in London about the year 1700. He was principally employed by the booksellers. His best prints are his portraits, and they are more esteemed on account of their scarcity than for any merit they possess, in point of execution. Among others are the following:

PORTRAITS.

- Charles I., with the persons who suffered in his cause.
- Mary Capel, Duchess of Beaufort; after Walker.
- Matthew Mead, father of Dr. Mead.
- Sir John Cheke.
- Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland.
- Robert Pierpont, Earl of Kingston.
- George St. Loo, Commissioner for the Navy; scarce.
- Henry Sacheverel, D. D.
- John Locke.
- Aaron Hill.
- G. Parker, the Almanack-maker.
- Johannes Jacobus Scheuchzerus; after Melchior Fusslimus.
- William Elder, Engraver; after Faithorne.

NUVOLONE, PANFILO. This painter was a native of Cremona, and flourished about the year 1608. He was one of the ablest disciples of Gio. Batista Trotti, called Il Malosso, and painted history in the style of that master. In the church of the monastery of S. S. Dominico and Lazzaro, at Milan, is one of his principal works, representing the Rich Man and Lazarus; and in the cupola of the church of La Passione, the Assumption of the Virgin. [Zani places his death in 1651. There is some confusion in the dates respecting Panfilo and his son Carlo Francesco.]

NUVOLONE, CARLO FRANCESCO, was the eldest son of Panfilo Nuvolone, born at Milan in 1608, and received his first instruction from his father, but was afterwards a scholar of Giulio Cesare Procaccini. He abandoned the principles of that master to imitate the works of Guido Reni, and some of his pictures, particularly those of the Virgin, approach so near to the elegant and graceful style of that master, that he acquired the appellation of the Guido of Lombardy. In the church of S. Vittore, at Milan, is a fine picture by him of St. Peter's Miracle at the Gate of the Temple. There are many of his pictures in the public edifices at Parma, Cremona, and Piacenza. He also painted portraits with great success. In the year 1649, when the Queen of Spain visited Milan, he was selected to paint the portrait of her Majesty. He died in 1661.

NUVOLONE, GIUSEPPE, called IL PANFILO, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Milan in 1619. With the possession of a fervid imagination, and great facility of hand, his works form a striking contrast with those of his brother. His compositions are copious, and the opposition of his light and shadow is conducted with intelligence and vigour. The pictures of Giuseppe Nuvolone are not confined to Lombardy. During a long life, he painted many altar-pieces for the churches at Brescia, and other cities, in the states of Venice. Lanzi mentions, as one of his best performances, his picture of St. Dominic resuscitating a dead Man, in the church dedicated to that Saint, at Cremona. The composition is grand, and the figure of the Saint dignified and expressive. Towards the latter part of his life his powers became languid and feeble, which is not extraordinary, as he continued to paint till his eighty-fourth year. He died in 1703.

NUVOLSTELLA, [or NIVOLSTELLA,] JOHN GEORGE, a German engraver on wood, born at Mentz in 1594. He executed a set of cuts for Virgil's Æneid, and other poetical subjects; and also engraved some prints of the Holy Fathers, from the designs of Tempesta. [He died in 1624.]

[NUYEN, WYNAND JAN JOSEPH, a scholar of the celebrated A. Schelfhout, was born in 1813, and died at the Hague in 1839. In his sixteenth year he exhibited a landscape at Ghent, for which he received the honours; some time after he obtained the first prize from the Society, Felix Meritis, at Amsterdam. In 1838 a winter scene, which he exhibited at Ghent, attracted the attention of all the connoisseurs; it is a charming production, beautiful in colour, and a faithful imitation of nature. For this he was nominated a member of the Academy of the Fine Arts at the Hague. His premature death prevented the full development of his talents; but what he has done will secure him a lasting reputation. His pictures are, of course, in great request, and only to be met with in the richest collections. At the Pavillon at Haerlem there is a landscape by him, which is considered one of his finest works.]

NUZZI, MARIO DELLA PENNA, called MARIO DA' FIORI. This painter was born at Penna, in the diocese of Fermo, in 1603, and was a scholar of Tommaso Salini, a flower painter of some celebrity. He chiefly resided at Rome, where his pictures of fruit and flowers were held in the highest estimation, and were purchased at considerable prices. But from using something of a noxious quality in the preparation of his colours, his works soon lost their original freshness, and many of them have almost entirely perished. He died at Rome in 1673. [He was much employed in painting garlands to decorate figures of the Virgin, Saints, and other religious subjects.]

NYTS, J., a French engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the sixteenth century. He etched a View of the City of Lisle, in French Flanders, and several landscapes, which are executed with great spirit and neatness. His works are not common. [See NEYTS, GILES.]

O

O, LEON HENRY VANDER, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He executed a part of the portraits for Priorata's History of the Emperor Leopold, among which are the following:
James, Duke of York.
J. C. de Königsmarch.
Gualter Leslie, Eq. Aur.
Pietro Strozzi.

OBREGON, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid about the year 1598. He was a disciple of Vincenzo Carducci, and proved a reputable painter of history, particularly in pictures of an easel size, of which there are several in the private collections at Madrid. Of his larger works, Palomino particularly notices his picture of the Trinity, in the refectory of the convent de la Merced, and the Immaculate Conception, in the church of Santa Cruz. He died in 1658. [Bermudez places his birth in 1597, and his death in 1659. He says that he was an excellent engraver; as were also his two sons Diego and Marcos. There was another Pedro de Obregon, who was a Miniaturist and Illuminator of books of devotion; he lived in 1564, but there are no particulars of him.]

OCCHIALI, GABRIELLO. See FERRANTINI. [See also VANVITELLI.]

OCHOA, FRANCISCO. This Spanish painter was born at Seville in 1644, and was brought up in the school of Murillo, whose style he followed with so much success, that his works have been mistaken for those of his master, by the most intelligent judges. [It is suspected that this is the same as Francisco Antolínez de Sarabia; Bermudez does not mention Ochoa.]

OCHTERVELDT, ———. This painter was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1655. He was probably a scholar of Gerard Terburg, to whose style his manner of painting bears so strong a resemblance, that his works are frequently mistaken for those of that master. His pictures, like those of Terburg, usually represent domestic subjects, ladies at their toilet, musical parties, &c. They are well coloured, and are very carefully wrought up; but his chief excellence consists in the polished finishing of his draperies, especially white satin, in which he is scarcely inferior to Terburg.

[Jan Ochterveldt, or Uchterveldt, a Dutch painter of familiar subjects in the manner of Metsu, flourished about the year 1670. Some writers suppose that he was born in 1655, in which case he could not have been a scholar of Metsu, but only an imitator of his manner to a certain extent. Some of his pictures have a resemblance to Peter de Hooge, who was his contemporary. His subjects are generally interiors, with few figures of the better order of society, sometimes painted in cool grey tones, and sometimes in warm positive colours; his out-door scenes, in which he imitates De Hooge, represent fish stalls, and other familiar objects in the towns of Holland. He seldom exceeded the small cabinet size; good specimens, in a pure state, are rare, and deserve to rank next to the masters above mentioned. Bryan is right as to the subjects painted by Ochterveldt, but any that can be mistaken for Terburg by a connoisseur, have not fallen under the editor's observation.]

ODAZZI, GIOVANNI, was born at Rome in 1663, and studied for some time under Ciro Ferri, but afterwards was a scholar of Giovanni Batista Gaulli, called Baciccio. By aiming at the despatch and celerity of his last instructor, without the possession of his powers, he proved but a feeble imitator of his style. Of his works at Rome, the most creditable are his picture of the Prophet Hosea, in St. John of Lateran; St. Bruno, in S. Maria dell'Angeli; and an altar-piece, representing the Fall of Lucifer, in the church of the S. Apostoli. He possessed a prompt and commanding facility; but his design is occasionally negligent and incorrect. He died in 1731.

ODDI, MAURO. This artist was born at Parma in 1639, where he was instructed in the first principles of the art. He went afterwards to Rome, where he studied six years, under Pietro da Cortona. On his return to his native city his talents recommended him to the patronage of the Duchess of Parma, who employed him in ornamenting the ducal palace, and the villa di Colorno. He also painted some altar-pieces for the churches of Parma, Piacenza, and Modena. Mr. Strutt attributes to this artist the etchings marked with the cipher M^o. [Bartsch describes two etchings by him, and says he died in 1703.]

[ODEKERKEN, W——, a painter of Nimeguen who lived about the middle of the 17th century, is mentioned as having copied a picture by Metsu so exactly as to render it difficult to distinguish it from the original. It represents a Cook in her Kitchen, surrounded by culinary utensils, and bears his name. He also painted objects of still-life; but not with equal success.]

ODERICO, GIOVANNI PAOLO. This painter was of a noble family of Genoa, born in 1613. According to Soprani he was a scholar of Domenico Fiasella, and painted history with some reputation, but was more distinguished for his portraits, in which he particularly excelled. He was a correct and tasteful designer, and his colouring possessed both vigour and harmony. Of his historical works, the most esteemed is his picture of the Guardian Angel, in the church of the Padri Scolopi at Genoa. He died in 1657.

[ODEVAERE, JOSEPH DIONYSIUS, an historical painter, was born at Bruges in 1778. After receiving a good scholastic education at the college of the Augustins, and obtaining several prizes at the Academy of Design, he was sent to Paris to study painting under Suvée and David. In 1804 he obtained the great prize, and the brevet of Pensionary of Government at Rome, for his picture of the Death of Phocion. This distinction, so honourable to him, was duly appreciated by the artists and inhabitants of his native city: he was received in triumph on his return; escorted to the city by the students on horseback in fanciful costume, preceded by a band of music; complimented by the Mayor and the President of the Academy; presented with a gold medal and chain, and a silver tea service; feasted at the Hotel de Ville; and the evening of the day concluded with a ball, and illuminations of fireworks, amidst continual acclamations of Vive Odevaere! Shortly after this magnificent reception, he returned to Paris; and the following year went to Italy, where he remained for about eight years, and executed several pictures of large dimensions. Revisiting France, he was presented with a gold medal by the Emperor Napoleon. In 1814 he painted for William I., king of the Netherlands, the picture of the Union of Utrecht; and, after the battle of Waterloo, another representing the action at the time the hereditary prince (now king of Holland) received his wounds, and others relating to the history of the country. For these he received special marks of the royal favour. His pictures are numerous, and are to be found at Paris, Brussels, Ghent, and Bruges. They are generally large; one painted for the king of the Netherlands measures 24 feet long and 16 feet high. Odevaere cultivated letters as well as the arts; and while in Italy collected materials for a history of the state of the arts in that country from the revival of painting to the time of Raphael. He was a member of the Royal Institute of the Pays-Bas, and a Chevalier of the order of the Belgique Lion. He died at Brussels in 1830.]

ODIEUVRE, MICHAEL, a French engraver and printseller, who resided at Paris about the year 1735. He etched and published in 1738 a set of portraits of illustrious personages, entitled, Portraits des Personages illustres de l'un et de l'autre Sexe, recueillis et gravés par les soins de Michel Odieuvre, marchand d'estampes à Paris. [These are usually found in the large paper quarto editions of the Memoires de Sully and Memoires de Commines.]

OERI, PETER, a Swiss artist, born at Zurich in 1637. He is said by the biographer of the painters of that country, to have been a correct and tasteful designer, possessing a ready invention, and a spirited and graceful execution. After studying six years in Italy, he returned to Switzerland, where, probably for want of employment, he abandoned painting, to follow the occupation of a chaser and working goldsmith.

OESER, FREDERICK, a German painter and engraver, born at Presburg in 1717. He was sent when young to Vienna, where he frequented the Academy, and at the age of eighteen gained the principal prize. His talent was noticed and encouraged by an eminent sculptor, named Raphael Donner, who taught him to model, and acquainted him with the costume of the ancients. Dresden was at that time the residence of several artists of eminence, and in 1739 he visited that city, where his abilities procured him the esteem and friendship of the most distinguished artists and literati. He formed an intimate acquaintance with the celebrated Winkelman, who makes honourable mention of him in his first literary work, on the imitation of the works of the Grecian painters and sculptors. "These reflections," says that writer, "are the result of my conversations with my friend Oeser, the successor of the Theban Aristides, who sketches the soul, and paints to the mind." In 1764, he was appointed director of the Academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture at Leipsic. He settled in that city, and during a residence of many years he painted many considerable works for the public edifices and private collections, both in oil and in fresco. Some of his most considerable productions are in the church of St. Nicholas, at Leipsic. F. Oeser has etched a variety of plates from his own compositions and after other masters, which are executed in a free, spirited style. Among many others are the following:

A variety of vignettes and frontispieces for books, ingeniously composed, designed, and etched by F. Oeser. The Circumcision; after G. Vanden Eeckhout. Saul and the Witch of Endor; after Rembrandt. The Presentation in the Temple; after the same. Cupid and Psyche; after Guercino.

He died at Leipsic in 1795. [Nagler calls him Adam Friedrich, and gives a list of 45 of his principal engravings. He says that Oeser died in 1799. The German writers speak highly of his productions, several of which have been engraved by Bause and others.]

[OESER, JOHANN LUDWIG, son of the preceding, was born at Dresden in 1751. He was a landscape painter and engraver. His principal plates are after Rembrandt, Rubens, and Salvator Rosa. He died in 1792.]

OESTEREICH, MATTHEW, a German designer and engraver, who resided at Dresden about the year 1750. We have several plates by this artist, etched in a bold, spirited style. His principal productions are a set of twenty-four caricatures, from the designs of P. L. Ghezzi, published at Dresden in 1750, entitled Raccolta de XXIV. Caricature, diseguate colla penna dal celebre Cavaliere Ghezzi, conservate nel Gabinetto di sua Maesta il Re di Polonia, Matt. Oestereich. These plates were republished at Potsdam in 1766, with the addition of eighteen others, from the designs of Giovanni Battista Internari, and others. He also engraved a set of forty plates from the drawings in the collection of Count de Bruhl, published at Dresden in 1752. Part of the plates from the pictures in the Dresden gallery were engraved by Oestereich. He usually marked his plates with the monogram M.

[OFFERMANS, JAN, born at Dort in 1646, painted landscapes for some time; but not succeeding according to his wishes, he gave up the attempt, and became a house painter. He was a prudent man; and it would be wisdom in many self-styled artists of the present day to follow his example.]

[OGBORNE, JOHN, an English designer and engraver, was born at London about the year 1725. He was a scholar of Bartolozzi, and followed the manner of his school. He engraved several of the large plates for Boydell's Shakspeare Gallery, and they are among the best. He was chiefly employed on the pictures of the painters of that time; Smirke, Stothard, W. Hamilton, A. Kauffman, Westall, and Romney. He also engraved some subjects from his own designs. His works would have been more appreciated if he had been employed on those of better painters than several of the preceding. He died about 1795.]

OGGIONE, MARCO DA. See UGGIONE.

[OLEN, or OLIS, JAN VAN, a Dutch painter, who flourished about 1670, or later. His subjects are conversations, game and flower-pieces, and interiors of kitchens, ornamented with their utensils; all of which are painted in a broad, free manner, well coloured, and carefully finished. It is also supposed that he painted landscapes with sportsmen and dogs; but particulars of him are very scanty. As the name is variously spelt by different writers, this may be the same with JAN VAN ALEN. See that article.]

OLGIATI, GIROLAMO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1572. He formed his style of engraving by studying the works of Cornelius Cort, but his drawing is incorrect, and his heads want expression. Among other plates by him, is an arched print representing the Trinity, with a number of saints and angels, after Federigo Zuccaro, inscribed Hieronymus Olgiatus, f. 1572.

OLIVER, ISAAC. This eminent miniature painter was a native of England, born in 1556. He is stated in the Anecdotes to have studied some time under Nicholas Hilliard, and to have afterwards received some instruction from Federigo Zuccaro. Vertue conjectured, from the variety of his drawings after the great masters, particularly from Parmigiano, that he visited Italy. In the particular branch of the art which he adopted, he has perhaps never been surpassed by any artist of any country, if we except a few of the smaller works of Holbein. The extraordinary productions of Giulio Clovio in miniature, however admirable, will not dispute his claim to that distinction, as he never painted portraits, and Oliver did little else. In our own country no artist can be said to compete with him, except Samuel Cooper, who lived in an age of greater facility, and had the advantage of studying and copying the works of Vandyck; and yet the boldness and freedom of his style scarcely compensates for the delicate fidelity and truth of nature which distinguish the best pictures of Oliver. His son Peter approached nearer than any other artist to the beautiful finishing of his father. The miniatures of Isaac Oliver are preserved with care in the cabinets of the curious. In the collection of Dr. Meade were some of his finest works, among which were a small portrait of himself; an admirable head, said to be of Mary Queen of Scots, which Zinck copied in enamel, and it is engraved in Jebb's collection;

Queen Elizabeth; Henry, Prince of Wales; a full-length of Sir Philip Sydney; Ben Jonson, and others. His portrait of James I. served Rubens and Vandyck, when they had occasion to paint that monarch after his death. Although he rarely designed historical subjects, a few of his drawings and miniatures of that description are noticed by Lord Orford, among which is a fine Magdalene, in the collection by Colonel Sothby; a head of Christ, formerly in the collection of Dr. Meade; and in Queen Caroline's closet at Kensington, are two capital drawings, one of the Murder of the Innocents, after Raffaello, and the other the entombing of Christ, a composition of twenty-six figures. He died at his house in Blackfriars in 1617, aged 61.

OLIVER, PETER, was the eldest son of the preceding artist, born in London in 1601, and was instructed in miniature painting by his father. He did not confine his talents to portraits, but was employed in copying in water colours several of the finest pictures in the collection of Charles I., and it appears by the catalogues of that monarch, and of James II., that there were thirteen historical miniatures in the royal collection, several of which are preserved in the palace at Kensington. At Burligh is a picture by Peter Oliver, of Venus and Adonis, dated in 1631. One of his finest portraits is a picture of his wife, which was in the collection of the Duchess of Portland; it is doubted whether his father ever surpassed this excellent miniature. He died in 1660. Vertue informs us that he etched some small historical subjects, but without specifying any of them.

OLIVER, JOHN. This artist is said to have been the nephew of Peter Oliver. He was born in 1616, and was an eminent painter on glass, and practised that art until he was far advanced in years, as appears from the inscription on a painted window, executed by him, in Christ Church, Oxford, J. Oliver etat. suæ 84, anno 1700, pinxit deditque. The subject is the angel delivering St. Peter from prison; the drawing and execution are good, but the colouring in some parts is feeble. He is said to have engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects, some of which are etched, and others executed in mezzotint; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

King James II. in mezzotint.
Judge Jefferies, styled Earl of Flint.
Thomas White, Bishop of Peterborough.
John Woremburg, the Dutch Dwarf.

SUBJECTS.

A Boy sleeping, with a Skull by him; after Art. Gentileschi
A View of Tangiers; J. Oliver, fec. 1676.
A View of the Hot Wells at Bath; J. Oliver, fec. aqua forti. 1676.

OLIVIERI, DOMENICO. This painter was born at Turin in 1679. According to Della Valle, he particularly excelled in painting drolls, fairs, and merry-makings, in imitation of the style of Peter van Laer, in which he displayed infinite humour, and a talent for caricature, which has seldom been surpassed. In the gallery of the court of Turin were two of his most capital pictures, in one of which he has represented a fair, with an immense assemblage of figures, of quack-doctors, and groups of peasants, sporting or quarrelling, ingeniously composed, with an admirable variety of expression in the heads. Though chiefly employed in painting what are called Bambocciate, he was not incapable of treading in the higher walk of historic painting, as appears in his picture of the Miracle of the Sacrament, in the sacristy of Corpus Domini, at Turin. [He died in 1755.]

[OMMEGANCK, BALTHASAR PAUL, a very distinguished painter of landscapes, with sheep, and other animals. He was born at Antwerp in 1755, and studied under H. Antonissen. He was not one of those artists who astonish by their precocity, but from the year 1802 till the time of his death, he enjoyed the full sunshine of public favour. His landscapes truly represent the warm humidity of spring, the glowing heat of summer, and the picturesque alternations of autumn; and such was his attention to, and accurate delineation of nature, that the very time of the day is perceptible, from the first roseate blush of the morning, to the setting splendour of the evening sun. In his scenes of spring all is dewy freshness; in those of summer it is breathless sultriness; the verdure is tinged with gold, the atmosphere dried up by heat, the very streams are oppressed with its power. It was in such subjects he delighted. Sheep, which he painted to perfection, and goats in frolicking attitudes, are the animated parts of his pictures. The forms and characteristic simplicity of the one, and the vivacious vagabondism inherent in the other, are impressed with the stamp of nature. During his life his works were in such request that only the rich could obtain them, and they are therefore seldom to be found, but in the finest modern collections of England, France, and Holland. Though he was liberally paid, his pictures are now of three-fold value, when found in commerce. The amateur, however, should be cautioned against very clever copies, imitations, and analogous pictures, of which there are many. Carpentero, J. F. Lenzen, and some of the more recent Belgian painters, have imitated his manner; a female painter, long resident in Holland and Belgium, has copied several of his pictures very successfully; and others in England and elsewhere, under the auspices of the dealers, have made it a very profitable speculation. He died at Antwerp in 1826. He received many honours, and was a member of several learned and artistic societies, and was one of the commissioners in 1815, appointed by Belgium to reclaim from France the objects of art which she had acquired by force of arms during the previous war.]

[ONATE, MIGUEL, a Spanish portrait painter, born at Seville in 1535, studied under Antonio More, who was in Spain in 1552. He accompanied his instructor to Portugal, where he was sent to paint the portrait of the first wife of Philip II., and returned with him to Madrid. He became one of the most celebrated portrait painters of the time, and his manner is exactly that of his master. Onate died at Madrid in 1606, leaving to his heirs a considerable fortune, which he had acquired by his profession.]

ONOFRIO, CRESCENZIO DI. This artist was born at Rome about the year 1650. He was a scholar of Gaspar Poussin, and painted landscapes in the charming style of that master. He chiefly resided at Florence, where he was much employed by the court, and for private collections. We have several etchings by this painter of heroic landscapes, with figures, which are executed in a spirited and masterly style. [Nagler, who gives a list of his etchings, says he was born in 1613. Lanzi and Zani say that he was living in 1712. Bartsch, who has given a description of the 12 prints by him, says he was born in 1613, and died in 1688, but one of the prints is dated 1696. The style of his engraving is similar to that of G. F. Grimaldi, called Il Bolognese. It is more likely that he was an imitator than a scholar of Gaspar Poussin, who was born in 1613. His works are rare.]

OORT, LAMBRECHT VAN. According to Descamps, this artist was born at Amersfort about the year 1520. He was a reputable painter of history, but was more celebrated as an architect. His principal residence was at Antwerp, where he was received into the Academy in 1547. [In the Museum at Antwerp there is a Resurrection of Christ; and in that of Brussels, the Adoration of the Shepherds, and a Descent from the Cross, by him.]

OORT, ADAM VAN. This painter was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1557, and was instructed in design by his father. Born with a decided genius for the art, he would probably have reached an elevated rank among the greatest painters of his country, had he not become a slave to the most intemperate propensities, by which he degraded his talents and brutalized his disposition. His academy for some time was the most frequented at Antwerp, and he counted among his disciples several of the most eminent artists of the Flemish school; Rubens, Jordaens, Franck, and Van Balen, were of the number. His outrageous conduct disgusted, and drove from his seminary all his pupils, except Jordaens, who was induced to remain with him, notwithstanding the violence of his temper, and the depravity of his habits, by his attachment to his daughter, whom he married. Van Oort was employed for several of the churches and public edifices in Flanders and Brabant, and in the early part of his life his compositions were studied, and his drawing tolerably correct; but his love of the art diminished as his excesses increased, and his latter pictures were the productions of negligence and manner. It has been observed by Rubens, that Van Oort would have surpassed all the artists of his country, at the period at which he lived, if he had visited Rome, and if his talents had been exercised under more regular habits. He died at Antwerp in 1641.

[OORTMAN, JAN JOACHIM, an engraver, of Dutch parentage, but, from his long residence at Paris, reckoned among French artists, was born in 1777. He studied successively under W. Kock, C. H. Hodges, and Claessens. He engraved after Rembrandt, Gerard Dou, Ostade, and other eminent Dutch masters; also after Titian, Giulio Romano, Caravaggio, and Valentino; and some French subjects of more modern date. He is deceased, but it is not said when he died: the last works exhibited by him were executed in 1817. Nagler has given a list of 33.]

OOST, JACOB VAN, the ELDER. This eminent artist was of an ancient and opulent family of Bruges, born about the year 1600. It is not known under whom he studied, but in 1621 he painted an altar-piece for one of the churches in his native city, which excited the admiration and surprise of the contemporary artists. This flattering success, instead of inspiring him with ideas of consequence and self-sufficiency, only served to convince him of the necessity of an arduous prosecution of his studies, and he determined to visit Italy in search of improvement. On his arrival at Rome he contemplated the works of the great masters with the most attentive admiration, but those of Annibale Caracci were particularly the objects of his imitation; and during his residence in that capital he painted some pictures of his own composition, so entirely in the style of that distinguished artist, that they astonished the most intelligent judges. The love of his country induced him, though with regret, to leave Rome, after a sojourn of five years; and as his talents had given rise to the most sanguine expectation before his departure from Italy, his fellow citizens were impatient to witness how far they had been cultivated by the advantages of travel and study. He was immediately loaded with commissions, and he was equally successful in altar-pieces, portraits, and pictures for private collections. During a long life he continued to be one of the most employed and most popular painters of his country. The number of altar-pieces he painted for the churches in Flanders, particularly at Bruges, is almost incredible, and proves the readiness of his invention, and the extraordinary facility of his hand. Van Oost is justly ranked among the ablest artists of the Flemish school. His first studies were the works of Rubens and Vandyck, and from their principles he acquired a freshness and purity of colouring, by which his works, both historical and portraits, are particularly distinguished. His compositions are studied and simple; following the example of the greatest masters, he avoided crowding them with figures unessential to his subject. In his design, and in the expression of his heads, he appeared to have always had in view the great style of Annibale Caracci. The back-grounds of his pictures are generally embellished with architecture, which he perfectly understood. Of his numerous works, the following are the most deserving of notice. In the church of St. Saviour, at Bruges, is a fine picture of the Nativity; and in the cathedral, one of his best productions, representing the Resurrection. But his most esteemed work is a taking down from the Cross, in the church formerly belonging to the Jesuits. He died in 1671.

OOST, JACOB VAN, the YOUNGER. He was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Bruges in 1637. After studying under his father until he was twenty, he was sent to Rome for improvement, where he passed several years, and returned to Flanders an able and accomplished designer. After painting some pictures for the churches at Bruges, he established himself at Lisle, where are the greater part of his works. He painted history and portraits with great reputation, and was so eminent in the latter, that his partisans ventured to compare his pictures with those of Vandyck. His historical pictures, like those of his father, are admirably composed, and his design partakes more of the Roman than the Flemish school. In the church of St. Stephen, at Lisle, is a fine picture by him of the Martyrdom of St. Barbara; and in St. Saviour, the principal altar-piece, representing the Transfiguration, is considered one of his best performances. He died in 1713.

[OOSTEN, J. VAN, an artist who painted small landscapes, with figures and animals, in the manner of Jan Breughel. They are pleasing and spirited little pieces, and when they appear in sales are invariably ascribed to Breughel. There are no particulars of him recorded.]

[OOSTERHOUDT, THIERRY VAN, was born at Tiel, in Gueldreland, in 1756. He was a scholar of R. van Eynder, and frequented the Electoral Academy at Dusseldorf. After several years' study of the pictures of Raphael, Carlo Dolci, Rubens, Van Dyck, and other masters there, he returned to his native city, and painted portraits, and finished numerous compositions. Some of his subjects are scenes in private life, and are to be met with at Tiel and Utrecht. He painted also in water colours, and his productions in that way are in much estimation. He died in 1830.]

OOSTERWYCK, MARIA VAN, a celebrated paintress of flowers and fruit, born at Nootdorp, a small town near Delft, in 1630. She was the daughter of a clergyman, who encouraged the disposition she discovered for the art, by placing her under the tuition of John David de Heem, the most celebrated flower painter of his time. By the lessons of so able an instructor, and her attentive study of nature, in a few years she produced some pictures which approached to the beauty and delicacy of de Heem. Her pictures of fruit, flowers, and still-life, found their way into the choicest collections; and she received commissions from many of the princes and sovereigns of Europe. The emperor Leopold engaged her to paint a picture for his collection, which was so much to his satisfaction, that he sent her the portrait of the Empress and his own, set with diamonds, as a mark of his approbation. William III. and Louis XIV. were among the most munificent patrons of this celebrated lady.

Maria van Oosterwyck may be deservedly ranked among the most successful imitators of nature in the particular branch of art to which she devoted herself. She grouped the flowers and fruit in her pictures with taste, and finished them with extraordinary neatness and delicacy. Her colouring is fresh, clear, and transparent, and though every part is exquisitely finished, her touch is admirably adapted to the various objects she had to represent. Although she was indefatigable in the pursuit of her profession, from the uncommon care and attention with which she finished her works, her pictures are extremely scarce, and are held in high estimation. She died in 1693. [Nagler, differing from all other writers of authority, places her birth in 1627, and her death in 1692.]

OPIE, JOHN. This eminent English painter was born in the village of St. Agnes, about seven miles from the town of Truro, in Cornwall, in 1761. He was the son of a master carpenter, who was very desirous of bringing him up to his own business, but the love of drawing appears to have given an early bent to his inclinations, and as his propensity was supported by his uncle, who had instructed him in arithmetic, and the elements of the mathematics, his desire of becoming a painter gained an entire dominion over his mind, and nothing could divert him from adopting it as a profession. He now pursued his untutored studies with assiduity, and had already acquired some practice in portrait painting, when his self-taught talent was accidentally discovered by Dr. Wolcott, distinguished by the appellation of Peter Pindar, who at that time resided at Truro, and being himself a lover of the art, possessing a competent judgment, and some respectable paintings, interested himself in his advancement, encouraged him to proceed, and lent him some of his pictures to study and copy. By his assistance and recommendation, the talents of young Opie soon became celebrated through the county, and he met with considerable employment as a portrait painter. His earliest efforts, though not distinguished by taste or a graceful disposition of the figure, were extraordinary productions for an artist, reared in a situation remote and secluded from the advantages of academic study, or the animating collision produced by the collected emulation of contending fellow students. About the year 1777 he was introduced to Lord Bateman, who employed him in painting old men, beggars, &c., which he designed with uncommon vigour and great truth of expression. In 1780 he visited London, under the auspices of Dr. Wolcott, where his merit, and the extraordinary circumstances of his early technical life, became the objects of universal admiration. Commissions crowded upon him, his partisans were zealous in his praise, and for some time he was flattered with the most encouraging success.

The powers of Opie were not calculated to flatter the frivolity of fashion; he was not very attentive to the elegance or the graces of female attraction; and his portraits of men were rather distinguished by identity and truth, than by dignity of character. It was not long before the curiosity excited on his arrival in the metropolis in a great degree subsided, but as his talents were not confined to portraiture, he continued to meet with employment in painting domestic or rustic subjects, in which he was very successful. The great undertakings which took place at this time, of the Shakspeare, by Messrs. Boydell; the Illustration of English History, by Mr. Bowyer; Macklin's Poets and Biblical Galleries; and the other enterprises of the day, gave a new scope to the abilities of Mr. Opie in the higher department of historical painting. In all these he was much employed; and the pictures he painted on these occasions were amongst the most admired productions of the British school. It will not be judged necessary to particularize all those which were deserving of admiration; but perhaps his most popular performances were his pictures of the Murder of James I. of Scotland, the Death of Rizzio, Jephtha's Vow, the Presentation in the Temple, and Arthur supplicating Hubert.

The works of Mr. Opie are distinguished by a simplicity in the composition, masterly boldness of effect, uncommon strength, though not dignity of character, and a faithful expression of individual nature. His best pictures possess, in an eminent degree, what is termed by artists breadth; and though they will be found deficient in elevation of character and grace of attitude, they invariably exhibit an appearance of truth and reality, which almost compensate for the absence of the more refined characteristics of elegance and taste. Few painters have shown so perfect an eye to the purity of colour; and in some of his works he appears to have emulated the harmonious toning of Rembrandt and Titian. His conduct of the chiaro-scuro is masterly and intelligent. Narrowed in his acquaintance with design, by the want of academic tuition, he was confined to copy with precision the model before him. He transmitted what he saw with fidelity to the canvass, and he seldom varied from it. There is little of the ideal to be found in his works; and it has been justly observed of him, that he rather bent his subject to the figure, than the figure to the subject. On Mr. Fuseli's appointment to the office of keeper to the Royal Academy, in 1806, he became a candidate for the vacant professorship of painting, and was elected. In that capacity he read four lectures at Somerset House, which, though immediately following the learned and luminous effusions of genius and erudition which had preceded him, bear very reputable testimony of the extent of his powers, and of his acquaintance with the theory of the art.

The estimable character of Mr. Opie, as an artist and as a man, has been so ably and so justly drawn by one of his co-academicians, that it is hoped the insertion of it will not be unacceptable. "Born in a rank of life in which the road to eminence is rendered infinitely difficult, unassisted by partial patronage, scorning with virtuous pride all slavery and dependence, he trusted alone for his reward to the force of his natural powers, and to well-directed and unremitting study; and he demonstrated by his works how highly he was endowed by nature with a strength of judgment and originality of conception. His thoughts were always new and striking, as they were the genuine offspring of his own mind; and it is difficult to say if his conversation gave more amusement or instruction. The toils and difficulties of his profession were by him considered as matter of honourable and delightful contest; and it might be said of him, that he did not so much paint to live as live to paint. He was studious, yet not severe; he was eminent, yet not vain; his disposition so tranquil and forgiving, that it was the reverse of every tincture of sour or vindictive, and what to some might have the appearance of roughness of manner, was only the effect of an honest indignation towards that which he conceived to be error. How greatly have we cause to lament that so much talent, united to so much industry, perseverance, and knowledge, should have been prematurely snatched from the world, which it would have delighted with its powers, and benefited by its example." He died April 9, 1807, and his remains were interred in St. Paul's cathedral, near those of Sir Joshua Reynolds. [The praise lavished on artists by their contemporaries has been often reversed by posterity. Opie may be cited as a worthy example of persevering industry in his endeavours to excel, but his productions must not be held up as models for imitation. There is coarseness and vulgarity in most of his historical characters, arising, perhaps, from the injudicious choice of his model, which he had not the talent to improve. Guido painted his divine figures from brawny porters; and a female servant's hands were the rough types for those of his Madonnas: Opie confined himself to the object; he could not idealize. His mode of colouring is to be condemned; in many instances it is plastering rather than painting, appearing to be laid on with a trowel, and not with a brush. In this, however, he does not stand alone: Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others of the same period, were guilty of a like departure from the legitimate application of their materials. The consequence is, that by such a procedure, and their unscientific experiments in vehicles and varnishes to produce striking and brilliant effects, their treacherous colours have abandoned the canvass, or exhibit unsightly seams, destructive of the harmony of the picture, and injurious to their reputation as masters of the art of painting].

OPSTAL, GASPAR JAMES VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1660. He painted history and portraits with considerable reputation, and there are several of his works in the churches in Flanders and Brabant. In 1704 he was employed by Marshal Villeroy to copy the celebrated altar-piece by Rubens, formerly in the cathedral at Antwerp, representing the Descent from the Cross, with the shutters, which he is said to have executed in a manner very reputable to his talents. He had perfectly imitated the freedom of touch, and the admirable colouring of the original. In the cathedral church at St. Omer's is a picture by Van Opstal, representing the fathers of the church. His portraits are to be found in many of the private collections at Antwerp, and are highly esteemed. [Balkema says he died in 1714. The altar-piece by Rubens, which he copied, is in its place, the cathedral of Antwerp.]

ORAM, WILLIAM, was bred an architect, but taking to landscape painting, arrived at great merit in that branch, and was made superintendent of the Board of Works, by the interest of Sir Edward Walpole, who had several of his pictures and drawings. [There is a picture by him in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg; it probably went there with the Houghton collection. Walker has engraved the triumphal arch erected by Oram on the coronation of George III., at Westminster Hall, in which is represented the entrance of the Champion and the Lord Chancellor, to take their parts in the ceremony.]

