PICCIONI, MATTEO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Ancona about the year 1630. Of his works as a painter little is known; but he was made a member of the Academy of St. Luke, in 1655. We have a few spirited etchings by him, among which are the following:

- St. Luke painting the Virgin; after Raffaele.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after P. Veronese.
- The Holy Family; after the same.
- The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John; after A. Camassei.
- The exposing of Moses in the Waters of the Nile; after the same.

[Nagler says he was born in 1615; and Zani, that he operated in 1641. Bartsch says nothing of the date of his birth, but gives a list of 23 of his prints, among which are two with the date 1641. It is also said that he wrought in mosaic.]

PICKAERT, P. [PIETER.] This artist was apparently a native of Holland. His name is affixed to a set of coarse, incorrect etchings, representing the flight of James II. from England, which were published in Holland. They are probably from his own designs, as he adds the word fecit to his name. [Neither the time of his birth or death are recorded, but he must have been living about 1688.]

[PICOLET, CORNELIUS, a painter of portraits and conversations, flourished at Rotterdam from about 1670 to 1690; his reputation rests rather on the circumstance of his having been the first instructor of Adrian Vander Werf than on any particular work that can be with certainty ascribed to him.]

PICOT, VICTOR MARIA, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1744. He came to London about the year 1770, and engraved several plates, some of which were for the collection of Boydell. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

- The Four Evangelists; after Rubens.
- Diana and her Nymphs; after the same.
- The Nurse and Child; after Schidone.
- A young Man holding a Flute; after B. Luti.
- Apollo holding a Branch of Laurel; after S. Cantarini.
- A Landscape and Figures; after Zuccarelli.
- Two Sea-pieces; after D. Serres.
- Two Landscapes, Morning and Evening; after Bar-ralett.

Several other Subjects; after the same.

[His engravings are of a miscellaneous character; Nagler has given a list of 36. He died about 1805.]

PICOU, or PIQUOT, ROBERT, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. He engraved some plates after pictures by Bassano, in a neat, but laboured style. We have also several frontispieces and other book ornaments by him, from his own designs.

[According to Marolles, Robert Picou was a native of Tours. He had the title of Peintre du Roi; he visited Italy, and remained some time at Rome. Dumesnil describes seven prints by him, which he says are so rare that the Abbé Marolles could only collect three. The last, executed from a picture by Jacopo da Ponte, called Bassano, is the best; the others are evidently from his own designs. They are executed with a firm point, and a mixture of little dots, and finished with the graver. The following are the titles as given by Dumesnil, P. G. F. tom. vi.

1. Love asleep; R. Picou. fe.
2. Two Cupids caressing; R. Picou. fe. Romæ.
3. Two Infants; R. Picou. fe. Romæ.
4. Three Infants; R. Picou. fe.
5. The little Wrestlers; R. Picou. fecit.
6. Two couples of Infants; R. P. &c.
7. Jesus Christ delivered to his Enemies. On the margin to the left inscribed Jacobus de poto Bassan pinxit, R. Picou sculpsit; and on the right, Ciartres formis Cum Privilegio. In a second impression, Ciartres formis is erased, and Mariette Excudit substituted.]

PICQUET, J. In Dubrayet's drawing-book is a print by this artist, representing Juno, Pallas, and Venus, half-length figures. It is executed with the graver, in a hard, dry manner, and appears to have been an early attempt of this engraver. It is inscribed Joan Picquet, ft.

[PICQUOT, THOMAS, an engraver of goldsmiths' work, designs for embroidery, damasking, and other ornaments, flourished about 1637. Dumesnil con-jectures that he was a scholar of Marin Le Bourgeois, painter and valet de chambre to Henry IV. and Louis XIII., of whom but little is known. Dumesnil describes fourteen prints by Thomas Picquot, the first of which is a portrait of the aforesaid Marin Le Bourgeois, with his name and titles set forth; the others consist of ornamental designs, arabesque or moresco, for goldsmiths' and armourers' work, book and other decorations. The portrait is etched in the manner of a painter, and is the best piece; the ornaments are etched with an extremely delicate point, and appear in white on a dark ground, as does the monogram of the artist JP. Zani, who marks him B. B., says he operated from 1623 to 1645.]

[PICQUOT, HENRI, supposed to be the brother of Thomas Picquot, was a scholar of Simon Vouet, at Paris, and flourished about 1640, as appears by that date on one of his prints. Dumesnil describes three prints by him; the two first after Chapron, etched with the point in a style analogous to that of Michel Dorigny, the other from his own design, also with the point, in a very light and spirited manner.

1. The young Virgin ascending the steps of the Temple; a composition of many figures, with a glory of angels and cherubim above. In the margin, on the left, is inscribed Chapron juven. et pinxit; and on the right, H. Picquot incidit Cum Privilegio Regis. The date 1640 is in the middle at bottom. There is a second impression from which the inscription on the right has been erased, and Coyppel, ex. avec privilege, substituted.
2. The Virgin giving the breast to the infant Jesus; Joseph, Elisabeth, and the infant St. John are introduced. Although this print bears the name of Guerineau, and not of H. Picquot, Dumesnil is of opinion that it is by the latter.
3. A sick Frog attended by others; one acts as a physician, two appear praying, another is bringing a potion, and four frogs are dancing to the sound of a violin. In the margin are six lines of French verse, moralizing on the brutalizing propensities of man. H. Picquot juven. et fecit. F. L. D. Ciartres excudit avec Privilege du Roy.

PIEMONTE, NICHOLAS, was born at Amsterdam in 1659, and at first passed some time under Martin Saagmolen, an obscure artist, but he afterwards became a scholar of Nicholas Molenaer. He visited Italy, and improved his talents for landscape painting, by designing the beautiful views in that country. After remaining several years at Rome he returned to Holland, where he painted some views in Italy, which gained him great reputation. His landscapes bear a strong resemblance to the works of John Both, and although not equal to that celebrated painter, his pictures are deservedly admired. [He died in 1709.]

PIENE, A. DE, a French engraver of little note. He engraved, among other plates, a portrait of the Duchess of Savoy, after Sacchetti, for a book published in 1672.

PIERCE, EDWARD, an English artist, who flourished in the reigns of Charles I. and II. He was eminent both as a painter of history and landscapes, and also excelled in architectural and perspective views. Few of his works are now remaining, the far greater part of them, which consisted of altarpieces and ceilings of churches, being destroyed in the fire of London, in 1666. Lord Orford attributes to this artist a book of frieze-work, in eight plates, etched in 1640.

PIERRE, JOHN BAPTIST MARIA, [JEAN BAPTISTE MARIE.] This artist was born at Paris in 1715. He went to Italy when young, and studied some years at Rome. On his return to Paris he distinguished himself as a painter of history, and was employed for some of the public edifices, particularly a large ceiling in the chapel of the Virgin, in St. Roch, by which he gained great reputation. He painted an admired picture of St. Nicholas and St. Francis, for the church of St. Sulpice, which has been engraved by Nicholas Dupuis. He was made a member of the Academy at Paris, and was appointed principal painter to the king, in which capacity he died in 1789. We have by this artist several etchings, among which are the following :

The Village Entertainment; after his own design.
 Several Studies of Heads; made by him in Italy.

[Basan says he was born in 1714; others say in 1720.]

PIERI, STEFANO. This painter was a native of Florence, and a disciple of Batista Naldini. According to Baglione, he visited Rome in the pontificate of Clement VIII., and was taken under the protection of Cardinal Alessandro Medici, by whom he was employed in the church of S. Prassede, where he painted some pictures of the Apostles, and the Annunciation. In S. Maria in Via, is a picture by him of the Assumption of the Virgin. He assisted Giorgio Vasari in the Cupola of S. Maria del Fiore, at Florence, and painted for the Palazzo Pitti, the Sacrifice of Isaac, one of his best works. [Zani places his birth in 1513, and his death in 1600. He ranks him with the painters of mediocrity.]

PIERSON, CHRISTOPHER. This artist was born at the Hague in 1631, and was destined by his parents to mercantile pursuits, but his strong partiality for the art induced them to permit him to indulge his propensity, and he became a scholar of Bartolomeo Meyburg, under whom he had studied some time, when he accompanied his instructor to Germany, and after an absence of three years returned to Holland, and established himself at Gouda, where he met with immediate employment as a painter of history and portraits. Notwithstanding the reputation he had acquired, the encouragement given to the pictures of Leemens, a painter of dead game, guns, powder-horns, pouches, &c., induced him to adopt similar subjects, in which he not only surpassed his model, but has perhaps scarcely been equalled in that branch. He usually represented those objects on a white ground, producing a surprising and illusive effect. He died [at Gouda] in 1714.

PIET. This artist was a native of the Low Countries, and flourished about the year 1608. He engraved the plates for a work entitled Le Manie-ment d'Armes de Nassau, &c., by Adam V. Brien, published in 1608. They are very indifferently executed.

PIETERS, JOHN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1667, and was a scholar of Peter Eykens, an historical painter of some eminence. He came to England in 1685, when he was eighteen years of age, and finding no employment for a painter of history, he offered his services to Sir Godfrey Kneller, who employed him to paint the draperies and back-grounds of his portraits. He excelled in copying the works of Rubens. He died in London in 1727.

PIGNÉ, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Chalon in 1690, and is said to have been a pupil of Bernard Picart. We have by this artist a few plates executed with the graver, among which are the following :

The Virgin, with the Infant sleeping in a cradle, with St. John standing by her side, attended by four angels; after F. Trevisani; for the Crozat collection.
 The Woman of Canaan kneeling at the feet of Christ; after Ann. Caracci.

He appears to have been in England, as there is a portrait with his name, of Richard Fiddes, B. D., prefixed to his Divinity, dated 1718. [Zani and Nagler say he was born in 1700; but as he engraved the portrait of Fiddes in 1718, and published ninety heads from the Cartoons in 1722, it may be conjectured there is a mistake.]

PIGNONE, SIMONE. This painter was born at Florence, according to Oretti, in 1614. After being instructed in the elements of the art by Domenico Cresti, called Passignano, he became a scholar of Francesco Furini, of whom he was the most distinguished disciple. He afterwards visited Venice, where he improved his style of colouring by studying the works of Titian and Tintoretto. On his return to Florence he painted several pictures for the churches, of which the most admired are the pictures of St. Michael discomfiting the Evil Spirit, in the church of the Nunziata; and S. Luigi distributing his Wealth to the Poor, in S. Felicità. He also excelled in painting subjects of the fable, which he sometimes treated with an unwarrantable licentiousness. He died in 1698.

PILAJA, PAOLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Rome about the year 1737. He executed a set of plates for a book entitled Storia di Volsena, by the Abbate Adami, with a portrait of the author, published at Rome in 1737. We have also, among others, the following prints by him :

The Portrait of Pope Benedict XIII.; after Brughii.
 The Martyrdom of St. Fedele; after S. Conca.
 A Miracle wrought by S. Thorio; after the same.
 St. Liberale, with two Children; after the same.
 The Statue of the Prophet Elias; after the sculpture by Ag. Cornacchini, in St. Peter's at Rome.

[He flourished from 1727 to 1747.]

[PILGRIM, JOHN ULRIC, an ancient engraver on wood, and supposed to be the inventor of engraving in chiaro-scuro. There is no certain account of him, nor of the time in which he operated. He marked his prints with two pilgrims' staves crossed, between the letters J° V.; but whether this is in allusion to his name is not satisfactorily ascertained. The French writers call him Le Maître aux bourdons Croisés. Bartsch, P. G. tom. vii., has described ten prints by him, of which the following are the subjects :

1. Christ on the Cross, with the Magdalene kneeling at the foot, and the Virgin and St. John standing, one on each side.
2. The Virgin seated in a Garden, with the Infant on her knees.
3. The Virgin, half-length, with the Infant in her arms.
4. St. Jerome in the Desert, with a book in one hand, and a stone in the other.
5. St. Sebastian tied to a tree.
6. A Death's Head seen in front, in a niche, with the inscription, Mundanæ foelicitatis gloria.
7. Thisbe and the dead body of Pyramus, with an inscription, Quid Venus in venis possit, &c.
8. Orpheus charming the Brutes: inscription, Orpheus vates.
9. Alcon, a famous Archer of Crete, delivering his Son from a monstrous Serpent.
10. A Warrior on horseback, armed cap-à-pie, accompanied by a Halberdier on foot.

For other marks by this master, see Brulliot, Dict. des Monogrammes, Part II. No. 2873.]

PILLEMENT, JOHN. This artist was a native of France, and resided some time in London, about the year 1760. He painted a few pictures of landscapes and fancy subjects, which were composed and coloured in a theatrical, gaudy style; but his chief employment was in making drawings of similar subjects, which were finished with great neatness and labour. Several of his designs have been engraved by Canot and Ravenet. He etched himself a few plates of flowers, &c. [Pillement's works are chiefly in water or body colours; the subjects are well known by the numerous engravings that have been made of them, a proof that they were popular in his time. Some of them had the honour of being done by Woollet, Mason, Elliot, and other eminent engravers. He was very industrious, and lived to a great age. It is said that he died at Lyons in 1808, at the age of 80; but some say a year or two later, at the age of 90.]

PILOTTO, GIROLAMO. This artist was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1590. He was a scholar of the younger Palma, and, according to Zanotti, a faithful follower of his style. One of his admired performances is a picture of S. Biagio, at the great altar of the Fraglia at Rovigo; but his most celebrated work is a large picture in the grand saloon in the ducal palace at Venice, representing the Ceremony of the Marriage of the Adriatic by the Doge. [Zani places his death in 1649.]

PILSEN, FRANCIS. This artist was born at Ghent in 1676. He studied painting and engraving under Robert van Andenaerde. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

- The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Rubens.
- The Conversion of St. Bavon; after the same.
- The Judgment of Midas; after the same.
- The Martyrdom of St. Blaize; after G. de Crayer.

[He was living in 1744. There is a print, not mentioned by Nagler, of St. Francis after Rubens, inscribed F. Pilsen, Sculp. G. 1770. (Lloyd.)

PINAS, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem, according to Descamps, in 1597. It is not known under whom he learned the rudiments of the art, but he travelled to Italy, in company with Peter Lastman, where he studied some years. On his return to Holland, he distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits. Of his historical productions, one of the most esteemed was a picture in the great church at Haerlem, of Joseph and his Brethren, which is spoken of as a work of considerable merit. [Nagler says that Jan Pinas was born in 1570; this would make him eleven years older than Peter Lastman, and the date in the text would make him his junior by sixteen years. Rembrandt was the scholar of Peter Lastman, and, it is said, imitated the style of Pinas. In 1623 a landscape with the story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, by Jan Pinas, was engraved by Magdalen Passe, a proof that he was then eminent. It must be confessed, however, that there is much uncertainty respecting the birth of both Jan and Jacob, as they are frequently confounded with each other.]

PINAS, JACOB, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Haerlem about the year 1601. He was instructed in the art by his brother, whose style he imitated, but never rose above mediocrity. [See preceding note.]

PINCHARD, P. This artist is said by Mr. Strutt to have resided at Genoa, about the year 1687, where he engraved several book plates.

PINE, JOHN. To this gentleman, who was a native of England, and a man of letters, we are indebted for several splendid and interesting works, for which he engraved many of the plates. The principal of them are the ceremonies used at the revival of the order of the Bath, by King George I.; the prints from the tapestry in the House of Lords, representing the Destruction of the Spanish Armada; a superb edition of Horace, the text engraved, and illustrated with ancient bas-reliefs and gems. The Pastorals and Georgics of Virgil were published by his son, after his death, ornamented in a similar manner, with a printed type. Mr. Pine also engraved a few portraits, among which are an etching of himself, and a mezzotinto bust of Mr. Garrick, taken from a cast. He died in 1756.

PINE, ROBERT EDGE. This artist was born in London about the year 1742. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he gained the premium for the best historic design, given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., in 1760, and again in 1762. He afterwards practised as a portrait painter, and was considered a respectable colourist. In 1782 he exhibited a series of pictures of scenes from Shakspeare. He afterwards went to America, where he died in 1790. [Nagler says he was born in 1730, and died in 1795. His principal works are subjects from Shakspeare, and theatrical portraits, which have been engraved by M^r. Ardell, V. Green, C. Watson, Aliamet, Lomax, and Dickinson.]

PINEDA, ANTONIO PEREZ DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville about the year 1640. He was a scholar of Murillo, whose style he followed with considerable success. There are several of his works in the churches and convents at Seville, which bear testimony of his being an able disciple of that distinguished artist. [This should be Francisco Perez de Pineda: Antonio lived about 100 years previously. The one flourished in 1564, the other in 1673.]

PINELLI, ANTONIA. According to Malvasia, this lady was a native of Bologna, and was instructed in the art by Lodovico Caracci. She painted some pictures for the churches; among others, the Guardian Angel, in S. Tommaso; and St. Philip and St. James, in the church dedicated to those saints. But her most celebrated performance is her picture of St. John the Evangelist, in the Annunziata, painted from a design of Lodovico Caracci. She died in 1640. [She was called Antonia Bertucci-Pinelli. Her maiden name was Pinelli, but she married Giambatista Bertucci. Zani places her death, and that of her husband, in 1644.]

[PINELLI, BARTOLOMEO, an eminent Italian painter and etcher of recent times, who resided chiefly at Rome, and whose etchings of Roman history, and Italian manners and costumes, are very generally known. His etchings of these subjects, and of views of the environs of Rome, with groups of banditti, amount to more than two hundred. He also engraved after other artists. His drawings in chalk and in water-colours are much esteemed for the very spirited style of their execution. His etchings are bold and free, and there is great vivacity in his figures, though in some respects they resemble the ancient bassi rilievi. The works by which he is best known to foreigners are, Istoria degli Imperatori inventata ed incisa in cento rami; Raccolta di Costumi pittoreschi; Nuova Raccolta di cinquanta Costumi pittoreschi; Istoria Greca, with 100 etchings; Istoria Romana, 152 etchings; Illustrations to Virgil, Dante, and Tasso; and some others, of which the plates were brought to England, and printed here. He also engraved the frescoes painted by Pintu-ricchio in the dome of St. Maria Maggiore; the illustrations of the Life and Miracles of St. Francis di Paula, after Marco da Fuenza and others; the friezes by Giulio Romano in the Farnesina; Picturesque Views of Tivoli, &c. He died at Rome in 1835.

PINO, MARCO DA, [or MARCO DA SIENA,] was born at Siena about the year 1520, and, according to Baglione, received his earliest instruction in the school of Domenico Beccafumi, called Mecherino, and afterwards studied under Daniele da Volterra. Baldinucci places him among the disciples of Baldassare Peruzzi. It is, however, universally agreed that he studied some time at Rome, where he is stated by Lomazzo to have profited by the lessons of Michael Angelo Buonaroti. He painted some pictures for the churches at Rome, of which one of the most esteemed was a dead Christ, with the Virgin and St. John, in S. Maria di Araceli. But the theatre of his fame is Naples, where he established himself in 1560. During a residence of twenty-seven years, he decorated the principal churches with several of his finest works, which are particularly described by Dominici. Of these, the most celebrated, and which he himself esteemed his best performance, is a Deposition from the Cross, in the church of S. Giovanni di Fiorentini, painted in 1577. In the same church is a fine picture of the Annunciation. His Assumption of the Virgin, and the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Severino, are considered among the finest works of art in that city. He died in 1587.

PINSON, NICOLAS, was born at Valence, in the department of Drome, about the year 1640. He studied at Rome, where he remained a considerable time, and imitated the manner of Pietro da Cortona. Scarcely anything more of his history, or of his works, is known, except that Colemans has engraved his picture of Tobit and the Angel, which was in the collection of Boyer d'Agulles; and that he etched two prints, a dead Christ and the Assumption of the Virgin, which are both of extreme rarity. The first is marked N. P. In. f., and the second N. Pinson. Inuent. et Sculp.

PINSSIO. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a few portraits. He lived about the year 1750. [Sebastian Pinssio was born at Paris in 1721, and engraved in 1755; after which year there is no account of him.]

PINTURICCHIO, BERNARDINO. This painter was born at Perugia in 1454. He was a scholar of Pietro Perugino, whom he assisted in many of his principal works, both at Rome and Perugia. Vasari, with his usual prejudice and partiality, speaks in less favourable terms of the talents of this artist than he deserves. Though he had somewhat of the dryness of his instructor's design, and retained too much of the tawdry style of gilding in his ornaments and draperies; he is expressive in the airs of his heads, graceful in his attitudes, and magnificent in his architecture. He lived in habits of intimacy with Raffaele, when that great artist frequented the school of Perugino, who is supposed to have assisted him in his most important work, in the library of the Dome at Siena, where he has represented, in ten compartments, the most memorable events of the Life of Pope Pius II. Raffaele is supposed to have designed and prepared the cartoons for the greater part of them; and there is a grace and elegance discernible throughout which are the characteristics of that illustrious artist. In his picture of S. Lorenzo, at the Franciscans, at Spello, is a figure of the infant John Baptist, which is believed by some to have been designed by Raffaele. He excelled in perspective and grotesque ornaments, and decorated one of the loggias of the Vatican with architectural views of the principal cities of Italy. Some of his most esteemed fresco works are in the Dome at Spello, where he has represented the Annunciation, the Nativity, and Christ disputing with the Doctors. This artist was remarkable for his avarice, and his death is said to have been occasioned by a very whimsical circumstance. He was employed to paint an altar-piece for the church of the Franciscans at Siena, and was accommodated by the monks with an apartment to paint in, from which they had, for his better accommodation, removed every thing except an old chest, which appeared to be in so fragile a state that it was not judged safe to displace it. The painter, who was not less remarkable for peevishness than cupidity, insisted on its being taken away, and on their endeavouring to move the box, it fell to pieces, when a discovery was made of several hundred pieces of gold, which had been long concealed in it, unknown to any person. His chagrin and disappointment at not being himself the finder of the treasure, so strongly affected him, that he only survived the accident a few months. He died in 1513.

[The kindness of Pinturicchio to Raphael, and the discernment which he evinced in selecting so young an artist to be his coadjutor in painting the memorable events in the life of Pius II. in the library of the Duomo at Siena, has operated most injuriously to his reputation. Most writers, from Vasari to the present time, have ascribed all that is excellent in his works to the hand, or the mind, of his highly gifted and cherished friend. If Raphael did not altogether paint the pictures, he made the designs; if they are compelled to allow Pinturicchio a large share in the execution, they select the most graceful figures and attribute them to Raphael; nay, in pictures on which they were not jointly engaged, if the drawing, or expression, be a refinement on the manner of Perugino's school, then it must be by Raphael and not by Pinturicchio. Pinturicchio was Raphael's senior by thirty years, and if he had not acquired a great reputation, would not have been selected by Cardinal Piccolomini to execute so great a work as that of the illustrations of the Life of his uncle Pius II. It would argue great modesty and self-denial on his part to devolve on another, who might be considered his pupil, the honourable task of making the designs; and a rare instance of artistic condescension, to allow a young assistant to make alterations in the drawing of the figures by his principal. Not only have writers detracted from Pinturicchio's merit as an artist, but they have vilified his moral character by accusing him of being remarkably avaricious. The tale of the old chest is very amusing, though the result of the discovery is said to have been so serious to Pinturicchio; but he is not the only one to whom it has been applied. He was called Il Sordicchio, (perchè era piccolo e tondo,) because he was little and corpulent; in familiar language, a little punchy man. This has, probably, been mistaken for Sordido, and he has been stigmatized as being very avaricious. The charge, however it may have originated, is not supported by any writer of credit. With regard to the time of his death, it may be observed that Zani says he operated in 1527.]

PINZ, [or PINTZ,] JOHN GEORGE. This artist is supposed by Mr. Strutt to have been a native of Germany. He is said to have been chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved several prints, in the style of those which ornament the numerous publications of Vander Aa. He engraved, among others, an emblematical print, in honour of the King of France, after P. Decker. [He was an engraver of Augsburg, and died in 1767, at the age of 70. The emblematical print after P. Decker is entitled Gallus und Germanus.]

PIO, GIOVANNI. See BONATTI.

PIOLA, PELLEGRINO, was born at Genoa in 1617. It is not said under whom he studied; but, although the world was deprived of his talents at the premature age of 23, as Lanzi informs us, by the villany of some one jealous of his extraordinary genius; a Madonna, painted by him, which was in the collection of the Marchese Brignole, was judged by Franceschini to have been painted by Andrea del Sarto; and his picture of S. Elogio, in one of the churches of Genoa, was mistaken by Mengs for a work of Lodovico Caracci. He aspired, however, to a higher flight than that of an imitator, and would have reached a transcendent rank among the ablest artists, if he had been permitted a longer career. He died in 1640.

PIOLA, DOMENICO, was the younger brother of Pellegrino Piola, born at Genoa in 1628, and received his first education in the art from his brother. After the death of his instructor he became a scholar of Giovanni Domenico Capellini. In conjunction with Valerio Castelli, he executed some works for the public edifices in Genoa and the state, and for some time attached himself to the style of that painter. His ideas, for the most part, are not without beauty, though he is not very successful in the conduct of the chiaro-scuro, and the character of his design is occasionally heavy and inelegant. He emulated the style of P. da Cortona, in the lustre of his colouring, in the splendour of his compositions, and his uncommon facility. He was particularly happy in the representation of children, which he designed from the casts of Fiammingo. One of his most esteemed works is the Miracle of St. Peter at the gate of the Temple, at Carignano, which is not degraded by its vicinity to an admirable picture by Guercino. He died in 1703. [Bartsch says that he etched sometimes in the manner of Castiglione, sometimes of Biscaino; and that his design showed more taste than firmness. He describes five of his etchings; two Nativities; the Virgin on a throne with the infant Jesus on her knees, and St. John kneeling; Paris holding the Apple; and an old Man with a long beard. Others have been attributed to him, but Bartsch assigns them to Domenico Peruzzini. See P. G. tom. xxi. Nagler mentions another, St. Anthony of Padua, which has the date 1640, when D. Piola was only twelve years old.]

PIOMBO, FRÁ, SEBASTIANO DEL. This distinguished artist is called by Vasari, Sebastiano Veneziano, by which name he was designated, until the Pope bestowed upon him the office of the keeper of the seal of his chancery, to fill which it was necessary for him to take the religious habit, and he assumed the title of Frá Sebastiano del Piombo. He was born at Venice in 1485, where his first occupation was the study of music. He afterwards turned his thoughts to painting, and at first was a disciple of Giovanni Bellini, who was then far advanced in years; but preferring the great style of Giorgione, he became his scholar, and was the most successful imitator of the harmony of his tones, and the breadth of his chiaro-scuro. He first distinguished himself as a portrait painter, to which his powers were peculiarly adapted. His portraits are boldly designed and full of character; the heads and hands are admirably drawn, with an exquisite tone of colouring, and extraordinary relief. The first historical picture which established his reputation was the altar-piece in the church of S. Gio. Crisostomo, at Venice, in which he so nearly approached the rich and harmonious colouring of Giorgione, that it was for some time supposed to be the work of that master. He had acquired considerable celebrity at Venice, when he was invited to Rome by Agostino Chigi, who employed him in ornamenting his palace of the Farnesina, in conjunction with Baldassare Peruzzi, and where Raffaele had painted his celebrated Galatea, and given the designs for the history of Cupid and Psyche. In this competition Sebastiano discovered his inferiority in design, and endeavoured to remedy the defect by studying the antique, and by the instruction of Michael Angelo Buonaroti. That great artist had felt some uneasiness at the growing fame of Raffaele, and he readily availed himself of the powers of Sebastiano as a colourist, in the hope, that, assisted by his designs, he might be enabled to enter the lists with his illustrious antagonist, if not drive him from the field. With this view, he furnished him with the designs for the Pietà, in the church of the Conventuali, at Viterbo; and the Transfiguration and Flagellation in S. Pietro, in Montorio, at Rome, which, as he was very tedious in his process, occupied him six years. The extraordinary beauty of the colouring, and the grandeur of M. Angelo's composition and design, in these celebrated productions, were the objects of universal surprise and applause. It was at this juncture that the Cardinal Giulio de Medici commissioned Raffaele to paint his immortal picture of the Transfiguration, and being desirous of presenting an altar-piece to the cathedral of Narbonne, of which he was Archbishop, he engaged Sebastiano del Piombo to paint a picture of the same dimensions, selecting for the subject the Raising of Lazarus. On this occasion, he was again assisted by the powers of Buonaroti, by whom it was composed and designed. The picture was publicly exhibited at Rome, in competition with the Transfiguration; and it is no mean proof of its extraordinary merit, that, notwithstanding the transcendent beauty of Raffaele's chef d'œuvre, Sebastiano's performance excited universal admiration. This celebrated work of art was removed, by the Regent of France, from the cathedral at Narbonne, into the Orleans' collection, of which it was one of the most important ornaments. After the death of Raffaele, he was reputed the most distinguished artist at Rome. He was particularly favoured by Clement VII., who remunerated his services by appointing him to a lucrative benefice, which occasioned him, in the latter part of his life, to relax in his labours as a painter. His last undertaking was the chapel of the Chigi family, in S. Maria del Popolo, which he left imperfect, and it was afterwards finished by Francisco Salviati. He died in 1547. [His name originally was Sebastiano Luciano; but on his appointment to be keeper of the Chancery Seal, which was of lead, he assumed del Piombo in lieu of Luciano. The picture of the Raising of Lazarus is in the English National Gallery; as also his own portrait, holding the seal of his office, with that of the Cardinal Ippolito de' Medici; and another of Giulia Gonzaga. There are, however, some doubts expressed by writers respecting both.]

PIORT, V., an obscure artist, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a plate from Rubens, representing an old woman holding a pot with fire, from which a boy is taking a lighted coal.

PIPER, FRANCIS LE, was the son of a Kentish gentleman of Flemish extraction, and was born about the year 1740. His father, who was in possession of a considerable estate, gave him a liberal education, intending him for a merchant, but his inclination leading him entirely to drawing, he rambled over great part of Europe to study painting. He was of a gay and facetious turn of mind, and the subjects he treated were usually humorous and comical, and were chiefly painted in black and white. Most of his performances were produced over a bottle, and the theatre of his exertions was the Mitre Tavern, at Stock's Market, or the Bell, in Westminster, which were adorned by the productions of this jovial artist. He drew landscapes, which he etched on silver plates for the tobacco-boxes of his friends. Towards the latter part of his life his circumstances were sufficiently reduced to make it necessary for him to think of turning his talents to some account. Becket employed him to design his mezzotints, and he drew several of the heads of the Grand Signiors, for Sir Paul Rycaut's History of the Turks. On the death of his mother, his fortune being re-established, he launched again into a course of pleasure, contracted a fever, and being bled by an ignorant surgeon, who pricked an artery, he died in 1698.

PIPPI, GIULIO. See ROMANO.

[PIRANESI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a very eminent designer and engraver of ancient architecture and other monuments of antiquity. According to Gandellini and Milizia, he was born at Venice in 1707, but Zani says it was in 1713, and that he died in 1778. On his monument, however, is inscribed, that he was born in 1721, and died in 1779. Others say that he was born at Rome, and died there. Gandellini and Milizia state that he first studied drawing and architecture at Venice, and afterwards went to Rome, where he received instructions in engraving from Giuseppe Vasi, a Sicilian. All writers concur in describing G. B. Piranesi as one of the best designers and engravers of architectural subjects and ancient ruins, and the most picturesque in his arrangements and combinations, of the artists of his time. He had many imitators, but none arrived at that degree of skill which would entitle them to be called his rivals. He has been charged, and perhaps justly, with sometimes substituting, in the restorations of ancient edifices, the conceptions of his ardent imagination in lieu of the original form of construction. His admirers, however, dispute the justice of the charge, so far as it implies a censure, and think that it would be difficult to disprove the accuracy of the restorations, as the buildings had been so many centuries in a state of dilapidation. They maintain that if he has not altogether revived the primitive forms, he has exhibited the same genius, taste, and magnificence, as the original designers; and that in his works of imagination it is difficult whether to admire most the fecundity and spirit of the composition, or the arduous and brilliancy of the execution. His skill in congregating objects from different localities, and arranging them for picturesque effect, is admirable; and the force and vigour which he gave to the most important, by the scientific distribution of light and shade, obtained for him the designation of The Rembrandt of Architecture. Of his multifarious works it is difficult to speak without going into a lengthened critical detail; they fill upwards of twenty folio volumes, mostly published during his life, but several subsequently by his son, Francesco Piranesi, who had an establishment at Rome for the express purpose.

The following list of his works is taken from Mr. Henry Bohn's Catalogue, where the inquirer will find a detailed account of what should constitute a complete set of the Roman editions.

Antichità Romano, 4 vols. 1756.

Antiquités de la Grande Grèce, gravées par Fr. Piranesi d'après les Dessins du feu J. B. Piranesi. (Paris, 1804.) 1807.

There are differences to be found in some of the titles, or frontispieces, to copies of his Antichità Romane, arising from a disagreement that occurred between Piranesi and Lord Charlemont. The arms of that nobleman had been engraved on the frontispieces, but were cancelled after only a few copies were issued; and in a small quarto work, not published, but circulated among his friends, he assigns his reasons for this proceeding, and for not dedicating his work, as originally intended. He appears to have been extremely irritated against his lordship and his agents for neglect and ill treatment; but the most curious part of the work is, that he has taken the pains to etch, in a small quarto size, and with the utmost neatness, yet with all his accustomed freedom, exact copies of the four original frontispieces, in which the name of his intended patron was to have been immortalized; also views of the inscriptions as they now stand, as if the first inscriptions had been cut out of the stones, and the new ones inserted on small pieces let into them, as the ancients sometimes practised. In this form they still remain in his frontispieces; a peculiarity which would not be understood without this explanation. There are also head and tail pieces, all full of imagination, and alluding to the matters and persons involved in the dispute. This work is dated 1757. By inspection of his works it will be seen that many of them, even in single plates, are inscribed to persons of the English nobility and gentry, at the time residents or visitors at Rome, from whom, no doubt, it was customary to receive some substantial acknowledgment for the honour conferred: it seems that his lordship would have been highly flattered by the dedication of the whole of the magnificent work, Antichità Romane, but demurred to the accustomed reward, either by pecuniary assistance in the publication, or by subscribing for a certain number of copies to lighten the artist's expenses. Whether Piranesi's estimate of the honour was too high, or Lord Charlemont's of the work too low, must be left to the impartial judgment of those who may be acquainted with the circumstances. His son, Francesco Piranesi, who engraved in the same manner as his father, and whose works have so strong a resemblance to his that it is difficult to distinguish them, was sent in 1798 to Paris, as minister for the Roman republic; and when the French were compelled to evacuate Italy, he was solicited to establish himself in Paris, under the especial protection of Napoleon. Thither he transported his father's plates, which constituted the whole of his property, and published there a complete edition in 30 vols., comprising nearly 2000 subjects. But in this edition the letter-press is omitted. He died at Paris in 1810. After his death the plates passed into the possession of the eminent printers, Didot, freres, but they have since been sold to the Roman government, and are now deposited in the Vatican. G. B. Piranesi was an honorary member of the Society of Antiquaries, in London, a distinction of which he seems to have been proud, as he always carefully added that title to his name. He was also a member of the Academy of the Arcadi, by the name of Salvadio Tiseio, as he has given it in one of his frontispieces, according to the fantastic custom of that Society of giving new names to the persons admitted. All who knew him agree that he was of a fiery and impetuous temper, but full of genius. As a practical architect it is only stated that he was employed to repair and ornament, at the particular desire of Clement XIII., (who was so well pleased with his labours that he made him a Cavaliere,) the Santa Maria del Popolo, and the priory of Malta, at Rome; in the latter of which his son erected a statue to his memory, which was executed by Angolini. His portrait, engraved by Polanzani, in 1750, in the style of a mutilated statue, is prefixed to some of his works.]

PIRANESI, FRANCESCO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Rome in 1748, and was instructed in design and architecture by his father. We have by him several plates of architectural views, and also of antique statues, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Gio. Marco Pitteri. Among others, are the following by him:

Jupiter seated; from the statue in the Clementine Gallery; after a drawing by Piroli.
The Venus of Medicis; after the same.
Cupid and Psyche; from the Antique Sculpture in the gallery of the Capitol.
Papirius and his Mother; from the group in the Villa Ludovisi.

PIRANESI, LAURA. This lady was the daughter of Giovanni Batista Piranesi, born at Rome in 1750. She has engraved some views of the remarkable buildings in Rome, which are executed with taste and delicacy. We have, among others, the following views by her:

The Capitol.
The Ponte Salario.
The Temple of Peace.
The Arch of Septimus Severus.

[She carried on business with her brother at Rome, and her etchings are said to bear a strong resemblance to those of her father. She probably retired to Paris with her brother. There is no account of her death.]

[PIRINGÈR, BENEDIKT, a designer and engraver, born at Vienna in 1780, and died at Paris, where he had resided for some time, in 1826. He worked in aquatint, and with the graver, and his productions are chiefly landscapes, romantic scenery, and views of cities, after old and modern masters, some of which were published collectively. His pieces are rather numerous, but not sufficiently interesting to give a detailed account of them. A list of 180 may be found in Nagler.]

PIRINI, LOUIS DES, a French engraver, by whom we have a plate, representing two Men playing at Cards, and a Woman holding a Mirror behind one of them, to discover his hand to the other; after Cornelius van Tienen. It is executed with the graver in a coarse, tasteless style.

PIRNRAUM, ALEXIS. According to Papillon, this artist was an engraver on wood, and resided at Basle about the year 1545, of which city he was probably a native. That author supposes him to have been a disciple of Hans Holbein. He does not, however, specify any of his works. [Nagler is of opinion that this is the same as Adam Petri, a bookseller of Basle; but Zani, who calls him Pirnbaum, describes him as an engraver on wood, and marks him B. B. (bravissimo).

[PIROLI, TOMMASO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Rome in 1750, was a pupil of G. B. Piranesi. His prints are numerous, etched in outline and in the chalk manner. The following are considered as the most interesting: The Prophets and Sibyls of Michael Angelo in the Cappella Sistina; a copy of Metz's prints of the Last Judgment, in the same chapel; the story of Cupid and Psyche, from the frescoes of Raphael in the Farnesina; Massacio's frescoes in the Brancacci chapel at Florence; and the outlines for the original editions of Flaxman's designs illustrative of Homer, Hesiod, Æschylus, and Dante, published at Rome. There are also several sets of engravings, from remains of ancient art, by Piroli, part of which were published at Rome and at Paris by Francesco and Pietro Piranesi, sons of the celebrated Giambattista. Piroli died in 1824.]

PISANELLI. See SPISANO.

PISANELLO, VITTORE. This painter was a native of St. Vito, in the Veronese territory. As to the precise time of his birth, the biographers of the artists are at unusual variance. Vasari makes him a scholar of Castagno, and dates his death about the year 1480. Dal Pozzo, in his Vite de' pittori Veronesi, on the contrary, asserts that he possessed a picture by Vittore, signed with his name, and dated 1406, before Castagno was born. Whoever was his instructor, the partiality of his admirers has placed him on an equality with Masaccio, in the merit of having contributed to the improvement and advancement of the art. The greater part of his works have perished, and his picture of the Annunciation, in the church of S. Fermo, at Verona, is greatly injured by time. In the sacristy of S. Francesco, at Perugia, are preserved some small pictures of the Life of S. Bernardino, very highly finished, but crude in the colouring, and the figures stiffly designed, and too long.

[Pisanello, or Pisano da S. Vito, operated from 1406 to 1447, as is shown by Zani, who quotes several dates. Kugler says he painted in the Lateran at Rome with Gentile da Fabriano. His figures have a certain slender grace which gives them some resemblance to Gentile's. Many of his works are preserved at Verona; an Annunciation in S. Fermo is ascribed to him, as well as a picture in the gallery of the Council-hall, a Madonna sitting in a flower garden with angels and saints, both of them graceful, pleasing works. Examples of a similar kind are to be seen at Milan and in other places.]

PISTOJA, LEONARDO DA, was a native of Pistoja, and was a scholar of Giovanni Francesco Penni, a distinguished disciple of Raffaello. His family name appears to have been Grazia, from an inscription on a picture of the Annunciation, by him, in a chapel of the Canons at Lucca, Leonardus Gratia Pistoriensis. He painted history and portraits with considerable reputation, but particularly excelled in the latter. His works are chiefly at Rome, Naples, and Lucca. [According to Zani he flourished from 1516 to 1640; but there is a doubt whether there were not two painters of the same name who lived about the same time. Lanzi says the picture at Volterra, dated 1516, was not by Grazia of Naples, since his master, Penni, was in that year still the scholar and assistant of Raphael; nor does it seem probable that he educated a pupil of so much merit. The Leonardo, therefore, who painted at Volterra, must have been some other of more proficiency.]

PISTOJESE, FRÀ PAOLI. This painter was born at Pistoja, and flourished about the year 1520. He was the favourite scholar of Frà Bartolomeo di S. Marco, who bequeathed him the greater part of his designs, and engaged him to finish the works which were left incomplete at his death. He also painted several pictures for the church of S. Domenico at Pistoja, from the designs of Frà Bartolomeo, as well as other works of his own composition.

PITAU, NICHOLAS. This eminent engraver was born at Antwerp in 1633, and is supposed to have been a disciple of Francis de Poilly, at Paris, whose style he followed, though more vigorous and spirited in his execution. His print of the Holy Family, after Raffaello, is distinguished by the beauty of the handling, the purity of the drawing, and the harmony of the effect. He engraved a variety of historical subjects after different masters, and a considerable number of portraits, which are deservedly esteemed. The following are considered to be his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Louis Henry, Duke de Bourbon, supported by Wisdom and Religion.
 Oliver Cromwell; after Vander Werf. [N. Pitau, the younger; but query after Vander Werf?]
 Pope Alexander VII.; after Mignard.
 Louis XIV., King of France; after Le Fevre. 1670.
 Louis, Dauphin, his son; after the same.
 James Fabier du Bulay, Master of Requests; after Champagne.
 H. L. H. de Montmort, of the French Academy; after the same.
 Theodore Bignon, Master of Requests; after the same.
 Peter Seguier, Chancellor of France. 1668.
 Alexander Paul Pitau, Advocate in Parliament.

Gaspar de Fieubet, Chancellor. 1662.
 Nicholas Colbert; after Le Fevre.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after Raffaello; very fine.
 The Entombing of Christ; after L. Caracci.
 The Virgin holding the infant Jesus in her arms and reading; after Guercino.
 The Dead Christ, with Angels weeping over him; after the same.
 The Virgin interceding for St. Bruno and his order; after Champagne.
 Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after the same.
 Mary Magdalene, penitent; after the same.
 St. Sulpius in Council; after the same.
 The Holy Family, with the infant Jesus embracing St. John; after the same.
 The Holy Family, with an Angel presenting a Basket of Flowers; after Villeguin.

[According to Watelet and Zani, N. Pitau the elder died in 1676; but Nagler, who gives a list of his engravings, says in 1696. The latest date in his list is 1677; it would be an extraordinary circumstance that an artist of such eminence should cease the exercise of his talent in the very prime of his life, and twenty years before his death. The most admired of his prints will be found among those quoted. In some of his portraits he approaches closely to the manner of Masson and Nanteuil, as is evident in that of A. P. Pitau.]

PITAU, NICHOLAS, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, by whom we have a few plates of portraits, among which is that of,

Louis Alexander de Bourbon, Count de Toulouse; inscribed Cobert, pinx. 1701. N. Pitau, Junior.
 [Oliver Cromwell, but query, after Vander Werf? and others enumerated by Nagler.]

PITTERI, GIOVANNI MARCO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Venice in 1703. He was a pupil of Gio. Antonio Faldoni, but he did not adopt the style of his instructor. His plates are executed in a very singular manner, by single strokes, but very different from the method practised by Mellan. His strokes run from the top to the bottom, and his shadows are produced by strengthening them as the occasion requires. The effect he produced by this whimsical operation is neither unpleasing nor unharmonious, and his prints possess considerable merit. He engraved several plates for the collection of the Dresden Gallery, and others, after various masters; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The Bust of Giovanni Marco Pitteri; after Piazzetta.
 Giovanni Batista Piazzetta, Painter, of Venice; after the same.
 Carlo Goldoni, comic Poet; after the same.
 Nogari Giuseppe, Painter; after the same.
 Giovanni Mocenigo, noble Venetian; after the same.
 Count Schulenburg, Field Marshal of Venice; after Rusca.
 Cardinal Quirini.
 Marquis Scipione Maffei.
 Clara Isabella Fornari.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Pietro Longhi.
 The Seven Sacraments; after the same.
 The Crucifixion; after Piazzetta.
 The Twelve Apostles; after the same.
 Religion overthrowing Heresy; after the same.
 St. Peter delivered from Prison; after Spagnoletto.
 The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew; after the same.
 St. Catherine of Siena; after Trepolo.
 Mary Magdalene, penitent; after the same.
 A set of six Plates of Huntings, in the environs of Venice; after Pietro Longhi.
 Twelfth-Night; after Teniers.
 Two Rustic Subjects; after the same.

[He died about 1786. Nagler has enumerated 52 pieces by him, some of which are in the Dresden and Florentine Galleries.]

[PITTONI, BATTISTA, a painter and engraver, born at Vicenza, it is supposed by some, in 1508, and was living in 1585. His engravings consist of landscapes with ancient ruins, fabulous subjects, and arabesques. Some of them bear date from 1561 to 1585. A work in the possession of the late collector Mr. Lloyd, was entitled Imagini favolosi, &c., intagliati in Rami da M. (Messer) Battista Pittoni. In Venetia presso Fran. Ziletti, 1585. Nagler, who says he was born in 1520, which seems more probable, has given an account of seven other works by the master. Of his paintings there is no record.]

PITTONI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA. This painter was born at Vicenza in 1690, and received his first instructions in the art from his uncle Francesco Pittoni; but his greatest improvement was derived from an attentive study of the works of the best masters of the Venetian school, by which he became an excellent colourist; and though his forms are not distinguished by elegance, his drawing is tolerably correct, and his compositions are abundant and ingenious. His figures are generally smaller than life; and he was less successful when he attempted to draw on a larger scale. Two of his finest pictures are the Martyrdom of St. Thomas, in the church of S. Eustacio, at Venice, and the Multiplication of the Loaves, in S. Cosmo della Guidecca. He died at Venice in 1767. We have a few spirited etchings by this artist, which he sometimes marked with his initials, and sometimes inscribed them Johannes Baptista Pitonus Vicentinum, fecit. [Nagler mentions but two etchings by him; Gio. Nep. Canonico de Praga, and a St. John. Others attributed to him are, perhaps, by Batista Pittoni, who lived 100 years earlier.]

[PIZZARO, ANTONIO, a Spanish historical painter, was a scholar of el Greco, and resided at Toledo at the commencement of the 17th century. He was an excellent designer, and a good colourist, and produced several works of merit. He painted the pictures of the foundation of the order of los Trinitarios for their convent; the pictures in the churches of St. Justo and Pastor; and the Nativity of the Virgin in the church of Santa Maria, in the city of Cassarubios. He also invented and designed the three subjects engraved by Alardo Pompo for the Life of St. Ildefonso by Salazar de Mendoza, published in 1618. Neither the time of his birth, nor of his death, is recorded.]

PLAAS, DAVID VANDER. This eminent portrait painter was born at Amsterdam in 1647. After learning the principles of design in his native country, he travelled to Italy, and resided some years at Venice, where the works of Titian were particularly the objects of his attention, especially his portraits, the most perfect models for the study of an artist who pursues that branch. On his return to Holland he was very extensively employed, and painted many of the distinguished personages of his time, among which was a fine picture of Vice-Admiral Tromp. His heads and hands are admirably drawn, full of truth and nature, and his colouring partakes of the vigour of Rembrandt and the truth of Titian. He was employed by Peter Martin to superintend the plates for his Bible. He died at Amsterdam in 1704.

PLACE, FRANCIS. This gentleman was the younger son of Roland Place, of Dimsdale, in the county of Durham. His father, intending him for the profession of the law, placed him as a clerk to a solicitor in London, under whom he continued until the year 1665, when he was obliged to quit the metropolis, on account of the plague, which gave him an opportunity of abandoning a pursuit which was never agreeable to his inclination, and of indulging his propensity for drawing, for which he had shown an early disposition. He painted, designed, etched, and engraved in mezzotint; but as he practised the art for his amusement, his works are very scarce. They prove him to have been a man of genius, and it is regretted that his application was not equal to his abilities. He is said to have refused a pension of five hundred pounds a year, which was offered him in the reign of Charles II., to draw the royal navy, as he could not endure confinement or dependence. Mr. Place died in 1728, and his widow disposed of his paintings, among which were an admired piece of fowls, others of flowers and fish, and some unfinished pictures. The following are the principal plates he engraved, all of which are scarce:

PORTRAITS.

Charles I.; after Vanduyck.

Charles II.

General Lambert.

Richard Sterne, Archhishop of York.

Nathaniel Crewe, Bishop of Durham; after Kneller; fine.

Richard Tompson, Engraver; after Zoust.

Philip Woolrich, Esq., in armour; after Greenhill.

Thomas Comber, Dean of Durham; after the same.

John Moyzer, Esq., of Beverley; after Kneller.

Henry Gyles, Glass-painter. 1687; oval.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Seven etchings, being part of a set of twelve of Birds; after Barlow; the other five were by Griffiere; very fine.

A View of Tynemouth Castle and the Light-house.

The Cathedral of York.

A Prospect of Leeds.

PLACES, LOUIS DES. See DESPLACES.

[PLANO, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, who was born at Daroca, and resided at Saragossa towards the end of the 17th century. He had a great reputation as a painter and architect, and for ornamental works. Palomino equals him with Colona and Mitelli; the works which he performed in the sanctuary of nuestra señora del Portillo, at Saragossa, and other churches, would seem to justify the assertion. He painted history and portraits; and the grand altar-piece at the parochial church of Santiago, representing the battle of Clavijo, is by him.]

PLAS, PETER VANDER. According to M. Descamps, this painter was a native of Holland, born about the year 1570. He resided many years at Brussels, where he was reputed an eminent painter of history. Several of his works are in the public places in that city, where he died, [in 1626, according to Balkema.]

[PLASSARD, VINCENT, a French engraver of the 17th century, of whom there are no particulars, and only one print known: it represents the Holy Family, the Virgin seated near the remains of a monument with the Infant, on one side of her a basket of flowers, towards which she is looking, and on the other side an ewer. The landscape is mountainous, with trees and a river, and at the back a city. It is signed V. Plassard in. et fe. 1650.]

PLATTENBERG, or PLATTEN, MATTHEW VAN. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1600. Having acquired the first rudiments of the art in his native city, he went to Italy, and resided some time at Florence, where, in conjunction with his countryman, John Asselyn, called Crabetje, he painted several sea-pieces and landscapes, which were greatly admired. He afterwards visited Paris, where his works were not less esteemed, and he met with sufficient encouragement to induce him to settle there for some time. From a singular caprice, he Frenchified his name of Plattenberg into that of Platte Montagne, with which he sometimes signed his pictures and prints, and sometimes Montagne only. His landscapes are highly finished, and exhibit very pleasing scenery. We have a few etchings by this artist, executed in a very spirited style. They represent landscapes and marines, and resemble the works of Fouquieres. They are usually inscribed M. Montagne, in. et f. [His name was Michel, not Matthieu. Dumesnil has described 29 prints by him, the greater part of which are signed M. Montagne; only N^o. 27 has the name Matthieu, which seems to have escaped the correction that appears to have been made on four others by the erasure of all the letters but M. None of his prints, as described by Dumesnil, are signed Platte Montagne. He was the brother-in-law of Jean Morin, and the larger number have the inscription Montagne fecit, Morin ex. cum privil. Re. He died in 1660. See Dumesnil, tom. v. Le Peintre-Graveur Français.]

PLATTENBERG, NICHOLAS VAN, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1631, and studied painting under Philip de Champagne. He was instructed in engraving by John Morin, whom he surpassed. His principal works, as a painter, are in the churches of Notre Dame, St. Sacrament, and St. Nicholas des Champs, at Paris. He was also a reputable portrait painter. In 1681 he became a member of the Academy. As an engraver, he is entitled to great praise; his drawing is correct, and his execution is bold and free. He engraved several portraits, which are generally inscribed Nicholas de Platte Montagne. Among other prints, we have the following by him:

The Portrait of Olivier de Castellan, general, killed at the siege of Tarragona in 1644.

St. Genevieve; after P. de Champagne.

A dead Christ; after the same; very fine.

[The Sudarium; The penitent Magdalene; both after the same, and very fine.]

He died at Paris in 1706. [See Dumesnil, tom. v. for a description of 28 prints by him.]

[PLATZER, or PLAZER, a German painter of small historical pictures in a peculiar style. His compositions abound with figures in theatrical action; and in the representation of the story he frequently violates chronology and national costume. His penciling, in his best pictures, is very beautiful, and the ensemble attractive; but the observer must divest himself of the disposition to be critical, for his works must not be judged by the same laws as those that governed the great masters of the Dutch and Italian schools. His colours are gorgeous, but deficient of harmony; there is no gradation, all are prominent from inattention to chiaro-scuro. He is eminent as a painter for the boudoir, and maintains his rank among Sevres and Dresden porcelain. In this sense his cabinet pictures may be considered fine; and there is great competition for them when they appear in public sales. Some are to be found in very grand collections in England, but they are more numerous in Germany. As there were several Platzers who were painters, it is necessary to give an account of three, who are described as having exercised their pencils on similar subjects, to enable the inquirer to decide to which of them the above character applies; premising that Johann Georg and Johann Victor seem to be one artist under different names. The third, Joseph, lived at a later period than the apparent date of those pictures alluded to would seem to warrant. Dealers make the distinction of a good and a bad Platzer, meaning that there were two, and that one imitated but did not equal the other; the cause of this will be intimated.]

[PLATZER, or PLAZER, JOHANN GEORG. Füssli (from Hagedorn) says this painter was born at Epan, in Tyrol, in 1702, and that he studied under his step-father, Kesler, and with his uncle on the father's side, who was a painter at Passau. In 1721 he went to Vienna, and there became intimate with an artist of the name of Jannek. They adopted the same style of painting, but it did not weaken their friendship, and the public was benefited by their rivalry. Both painted small histories, and particularly festivals, which Platzer represented in such glowing colours, with a total neglect of the rules of shadowing, that they are defective in harmony. The cities of Breslau and Glogau possess many of his fine works. He returned to his native country, where he was living in 1755. Zani also notices Giovanni Giorgio Platzer, a painter of conversations, a native of Trent, born, he says, in 1702, and died in 1760. No doubt the same, though there is an error in respect to the place of his birth. There are two pictures by him in the Vienna Gallery, of conversations, in which the ladies and gentlemen are habited in Spanish costume.]

[PLATZER, or PLAZER, JOHANN VICTOR. Nagler calls him a sculptor, though it does not appear that he exercised the art, and says that he was born in Vintschgau, probably at Mals, in 1704, and was a scholar of Kessler at Inspruck, until the court-painter, Christopher Platzer, took him under his care at Passau. He afterwards established himself at Vienna, and painted small pictures, mostly with many figures, which were received with much applause both at home and abroad. His application was such that he weakened his sight, and diminished the firmness of his hand, so that in painting he was obliged to use a machine to steady the latter. The pictures he executed under these circumstances appear spotted, and are, perhaps, those that dealers call a bad Platzer; there are two such in the National Museum at Inspruck. In the year 1755 Platzer returned to the place of his nativity, and died in 1767.]

[PLATZER, or PLAZER, JOSEPH, a painter of architecture, theatrical decorations, moonlights, and small historical subjects, was the son of the celebrated sculptor Ignatius Platzer, and was born at Prague in 1752. After the completion of his scholastic studies he devoted six years to drawing, particularly in architecture, under the direction of F. Wolf. In oil painting he was his own master, and attained to such proficiency that he was noticed by Prince Kaunitz, who favoured him by his patronage. Thus encouraged he went to Vienna, where, after six years more of assiduous practice, he felt himself equal to greater works than those on which he had been employed, and hoped thereby to draw public attention to his ability. For this purpose he executed a triumphal arch thirty-six feet in height, which was erected on a holiday at St. John's hospital, and excited general admiration. In consequence of the talent shown in this work he was employed in 1781 to decorate the new theatre at Prague, and afterwards selected by the emperor Joseph II. to embellish the royal theatre at Vienna. During these operations he encountered many obstacles, and was obliged to maintain his reputation by painting in oil moonlights, historical compositions, and small theatrical designs. On the accession of Leopold II. he was appointed one of the painters to the court, and proved himself worthy of the situation; in 1790 he was made principal cabinet painter, which office he filled till his death, in 1810.]

[PLATEAU, ANTHONY, a flower and decorative painter, born at Tournai in 1759, and died in 1815. Several pictures by this artist are in the Temple of the Sun at Laken, and in the house of M. Walkiers.]

PLEGINCK, MARTIN, a German engraver on wood and on copper, who flourished about the year 1590. He engraved a set of copper-plates representing figures fighting, entitled Fechter Buchstem geducht in der fürstlichen stat onnoit bich bei Stephan Hermamburger und Goldschmidt da Selbsten. They are executed with the graver, in a style resembling that of Virgilius Solis. His wooden cuts are in the manner of Just. Amman. He used the cipher MP. See Bartsch, P. G., tom. ix. for a description of twenty-three prints by this master. They are of small size, and represent ecclesiastical orders and dignities, cavalry and foot soldiers, after J. de Gheyn, animals, and goldsmiths' work; the date 1594 is on two of them. Zani says he operated in 1606.]

PLEYDENWURFF, WILLIAM. This artist was one of the early engravers on wood. He was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1493. Conjointly with Michael Wolgemut, he executed the cuts for the Chronicle compiled by Herman Schedel, and printed at Nuremberg in 1493, entitled, the Nuremberg Chronicle. They represent views of towns, &c., and figures of various kinds, which, though drawn in the stiff and incorrect manner usual at that early period, the prints are spiritedly and boldly cut, and the heads are not without expression. [Zani says it is not proved that he executed the wood-cuts for the Nuremberg Chronicle; nor, indeed, is there any thing proved satisfactorily concerning him. See Nagler and Brulliot. Bartsch and Ottley are silent.]

PLIN, E. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1780. He engraved some plates representing conversations and domestic subjects, which are etched, and finished with the graver, in a neat, clear style.

PLONICH, VEDASTUS DU, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. Among other prints, we have a few plates by him representing views in Holland, which are neatly engraved, though stiff and formal.

PLOOS, CORNELIUS VAN AMSTEL. See AMSTEL.

PLOTT, JOHN. This artist was born at Winchester in 1732. In the early part of his life he was articulated to an attorney, but he did not long follow the profession. In 1756 he came to London, and having shown an inclination for painting, he became a pupil of Richard Wilson, the admirable landscape painter; but his genius directing him to portraiture rather than landscape, he quitted that master, and placed himself under the tuition of Nathaniel Hone. He afterwards distinguished himself as a miniature painter, both in enamel and water-colours, though he sometimes painted in oil, and met with considerable employment. He had a taste for natural history, and executed several drawings in that branch which had great merit. Towards the latter part of his life he resided at Winchester, and some years before his death was chosen a member of the corporation of that city. He died in 1803. Mr. Bromley, in his catalogue, mentions a mezzotint portrait of this artist, as scraped by himself.

PLUMIER, ———. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as a painter by whom we have some spirited etchings from his own compositions, which show him to have been a man of genius; but the naked parts of the figures are not correctly drawn.

PO, PIETRO DEL. This artist was born at Palermo in 1610, and studied under Domenichino at Naples, during that celebrated painter's residence in that city. He painted some pictures for the churches at Palermo, and afterwards visited Rome, where, among other works, he painted a picture of S. Leone, for la Madonna di Constantinopoli. He was, however, more successful in easel pictures than those of large dimensions, and is more distinguished as an engraver than a painter. We have several etchings by this artist, some of which he has finished with the graver. They are not so correctly designed as might have been expected from the school in which he was educated. Among others are the following:

St. John in the Wilderness; after An. Caracci.

The Woman of Canaan before Christ; after the same.

The Dead Christ on the Lap of the Virgin; after the same.

The Virgin seated on a Throne with the Infant, and a choir of Angels; after Domenichino.

The four Cardinal Virtues, with their attributes; after the same.

St. Jerome kneeling, with an Angel; after the same.

The Annunciation; after N. Poussin.

The Flight into Egypt; after the same.

This artist died at Naples in 1692. [Bartsch, P. G. tom. xx., has given descriptions of 32 prints by del Po, which he believes to be a complete catalogue. Füssli attributes three more to him, but, as they have not his name, Bartsch introduces them after his list without further remark. One mentioned by Gori, after Ribera, he is almost certain is not by del Po.]

PO, TERESA DEL. This lady was the daughter of the preceding artist. She is said to have painted in oil and in miniature, and has etched a few plates in the style of her father; among which is,

Susanna and the Elders; after Caracci.

[Bartsch says she engraved in the manner of her father so closely, that it is difficult to distinguish them. He describes sixteen prints by her; and enumerates six more mentioned by Füssli. The date of her birth is not known; but she was a member of the Academy of St. Luke, at Rome, and died at Naples in 1716.]

PO, GIACOMO DEL, was the son of Pietro del Po, born at Rome in 1654, and was first instructed in the art by his father, but was afterwards a scholar of N. Poussin. He was chiefly occupied in ornamenting the saloons and mansions of the nobility at Naples, with emblematical and allegorical subjects, for which his inventive genius and extraordinary facility particularly qualified him. As is usual with the majority of mechanists, despatch and confidence led him into the negligence and incorrectness of a mannerist. Rome possesses only two of his pictures, one in the church of S. Angiolo, and the other in S. Marta; but his talents are seen to greater advantage in his frescoes in the gallery of the Marchese di Genzano, and particularly in the palace of the principe di Avellino, at Naples. He died in 1726.

POCETTI. See BARBATELLI.

PODESTA, ANDREA, was born at Genoa about the year 1620, and went early in his life to Rome, where he became a scholar of Giovanni Andrea Ferrari. It does not appear that he reached any celebrity as a painter; but we have some very spirited and masterly etchings by him, which prove him to have been an artist of considerable ability. He usually marked his plates AND. P. or And. P. in. et fec. Among others, the following are by him :

An Allegorical Subject, representing Boys cultivating the Arts, and a Phoenix in the Flames; after his own design.

The Triumph of Bacchus; after Titian.

Bacchus and Ariadne; after the same.

Silenus Drunk, supported by Satyrs and Bacchanals; after the same.

Two subjects from the Life of Diego; after Caracci.

[He is called by the generality of writers Giovanni-Andrea, but Zani says his right name is Giacomo-Andrea. The date of his birth is uncertain; but one of his prints is marked 1636, and four others 1640, which was probably his best time. Bartsch describes eight engravings by him, of which five are bacchanalian subjects, two amatory, and one of St. Francis performing a miracle. The year of his death is not ascertained.]

POEHAM, MARTIN, an old German engraver, to whom the prints marked with the cipher M. are attributed by Professor Christ. They chiefly consist of very indifferent copies from the prints of Aldegraver, Sebald Beham, and others.

POEL, VANDER. This painter is not mentioned by any of the writers on art, although his pictures are frequently met with, and possess considerable merit. He was a native of Holland, and, from the dates on some of his works, flourished about the year 1660. His pictures usually represent conflagrations, and buildings on fire; and he treated those disastrous subjects with great ability. His pencil is free and firm, his colouring vigorous, and he was well acquainted with the principles of the chiaroscuro. [Egbert Vander Poel was an excellent painter of conflagrations, views of villages, interiors of tabagies and rustic habitations, and other subjects; but his principal performances are conflagrations. In the Museum at Amsterdam there is a picture by him representing the explosion of a powder magazine at Delft in 1654, which seems to have been a favourite subject, as he repeated it many times; several of these repetitions are in England. In the same collection there is an interior of a cottage with females in domestic and rural employment. In the Gallery of the Hague there is a moonlight by him; and in many of the cabinets in Holland his pictures are to be found. Some of them are in the manner of Teniers and Brauer, and all that have come under the editor's observation are painted in a free, spirited, and artistic style. His name is generally found in full on his pictures, and sometimes only his initials E. V. P. Balkema says he died in 1690.]

POELEMBURG, CORNELIUS. This painter was born at Utrecht in 1586. He received the first principles of the art from Abraham Bloemaert, and, following the example of the generality of his countrymen, he travelled to Italy in search of improvement. On his arrival at Rome, he attached himself at first to the style of Adam Elsheimer, which he afterwards quitted, we are told by Houbraken, "to study the works of Raffaele, and imitated the grace of that incomparable master, particularly in the naked." It would certainly be a whimsical research, to look for the characteristics of Raffaele in the Chinese figures of Poelemburg. He adopted a pleasing style of painting small landscapes, distinguished by the suavity and delicacy of his colouring, an agreeable choice of scenery, enriched with architecture, into which he introduced figures as remarkable for the neatness of his pencil, and the clearness of his carnations, as they are deficient in design. There is, however, a polished and seductive brilliancy in his finishing, which gratifies the generality of observers; his works were held in the highest estimation, and he was employed by the principal personages at Rome. This flattering encouragement did not however subdue his desire of revisiting his native country, and he determined to pass through Florence on his return to Holland. He quitted Rome with some reluctance, after a sojourn of several years; and on his arrival at Florence, where the reputation of his talents had preceded him, he was received with favour and distinction by the Grand Duke, for whom he painted several pictures, and who endeavoured in vain to retain him in his service, by the most marked munificence and liberality. On his return to Utrecht, the impatience of his countrymen to possess his works loaded him with commissions, Charles I. invited him to London, where he remained some time, and painted several pictures for the king and the nobility. He frequently ornamented with his figures the architectural views of Steenwyck, and the landscapes of Kierings. In King Charles's catalogue are mentioned the portraits of his Majesty, and of the children of the King of Bohemia, by Poelemburg; and in that of James II. there are sixteen pictures by him. The success he met with could not induce him to remain in England. He returned to Utrecht, where he died in 1660. Descamps and M. Watelet assert that Poelemburg etched some prints from his own designs, and that the plates being soon afterwards destroyed, they are now extremely scarce. I have never met with any of them. [Probably the prints attributed to Poelemburg are those etched by J. G. Bronkhorst after his designs. Poelemburg came to England in 1637, and must have remained some years to paint so many pictures as he did. His figures are not Chinese, but they sometimes look like paintings on porcelain. Occasionally they are to be found in the landscapes of Claude and Jan Both; neither are improved by them. He had a great imitator in Jan Lys, whose works are frequently attributed to him. He had many scholars, and has been a great favourite with engravers, so that his compositions are well known. He was a painter for the boudoir.]

POERSON, CHARLES FRANCIS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1653. He was a scholar of Noel Coypel, and painted history in the style of his instructor. By the patronage of M. Mansard, he was introduced to the notice of Louis XIV., and was employed in painting some historical subjects, in the hospital of the Invalids. The undertaking, however, did little credit to his abilities, as they were soon afterwards destroyed, and replaced by some frescoes by Bon Boullongne. He was afterwards appointed Director of the French Academy at Rome, where he died in 1725.

POILLY, FRANCIS, THE ELDER, a very eminent French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1622. He was the son of a goldsmith and engraver, who instructed him in the rudiments of the art. He afterwards went to Paris, where he became a pupil of Peter Daret, under whom he remained three years, and afterwards visited Rome, where he adopted the fine style of Cornelius Bloemaert as his model. During a residence of seven years, he greatly improved his design, and engraved several plates after the works of the great Italian masters. On his return to Paris he distinguished himself as one of the most celebrated engravers of his country. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with uncommon firmness and dexterity. The correctness of his design corresponds with the beauty of his burin, and there is a fine expression in his heads. Though he had the assistance of some able pupils, it is surprising that he could have finished so many plates in a manner that required both time and patience. The following are esteemed his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

- Pope Alexander VII. with accessories.
- Louis XIV. when young; after Noeret.
- Cardinal Mazarine; after Mignard.
- Henry D'Arnaud, Bishop of Angers.
- Jerome Bignon, Counsellor of State; after Champagne.
- Abraham Fabert, Marshal of France; after Ferdinand.
- William de Lamoignon, with Allegorical Figures; after Mignard.
- Bust of William de Lamoignon; after Le Brun.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

- The Virgin and Child.
- The Holy Family, with St. John embracing the infant Christ.
- St. Ignatius of Loyola.
- The Death of St. Francis Xavier.
- The Crucifixion.
- The Triumph of Augustus.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Vision of Ezekiel; after Raffaele.
- The Holy Family, in which the infant Christ is standing upon the cradle; after the same.
- The Virgin lifting up a veil, to show to St. John the infant Christ sleeping; after the same.
- The Flight into Egypt; after Guido.
- The Nativity, or Adoration of the Shepherds, in an octagonal border; after the same. The first impressions of this plate are before the two angels which appear above were inserted.
- Christ praying in the Garden; after the same.
- The dead Christ on the lap of the Virgin, at the foot of the Cross; after L. Caracci.
- The Repose in Egypt, in which the Virgin is represented sleeping, with two Angels kneeling; after An. Caracci.
- The Holy Family; after N. Poussin.
- The Marriage of St. Catherine; after P. Mignard.
- The Holy Family; after the same.
- The Baptism of Christ; after the same.
- St. Charles Borromeus administering the Communion to the Persons infected with the Plague; after the same.
- The Visitation; after C. Le Brun.
- St. John in the Isle of Patmos; after the same.
- The Crucifixion; after the same.
- The Parable of the Wedding Garment; after Champagne.
- The Crucifixion; a large print, in three sheets; after the same.
- The Trinity; after the same.
- Joseph's Bloody Garment presented to Jacob; after Antonio Coypel.
- Nymphs Bathing; after Giulio Romano.

A variety of emblematical and other subjects, from various masters. He died at Paris in 1693. [There are about 400 prints that bear his name; of course these include the works of his pupils while under his direction. Nagler describes 107 that may be considered as being entirely by him. There is so little variety in his manner, that it is difficult to establish a ground for preference; perhaps the subject may determine it. St. Charles Borromeus administering the Sacrament, after Mignard's picture; the Holy Family, after Raphael; the Flight into Egypt, after Guido, are most frequently quoted.]

POILLY, NICHOLAS. This artist was born at Abbeville in 1626. He was the younger brother of Francis Poilly, by whom he was instructed in the art of engraving, and executed several plates in the style of his brother, which, though inferior to those of Francis, possess considerable merit. We have several prints by him of portraits and historical subjects, executed with the graver, in a neat, clear manner. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

- Louis XIV., in a frame of laurels, with Children bearing emblems; after N. Mignard.
- Bust of Louis XIV., as large as life. 1683.
- Maria Theresa, Queen of France; the same. 1680.
- Louis, Dauphin, the son of Louis XIV.; the same.
- Louis Bourhon, called the Great Condé; the same.
- Francis de Coetlogon, Bishop of Rennes.
- René Potier, Duke de Gesvre; after Le Fevre.
- Nicholas Edward Olier; Counsellor of State.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- St. Augustine holding a Crucifix.
- The Holy Family, with two Angels holding a Basket of Flowers; after S. Bourdon.
- The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.
- The Presentation in the Temple; after C. Le Brun.
- The Holy Family returning from Egypt; after the same.
- The Holy Family, with the infant Jesus sleeping on the knee of the Virgin; after the same.
- The Repose in Egypt; after Chapron.
- The Crucifixion; after N. Poussin.

He died at Paris in 1696.

POILLY, JOHN BAPTIST, was the son and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1669. Having made some progress in engraving under his father, he went to Rome, where he studied some years. On his return to Paris he executed several plates, by which he gained considerable reputation, and was made a member of the Royal Academy in 1714. His style of engraving differs greatly from that of his father or his uncle. He forwarded his plates with the point, and finished them with the graver, in a pleasing and picturesque style. His drawing is generally correct, and there is a fine expression in his heads. We have several portraits and historical subjects by him, of which the following are the most deserving of notice:

PORTRAITS.

- Clement XIII. Pontifex Max.
- Louis XIV.; after Mignard.
- Charles James Edward Stewart, son of the Pretender; after Dupra.
- Francis de Troy, Painter; from a picture by himself; his reception plate at the Academy.
- Cornelius van Cleve, Sculptor; after Vivien; the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Nativity; after Gaudenzio Ferrari; for the Crozat collection.
- The Virgin adoring the infant Jesus, who is sleeping; after Benvenuto Garofalo; for the same collection.
- The Martyrdom of St. Cecilia; after Domenichino.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after C. Maratti.
- The Rod of Aaron devouring the Rods of the Magicians; after N. Poussin.
- The Israelites worshipping the Golden Calf; after the same.
- The Holy Family; after the same.
- The Judgment of Solomon; after A. Coypel.
- Susanna and the Elders; after the same.
- Jupiter and Danae; after Giulio Romano; for the Crozat collection.
- Eleven Plates from the paintings by P. Mignard, in the saloon of St. Cloud.

The Four Seasons; from the paintings in the gallery of St. Cloud; after the same.

He died at Paris in 1728.

POILLY, FRANCIS, THE YOUNGER, was the younger son of Nicholas Poilly, born at Paris in 1671, and was instructed in engraving by his father. He afterwards travelled to Rome, with his brother, where he engraved a plate representing St. Cecilia distributing her wealth to the poor, after Domenichino, a companion print to the Martyrdom of that Saint, by John Baptist Poilly.

POILLY, N. B. [NICHOLAS JEAN BAPTIST DE.] According to Basan, this artist was the son of John Baptist Poilly, and was intended by his father for an engraver, who gave him some instruction in the art, but he did not long apply to it. He engraved a few portraits, after Cochin, some of which are dated 1753. [According to Nagler he was born at Paris in 1712; one of his prints is dated 1758.]

[POINDRE, JACOB DE, a portrait painter of Malines, born about 1527, was a scholar of Schwagers Marc Willems. He painted a few historical pictures, but attached himself more particularly to portraiture. He went to Denmark, and painted portraits of some of the kings, probably as historical recollections, and died there in 1570.]

POINSART, J., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. He was principally employed by the booksellers, for whom he executed several plates of views of cities, castles, &c. They are neatly executed, but in an incorrect, tasteless style. Among other prints by him, is the Entry of Charles VII. into Rheims.

POINTE, F. DE LA. By this artist, who was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1678, we have a plan of the environs of Paris, in nine parts. He also engraved some of the views of the palace of Versailles, in conjunction with Israel Silvestre.

[POL, CHRETIEN VAN, a flower and arabesque painter, was born at Berkenrode, near Haerlem, in 1752. In 1782 he went to Paris, where he obtained a great reputation for his paintings in arabesque, which he rendered very agreeable by the introduction of birds, fruit, and flowers. He ornamented in this manner the chateaux of Bellevue, Chantilly, and St. Cloud. He also painted flower-pieces in oil, which are beautiful in composition and colouring, but required a little more attention to the finishing. He occupied himself occasionally in painting on snuff-boxes groups of flowers, which are so delicately executed that they may be mistaken for the work of the most celebrated masters in that class. He died in 1813.]

[POLANCOS, ———. Two brothers of this name are mentioned among the Spanish painters of history. Scarcely any thing is recorded of them, except that they studied under Francisco Zurbaran, and flourished about 1646 or 1649. It is, however, said that their works bear so near a resemblance to those of Zurbaran, that they are often mistaken for his. This is particularly the case with regard to the pictures in the church of S. Esteban, at Seville, where Zurbaran painted the St. Peter and St. Stephen, but where the martyrdom of the patron saint, the Nativity, which is above the St. Hermenegildo, and the S. Fernando, are by the brothers Polancos. They also painted several large pictures for the sacristy of the convent of St. Paul, in the same city; and also the Angels appearing to Abraham, Tobit and the Angel, Jacob wrestling with the Angel, Joseph's Dream, and St. Teresa conducted by Angels;

the last for the church of the Guardian Angel, belonging to the unshod Carmelites and Franciscan Friars.]

POLANZANI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, born at Andale, near Venice, about the year 1700. He chiefly resided at Rome, where, he engraved a set of twenty-two plates, representing the Life of the Virgin, from designs which are by some attributed to N. Poussin; but from their resemblance to the style of J. Stella, they are more probably after the works of that painter. He also engraved the following prints:

- The Bust of a Woman; after C. Cignani.
- The Bust of a blind Musician; after Marco Benefiali.
- The Virgin and infant Christ; after G. Nogari.
- An old Man holding a Money-bag; after the same.
- An old Woman warming her hands; after the same.

[This is probably Felice Polanzi, or Polanzani, who engraved after Vandyck, and various other masters. He flourished from 1745 to 1766. It is supposed that he was living in 1771. For a list of his works see Nagler. There is a Francesco Polanzani mentioned, who lived about 1750, but he was of Verona.]

POLESTANUS, ANDREA. By this artist, who was a native of Italy, and apparently a painter, we have a slight etching of a Bacchanalian subject, a composition of many figures, from his own design. It is signed with his name, and dated 1640.

POLETNICH, a modern engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He engraved several plates after the works of Vandyck, Boucher, La Grenée, and others. [J. F. Poletnich sculpsit 1769. He was living in 1780.]

POLIDORO, DA CARAVAGGIO. See CARAVAGGIO. POLIDORO, VENEZIANO. This painter was born at Venice in 1515, and was one of the numerous scholars of Titian. Although he had the advantage of studying under that admirable master, he never rose to great celebrity in the art; and his pictures in the church of the Servi, and in other public situations at Venice, do not rank his talents above mediocrity. He died in 1565.

POLLAJUOLO, ANTONIO and PIETRO. Antonio, the elder of these brothers, was born at Florence in 1426. He was brought up to the profession of a goldsmith and designer, under Bartolucci, and afterwards learned the art of casting figures in metal of Lorenzo Ghiberti, whom he assisted in executing the celebrated gates in the church of S. Giovanni, at Florence, so much extolled by Michael Angelo. He executed in bronze the tomb of Sistus IV. and that of Innocent VIII. His younger brother, Pietro, born in 1428, studied painting in the school of Andrea Castagna, and having distinguished himself by several admirable portraits at Florence, Antonio became his disciple. He painted some pictures for the public edifices at Florence, which gained him the reputation of one of the ablest artists of the period at which he lived. One of his most celebrated works is a picture of the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the chapel of the Marchese Pucci, in the church of the Servi, at Florence, which is considered by Lanzi one of the ablest productions of the 15th century, in respect to composition and design, though not equally admirable for the colouring. He was perfectly master of the anatomy of the human figure, in which he showed himself superior to all his contemporaries. Pietro chiefly distinguished himself in portrait painting. The two brothers died at Rome in the same year, 1498. Antonio Pollajuolo was one of the earliest of the Italian engravers. Contemporary with Finiguerra, he is supposed to have learned the art from him, and engraved several plates, executed in a similar style. We have the following prints by him :

A large plate, representing ten Naked Figures fighting with swords and other weapons. It is inscribed, Opus Antonii Pollajuoli Florentini, without a date. The back-ground is a forest, very rudely represented. The design shows that he had paid some attention to the figure, and the heads are not without expression.

The Holy Family, in which the Virgin is seated, with the infant Jesus on her knee; St. Joseph appears on the right hand leaning on his staff, on the left is St. Elisabeth with St. John presenting a flower to the Child.

Hercules strangling Anteus.

[Bartsch and Ottley describe a print of Hercules combating the Giants, which, though it does not bear the name of Pollajuoli, there is every reason to believe is by him. Ottley has described a Battle of Centaurs as by Pollajuoli, but which Bartsch has given to Gasparo Reverdino; there seems to be no doubt among connoisseurs that it is by the former. It was purchased from the Riccardi palace by Mr. Lloyd, was afterwards in Sir M. M. Sykes's collection, and is now in the British Museum. The niello of the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, mentioned by Duchesne, is attributed to Pallajuolo by conjecture.]

[POLO, BERNARDO, a painter of fruit and flower pieces, who resided near Saragossa towards the end of the seventeenth century. He painted his subjects from nature, and his pictures were highly esteemed both at Saragossa and Madrid, and are still preserved in the collections of amateurs. According to Zani, he operated in 1680 and died about 1700.]

POLO, DIEGO, THE ELDER. According to Palomino, this Spanish painter was born at Burgos in 1560. He studied at Madrid, under Patricio Caxes, and was a reputable painter of history. There are some of his works in the Escorial, and in the palace at Madrid, which prove him to have been an excellent colourist, and a tolerably correct designer. He died at Madrid in 1600. [The pictures by which he gained reputation are the portraits of the kings of the Goths; a painting of St. Jerome chastised by an Angel for taking too much pleasure in reading Cicero; and a penitent Magdalene.]

POLO, DIEGO, THE YOUNGER, was the nephew of the preceding artist, born at Burgos in 1620, and was a scholar of Antonio Lanchares. He acquired an admirable style of colouring, by studying the works of Titian, in the royal collection; and painted several pictures for the churches at Madrid, of which the most esteemed are the Baptism of Christ, in the church of the Carmelites; and the Annunciation, in S. Maria. He died in 1655. [He was an artist of great promise, and excelled in portraiture, a quality he acquired by copying those by Titian and other Venetian masters.]

POLONY, ZIARAKA, an obscure engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1615. Among other prints, we have by him a slight etching, representing Queen Margaret lying in state, in the Fauxbourg St. Germain at Paris.

POMARANACE, CRISTOFANO. See RONCALLI.
POMARANACE, NICCOLO and ANTONIO. See CIRCIGNANO.

POMAREDE, SVLVIVS. This artist is said by Professor Christ to have been a native of Italy, and to have engraved some plates, which he marked with the initials S. P. F., the F. for fecit. Mr. Strutt says he flourished in 1620, instead of 1720.

[This is probably the same as Silvio or Silvestro Pomarede mentioned by Zani, and Silvestre Pomarde by Nagler, of whose prints he gives a list; if so, he flourished from 1740 to 1768, according to both those authorities. He engraved the four pictures, said to be by Titian, called The Triumphs of Time, Fame, Death, and the Christian Religion.]

POMPADOUR, THE MARCHIONESS OF. This celebrated lady amused herself with engraving, and has executed several small plates, after Boucher, Eisen, and others. She also engraved a set of sixty-three prints after gems, by Gay.

[PONCE, NICOLAS, a French engraver, was born at Paris in 1746, and died in 1831. He was a pupil of M. Pierre, the painter, and of Fessard and Delaunay, the engravers. His works are rather numerous, as he was employed on several of the grand publications which do honour to the French nation; such as Le Musée Laurent; Le Cabinet de Choiseul; La Galerie du Palais Royal; Les Campagnes d'Italie; the folio edition of Racine, by Didôt; the edition of Ariosto by Dussieux, of which all the prints after Cochin's designs are by Ponce; Les illustres Français, avec les Notices historiques, with 56 plates; Les Bains de Titus et du Livie, in 75 plates; La Guerre d'Amerique, conjointly with Godfrey. He was the editor of the Bible with 300 figures after Marillier; and dedicated to Louis XVIII. the beautiful edition in quarto of the Charter. In addition to these works, he executed several detached pieces, among which are, Restoring the blind Man's Sight, after Le Sueur; the Battle of Marengo, after C. Vernet; the Virgin and Child, after Vouet; the Marriage of the Virgin, after Van Loo; and a scene from the tragedy of Mithridate. He also wrote and translated several works relative to the arts, was a member of various academies and literary societies, one of the Legion of Honour, and corresponding member of the Royal Institute of France.]

[PONCE, ROQUE, a Spanish landscape painter, was a scholar of Juan de la Coste, at Madrid. He flourished about the year 1690, and painted landscapes in a very graceful manner, which he embellished with suitable incidents. In some of his pictures the figures are by Antonio Castrejon, but those are most esteemed in which the latter had no hand.]

PONCHEL, C. DU, a French engraver, who resided in England about the year 1779. Among other prints he engraved a plate of a view of Waterford, from a design by Paul Sandby. [His name was Charles Eugene. He was born at Abbeville in 1748, and was a scholar of N. Tardieu. He engraved the Madonna della Seggiola of Raphael; a Holy Family after A. del Sarto; and several other historical subjects and portraits. He was living in 1804.]

PONCHINO, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called IL BOZZATO. This painter was born at Castelfranco in 1500. He was a disciple of Titian, and, according to Lanzi, was a reputable painter of history. His picture of the Limbo, in the church of S. Liberale, at Castelfranco, is superior to any work of art in that city, except the admirable productions of Giorgione. He also painted several altar-pieces for the churches of Venice and Vicenza. [He died in 1570. According to Zani, he was a prelate with the title of Monsignore.]

POND, ARTHUR, an English painter and engraver, who resided in London about the year 1740. He painted portraits both in oil and in crayons, and contributed greatly to the encouragement of the arts. In conjunction with George Knappton, he published the collection of heads of illustrious persons, engraved by Houbraken and Vertue, and other interesting undertakings. Among others, they engraved a set of ninety-five plates from the drawings of the great Italian masters, in imitation of the originals, which are executed with taste and spirit. We have also by him a set of twenty-five caricatures, after Cavaliere Ghezzi, and other masters. He etched several portraits, in a style resembling that of Rembrandt, among which are the following :

His own Portrait.
Lord Bolingbroke.
Alexander Pope, Esq. [He had also the honour of painting his portrait.]
Doctor Mead,
Thomas Sadler, Antiquary.

[He died in 1758.]

[PONSE, JORIS, a painter of birds, fruit, and flowers, was born at Dort in 1723. He was a scholar of A. Schouman. His cabinet pictures are more esteemed for their elaborate finishing, than for skill in the composition. He died at Dort in 1783.]

[PONT, NICOLAS DU, born at Brussels in 1660, painted landscape and architecture. The figures in his landscapes are attributed to Bout, or Baut, the coadjutor of Bodewyns, with whom he painted in conjunction the perspective of a grand palace, now in the Museum at Ghent. He died at Brussels in 1712.]

PONTE, FRANCESCO DA, THE ELDER. This painter was the head of the family of the Bassans, and the founder of the school distinguished by their name. He was born at Vicenza about the year 1475, and after receiving his technical education at Venice, he established himself at Bassano, a small town situated on the Brenta. If he was not a disciple of Giovanni Bellini, he was in the early part of his life one of the most precise followers of his style. Such is his picture of St. Bartholomew, in the cathedral at Bassano, which retains much of the hard and laboured finishing of Bellini. In the middle of his life his style became less dry and Gothic, as appears in his altar-piece, in the church of S. Giovanni, and his last works approached to the mellowness and freedom of the modern style, as is evident in his picture of the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the church of the village of Oliero, a grand composition, with a rich and harmonious tone of colour, and a fine expression in the heads. He died at Bassano about the year 1530.

PONTE, GIACOMO DA, usually called IL BASSANO. This eminent artist was the son of Francesco da Ponte the elder, born at Bassano in 1510. He received his first instruction in the art from his father, and afterwards studied at Venice, under Bonifazio Veneziano; but his best improvement was derived from contemplating the works of Titian, and copying the designs of Parmigiano. He has been supposed by some to have been a disciple of the former; and Lanzi asserts, that some of his juvenile works seemed to promise to the world another Titian, so much had he adopted his style in his Flight into Egypt, in the church of S. Girolomo; and a Nativity, painted for Signor Larber. At this period he drew his figures larger than life, and aspired to a greatness of style, of which he showed himself not incapable, in some paintings still preserved on the exterior of the Casa Michieli, at Venice, where he represented Samson destroying the Philistines, designed with a boldness and enthusiasm that reminds us of the grandeur of Michael Angelo Buonaroti. But this energy was not of long duration, and he eventually contracted his scale to smaller proportion, as he abandoned the dignity of history, to familiarize his ideas to the meaner and more domestic subjects which afterwards occupied his pencil. He also distinguished himself as a portrait painter, in which he followed the style of Titian and Tintoretto, and painted several of the most celebrated personages of his time; among whom were Sebastiano Venerio, Doge of Venice, Ariosto, Tasso, and others. He had acquired considerable celebrity at Venice, when the death of his father made it necessary for him to return to Bassano, where he established himself for the remainder of his life. The picturesque situation of his family mansion, on the fertile banks of the Brenta, environed with pasturage and cattle, led him to paint from nature the rural objects which surrounded him, and he selected such subjects for his pictures as admitted of the introduction of animals and rustic occupations, which he painted with a truth and simplicity which may be truly said to be his own. His scriptural pictures usually represent the Animals going into the Ark, the History of Jacob, the Adoration of the Shepherds, and others of a similar kind. His works of this description were readily disposed of in the neighbouring cities of Vicenza, Brescia, Treviso, and Padua. When he did not confine himself to devout subjects, he made choice of those of a pastoral kind, markets and fairs of cattle, farm-yards, the pursuits of husbandry, &c. As he possessed an extraordinary facility of execution, and as his compositions are neither complicate nor much varied, the number of pictures despatched by him, his sons, and scholars, is astonishing. When his works were not painted by order, and when he had accumulated a certain number, it was his practice to send them for sale to the several fairs held in the neighbouring towns. This will account for the multifarious productions of the school of Bassano, which are to be met with in every country, and in every collection. He was invited to the court of Rodolfus II., but his attachment to his retreat at Bassano induced him to decline the invitation. He painted for the Emperor the Twelve Months of the year, and the Four Seasons. Of his historical pictures and altar-pieces, some are deserving of particular attention, and prove that the defects discernible in the generality of his works are rather to be attributed to negligence and manner, than want of ability. The Entombing of Christ, in the church of S. Maria in Vanzo, at Padua, is a grand and solemn scene, represented with great feeling and expression. His picture of the Nativity, now in the gallery of the Louvre, in which the light emanating from the infant produces a charming effect, is a chaste and studied composition; the airs and attitudes of the shepherds are simple and natural, and there is a dignity in the characters of the Virgin and St. Joseph, seldom to be found in his productions; the animals are admirably painted. One of his most important works is a large picture of St. Roch interceding with the Virgin for the Persons infected with the Plague, in the church dedicated to that saint at Vicenza. Deprived of the advantage of visiting Rome, and of studying the antique and the great masters, he was confined in his models to the works of the best Venetian painters, where he looked in vain for correctness or elegance of design, sublimity of conception, or the select beauty of forms, but he availed himself of their most seductive attributes; his colouring is as harmonious and captivating as any of the great masters of his country, and his handling evinces the most decided and commanding facility. His heads, without dignity or beauty, charm by an indescribable truth and naïveté, which is peculiar to himself. The constant repetition of domestic subjects, and representations of ordinary nature, undoubtedly degraded his ideas, and impoverished his fancy. His contracted acquaintance with the naked obliged him to load his figures with draperies, which, even in his historical pictures, are usually rather the habiliments of peasants, than characterized by the propriety of costume. His compositions are frequently fantastical and incongruous, and his want of precision in perspective deteriorates the effect of his landscapes, which in other respects are deserving of admiration. He died in 1592.

PONTE, FRANCESCO DA, THE YOUNGER. Francesco was the eldest of the four sons of Giacomo da Ponte, born at Bassano, according to Ridolfi, in 1548, and was brought up in the school of his father. He afterwards established himself at Venice, where he was employed by the government to decorate the public palace with a series of pictures, representing subjects from the history of the republic. It is no slight proof of the eminence of his talents, that these ingenious productions sustain their claim to admiration, in the vicinity of some of the most esteemed works of Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese. He painted several pictures for the churches at Venice and in the state, which, though less vigorous and harmonious in the colouring than those of Giacomo, are deservedly admired. One of his most esteemed works is his picture of S. Apollonio, in the church of S. Afra, at Brescia. This able artist was afflicted with occasional attacks of melancholy, which were probably increased by his assiduous application. In a paroxysm of mental derangement, he precipitated himself from a window and was killed, in 1591, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

PONTE, GIOVANNI BATISTA DA. Gio. Batista, the second son of Giacomo da Ponte, was born at Bassano in 1553. He was chiefly employed in copying the works of his father, which he did with a precision that deceived the most experienced. The only picture noticed of his own composition, is an altar-piece in the church of Gallio, signed with his name, which is said, by Lanzi, to be painted in the style of his brother Leandro. He died in 1613.

PONTE, LEANDRO DA. This artist was the third son of Giacomo da Ponte, born at Bassano in 1558. He was also educated under his father, whose style he for some time followed, until some portraits he had painted at Venice were so highly celebrated, that, in the latter part of his life, he confined himself almost entirely to portrait painting. Of his historical pictures the most deserving of notice are, the Birth of the Virgin, in the church of S. Sofia, at Venice; and the Raising of Lazarus, formerly in La Carità, now in the gallery of the Louvre. Among other distinguished portraits he painted was the Doge Grimani, who conferred on him the order of knighthood. He died in 1623. [He was born in 1555, according to an inscription on one of his paintings: An. A. Virginis partu 1586. mense Februario Leander Bassanus pinxit An. sue ætatis 31.]

PONTE, GIROLAMO DA, was the youngest son of Giacomo, born at Bassano in 1560, and, with his brother Gio. Batista, copied the pictures of his father so perfectly, as to pass at the time, as they have done since, for the originals. He painted, however, some pictures from his own designs; among others, an altar-piece, in the church of S. Giovanni, at Bassano, representing St. Barbara kneeling before the Virgin. He died in 1622.

PONTIUS, PAUL, a very eminent Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1596, and was instructed in the art of engraving by Lucas Vostermans; but he improved his design by the advice and friendship of Rubens, from whose works he engraved many admirable plates. Few artists have equalled him in the correct and faithful delineation of his model; and in the character and expression of his figures, he appears to have possessed himself of the mind of Rubens. He was not less successful in the fine portraits he has engraved after Vandyck, in which he seems to have adapted his style to the particular character of the person represented. His plates are executed with the graver in a clear, bold style; and, though he did not possess the facility of Bolswert, or the delicacy of Vostermans, his plates will ever be esteemed among the ablest productions of the Flemish artists. The following is an ample list of his principal works:

PORTRAITS AFTER VANDYCK.

Paul du Pont, or Pontius, Engraver.
 Peter Paul Rubens.
 James de Breuck, Architect.
 John Wildens, Painter, of Antwerp.
 John van Ravesteyn, Painter, of the Hague.

 The Holy Family; after J. van Hoeck.
 The Entombing of Christ; after Titian.

[Those who wish for a more copious list of his works, will find it in Nagler.]

PONTONS, PABLO, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia, in 1606. He was a scholar of Pedro Orrente, and followed the style of his instructor, who had been a scholar of Bassano: his colouring bears the character of the Venetian school. There are several of his works in the churches and convents of his native city, of which the most considerable is a series of subjects from the life of San Pedro de Nola, in the church and cloisters of the convent de la Merced. He also painted some altarpieces for the monastery of la Cartuja del Puche; and in the church of S. Maria de Morella, are two pictures, representing the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi. He was also a reputable painter of portraits. He died in 1670.

PONTORMO, JACOPO CARRUCCI, DA. This painter was born at Pontormo, in the Florentine state, in 1493. His family name was Carrucci, but he is generally called da Pontormo, from the place of his nativity. His parents dying before he was thirteen years of age, he was taken to Florence by a relation, who, perceiving his inclination for the art, placed him in the school of Lionardo da Vinci, under whose tuition he only remained a short time, and afterwards successively became the scholar of Pietro Cosimo and Mariotto Albertinelli. Whilst he was a disciple of Albertinelli, he painted a picture of the Annunciation, which excited the greatest admiration, and being shown to Raffaele, was considered by that great painter as an uncommon effort of genius, as a juvenile performance. He afterwards became a pupil of Andrea del Sarto; and some of his early productions having received the most marked commendation from Michael Angelo Buonaroti, the illiberal disposition of his instructor conceived an unworthy jealousy of his powers, and dismissed him from his academy. This ungenerous and unwarrantable treatment only served as a stimulus to his exertions; and it was not long before he met with considerable occupation. One of his first productions, on leaving Andrea del Sarto, was a picture of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, for the church of la Nunziata, which disputed the preference with many of the works of Andrea. He was not less successful in his Holy Family with St. John, painted for the church of S. Michele, at Florence; and his picture of S. Agostino giving the Benediction, with a beautiful choir of Angels, in the church of S. Clemente. It is surprising that, with the possession of such powers, he should vitiate his principles, and degrade his talents, by stooping to a mean and servile imitation of the dry and meagre style of Albert Durer. But whether from a diffidence in his own resources, or from the inconsistency of his disposition, he forsook the path which he had trod with such ability, to wander from one manner to another, until he found it impossible to return to that from which he had so indiscreetly departed. The compositions, in the series of pictures he painted for the cloister of the Carthusians at Florence, are undisguisedly copied from the prints of Albert Durer. His last works were the frescoes he painted in the chapel of S. Lorenzo, representing the Deluge, and the Last Judgment, which, from his indecision and want of energy, had occupied him eleven years. Great expectations had been formed of this important undertaking; but when they were exposed to public view, they were found to be totally unworthy of his reputation; and it is perhaps fortunate for his fame, that they have since been obliterated. He did not long survive this mortifying failure, and died in 1556. [According to Zani, and others, he died in 1558. Manni says he was born in 1504, and died in 1556. Kugler says there are excellent portraits by him in the Berlin Museum.]

PONZONE, MATTEO. This artist was a Venetian, and a scholar of Santo Peranda. He was a painter of history, and several of his works are in the churches and public places at Venice, particularly in S. Maria Maggiore, and in the church of the Padri Crociferi. He surpassed his instructor in the delicacy of his colouring, though inferior in the elegance of his design. [He was born in Dalmatia, and lived between 1630 and 1700. A Holy Family by Ponzone, in the Houghton Gallery, was engraved by Valentine Green.]

POOL, JURIAEN. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1666. He distinguished himself as a portrait painter, and passed the early part of his life at the court of the Elector Palatine, by whom his works were much esteemed. After the death of his patron he returned to Holland, where he abandoned painting, and applied himself to mercantile pursuits. He was the husband of Rachel Ruysch, the celebrated paintress of flowers and fruit. He died in 1745.

POOL, MATTHEW, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1670. He was instructed in the art at Paris, and on his return to Holland engraved several plates after various masters, in a style resembling that of Bernard Picart. We have among others the following prints by him:

The Portrait of Barent Graat, Painter.

The Infancy of Jupiter; after B. Graat.

Cupid taken in a Net by Time; after Guercino.

A Bacchanalian subject; after N. Poussin.

A set of twelve subjects; from designs by Rembrandt.

A set of one hundred and three plates, entitled The Cabinet of the Art of Sculpture, by Francis van Bossuit; from drawings by B. Graat.

Three hurlaque representations of the Ceremonies adopted by the Flemish painters at Rome; from the same.

[The date of his death is not recorded, but he engraved in 1727, as appears by a work published in that year. Nagler has given a list of his works, which are of a rather miscellaneous character, after some of the best masters of the Italian, Dutch, and French schools.]

POOL, RACHEL. See RUYSCH.

POOST, FRANCIS. See POST.

[POPE, ALEXANDER, a tragedian, well known for his performances in the characters of Othello, Henry VIII., and Oroonoko, was also an excellent painter in miniature, and had considerable practice. He painted the portrait of MICHAEL BRYAN, the first compiler of this work, the engraving of which stood at the head of the quarto edition; a very excellent likeness of an amiable man, and a good judge of works of art of the higher order.]

POPELS, JOHN. This artist was born at Tournay about the year 1630. He engraved some plates from the pictures in the gallery of the Archduke at Brussels, for the collection of prints called The Cabinet of Teniers; among which are the following:

Hagar and Ishmael; after Titian.
St. George and St. Stephen; after Gio. Bellini.
St. John Baptist and St. Roch; after Palma Vecchio.
The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John and St. Catherine; after Palma Giovine.
A dead Christ, supported by Joseph of Arimathea; after Schiavone.

He also engraved a plate of the Triumph of Bacchus, after Rubens.

POPPI. See MORANDINI.

PORBUS, [or POURBUS,] PETER. This painter was born at Gouda in 1510. He distinguished himself as a geographer as well as a painter. In the great church at Gouda was a picture by him representing St. Hubert. He afterwards established himself at Bruges, at that time the most flourishing city in the Low Countries, where he painted several altar-pieces for the public edifices, particularly the Crucifixion, still preserved in the church of Notre Dame. He died at Bruges in 1583. [Others place his birth in 1513, and his death on the 30th of January, 1584.

The altar-pieces painted by Pierre Pourbus are numerous, the most beautiful are to be found in the principal church at Gouda. His portraits are of a rare perfection; the Academy at Bruges possesses two painted in 1551. He was also a good geometer. He painted for the magistrates of Bruges a large chart or picture, on canvass and in oil, of the whole of the territory within their jurisdiction, in which he represented the minutest details. This immense work still exists in the Hotel de Ville. He was originally a mason; and when he became eminent as an architect and painter he marked all his works with a trowel. He married the daughter of Lancelot Blondeel, and was president of the Corporation of Painters at Bruges. There are three pictures by him in the private collection of the King of Holland, described at large in Mr. C. I. Nieuwenhuys's Catalogue: one is an allegorical subject, which shows that he possessed a lively and poetic imagination; the others are portraits of persons of distinction. Michiel, in his "Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise," tom. iii., has given a catalogue of fifty pictures by Pierre Pourbus, besides some poetical detailed descriptions of his principal altar-pieces.]

PORBUS, [or POURBUS,] FRANCIS, THE ELDER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Bruges in 1540, and was first instructed by his father; but he afterwards had the advantage of studying under Francis Floris, and eventually surpassed both his instructors. He painted history, landscapes, and animals, and was one of the most distinguished portrait painters of his time. There are several of his works in the churches at Antwerp, where he chiefly resided, and where he was received into the Academy in 1564. In the cathedral is an altar-piece representing the Circumcision, with two shutters, on which he painted the portraits of the donors of the picture. One of his most esteemed works is the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of the Convent at Oudenarde. Though the productions of this artist retain somewhat of the dry, formal style which preceded him, his colouring is clear and chaste, particularly in his portraits, which are full of life and character. He died in 1580.

PORBUS, [or POURBUS,] FRANCIS, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Antwerp in 1570. After receiving some instruction in his native city, he travelled to France, with the intention of visiting Italy, but he met with such encouragement at Paris as a portrait painter, that he took up his residence in that city for the remainder of his life. He painted the portraits of the royal family, and the most distinguished personages of the court. His talents were not confined to portraits; there are several of his pictures in the churches at Paris, which establish his reputation as a painter of history. He painted for the church of the Jacobins the Annunciation, and a picture of St. Francis; but his most esteemed performance is the Last Supper, formerly in the church of St. Leu, now in the gallery of the Louvre; it is a grand and simple composition, the figures correctly designed, and the colouring rich and harmonious. In the Hotel de Ville are two pictures by Porbus of the Minority and Majority of Louis XIII., which he has treated with great ingenuity, and the portraits he has introduced have an admirable appearance of truth and nature. The portrait of Henry IV. was formerly in the collection of the king of France, it is now in the French Museum. He died at Paris in 1622.