ORAZZI, NICCOLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He was employed to execute part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculeaneum, published by the authority of the King of the Two Sicilies.

ORCAGNA, ANDREA, called DI CIONE. According to Baldinucci, this old painter was born at Florence in 1329, and distinguished himself as a painter, a sculptor, and an architect. He was instructed in painting by his elder brother, Bernardo Orcagna. They painted in conjunction the frescoes in the Capella Strozzi, in S. Maria Novella, at Florence, representing Paradise and the infernal Regions. In the Campo Santo at Pisa there is a painting by Andrea Orcagna, representing the Last Judgment, in which, as was usual at that time, the figures were portraits; and Vasari reports that he placed his friends among the blessed, and his enemies among the reprobate. He painted in the dry, hard style of the early period at which he lived, and was inferior to Giotto, both in his design and colouring. He died in 1389.

[Andrea di Cione, called L'Arcagnuolo, or in the contracted or corrupted form, Orcagna, was born about the beginning of the 14th century. The name Arcagnuolo (Archangel) was given to him by his contemporaries, and by this he has become known to posterity. He was one of the most distinguished of the immediate successors of Giotto; he did not, however, go beyond Giotto in painting, but excelled him as a sculptor and architect. Descriptions of the celebrated pictures in the Campo Santo of Pisa, painted by Andrea in conjunction with his brother Bernardo, will be found in Lord Lindsay's elegant and very interesting work on "Christian Art," vol. iii. letter vi.; and etchings of "them in Lasinio's "Pittura del Campo Santo di Pisa;" and in Rosini's "Storia della Pittura Italiana," where there are also descriptions of, and dissertations on, several other masterly performances of these distinguished brothers. The inquirer, on inspecting the prints, and reading the descriptions, will not agree in the observation that Orcagna "painted in the hard, dry style of the period in which he lived," as being strictly just. His excellence as an architect does not come within the scope of this work; but all writers agree that he stands among the most eminent of the age. Lord Lindsay says, "whatever he undertook to do, he did well,—by which I mean to say, better than any body else. His Loggia, in its general structure, and its provisions against injury from wet and decay, is a model of strength no less than symmetry and elegance; the junction of the marbles in the tabernacle of Orsanmichele, and the exquisite manual workmanship of the bas-reliefs, have been the theme of praise for five centuries; his colours in the Campo Santo have maintained a freshness unrivalled by those of any of his successors there. The secret of all this was, that he made himself thoroughly an adept in the mechanism of the respective arts, and therefore his works have stood." Andrea died about 1375.]

ORLEY, BERNARD VAN, or BERNARD OF BRUSSELS. This painter was born at Brussels about the year 1490. He was sent to Rome when he was very young, where he entered the school of Raffaele, and studied some time under that distinguished master. He was principally employed, after his return to Brussels, in painting cartoons for tapestry for the court. In these, Van Orley represented hunting parties of Charles V. and his nobles, in the forest of Soignes, which were composed and designed in a grand style. He also painted several altar-pieces for the churches, of which the most deserving of notice are a picture of the Nativity, in the church of St. Gery, at Brussels; and the Last Judgment, and the Seven Acts of Mercy, in the cathedral at Antwerp. His design, and the airs of his heads, bear resemblance to the early works of Raffaele, and his pictures are very highly finished. To give brilliancy and transparency to his shadows, he frequently painted on a gilt ground. He was commissioned by the Prince of Orange to paint a series of sixteen cartoons, for a suit of tapestry, for the palace at Breda, which were designed with a greatness of style worthy of the school in which he was educated. He died in 1560.

[Alfred Michiels ("Histnre de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise, tom iii.") says that Bernard van Orley was born in 1471, and died in 1541; Balkema gives nearly the same dates. This can hardly be correct, if he was sent very young to Rome to be a pupil in the school of Raphael, who was born in 1483, and was not called there to paint till 1508, when, according to the above date, Bernard would have been 37 years old. It is agreed by all that he did study in the school of Raphael, and went there early in life; supposing that he went there in the first year of Raphael's employment by Julius II., he would have been, according to the date given by Bryan in the text, 1490, only 18 years of age, which seems to be more likely than the other. Michiels says he was employed by Raphael, as his pupil, to superintend the execution of the tapestries manufactured at Arras, from cartoons designed by him in 1513 and 1514, and this work was completed in 1519. In 1521 he was in the service of Marguerite of Austria, aunt of Charles V., and whom he had appointed regent of the Low Countries. There is a curious document preserved, entitled Comptes des dépenses de Marguerite d'Autriche, in which is the following entry, showing the rate of payment to an eminent painter at that time.

"A maistre Bernard d'Orley, peintre de Madame, la somme de douze livres dix-sept sols de 40 gros (monnaie de Flandres) la livre, de laquelle somme ma dite Dame par sa lettres patentes en date du 8^e jour de Mars 1521 lui a ordonné prendre et avoir d'elle pour un fois, et ce pour récompense de semblable somme à quoy il a esté rayé en l'année 1521 de ses gaiges ordinaires d'un sol qu'il prend chacun jour d'elle et lui sont comptés par les escroes de la despence ordinaire de son hostel, en laquelle rayure sont compris 257 jours revenant à ladite somme. Pour ce, avec quittance dudit maistre Bernard d'Orlech," &c. Marguerite died in 1530, and was succeeded in the regency by Maria of Austria, widow of the king of Hungary, and sister of Charles V. : Bernard retained his situation as painter to the court, and painted several portraits by order, for which he received liberal payment. His wife died in 1530, but her age is not stated. Michiels' account, however, must not be hastily rejected; he gives particulars that have much force. He says that he was born at Brussels in 1471; that he was the third son of Everhard van Orley and Barbara Tave, who were married the 27th of April, 1462; that they were connected with the greatest families of the nation, and that they occupied a distinguished rank at court. He gives the dates of several of his productions down to 1535, and concludes by saying that he died on the 6th day of the month of January, 1541, at the age of 70. Zani's dates are at variance with all others; he places Bernard van Orley's birth in 1500, and his death in 1550.

The king of Holland possesses nine pictures by him, of which a descriptive account may be found in Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys's Catalogue of his Majesty's private Gallery. As many of his pictures have been attributed to Italian masters of the period in which he flourished, and others ascribed to him in which he had no part, and tends to offuscate the inquirer's ideas of both, it will be a valuable assistance to such as are desirous of distinguishing them, to have a list of those considered by connoisseurs to be undoubted works of Bernard van Orley, with the names of the professors, or of the places where they are to be found.

Neptune and Amphitrite; the Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick.

Venus and Adonis; at Berlin.

Bust of Lucretia; at Prague.

Antiochus erecting an idol in the Temple of Jerusalem, the right wing of a picture; at Vienna.

The Marriage of the Virgin; in the Louvre.

The Annunciation, and several circumstances in the life of Christ; in the Museum at Berlin. Connoisseurs are not agreed on its authenticity.

The Nativity; formerly in the church of St. Gery, at Brussels.

The Adoration of the Magi; formerly in the refectory of the abbey of the Premontres, at Dileghem.

The Presentation of Mary in the Temple; at Chatsworth. This picture, till recently, was attributed to Jan Van Eyck.

St. Anne blessing the Virgin, an imitation of Raphael; at Berlin.

Sportsmen on horseback and foot, with a Dog, under Trees; the same.

Paintings in the Piccolomini Palace; at Vienna.

Cartoons for tapestry, designed for Charles V., Marguerite of Austria, and for the house of Nassau.

There are many others attributed to him, but the foregoing have the greater number of concurrents in favour of their authenticity.]

ORLEY, RICHARD VAN. This artist was apparently of the family of Bernard van Orley. He was born at Brussels in 1652, and was instructed in the first principles of design by his father, Peter van Orley, an obscure landscape painter. He first applied himself to painting portraits in miniature; but being ambitious to distinguish himself in a higher department of the art, he studied the design of the figure with great assiduity, and in a few years he became celebrated as a painter of historical subjects of a small size, composed and designed in a style that partook more of the Italian than the Flemish school. Richard van Orley also distinguished himself as an engraver, and has etched a variety of plates, many of which are from his own designs. The following are his principal prints:

The Fall of the Rebel Angels; after Rubens.

Bacchus inebriated, supported by Satyrs; after the same.

The Marriage of the Virgin and St. Joseph; after L. Giordano.

Vertumnus and Pomona; from his own design.

Twelve Pastoral subjects, from Guarini's Pastor Fido; the same.

Part of a set of twenty-eight plates of subjects from the New Testament; after the designs of John van Orley, who etched the remainder himself.

[He died in 1732.]

ORLEY, JOHN VAN, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Brussels about the year 1656. He painted history with some success, and was employed for some of the churches in the Netherlands. In the church of St. Nicholas, at Brussels, is a picture by him of St. Peter delivered from Prison; and in the parochial church of Asch, between Brussels and Alost, is an esteemed picture of the Resurrection. In the refectory of the abbey of Dillighem is a large picture of the Adoration of the Magi, which is considered his best performance. He etched part of the plates of subjects from the New Testament, designed by himself, as mentioned above. [He died in 1740.]

[ORLEY, PETER VAN, a landscape painter, lived about 1652; he was but an indifferent painter, and there are no particulars of him.]

ORRENTE, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Montealegre, in Murcia, about the year 1560. He visited Italy, and was a scholar of Giacomo Bassano. He imitated the excellent colouring of his master, but his style of composing and designing bears no resemblance to that of Bassano. He was favoured with the protection of the Duke of Olivarez, who employed him in painting several pictures for the palace of the Bueno Retiro. Many of his works are in the churches and convents at Valencia and Cordova. In the cathedral at Toledo, over the door of the sacristy, is a fine picture by this master, representing Santa Leocadia coming out of the Sepulchre; and in the Los Reyes Nuevos, in the same church, was a Nativity painted by him. The latter has been since removed into the royal collection: it is a grand composition, and is admirably painted. Another picture by this master holds a distinguished place in the King of Spain's collection, representing Orpheus playing to the brute Creation. There are also in his Majesty's possession four landscapes, which are much admired. He died at Toledo in 1642. [Orrente was not a pupil of Giacomo Bassano, but he imitated his manner, there being many of that master's works in Spain. It is probable that he studied under Il Greco. His pictures are numerous, and are to be seen in all the principal cities of Spain. He died in 1644, at Toledo, and was buried in the same church as Il Greco.]

ORSI, LELIO, called LELIO DA NOVELLARA. This painter was born at Reggio in 1511. Having been banished from his native city, for some unknown reason, he established himself at Novellara, whence he acquired the appellation of Lelio da Novellara. From the similarity of his style to that of Coreggio, and the graceful airs of his heads, he has been supposed to have been a disciple of that distinguished artist, with whom he was a contemporary. That he studied attentively the works of the chief of the Lombard school, is evident from his having occasionally copied his pictures, of which one of the most remarkable is a fine copy of the famous Notte, by Coreggio, in the Casa Gazzola, at Verona. Others have stated him to have been a scholar of M. A. Buonaroti; but this tradition is suspected, although Tiraboschi asserts that he resided at Rome in the time of Michael Angelo, where he painted some pictures for the churches. There were many of his fresco works in the churches at Reggio and Novellara, which are now nearly all perished. He died in 1587. [There is much obscurity in all the accounts of this great artist. It is not certain that he was born at Reggio; on the contrary, it is stated that he was born on the noble soil of Novellara, of parents in the middle class of life, and that his father's name was Bartolomeo, of which there are proofs in the public archives. He was great in painting and in architecture: Italian writers say he was "in pittura grande, in architettura ottimo, e in disegno massimo." If he was not the pupil of Coreggio, he was on friendly terms with him, and many civilities passed between them.]

ORSI, BENEDETTO, was a native of Pescia, and flourished about the year 1660. Lanzi numbers this artist among the disciples of Baldassare Franceschini, called Il Volterrano, and mentions in very favourable terms a picture by him in the church of S. Stefano, at Pescia, representing St. John the Evangelist. He also painted the Seven Works of Mercy, for La Compagnia de Nobili, which were regarded among the most esteemed works of art in that city. [He died about 1680.]

ORSI, PROSPERO. According to Baglioni, this artist was a native of Rome, and lived during the pontificate of Sixtus V., who employed him in the palace of St. John of Lateran, where he painted two of the ceilings, one representing Moses with the Children of Israel passing the Red Sea, a very considerable composition of many figures; the other, Jacob receiving the Blessing from Isaac. He was the particular friend of the Cavaliere Giuseppe Cesare d'Arpino, whose manner of painting he imitated. He died at Rome in the time of Urban VIII., aged 75. [He died in 1635.]

ORSOLINI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, born at Venice about the year 1724. He carried on a considerable commerce in prints, and was employed in engraving some of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino. Among others, we have the following by him:

St. Jerome in Meditation; after Ant. Balestra.

St. Francis de Sales; after the same.

The Virgin, with several Saints; after Pietro Ricchi.

ORTOLANO. See BENVENUTI.

[OS, JAN VAN, a painter of fruit, flowers, and marine subjects, was born at Middelharnis, in Holland, in 1744, and was a scholar of A. Schouman, at the Hague. His marine pieces are respectable, but not much valued in commerce. His pictures of Fruit and Flowers are in great request, and rank next to Jan van Huysum in the style of the compositions and manner of painting, but have not the tenderness and delicacy of touch of that great master. Fine specimens are becoming scarce, and obtain high prices in commerce. He died in 1808. The two masterly magnificent flower-pieces, now in the Museum at the Hague, are by his son, George Jacob Jan van Os, who is still living. They have never been surpassed in artistic execution, brilliancy of colour, and powerful effect. They were exhibited for sale in London, some years ago, but did not meet with a purchaser.]

[OS, PIETER GERARD VAN, the son of Jan van Os, was born at the Hague in 1776, and was instructed in the elements of the art by his father, but he made the works of Paul Potter and Karel Dujardin his models; his pictures, painted in their manner, enrich the finest collections in Holland. His etchings from his own designs, and also after Paul Potter, Berchem, and Ruysdael, are held in great estimation. His prints are sometimes signed P. G. van Os fec. et exc., and sometimes with his initials only, P. G. V. O. f. He died at the Hague in 1839. Nagler gives a list of his etchings.]

OSORIO, FRANCISCO MENESES. This Spanish painter was a native of Seville, and was brought up in the school of Murillo, of whose style he was one of the most successful imitators. He flourished about the year 1725, and in conjunction with Juan Garzon, who was also a scholar of Murillo, he painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Seville. [Osorio copied and imitated the works of Murillo to deception, particularly those of children. He was employed to complete the picture at Cadiz, which Murillo left unfinished, and which he accomplished to the satisfaction of the friends of that master.]

OSSENBECK, [JAN or JOSSE] VAN, was a native of Rotterdam, born about the year 1627, and after having received some instruction in his native city, he went to Italy, and distinguished himself at Rome as a painter of landscapes, with animals, fairs, and huntings, in the style of Peter van Laer, called Bamboccio, whose works were then greatly admired. Though inferior to those of Van Laer, the pictures by Ossenbeck have the merit of being ingeniously composed, the figures and animals are correctly designed, and touched with spirit. He usually embellished his pictures with ruins and architecture, designed from the remains of antiquity in and near Rome. His works are more frequently to be met with in Italy than in Holland, as he resided there the greater part of his life. He died in 1678. We have by this artist several etchings, executed in a firm and free style. He engraved part of the plates for the collection called the Gallery of Teniers, among which are:

The Children of Niobe; after Palma.

The Children of Israel gathering the Manna in the Desert; after Tintoretto.

Orpheus playing to the Animals; after Bassano.

The Four Seasons; after the same.

A set of twelve plates of different Animals; from his own designs.

A set of four of different subjects; the same.

Two Views in and near Rome; the same.

A Boar-hunt; after Peter van Laer.

Six large prints; after Salvator Rosa, Peter van Laer, and S. de Vlieger; scarce.

A grand Festival given at Vienna, with a great number of figures on horseback and on foot; A. Lartucci, inv. J. Ossenbeck, sc.; fine and scarce.

[He died at Regensburg in 1678. Nagler and Bartsch have given lists of his engravings: fine impressions of them are rare.]

OSTADE, ADRIAN VAN. This eminent painter was born at Lubeck in 1610, and came to Haerlem when very young, to study under Francis Hals, whose works were then in great repute. He was a fellow student with Brower, and found the means of persuading that artist to escape from the tyranny of his master, as is mentioned in the life of that painter. His genius naturally led him to similar subjects to those of Brower, and, like him, he has acquired a brilliant reputation by his admirable representations of subjects, which, in less ingenious hands, would have only excited our disgust. The pictures of Ostade usually represent the interiors of ale-houses or kitchens, with Dutch peasants smoking and regaling, drunken frolics or quarrels; but he has treated these grotesque subjects with such humour and spirit, and has given so lively and natural an expression to the various characters of his heads, that we forget the low vulgarity of the objects, to admire the truth and finesse with which he animates the uncouth actors of his scene. His colouring is rich, clear, and glowing; and he was perfectly acquainted with the principles of chiaro-scuro. His pencil is uncommonly light and delicate, and though his pictures have the appearance of the most polished finishing, his touch is spirited and free.

Adrian van Ostade had exercised his talents for several years at Haerlem, with distinguished reputation and success, when the approach of the French troops, in 1662, excited the greatest alarm, and he made preparations for leaving Holland and returning to his native country. With this intention, he sold his pictures and effects, and went to Amsterdam, with the intention of embarking for Lubeck; he there was prevailed on to abandon his fears, and to establish himself in that city, where his works were known, and purchased with avidity. He consequently settled at Amsterdam, where he continued his profession with great celebrity till his death, in 1685. We have by this estimable artist a number of spirited etchings, amounting to fifty-four, from his own designs, which are justly admired. Some of them are boldly etched, and printed without the assistance of the graver; others are very neatly executed, and finished in the manner of Rembrandt. He sometimes signed his prints with his name, and sometimes marked them with one of these ciphers A^o. or A^o. The following are his most esteemed prints:

The Painter seated at his Easel. The first impressions of this plate are with the high cap considerably above the eyes; in the second impression a lower bonnet nearly touches the eyes.

An Assemblage of Peasants, occupied in killing a Pig; a night-piece, producing a fine effect of the chiaro-scuro.

A Family of Peasants at table saying grace. 1647.

A Mountebank surrounded by several figures.

Several Peasants at the door of a Cottage, with a fair in the back-ground.

Several Peasants fighting with Knives.

The Cottage Dinner. 1653.

The Cobbler's Shop. 1671.

A Man standing on a Bridge angling.

The Interior of a Dutch Ale-house, with figures drinking and dancing.

The Inside of a Cottage, with a Woman suckling a Child.

The Spectacle-seller.

A Man, Woman, and Child at the door of a Cottage. 1652.

Several Peasants at a window, one of them is singing a ballad, and another holds the candle.

A Man blowing a Horn, leaning over a batch.

A village Festival, with a great number of figures diverting themselves at the door of an ale-house. His largest plate.

[In Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the Works of the Dutch and Flemish Masters, vol. i. and Supplement, will be found full descriptions of about 380 paintings by Adrian Ostade; an account of the prices at which they have been sold at various periods; the names, in many instances, of the present possessors, or of the galleries in which they are to be found. In addition to this large number of highly-finished pictures in oil, he made a considerable number of drawings in semi-opaque colour, which in richness and harmonious effect, are little inferior to his oil paintings; and indeed are now so highly esteemed by connoisseurs in this class of art, that they obtain prices equal to those of his best pictures 50 years ago. It will amuse and instruct the inquirer to go back to that period, and mark the progressive estimate of this master's works to the present time. Two instances will serve as examples. In the year 1800, the picture described as No. 57 in the Catalogue, was sold in the famous Geeldermester Collection for £229; in Penrice's sale in 1844, it was knocked down for £1375 10s. The picture, No. 104, was sold in 1802 for £340; in 1844 it obtained, in Mr. Harman's sale, £1386. The most accurate account of his prints will be found in Bartsch, P. G. tom. i. page 351.]

OSTADE, ISAAC VAN, was the brother and scholar of Adrian Ostade, born at Lubeck about the year 1617. His earliest pictures were painted in imitation of the style of his brother, and are very inferior to the works of Adrian; but he afterwards adopted a manner of his own, in which he was more successful. He painted several pictures representing winter scenes and canals frozen, with figures amusing themselves on the ice. Some of these are faithful and admirable representations of nature, and are deservedly held in the highest estimation. They approach to the bold and admirable productions of Albert Cuyp, and it may fairly be presumed, that if this promising artist had been permitted a longer career, he would have reached an eminent rank among the ablest painters of the Dutch school. He died young. [The early pictures of Isaac Ostade are slight in execution, and brown in colour; they are, comparatively, of very little value: but his latter productions may compete with the best of his contemporaries, and obtain corresponding prices. These consist of out-door scenes, such as Travellers halting at an Inn, Frozen Canals with figures amusing themselves on the Ice, and Views of Dutch Villages. To these he confined himself, but so varied his treatment of the subject as to obviate the charge of self-imitation. The amateur who possesses one of them may consider himself fortunate; indeed they are now estimated so highly that few besides princes and nobles, or others of equal opulence, can retain them. One in the Duchess de Berri's Collection sold, in 1837, for £1306; the same picture sold in 1801, in Robit's sale, for £361; and many others have equally progressed in value. See Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. i. and Supplement, for a descriptive account of about 112 known pictures by the master. Such of his best pictures as are dated, are of the years 1644 to 1649 inclusive: it is supposed that he died in 1654.]

OTTAVIANI, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, born at Rome in 1735. He was a pupil of Wagner, at Venice; and on his return to Rome engraved several plates after some of the most distinguished masters. Among others we have the following by him:

- St. Jerome with a Crucifix; after Guercino.
- St. Cecilia; after the same.
- Angelica and Medora; after the same.
- Mars and Venus; after the same.
- Three Women bathing surprised by a young Man; after the same.
- Diana and Acteon; after the same.
- Twenty-three plates, from the paintings by Raffaello, in the Vatican.
- Four plates from the pictures by Raffaello, in la Farnesina, representing
 - Jupiter and Ganymede.
 - Juno on her Car.
 - Neptune on the Ocean.
 - Pluto and Proserpine.

[He died in 1808. Nagler gives a list of his prints.]

OTTENS, FRANCIS, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints he engraved a portrait of F. Halma.

[OTTINI, PASQUALE, called PASQUALOTTO, was born at Verona about 1570, and died in the same city, of the plague, in 1630. He was a disciple of Felice Riccio, called Brusasorci, whose manner he imitated so happily that he was employed after that artist's death to complete several of the pictures that he had left unfinished. He was a good artist in regard to his forms, and of no common expression, especially in the works he conducted after having seen those of Raphael. Of this there is a striking example in the Slaughter of the Innocents, in San Stefano; and he appears still to more advantage at San Giorgio in the picture of San Niccolo, with other Saints, in the best Venetian style of colour-

ing. In other instances his colours are somewhat languid; a defect arising most probably from time, and unfavourable situations. He is in high repute among his countrymen, and in Carli's history of Verona he is mentioned as approaching nearest of all in excellence to Paolo Veronese. Bartsch has given a description of the only print known to be by him, of which he speaks in high terms of commendation. It represents the burial of Christ, and is signed Pasq. Otti. Ver. inv.]

OTTO, H. F. This artist is said to have been a native of Berlin. He resided at Frankfort in 1707, and engraved part of the heads for a work entitled, Notitia Universitates Francofurtanae, published in 1707. His plates are very indifferently executed, and consist chiefly of book ornaments.

[OUDENDYK, ADRIEN, a landscape painter, born at Haerlem about 1648, was instructed by his father, Evert Oudendyk, a respectable painter of landscapes enlivened with stag hunts, and similar subjects. Adrien painted landscapes and views of towns, some of which are enriched with figures by Dirck Maas, probably when he was young; but his chief skill lay in copying, or perhaps pillaging, the works of Adrian Vande Velde, and Thomas Wyck, and for which he was surnamed Rapianus. The time of his death is not known, but he was living in 1696.]

OUDRY, JOHN BAPTIST, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1686. He was a scholar of Nicholas Largilliere, under whom he became an able designer and a respectable colourist. For some time he painted historical subjects and portraits, and gave proof of considerable ability in his picture of the Nativity, in the church of St. Len; and the Adoration of the Magi, in the chapter of St. Martin des Champs. He afterwards adopted a different branch of the art, in which he acquired considerable reputation. He painted hunting-pieces and cavalcades with great success, in which the animals are designed with correctness and spirit, and touched with facility and vigour. There are many of his works of this description in the royal palaces in France. We have several etchings by this artist, from his own compositions, executed in a bold and masterly style. Among others we have the following prints by him:

- A Wolf-hunt.
- A Fox-hunt.
- Dead Game fastened to a tree.
- A Fish-market on the Sea strand.
- A set of twenty-six prints of subjects from the comical Romanee of Scarron.

[He died at Beauvais in 1755. Dumesnil has given a descriptive list of 66 engravings by him, and of several doubtful pieces.]

OVENS, JURIAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1620. He was brought up in the school of Rembrandt, under whom he became an excellent colourist, and acquired a competent acquaintance with the chiaro-scuro. He excelled in painting night-pieces and subjects by torch-light, and was eminent as a portrait painter. There are some of his works in the Stadt-house at Amsterdam, representing subjects of Batavian history, painted in the vigorous style of his master, which are very creditable to his talents. His portraits are esteemed for uncommon truth and expression of character, and for the harmony of the colouring. In 1665 he was invited to the court of the Duke of Holstein, in whose service he remained till his death. [Nagler says he was born in 1600 and refers to a portrait of him, which bears date 1666, anno ætatis 66. He was in the service of the Duke of Holstein in 1675, and died in 1678.]

OVERBECK, BONAVENTURE VAN. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1660. His parents were in affluent circumstances, and bestowed on him a liberal education. Whilst at college he distinguished himself by his application, and the rapid advancement he made in his studies. On his leaving the university, a strong inclination for the art induced him to place himself under the instruction of a master; and Descamps supposes him to have been the scholar of Gerard de Laïresse. He visited Rome, where he applied himself with great ardour in studying and drawing after the antiquities of that city. He formed a rich collection of casts and drawings; and after a residence of some years in Italy, returned to Holland with his valuable assemblage. On his arrival he was caressed and visited by all the artists, particularly by his friend and instructor Laïresse, with whom he formed a close intimacy; and he profited still further by the advice and conversation of that eminent painter. He painted some historical subjects, which were highly esteemed; but his attention was greatly occupied by a work he intended to publish, with plates, engraved by himself, from the designs he had made and collected at Rome. An unfortunate disposition to dissipation and excess brought on an illness, of which he died in 1706. Before his death, he engaged his nephew to undertake the publication of his work, which he desired should be dedicated to Queen Anne of England. It was published in 1709, in French, under the title of Les restes de l'ancienne Rome.

[OVERBECK, FRIEDERICH, one of the great leaders of the present German school of historical painters, was born at Lubeck in 1789. In 1809 he went to Rome, where he remained till 1831, when he made a journey to Munich to exhibit some of his beautiful designs at the Academy of Fine Arts in that city. He made some stay there, and then returned to Italy, where he still resides. His works in fresco and in oil are admired for beautiful composition and finished detail. Many of his pictures and designs of scriptural subjects have been engraved and lithographed, and have diffused his fame through Europe. He was amongst the first to give impulse to the present aspiring state of painting in Germany, by reverting to the almost forgotten style of the middle age, as a preparatory step to a revolution in art, as it prevailed at the commencement of the present century, and a renovation of it on the principles that guided the old masters. In the first part of his career he imitated the old German meagre forms; by degrees he forsook these for the primitive painters of Italy; his contours became more soft and graceful, and he exhibited more of the ideal. In this new course he produced many charming pieces, in which he showed himself an artist truly inspired by a love of the beautiful, and who knew how to invigorate and ennoble the simplest subject. After ascertaining his strength, he commenced his picture of Christ's Entry to Jerusalem, now in the principal church of the city of Lubeck, and which at once established his reputation. He next painted the Adoration of the Magi, for the queen of Bavaria, and Christ visiting Mary and Martha, for his friend Vogel the painter at Zurich. The style and composition of these pictures are admirable. Among his beautiful productions in fresco may be named The Seven Years of Famine, and Joseph sold by his Brethren, which ornament La

Salle Bartoldi at Rome. His frescoes at the Villa Massimi represent subjects from the "Jerusalem Delivered." The Vision of St. Francis d'Assise, painted in fresco by him, in the church of Sainte Marie des Anges, in the route from Foligno to Perugia, is considered of the highest order, and reckoned as one of the immortal productions of the present epoch. He was selected by Canova to ornament a part of the walls of the Vatican. He traced the Coliseum, and placed in the middle the Virgin appearing to a Pilgrim; thus ingeniously uniting and contrasting the different feelings of the people of ancient and modern Rome. His later productions, Christ in the Garden, Judith, and his frescoes at Frankfort, have tended to increase his reputation. His drawings are numerous, and of rare merit; it is in these, chiefly, that his superior excellence is discovered, and by which his fame will be more widely diffused. A critic, of his own country, says he is deficient in the knowledge of colouring, and that his carnations want life and energy: but Overbeck, like Niccolò Poussin, is of opinion that a talent and tendency that way is more injurious than favourable to the perfection of art. Friederich Overbeck was son-in-law to Schlegel, the celebrated German critic. The school, of which he may be considered the founder, is ably supported by Cornelius, Schadow, Bendeman, Weit, Schnorr, Hess, and several other German artists, all emulous of sharing in the glory of their chief, and of handing down their own names also as chieftains to posterity. They commenced rightly, and are advancing nobly.]

[OVERBECK, LEENDERT, was born at Haerlem, and was a scholar of H. Meyer. As a painter he was chiefly employed in designs for tapestries, which he finally abandoned, and devoted himself entirely to engraving. He died in 1815, at Haerlem, in his 63rd year. Nagler has described several landscapes etched by him.]

OUVRIER, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1725. We have by this artist a variety of vignettes, landscapes, and other subjects, neatly engraved, though sometimes too dark in the shadows. The following are considered his best prints:

The Villagers of the Apennines; after Pierre.

A View of the Alps; after Vernet.

A View of the Apennines; after the same.

The Magic Lantern; after Schenau.

The Flemish School; after Eisen the elder.

The Dutch School; after the same.

The Genius of Design, an emblematical subject; after Cochin.

[He died in 1754. Nagler gives a list of 23 prints by him.]

OUWATER, ALBERT. This artist was one of the earliest painters in oil in Holland, soon after the discovery of John van Eyck. He was born at Haerlem in 1444, and is mentioned by Van Mander as a reputable painter at the time in which he lived. He particularly commends an altar-piece in the principal church at Haerlem, representing St. Peter and St. Paul, in which the figures are carefully and correctly designed and richly coloured, though stiff and laboured in the finishing. He describes another picture, by Ouwater, of a more extensive composition, representing the Resurrection of Lazarus, with the Apostles and other figures, designed in a style superior to what was usually practised at that early period, and with a considerable expression in the heads, particularly in the women. The draperies were well cast, and the back-ground was embellished with architecture in the taste of the time. He died in 1515. [There is great uncertainty respecting the time when this artist lived. Zani says he was born in 1370; Balkema, that he was born in 1366, and died in 1424. Van Mander's account rests on a weak foundation. It is, perhaps, impossible now to arrive at the truth. Pictures of the early Dutch school are attributed to him by conjecture when they do not accord with Van Eyck, Hugo Vander Goes, or others of the period. Michiel says, (and he is likely to know,) "Depuis la mort du chroniqueur, (Van Mander,) nul texte retrouvé n'a éclaircir l'histoire d'Albert van Ouwater; nous ne possédons que les renseignements imparfaits contenus dans le Livre des Peintres."

[OUWATER, ISAAC, a painter of views of cities in Holland, was born at Amsterdam in 1747. He manages his subjects in a very pleasing, picturesque manner. They are Views in Haerlem, Utrecht, and Amsterdam, with figures promenading on the road by a gracht ornamented with trees. The representations are accurate, and the shadows and reflections of the buildings and vessels in the water, give an air of vivacity. The pencilling is minute and neat, but far from being so light, rich, and transparent in handling or colour as that of Vanderheyden. His larger views of the High Streets are fine in the perspective, and, in addition to the pedestrians, have carriages and horsemen; the arrangement is in good taste, and the effect illusory. He died at Amsterdam in 1793.]

[OUWATER, JACOB, a Dutch painter of fruit, flowers, insects, birds, &c., of whom there is no account. His compositions, design, colouring, and admirable finishing, denote a painter of the highest order in that class, and it is conjectured that he lived about the middle of the last century.]

[OWEN, WILLIAM, an eminent portrait painter, and also of fancy subjects, was born at Ludlow, in Shropshire, in 1769, and was educated at the grammar school of that town. It is not known that he received any instruction in painting until he reached his 17th year, although he had exhibited a strong inclination for the art during his boyish days. About 1786 he was sent to London and placed under Catton, who had been a coach-painter, but was then a Royal Academician; a copy which Owen made of Reynolds's picture of Perdita, introduced him to the notice of the President and the benefit of his instruction. In the year 1792 he made his first appearance as an exhibitor at Somerset House, with the Portrait of a Gentleman, and a view of Ludford Bridge; each succeeding year his "Portraits of Ladies and Gentlemen" increased, till in the year 1798 he exhibited no less than ten. This may be considered good evidence of his artistic skill, for he had not the advantage of patronage like Reynolds, Beechey, Lawrence, and Hoppner, who divided the world of fashion among them, and basked in the sunshine of royal favour. Among those who sat to him were some of the most distinguished men of the day; such as William Pitt, Lord Grenville, Sir William Scott, Cyril Jackson, Vicary Gibbs, Chief Justice Abbot, the Marquis of Stafford, the Earl of Bridgewater, John Soane the architect, Viscount Exmouth, and many others, whose likenesses posterity will feel satisfaction in recognising from the pencil of a painter whose adherence to truth was as great as his artistic skill. Though he had a continual flow of this profitable employment, he would sometimes make excursions into the realms of fancy, and embody scenes that might be called poetic pictures of nature. The Daughter of the Beggar of Bethnal Green, the Sleeping Girl, the School-

mistress, the Girl at the Spring, the Road-side, the Cottage Door, the Children in the Wood, and similar subjects, are among the finest of that class of pictures, painted by English artists in his day. The regret that he did not employ his pencil more on such productions, is checked by the consideration that he has more than compensated by handing down to posterity faithful resemblances of men eminent for their talents, and whose names recorded in history will make their portraits interesting for ages. By virtue of his talents, he became in 1806 a member of the Royal Academy; and in 1810, portrait painter to the Prince of Wales, and afterwards "principal portrait painter to the Prince Regent." But Owen was deficient of that suppleness and flattery essential in a court painter, so others, better qualified in those respects, took the benefit of the office, and left him in the enjoyment of the title. The Prince Regent offered to knight him, an honour which he wisely refused; not that he was averse to royal favour, but declined it as a distinction which promised to be expensive and nothing more. For the last five years of his life he was in a state of almost utter helplessness, gradually wasting away; and was relieved from his sufferings at last by the mistake of a chemist's boy, who instead of an aperient draught labelled a bottle of opium, which he swallowed, fell into a stupor, lingered a few hours, and died on the 11th of February, 1825. As a portrait painter Owen was among the best of his time, a worthy compeer of Reynolds, Hoppner, and T. Phillips: his drawing was correct, he seized individual character, and never failed to impress the image, mentally and bodily, of his subject. Some slight objection might be made to his colouring; it was occasionally deficient in transparency and harmony: but this is less observable in his fancy pictures.]

OZANNE, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1724. He engraved from his own drawings a number of plates of marines and sea-ports, which are esteemed for their neatness, and the precision with which the vessels are designed. We have, among others, the following by him:

A set of four Landscapes and Marines; Ozanne, fee.
Two Views of the Port of Brest.

OZANNE, JANE FRANCES, and MARY JANE. These ladies were the sisters of the preceding artist, and were instructed in engraving by Aliamet. We have by them several prints of sea-ports, &c., neatly executed, among which are the following:

A View of the Port of Dieppe; J. F. Ozanne; after Hackert.