[Of the pictures of François Pourbus the younger, there are six in the Louvre: a portrait of Guillaume du Vair; a small portrait of Henry IV. in armour; another of the same in black velvet; portrait of Marie de Medicis, in a blue velvet robe covered with fleurs de lis, and enriched with diamonds and pearls; the Last Supper; and St. Francis in ecstasy. In England there are portraits by him in various collections. There are two at Hampton Court, Henry IV., and Mary de Medicis; at Althorp a whole-length portrait, by some called the Duke of Guise, surnamed le balafre, by others, his son Henry.]

PORDENONE. See LICINIO.

PORPORATI, a modern Italian engraver, born at Turin in 1740. He went to Paris when he was young, and became a pupil of Beauvarlet, under whom he made great progress, and acquired considerable celebrity by his first productions, in the neat, finished style of his instructor. In 1773 he was made a member of the Royal Academy at Paris, and engraved, for his plate of reception, Susanna and the Elders, after Santerre. He had executed several fine plates at Paris, when he returned to Turin. We have the following prints by him, some of which are executed in a finished and beautiful style:

Abraham sending away Hagar; after Philip Vanduyck.
Tancred and Clorinda; after C. Vanloo.
Ermينيا asking shelter of a Shepherd; after the same.
Cupid in Meditation; after Angelica Kauffman.
The Death of Abel; after A. vander Werff.

Venus caressing Cupid; after Pompeo Battoni.
Jupiter and Leda; after Coreggio; very fine.

[Carlo Antonio Porporati studied also under the celebrated J. G. Wille; but his style of engraving does not partake of that of either of his masters: his manner is entirely his own, particularly in the carnations. He was the first of the Italian engravers that availed himself of the purity and gracefulness produced by the graving instrument alone. Longhi, while he admits his excellence in many respects, endeavours to detract from his merit in others; but Joubert maintains that his beauties more than counterbalance any deficiencies. In addition to the prints quoted above may be named the following:

The Madonna with the Rabbit; after Correggio.
Leda and the Swan, and Leda bathing; after the same.
La Zingarella; after the same.
The young Girl with a Dog; after Greuze.
The Lady preparing for Bed, and Paris and Helen.

Porporati died at Turin in 1816.]

PORRO, GIROLAMO, an Italian engraver on wood and on copper, born at Padua about the year 1520. He executed the plates for the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, published at Venice in 1548. He also engraved in a tasteful and delicate style, the vignettes, amounting to nearly one hundred, for a book entitled Impressi degli uomini illustri, by Camillo Camilli. His last work was a set of wooden cuts for the Funerali degli Antichi, by Tommaso Porcacchi, published at Venice in 1591. [This work was published in 1574, after which there is no account of any other by Porro; but Zani says he operated in 1604.]

PORTA, BACCIO DELLA, called FRÀ BARTOLOMEO DI S. MARCO. This eminent painter was born in the territory of Savignano, near Florence, in 1469. When he was very young, he became a disciple of Cosimo Roselli, at Florence, whose residence being near the gate of St. Peter, he acquired the name of Baccio della Porta. After passing some years under that master, he applied himself to an assiduous study of the works of Lionardo da Vinci, whose grandeur of relief, and admirable chiaro-scuro, were the particular objects of his admiration. In company with his friend, Mariotto Albertinelli, he modelled and copied from the ancient bassi-relievi, by which he acquired a breadth of light and shadow, which is one of the most striking characteristics of his style. His first works were of a small size, and very highly finished, gracefully composed and designed. Such are his two cabinet pictures in the Florentine Gallery, representing the Nativity and the Circumcision; but he afterwards aspired to a grander style, and in his fresco of the Last Judgment, in a chapel of S. Maria Nuova, evinced powers of a superior cast. He was the particular friend of the celebrated Dominican Savonarola, and is said to have been urged, by the too rigid scruples of that unfortunate zealot, to destroy all his studies and designs, on account of their nudity. He was employed in the convent of St. Mark, when the officers of justice, by order of Alexander VI., broke into the monastery to seize the person of Savonarola previous to his execution; and the tumult it occasioned, by the resistance of the monks, is said to have intimidated him to such a degree, that he made a vow to devote himself to a monastic life, if he should escape the danger. In 1500 he took the habit of St. Dominick, and was afterwards usually called by the name of Il Frate.

When Raffaëlle visited Florence, in 1504, he formed a friendship with Frà Bartolomeo, from whom he received some instruction in the principles of colouring and the folding of his drapery; and, in return, taught Il Frate the rules of perspective. In a short time afterwards he visited Rome, where he was so struck with the works of Michael Angelo and Raffaëlle, that, from modesty, he only attempted to paint two single figures of St. Peter and St. Paul, preserved in the palace of the Quirinal. On his return to Florence, removed from such formidable competitors, he painted several altar-pieces for the churches of his order, which proved how much he had strengthened his style by his journey to Rome. His design approached to that of Raffaëlle in grace and grandeur, and he surpassed him in the boldness of his relief, and the rich impasto of his colouring. His compositions, like those of his contemporaries, usually represented the subjects then mostly in demand for conventual situations, the Virgin with the Infant, surrounded with Saints; but he diversified the formality of these objects, by embellishing them with magnificent architecture and groups of angels, or celestial choristers, composed and designed with elegance and taste. Some of his rivals had accused him of being incapable of designing the figure on a large scale, and he refuted the calumny by painting his celebrated figure of St. Mark, in the Florentine Gallery, regarded as a prodigy of art, and which occasioned a learned traveller to remark, that it appeared to him a large Grecian statue metamorphosed into a painting. The jealousy of his opponents charged him with being ignorant of the anatomy of the human body, until he painted a picture of St. Sebastian, so correctly designed, and of so perfect a form, that it excited universal admiration, and was judged by the monks to be too beautiful a figure to be publicly exposed in their church. Several of the principal works of Frà Bartolomeo were taken by the French from the churches at Florence, and are now amidst the spoils in the Louvre; among which are his celebrated picture, formerly in the church of S. Marco, representing the Virgin sitting on a throne, accompanied by St. Peter, St. Bartholomew, and other saints, presiding at the mystical marriage of St. Catherine with the infant Christ; the Four Evangelists, taken from the church of the Nunziata, and others. This distinguished painter died in 1517. [The second picture in the Louvre is not the Four Evangelists. It represents St. John the Baptist, St. Paul, St. Francis, St. Jerome, the Magdalene, and St. Margaret, doing homage to the Virgin, who is seated on a throne. The angel Gabriel appears above, holding a lily branch, and announcing his mission to the Virgin. The picture is dated 1515, and therefore one of his latest works.]

PORTA, GIUSEPPE, called SALVIATI. This painter was born at Castel Nuovo, in the Grafagnana, in 1535. He was sent to Rome when he was young, and was placed in the school of Francesco Salviati, a Florentine painter, whose character of design he followed, and acquired the name of the younger Salviati, by which he is more generally known than his own. He had already arrived at considerable proficiency, when his instructor was invited to Venice, whither he was accompanied by his pupil, and having combined somewhat of the design of the Roman school with the Venetian colouring, his works were sufficiently admired in that capital to induce him to establish himself there, where he met with the most flattering encouragement. He was employed by the senate, in conjunction with some of the most distinguished artists of his time, in ornamenting the palace and library of St. Mark, where he painted the Sibyls, the Prophets, and the Cardinal Virtues; and for the chapel, the dead Christ with the Marys. His reputation reached Rome, whither he was invited by Pius IV., where he was employed in the Sala Reale, and painted the Emperor Frederick I. doing homage to Alexander III. Having finished these, and other considerable works for that pontiff, for which he was munificently rewarded, he returned to Venice, where he painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices, particularly an Assumption, for the church of the Padri Servi; and the Annunciation, in the chapel of the Incurabili. In the church degli Angeli, at Murano, is one of his finest works, representing a Descent from the Cross, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John. His compositions show the fertility of his genius, and his design is characterized by the energy of the Florentine school; though, like many of those who have emulated the daring contour of Buonaroti, without possessing his learning and taste, he is occasionally strained and extravagant in the delineation of the muscles: his colouring is often tender and harmonious; but towards the latter part of his life was occasionally languid and monotonous. He died in 1585.

Papillon mentions this artist as an excellent engraver on wood. That writer asserts, that he had seen, in the possession of M. Villayer, at Paris, about a dozen wooden cuts by him, representing Prophets and Sibyls, and a print of Cupid and Psyche. He possessed himself a print of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, signed Giuseppe Salviati, executed in an admirable style, with a fine expression in the heads; and another representing the Academy of Arts and Sciences, signed Joseph Porta Grafagninus. [Lanzi says that he died in 1570, aged 50. Zani, that he painted in 1542, and in 1566. He gives an inscription from a picture: Joseph Garfagninus, Anno 1542. With respect to the wood engravings, he is of opinion that though designed by him, they are executed by an anonymous hand. They are, however, inscribed Joseph Porta Grafagninus.]

[PORTENGEN, PIERRE, a painter of Utrecht, and scholar of Paul Moreelze, flourished about 1638. He painted landscapes in the manner of Jan Both, but in the handling of his trees he is very inferior to that master.]

[PORTER, ROBERT KER, was born at Durham in 1780, and passed his boyhood in Edinburgh, whither his mother had removed on the death of her husband, an officer in the army. Here he made acquaintance with the celebrated Flora Macdonald. In consequence of his admiration of a battle-piece in that lady's possession, representing some action in the affair of '45, and which she explained to him in animated language, he determined on becoming himself a painter of battles. This occurred when he was only nine or ten years old. From this time he was continually sketching similar subjects, which induced his mother to take him to West, the president of the Royal Academy, who, struck with the spirit of his sketches, immediately procured him admission as a student. His progress was rapid, and in 1793 he was commissioned to paint an altar-piece for Shoreditch church. In the following year he painted a picture of Christ allaying the Storm, which he presented to the Roman Catholic chapel at Portsea; and in 1798, St. John preaching, for St. John's college at Cambridge. These pictures showed wonderful precocity; but in 1800 he astonished the public by the exhibition of The Storming of Seringapatam, a picture 120 feet in extent, representing with Homeric fire and animation the details of an exploit of British valour never surpassed. It is said that he was only six weeks employed in the execution, and yet no part was neglected. Unfortunately this picture was destroyed by fire, but the sketches exist, and the engravings by Vendramini will preserve the remembrance, and be some evidence of its merits. He painted several other renowned actions, among which are the Battle of Agincourt, for the city of London; the Battle of Alexandria, and the Death of Sir Ralph Abercromby. In 1804 he went to Russia, and was appointed painter to the emperor; in 1808 he accompanied Sir John Moore to the Peninsula, and attended throughout the campaign to the conclusion of that hero's career at the battle of Corunna. After this he paid a second visit to Russia, where he married the Princess Mary, the daughter of Prince Theodore de Shorbatoff. After his return to England he published, in 1813, an Account of the Russian Campaign, and was knighted by the Prince Regent in the same year. He afterwards published an account of his travels in Georgia, Persia, America, ancient Babylon, and other places, with numerous engravings of portraits, costumes, and antiquities. In this work are excellent designs, in outline, from the fine characteristic sculptures of Nakshi Roustan, Nakshi Rajab, Shiraz, and Persepolis. This work is extremely valuable, as it shows the great inaccuracies that exist in the representations, of figures and other objects, in the publications of preceding travellers. Being appointed British consul at Venezuela, he resided at Caracas until 1841, and continued to employ his pencil. He painted while there three pictures of sacred subjects; Christ instituting the Eucharist, Christ blessing a little Child, and an Ecce Homo. He also painted the portrait of the celebrated Bolivar. In 1841 he paid his last visit to St. Petersburg, where the cold proved too intense for his constitution, after being inured to the warmth of Venezuela, and he was preparing for his return to England when he was struck by a fit of apoplexy, and expired on the 2nd of May, 1842.]

PORTIO, an obscure engraver, who lived about the year 1700. His name is affixed to a few portraits and other book-plates. [Zani calls him Amiello.]

[PORTO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DEL, an engraver, who flourished about the year 1503, and marked his prints with the letters J. B. and a bird. It is not certain that the above name is correct, but he is called Gio. Bat. del Porto by Zani; and Bartsch has described five etchings by him, and three wood engravings after his designs, all bearing his mark, but without dates, in vol. xiii. of P. G. Bruliot, Dict. of Mon. part ii. N^o. 2860, has noticed one representing Two Infants joined together, a Cat with three heads, and an Egg of a singular form. At the bottom is the following inscription: ANNO. POST. CHRISTI. ORTUM. MDIII. XVI. KL. APRILIS. PONT. MAX. TENENTE. ALEXANDRO. VI. NATA. SUNT. ROME. EODEM. DIE. HÆC. MONSTRA. DUO. INFANTES. IN. VTERO. CONIUNCTI. ET. CATUS. TRICEPS. ET. OVVM. GALLI. IN. FORMAM. HANC. QUAM. SUPRA. EFFINKIMUS. I. B. and the bird. Largueur, Ap. 71., Hauteur, Ap. 31. There was also a print in Sir Mark Sykes's sale with the mark. It represents a Figure of Rome. A female seated, her profile turned to the left; she wears a helmet, and holds a small figure of Victory in the right hand. The mark is at the bottom on the left. H. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ in. The print of the two monstrous children joined together, which is in the British Museum, has been noticed among those of Nicoletto da Modena, whose name it bears: it is but a part of the subject above described.]

PORTUCAL. According to Mr. Strutt, this artist was the engraver of a small upright plate, representing a female figure weeping, and pouring water from a cup. It is very indifferently engraved, in imitation of the style of Aldegrever.

PORZEL, ELIAS, a German engraver on wood, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1700. Professor Christ, without specifying any of his works, gives the following as the marks usually found upon his prints Æ. R. [Nagler says that he was born at Isny in Suabia, about 1622, and died at Nuremberg in 1722. He was a carver in wood, and engraved some Bible prints.]

POSSENTI, BENEDETTO. According to Malvasia, this artist was a native of Bologna, and was brought up in the school of the Caracci. He excelled in painting landscapes, sea-ports, embarkations, and battle-pieces, which were held in considerable estimation.

POSSENTI, GIOVANNI PIETRO, was the son and scholar of Benedetto Possenti, born at Bologna in 1618. His genius led him to paint battles and attacks of cavalry, in which he not only surpassed his father, but was regarded as the ablest painter of his time, in that branch of the art. His talents were not confined to those subjects, and he acquired no mean reputation by some altar-pieces he painted for the churches at Bologna and Padua. One of his most esteemed productions is a picture in the church of S. Lorenzo, in the latter city, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint. [He died in 1659.]

POST, or POOST, FRANCIS. This painter was born at Haerlem about the year 1620. He was the son of John Post, a glass-stainer of some celebrity, who taught him the rudiments of design. It is not known whether he had the advantage of any other instruction, but before he was twenty years of age he discovered sufficient ability to recommend him to the protection of Prince Maurice, who engaged him in his service, and he accompanied that prince in the voyage he undertook to the West Indies and South America. During a residence of two years, he made numerous drawings of the most interesting views in that country, from which, on his return to Holland, he painted several large pictures for the palace of Ryksdorp, near Wassenaer. Houbraken speaks in very favourable terms of the talents of this artist as a landscape painter. His pencil is light, yet firm; his colouring clear and agreeable; and his trees and plants are touched with neatness and spirit. He died at Haerlem in 1680. We have several spirited etchings by this artist, among which are the following:

- A set of Views in Brazil; from designs made by himself.
- A View of the Gulf of All Saints; Fr. Poost, Jec. 1645.
- A View of Cape St. Augustine; the same inscription.
- A View of the Isle of Thamaraca; the same.

[His smaller landscapes, Views in India and America, occur sometimes in sales, but are held of very little account. They have, however, all the appearance of being painted from nature.]

POT, HENRY. According to Descamps, this artist was born at Haerlem about the year 1600. It is not said under whom he studied, but he was a reputable painter of history. Houbraken celebrates a picture by this master, representing Judith with the Head of Holofernes; and mentions in very favourable terms a large picture of a Triumphant Car of one of the Princes of Orange, in the Princenhof at Haerlem. He was also a distinguished portrait painter, of which he has given proof in a large picture in the hall of the archers, at Haerlem, in which he has represented the principal officers of that society. [His name was Hendrik Gerritz Pot. It is supposed that he received some instruction from Frank Hals. He died in 1656.]

POTHOVE, H., an obscure engraver in mezzotint, by whom we have a few portraits, very indifferently executed.

[POTHOVEN, HENRI, born at Amsterdam in 1725, was a scholar of Philip Vandyck. He painted portraits and cabinet pictures in the manner of his master. He imitated satin, velvet, lace, and carpets, very successfully, and the other accessories which he introduced in his small family pictures. He understood the nude and designed figures correctly. His penciling is good, and his colouring agreeable. As late as 1791 it is said he painted the portrait of Professor David Ruhnkenius. He also engraved, in mezzotint, an old Man reading a Book by the light of a Candle which he holds in his right hand, which Brulliot has noticed; and many others, if Balkema is correct, who says that he applied himself much to it. He died about 1795.]

POTMA, JAMES, [or JACOB,] was a native of Workum, in Friesland, born about the year 1610, and was a scholar of Wybrant de Gheest. He painted history and portraits, but was particularly eminent in the latter. The greater part of his life was passed at the different courts in Germany, where he was much employed as a portrait painter. He died at Vienna in 1684.

[POTRELLÉ, JEAN LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1788, was a scholar of David, Tardieu, and Desnoyers. He gave early proof of his talents, and in 1806 obtained the second grand prize for engraving. He has produced several plates of subjects by the Italian masters, and also of portraits of distinguished persons. Among them are,

- Portrait of Giulio Romano; after the picture in the Museum.
- Portrait of Michel Angelo; after the picture by himself.
- Louis XVIII.; after Gerard.
- Cupids; after the same.
- Portraits of Raphael, and N. Poussin.
- Portrait of David; after the picture by Navet.
- Prince Schwartzenberg; after Gerard.
- Cupid and Psyche; after David.
- Portrait of Dr. Dubois.
- The Course of Love, in 6 plates; after Gerard.

POTTER, PETER, was born at Enkhuysen about the year 1595. Little more is known of this artist than that he painted landscapes, with scriptural and other subjects, which, if we may judge from the prints engraved from them by Peter Nolpe, must have possessed considerable merit. They represent the Four Seasons and the Four Elements, the Prophet Elias speaking to the Woman of Sarepta, and St. Paul the Hermit nourished in the Desert by an Eagle.

POTTER, PAUL. This admirable painter of animals was the son of the preceding artist, born at Enkhuysen in 1625, and was instructed in the art by his father. Before he had attained his fifteenth year his works were held in the highest estimation, and he was regarded as the most promising artist of his time. He established himself at the Hague, where his pictures were so much sought after, that, with more than common assiduity, he could with difficulty keep pace with the demand for his works. Maurice, Prince of Orange, was one of his most zealous admirers, for whom he painted some of his finest pictures. The landscapes of Potter are usually subordinate to his cattle, and seldom extend beyond a pasture, with a stump of a tree, a farm-house, or a hovel; but these are represented with uncommon fidelity, and his animals are designed with a correctness that is beyond all praise. He chiefly excelled in painting cows, sheep, goats, &c., which he grouped in a most picturesque manner. His pictures usually exhibit a brilliant effect of sunshine; and there is a lustrous glitter in his colouring, which is peculiar to himself. His touch is firm and free, and his pencil unusually full and flowing, although his pictures are highly finished. Though he generally painted on a small scale, he was not incapable of more energetic exertions. There was formerly in the collection of the Prince of Orange, a picture of a herdsman and cattle, as large as life, designed and painted with surprising truth and character; it is now in the gallery of the Louvre. His cabinet pictures are, however, preferable to those of a large size. He designed every object from nature; and it was his constant practice, in his walks in the fields, the only recreation he allowed himself from constant application, to sketch in a book every object that attracted his attention. An unremitting and laborious attention to his art had a fatal influence upon a constitution naturally weak and delicate, and he fell a victim to his assiduity in the bloom of life, in 1654, in the twenty-ninth year of his age. We have some charming etchings by this celebrated artist, drawn with great spirit and correctness, and executed in a very masterly style; they are as follow:

A set of eight plates of Cows, Oxen, and other animals, with a Bull on the title; Paulus Potter, f.

A set of five plates of Horses; the same inscription.

A Mountainous Landscape, with cattle and a herdsman; Paulus Potter, in. et f. 1649.

A Landscape, with a shepherd playing on a pipe, and a flock of sheep and goats.

A great number of the designs of Paul Potter have been spiritedly etched by Mark de Bye.

[Instead of entering into a dissertation on the merits of the highly estimated works of this eminent master, it is better at once to refer the inquirer to vol. v. and Supplement of Smith's "Catalogue raisonné of the Works of the Dutch and Flemish Painters," where he will find descriptions of about 120 pictures by Paul Potter, (allowing for a few repetitions,) and many curious particulars regarding them. It may, however, be interesting to some to have a few examples of the prices at which choice specimens have been sold at public sales, (the truest test of their value when fairly conducted,) to show the progressive rise in their estimate during the last eighty years. It is true, as Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuyss observes in his remarks on the works of this master in his "Review of the Lives and Works of some of the most eminent Painters," that the diminished value of money should be taken into consideration. But the diminution in the one can hardly be considered equal to the rise in the other. To give instances as they occur. Four Oxen in a Meadow, sold in 1750 for 280 florins, or about £25 sterling; in 1812 it rose to £320; and in 1815 was purchased by the Emperor of Russia for about £2800: it is now in the Hermitage at Petersburg. A View in Holland, measuring about 18 inches by 14, sold, 1780, for 3200 francs in the Poullain sale; in 1844, at the sale of Mr. Harman's pictures, it brought £840. Two Cows and a Bull in a Meadow, or, as it is generally called, The Young Bull, measuring 17 inches by 15, sold in 1771 for about £186 in the Braamcamp sale; in 1823 it brought 1210 guineas. The Dairy Farm, measuring about 20 inches by 24, sold in Le Perrier's sale in 1817 for £689; and rose progressively to £1228 in Lapeyriere's sale in 1825. A Pastoral Scene, 23 inches by 21, sold in Lindert de Neuville's sale in 1765 for about £135; in 1783 for £678, in Van Locquet's sale; and in 1829, in Lord Gwydir's, for 1205 guineas. Many other examples might be adduced, but these will show the high estimation in which the master's works are held. But the reader should be made acquainted with an anecdote respecting the large picture of the Hague, known as the Young Bull. It was sold by public auction on the 19th of August, 1749, at Haerlem, in the collection of a gentleman of the name of Willem Fabricius, for 630 florins, about £56 sterling. How many thousands would it bring now?—This is the picture referred to in the text as being in the gallery of the Louvre: it was restored to Holland in 1816.

Nor are his drawings proportionately less esteemed than his pictures. In M. Goll's sale at Amsterdam, Messrs. Woodburn gave about £200 for one in Indian ink, heightened with white chalk, measuring about 13½ inches by 8½; and in the same sale the Chevalier Claussins gave for another done with the pen and worked in Indian ink, measuring 10½ inches by 7½, £163.—Bartsch describes eighteen etchings by Paul Potter, including the Head of a Cow, a Cow lying down under a Tree, and the Zabucaia; and also the eight, falsely attributed to him, which he believes are really by Jean Visscher. Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has given an account of the variations that appear in several of those by Paul Potter, described by Bartsch; and has added two prints to the list, the Head of a Cow, and the Portrait of Potter. The latter, which is of extreme rarity, (Weigel knew of no other,) was formerly in the collection of Mr. Sheepshanks, and is now in the British Museum. Messrs. Smith, brothers, of Lisle Street, London, the dealers in ancient prints, have made memoranda of two more: 1. The Head of a Bull, profile directed to the right, a log of wood suspended from the neck by a chain, halter on the head, the eye partly closed gives the animal a sleepy expression; the trunk of a tree on the left. Length 3¾ in., Height 2¼ in. At Amsterdam. 2. A very small etching of a Bull.]

[POTUILL, HENRI, a painter, who, it is said, imitated with much art the manner of Gerard Dou. As only one picture is recorded as by him, and that in the catalogue of Hoet and Terwesten, who say it represents an animated Conversation of Peasants, his name is admitted here merely to allow some one to fall back upon, when there is a question of the authenticity of a Gerard Dou. When Dutch writers point out these imitators, they are worth noticing.]

POULLEAU, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1749. He has engraved several plates of ruins and architecture; among which are the following:

Ruins of a Temple; after de Machy.

A View of the Interior of the Church of the Magdalene, at Ville l'Evêque; after Contau d'Ivry.

POURBUS. See PORBUS.

POUSSIN, NICHOLAS. This distinguished painter was born at Andely, in Normandy, in 1594. He was descended from a noble family, originally of Soissons, whose fortunes had been ruined by the civil wars in the time of Charles IX. and Henry III., and his father, John Poussin, with a small inheritance, served in the army under Henry IV. Preferring the cultivation of science to military pursuits, the young Poussin had already distinguished himself by the solidity of his judgment, and his progress in literature, when a fondness for drawing, and an acquaintance formed with Quintin Varin, an artist of some eminence, induced him to solicit the permission of his father to adopt painting as a profession.

After receiving the incipient principles of the art from Varin, in 1612, when he was eighteen, he visited Paris in search of improvement. The arts were at that period at a very low ebb in the capital of France, and the only assistance he appears to have received was from a Flemish portrait painter, named Ferdinand Elle. Such an instructor was little qualified to forward the sublime ideas he had formed of the art, and he quitted him in a few months. Having procured some prints from the works of Raffaele and Giulio Romano, he studied them with admiration and delight; and he improved his design, by drawing after casts from the ancient statues. Some of his first essays in painting were the pictures in the church of the Capuchins at Blois, and some bacchanalian subjects for the chateau of Chiverny. His talents, and the endowments of his mind, procured him a ready admission into the society of men of letters; and the Cavaliere Marino, the celebrated Italian poet, being at that time at Paris, conceived so favourable an opinion of his genius, that he invited him to accompany him to Rome. Nothing could have been more agreeable to his inclination than such a proposal, as he had long felt the most ardent desire of seeing the metropolis of art; and it would have been particularly gratifying to him to have visited it in company so congenial with his taste; but he was at that time engaged on his picture of the Death of the Virgin, for the church of Notre Dame, and other works; and he was under the necessity of reluctantly declining the invitation, promising to follow him to Italy as soon as circumstances would permit. In 1624 he found himself at liberty to indulge his inclination, and on his arrival at Rome was kindly received by his friend, who introduced him to the protection of Cardinal Barberini. This patronage, however, was of no immediate advantage to him, as the Cardinal soon after left Rome, on his legation to France and Spain; and the Cavaliere Marino dying soon after his arrival, he was reduced to very embarrassed circumstances. A stranger, and unfriended, in a large city, where his growing abilities were not known, it was with difficulty he could maintain himself by the produce of his works, which he was under the necessity of disposing of at miserable prices, hardly more than the expense of his canvass and colours. Reduced to a state of indigence and obscurity, which would have sunk a less courageous lover of the art into disgust and despondency, he comforted himself with the reflection that he could subsist on little, that he was still at Rome, where he could console himself with the study of Raffaele and the antique. As he lodged in the same house with Francis du Quesnoy, called il Fiammingo, whose finances were at that time not more flourishing than his own, he lived in habits of intimacy with that eminent sculptor, with whom he studied, and modelled after the most celebrated statues and bas reliefs. His genius had too great a conformity with that of Raffaele, for him not to distinguish the works of that illustrious painter above those of any other artist; and he contemplated his principal productions with an enthusiasm bordering on adoration. The admirable expression and purity of design which characterize the best pictures of Domenichino, rendered the works of that painter particularly interesting to him, and he regarded his Communion of St. Jerome as the second picture at Rome.

The Cardinal Barberini having returned from his embassy, engaged Poussin to execute some works for him; and if the patronage of that prelate did not load him with riches, it at least rescued him from poverty. He painted for his protector his celebrated picture of the Death of Germanicus, and the Taking of Jerusalem by the Emperor Titus, so much to the satisfaction of his employer, that he procured for him the commission to paint a large picture for St. Peter's, representing the Martyrdom of St. Erasmus, now in the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo. These productions established his reputation, and recommended him to the friendship of the Cavaliere del Pozzo, for whom he painted his first series of the Seven Sacraments, which were afterwards brought to this country, and are now in the possession of the Duke of Rutland. He afterwards painted another set of the Sacraments, with variations, for M. de Chantelou, which were among the principal ornaments of the Orleans' collection, and now form a part of the collection of the Marquis of Stafford. The celebrity he had now acquired at Rome reached France; and in 1639 he was invited to return to Paris by M. de Noyers, minister and superintendent of the buildings to Louis XIII., at the instance of the king, who honoured him on the occasion with a letter, written by himself, assuring him of his favour and protection. Wedded to the great objects of art with which he was surrounded, and happy in the tranquillity with which he prosecuted his studies, in the sojourn of taste and science, he received this flattering invitation with regret. The urgency of his friends at length prevailed, and he arrived at Paris in 1640, where he was received with distinction, appointed principal painter to the king, and accommodated with apartments in the Tuileries. He was commissioned to paint an altar-piece for the chapel of St. Germain en Laye, where he produced his admirable work of the Last Supper, and was engaged to decorate the gallery of the Louvre, for which he had prepared the designs and some of the cartoons, representing the Labours of Hercules, when he was assailed by the machinations of Vouet and his adherents; and even the landscape painter Fouquieres presumed to criticise his works, and to detract from his merit. Disgusted with these cabals, he turned a longing eye to the quiet felicity he had abandoned at Rome, and having obtained permission of the king to return to Italy, for the pretended purpose of settling his domestic concerns and bringing his wife to France, he quitted the residence of tumult and intrigue, with a firm resolution never to return. After his arrival at Rome he confined himself chiefly to pictures of an easel size, for which he had a continued demand, and although he was constantly employed, such was the modest and moderate price he required for them, which it was his constant practice to mark on the back of his canvass, that he did not amass any considerable fortune. He always preferred a state of tranquil mediocrity to ostentation; and it is reported by Felibien, that the Cardinal Mancini, who frequently visited him, having staid with him in the evening later than usual, Poussin lighted him to his carriage, with the lamp in his hand: "I pity you, Poussin," said the Cardinal, "that you have not one domestic for such an office."—"And I," replied Poussin, "pity your Excellency much more, that you are obliged to keep so many." He continued to lead the same retired and studious life till he reached his seventy-first year, and died in 1665.

During a period of twenty-three years after his return to Rome from Paris, he continued to enrich the different cabinets of Europe with a great number of his pictures, which will ever be regarded amongst their most interesting ornaments. Although it is easy to distinguish the works of Nicholas Poussin from those of any other master, he nevertheless was attentive to vary his style, and the tone of his colour, distinguishing them by a firmer or more delicate touch, a tint more cheerful or austere, a site more cultivated or wild, according to the character of his subject, and the impression he designed it to make. In one of his letters to M. de Chantelou, he observes, that he had applied to painting the theory which the Greeks had introduced into their music; the Dorian for the grave and serious, the Phrygian for the vehement and passionate, the Lydian for the soft and tender, and the Ionian for the riotous festivity of his bacchanals. His study of the antique inspired him with an attachment, which partook of the fervour of devotion; his veneration for the ancient statues and bas reliefs was such, that from his constant study of them, he became as intimately acquainted with the rites and ceremonies of the ancients, as with those of his own time; and in regarding his favourite pictures representing subjects of the fable, or of the Heathen Mythology, the mind is carried back into antiquity, and nothing is seen to disturb the illusion. It was the opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds, that he even wished to give to his works the air of the paintings of antiquity, and it is certain that he studied with attention, and copied the celebrated relique of those remote ages, the Nozze, in the Villa Aldobrandini. This fine copy is in the gallery of the Palazzo Dorio. Of the moderns, Raffaele was the model he most followed, to whom he can hardly be said to be inferior in the sublimity of his conceptions, the select beauty of his forms, the grace and dignity of his attitudes, and his just and animated expression of the passions. His compositions, the result of a learned and profound meditation, are simple, grand, and judicious; and it will not be denied, that his works are distinguished by a refined and classical observance of the propriety of costume.

N. Poussin has been accused by his countryman, De Piles, with being cold and feeble in his colouring, but it did not occur to that critic that brilliancy of tints, and splendour of colour, would ill accord with the solidity and simplicity of effect so essential to heroic subjects; and that the sublime and majestic would be degraded by a union with the florid and the gay. The elevation of his mind is conspicuous in every thing he undertook; and we are not less impressed with the beauty and grandeur of the scenery he displays in his landscapes, than with the dignified characteristics that distinguish his historical works.

[Notwithstanding the length of this article, it is due to the inquirer to give the discriminating criticisms of the late professor of painting, Thomas Phillips, on the works of Nicholas Poussin, as delivered by that competent judge in his third Lecture on the History of Painting. "Nicolo Poussin merits a station in the class of original painters; of those who extended the application of the art, if not of its mechanical power. Raffaele and Julio Romano had preceded him in study from the remnants of antiquity, but Poussin's perception of the use that might be made of them was totally distinct from theirs; and, if less grand, not less imaginative. It was also more strictly imitative of ancient forms, customs, dresses, and appropriate scenery; of all which he has left us a most useful display. Though he drew the principal part of his materials from the works of ancient times, and his combinations of them from the inspirations of the poetry and mythology of the same period; yet those combinations are so just, the incidents and accompaniments so well chosen, and exhibited with such an air of truth, that the invention is truly his own; as distinct from those of other men, as are the works of Michael Angelo. His historical pictures, properly so called, are founded upon the perception of the value of truth. Perhaps it may be said that he pursued incident too far, and overlaboured the illustration of a fact; and there can be no doubt that sometimes is the case, and reflection seems to have constrained his imagination in too great a degree. Yet even then, the evil is not that affectation found its way into his pictures, but only a superfluity of true imagery; embarrassing, indeed, to the observer, abstracting his attention from the main end of the picture, and, consequently, in opposition to the dictates of good taste. The landscapes of Nicolo Poussin, transcripts of the districts in the neighbourhood of Rome, or of the mountains that bound the Campagna, convey in their arrangements and tone of colour a full sense of the dignified perceptions of his mind. The grandeur of their forms, the well-regulated union of their parts, and the depth and richness of their tones of colouring, never fail to impress us with elevated ideas, and supply us with poetic imagery." Many interesting particulars of Nicolo Poussin will be found in his Life, prefixed to a descriptive account of his works in the 8th volume of Smith's Catalogue raisonné. This account embraces upwards of 340 of his known pictures, and in many instances traces their history from the time when they were painted; it also mentions the names of the present possessors, and of the principal artists by whom they have been engraved. In the English National Gallery there are eight pictures by him.]

POUSSIN, GASPARD DUGHET, called GASPARD. This eminent artist was born at Rome in 1613. His family was originally of France, of the name of Dughet, but his father had settled at Rome, and Nicholas Poussin having married his sister, he acquired the appellation of Gaspar Poussin. He became a scholar of his brother-in-law, who, perceiving his decided genius for landscape painting, advised him to devote his studies to that particular pursuit. Aided by the counsels of Nicholas, and under the direction of his judgment and taste, Gaspar became one of the most celebrated painters of landscape that the art has produced. His first manner was rather dry and hard, but when he had seen some of the pictures of Claude Lorraine, he adopted one more mellow and agreeable. He at length acquired an almost incredible facility of execution, and he is said to have sometimes finished a large picture in a day. His touch is firm and vigorous, and the foliage of each tree and plant bears the peculiar character of its species. His pictures represent the most interesting prospects in the vicinity of Rome,

Tivoli, and Frascati; views which appear to have been selected from whatever the most beautiful nature and the most cultured art can produce to fascinate and delight. The gentle sloping of the mountains, their sides decked with the sequestered villa or the ruined castle; the immense campania intersected with limpid lakes; the murmuring waterfall gushing through rifted rocks, form the features of his enchanting scenery. We sometimes look on this delicious country under the tranquil influence of a serene atmosphere, where the gentle breeze of morning scarcely stirs the leaves, or the evening sun, lengthening the shadow of each tower or tree, augments the grandeur of the classic scene. At other times, we view it agitated by the most terrific convulsions of nature; the lowering tempest blackens all the sky; the forked lightning rives the towering pine, or crumbles the mouldering turret; the impetuous whirlwind, rushing from the hills, sweeps flocks, and herds, and herdsmen from the plain. Every thing in his works breathes elegance or grandeur. Such are the admirable landscapes by Gaspar, formerly in the Colonna palace at Rome, several of which have been brought to this country. His pictures are sometimes embellished with figures by Nicholas Poussin, usually representing some subject of history, or the fable. We have a few slight but masterly etchings by this great artist, they consist of the following:

A set of four circular Landscapes.

A set of four Landscapes, lengthways.

He died at Rome in 1675.

[There are six pictures by Gaspar in the English National Gallery, and many others in the collections of noblemen and gentlemen. Bartsch and Dumesnil describe eight etchings by him, the whole that are believed to be authentic.]

POUSSIN, JOHN DUBERT, called, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Rome about the year 1615, and was taught the elements of design by his relative Nicholas Poussin. His first pursuit was painting, but not succeeding to his expectation, he afterwards devoted himself to engraving, in which he never reached any great degree of perfection. His best prints are engraved after the works of Nicholas Poussin, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

The seven Sacraments; from the pictures painted by Nicholas Poussin, for the Cavaliere del Pozzo, different from those formerly in the Orleans' collection.

Mount Parnassus; after the same.

The Birth of Bacchus; after the same.

The Judgment of Solomon; after the same.

[POUSSIN, LE MAIRE, properly PIERRE LE MAIRE, an engraver, born at Dammartin, near Paris, in 1597. Robert Dumesnil, in the 6th volume of "Le Peintre Graveur Français," has given descriptions of fifteen etchings by him, in the manner of Remi Vubert. He was the intimate friend of Nicolo Poussin, and was called Le Maire Poussin; and, as he was a corpulent man, he was also known as Le gros Le Maire. He died at Gaillon in 1659. But there was another of the name, whom N. Poussin employed to copy his pictures; his baptismal name was François; he was born at Maison-Rouge, near Fontainebleau, in 1620, was received into the Academy in 1656, and died in 1688. This is the painter known in England as Poussin Le Maire by architectural subjects, with figures, evidently from paintings, or drawings, by Nicholas Poussin. Poussin, to distinguish him from his corpulent friend, called him Le petit Le Maire. He is known here only by these copies, or imitations, which are generally porticos, or vestibules of temples, with few figures. They are well painted, and somewhat brighter in colour, but want the antique dignity of the originals.]

[POWELL, C. M. an English marine painter, who flourished during the first twenty years of the present century. His works are numerous, as he was principally employed by the dealers, but little of his history is known, further than that he was originally a sailor, and self-taught in the art of painting. In the management of his vessels he shows his practical knowledge; and his compositions are well understood by seamen. Many of his pictures are injured from being varnished too early, to satisfy the demand of his employers and their customers. Powell was a clever artist, but an imprudent man; hence he was always in a state of thralldom, and had frequently the mortification of seeing his pictures sold by his liberal patrons for five times the sum he had received. His more carefully painted pictures are still esteemed, and obtain good prices.]

POWLE, GEORGE, a modern English engraver, who flourished about the year 1776. He was a pupil of Worlidge, and has engraved some portraits in his style, among which is that of Sir Robert Berkeley, Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

POZZI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, born at Rome in 1750. In conjunction with Coppa and Perini, he engraved some of the plates from the statues in the Clementine Gallery. We have also the following prints by him:

The Portrait of Pius VI. Pont. Max.; Fr. Pozzi, sc.

The Aurora; after the painting by Guercino in the Villa Ludovisi; F. Pozzi, 1780.

POZZI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Baglione, this artist was a native of Milan, but went to Rome when young, and was employed by Sixtus V. in the palace of St. John of Lateran, and in the library of the Vatican. In the Sistine chapel in S. Maria Maggiore, he painted the Visitation of the Virgin, and the Angel appearing to St. Joseph in his dream. This promising artist died at the premature age of 28 years, much regretted by his contemporaries.

POZZI, Rocco. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1750. He engraved several of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino, and executed some of the prints for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples.

POZZI, STEFANO, was a native of Rome, and was first a scholar of Carlo Maratti, and afterwards studied under Agostino Masucci. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Rome, which place him at least on an equality with his contemporaries. His design is grander than that of Masucci, and his colouring is more vigorous and more chaste. In the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo is a picture by him of S. Gregorio; and in the church of il Nome S. S. di Maria, an altar-piece representing the Death of St. Joseph. He died at Rome in 1768.

POZZO, ANDREA. This painter was born at Trent in 1642. Without the assistance of a master, he became an eminent architect and painter, by the strength of his own genius, supported by the most assiduous application. By studying the works of the most distinguished artists of the Venetian school, he became an excellent colourist, and during a residence of several years at Rome he improved his style of design, by contemplating the best works of art in that metropolis. At an early period of his life he became a religious of the society of the Jesuits, and was afterwards chiefly occupied in ornamenting the churches of his order. He resided some time at Genoa, where he painted for the Congregazione de Mercanti, four pictures of the Life of our Saviour, in which he emulated the style of Rubens, which he had studied from the celebrated works that distinguished painter had executed during a long residence at Turin. Of his works in oil, one of the most esteemed is his picture of S. Francesco Borgia, in the church del Gesu at Rome. He was more eminent in fresco, in which he greatly distinguished himself. The ceiling of the church of St. Ignatius at Rome is regarded as one of the most able productions of his time, for the ingenuity and copiousness of the composition, the brilliancy of the colouring, and the animated freedom of the execution. Such was his extraordinary facility, that Ciro Ferri was accustomed to say, that the horses of other painters moved at a foot's pace, but those of Pozzo were always on the gallop; and Lanzi reports, that he painted the portrait of a cardinal in four hours. He was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Leopold, where he executed some works for the public edifices, and died there in 1709.

POZZO, ISABELLA DAL. In the Nuova Guida di Torino, this lady is mentioned as the paintress of a picture in the church of S. Francesco at Turin, representing the Virgin and Infant, with S. Biagio and other saints, signed with her name, and dated 1666. According to Lanzi, few of her contemporaries in that city could have produced a more creditable performance.

POZZOSERRATO, LODOVICO, called DA TREVIGI. According to Ridolfi, this painter was called da Trevigi, from his long residence in that city, though he was a native of Flanders. He painted landscapes, and was a contemporary of Paul Brill, with whose works his pictures were often put in competition, and were sometimes preferred to them. He excelled in representing the rising and setting of the sun, with a fine degradation of tint in his skies and distances. He also painted land-storms and tempests with an uncommon grandeur of effect. [His family name was Toeput; he was living in 1604.]

PRADIER, CHARLES SIMON, a French engraver, but a native of Geneva, born in 1790, was a scholar of the celebrated Desnoyers. Among his principal plates are several portraits after Gerard; La Vierge aux Ruines, after Raphael; Cupid and Psyche, after the picture by Gerard; Virgil reading the Æneid to Augustus, and Zephyr caressing Flora, after the same; Raphael and the Fornarina, after Ingres; Antiochus, after the same; and some landscapes. He was living in 1841.]

PRADO, BLAS DE, a Spanish painter, who, according to Palomino, was born in the vicinity of Toledo, in 1497, and was a scholar of Alonso Berugete. There are some of his works in the chapel of St. Blas at Toledo, but they are much injured by time and the dampness of the situation. At Madrid there are also some pictures by this artist, particularly an altar-piece, in the church of San Pedro, representing the taking down from the Cross, which is evidently the work of a great master. In the early part of his life he was invited to visit the court of the Emperor of Morocco, to paint a portrait of his daughter, and returned to Spain amply rewarded for his commission. He died at Madrid in 1557. [Blas de Prado was living in 1591, as is evidenced by the picture which he painted in that year for the altar of the Minimes at Toledo. His master was Francisco Comontes, who was living in 1565. It was at the latter part of his life he was sent to Morocco by Philip of Spain, to paint the Emperor's daughter, about the year 1593. Blas de Prado painted many sacred subjects for the churches at Madrid, which were justly considered superb productions. Their merit consisted in the grandeur of the forms, the purity of the drawing, and the simplicity of the composition. He also painted fruit and flowers, which he formed into garlands, in the manner of Daniel Seghers, to surround Madonnas and saints.]

PRAET, STEPHEN DE, a Dutch engraver, of no great merit, by whom we have a print of the head of a Jew Rabbi, after G. Hondius. It is neatly executed, but in a stiff, formal style. He appears to have confined himself to portraits.

PRANKER. Mr. Strutt notices this artist as a modern English engraver, who was much employed by the booksellers. He does not specify any of his works.

PRECIADO, or PREZIADO, DON FRANCISCO. According to Lanzi, this Spanish painter was born at Seville in 1713. He was a scholar of Domingo Martinez, but he visited Rome in 1733, where he entered the school of Sebastiano Conca. On leaving the academy of that master, he painted some pictures for the public edifices at Rome, particularly a Holy Family for the church of the Forty Saints, which is entirely in the style of his instructor. He was appointed painter of the chamber to Ferdinand VI., and director of the Spanish Academy at Rome. There are few of his works in his native country, as he resided the greater part of his life at Rome, where he died in 1789.

PREISLER, JOHN JUSTIN, a German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1698. He was instructed in design by his father, John Daniel Preisler, an artist little known, and afterwards visited Italy, where he resided eight years. On his return to Germany, he gave proof of considerable ability in a picture representing the Entombing of Christ, for one of the churches at Nuremberg. He is, however, more known as an engraver than a painter. We have the following prints by him :

The Four Elements; after Bouchardon.

The Four Quarters of the World; after the same.

A set of fifty plates from the designs of Bouchardon; after the principal antique statues at Rome.

Part of the plates from the ceilings painted by Rubens, in the church of the Jesuits at Antwerp, with the frontispiece, containing the Portraits of Rubens and Vandyck.

PREISLER, GEORGE MARTIN, was the second son of John Daniel Preisler, born at Nuremberg in 1700, and followed his brother John Justin Preisler to Italy, where he resided some years. Huber speaks of him as a painter of portraits; but he is most worthy of notice as an engraver. Besides some plates after the statues in the Dresden Gallery, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Giovanni Dom. Ferretti, Painter; after a picture by himself.

Giovanni Dom. Campiglia, Painter; Gio. D. Campiglia, del.

Egion vander Neer; after his portrait by himself, in the Florentine Gallery. [And many others, of which a list may be found in Nagler.

He was one of the engravers employed by Stosch for his work on antique gems. He died about 1754.] He also engraved a set of twenty-one plates from designs made by John Justin Preisler, after the antique and modern statues at Rome and Florence.

PREISLER, JOHN MARTIN, the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Nuremberg in 1715. He was instructed in engraving by his brother, under whom he made considerable progress; but in 1739 he visited Paris, where he received some lessons from George Frederick Schmidt. In 1744 he was invited to the court of Denmark, and was appointed engraver to the king, and a member of the Academy at Copenhagen, where he died in 1794. We have several plates by this artist, executed in a clear, neat style, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Frederick V., King of Denmark and Norway; Tilo, pinx.

Christian VI., King of Denmark; Wahl, pinx.

Jacobus Benzelius, Episcopus Upsal. 1751.

Otto, Count de Thot; after Kraft.

Klopstock; Juel, pinx. Preisler, sc. 1782.

Equestrian Statue of Frederick V.; after a bronze by J. Saly.

The Cardinal de Bouillon; after Rigaud.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

David and Abigail; after Guido.

Semiramis putting the Crown of Ninus on her head; after the same.

Christ bearing his Cross; after P. Veronese. These two prints were for the collection of the Dresden Gallery.

Ganymede taken up by the Eagle of Jupiter; after Pierre.

A Bacchanalian subject; after the same.

Laban seeking for his Gods; after Cazes.

The Triumph of David; after Trevisani.

Jonas preaching to the Ninevites; after Sal. Rosa.

The Madonna della Seggia; after Raffaele. [And many plates of antique statues in the galleries of Italy and Germany.]

Nagler gives a list of his works.]

PREISLER, VALENTINE DANIEL, was the youngest son of John Daniel Preisler, born at Nuremberg in 1717. We have by him some mezzotinto portraits of the Burgomasters of Zurich, after the designs of J. C. Fuesslin, which, from some caprice, he signed with the name of S. Walch. He also scraped some plates of portraits and other subjects, after pictures in the collection of the King of Denmark. They are very indifferently executed. [He died in 1763 or 1765. Nagler enumerates twenty-six pieces by him.]

PREISLER, JOHN GEORGE. This artist was the son of John Martin Preisler. After receiving some instruction in engraving from his father, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of John George Wille. He has engraved several plates in the neat finished style of his instructor, and in 1787 was made a member of the Academy at Paris. His plate of reception represented Icarus, engraved from a picture by Vien. [He was born at Copenhagen in 1757, and died in 1808.]

PRENNER, ANTHONY JOSEPH VON, a German engraver, born at Vienna about the year 1698. After the death of Jacob Mannl, conjointly with Andrew Altamont, Francis Stampart, John Adam Schmutzer, and other artists, he undertook to engrave all the pictures in the imperial collection. The plates, consisting of 160, were published at Vienna in four volumes, under the title Theatrum artis Pictoriae, &c., each containing forty prints, in the years 1728, 1729, 1731, and 1733. He has scraped a few plates in mezzotinto, but they are inferior to his other works. He also engraved some portraits, among which are the following :

John Gottfried Auerbach, Painter to the Emperor Charles VI.

Count D'Odt, Governor of Vienna; after J. G. Auerbach.

[He died in 1761. Nagler has given a list of his prints, in which he has specified those engraved by him for the Vienna gallery.]

PRENNER, GASPAR, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Vienna about the year 1722. He went young to Italy, and studied painting at Rome for several years. In the church of S. Dorothea there is an altar-piece by this artist. We have a few etchings by this master, some of which are neatly finished with the graver. [He engraved some of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino; and also those for the Illustri fatti Farnesiani, published at Rome in 1744 and 1746. He died about 1766. His name was George Caspar von Prenner; for so he inscribes it on these works.]

PRENNER, JOHN JOSEPH, was the younger son of Joseph Anthony Prenner, and was instructed in engraving by his father. He resided some years in Italy, where he executed some plates for the Museo Fiorentino. He also engraved a set of forty-five prints from the paintings by Taddeo Zuccaro, in the Castle of Caprarolla, representing the most memorable actions of the Farnese family. [This means the same as the preceding; Nagler does not notice John Joseph.]

PRESTEL, JOHN GOTTLIEB, a German painter and engraver, born at Grunebach, in Sraubia, in 1739. After learning the rudiments of design in his native country he went to Venice, where he studied painting under Giuseppe Nogari, and was instructed in engraving by Joseph Wagner. On his return to Germany he resided chiefly at Nuremberg, where he devoted himself almost entirely to engraving. He worked in various styles; and we have a great number of plates by him, most of which are spiritedly etched, and finished in aquatinta. He also engraved several plates in the crayon manner. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

The Portrait of John Gottlieb Prestel, sitting at an easel; from a picture by himself.

The Descent from the Cross; after Raffaele; in chiaro-scuro.

The Virgin with the Dead Christ; after Vandych.

The Holy Family; copied from Albert Durer.

He also engraved several views and landscapes, in which he was assisted by his wife, Maria Catherine Prestel. [Nagler calls him Johann Theophilus, or Gottlieb and Amadeus, and gives a list of 140 prints by him, many of which are after the greatest of the Italian and Dutch masters, and copies of Albert Durer. He died at Frankfort in 1808.]

PRESTEL, MARIA CATHERINE. This ingenious lady was the wife of the preceding artist, and aided him in some of his best plates, particularly in landscape. On account of some disagreement, she separated from him, and came to England in 1786, where she engraved some prints, which have not been surpassed in the particular style in which they are executed. They are very spiritedly etched, and finished in a delicate and picturesque manner in aquatinta. She died in London in 1794. Among others, we have the following prints by her :

Ceres; an oval; after Cipriani.

Four Views, from the designs made by Webber, in his voyage with Captain Cook.

Two other Views; from the same.

Two Landscapes, with horses; after Wouvermans.

A pair of Views, with horses and figures; after Casanova.

Hobbema's Village; after Hobbema.

Evening, with cattle reposing; after Rosa di Tivoli.

Two Landscapes; after Gainsborough.

A View of a Tin Mine; after Loutherbourg.

[Her works are numerous; Nagler gives a list of 73, after Italian, Dutch, and German masters. Her daughter Catherine also engraved in a similar style.]

PRESTON, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1730. He was an artist of little celebrity, whose name is affixed to a bust of Mr. Pope, a slight etching, very indifferently executed. There is also by him a portrait of Admiral Blake, with shipping below.

PRETE, GENOESE. See GALANTINO.

PRETI, CAVALIER MATTIA, called IL CALABRESE. This painter was born at Taverna, in Calabria, in 1613. After passing some time at Parma and Modena, he went to Rome, and was for a short time a scholar of Giovanni Lanfranco. The reputation Guercino had acquired by the novelty and grandeur of his style, induced him to visit Cento, where he became his disciple, and studied under him several years. He afterwards went to Venice and Bologna, where he painted some pictures for the public edifices, by which he acquired considerable reputation. He returned to Rome about the year 1657, where he was employed to paint three pictures for the church of S. Andrea della Valle, representing subjects from the life of that Saint, and which, unfortunately for his fame, were placed immediately under the Four Evangelists, in the angles, so admirably painted by Domenichino. It is not perhaps very derogatory to his talents, to allow that his works are unequal to such a competition. His celebrity reached Malta, whither he was invited by the grand master, Cotoner, who commissioned him to ornament the cathedral with some frescoes, representing subjects from the life of St. John the Baptist, which he executed so much to the satisfaction of his employer, that he conferred on him the knighthood of the order. He afterwards passed some time at Naples, where he painted some considerable works in fresco, in the church of the Carthusians. He possessed a rich and fertile invention, and his compositions are copious and grand; his design is more bold than correct, and his conduct of the chiaro-scuro is characterized by the vigorous contrast that distinguishes the works of Guercino, though generally dark in his shadows. He usually made choice of the most terrific and gloomy subjects; and his pictures frequently represent martyrdoms and scenes of death, to which his sombre style of colouring was particularly appropriate. Disgusted by the admiration bestowed on the works of Luca Giordano, he left Naples, and returned to Malta, where he died in 1699.

PREVITALE, ANDREA. This artist was a native of Bergamo, and, according to the dates on his pictures, mentioned by Tassi, flourished from the year 1506 until 1528. He was one of the most distinguished scholars of Giovanni Bellini, and painted history with great reputation. His early works retained somewhat of the Gothic character of the works of his instructor, in composition and design, and in the minute precision with which he finished the accessorial ornaments. But in the latter part of his life he approached nearly to the modern style; such are his pictures of St. John preaching, in the church of S. Spirito; and his S. Benedetto, in the cathedral at Bergamo. Ridolfi mentions as one of his finest works his Annunciation, at Ceneda, which Titian regarded as one of the ablest productions of the period at which he lived. [His Madonnas are held in the highest estimation, and partake more of the manner of Raphael and Lionarda da Vinci than of Bellini; Lanzi distinguishes two, which he saw at Milan, both surrounded with figures of saints, executed with discrimination and truth. He died of the plague in 1528. He signed some of his pictures ANDREAS BER. PIN. i. e. Andreas Bergomensis, Pinxit.]

PREVOST, BENOIT LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1747. He was a pupil of John Ouvrier, and has engraved a variety of vignettes and other book-plates, in a clear, neat style. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XV. with ornaments, oval; after Cochin.
A. T. Hue, Sculptor; after the same.

BOOK-PLATES.

The Frontispiece to the French Encyclopedia; after the same.
A set of twelve plates for the Abregé chronologique du President Henault.

[Nagler, who describes 26 pieces by him, says he was born in 1740, and died in 1804.]

PREVOST, NICHOLAS. This artist was a native of France, and is mentioned by Florent le Comte as a painter, and a scholar of Claude Vignon. He flourished about the year 1700, and is said by that author to have etched six small plates; but he has not specified the subjects. [It is the Abbé de Marolles who mentions this artist in his catalogue of the date 1666; he calls him Provost. Dumesnil is of opinion that he is the artist that painted the Decollation of St. John for the church of Nôtre Dame at Paris. He describes only one print by him, a Holy Family, signed N. Prevost, Jr.]

[PREVOST, PIERRE, a painter of panoramas and landscapes, was born at Montigny (Eure-et-Loir) in 1766, and died in 1823. He was a scholar of the celebrated Valenciennes. He painted a number of easel pictures, landscapes and ruins, but his principal works were panoramic views, which he was the first to exhibit in France. Among them were Paris, Naples, Amsterdam, London, Antwerp, Athens, Jerusalem, and various others, in which he was assisted by Bouton and Daguerre.]

PREZ, F. DES, a French engraver on wood, who resided at Paris about the year 1573. He executed a large plan of the town of Rochelle, with the additional fortifications, made at the time it was besieged in the civil wars in 1573. It is inscribed, A Paris, par F. des Prez, rue Montorgueil au bon pasteur.

PRICE, an obscure English engraver, by whom we have, among other prints, a very indifferent one of Duncan Campbell.

PRICKE, ROBERT. This artist is mentioned by Vertue among the pupils of Wenceslaus Hollar, whose style he endeavoured to imitate. He engraved the plates for a book of architecture, by Pierre le Meurs.

PRIEST, THOMAS, an English landscape painter, who resided at Chelsea about the year 1738. He chiefly painted views of the Thames, and published a set of eight etchings of views of Chelsea, Mortlake, and other places on the banks of the river. They are executed in a coarse but spirited style.

PRIMATICCIO, FRANCESCO. This distinguished painter was born at Bologna in 1490. He was of a noble family, who, perceiving his strong inclination for the art, first placed him as a disciple under Innocenzio da Imola; but he afterwards studied under Bartolomeo Ramenghi, called Il Bagnacavallo. The fame of Giulio Romano drew him to Mantua, where he entered the school of that celebrated painter, with whom he passed six years, and assisted him in his great works in the Palazzo del Te. Francis I. of France, having requested the Duke of Mantua to recommend him an artist to ornament the Chateau at Fontainebleau, Primaticcio was selected on the occasion, and on his arrival in France, found Il Rosso engaged in the king's service, and invested with the office of superintendent of the buildings. A violent animosity took place between these eminent artists; and to put an end to their differences, the king sent Primaticcio to Italy, to collect antique statues, and other works of art. During his absence, Maître Roux died, and on his return to France he succeeded him in his employment. He now formed his great plan for ornamenting the gallery and apartments in the palace at Fontainebleau. In the ceiling of the great gallery, he represented, in fifteen compartments, the Gods of Homer, and on the sides, in fifty-eight smaller compartments, the Adventures of Ulysses, taken from the Odyssey. This prodigious machine was executed entirely from the designs of Primaticcio, and was principally painted in fresco by Niccolò dell' Abate, as is mentioned in his Life. To the regret of every person of taste and judgment, this admirable work, the most magnificent monument of art of which France could boast, was, by the ignorance or barbarism of the superintendent of the works, entirely destroyed in 1738, to make way for some paltry alteration in the Chateau; and all that remains of the works of this sublime artist at Fontainebleau, are the frescoes in the saloon of the guards, now called the apartment of Madame d'Estampes, representing the history of Alexander the Great. There are few of the works of Primaticcio in Italy, as the greatest part of his life was passed in France; and previous to his going thither he was chiefly employed in assisting Giulio Romano, in the Palazzo del T. France is indebted to Primaticcio, Il Rosso, and Niccolò dell' Abate, for the introduction of a more genuine taste, both in painting and sculpture; and Francis I. was so sensible of the merit of this great artist, that he remunerated his services by bestowing on him the lucrative revenue of the Abbey of St. Martin, at Troyes, in Champagne. After the death of his benefactor, he continued in the service of his successors, Henry II., Francis II., and Charles IX., and died at Paris in 1570. [Whether France really profited much by the labours of Primaticcio, Il Rossi, and Niccolò dell' Abate, may be doubted. Mr. Phillips, in one of his lectures, after criticising the bombastic style of Tibaldi, says, "Primaticcio and Niccolò dell' Abate wrought in the same brilliant and free style of design and composition; masterly, but false; able in art, but at variance with nature; and manifesting far more science than feeling; freedom and ease of design being regarded by them as most worthy of attention."]

PRIMO. See GENTILE.

PRINCE, JOHN BAPTIST LE, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1733. He studied painting under J. M. Vien and Francis Boucher; and after having acquired some reputation at Paris, he went to Russia, where he resided several years, and visited various parts of that vast empire, designing their different costume, and the most remarkable views in the countries through which he passed. He returned to Paris with an extensive collection of drawings, from which he painted pictures, which were much admired, and executed several plates, both in etching and aquatinta, which were very favourably received by the public. He also engraved several fancy subjects and domestic scenes from his own designs. The number of the plates engraved by himself exceeds 160; and many ingenious engravers of his country have exercised their talents after his designs. [For an account of his prints see Nagler, who says that he died in 1781.]

[PRINS, B. M., a painter of landscapes and sea pieces, flourished at Amsterdam about 1824. It is not known whether he be still living, but he had some reputation at the period named.]

[PRINS, J. H., a painter of views of the interiors of cities, was born at the Hague in 1758, or 1759. He was intended for the medical profession, but his predilection for painting induced him to quit his home to avoid his friends, who were strongly opposed to his inclination. He rambled, as an artist, through Brabant and France, where he made numerous sketches and drawings, with which, after two years' absence, he returned to his own country. He visited Amsterdam, Utrecht, and Leyden, and painted views in each of those cities. The Dutch writers say he painted in the manner of Berkheyde and Vanderheyden; his pictures resemble theirs only in the subjects. His penciling is not so delicate and minute as that of Vanderheyden, nor his colouring so bright and transparent; neither are the lights and shades of his pictures so graduated and distributed as to bring the whole composition into perfect harmony, as in the pictures of that master. Nor is his manner of painting broad and soft like that of Berkheyde, nor his colouring so chaste. He has merits of his own, and only suffers by comparison with those great masters. His pictures, which are generally small, are faithful representations of the cities of Holland, and are painted in a lively and spirited manner, and have a pleasing dioramic effect. The figures are introduced with judgment; the contrast of light and shade is striking; the reflection of the objects in the water illusive; and the combination satisfactory. Less apparent labour in the brickwork of his buildings would have been an advantage to his pictures, as so much detail shows more of the artisan than of the artist. Nagler, who gives a list of twelve etchings by him, says he was drowned in a canal in 1805. A few years back his pictures were common in England.]

[PRIWITZER, JOHAN, a Danish artist who visited England in the time of James I., and probably had court favour, as it is said that he painted the portraits of many of the nobility; the only one, however, on record, is that of Sir William Russell, in the robes of the order of the Bath, attended by a dwarf, and dated 1627, which is at Woburn Abbey.]

PROBST, JOHN BALTHAZAR, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1734. He worked chiefly with the graver, in a neat, formal style. Among other prints, he engraved part of the plates after the antique statues in the Dresden Gallery. We have also by him some prints after Luca Giordano, Bernardino Poccetti, and other masters. He also engraved several plates of birds and beasts, in the menagerie of Prince Eugene, published in 1734. [He was born in 1673, and died in 1748. He engraved several pieces after Rugendas and Ridinger.]

PROCACCINI, ERCOLE. This painter was born at Bologna in 1520. The Padre Orlandi, on the authority of Malvasia, asserts, that finding himself unable to contend with his contemporary artists at Bologna, he established himself at Milan, where he was more successful, and founded the school which was for some time distinguished by his name. Lomazzo, on the contrary, in his Tempio della Pittura, extols him as a successful follower of the graceful design and admirable colouring of Coreggio. His principal works are at Bologna, of which the following are the most worthy of notice. In the church of S. Benedetto is a picture of the Annunciation; in S. Giacomo Maggiore, the Conversion of St. Paul, and Christ praying in the Garden; in S. Bernardo, St. Michael discomfiting the rebel Angels; and in St. Stefano, a Deposition from the Cross. Although his design is occasionally minute, and his colouring languid, defects which he possessed in common with his contemporaries, his forms are graceful and correct, and there is an exactness and precision in his style, which rendered him peculiarly competent to the duties of a preceptor. His academy became the most celebrated of his time, and besides his sons, he produced some of the most distinguished artists of the Milanese school. He was living in 1591.

PROCACCINI, CAMILLO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1546, and was first instructed by his father; but he afterwards visited Rome, where he particularly applied himself to study the works of Michael Angelo. To the attention he paid to the great style of Buonaroti, may be attributed the peculiar character discernible in many of his works, which frequently partake of the terrible and gigantesque. The graces of Parmigiano were also the objects of his imitation, particularly in the airs of his heads and the turn of his figures, which, like those of that master, are occasionally too long. Some of his esteemed works are at Milan, of which the most remarkable are his pictures of the Martyrdom of St. Agnes, painted in fresco, in the sacristy of the cathedral; and the ceiling of the church of the Padri Zoccolanti, representing the Assumption of the Virgin. But his most celebrated performances are his Last Judgment, in the church of S. Procolo, at Riggio, which is considered by Malvasia one of the finest frescoes in Lombardy; and his picture of St. Roch administering the Sacrament to Persons afflicted with the Plague, an admirable work, of which Annibale Caracci has established the reputation, by the apprehension he expressed on being commissioned to paint a companion picture to it, representing St. Roch distributing Alms to the Poor. He was commissioned by the Duke of Parma to execute some frescoes in the dome at Piacenza, in competition with Lodovico Caracci, where he painted the Coronation of the Virgin, with a beautiful choir of angels; and though on this occasion his production was not equal to that of his powerful antagonist, it is no mean proof of his abilities, that his picture possesses a distinguished attraction, even in the neighbourhood of so dangerous a competitor. Of his works at Bologna, the most considerable are the Adoration of the Shepherds, in the church of S. Francesco; and the Annunciation, in S. Clemente. Camillo Procaccini possessed a fertile invention, and a commanding facility of hand. His colouring, particularly in fresco, is clear and vigorous, and his draperies are cast with judgment and taste; but his promptness and despatch led him sometimes into extravagance and incorrectness; and he may be oc-asionally convicted of the vices of a mannerist. He died at Milan in 1626. We have several etchings by this eminent artist, among which are the following:

The Holy Family reposing, in which St. Joseph is represented lying on the ground, resting on the saddle of the ass.

Another Holy Family, in which St. Joseph is presenting an orange to the Infant. 1593.

The Virgin suckling the Infant, [St. Joseph standing behind her.]

The Transfiguration, [of which there are two impressions; the second retouched by another hand, but in a very able manner.]

St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. 1593.

PROCACCINI, GIULIO CESARE, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1548. He was taught the rudiments of design by his father, and for some time applied himself to the study of sculpture, in which he had made some progress, when the reputation his brother Camillo had acquired as a painter induced him to change the chisel for the pencil. He has been stated by some of the biographers of the artists to have been brought up in the school of the Caracci; and M. d'Argenville asserts, that on account of a quarrel between him and Annibale, which happened in 1609, he quitted Bologna, and settled at Milan. It will be found difficult to reconcile these facts with the order of chronology, as Annibale, who was twelve years younger than G. C. Procaccini, died in 1609, at the age of 49, and at that period our artist not only had established his reputation at Milan, but was already in the decline of life. It is more probable that, like the Caracci, he formed his style from the great principles of Coreggio, which are discernible in all his works. He passed some time at Rome, where the admirable productions of Raffaello were particularly the objects of his attention. The public edifices at Milan abound with his works, of which the most considerable are, the Transfiguration, in the church of S. Celso; the Adoration of the Magi, and St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, at the Padri Zoccolanti; and the Annunciation, in the church of S. Antonio. At Rome, in the French church of S. Luigi, is a picture of the Virgin and Infant, so much in the style of Coreggio, that it has been engraved as a work of that master. Less capricious and less prompt than Camillo, the compositions of Giulio Cesare are studied and judicious, and his design is dignified and correct. His colouring is rich and harmonious, and the disposition of his masses broad and masterly. In imitating the graces of Coreggio, he sometimes attempted a tenderness of expression which occasionally approaches to affectation. Such are his pictures of the Madonna and Infant, surrounded by saints, with a choir of angels, in the church of S. Afra, at Brescia; and the Marriage of St. Catherine, in la Steccata, at Parma. He died at Milan in 1626. We have by the hand of this artist an etching representing the Virgin with the infant Jesus. [This etching is probably the one attributed to Camillo Procaccini by Gori, but Bartsch says without any foundation. He does not, however, ascribe it to Giulio Cesare.]

PROCACCINI, CARLO ANTONIO, was the third son of Ercolo Procaccini, and the brother of the two preceding artists, born at Bologna about the year 1555, and is said to have been instructed in the art by his father, though his genius led him to a different department of the art. He excelled in painting landscapes, flowers, and fruit, and his pictures possessed sufficient merit, to secure them a place in the best collections at Milan, and in the state; and he was much employed in commissions for Spain, where his works were highly esteemed.

PROCACCINI, ERCOLE JUNIORE. This painter was the son of Carlo Antonio Procaccini, born at Milan in 1596, and was educated in the school of his uncle Giulio Cesare. He followed with success the style of his instructor, and painted several pictures for the public edifices and private collections at Milan. One of his most esteemed works is an altar-piece representing the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Bergamo, in which he has imitated the grandeur of Correggio. On the death of Giulio Cesare, he became the director of the academy established by the Procaccini, and died in 1676.

PROCACCINI, ANDREA. According to Pascoli, this painter was born at Rome in 1671, and was brought up in the school of Carlo Maratti. He painted history in the style of his master, and among his other works in the public edifices at Rome, is his picture of Daniel, one of the twelve prophets, painted by order of Clement XI., in S. Giovanni Laterano. He was invited to the court of Spain, where he resided fourteen years, and executed several considerable works. He died in 1734. [He executed many important works in the palaces and churches of Spain, but his smaller pictures are very few. He etched gracefully, and in this department there are by him a half-length of S. Vincente Ferrer, an infant Bacchus, Diana in the Chase, Clelia passing the Tiber; the Supper at Emmaus, and Christ's Ascension, after Raphael; and other pieces, after Carlo Maratti. He died at St. Ildefonso, in Spain, and was buried with great pomp in the convent of St. Francisco de Segovia.]

PRONCK, C., a Dutch engraver, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as having executed several plates of views of various sizes. [Cornelius Pronck was born at Amsterdam in 1691, and was taught drawing by F. van Houten, and painting by Arnold Boonen. He became a good portrait painter, and had much employment; but he preferred making views of cities and landscapes, in Indian ink and in water-colours; these are highly estimated by collectors. Many of his drawings, however, are after other Dutch masters. He died in 1759.]

PRONTI, PADRE CESARE. This painter was born at Rimini in 1626, and was brought up at Bologna, under Guercino. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was much employed for the churches at Rimini and Ravenna. At an early period of his life he became a monk of the order of St. Augustine, and was afterwards principally engaged in painting altar-pieces for the churches of his fraternity, of which one of the most celebrated is a picture of S. Tommaso da Villanova, at the Augustines at Pesaro, which he embellished with a back-ground of admirable architecture. He died at Ravenna in 1708. [He was of the family Bacciocchi, but to avoid the ridicule to which it might expose him, he took the name of his mother, Pronti.]

PROU, JAMES, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1639. He was a scholar of Sebastian Bourdon, and painted landscapes in the style of that master. Of his works as an engraver, the following are the most worthy of notice:

A set of twelve Landscapes and Views; after his own designs.

A set of six large Landscapes; after Seb. Bourdon.

The Baptism of Christ by St. John; after the same.

The Flight into Egypt; after Agost. Caracci.

[Others say he was born at Troyes in 1624, and died at the latter part of the same century.]

PROUD, an obscure engraver, mentioned by Mr. Strutt as having resided in England about the year 1760, and engraved a few book-plates and portraits, among which was that of Sarah Philips, prefixed to The Lady's Handmaid, 1758.

PROVENZALE, MARCELLO. This artist was born at Cento in 1575. He was a scholar of Paolo Rossetti, and is chiefly distinguished in the art for his talents as a mosaicist. Baglione describes several of his works at Rome, executed under the direction of Paul V., among which is the portrait of that pontiff, wrought with surprising neatness and beauty. In conjunction with Rossetti, he executed several mosaics in the capella Clementina, in St. Peter's, from the cartoons of Cavaliere Cristofano Roncalli; and for the Cardinal Scipione Borghese he finished some smaller works, among which is Orpheus playing on the Lyre, surrounded by animals, in the Borghese palace. He died at Rome in 1639.

[PRUD'HON, PIERRE PAUL, a very eminent French painter and designer, was born at Clugny in 1760, according to Gabet; Nagler says in 1768, and died at Paris in 1823. His first master was Devosges of Dijon; he afterwards went to Italy, where he formed a friendship with the celebrated Canova, and remained at Rome till 1789, when he returned to France. The elegance of his designs, and the beautiful delicacy of his colouring and penciling, obtained for him the title of the French Corregio. His works are numerous in poetical and historical subjects, and also in portraiture; and are to be found in the best collections in France. Some years ago there was in England a remarkably fine large drawing by him, representing the Baptism of the King of Rome, which is not mentioned by his biographers. Making allowance for the difference of national taste, Prud'hon must be assigned a very high rank among modern artists. His compositions are rich in fancy, elegant in design, and refined in execution. As a portion only of his works would in description occupy a large space, the inquirer is referred to the Notice Historique sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de Prud'hon, by Viart, published at Paris in 1824.]

PRUÑEAU, NOËL, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1751. He was a pupil of Augustin de St. Aubin, in whose style he has engraved several plates, chiefly portraits, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Rosalie le Vasseur; after his own design.

Herman Boerhave; the same.

Albert de Haller; the same.

Gerard, Baron van Swieten, Architect; after A. de St. Aubin.

John Joseph Sue; after A. Pujos.

Francis de la Peyronie, principal Surgeon to Louis XV.

[PÜCHLER, JOHANN MICHEL, an engraver, of whom very little is known, but who worked in a peculiar manner. He engraved portraits with the point, and the hair and habits are formed of writing. He marked his prints with the letters J. M. P. cur-sive, in a monogram. Van Stettin speaks of a Jan Gregoire Büchler, a writing-master, who worked in this manner about the year 1692, and Brulliot conjectures that he means the same. If Van Stettin be right in the names, the conjecture is rather a bold one. May it not as well be supposed to be Jean Michel Papillon, whose portrait to his book is engraved in the manner above mentioned, but who lived half a century later than J. G. Büchler.]

PUCHLER, MICHAEL, a German engraver, by whom we have a few portraits, among which are those of Leopold, Emperor of Germany.

Eleanora Magdalena Theresa, his Empress.

[PUGA, ANTONIO, a Spanish painter of familiar subjects, was a scholar of Velasquez, whose early manner he imitated exactly. In 1653 he painted six pictures, which at the first view appear to be by that master, especially in the accessories. They were in the collection of D. Silvestre Collar de Castro.]

PUGET, PETER PAUL, a French painter, sculptor, and architect, born at Marseilles in 1623. Although he was principally employed as an architect and a sculptor, he occasionally practised painting. In the cathedral at Aix is a picture by him of the Annunciation, a graceful and elegant design, though cold and languid in the colouring; and in the church of the Jacobins, at Toulon, is an altarpiece, representing the same subject, differently composed, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Pietro da Cortona. He died at Marseilles in 1695.

PUGH, HERBERT. This artist was a native of Ireland. He came to London about the year 1758, and met with some encouragement as a landscape painter. His talents were not very considerable, and his style of painting was mannered and affected. He also painted a few pictures, in which he attempted to imitate the style of Hogarth, but they were very indifferent performances. He died about the year 1775.

PUGLIA, GIUSEPPE, called IL BASTARO. According to Baglione, this artist was a native of Rome, and flourished in the pontificate of Urban VIII. He executed several works for the public edifices at Rome, of which the most deserving of notice are a picture of the Presentation in the Temple, in the cloister of the Padri della Minerva; and an altarpiece, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, in the Basilica of S. Maria Maggiore. He died young at Rome, [in 1640; but if he was known in 1600, as Zani states, he was not so very young when he died.]

PUIS, DU. See DUPUIS.

PULIGO, DOMENICO. This painter was born at Florence in 1475, and was brought up in the school of Domenico Corradi, called del Ghirlandaio. On the death of that master, in 1495, when he was twenty years of age, it does not appear that he made choice of another instructor, but he acquired considerable reputation as a portrait painter, and by some easel pictures representing Madonnas, and Holy Families, which were gracefully designed, and were coloured with great sweetness and harmony. He formed an intimate acquaintance with Andrea del Sarto, and though several years older than that distinguished painter, he improved his style by an attentive study of his works, and is said by Lanzi to have painted some pictures from the designs of Andrea, which were mistaken for the productions of that great artist. He died in 1527.

PULZONE, SCRIPIONE, called GAETANO, was born at Gaeta in 1550, and was a disciple of Jacopino del Conte. Though he painted history with considerable reputation, he was more distinguished as a painter of portraits, and drew those of the most illustrious persons of his time; among whom were Gregory XIII., Cardinal de Medici, the Archduke

Ferdinand, and others. His attitudes are elegant and graceful, and the heads expressive and full of life. Lanzi asserts, that his celebrity in this branch of the art acquired him the title of the Roman Vandyck. This is not consistent with the usual accuracy of that estimable writer, as he died several years before Vandyck was born. Of his historical works, the most deserving of notice are, his picture of the Assumption, with the Apostles, in S. Silvestro, in Monté Cavallo; a Pietá, in the church del Gesu; and the Crucifixion, in S. Maria, in Vallicella. In the Palazzo Borghese is a fine picture by him of the Holy Family. Though his style is elaborate and minute, his design is correct, and there is much snavity and harmony in his colouring. He died at Rome in the prime of life, in 1588. [Zani says he was born in 1562, and died in 1600. Bryan need not have accused Lanzi of inconsistency for saying "that by some he is called the Van Dyck of the Roman school;" such a comparison may be made, speaking of an artist's style, in order to give the reader an idea of it by the mention of one more generally known, irrespective of the times in which both lived.]

PUNT, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He was an artist of no great note; his principal work was a set of thirty-six plates, after the designs made by Jacob de Wit, from the ceiling of the church of the Jesuits, at Antwerp, painted by Rubens, which are the more interesting, as the originals were destroyed by lightning. He also engraved a plate of the Ascension, after Seb. Ricci, for the Dresden collection. [Jan Punt was born in 1711, and died about 1779. He was a theatrical decorator, and painter in chiaro-scuro. The world is much indebted to him for the preservation, by his engravings, of de Wit's designs, after Rubens, which are sufficiently well done. He engraved many other subjects in a very respectable manner. Nagler has given a list of them.]

PUNTORMO. See PONTORMO.

[PUPILER, ANTOINE, a Flemish painter, who was employed in Spain by Philip II., in 1556, and who, it is said, was an artist of extraordinary merit, but of whose works there is no account, as all that he produced there were consumed in the conflagration at the Pardo. He returned to his own country, but the Flemish writers have not noticed him, unless it be under another name.]

PUPINI, BIAGIO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1530 [to 1540.] He was a disciple of Francesco Francia, whose style he followed, though with a more modern air. Of his works in the public edifices at Bologna, the following are the most worthy of notice. In the church of S. Giuliano, the Crowning of the Virgin; in S. Giacomo Maggiore, the Virgin and infant Christ, with S. Orsola; in S. Maria della Baroncella, St. John preaching in the Wilderness; and at the Institute, a picture of the Nativity.

PURCELL, RICHARD, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. We have by him several prints of portraits, among which are the following:

John Manners, Marquis of Granby; after Reynolds.
Lady Fenhoulet, afterwards Countess of Essex; after the same.
Elizabeth, Countess of Berkeley; after the same.
The Children of Charles I.; after Vandyck.
John Wilkes, Esq.; after Pine.

[He was born in 1736, and lived near the end of the 18th century. He engraved several portraits after Sir J. Reynolds; also that of Paoli, after Constantine; and two subjects, after J. Vernet.]

PUSCHNER, [JOHANN GEORG,] a German engraver, supposed to have been a native of Nuremberg. He flourished about the year 1670, when he engraved a set of portraits for a folio volume, entitled Icones virorum omnium ordinum eruditione, &c., published at Nuremberg. [He was living in 1720.]

PYE, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1775. We have by him several landscapes, after the pictures of Claude Lorraine, Vernet, Swanevelt, Cuypp, &c., which are etched and finished with the graver, in a neat, finished style. [He was born about 1745; and the greater part of his prints were executed for Boydell, from 1773 to 1775. The date of his death is not recorded. He was the father of John Pye, the engraver, now living.]

PYNAKER, ADAM. This painter was born at the small town of Pynaker, between Delft and Schiedam, in 1621. It is not known from whom he received his first instruction in the art, but he visited Italy when he was very young, and resided some years at Rome, where he studied the works of the most distinguished landscape painters, and made designs of the most picturesque objects in the environs of that capital. On his return to Holland, he soon gave proof how much he had profited by his travels, and became one of the most admired and most employed artists of his country. It was at that time the mode to ornament the apartments of the principal mansions with the works of the most eminent landscape painters; and Pynaker was much engaged in works of that description. His pictures of a small size are, however, more esteemed, and they possess sufficient merit to entitle them to a place in the choicest collections. The landscapes of Pynaker exhibit very pleasing scenery. He frequently represents the sunny light of the morning breaking out from behind the woods or mountains, and diffusing a brilliant glow over the whole face of nature. His skies are clear, light, and floating, and the foliage of his trees and plants is touched with uncommon freedom and spirit. His pencil is firm and flowing, and evinces an extraordinary facility of hand. He embellished his pictures with the ruins of ancient architecture, and decorated them with figures and cattle, correctly drawn, and grouped with taste and elegance. Some of his pictures have been objected to as too green, but this is not the case with the generality of his works. He died in 1673.

[Pynaker's landscapes, of the cabinet size, are not numerous; in Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish masters, vols. vi. and ix., will be found an account of about seventy. They are mostly what may be termed representations of romantic scenery; mountainous and well-wooded countries, with ancient ruins, cascades, muleteers, and peasants with cattle. His ideas are altogether Italian, his pencil only is Dutch, and that of the highest quality; with a breadth, a brilliancy, a richness almost unequalled by any other landscape painter, except Cuypp. There are many of his finest works in England.]

[PYNE, WILLIAM HENRY, the author and illustrator of the Microcosm, was born in 1769, the son of a leather-seller in Holborn. From his earliest years he showed a strong predilection for the arts, which induced his father to place him on trial with a clever draughtsman and colourer of prints. But, after a short probation, he refused to be articled, and left his master in disgust for having called his word in question. He was then but fourteen years of age, and it does not appear that he ever after received what may be deemed regular instruction. However he attained to it, great knowledge of character, and facility of execution, were evinced in every subject he undertook to delineate, and showed a discriminating taste and lively fancy, whether the objects were animate or inanimate. As an artist he confined his talent to drawings, and his productions were multifarious in detached pieces. In 1803 he published the first part of his interesting work, "The Microcosm; or a picturesque Delineation of the Arts, Agriculture, Manufactures, &c., of Great Britain," which he completed in 1806, illustrated with about 600 groups of small figures for the embellishment of landscapes. Subsequently he published, in three imperial quarto volumes, a "History of the Royal Residences" of Windsor, St. James's, Carlton House, Kensington Palace, Hampton Court, Buckingham House, and Frogmore, with about 100 richly coloured plates. In both these works he not only showed the ready and varied talents of a skilful artist, but also the persevering industry of an antiquary, and the unwearied inquirer into facts; and with all and every topic his knowledge seems commensurate. He published also, from time to time, in a periodical of the day, (the Literary Gazette,) a work entitled "Wine and Walnuts," which afterwards, in a collected form, became very popular; and he attempted another, called the "Somerset House Gazette," which was not successful. He was connected with the enterprising and highly respectable Mr. Ackermann, of the Strand, and was the suggester and mainspring of many of that worthy publisher's successful undertakings; and it may be added, that the numerous artists employed by him owed much to the extensive knowledge, practical skill, and kindly communicative disposition of Pyne. With all his acquirements and amiable qualities, he never arrived at a state of settled competence in pecuniary matters; his heart was too generous, and his hand too open, to allow him to accumulate; and in his latter days he was subjected to painful difficulties. After a long illness, he died at Paddington on the 29th of May, 1843.]

QUADRATA. This artist is mentioned by Pappillon as an engraver on wood. He asserts that he had seen some of his works, though he has not specified them.

QUAGLIA, GIULIO. This painter was a native of Como, and flourished about the year 1693. Lanzi conjectures from his style, and the period at which he lived, that he was brought up in the school of the Recchi. He established himself at Friuli, about the end of the 17th century, where he executed several considerable works in fresco. His most esteemed productions are in the chapel of the Monte di Pietà, at Udine, in which he evinces a fecundity of invention, a grandeur of composition, and a freedom of pencil, which were not surpassed by any of his contemporaries.

QUAINI, FRANCESCO, was born at Bologna in 1611, and was a scholar of Agostino Mitelli, under whom he became an eminent painter of perspective and architectural views. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Bologna, of which the most esteemed are the architectural ornaments in the Sala Farnese, in the Palazzo Publico. He died at Bologna in 1680.

QUAINI, LUIGI, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1643. After learning the first principles of perspective under his father, he became a disciple of Guercino, but afterwards entered the school of Carlo Cignani, to whom he was nearly related, at the time when Marc Antonio Franceschini was also a disciple of that master. Conjointly with Franceschini, he assisted Cignani in several of his principal works. After the death of their instructor they continued to work in conjunction, Franceschini painting the figures and Quaini the landscapes, architecture, and other accessories. Their united talents were successively employed at Bologna, Modena, Piacenza, Genoa, and at Rome, where they painted the cartoons for a cupola in St. Peter's, which has since been executed in mosaic. He also painted several historical subjects from his own compositions, which were entirely finished by himself. In the church of S. Giuseppe at Bologna, is a picture representing the Visitation; in la Carità, the dead Christ supported by the Virgin; and in the church of S. Niccolo, the principal altar-piece is by Quaini, representing that saint in prison, visited by the Virgin and an angel, of which Lanzi speaks in favourable terms. He died in 1717.

QUAST, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at the Hague in 1602. His pictures usually represent drolls, beggars, and assemblies of boors merrymaking, which he treated with a great deal of humour, and not less vulgarity. We have several spirited etchings by him from his own designs, as well as after other masters, some of which are executed in the style of Callot, though incorrect in the design. He generally marked his prints with a cipher composed of a P. and a Q. joined together,

P. Q.

We have, among others, the following prints by him :

The Five Senses; P. Quast, fec. 1638.

The Four Seasons, in grotesque figures.

A set of twenty-six plates of Beggars, Boors, &c.

A set of twelve Grotesque Figures.

A set of ten plates of Beggars, &c.; S. Savery, exc.

A set of twelve fancy subjects, in imitation of Callot.

[It is equally uncertain when he was born, or when he died; it is only known that he lived in 1632 and 1638 by the dates on some of his prints. However degraded his subjects, he was master of his pencil, and painted in a clear and spirited manner. Prints by and after him are numerous.]

QUATREPOMME, ISABELLA. This lady is mentioned by Papillon as an engraver on wood. She is said to have been a native of Rouen, and to have flourished about the year 1521, as appears from a frontispiece to an old calendar, executed in a neat style by her, representing a figure of Janus. It is marked with an apple, on which is the figure of 4, in allusion to her name. [Malpe doubts all that Papillon has said on the subject; and Brulliot declares that he has never met with the mark. Zani supports Papillon, and says that he had seen two with this logograph.]

QUEBOORN, or QUEBORN, CRISPIN VANDEN, a Dutch engraver, who resided at the Hague about the year 1630. He chiefly confined himself to the engraving of portraits, which possess considerable merit. He also executed a part of the plates for Thibault's Academie de l'Épée, published at Antwerp in 1628; and a print of the Nativity, after Henry van Balen. We have, among others, the following portraits by him :

Queen Elizabeth. 1625.

Charles I. 1626.

William I., Prince of Orange; after Vischer.

Mary, daughter of Charles I., consort of the Prince of Orange.

Frederick V., Elector Palatine.

Elizabeth, daughter of James I., his consort.

Juliana, Princess of Hesse.

Frederick Henry, Prince of Nassau. 1630.

[He was born at the Hague in 1604. He was chiefly employed on small engravings for the booksellers. The date of his death is not recorded.]

QUELLINUS, ERASMUS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1609. The early part of his life was devoted to the study of the Belles Lettres, in which he so far distinguished himself, that Sandrart asserts that he was for some time professor of philosophy. His intimacy with Rubens, whose house was the resort of the learned, as well as the most distinguished artists, inspired him with a love for painting, which induced him to abandon his professor's chair, and he became the disciple of his friend. With a mind richly endowed with the store of literature, and aided in his studies by the counsels of Rubens, his progress in the art was extraordinary, and in a few years he distinguished himself among the able artists of his country, at a period when Antwerp was the residence of the most celebrated painters of the Flemish school. The vivacity of his genius, polished by the result of his studies, appeared in all his compositions. His design, though tinged with the taste of his country, is tolerably correct, and his colouring, brilliant and vigorous, is worthy of the school in which he was educated. He was well acquainted with perspective and architecture, with which he embellished the back-grounds of his historical pictures, and his landscapes are treated in a very pleasing style. He was not less eminent as a portrait painter, and following the example of Vandyck, painted those of many of the most distinguished artists of his time. In the church of St. Peter, at Mechlin, is an admirable picture by Erasmus Quellinus, representing the Nativity, which has been sometimes mistaken for a work of Vandyck. In the church of St. Andrew at Antwerp, is a fine picture of the Guardian Angel; and in the church of St. Saviour at Ghent, is an altar-piece representing the Holy Family reposing in Egypt. He died at Antwerp in 1678, aged 71. We have a few etchings by Erasmus Quellinus, among which are the following :

Samson killing the Lion; after Rubens.

A Landscape, with a dance of children and young satyrs;

E. Quellinus, fec.; rare.

The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Rubens.

QUELLINUS, JOHN ERASMUS, was the son and scholar of Erasmus Quellinus, born at Antwerp in 1629. At the age of twenty-one he visited Italy, and resided some years at Venice, where the works of Paolo Veronese particularly attracted his attention. He adopted the ornamental style of that master, which is visible in all his works, and had acquired considerable reputation at Venice, Naples, and Rome, when, at the desire of his father, he returned to his native country. The expectation his countrymen had formed from the report of his talents, furnished him with numerous commissions, and his altar-pieces are to be found in most of the churches of the Low Countries. His most important work is in the church of the abbey of St. Michael at Antwerp. This stupendous machine extends the whole height of the church, and is painted entirely in the style of Paolo Veronese, representing Christ healing the Sick. It is an immense composition, and though it comprises an infinite multitude of figures, he has ingeniously avoided the least appearance of confusion. In imitation of his splendid prototype, he has embellished the back-ground with admirable architecture. In the refectory of the abbey there are four large pictures, representing the four repasts mentioned in the Scriptures, which were also the favourite subjects of P. Veronese. In the cathedral at Antwerp is a fine picture of the Adoration of the Magi; and in the church of Notre Dame at Mechlin, one of his most esteemed works, representing the Last Supper. The younger Quellinus is justly ranked among the ablest artists of his country, who succeeded the golden era of Flemish art, under Rubens and Vandyck. He possessed an unusual fertility of invention, and arranged his compositions with solidity and judgment. His design is more tasteful and correct than the generality of his countrymen, and his colouring, partaking of the Venetian and Flemish style, is brilliant and clear. He died at Antwerp in 1715.

QUELLINUS, HUSERR. This artist was the brother of Artus Quellinus, an eminent sculptor, and was born at Antwerp about the year 1608. He engraved a set of plates after designs made by John Bennokel, from the marble statues executed by Artus Quellinus, in the Stadthouse at Amsterdam, and are marked with the initials of both the artists, A. Q. H. Q. They form a volume in folio, and were published in 1655. He also engraved some portraits. His plates are etched in a singular style, resembling that of Peter Soutman, and neatly finished with the graver. Among others, we have the following portraits by him:

Artus Quellinus, Statuary of Antwerp; H. Quellinus, del. et sc.

Philip IV. seated on his throne, with the Prince Royal, and several allegorical figures; H. Quellinus. 1665.

[QUERFURT, AUGUSTUS, was born at Wolfenbützel in 1696. He was first instructed by his father, Tobias Querfurt, a landscape painter, and afterwards studied under Rugendas, at Augsburg. He painted encampments, battles, skirmishes of cavalry, and hunting subjects, in all of which he appears rather an imitator than an original painter. He sometimes imitated the manner of Bourguignone, Parrocel, and Vander Meulen; at others, he aimed at that of Wouwerman; in the last he was least successful. His pictures, however, have considerable merit, and are composed with judgment, executed in a spirited manner, and not deficient of good colouring. He died in 1761, at Vienna.]

[QUESNEL, or QUENET, FRANÇOIS, supposed to have been born at Edinburgh about 1540 or 1542, but spent his life in France, in the service of Henri III. and Henri IV., whose portraits he painted, as also that of Marie de Medicis. Several portraits by him have been engraved by Edelinck, T. de Leu, and Van Schuppen. He died at Paris in 1619.]

QUEVÉRDO, F. M. J., [FRANÇOIS MARIE ISIDORE,] a French engraver, born in Brittany in 1740. [Others say he was a Spaniard.] He has engraved several plates, as well from his own designs as after other masters. He executed part of the plates for the Voyage pittoresque d'Italie, by the Abbé de St.

Non. We have also, among others, the following prints by him:

The Portrait of Henry IV.; after his own design.

A set of four subjects of Children; oval.

A Landscape, with a peasant's family at the door of a cottage; Queverdo, fecit.

[He was living in 1811.]

QUEWELLERIE, WILLIAM DE LA, was a native of France, and was probably a goldsmith. He engraved a set of very small plates, representing ornamental crosses, and other designs for jewellery. They are neatly executed with dark back-grounds. On the frontispiece is inscribed his name, Guilhelms de la Quewellerie, fecit, An. Dni. 1680. On the other plates are the initials G. D. L. Q.

QUILLART, PETER ANTHONY, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1711. He was a scholar of Anthony Watteau, and soon after leaving the school of that master, he was invited to the court of Portugal, where he was made painter to the Queen, and a member of the Academy at Lisbon. His principal work as a painter is a ceiling in the queen's bed-chamber. He engraved from his own designs the plates for a book entitled The Funeral Pomp of Duke Don Nuno Olivares Pereira, published at Lisbon in 1730. He died at Lisbon in the flower of his age.

[QUINKHARD, JAN MAURITS, was born at Rees, near Cleves, and was a scholar, successively, of Arnold Boonen, Lubimietzki, and N. Verkolie. He painted familiar, allegorical, and mythological subjects, and was excellent in portraits, of which he painted a great number. He died in 1772, at the age of 85 years.]

QUINTILIEN. This artist is mentioned by Florent le Comte as the engraver of some plates after Callot, to which he did not affix his name.

[QUIROS, LORENZO, a Spanish historical painter, and imitator of Murillo, was born at Santos in Estramadura in 1717. He studied at Seville under Bernard German Llorente, and made great progress both in fresco and oil painting. To perfect himself in drawing, he went to Madrid; but his turbulent disposition induced him to abandon the protection of Corrado and Mengs, who were disposed to employ him. A slave to his fancies, he preferred imaginary liberty to honours and fortune. He returned to Seville, where he remained for twenty years without ever making any one acquainted with his place of residence. He employed himself in copying the works of Murillo, which he did very successfully, and sold them through an agent. He died in 1789. He has left works at Madrid, at the Royal Academy of San Fernando, at Cazalla, Granada, Xeres, at Seville, and at other places in Spain.]

QUITER, HAR HIND, a Dutch mezzotinto engraver, by whom we have a few English portraits, which are very poorly executed. Among others, are Queen Catherine, consort of Charles II.; after Lely.

Sir Leoline Jenkins; from his own design.

[This is probably Herman Hendrik Quiter, who engraved several portraits after Sir Peter Lely and others, mentioned by Bromley; if so, he was born in 1620, and died in 1700. His eldest son, of the same names, studied in the school of Carlo Maratti, in 1700, and was afterwards painter to the Landgrave of Hesse; he died in 1731 at Brunswick. Magnus, a younger son, was a portrait painter; he was also a short time in the school of Maratti; he visited Holland and England, and probably assisted Kneller. He was afterwards keeper of the gallery at Salzdalum, and died in 1744. It is said that he painted some historical pictures, but it is not said where. There was another mezzotinto engraver, who signed his prints E. Quiter: there are portraits by him after Jan de Baan.]

[RABASSE, JEAN, an engraver and printseller, who flourished at Paris about 1650. Dumesnil attributes three prints to him; Judith, signed Jean Rabas avec Preuledge du Roy; a Holy Family, with his initials, J. R.; and a Repose in Egypt, with the same letters in a cipher. The two latter he had before attributed to Mauperché. Brulliot attributes the mark on the last print, the Riposo, to Jacques de Bray, and to Joseph Ribera. Dumesnil apologizes for his mistake with regard to Mauperché, as he had not seen the impression with the initials J. R. till after the publication of his first volume, when he was made acquainted with it by M. Rodolph Weigel of Leipsic. When were the initials placed on the print?—that in the Appendix to the works of Mauperché is without them; it may therefore be concluded it was the earlier impression.]

RABEL, JOHN. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1588. He is said to have been a painter, but his works are little known. According to Professor Christ, he published several of his designs, engraved on wood. He does not, however, specify the subjects, nor does he inform us whether they were executed by himself. There is a copper-plate by him representing the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, copied from the print of the same subject engraved by Marc Antonio, after Baccio Bandinelli. It is less than the original, and on a stone at the bottom of the print is inscribed Io. Rabel Bellonacius lute Parisii. [He was born in 1550, and, according to Basan, died in 1608.]

RABEL, DANIEL, was the son of the preceding artist, and was probably instructed by him in the principles of the art. He painted landscapes, some of which have been engraved by the contemporary artists. He etched a considerable number of plates in a style resembling that of Israel Silvestre, which chiefly consist of views and landscapes, with figures neatly drawn. [Nagler places his death in 1628; but Zani says he operated in 1636. If he etched a considerable number of plates in the style of Israel Silvestre, they have escaped the notice of Nagler.]

[RABEN, RÆVEN, or RAVEN, SERVATIUS, a Dutch engraver, of whom little is known with certainty, except that he engraved the Twelve Cæsars, after Stradanus, on one of which is a cipher formed of S. V. R., and on the rest his name varied as above; and the Madonna della Seggiola, after Raphael, signed Servatius Raeven. Zani and others consider him to be the same with Serwouter, of whom the accounts are much confused; but the cipher of the latter is very different, being composed of a P and an S interlaced, followed by a W. See SERWOUTER.]

[RABIELLO, PABLO, a Spanish painter of battle-pieces, was living at Saragossa at the commencement of the 18th century, and was of considerable reputation. Although not very correct in his drawing, he understood the great maxims of a painter, and followed the styles of Juan Rizzi of Castille, and Juan de Valdes of Andalusia; well suited for battle-pieces, in which he excelled. There are several pictures in the Trinitarios Calzados de Terruel attributed to him; also in the chapels of St. Marcos and St. Jago; and one in the cathedral de la Seu, at Saragossa, represents the battle of Clavijo.]

[RABON, or REBON, PIERRE, born at Havre de Grace in 1616, excelled in portrait painting. He died in 1684.]

[RABON, or REBON, NICHOLAS, son of the preceding; painted historical subjects; he was born in 1644, and died in 1686.]

RACCHETTI, BERNARDO. This painter was the nephew and scholar of Giovanni Ghisolfi, born at Milan in 1639. He painted architecture and perspective views, in the style of his instructor, and his pictures are not unfrequently mistaken for those of his uncle. They usually represent sea-ports, embellished with magnificent buildings, which are precisely designed, and are touched with taste and spirit. There are many of his works in the private collections at Milan. He died in 1702.

RACINE, JOHN BAPTIST, a modern French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1750. He was a pupil of Francis Aliamet, and has engraved several vignettes and other book-plates, after Cochin. We have also some prints of landscapes after different masters, and a few subjects from the pictures in the Orleans' Gallery. Among others, the following are by him:

Hagar and Ishmael; after P. F. Mola.

A Pastoral Subject; after B. Breenberg.

A pair of Landscapes; after Pillement.

[According to Nagler he was born in 1747, and died in 1805; but Zani says he was living in 1807.]

RADEMACKER, GERARD. According to Descamps, this artist was born at Amsterdam in 1672. He was the son of an architect, who taught him the first rudiments of drawing and perspective, with an intention of bringing him up to his own profession; but perceiving his son's inclination for painting, he placed him under the tuition of A. van Goor, a portrait painter of some reputation. He had made some progress in his studies when the death of his master deprived him of his assistance; but he was sufficiently advanced in the art to give lessons in design; and he was engaged by the bishop of Sebasto to teach his niece drawing. That prelate being soon afterwards obliged to visit Rome, Rademacker was invited to accompany him, and had the advantage of improving his talent by studying the most interesting objects in that capital. His genius led him to represent views of the principal ruins and other monuments in that city and vicinity, which he designed with accuracy and precision. On his return to Holland he met with the most flattering encouragement. He did not, however, confine himself to architectural views, but painted historical and emblematical subjects with considerable success, which adorn the public edifices at Amsterdam, and the other cities of Holland. In the Stadthouse at Amsterdam is an allegorical subject painted by Rademacker, representing the regency of the city; and in the collection of the family of Walraaven, there is a view of the interior of St. Peter's at Rome, designed with great accuracy. He died at Amsterdam in 1711, in the prime of life, having scarcely completed his thirty-ninth year.

RADEMACKER, ABRAHAM. This artist was probably the younger brother of Gerard Rademacker. He was born at Amsterdam in 1675, and is said to have reached an eminent rank in the art as a landscape painter, without the assistance of an instructor. His first productions were painted in water-colours, and were very highly finished; but he afterwards practised oil painting, with no less success. He was well acquainted with the rules of architecture, and embellished his landscapes with buildings and ruins, in a very picturesque manner. He engraved from his own designs a set of plates of the most interesting views of ancient monuments, &c., in Holland and the Netherlands. They are executed in a masterly style, and amount to near three hundred prints, which were published at Amsterdam in 1731. [He died in 1735. His Views consist of a much larger number than 300; that number was published, in 6 vols. small quarto, at Amsterdam, in 1727.]

RADI, BERNARDINO, an Italian designer and engraver, whose name is affixed to a set of architectural ornaments, monuments, &c., published at Rome in 1618. They are slight, hasty etchings, and bear the title Varie invenzioni per depositi di Bernardino Radi Cortonese.

RADIGUES, ANTHONY, a French engraver, born at Rheims in 1719. Basan states, that he visited England, from whence he went through Holland to Russia, and resided several years at St. Petersburg, where he engraved the portraits of the Prince and Princess of Gallitzin, and other persons of distinction. He also engraved a plate for the collection of the Dresden Gallery, representing Angelica and Medoro, after Alessandro Tiarini.