A View of St. Vallery; the same.

Two Views of the Port of Leghorn; M. J. Ozanne; after Vernet.

A Calm; the same; after the same.

Two Pastoral subjects; after Phil. Wowermans; M. J. Ozanne.

P

PACCHIAROTTI, [or PACCHIAROTTO,] JACOPO. This painter was a native of Siena, and flourished about the year 1535. He formed his first style by an attentive study of the works of Pietro Perugino, which he afterwards improved by contemplating the admirable productions of Raffaele. There are many of his works in the churches and private collections at Siena, of which the most deserving of notice is a fine picture in the church of S. Christoforo, representing St. Catherine visiting the Corpse of St. Agnes, a grand composition, in which the airs of the heads approach to the beauty of those of his illustrious prototype. In 1535 he became implicated in a seditious commotion against the government, and was obliged to take refuge in the monastery of the Osservanti, from whence he escaped secretly to France, where he worked some time, in conjunction with Il Rosso, and where he is supposed to have died. [According to Speth, the works above alluded to can justly be compared with Raphael's alone; and he adds, that designating Pacchiarotti as of the school of Perugino is only magnifying the injustice he had already undergone, in having his works long ascribed to Perugino. If, therefore, he were the pupil of Perugino, what Perugino applied was only the spark, says Speth, which in Pacchiarotti grew into a flame. Pacchiarotti has suffered the same misfortune that many other excellent painters have undergone, owing to their being omitted by Vasari. He is probably the Girolamo di Pacchia, casually mentioned by that writer in speaking of Il Sodoma; indeed Zani, in his Enciclopedia, gives it as one of his appellations, and Il Dondolone as another. There are two beautiful easel pictures in oil and on wood, in the Pinacothek at Munich, by Pacchiarotti, which are considered as two of the best in the collection for character, colour, and execution; and also among the best specimens of the early Italian schools of painting. They were formerly in the church of San Bernardino, at Siena, and were purchased by the present king of Bavaria in 1818, when he was Crown Prince. Rosini has given an engraving of the picture of the Birth of the Virgin in San Bernardino at Siena, (plate 142,) which exhibits much of the dignity and grace of Raphael in composition and design.]

PACHECO, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter and writer on art, born at Seville, according to Palomino, in 1580. He was a disciple of Louis Fernandez, and is said by the above-mentioned author to have studied some years in Italy. He was a correct and rigid designer, his compositions are studied and appropriate, and the airs of his heads are noble and dignified; but there is a feebleness in his execution, a poverty of tone, and a crudity and dryness in his manner, which greatly diminishes the merit of his productions. In competition with Alonso Vasquez, he painted some pictures for the church of the Barefooted Carmelites, in which he was greatly surpassed by his rival. Mr. Cumberland has favoured us with a Spanish couplet upon a Crucifix, by Pacheco, which satirizes this harshness of style with great smartness and neatness of versification.

Quien os puso assi, Sennor,
Tan desabrido y tan seco,
Vos me direis que el amor,
Mas yo digo, que Pacheco.

He derived his greatest celebrity from his having been the instructor of Alonso Cano and Don Diego Velasquez. He died at Madrid in 1654.

[Francisco Pacheco was born of a good family at Seville in 1571, which is nine years earlier than the date given by Palomino. He studied under Luis Fernandez, a painter of serges, but never was in Italy. His first works in oil, worthy of notice, were two large flags, or standards, for the Spanish fleets of New Spain and Terra-firma; they were on crimson damask, each thirty yards by fifty, the subjects being the royal arms and St. Iago on horseback, with rich borders and other decorations. He was the first, says Cean Bermudez, in Seville who properly painted and gilded statues; he was the first likewise who painted the figures and grounds of bassi rilievi: there are several works of both descriptions by him in Seville. It was not till 1611 he visited Toledo, Madrid, and the Escorial, and saw the great works of Titian and other celebrated masters of Italy and Spain. On his return to Seville he opened a systematic academy of the arts, as well for his own improvement as for the benefit of the rising artists of Seville; and the fact alone that Alonso Cano and Velasquez were two of his scholars, shows that his system worked with good effect. The improvement he himself made by such elementary instruction, and from the true principles of art, was observable in his great picture of the Last Judgment, an altar-piece finished in 1614 for the nuns of the convent of St. Isabel, which he has described at great length in his treatise on painting. Soult made a magazine of this convent during his occupation of Andalusia, and the picture was probably removed. In 1618 he was appointed by the Inquisition one of the guardians of the public morals, in as far as he was made censor of all the pictures exposed for sale in Seville: nakedness was prohibited, and it was Pacheco's business to see that no pictures of the naked human form were sold. It is to such formal morality as this that the Spanish school of painting owes its characteristic ponderous sobriety. There is not probably in the whole art of Spain such a thing as a naked female figure of the size of life, if of any other size. Prudery was carried so far in Spain, that in the time of Ferdinand VII. even all the great Italian works which could be reproached with nudities were removed from the galleries, and were condemned to a distinct set of apartments, called the Galeria Reservada, and only opened to view to those who could procure especial orders. There is a Cabinet des Objets Reservés at Naples, and though this is separated from the rest of the collection with reason, there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining admission to it; but the Galeria Reservada of Madrid is of a very different nature, and comparatively innocent, and the separation of such works as it contains from the general collection, is a greater evidence of subjective immorality than of objective indecency. Mr. Ford, in his "Handbook of Spain," terms this gallery a sort of Magdalen or Penitentiary, into which were banished all peccant pictures whose nudities might corrupt the purity of Madrid; where the Italian and Flemish Leda, Danaë, and other improper ladies blushed unseen, lumped together like the naughty epigrams of Martial when collected into one appendix in well-intentioned editions. All these pictures were the works of foreigners. Nothing, says Mr. Ford, gave the holy tribunal greater uneasiness than how Adam and Eve in Paradise, the blessed souls burning in purgatory, the lady who tempted St. Anthony, or the Last Day of Judgment, were to be painted, circumstances in which small-clothes and long-clothes would be highly misplaced. Both Palomino and Pacheco handle these subjects very tenderly. In 1623 Pacheco again visited Madrid in company with his scholar and son-in-law Velasquez, and remained two years in the Spanish capital. During this visit, among many other works, he executed one which hardly accords with the present notions of the occupations of a great painter: he dressed, gilded, and painted for the Duchess of Olivares a statue, probably of wood, of the Virgin by Juan Gomez de Mora. The work was much admired, and by none more than by Eugenio Caxes, who estimated the decoration at 500 ducats. Mr. Ford gives some curious details about the toilets of these Spanish images. No man is allowed in Spain to undress the Paso, or Sagrado Imagen of the Virgin; and some images had their mistresses of the robes, and a chamber where their toilet was made. Pacheco died at Seville in 1654. He wrote an elementary treatise on the Art of Painting, which is considered in Spain as indispensable for the instruction of students, and the best in the language.]

PACOT, ———. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1690. He engraved some plates of battles and sea-fights, which are etched, and finished with the graver, in a neat, spirited style.

PADERNA, GIOVANNI, was born at Bologna about the year 1600, and was a scholar of Girolamo Curti, called Il Dentone, under whom he became an eminent painter of perspective and architecture. After the death of Dentone he was much employed, and his success was such as to excite the jealousy of Agostino Mitelli, one of the ablest artists in that branch. Of his numerous works at Bologna, the decorations of the Capella Zagoni, in the church of la Madonna della Libertá, are considered among his best performances. He died in 1640. [Zani says he was living in 1647.]

PADERNA, PAOLO ANTONIO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1649, and for some time studied under Guercino. On the death of that master he entered the school of Carlo Cignani. Although he acquired some celebrity as an historical painter, he was more distinguished for his landscapes, which are designed and painted in the vigorous style of his first instructor. His scenery is grand, and his colouring clear and harmonious. He died in 1708.

PADOUANINO, FRANCESCO. This artist was born at Padua in 1552. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he painted history with considerable reputation. He possessed an inventive genius, and was a correct and graceful designer. Of his historical works, one of the most esteemed is a picture representing a Saint interceding for two criminals condemned to death, in the church of la Madonna del Carmine, at Venice. He also was much employed in painting portraits, which were admired for truth and dignity of character, and an excellent tone of colour. He died in 1617.

PADOUANINO, OTTAVIO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Padua about the year 1582. After studying some time under his father, he was sent to Rome for improvement. He acquired some celebrity as an historical painter, but was chiefly engaged in portrait painting, in which he was more successful. He died in 1634.

PADOUANINO, [ALESSANDRO.] See VAROTARI.
PADOUANO, LAURO. In the Venezia Descritta, by Sansovino, this painter is said to have been a native of Padua, and a scholar of Francesco Squarcione. He was a successful imitator of the style of Andrea Mantegna, and painted for the church of La Caritá, at Venice, some subjects from the life of St. John, which rank among the most creditable productions of the time. He flourished about the year 1460. [It is suspected that this is the same as Lauro, or Lauri, da Padova, who lived to a much later period: Zani says he operated from 1470 to 1500.]

PADOUANO. See AVIUS.

PADTBRUGGE, H. L. This artist was a native of Stockholm, and flourished about the year 1700. He engraved the greater part of the plates for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna, published in 1712. They consist of bird's eye views and maps, and are executed in a free, spirited style. [The work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna, was published in 3 vols. folio; the first in 1693, the last in 1714. It contains about 350 plates.]

[PAELINCK, JOSEPH, an historical painter, was born at Oostacker, near Ghent, in 1781. He commenced his artistic studies under Verhaegen, the professor of painting at the Academy of Ghent; after showing remarkable progress there, he went to Paris and enrolled himself among the scholars of David. By this master's instructions he profited so well as to be able to enter the lists and contend for the prize offered by the Academy at Ghent, which he obtained for his picture of the Judgment of Paris, and was also named Professor of Design to the Academy. He shortly after vacated this appointment, and went to Italy in order to study the works of the great masters of the different schools. Here he corrected much of the academic manner which he had imbibed in the school of David, and produced, what is considered his best picture, The Invention of the Cross; this is now in the church of St. Michel at Ghent. He remained at Rome for about eight years, to enable him to perfect his knowledge of the art, and during that time he painted a large picture for the palace of the pope at Monte-Cavallo, representing the embellishments of Rome by Augustus. His principal pictures, in addition, are, The Adoration of the Shepherds, in the convent of La Trappe, near Antwerp; The Flight into Egypt, at Malines; The Departure of Tobit, at Opbrackel, near Oudenarde; The Return of Tobit, for Maria Oudenhove; The Assumption of the Virgin, for Muysen, near Malines; and other sacred subjects, in all of which he exhibits great science, though not entirely divested of academic display. This latter blemish is, perhaps, more apparent in his compositions of profane subjects, among which may be named, The Toilette of Psyche, in the Museum at the Hague; The Dance of the Muses; The Judgment of Midas; and, The Abdication of Charles V.; otherwise they may be considered as beautiful productions. In the picture of The Invention of the Cross; and it may be added, in those of The Disciples at Emmaus, which is in the church at Everghem, near Ghent; and, The Calvary, which is in the village of Oostacker, the place of his nativity, he exhibits an elevation of style altogether Christian, and in perfect harmony with the subjects. Joseph Paelinck is deservedly classed among the most eminent of the modern Belgian painters. He died at Brussels in 1839.]

PAGANI, FRANCESCO. According to Baldinucci, this painter was born at Florence in 1531. After learning the first rudiments of art in his native city he went to Rome, where he studied the works of Polidoro da Caravaggio and Maturino. He returned to Florence at the age of twenty-one, where he soon produced some works which procured him great reputation. Pontormo, on seeing one of the first pictures that he produced at Florence, exclaimed, that it was worthy of Michael Angelo. He was considered one of the most promising artists of his time, but died in 1561, greatly regretted.

PAGANI, GREGORIO, was the son of Francesco Pagani, born in 1558. His father dying when he was an infant, he was placed as a disciple of Santo di Titi, and afterwards improved his style by the instruction of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli. In imitation of the style of that master, he painted a picture of the Finding of the Cross, for the church of the Carmelites, of which we can only judge of the composition by the print, as the church was destroyed by fire. Some of his fresco works remain in the cloister of S. Maria Novella, which, according to Lanzi, are worthy of admiration, though they were not duly appreciated at the time. Baldinucci dates his death in 1605.

PAGANI, PAOLO. This painter was born at Valsolda, in the Milanese state, in 1661. He formed his manner by studying, at Venice, the works of the best masters, and, according to Zanetti, established there an academy, where he introduced a style of designing the naked, which, though occasionally surcharged and extravagant, is bold and effective. After a residence of some years at Venice, where he painted several pictures for the churches, he returned to Milan, and was much employed for the public edifices and for private collections. There are some of his best works in the gallery of Dresden. He died in 1716.

PAGANINI, GUGLIELMO CAPODORO. According to Orlandi, this artist was born at Mantua in 1670, and was a scholar of Antonio Calza. His genius led him to paint battles and encampments. After studying some time under that master, having seen some of the pictures of Borgognone at Florence, he attached himself to study and imitate the works of that excellent artist, and became a very reputable painter. His pictures are composed with ingenuity, and are painted with great spirit.

PAGGI, or PAGI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Soprani, this painter was born at Genoa in 1554. He was first a scholar of Luca Cambiasi, and improved himself in design, by studying the antique statues and bas-reliefs. He had acquired some reputation as a painter of history, when he had the misfortune of killing his antagonist in a quarrel, which obliged him to leave Genoa, and he took refuge at Florence, where he resided twenty years, and was protected and employed by the court. Florence was at that time the residence of several artists of distinction, who, with Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli, contributed to reform the Florentine school from the languid state into which it had fallen, by introducing the more vigorous and effective style which was at that period established in Lombardy. His first productions were rather distinguished by grace than energy, in which he appears to have imitated the suavity of Baroccio; such is his picture of the Holy Family in the church Degli Angeli, at Florence. He afterwards adopted a manner more robust and masculine; and his large work of the Transfiguration, in the church of S. Marco, is painted with such vigour and effect, that it does not appear to be by the same hand. Lanzi mentions as his finest works, three subjects from the Passion of our Saviour, at the Certosa, at Pavia. In 1600 he was invited to return to Genoa, where he was much employed for the public edifices and private collections. His best performances at Genoa are two pictures in the church of St. Bartholomeo, and the Murder of the Innocents, in the Palazzo Doria, painted in 1606, in competition with Rubens. He died in 1629. [In some of his oil paintings there is much of Venetian colouring, and an approach to the manner of Paolo Veronese. Several writers of authority place his death in 1627.]

PAGLIA, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Brescia in 1636, and was brought up in the school of Guercino. He painted some pictures for the public edifices at Brescia, of which the most distinguished is an altar-piece, in the church of La Carità. His works are estimable for harmony of colour, an excellent impasto, and an intelligent conduct of chiaro-scuro, though his drawing is occasionally incorrect, and his figures too long and meagre. His best productions are his portraits, which are distinguished by dignity and truth of character, great purity of tone, and uncommon relief. He was living in 1700. [According to Zani he died in 1713.]

PAGNI, BENEDETTO, was a native of Pescia, and was brought up at Rome in the school of Giulio Romano. He followed that master to Mantua, where he distinguished himself as a painter of history. In the church of S. Andrea is an altar-piece by him of the Martyrdom of S. Lorenzo; and at the Collegiate, a picture of the Marriage of Cana. [Zani says he operated from 1525 to 1570.]

PAIGEOLINE. The name of this engraver is affixed to a slight etching from a picture by Paolo Veronese, representing the Mother of Moses brought to Pharaoh's Daughter as a nurse for her son. [Zani writes his name Paigeloine, but there is no account of him.]

PAIOT, A French engraver of little note, who appears to have been chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved a variety of frontispieces, and other book plates, which are very indifferently executed. Among others, there is a print by him of David, a half-length figure; after Vignon. [He lived about 1627.]

PALADINI, ARCANGELA. This ingenious lady was born at Pisa in 1599. She was the daughter of Filippo Paladini, who painted portraits with some reputation, by whom she was instructed in the rudiments of the art. Her talents were not confined to painting, she also excelled in music, and above all in embroidery, in which she discovered uncommon ingenuity. Her portrait, painted by herself, was placed in the gallery of artists at Florence. She died in 1622.

PALADINI, LITTERIO. In the Memorie de Messinesi Pittore, by Hackert, this painter is said to have been born at Messina in 1691. He studied at Rome, in the school of Sebastiano Conca, but he derived more advantage from his studies after the antique, and the works of the great masters, than the lessons of his instructor. On his return to Messina, he was engaged in several considerable works in fresco, of which the most esteemed is the ceiling of the church of Monte Vergine. He died of the plague in 1743.

PALAMEDES. See STAEVERTS.

PALING, ISAAC. According to Houbraken, this artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1670. He was a scholar of Abraham Vanden Tempel, and painted portraits and conversations in the style of that master. He visited England in the reign of Charles II., where he practised portrait painting some years, and returned to his own country in 1682.

PALLADINO, ADRIANO. According to Orlandi, this artist was born at Cortona in 1610, and was a scholar of Pietro Berretini. He painted history in the style of his master, and executed several works for the public edifices of his native city. He died in 1680.

PALLAVICINI, LEO. According to Professor Christ, this artist resided at Milan about the year 1664. He is said to have published some prints marked with the initials L. P. f. [Several writers say that he flourished about 1604; Zani comes as late as 1616. The prints marked L. P. in a tablet, are of a more ancient date, and supposed to be by Lucas Penni; but of this there is no certainty.]

[PALLIERE, LOUIS-VINCENT-LEON, a French historical painter, was born at Bordeaux in 1788, and died in 1820. He was a scholar of Vincent, and gave early promise of arriving at excellence in the art. In 1812 he obtained the first prize in the contest for the scholarship at Rome, for his picture of Ulysses slaying the Suitsors to Penelope. At Rome he painted Argus slain by Mercury; Prometheus tormented by the Vulture; the Flagellation of Christ; and Juno borrowing the Girdle of Venus. In 1819 he exhibited at the Musée St. Peter curing the Lame Man; Tobit restoring Sight to his Father; a Shepherd in Repose; a Nymph coming from the Bath; Preaching at Rome during the Night; and other subjects. In this year he obtained the gold medal of the first class.]

PALMA, JACOPO, IL VECCHIO. This eminent artist is called Il Vecchio, to distinguish him from his great nephew, Jacopo Palma, called Il Giovine. He was a native of Serinalta, in the Valle Brembana, in the Bergamesco territory. Until the publication of the Dictionnaire Portatif, by M. La Combe, in 1752, who has asserted that he was born in 1540, this artist was believed to have been a contemporary and competitor of Lorenzo Lotto, who flourished from the year 1513 till 1554, which tradition is supported by the authority of Ridolfi, who states him to have been the instructor of Bonifazio Veneziano, who died in 1553. By this inconsiderate mistake, which has been followed by M. D'Argenville and the other French biographers, they have endeavoured to establish the whimsical absurdity, that Palma the younger was born in 1544, when his great uncle was only four years of age. From the character of his style, and from the evidence of Vasari, who asserts that he died a few years previous to the publication of his work, which was in 1568, it appears satisfactorily confirmed, that the elder Palma was born about the year 1510. He is said, by Ridolfi, to have embellished his style, which at first partook of the formality and dryness of Giovanni Bellini, by studying the works of Giorgione, and acquired a rich and harmonious tone of colour, a tenderness and impasto in his carnations, in which he approaches the first style of Tiziano. Such are his pictures of the Last Supper, in S. Maria Mater Domini, at Venice; and the Holy Family, in the church of S. Stefano, at Vicenza. He appears to have attempted a character of more originality in his large picture of the Adoration of the Magi, in the Isola di S. Elena, in which he discovers a fine choice of nature, a copious composition, and a tasteful arrangement of his draperies. One of his most admired productions is his celebrated picture of St. Barbara, in the church of S. Maria Formosa, at Venice. The works of Palma are more estimable for the union and harmony of the colouring, and the careful style of their finishing, than the boldness and correctness of design, or the energy of his pencil. Towards the latter part of his life his productions were less vigorous, and he declined into negligence and manner.

[It is by no means "satisfactorily confirmed" that Jacopo Palma il vecchio was born in or about the year 1510. Zani says he operated in 1491, and in 1516. Vasari does not mention him in the first edition of his work, published in 1550; in the second edition, 1568, he says that Palma died at the age of forty-eight, but he does not say in what year, nor does he say "a few years previous to his publication:" it may have been twelve or fifteen years previous. He classes him with Lorenzo Lotto, and both under the head MAZZUOLA ED ALTRI. Now, it is said that Lorenzo Lotto was born in the year 1490, or perhaps earlier, and was the rival and imitator of Palma. Zani gives the dates of three pictures painted by Lotto; one in 1505, one in 1506, and another in 1523. He also quotes two lines of a sonnet by Boschini.

"Del Palma vecchio il raro imitador Quel Bergamasco Lotto si famoso."

It is generally the younger artist who imitates and endeavours to rival another. It is said that Lorenzo Lotto died old in 1560; (Zani says, 1554;) if Lotto was old in either of those years, it can hardly be supposed that Palma was only 48 a few years previous to the publication of Vasari's work in 1568. If any conclusion could be drawn from the portrait in Vasari, it would be that he was 80 when it was taken. It is doubtful whether he painted the picture of the Last Supper, in S. Maria Mater Domini, at Venice; it is by some attributed to Bonifacio. Vasari describes with great gusto a picture by Palma representing the ship bringing the body of St. Mark from Alexandria to Venice, exposed to the fury of a frightful storm. He says the effect is so terrific that the very canvass seems to tremble!

"The monster roar'd so loud, and look'd so grim,
His very shadow darst not follow him."

His pictures are to be found in Holland, Germany, Russia, and England, as well as in Italy; particularly at Vienna, Dresden, Munich, and Berlin. In the Hermitage at Petersburg are those that were formerly in the Houghton gallery. There are pictures by him in private collections in England, some of which are attributed to Titian. In Sir Thomas Baring's, the Virgin and Child, in a landscape, with Joseph, the Magdalene, and St. Catherine, a beautiful work of his middle period; another, with additional figures, was at Corsham House; at Alton Tower, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, two small pictures, the Birth and Death of Adonis, erroneously attributed to Giorgione; in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, a Venus and Cupid, formerly in the Orleans' gallery; in Lord Ellesmere's collection the portrait of a Doge, also from the Orleans' gallery; and others elsewhere, sometimes called Giorgione, sometimes Titian. There seems to have been a similar disposition in Palma and Lotto for imitation. In the works of the former is found a resemblance to Bellini, Giorgione, and Titian; in the latter, to all these, and to Lionardo da Vinci and Palma.]

PALMA, JACOPO, IL GIOVINE. This artist was called Jacopo Palma il Giovine, to distinguish him from his great uncle, the elder Palma, who is the subject of the preceding article. He was born at Venice in 1544, [Zani says 1541,] the son of Antonio Palma, an obscure painter, who instructed him in the little he knew of the art, and encouraged him in his studies after the works of the principal masters in the Venetian school. The bold and prompt style of Tintoretto appears to have first attracted his attention; but he afterwards became sensible of the suavity of colour and the more tasteful design of Titian, whose works he studied with admiration and delight. At the age of fifteen, whilst he was occupied in copying the celebrated Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, by Titian, in the church of the Jesuits, the Duke d'Urbino, Guido Ubaldo, entered the church, to attend the service, when the young Palma took the opportunity of sketching his portrait, which being observed by the attendants, they acquainted the Duke with what they had noticed. The artist was sent for, and the prince was so satisfied with his performance, that he took him into his protection, and sent him to Rome for improvement, with letters of recommendation to his brother the cardinal. During a residence of eight years at Rome, his studies were directed to the antique statues, the works of M. Angelo, Raffaele, and, above all, to the classical designs of Polidoro da Caravaggio. His abilities were not unnoticed at Rome, and he was employed by the pope to decorate one of the apartments of the Vatican. On his return to Venice, when he was about twenty-four years of age, he found the popular favour and employment in the possession of Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese. Lanzi asserts that he was indebted for his introduction to public notice to his casual acquaintance with a celebrated architect and sculptor, named Vittoria, who was then considered the principal arbiter and judge of the works of art. The indignation which an able artist feels at his works being submitted to the capricious tribunal of a professor, who did not even practise painting, had excited some animosity between Vittoria and the two eminent painters just mentioned, and he embraced with zeal the party of Palma, and became the trumpet of his fame. Their well-founded reputation was, however, proof against the intrigues of Vittoria, and Palma was obliged to content himself with the rank of the third painter in Venice. After their death, it is observed by Lanzi, that the younger Palma may be considered the last painter of the good, and the first painter of the bad, epoch of the Venetian school. He had occasionally an opportunity of entering the lists with his powerful antagonists, and other contemporaries; and he painted in competition with Tintoretto, in the palace of St. Mark, and with Giuseppe Cesari d'Arpino, in the Ospitaletto; where he produced one of his finest works, representing the Assumption of the Virgin. Loaded with commissions towards the latter part of his life, his pictures were finished with less study and attention; and it is reported that the Cavaliere d'Arpino, who was himself not remarkable for care or precision, calling on him, and remarking the slight style in which he then painted, observed, that he intended making some stay at Venice, to learn of him how to make such admirable sketches. "I will readily instruct you," replied Palma, "on condition that you will permit me to visit you at Rome, to be instructed how to finish them." Of his numerous works at Venice, the following are the most deserving of notice. In the church of S. Niccolo dei Frari, a fine picture of the Deposition from the Cross; in S. Giacomo del Orio, the Martyrdom of S. James; in La Trinità, Christ taken in the Garden; and in S. Elisabetta, the Visitation. The compositions of the younger Palma are more copious than judicious; and his design is more bold than correct. His colouring is distinguished by suavity and freshness, and though less lustrous than that of Paolo Veronese, he approaches nearer to the truth and tenderness of Titian. We have several etchings by the younger Palma, executed in a very spirited and masterly style. They are sometimes signed with his name at length, and sometimes marked with a monogram composed with a P. crossed with a palm branch, thus . The following are his principal plates:

Samson and Dalilah.

Judith putting the Head of Holofernes into a sack, held by an attendant.

The Nativity.

The Holy Family, with St. Jerome and St. Francis.

St. John in the Wilderness.

The Decollation of St. John.

The Tribute Money.

The Adulteress before Christ.

Christ answering the Pharisees, who disputed his authority.

The Incredulity of St. Thomas.

An emblematical subject of Pallas presenting Victory.

St. Jerome in conference with the Pope Damasius; scarce.

An Ecclesiastic and a naked Figure, with two boys.

This eminent artist died in 1628. [The whole of his etchings as described by Bartsch consists of 27 pieces.]

[PALMA, LODOVICO, a portrait painter and engraver, of Volterra, noticed by Zani as living in 1650. There are eight etchings and a frontispiece to a work, in quarto, printed at Avignon in 1623, with the following title: "La voye de Lait, ou le chemin des Heros au palais de gloire à l'entre triomphante de Louis XIII. en la Cité d'Avignon, 1622." The prints are inscribed Palma Ludovicus Lusitanus f.]

[PALMAROLI, PIETRO, an Italian painter and picture restorer, to whom the world is indebted for the preservation of the famous Descent from the Cross, by Daniele da Volterra. He transferred this picture from the wall, on which it was painted in fresco, to canvass; this he accomplished in 1811, being the first work of the kind. He afterwards transferred and restored several other pictures in Rome and in Dresden, among which is the very celebrated Madonna di San Sisto, by Raphael, so well known by Müller's magnificent print. He also freed the fresco of the Sibyls, by Raphael, in the church of Santa Maria della Pace, from the destructive restorations in oil made by order of Alexander VII. In such difficult processes there must of necessity be some further restorations; but when these are accomplished with the skill and judgment which Palmaroli has exhibited, all lovers of the arts feel under obligation to the operator. Before the last-mentioned picture was cleansed by him, the objects were so dark and undistinguishable, that it was a subject of disappointment to all the admirers of Raphael. The above-mentioned pictures are, however, but a portion of the works of the great Italian masters that owe their revival and preservation to his skill, not only of those in churches and in public galleries, but in private collections. It might be advantageous to many critics on paintings by the old masters, to obtain a list of them, and commit it to memory, in order to qualify their decisions. To enable them to do so they may consult Nagler, who has particularized a considerable number. Palmaroli died at Rome in 1828.]

PALMEGLIANI, MARCO DA FORLÌ. Although this painter is not mentioned by any writer before Lanzi, except Vasari, who miscalls him Parmegiano, he is worthy of notice as one of the ablest artists of his country at the period in which he lived. He was a native of Forlì, and is said to have been a disciple of Francesco Melozzo. He flourished from the year 1513 till 1537, as appears from the dates on some of his pictures in the collection of Prince Ercolani, and in the churches of Forlì. Lanzi attributes to this painter two styles; the first dry and formal, seldom venturing on a picture beyond a St. Sebastian or a St. Jerome, and loaded with the absurd gilded accompaniments usual at the time; in the second, his compositions are more copious, and his outline bolder. Several of his works remain in the churches in Romagna, and in the Venetian states. In the Palazzo Vicentini, at Vicenza, is a fine picture by this master of a dead Christ between Nicodemus and Joseph. [By some writers he is called Palmezzano. Zani gives several of his signatures to pictures: Palmasanus, Palmsianus, Palmezianus, &c. Kugler says there are several clever pictures by Marco Palmezzano in the Berlin Museum. In Rosini is a print of Christ administering the Sacrament to his Disciples, (plate 141,) from the picture in the Duomo of Forli. Zani mentions Filippo Palmeggiani, an eminent painter, supposed to be a son of the preceding.]

PALMIERI, GIOSEFFO, [or GIUSEPPE.] This painter was born at Genoa in 1674. Although he acquired some reputation as a painter of history, he is chiefly celebrated for his pictures of animals, in which he particularly excelled. In his historical pictures, though ingeniously composed, and coloured with great sweetness and harmony, he usually discovers an incorrectness of design, which probably was rather occasioned by inattention than incompetency, as some of his works are exempt from this defect. Such is his picture in the church of S. Domenico, at Genoa, representing the Resurrection. He died in 1740.

PALOMBO, BARTOLOMEO, was born at Rome about the year 1612, and was a scholar of Pietro da Cortona. He proved a reputable painter of history. In the church of St. Joseph, at Rome, is an altarpiece by this master, representing the Death of that Saint; and in the church of the Carmelites of St. Martino de Monti, a picture of Mary Magdalene. [Zani, by a misprint, says he was living in 1566, (1666?) and Nagler has copied it, though he previously says Palombo was a scholar of Pietro da Cortona, who was not born till 1596.]

PALOMINO, DON ACISLO ANTONIO Y VELASCO. See VELASCO.

[PALTHE, GERARD JAN, born at Degenkamp, in Overyssel, in 1681, was a scholar of Juriaan Pool. He painted portraits, familiar subjects, and interiors, by candle or torch-light, in the manner of G. Schalken. He died about 1750. There was also a Jan Palthe, probably a son of G. J., who painted similar subjects; he was born at Deventer in 1719, and resided at Leyden, where he acquired considerable reputation, and died there in 1769. There were two others of the same name, who may be considered rather as amateurs than as professors.]

PALTRONIERI, [or PALTRINIERI,] PIETRO, called IL MIRANDOLESE DALLE PROSPETTIVE. According to Oretti, this artist was born at Bologna in 1673. He distinguished himself as a painter of perspective and architectural views. There are many of his works in the public edifices at Bologna, also at Vienna, in which the figures are frequently painted by Ercole Graziani. He died in 1741.

PANCOTTO, PIETRO. This artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1590. He was brought up in the school of Caracci, and, according to Malvasia, was one of the most eccentric and enterprising artists of the Bolognese school. His principal work is the Last Judgment, painted in fresco, in the church of la Madonna di S. Colombano, at Bologna.

PANDEREN, EGBERT VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Haerlem in 1606. He resided at Antwerp, where he engraved a considerable number of plates, executed with the graver in a stiff, formal style, with little effect, and deficient in drawing. Among others, we have the following by him:

The Virgin interceding with Christ for the salvation of mankind; after Rubens.

The Four Evangelists; after Peter de Jode.

St. Louis, with a border, representing his Miracles; after the same.

Three circular plates of Minerva, Juno, and Venus; after Spranger.

The Portrait of Maurice, Prince of Orange, on horseback, with a battle in the back-ground; after Tempesta.

Four plates of the Sick Man and the Doctor; after Goltzius; scarce.

Part of the Plates for the Academie de l'Espée; by G Thibault.

[Nagler, who says he was born in 1575, has given a list of 37 prints by him.]

PANDOLFI, GIANGIACOMO. This artist was a native of Pesaro, and flourished about the year 1630. He was a scholar of Federigo Zuccaro, of whose style he was one of the most successful followers. He painted in fresco the Oratorio de Nome di Dio, where he represented several subjects from the Old and New Testament. His picture of S. Giorgio and S. Carlo, in the dome of Pesaro, is considered by Lanzi as little inferior to the works of Zuccaro. [Gian-Giacomo Pandolfi painted in 1607, as quoted by Zani.]

[PANDERIT, ———, mentioned by Balkema as one of the best scholars of Rembrandt, and he says, a native of Saxony, born in 1601, and died in 1662. He afterwards notices Jean Paudits, born in Saxony in 1618, and died in 1659, as a scholar of Rembrandt, and a good portrait painter. There is but little doubt that both these erroneous and contradictory accounts refer to Christopher Paudits; and they are now noticed to guard against the confusion that they occasion when referred to.]

PANDOLFO. See RESCHI.

PANETTI, DOMENICO. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1460. It is not known under whom he studied; but his works were dry and Gothic, until Benvenuto da Garofola, who had been his pupil, returned from Rome to Ferrara, with the modern taste and dignified style he had acquired in the school of Raffaëlle. The instructor now became the scholar of his former disciple, and although advanced in years, he so entirely altered his manner, that he became one of the most eminent artists of that period. Of his numerous works in the churches at Ferrara, the following are the most deserving of notice. In the church of S. Niccolo, the taking down from the Cross, with the Virgin, St. John, and St. Joseph; a picture of S. Andrea, at the Agostiniani; and the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, in the church of S. Francesco. He died in 1530. [Kugler mentions a beautiful Entombment inscribed with his name in the Berlin Museum.]

PANICALE, MASOLINO DA. This artist was born at Panicale, in the Florentine territory, in 1378. He was first instructed in design by Lorenzo Ghiberti, and afterwards became a disciple of Gherardo Starnina, and adopted a style less dry and Gothic than that which had existed before him, in which there appeared a dawning of that grandeur and harmony, which was afterwards carried to a higher perfection by his scholar Masaccio. His principal works are in the chapel of S. Pietro al Carmine, at Florence, where he painted the four Evangelists, the Vocation of St. Peter to the Apostleship, his Denial of Christ, and his curing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple. He died at Florence in 1415. [Rosini has given a print of Peter and John healing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple, (plate 32,) in which is also the restoring of Tabitha to life. The expressions are admirable.]

PANICO, ANTONIO MARIA. According to Bellori, this artist was a native of Bologna, and a disciple of Annibale Caracci. He accompanied that master to Rome when he was very young, and was taken under the protection of Signor Mario Farnese, who employed him in ornamenting his country-seats of Castro and Latera. In the Dome at Farnese he painted his celebrated picture of the Mass, in which he is supposed to have been assisted by Annibale Caracci.

[PANICO, CONTE UGO DA. See UGO DA CARPI.]

PANNINI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI PAOLO. This artist was born at Piacenza in 1691. He went early to Rome, where he became a scholar of Pietro Lucatelli, an eminent painter of perspective. He applied himself, with great assiduity, in designing the remaining monuments of ancient architecture in the vicinity of that capital. These magnificent vestiges of antiquity he has represented with the utmost precision and correctness. He was perfectly acquainted with the rules of perspective, and surpassed his instructor in the neatness and freedom of his touch, and the clearness of his colouring. The merit of Pannini is not confined to the beauty and grandeur of his buildings; he decorated his pictures with figures, gracefully and correctly designed, and grouped with taste and elegance. Although he usually confined himself to pictures of an easel size, he was not incapable of succeeding in works on a larger scale; and Lanzi speaks in very favourable terms of a large painting, with figures as large as life, representing Christ driving the Merchandizers out of the Temple, in the church of the Signori della Missione, at Piacenza; the architecture is magnificent, and the figures are designed with great spirit and variety of character. He has been sometimes reproached with drawing his figures of too large a size for his architecture, and that they destroyed the effect which would otherwise be produced by the immensity of the buildings; but this defect is by no means general. The works of Pannini are to be found in most of the collections in England, and several of them decorate the palaces at Rome. Two of his finest pictures are in the gallery of the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo. He died in 1758. [There are three dates given by different writers of the death of G. P. Pannini;—1745, 1758, and 1764: the last is probably the right one. Many of his pictures have been engraved by Lempereur, Le Bas, J. S. Müller, Vivares, Benezech, Bartolozzi, and other eminent engravers.]

PANNEELS, WILLIAM, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1600. He was a disciple of Rubens, as appears from his inscription on one of his prints. Of his works as a painter little is known, and from the number of his prints he appears to have been chiefly employed in etching from the works of Rubens and his own designs. His plates are executed in a spirited and masterly style, and sometimes produce a vigorous effect; but his drawing is generally very incorrect, particularly in the naked. The following are his principal plates:

The Portrait of Rubens, in an octagon border; after Rubens.

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

Esther before Ahasuerus.

The Nativity.

The Adoration of the Magi.

Mary washing the Feet of Christ.

The Assumption of the Virgin.

The Holy Family, with the infant Christ and St. John playing with a Lamb.

St. John baptizing Christ.

Samson killing the Lion, with a companion, David killing the Lion and the Bear.

St. Sebastian.

Jupiter and Antiope.

Jupiter and Juno.

Bacchus drunk, supported by a Faun and a Satyr.

Bacchus supported by Satyrs and Bacchante.

Meleager presenting the Head of the Boar to Atalanta.

[The year of his death is unknown, but one of his prints is dated 1636. Nagler has given a list of 33, and added one by John Pannools, after An. Caracci.]

PANNICCIATI, JACOPO. According to Baruffaldi, this painter was born at Ferrara about the year 1510. He was a disciple of Dosso Dossi, and painted history in the style of that master, though his compositions are more copious than those of Dossi, and his pictures are painted with more freedom. He died young, in 1540.

[PANTOJA DE LA CRUZ, JUAN, born at Madrid in 1551, was a scholar of Alfonso Sanchez Coello, in whose school he so greatly distinguished himself that Philip II. named him one of his painters, and conferred on him the title of valet-de-chambre. He became very eminent both as an historical and portrait painter. Palomino possessed the original designs by him for the beautiful sepulchres of Charles V. and Philip II. in the Escorial, and which he had painted in oil, together with two escutcheons of the Arms of Austria, en grisaille, to exhibit at the funeral ceremony of the great Emperor. He painted a great number of portraits of the family of Philip II., of which many exist at the Escorial, the Retiro, and in the tower of the Parada; several were destroyed at the burning of the Prado. At the death of Philip, he continued in favour with his successor, who commanded him to paint his portrait on horseback, as a model for the famous sculptor, Giovanni de Bologna, then at Florence, to form the equestrian group in bronze placed in the garden of La Casa del Campo. He painted also two magnificent portraits of Philip III. and his Queen, which are dated 1606, and are still preserved in the palace of the Dukes d'Uceda at Montalvan. Bermudez particularly distinguishes the portrait of the celebrated councillor Ruiz Perez de Ribera, which is in the monastery of Santa Maria de Naxera, for the extraordinary delicacy of the painting, and the learned inscription composed and signed by Pantoja: it is dated in 1596. Mention is also made of a picture of the Adoration of the Shepherds, in which the portraits of Philip II. and his family are introduced. This is spoken of as blending the qualities of Lucas Cranach and Bronzino, (two very opposite masters,) whose style he imitated in his draperies and his figures; and it is added that they never did better. This imitation is, however, rendered doubtful when it is said that Antonio More, of Utrecht, absolutely reminds us of the manner of Pantoja. After a laborious life he died at Madrid in 1610. As almost every country finds among its painters a parallel for the story of Zeuxis, there is no reason why Spain should be deprived of hers. It is related that a superb eagle having been captured near the Prado, the King gave orders to Pantoja to paint its likeness; which he did with so much truth, that the royal bird on seeing it mistook it for a real eagle, and notwithstanding all their efforts to prevent the destruction, attacked it with impetuosity, and tore it in pieces.]

PANVINUS, ONULPH. This artist was a native of Antwerp, and flourished about the year 1568. He engraved and published a set of twenty-seven portraits, from his own designs, entitled, Elogia et Imagines Pont. Max. ad viv. delin. 1568. Among other portraits engraved by him is that of Rubens. [If he engraved a portrait of Rubens, he must have lived much later than 1568: Rubens was not born till 1577. Zani mentions Onofrio Panvinus, a designer and engraver of Verona, who operated about the same period.]

PANZACCHI, MARIA HELENA. According to Orlandi, this lady was born at Bologna in 1668. She was instructed in design by Emilio Taruffi, and became a reputable paintress of landscapes. She embellished her pictures with figures, tolerably correct in the design, and disposed with elegance and taste. Several of her works are to be found in the private collections at Bologna. [Zani says she died in 1737. Lanzi says her landscapes are now very little known, even in Bologna: Crespi mentions only two.]

PAOLETTI, PAOLO. This painter was a native of Padua, and flourished about the year 1725. He excelled in painting flowers, fruit, fish, and dead game. His pictures are held in considerable estimation throughout Friuli. [He died at Udine in 1735.]

PAOLI, FRANCESCO DA. Florent le Comte mentions this artist as the engraver of a View of the City of Rome. [He lived about 1640.]

PAOLINI, PIETRO, [or LUCA PIETRO,] was born at Lucca in 1603, and was sent to Rome early in his life, where he entered the school of Angelo Caroselli, under whom he became an able designer. His style of colouring, however, rather resembles the Venetian than the Roman school, in which he occasionally approaches the rich and harmonious tinting of Pordenone or Titian. He painted a fine picture of the Martyrdom of S. Andrea, for the church of S. Michele, at Lucca; and his large work in the library of S. Frediano, representing Pope Gregory entertaining the Pilgrims, is described by Lanzi as a magnificent production, exhibiting a grandeur of composition, a variety of character, and a beauty and harmony of colouring, sufficient to immortalize his fame. He also speaks highly of his talent in painting conversations and village festivals, many of which are in the private collections at Lucca. He died in 1681. [He invented an instrument for taking perspective views, and designing them in their due proportions: perhaps the Camera lucida.]

PAOLINI, P10, [FABIO.] This painter was a native of Udine, but studied at Rome under Pietro da Cortona. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was received into the Academy at Rome in 1678. There are several of his fresco works in the churches in that city, particularly a ceiling of one of the chapels in S. Carlo al Corso, which is highly creditable to his talents.

PAPA, SIMONE, IL VECCHIO, was a Neapolitan, born about the year 1430. The works of Antonio Solario, called il Zingaro, were then held in high estimation, and he became his scholar. In the church of S. Niccolò alla Dogana, at Naples, is a picture by this master, representing the Annunciation; and in S. Lorenzo, the Virgin and infant Saviour, with several Saints; but his principal work is in the church of S. Maria la Nuova, in the chapel of the family of Turbolo, where he has represented St. Michael discomfiting the rebellious Spirits. He died in 1488.

PAPA, SIMONE, IL GIOVINE. This artist was born at Naples in 1506, the son of a goldsmith, who intended to bring him up to that business, but having shown an early inclination for the art, he was placed under the instruction of Giovanni Antonio d'Amato, and he became a respectable painter of history. In the church of S. Maria la Nuova, are two pictures by this master, in one he has represented the Assumption of the Virgin, and in the other the Annunciation. He died in 1569.

[PAPPE, ADRIEN DE, said to have been a scholar of Gerard Dou. Balkema, who is the only writer that notices him, says that in the sale of Cornelius van Dyck's collection of pictures in 1713, there was a picture by Pape representing a Kitchen with a Woman paring Turnips; and in Van Muller's collection sold at Amsterdam in 1837, another of a Kitchen, with a Woman plucking a Fowl. The latter, he says, is more in the manner of Q. Brekelencamp than of G. Dou. He adds, that there is an Interior by him in the Museum at the Hague; but he gives no particulars relative to his birth, place of residence, or death, though he says he was worthy of the school whence he proceeded.]

PAPILLON, JOHN, the ELDER, an indifferent French engraver on wood, who was a native of Rouen, in Normandy, and lived about the year 1670. He was instructed by Du Bellay, but never arrived at any eminence in the art. [He was born in 1639, and died in 1710.]

PAPILLON, JOHN, the YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at St. Quintin in 1661. After receiving some instruction in drawing from his father, he was sent to Paris, where he was placed under the tuition of Noel Cochin. His first pursuit was drawing with a pen, which he performed with great facility and spirit. He afterwards turned his attention to engraving on wood, and his cuts possess considerable merit. This artist is said to have been the inventor of printing papers in imitation of tapestry, for furnishing rooms, about the year 1688. He executed a great variety of vignettes and book ornaments. [He was the first who engraved on wood with the point without using the pen. He died in 1723.]

PAPILLON, JOHN BAPTIST MICHAEL, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1698, and was instructed by his father in the art of engraving on wood, which he practised with great success. Among his best performances are the cuts he executed in conjunction with N. le Sueur, from the designs of J. J. Bachelier, for the fine edition of Les Fables de la Fontaine, in four volumes folio. This ingenious artist published an interesting history of the art of engraving on wood, in two volumes, entitled, Traité Historique et pratique de la Gravure en bois. In this publication are inserted many beautiful specimens of engravings on wood, some of which are executed with single strokes, without cross hatchings, which produce a clear and pleasing effect. Several of his cuts represent ornamental foliage, flowers, and shells, which give proof of his ability. The difficulty of executing such long cuts on wood, with such regularity and clearness, will be obvious to every beholder. In the work above mentioned, he has given us two specimens of figures in chiaro-scuro, executed with four blocks each, one of which, between the pages 154 and 155 of the second volume, he gives proofs of, from the separate blocks, followed by the figure complete. There is perhaps no mode by which the sketches and tinted drawings of the great masters can be more successfully represented. In his historical account of the engravers on wood, he is guilty of many mistakes; but it ought to be remembered, that he had very little light to assist him in his researches, which are extensive. The number of names which he collected together, many of which are confounded with each other by different authors, may in some measure plead his excuse. [Since the publication of Jackson's History of Wood Engraving, and other treatises on the subject, Papillon's book has become comparatively of no account. He was enthusiastic with regard to the art, but wanted judgment and discrimination. Indeed there is much of wild fancy, or, it may be said, hallucination, in parts of it, particularly that which regards the two Cunios. The whole story is exploded; and the writer who could invent or believe such improbable fictions, is not to be relied on as an historian. He died in 1776.]

PAPINI, GIUSEPPE, [OR GIUSEPPE BENEDETTI DE PAPINI,] an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He executed several plates of ceilings, and other decorations from the Tuscan gallery, published by Ignazio Orsini, [for the Museo Etrusco, by Gori; the Museum Capitolinum; and other works published between 1737 and 1750. Zani says he was born in 1707, and died in 1782.]

PARASACCHI, DOMENICO, an Italian designer and engraver, who resided at Rome about the year 1630. In conjunction with Giovanni Maggi, he engraved a set of plates of the fountains at Rome, published in 1618. This collection, with additions, was afterwards republished at Rome in 1636, entitled, Racolta delle principale Fontane della Città di Roma, disegnate e intagliate da Domenico Parasacchi.

PARASOLE, LEONARDO, called NORSINI, an Italian engraver on wood, born at Rome about the year 1570. He chiefly distinguished himself by the cuts he executed of the plants for the Herbal of Castor Durante, physician to Pope Sixtus V., engraved by order of that pontiff. He also engraved several prints from the designs of Antonio Tempesta. [He was called Norcino, or Norsino, from the place of his birth.]

PARASOLE, ISABELLA. This ingenious lady was the wife of the preceding artist. She executed several cuts of plants for an Herbal, published under the direction of Prince Cesi, of Aquasparta. She published a book on the method of working lace and embroidery, with ornamental cuts, which she engraved from her own designs.

PARASOLE, BERNARDINO, was the son of Leonardo Parasole, and studied painting in the school of Giuseppe Cesari. He had begun to distinguish himself as an historical painter, when he died, in the bloom of life. He executed a few engravings on wood, from his own designs.

PARASOLE, HIERONIMA. This lady was of the same family with the preceding artists. We have by her some engravings on wood; and, among others, the Battle of the Centaurs, after Tempesta. It is executed with considerable spirit, but the drawing is very incorrect.

PARCELLES, JOHN. This artist was born at Leyden about the year 1597, and was a scholar of Henry Cornelius de Vroom. He excelled in painting marines, particularly tempests and agitated waters, with thunder storms, and all the horrors of shipwreck. He treated these awful subjects with extraordinary fidelity and effect. His pictures of calms have also considerable merit, they usually represent views of the coast of Holland, with fishing boats, and groups of figures on the strand. The pictures of Parcelles are delicately and carefully finished; and his small figures are correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. We have by this artist some etchings of marines and shipping, as follows:

A set of twelve Sea-pieces, with the figure of a Dutch boor on each.

A set of twelve plates of the different Shipping used in Holland, with a Latin inscription.

[There are several other etchings by him and his son Julius, but their works, both in painting and engraving, are so much alike that it is difficult to distinguish them. Jan died at Leyderdorp in 1641, according to Balkema; but either this is an error, or his son Julius must have been born earlier than is stated in the next article. Füssli and Immerzeel are silent on both points.]

PARCELLES, JULIUS, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Leyderdorp about the year 1628. He painted similar subjects to those of his father, whose style he imitated with some success, though inferior to him in delicacy of touch, and the transparency of his colouring. His works have sometimes been mistaken for those of the elder Parcelles, as they both marked their pictures with the initials J. P.

PAREJA, JUAN DE. This artist was a native of Spanish America, born in 1610, the offspring of a Spaniard and an Indian mother. He became a slave of the celebrated painter Don Diego Velasquez, and was employed by him in mixing his colours and preparing his palette. "From pointing the arrows of Apollo," says Mr. Cumberland, "he became ambitious of trying the strength of his bow." The servility of his situation for some time deterred him from making his first effort; but the impulse of genius at length prevailed, and he seized every secret opportunity, in the absence of Velasquez, of endeavouring to imitate what he had been employed upon, and by persevering application, and the force of talents, he became a respectable follower of the style of his master. These stolen studies were not accomplished without considerable apprehension and dread of discovery. The disqualifying circumstance of his bondage rendered it dangerous in the extreme, in a country like Spain, where the ranks of society are so pertinaciously adhered to, for a slave to presume to aspire to the exercise of an art which ranked its professors with the great, decorated them with courtly orders, and secured them the favour and familiarity of Majesty itself. Velasquez, of all others, was the least likely to pardon so insolent an invasion of his graphic honours; and it was with fear and trembling that the humble candidate for fame conceived the project of introducing his clandestine performances to the notice of the King. It was customary with Philip to honour the atelier of Velasquez with frequent visits; and Pareja having observed that it was usual for the King to order the pictures which were placed with their faces to the wall to be turned for his inspection, he formed the scheme of substituting a picture of his own, and of throwing himself on his Majesty's clemency for forgiveness. On Philip's next visit to the apartments of Velasquez, the project succeeded to his utmost wishes; the King ordered the picture to be shown him, Pareja eagerly obeyed, and presenting his humble performance, threw himself at his Majesty's feet, acknowledged his guilt and audacity, and implored the royal protection against his master's displeasure. He could not have appealed to more competent judgment, nor have brought his offences before a more merciful tribunal. Philip interceded in his behalf, and Velasquez not only forgave the transgression, but emancipated him from his servitude. The gratitude of Pareja induced him to continue his voluntary service to Velasquez until his death. He is said to have been eminent in portrait painting, and to have produced some historical subjects in the style of his master. He died at Madrid in 1670. [Cean Bermudez says he was born at Seville in 1606, of parents who were slaves, of which there were then a great number in that city. He was ignorant of the manner by which Pareja became the property of Velasquez, whether by purchase or inheritance; but is certain that he accompanied Velasquez in the quality of slave, when he was called to Madrid in 1623. It was not till 1651 that he obtained emancipation by the ingenious project mentioned above. His public works are not numerous; the Calling of St. Matthew, at Aranjuez; the Baptism of Christ, at Toledo; and some Saints, at Madrid, are all that are particularized.]

PARIA. See PERRIER.

PARIGI, GIULIO. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1610. He engraved some plates of opera scenes, in conjunction with Remegio Cantagallini, whose master he was. [Giulio Parigi, a Florentine architect, engineer, and designer, was the son of Alfonso Parigi, who died in 1590. There are only three etchings ascribed to Giulio by Bartsch and Nagler; the Garden of Calypso, the Temple of Peace, and a Landscape after Canta Gallina, who was his scholar. The two first are described by Bartsch among the etchings of Canta Gallina, Nos. 15 and 18. Giulio died in 1635. The plates of opera scenes, alluded to in the text, are by his son Alfonso, called the younger. They are etched in the manner of Canta Gallina, and it is difficult to distinguish them. Bartsch has described 12; several are dated 1628. He was at one time military engineer, and afterwards architect to the Duke of Tuscany. He died in 1656. See Bartsch, tom. xx. of P. G.]

[PARIS, PIERRE ADRIEN, an architect and architectural designer, was born at Besançon in 1747, and died in 1819. His architectural designs appear in Le Voyage à Naples, by Saint Non; in Les Tableaux de la Suisse, by Delaborde; and in works published by himself: such as Recueil de desseins et études d'Architecture, 9 vols. in folio; Examen des Edifices de Rome, in folio; Restauration du Colysée, 45 plates; and other publications.]

PARISET, D. P., a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1740. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Des Marteau, under whom he learned the art of engraving in the chalk style. In 1767 he came to England, where he was for some time employed by Mr. Ryland, and engraved some plates for the collection of prints from the drawings of the great masters, published by Mr. Rogers. We have also several portraits of English artists, and others, from the designs of Falconet, among which are the following:

Sir Joshua Reynolds; P. Falconet, del. 1768.
Benjamin West, [with his family, after West.]
Francis Cotes.
William Ryland.
Paul Sandby.
Ozias Humphrey.
J. Meyer.

[Oliver Cromwell; after Cooper.
The death of Admiral Coligny.
The death of the Duke of Guise.]

The date of the artist's death is not ascertained.]

PARISINUS, AUGUSTINUS. This artist is supposed to have been a native of France, and to have flourished about the year 1640. He engraved several plates of book ornaments, which are executed with the graver in a very indifferent manner, and his drawing is very incorrect. Florent le Comte mentions five prints by him from the designs of Florius Macchius, but without specifying the subjects. He executed several of the plates for a book of emblems, after the designs of Florius Macchius. He generally used a cipher, composed of an A and a small P under it, thus AP. [He engraved, in conjunction with J. B. Coriolano and Olivier Gatti, a book of emblems by Paul Macchi, published at Bologna in 1628. There are landscapes with his mark.]

PARIZEAU, PHILIP [LOUIS,] a French engraver, born at Paris in 1740. We have by him several etchings, after Sal. Rosa, and other masters, executed in a neat, spirited style, among which are the following:

An Assembly of Roman Soldiers; after Sal. Rosa.
Marius seated on the Ruins of Carthage; after the same.
The Martyrdom of St. Andrew; after Deshayes.
The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew; after the same.
Psyche refusing the Honours of Divinity; after Boucher.

[Zani says he was born in 1748, and died in 1801; Nagler says he was born in 1740, but agrees in the date of his death. He gives a list of his principal engravings: the latest date mentioned is 1784.]

[PARKER, JAMES, an engraver, born about 1750, was a pupil of Bartolozzi, whose manner he followed. He was one of the engravers employed by Boydell in his Shakspeare; eleven of the plates are by him. * He also engraved the Revolution of 1688; the Novel; and Yorick feeling the Lady's Pulse, after Northcote; the Commemorations of the 14th of February and the 11th of October, 1797, after Smirke; several of the plates for Flaxman's illustrations of Homer's Iliad, and other publications. It is supposed that he died about 1805.]

PARKER, JOHN. "Of this person," says Edwards, "little can be said, for little is known." He was a native of England, and resided several years at Rome, where he discovered sufficient ability to be employed to paint an altar-piece for the church of S. Gregorio, on Monte Celio, representing S. Silvia. He returned to England about the year 1762, and was an exhibitor at the Society's Rooms, in the Strand, in 1763, where he had two pictures. The subject of one was the Assassination of David Rizzio; the other, his own portrait. He did not long survive his return to England, but died at Paddington about the year 1765.

PARKER, JOHN, another artist of the same name, must not be confounded with the preceding painter. He was for some time a student in the Duke of Richmond's gallery, and received some instructions from the Smiths of Chichester. He was at Rome in 1774, but returned to England the following year, where he practised landscape painting with some success.

PARMENSIS, BAPTISTA, an Italian engraver, born at Parma about the year 1530. He chiefly resided at Rome, where he engraved several plates after various masters, and from his own designs. His prints are executed with the graver, in a style resembling that of Cornelius Cort. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

- The Portrait of Philip II., King of Spain. 1589.
- The Virgin and Infant appearing to St. John ; after Baroccco, Baptista Parmensis, fec. 1588.
- The Baptism of Christ. Bapt. Parmensis, del.
- The Chastity of Joseph. 1592.
- The Crucifixion, in two sheets ; Bapt. Parmensis, formis. 1584.

[Zani mentions this artist as Battista Pensieri da Parma, and says that he operated from 1538 to 1601. He designates him as a designer, engraver, book and print-seller, and quotes four inscriptions, Romæ Battista da Parma 1583,—Battista Pensieri Parmensis fecit Romæ 1590,—Baptistæ pensier parmensis formis,—Baptista panzera formis 1601. It seems that he was patronized by the infamous Pietro Aretino, and praised by him in some of his letters ; if so, it may be supposed that he was born earlier than 1530, which Zani's statement corroborates.]

PARMENTIS, JACOBUS, was probably of the same family with the preceding artist. We have, among others, a print of the Martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, after Parmigiano. It is executed with the graver in a slight style, somewhat resembling Giovanni Giacomo Caraglio, to whom it has been sometimes attributed. [Nagler is of opinion that this is the same as Caraglio. There is nothing to show that he was of the same family as the preceding.]

PARMENTIER, JAMES, a French painter, born at Paris in 1658. He was a relative of Sebastian Bourdon, by whom he was instructed in the art. On the death of Bourdon, he came to England in 1676, and was for some time employed by Charles de la Fosse, to assist him in the works he was engaged in at Montague House. King William sent Parmentier to Holland, to ornament his palace at Loo, but he quarrelled with Marot, the superintendent of the works, and returned to London. Not finding on his arrival much employment, he went into Yorkshire, and was engaged in several historical subjects, as well as portraits. He painted an altar-piece for the principal church at Hull, and a picture of Moses receiving the Law, for St. Peter's church at Leeds. His best performance was the staircase at Worksoop. He gave a picture of Diana and Endymion to Painters'-hall. On the death of Laguerre, in 1721, he returned to London, where he died, in 1730.

PARMENTIER, L. This artist engraved a title for the works of Philip Wowermans, with the portrait of the painter at the bottom, from a design by J. de la Jove.

PARMIGIANO. See MAZZUOLI.

PARMIGIANO, FABRIZIO. According to Baglione, this artist flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Clement VII. He painted landscape with considerable reputation. In the church of S. Cecilia in Trastevere, are eight large pictures by him, painted in fresco, in which, like some of the landscapes by the Caracci, there is more of the ideal than the natural. The subjects are grandly conceived, and they are touched with great spirit. He died at the age of 45, [in 1600. He is also called Fabrizio Andrea da Parma.]

PARODI, [or PARRODI,] DOMENICO. This artist was born at Genoa in 1668. He was the son of Giacomo Filippo Parodi, an eminent sculptor, who observing in him an uncommon quickness and vivacity, bestowed on him an excellent education, and his progress in literature was considerable. He acquired the first elements of design under his father, and for some time applied himself to the pursuit of sculpture ; but a partiality for painting prevailed, and, according to Ratti, he was sent to Venice, where he entered the school of Bombelli, and became an excellent colourist, by studying the works of Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese. With the intention of improving his style of design, he visited Rome, where he studied with incessant assiduity the works of the most distinguished masters. Of the moderns, he attached himself to the manner of Carlo Maratti, and in the style of that master painted his celebrated picture of S. Francesco di Sales, in the church of the Filippini, at Genoa. [He died in 1740.]

PARODI, [or PARRODI,] OTTAVIO. This painter was born at Pavia in 1659, and was a scholar of Andrea Lanzano. He afterwards visited Rome, where he studied some years. On his return to Pavia he executed several works for the public places in that city, which established his reputation as a respectable painter of history. [He was living in 1718.]

PAROLINI, GIACOMO. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1663. His father dying when he was only five years of age, he was taken under the protection of a maternal uncle, who perceiving his disposition for the art, placed him as a disciple of Cavaliere Peruzzini at Turin, under whose tuition he remained until he was eighteen, when he visited Bologna, and entered the school of Carlo Cignani. He returned to Ferrara a little time previous to the death of Aurelio Scannavini, who had been his fellow student under Cignani, and finished some pictures left imperfect by that master. Though inferior to Cignani in the grandeur of his conception, and his masterly conduct of the chiaro-scuro, he sustained the credit of his school by the elegance of his design, and the suavity of his colouring, particularly in his carnations. He was unusually successful in the design of his female figures and children. His bacchanals and festive dances remind us of the playful elegance of Albano. His pictures of those subjects are to be found in almost every collection at Ferrara. Of his historical works, the most considerable are, the Last Supper, in the cathedral at Ferrara ; and his celebrated fresco, representing St. Sebastian with a glory of angels, in the church dedicated to that Saint, at Verona. He was the last eminent painter of his country, and "with him," says Lanzi, "was buried the glory of the Ferrarese school." He died in 1733. [According to Zani, he was born in 1667, and died in 1737. He was also called Giacomo Filippo.]

PAROLINI, PIO. According to Ab. Titi, this painter was a native of Udine, though he chiefly resided at Rome, where he was received into the Academy, in 1678. He painted the ceiling of one of the chapels in S. Carlo al Corso, representing an allegorical subject, which was ingeniously composed, and well coloured.

PARONE, FRANCESCO. According to Baglione, this painter was born at Milan near the end of the fifteenth century. He was the son of an obscure artist, from whom he learned the first rudiments of design. At an early age he visited Rome, where he had the good fortune of being taken under the protection of the Marquis Giustiniani, when he had the advantage of studying the celebrated works of art in that distinguished collection, and of contemplating the admirable productions of the great masters at Rome. In the church of the monastery of S. Romualdo, is an altar-piece by this master, representing the Martyrdom of a Saint of that order; a grand composition of many figures. He died at Rome in the prime of life, in the year 1634.

PARR, R., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1740. He was of little celebrity, and was chiefly employed by the booksellers in portraits and book plates. Among others, we have the following portraits by him:

Maria Louisa, daughter of Charles II.

John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester.

William Becket, prefixed to his Chirurgical Observations, 1740.

[Remi or Remigius Parr, was an architectural designer and engraver. He was born at Rochester in 1723, and published a View of London from Westminster bridge in 1737, and others of a similar kind. He was living in 1750.]

PARROCEL, JOSEPH, an eminent painter of battles, born at Brignoles, in Provence, in 1648. He was the son of Bartholomew Parrocel, a painter of little note, who had instructed him in the first elements of the art, but he died when his son was only fourteen years of age. Without the assistance of any other instructor, he went to Paris, where his lively disposition, and a progress in the art unusual at his age, recommended him to the notice of some of the most distinguished artists, who aided him with their advice, and recommended him to visit Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he found the works of Borgognone in the highest estimation; and he had the good fortune to be admitted into the school of that distinguished artist. After a residence of some years at Rome, he visited Venice, where he improved his system of colouring, which at that time partook of the dark and cold style of Cortesi, by studying the works of the best Venetian masters. Such was the encouragement he experienced, and the homage paid in that city to his talents, that he had entertained a project of establishing himself there, when an extraordinary rencontre obliged him to alter his purpose. As he was returning to his apartments, he was assailed on the Rialto by several assassins, posted, as it is believed, by persons jealous of his merit and success, and was indebted to his courage and personal vigour for his escape from so dangerous a dilemma. In 1675 he returned to Paris, and immediately met with public favour and encouragement. He was made a member of the Academy the following year, on which occasion he painted for his picture of reception the Siege of Maestricht, which greatly increased his reputation. He was commissioned by the Marquis de Louvois, to decorate one of the four refectories of the Invalids, with the conquests of Louis XIV., in which he succeeded so much to the satisfaction of that minister, that he was immediately employed in some of the works at Versailles. He became one of the favourite painters of Louis XIV., in whose service he remained until his death. The talents of Joseph Parrocel were not limited to the representation of battles, he was occasionally employed as a painter of history, in which he acquired no mean reputation. He painted several historical subjects for the Hotel de Toulouse, and an admirable picture of St. John in the Wilderness, for the church of Notre Dame, at Paris. His battle-pieces are ingeniously and copiously composed, his design of the figure and horses is correct and spirited, and his touch is marked with a fire and enthusiasm which are admirably adapted to the subjects he represented. He died in 1704.

We have several spirited etchings by this artist, from his own designs; among which are the following:

The Four Times of the Day; J. Parrocel, inv. et fec.

Four Battles; the same inscription.

A set of forty-eight prints of the Life of Christ.

[For a descriptive account of 90 prints by him, see Dumesnil, tom. iii.]

PARROCEL, CHARLES, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Paris in 1689, and was first instructed by his father, who dying when he was only sixteen years of age, he was placed under the tuition of Charles de la Fosse, and on leaving that master travelled to Italy, where he studied some years. On his return to France he acquired considerable reputation in the branch of painting in which his father had distinguished himself. Although his battle-pieces and huntings are inferior to those of Joseph Parrocel, his pictures possessed sufficient merit to procure his reception into the Academy at Paris. We have by this artist a set of spirited etchings, from his own designs, representing horse and foot soldiers. He died in 1752. [See Dumesnil, tom. ii. for a description of 37 prints by him.]

PARROCEL, IGNATIUS. This artist was the nephew of Joseph Parrocel, born at Paris about the year 1680. He was apparently his scholar, as he painted similar subjects of battles and huntings, in a style which bears a strong resemblance to that of his uncle. He died at Paris in 1722. [There were two of this name, both born at Avignon; the first Ignatius, the son of Louis, in 1664 according to Zani, in 1688 according to Nagler, and died in 1722; the second Ignatius, son of Peter, died in 1759, or in 1781, according to those authorities.]

[PARROCEL, PIERRE, nephew of Joseph Parrocel, was born at Avignon about 1664, and died in 1739. He was first instructed by his uncle, and afterwards entered the school of Carlo Maratti. His principal work, as a painter, was in the gallery of the Hotel de Noailles, at St. Germain-en-Laye, where he represented the history of Tobit in sixteen pictures; but the Coronation of the Virgin, in the church of St. Mary, at Marseilles, is considered his chef-d'œuvre. He also etched and engraved. His etchings are executed with rare dexterity and infinite spirit, in a style analogous to that of A. Rivalz; but he was not equally successful with the graver. Dumesnil has given a descriptive list of eighteen in the second volume of Le Peintre Graveur Français, wherein it will be seen that two of these are attributed by Huber and Rost (who do not mention Pierre) to Etienne or Stephen Parrocel; they are a Bacchanalian subject, and Bacchus and Ariadne. The Triumph of Mordecai, attributed also to Etienne, is by J. P. Parrocel.]

PARROCEL, STEPHEN, [OR ETIENNE], a French painter and engraver, who was apparently a relation of the preceding artists. He was born at Paris about the year 1720. We have several etchings by him, executed in a bold, free style, among which are the following:

A Bacchanalian subject; from his own design.

The Triumph of Mordecai; after J. F. de Troy.

Bacchus and Ariadne; after Subleyras.

[He was the son of Pierre Parrocel: the three etchings quoted are not by Etienne; it is uncertain that he ever engraved. See PIERRE PARROCEL.]

PARRY, WILLIAM. This artist was born in London in 1742. He was the son of Parry, the celebrated blind performer on the Welsh harp, and received his first instructions in design in Mr. Shipley's drawing school. He afterwards studied from the plaster-casts in the Duke of Richmond's gallery, and became a pupil of Sir Joshua Reynolds; about which time he also entered the academy in St. Martin's Lane. He was considered at that time a very promising artist, and obtained several premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. On leaving Sir Joshua he was favoured with the patronage of Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, by whose liberality he was enabled to visit Italy, in 1770, where he remained four years, and, among other things, he painted for his protector a copy of the Transfiguration of Raffaele, at that time in the church of S. Pietro in Montorio. He returned to London in 1775, and in 1776 was chosen an associate of the Royal Academy. Not meeting with the employment he expected, he determined to revisit Rome, in 1778, where he found sufficient encouragement to induce him to remain several years. His ill state of health obliged him to return to his native country, in the commencement of the year 1791; but he only survived his arrival a short time, and died on the 13th of February in that year. There is a small etching by Mr. Parry, about the size of a card, it represents the portrait of his father playing on the harp, and was engraved as a ticket of admittance to a concert. It is now become very scarce.

PARS, WILLIAM, was born in London about the year 1742, and was educated in the rudiments of the art in Shipley's drawing school. He afterwards frequented the Academy in St. Martin's Lane; and in 1764 obtained the third premium, of twenty guineas, for historic painting. According to Edwards, "the Dilettanti Society having at that time determined to employ a portion of their accumulated subscriptions in the cultivation of elegant literature, they resolved to send some persons into Greece, to make further researches among the remains of antiquity, which are still to be found in Ionia, for which purpose the following gentlemen were selected: The Rev. Dr. Chandler, of Oxford, was appointed to the literary department; to Mr. Revet was assigned the architectural inquiries; and Mr. Pars was chosen the draughtsman." On this expedition he was absent about three years, and some time after his return he was engaged by the late Lord Palmerston to accompany him in a tour through Switzerland and Italy, to make drawings of the most remarkable views and antiquities. In 1770 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy; and in 1774 the Dilettanti Society having determined to send an artist to Rome, for a certain number of years, upon a pension, to complete his studies as a painter, Mr. Pars was made choice of on the occasion, and arrived at Rome in 1775. He continued his studies in Italy until the autumn of the year 1782, when he died of a fever, aged about 40. Several of his views that were made in Greece have been engraved by Mr. Byrne; and some of those in Switzerland and Italy have been executed in aquatinta by Mr. Paul Sandby.

PASINELLI, LORENZO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1629, and was first a scholar of Simone Cantarini, but afterwards studied under Flaminio Torre, whose school he left at an early age. He afterwards visited Venice, where the brilliant and ornamental style of Paolo Veronese induced him to follow him as a prototype. His imitation was, however, neither mean nor servile; he adopted his splendour and magnificence, but the airs of his heads, and the disposition of his colours, he acquired from another source. His genius naturally led him to rich, copious, and spirited compositions. Such are his pictures of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, at the Certosa at Bologna; and the history of Coriolanus, in the Palazzo Ranuzzi. These sufficiently establish his claim to a novel and fervid invention, a spirited execution, and a certain machinal facility, which is never the portion of mediocrity. It will, however, be acknowledged, that his attitudes are occasionally strained, and that he sometimes too nearly resembles Paolo in his pompous and fantastical habiliments, and in his neglect of costume. These defects are particularly discernible in his picture of St. John preaching in the Wilderness, which occasioned his rival Taruffi to remark, that instead of a desert in Judea, the scene reminded him of the Piazza di S. Marco at Venice. He sometimes moderated this fire according to the subject, as appears in his picture of the Holy Family, in the church of the Barefooted Carmelites, in which he appears to have imitated the grace and elegance of Albano. He was more employed for private collections than for the public edifices, though there are several of his pictures in the churches at Bologna, of which one of the most esteemed is the Resurrection, in the church of S. Francisco. He died in 1700. We have the following etchings by this artist, from his own designs:

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; fine.

The Martyrdom of several Saints.