[RAEBURN, HENRY, an eminent portrait painter, was born at Stockbridge, now forming part of Edinburgh, in 1756. At the age of six he was left an orphan, and was placed in "Heriot's Wark," the Christ-church school of Scotland. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a goldsmith; but a propensity for sketching and drawing, which he had evinced at school, seemed more to occupy his mind than the business of his master, who, on his part, considered that he had got an idle apprentice. On discovering his propensity, however, and seeing some tolerably executed miniatures which he had painted, this worthy man, instead of chiding, praised his youthful attempts, and encouraged him in the pursuit by introducing him to a portrait painter of the name of Martin, of some repute at that time in Edinburgh. The sight of that artist's pictures at once lighted up a flame in the mind of young Raeburn, and the kind manner with which the painter received him made an impression which was not obliterated when he arrived at the summit of his reputation. By the further kindness of his master he was permitted to practise the art, and was so successful, that in a short time he was enabled to purchase the remainder of his apprenticeship, and to become professedly a portrait painter in miniature. As his knowledge of art increased, so did his views expand; but as he had received no preliminary instruction, he had many difficulties to contend with: by perseverance he overcame them. Martin lent him pictures with permission to copy them, but without offering any assistance as to the manner in which he was to proceed, nor had he a claim to such gratuitous assistance. The elder artist, however, grew uneasy, it is said, when he saw the talent of the neophyte, and fearing that he was raising up a rival who might hereafter dispute for supremacy, he abruptly terminated the acquaintance. This seems to have been the extent of his early artistic studies. He soon applied himself entirely to painting in oil, and his reputation, with his application, opened to him the doors of the noble and rich, whose collections of pictures afforded a better knowledge of the beauties of art than he had hitherto the opportunity of acquiring. At the age of twenty-two he married advantageously, and repaired to London to seek the advice of Sir Joshua Reynolds, who counselled him to study at Rome, and to worship the genius of Michael Angelo in the Sistine chapel. Such advice from a portrait painter to one who only aspired to the same line of art was no doubt well intended; and it was strengthened by an offer of pecuniary assistance if needed, and letters of introduction to persons there, who might be useful during his stay. The latter he accepted, and with his wife departed for Italy. At Rome it seems that he profited more by the advice of Byers, the dealer in pictures and antiquities, than by acquaintance with artists and connoisseurs. After two years' residence in Italy he returned to Scotland, and may be said to have then commenced his professional career. He soon took the lead in Edinburgh, and verified the justness of his former friend Martin's apprehensions. For years, application, improvement, and success went hand in hand; and he might reckon the greater part of the distinguished men of Scotland of his time among his sitters and friends. In 1814 he became an associate of the Royal Academy, and in the following year R. A., it is said without the usual humiliating solicitation. He now again turned his thoughts to the metropolis, and consulted Sir Thomas Lawrence on the subject, who found means to persuade him to be content with his Scottish supremacy. Perhaps Lawrence was right; Raeburn could represent, with the force of truth, men of intellect and genius, but could not condescend to the frivolities of fashion. His power lay in depicting the mind, not the decorative paraphernalia of the coxcomb, or the millinery and affected airs of the beauties of the saloon or drawing-room. He took the advice which Lawrence had kindly given, and the portraits of the mountain chiefs, the Macdonalds, Mackenzies, Campbells, Bruces, Hays, Scotts, Duffis, Gordons, Douglasses, Hamiltons, and many others, attest the fulness of his practice. In 1822, when George IV. visited Scotland, he was knighted; and in the following year appointed "his Majesty's limner in that part of his dominions, with all the rights, privileges, and advantages thereunto belonging." Whatever these rights, privileges, and advantages might be, he did not long enjoy them, for he died in the same year, leaving a lasting reputation in the numerous excellently painted portraits of many of his talented countrymen, and of talented Englishmen too, whose fame will give stability to his, while their portraits, painted by him, will assure posterity of genuine resemblances of the men.]

RAEFUS, or RAEFE, P. This artist is mentioned by Papillon as an engraver on wood. He is said to have been a native of Paris, and to have flourished about the year 1575. He executed part of the cuts for a cosmographical work by André Thevet. His prints are very neatly finished, and are usually marked with the initials P. R. [Papillon adds, that the name at full length is on the print of the Antiquities of Athens, page 796 of the Cosmographical work, and that the book contains about 200 wood cuts excellently engraved, the greater part by Raefe. He says that some of them are designed in the taste of the celebrated sculptor Goujeon. The celebrated sculptor Jean Goujon may have designed some of the prints, but it was an O. Goujon who was employed on the work with Raefus, and the prints engraved by him are marked with his initials, O. G. Jean Goujon, the Phidias of France, flourished about the same period, and it is probable that he and the engraver were relations. Jean, according to Dumesnil, tom. vi., engraved on wood the figures respecting Masonry in Jean Martin's translation of Vitruvius, published in 1547, and again in 1572, of which he speaks in terms of high commendation, and describes twenty-seven. They consist, chiefly, of architraves, friezes, columns, and capitals of the several orders of Grecian architecture. He supposes that Jean Goujon was one of the victims of the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, the 24th of August, 1572.]

RAFFAELLE, RAFFAELLE SANZIO, DI URBINO, called. This illustrious artist has, by the general approbation of mankind, been styled the prince of painters, and is universally acknowledged to have possessed a greater combination of the higher excellencies of the art than has fallen to the lot of any other individual. He was the son of Giovanni Sanzio, a painter of little celebrity, born at Urbino in 1483. After being instructed in the first elements of design by his father he was sent to Perugia, where he became a disciple of Pietro Vanucci, called Perugino, whose works were at that time held in high estimation. Mengs considers it fortunate for the fame of Raffaelle, that he was born at an era, which he ingeniously denominates "the innocence of the art," and before it had been debauched by affectation and manner. As the powers of this sublime artist did not, like those of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, blaze forth at once, to the astonishment of the world, his progress, from his commencement, under Pietro Perugino, to the pinnacle of greatness to which he subsequently soared, cannot but be interesting, and calls for a more than usually minute detail of his earliest performances.

Among his first productions, after leaving the school of Vanucci, were a picture of S. Niccola da Tolentino, crowned by the Virgin and S. Agostino, in the church of the Eremitani; and the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, in the church of S. Domenico, at Citta di Castello. These were entirely in the style of Perugino, though with a finer expression in the heads, particularly in that of the Virgin. Vasari asserts that he had previously painted his picture of the Assumption, in the church of the Conventuali, at Perugia; but that is extremely improbable, as it exhibits a perfection which he did not attain until a more advanced age. One of his earliest works, of which the date has been ascertained, is a picture noticed by Lanzi, formerly in the possession of Sig. Annibale Maggiori at Fermo, representing the Holy Family, in which the Virgin is lifting a veil from the infant Jesus, who is sleeping in a cradle. It bears the inscription R. S. V. A. A. XVII. P. Raphael Sanctius Urbinas an. aetatis 17, pinxit. This was probably painted soon after the two pictures above mentioned. The growth of his genius, and his superiority to his instructor, were more visible in his next performance, the Marriage of the Virgin, in the church of S. Francesco, at Citta di Castello. The composition is not very different from a picture of the same subject by Perugino, in one of the churches at Perugia; but it is designed in a manner so modernized, that it may be regarded as the first fruits of the new style. The Virgin, of celestial beauty, is accompanied by a group of females, in bridal vestments, in which elegance disputes with magnificence. Amidst this lovely group, the principal figure is distinguished, not by the "foreign aid of ornament," but by her own attractions; dignity, beauty, modesty, grace, captivate the eye at the first glance. The band of youths, attendant on St. Joseph, are not less remarkable for the select nobleness of their form and character. In this picture we find nothing of the scantiness of drapery, of the mannered minuteness and cold precision which characterize the works of Perugino. Every visage, every attitude, is animated by the most appropriate expression.

It was about this time that Bernardino Pinturicchio was commissioned by Cardinal Francesco Piccolomini to decorate the great library at Siena, and finding the enterprise beyond his faculties, had recourse to Raffaelle, to assist him in so important a work. He had to represent the principal events of the life of Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, afterwards Pope Pius II. No undertaking of equal importance had hitherto been intrusted to any individual artist, and the art itself had not yet ventured beyond a very limited flight. Raffaelle was at this time a perfect novice in subjects of this nature, and being yet a stranger to the splendour of a metropolis, must have found great difficulty in executing the designs for a work, which called for a description of the particular customs of each court, or rather of the luxury and splendour of Europe. Notwithstanding the arduousness of such a task, Raffaelle made the sketches and cartoons for the whole of the compartments. These were completed in 1504, and confer great honour on our artist, who had not then completed his twenty-first year; as no work so extensive and multiform had as yet been attempted. He had scarcely accomplished this great undertaking, when the fame acquired by Lionardo da Vinci and Michael Angelo, inspired him with the most ardent desire of visiting Florence. He arrived in that city in 1504, and as Buonaroti had not yet painted his famous cartoon of Pisa, the works of Masaccio and Lionardo da Vinci were the principal objects of his admiration. He formed an intimacy with Frà Bartolomeo di S. Marco, whom he instructed in perspective, and in return profited by the lessons of that artist in colouring. His residence at Florence on his first visit was of short duration, as the death of his parents obliged him to return to Urbino; and in 1505 we find him engaged at Perugia, in painting the chapel in S. Severo, and the Crucifixion preserved at the Padri Camaldolensi. By these performances may be measured the progress he had made in his first visit to Florence. That he had not materially increased his acquaintance with anatomy is evident, from his not having discovered any particular excellence of design in the body of Christ on the Cross, in the picture just mentioned, in which he might have displayed his knowledge of it with so much propriety. His advancement in the study of the beautiful is still less apparent in these productions, as he had exhibited more admirable specimens of it previous to his going thither. With respect to expression, he could find at Florence no heads more animated or expressive than he had already produced. His principal improvement was in colouring, in the arrangement of his groups, and in his acquaintance with fore-shortening. He returned to Florence, where he remained until his departure for Rome, in the commencement of 1508. During these four years were painted the pictures, which, according to Lanzi, form the second style of Raffaelle. Vasari includes in this epoch the Holy Family, in the Rinuccini Gallery, though it is dated 1516. With more accuracy may be classed among his works of that period, the Virgin with the infant Jesus and St. John, in the tribune of the Florentine Gallery; and the Entombment of Christ, formerly in the church of S. Francesco, at Perugia, now in the Palazzo Borghese. Vasari styles it Tavola Divinissima; the composition does not consist of many figures, but each is occupied in the most appropriate manner, and the arrangement is admirable. The heads, full of the most impressive piety, may be regarded as the first, since the restoration of the art, in which the expression of extreme sorrow does not diminish their beauty.

In 1508, Raffaëlle was invited to Rome by Julius II., to whom he was recommended by Bramante, his uncle, who was architect to that pontiff, to assist in the ornaments of the Vatican. His first undertaking at Rome was the decoration of one of the apartments then called La Segnatura, where he has represented, in the most learned and sublime manner, a Personification of Theology, Philosophy, Poetry, and Jurisprudence. The first compartment he painted represents Theology, in which, in imitation of Petrarch, he has adopted the privilege of assembling in the same work, personages essential to his subject, though they lived at different periods. He has introduced the Evangelists, whose writings form the foundation of theology; St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Gregory, and St. Jerome, the doctors of the church, who continued the tradition; and the fathers, St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Bonaventura, and other theologians. In the upper part of the picture is the Trinity, surrounded by the blessed; and on an altar beneath is placed the Eucharist. This has since been denominated the Dispute on the Sacrament. In this compartment, his first production at Rome, there still remained somewhat of the minuteness he had acquired under Perugino. He still continued the gilded glories round the heads of his saints, and other similar ornaments, and the composition was more formal and restrained than in his future productions. Julius II. was so satisfied with this performance, that he directed all the paintings, which had already been finished in the other apartments by Bramantino, Pier della Francesca, and others, to be defaced, that the whole might be decorated by the hand of Raffaëlle.

In 1509 he commenced his second picture, on the opposite side of the apartment, representing Philosophy, which has been styled the School of Athens. In this he had taken leave of every vestige of the antique style, and had adopted a grander manner, which from that time he continued to embellish. The scene represents a portico of superb architecture, containing four gradations. In the upper part of the composition he has introduced Plato and Aristotle, surrounded by their disciples, expounding their systems; in another group, Socrates is seen reasoning with Alcibiades; and below, Pythagoras in the midst of his scholars, one of whom holds a tablet, on which are graved the harmonic consonances. In another part of the picture Archimedes is seen instructing his pupils in geometry; Zoroaster is represented with a globe in his hand; and on one side Diogenes with a book. In this magnificent work, consisting of fifty-two figures, the immortal Raffaëlle, in representing the school of philosophy, has given to the world a school of painting which has ever been regarded as one of the most sublime productions of the art, for the grandeur of the composition, the boldness of the invention, and the perfection of the design.

The third compartment represents Jurisprudence: on one side he has introduced Justinian presenting to Trebonianus the code of the civil law, who receives it with an expression of humility and submission which is indescribable; and on the other, Gregory IX. giving the decretals to a consistorial advocate. In the upper part of the picture are personified Prudence, Temperance, and Fortitude.

His fourth picture in the apartment represents Poetry, where he has introduced Apollo and the Muses on Mount Parnassus, with the most celebrated Greek, Latin, and Tuscan poets. Homer is placed between Virgil and Dante, and is the most impressive figure of the group. He seems possessed of a character almost super-human, and appears to speak and prophesy at the same time. This extraordinary apartment, with the accompanying ornaments, executed from the designs of Raffaëlle by his disciples Polidoro di Caravaggio and others, was finished in 1511, the date inscribed on the Parnassus.

It may be proper in this place to notice the flagrant partiality of the Florentine writers on art, who have attempted to disparage the transcendent powers of Raffaëlle, by insinuating that he was indebted for the greatness of style which distinguishes these admirable performances, to his having surreptitiously obtained a sight of the works of Michael Angelo, in the Sistina; and Vasari asserts, that although he had constantly studied the antique, he had not yet given to his figures that air of grandeur and majesty which he afterwards displayed. He reports, that Michael Angelo being obliged to fly from Rome and take refuge at Florence, to avoid the displeasure of Julius II., Bramante, who was intrusted with the keys of the Sistine chapel, as superintendent of the works, clandestinely introduced Raffaëlle to a sight of it, who, from that time, immediately changed his style, and produced his celebrated frescoes of the prophet Isaiah, in the church of S. Agostino, and the Sibyls, in la Pace. Fortunately for the fame of Raffaëlle, it is not difficult to prove the falsehood and malignity of these assertions, by a plain and simple detail of facts and dates. This has been very satisfactorily accomplished by Bellori, in his treatise entitled Se Raffaëlle ingrandì e migliorò la maniera per aver vedute l'opere di Michel Angiolo; and Crespi has successfully answered the calumny in three letters, inserted in the Lettere Pittoriche. It is necessary to observe, that the Life of Michael Angelo was written by two of his own disciples, Vasari and Condivi, after the death of Raffaëlle, and previous to that of Buonarroti. Had Raffaëlle been living when these attacks were made on the originality of his style, he would not have remained silent. He could easily have demonstrated, that when Michael Angelo fled from the resentment of the Pope, which was in 1506, Raffaëlle had not yet been at Rome, and was not invited thither until two years afterwards. That from the year 1508, when Michael Angelo had not yet commenced the Sistine chapel, until 1511, at which time it was only partly finished, Raffaëlle had evinced a grandeur, which he perhaps never afterwards surpassed, in his great works in the Vatican. He would probably have demanded of Vasari in what consists the grandeur and majesty of style, and, supported by the evidence of the best Greek statues, and by reason itself, he might have instructed him, that the grand does not consist in a gigantic and muscular display of the members, or in fierce and daring attitudes given to every figure, but in an elevated choice of the great and beautiful, in the absence of every thing that approaches to meanness and mediocrity, and in a chaste and decorous combination of whatever can ennoble and embellish the subject. These faculties he had before amply discovered in the School of Athens, and in other works in the Vatican, in the impressive dignity of his heads and attitudes, whose beauty may easily be traced to their genuine source, his study of the antique. It would be difficult to produce a more sublime effort of art than his Isaiah, which, as a complete refutation of the calumny of Vasari, was painted before 1511, and soon after the School of Athens. It will not be denied, that the works of Michael Angelo might inspire him with a bolder character in his forms, and that he might occasionally have imitated the athletic daring of his design. But how did he imitate it? By tempering its fierceness with beauty and majesty. In defence of Raffaele, it is justly remarked by Lanzi, that whoever wishes to discover what is wanting in the Sibyls of Michael Angelo, let him examine those of Raffaele; and in admiring the Isaiah of Raffaele, will be found what is deficient in the Prophets of Michael Angelo.

In 1512, Buonaroti finished his great work in the Sistine chapel, and Raffaele was engaged in the same year in ornamenting the second apartment in the Vatican. In one of the compartments he has represented the History of Heliodorus, who, having been sent by Antiochus to plunder the temple of Jerusalem, is driven from his purpose by a supernatural apparition, sent at the invocation of the high priest Onias, to punish his sacrilege. This is considered one of his most distinguished performances. The surprise and consternation of Heliodorus, and the terror of his attendants, are expressed in the most admirable manner. His picture of the Miracle of the Mass at Bolsena, in the same apartment, was also executed in the life-time of Julius II. It was supposed that the death of that Pontiff, in 1513, would have interrupted the progress of this important work; but his successor, Leo X., was not less a patron of the art, and was equally sensible of the extraordinary talents of Raffaele. By his direction, the ornaments in the Vatican were continued, and, to the two pictures last mentioned, he next added his celebrated work of St. Peter delivered from Prison, in allusion to the imprisonment of Leo X. at Ravenna. In this representation he has given a proof of his ability in conducting the effect of different lights. The soldiers placed near the door of the prison are illuminated by moonlight, and partly by a torch held by one of the guards, producing a different effect. From the figure of the angel emanates a splendour that rivals the light of the sun. His fourth picture in the second apartment represents S. Leone Magno stopping the progress of Attila and his army, in their attack on Rome, who, intimidated at the appearance of St. Peter and St. Paul, retire in confusion and dismay. In the third apartment he executed four frescoes, which entitle him to the crown of epic poetry. In one compartment he has represented the victory gained by Leo IV. over the Saracens, in the port of Ostia, in which he has described, with all the feeling of a poet, the military pomp and parade of the contending warriors, the various weapons of the combatants, the fury of the battle, and the shame and grief of the vanquished and the prisoners. Another represents the burning of the Borgo Vecchio, miraculously extinguished by the same pontiff. The horrors of the conflagration are portrayed with all the truth and effect that the art is capable of. The terror of the scene is increased by the darkness of the midnight hour; the raging flames, infuriated by the violence of the wind, are devouring every thing in their way. The misery and alarm of the citizens is carried to the highest pitch. Some are active in carrying water, and are baffled and dispersed by the fury of the wind and smoke; others seek safety in flight, and are hurrying away in all directions, half naked and dishevelled. Women are supplicating the pontiff; mothers, more alarmed for their offspring than themselves, are solely intent in sheltering them from the danger; amidst the confusion is seen an admirable group, of a young man carrying his aged father on his shoulders, in which Raffaele appears to have had in mind Aeneas saving Anchises from the burning of Troy. The third picture represents the Coronation of Charlemagne, by Leo III., and the fourth, the same pontiff protesting on the Evangelists, before that monarch, his innocence of the charges imputed to him. These important works were finished in 1517, and had occupied him nine years.

Having thus decorated the three principal apartments, his attention was next turned to the embellishment of the loggie of the Vatican, of which the architecture had been begun by Bramante, and was finished by Raffaele. These were chiefly executed from his designs by his disciples, Giulio Romano, Giovanni Francesco Penni, Perino del Vaga, Pellegrino da Modena, Polidoro di Caravaggio, &c. The objects most deserving attention are the thirteen small ceilings, each containing four subjects of sacred history, the first of which, representing the Creation, was painted by himself, as the model to be followed by his scholars; and the whole was retouched and harmonized by Raffaele, as was his custom. This series of subjects from the Scriptures has been frequently engraved, and is generally denominated Raffaele's Bible. It was about this time that he designed the famous Cartoons for the tapestry for the Papal chapel, representing the principal subjects of the Evangelists, and the Acts of the Apostles, which, after being wrought in Flanders, fortunately found their way to this country, where they have been and will ever be regarded as one of the most exalted monuments of his fame. The subjects of these divine performances, and their extraordinary beauty, are so generally known, that a particular description of them here might be deemed superfluous.

His immense works in the Vatican did not prevent him from engaging in other undertakings, and satisfying the desire of several individuals to possess his works. Among these, his frescoes in the Farnesina, painted for Agostino Chigi, are the most prominent. The most celebrated picture, representing the so much admired Triumph of Galatea, was painted by himself; and in another apartment were executed by his disciples, from his designs, a series of pictures of the Loves of Cupid and Psyche, their Marriage, and the Assembly of the Gods, which he has treated with so much taste and learning, that they may be compared with the best works of antiquity. Of his pictures in oil, the following are the most remarkable. His St. Cecilia, formerly in the church of S. Giovanni in Monte, at Bologna, now in the gallery of the Louvre; his inimitable picture in the royal collection at Madrid, called Lo Spasimo de Sicilia, in which the subject is treated with a feeling and pathos which are beyond all praise. It represents Christ bearing his Cross; the action of our Saviour is undescribably affecting and impressive; he embraces with his right hand the cross, under which he is sinking; his left is stretched out with infinite grandeur and expression, as if in the act of prophesying the destruction of Jerusalem. The Virgin Mary, in a supplicating attitude, is interceding with the soldiers and populace for pity for her Son, who, exhausted with fatigue and anguish, has sunk under the weight of the instrument of torture, which he is bearing to the scene of his sacrifice and death. The holy women and St. John are endeavouring to console the mother of Christ. Mary Magdalene is solely absorbed with grief for the sufferings of her Divine instructor. The expression in the countenance of the Saviour is such as could only result from the most pathetic imagination, and the most perfect execution; it exhibits all that divinity which sacred story designates in the person of the Redeemer; no sorrow was ever more deeply delineated, the eyes are suffused with tears, the forehead is stained with blood, yet the divine beauty of the visage is not disturbed, nor its majesty impaired; meekness and resignation are truly characterized, but it is a meekness that does not detract from dignity, and a resignation that has no connexion with despair. A look of celestial complacency and benevolence, which seem to triumph over pain and sorrow, illumines the whole visage, and affects the beholder with the most irresistible emotions.

It has been stated in the Life of Frà Sebastiano del Piombo, that Michael Angelo, desirous of checking the great reputation of Raffaele, had furnished that painter with the designs for his most considerable works; and that when Raffaele was commissioned by Cardinal de Medici to paint his famous picture of the Transfiguration, he engaged Sebastiano to undertake an altar-piece of the same size for the cathedral of Narbonne, of which he was archbishop, which gave rise to a rivalry that ended in a public exhibition of their works. That Sebastiano del Piombo might enter the lists with a greater prospect of success, Buonaroti composed and designed the subject, which was the Resurrection of Lazarus. Whatever was the extraordinary merit of that celebrated picture, and it is allowed to possess a distinguished claim to our admiration, it was unable to contend with the inimitable production of Raffaele. This extraordinary picture is generally considered his most distinguished work in oil. He has represented the mystery of the Transfiguration of Christ on Mount Tabor. At the foot of the mountain is assembled a group of the disciples, to whom a youth is brought, who is possessed of an evil spirit. He is agitated by the most horrible convulsions, and is with difficulty supported by his father, who looks with faith and confidence towards the Apostles for the relief of his son, whilst a female figure, of the most beautiful form, is kneeling, and seems to implore the interference of their power in favour of the possessed. The varied expression of the Apostles, who appear dubious of their ability to effect the miracle, is admirable. But whatever is the merit of this part of the picture, it is eclipsed by the beauty and grandeur with which Raffaele has represented, in the upper part of the mountain, Christ in his Transfiguration, between Moses and Elias. He appears invested with a robe of celestial light, which dazzles the prophets, and the three well-beloved disciples, who are kneeling in a lower part of the mountain. The head and attitude of the Saviour are distinguished by a divine majesty and sublimity, which are inconceivable.

This immortal production was the last work of Raffaele. He was attacked by a fever in 1520, and having, as it is supposed, been improperly treated by his physicians, he died in that year, on Good Friday, the 6th of April, which was his birth-day, at the age of 37. His corpse was laid in state in the apartment in which he was accustomed to paint, and his last picture of the Transfiguration was exposed near the body, previous to its interment in the church of the Rotonda. Never was a spectacle more affecting; never was an artist so universally deplored. The gentleness of his nature had attached to him every heart. Respectful to the memory of Perugino, and grateful for the instruction he had received from him, he exerted all his influence with the Pope, that the works of his master, in one of the ceilings of the Vatican, might be spared, when the other paintings were destroyed, to make way for his embellishments. Just and generous to his contemporaries, though not ignorant of their intrigues, it was his custom to thank Heaven that he was permitted to live at the same time with Michael Angelo. Gracious and mild to his disciples, whom he loved and instructed as his children; courteous even to those who were unknown to him, he constantly assisted with his counsel all who applied to him for advice and instruction; and he was not only incapable of refusing them that favour, but of delaying it. The remembrance of such affability and beneficence was strongly excited by his too early death, by which the young artists of his time had to lament that, with Raffaele, was so untimely cut off the source of that enlightened intelligence he had expended over the art. Leo X. was not less sensible to his loss, which he regarded as a public disaster to Italy, and to the graphic world. At the request of the Pope, Cardinal Bembo composed the following brief but expressive epitaph, to be inscribed on his tomb:

Rerum magna parens, et moriente mori.*

Though the premature death of Raffaele was the subject of universal regret, it will be recollected with satisfaction, that, by leaving the world at that particular period, he was spared the affliction of beholding the calamities that soon after befell Rome, calamities of which the horrors would have made death desirable to him. He did not live to witness the sacrilegious murder of his patron and pontiff, Leo X., the guardian of learning, the protector of the arts, who was treacherously poisoned the year after his death; nor to see Clement VII. seized by furious banditti, and imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo; and escaping from them, after encountering the dangers and degradation of a fugitive, at length constrained to purchase his safety from those who ought to have been the defenders of his dignity and his life. He did not survive to see the cruel sacking of Rome, when the nobles were assailed and plundered in their palaces, the prelates hurried to the gibbet, the priests torn from their altars, which they in vain embraced for protection, barbarously put to the sword, and their bodies thrown to the dogs. He escaped the grief of seeing that city exposed to pillage and conflagration, which his exalted genius had so much contributed to adorn, and of which his matchless talents had been the admiration and delight.

It has already been observed, that Raffaele possessed the most essential excellences of the art in a more exalted degree than any other painter; and it may not be improper, in support of his claim to that distinction, to endeavour to point out his superiority in those faculties which constitute the higher characteristics of painting.

His other endowments would not have been sufficient to have raised him to so elevated a rank, if he had not possessed, in a transcendent degree, the powers of invention. If it is allowed that the noblest object of the art is not to accomplish that which merely pleases the eye, but that which satisfies the mind, and secures the approbation of the intelligent, Raffaello must be regarded as the greatest artist with whose works we are acquainted, as he may be said to have surpassed in this branch every thing he could have seen, either ancient or modern, and as nothing has appeared since that can dispute his title to that pre-eminence. The invention and disposition of his pictures point out at the first glance the particular action he was desirous of presenting to the mind of the spectator. Hence the scenes in his drama, whether tranquil or tumultuous, pleasing or terrible, gay or melancholy, exhibit nothing incongruous with the character of the subject. In every picture, like the discourse of an accomplished speaker, he instructs, affects, and delights. The first is not difficult to be effected by the orator, as he can dwell at will on an illustration of his subject; whereas the painter, on the contrary, has but a fixed moment to make himself understood, and his great skill consists in presenting to the comprehension of the spectator, not only that which is doing, but that which is about to be done, and, which is more difficult, that which has been done. In this arduous science, the genius of Raffaello is distinguishedly triumphant; it is this that forms the magic of his art, and he has carried it to the highest possible pitch.

In composition, so nearly connected with invention, Raffaello is entitled to the highest praise; and it has been observed by Mengs, that he would have gone beyond the limits of humanity, if he had possessed every part of the art in the same degree. In all his compositions, the principal figure presents itself to the beholder at once; there is never a necessity to search for it. The different groups are reunited by the principal action; his oppositions, and his conduct of the masses of light and shadow, are not directed by affectation or caprice, but are regulated by reason and truth. His School of Athens may be cited as one of the most admirable examples of composition that can be found. Those who have practised the art since Raffaello, and have adopted opposite principles in this branch, may have been able to seduce the artificial observer, but they have not been successful in satisfying the expectations of the judicious. Paolo Veronese is splendid and multifarious in his figures and ornaments; and Lanfranco, and other eminent machinists, have introduced contrasts of the chiaro-scuro more striking and vigorous; but these afford a poor compensation for the absence of that decorous urbanity and dignified nobleness which characterize the works of Raffaello.

In design he considered the art as something more than a simple and precise imitation of his model; and it was his prevalent maxim, that objects should be represented not as they are, but as they ought to be. By consulting the works of the ancient sculptors, without abandoning nature, he learned how her beauties were to be selected and studied. He found that the Greeks had not followed her in detail, that they had only availed themselves of what was most essential and most beautiful, and that their greatest perfection consisted in the regularity of the proportions; he therefore particularly attached himself to that part of the art. In the delicacy and purity of his contours, it has been attempted to equal him to the sculptors of antiquity; but this, without injury to his reputation, may be allowed to be strained; and his admirers will not be unwilling to admit that he is still inferior to them in his ideas of perfect beauty. Agostino Caracci proposes him as a model for symmetry; and in this, more than in any other respect, he has approached to the perfection of the antique. His style of design is rather Roman than Grecian, as it was principally from the bassi-rilievi that he studied the ancients. From them he formed his habit of expressing strongly the construction of the human frame, the action and articulation of the bones and muscles; and he has excelled in that respect, without, however, giving generally to his figures that ease and elegance remarkable in the best Grecian statues, and without expressing that flexibility which we discover in the Laocoon, the Apollo Belvidere, and in the Gladiator. If he did not reach the ideal beauty of the ancients, it may be attributed to the taste and manners of the age in which he lived, and the subjects he was called upon to treat. Having rarely occasion to represent figures entirely ideal, he devoted himself to a pure and sensible expression of the passions of the mind. He particularly excelled in the delineation of philosophers, the apostles, and other similar characters; and his heads of that description are said by Vasari to be something more than human. If he was less successful in his attempts to personify divinity, it will be allowed that, as Mengs expresses it, if the Greeks hovered between earth and heaven, Raffaello moved with dignity as a terrestrial.

In expression, no less than in the branches just mentioned, Raffaello may be said to be unrivalled. There is not an emotion of the mind, nor a passion implanted in the human heart, that he was not capable of expressing with the most characteristic propriety. Nature had endowed him with an imagination so faithful and correct, that he was able to give to each figure the precise shade of feeling, whether impassioned or tranquil, that the situation required. Every figure in his pictures exhibits its genuine character, and cannot be mistaken for any other passion. The pensive, the sad, the gay, the furious, all are represented with the same explicit correctness. He not only gave the expression suitable to each figure, but to the entire subject; and its different episodes are stamped with correspondent consistency. The spirit of Raffaello is seen in every group, in every figure, in every member, in every articulation; and is even evident in the disposition of the hair, and in the folding of the drapery. If his figure is speaking, it is seen at once if his mind is calm, or if he is talking with vehemence. One of his most surprising faculties is the variety he has given to the same expression. He offers these varieties without having recourse to affected contrasts, and exhibits the most violent passions without vulgarity or grimace. No artist was so well acquainted with the just and precise effect which the emotion of the mind produces on the movement of the body. Every thing speaks in silence, and each actor on the scene, as Petrarch expresses it, Il cor negli occhi, e nella fronte ha scritto.

In Raffaello we never discover what is constantly found in the works of other eminent artists, who, when they had to represent a strongly animated passion, run into the extremity of phrensy and extravagance; or when called on for the tranquil and sedate, present us with coldness and insipidity. In this classic discrimination others have in vain attempted to imitate him; his figures appear to be put in motion by the sentiments of the mind; those of other artists, with the exception of N. Poussin, Domenichino, and a few others, seem to be the puppets of the theatre. Such is the variety with which he has depicted the passions of the mind, and as expression is considered the most difficult, the most philosophical, and the most essential accomplishment of the art, his pretensions to superiority will scarcely be disputed. Such are the attributes which the sublime genius of Raffaele created and established in the art, during the short period of his abridged existence; who can venture to ascertain to what point of perfection he might have raised it, if he had been permitted a length of years equal to that of Titian or Michael Angelo? [The preceding account is sufficiently ample for ordinary consultation; perhaps too diffuse for a Dictionary. The name, however, of RAPHAEL has such a charm that every amateur is desirous of knowing all that can be related of a man so wonderful in art. To enable the inquirer to obtain the knowledge of a portion of what has been written respecting him, the following works are perhaps the best for perusal, though they do not contain a moiety of what might be compiled, and the subject be still capable of new dissertation. Vasari, Vite de' Pittori; Bellori, Descrizione delle Imagini depinte da Raffaello da Urbino nel Palazzo Vaticano; Duppa's Life of Raffaello Sanzio; Quatremère de Quincy, Histoire de la Vie et des Ouvrages de Raphael; Pungileoni, Elogio Storico di Raffaello Santi da Urbino; Rehberg, Rafael Sanzio aus Urbino; Platner and Bunsen, Beschreibung der Stadt Rom, vol. ii.; and J. D. Passavant, Rafael von Urbino und sein vater Giovanni Sante, whose account of his works, as regards their authenticity, must be read with caution. Zani, Enciclopedia Metodica delle belle Arti, parte seconda, passim, will afford much information respecting Raphael's life and works. For sound discriminating criticism on his styles at different periods, and his character as a painter generally, the Lectures delivered by the late Thomas Phillips, professor of painting of the Royal Academy of London, deserve an attentive perusal, especially by students. England may be proud of possessing seven of his Cartoons, which are at Hampton Court, preserved to the country by Oliver Cromwell, at the dispersion of the collection of Charles I. In the National Gallery there is a cabinet picture of St. Catharine, a portrait of Julius II., one of several, and a small picture called The Vision of a Knight, attributed to him, but whether truly or no is not of the slightest importance, as it adds nothing to the artist's reputation, and does no credit to the judgment of those who selected it for a national institution, as a type of the master. There are many better pictures by Raphael in the collections of noblemen and gentlemen in England than those in the National Gallery; among which, three in the Bridgewater collection, one at Panshanger, one at Blenheim, a small picture in the possession of Mr. Farrer, one belonging to Lady Garvagh, and one in Lord Dudley's collection, may be cited; to say nothing of the numerous drawings by him in various collections that would be much more valuable as examples. Different authors have adopted different modes of spelling the painter's name; but as he himself placed Raphael on the hem of the Virgin's robe, and inscribed on two pictures Raphaelis Sanctij Urbinate opus, and Raphael Urbinas pingebat, 1517 and 1518, on two others, and as there is a fac simile of a letter written by him signed Raphaello, the English form, Raphael, is nearer to the name than Raffaello or Raffaello, and has less of affectation in the utterance. On a medal, supposed to be by him, struck in honour of Lucretia Romana, the name RAPHAEL, in Roman capitals, is in the exergue on the reverse. As the medal is very rare, a description of it may not be considered out of place. It is one inch and three-tenths in diameter. On the obverse, the head with a veil thrown back, and the words LUCRETIA ROMANA in Roman capitals; on the reverse, a biga and charioteer in the field, the sign Aries above between the letters L. C., (Lucretia Constellatio.) and RAPHAEL in the exergue.]

RAFFAELLI, FRANCESCO. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1705. He engraved some plates of historical subjects, which are chiefly executed with the graver.

RAFFAELLINO, DEL COLLE. This artist was a native of Citta S. Sepolero, and flourished about the year 1546. He was first a disciple of Raffaele, but after the death of that master he became the scholar of Giulio Romano, whom he assisted in his principal works at Rome, and in the Palazzo del Te, at Mantua. Of his own compositions, the principal are two pictures at Citta di S. Sepolero, one of which, representing the Resurrection, in the church of S. Rocco, exhibits a grandeur not unworthy of the great school in which he had been educated. The figure of Christ is dignified and majestic, and the terror of the guards of the sepulchre is admirably expressed. The other is in the church of the Conventuali, and represents the Assumption of the Virgin. It is a graceful and impressive composition; and being placed near one of the best pictures of Giorgio Vasari, establishes its merit by its decided superiority. [He was one of the artists employed by Raphael in the decorations of the loggie of the Vatican, and painted one of the small cupolas in the roof with a portion of the history of Moses. In Citta di Castello is an Annunciation by him, a very graceful composition, of which Rosini has given a print (plate 155); an Entombment in the Servi is another beautiful picture. A picture of the Virgin attended by St. Sebastian and St. Rocco, was in the church of St. Francis of Cagli, the figures and landscape of which much resemble the manner of Raphael. In one of the chapels of the Olivet monks at Gubbio there are pictures by him, in one of which he has introduced a figure of Virtue, that seems to be a sister to Raphael's Sibyls. He assisted Bronzino and Vasari in their decorations and cartoons; and had many scholars who proved able artists, but few that equalled him in grace and high finish. Justice compels the reversal of the compliment at the end of the text. What Lanzi says is, "that it loses something of its effect by standing opposite to a fine picture by Vasari, which throws it strongly into the shade." Vasari has been very sparing in his notice of this master.]

RAGGI, PIETRO PAOLO. According to Tassi, this painter was born at Vienna about the year 1650; but his parents removing from thence to Genoa when he was young, he received his first education in the art in that city, though it is not known by whom he was instructed. His picture in the Nunziata del Guastato, at Genoa, representing S. Bonaventura, is in the style of the Caracci, and is mentioned by Ratti as a production of great merit. After visiting Turin and Savona, he established himself at Bergamo, where he painted several pictures for the churches and private collections. In the church of S. Lorenzo is an admired picture of the Annunciation; and in S. Marta, Mary Magdalene taken up into heaven. He also distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes, which he embellished with figures representing pastoral or bacchanalian subjects, which he painted in the style of Benedetto Castiglione and Giulio Carpioni. He died at Bergamo in 1724. [Zani places his birth in 1637, and his death in 1711.]

RAGOT, FRANCIS, a French engraver, born at Bagnolet in 1641. He engraved some plates after Simon Vouet and Charles Le Brun; but he is chiefly distinguished for his ability in copying the prints engraved by Bolswert, Pontius, and Vorstermans, after the works of Rubens and Vandyck. He executed about forty of these copies with such accuracy and precision, that they have been mistaken for the originals by inexperienced collectors. He is also said to have engraved a few portraits. [Of these copies Nagler has given a list; they amount to thirty-four.]

[RAHART, FLORENT DELAMERE, a French artist, is incidentally mentioned as a good portrait painter; he was born in 1630, and died in 1718.]

RAIBOLINI, FRANCESCO, sometimes called FRANCESCO FRANCA. This artist was born at Bologna in 1450. In the early part of his life he followed the business of a goldsmith and medallist; and Vasari informs us, that some of his coins were equal to those of the celebrated Caradosso of Milan. At what precise period he commenced the study of painting is not known; but he is said to have received his instruction in the art from Marco Zoppo, when he had already reached the age of virility, and in a few years made such progress, that he was able to compete with the ablest painters of Ferrara and Modena. It is probable that he continued the profession of a goldsmith for some years after he began the practice of painting, as we find several of his works in the churches at Bologna, inscribed Franciscus Francia Aurifer, particularly a picture of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, S. Girolamo, and S. Francesco, in the church of the Annunziata, and the altar-piece of the chapel of the noble family of Bentivogli, in S. Giacomo Maggiore, representing the Virgin and Infant, with several saints, which was painted in 1490. His first style resembled that of Pietro Perugino, in the arrangement of his compositions, the airs of his heads, and the tones of his colouring; and some of his pictures have been ascribed to that master. He afterwards aggrandized his style by studying the works of Andrea Mantegna.

Cavazzoni, who has written a treatise on the pictures at Bologna, would have us to believe that Raffaele himself had profited by the works of Francia, which enabled him to quit the dry manner he had acquired under Perugino; but it is scarcely necessary to remark, in answer to this assertion, that the juvenile performances of Raffaele in S. Severo, at Perugia, already surpassed the best productions of Francesco Francia, as well as those of Pietro Perugino. Vasari reports, that Raffaele having painted his celebrated picture of St. Cecilia, for the church of S. Giovanni in Monte, at Bologna, addressed it, in 1518, to the care of F. Francia, requesting him to correct any defect he might discover in it, previous to its being fixed in the place for which it was intended; and attributes the death of Francia in that year to the mortification and chagrin he felt at the sight of a performance so superior to every thing he had seen. Malvasia detects the falsity of this statement, by proving that he lived several years after that period, and, in 1522, painted his most celebrated picture of St. Sebastian, which became the model of study to the Caracci and their school. The precise time of his death is not known. [Zani says he died on the 5th of January, 1517, which agrees within a day with the date of the document discovered by J. A. Calvi. According to the old custom of beginning the ecclesiastical and legal year on the 25th of March, this is by the modern mode of reckoning 1518. Malvasia is, therefore, in error. There are two pictures by this master in the English National Gallery. Duchesne classes him among the miellists, and ascribes to him a Nativity, a Crucifixion, a Resurrection of Christ, and a Woman with three Men and a Satyr.]

[RAIMBACH, ABRAHAM, a very eminent engraver, was born at London in 1776. His father was a Swiss by birth, but had come to England at an early period of his life, and never left it. After receiving his education at Archbishop Tennison's Library School, he was apprenticed to J. Hall, the engraver, and the first work of the young apprentice was the explanatory key to the engraving of Copley's Death of Chatham, and which, with the picture, hangs now in the National Gallery. After the term of his apprenticeship he entered as a student at the Royal Academy, and took what casual employment he could obtain from the booksellers, and also occupied himself with miniature painting. He found the latter irksome, and abandoned it. The plates he executed for Smirke's and Forster's illustrated edition of the Arabian Nights made known his ability, and were also profitable in a pecuniary point of view. In 1812 he became David Wilkie's engraver, and the first work of that distinguished painter that he transferred to copper was The Village Politicians, the next was The Rent Day, and these were followed at intervals by The Cut Finger, The Errand Boy, Blindman's Buff, Disstraining for Rent, The Parish Beadle, and The Spanish Mother and Child. Raimbach, it is said, never employed an assistant, but executed the whole of the plates. His prints, after Wilkie, are considered masterly works, and were boldly engraved to enable the publishers to take numerous impressions, and therefore appear somewhat deficient in artistic freedom and delicacy of execution. They are, however, suited to the subjects, and the characters are faithfully maintained. He died in 1843.]

RAIMONDI, MARC ANTONIO. This eminent engraver was born at Bologna in 1487 or 1488, and is generally known in the art by the name of Marc Antonio. He was instructed in design by Francesco Raibolini, called Francia, and probably learned engraving from a goldsmith, as his first attempts in that art were the embellishments of the silver ornaments worn at the time. One of his earliest engravings on copper was a plate from a picture by Francia, representing Pyramus and Thisbe, dated in 1502. Vasari reports, that on a visit he made to Venice in search of improvement, he met with the set of thirty-six wooden cuts by Albert Durer, representing the Life and Passion of Christ; and was so much pleased with them, that he copied them with great precision on copper, and having affixed the cipher of Albert Durer to them, the prints were sold in Italy as the originals. The deception having reached the ears of Albert, he complained to the senate of the plagiarism, but could only obtain an order that Marc Antonio should not in future put the monogram of Albert Durer on the copies he might afterwards make from his works. It is most probable that Vasari, with his usual inaccuracy, has mistaken the Life of our Saviour for the Life of the Virgin; as Marc Antonio copied both the sets from the cuts of Albert Durer, to the latter of which he affixed the mark of Albert, and not to the former, as asserted. Marc Antonio soon afterwards quitted Venice and went to Rome, where his talents were not long unnoticed by Raffaele, who not only employed him in engraving from his designs, but is said to have traced the outlines himself on the plates, that the correctness of the drawing might be more perfectly preserved. The first plate he engraved from the design of Raffaele was the Death of Lucretia, which is neatly engraved, but not among his best performances. His next print after that master was the Judgment of Paris, executed in a more bold and spirited style. These were followed by several other plates, which firmly established his reputation; and Raffaele was so perfectly satisfied with the works of this able artist, that he sent several of them as presents to Albert Durer, to whom they were particularly acceptable.

During the life of Raffaele, Giulio Romano, from respect for his master, did not employ the graver of Marc Antonio; but after his death, in 1520, he engaged him to engrave from his designs, and unfortunately for our artist, he was prevailed on to execute the set of indecent subjects for which Aretin composed the verses, which excited the indignation of Pope Clement VII. to such a degree, that he ordered Marc Antonio to be arrested and thrown into prison; and it was with great difficulty the intercession of some of the cardinals, and that of Baccio Bandinelli, procured his liberation. On recovering his liberty, he was desirous of expressing his acknowledgments to Bandinelli for the good offices he had rendered him, and for that purpose he engraved his celebrated print of the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, after a picture by that painter. In the execution of this fine plate he exerted all his ability, and on its being shown to the Pope, he not only pardoned his offence, but took him under his protection. He was now in full possession of the public esteem, and favoured with the patronage of the great, when he was suddenly deprived of these advantages by the dreadful sacking of Rome by the Spaniards in 1527, in which he was plundered of all he had acquired, and obliged to fly from Rome, and take refuge at Bologna, where he continued occasionally to engrave, until the year 1539, the date of his last print of the Battle of the Lapithæ, after Giulio Romano. He is said by Malvasia to have been assassinated by a Roman nobleman, for having, contrary to his engagement, engraved a second plate from a design by Raffaele, representing the Murder of the Innocents.

Marc Antonio may be regarded as one of the most extraordinary engravers that has appeared in the art. The purity of his outlines, the beautiful character and expression of his heads, and the correct drawing of the extremities, establish his merit as a perfect master of design. In the prints of this eminent artist, which are extremely numerous, great attention should be paid to the different impressions of the plates, which have been greatly retouched and altered by the different printsellers through whose hands they have passed. The best impressions are without the name of any publisher. After the plates were taken from the stock of Tommaso Barlacchi, they came into the possession of Antonio Salamanca; afterwards they passed through the hands of Antonio Laferri, from thence to Nicholas van Aelst, and, lastly, became the property of Rossi, or de Rubeis, at which time they were almost worn out. The most complete catalogue of the prints of this great artist, which has hitherto appeared, is that of Baron Heineken, to which we refer the reader for more particular information than can be looked for in a work of this nature. The following is as copious a list of his most esteemed prints as our limit will admit of. Several of his plates are without any mark; on others will be found one of the following ciphers, or the tablet:

M. M. M. M.

PORTRAITS.

Aretin, the poet; inscribed Petrus Aretinus accerimus, &c.

A Man wrapped in a cloak, seated near a table, and on the left a pallet with colours. Malvasia calls this the portrait of Raffaele.

Charles V. when young; a medallion.

Pope Clement VII.; the same.

SUBJECTS OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT.

Adam and Eve; after Raffaele. This print has been copied by Mr. Strutt, and is placed as the title to the second volume of his Dictionary of Engravers.

Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; after the painting by M. Angelo in the Sistine chapel.

Noah sacrificing after leaving the Ark; after Raffaele.

God appearing to Noah; after Raffaele.

God appearing to Isaac; after the same.

Joseph and Potiphar's wife; after the same.

David cutting off the Head of Goliath; after the same.

David taking up the Head of Goliath; after the same; very scarce.

The Nativity, or Adoration of the Shepherds; after Francia.

The Murder of the Innocents; after Raffaele. He engraved this subject a second time, and has added in the second plate, towards the right of the print, a small pointed tree, resembling a yew tree, called in Italian la feleitta, and in French la fougere, or le chicot. The latter is considered the better print, and it is scarce.

The Holy Family. The Virgin is seated, holding the infant Jesus on her lap, with St. John before him, and St. Joseph appearing behind; after the same. This print is usually called The Virgin with the long thigh.

The Virgin seated, with St. Elisabeth and St. John, to whom the infant Christ is giving the benediction. A large palm tree is seen in the back-ground, on which account the print is known by the appellation of The Virgin of the Palm; after the same.

The Virgin seated near a cradle, presenting the infant Jesus to St. Anne. Behind is an old woman with her arms extended, as if in admiration; after the same; called The Virgin of the Cradle.

The Virgin seated on a chair, embracing the infant Jesus; after the same.

The Virgin holding the Infant, and reading; after the same.

The Holy Family; after the painting by M. Angelo in the Sistine chapel.

The Virgin and infant Jesus, to whom Tobit, accompanied by an Angel, is presenting a fish. On the other side is St. Joseph reading in a book; after Raffaele.

The Virgin in the Clouds, holding the infant Jesus; after the same. Agostino Caracci, having got possession of this plate, retouched it, and added two beautiful heads of cherubim.

A set of seventeen plates of the Life of the Virgin; copied from the wooden cuts by Albert Durer, with the monogram of that artist; and on the last plate the cipher of Marc Antonio.

Thirty-six plates of the Life and Passion of our Saviour, copied in imitation of the wooden cuts by Albert Durer, but without the mark of that master.

Christ seated between two columns, upon the steps, with the Virgin and Mary Magdalene; after Raffaele; called The Virgin with the Steps.

Mary Magdalene at the feet of Christ, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; after the same.

The Last Supper; after the same; called La piece des pieds.

The taking down from the Cross; after the same.

The dead Christ laid on the Sepulchre, with the Virgin with her arms extended, and in the deepest affliction; after the same.

The same composition, in which the Virgin appears younger, and has one of her arms naked, called The Virgin with the naked arm.

The dead Christ, with his head on the knees of the Virgin, with the holy women and two of the disciples, with Nicodemus; after the same.

Jesus Christ, with a glory, between the Virgin and St. John, and below, St. Paul and St. Catherine; after the same. This print is called The Five Saints.

The Death of Ananias; after the same.

Elymas, the Sorcerer, struck blind; after the same.

St. Paul preaching at Athens; after the same.

The three last are the subjects of three of the cartoons.

St. Cecilia, with Mary Magdalene, St. Paul, and two other saints; after the same. The best impressions of this plate have a strong shadow on the neck of St. Cecilia, resembling a necklace, on which account it is called The St. Cecilia with the Necklace. In the inferior impressions the shadow is more feeble.

The Martyrdom of St. Felicitas; after Raffaele.

St. Catherine holding the Palm of Martyrdom; after Francia.

St. Catherine and St. Lucia; after the same.

St. Martha holding the Palm of Martyrdom; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; called by the Italians La graticola di S. Lorenzo; after Baccio Bandinelli.

A set of thirteen plates of Christ and the Apostles; after Raffaele.

HISTORICAL AND OTHER SUBJECTS.

The four heroes, Curtius, Horatius, Scipio Africanus, and Titus Vespasian; supposed to have been among his first attempts on copper.

The books of the Sibyls put into the tomb of Numa Pompilius; after Raffaele.

The Rape of Helen; after the same.

Aeneas saving his father Anchises from the burning of Troy, preceded by Ascanius; after the same.

Venus appearing to Aeneas in the form of a Huntress; after the same.

The Death of Dido; after the same.

The Death of Lucretia; after the same.

The Battle of the Sabre; after the same. The same subject was engraved by Agostino Veneziano, called de Musis.

SUBJECTS OF THE FABLE.

Three of the Angels of the Farnesina; after Raffaele; representing Jupiter caressing Cupid, Cupid and the Graces, and Mercury descending to earth from Olympus.

The Judgment of Paris; after the same.

Mars, Venus, and Cupid; after Montegna.

Vulcan, Venus, and Cupid; after Raffaele.

Apollo resting on the shepherd Hyacinth, accompanied by Cupid; inscribed 1506. Æ. 19.

The Triumph of Galatea; after the same. The best impressions are without any name, the worst have the names of Van Aelst and Rossi.