[It was a mistake of Basan to say that Pasinelli was an engraver. The two prints mentioned above are by Lorenzini, a scholar of Pasinelli, and are described by Bartsch as his in P. G. tom. xix. pp. 415—417, Nos. 6 and 8. They are both after pictures by Pasinelli.]

PASQUALI, FILIPPO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Carlo Cignani. He flourished about the year 1680, and, in conjunction with Marc Antonio Franceschini, painted several fresco works at Bologna and Rimini. There are some of his paintings in the portico of the Serviti, at Bologna; and Lanzi makes more honourable mention of his pictures in the church of S. Vittore, at Ravenna. [He was a native of Forli, where Cignani resided for some years, but being one of his scholars he is reckoned among the Bolognese painters. The time of his death is not mentioned.]

PASQUALINI, or PASCALINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Cento, near Bologna, about the year 1600. He frequented for some time the school of Ciro Ferri; but it does not appear that he arrived at great eminence as a painter. We have several etchings by this artist, principally after Guercino, his countryman, in which he endeavoured to imitate with the point the bold and masterly pen drawings of that master, but he did not possess a sufficient command of his instrument to accomplish it with much success. He frequently signed his plates J. B. Centensis. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

St. Felix kneeling before the Virgin and Infant; after L. Caracci.

St. Diego working a Miracle; after Ann. Caracci.

The Death of St. Cecilia; after Domenichino.

The Aurora; after Guido.

SUBJECTS AFTER GUERCINO.

Christ dictating the Gospel to St. John.

The Resurrection of Lazarus.

Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter.

Christ taken in the Garden.

Angels showing Mary Magdalene the Instruments of the Passion.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus.
The Incredulity of Thomas.
The Virgin and Infant, with an Angel presenting Fruit.
The Virgin and Infant, to whom St. John presents an Apple.
St. Charles Borromens.
St. Felix resuscitating a Dead Child.
Tancred and Erminia.
Tithonus and Aurora.

[There are but few particulars respecting him; Nagler gives a list of his prints, forty in number: the earliest is dated 1619, and the latest 1630.]

PASQUALINO, DA VICENZA. See ROSSI.

PASQUIER, JOHN JAMES, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1736. He was a pupil of Lawrence Cars, and has engraved several plates after the French painters, and a variety of vignettes and other book plates. Among others, we have the following by him:

Arion upon the Dolphin; after Boucher.
Two Pastoral Subjects; after the same.
The Graeces; after C. Vanloo.
A set of Twelve Academical Figures; after Natoire.

[It is probable that he was born earlier than 1736. Zani says he operated in 1740, and Nagler quotes a print by him dated 1748. He died in 1784.]

PASS, or PASSE, CRISPIN DE, the ELDER. This eminent artist was born at Utrecht about the year 1560. He is said to have been instructed in engraving by Theodore Cuernherth. He was a man of letters, and not only industrious to perfect himself in his art, but fond of promoting it. This particularly appears from his being at the expense of setting forth Holland's Herologia, which is expressly stated to be published, Impensis Crispini Passe. He applied himself very early in life to the study of design, as appears from the preface to his drawing-book, published in 1643 at Amsterdam, in Italian, French, and Dutch, entitled Della Luce del dipingere e disegnare, in which he mentions his intimacy with the most celebrated masters of the time. Freminet, Rubens, A. Bloemart, P. Moreelze, and P. Vander Berg, were among his friends and encouragers. His talents recommended him to the notice of Prince Maurice, who sent him to Paris, where he taught drawing, in the academy of M. Pluvinel, riding-master to Louis XIII., on which occasion he published his celebrated set of prints, entitled, Instruction du Roi en l'exercice de monter à cheval, par Messire Antoine de Pluvinel. The plates represent the different exercises of the horses, the manner of tilting at the barriers, &c. In these are introduced the portraits of Louis XIII., the Duke de Bellgarde, and many of the great personages of the court. At what time he came to England is not clearly ascertained, but as none of his prints, engraved here, are dated later than 1635, it is probable that he quitted this country soon after that period. The plates of Crispin de Pass are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear, and original style; and though there occasionally appears somewhat of stiffness and formality, his prints, especially his portraits, possess great merit. Many of them he designed from the life, and the greater part of his historical, and other subjects, are engraved from his own compositions. He succeeded best in figures of a small size. He usually marked his plates with a cipher composed of an S, a V, and a P, joined together thus, . His prints are very numerous.

The following is an ample list of those most esteemed;

ENGLISH PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth, sumptuously attired, with the Crown, Sceptre, and Globe; after Isaac Oliver.
A Head of the same Queen; oval.
James I. with the Sceptre in his hand.
James I. with a Hat and Ruff; oval.
Anne of Denmark, his consort; the same.
Henry, Prince of Wales; oval.
Charles, his brother, afterwards Charles I.; the same.
Frederick, Count Palatine, consort of Princess Elizabeth.
Elizabeth, daughter of James I., his wife.
Sir Philip Sidney.
The Earl of Essex on horseback.
Thomas Percy, the conspirator; scarce.

FOREIGN PORTRAITS.

Henry IV., King of France.
Mary of Medici, his Queen.
Philip II., King of Spain.
Henry Frederiek, Prince of Nassau.
Albert, Archduke of Austria, and Maurice, Prince of Nassau, on horseback.
Louisa Juliana, Countess of Nassau; circular.
Andrea Doria, Genoese Admiral.
Adolphus, Baron of Schwartzenberg.
Alexander Farnese.
A set of fourteen Portraits of Women, with a frontispiece, entitled, Speculum illustrium feminarum.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Adam and Eve.
Susanna and the Elders.
Three small circular plates of Busts, representing Faith, Hope, and Charity; fine.
Cleopatra.
Herules strangling Anteus.
The Inside of a Tavern, with Men and Women quarrelling; C. van Pass, inv. 1589. One of his earliest prints.
The Seven Liberal Arts.
The Nine Muses.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The History of Tobit, in six plates; after M. de Vos.
The Twelve Months, in twelve circular plates; after the same.
The Four Evangelists, in four plates; after Geldorp Gorcius; very fine.
The Angels appearing to the Shepherds; after A. Bloemart.
The Crucifixion; after Jod. de Winghe.
The Judgment of Paris; after C. vanden Broeck.
The Siege of Troy; after the same.
A set of four Landscapes, with figures; after J. Breughel.

[Considering the multiplicity of his works, and the eminent position he occupied among the engravers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it is surprising that there should be such uncertainty and discrepancies in the several writers concerning Crispin de Passe, the elder. Not only the place, but the time of his birth is differently reported. Some say he was born at Coln; others at Armuyde, in Zeelande; others at Utrecht: and the year varies from 1540 to 1560. As he was instructed by Koornhaert, or Coornhaert, who was born in 1522 and died in 1590, and was on terms of intimacy with the masters mentioned in the text, and, above all, as his first dated work is 1589, it may be reasonably concluded that 1560 is the most probable year of his nativity. The date of the publication of his "Drawing Book," 1643, makes him an octogenarian, and later than that there is no account of him. Nagler has given a copious list of his works; but his account of the artist's life is not more satisfactory than that given by Füssli and others.]

PASS, or PASSE, CRISPIN DE, the YOUNGER, was the eldest son of the preceding artist, born at Utrecht about the year 1585, and was instructed in the principles of drawing and engraving by his father. Whether he died young, or did not long continue the profession, does not appear, but we have only a few engravings by him, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Frederick, Elector Palatine; inscribed, Crispin Passeus, jun. fig. et sculps.; oval.
Johannes Angelius Werdenhagen; C. de Passe filius, fec. 1600.

SUBJECTS.

Three, of a set of four plates of the History of the Rich Man and Lazarus; the fourth was engraved by his father.

[There are discrepancies respecting this artist's birth. Some place it in 1570, others in 1576; but neither of these dates is consistent with that of the birth of his father. Zani says he flourished as late as 1659: he quotes an inscription, "avec privilege du Roy 1659. C. de Pas inven. et fecit—Crisp. Passeus Junior Sculptit." Nagler gives a list of his works, but does not mention this. One in the list, Pope Paul, is inscribed "Crispinus Passaeus senior inv. et ecc., junior sculp. aetatis 17;" but no date. He had a son, Simon de Passe, who resided at Copenhagen, probably with his uncle of the same name, but no particulars of him are recorded, except that he engraved a portrait of Frederick III., King of Denmark; an Ecce Homo, in 1639; and a Woman with three Children, in 1643.]

PASS, or PASSE, WILLIAM DE, was the second son of Crispin de Pass the elder, born at Utrecht about the year 1590, and was also instructed by his father, under whom he became a very eminent artist. It is probable that he came to England with the elder Pass, where he resided the greater part of his life, and where he engraved his best plates. His prints are very numerous; the most esteemed of which are his portraits, which are highly valued, and many of them very scarce. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher W. The following are his principal works :

PORTRAITS.

James I. and his Family, inscribed Triumphus Jacobi Regis Augustae que ipsius prolis; scarce.

James I. with Henry Prince of Wales. After the death of that prince the face was erased, and that of Charles his brother substituted in its place.

Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; oval, with the cipher. George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, on horseback, with shipping in the back-ground; scarce.

Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, on horseback; scarce. Frances, Duchess of Richmond and Lenox; very highly finished, inscribed Anno. 1625. insculptum Guliel. Passeo Londinum.

Sir John Haywood, W. Pass, f.

Sir Henry Rich; very fine.

Darcy Wentworth, 1624.

The King and Queen of Bohemia, with four of their children, inscribed Will. Pass, fecit, ad vivum figurator. 1621.

The Palatine Family, in which the youngest child is playing with a rabbit; without the name of the engraver.

He also engraved some devotional and other subjects, which possess considerable merit, though inferior to his portraits. [Here again there are variances. His birth is placed in 1572, in 1580, and in 1590. Nagler has omitted several of the prints of the above list, but added a few others, among which are Oliver Cromwell and George Duke of Saxony, both on horseback. Zani says William de Passe operated in 1640; but, if he engraved Cromwell's portrait, it is probable that he lived till about 1660.]

PASS, or PASSE, SIMON DE. This artist was the youngest son of Crispin de Passe the elder, and received his instruction from his father. He resided about ten years in England, where he engraved several fine portraits, the earliest of which is dated 1613, and on leaving this country he entered the service of the King of Denmark. He was employed by Nicholas Hilliard to engrave counters of the English Royal Family. Of his numerous prints, his portraits are the most estimable, although he engraved several sacred subjects, frontispieces, and other book ornaments, which are very neatly executed. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher P. The following are his most esteemed prints;

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth; whole length.

James I. crowned, sitting in a chair.

The same, with a hat.

Queen Anne, on horseback, with a View of Windsor; scarce.

The same; dated 1617.

Prince Henry with a lance.

Philip III., King of Spain.

Maria of Austria, his daughter, the intended bride of Charles I.; scarce.

The same, as sister of Philip IV.; very fine.

General Edward Cecyll, son to the Earl of Exeter; very scarce.

George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. 1617, when Earl. The same, when Marquis. 1620.

Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset.

Frances Howard, Countess of Somerset.

Francis Manners, Earl of Rutland.

Thomas, Earl of Arundel; after Mirevelt.

Sir Walter Raleigh.

Sir Thomas Smith, Ambassador to Russia.

William, Earl of Pembroke; after Van Somer.

Richard, Earl of Dorset.

Archbishop Abbot, with a View of Lambeth.

Robert Sidney, Viscount Lisle; scarce.

Charles, Earl of Nottingham.

Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke; scarce.

Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton.

Edward Somerset, Earl of Worcester.

Count Gondomar, Ambassador from Spain; very fine.

Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange, inscribed Liberum Belgium; very fine.

Four whole-length Portraits of the Dukes of Burgundy—John the Intrepid, Philip the Bold, Philip the Good, and Charles the Rash; etchings; scarce.

[Like the preceding, there are differences among writers respecting the time of his birth, and also the place of his nativity. Some say he was born in 1574, others in 1581, either at Coln or at Utrecht. It is said above that his earliest portrait is dated 1613. If either of the foregoing dates be the true one, he did not evince the same precocity as the other members of his family. Zani quotes an inscription: "Sereniss. Damae Norvegiae ecc. Regis Sculptor Simon de Pas sculpsit Anno 1643;" and Nagler mentions two prints, Danish portraits, dated 1644. It is probable that he died about that time in Denmark.]

PASS, or PASSE, MAGDALENE DE. This ingenious lady was the daughter of the elder Crispin de Pass, and learned the art of engraving from her father. She executed some small plates, in imitation of the neat, finished style of Count Goudt, which, though inferior to the prints of that nobleman, possess considerable merit; and also engraved a few portraits. She sometimes used the cipher

M. Among others, we have the following prints by her:

PORTRAITS.

Her own Head; scarce.

Catherine, Duchess of Buckingham, with a feather in her hand.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Wise and the Foolish Virgins; after Elsheimer; fine and scarce.

The Four Seasons; after the designs of her father.

Cephalus and Procris.

Salmacis and Hermaphroditus.

Latona changing the Lycian Peasants into Frogs.

Alpheus and Arethusa.

A pair of Landscapes; after Roland Savery.

A pair, one a Storm with a Shipwreck, and the other a Landscape with a Windmill; after A. Willeres; fine.

[Magdalene de Passe is in the same state of uncertainty as her brothers, with regard to her age. As far as her sex is concerned, perhaps biographers might not think themselves justified in being too particular; and the writers who say she was born in 1583 (and they are the majority) may be allowed to be better informed than those who place her birth in 1576. The print of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus is dated 1623, as is also that of Alpheus and Arethusa; but whether they were early or late performances is not said, nor is the date of her decease recorded. Nagler has added a few prints to the list given above.]

PASSERI, ANDREA. This painter was a native of Como, in the Milanese, and flourished about the year 1505. In the cathedral of his native city is a picture of the Virgin, surrounded by the Apostles, in which the heads are of a tolerable expression, but the hands and draperies are dry and stiff, unworthy of the era in which it was painted, in 1505.

PASSERI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was born at Rome about the year 1610, and is reported by Lanzi to have been a friend of Domenichino, and a follower of his style. In the church of S. Giovanni della Malva, at Rome, is a picture by him of the Crucifixion; but his works are more frequent in private collections than in public edifices. He sometimes painted pictures of dead game, birds, &c., touched with great spirit, of which there are several in the Palazzo Mattei. In the Academy of St. Luke is a portrait of Domenichino, painted by Passeri, and placed there at the death of his friend, whose funeral oration he pronounced. Lanzi ranks this artist among the most correct of the Italian writers on art. His principal work is entitled Vite de Pittori, Scultori, e Architetti, che hanno lavorato in Roma, e che son morti dal 1641. al 1673. He died in 1679. [Zani says he was born in 1618; but this does not accord with what Passeri says of himself, "that he did not take up painting until comparatively late." He was employed by Canini, in the Villa Aldobrandini, in 1635, when, according to that date, he would have been only 17 years old. He was president of the Academy of St. Luke, in 1641, when Domenichino died. At the close of his life Passeri entered into holy orders, and in 1675 obtained a benefice in the college of Sta. Maria in Via Lata.]

PASSERI, GIUSEPPE, was the nephew of the preceding artist, born at Rome in 1654, and, according to Pascoli, was a favourite disciple of Carlo Maratti, of whose style he was one of the most successful followers. His principal works at Rome are his picture of the Conception, in the church of S. Tommaso in Parione; and one of the laterals to the picture of the Baptism, by Maratti, in the Vatican, in which he has represented St. Peter baptizing the Centurion, which has been executed in mosaic, and the original placed in the church of the Conventuali at Urbino. At Pesaro is one of his most esteemed works, representing St. Jerome meditating on the Last Judgment. He died in 1714.

PASSERO, or PASSARI, BERNARDINO, an Italian painter and engraver, who flourished at Rome about the year 1580. As a painter, he appears to have adopted the style of Taddeo Zuccaro. He is, however, more known as an engraver than a painter. We have a considerable number of prints by him, consisting chiefly of devout subjects, from his own designs. They prove him to have possessed a ready and fertile invention, but his design is incorrect, and the airs of his heads are neither beautiful nor expressive. He sometimes signed his plates with his name at length, and sometimes used the cipher P. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Holy Family, in which the Virgin is attired as a Bohemian.

A set of several plates of the Life of St. Bruno. Several Madonnas, and other subjects.

[There is no proof that Bernardino Passero, or rather Passeri, was a painter. The similarity of names, the proximity of the time in which he flourished with that of Bartolomeo Passerotti, induced a belief that they were one artist; and as it was added, that he adopted the style of Taddeo Zuccaro, equally applicable to Passerotti, that belief was confirmed. But Bartsch has exploded that notion, and reinstated Passeri in his rights as a designer and engraver. He has given a list of 78 etchings by him, with full descriptive particulars, in P. G. tom. xvii.]

PASSEROTTI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was born at Bologna about the year 1540. He was first a scholar of Giacomo Barocccio da Vignola, but afterwards he became the disciple and coadjutor of Taddeo Zuccaro. He resided in the early part of his life at Rome, where he painted some pictures for the public edifices, of which the most esteemed is the Martyrdom of St. Paul, in the church of S. Paolo alle Tre Fontane. On his return to Bologna, he painted a great number of altar-pieces for the churches, of which the most celebrated are the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Pietro; the Annunciation, in S. Martino Maggiore; and the Virgin on a throne, surrounded by St. John the Baptist and other Saints, in S. Giacomo Maggiore; painted in competition with the Caracci, and which excited their admiration and applause. His works are very unequal, as he frequently sacrificed correctness and refinement to his desire of gain, and to the indulgence of an uncommon facility of hand. He was the founder of a respectable academy at Bologna, and counted among his disciples, Francesco Vanni, Agostino Caracci, and other distinguished artists. B. Passerotti particularly excelled in portrait painting, and was considered little inferior to Titian in dignity of character and gracefulness of attitude. He died in 1595.

[As former writers had erroneously attributed the etchings of Passero to Passerotti, so Bryan has withheld from him what is justly his due. Bartsch speaks highly of his ability as a designer with the pen, and the freedom and boldness of his manner of engraving. He says that his prints have at all times been sought for both by artists and connoisseurs, and that they are become very rare: the richest collections often possess only two at most. He enumerates and describes fifteen pieces by him; two mentioned by Gori and Rost, and one doubtful; but he does not consider the catalogue complete. According to Zani, who also describes Passerotti as a designer and engraver, he was born about 1530, and died in 1592: Bartsch agrees in the date of his death.

A list of Passerotti's etchings, as given by Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xviii.

1. The Chastity of Joseph; after Parmigiano.
 2. The Visitation; after F. Salviati.
 3. The Virgin, with the infant and St. John, marked P. F.
 4. A similar subject, with the letters B. P.
 5. The Virgin sitting on the ground, with the infant Jesus on her knees; signed B. PASAROT.
 6. Jesus Christ holding a banner; B. PASAROT. This and the five following are supposed to be part of a suite of thirteen, representing Christ and his Apostles.
 7. St. Peter. The letters B. P. on the left at bottom.
 8. St. Andrew. B. PASAROT at bottom.
 9. St. John the Evangelist. B. PASAROT at bottom.
 10. St. Bartholomew. B. PASAROT at bottom.
 11. St. Paul. The letters B. P. on the right at bottom.
 12. Religion, represented by a woman seated, and surrounded by the sun. The letter B. on the right at bottom.
 13. Painting, represented by a young Female with Wings. The letters B. P. on the right at bottom.
 14. A young Woman in Bed. B. PASSAROTO written backwards, the letter B. reversed and joined to the P.
- P.
15. The Sacrifice, in which there are eight figures. The letters B. P. on the left at bottom.

A Charity, mentioned by Gori.

The Marriage of Isaac and Rebecca; after Perugino; mentioned by Rost.

A Holy Family, doubtful.

St. Peter delivered from Prison by an Angel. St. Peter is seated, and the Angel, without wings, has placed the left hand on Peter's shoulder, and directs the way with the right. At the bottom in the corner are the letters B. P.

Zani mentions this print in vol. ix. parte seconda, of his Enciclopedia. He also says that he is called il maestro al Passero, (the master of the Sparrow,) from having used a sparrow between the letters B. P. as his rebus or mark; but it does not appear on any in the foregoing list, nor has it been discovered by Brulliot. Such a mark would be equally applicable to Bernardino Passero, if not more so; but Bartsch does not mention it.]

PASSEROTTI, TIBURZIO, was the eldest son and the disciple of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1575. He painted history and portraits, in the style of his father. Of his works in the public edifices at Bologna, the following are the most deserving of notice. In the church of S. Maria Mascarella, a picture of the Assumption; in S. Cecilia, St. Francis and St. Jerome kneeling before the Virgin; in S. Cristina, the Annunciation; and in S. Giacomo Maggiore, the Martyrdom of St. Catherine, his most celebrated performance. He died at Bologna, in the prime of life, in 1612. [Zani designates him an amateur painter.]

PASSEROTTI, VENTURA, the fourth son of Bartolomeo, was born at Bologna about 1586. He was instructed by his father, and assisted by his brother Tiburzio. He, however, chiefly delighted in making drawings with the pen of imaginary subjects, wherein he aspired to express the proportions of the naked figure, and the muscular actions in the grandioso style of Michael Angelo. His practice as a professed painter was confined to portraiture, in which it is said that he was equal to any of his contemporaries. There is no account of any public work by him. He died in 1630.]

PASSIGNANO, CAVALIERE DOMENICO CRESTI, called. This painter was born at Passignano, near Florence, in 1558. He was first a scholar of Batista Naldini, but afterwards studied under Federigo Zuccaro, to whose style his manner is more conformable. He resided some time at Venice, and was so fascinated with the works of the great masters of that school, that, according to Boschini, he used to observe, that whoever had not seen Venice, could not hope to become a painter. Though neither select in his forms, nor correct in his design, he is ingenious and abundant in his compositions, and in the splendour of his habiliments, and the richness of his architecture resembles more the style of Paolo Veronese, than any other of the Florentine painters. He sometimes reminds us of Tintoretto, in the strained attitudes of his figures, and, like that master, painted many of his pictures with so thin and oily a substance in colouring, that several of both their works have already perished. Such has been the fate of his picture of the Crucifixion of St. Peter, and the Presentation in the Temple, painted for the Basilica of St. Peter, in the pontificates of Paul V. and Urban VIII. There are, however, some of his pictures remaining, which are painted with an excellent impasto of colour. Of these may be mentioned a dead Christ, in the Capella di Mondragone at Frascati; a Descent from the Cross, in the Palazzo Borghese, at Rome; and Christ bearing his Cross, in the Collegio S. Giovannino at Florence. He died in 1638. [He was one of the most influential of those painters who contributed towards the reform of the Florentine school by improving the taste for colour, and rendering the mannered anatomical school less popular. He was the friend and associate of Cigoli, and is said to have been the master of Ludovico Caracci while in Florence.]

PASTI, MATTEO, an old Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1470. He executed a set of prints for a folio volume, entitled De Re Militare, by R. Valturinus, published at Verona in 1472. [He was a native of Verona, and flourished from 1446. He was a painter, sculptor in bronze and marble, medallist, and gem engraver. Neither the year of his birth nor his death is correctly ascertained.]

PASTILL, J. DE, a French engraver, who appears to have been chiefly employed in copying the prints of other artists, which he did in a very indifferent manner. Among other plates of that description, we have the Murder of the Innocents, after the engraving by Louis Audran; from Le Brun.

PASTORINI, B., a modern Italian engraver, who resided in London about the year 1770. He engraved some plates in imitation of the style of Bartolozzi, assisted by his instruction. We have, among others, the following by him:

L'Allegro; Angel. Kaufman, pinx. B. Pastorini, fec.

Il Penseroso; the companion.

A View of London; from his own design.

Guntherus and Griselda; J. F. Rigaud, pinx. B. Pastorini, fec.

Griselda returning to her Father; the companion.

PATAROL, LAWRENCE. This artist engraved some book plates, and among them a frontispiece for a book of coins, published at Venice in 1702.

PATAS, JOHN BAPTIST, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris in 1744. He has engraved several small plates after various French painters, and from his own designs; among which are the following:

The Judgment of Paris; after Queverdo.

The dangerous Model; after the same.

Henry IV. permitting Provisions to enter Paris whilst he was besieging it; after Careme.

An allegorical subject on the Accession of Louis XVI. to the throne of France; from his own design.

[He was born in 1748, and died in 1817, according to Nagler. He engraved several of the plates for the Galleries de Florence and Orleans, Musée Français, Cabinet Poullain, and other works of importance. Nagler has given a list of his principal plates.]

PATAVINUS. See AVIBUS.

PATCH, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1770. He engraved a set of twenty-six plates, from the pictures of Masaccio; dated in that year. [He engraved also after Giotto, Frà Bartolomeo, and other old Italian masters. He spent much of his time in Italy, and probably died there after 1772.]

PATEL, a French landscape painter, who flourished about the year 1680. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he appears to have visited Rome, from the subject of his pictures, which generally represent views in the vicinity of that city. He had evidently adopted the fine style of Claude Lorraine, and in some of his works has not been unsuccessful in his imitation. The scenery of his pictures is grand and striking, and his distances retire with a pleasing degradation. His landscapes are usually embellished with the ruins of ancient architecture, and decorated with figures correctly drawn, and touched with spirit. His skies are clear and brilliant, and his verdure is fresh and agreeable, though occasionally too green and monotonous. Though unequal to his admirable model in the purity of his aerial tints, and the grandeur of his compositions, the works of Patel possess sufficient merit to entitle him to an eminent rank among the landscape painters of his country.

[Patel, the elder, was born, according to Einigen, in 1648, and, according to Andern, in 1654. He was killed in a duel in 1703, says Dumesnil, in 1705, says Nagler. He is sometimes called Peter, sometimes Paul; but Dumesnil asserts that he signed the greater part of his pictures with his name followed by the year, and preceded by a monogram composed of the letters APT, and he marked the two prints etched by him AP. PATEL, in. et fecit. It is strange, therefore, that his real name is not known. Felibien calls him Patel only. His pictures are not uncommon in England; the editor has examined many, but none with the name and date. The two prints described by Dumesnil are a Landscape with Architectural Ruins, and the View of a Forest, with Travellers. His son, who is called Bernard, imitated his manner of painting, but is very inferior to his father. Some of his pictures have been engraved by Daullé, Vivares, Benezech, and others.]

PATENIER, JOACHIM. This painter was born at Dinant, in the principality of Liege, in 1480. He chiefly resided at Antwerp, where he acquired considerable reputation as a landscape painter, and was admitted a member of the Academy there in 1515. His pictures are usually of a small size, very highly finished, in a laboured style, into which he generally introduced a great number of small figures, designed with tolerable correctness, and neatly touched. He also painted huntings and battles, which, at that early period, were held in considerable estimation.

[The date of the birth of Joachim Patenier is not accurately known; several writers of credit place it in or about 1490. He was one of the first of the Flemish painters who painted landscapes independent of history. Many of them exist, and justify the commendations of Van Mander, considering them as the earliest productions of that class, of his country. In most of them will be found a small clownish figure, naturally employed, but indecently exhibited. Some historical pictures are attributed to him; but they should be received with caution. Those that are, perhaps, least liable to doubt are in the gallery at Vienna; one in the possession of Melchior Wijntges at Middelbourg, representing a battle, so delicately wrought that no miniature can surpass it in the finishing; and one that was in the late William Beckford's possession, the Offering of the Wise Men, which Waagen pronounces to be one of the best pictures of this master for colouring and execution. He was a man of very low, dissolute habits; yet he was the painter which the elegant-minded and sensitive Albert Durer found to be the most agreeable of all the Flemish artists, and with whom he formed the closest intimacy; Albert painted his portrait. It is said that Patenier died in 1548, but of this there is no certainty.]

PATER, JOHN BAPTIST, a French painter, born at Valenciennes in 1695. He went early in his life to Paris, where he became a scholar of Anthony Watteau; and under the tuition of that master, distinguished himself as an excellent colourist, though a negligent and incorrect designer. He painted similar subjects to those of Watteau, representing balls, gallant assemblies, and pastorals; but he is very inferior to him in the spirited touch of his pencil, and in the expression of his heads. He died in 1736.

PATIGNY, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He executed a few plates, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Agostino Caracci, but with little success. Among others, is a print of the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after Annibale Caracci. The drawing is not very correct, and the effect feeble and heavy. [He was a Frenchman, and flourished from 1650 to about 1670.]

[PATIN, JACQUES. This artist, who was painter in ordinary to Henry III. of France, and to his Queen, Louise de Lorraine, had been entirely forgotten till Robert Dumesnil rescued him from the gulf of oblivion. He was employed by the queen to paint the decorations necessary for a masque, or ballet, given by her on the marriage of her sister Marguerite de Vaudemont with the Duke de Joyeuse, in 1581; and he acquitted himself as happily as any other painter of the kingdom could have done. The circumstances are related by Baltazarini, called Beaujoyeux, valet de chambre to the king and the queen mother, in a book describing the ballet, published conjointly with Patin, in 1582. This book is illustrated with twenty-seven etchings by Patin, executed with the point in a spirited manner. Dumesnil has described them in the seventh vol. of "Le Peintre Graveur Français." They consist of ingenious devices, the greater part with appropriate mottoes. To obtain the whole of these it is necessary to possess the book, which is very rare, and also very precious, as being the record of a right royal and splendid entertainment, to which ten thousand spectators were admitted. It also contains the notes of the airs performed on the occasion, composed by Baltazarini, and by Beaulieu and Salmon, two celebrated musical composers of the time.]

PATON, RICHARD, an eminent English painter of marines and combats by sea, who flourished about the year 1758. Several of his sea-fights have been engraved by Canot, and other celebrated artists; and we have a few etchings by himself, executed with taste and spirit. Among others, are the following:

The Victory gained by the English over the French, 21 September, 1757.

The Engagement of the Monmouth with the Foudroyant, in which the French ship was taken, 28 February, 1758.

The Engagement between the Buckingham and the Florissant, supported by two Frigates, 3rd Nov. 1758.

[He was born in 1720, and died about 1795. His works were very popular, as he painted most of the great sea-fights that occurred during his time. Many of them have been engraved by Woollett, Fittler, Lerpeniere, and Canot.]

PATOUR, JOHN AUGUSTINE, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1760. He was a pupil of Hallé and Flipart, and has engraved several plates in a neat style, among which are the following:

The little Lyar; after Albert Durer.

Le doux Sommeil; after Hallé.

Le doux Repos; after the same.

[Hercules and Omphale; after the same.]

Two Views of La Rochelle; after Lallemand.

[He was born about 1730; and flourished from about 1766 to 1784.]

PATTE, [PIERRE,] a French architect, who is stated by Basan to have engraved several plates of architectural ornaments. [He was born at Paris in 1723, and flourished about 1750 to 1780. He wrote several works on architecture, and engraved some of the plates for Blondel's "Architecture Française;" also Perspective Views, after Piranesi; and the Temple of Venus, after Claude. It is said that he was living as late as 1812.]

PAUDITS, [CHRISTOPHER.] This artist was a native of Lower Saxony, about the year 1618. After receiving some instruction in design from an obscure German painter, he visited Amsterdam, where he entered the school of Rembrandt, of whom he became one of the ablest disciples. On his return to Germany he was taken into the protection of Albert Sigismund, Duke of Bavaria, in whose employment he remained several years, and for whom he painted some of his finest works. He was also favoured with the patronage of the Bishop of Ratisbon, and distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits. His historical subjects are well composed, his colouring is both vigorous and harmonious; and his heads, especially those of old men, are marked with dignity and expression. He particularly excelled in portrait painting, in which he was much employed; and his pictures of that description are full of character and life. Sandrart reports, that his death was occasioned by the unfortunate issue of a contest he had engaged in with a contemporary artist, who had challenged him to paint a picture in competition with him. Although the production of Plaudits was greatly superior to that of his rival, the ignorance of the judges giving the preference to the work of his antagonist, their decision affected him so sensibly, that he did not long survive it. [It is supposed that he died in 1666; one of his pictures, marked C. P., is dated 1665. His works are to be found at Munich, Vienna, and other principal cities of Germany.]

PAVIA, GIACOMO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1655, and was a scholar of Antonio Crespi. He painted history with some reputation, and was employed in several works for the churches in his native city; of which the most esteemed are his picture of St. Anne teaching the Virgin to read, in S. Silvestro; and the Nativity, in S. Giuseppe. Lanzi states that he visited Spain, where he distinguished himself. He died in 1740. [Lanzi and Zani place his death in 1750. He may have painted with the Crespi, Giuseppe and Antonio, father and son; but he was born ten years before the one, and twenty-six years before the other; it is not likely, therefore, that he was pupil to Antonio Crespi. Zani says he was born in 1699; this, if correct, would make it probable. In the Felsina Pittrice it is said that he was instructed by Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole; this is more in accordance with the first date; still there is this difficulty: G. G. dal Sole was his junior by four years, and was instructed by his father, Antonio dal Sole; perhaps he and Pavia were fellow pupils.]

PAUL, or DE PAULIS, ANDREW, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1640. He engraved several plates, among which are the following:

Peter denying Christ; after Gerard Segers.

Titian and his Mistress; after the etching by Vandyck.

The Tooth-drawer; after Theodore Roelants.

[Nagler says he was born in Holland in 1598, and gives a list of his works.]

PAUL, I. S., an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1760, and by whom we have a few portraits, among them that of Mrs. Barry, the actress, after Kettle; [Lady Georgiana Spenser and her daughter, after Reynolds; and several others.]

PAUL, ROBERT. This artist was probably a native of Scotland. He resided at Glasgow about the year 1762, when he engraved some views of that city. They are neatly executed, and bear the above date.

PAULINI, [or PAOLINI,] GIACOMO, an Italian engraver, who apparently resided at Venice. We have a few prints by him, among which are the following:

St. Peter; probably from his own design, as he has added the word fecit to his name.

A View of the Ponte di Rialto, at Venice; [and an alphabet.]

[He was a native of Naples, and flourished about 1600.]

PAULYN, HORATIUS. This painter is introduced by M. Descamps among the artists born about the year 1643. He was a native of Amsterdam, but it is not said under whom he studied. He excelled in painting conversations and gallant subjects, in which he occasionally gave way to a culpable breach of decorum and decency. [According to Balkema, he died in 1686. Some of his pictures are in the manner of Rembrandt. He affected great piety, and exhibited outward signs of devotion, while he painted subjects so gross as caused avowed libertines to blush.]

PAULYN, ISAAC. This artist is called, by Lord Orford, Paling. He was born at Amsterdam about the year 1630, and was a scholar of Abraham Vanden Tempel. He was an eminent portrait painter, and in that capacity visited England, where he resided many years. In 1682 he returned to Holland, and established himself at the Hague, where he met with great encouragement.

PAUTRE, JEAN LE. This eminent artist was born at Paris in 1617. In the early part of his life he was placed with a carpenter and builder, under whom he learned to draw plans and ornamental designs, in which he discovered an inventive genius, and extraordinary facility. He afterwards turned his attention to engraving, both with the point and the graver, and has executed a prodigious number of plates, consisting of architectural decorations, friezes, ceilings, vases, and other ornaments, which, except a few prints from the drawings of Paolo Farinati, are all after his own designs. He also engraved several historical and devout subjects; but they are inferior to his other plates. He was made a member of the Academy at Paris in 1677, and died there in 1682. The works of Le Pautre, as an engraver, are very numerous, and are so well known, that a detailed account of them will not be deemed necessary. They are usually marked with the initials I. P. or I. le P. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

John le Pautre, with a border of flowers, supported by Genii. 1674.
Louis XIV. in a Roman attire. 1684.
John Robert.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

A set of ten plates of the History of Moses.
Twenty-two of Mythological Subjects.
Twelve of Landscapes, Views of Gardens and Grottos.
Six plates of Italian Fountains.
Six of Friezes, Mythological Subjects.
Twelve of Antique Vases.
Six plates of Sea-ports and Vessels.
The Sacre of Louis XIV., in the cathedral at Rheims; in three sheets.
The Baptism of the Dauphin.
Two perspective Views of the Canal of Fontainebleau.

[So numerous are the prints of Jean le Pautre, that Mariette reckons them at fourteen or fifteen hundred. Mariette published in 1659, and following years, four small folio volumes, containing about 700 plates, consisting of almost every description of exterior and interior ornament for houses, pleasure grounds, chapels, mausoleums, altars, tombs, fountains, ceilings, chimneys, panels, doors, grottos, façades, &c., a treasury from which much of the renaissance, as it is called, of the present time has been drawn.]