Mount Parnassus; after the same.

Heracles strangling Anteus; after a design by some attributed to Raffaele, by others, to M. Angelo.

The Battle of the Lapithæ; after Giulio Romano. 1539.

Pyramus and Thisbe; after F. Francia, supposed to be his first engraving on copper.

The two Sibyls; after Raffaele.

Neptune rising from the Sea, to calm the tempest in which Aeneas and his companions were shipwrecked. It is surrounded by a border, in which are nine compartments, containing subjects taken from the Æneid.

The Pest, called Il Morbetto; after Raffaele.

[Notwithstanding the length of this article, the inquirer is recommended to peruse Bartsch, Peintre

Graveur, tom. xiv., the whole of which is devoted to an account of this artist and a catalogue raisonné of his works, and those of his two principal scholars, Agostino Veneziano, and Marco da Ravenna. See also note 3, vol. xvi. parte 1. of Zani's Enciclopedia Metodica.]

RAINIERI, FRANCESCO-[MARIA, called Lo SCHIVENOGLIA.] This artist was born at Mantua about the year 1680. He was a scholar of Giovanni Canti, and painted similar subjects, representing landscapes and battle-pieces. His pictures are little inferior to those of his instructor; if they are less vigorously coloured, his figures are usually better drawn. He died in 1758.

[RAM, JAN DE, a Dutch engraver, who was born about 1680, and was a scholar of Romeyn de Hooghe. He worked for the booksellers, and his prints are numerous in Dutch publications. He is more free, learned, and correct than his instructor. He also engraved in mezzotint, of which there is a specimen in a portrait of Christian V., king of Denmark. The time of his death is not mentioned.]

RAMA, CAMILLO. According to Orlandi, this painter was a native of Brescia, and flourished about the year 1622. He was a disciple of the younger Palma, and painted several altar-pieces and other considerable works for the public edifices of his native city, which prove him to have been an able follower of the style of his instructor. In the refectory of the Carmelites is an admired picture by this master; and in the churches of S. Giosseffo and S. Francesco there are several of his performances, which are deservedly esteemed.

RAMBALDI, CARLO [ANTONIO.] This painter was born at Bologna in 1680, and was a scholar of Domenico Viani. He painted history with some reputation, and there are several of his pictures in the churches at Bologna, which are not without considerable merit. The most worthy of notice are the Death of St. Joseph, in the church of S. Gregorio; the Visitation, in S. Giuseppe; and his picture of St. Francis Xavier, in S. Lucia. He died in 1717.

[RAMBERG, JOHN HENRY, an historical and portrait painter, and engraver, was a native of Hanover, born in 1763, and came early to England. He was a scholar of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and made great progress under his instruction. He painted many subjects for book illustrations, and was one of the artists employed by Boydell on his Shakspeare. He was patronized by the royal family, and painted for the Prince of Wales at Carlton House; he was of course a member of the Royal Academy. He visited Italy, France, Holland, and Germany, and left proofs of his talents in each. His works, however, seldom appear; among those he painted in England, that of The cross-gartered Malvolio, from Shakspeare's play of Twelfth Night, is, perhaps, the best known. He also engraved a great number of pieces in aquatint and the chalk manner; and twenty allegorical subjects, entitled Genius, Imagination, and Fancies, in lithography, from the designs of the Princess of Hesse Homberg, the Princess Royal of England, which were printed at Hanover in 1834, to which place he had returned, and probably died there in 1840.]

RAMELLI, PADRE FELICE. According to Orlandi, this artist was born at Asti, in the Piedmontese, in 1666, and was a scholar of Padre Danese Rho. He became a celebrated painter of historical subjects and portraits in miniature, and resided the greater part of his life at Rome, where he became an ecclesiastic, and was made a canon of S. Giovanni Laterano. The king of Sardinia invited him to his court, where he was for some time employed in painting the portraits of the most celebrated painters, many of which he copied from the originals, painted by themselves in the Florentine Gallery. He died in 1740.

RAMENGI, BARTOLOMEO. See BAGNACAVALLIO.

[RAMIREZ, GERONIMO, a painter of Seville, and a disciple of Roélas, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. In the church of the hospital de la Sangre was a beautiful picture, signed with his name, representing the pope surrounded by cardinals and other personages.]

[RAMIREZ, FELIPE, probably a relation of Geronimo, flourished at the same period. He painted hunting-pieces, dead game, birds, and various other subjects. He was a correct designer, and understood the figure, as may be seen in his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Stephen. His pictures of still-life are distinguished by their truth and freshness; and his pictures generally were held in much esteem by amateurs.]

RAMIREZ, JOSEF, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia about the year 1626. He was a scholar of Geronimo de Espinosa, and painted history in the style of his master. Palomino mentions, as his most esteemed performances, his works in the convent of San Phelipe Neri, particularly his picture of Nuestra Sennora de la Luz. He died at Valencia in 1686. [According to Bermudez he was born in 1624, and died in 1692. He was a learned ecclesiastic, and wrote the Life of San Phelipe Neri.]

[RAMIREZ, JUAN, a Spanish portrait painter, who lived about the middle of the 16th century. A great number of his portraits existed at Seville. Of his other works there are no vestiges, though it is supposed that being employed in the chapel of St. Christopher, and other places of note, he must have been an artist of considerable talent.]

RAMSAY, ALLAN. This artist was the son of Allan Ramsay, the author of the admired pastoral drama of the Gentle Shepherd, and was born at Edinburgh in 1709, [others say, in 1713.] After learning the elements of design he went to Italy, where he was first a scholar of Solimene, and afterwards of Imperiale. He did not, however, long prosecute his studies in historical painting, but devoted himself entirely to portraits. On his return from Italy he established himself for some time at Edinburgh, but afterwards settled in London, where he met with very flattering success. He was introduced by Lord Bute to the Prince of Wales, [afterwards George III.,] whose portrait he twice painted; and on the death of Mr. Shakelton, in 1767, was appointed principal painter to the crown. Without reaching the highest rank in his profession, he painted portraits with considerable reputation. In a pamphlet [by Rouquet] entitled The present State of the Arts in England, published in 1755, this artist is thus mentioned: "Ramsay is an able painter, who, acknowledging no other guide than nature, brought a rational taste with him from Italy: he showed even in his portraits that just steady spirit which he so agreeably displays in his conversation." He died in 1784. [He painted a great number of full-length portraits of George III. and of Queen Charlotte, sitting in state, in which he was assisted by his pupil Philip Reinagle.]

RANC, JOHN, a French portrait painter, born at Montpellier in 1674. He was a scholar of Hyacinth Rigaud, whose style he followed with considerable success. M. D'Argenville relates the following anecdote respecting this artist, which places in a whimsical point of view the mortification which artists practising that branch are too often condemned to experience, from the ignorance and caprice of pretended judges. Having painted the portrait of a gentleman, in which he had exerted all his art, the friends of the party persisted in declaring that it was no way like him. Piqued at their obstinate condemnation of his performance, Ranc promised to alter it, and having prevailed on his sitter to co-operate with him in the stratagem, he prepared a similar cloth, and having cut a hole to admit the head, he requested his model to place himself behind the canvass. The critics were sent for to examine the amended portrait, which they persevered in declaring was not yet like him, when the head answered, "You must be mistaken, gentlemen, 'tis I myself." M. de la Motte has introduced this adventure into his fables. In 1724 he was invited to the court of Spain, and was appointed principal painter to the king. He painted the Royal Family, and also the King and Queen of Portugal, and died at Madrid in 1735.

RANDA, ANTONIO, was a native of Bologna, and was first a scholar of Guido, but afterwards studied under Lucio Massari. He became of sufficient celebrity to be taken under the protection of the Duke of Modena, who appointed him his painter in the year 1614. His works are chiefly to be seen in the churches at Bologna and Ferrara. In the latter city, in the church of S. Stefano, is a picture by him representing S. Filippo Neri, and the great altar-piece of the church of S. Libera is by this master, representing the Virgin Mary, with the infant Saviour and St. Francis. [He died in 1650.]

RANDON, JOHN. By this engraver, who resided at Rome about the year 1710, we have several plates of the antique and modern statues, for the collection published by Rossi; with several other subjects, after Passebon, and other masters. [He was living in 1755.]

RANSONETTE, NICHOLAS, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1753. He has engraved several fabulous subjects, after Gabriel de St. Aubin, and other masters. We have also the following prints by him:

The new Palais-Royal at Paris.

A View of the new Palace of Justice.

The Rival Seducer; from his own design.

The Lover Revenged; from the same.

Cupid and Psyche; after Raffaele.

[Diana of Poitiers; after L. Penni.

Agnes Sorel; after the same.

The Dream of Voltaire; after St. Aubin.

Nostradamus showing Mary de Medicis the throne of the Bourbons.

He died in 1810.]

RAOUX, JOHN, a French painter, born at Montpellier in 1677. He was a scholar of Bon Boulongne, and having obtained the prize at the Academy, was sent to Italy with the king's pension. Although his studies were directed to historical painting, and he was on his return from Italy received into the Academy in that character, he afterwards attached himself principally to fancy subjects and portraits. He is said to have been in England, where he was patronized by Sir Andrew Fontaine. His historical works are his picture of Telemachus in the Island of Calypso, which has been engraved by Beauvarlet, and Venus reposing, of which there is a print by J. Daulle. He died at Paris in 1734.

RAPHAEL. See RAFFAELLE.

[RAPHON, or RAPHOHN, JOHANN, a German historical painter, who flourished in the 15th and 16th centuries. It is said that he was a scholar of Albert Durer, and that he died in the same year, 1528, as his master. There are two pictures known by him, both signed with his name, and bearing the dates 1499 and 1508. The latter picture is in the cathedral of Halberstadt; it consists of a centre and wings, or shutters. In the middle is represented the Crucifixion; on the interiors of the wings the Annunciation, the Adoration of the Shepherds and Magi, and the Presentation in the Temple; on the exteriors, figures of Saints. The composition of the central picture is somewhat overcharged; and the heads are distinguished rather by their energy and individuality than by the expression of that inward feeling by which they might be supposed to be affected at the moment. Another altar-piece, of a Crucifixion, with saints on the wings, said to be by him, is in the library of the university at Gottingen. M. Hausmann of Hanover possesses two wings of a fourth altar-piece; and, as curiosity is awakened, it is probable that more will be discovered. At present this seems to be all that is known of him, or his history.]

RATHBONE, JOHN. This artist was a native of Cheshire, and was born about the year 1750. Without the help of an instructor he acquired a respectable talent as a landscape painter, and his pictures were frequently embellished with figures by Ibbeston, Anderson, and other contemporary artists. He died in 1807.

RATTI, GIO. AGOSTINO. This painter was born at Savona in 1699. He went early in life to Rome, where he frequented the school of Benedetto Luti. He occasionally painted historical subjects, of which the most deserving of notice are his pictures of the life of St. John the Baptist, in the church of S. Giovanni, at Savona, of which the Decollation is much admired. But his principal merit was in painting theatrical decorations and caricatures, in which he discovered great ingenuity and invention, and in that branch nearly equalled the celebrated Ghezzi. He died at Genoa in 1775.

RAVENET, SIMON FRANCIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1706. After practising the art with considerable reputation in his native country, he came to England, and settled in London about the year 1750, and engraved several plates, which justly entitle him to the rank of an eminent artist. He gave both colour and brilliancy to his engravings, and finished them with great precision. He engraved a variety of historical subjects and portraits, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

George I.
George II.; after Mercier.
Lord Camden; after Reynolds.
Alexander Pope, Poet.
James Thomson, Poet.
David Hume, Historian.
Mr. Garrick and Miss Bellamy, in Romeo and Juliet; after B. Wilson.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Emblem of Human Life; after Titian; Crozat collection.
Venus and Adonis; after P. Veronese; the same.
The Adoration of the Shepherds; after D. Feti; the same.
Painting and Design; after Guido.
The Virgin, with the infant Jesus sleeping; after the same.
Charity; after Carlo Cignani.
The Arcadian Shepherds; after N. Poussin.

Sophonisba receiving the Nuptial Present; after L. Giordano.
The Death of Seneca; after the same.
Tobias's Nuptial Night; after Le Sueur.
Tobit Anointing his Father's Eyes; after Ag. Caracci.
The Lord of the Vineyard; after Rembrandt.
The Prodigal Son; after Sal. Rosa.
Phryne tempting Xenocrates; after the same.
The Return of the Prodigal Son; after Guercino.
Lucretia deploring her Fate; after Cazali.
Gumbilda, Empress of Germany, acquitted of a charge of adultery; after the same.

He died in 1774. [Zani and Basan say he was born in 1721, and Rost says in 1707. He was a scholar of Ph. le Bas, but most of his works were executed in England. He was much employed by Boydell, as appears by his publications.]

RAVENET, SIMON [FRANCIS,] was the son of the preceding artist, born in London about the year 1755, [according to others in 1749,] and was instructed by his father in the art of engraving. He afterwards visited Paris, where he studied painting for a short time under Francis Boucher. On leaving that master he went to Italy, and settled at Parma, where he undertook the hardy enterprise of engraving and publishing plates from all the works of Coreggio, which were in that city. This arduous undertaking occupied him from 1779 till 1785, in which time he engraved the following prints:

A set of twelve plates of the Cupola of the Cathedral.
A set of plates of the Dome of S. Giovanni.
The Madonna della Scodella.
The Madonna della Scala.
La Santissima Nonziata.
The Madonna Incoronata.
Christ bearing his Cross.
The Descent from the Cross.
The celebrated St. Jerome.
The Martyrdom of St. Placid.—[All of them after Coreggio.]

We have also by him the two following prints:

Jupiter and Antiope; after Rubens.
Theseus lifting the Stone; after N. Poussin.

[He was living in 1813.]

RAVENNÀ, MARCO DA, an eminent Italian engraver, born at Ravenna about the year 1496. The reputation which Marc Antonio Ramondi acquired at Rome, drew many young artists thither, to study under him; and of the number was Marco da Ravenna, who was his disciple at the same time with Agostino de Musis, called Veneziano. Ravenna imitated with precision the bolder style of engraving practised by his master, but was not equally successful when he attempted to follow him in his neatest and most finished works. He handled the graver with more freedom than his fellow student Veneziano, though he was inferior to him in clearness and accuracy. The usual mark of this artist is a cipher, composed of an R. and S.

joined together thus, RS, which has been the occasion of several mistakes, not only with respect to his works, but with respect to himself, and has led several authors to suppose that there were two Ravennas, the one named Marco, and the other Silvestro; and they have been confirmed in this opinion by the declaration of Vasari, who tells us, that Marco da Ravignano, for so he writes the name, marked his plates with an M. and an R., which in some few instances he did. Those who do not suppose there were two Ravennas, have imagined that these two letters were designed for Raffaello Sanzio, and placed upon the plate to denote that it was taken from a design by that master. This opinion; however, is easily confuted, for the same mark is found on the print of the Murder of the Innocents, after Baccio Bandinelli, which, of course, cannot refer to Raffaele. It should certainly be interpreted Ravenna, or, as Vasari writes his name, Ravignano, sculpsit. He sometimes marked his plates with an R. without the S., and sometimes with a monogram formed of an M. and an R. thus MR. The following are his principal prints:

SACRED SUBJECTS.

A set of twelve plates of subjects from the Bible; after the paintings in the Vatican, from the designs of Raffaele.

The Murder of the Innocents; after Baccio Bandinelli.

The Transfiguration; after Raffaele.

The Last Supper; after the same. The same is engraved by M. Antonio.

The Holy Family; after the same; engraved also by M. Antonio; called The Virgin with the long thigh.

The Virgin Mary holding the infant Jesus, seated on a pedestal, with St. Joseph; after Polidoro di Caravaggio.

A set of thirteen plates of Christ and the Apostles; after Raffaele. The same were engraved by M. Antonio.

St. Michael discomfiting the Evil Spirit; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Remembrance of Death; an emblematical subject, in which a figure of Death is represented holding a book, surrounded by several emaciated figures; after Baccio Bandinelli. The same subject, with variations, was engraved by Agostino Veneziano.

A Bacchanal subject, represented by children; after Giulio Romano.

The Rape of Helen; after Raffaele.

Venus quitting Juno and Ceres; after the same.

Two plates, the Interview between Scipio and Hannibal, and the Victory of Scipio; after Giulio Romano.

The Triumph of Galatea; after Raffaele. Engraved also by M. Antonio.

The Assembly of the Gods; after the same.

Venus on the water, seated on a shell; after the same.

Venus seated under a tree, taking a thorn from her foot, called The Venus with the Rabbit.

Polyphemus pursuing Galatea; after Raffaele.

Galatea seated on a shell, flying from Polyphemus; after the same.

Jupiter and Antiope; without the name of the painter.

The Laocoon; after the antique statue. To this plate he has affixed his name nearly at length, MERCUS RAVENAS.

[To elucidate the questions regarding Marco da Ravenna would require a dissertation too extensive for this Dictionary, nor would it, perhaps, interest the general reader if it were done. The experienced collector does not require it; he knows that Zani, in his Enciclopedia Metodica, parte prima, vol. xvi., and parte seconda, vol. v., has laboured at it con amore; and that Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xiv., with his usual critical acumen, has examined all the evidence of Zani, and placed the subject in as clear a light as will ever, probably, be brought to bear upon it. To those works, therefore, the inquirer should have recourse, to clear up the difficulties that will assuredly present themselves to him, if he is a young amateur. His family name was Dente, he should therefore be called MARCO DENTE DA RAVENNA. Of Silvestro, Simone, and Severo da Ravenna nothing need be said here, as their names and claims, real or supposed, are discussed by the acute writers already referred to.]

RAVESTEYN, HUBERT VAN. This artist was born at Dort in 1647. It is to be regretted that his talents were not employed in subjects more worthy of his uncommon ability. His pictures generally represent the interiors of slaughter-houses, butchers-shops, and objects even more disgusting. He sometimes represented the insides of peasants' kitchens, and stables, which he treated with a captivating intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, and in which every object is designed and touched with infinite nature and effect. Some of his pictures, in point of colour and light and shadow, remind us of the admirable production of his fellow citizen, Albert Cuyp. [According to Immerzeel he was born in 1640; the date of his death is not recorded.]

RAVESTEYN, JOHN VAN, a celebrated portrait painter, born at the Hague about the year 1580. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but he has not been surpassed in the particular branch of the art which he practised, by any of his countrymen, if we except Rembrandt and Vander Helst. Independent of the individual portraits by this painter, which are found in the private collections in Holland, there are two large pictures by him in the hall of the Company of Archers at the Hague, which establish his reputation as one of the ablest artists of the Dutch school. In one of them he has represented the portraits of the officers and principal members of the society, as large as life. The figures, as well as the heads, are correctly drawn and finely coloured. It is dated in 1616. The other represents an assembly of the magistrates of the Hague seated at a table; the figures, consisting of twenty-six, are admirably grouped, and the accessories which accompany them are drawn and painted with great spirit and effect. The heads are full of dignity and expression, and the whole exhibits an appearance of truth and nature that have seldom been surpassed. It was painted in 1618. In the town-house is another picture by Ravesteyn, representing the burgomasters in office, in 1636. He must have lived to an advanced age, as he was at the head of the forty-eight artists, who, in 1655, presented a petition to be separated as a society from the company of house painters. [According to Immerzeel he was born in 1572, and died in 1657.]

RAVESTEYN, ARNOLD VAN. This artist was the son of John van Ravesteyn, and was born at the Hague in 1615. He was instructed in the art by his father, and became a reputable painter of portraits. Although his merit in that branch did not equal that of his father, he was considered superior to any other portrait painter of his time, and was chosen chief of the Society of Artists at the Hague, in 1661. [He died in 1676.]

RAVESTEYN, NICHOLAS VAN. This painter was born at Bommel in 1661. He was the son of Henry Ravesteyn, a painter little known, who intended him for one of the learned professions, but his father dying before he had finished his studies, he turned his thoughts to painting, having already been instructed in the rudiments of design. He was first a scholar of William Doudyns, at the Hague, but his genius leading him to portrait painting, he became a disciple of John de Baan, who was at that time in high repute; on leaving that master he established himself in his native town, where he immediately fell into very extensive practice. The principal persons of the neighbourhood sat to him. In 1694 he was invited to the court of Kuilenberg, to paint the portrait of the Prince of Waldeck. He also occasionally painted historical and emblematical subjects, of which M. Descamps particularly notices four pictures representing the four quarters of the world. He died in 1750. [It was the portrait of the Princess of Waldeck that he went to Kuilenberg to paint, after her death; and succeeded in doing that satisfactorily, which no painter could accomplish during her life.]

RAWLINS, J. This artist is mentioned by Mr.

Strutt as an engraver of portraits and frontispieces for books. He flourished about the year 1760.

RAYMOND, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1695. He executed a few plates with the graver, in a bold, clear style, for the Crozat collection. His drawing is tolerably correct, though formal and stiff; among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Holy Family; a circular plate; after Raffaele.
The Entombing of Christ; after Taddeo Zuccaro.
The Miracle of the Manna; after Romanelli.

RAZZI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI ANTONIO, called IL SODOMA. This painter was born at Vercelli, in the Piedmontese, about the year 1479. According to Vasari, he was instructed in design by Giacomo dalle Fonte, but he chiefly formed his principles by an attentive study of the works of Lionardo da Vinci, whose style is discernible in all his productions. Among his earliest performances were the pictures he painted in 1502, at Monte Oliveto, representing the history of S. Benedetto. He visited Rome in the pontificate of Julius II., and was employed in the Vatican; but his works, with those of several other artists, were defaced, to make way for the frescoes of Raffaele. He was also engaged by Agostino Chigi to ornament the apartments of the Farnesina, where he painted in fresco some pictures of the History of Alexander of Macedon, of which the most admired is his Marriage with Roxana. Though inferior to Lionardo in the beauty of his heads, and in the elegance and nobleness of his forms, he exhibits much of the breadth of his chiaro-scuro, and nearly equals him in perspective. His best works are those he painted at Siena, after his return from Rome, in which he evinced the advantage he had derived from his studies in that capital. His picture of the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Agostino, approaches to the dignity and expression of da Vinci. His Flagellation, at the Franciscans, partakes of the grandeur of M. Angelo Buonaroti, and he appears to have imitated the grace and beauty of Raffaele, in his picture of S. Caterini di Siena, in a chapel in the church of S. Domenico. He died in 1554.

[There seems to be an error in the appellation given to this artist of Il Sodoma; Padre della Valle, in Lettere Senesi, has given the epigraph on a picture by Razzi, which runs thus: Ad honorem Virginis Mariae Jo. Antonius . . . SODONA Eques, et Comes Palatinus faciebat 1538. Sarnelli, in the Guide to Naples, speaking of another picture by him, says, Opera di Gio. Antonio da Vercelli, Cavaliere dello Sprone d'oro, illustre Pittore, che fiori nel 1510. Whatever the meaning of Sodoma may be, it was easy to fall into a mistake in transcribing it, and the error, being once committed, it was implicitly followed by other writers, who, content with a word of which they knew the meaning, did not trouble themselves to inquire into the propriety of the application.]

READ, CATHERINE. According to Edwards, this lady possessed a considerable reputation as a painter of portraits, both in oil and in crayons. About the year 1770 she went to the East Indies, where she resided a few years. On her return to England, she continued to exercise her talents with great respectability until her death, which happened about the year 1786. There are several mezzotint prints after her portraits.

READ, RICHARD, an English engraver in mezzotint and in the crayon manner, who flourished about the year 1780. Among other prints by him we have the following:

Moses saved from the Nile; after Le Sueur.
A Portrait of a Dutch Lady; after Rembrandt.
Mary, Queen of Scots, resigning her crown in favour of her son; after G. Hamilton.

RECCO, CAVALIERE GIUSEPPE. This painter was born at Naples in 1634, and was a scholar of Aniello Falcone. He particularly excelled in painting huntings, dead game, fish, and similar subjects. His pictures are found in the best collections at Naples. He was invited to the court of Madrid, at the time when Luca Giordano flourished there, where his pictures were held in the highest estimation. He died at Naples in 1695.

[RECHBERGER, FRANZ, a very eminent designer, etcher, and landscape painter, was born at Vienna in 1771, and was a scholar of F. Brandt at the same time as Martin von Molitor, with whom he afterwards continued to practise. His landscapes are designed after nature; his etchings are spirited and beautiful, and rank with the choicest of modern times. In general they represent wild, romantic scenery, richly ornamented with trees, or frowning with rocks, in the style of Jacob Ruisdael, or Albert van Everdingen. He also etched a number of landscapes from paintings, or drawings, by Dietrich. The care of the fine collection of prints formerly belonging to Count Fries was confided to him, and he was also keeper of the prints and drawings of the Archduke Charles at Vienna. His etchings are marked F. R., which has occasioned them to be sometimes erroneously attributed to Frederic Rehberg, a contemporary artist, but in a different department, whose works are historical, and belong rather to the Roman school. Rechberger was living in 1842. Nagler has specified 76 etchings by him, and several variations.]

RECLAM, FREDERICK. This artist was born at Magdeburg in 1734. After learning the rudiments of design in his native country, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of J. B. Pierre. In 1755, he visited Rome, and after a residence of seven years in that capital, during which time he was occupied in designing the most interesting views, he established himself at Berlin. He painted landscapes and portraits with considerable success, and died in 1774. We have the following etchings by him:

A set of eight Views in Italy. 1755.
A Landscape, Morning; after Moucheron.
The Companion, Evening; after Dubois.
Two Views in the Environs of Paris; from his own designs.

A View near Rome, with a Waterfall; the same.

[Nagler increases the number to twenty-nine.]

RÉDER, CHRISTIAN, was born in Saxony in 1656, and, according to Pascoli, visited Rome about the year 1686, the year in which Buda was taken, and acquired considerable reputation by the pictures he painted of the battles between the Christians and Ottomans, which were well composed, and touched with great spirit. He died in 1729. [He was also called Leander. Nagler says nothing of his birth or death; Zani says he was born in 1666, but Fuseli says he died in 1729, at the age of 73, which agrees with the dates given in the text. He visited Venice, Hamburg, England, and Holland, and left pictures in each, either battles or landscapes. Füssli calls him Reuter.]

REDI, TOMMASO. This painter was born at Florence in 1665, and after receiving some instruction in his native city he went to Rome, where he frequented the Academy established in that city by the Grand Duke Cosimo III., which was at that time under the direction of Carlo Maratti and Ciro Ferri. His studies at Rome were prosecuted with considerable success, and on his return to Florence he was employed by the Grand Duke in several works for the Palazzo Pitti. He also painted some pictures for the churches, and other public edifices, and is spoken of as an eminent portrait painter. When the Czar Peter visited Florence, he was particularly struck with the works of Redi, and being desirous of establishing an academy for the promotion of the fine arts at Moscow, made very liberal proposals to that master to prevail on him to undertake the superintendence of it, but his engagements at Florence prevented his accepting the offer. He has the character of being a correct and elegant designer; and his colouring partakes of the suavity of Carlo Maratti. He died at Florence in 1726.

REGGIO, LUCA DA. See FERRARI.

REGILLO, DA PORDENONE. See LICINIO.

REGNARD, VALERIAN, a French engraver, who flourished at Rome about the year 1630. Among other things, he engraved several of the plates for the collection of prints from the antique statues, &c., in the Giustiniani Gallery. He also engraved some plates after the works of Gio Antonio Lelli, Pomerancio, Agostino Ciampelli, &c. [He was a scholar of Ph. Thomassin, and was living at Rome in 1650.]

[REGNAULT, JEAN BAPTISTE, an eminent French historical painter, was born at Paris in 1754, and died there in 1809. His pictures are numerous, and consist of historical, poetical, and allegorical subjects, of which Gabet has given a tolerably long list in his Dictionnaire des Artistes de l'Ecole Française, au XIX^e siècle, but says that it is confined to those of his principal productions. At his death, in addition to his pictures, he left numerous academical studies, designs, and finished sketches; many of the latter illustrative of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and other poets. He was a Chevalier of the order of St. Michael, and of the Legion of Honour; and a Professor of the schools of painting, sculpture, and architecture; he was also a member of the Academy of the Fine Arts.]

REGNE, ———. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints he engraved a set of plates of animals, which are neatly executed.

REICH, WENDEL. According to Professor Christ, this artist was an engraver on wood, and flourished at Lyons about the year 1515, where he published several cuts, marked with a W. and an R. joined together. He does not, however, specify any of them. [He was also a bookseller, and lived at Strasbourg in 1540. Bartsch has described a print bearing his cipher, supposed to be by him, in tom. ix. of P. G. p. 170.]

[REINAGLE, PHILIP, a landscape, animal, and panoramic painter, was a scholar of Allan Ramsay, the court painter, but not feeling much predilection for portraiture, he turned his attention to the study of the brute animal, and succeeded to admiration. His pictures of hunting subjects, sporting dogs, particularly the spaniel, shaggy ponies, and dead game, were the best of the day. He studied rather the manner of the old Dutch painters than that of his contemporaries, and was an excellent copier of their works; this should not be lost sight of, as there are many small pictures called Paul Potter, A. van de Velde, Berchem, Karel du Jardin, &c., painted by Philip Reinagle, now called the elder. He assisted Barker in his panoramic Views of Rome, the Bay of Naples, Florence, Gibraltar, Algeiras Bay, and Paris. The work by which he is best known, and on which his reputation will stand, is "The Sportsman's Cabinet," or correct delineations of the various dogs used in the sports of the field, taken from life, and engraved by John Scott. He was a member of the Royal Academy, and died in 1834.]

[REINAGLE, GEORGE PHILIP, son of Richard Ramsay Reinagle, and grandson of Philip Reinagle, was instructed by his father, and gave early proofs of great talent as a painter of marine subjects. After successfully copying pictures by Everdingen, Backhuysen, and William van de Velde, he accompanied the expedition to Navarino, for the express purpose of giving a representation of the expected action, which he did with great applause. His works are confined to private cabinets, and the masterly style in which they are painted causes regret at the shortness of his career. He died at London in 1833, aged about 33.]

REINER, WENCESLAUS LAURENT. This painter was born at Prague in 1686. His father, Joseph Reiner, was a sculptor of little note, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of design: but he was more advantaged by the lessons of Peter Brandel, a painter of some reputation. By the assistance of this master, and his studies after nature, he became a painter of some celebrity. His talents were not confined to any particular branch, and he painted with considerable success historical subjects, landscapes, and battles. His best productions, however, were landscapes with cattle, and battle-pieces, in which he resembles the works of Peter van Bloemen. His figures and animals are correctly drawn, and touched with great freedom and spirit. His works are chiefly confined to his own country, where they are found in the best collections. He died in 1743. [Brulliot says he died in 1745, and refers to Dlabacz for a list of his works. The majority of writers say he died in 1743. Balkema has committed three mistakes: first, in placing him among the Flemish and Dutch painters; second, in saying he was born in 1666; and, third, that he died in 1753.]

REINSPERGER, J. C., a German painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He painted portraits, some of which he has engraved in a coarse, heavy style, nearly as large as life, among which are,

The Empress Dowager, Elizabeth Christiana.
Joseph II., Emperor of Germany.
The Archduke Leopold.

He also engraved a plate of a man playing on the lute, after Bernardo Strozzi, called Prete Genovese. [His names were Johann Christopher. He was born at Nuremberg in 1711, and died in 1780. He was a scholar of Liotard, and practised for some time at Vienna.]

[REITER, REUTER, or REYTER, BARTOLOME, a painter and engraver of Munich, flourished during the first quarter of the 17th century. He was a scholar of Hans Ostendorfer the younger, and, traditionally, one of the best painters of Munich in his time; it is also said that he had many pupils. As there are no examples of his talent as a painter referred to, and not one name of his pupils recorded, his reputation must rest on a few prints, of which Nagler has given a list. The following are the titles, with the varied signatures:

1. Christ holding the Globe in his right hand.

2. Christ seated, crowned with thorns; Bartlme Reitter — Pictor inv. Monachy 1615.
3. Christ carrying his Cross, group of half-length figures; Georg Beham inv. Monachii. Bart. Reiter fec. 1610.
4. Christ exposed to the People; inscribed, Ecce Homo. Bart. Reiter pictor figur. Monachy 1612 fec.
5. The Holy Family, with St. Francis or St. Jerome, half-figures, a copy after Palma, with both monograms.
6. St. Jerome sitting in a Cavern, half-figure, the lion on the left; signed Bart. Reytter pictor inv. et excud. There is an impression signed Bartholome Reuter.
7. A Nymph sitting on the lap of a Satyr, Cupid at their feet; Bart. Reiter fec. Monachy 1610.
8. Venus holding a Mirror, and seated with Cupid under a Tree, half figures; Georg Becham inv. B. Reytter fec. 1610.
9. Neptune on a Sea-Horse holding his Trident; Georg Beham inv. Monachy, with Reiter's mark, and the date 1610.
10. A Child seated on a Skull and blowing Bubbles; B. R. F. Monachi Zimmermann. Excud.
- 11—18. Eight prints, a series of naked Children in different positions; marked B. R.]

REITZ, E. This artist was a native of Sweden, and flourished about the year 1700. He engraved several plates of coins and architectural views for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna.

REM, MATTHEW, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1635. According to Professor Christ, he engraved the plates for L'Architecture de Furtenbach. He usually marked his prints with the initials of his name.

REMBRANDT, VAN RYN. The family name of this eminent artist was Gerretz, but he acquired the appellation of Rembrandt van Ryn, from his being the son of a miller, who resided on the banks of the Rhine, between Leyderdorp and Leyden, where he was born in 1606. His father, who was in easy circumstances, was desirous of giving him a classical education, preparatory to his pursuing one of the learned professions. But as the genius of his son led him to drawing rather than the study of the classics, he permitted him to follow the bent of his inclination, and placed him as a disciple with Jacob van Zwaanenbergh, at Amsterdam, under whom he studied three years, and his progress in that time was the astonishment of his master. He is said to have afterwards passed some time with Peter Lastman and Jacob Pinas. But he was indebted for his best improvement to the vivacity of his genius, and his attentive observation of nature. She was the oracle he most consulted, his father's mill was his atelier, the peasants which frequented it his models, and their manners and conversation the extent of his ideas. He studied the grotesque figure of a Dutch boor, or the rotund contour of the bar-maid of an alehouse, with as much precision as the great artists of Italy have imitated the Apollo of Belvidere, or the Venus of Medicis. These studies were not likely to conduct him to the noble conceptions of Raffaele, but they were still the road to simplicity and nature, which will always lead to certain popularity. Celebrity, sometimes so difficult to acquire, and which is too often refused to merit, unless accompanied by intrigue, made her way to Rembrandt in the obscurity of his mill, and led him to fortune and to fame. He was employed to paint the portraits of the most distinguished personages at Amsterdam; and he at length established himself in that city, where he was immediately loaded with commissions, and his academy was frequented by students of the first respectability. This change of residence and circumstances did not, however, induce him to take leave of the singularity of his habits. He sought for recreation among the lowest orders of the people, and in the amusements of the cabaret. Hence his ideas were not more elevated than in the humble retreat from whence they had originated. He still attached himself to an imitation of the lowest nature, with which it was his pleasure to be surrounded, and the capricious fantasy of his mind supplied the place of the beautiful ideal. In the early part of his life he finished his pictures nearly as highly as those of Gerard Douw, but with a more spirited pencil, and a richer tone of colouring. Such are his pictures of the Boat of St. Peter, formerly in the collection of M. Kinloopen; Esther before Ahasuerus; St. John preaching in the Wilderness, and others. He afterwards adopted a greater breadth of light and shadow, and a more commanding facility of touch. It has been asserted, by Mr. de Piles, that Rembrandt visited Venice about the year 1635 or 1636; but he has probably been led into the error, by having seen some of the prints of that artist with the name of Venice, and the above dates, which was one of the many subterfuges practised by Rembrandt, to enhance the value of his copper-plates. It is satisfactorily ascertained by the Dutch biographers, that he never left Amsterdam after his first settling in that city in 1630. Nor is it likely that he would have quitted so advantageous an establishment, for the purpose of travelling for the improvement of his style; as no painter ever so decidedly set at nought the higher characteristics of the art, which distinguish the Italian school, and of which he only spoke in derision. He had collected a great variety of old armour, sabres, flags, and fantastical vestments, which he ironically exhibited to his disciples as his antiques. He now became the most distinguished and the most employed artist of his country, and was not less celebrated for his extraordinary productions as a painter, than for his ingenious and interesting engravings, which were also held in the highest admiration. He continued to practise his art with the most flattering encouragement and success, until the year 1674, when he died at Amsterdam, aged 68.

Though Rembrandt acquired a distinguished reputation by his historical works, he is more deserving of our admiration as a painter of portraits. In the former, his compositions are ignoble, though full of nature and expression; and though he possessed genius and fire, they were never elevated by sentiment or taste. His untutored mind was divested of the resources of history and the fable, and the whimsicality of his habiliments resembled rather the personages of a masquerade, than the characters appropriate to the subject. His figures are remarkable for deformity rather than beauty; and he seems to have courted vulgarity instead of the graces. But the seductive simplicity of his arrangements, the glowing beauty of his colour, and the magic charm of his light and shadow, make us almost lose sight of the misshapen grossness of his forms, and his outrageous invasion of the propriety of costume. Although Rembrandt cannot claim a high rank as a designer, particularly of the naked, his pretensions as a colourist place him among the greatest masters of the art; and in the region of the chiaro-scuro, none will dispute his unrivalled dominion. He perfectly understood the different colours which were friendly or inimical to each other; and in the harmony of his tones, perhaps with the exception of Titian, no painter has equalled him. His portraits are faithful transcripts of his models, which he never attempted to dignify or embellish; but they exhibit so much nature and animation, such truth and force of colouring, that it may be fairly said he has never been surpassed in that particular branch.

Rembrandt van Rhyn holds a distinguished place among the most popular engravers of his country. This extraordinary artist, who owed every thing to nature, has established an epoch in engraving more than any other master. He was the inventor of a process, for which he was indebted entirely to his genius, and which has thrown a charm over his prints that is undescribable. His plates are partly etched, frequently much assisted with the dry point, and occasionally, though rarely, finished with the graver. They evince the most extraordinary facility of hand, and display the most consummate intelligence of the effect of light and shadow. His point, playful and free, sports, if the expression may be allowed, in picturesque disorder, and, by an enchanting negligence, produces, as if by accident, the most surprising effects, which are, however, always regulated by his perfect acquaintance with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. As an engraver, as well as a painter, his most admirable productions are his portraits, which are executed with a finesse and expression that are unexampled. For the particular description of the different impressions and variations of his plates, their respective rarity, and consequent value, we cannot do better than refer the collector to the catalogue of his works, first published by Gersaint, at Paris, and P. Yver, at Amsterdam, which was afterwards considerably enlarged by our countryman, Mr. Daulby, and has since been added to in a publication by Adam Bartsch, printed at Vienna in 1797. Our limits will oblige us to confine our list of his prints to those which are esteemed the most interesting :

PORTRAITS OF REMBRANDT, BY HIMSELF.

Rembrandt, with the mouth open. 1630.
The Busts of Rembrandt and his Wife. 1636.
A Bust of Rembrandt; highly finished. 1638.
His Portrait, with a Crayon in his hand.

 Rembrandt's Wife.
 An old Woman sleeping.
 An old Woman with spectacles.

A variety of studies and sketches, some of which are scarce, and executed in a charming style.

[The most authentic account of Rembrandt and his works will be found in Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys's "Review of the Lives and Works of the most eminent Painters;" in Smith's "Catalogue raisonné," vol. vii. and Supplement; and in Bartsch's and Claussin's Catalogues of his Etchings. The first writer has satisfactorily shown that Rembrandt died in 1665; and has related many interesting particulars of his life unknown to former biographers. In Smith's catalogue will be found descriptions of about 640 pictures by Rembrandt, with an account of the public galleries and private cabinets in which they were located at the time of the publication of the book; together with a copious list of his drawings and etchings. Mr. Nieuwenhuys has remarked, "Although some have pretended that he ought to have studied the antique, it is not less true that he was by no means deficient on that point; for it is known that he purchased, at a high price, casts from antique marbles, paintings, drawings, and engravings, by the most excellent Italian masters, to assist him in his studies, and which are mentioned in the inventory of his goods when seized for debt." The following extracts from that inventory establishes the fact:

A Head, by Raphael Urbino.
 The Virgin Mary, by the same.
 A book containing prints; after Raphael.
 Another containing prints; after the same.
 Another, with valuable prints; ditto.
 Another, full of the works of M. A. Buonaroti.
 Another, with fine impressions, after Raphael Urbino.
 A large picture of the Samaritan Woman, by Giorgione.
 Two copies of pictures; after A. Caracci.
 The valuable book of Andrea Mantegna.
 A very large book, with almost all the printed impressions from Titian.
 Ditto, with models of Raphael, A. Caracci, and Giulio Bonasone.
 A book full of Drawings of all the Roman Edifices, and Views by the most celebrated masters.
 Ditto, of Engravings; after Vanni, Baroccio, and others.
 Three books full of prints, by Tempesta.
 A book full of prints, by Annibal, Agostino, and Lodovico Caracci; Guido, and Spagnoletto.

A parcel of drawings from the antique, by Rembrandt.
 A Child, by M. A. Buonaroti (probably a model).
 And a variety of Casts from the antique.

After this display it cannot be said that Rembrandt did not study the ancient masters, nor "that he set at nought the higher characteristics of the art which distinguish the Italian school, and spoke of them only in derision." Whatever his practice, he certainly knew their value, and availed himself of their beauties in his compositions, though disguised in his forms. There are eight pictures by him in the National Gallery; and the country is very rich in his works.]

REMSHARD, CHARLES. According to Professor Christ, this engraver resided at Augsburg in 1700, when he published his dictionary of monograms. He marked his plates with the initials C. R. [According to Zani, he was born in 1678, and died in 1755. His mark appears on some etchings of architecture after Paul Decker. Nagler mentions several others by him, some of which are copies from previous engravings.]

RENANTO, J. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a wooden cut representing the Wise Men's Offering. It is very indifferently executed.

RENARD, J., a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1710. He executed part of the plates for the collection of views of the palace and park at Versailles.

RENARD, SIMON DE ST. ANDRÉ, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1614. He was a scholar of Louis Bobrun, and painted portraits with some success. We have several etchings by this artist, among which are the following:

A set of forty-six plates of the Sculpture and the Paintings by C. Le Brun; in the gallery of Apollo in the Louvre.

The Crucifixion; after the same.

An Allegorical Subject of Peace; after the same.

The infant Jesus holding the Cross; from his own design.
 Louis XIV. conducted by Fame to the car of Victory; after the same.

[He died at Paris in 1677. Dumesnil doubts whether he engraved the 46 plates after C. Le Brun, as they were not published till 1695, just eighteen years after his death. He notices but one as authentic, "the infant Jesus holding the Cross;" the rest he supposes by an engraver of the same name, probably his son.]

[RENESE, C — A —, a very clever designer and etcher, of whose history nothing is known, except what may be gathered from his prints. These bear so strong a resemblance to the etchings of Rembrandt, that they may be mistaken for the works of that master, and Bartsch has admitted one in his Catalogue (tom. ii. p. 104, N^o. 18). The prints by Rencsse show that he flourished between the years 1649 and 1661; the probability is, that he lived in Holland, though his name may belong to France, or Flanders. Nagler describes six etchings by him, of which the titles are given below; but Brulliot says there are eleven known, and that only one bears his monogram merely, (C. A. R. in a cipher,) and this he supposes is the artist's portrait, as it represents a half-length figure of a man, full face, wearing a barret, seated at a table and holding the graving instrument in his left hand. The other prints have, most of them, the monogram accompanied by enessé. Dutch writers mention a J. Renesse, and an A. C. Renesse, who painted landscapes and sea-pieces; they are probably identical with the engraver who used the cipher C. A. R.

interlaced. The following are the subjects of the prints described by Nagler:

A half-length figure of a Man seated at a table, with the monogram.

A Clergyman seated at a table, with books, &c., signed Renesse.

A half-length figure of a young Man.

Full-face Portrait of a young Man, with long hair escaping from under his cap; signed C. A. Renesse, 1651.

Christ bearing his Cross.

A Village Fair, with Mountebanks and a crowd of People.]

RENI, GUIDO. This admired painter was born at Bologna in 1575. He was the son of a professor of music, and had himself made some progress in the study of that science, when he turned his thoughts to painting, as less exposed to the variations of fashion, and the caprices of taste. He became a scholar of Denis Calvart, with whom his progress was such, that in a few years his instructor, after slightly retouching his pictures, disposed of them as his own. He continued in the school of Calvart until he had reached his twentieth year, when the great reputation of the Caracci induced him to enter their academy, and he was for some time the favourite disciple of Lodovico. He had already given proof of uncommon ability in some juvenile performances in the Palazzo Bonfigliuoli, when some of the pictures of Michael Angelo Caravaggio found their way to Bologna. The novelty of the style, and the vigorous opposition of his light and shadow, both astonished and pleased. At Bologna, as at Rome, they excited the greatest admiration; and Guido was for some time induced to adopt the singularity of his principles. The applause bestowed on the works of Caravaggio was extremely mortifying to the Caracci. Lodovico, familiarized with the graces of Coreggio, could not witness without disgust the praises lavished on productions divested of dignity or grandeur, and whose attractions were chiefly confined to a striking, though unnatural, contrast of the chiaro-scuro. In a conference held on the subject, Annibale Caracci proposed, as the means of putting an end to the popularity of the new style, the adopting one entirely in opposition to it. "To the crudeness and violence of his tones," said Annibale, "I would oppose tenderness and suavity. Instead of darkness and obscurity, I would represent my figures in the open day. Far from avoiding the difficulties of the art, under the disguise of powerful shadows, I would court them, by displaying every part in the clearest light. For the vulgar nature which Caravaggio is content to imitate, I would substitute the most select forms and the most beautiful ideal." Guido was present at this discourse, and the principles it inculcated made a more lasting impression on his mind than was perhaps intended by the speaker, and led him eventually to a path which conducted him to an immortal celebrity. It was not long before he carried these principles into practice; but whether from jealousy, or the backwardness frequently shown to acknowledge excellence which has not received the sanction of time, he had no sooner exhibited some pictures painted from the principles furnished him by Annibale, than he had to encounter the most violent animosity from his fellow disciples, and even from the Caracci themselves. They upbraided him with his insolence, in attempting to establish a new system, and aspiring to singularity; and even Lodovico, who had hitherto treated him with the most tender affection, spoke of his new productions with harshness and severity, and at length dismissed him from his academy. The unkindness of Lodovico afflicted him severely; but finding himself thus freed from his obligations to that master, by the injustice of such a proceeding, he had the less difficulty in offering himself in the character of a competitor.

There are several pictures by Lodovico in the cloister of S. Michele in Bosco, at Bologna, and they are regarded as the finest of his works. For the same church, Guido painted a picture of S. Benedetto in the Desert, to whom a number of persons are offering presents. The composition consists of a variety of figures of every age. This production excited universal admiration; the public, astonished at the beauty of the performance, declared Lodovico had found a rival in his scholar; and that painter is said to have had the liberality of adding his applause to that of the popular opinion.

Guido had not seen Rome, but his works were not unknown in that capital, and they were highly esteemed. He was invited thither by Giuseppino Cesari, with the intention of producing a rivalry between Guido and Caravaggio. Another inducement was to visit Annibale Caracci, who was then employed on the Farnesian Gallery, for whose great talents he always had the highest respect, and whose unkindness he had forgotten. Albano, his friend and fellow student, accompanied him on his journey. His first production at Rome was the Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, for the church dedicated to that saint. Such was the infatuation then prevalent at Rome, in favour of the works of Caravaggio, that when he obtained the commission from the Cardinal Borghese, to paint a picture of the Crucifixion of St. Peter, he was under the necessity of submitting to the predominant taste, and was obliged to agree to paint it in the style of that master. Without departing from his engagement, he evinced his superiority over the model he condescended to imitate, by exhibiting in the design and composition of that celebrated picture, a grandeur and dignity to which Caravaggio was totally a stranger. The flattering encouragement he met with at Rome occasioned him many enemies, the most furious of which was Caravaggio, but the most dangerous was Annibale, as his invectives, repeated and remembered, were calculated to injure with posterity talents to which he was not disposed to do justice. Even Albano became an enemy of Guido, his friend, when he found that, in the public opinion, that friend was his superior. He was chosen by Paul V. to decorate the private chapel of the palace of Monte Cavallo; and the reputation he acquired on that occasion was a new triumph over his adversaries. Being disgusted with the treasurer of the Pope, for some difficulty he had experienced in the payment of his appointments, he left Rome, and returned to Bologna, where he painted his famous picture of the Murder of the Innocents, for the church of S. Domenico; and the Repentance of St. Peter, one of his most esteemed works, for the Palazzo Sampieri. These distinguished performances augmented his reputation, and the regret of Paul V. at being deprived of his talents. He employed his legate at Bologna to prevail on him to return to Rome, in which his efforts were not ineffectual. On his arrival, he was received with favour and distinction, and was immediately employed by the Pope in ornamenting his chapel in St. Maria Maggiore. His most celebrated works in the palaces at Rome, are his fresco of the Aurora, in the Palazzo Rospigliosi, which has been admirably engraved by Raphael Morghen; his Fortune, in the gallery of the Campidoglio; the Rape of Helen, in the Spada palace; and his Magdalene, in the Barberini collection. After finishing his works in S. Maria Maggiore, he returned to Bologna, where he continued the exercise of his extraordinary abilities, and received so many commissions from different parts of Italy, that he was under the necessity of refusing many of them. It was at this time that he painted his admired picture of the Assumption, for the church of S. Ambrogio, at Genoa, regarded as one of his happiest productions; the Purification, for the cathedral at Modena; and his famous St. Michael, for the Cappuccini, at Rome. On sending the picture to the place for which it was destined, he accompanied it with a letter to Sig. Massano, maestro di Casa, to Urban VIII., in which he expresses himself in the following manner: "I wish I had had the wings of an angel, to have ascended into Paradise, and there to have beholden the forms of those beatified spirits, from which I might have copied my Archangel; but not being able to mount so high, it was in vain for me to search for his resemblance here below; so that I was forced to make an introspection into my own mind, and into that idea of beauty which I have formed in my own imagination."

The exalted faculties of this great artist were degraded by his fatal passion for gaming; and such was the extent of his infatuation, that, though his gains were considerable, he was reduced, by his indulgence of it, to a state of continual indigence; and towards the latter part of his life, to raise funds, of which he was constantly in need, he sent into the world works executed with such negligence and haste, as to be totally unworthy of the character he had established. His distresses at length brought on a fever, of which he died at Bologna in 1642.

Guido Reni is regarded as the most distinguished disciple of the Caracci, with the exception of Domenichino. The Italians report of him, that grace and beauty dwelled upon his pencil, to animate his figures. An exquisite touch, a singular facility of execution, great suavity of colour, a general accord, the sweetest harmony, are the distinguishing characteristics of the style of Guido. His design is generally correct; and when he does not entirely satisfy the rigid expectations of the anatomist, he still captivates by the grace and elegance of his contour. If his figures of men occasionally want vigour and strength, those of his women always enchant us by the softness and delicacy of their forms. The airs of his heads are peculiarly impressive, particularly those that are looking upwards; and he appears to have taken this fine expression from the Niobe of the antique. His Madonnas and Magdalenes are distinguished by a noble simplicity, which may be said to be peculiar to him, and the correct folding of his drapery does not interfere with the bland graces of their forms. He possessed an extraordinary faculty of being able to express grief, sadness, or terror, without detriment to the beauty of his heads.