[PAVON, IGNATIUS, a scholar of the celebrated Raphael Morghen, who imitated the manner, and copied several of the fine engravings of his master. It is not said when he was born, nor when he died. The following are considered to be his principal works:

Mater Amabilis; after Sasso Ferrato.
The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John, in a landscape; after Raphael; but copied from the engraving by R. Morghen.
La Madonna del Trono; after Raphael.
La Madonna di Foligno; after the same.
La Vierge au Papillon; after the same.
La Vierge a l'Oiseau; after the same; copied after R. Morghen.
The Transfiguration; after the same; copied after R. Morghen.
The Communion of St. Jerome; after Domenichino.
St. John Writing; after the same.
The Magdalene; after Schidone.
Leda; after Coreggio: and several others after Caracci, N. Poussin, &c.]

PAYNE, JOHN, an English engraver, born about the year 1606. He was a disciple of Simon de Pass, and is considered as the first artist of this country that distinguished himself by the graver. Had his application been equal to his genius, he would have ranked among the first of his profession; but he was indolent and dissipated, and though recommended to King Charles I., he neglected his fortune and his fame, and died in indigence before he was forty, in 1647 or 1648. He engraved portraits, frontispieces, and other book-plates, as well as a variety of other subjects, such as landscapes, flowers, fruit, birds, beasts, &c., but his portraits are the most esteemed of his prints. They are executed entirely with the graver, in a free, open style, and produce a very pleasing effect. In Mr. Evelyn's Scultura, he is commended for his engraving of a ship, which Vertue informs us was the Royal Sovereign, built in 1637, by Phineas Pett. It was engraved on two plates, and when joined, was three feet long, by two feet two inches high. The following are his most esteemed portraits:

Henry VII., prefixed to his Life by Lord Bacon.
Henry VIII.
Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, with a hat and feather.
Sir Benjamin Rudyard; after Mytens.
Doctor Alabaster; after Cornelius Jansen; scarce.
Hugh Broughton.
Alderman Leate; after C. Jansen; scarce.
Roger Bolton. 1632.
Arthur Lake, Bishop of Chichester.
Sir Edward Coke. 1629.
Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland.
George Withers, the Poet, with a hat on, [for his Emblems, published in 1635.]
William Shakspeare.
Ferdinand of Austria; after Vanduyck.
Count Ernest de Mansfeld.
[Elizabeth, Countess of Huntingdon.]

PAZZI, PIETRO ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Florence about the year 1730. He engraved several portraits of artists for the Museo Fiorentino, and various subjects from the pictures in the Florentine Gallery. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Francesco Albano, Bolognese Painter; se ipse pinx.
Federigo Baroccio, Painter; se ipse pinx.
Giacomo Bassano, Painter.
Giovanni Bizelli, Painter; from a picture by himself.
Andrea Boscoli, Painter; the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after L. Cambiasi.
The Assumption of the Virgin; after Raffaele.
The Virgin and infant Christ; after Vanduyck.
St. Zanobi resuscitating a dead Person; after Betti.
St. Philip refusing the Popedom; after the same.
A Sibyl; after Crespi.

[Pazzi was born much earlier than 1730. Zani and Nagler say in 1706, which is probably correct; for we find his works in the Museo Capitolino, published in 1741; and in Gori's Museo Etrusco, printed in 1737. The prints above noted are but a small portion of what he engraved. Nagler gives a good account of them. He was living in 1766.]

PEACHAM, HENRY. In the Anecdotes, this gentleman is said to have engraved a portrait of Sir Thomas Cromwell, afterwards Earl of Essex, [after Holbein.] He was the author of a book called The Complete Gentleman, [published in 1633. He was born at South Mimms in Hertfordshire, and took the degree of M. A. at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was an amateur, not a professed artist, and was skilled in music as well as painting and engraving. In his book entitled The Complete Gentleman, and another entitled The Gentleman's Exercise, he lays down rules for drawing and painting in oil; for making of colours, blazoning coats of arms, &c. He died about 1650.]

PEACKE, EDWARD, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1640. In conjunction with Robert Peacke, who was probably his brother, he executed some plates of friezes, and other architectural ornaments, published in 1640.

PEACKE, WILLIAM. Strutt mentions this artist as the engraver of two portraits of the Earl of Holland and the Earl of Warwick. As the prints he alludes to are marked Peacke, exc., it is probable that he was rather the publisher than the engraver of them.

PEAK, JAMES, a modern English engraver, who flourished from about the year 1760 till 1777. We have several plates of landscapes by this artist, some of which were engraved for Mr. Boydell; and he also etched a few plates from his own designs. Among others, the following are by him:

- A View of Waltham Abbey, in Essex.
- Two Landscapes; after Pillement.
- Two Views of Warwick Hall, in Cumberland, and Ferry Bridge, in Yorkshire; after Bellers.
- A Landscape, with Mercury and Battus; after Claude.
- Morning, a Landscape; after the same.
- A Landscape, with Ruins; after G. Smith.
- A Landscape, with a Waterfall; the companion; after the same.
- Four Views; after R. Wilson.
- Banditti in a rocky Landscape; after Borgognone.
- The Beggars; the companion; after the same.

[He was born in 1732, and died in 1782.]

[PEARSON, MARGARET, daughter of Samuel Paterson, the book auctioneer, distinguished herself by her skill in painting on glass. She was the wife of Mr. Pearson, who also excelled in the same department. She painted two sets of the Cartoons, after Raphael, one of which was purchased by the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the other by Sir Gregory Page Turner. There is also another set, but whether by the husband or wife, or by both, is not certain. She died in 1823. Her husband died in 1805. His works were various, but mostly copied from pictures by other masters.]

[PECHWELL, CARL VON, a German engraver, who flourished at Vienna in the latter half of the 18th century. He engraved the portrait of the emperor, Joseph II., after P. Batoni, and of several German princes and nobility; also the following subjects are particularly noticed as by him:

- La vieille Amoureuse; after J. Toornvliet.
- The Judgment of Paris; after A. Vander Werff, with a dedication to the Graces of Europe.
- Venus uncovered by a Satyr.
- The Magdalene in a grotto; after P. Batoni's picture at Dresden.
- The angry Mother and her Daughter; after P. della Vecchia.]

PEDRETTI, GIUSEPPE. This painter was born at Bologna in 1694, and was a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini. He resided some time in Poland; and on his return to Bologna painted a great number of pictures and altar-pieces for the churches and public edifices, of which the most esteemed are the Martyrdom of St. Peter, in St. Petronio; Christ bearing his Cross, in S. Giuseppe; and S. Margarita, in the Anunziata. He died in 1778.

[PEE, EMANUEL, JEAN, THEODORE VAN, three Dutch painters of little or no account but as copyists and picture dealers. Emanuel painted familiar subjects, and copied the works of other masters with considerable success; Jean, his son, was born in 1640, and copied for the dealers the works of Italian painters; Theodore was the son of Justus van Pee, and painted ceilings, portraits, and various subjects, but with so little profit that he changed his avocation and came to England as a picture dealer. Here, of course, he realized a pretty little fortune, with which he returned to his own country, and died at the Hague in 1747.

There was also an Engelhart van Pee, a portrait painter, who flourished at the commencement of the 17th century. He was a native of Brussels, but exercised his talent chiefly in Germany, and was patronized by the court at Munich, where he died about 1605.]

PEHAM, GEORGE. By this artist, who was probably a German, and flourished about the year 1594, we have a few bold etchings, executed in the style of a painter. He sometimes signed them with his name at length, and sometimes with the initials G. P. Among others are the following:

- Neptune rising from the Sea; with his name.
- Hercules and Anteus; with the initials.

[Zani says he operated from 1545; and Nagler gives the date of 1604 on one of his prints. He quotes but nine, and the dates are 1592 to 1604 inclusive. He was of Munich, and sometimes signed his prints Georges Peham Monachi.]

PEINS, G. See PENZ.

PEIROLERI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, who was a native of Turin, and flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints we have Bacchus seated on a Tun; after Rubens. [Zani quotes his birth in 1741, and says he operated in 1777. Nagler says he was born in 1738, and gives a list of 20 prints by him. Neither of them mentions the time of his death. The principal prints appear to be,

- Portrait of the Fornarina; after Raphael.
- Portrait of Raphael; after the same.
- Philip de Champagne; copied from Edelinck.
- The Holy Family; after Scarsellino.
- The finding of Moses; after Lazzarini.
- The Roman Charity; after the same.
- Abraham's Offering; after Bellucci.
- Jupiter and Calisto; after Amiconi.
- Zephyrus and Flora; after the same.
- And others, after Rembrandt, Mieris, Nogari, Beaumont, and C. Ruthart.

PELAIS. The name of this very indifferent engraver is affixed to a wretched print of St. John preaching in the Wilderness. It is signed Palais, fec. [This engraver is called by Füssli Michel Pelais;

he signed his prints MP. fe. according to Bruliot, and therefore had an additional name. It is supposed that he flourished at Rome about 1625. He engraved the portraits of Cardinal d'Ossat and J. de Gastebois. His mark is also found on prints after Palma the younger, and Federigo Zuccaro, and his manner approaches that of Cornelius Cort. He was, therefore, not "a very indifferent engraver."]

[PELÉE, PIERRE, a native of Courtedoux in the Canton of Bern, and a scholar of von Schenker, engraved from 1820 to 1838. The following prints by him are noticed by Nagler:

- The Evangelist St. John; after Domenichino.
- The President Duranti; after P. Delaroche.
- Several Portraits and Vignettes for the works of Voltaire and Rousseau; after Desenne and Deveria.

Neither the year of his birth or death is mentioned.]

[PELEGRET, TOMAS, a Spanish historical painter in fresco and en grisaille, was born at Toledo, where he studied the elements of his art, but afterwards went to Italy and placed himself under Balthasar de Siena, and Polidoro de Caravaggio, from whom he derived his knowledge of chiaro-scuro; and whom he made his model for imitation. Having advanced greatly in the art by practising under such able masters, he returned to Spain, in the time of Charles V., and established himself at Saragossa, where he acquired considerable reputation. He had a fertile invention, was well versed in the knowledge of perspective, and, above all, was an excellent designer. Hence his drawings were highly prized, not only by amateurs, but by artists. They were purchased with avidity by painters, sculptors, decorators, and goldsmiths. Unfortunately few or none of his works in fresco exist, which he painted on the façades of the churches and palaces: the only examples of his ability that can be mentioned with certainty, are some beautiful pictures in the manner of Polidoro Caravaggio in the Monastery of Santa Engracia, in Saragossa. He died at the age of 84, (the date is not mentioned,) and with him died, in Spain, the art of painting in chiaro-scuro. He had many scholars; among them was Cnevas, who assisted him in painting the sacristy of the cathedral of Huesca, and some other works.]

PELHAM, PETER, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1730. He engraved several portraits in mezzotinto; among which are the following:

King George I.; after Kneller.
 King George II.; after the same.
 Anne, consort of the Prince of Orange; after the same.
 Oliver Cromwell; after Walker.
 Thomas Holles, Duke of Newcastle.
 Robert, Viscount Molesworth; after Gibson.
 John, Lord Carteret; after Kneller.
 James Gibbs, Architect; after Hysing.
 [Peter Paul Rubens; after Rubens.
 Edward Cooper; after Vander Vaart.
 Dr. Edmund, Bishop of London; after Murray.

Peter Pelham was born about 1684, and died about 1738. J. C. Pelham, a painter, born in 1721, was his son. W. Ward scraped a mezzotinto of the Finding of Moses, after him: it is dated 1787, when probably he was living.]

PELKIN, CORNELIUS, a very indifferent Dutch engraver, who lived about the year 1663. Among other plates which he engraved for the booksellers, is a frontispiece to a book, entitled Spiegel der Spaensche Tirannie, published at Middleburg in 1663.

PELLEGRINI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1674. He was a scholar of Sebastiano Ricci; and is said to have received some instruction from Paolo Pagani. He distinguished himself among the modern Venetians, by a ready and ingenious invention, and an unusual facility of execution, though the effect of his works is impoverished by a feeble and languid colouring, and a total neglect of the principles of the chiaro-scuro. The reputation he had acquired at Venice recommended him to the notice of the Duke of Manchester, who invited him to England, where he resided some years. He executed several ornamental works for the mansions of the nobility. [He died in 1741. He is noticed in the "Guida di Venezia," as Gianantonio, with this addition, "Fu Pittore piu di fortuna che di merito." Some of his pictures have been engraved by V. Green, J. B. Cathelin, P. Simon, and T. Park.]

PELLEGRINI, FELICE, was born at Perugia in 1567, and was a scholar of Federigo Baroccio. He painted history, and became an artist of sufficient celebrity to be invited to Rome by Pope Clement VIII., who employed him in the Vatican. After having exercised his talents at Rome with considerable reputation, he returned to Perugia, where he died, in 1630.

PELLEGRINI, VINCENZIO, was the brother of Felice Pellegrini, born at Perugia in 1575, and was also educated in the school of Baroccio. He painted several pictures for the public edifices in Perugia, which are to be seen in the churches of S. Antonio, in the Chiesa Nuova, and in other places. [He was called il pittor bello for the beauty of his person, not for that of his painting. He died in 1612.]

PELLEGRINI, FRANCESCO. According to Barotti, this painter was a native of Ferrara. He was a scholar of Giovanni Batista Cozza, and flourished about the year 1740. There are many of the works of this master in the churches at Ferrara. In the cathedral is a picture representing St. Bernard; and in S. Paolo the Last Supper.

PELLEGRINO, DA BOLOGNA. See TIBALDI.

PELLEGRINO, DA MODENA. See MUNARI.

PELLEGRINO, DI SAN DANIELO. See UDINE.

PELLET, DAVID, a French engraver, whose name is affixed to a plate representing Louis XIII. when young, on horseback, with the portraits of Henry IV. and Mary of Medicis, in small ovals at the top. It is executed with the graver in a neat, but formal style.

PELLETIER, JOHN, [JEAN,] a modern French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1736. We have several plates by him of various subjects, engraved in a neat, pleasing style, among which are the following:

The Watering-place; after Berghem.
 Ruins and Figures; after the same.
 The Fish-Market; after Pierre.
 The Green-Market; after the same.
 Diana Reposing; after Boucher.
 The Rape of Europa; after the same.
 Two Pastoral subjects; after the same.
 The Union of Design and Painting; after Natoire.
 Young Bacchus; after C. Vanloo.
 The Travellers; after Wouvermans.
 Ladies going to the Chase; after the same.
 The Tipplers; after Ostade.

[Nagler mentions about 20 more, after Claude, A. Vandevelde, Teniers, Bega, F. Millet, Metsu, and others. His wife also engraved two after A. Ostade, and one after Wouverman. There is no account of the death of either.]

[PELLI, MARCO, an engraver, born at Venice about 1696. His principal engravings are heads of saints; a few portraits; a Charge of Cavalry, after Borgognone; and a landscape, after D. B. Zilotti, signed M. Pelli, exc. There are no particulars concerning him.]

[PELLIER, NICHOLAS FRANÇOIS, a native of Besançon, born in 1782, by whom there are a few small landscapes engraved with the point in a spirited manner. They are from his own designs, and marked with the monogram NP. He died in 1804.]

PEN, or PENN, HISPAL. Mr. Strutt has been led into an error with respect to this supposed artist, by the inaccuracy of the Padre Orlandi, who, in his Abecedario, attributes to him the same monogram as that used by Hans Sebald Beham. The numerous mistakes of the Italian authors, respecting the German engravers, are well known; and it is satisfactorily ascertained, that the prints bearing that cipher ought to be included in the works of Beham.

[PEN, JACOB, or JAMES, a Dutch painter, mentioned by Balkema as being particularly employed by Charles II. He says that he composed with intelligence, and to correct drawing added beautiful colouring; but he does not say any thing of the subjects. He adds, "all his pictures are in England." He died in 1674.]

[PENALOSA, JUAN DE, an historical painter, of the school of Seville, was born at Baeza in 1581. He was one of the best scholars of Pablo de Cespedes at Cordova, whose works he assiduously imitated, as is evinced in the magnificent picture in the cathedral of Cordova, representing St. Barbe. He also painted a St. Jago for the convent of Arizafa; several pictures for the Minimés, and many others for private collections in Cordova, where he died in 1636.]

PENCHARD, J., a Dutch engraver, who resided at Leyden about the year 1678. His plates are chiefly confined to frontispieces, and other book ornaments. He engraved also the anatomical plates for the works of Reg. de Graaf, with the portrait of the author, published at Leyden in 1678.

[PENNEMAKERS, THE RECOLLET, a scholar of Rubens, according to Balkema. In the Museum at Antwerp there is the Ascension of Christ attributed to him.]

PENNENSUS, F. We have by this artist, who was probably a painter, and a native of Italy, a few slight, but spirited etchings, executed in a neat, free style. There is a fine expression in the heads of his figures, though he is negligent and incorrect in the design of the extremities. The following, among others, are by him :

The Holy Family, with St. Catherine, and an Angel in the air; after Parmigiano.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; from his own design.

PENNEY, N., a French engraver, by whom we have some plates of devout subjects, executed with the graver in a very neat style, but without much taste. Among others is the following, which is apparently from his own design, as he adds fecit to his name :

The Virgin appearing to St. Bartholomew.

PENNI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, called IL FATTORE. This painter was born at Florence in 1488. He went to Rome when he was very young, and was received into the school of Raffaëlle, of whom he became a favourite disciple; and being intrusted by that great artist with the management of his domestic affairs, he acquired the appellation of Il Fattore. His talents and assiduity induced his master to employ him in many of his most distinguished works, particularly in painting from his designs the cartoons for the tapestry, and in the Loggia of the Vatican. Taja informs us that the histories of Abraham and Isaac were executed by Il Fattore. In these important undertakings, he acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of Raffaëlle, that he appointed him his joint heir with Giulio Romano. He was employed by Clement VII., in conjunction with Giulio, to finish the frescoes of the History of Constantine, which had been begun in the Saloon now called by his name. Constantine's Vision of the Cross, and his Battle with Maxentius, were painted by Giulio; his Baptism, by S. Silvester; and his Donation of Rome to that pontiff, by G. F. Penni. He had also a principal share in the history of Cupid and Psyche, in the Farnesina. Of his own compositions, those executed in fresco have now almost entirely perished; and he painted so few pictures in oil, that they are rarely to be met with. He possessed an admirable taste of design, which he had imbibed from his illustrious instructor, and his execution was graceful and facile. He particularly excelled in landscapes, and was well acquainted with the beauties of architecture. In 1525 he was invited to Naples by the Marquis del Vasto, and took with him an admirable copy he had made of the Transfiguration, by Raffaëlle, which he sold to that nobleman, for whom he executed some considerable works. The air of Naples proving injurious to his health, he died in 1528. [According to Kùgler, G. F. Penni could work well only when under the direction of his master Raphael; when left to his own resources he was weak and ineffective. He must have been an admirable copier of Raphael's designs and pictures, if it be true, as Kùgler and Passavant conjecture, that the picture in the Bridgewater gallery, known as The Madonna del Passeggio, is by him.]

PENNI, LUCA, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Florence about the year 1500. He is said to have frequented, for a short time, the school of Raffaëlle; and after the death of that master attached himself to Perino del Vaga. After painting some pictures for the churches at Lucca and Genoa, he visited England, in the reign of Henry VIII., by whom he was for some time employed, and afterwards went to France, where he painted at Fontainebleau, in conjunction with Il Rosso. On his return to Italy he applied himself to engraving, and executed several plates, both with the point and the graver. His prints are chiefly from the works of Il Rosso and Primiticcio, of which the following are the principal :

Two Satyrs presenting Wine to Bacchus; after Il Rosso.
Leda drawing out the Arrows from Cupid's Quiver; after the same.

Susanna and the Elders; after the same.

Abraham sacrificing Isaac; after Primiticcio.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.

Penelope at work, surrounded by her Women; after the same.

He occasionally used the cipher P or R.

[Many prints and marks are attributed to Lucas and Laurence Penni, which may, with equal propriety, be ascribed to other engravers of their time, whose initials are L. P. The inquirer will do well to consult Brulliot on the subject.]

[PENNING, NICOLAS LOUIS, born at the Hague in 1764, was a scholar of Dirk Vander Aa, and painted landscapes, interiors of stables, and marine subjects. He died at the Hague in 1818. His drawings are held in estimation by the amateurs.]

PENNY, EDWARD, was born at Knutsford, in Cheshire, in 1714, and having, at an early period of his life, discovered an inclination to painting, he was sent to London, where he was placed under the tuition of Hudson, who was at that time eminent. He afterwards went to Rome to complete his education, where he studied some time, under Marco Benefial. On his return to England Mr. Penny became a member of the incorporated Society of Artists of Great Britain, of which he was for some time vice-president. At the foundation of the Royal Academy he was one of the original members, and was appointed their first Professor of Painting. He continued to fill that situation with great respectability, and read an annual course of lectures, which were well received, until the year 1783, when, in consequence of declining health, he was obliged to resign the professorship, and was succeeded by Mr. Barry. About this period he went to reside at Chiswick, and having married a lady of property, lived in quiet retirement until his death, which happened on the 15th of November, 1791.

Mr. Penny was principally employed in painting small portraits in oil, which were very generally admired. He also painted sentimental and historical subjects, many of which were publicly exhibited. Among others, were the Death of General Wolfe, from which a mezzotint print was published by Mr. Sayer, and met with a very extensive sale; the portrait of the Marquis of Granby relieving a sick Soldier, from which there is a print; Virtue rewarded, and Profligacy punished, two pictures which are also engraved.

PENOZZI, B. This artist is mentioned by Pappillon as an engraver on wood, but he has not particularly specified any of his prints.

[PENSABEN, FRÀ MARCO, and FRÀ MARCO MARAVEIA, his assistant, both of the order of the Dominicans at Venice, painted at Trevigi in 1520 and 1521. The former was born about 1485, and is registered in the bills of mortality for 1530. Lanzi, enumerating the scholars, followers, and imitators of the models of Gian Bellini, mentions the altar-piece in the Dominican church at Treviso, painted by Marco Pensaben, and his assistant, in which the cupola, the columns, and the perspective, with the throne of the Virgin seated with the infant Jesus, and surrounded by saints standing, the steps ornamented with a harping seraph, (an angel playing on the guitar,) all discover Bellini's composition. Rossini has given an outline of the subject, plate 158 of his Storia della Pittura Italiana, which will justify what Lanzi says; "I believe Pensaben to have been an excellent artist in the Bellini manner, though not commemorated in history, nor by his order." It seems that for some unknown reason Pensaben fled secretly from his convent in 1521; but was found in 1524, as before, a Dominican friar in Venice. In 1530 he is registered, in authentic books belonging to the order, among those who had either left it, or were dead. If he left the order, it may account for their silence respecting his talents.]

PENTZ, or PEINS, GREGORY, called GEORGE. This eminent artist was born at Nuremberg in 1500, and was instructed in design, painting, and engraving, by Albert Durer. His real name was Peins, as appears from his inscription on his portrait, and that of his wife, which will be found in the list of his prints. On leaving the school of Albert Durer, he went to Italy, where he acquired a correct and tasteful design, which distinguishes him from the contemporary artists of his country. Of his works as a painter little is known. Huber informs us, that there are some of his cabinet pictures in the gallery at Vienna, which are highly and deservedly esteemed. In conjunction with Marc Antonio, he engraved several plates from the works of Raffaele, and his style of engraving resembles the best manner of Raimondi. His plates are executed with the utmost neatness and delicacy, and though they are wrought with great care and precision, they have nothing of the stiffness and formality which distinguishes the productions of the artists of his time. His drawing is correct, and the characters of his heads are finely expressed. The greater part of his plates are of a small size, on which account he is ranked among what are called by the collectors, the little masters. He was, however, perfectly competent to accomplish plates on a large scale, as is evident from his admirable print, after Giulio Romano, described among his works, the greater part of which are from his own compositions. He usually marked his plates with a cipher, composed of a G. and a P. joined together thus

P. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

The Artist and his Wife, on the same plate, inscribed Imago Gregori Peins. Imago Duxore Gregori Peins. John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, inscribed Spes meus in Deo est. 1543; scarce.

BIBLE SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Two small prints, Job tempted, and Esther before Ahasuerus.

Two, Judith in the Tent of Holofernes, and Judith with his Head.

Two, the Judgment of Solomon, and Solomon's Idolatry. Two, Lot and his Daughters, and Susanna and the Elders.

Four, of the History of Joseph. 1544.

Seven, of the History of Tobit. 1543. [Considered amongst his best.]

Two, the Merciful Samaritan, and the Conversion of St. Paul. 1545.

The Four Evangelists.

The seven works of Mercy; circular.

Twenty-five plates, of the Life and Miracles of Christ; very fine.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Two, Tarquin and Lucretia, and the Death of Lucretia. Cephalus and Procris.

Medea and Jason.

The Death of Dido.

Thomyris causing the Head of Cyrus to be put in a vessel of blood.

The Death of Virginia.

Mutius Scevola putting his hand into the Brasier.

Marcus Curtius precipitating himself into the Gulf.

The Death of Regulus.

Sophonisba drinking the Poison.—Artemisa drinking the Ashes of her Husband.—[Both highly esteemed by amateurs.]

The Triumph of Bacchus.

A set of six plates of the Triumphs of Human Life.

The Five Senses.

The Seven Liberal Arts.

The Seven Mortal Sins.

A large plate of a City taken by assault; after Giulio Romano, inscribed Georgius Pentz Pictor Nuremberg faciebat, anno 1549; an admirable specimen of his great ability. [Generally called The taking of Carthage.]

[His name is also written Pencz and Pens. Bartsch, P. G. tom. viii. describes 126 prints by him, to which Nagler has added three. Some writers say that he was born in 1510; and Dopplemayer states that he died at Breslau in 1550. There are pictures by him at Nuremberg, and a few in the galleries of Berlin, Munich, and Schleissheim. Peins, also, holds a distinguished rank among the portrait painters of his time; there are three in the Museum at Berlin, two of which are in the German and one in the Italian manner.]

[PENZEL, JOHANN GEORG, a painter and engraver, born at Hersbruck, near to Nuremberg, in 1764, according to Brulliot; but Zani and Nagler say in 1754, and died at Leipsic in 1809. He commenced with Schellenberg at Winterthur, and after studied at Dresden, where he entirely devoted himself to engraving. He worked much for the publishers there, and engraved many of Chodowiecki's designs.]

PEPIN, MARTIN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1578. It is not said under whom he studied, but he went to Italy when he was young, where he remained several years, and distinguished himself as an artist of extraordinary abilities. Weyermans describes a picture by this painter, representing the taking down from the Cross, which he greatly extols; the composition was in the grandest style, it was designed with the greatest correctness, and the colouring was rich and harmonious. Such was the reputation this artist had acquired at Rome, that when Rubens, who was then in the zenith of his celebrity at Antwerp, heard of Pepin's intention to return to his native country, it occasioned that distinguished master considerable uneasiness; but on finding that he had married in Italy, and intended to continue his residence there, he was heard to declare, that as Pepin remained at Rome, he no longer feared a diminution of his fame from the rivalry of any other painter. He certainly may be regarded as one of the greatest artists of his country. In the church of the hospital at Antwerp, are two admirable works by this master; they are two altar-pieces, with folding doors, as was customary at that time. In the centre picture of one of them, he has represented the Baptism of St. Augustine; on one of the doors, that Saint giving alms to the poor; on the other, St. Augustine curing the Sick. The centre picture of the other represents St. Elisabeth giving charity to a group of miserable objects, who are struggling to approach her. This composition is wonderfully ingenious, every figure appears in movement, and it is drawn in the most correct and grand style. The colouring is no way inferior to the greatest painter of his time. On one of the doors is the death of that Saint, and on the other her Ascension to heaven, with a choir of angels. Most of the works of this excellent artist are in Italy, and the above-mentioned are the only productions by him in the Low Countries. They are sufficient to warrant the jealousy expressed by Rubens, and to place him on a level with the most able painters of his country.

[Martin Pepin, or Pepyn, was born in 1574. His portrait by Van Dyck, in the king of Holland's private collection, is described by Mr. C. I. Nieuwenhuys in his excellent Catalogue. On it is inscribed Me Pictorem Pictor Pinxit D. Ant. Van Dyck Eques illustris. A. D. 1632. ET. ME LVIII. Mr. Nieuwenhuys, who has had several of his pictures, says that his talents were but second-rate. His first manner partook of the school of Otho Venius; but those painted in Italy are in a more elevated style. Balkema says that he died in 1641, but he is not supported by any other writer.]

PERAC, STEPHEN [ETIENNE] DU, an old French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1540? He went to Italy when he was young, and resided some time at Rome, where he made many designs from the vestiges of ancient architecture, and views of Tivoli and Frascati, which he engraved and published at Rome in 1569, 1573, and 1575. On his return to France, he was appointed architect to the king, and painted some architectural views for the palace at Fontainebleau. We have a few slight etchings by this artist, after Michael Angelo, Raffaello, and other masters; among which are,

The Last Judgment; after M. Angelo.

The Capitol; after a drawing by the same.

The Judgment of Paris; after Raffaello.

Four plates, of various sizes, of Views and Ruins near Rome.

[Nagler describes 29 prints by him; the latest date is 1583. Zani places his death in 1601.]

PERANDA, SANTO. This painter was born at Venice in 1566. According to Ridolfi, he was first a scholar of Giacomo Palma the younger, and afterwards studied under Leonardo Corona, of Murano. In his first performances he followed the prompt and hasty manner of Palma; but he afterwards visited Rome, where, by studying and designing the antique statues, and the works of the great masters, he adopted a style more finished and correct. He executed several considerable designs for the Ducal palace at Venice, and for the Dukes of Mirandola and Modena. Lanzi considers, as his most estimable performance, the Descent from the Cross, in the church of S. Procolo at Venice. He died in 1638. [A picture by him in the Ducal palace represents the defeat of the Turks by the Venetians.]

PERCELLES, JOHN. See PARCELLES.

[PEREDA, ANTONIO, a great Spanish historical painter, was born at Valladolid in 1599. He was a scholar of Pedro de las Cuevas, and gave early proofs of his ability in art. After making considerable progress in the school of Cuevas he was placed by his patron, Don Francisco de Texada, with Don Juan Bautista Crescenci, Marquis de la Torre, who had been a pupil of Pomerancio. This gave him the opportunity of seeing and copying the pictures in the royal collection, to which the Marquis, as a professor, had free access, and by these means he perfected himself in the Venetian manner of colouring which he finally adopted. At the age of eighteen he produced and exhibited to the public a picture of the Immaculate Conception, in which the Virgin appeared on a throne of clouds supported by angels, of such surpassing beauty that no one could credit its being the work of so young an artist, but rather of one of the principal painters of the court. Surprise, admiration, and envy, were equal on the occasion. The reputation he acquired by this performance induced the Duke de Olivares, who was then occupied in ornamenting the palace of the Retiro with the works of the best Spanish painters, to place Pereda among those of the highest rank. He performed his part to the satisfaction of his patron, and was munificently rewarded. Pereda's works were much in request, and he exercised his talent on a great variety of subjects. History, familiar circumstances, still-life, vases, tapestry, musical instruments; all were within the compass of his ability. Venetian colouring, freshness, beautiful impasto, and correct drawing, are the characteristics of the master. He died at Madrid in 1669. His works were formerly to be found in all the palaces and churches of Madrid, Toledo, Alcalá, Cuenca, Valladolid, and in many private collections. At present it can only be said, with certainty, that there are two in the Madrid gallery, one a St. Jerome meditating on the last Judgment; in Marshal Soul's collection, a Christ asleep on the Cross, with flowers and skulls about him; in the Esterhazy gallery, at Vienna, a St. Anthony and Christ; and three or four in the gallery at Munich. Formerly it was considered that no Spanish collection was complete that had not a specimen of Pereda.]

[PEREGRINI DA CESENA, or PELLÈGRINO DA CESIO, a goldsmith, engraver, and worker in niello at the latter part of the 15th and commencement of the 16th century. Bartsch has given a descriptive account of ten prints by him in P. G. tom. xiii., five of which have his mark P abbreviated, thus

P., three others are defective in the part where the mark is usually found, and two have the additional letters O. P. D. C. These letters are interpreted by Duchesne, Opera Peregrini da Cesina, and by Zani, who says that he has read on some prints by this artist, Opus Perigrini da Ces. Bartsch says this engraver is entirely unknown, (as regards his history,) but the date on the first print, 1511, informs us when he worked as an engraver. Duchesne, Essai sur les Nielles, has discovered the name, and describes several admirable works by him in niello. As it is a matter that will interest only a few, it may be better to refer the inquirer to Duchesne, Essai sur les Nielles; Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xiii.; Zani, Enciclopedia metodica delle belle Arti, Parte prima, vols. vi. and xv., in the notes, where he will find all that is at present known, and some curious speculations. Ottley describes ten, which he supposes to be by the artist who used the above marks, but he does not mention Peregrini. Nagler, from these authorities, and from Sir Mark Sykes's Catalogue and others, has given an account of sixty-four pieces, of which the following are the subjects.

List of Peregrini's Prints, from Nagler.

(Where it is stated that the print is marked with the letter P. it is to be understood in the form indicated above; a P. crossed in the middle, as an abbreviation.)