Guido appears to have been fond of amusing himself with the point, as we have a considerable number of charming etchings by his hand. They are executed with great freedom and boldness, in a very masterly style. They exhibit the same beautiful expression in the heads, and correctness in the design of the extremities, which we admire in his pictures. Simone Cantarini, called Il Pesarese, imitated the etchings of Guido with such precision, as sometimes to mislead the unwary; but the experienced collector will, without much difficulty, discover their deficiency in that correctness and taste which distinguish the etchings of Guido. He sometimes marked his plates with the initials G. R. and sometimes with the cipher GR. The following are his principal plates:

PLATES FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

- The Bust of Pope Paul V., inscribed Paulus V. Pont. opt. max.
- The Holy Family, in which the Virgin is seated, with her face towards the infant Christ.
- The Virgin, with the infant Jesus sleeping on her breast. He has engraved this subject in three different manners.
- The Virgin embracing the infant Christ, and holding a book in her hand.
- The Virgin, and infant Jesus giving his hand to St. John.
- The Holy Family, with two Angels scattering flowers. He engraved this subject four times, with variations.
- St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus on his shoulders.
- St. Jerome praying in a Cave, with a book and a crucifix.
- The Virgin seated in the Clouds, with St. George, St. Francis, St. Lawrence, and others.

PLATES AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- A Glory of Angels; after Luca Cambiaso.
- The Entombing of Christ; after Parmigiano.
- The Holy Family, with St. Clara; after A. Caracci.
- The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; after the same.
- The Charity of St. Roch; after the same. 1610.

[Bartsch describes sixty etchings by Guido, but does not include the Virgin seated in the Clouds. There are many beautiful pictures by Guido in England, in private collections; two belonging to the Earl of Ellesmere are superlatively so. One, representing an infant Christ sleeping on the Cross, purchased from the Orleans' Gallery, is a perfect gem; the other, the Immaculate Conception, representing the Virgin star-crowned in glory, borne up to the heavenly presence by cherubs, and attended by adoring seraphs, abounds with beauty, grace, and sanctity; it is of the loveliest order of visible poetry;—it is the perfection of the ideal in painting. In the National Gallery there are several attributed to his pencil. Venus attired by the Graces, a subject well known by Strange's engraving, and Perseus delivering Andromeda, of which there is a duplicate at Devonshire House, were presented by William IV. A half-length Magdalene; two heads, called the Infant Christ and St. John; Lot and his Daughters leaving Sodom; and Susanna assaulted by the Elders; were obtained by purchase. The Coronation of the Virgin, a small picture on copper, crowded with figures, is a bequest by the late Mr. Wells, of Redleaf. Unfortunately the greater part cannot be adduced as types of the master. As examples, four at least might have been spared. The Lot and his Daughters, and the Assault on Susanna, are in the style of Caravaggio, by which Guido had been seduced, and have none of the suavity by which his own manner is distinguished. They are not only bad examples of the master's genuine style of painting, but they are objectionable subjects to expose to public gaze in a gallery frequented by modest females. An old man quitting Sodom with his two robust daughters to commit incest at Zoar, and two hoary lechers tempting a naked female to fornication and adultery, are not matters that can be explained to inquiring simplicity, without raising a burning blush and causing confusion. The hands of the sisters must have had laborious employment; the buff-skinned body of Susanna had need of the bath. It is misleading ignorance to say, that the picture called the Infant Christ embracing St. John is by Guido. Of the last acquisition, the authenticity is questionable; but for this the trustees are not answerable. It was obtained by Mr. Wells of Sir Thomas Lawrence; and the latter's knowledge of the genuineness of pictures by the old masters was too frequently at fault to be relied on; it is, however, a pretty picture.]

[RENOU, ANTOINE, a French painter, poet, and actor, was born at Paris in 1731, and died in 1806. He was a scholar of Pierre and Vien, and passed some time at the court of Stanislaus, king of Poland, as painter to that prince; and at the same time exercised his talents as an actor and writer of verses. On his return to Paris he was admitted a member of the Academy of Painting, and was employed to paint part of the ceiling of the Apollo Gallery in the Louvre. He also painted a picture of Christ among the Doctors; Agrippina with the ashes of Germanicus; an Annunciation for the church of St. Germaine-en-Laye, and the ceiling of the Hôtel des Monnaies at Paris. He was the author of a tragedy on the subject of Tereus and Philomela, and translated Dufresnoy's poem on Painting out of the Latin into French.]

RENOU, LOUISA. This lady was born at Paris in 1754. We have by her a few plates engraved after the modern French painters; among which is,

Alexander and his Physician; after Colin de Vermont.

RENTER, BART. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a spirited and correct etching, representing Christ shown to the Jews by Pilate. It is a small plate, lengthways, inscribed Bartl. Renter pictor figur. Monachii. 1612. [See BARTOLOME REITER.]

RESANI, ARCANGELO, was born at Rome in 1670, and was a scholar of Gio. Batista Boncuore. He chiefly excelled in painting animals and huntings. His works were highly esteemed at Siena, Bologna, and Venice. His portrait, with dead game in the back-ground, is in the Florentine Gallery. [He died about 1740.]

RESCHI, PANDOLFO. This painter was born at Dantzic in 1643. He went to Italy when he was young, and became one of the ablest scholars of Giacomo Borgognone. He painted battle-pieces with considerable reputation, and imitated with success the landscapes of Salvator Rosa. He also excelled in painting perspective and architectural views, of which there are several in the collections at Florence. He died in 1699.

RESTOUT, JOHN, a French painter, born at Rouen in 1692. He studied at Paris, under Jouvnet, who was his uncle, and followed with considerable success the style of that master. If he was unequal to his instructor, he was at least the painter of his time who approached nearest to him in merit. He was a member of the Academy at Paris, and painted for his picture of reception Arethusa flying into the arms of Diana to escape from the pursuit of Alpheus. His principal works at Paris are the Death of Ananias, and the Pool of Bethesda, in the church of St. Martin des Champs, and the ceiling of the library of St. Genevieve. He died at Paris in 1768.

[RETZSCH, FRIEDERICH AUGUST MORITZ, whose illustrations of the works of Goethe, Schiller, and Shakspeare are so well known, was born at Dresden in 1779, where his ancestors, originally of Hungary, had taken refuge to escape the persecution that raged in the latter kingdom against the Protestants. It was not till he was about twenty years of age that he applied himself seriously to the study of painting; for though he had previously some skill as a designer, he disliked all restraint, and would have preferred following the bent of his genius as a hunter in woods, and as a student of nature in solitude. He was, however, persuaded to enter the academy at Dresden, in 1798, and after submitting awhile to the irksome drudgery of copying, to acquire the mechanical part of painting, he began to exhibit his talent and genius as an original and poetic artist. The works of his illustrious countrymen, Schiller and Goethe, acted on his mind like inspiration, and with a kindred spirit he embodied their wild and wonderful descriptions in form and substance; to these he added illustrations of such parts of Shakspeare's dramas as were consonant with the feelings which the others had inspired, or brought into action. As it is uncertain whether he is still confined in body to this sublunary planet, it must be left to others, better informed, to give a fuller account hereafter of his life; it may, however, be concluded that his artistic career is terminated, and it would be a defect in this Dictionary to omit a name already so renowned, and which will accompany to posterity those of the three super-eminent geniuses whose thoughts he delighted to invest with form. REVERDINUS, C., an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1570. He was probably a disciple of Æneas Vico, as he has imitated his style of engraving with great exactness. His figures are, however, very indifferently drawn, and his plates have little to recommend them, except their neatness. According to Florent le Comte, he engraved several obscene subjects, which have probably been destroyed. He sometimes marked his plates with the monogram . Among others, we have the following prints by him, apparently from his own designs:

Moses striking the Rock.

The Wise Men's Offering.

A small Frieze, representing a Bacchanalian subject; marked with his name. 1564.

Venus coming to Vulcan for the arms of Æneas; marked also with his name, and dated 1602.

[Zani calls him Cesare Reverdino, and says that he operated from 1531 to 1554; Bartsch says that modern writers pretend that his name was Gaspar, and that he engraved in wood; these notices, he says, are partly false and partly without authority. Zani emphatically denies that he ever engraved on wood. All that concerns this artist, says Bartsch, is covered with a species of fog, or obscurity; several pieces are attributed to him of which it would be difficult to prove him to be the engraver. He knew of only one of his prints with a date, that of 1531. Those that are marked with his name in full, and are undoubtedly his work, are in a style between that of Giulio Bonasone and Agostino Veneziano, and seem to prove that he was of the school of Marc Antonio. He describes thirty-nine of his prints, considered authentic, and twelve doubtful. See Bartsch, P. G. tom. xv. Nagler has added eleven to the list.]

REUVEN, PETER. This artist was born at Leyden in 1650, but studied at Antwerp in the school of Jacob Jordaens. He painted history and allegorical subjects, and was employed to design the triumphal arches for the reception of William III. at the Hague, by which he acquired some celebrity; and he was afterwards engaged to ornament some of the principal apartments in the palace at Loo, in which he showed a fertile invention, and great facility of execution. One of his best performances was a ceiling in the hotel of M. de la Court Vandervoort, at Leyden; it is an ingenious composition, and the colouring possesses all the brilliancy which is found in the productions of the best painters of the Flemish school. He died in 1718.

REYN, JOHN DE. Mr. Pilkington has been led into an error respecting this artist by M. d'Argenville, and calls him Lang Jan, the appellation which belongs to John Bockhorst. He was born at Dunkirk about the year 1610, and went when he was young to Antwerp, where he became a scholar of Vandyck. Such was his progress under that master, that he was invited by him to accompany him to England, where he continued to assist him as a coadjutor, until the death of his illustrious instructor. He afterwards established himself in his native town, where he met with very flattering encouragement, and painted several admirable pictures for the churches, and was much employed as a portrait painter. "If the works of de Reyn," says M. Descamps, "are not more universally known, it is because the greater part of his pictures are mistaken for those of Vandyck." His pictures exhibit the same correctness of design, the same purity and delicacy of colouring, and the same facility and animation in his touch. His compositions are ingenious and copious, and his conduct of the light and shadow masterly and effective. His principal works in the churches at Dunkirk are the Death of the four Royal Martyrs, in the church of St. Eloi; and the Baptism of Totila, in the church of the English convent. There are many of his portraits in the private collections, which are little inferior to those of Vandyck. The principal altar-piece in the parochial church of St. Martin, at Bergues St. Vinoc, near Dunkirk, is by this master, representing Herodias bringing the Head of St. John to Herod. He died in 1678.

REYNA, FRANCISCO DE. This Spanish painter was a native of Seville, and was a disciple of Francisco de Herrera, the elder. He had given proof of most promising talents, in a picture of the Blessed Spirits, in the church of All Saints, at Seville, when he died, in the bloom of life, in 1659.

REYNOLDS, SIR JOSHUA. This illustrious artist, the great luminary of the English school, was born at Plympton, in Devonshire, the 16th of July, 1723. He was the son of the Reverend Samuel Reynolds, the master of the grammar-school of that town, by whom he was for some time instructed in the classics, with the intention of being brought up to the practice of physic. It has been erroneously stated that he was intended by his father for the church, and that he took a degree in one of the universities with that view. This mistake, probably, was occasioned by his having, at a later period of his life, received an honorary degree of doctor of civil law, in the university of Oxford. His inclination for the art, of which he afterwards became so eminent a professor, discovered itself at an early age, in his attempting to copy the prints he occasionally met with in his father's books; and he found a fund of materials for imitation in Jacob Catt's Emblems, a copy of which had been brought by his great grandmother from Holland. Before he had completed his eighth year, he met with a copy of the Jesuit's Perspective, which he read with avidity and delight; and Mr. Malone informs us, that he made himself so completely master of it, that he never afterwards had occasion to study any other treatise on that subject. He soon afterwards exemplified the knowledge he had acquired by his perusal of that book, by a drawing he made of the school at Plympton, according to the rules it established, and it was done with such precision, that it excited his father's astonishment. From these attempts he next proceeded to draw likenesses of the friends and relations of his family, with a success beyond his expectation. The admiration he excited and the applause he obtained by these juvenile efforts, naturally strengthened the propensity he had shown for the art; but what confirmed him in his attachment was the perusal of Richardson's Theory of Painting, which at this time came into his hands, in which the enthusiastic raptures bestowed on that great painter Raffaele, so animated and inflamed his mind, that he considered him the most illustrious character that had appeared in ancient or modern times, a notion in which he loved to indulge all the rest of his life. His father was at length induced to permit him to gratify this growing propensity, and in 1740, when he was seventeen years of age, he was sent to London, and placed under the tuition of Mr. Hudson, who was then the most eminent portrait painter of his time. Such was the rapidity of his progress under this barren source of instruction, that when he had not been more than two years with Hudson, he painted the portrait of an elderly female servant of the family, in which he discovered a taste so superior to that of his contemporaries, that even the self-sufficiency of his instructor discovered an ability which excited no little jealousy and alarm, that in his pupil he would probably encounter a most formidable rival. This apprehension was increased, when the portrait just mentioned, having been seen in his master's gallery, obtained so decided a preference, that he sought every opportunity of rendering Mr. Reynolds's situation unpleasant, and he left him in 1743, and returned to Devonshire, where he pursued the practice of portrait painting; and in the course of three years not only gained employment, but improvement, and painted many portraits in a style much superior to the artists of that time. He established himself at Plymouth Dock, where he met with encouragement beyond his expectation; and in a letter to his father, informed him, with some exultation, that he had painted the portrait of the greatest man in the place, the Commissioner of the Plymouth Dock Yard. It was at this time that he became known to Lord Mount Edgcombe, who warmly patronized him, and not only employed him, but recommended him to Captain, afterwards Lord Keppel, who, being appointed to the Mediterranean station, requested Mr. Reynolds to accompany him thither: an invitation so flattering to his prospects, which would give him an opportunity of visiting Italy, could not fail of being peculiarly agreeable to a young artist of his sensibility. He sailed from Plymouth the 11th of May, 1749, and on his arrival at Leghorn proceeded to Rome. Of his particular practice and habit of study in the great temple of the arts, the most particular account is furnished us by the late publication of the Memoirs of Sir Joshua Reynolds by Mr. Northcote, who was his pupil, and had the best opportunity of being acquainted with them.

His time was most diligently and judiciously employed. He contemplated, with unwearied attention, the various beauties which marked the styles of the different ages. He sought for truth, taste, and beauty, at the fountain head. It was with no common eye that he beheld the productions of the great masters. He copied and sketched in the Vatican such parts of the works of Raffaele and Michael Angelo, as he thought would be most conducive to his future excellence; and by his well-directed study acquired, whilst he contemplated the best works of the best masters, that grace of thinking to which he was principally indebted for his subsequent reputation. Of his feelings when he was first shown the works of Raffaele in the Vatican, Sir Joshua has given us the following ingenuous account.

"It has frequently happened," says this great painter, "as I was informed by the keeper of the Vatican, that many of those whom he had conducted through the various apartments of that edifice, when about to be dismissed, have asked for the works of Raffaele, and would not believe that they had already passed through the rooms where they are preserved, so little impression had those performances made on them. One of the first painters now in France once told me, that this circumstance happened to himself, though he now looks upon Raffaele with that veneration which he deserves from all painters and lovers of the art. I remember very well my own disappointment when I first visited the Vatican, but on confessing my feelings to a brother student, of whose ingenuousness I had a high opinion, he acknowledged that the works of Raffaele had the same effect upon him, or rather that they did not produce the effect which he expected. This was a great relief to my mind, and on inquiring further of other students, I found that those persons only who, from natural imbecility, appeared to be incapable of ever relishing those divine performances, made pretensions to instantaneous raptures on first beholding them. In justice to myself, however, I must add, that, though disappointed and mortified at not finding myself enraptured with the works of this great master, I did not for a moment conceive or suppose that the name of Raffaele, and those admirable paintings in particular, owed their reputation to the ignorance and prejudice of mankind; on the contrary, my not relishing them as I was conscious I ought to have done, was one of the most humiliating circumstances that ever happened to me. I found myself in the midst of works executed upon principles with which I was unacquainted: I felt my ignorance, and stood abashed. All the indigested notions of painting which I had brought with me from England, where the art was in the lowest state it had ever been in, (it could not indeed be lower,) were to be totally done away with, and eradicated from my mind. It was necessary, as it is expressed on a very solemn occasion, that I should become as a little child. Notwithstanding my disappointment, I proceeded to copy some of those excellent works. I viewed them again and again; I even affected to feel their merit, and to admire them more than I really did. In a short time, a new taste and new perceptions began to dawn upon me, and I was convinced that I had originally formed a false opinion of the perfection of the art, and that this great painter was well entitled to the high rank which he holds in the estimation of the world. The truth is, that if these works had really been what I expected, they would have contained beauties superficial and alluring, but by no means such as would have entitled them to the great reputation which they have so long and so justly obtained.

"Having since that period frequently revolved this subject in my mind, I am now clearly of opinion, that a relish for the higher excellencies of the art is an acquired taste, which no man ever possessed without long cultivation, and great labour and attention. On such occasions as that which I have mentioned, we are often ashamed of our apparent dulness; as if it were to be expected that our minds, like tinder, should instantly catch fire from the divine spark of Raffaele's genius. I flatter myself that now it would be so, and that I have a just and lively perception of his great powers; but let it be always remembered, that the excellence of his style is not on the surface, but lies deep, and at first view is seen but mistily. It is the florid style which strikes at once, and captivates the eye for a time, without ever satisfying the judgment. Nor does painting in this respect differ from other arts. A just poetical taste, and the acquisition of a nice discriminative musical ear, are equally the work of time. Even the eye, however perfect in itself, is often unable to distinguish between the brilliancy of two diamonds, though the experienced jeweller will be amazed at its blindness, not considering that there was a time when he himself could not have been able to pronounce which of the two was the most perfect, and that his own power of discrimination was acquired by slow and imperceptible degrees.

"The man of true genius, instead of spending all his hours, as many artists do while they are at Rome, in measuring statues and copying pictures, soon begins to think for himself, and endeavours to do something like what he sees. I consider general copying," he adds, "as a delusive kind of industry; the student satisfies himself with the appearance of doing something; he falls into the dangerous habit of imitating, without selecting, and of labouring, without any determinate object; as it requires no effort of the mind, he sleeps over his work, and those powers of invention and disposition, which ought particularly to be called out and put in action, lie torpid, and lose their energy, for want of exercise. How incapable of producing any thing of their own those are who have spent their time in making finished copies, is an observation well known to all who are conversant with our art."

He appears to have very rarely copied the whole of a picture by any master, except the St. Michael, by Guido; and a small copy of the School of Athens, after Raffaele. He rather employed his time in examining, and fixing in his mind, their peculiar and characteristic excellencies; and was more intent on aspiring to their conceptions, than on imitating their particular handling.

On leaving Rome, he visited the other cities of Italy, and passed two months at Florence, where he painted some portraits; and during a residence of about six weeks at Venice, he paid a particular attention to the works of the great masters of colouring; and in his 39th note on Du Fresnoy's Poem, he describes an ingenious experiment he practised.

to find out their management of their lights and shadows.

He had now been absent from England about three years, when he began to think of returning home, and arrived in London in October, 1752. He resided for some years after his arrival from Italy in Newport Street, and it was not long before his great talents attracted public attention. He soon afterwards painted a whole-length portrait of his friend and patron, Admiral Keppell, in which he exhibited such powers, that he was universally acknowledged to be at the head of his profession, and the greatest painter that England had seen since Vandyck. The whole interval between the time of Charles I. and the conclusion of the reign of George II., though distinguished by the performances of Sir Peter Lely, Riley, and Sir Godfrey Kneller, seemed to be annihilated, and the only question was, whether the new painter or Vandyck was the more excellent.

It has been observed, that the art of painting was at that time in England at the lowest state that it had ever been. This impoverishment has been justly attributed to the rapacity of Sir Godfrey Kneller, who, the better to enable him to wade through the flood of business with which he was surrounded, struck out a slight, broad manner of marking his portraits, which gave him little trouble, though it satisfied his employers. For several years previous to the period we are now speaking of, the portrait painters were satisfied with producing as exact a likeness as they could; but they appear to have entirely neglected to give, or were incapable of giving, that interesting air of history to portraiture in which Reynolds was so eminently successful. Instead of confining himself to mere likenesses, in which however he was eminently happy, he dived, as it were, into the mind, habits, and manner of those who sat to him, and accordingly the majority of his portraits are so appropriated and characteristic, that the many illustrious persons whom he has delineated will be almost as well known to posterity as if they had seen and conversed with them. With the possession of such faculties, and endowed with more than usual industry and perseverance, it is not to be wondered at that the success of Mr. Reynolds was rapid and distinguished, and that he continued to rise in reputation and in excellence, during a brilliant career of upwards of thirty years.

Soon after his return from Italy, he had formed an intimacy with Dr. Johnson, which continued uninterrupted to the time of the death of that celebrated writer; and it was to his connexion with him that we are indebted for Mr. Reynolds's first literary productions, in three Essays on Painting, which appeared in the Idler in 1759. He was now in the zenith of his fame, when the Royal Academy was instituted, in 1768, and as he unquestionably held the first rank in his profession, he was nominated their president, and the king soon afterwards bestowed on him the honour of knighthood. Although it was no part of the prescribed duty of the distinguished situation to which he was appointed, to read lectures to the Academy, Sir Joshua's zeal for the prosperity of the institution led him, from the most praiseworthy motive, to impose this important task upon himself, for reasons which he has assigned, in the most delicate manner, in his fifteenth discourse. "In the honourable rank of professors I have not presumed to class myself, though in the discourses which I have had the honour of delivering from this place, while in one respect I may be considered as a volunteer, in another view it seems as if I was involuntarily pressed into this service. If prizes were to be given, it appeared not only proper, but almost indispensably necessary, that something should be said by the president on the delivery of those prizes; and the president, for his own credit, would wish to say something more than mere words of compliment, which, by being frequently repeated, would soon become flat and uninteresting, and by being uttered to many, would at last become a distinction to none: I thought, therefore, if I were to preface this compliment with some instructive observations on the art, when we crowned merit in the artists whom we rewarded, I might do something to animate and guide them in their future attempts." To this laudable consideration, the world was indebted for the admirable discourses delivered by Sir Joshua, between the opening of the Academy on the 2nd of January, 1769, and the 10th of December, 1790, when he took his leave. "A work," as his biographer justly observes, "containing such a body of just criticism on an extremely difficult subject, clothed in such perspicuous, elegant, and nervous language, that it is no exaggerated panegyric to assert, that it will last as long as the English tongue, and contribute, not less than the productions of his pencil, to render his name immortal." Soon after the publication of the first edition of the works of Sir Joshua, a report was attempted to be circulated, that the discourses delivered by him to the Academy were not written by himself, but by his friend Doctor Johnson. This not meeting with a ready belief, it was attempted, after the death of Mr. Burke, to be established, that they were written by that eminent genius. In a note to the second edition, the editor has thought proper to notice these flagitious attacks on the literary reputation of our great artist, by the following satisfactory refutation of them. "Such insinuations, however agreeable to the envious and malignant, who may give them a temporary currency, can have but little weight with the judicious and ingenuous part of mankind, and therefore, in general, merit only silent contempt. But that Mr. Burke was the author of all such parts of these discourses as do not relate to painting and sculpture, (what these are, the discoverer of this pretended secret has not informed us,) has lately been so peremptorily asserted, and so particular an appeal has been made on this occasion to their editor, that I think it my duty to refute this injurious calumny, lest posterity should be deceived and misled by the minuteness of uncontradicted misrepresentation, delivered to the world with all the confidence of truth. Fortunately, I am able to give a more decisive testimony on this subject, than could reasonably be expected from any one man concerning the writings of another.

"To the question, then, whether I have not found among my late friend's papers several of his discourses in the hand-writing of Mr. Burke, or of some other unnamed person, I answer, that I never saw any one of his discourses in the hand-writing of that illustrious statesman, or of any other person whatsoever, except Sir Joshua Reynolds: and, secondly, I say, that I am as firmly persuaded that the whole body of these admirable works was composed by Sir Joshua Reynolds, as I am certain at this moment I am employing my pen in vindication of his fame. I do not mean to assert, that he did not avail himself of the judgment of his critical friends, to render them as perfect as he could; or that he was above receiving from them that species of literary assistance which every candid literary man is willing to receive, and which even that transcendent genius, Mr. Burke, in some instances did not disdain to accept. Of the early discourses, therefore, I have no doubt that some were submitted to Dr. Johnson and some to Mr. Burke, for their examination and revision; and probably each of those persons suggested to their author some minute verbal improvements. Four of the latter discourses, in his own hand-writing, and warm from the brain, the author did me the honour to submit to my perusal, and with great freedom I suggested to him some verbal alterations, and some new arrangements in each of them, which he very readily adopted. Of one, I well remember, he gave me the general outline, in conversation, as we returned together from an excursion to the country, and before it was yet committed to paper. He soon afterwards composed that discourse, conformably to the plan which he had crayoned out, and sent it to me for such remarks on the language of it as should occur to me. When he wrote his last discourse I was not in London; and that discourse, I know, was submitted to the critical examination of another friend, and that friend was not Mr. Burke. Such was the mighty aid that our author received from those whom he honoured with his confidence and esteem. Let this plain tale, therefore, for ever seal up the lips of those who have presumed most unjustly to sully and depreciate the literary reputation of a man, who is acknowledged, by the unanimous voice of his contemporaries, to have been a signal ornament of the age in which he lived; who was not less profound in the theory than excellent in the practice of his art; and whose admirable works, of each kind, will transmit his name with unfading lustre to the latest posterity."

To this clear and satisfactory refutation of these scandalous attempts, it may be proper to add the convincing testimony of Mr. Northcote, at that time a pupil and inmate of Sir Joshua, which will unquestionably convince the most sceptical. "I can only say, that at the period when it was expected he should have composed them, I have heard him walking at intervals in his room, as if in meditation, till one or two o'clock in the morning; and I have on the following morning, at an early hour, seen the papers on the subject of his art, which had been written the preceding night. I have had the rude manuscript from himself in his own hand-writing, in order to make a fair copy from it for him to read in public. I have seen the manuscript also when it had been revised by Dr. Johnson, who has sometimes altered it to a wrong meaning, from his total ignorance of the subject and of art; but never saw the marks of Burke's pen on any of the manuscripts."

To the success of the Academy, and the improvement of art, Sir Joshua contributed not less by the splendid works with which he embellished his exhibitions, than by the learned and judicious principles inculcated by his lectures. From the opening of the first exhibition in 1769, until the year 1790, inclusive, he sent no less than two hundred and forty-four pictures to the various exhibitions. The constant engagements of his profession through his active life, did not permit him to make many excursions from the metropolis; nor was he at all attached to the amusements of a country life. In 1780 he completed his design for the great window in the New College chapel at Oxford. In seven compartments in the lower range of the composition, he has represented the emblematical figures of the four cardinal and the three Christian virtues, of Temperance, Fortitude, Justice, Prudence, Faith, Hope, and Charity. Each figure is accompanied by its appropriate attribute, and they are all single figures, except the centre one, where Charity is represented by an admirable group. Above this is represented, on a grand scale, the Nativity, a composition of thirteen figures, in which, as in the Notte of Coreggio, the light emanates from the infant Saviour.

In 1781, Sir Joshua, in company with his friend Mr. Metcalfe, made a tour to the Netherlands and Holland, for the purpose of visiting the best productions of the Flemish and Dutch schools; and on his return wrote a very interesting account of their journey, with excellent critical observations on the various pictures they met with in the churches and private collections, together with a character of Rubens, drawn with the hand of a great master. Soon after his return from this tour, he remarked to his companion, Mr. Metcalfe, that he thought his own pictures seemed to want force; and the portraits which he painted after that period were observed to have still more animation, power, and brilliancy of colouring, than had appeared in his former works. In consequence of the suppression of some of the convents in Flanders, in 1783, by the Emperor Joseph II., Sir Joshua again visited Brussels and Antwerp, where he purchased several pictures by the most eminent Flemish painters.

In 1782, Mason published his translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting, with very ample and ingenious annotations by Sir Joshua Reynolds, which, together with the poem, were published with his other works by Malone. Upon the death of Mr. Ramsay, in 1784, he was appointed principal painter in ordinary to the king. In the exhibition of this year, Sir Joshua had a pre-eminence of pictures, among which was his celebrated portrait of Mrs. Siddons as the Tragic Muse, the Fortune-Teller, and others.

Sir Joshua soon afterwards received a commission from the Empress Catherine of Russia, to paint an historical picture, leaving him at liberty to choose the subject, and fix the size and price; and in consequence of his time being much occupied by this undertaking, he did not exhibit any historical piece or fancy subject in the year 1786. On this occasion, the subject he made choice of was the infant Hercules strangling the Serpent, probably in allusion to the difficulties the Empress had to encounter in the civilization of her vast empire, from the state of barbarism in which she found it, when she first filled the imperial throne. If the composition of this picture could not be compared with some of the works of the great artists who had preceded him, in respect to colour and effect, it was one of the finest productions of the art. The group in the middle of the picture, which receives the principal light, is exquisitely beautiful. On the arrival of the picture at Petersburg the Empress wrote a letter to Count Woronzow, her ambassador at the court of London, accompanying it with a gold box, with a basso-relievo of her imperial Majesty in the lid, set with diamonds, enclosing a note, written with her own hand, containing these words: Pour le Cavalier Reynolds, en temoignage du contentment que J'ai ressentie à la lecture de ses excellens discours sur la peinture, which were presented to Sir Joshua by the Count, with a copy of the Empress's letter to his Excellency, which was as follows: "I have read, and, I may say, with the greatest avidity, those discourses pronounced at the Royal Academy of London, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, which that illustrious artist sent to me, with his large picture. In both productions one may trace a most elevated genius. I recommend you to give my thanks to Sir Joshua, and to remit him the box I send as a testimony of the great satisfaction the perusal of his discourses has given me, and which I look upon as perhaps the best work that ever was written on the subject."

When Alderman Boydell projected the plan of his magnificent edition of Shakspeare, embellished with plates from the works of English painters, Sir Joshua undertook three pictures, the Death of Cardinal Beaufort, Macbeth with the Witches in the cauldron scene, and Puck, or Robin Goodfellow. In the first, he may be said to have united the colouring of Titian with the chiaro-scuro of Rembrandt; and the last, in point of fanciful expression and animation, is unparalleled, and is one of the happiest efforts of Sir Joshua's pencil. Notwithstanding his constant application to his art, Sir Joshua enjoyed an almost uninterrupted state of good health until 1782, when he experienced a slight shock of what was apprehended to be a paralytic affection, for which he visited Bath, and returned in a short time perfectly recovered. He did not experience any other infirmity until the year 1789, when he found his sight so much affected, whilst painting the portrait of the Marchioness of Hertford, that he found it difficult to finish it, and in a few months afterwards, in spite of the most skilful aid, he was entirely deprived of the sight of his left eye. Under the apprehension of the total loss of sight, he, with much difficulty, determined to paint no more. A resolution to relinquish for ever a favourite pursuit, which had been so long to him a source of amusement, as well as reputation, must have cost him infinite concern. For some time, however, he preserved his spirits, and partook of the society of his numerous friends with his usual complacency, until the latter part of the year 1791, when he felt some painful symptoms, under which his spirits sunk, and he considered them as the signs of approaching dissolution. During this period of affliction, his friends were willing to suppose that his spirits were unnecessarily depressed, and that his malady was in a great degree imaginary. But after lingering under a painful illness of about three months, which he bore with great fortitude and resignation, and which a little time before his death was discovered to be a diseased liver, he expired on the 23rd of February, 1792. On Saturday, the 3rd of March following, the remains of Sir Joshua Reynolds, after lying in state at the Royal Academy, were interred in the crypt of St. Paul's, near the tomb of Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of that superb edifice. The funeral was conducted with all the honours that could be bestowed upon exalted genius by an admiring and enlightened nation.

To the extraordinary ability of Sir Joshua as a portrait painter, his friend Dr. Johnson pays the following tribute: "Genius," says that learned writer, "is chiefly exerted in historical pictures, and the art of the painter of portraits is often lost in the obscurity of his subject. But it is in painting as in life, what is greatest is not always best. I should grieve to see Reynolds transfer to heroes and to goddesses, to empty splendour and to airy fiction, that art, which is now employed in diffusing friendship, in renewing tenderness, in quickening the affections of the absent, and continuing the presence of the dead." To the dignity and truth of Titian, he added the force of Rembrandt, and the purity of Vandyck. The airs and attitudes of his portraits are distinguished by elegance and grace, and, as Mr. Northcote justly observes, "no painter ever gave, so completely as himself, that captivating charm which accompanies and denotes the Cynthia of the minute." Above all things, he excelled in colour and harmony of effect. In his historical pictures, though he is occasionally deficient in design, and defective in composition, he always exhibits an extraordinary breadth, a feeling and taste peculiar to himself, and frequently an admirable expression. We cannot close this account of the great founder of the British school better, than by adding the following character of him as a man and an artist, which was written by his illustrious friend Mr. Burke, a few hours after the melancholy event of his death.

"His illness was long, but borne with a mild and cheerful fortitude, without the least mixture of any thing irritable or querulous, agreeable to the placid and even tenor of his whole life. He had, from the beginning of his malady, a distinct view of his dissolution, and he contemplated it with that entire composure, which nothing but the innocence, integrity, and usefulness of his life, and an unaffected submission to the will of Providence, could bestow. In this situation he had every consolation from family tenderness, which his own kindness had indeed well deserved.

"Sir Joshua Reynolds was, on very many accounts, one of the most memorable men of his time. He was the first Englishman who added the praise of the elegant arts to the other glories of his country. In taste, in grace, in facility, in happy invention, and in the richness and harmony of colouring, he was equal to the great masters of the renowned ages. In portrait he went beyond them; for he communicated to that description of the art, in which English artists are the most engaged, a variety, a fancy, and a dignity, derived from the highest branches, which even those who professed them in a superior manner, did not always preserve, when they delineated individual nature. His portraits remind the spectator of the invention of history, and the amenity of landscape. In painting portraits, he appeared not to be raised upon that platform, but to descend to it from a higher sphere. His paintings illustrate his lessons, and his lessons seem to be derived from his paintings.

"He possessed the theory as perfectly as the practice of his art. To be such a painter he was a profound and penetrating philosopher.

"In full affluence of foreign and domestic fame, admired by the expert in art, and by the learned in science; courted by the great, caressed by sovereign powers, and celebrated by distinguished poets, his native humility, modesty, and candour never forsook him, even on surprise or provocation; nor was the least degree of arrogance or assumption visible to the most scrutinizing eye, in any part of his conduct or discourse.

"His talents of every kind, powerful from nature, and not meanly cultivated by letters, his social virtues, in all the relations and all the habitudes of life, rendered him the centre of a very great and unparalleled variety of agreeable societies, which will be dissipated by his death. He had too much merit not to excite some jealousy, too much innocence to provoke any enmity."

verted commas, is an extract from the biography of Reynolds in Rees's Cyclopædia, and is supposed to have been written by the late Mr. Thomas Phillips, R. A. "It remains to speak of his style as an artist, which is precisely that denominated in his lectures the ornamental style, but which, beautiful and seducing as it undoubtedly is, cannot be recommended in so unreserved a degree as his industry both in study and practice: that which he characteristically terms his own uncertainty, both in design and execution, operates too frequently and too powerfully against its entire adoption. In the higher attainments of the art, colouring and chiaro-scuro were undoubtedly elements which he favoured, and in which he moved uncontrolled. Drawing, as he himself candidly confessed, was the part of the art in which he was most defective; and from a desire perhaps to hide this defect, with an over-solicitude to produce a superabundant richness of effect, he was sometimes tempted to fritter his lights, and break up his composition, particularly if it happened to be large, into too many parts; yet, in general, his taste in lines and forms was at the same time grand and graceful; and the taste and skill with which he drew and set together the features of the human face, has never been surpassed by any artist. We would be understood to speak of his finest productions; of the ordinary class among them, we must allow that the marking favours of manner, and the substance is not always characteristic of flesh. In execution, though he wanted the firmness and breadth which appertain to the highest style of art, yet the spirit and sweetness of his touch were admirable, and would have been more remarkable had he been more a master of drawing; but not being able readily to determine his forms, he was obliged to go over and over the same part, till some of the vivacity of his handling was frequently lost; his labour, however, was never wholly so, for he added to the force and harmony of his pictures by these repetitions; and frequently attained graces by them which would otherwise perhaps have remained unknown. The numberless instances in which he is known to have borrowed thoughts, both in actions of figures, and effect of colour, seem to impeach his power of invention. But surely it could not proceed from want of a sufficient portion of that high and necessary quality, that he who produced so many novel combinations, adopted that short-hand path to composition. We see it exemplified in a superior degree in most of his principal productions; and particularly in his whole-length and half-length portraits, the arrangement of which are no less beautiful and interesting than new, and entirely his own. These are composed in a taste far surpassing all that had ever been done by his predecessors; uniting the grandeur, simplicity, and fullness of Titian, and the grace and nature of Van Dyck, with the artful and attractive effects of Rembrandt. One quality he had, which no other painter that ever breathed shares with him in an equal degree,—fascination. The effect of his best pictures acts like a charm, and arrests the tasteful beholder with irresistible power. On the works of others we look with approbation, and sometimes with feelings of admiration and delight, or even with a sensation of awe; but in those of Reynolds there is generally an indescribable unity and amenity which act upon us with most fascinating power, and rivet the attention with superior gratification. No real connoisseur can deny the existence of this quality in his pictures, but wherein it specifically dwells, it is not easy to discover or define. They are not labouring to perfect imitation, indeed they stop very far short of that; yet they present a full image, with a degree of life and animation that has rarely been displayed upon canvass. It is a dangerous doctrine to advance, and may be abused; but, perhaps, this power may be in a great measure owing to his having painted less upon system than from feeling; and the latter governing the exercise of his pencil, not to the neglect of, but in a superior degree to the influence of, the former, necessarily imbued his works with a glow of nature, which, it will be allowed, attracts beyond the power of art. Whencesoever this fascination, of which we speak, proceeds, it must be acknowledged that no painter ever possessed it like Reynolds." This is just and masterly criticism, as far as relates to the portraits by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and may be extended to his single figures in subjects of fancy, particularly of children; it applies also to the colouring and chiaro-scuro of many of those compositions by him that are classed as historical. But it would be contrary to truth to claim for his attempts at poetical and historical compositions an equality even with the great masters of the Italian and Flemish schools. The greater part of his productions in these departments are failures. His picture of the Nativity is commonplace, partly borrowed; and the introduction of his own portrait and that of Jarvis in their European costume, a puerile absurdity. The allegorical figures of the Christian Virtues are prose versions of classical symbols; his Ugolino, without dignity, exhibits only the outward effects of punishment on culprits of the common herd; his Head of a Banished Lord belongs to an inmate of a lunatic asylum; his Holy Family in riposo (in the National Gallery) is an egregious plagiarism, vulgarized by the adoption of forms deficient of beauty, grace, and intellect. His Macbeth with the Witches, and his Death of Cardinal Beaufort, are wholly deficient of that grandeur and sublimity that such subjects should have displayed; they are vile commentaries on Shakspeare. The contortions of the dying man, and the whispering dæmon in the latter, are Hogarthian caricatures; and the figures in the former, little short of burlesque. Even in that noblest of his productions, the portrait of Mrs. Siddons as the Muse of Tragedy, the genius of mischief interfered. The attitude and the expression are admirable; but the introduction of the two attendants with the dagger and the bowl destroy the illusion, and, instead of the exalted personification of the highest order of poesy, we behold the figure of Medea meditating murder. It is vain to close the eyes of our understanding to these defects in our most admired painter; if we will not see them, others will; and it is better, therefore, to acknowledge it at once than to be taunted by foreigners for blind or ignorant partiality. The fame of Reynolds, as a painter, is established on his numerous superlative portraits, and his enchanting representations of the innocence, simplicity, and natural habits of unsophisticated children: in these he stands alone. Let us not, by claiming too much, weaken that title to superiority which is justly his due, nor enter into a contest in which we might show zeal and pugnacity, but must fail of victory.

It would, no doubt, be gratifying to many to have a list of the men illustrious by their talents or station, and of the women celebrated for their beauty and accomplishments, who were depicted by the pencil of so renowned an artist; but, as this would include the names of a great portion of the eminent poets, historians, statesmen, prelates, and officers, military and naval; and almost all the female beauties and leaders of fashion of his time, and of their descendants, (then in their childhood,) who have to the present day, in many instances, sustained their fathers' character for ability, and their mothers' reputation for beauty and grace, it would require a distinct volume to give it with accuracy. As this, too, would be only a bare recital of names, the inquirer may be better satisfied by consulting the excellent work of the late eminent mezzotinto engraver, S. W. Reynolds, in which he will find upwards of three hundred portraits, and other subjects, after Sir Joshua, which may be considered faithful translations of the pictures. Of historical and poetical compositions by him, those most dwelt upon by his biographers are, the Nativity and the Cardinal Virtues, the Holy Family, the Infant Hercules strangling the Serpent, the Tragic Muse, Garrick between Tragedy and Comedy, Macbeth and the Witches, the Death of Cardinal Beaufort, Cymon and Iphigenia, the Death of Dido, the Snake in the Grass, Count Ugolino and his Sons, Venus chiding Cupid, Hope nursing Love, Cupid and Psyche, and others, in which fancy and reality are combined. His numerous portraits are dispersed in almost as many directions, so that it is impossible to give information where they are all to be found, except by saying, in most of the family mansions of the descendants of the nobility and gentry of the latter part of the last century. The names of a few of the best collections, in which not only portraits but fancy subjects by him are located, and where they are likely to remain, are given to serve as a directory to the inquirer. Fuller particulars will be found in the printed list of plates prefixed to Mr. Henry Bohn's edition of the complete works of Sir Joshua Reynolds, recently published in 3 vols. folio.

W. Dickenson; Sir Joseph Banks, Lady Crosbie, Mrs. Mathew, Mrs. Pelham feeding chickens, Bishop Percy.

J. Jones; Boswell, Erskine, Fox, Sir Abraham Hume.

G. Marchi; Goldsmith, Mrs. Bouverie, and Mrs. Crewe.

Sharp; John Hunter, Holy Family.

Doughty; Dr. Johnson.

Howard; Mrs. Siddons (Tragic Muse), Prince of Wales leaning on his horse, Infant Academy.

Sherwin; Fortune-teller.]

[REYNOLDS, SAMUEL WILLIAM, a very eminent engraver in mezzotinto, was born in 1774, and died in 1835. He was a pupil of Hodges. His works are very numerous in portraits, and in historical and fancy subjects, chiefly after pictures by modern painters. Of portraits and compositions by Sir Joshua Reynolds, he engraved, on a reduced scale, upwards of three hundred, which were published in three folio volumes. He also engraved many of distinguished persons, from paintings by Dance, Northcote, Jackson, Edridge, Owen, Dawe, and Phillips. The best of these are Reginald Heber, the late bishop of Calcutta, and other dignitaries of the Church of England, after Owen; and that of Lady Ellis Agar, after Jackson, which was intended as a pendant to the Chapcau de Paille, also engraved by him from the celebrated picture by Rubens in the collection of Sir Robert Peel. In 1826 he went to France, and during his stay there he engraved several pictures of the distinguished painters of that country, Horace Vernet, Gericault, Delaroche, and Dubuffe; among which are The Wreck of the Medusa, Mazeppa, Joan of Arc in Prison, Napoleon crossing the Alps, and other subjects of fancy. There are many other prints of considerable merit bearing his name; such as The Visit of the poor Relations, after Stephanoff; The Lion and Snake, The Vulture and Lamb, and The Falconer, after Northcote; The Fisherman's Dog, and The Setters, after Morland. He was also a skilful designer in landscape, and made numerous sketches in oil, which are highly esteemed for their picturesque selection and artistic effect. The eminently distinguished engraver, Cousins, was one of his pupils.]

REYNOSO, DON ANTONIO GARCIA, a Spanish painter, born at Cabra, in Andalusia, in 1623. He studied under Sebastian Martinez, an artist of some eminence at Jaen. He painted history and landscapes; and there are several of his works noticed by Palomino, particularly an altar-piece in the church of the Capuchins, at Andujar, representing the Trinity, with several saints. There are also some of his pictures in the churches and private collections at Cordova, in which city he died in 1677.

REYSSCHOOT, F. VAN. By this artist, who was apparently a native of Holland, we have some small prints, after Teniers, which are executed in a very neat and spirited manner.

RHELINGER, WELSER. This artist was a native of Germany. According to Papillon, he executed a hundred and twenty wooden cuts, for a German book, entitled Patricium Stirpium Augustanarum Vindelicum, et earundem sodalitatatis insignia. The principal figures are all represented on horseback, completely armed, with the arms of their respective families on their shields.

RIBALTA, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Castellon de la Plana, in the kingdom of Valencia, in 1551. In some of his pictures he appears to have formed his style by studying the works of Juan Bautista Juanes, which are in the churches at Valencia. He is said to have afterwards travelled to Italy, where he resided some years. One of his best performances is an altar-piece in the church of the Patriarch, at Valencia, representing the Last Supper. He made copies from the pictures by Sebastiano del Piombo, which are in the royal collection at Madrid, three of which are in the convent of the Carmelites, in that city. He died at Valencia in 1628.

[Francisco Ribalta was one of the greatest historical painters of Spain. There is a little romantic history connected with his life. While a student he fell in love with his master's daughter, and demanded her in marriage, but her father refused his consent, alleging that he was not sufficiently advanced in his profession. Ribalta and his mistress, however, agreed privately to wait three or four years, and he immediately departed for Italy with the determination of perfecting himself by the study of the works of the great masters there. He applied himself with great assiduity to those of Raphael, Sebastian del Piombo, and the Caracci, and copied many of their pictures, particularly those of Sebastian. He returned after an absence of three years to his own country, and the first place he visited was the atelier of his former master, the father of his mistress. Finding the sketch of a picture on the easel, he finished it and withdrew. On the return of the old painter he expressed much surprise at the excellence of the performance, and said to his daughter, "How readily would I give you to a painter of such ability as this, instead of that miserable dauber Ribalta." "My father," replied the lady, "it is Ribalta that did it." Of course they were soon married.

Ribalta acquired great reputation not only in Valencia, but throughout Spain. At the time Can Bermudez wrote, Ribalta's pictures were numerous in various cities and places in that country, but a recent writer says that it is in Valencia alone that his works can be seen and appreciated. Mr. Ford, in his Hand-book of Spain, says, "The Colegio de Corpus, or del Patriarca, is a Museum of Ribaltas." He particularizes San Vicente de Ferrer visited on his sick-bed by our Saviour and Saints, as a masterpiece, painted in a style between Titian and Van Dyck; he also notices the Last Supper, in which the head of an Apostle with a white beard is equal to any thing painted by the old Venetians; and a Holy Family, in part like Titian. He calls Ribalta the Spanish Domenichino and Sebastian del Piombo combined. This is high praise from one so competent to give it. There is a grand specimen of Ribalta in the chapel of Magdalen College, Oxford, which has been erroneously attributed to Morales, to whose works it has not the remotest resemblance; but formerly every Spanish picture in England was attributed to Morales, Murillo, or Velasquez.]

RIBALTA, JUAN, was the son of Francisco Ribalta, born at Valencia in 1597. At the age of eighteen he gave proof of extraordinary ability, in a picture he painted of the Crucifixion, and would have probably become one of the most distinguished painters of his country, but he died young. [His works are frequently ascribed to his father, and his father's attributed to him. At the age of eighteen he painted the magnificent Crucifixion, which he inscribed Joannes Ribalta pingebat et invenit 18 etatis sue anno 1615, a picture perfect in all parts of the art. He painted for Don Diego de Vich above thirty portraits of illustrious persons of Valencia, which de Vich at his death bequeathed to the monastery of St. Jerome. Juan died on the 10th of October, 1628, the same year as his father.]

[RIBAUT, J—F—, an historical engraver, was born at Paris in 1767, and died in 1820. He was a scholar of Ingouf, and engraved the Crowning with Thorns, after Titian; Marcus Sextus, after Guerin; Paris and Enone, after Vander Werff; a young Lady playing on the Guitar, after Metsu; the two last are in the Musée Napoleon, and there are several by him in Collection du Musée, published by Laurent and Robillard. He also engraved the heads of Bernardin de St. Pierre, the poet Le Brun, and the Empress Marie Louise; and the costumes of the grand functionaries.]

RIBERA, GIUSEPPE, called LO SPAGNOLETTO. See SPAGNOLETTO.

RICCHI, PIETRO, called IL LUCCHESE. According to Baldinucci, this painter was born at Lucca in 1606, and was first a scholar of Passignano, but afterwards studied under Guido Reni. He imitated the graceful forms of the latter, though his colouring resembles that of Passignano. In the church of St. Francesco, at Lucca, are two altar-pieces, which evince the fertility of his invention, and his readiness of hand. He also painted several pictures for the churches at Udine, in which city he died in 1675. [He frequently imitated the forms of Guido; but it is doubtful that he ever studied under him, as his intimate friend Boschini says not a word upon the matter. He painted in France, and in the Milanese and Venetian states, and was very rapid and indefatigable in execution.]

RICCHIEDEO, MARCO, was born at Brescia, but it is not said in what year, nor under whom he studied. He was, however, a very reputable painter of history. In the church of St. Thomas, at Brescia, there is a fine picture by this master, representing the Incredulity of that Saint.

RICCI, ANTONIO. See BARBALUNGA.

RICCI, CAMILLO. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1580, and was the most celebrated disciple of Ippolito Scarsella, called Lo Scarcellino. Such was his progress under that able instructor, that Baruffaldi reports, that Scarcellino not only declared that he surpassed his master, but that if Camillo had preceded him in the art, he would have chosen him for his instructor. His style so nearly approaches to that of Ippolito, that the most experienced eye may be mistaken in their works. If he exhibits less freedom and breadth, he has perhaps surpassed him in the tenderness of his carnations and the general harmony of his colouring. The churches of Ferrara abound with his works, of which Barotti gives a particular account in his Pittura di Ferrara. His most admired productions are his pictures of S. Vincenzo e S. Margherita, in the cathedral; the Annunciation, in Spirito Santo; and his celebrated ceiling in the church of S. Niccolo, representing, in eighty-four compartments, the life and miracles of that saint. He died at Ferrara in 1618.

RICCI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called DA NOVARRA. This painter was born at Novarra in 1545. He went to Rome when young, and became a scholar and imitator of Raffaellino da Reggio. According to Baglione, he was employed by Sixtus V. in the palace of St. John of Lateran, and in the library of the Vatican. He was afterwards appointed by that pontiff superintendent of the paintings he had directed in the palace of Monte Cavallo. He was also much employed in the pontificate of Clement VIII. Of his own productions in the public edifices of Rome, the following are the most considerable: In the nave of the church of S. Maria Maggiore, he painted in fresco the Visitation, the Ascension, and the Assumption of the Virgin; in S. Marcello, a series of frescoes of the Life of the Virgin, and the Passion of our Saviour; but his most admired work is in S. Giovanni Lateran, representing the Consecration of that Basilica by S. Silvestro. This artist is mentioned in the Abecedario by Orlandi, as an engraver, but he does not specify any of his works. He died in 1620.