1. Abraham loading an Ass for his journey to Mount Moriah.
2. Abraham, Isaac, and two servants, on their way to the Mount.
3. Abraham and Isaac on the Mount, the servants sitting below.
4. Abraham with a knife and torch, Isaac bearing a bundle of wood.
5. Abraham about to immolate Isaac, is prevented by an angel; the head of a ram is seen at the right hand corner.
6. David conquering Goliath; a very fine plate. According to Duchesne it is probably by Peregrini.
7. Judith with the head of Holofernes in her left hand. This print has not Peregrini's mark; but the words lude te on a scrap of paper.
8. The Holy Virgin with the Infant on a throne; attended by S. S. Paul and Francis d'Assisi. Peregrini's mark in the centre.
9. The Baptism of Christ. In the foreground, to the right and left, are St. Stephen and St. Francis.
10. The Resurrection of our Lord, signed DE—OPVS—PEREGRINI—CES. An impression of the unfinished plate, in which some parts of the figure of Christ are white, was sold in Sir Mark Sykes's sale, in 1824, for about £20 sterling.
11. The Annunciation; in two small medallions.
12. John the Baptist with the Cross, on which is a medallion with the lamb and the words ECE AGNUS. Duchesne is of opinion that this is the work of Peregrini.
13. St. Sebastian standing by a Tree, his hands tied above his head.
14. St. Jerome kneeling before a Crucifix, the lion behind him. Peregrini's mark in the margin.
15. St. Roch. On the right hand the first person of the Trinity blessing him. Attributed to Peregrini by Duchesne.
16. St. Margaret seated on a large winged Dragon, holding in one hand a cornucopia, and in the other a cake. In the dark back-ground are four trees, and the mark P. Bartsch calls the subject Providence.
17. The Triumph of Neptune; marked O. P. D. C. (Opera Peregrini da Cesena.)
18. Minerva, with Lance and Shield; on the latter the head of Medusa. Duchesne considers this a work of Peregrini, though it has not his mark.
19. The Triumph of Mars. On a globe, surmounted by a figure of Cupid, is the letter P. Nagler notices that on an early impression of this subject it is difficult to distinguish the figure on the shield of Mars; on a later it is seen plainly. The back-ground is very dark. A second impression sold in Sir Mark Sykes's sale for £31.
20. A Sacrifice in honour of Mars. Bartsch describes this among the prints of the old Italian masters, P. G. tom. xiii. p. 139, N^o. 69; but Duchesne considers it to be the work of Peregrini. An impression sold in Sir Mark Sykes's sale for 17 guineas.
- 20b. A Muse playing on a Flute; around her are other instruments. Attributed to Peregrini by Duchesne.
21. A Muse playing on the Lyre; with other musical instruments lying around her. Attributed to Peregrini by Duchesne.
22. A winged Cupid standing on a Vase, which is ornamented with four figures of children; attributed to Peregrini.
23. Two Cupids by a Monument. Duchesne thinks it is by Marc Antonio.
24. Psyche at the foot of a Tree, Cupid behind her; in the back-ground, on the sea, a monster about to devour her. At the bottom is a mark which resembles that of Peregrini.
25. Leda and the Swan. According to Duchesne, by Peregrini; in the centre is a mark resembling Peregrini's.
26. A Nymph bound to a Tree by a Satyr and a Faun.
27. A Triton caressing a Nymph. The workmanship of this niello is fine, and resembles that of Peregrini.
28. A Woman with three Men and a Satyr. Duchesne considers it to be by Peregrini.
29. Hercules strangling Anteus. Attributed to Peregrini.
30. Hercules and Dejanira. HERCVLE—DEJANIRA. with Peregrini's mark.
- 29b. Hercules combating the Hydra. With Peregrini's mark.
- 30b. Hercules killing the Hydra. Duchesne says certainly by Peregrini.
31. Orpheus with a Guitar, surrounded by Animals. On the margin the letters O. P. D. C.
32. Arion on the Dolphin; in the back-ground the ship from which he was cast. Duchesne is certain that it is by Peregrini.
33. Arion on the Dolphin, with a violin in his left hand, arriving at Piræus.
34. Diomedes naked, armed with helmet and shield, holding the Palladium in his left hand. O. P. D. C. in the margin.
35. Mutius Sævola before Porsenna, holding his hand over the fire. The letter P. by the throne.
36. An Apotheosis. On the right hand a naked man with a helmet before an altar, on which is an eagle, and a woman on the left preparing a libation. In the centre of the margin the letter P.
37. A Standard-bearer, with Peregrini's mark, P. by the trunk of a tree. Ottley thinks this piece was copied from the drawing of a German master.
38. Two Knights fighting. Duchesne thinks it is by Peregrini.
39. Two naked Men fighting with Boughs of Trees. Attributed to Peregrini.
40. Three Women dancing. In the margin below the mark P.
41. Three Children dancing. At the bottom the mark P.
42. An Allegory of War. Three naked men with helmets on their heads, &c. The mark P. in the margin.
43. An Allegory of Union. A king on a throne; a young man and two soldiers before him. On the throne is written VN. RO. DI. F. Duchesne interprets these Un fondamento di Fraternalità.
44. An Allegory of Fame. Considered by Duchesne the work of Peregrini.
45. An Allegory of Seamaanship. In the margin O. P. D. C.
46. An Allegory of Plenty. In the margin O. P. D. C.
47. A Woman with a Sword and an Apple. Bartsch, tom. xiii. p. 206, N^o. 2.
48. A naked Man sitting under a Tree, a Snake in each Hand. The mark in the margin.
49. Half-length figure of a Man with a fur Cap; ornaments on both sides.
50. Half-length figure of a young Man with a Cap. No mark.
51. Arabesque, with Acanthus and Grapes. No mark.
52. Arabesque, with winged Sphynx under two Satyrs. The mark P.
53. Arabesque, with flying Chimæra carrying a Veil. The mark P. on the shield.
54. Arabesque, with two Boys riding on Chimæric Birds. The mark P.
55. Arabesque, with Helmet and Cuirass in the centre, above a winged Sphynx. The mark and the initials S. C.
56. Arabesque, with the Symbols of Seamaanship; in the lower part two marine deities on dolphins; between them a ship.
57. Arabesque, with two Goats. In the margin a mark, which may be taken for P.
58. Arabesque, with a female Satyr suckling two Children.
59. Arabesque, with the mark of a river Deity. Duchesne thinks this niello is by Peregrini, although without the mark.
60. Arabesque, with two Dolphins; in the centre above a winged head.
61. Arabesque, with two Trophies, chimæric birds, a faun sitting on a basket and playing a flute. On a tablet the letters SCOF.
62. A Coat of Arms with three Nails. On the right hand the letter C., on the left Z or S. Therefore only probably by Peregrini.
63. Two Knife-handles with Arabesques. On one a head of Medusa in a medallion, and at the end two satyrs with the initials P. C.
64. A Knife-handle, with two Guitars and two Rings. The letters S. C. in tablets, identify this piece as the work of Peregrini, in the opinion of Duchesne.]

PERELLE, GABRIEL, an eminent French designer and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1620. He excelled in drawing and engraving landscapes and views, of which we have a prodigious number, which prove the fertility of his invention, and an extraordinary facility of execution, rather than an observant study of nature. They are, however, composed in a very pleasing style, and executed with neatness and taste. He usually enriched them with ruins and other objects, which give an agreeable variety to his scenery. His principal defect is in the management of his masses, and his lights are scattered and in spots, by which the general effect of his prints is materially injured. Although by far the greater part of his plates are from his own compositions, he also engraved from the designs of several other masters, particularly Paul Brill, Gaspar, Poussin, Asselyn, and above all, after Silvestre. He was assisted in his numerous works by his sons, ADAM and NICHOLAS PERELLE, who, after his death, engraved a great number of plates of architectural views, landscapes, &c., but which are inferior to those of their father. The Perelles worked both with the point and the graver. Their works, especially those from their own designs, are so multifarious, and so frequently to be met with, it will not be thought requisite to specify them; the following are the principal plates they engraved after other artists:

A set of four Views, the Church of St. Michael at Dijon, the Palace in that City, the Bridge of Grenoble, and the Porte Royale at Marseilles; after Silvestre.

Four Views in Paris, the Arsenal du Mail, the Pontneuf, the Louvre, the Mail, and surrounding country; after the same.

A set of four Views, the Baths of Bourbon d'Archaubaud, the Castle of Bourbon Lancy, with the Baths of Julius Cæsar, and the great Chartreuse near Grenoble; after the same.

Six Views of the Garden de Ruel; after Israel Silvestre.
Two Mountainous Landscapes, with biblical subjects; after P. Brill.

Six Views of the Vestiges of Rome and its Environs; after J. Asselyn.

A View of Ruins, with the Adoration of the Magi; after Poelenberg.

[Gabriel Perelle, according to Nagler, was born in 1610, and died in 1675; Zani says in 1680. He is considered the Hollar of France, both in his style of engraving, and the esteem in which his views are held. His large views of public buildings and gardens in France, Italy, and Spain, were published, with those of Silvestre, in 1680; and there is a set of smaller views by these artists. His son Adam was born in 1638, and died in 1695, according to Nagler; but Zani applies these dates to Nicholas.]

PERERIETTE. The name of this artist is affixed to a coarse, incorrect etching, after Paolo Veronese, representing the Holy Family, accompanied by two angels.

[PEREZ, ANDRES, a Spanish historical and flower painter, was born at Seville in 1660; and was instructed by his father, Francisco Perez de Pineda, one of the members of the Society of Professors who established the Academy in that city, and who, as a scholar of Murillo, knew how to inculcate a knowledge of colouring as practised by that master. In the sanctuary of S. Lucia, at Seville, there were three scriptural subjects relating to the holy sacrament, signed Andres Perez, 1707; and in the sacristy of the Capucins of the same city another with the date 1713, representing the Last Judgment, taken in part from that of Michael Angelo. Perez was, however, most successful in painting flowers and other objects after nature. In his historical works may be seen how soon the painters of the school deviated from the good rules and maxims which their master, Murillo, had endeavoured to establish. Andres Perez died in 1727.]

PERJECOUTER, S. This artist was either a native of Italy, or resided there about the year 1535. We have some plates by him executed with the graver, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Marco da Ravenna. He also etched several plates, consisting of architectural ornaments. He marked his prints with the cipher P. [This article appears to be altogether erroneous. See SERWOUTER.]

PERIGNON, NICHOLAS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1730. He painted flowers and landscapes in distemper; and has etched some plates from his own designs, among which are the following:

A set of six pleasing Landscapes; etched in the style of a painter.

Four larger Landscapes; inscribed Perignon, fecit. 1771.

[From the different accounts given by the several writers respecting Nicholas Perignon, it may be reasonably concluded that there were two of the name, probably father and son, who practised the same style of art. Brulliot, quoting from Rigal's Catalogue, says he was born at Nancy in 1616, (this is probably a misprint for 1716,) and died at Paris in 1782. According to Füssli, he says, he died in 1802, at the age of 56. Zani places his birth in 1727, and his death in 1782. It should be noticed that there is no such statement in Füssli's Allgemeines Künstler Lexicon; he merely says that N. Perignon flourished about the middle of the 18th century. As Füssli's work was published in 1779, Brulliot has made an egregious mistake.]

PERINI, GIUSEPPE, [SPORZA,] a modern Italian engraver, born at Rome about the year 1748. He executed some of the plates for the Scuola Italica, of Gavin Hamilton, and engraved some of the statues in the Clementine Gallery. The following, among others, are by him:

The Frontispiece to the Scuola Italica, with two figures by M. Angelo.

Jupiter and Antiope; after Jacopo Palma.

Charity; after Bartolomeo Schidone.

Christ bearing his Cross; after Lanfranco.

[He was living in 1795.]

PERINI, LODOVICO, an indifferent Italian engraver, by whom we have some prints very poorly executed with the graver, among which is one representing two men playing at cards, and a woman overlooking them.

PERINO, DEL VAGA. See VAGA.

PERISIN, or PERSINUS, or PERRISIM, JAMES, [or JACQUES,] an old French engraver, who flourished about the year 1570. In conjunction with J. Tortorel, he designed and engraved, partly on wood and partly on copper, a set of twenty-four large prints, representing subjects of French history, from the death of Henry II. 1559 to 1570. His copper plates are etched in a coarse, incorrect style; the wooden cuts are executed with more attention. He sometimes signed his prints J. Perrissim, fecit, or J. Persinus, fecit, and sometimes marked them with the monogram P. [Zani thinks that he was a German by birth, an opinion in which Nagler seems to concur. The latter says he was born in 1530, and quotes the work referred to as being published in 1567 and 1574. Brulliot has given his monogram thus P which agrees with Nagler, who calls him C. Jakob. When he engraved conjointly with Tortorel the monogram is Dumesnil, who has given a description of 41 prints, including the History of the Massacres, so tenderly alluded to by Bryan, however, denies that these monograms are strictly correct. As many of the prints have the marks of both engravers they should have been included in one article. See TORTOREL.]

PERNA, PETER. This artist, according to Strutt, was an engraver on wood, to whom the prints marked P. P. are usually attributed. [He lived to the latter end of the 16th century.]

PERNET. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as an obscure engraver, who lived about the year 1620, and who executed a few indifferent plates of portraits.

PERONI, GIUSEPPE. According to Abbate Affò, this painter was born at Parma about the year 1700. He first studied at Bologna, under Felice Torelli and Donato Creti, and afterwards went to Rome, where he became a scholar of Augustino Masucci. He was a tolerably correct designer, and, in his best performances, resembles the style of Carlo Maratti. Such are his pictures in the church of S. Satiro, at Milan; and the Conception, at the Padri dell' Oratorio, at Trnin. In competition with Pompeo Batoni, he painted in fresco for the church of S. Antonio Abbate, the Crucifixion, which ranks him among the most respectable artists of his time. He died in 1776. [Zani places his birth in 1710; but as it is said that he died at an advanced age, and all agree that he died in 1776, the first date is probably the true one.]

PERRET, PEDRO. According to Basan, this artist was a native of Flanders, and flourished about the year 1590. His principal residence was at Madrid, where he was appointed engraver to Philip III. He worked with the graver in a neat, stiff style, in which he discovers more patience than taste. He engraved several plates of historical subjects, among which are:

The Woman taken in Adultery; after Breughel.
The Chastity of Joseph; after Speckart.

But his chief performance was a set of portraits of the Kings of Portugal, published in 1603, which he inscribed Pedro Perret sculptor Regis, fecit.

[Pieter Perret was born about 1550; it is uncertain whether he was a native of France, or of the Low Countries. He studied at Rome under Cornelius Cort, and was engraver to the Duke of Bavaria and the Elector of Cologne. He engraved the plates of the monastery of St. Lorenzo in the Escorial, from the designs of Juan de Herrera, which gave so much satisfaction to Philip II. that he invited him to Spain, and appointed him his engraver; an office which he retained under Philip III. and IV. Nagler enumerates 24 different works by him; and Bermudez many others. He was called to Spain in 1595, and resided there till his death in 1637. When at Rome he signed his prints Pieter Perret.]

PERRIER, FRANCIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Macon, in Burgundy, about the year 1590. He was the son of a goldsmith, who had him instructed in the elements of design; but opposing his desire of becoming a painter, the young Perrier secretly left his paternal home, and being without the means of subsistence, he associated himself with a blind mendicant, as his conductor, who was on his way to Italy, and by those means arrived at Rome. He accidentally became acquainted with Lanfranco, who encouraged him in his pursuit, and admitted him into his school. After a residence of several years at Rome, he returned to France, and passed some time at Lyons, where he painted a set of pictures for the cloister of the Carthusians. Not content with the reputation he could acquire as a provincial artist, Perrier visited Paris. Simon Vouet, who was then in possession of every commission of importance, employed him in painting the chapel of the chateau of Chilly, from his design. Finding little employment in Paris, he returned to Rome in 1635, where he applied himself to engraving the principal antique statues and bas-reliefs, and executed several plates after the Italian masters, as well as from his own designs. After the death of Simon Vouet, he returned to Paris in 1645, when he was employed to paint the gallery of the Hotel de la Vrilliere, and was received into the Academy. He died at Paris in 1660. We have by this artist a considerable number of etchings, from his own designs, and after other masters. They are executed in a slight, hasty style, and the drawing is negligent and incorrect. He sometimes signed his name Paria, and occasionally used the cipher P. The following are his principal plates:

A set of one hundred prints from the antique statues, published at Rome.

A set of fifty, taken from the ancient bas-reliefs.

Ten plates of the Angels in the Farnesina; after Raffaele.

Two plates of the Assembly of the Gods, and the Marriage of Cupid and Psyche; from the paintings by Raffaele, in the Farnesina.

The Communion of St. Jerome; after Agos. Caracci.

The Flight into Egypt; after the same.

The Nativity; after S. Vouet.

The Portrait of Simon Vouet; F. Perrier, fecit. 1632.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Holy Family, with St. John playing with a Lamb.
The Crucifixion; inscribed Franciscus Perrier, Burgundus, pinx. et scul.

St. Roch curing the People afflicted with the Plague.

The Body of St. Sebastian, supported by two Saints.

Venus and the Graces.

Time clipping the Wings of Love, engraved in chiaro-scuro; fine.

[A descriptive catalogue of his prints will be found in Dumesnil, tom. vi. D'Argenville places Perrier's death in 1650.]

PERRIER, WILLIAM, was the nephew and scholar of Francis Perrier, whose style he followed. Of his works as a painter the most considerable are his pictures in the sacristy of the Minimes at Lyons, where he took refuge, having killed his antagonist in a duel. We have by this artist several etchings, executed in the style of his uncle. He died in 1655. [Dumesnil describes four: a Holy Family; the Death of the Magdalene; portrait of Lazarus Meyssonier; and an emblematical subject.]

PERRIN, JOHN, an obscure engraver on wood, who, conjointly with John Munier, executed a set of cuts for a work entitled La Morosophie de Guillaume de la Perriere Tolsain, contenant cent Emblemes, published in 1553.

PERRISSIM. See PERISIN.

PERRONEAU, JOHN BAPTIST, a French engraver, by whom we have a few prints; among others, two of the four elements, Air and Earth, after Natoire; the companions, Fire and Water, are engraved by P. Aveline. [He was born in 1731, and died in 1796. He was instructed by L. Cars. He engraved also after Boucher, Vanloo, and Bouchardon. He was a painter in crayons, and was for a short time in England, where he exhibited some portraits done in that manner.]

PERRY, FRANCIS, an English engraver, mentioned by Strutt from the authority of Mr. Grosse. He was born at Abingdon in Berkshire, and was a pupil of one of the Vanderbanks. He afterwards was, for some time, under Richardson, but made little progress as a painter. He afterwards commenced engraver, and for some time worked for the magazines. His best plates are coins and medals, which he copied with neatness and precision. He also engraved some portraits, among which we have the following:

Dr. Ducarel, affixed to his Anglo-Norman Antiquities.
Matthew Hutton, Bishop of Durham.
Alexander Pope, Poet.

PERSON, NICHOLAS, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1696. He executed a set of indifferent prints, consisting of twenty portraits of the Archbishops of Germany; published in 1696.

PERSYN, REGNIER DE. This artist was a native of Amsterdam, and flourished about the year 1650. He went to Rome, where, in conjunction with Cornelius Blomaert, Theodore Mathan, and M. Natalis, he engraved the statues in the Palazzo Giustiniani. He worked with the graver in a neat, clear style. We have also the following plates by him:

The Portrait of Ariosto; after Titian.
That of Balthazar, Count Castiglione; after Raffaele.

[Nagler says that Regnier de Persyn, or Perzyn, surnamed Narcissus, was born at Amsterdam in 1600; Zani says 1639, and that he was living in 1690. But Zani names another Renato, or Reniero, Perzyn, whom he calls a Roman, and who operated in 1642. He quotes two inscriptions; R. a Persyn sculp.—R. a Persyn fec. 1642. This date may accord with that given by Nagler, but certainly not with that given by Zani, as regards the first-named Persyn. But another difficulty presents itself. On the print of Leander taken to the Shore by marine Deities, engraved by Regnerus a Persyn, is added, after sculptor, — Lusit. Was he a Portuguese? Nagler enumerates this among the other prints by Persyn, but does not mention the circumstance of its being so signed: the late Mr. Lloyd, however, has noted it. The inquirer must reconcile as well as he can the uncertain dates respecting Persyn, or Perzyn; and trace, if it be worth the pursuit, whether he was a Dutchman, an Italian, or a Portuguese; or, in fact, whether there existed only one or three of the same name. Nagler has given a list of his works, commencing with the two mentioned in the text.]

PERUGINI, PETRUCCIO. See MONTANINI.

PERUGINO, LUIGI. See SCARAMUCCIA.

PERUGINO, PIETRO. The family name of this painter was Vannucci; but he is generally distinguished by the appellation of Pietro Perugino. He was born at Citta della Pieve, near Perugia, in 1446. His parents, who were extremely poor, placed him with an obscure painter at Perugia, by whom he was taught the elements of design. He has been generally believed to have afterwards studied at Florence, under Andrea Verocchio; but this is disputed by il Padre Resta, in the Galleria Portatile, who has ascertained that Verocchio was never his master. It is asserted, with more probability, by Mariotti, in his Lettere Pittoriche Perugine, that he received his principal instruction at Perugia, under Benedetto Bonfigli. He first distinguished himself by a picture he painted for the church of S. Chiara, at Florence, representing a Deposition from the Cross, with the Virgin, St. John, and other figures, which was considered one of the finest productions of the art at that early period. The reputation he acquired by this admirable performance, induced Sixtus IV., who was at that time desirous of ornamenting the Sistina, to invite him to Rome, where he executed several considerable designs in the Sistine chapel, of which one of the most admired is Christ giving the keys to St. Peter. Although the style of Perugino retains somewhat of the dryness and crudity which prevailed before him, his works claim our esteem for the precision with which he imitated nature, the simplicity of his compositions, and a certain grace which distinguishes his forms from those of his contemporaries, particularly in his female figures, in which we discover the germ of that transcendent beauty, which afterwards characterized the productions of Raffaele, his illustrious disciple. His colouring is equal to any artist of his time, though there is a want of gradation in his plans, and too great a uniformity in his tones. He was little acquainted with aerial perspective, and was ignorant of the principles of the chiaro-scuro. But these were the defects of the era in which he lived, when every object was treated with a scrupulous individuality, approaching to servility. In his altar-pieces there is little variety of invention; his numerous pictures of the Ascension of our Saviour, and of the Assumption of the Virgin, in the churches of Bologna, Florence, Perugia, and at Citta di S. Sepolcro, are nearly of a similar composition. In his frescoes he discovered more fertility of invention, and more delicacy and harmony in his colouring. Of these, the principal are in the Sala del Cambio, at Perugia, representing subjects from the Old and New Testament. Of his cabinet pictures, one of the most esteemed, representing the Holy Family, is preserved in the sacristy of S. Pietro, at Perugia. He died in 1524.

PERUNDT, GEORGE. This artist was a native of Franconia, and flourished about the year 1640. According to Sandrart, he engraved a considerable number of architectural and geographical subjects. [The name should be written Pfriindt. He was an architect, sculptor, and steel engraver. He was born in 1603, and died in 1663.]

PERUZZI, BALDASSARE, called BALDASSARE DA SIENA. According to Della Valle, in his Lettere Senesi, this distinguished artist was born at Accajano, in the territory of Siena, in 1481. He is counted, by Lanzi, among the many illustrious artists whose merit is not to be measured by their fortune. After receiving his first instruction in the art from an unknown master, he went to Rome, in the pontificate of Alexander VI. He formed an acquaintance with Raffaele, whose style he admired and imitated, particularly in his works in fresco. In his Judgment of Paris, in the Castello di Belcaro, and in his picture of the Sibyl's Prediction to Augustus, at Fonte Giusta, in Siena, he has shown a divine enthusiasm, which, according to Lanzi, neither Raffaele himself, in treating the same subject, nor Guido, nor Guercino, who have painted so many admirable Sibyls, could have surpassed. He was not less excellent in large machinal compositions; such is his celebrated fresco of the Presentation in the Temple, in la Madonna della Pace, at Rome, in which he has shown himself a perfect master of the delineation of the passions, and the magnificence of the architecture is hardly to be equalled: this admirable production was a favourite study of Annibale Caracci. His altar-pieces in oil are extremely rare. Lanzi recollects one at Torre Babbiana, near Siena, representing the Virgin, with St. John Baptist, and S. Jerome, half-length figures. But the branch in which he particularly distinguished himself was in perspective and architectural views, which he represented with such fidelity and precision, and with so judicious a management of the chiaro-scuro, as to become perfect illusion. He was also celebrated for ornamenting the exteriors of the palaces at Rome and Siena, with sacrifices, bacchanalian subjects, battles, &c., in imitation of the antique bassi-relievi, which was afterwards practised by Polidore Caravaggio, and Maturino, with such success. One of his most admired works at Rome, is at the Farnesina, in the apartment where is the celebrated Galatca, by Raffaello, in which he has represented the History of Perseus, embellished with ornaments, in imitation of stucco, so admirably executed, that it is reported that Titian himself was deceived by them, and could only be convinced of the deception by changing the point of view. He was one of the most eminent architects of his time, and is said to have received some instructions from Bramante, the friend of Raffaele.

The life of this estimable artist was a continued series of misfortune and injustice. The offspring of indigence and obscurity, he was deprived of the means of prosecuting his studies with celerity. Insulted by his fellow students, who were insolent and arrogant in proportion as he was modest and unassuming; constrained by parsimony, or injustice, to work for a miserable stipend at Siena and Bologna; plundered of the little he had saved at the sacking of Rome; and finally cut off in the prime of life, when his talents were beginning to be known, by poison, administered by the jealousy of a rival. His death unveiled the extent of a genius, too little appreciated whilst he was living; and his sepulchral eulogy, which almost equals him with the greatest artists of antiquity, has been resounded by all posterity. He died at Rome in 1536, and was buried in the Rotunda, near the tomb of Raffaello.

Baldassare Peruzzi is said to have engraved on wood, and a print is attributed to him representing Apollo, Minerva, and the Muses, with Hercules driving before him a female figure, loaded with treasure, supposed to represent Avarice. It is executed in a fine, bold style, on three blocks, and is inscribed BAL. SEN., and at some distance the word PERUGO. Papillon informs us, that he wrote a Treatise on the Antiquities of Rome, and a Commentary upon Vitruvius, which he intended to embellish with engravings on wood, but he died before it was ready for publication.

[It is difficult to reconcile the different accounts that are given of Baldassare Peruzzi. While some state that he was of noble extraction, others say that he was the child of indigence and obscurity. The children of obscurity and indigence are rarely so instructed in the sciences and arts, as to exhibit at an early age acquirements equal to the most eminent professors. He was Raphael's senior only by two years, and, it appears, studied with him in the school of Bramante; their congeniality of taste and sentiment, with regard to the arts of painting and architecture, united them in the strictest friendship; and, as there was rivalry without jealousy, it may be readily supposed that they were equally noble in disposition. Peruzzi had executed some excellent works, both in architecture and painting, before he entered the school of Bramante; and when he was selected by Agostino Chigi to erect for him a magnificent palace, (now the Farnesina,) Raphael co-operated with him, and decorated the walls with some of his finest imaginings. It was there that he painted his Galatea, and the History of Cupid and Psyche. Peruzzi has been emphatically styled the Raphael of Architecture. To deserve that title in a science that requires the knowledge of so many others as components, instruction and assiduous study must be the handmaids of genius. Professors of high reputation do not afford their instructions gratuitously; and an indigent and obscure person without instruction arrives at excellence but by slow degrees: poverty retards his progress, though it may stimulate exertion. Peruzzi was little more than thirty when he commenced the Chigi palace. His ability as an architect, however, does not come within the scope of this Dictionary, or many other noble erections by him might be enumerated. As a painter, by general concurrence, he was only second to his illustrious friend. Time, unfortunately, has been less favourable to him in the preservation of his works in that department. It is surprising that an artist possessed of such superior talents should, in those days, have fallen into a state of indigence; but most writers record the fact. Pope Clement VII., hearing of his necessities, sent him fifty pieces of gold. It is not extraordinary that his countrymen, who suffered him to die in want, should give him a pompous funeral, and erect a monument to his memory; that is a common affair with nations, as regards men of genius that do them most honour. It was an oversight of Zani to deny that Peruzzi ever engraved in wood, and to reprove the cavalier Puccini for having said that he did so in a superior manner, and afterwards to describe a wood print by him, which he designates legno finissimo a piu tagli, B. B. irreperibile. It represents Christ and the two Disciples at Emmaus; four other figures and a dog are introduced. This print, says Zani, forms one of the four Banquets by Peruzzi, the other three being the Marriage at Cana, the Feast in the House of the Pharisee, and the Last Supper. See Enciclopedia Metodica, parte prima, vol. xv. note 42, and parte seconda, vol. ix. page 125. There is a drawing in chiaro-scuro by him in the English National Gallery; it represents the Adoration of the Magi.]

[PERUZZINI, DOMENICO, an engraver, born at Pesaro, and supposed to be the elder brother of Giovanni Peruzzini. He flourished from 1640 to 1661, according to the dates on the prints attributed to him by Bartsch. There is, however, considerable uncertainty respecting him, these prints having been previously ascribed to Domenico Piola, which Bartsch repudiates; the style being entirely different, both in design and execution. It is supposed that, like his brother Giovanni, he was a scholar of Simone Cantarini da Pesaro, and his etchings resemble those of that master, and of Guido Reni. Bartsch adduces several cogent reasons to prove him entitled to the honour of being the engraver of the prints which he assigns to him. Subjoined is a list of their titles. For full descriptions see Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xxi.

1. The Holy Virgin, half-length, with the infant Jesus. D. P. 1661.

2. The Virgin seated, with the Infant on her knees. D. P. 1661.
3. Christ tempted by the Devil, in the form of an old man. D. P. 1642.
4. Christ bearing his Cross, with other figures, half-lengths. D. P. P. F. engraved on the cross. (Circular.)
5. The Holy Family and Saints. Dom^{us}. Per^{us}. Anconae 1661. The figures in this print are half-lengths. Heineken, in his Dictionaire des Artistes, attributes this print to Gio. Dom. Cerini, known under the name of Il Cavaliere Perugino.
6. St. Anthony of Padua praying, and the infant Jesus appearing to him on a cloud supported by three cherubim. Dom. P. F. This print has been erroneously attributed to D. Cresti.
7. The Assassination. A man in his shirt on a bed, assailed by three soldiers, one of whom thrusts a lance into his body. D. P. 1640.
- 8 to 11. Landscapes. The first is signed D. P. f. Anconae; the others, D. P. only.
12. St. Jerome doing Penance in the Desert. The letters D. P. F. are on a plant to the right. Bartsch, however, considers it doubtful whether it belongs to Domenico Peruzzini, as there is a sensible difference in the style from that of the others.

It would seem that both brothers, though natives of Pesaro, preferred being called of Ancona, their adopted country, to which they had transferred their services. Domenico remained there longest, perhaps died there; Giovanni, being of a lively disposition, was enamoured of an erratic life, and, after various peregrinations, died at Milan.]

PERUZZINI, GIOVANNI. This artist was born at Ancona, [or at Pesaro,] in 1623, and was a scholar of Simone Cantarini, called da Pesaro. He possessed a lively genius, and became a reputable painter of history. There are several of his pictures in the churches of his native city, of which the most esteemed are the Decollation of St. John, at the Spedale; and a picture of S. Teresa, at the Carmelitani. He resided some time at Bologna, where there are some of his works in the public edifices, particularly the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the church of S. S. Vitale ed Agricola; and a picture of St. Cecilia, in the church dedicated to that Saint. He was invited to the court of Turin, where he executed several works, both in oil and in fresco, so much to the satisfaction of his protector, that he made him a knight of the order of St. Maurice. He died [at Milan] in 1694. [He was vain of his facility of execution, and inscribed on one of the lunettes of the portico de' Servi in Bologna, Opus 24 Hor. Eq. Jo. P. The work of twenty-four hours by Gio. Peruzzini, knight. Carlo Cignani, on reading it, observed, Le minchionerie si fanno presto. The witty remark of a brother painter, perhaps a rival, must not be allowed to deprive Peruzzini of the praise to which he is justly entitled. In the picture of S. Teresa, says Lanzi, there are traces of Baroccio's manner; that of the beheading of St. John is extremely beautiful, and here he appears a scholar of the Bolognese. After forming a style participating of those of the Carracci, of Guido, and of Cantarini, he took to a wandering life, and painted in various theatres and churches, if not with much study, with tolerable correctness, a knowledge of perspective, in which he was excellent, and with a certain facility, grace, and spirit, which delight the eye.]

PESARO, NICCOLO TROMETTO, called NICCOLO DA. This painter was a native of Pesaro, and visited Rome when young, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. He became a scholar of Federigo Zuccaro, and was a successful follower of the style of that master. There are many of his works in the public edifices at Rome, of which, according to Baglione, the following are the most esteemed. In the Basilica of S. Giovanni Laterano, the Nativity; in S. Francesco a Ripa, a Pietà, with two laterals of S. Niccolo and S. Antonio; and in S. Maria d'Araceli, two pictures of the Nativity and Circumcision. His most celebrated performance is in the Chiesa del Sacramento, at Pesaro, representing the Last Supper, one of the most admirable works of art in that city. Towards the latter part of his life he sunk into a mannered and feeble style; and his last works are extremely inferior to his earlier productions. He died at Rome, in the pontificate of Paul V., at the age of 70, [in 1612.]

PESARO, SIMONE DA. See CANTARINI.

[PESCIA, MARIANO DA, also called Gracialei. The time of his birth and death is uncertain; Zani says he died about 1520; others, that he was born in 1525, and died in 1550. It is also said that he was a scholar of Ghirlandajo, and assisted him in his works; if he was not born till 1525, he could not have been a scholar of Domenico Ghirlandajo, who died in 1493 or 1495. Perhaps it was his son, Ridolfo, who received instruction from Raphael and Frà Bartolomeo, and practised at Florence. In the chapel della Signoria, in the Palazzo Vecchio at Florence, there is an altar-piece by him; and, in the gallery, the Virgin and infant Jesus, with Elisabeth and the young St. John, of which Rosini has given an outline in plate 153 of his "Storia della Pittura Italiana;" the style is between that of Andrea del Sarto and Innocenzio da Imola. It is agreed by all that he died young, and his known works are very few.]

PESELLO, PESELLI. This painter was born at Florence in 1404, and was for many years a scholar of Andrea Castagno. He painted history in the style of his instructor; and at the time of Vasari there were several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Florence, of which the most esteemed was a picture of the Adoration of the Magi, which is preserved in the gallery at Florence. But his principal talent was in painting animals, in which he surpassed every artist of his time. He is said to have kept a collection of wild beasts, and other curiosities, in his house, for the purpose of painting them from nature. He died in 1481, aged 77. [By Lanzi and Zani he is called Francesco Pesello, senior; but Rosini asserts that this is a mistake, and that his real name was Giuliano, and that he was of Arrigi. Lanzi, Zani, and Rosini agree that he was born in 1380, and died in 1457, which would make him 77 years old. But this militates against his being for many years a scholar of Andrea Castagna. Castagna was born about 1403; so that when Pesello was thirty Castagna would be only seven years old. Nor, by the same rule, is it likely he could have been a scholar of Filippo Lippi, as some have asserted; the elder Lippi was twenty years his junior; and the younger was not born till three years after Pesello's death.]

PESELLO, FRANCESCO, called PESELLINO, was the son and disciple of the foregoing artist, born at Florence in 1426. This promising painter had given proof of uncommon ability, in a series of frescoes, at the Noviziano di S. Croce, representing the lives of S. S. Cosmo e Damiano, and S. S. Antonio e Francesco, when he died in 1457. [Lanzi and Zani agree in these dates.]

PESNE, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Rouen in 1623, [and died at Paris in 1700.] It is not ascertained by whom he was instructed, but he reached an eminent rank as an artist, particularly as a designer, in which he arrived at a higher degree of perfection than the generality of engravers. His execution is neither dexterous, agreeable, nor picturesque; but he compensates for these deficiencies by the correctness of his outline, and the fidelity with which he has rendered the precise character of the different painters, whose works he engraved. His principal plates are from the pictures of Niccolo Poussin, and a due portion of the merit of his prints, after that distinguished master, will be justly attributed to the perfection of his models. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Two of Niccolo Poussin; after pictures by himself.
Louis le Comte, Sculptor to the King.
Francis Langlois; after Vanduyck.

SUBJECTS AFTER POUSSIN.

Esther before Ahasuerus.
The Adoration of the Shepherds.
The dead Christ, with the Virgin and St. John.
The Entombing.
The Death of Ananias.
The Holy Family, with a dedication to Le Brun.
The Vision of St. Paul.
The Triumph of Galatea.
The Testament of Eudamidas; one of his best prints.
The Seven Sacraments, in seven plates, of two sheets each.
The Labours of Hercules, in nineteen plates; from the paintings in the Louvre.

SUBJECTS AFTER ITALIAN MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Raffaele.
A set of fifteen Landscapes; after Guercino, and other masters; fine.

[Dumesnil has described 166 prints by Jean Pesne, and has indicated the foregoing as being the principal.]

[PESNE, ANTOINE, according to several, the son of Thomas Pesne, a portrait painter, and brother of Jean Pesne; according to Dumesnil, the son of Jean Pesne; was born at Paris about 1683, and died at Berlin in 1757. He painted history and portraits, and was appointed principal painter to Frederic of Prussia, called the Great, who gave him a considerable pension. His works were much admired by the connoisseurs of the court; and as a specimen of the taste of his admirers here are two apostrophizing lines from an epistle:

“ Quel spectacle etonnant vient de frapper mes yeux!
Cher Pesne, ton pinceau d'egale au rang de dieux ! ”

Like many other deified personages, he finds very few worshippers in the present day; indeed if it had not been for those two magniloquent lines he would have been overlooked on the present occasion; so true it is that poetry, like amber, preserves the smallest creatures from corruption. Many painters who lived before Antoine Pesne were praised by their contemporaries, and many since; but, alas! “they had no poet, and are dead.” Jervas survives in Pope's epistle, and in that only.]

PETERS, [or PEETERS,] BONAVENTURA. This eminent artist was born at Antwerp in 1614. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he distinguished himself as the most celebrated painter of marines and sea-storms of the time in which he lived. His pictures of tempests and hurricanes are faithful and impressive representations of the horrors of shipwreck. The lowering sky, the awful and terrific agitation of the waters, the lightning's glare, the alarm and movement of the mariners, the vessels dashed to pieces on the craggy shore, or swallowed up in the devouring deep, are described with a fidelity and feeling which prove that he must have frequently witnessed these disastrous scenes, to enable him to delineate them with a precision so affecting. He was not less successful in his representations of the element under a more lucid and tranquil dominion. His pictures frequently represent the sea in its calm, with fishing boats at anchor, or views of the Scheldt, with vessels sailing under an easy breeze, in which he exhibits a freshness of atmosphere, and a transparent purity of colour, that is admirable. His best works are justly held in the highest esteem in Flanders; and if his pictures are not more duly appreciated in this country, it is because very inferior productions are continually attributed to him, which are every way unworthy of his estimable talents. He died in 1652. [Most writers, following Descamps, have placed his death as above; but as there is a picture by him in the Museum at Amsterdam, dated 1667, it must be a mistake. Balkema, with more probability, says he died in 1671. Nagler describes two etchings by him.]

PETERS, JOHN, was the brother and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1625. He painted similar subjects to those so admirably treated by his brother, though in general his works are very inferior to those of Bonaventura. He sometimes painted combats at sea, in which he showed great ingenuity in the composition, and his small figures are correctly and spiritedly drawn. Though his colouring is clear and transparent, and his penciling delicate and neat, he is very unequal to his brother in grandeur of effect, and in his judicious management of the chiaro-scuro. [He died in 1677.]

PETERS, FRANCIS LUCAS. This artist was born at Mecklin in 1606. He was the son of an obscure painter, from whom he learned the elements of design, but he afterwards entered the school of Gerard Segers. He did not, however, follow the style of that eminent master, but abandoned historical painting to devote himself to landscapes, which he painted in a pleasing style, and decorated them with figures, correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. He was taken into the service of the Archduke Leopold, in whose employment he passed the greater part of his life. He died at Brussels in 1654.

PETERS, GERARD. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1580. He received his first instruction in design from an eminent glass painter, named James Lenards, who, perceiving in his pupil an uncommon genius for the art, advised him to put himself under a more able master. He consequently became a disciple of Cornelius Cornelisz, under whom he studied five years, and, at the recommendation of that master, visited Italy in search of improvement. After a residence of some years at Rome he returned to Holland, where he distinguished himself as one of the ablest artists of his time. Van Mander extols him as a correct designer of the figure, and commends some of his historical pictures; but he is more celebrated as a painter of gallant assemblies and conversations, which he composed in a very agreeable style, and finished with great neatness and delicacy. He also painted portraits with considerable success. [His name should be written Peeters, or Pieters. According to Balkema he died in 1626. It is supposed that he etched three landscapes. Immerzeel calls him Pieterzen.]

PETERS, MATTHIAS. This artist, who flourished at Amsterdam about the year 1660, in conjunction with his brother NICHOLAS PETERS, engraved the plates for the Atlas Major, published by Blaeu, in that city, from drawings by the publisher.

[PETERS, WILLIAM, (the Reverend?) flourished during the latter half of the 18th century. He is better known by the prints engraved for Boydell's Shakspeare and Macklin's Gallery than by his paintings, though some of his pictures have all the impasto of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and in richness of invention and fancy far surpass him. His Resurrection of a Pious Family; the Guardian Angel and the Spirit of a Child; his scenes from the Merry Wives of Windsor, and from Much Ado about Nothing, and other theatrical subjects, were very popular. He painted many fancy subjects from his own invention, some pleasingly sentimental, some not strictly in accordance with just notions of propriety. A few of the latter class have been engraved. He also painted portraits with great taste and elegance. It is supposed that he exercised the art more as an amateur than as a professional painter; but he was patronized by some of the nobility of his day, for whom he painted subjects very different from those of his Resurrection of a Pious Family, or The Cherubs. The Lady in Bed, of which there are two, must not be attributed to Sir Joshua Reynolds, though in the quality of the painting it resembles his manner. It is supposed that he died about 1800. There are engravings of several of his fancy pieces and portraits by Bartolozzi, Marcuard, Simon, Thew, Dickinson, and J. R. Smith. He was called the Reverend W. Peters; perhaps he preferred painting to preaching.]

PETERZANO, SIMONE. This painter was a native of Venice, and was brought up in the celebrated school of Titian. He flourished about the year 1590. His picture of the Pietà, in the church of S. Fedele, at Milan, is signed with his name, to which he has added Titiani discipulus. In the church of S. Barnaba, at Milan, he painted some frescoes of the life of St. Paul, in which he appears to have been desirous of ingrafting on the Venetian colouring, the expression, the foreshortening, and perspective of the Milanese school. There is a fine picture by this master representing the Assumption, in the Chiesa di Brera, at Milan.

PETHER, ABRAHAM. This ingenious artist was born at Chichester in 1756. In the early part of his life he applied himself to the study of music, and at the age of nine years, is said to have occasionally performed the organist's duty in his native city. He afterwards turned his thoughts to painting, in which he was instructed by George Smith, and attained a considerable rank in the art as a landscape painter, particularly in the effect of moon-light. In his day pictures his scenery is usually pleasing and luxurious; his colouring is clear, and his distances are remarkably tender and sweet. He does not, however, appear to have paid much attention to the arrangement of his masses, and there is a want of judgment in the distribution of the light and shade. Hence the effect in his pictures is sometimes fluttered, and, as he did not often resort to nature for his materials, his forms are frequently repeated, and exhibit the characteristics of a mannerist.

Mr. Pether not only distinguished himself as an eminent painter, and an excellent musician; his philosophical and mathematical researches are particularly deserving of notice. He also possessed extensive powers as a mechanic, and constructed various optical instruments, such as telescopes and microscopes, as well as air pumps, and other machines relative to science; and once read lectures on electricity, exemplified by instruments made by himself.

With an ardent thirst after knowledge, he possessed a happy and contented disposition, and his manners were affable and unassuming. A lingering disease, which had confined him during the space of three years, terminated his existence, at Southampton, the 13th of April, at the age of 56. [He was the son of W. Pether, the engraver, and scholar of the Smiths of Chichester, but far surpassed them in execution. His day scenes are sometimes dry and hard in the penciling, but there is no want of judgment in the distribution of the light and shade; on the contrary, his best pictures are remarkable for his observance of natural effects, although there is no attempt at striking contrasts. His moon-light pieces exhibit his knowledge of astronomy; in them may be discerned the age of the luminary, the hour of the night, and the period of the year which the picture is intended to represent.]

[PETHER, SEBASTIAN, was the son of Abraham Pether, and was probably instructed by his father, as he painted similar subjects. His pictures consist of moonlights, conflagrations, and sun-sets, and exhibit fine feeling and judgment in the selection, and harmony in the colouring. The narrowness of his circumstances, and the largeness of his family, reduced him to the necessity of working for picture dealers, and beyond them it does not appear that he ever had a patron, except in one instance. That patron was Lord de Tabley, who commissioned him to paint a subject quite out of his line, a Caravan overtaken by a Whirlwind. Such patronage is more detrimental to a necessitous artist than entire neglect; a failure throws discredit on his talents. He had considerable knowledge in the mechanical arts, and, it is said, was the first that suggested the idea and construction of the stomach-pump to Mr. Jukes, the surgeon, who introduced it to the medical profession. His pictures are not numerous; but they were a source of great emolument to his friends the dealers, as they could be readily copied, and the copies disposed of to country gentlemen; thence it is that his name so frequently appears in catalogues of picture sales. His real works are worth obtaining. He died in 1844, at the age of 54.]

PETHER, WILLIAM, an English painter and mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1770. He engraved several fine plates after Rembrandt and other masters, as well as a few from his own works. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

The three brothers, Smith, Painters of Chichester; W. Pether, pinx. et fec. 1765.
Benjamin West; after Lavranson.
Samuel Chandler, D.D.; after Chamberlin.
Francis du Quesnoy, Sculptor; after C. Le Brun.
Carlo Tassarini, Musician; after Palthe.
Rembrandt's Wife, as the Jew Bride; after Rembrandt.
Rubens's second Wife; after Rubens.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Rabbi; after Rembrandt.
*An Officer in Armour; after the same.
An old Man with a beard; after the same.
The Lord of the Vineyard; after the same.
A Village Festival; after Teniers.
A Warrior; half-length; after Giorgione.
The Descent from the Cross; after the picture in King's College, Cambridge; by Daniello da Volterra.
The Philosopher; after Jos. Wright.
The Statuary; after the same.
The Academy; after the same.

The Contenance of the Chevalier Bayard; after Penny.
The Hermit; after the same.
The Alchemist; after the same.

[William Pether was born at Carlisle in 1731; was a scholar of Thomas Frye, the mezzotinto engraver, and became the most eminent of his time in that style of engraving. He was admitted into the Academy in 1778, and died about the year 1795.]

PETIT, GILES EDME, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1696. He was a pupil of J. Chereau, and engraved several plates in the neat style of his instructor, of which the most esteemed are his portraits. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Francis I. King of France; after Titian; for the Crozat collection.

Louis Philip, Regent of France; after Liotard.

Louis XV., King of France; after C. Vanloo.

Charles Edward Stuart, the Pretender; after Dupra.

Philibert Papillon, Canon of Dijon.

René, Charles de Maupeou, President of the Parliament.
Peter Bayle, Author of the Historical and Critical Dictionary.

Maria Theresa, Queen of Hungary.

Armand Julius, Prince of Rohan; after Rigaud.

Henry Charles de Pomponne, Abbé of St. Medard.

John Frederick Philippeaux, Count of Maurepas.

Joachim Francis Potier, Duke of Gesvres.

SUBJECTS.

The Disciples at Emmaus; after J. André.

The Visitation; after the same.

The Virgin of the Rosary; after the same.

St. Catherine of Siena; after the same.

[In Nagler may be found a list of 52 prints by him. He died in 1760.]

[PETIT, Louis, a designer and engraver, born at Paris in 1760, was a scholar of N. Ponce. He was much employed in designing vignettes and other book illustrations, which he etched with considerable ability. He died about 1812. Among his detached engravings the following are most deserving of notice :

The Portrait of Peter Bayle, author of the Dictionary.
La belle Jardiniere, jointly with Massard; after Raphael.

The infant Jesus asleep, finished by Bovinet; after the same.

Aurora; after the same.

A Holy Family; after the same.

St. Romualdus; after A. Sacchi; finished by Dambrune.

The dancing Nymphs; after Vander Werff.

And several for Ligni's History of the Life of Christ; among which are the Transfiguration, after Raphael; and the Last Supper, after Lionardo da Vinci.

PETITOT, JOHN, THE ELDER. This distinguished enameller and miniature painter was born at Geneva in 1607. He was the son of a sculptor and architect, who designed him for the profession of a jeweller, and having frequent occasion to make use of enamel, he attained such a tone of colour, that he was advised to apply himself to portrait painting, which he afterwards carried to a perfection that may be said to be unexampled. He was patronized by the two monarchs, who, in their time, gave the most liberal encouragement to art, Charles I. and Louis XIV.; and his extraordinary ability was deserving of their protection. In company with Peter Bordier, who afterwards became his brother-in-law, he visited Italy, where, during a residence of some years, they had the opportunity of studying the treasures of art, and of frequenting the best chemists, for improvement in the preparation of their colours. Petitot painted the heads and hands, and Bordier the hair and back-grounds. In this intercourse of social labour, they visited England, and had the good fortune of forming an acquaintance with Sir Theodore Turquet de Mayerne, physician to the king, an intelligent chemist, who had, by his experiments, discovered the principal colours to be used in enamel, and the proper means of vitrifying them in such a manner, that they surpassed the boasted enamelling of Venice and Limoges. Mayerne introduced Petitot to King Charles I., who retained him in his service, and gave him apartments at Whitehall. He painted the portrait of that monarch, and the royal family, several times. He copied several pictures after Vandyck, who assisted him with his advice, and they are considered the finest of his works. The beautiful whole-length of the Countess of Southampton, in the collection of the Duke of Devonshire, is painted from the original, in oil, by Vandyck, and is considered one of the most capital works of enamel that exists. It is nine inches three quarters high, by five inches three quarters wide, and the execution is the boldest, and the colouring the most rich and beautiful, that can be imagined. It is dated 1642. King Charles often went to see him at work, as he took great pleasure both in painting and chemical experiments. The tragical death of his royal protector was a dreadful stroke to Petitot, who did not quit the exiled family, but followed them in their flight to Paris, where he was looked upon as one of their most faithful adherents. Charles II., during his abode in France, took great notice of Petitot, and introduced him to Louis XIV., who appointed him his painter in enamel, and ordered him apartments in the Louvre. He painted that monarch several times, Mary Anne of Austria, his mother, and Mary Theresa, his queen. Being a zealous Protestant, and dreading the consequences of the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685, he solicited the king's permission to retire to Geneva. Louis, unwilling to part with so favourite an artist, and perhaps supposing that the religion of an enameller was not likely to be "composed of sterner stuff" than that of the great Turenne, for some time evaded the demand, and employed the celebrated Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, to endeavour to convert him. This not succeeding, he was at length permitted to leave France, after a residence of thirty-six years, and he returned to Switzerland. He settled at Geneva, but the concourse of his admirers, and the resort of the curious, who came to see him, was so great, that he was obliged to quit Geneva and retire to Vevay, a small town in the canton of Berne, where he continued to exercise his art till he had reached the advanced age of 84, and died in 1691.

Petitot may be called the inventor of painting in enamel; or at least he was the first artist who brought it to complete perfection. He was much assisted in his works by his relation, Bordier, whose fame is almost absorbed in that of his brother-in-law. Bordier is said, in the Anecdotes, to have remained in England after Petitot left this country, and was employed by the parliament to paint a memorial of the battle of Naseby, which they presented to Fairfax, their victorious general. This is the only work which can with certainty be allotted to Bordier alone.

[In the Apollo Gallery of the Museum at Paris are about sixty of Jean Petitot's finest enamels, consisting of portraits of Louis XIV., and several members of his family; of ladies of the court celebrated for their beauty, attachments, or literary acquirements; and some of the statesmen and military commanders of France. The following are perhaps the most interesting:

Several of Louis XIV., at different periods.
 Three of Anne of Austria.
 Two of Madame de Maintenon.
 Three of Maria Theresa of Austria.
 La Duchesse de la Valliere.
 Ninon de L'Enclos.
 Madame de Sévigné.
 Madame Deshoulières.
 The Duchess of Portsmouth.
 Madame de Ludre in the character of a Magdalene.
 Christina of Sweden.
 The Duchesse de Mazarin.
 The Cardinal Richelieu.
 Madame de Montespan.
 Mademoiselle de Montpensier.
 Maréchal de Villars.
 Jean Chardin, the Traveller.]

PETITOT, JOHN, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, by whom he was instructed in enamelling. He settled in London, where he exercised his art with considerable success. His works are very inferior to those of his father, though they possess great merit.

PETRAZZI, ASTOLFO. This painter was a native of Siena, and flourished about the year 1635. He was a scholar of Francesco Vanni, and, according to Baldinucci, painted some pictures for the public edifices and private collections at Siena, which were justly esteemed. One of his principal works is the Communion of St. Jerome, at the Agostiniani, at Siena, in which he exhibits somewhat of the style of the Caracci. He excelled in painting children, which he introduced very happily into his emblematical subjects. Such are his Four Seasons in the Villa Chigi, which are admired for the playfulness and ingenuity of the groups. He died in 1665. [He was not a scholar of Francesco Vanni, but, like him, a pupil of the younger Salimbeni, and of Sorri.]

PETRI, PIETRO DE. According to Orlandi, this artist was born at Premia, in the Novarese state, in 1671. He studied at Rome, in the school of Carlo Maratti. He painted history with some reputation, and united with the style of Maratti somewhat of the taste of P. da Cortona. One of his principal works at Rome is a picture of the Crucifixion, in the church of S. S. Vincenzo ed Anastasio: he also painted some frescoes in the tribune of S. Clemente. We have a few etchings by this artist from his own designs, executed in the style of a painter, among which are,

The Assumption of the Virgin.
 St. Laurence Justinian.

[According to Zani he was born in 1663, and died in 1716. He distinguishes him from Pietro Antonio de Petri, or Pitri, by whom Bartsch has given an account of four engravings in addition to the two above named. Zani says the latter was born at Rome, but it may be a mistake, from his having practised much there. See Bartsch, tom. xxi. p. 289.]

PEUTEMAN, PETER. This artist was born at Rotterdam in 1650. He excelled in painting objects of still-life, such as musical instruments, books, vases, &c., which he represented with surprising precision. Though the objects he made choice of are in themselves little interesting, they please by the beauty of his finishing, and his judicious management of the chiaro-scuro. His death is said to have been occasioned by a sudden fright brought on by an earthquake, which happened in 1692. [Balkema calls him Nicolas Peuterman, and says that he painted history. He gives the same dates.]

PEYRON, JEAN-FRANÇOIS-PIERRE, a French historical painter and engraver, born at Aix in 1744, and died in 1820, was a scholar of the elder Lagrenée. His subjects are from the ancient poets, and from Greek and Roman history, and occasionally of events occurring in his own time, such as the death of General Walhubert at the battle of Austerlitz. The greater number were painted from 1780 to 1800; but he continued to exhibit till 1812. He engraved several subjects after Raphael, Poussin, and after his own designs. He was a member of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture in 1783, and was named Director of the Gobelins Manufactory in 1787, and executed many paintings for that establishment.]

PFEFFEL, JOHN ANDREW, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1720. He resided at Vienna, where he followed the business of a print-seller. His works, as an engraver, were chiefly confined to architecture and ornamental foliage, which he executed in a neat style. In conjunction with C. Engelbrecht, he engraved a set of plates of jewellery ornaments, from the designs of A. Morison; and executed part of the plates for the History of Architecture, published at Vienna in 1721, by John Henhard Fischers. [There were two of the names Johann Andreas Pfeffel, father and son. The elder died in 1750, at the age of 76; the younger in 1763, at the age of 53. For a full account of their works see Nagler.]

PFEIFFER, CARL HERMANN, an engraver, was born at Frankfort in 1769. He studied at the Royal Academy at Vienna, under the Professor Ch. Brand. He worked with the point, in the English manner, and was a very industrious artist. His engravings are numerous, particularly of portraits, which are chiefly of German nobility, and persons of science and letters, of his time. He also engraved after some of the older Italian and Flemish painters, such as Raphael, Coreggio, Frà Bartolomeo, Giuliano da Parma, Sasso Ferrato, and Rubens. Though his death is not recorded, it is presumed his artistic career is ended.]

PFENNINGER, HENRY, [or HEINRICH,] a Swiss painter and engraver, born at Zurich in 1749. He was a scholar of John Balthasar Bullinger, under whom he passed five years, and afterwards went to Dresden, where he had access to the Electoral Gallery, and devoted himself to an assiduous study of the works of the best masters, particularly Vandyck and Rembrandt, and became a reputable painter of portraits. On his return to Switzerland, he was engaged by Lavater to make the designs and engrave part of the plates for his work on Physiognomy. He was much employed as a portrait painter; and has etched a great number of plates of portraits and views in Switzerland, which are executed with spirit and taste. He engraved some of the portraits for Fuesslin's Supplement to the Lives of the Swiss Painters. We have also the following by him:

A set of seventy-five Portraits of Illustrious Personages of Switzerland, accompanied with an abridged history of their lives by Leonard Meister. 1781.
 Thirty-four Portraits of the most celebrated German Poets, with their characters, by L. Meister. 1785.
 A set of six Views in Switzerland.

[He died in 1815.]

PHILESIUS, RIGMANN, a German engraver on wood, who, according to Papillon, resided at Strasburg about the year 1508. He executed a set of twenty-five cuts of the Life and Passion of our Saviour, published at Strasburg, by John Knoblauch, in 1508. These cuts are said to be extremely scarce. [He was also a carver in wood. Zani notices him under the names Rigman, Philesius, and Phillery, or Phillery. See a curious note to vol. xv. parte prima, of his Enciclopedia delle belle Arti. See also Phillery, Anton., in Nagler, an engraver, who flourished at Antwerp in 1530, to whom is ascribed the print alluded to by Zani; it represents two soldiers and a woman, and is inscribed Gheprint t'Antwerpen by my Phillery de figursnider. See PHILLERY.]

PHILIPPE, PETER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at the Hague about the year 1660. We have by him a few plates of portraits and festivals, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Louis Henry, Prince of Nassau; P. Philippe, fec.
Henry Charles de la Tremoile, [Tremouille,] Prince of Tarente; after Vanderbank.

SUBJECTS.

The Assembly of the States-General of Holland; after Tavernier.

A grand Festival; after the same.

A set of Merry-makings; after Vander Venne. 1660.

PHILLERY, an old engraver on wood, by whom we have a middle-sized print representing two Soldiers standing before a Woman, who is seated, holding a dog upon her lap. It bears the following inscription in old Flemish characters, Gheprint t'Antwerpen by my Phillery de figursnider, printed at Antwerp, by me Phillery, the figure-cutter. The cut is neatly executed, and the hatchings are carefully represented. Heineken supposes this print to be very ancient, which it appears to be from the inscription. [See note to PHILESIVS.]

PHILLIPS, CHARLES, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1765. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

A Boy holding a Pigeon; after Mola.

A Woman plucking a Fowl; after Rembrandt.

The Philosopher; after the same.

The Holy Family; after Parmigiano.

Venus and Cupid; after Salvatori.

Isaac blessing Jacob; after Spagnoletto.

[And others, after Louthembourg and Sir Joshua Reynolds.

He was born in 1737, but there is no account of his decease. The latest date noticed is 1770.]

[PHILLIPS, THOMAS, a very eminent portrait painter, was born at Dudley, in Warwickshire, in 1770. He was placed early with a glass painter at Birmingham, and came to London in 1790 with a letter of introduction to Benjamin West, who employed him on the glass paintings in St. George's chapel at Windsor. In 1792 he commenced an exhibitor, with a View of Windsor Castle; and in the two following years he exhibited the Death of Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, at the battle of Cassillon; Ruth and Naomi; Elijah restoring the Widow's Son; Cupid disarmed by Euphrosyne; and others of a like character. Afterwards he devoted himself chiefly to portrait painting. Notwithstanding that he had to compete with Hoppner, Owen, Jackson, Lawrence, and Beechey, he kept steadily progressing in public favour; and if he had not the advantage of court patronage, he seemed to be the selected painter for men of genius and talent. In 1808 he became a member of the Academy; and in 1824 succeeded Henry Fuseli in the professorship of painting, which office he held till 1832. On his appointment to the professorship he made a tour in Italy, in the company of Hilton, in order, as he said, to enable him to discharge the duties of the office more efficiently. He delivered ten "Lectures on the History and Principles of Painting," which he afterwards published in one volume (in 1833). These lectures are clear and simple in their style, and instructive in substance and arrangement, especially in those parts where he gives an exposition of his views of the principles of art. He died April the 20th, 1845. As the life of a portrait painter of great practice is confined to his workshop, the best record is, perhaps, an account of what he has produced there; and if it be found that he was chosen by persons distinguished for talent to preserve their likenesses for posterity, it may be concluded that he possessed qualities superior to the more fashionable painters, who owed much of their employment to the favour of a court. A few of the names of those who sat to him may be found useful hereafter, as an assurance to posterity that they are faithful resemblances, without meretricious accessories and embellishments; and they will justify the appellation which a foreign artist of great talent (Nicaise De Keyser) bestowed on him, that of the Van Dyck of England. The names are given nearly in the chronological order in which the portraits were painted. Lord Thurlow, Blake the painter, (engraved by Schiavonetti,) Lord Byron twice, Count Platoff, the poet Crabbe, Earl Grey, Lord Brougham, Sir Joseph Banks, Joshua Brookes, the celebrated lecturer on surgery, Major Denham, the African traveller, Lord Stowell, Sir E. Parry, Sir J. Brunel, David Wilkie, (now in the National Gallery,) Sir F. Burdett, Lord Lyndhurst, Dr. Arnold, the Duke of Sussex, Sir Nicholas Tindal, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Dr. Shuttleworth, bishop of Chichester; the portraits of Sir Walter Scott, Thomas Moore, Thomas Campbell, Southey, and Coleridge, for Mr. Murray; Dr. Buckland, Professor Sedgwick, Davies Gilbert, Mrs. Somerville, Mr. Hallam the historian, Francis Baily the astronomer, Faraday the chemist, Sir Humphrey Davy, and many other really illustrious characters: one of his last was a portrait of himself, an excellent likeness, which the editor saw on the easel while he was finishing it. In 1802 he painted by stealth, but with the connivance of Josephine, a portrait of Napoleon, which is now at Petworth; it has been engraved. Phillips wrote many of the articles on the fine arts in Rees's Cyclopædia, and in other publications. He was one of the great promoters of the society called "The Artists' general Benevolent Institution."]

PIAGGIA, TERAMO, [OF ERASMO DE ZOAGLI.] This painter was a native of Zoagli, in the Genoese state, and flourished about the year 1547. He was a disciple of Lodovico Brea. In conjunction with Antonio Semini, he painted several works for the churches at Genoa, of which one of the most esteemed was the Martyrdom of St. Andrew. In this fine picture, the style of Brea is discernible, but modernised and embellished; the design is more easy and flowing, the airs of the heads are expressive, and the colouring is harmonious.

PIANORO. See MORELLI.

PIATTI, FRANCESCO. This artist is said by Fuessli, in the Appendix to his Lives of the Swiss Painters, to have been born at Teglio, in the Valteline, in 1650. He does not acquaint us by whom he was instructed, but informs us that he painted a great number of altar-pieces and pictures for the churches and galleries of the neighbourhood, and highly commends a picture of Cleopatra, by him, in the possession of a noble family at Delebio. [Zani says he was living in 1690.]

PIAZZA, CALLISTO. This painter was a native of Lodi, and flourished, as appears from the dates on his pictures, from 1524 till 1556. He was one of the most successful followers of Titian, as is manifest in his fine picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, at the Collegiate di Codogna, which Lanzi asserts is worthy of the ablest disciple of his school. In the church of the Incononata, at Lodi, he painted three chapels in fresco; in one, he represented the Mysteries of the Passion; in another, the Life of St. John the Baptist; and in the third, the Life of the Virgin. The extraordinary beauty of these admirable productions is sufficiently established, by its having been for some time believed that Titian himself had painted them. He appears to have sometimes imitated the style of Giorgione; such is his picture of the Virgin and Infant, surrounded by several saints, in the church of S. Francesco at Brescia. One of his earliest pictures, signed Calixtus Laudensis, 1524, is in the church of S. Clemente, at Brescia; his Marriage at Cana, in the refectory of the Padri Cisterciensi, at Milan, bears the date of 1545; and in the Monastery of S. Maurizio, in the same city, are two large pictures representing the Adoration of the Magi, and the Baptism of Christ by St. John, inscribed with his name, and dated 1556.

PIAZZA, PADRE COSIMO. Paolo Piazza, called Padre Cosimo, was born at Castel Franco, in the Venetian territory, in 1557. He was a scholar of the younger Palma, although he did not imitate the style of that master, but formed a manner of his own, which, though not distinguished by great vigour or energy, was pleasing and agreeable, and he had acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history, when he became a Capuchin friar, and took the name of Padre Cosimo. He continued, however, to exercise his talents as a painter, and visited Rome in the pontificate of Paul V., where he executed several considerable works for the churches and public edifices, particularly a picture of the Deposition from the Cross, in the Campidoglio, and in a saloon of the Palazzo Borghese, the history of Anthony and Cleopatra. He was invited to the court of Germany by Rodolphus II., by whom he was employed some years, and on his return to Venice was patronized by the Doge Antonio Priuli. He died at Venice in 1621. [Zani places his birth ten years earlier.]

PIAZZA, CAVALIERE ANDREA, was the nephew of the preceding artist, by whom he was instructed in the art, and he accompanied his uncle to Rome, where he had the advantage of studying after the great masters. He passed some years in the service of the Duke of Lorraine, and on his return to Venice painted a large picture of the Marriage at Cana, for the church of S. Maria, which, according to Lanzi, is his most celebrated work. He died at Venice in 1670. [There is a picture by him dated 1649.]

PIAZZETTA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Zanetti, this artist was born at Venice in 1682. He was the son of a sculptor in wood, by whom he was taught the rudiments of design; nor does it appear that he had the advantage of any other instruction. His first style was distinguished by a clear and brilliant tone of colouring; but on visiting Bologna he was so struck with the extraordinary effect of the works of Guercino, that he adopted the vigorous opposition of light and shadow, and the boldness of relief, which characterize the pictures of that eminent artist, in which he was not entirely unsuccessful; but his drawing is mannered and incorrect, and the tones of his colouring false and discordant. One of his best pictures is the Decollation of St. John, in the church dedicated to that Saint, at Padua. He died at Venice in 1754. [His pictures partake of the fluttered manner of his contemporary, Tiepolo. He is best known in England by his chalk drawings of heads, which are not held in great estimation. He may be reckoned among the last of the Venetian painters of any note. Nagler has given a list of engravings after his pictures, and of two etchings by himself.]

PICART, JOHN, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1640. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Crispin de Passe, as he engraved from the designs of that master, and imitated his style, though not very successfully. He appears to have been principally employed in engraving ornaments for books, and a few portraits. We have by him a portrait of Edward, infant of Portugal, a half-length, with emblems. That of Erasmus, a whole-length, standing in an arch, a frontispiece to part of his works, published at Paris in 1639. Several other book plates of monuments, &c.

PICART, STEPHEN, [ETIENNE,] called the Roman. This eminent artist was born at Paris in 1631. He is said by some to have assumed the appellation of the Roman, on account of his long residence at Rome; others assert, that it was to distinguish his works from those of an indifferent engraver of the same name. On his return to Paris he was employed, with other celebrated artists, to engrave the pictures in the king of France's collection. His plates are sometimes executed with the graver only, in the style of Poilly; but he also engraved several prints, in which the point is predominant. His drawing is not very correct, and there is frequently a want of harmony in the effect of his engravings. His prints are extremely numerous, of which the following are the most deserving of notice:

PORTRAITS.

- John Francis Paul Gandy, Cardinal de Retz. 1652.
- Bust of Cardinal Fachenetus; after Morand.
- Melchisedeck de Thevenot, famous traveller; after Chaveau.
- Francis Tallemant, Abbé de Vlachretien; after Nanteuil.
- Andrew Hameau, Doctor of the Sorbonne.
- Nicholas Pavillon, Bishop of Aleth.
- Nicholas Choart de Busanval, Bishop of Beauvais.
- Claude de Brion, President of the Parliament.
- Peter Loisel, Doctor of the Sorbonne.
- Frances Athenais de Rochechouart, Marchioness de Montespan.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Ecce Homo, with three Angels; after Albano.
- The Birth of the Virgin; after Guido.
- The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Coreggio.
- Virtue triumphant over Vice; after the same.
- The Sensualist; after the same.
- St. Cecilia; after Domenichino.
- A Concert of Music; after the same.
- The infant Jesus sleeping, with the Virgin holding up her finger to St. John; called the Silence; after An. Caracci.
- The Holy Family; after Palma.
- The Separation of St. Peter and St. Paul; after Lanfranco.
- The Plague among the Philistines; after N. Poussin.
- Christ curing the Blind; after the same.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after the same.
- The Martyrdom of St. Gervais and St. Protas; after Le Sueur.
- St. Paul directing the burning the Books of the Ephesians; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Andrew; after Le Brun.
 The Stoning of St. Stephen; after the same.
 The Adoration of the Magi; after Courtois.
 The Virgin and Infant; after Noel Coypel.
 St. Anthony of Padua adoring the infant Jesus; after Vanduyck.

He died at Amsterdam in 1721.

PICART, BERNARD. This ingenious artist was the son of Stephen Picart, born at Paris in 1663. He was instructed in design and engraving by his father, and at the age of sixteen gained the prize at the Academy of Paris. He distinguished himself as a designer as well as an engraver; and the great number of plates he executed from his own compositions, evince the fertility of his genius and the excellence of his taste. He used both the point and the graver; but in his larger plates the execution was not equal to the drawing. His works chiefly consist of book-plates, and other ornamental engravings. In 1710 he left Paris, and settled at Amsterdam, where he was greatly employed by the booksellers, and died there in 1733. He engraved a set of seventy-eight plates, in imitation of the different styles of the old engravers, which were published after his death, in 1738, in one volume, entitled Les Impostures Innocentes. The following are his most esteemed works:

PORTRAITS.

- Charles I.; after Vanduyck. 1724.
- Charles II.; after Kneller. 1724.
- James II.; after Largilliere. 1724.
- William III.; after Vander Werf.
- George I.; after Kneller.
- Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; after Zoust. 1724.
- William, Lord Russell; after Kneller. 1724.
- Frederick, Duke of Sehomberg; after the same. 1724.
- Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury; after Hoadly. 1724.
- Eugene Francis, Prince of Savoy; after Van Schuppen. 1722.
- Don Louis, Prince of Asturias.
- John de Wit, Pensionary of Holland. 1727.
- Francis Peter, Cardinal de Foix. 1713.
- Philip, Duke of Orleans, supported by Minerva and Apollo; after A. Coypel. 1706.
- Stephen Picart, the Roman, Engraver to the King.
- Roger de Piles; ipse pinx. B. Picart, fec. aqua forti. 1704.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

- The Murder of the Innocents. The first impressions are before the crown was placed upon the head of Herod; fine.
- A set of twelve Prints, called the Epithalamiums; fine.
- Truth, the Research of Philosophy; a Thesis in honour of Descartes.
- The Triumph of Painting.
- The Death of the Infants of Niobe.
- The Feast of the Gods and the Cæsars.
- A set of Prints of the Annals of the Republic of Holland.
- The Frontispieces to Cérémonies Religieuses, 11 vols. 1723—1743.
- to the Bible of Vander Marck.
- to the Roman Antiquities.
- to Ovid. 1732.
- to Temple des Muses. 1733.
- to the Historical Dictionary.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- Time discovering Truth; after the picture by Poussin, in the Louvre.
- An Allegory on human Life; after the same.
- The Arcadian Shepherds; after the same.
- Two Prints of the Muses, Calliope and Terpsichore; after Le Sueur.
- Abraham sending away Hagar; after Le Brun.
- The Discovery of the Pregnancy of Calisto; after An. Caracci.
- Neptune calming the Sea; after An. Coypel.

[His prints are said to amount to 1300; those above enumerated are among the best. His work entitled Les Impostures Innocentes is certainly the most innocent imposture ever attempted; no one with the smallest degree of knowledge of the works of the masters he pretends to counterfeit can be deceived by it. His book illustrations are very pleasing, and add much to the value of the works in which they appear.]

PICAULT, PETER, a French engraver, born at Blois in 1680. It is probable that he was a pupil of Gerard Audran, as he copied, on a smaller scale, the celebrated Battles of Alexander, from the plates engraved by that distinguished artist, after Le Brun. He also engraved some portraits, and the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, after Carlo Maratti. This promising artist had acquired considerable reputation, when death put a stop to his career, in 1711. He usually signed his plates P. Picault, Blesensis, sculp.

PICCHIANTI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence about the year 1670. He was taught the rudiments of drawing by Gio. Batista Foggini, a sculptor, and applied himself to engraving, both with the point and the graver. In conjunction with Lorenzini, Mogalli, and other artists, he executed several plates from the pictures in the gallery of Florence. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

- Sebastiano del Piombo; after Titian.
- Cardinal Bentevoglio; after Vanduyck.
- Pope Leo X. with the Cardinals Rossi and Giulio di Medici; after Raffaele.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Madonna della Seggiola; after Raffaele.
- The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John; after An. Caracci.
- The Tribute Money; after Titian.
- The Virgin and Infant; after the same.
- Abraham sending away Hagar; after P. da Cortona.

[Nagler enumerates 27 prints by him, of which the preceding form part.]

PICCINI, GIACOMO. This artist was born at Venice in 1617, but it is not known by what master he was instructed in the art of engraving. We have several plates by him, executed in a stiff, disagreeable style. He engraved a set of thirty portraits of the principal painters of the Venetian school, for the account of their Lives, published by Ridolfi, in 1648. We have also the following prints by him:

- The Portrait of Alessandro Farnese.
- Diogenes, with his Lantern; after P. Liberi.
- The Holy Family; after the same.
- Judith, with the Head of Holofernes at her feet; after Titian.
- The Holy Family; after the same.

[Zani says he operated in 1669; the latest date on his prints is 1655.]

PICCINI, GUGLIELMO, was the brother of the preceding artist, and among other prints etched a plate of a Pietá, after Rubens. He had a daughter, ISABELLA PICCINI, who was a nun, and engraved a set of portraits of the illustrious personages of Italy, for the Conchilia Celeste, of G. B. Fabri.