RICCI, SEBASTIANO, was born at Belluno, in the Venetian state, in 1659, and was placed when he was young under the tuition of Federigo Cervelli, at Venice, with whom he studied till he was twenty years of age. On leaving that master he went to Bologna, where he resided a short time, and was taken under the protection of the Duke of Parma, who employed him for some time at Piacenza, and sent him to Rome for the purpose of improvement. On the death of his patron he left Rome, and visited Florence, Modena, and Parma, contemplating the works of the great masters of the Lombard school. He was soon afterwards invited to the court of Vienna by the king of the Romans, where he was employed in decorating the imperial palace of Schoenbrunn. On his return to Venice from Germany, his nephew, Marco Ricci, who was at that time in London, encouraged him to visit England, in the reign of Queen Anne, and he met with the most flattering encouragement. He painted the chapel at Bulstrode, for the Duke of Portland; and with that inconsistency frequently found in the works of the Venetian painters, in the altar-piece, representing the Last Supper, he has introduced his own portrait, in a modern habit. The hall of Burlington House, and some of the ceilings, were painted by this master. He also painted the altar-piece of the chapel of Chelsea College. During a residence of ten years in this country, he executed several other considerable works for the mansions of the nobility, and is said to have left England in disgust, on finding that it was determined that Sir James Thornhill should paint the cupola of St. Paul's. He possessed a similar talent to that which is recorded of Luca Giordano, of being able to imitate the style of the great masters who had preceded him, with a precision which sometimes deceived even the intelligent. His picture of the Apostles adoring the Sacrament, in the church of S. Giustina, at Padua, is painted in imitation of the cupola of S. Giovanni, at Parma, by Coreggio; and his S. Gregorio, in S. Alessandro, at Bergamo, reminds us of the works of Guercino at Bologna. But his most successful imitations were those of the works of Paolo Veronese, many of which he disposed of as original pictures, and is said to have once deceived the French painter, La Fosse, who avenged himself for the imposition by the following sarcastic rebuke: "For the future," said he, "take my advice, paint nothing but Paul Veroneses, and no more Riccis." Sebastiano Ricci possessed a fertile invention, and a commanding facility of execution. Although his design is not scrupulously correct, the forms of his figures are graceful, and his colouring, though sometimes feeble and cold, is often silvery and agreeable. Like most painters of decorations, he consulted his imagination more than nature, and frequently discovers the repetition and the weakness of a mannerist. He died at Venice in 1734.

RICCI, MARCO, was the nephew of Sebastiano Ricci, and was born at Belluno in 1680. After receiving his first instruction in the art from his uncle, he visited Rome, where he was for some years occupied in designing the most picturesque views in the vicinity of that city, and the most remarkable vestiges of ancient architecture. From these designs he painted perspective views, which were greatly admired. In 1710 he came to England, and his talents soon excited the public attention. He was much employed in painting landscapes, with ruins and architecture, both in oil and distemper; and his works are still found in many of the principal collections. He died at Venice in 1730. M. Ricci has etched several plates from his own designs, consisting of views and landscapes, with ruins and figures, of which the most deserving notice is a set of twenty-three prints, entitled Varia Marci Ricci Pictoris præstantissimi experimenta ab ipsomet auctore inventa, delineata atque incisa, et a me Carolo Orsolini Veneto incisore in unum collecta, &c. Anno 1730, Venetiis.

RICCIARELLI, DANIELE. See VOLTERRA.

RICCIO, DOMENICO, called BRUSASORCI. This painter was born at Verona in 1494. According to Ridolfi, he was a disciple of Giovanni Francesco Caroto; but Lanzi ranks him as a scholar of Niccolò Giolfino. His greatest improvement was, however, derived from an attentive study of the works of Giorgione and Titian, at Venice. His picture of S. Rocco, in the church of the Padri Agostiniani at Verona, is entirely in the style of the latter, as well as some pictures of fabulous subjects in the private collections. His genius did not confine itself to the style of any individual master; and his works at Mantua partake of the depth of colouring of Giorgione, and of the graceful design of Parmigiano. His picture of Phaeton, in the Ducal palace, though somewhat damaged by time, still charms by the ingenuity of the composition, the harmony of the colour, and the admirable fore-shortening. His greatest merit was in fresco painting, and in the many admirable works with which he embellished the public edifices and palaces, he united the erudition of the poet to the talents of a great painter. Of his historical works, the chef d'œuvre was the Cavalcade of Clement VIII. and Charles V. on their entry into Bologna, in a saloon in the Casa Ridolfi, a grand and copious composition, which is spoken of by Lanzi in terms of the highest praise. He died in 1567. [Rossini has given an etching of a portion of the Cavalcade of Clement and Charles V. in plate 150 of Storia della Pittura Italiana. Brusasorci signifies rat-burner. His father acquired that appellation by inflicting that cruel punishment on all the unlucky animals of the kind entrapped in his house.]

RICCIO, FELICE, called BRUSASORCI THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Verona about the year 1550, and was first instructed by his father. On the death of Domenico Riccio, when he was in his seventeenth year, he continued his studies at Florence, under Jacopo Ligozzi, and brought back with him to Verona a correct and elegant design. He painted several pictures for the private collections at Verona, of Holy Families and Madonnas, with angels, which were admired for a graceful air of the heads, and a beautiful expression. He was, however, capable of greater powers when the subject required them. Such is his picture of the Forge of Vulcan with the Cyclops, in the collection of the Conte Gazzola, which is designed in the best style of the Florentine school, and vigorously coloured. There are some altarpieces by him in the churches at Verona, of which the most admired is his picture of S. Elena, in the church dedicated to that saint. He died in 1605. [Zani says he was born in 1540; and Lanzi, after Ridolfi, that he died in 1605, at the age of 65. He not only exercised his talents on large works, but painted small pictures on marble, which he coloured with great skill, availing himself of the marble itself for his shadows, especially in the Oriental alabaster, which has a very pleasing effect.]

RICCIOLINO, MICHELANGELO. This artist was born at Rome in 1654, and is noticed by Abate Titi, who mentions some of his works in the public places at Rome, particularly in the church of S. Lorenzo in Piscibus, and a ceiling, in S. Maria in Campitelli. His portrait, painted by himself, is in the Florentine Gallery. He died at Rome in 1715.

RICHARDSON, JONATHAN. This eminent portrait painter was born about the year 1665. His father dying when he was only five years of age, his mother married a second husband, and he was, contrary to his inclination, articulated by his father-in-law to a scrivener; but as his master died in the sixth year of his apprenticeship, he indulged an inclination he had long felt for painting, and became a pupil of John Riley, under whom he studied four years. Having made sufficient progress in the art to offer himself to the public attention, he married the niece of his instructor, and established himself as a portrait painter. Though Sir Godfrey Kneller and Dahl were then in great reputation, Mr. Richardson possessed sufficient merit to secure a share of the public favour during their lives, and after their death he was considered at the head of his profession. He continued in possession of considerable employment for many years, and was enabled to retire from business long before his death, which happened the 28th of May, 1745, when he was upwards of eighty years of age. He left one son and four daughters, one of whom was married to Mr. Hudson, his pupil.

Mr. Richardson published the following works on art: 1. "The Theory of Painting." 2. "The Connoisseur, an Essay on the whole Art of Criticism, as it relates to Painting." And, 3. "An account of some of the Statues, Bas-reliefs, Drawings, and Pictures, in Italy, &c., with remarks by Mr. Richardson, sen. and jun." The son made the journey, and from his notes, letters, and observations, they both, at his return, compiled this valuable work. In 1734 they also published "Explanatory Notes and Remarks on Milton's Paradise Lost, with the Life of the Author, and a Discourse on the Poem." The father having said, in an apology for being little conversant in the classics, "that he had looked into them through his son," Hogarth, whom a quibble could furnish with wit, drew the father peeping through a telescope, with which the son was perforated, at a Virgil above on a shelf.

For the following character of Richardson, we are indebted to the noble author of the Anecdotes. "Jonathan Richardson was undoubtedly one of the best English painters of a head that had appeared in this country. There is strength, roundness, and boldness in his colouring; but his men want dignity, and his women grace. The good sense of the nation is characterized in his portraits. You see he lived in an age when neither enthusiasm nor servility were predominant: yet with a pencil so firm, possessed of a numerous and excellent collection of drawings, full of the theory, and profound in reflections on his art, he drew nothing well below the head, and was void of imagination. His attitudes, draperies, and back-grounds are totally insipid and unmeaning; so ill did he apply to his own practice the sagacious rules and hints he bestowed on others. Though he wrote with fire and judgment, his paintings owed little to either. No man dived deeper into the inexhaustible stores of Raffælle, or was more smitten with the native lustre of Vandeyck. Yet, though capable of tasting the elevation of the one, and the elegance of the other, he could never contrive to see with their eyes when he was to copy nature himself. One wonders that he could comment on their works so well, and imitate them so little." Mr. Richardson has etched a few portraits; among which are,

His own Portrait.
Alexander Pope, Esq.; two plates, one of them a profile.
John Milton.
Dr. Mead.

[RICHAET, F. J. DE LA MARE-, an engraver, who, according to Robert Dumesnil, was born at Bayeux about 1630, and died at Versailles in 1718. His prints have a resemblance to those of Lutma and Morin, and also to those of Livens, the scholar of Rembrandt. Basan mentions him as having engraved a St. Jerome, after L. De La Hyre. Dumesnil has described eighteen prints by him, but does not include the St. Jerome; two, an Ecce Homo, and the Virgin, are inscribed F. de la Mare fec. 1650, and F. J. D. L. Mare inv. sculp. 1655. The rest, which are fancy heads, are in the style of Livens, without marks.]

RICHER, P. According to Florent le Comte, this artist, in conjunction with Francis Chaveau, engraved eleven plates of philosophical tables by Louis Lesclaches. [According to Nagler he worked from 1630 to 1660.]

RICHERI, ANTONIO. This artist was a native of Ferrara, and was brought up in the school of Giovanni Lanfranco. According to Passeri, he followed that master to Naples and Rome, and painted some frescoes at the Teatini from the designs of Lanfranco. He is said to have etched some plates from the designs of his master. Mr. Strutt calls him A. Richer. [Zani says he was born in 1600. Passeri says he engraved, but there is no account of his works in that way. He was an artist of mediocrity.]

RICHMANS. See RYCKMANS.

[RICHOMME, JOSEPH THEODORE, a very eminent engraver, was born at Paris in 1785, and was first a scholar of Regnault, the painter, and afterwards of J. J. Coigny, the engraver. He obtained the great prize at the Institute for the best engraving in 1806, and has since obtained additional honours for productions of great excellence. His works class with those of the best modern engravers of Italy.] among them may be specified,

The Triumph of Galatea; after Raphael.
The Five Saints; after the same.
The Holy Family; after the same.
Adam and Eve; after the same.
Neptune and Amphitrite; after Giulio Romano.
Venus at the Bath; after the Antique.
Andromache; after Guerin.
Thetis crowning Vasca de Gama; after Gerard.

Richomme was a member of the Legion of Honour, and of the Institute. He is perhaps still living, an honour to the arts.]

RICHTER, CHRISTIAN, was a native of Stockholm, and came to England in 1702, where he painted portraits both in oil and in miniature; chiefly studying the works of Michael Dahl, from which he learned a strong manner of colouring. In the latter part of his life he applied to enamelling, but died before he had made much progress in that branch, in 1732.

RICKE, BERNARD DE, was born at Courtray, about the year 1520. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he was an eminent painter of history. In the church of St. Martin, at Courtray, there are two pictures by this master, one of which is much esteemed, representing Christ bearing his Cross; the other is the Decollation of St. Matthew. He afterwards fixed his residence at Antwerp, and was received into the academy there in 1561.

RIDINGER, JOHN ELIAS. According to Huber, this artist was born at Ulm, in Suabia, in 1695, and received his instruction in the art from Christopher Resch. He established himself at Augsburg, where he became an eminent designer and painter of animals and huntings. His works as a painter are few, and are little known, except in his own country; but in his numerous etchings, from his own designs, he discovers an ability which has seldom been surpassed. His compositions are ingenious and animated, and he has given to each animal its peculiar character and attitude with surprising expression and exactness. The pardonable partiality of his countryman and biographer, Mr. Fuessli, does not hesitate to assert, that though "he has perhaps been excelled by Rubens, in the ideal grandeur of the lion, he has far surpassed him, and the rest of his predecessors, in the wide extent of his powers over every species of the brute creation." The just value of this eulogy, the unbiased judgment of the public will have little difficulty in ascertaining. The number of his prints is very considerable, and there is a great inequality in his works. The following are among the most esteemed:

A set of twelve plates of the Creation.
A set of Heads of Wolves and Foxes.
Four plates of Boar-huntings.
A set of sixteen plates representing the mode of hunting different animals in Germany, with inscriptions in German and French.
Eighteen plates of Horsemanship.
Thirteen plates of various Wild Beasts.
A Lion-hunting; after Rubens; for the Dresden Gallery.

[According to Zani he was born in 1698, and died in 1769. There are prints, supposed to be executed by him conjointly with his son Martin Elias, with the date 1770. The German writers call him Riedinger.]

RIDOLFI, CLAUDIO, was born at Verona in 1560, and was for some time a scholar of Dario Pozzo, a painter of little celebrity; but he afterwards entered the school of Paolo Veronese. As Venice was at that time the residence of a great number of eminent artists, he went to Rome in search of employment. Not meeting with the success he expected in that capital, he visited Urbino, where the works of Federigo Barocci were then held in the highest estimation. He formed an intimacy with that distinguished artist, and with the advantage of his instruction and advice, he acquired an amenity of style, and a graceful expression in the airs of his heads, by which his works were afterwards distinguished. He resided several years at Corinaldo, in the marquisate of Ancona, where he painted many pictures for the churches of that town and its vicinity, which, in colouring, might vie with the ablest of the Venetian painters, and in elegance and correctness of design, remind us of the great masters of the Roman school. Of his works at Urbino, the most esteemed are the Birth of St. John the Baptist, in S. Lucia; and the Presentation in the Temple, in Spirito Santo. At Rimini is a fine picture by this master, representing the taking down from the Cross. He also painted portraits, in which he united dignity and character with a perfect resemblance. He died in 1644.

RIDOLFI, CAVALIERE CARLO. This painter was born at Vicenza in 1602. He was instructed in the art by Antonio Vassilacchi, called l'Aliense, but afterwards studied the works of the best masters at Verona and Vicenza. Little is known of his works as a painter, and Lanzi mentions, as his most esteemed performance, the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, in the church of the Ognisanti at Venice. He also painted portraits and easel pictures for private collections. He is more distinguished as a writer on art than as a painter, and was the author of the Lives of the Venetian Painters, in two volumes, published at Venice in 1648, entitled Le Maraviglie dell' arte, ovvero le Vite degli illustri pittori Veneti, e dello Stato. He died in 1660, aged 58. [Zani and other writers date his death in 1658, at the age of 64.]

RIDOLFI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1710. Mr. Strutt notices a frontispiece engraved by this artist, from a design by C. N. Lamparel, affixed to a volume, containing views of ancient and modern Rome, published at Venice in 1716. It is executed in a style resembling that of Cornelius Bloemart, though very inferior. [He was living in 1723.]

RIEDEL, JOHN ANTHONY, a German designer and engraver, born at Prague in 1732. He was keeper of the Dresden Gallery, and has engraved several plates from the pictures in that celebrated collection, in which he has imitated the style of Rembrandt, among which are the following:

- The Virgin and infant Christ; after Baroccio.
- The Seven Sacraments; after Gio. Maria Crespi.
- A Portrait of Rembrandt; after a picture by himself.
- A Warrior, with a cap and feather; after the same.
- A Portrait of a Lady holding a Letter; after Vanduyck.

[Nagler, who gives a list of 52 of his works, says he died in 1816; but the latest date on his prints is 1772.]

RIETSCHOOFF, JOHN KLAASZ, was born at Hoorn in 1652, and was a scholar of Ludolf Backhuysen, under whose tuition he became an eminent artist, and painted sea-pieces and storms so much in the style of his instructor, that his pictures were sometimes mistaken for those of Backhuysen. He particularly excelled in painting tempests and hurricanes, which he represented with the most impressive fidelity. His calms are not without considerable merit, and bear some resemblance to the works of William Vandervelde. The pictures of Rietschoof are little known in this country, and are chiefly confined to Holland, where they are justly esteemed. He died in 1719. [Rietschoof's pictures are now very well known in this country; they certainly are analogous to those of Backhuysen, and are worthy of being placed in the second rank of sea-pieces by Dutch masters. The resemblance of his calms to those of W. Vandervelde is not very striking.]

RIETSCHOOFF, HENRY, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Hoorn in 1678, and was instructed in the art by his father. He painted similar subjects to those of the elder Rietschoof; and though his pictures cannot be said to equal them, they possess sufficient merit to find a place in the collections of his country. [The date of his death is not recorded.]

RIGAUD, HYACINTH, a French painter, born at Perpignan in 1659. He was the son of Matthias Rigaud, an artist of little note, from whom he received his first instruction in the elements of design. His father dying when he was very young, he was placed under the care of a portrait painter of no great celebrity, at Montpellier, under whom he continued till he had reached his eighteenth year, when he established himself in the city of Lyons, where he met with very flattering encouragement. In 1681 he went to Paris, for the purpose of studying historical painting, and in the following year obtained the prize at the Academy. By the advice of Charles le Brun, who discovered in him a decided talent for portrait painting, he abandoned his project of visiting Italy, and applied himself particularly to that department. Having seen some portraits by Vanduyck at Paris, he was so much struck with the admirable style of that painter, that he ever afterwards made him the model of his imitation. The success of Rigaud as a portrait painter was most brilliant. He frequently painted the portrait of Louis XIV. and those of the principal nobility of the court, and many of the most illustrious personages in Europe. In 1700 he became a member of the Academy at Paris, and presented them with a fine portrait of the sculptor Desjardins, as his picture of reception. He painted a few historical works, among which is a picture of St. Andrew, in the hall of the Academy; and a Nativity, which is engraved by Drevet.

Hyacinth Rigaud is considered one of the ablest portrait painters of the French school. His heads are full of character and expression, his colouring more chaste than is usual in the artists of his country, and his touch is bold and free. He had the misfortune of being obliged to encounter the unpicturesque habiliments and the enormous perukes worn at his time, and his works would undoubtedly have possessed a stronger claim to our admiration, if he had been permitted to delineate nature, without such preposterous disguises. Some of his portraits have been finely engraved by the eminent artists of his country, among which are those of Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, by Drevet; and his own portrait, by Gerard Edelinck. He died in 1745. [Zani and Nagler say he died in 1743. Nagler has given an excellent list of the portraits engraved after him by the most eminent French engravers: they are very numerous.]

RIGAUD, JOHN, was a relation of the preceding artist, and was born at Paris about the year 1700. He painted landscapes and views, which, if we may judge by his prints, must have possessed considerable merit. He appears to have passed some time in England, as he has etched some views in the environs of London. We have several plates by him, executed in a spirited and masterly style, and the figures are correctly and neatly drawn. The following are his principal prints:

- A pair of Views of Marseilles, at the time of the plague in 1720.
- A set of six Views of the Chateau and Gardens of Marly.
- The Garden of the Tuilleries.
- A View of the Chateau of the Luxembourg.
- A View of Hampton Court.
- St. James's Park.
- Greenwich Park.
- Greenwich Hospital.
- A set of six Landscapes, with figures.
- A set of six Views in France, with rural amusements.
- Twelve marine subjects.

[Nagler has given a list of a great number of engravings by him, and says he died in 1754; but Zani says he operated in 1757.]

He had a son, JOHN BAPTIST RIGAUD, who engraved a plate of a view of the Palais Bourbon, after a design by his father.

[RIGAUD, JOHN FRANCIS, an historical painter, who was probably of French or Swiss origin, but practised his art in England, and was a member of the Royal Academy, flourished during the latter part of the 18th century. He was one of the painters employed by Boydell to illustrate Shakspeare; and he painted also many subjects taken from the sacred writings, and from the History of England. His admission picture to the Royal Academy represents Samson breaking his Bonds, and looks like a bold academical study. His style partakes more of the French than of the English school. A great number of his pictures have been engraved. He translated and published Lionardo da Vinci's Treatise of Painting with illustrative copper-plates. It is supposed that he died in 1810.

RIGHETTI, MARIO. This painter was born at Bologna about the year 1590, and was a scholar of Lucio Massari. He painted several pictures for the churches of his native city, which are noticed in Le pitture di Bologna, of which the most deserving attention are the following: The Archangel Michael, in the church of S. Guglielmo; Christ appearing to Magdalene, in S. Giacomo Maggiore; the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Agnese; and the Nativity, in S. Lucia.

RILEY, JOHN. This artist was born in London in 1646, and received instructions from Isaac Fuller and Gerard Zoust. He was little noticed till after the death of Sir Peter Lely, though he is considered by the noble author of the Anecdotes as one of the best native painters that had then flourished in England. His talents were obscured by the fame, rather than the merit, of Sir Godfrey Kneller, and have been since depressed by being confounded with Lely, an honour unfortunate for his reputation. He painted several portraits, particularly that of Lord Keeper North, at Wroxton, which would have done credit to either Lely or Kneller. Riley was modest, humble, and of an amiable character, and was easily disgusted with his own works. With a quarter of Kneller's vanity, he might have persuaded the world that he was a great painter. Charles II. sat to him, but almost intimidated the modest artist from pursuing a profession so proper for him, by what perhaps he considered as a jeu d'esprit. Looking at the picture, he cried, "Is this like me? then, od's fish, I am an ugly fellow." James II. and his queen also sat to him, as did their successors, William and Mary, who appointed him their painter. He died in 1691.

RILEY, CHARLES REUBEN, was born at London about the year 1752, and having shown a disposition for the art, was placed under the tuition of Mr. Mortimer. In 1778 he obtained the gold medal at the Royal Academy, for the best painting in oil; the subject was the Sacrifice of Iphigenia. He was recommended by his instructor to the patronage of the Duke of Richmond, and was employed in the decorations at Goodwood. He afterwards went to Ireland, on a similar employment for the embellishment of the mansion of Mr. Conelly. His principal employment afterwards was in making designs for booksellers, in which he displayed both fancy and taste, with considerable facility. He was of a feeble constitution, probably occasioned by the deformed construction of his body, and died in 1798.

RIMALDI, ORAZIO. This painter was born at Pisa in 1598, and was first a scholar of Aurelio Lomi, but afterwards studied at Rome under Orazio Lomi, called Gentileschi. During a residence of some years at Rome, he studied with attention the works of the great masters, and the beauties of the antique, and on his return to Pisa distinguished himself as one of the most promising artists of his time. He followed, in the early part of his life, the principles of M. Angelo Caravaggio, which he soon after abandoned for the more graceful and expressive style of Domenichino. He painted several pictures for the churches in that city, one of which, the Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, has since been placed in the Florentine Gallery. In the cathedral are two Scripture subjects by him, representing the Brazen Serpent, and Samson destroying the Philistines. His last work was his admired picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, which he did not live to finish. To the great regret of the lovers of painting, this able artist was cut off in the commencement of a flattering career by the plague, which visited the Florentine state in 1630. [Zani and Lanzi say he died in 1631.]

[RINALDI, SANTO, called IL TROMBA, an excellent painter of battles, landscapes, and architecture, was a scholar of Furini, and flourished from 1640 to 1660. Though he painted much, and was eminent in his day, very little of his history is recorded. It is supposed that he was born about 1620, at Florence, and died in 1676.]

RINCON, ANTONIO DEL. This painter was born at Guadalaxara, in 1446, and may be considered as the father of the Spanish school. He studied at Rome, and on his return to Spain was taken into the service of Ferdinand the Catholic, who appointed him his painter, bestowed on him the order of Santiago, and made him groom of his chamber. Among the few of his works that remain, are the altar-piece in the church of Robledo de Chabela, a town in the archbishopric of Toledo; and two portraits of Ferdinand and Isabella, in the church of San Juan de los Reyes, at Toledo. Several of his works perished in the fire that destroyed the palace of the Pardo, in 1608. He died in 1500.

[RING, PIETER DE, an admirable painter of subjects of still-life, flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. If not a native of Holland, he practised his art there, as most of his pictures are, or were, confined to that country, though the Dutch writers seem to know nothing of his history. In the Museum at Amsterdam there is a picture by him, representing a table covered with blue velvet, on which are various kinds of fruit, oysters, and other shell-fish. Some twenty or thirty years ago there were several imported to England by dealers; but it is apprehended that they have changed the name, and have assumed that of John David de Heem. He generally introduced a ring as his signature: and by this signet ring his works may be ascertained. They deserve to be known.]

RINGGLI, GOTHARD, [OR GODFREY.] This artist is mentioned in Fuessli's Lives of the Swiss Painters. He was born at Zurich in 1575, but it is not said by whom he was instructed, nor is any thing known of the circumstances of his early life. He was employed by the magistracy of Berne to paint some large pictures relative to the history of that city, which his biographer commends for the ingenuity of the composition and the correctness of the design. He is said to have etched some plates from his own designs, in a bold, free style, which he marked with a cipher composed of the letters G. R. [Nagler has given a list of eleven; Brulliot notices two; one has his name in full, G. Ringly ū Zurich, fecit 1628. He died in 1635.]

RIPOSO, FELICE. See FICHERELLI.

RISVENNO, GIUSEFFO, [OR RISUENO, JOSEF,] a Spanish painter, born at Granada about the year 1640. He was a scholar of Alonso Cano, under whom he studied both painting and sculpture. He painted history with some reputation; and there are several of his works in the churches of his native city, of which the most considerable is the cupola of the Carthusians. He died at Granada in 1721.

RITUS, MICHAEL. The name of this artist is affixed to an etching representing the Virgin Mary and the infant Christ; after A. Caracci. It is dated 1647.

RIVALZ, ANTHONY. This artist was born at Toulouse in 1667. He was the son of John Peter Rivalz, a painter and architect of some celebrity, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of the art, and afterwards visited Paris, where he did not remain long, but went to Rome in search of improvement. During his residence in that capital he was the successful candidate for the prize given by the Academy of St. Luke, in a picture representing the Fall of the Rebel Angels. After studying the works of the best masters, he returned to Toulouse, where he passed the remainder of his life. He possessed an extraordinary talent for copying the works of the most celebrated Italian masters with surprising precision. As he resided at so great a distance from the metropolis, few of his works are to be met with at Paris. His pictures are chiefly confined to the public edifices and private collections at Toulouse, where he died in 1735. He left a great number of drawings, which are executed with great freedom, in a style resembling that of Raymond de la Fage. We have a few spirited etchings by this artist, among which are the following :

The Martyrdom of St. Symphorianus.

An Allegorical subject of Vice driven away by Truth, as the enemy of the Arts and Sciences; in memory of N. Poussin.

Four plates of Allegorical subjects for a treatise on Painting, by Dupuy du Grez.

RIVALZ, BARTHOLOMEW, was the nephew and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Toulouse in 1724. We have by him a few etchings, among which are the following :

The Fall of the Rebel Angels; after Ant. Rivalz.

Judith and Holofernes; after the same.

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife; after the same.

The Death of Mary Magdalene; after Benedetto Luti.

RIVAROLA, ALFONSO, called IL CHENDA, this painter was born at Ferrara in 1607, and was the most distinguished scholar of Carlo Bononi. On the death of that master he was engaged to finish the picture of the Marriage of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria del Vado. There are several pictures of his own composition in the churches at Ferrara, which do honour to the school in which he was educated. Such are his Baptism of St. Agostino, in the church dedicated to that saint, which he has embellished with magnificent architecture; the Resurrection, at the Teatini; the Brazen Serpent, in S. Niccolo; and the Martyrdom of S. Caterina, in S. Guglielmo. This promising young artist had acquired a distinguished reputation among the ablest artists of the Ferrarese school, when he died at the premature age of 33, in 1640.

RIVERDITI, MARCANTONIO. According to Lanzi, this painter was a native of Alessandria della Paglia, but received his education in the art at Bologna, where he painted some pictures for the churches, in which he imitated the style of Guido Reni. He also painted portraits with considerable success. Of his historical works, the most worthy of notice are his pictures of the Conception, in the church of the Padri Camaldolesi; and S. Francesco di Paola, in S. Maria de Foscherari. He died at Bologna in 1744. [According to Lanzi and Zani he died in 1774.]

[RIZI, FRANCISCO, a Spanish historical painter of a very fertile invention, was born at Madrid in 1608. He was the son of Antonio Rizi, a native of Bologna, who had accompanied Federigo Zuccaro into Spain, but he was instructed in the principles of the art by Vincencio Carducho. He seemed to possess an intuitive disposition for painting; no obstacles could obstruct his progress; they were overcome as they presented themselves: he was born a painter. This precocity of talent, and the fecundity of an unbridled imagination, induced a superficial study of the essentials of the art; the usual result followed; he became the Spanish Fa presto. He conceived and produced, but always incorrectly. As he lived at a time, and in a court, when and where the great merit of an artist was to improvise, he was celebrated and patronized as one of first-rate talent; and in consequence he became painter to Philip IV. in 1656, which office he continued to hold under Charles II., who added to it the honour of deputy-keeper of the royal keys. A few years previous he had been appointed painter to the cathedral of Toledo, a post of more importance to an artist, in a pecuniary point of view, than that of painter to the king, as it gave him the charge of all the existing works in the cathedral, and insured to him the execution of the greater part of what might be undertaken in his time, which in Spanish cathedrals, at that period, were numerous and important. It would occupy space to no very good purpose to give a detailed account of his manifold works in the palaces, cathedrals, and churches of Spain; and it would be concluded by saying, that the decline of painting in that country may be attributed, in a great degree, to the attraction of his style, and its superficiality. He is said to have done equal injury to the architectural taste of the period by his capricious decorations of the theatre of the Retiro. His opinions were as dangerous to art as his practice; he preferred facility to correctness, and considered the employment of painting only as a means of living. His last design was, perhaps, his best. It was a sketch for the great altar-piece of the Retablo de la Santa Forma, in the sacristy of the Escorial, but he did not live to finish the work; Coello, his disciple, painted the picture from a sketch of his own, and it is considered one of the finest in Spain. Francisco Rizi died on the 2nd of August, 1685.]

[RIZI, FRAY JUAN, brother of Francisco, was born at Madrid in 1595. He was also an eminent painter, and was more correct in design than his brother, and more attentive to the chiaro-scuro. His principal works are in the Benedictine monastery of San Martin, at Madrid. He retired to Rome, was made an archbishop by Pope Clement X. in 1675, but died before entering into the duties of the office.]

[ROBART, ———, said to have been a scholar of Jan Van Huysum, painted fruit, flowers, dead game, and landscapes. If he be the same as a painter who was called the Religious Willem Robart, he flourished about the year 1770.]

ROBATTO, GIOVANNI STEFANO. This painter was born at Savona in 1649, and studied at Rome in the school of Carlo Maratti. He for some time painted history with considerable reputation, and was employed for some of the churches at Genoa. One of his most esteemed works is St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, at the Cappucini. He afterwards degraded his talent by a fatal passion for gaming; and his latter performances are the productions of negligence and despatch. He died in 1733.

ROBERT, NICHOLAS. This artist was born at Orleans in 1610. He excelled in painting animals, insects, and plants, in miniature, and was employed by Gaston, Duke of Orleans, in painting the most curious beasts and birds in the royal menagerie, which are preserved in the King's library at Paris. We have also several etchings by him of similar subjects, and a set of six plates of Vases, from the designs of Charmeton. [He died in 1684.]

ROBERT, A. According to Basan, this artist was a pupil of J. C. le Blond, by whom we have some prints in colour, which possess considerable merit. [Jean Robert followed the system of Le Blond and others of printing in colours by using four plates.]

ROBERT, HUBER, a French painter of architectural views and perspective. He was born at Paris in 1741; and after learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Rome, where he passed several years, and made very accurate designs from the remains of ancient Architecture. On his return to Paris, he was made a member of the Academy, and his pictures were held in high estimation. We have several spirited etchings by this artist, among which is a set of ten Views, with buildings, entitled Les Soirées de Rome. [Hubert Robert was born in 1733, and died in 1808. He was an elegant artist, and has given picturesque representations of the antique remains in and about Rome, in the blended styles of Pannini and Joseph Vernet.]

ROBERT-[DE-SERI,] PAUL PONTIUS ANTHONY, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1680. He was a scholar of Peter James Cazes, and afterwards studied in Italy. On his return to Paris he painted an altar-piece for the church of the Capuchins, representing the Martyrdom of St. Fidelis, which is esteemed his principal work as a painter. He etched several of the subjects, which were executed in chiaro-scuro by Nicholas le Suenr, for the Crozat collection. [He died about 1740. Dumesnil has given descriptions of fourteen prints by him, with this character, "that he would have been the greatest painter in the world if his talents had been equal to the good opinion he had of himself." It is feared that, with the same proviso, he would have had many rivals.]

ROBERTS, JAMES, an English engraver, born in Devonshire in 1725. He engraved several landscapes and views from the pictures of Richard Wilson, George Barret, Smith of Chichester, and others.

ROBERTSON, GEORGE. According to Edwards, this artist was born in London about the year 1742, and was instructed in design in Mr. Shipley's drawing-school. At an early age he went to Italy, where he chiefly studied landscape painting, and produced some pictures which possessed considerable merit. He afterwards visited the island of Jamaica, where he made several drawings and pictures of views of that country, some of which were exhibited in 1775. Not meeting with the encouragement he expected, and to which his talents justly entitled him, he adopted the profession of a drawing-master, in which he was more successful. He died in 1788. We have a few etchings of views by him from his own designs.

ROBETTA. According to Huber, this old engraver was born at Florence about the year 1460. He followed the profession of a goldsmith, and engraved a few plates in the rude and uncouth style practised in Italy before the time of Marc Antonio Raimondi. His prints are very scarce, and have little more than their rarity to recommend them.

He sometimes signed them with his name at length, on a tablet, and sometimes with the letters R. B. T. A. The following are by him, and are apparently from his own designs :

Adam and Eve; a middle-sized upright plate.

The Wise Men's Offering; the same.

The Resurrection of Christ; the same.

The Golden Age; a large upright plate.

[The foregoing account of Robetta is very meagre and unsatisfactory; but there is great uncertainty in all that is related of him. Zani endeavoured to elucidate his history, and has given from Vasari the little that author has said that might tend to show the period in which a goldsmith named Robetta lived. It appears that twelve artists formed a club, under the appellation of La Compagnia del Pajuolo, (the company of the Stock-pot,) and had pic-nic suppers alternately at each other's lodgings. The names of these associates were Gianfrancesco Rustici (the founder); Andrea del Sarto; Spillo, Pittore; Domenico Puligo; Il Robetta, Orafo; Aristotile da San Gallo; Francesco di Pellegrino; Nicolo Boni; Domenico Baccelli (who played and sung excellently); Il Solosmeo, Scultore; Lorenzo detto Guazzetto; and Roberto di Filippo Lippi, Pittore. The inference that Zani draws is, that as Gianfrancesco Rustici was born about 1470, and lived to 1547, Robetta, a goldsmith, flourished within those years, and that he was the engraver in question. These Symposia appear to have taken place about 1511 or 1512, and Bartsch conjectures that Robetta flourished about 1520; but as nothing is said respecting his age, it cannot be ascertained whether that was his prime or decline. By his being admitted a member of a select club of eminent artists, it may be supposed that he was of some celebrity before 1512. He is designated Orafo in the list of names, that word being then used for Orefice, goldsmith; but engraving was part of a goldsmith's business in those days, and ranked him among artists. Andrea del Sarto was placed with a goldsmith to learn the art of engraving before he became a painter. Ottley observes, "The works of Robetta bear evidence that he was no ordinary goldsmith. He appears to have possessed a fertile imagination, and to have composed with facility. In his small draped figures of females or angels, he is frequently graceful; but he was not equally successful in his naked figures, which are often lamely drawn, and sometimes ill proportioned. His engravings, which appear executed with freedom, are finished with close hatchings carelessly thrown in various directions; and in the light parts of his figures, and upon the ground, he sometimes introduces a few dots, or short curved strokes, in the manner of Schongauer and the early engravers of Germany and the Low Countries." Zani says he knew about thirty prints by this artist, almost all signed either Robeta or Robetta, but more commonly 'ROBTA', or R. B. T. A. On his Mutius Scævola the mark is R. BTA', and on the Lyrist, (No. 23 of Bartsch,) RBTA. The prints of this old engraver are of sufficient importance, for their merits and rarity, to justify the introduction of a list of their titles, as given by the accurate Bartsch in Le Peintre Graveur, tom. xiii., to which the inquirer is referred for fuller descriptions. Zani, Enciclopedia Metodica, parte seconda, vol. ii., should also be consulted.

List of Prints by, and attributed to, Robetta.

SUBJECTS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT.

1. The Creation of Eve. Not signed.

2. Adam and Eve driven from Paradise. Not signed.
3. Adam and Eve, and their two Children. Signed RBTA. There are two impressions of this plate. In the first the sky is white; the second is retouched, and there are several clouds in the sky, particularly towards the right.
4. Adam and Eve, and their two Children. No mark. The first state before a round hole at the bottom of the plate.
5. Adam and Eve, and their two Children. No mark.

SUBJECTS FROM THE NEW TESTAMENT.

6. The Adoration of the Kings. Signed ROBETTA.
7. The Nativity. Not signed, but undoubtedly his work.
8. Jesus Christ baptized in the river Jordan. Signed RBTA.
9. Jesus Christ taking leave of his Mother. Signed RBTA.
10. The Resurrection of Christ. Signed RBTA.
11. The Virgin presenting her breast to the Infant. Signed ROBTA.
12. The Virgin seated in a landscape, &c. Signed RBTA.
13. The Virgin with Angels, &c. Not signed, but considered one of the most beautiful pieces of the master.
14. St. Sebastian and St. Roch. Not signed.
15. Faith and Charity with their attributes. Signed RBTA.

MYTHOLOGICAL SUBJECTS.

16. Ceres with two goat-footed Infants. Signed RBTA.
17. A young Man tied to a Tree, &c. Signed RBTA.
18. Venus surrounded by Cupids. Some traces of the name may be seen in a dark shadow.
19. Apollo and Marsyas. Signed RBTA.
20. The young Hercules between Virtue and Vice. Not signed.
21. Hercules killing the Hydra. Signed RBTA. There are two impressions; in the first the sky is left white; in the second, there are some clouds, and a falcon chasing a heron.
22. Hercules and Anteus. Not signed.
23. The Lyrst. Signed RBTA.
24. An old Woman and two amorous Couples, &c. Not signed.
25. A Man tied to a Tree by Cupid, &c. On a tablet RORETA (sic.)
26. Mutius Scaevola. Signed RBTA.

The following six prints, five of which are in the British Museum, are presumed to be by Robetta, although they have not his mark. Ottley has noticed the two first in his "Inquiry," pp. 461 and 462.

The Sacrifice of Cain and Abel. H. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in. B. M.
The Death of Abel. H. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ in., W. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ in. B. M. Formerly in Mr. Lloyd's collection.

St. Jerome kneeling before a Crucifix.

Jupiter and Leda. B. M.

The Virgin and Child attended by St. Sebastian and the Magdalene. B. M.

A Riposo in Egypt. B. M. Formerly in the Duke of Buckingham's Collection.]

ROBINS, WILLIAM, an English engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1730, by whom we have a few portraits; among others, that of William Warren, LL.D.; after Heims.

ROBINSON, R. The name of this artist is affixed to some portraits in mezzotint, among which are the following:

Charles I.; after Vandyck.

Charles II.

James II.

Thomas White, Bishop of Peterborough.

Sir James Worsley, Knight.

ROBINSON, ———. This artist was born at Bath about the year 1715. He came to London when he was young, where he became a scholar of John Vanderbank, under whose tuition he made considerable proficiency, and was afterwards distinguished himself as a portrait painter. He succeeded Jervas in his house in Cleveland Court, and suddenly came into extensive employment though his colouring was faint and feeble. He affected to dress all his pictures in Vandyck's habits, but this was the only resemblance his works bore to those of that great painter. He died in 1745.

[ROBSON, GEORGE FENNEL, a very eminent landscape painter in water-colours, a native of Durham, and son of a wine merchant of that city, was born in 1790. His taste for drawing displayed itself at a very early age, and Bewick's book of Quadrupeds, then lately published, became, after nature, the favourite object of his notice. It seems that he never received any regular instruction in the rules of art, but that all his knowledge of it was derived from observing the proceedings of artists who came down to Durham for the purpose of sketching the beautiful scenery in its vicinity. When one of these made his appearance, he was sure to find himself attended by a ruddy-faced boy, who hung upon his path, and before he had made much progress the little fellow was creeping up to his side with a look of intense interest to observe the magical effect of his pencil. By degrees he mustered courage to show his own attempts to these mighty magicians, and being kindly received by several, the effect of their advice was soon visible. Such kindness should not be forgotten; and Robson in after life, when his reputation was established, referred with gratitude to the encouragement his very early attempts had received from Mr. William Daniell, the academician, and Mr. Cotman, of Norwich. At the age of sixteen, with only five pounds in money, he left his father's house, never more to return, and travelled to London. Here he made drawings, which he exposed in the shop window of a carver and gilder, and sold for small sums. By these means he not only supported himself for twelve months, but was enabled to return the five pounds he had received from his father. He now resolved on publishing a view of his native city, and was encouraged by a large list of subscribers; the funds derived from this speculation enabled him to visit the Highlands of Scotland. That he might enter into the romance of the country, he dressed himself as a shepherd, and with his wallet at his back, and Scott's Lay of the last Minstrel in his pocket, he wandered over the mountains at all hours and in all seasons. He left many reminiscences of the beautiful scenery of Loch Katrine and its vicinity. Though especially inspired by the grandeur of the Highlands, he did not confine himself to Scotland, but visited Durham, the Lakes of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and made himself familiar with North Wales, and crossed over to Ireland to depict the beauties of Killarney. He had the good sense and fine taste to perceive that the British Isles could supply the finest subjects that could be desired by the most romantic painter. His success with the public was commensurate with his talent and industry, and though his productions were numerous, they never lacked purchasers. He was a constant exhibiter at the Water-colour Society's rooms in Pall Mall East, which, indeed, may be deemed, if not of his creation, a society fostered and supported by his exertions till it attained strength and stability. On one occasion he contributed no fewer than thirty-eight pieces; yet, so highly are his productions esteemed, it would be difficult to obtain, even at the present time, when so much talent is shown in the same department, a specimen of his drawings, at almost any price. Some of his mountainous scenes are enlivened with animals by Hills, especially with Deer, in which that artist particularly excelled. His works are remarkable for vigour of execution, and powerful in colour and effect. The Scottish hills had strongly impressed their awful character on his imagination; and the calmness of his own mind associated itself with these scenes of peace and loneliness even when settled altogether in the south, and drawing his materials from objects around him. He could, however, depict the busy haunts of men with equal felicity. His View of London, from the Bridge, before Sunrise; The City of Durham from the North-east; and several other picturesque representations of English cities, some of which were executed for Mr. J. Britton, and engraved under his direction, were objects of great admiration. In addition to the view of his native city, he published his scenes of the Grampian Hills, having visited every lake and vale through the whole extent. Many amusing anecdotes might be related of occurrences that took place during his tours in search of the picturesque, and many respectable names recorded of those with whom he formed friendship by casual encounters in secluded spots; but these, perhaps, would be deemed out of place in a work that only takes cognizance of him as an artist, and it only remains to notice the premature termination of his valuable labours. At the latter end of August he embarked in excellent health and spirits on board the James Watt steam-boat, to visit his friends in the north, and was landed at Stockton-on-Tees on the 31st, extremely ill, and died on the 8th of September, 1833. It is remarkable that seven of the passengers in the steam-boat were also attacked with inflammation of the stomach; but as, on a chemical analysis, nothing deleterious was discovered, the cause must be left to conjecture: the artist's dying words were, "I am poisoned." His death caused a great sensation, not only among the artists, by whom he was greatly beloved, but the public in general.]

ROBUSTI. See TINTORETTO.

ROCHERS, STEPHEN DES, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1710. He imitated the style of P. Drevet, and was probably his pupil. Among other prints, he engraved a numerous set of small portraits of illustrious personages. They are but indifferently executed.

ROCHFORD, P. DE. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1720. He engraved several of the plates for the large folio collection of Views of the Palace and Gardens of Versailles, published by P. Menant. He also engraved some prints from the pictures of John Baptist Santerre, and other painters. He resided some time in Portugal, where he died.

ROCHIENNE, P. [PIERRE,] a French engraver on wood, who, according to Papillon, flourished about the year 1551. In conjunction with J. Ferlato, he executed a set of wooden cuts for the New Testament, in Latin, published in 1551. They are said to be very indifferent performances. [He also engraved some of the cuts for the Golden Legend, (Legende dorée), published in 1557.]

ROCQUE, J. This artist was probably a native of France, but he chiefly resided in England, where he engraved some plates of landscapes and views, from his own designs. Among others, we have by him two large plates representing views of Wanstead House, in Essex.

RODE, CHRISTIAN BERNARD, was born at Berlin in 1725, and having learned the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went to Paris, where he studied some time under Charles Vanloo and John Restout. He afterwards travelled to Italy, and on his return to Berlin met with very flattering encouragement as a painter of history and portraits. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches at Berlin, and the other towns in Prussia, and was employed by the king in embellishing the palace of Sans Souci. This ingenious artist has etched a great number of plates from his own designs; several of them are after the pictures he painted for the public edifices. The following are among his principal works:

His Portrait; engraved by himself; after Reclam.
Christ, with the Disciples, at Emmaus.

The Descent of the Holy Ghost.

The Ascension; from his picture in the church at Rostock.

St. Paul preaching.

Christ in the Garden of Olives; from the picture in the church of St. Mary at Berlin.

Joseph discovering himself to his Brethren.

[Of the works of this artist, who died in 1797, the inquirer will find an ample list in Nagler, sufficient, indeed, to fill an ordinary catalogue.]

RODE, JOHN HENRY, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Berlin in 1727. He was brought up to the profession of a goldsmith, but abandoned that pursuit to devote himself to engraving. Having executed some plates at Berlin with considerable success, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of John George Wille. During his residence in that city, he engraved a few plates in the finished style of his instructor, and on his return to Berlin published several prints from the designs of his brother. He had acquired a very flattering reputation, when his career was interrupted by his premature death, in 1759. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

A Head of Epicurus; after J. M. Preissler.

Jacob wrestling with the Angel; after C. B. Rode.

An Ecce Homo; after the same.

A Sacrifice of the Vestals; after the same.

[See Nagler, for a full detail of his works.]

[RODRIGUEZ, FRATE ADRIAN, properly ADRIAN DIERIX, of the order of the Jesuits, was born at Antwerp in 1618, and died in 1669. He painted what is called history, but little of his own is recorded. It appears that he went to Spain when he was about thirty, and entered the imperial college at Madrid, where he professed himself of the order of the Jesuits, and changed his name from Dierix or Dierex to that of Rodriguez, for the sake of euphony. He painted in the Flemish manner, and the few pictures that are mentioned as by him, are, Abraham entertaining the three Angels, the Marriage at Cana, the Holy Family, Christ at Emmaus, and the Banquet at the house of the Pharisee, with the Magdalene anointing Christ.]

ROELAS, JUAN DE LAS. This Spanish artist is called el Doctor Pablo de las Roelas, by Palomino, though Francesco Pacheco, who was his contemporary, denominated him Juan. He was descended from a noble family, originally of Flanders, was born at Seville in 1560, and was brought up to the profession of physie, in which he had already taken a degree, when an inclination for the art of painting, which he had discovered in the early part of his life, induced him to devote himself to the study of it, and he travelled to Italy for the purpose of improvement. He went to Venice, where he studied some years. Palomino states him to have been a disciple of Titian, but that cannot be correct, as

Titian died in 1576, when our artist was only sixteen years of age. It is more probable that he received his instruction from a disciple of that great master. On his return to Seville, he was much employed in ornamenting the churches in that city, where there are many pictures by him, which are compared by his biographer to the works of Palma or Tintoretto. To a rich and harmonious colouring, which he had acquired in the Venetian school, he added a correct design, a perfect acquaintance with the anatomy of the human figure, and his compositions are ingenious and abundant. One of his most admired works is the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, in the Colegio de Santo Thomas. According to Palomino, he died at Seville in 1620. [Roelas is known by the styles of el Clerigo Roelas, and el Licenciado Juan. He went as a canon to Olivares in 1624, but whether he ever practised as a physician is not said. Probably he was styled Licentiate, as having graduated at the university of Seville. His pictures are very numerous in Seville. His masterpiece is the Death of St. Isidore, in the church of that Saint; another fine picture by him is the Sant Jago, in the Capilla de Santiago, in the cathedral, in which the saint is represented riding over the Moors. Bermudez says it is full of fire, majesty, and decorum. Mr. Ford, however, says it is surpassed by the picture of the Conception, in the Academy, and by three in the chapel of the university at Seville. He has been compared with Tintoretto and Caracci, and is certainly the best of the Andalusian painters. It is a subject of regret that none of his fine works has been engraved, as he excelled in design and composition, and displays a grandeur of form and character which belong only to the greatest masters. In colouring he may also be compared with the Venetians. He died at Olivares in 1625, on the 23rd of April.]

RODERMONT, or ROTTERMONDT. This artist is called Rotermans in the Anecdotes. He was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1640. From the style of his etching, he appears to have been a painter, and has imitated the style of Rembrandt with great success. He engraved a few portraits, which are now become scarce, among which are,

Sir William Waller, Serjeant Major-general to the Parliament, with a Battle in the hack-ground; after C. Jansen.

Joannes Secundus, a Latin Poet of the Hague; Rodermont, fecit.

[Bartsch and Claussin, in their Catalogues of Rembrandt's prints, have noted several by this artist, distinguishing them, however, from the works of that great master.]

RÖEPEL, CONRADE, [OR KOENRAAD,] an eminent Dutch painter of flowers and fruit, born at the Hague in 1679. He was placed for some time under the care of Constantine Netscher, with the intention of studying portrait painting; but the delicacy of his constitution made it necessary for him to quit the Hague, and to reside at a country-house of his father's, where he amused himself in cultivating the choicest flowers. This occupation led him to an attempt to imitate in painting the beautiful objects of his care, and his success surpassed his expectation. He sent one of his earliest performances to the Hague, where it was readily purchased by one of the most celebrated florists of the place, who afterwards supplied him with the most curious productions of his garden, from which Rœpel painted pictures which were highly esteemed. In 1716, he was invited to the court of the Elector Palatine, at Dusseldorp, where he was received with every mark of favour and distinction. He painted some fruit and flower pieces for that prince, for which he was liberally remunerated, and was decorated with a gold chain and medal. On the death of his patron he returned to the Hague, where he found his reputation increased by the flattering reception he had met with at the Palatine court. He painted some pictures for Prince William of Hesse, and the families of Fagel and Lormier for some time employed his pencil. In 1718 he was received into the Society of Painters at the Hague, of which he was the director at the time of his death, in 1748. Although the works of C. Rœpel are neatly finished, they must still be allowed to be very inferior to the admirable productions of John van Huysum and Rachel Ruysch.

[ROER, JACOB VANDER, was born at Dort in 1648; he studied portrait painting under Jan de Baan, and practised for some time in England, during the reign of Charles II. It is not known how long he remained in this country, but he died at his native place in 1699.]

ROESTRAETEN, PETER. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1627, and was brought up under Francis Hals, whose daughter he married, and whose style he followed in portrait painting for some time with success in Holland, when the reputation and good fortune Sir Peter Lely had met with in England, induced him to visit this country, in the reign of Charles II. He was received by Lely with great kindness on his arrival, who introduced him to the king; but it does not appear that he met with much encouragement at court, as none of his pictures are to be found in the palaces, or in the royal catalogue.

Descamps, in his Lives of the Dutch Painters, gives a very improbable account of Sir Peter Lely's jealousy of the talents of Roestraeten in portrait painting; and of his having, in consequence of it, proposed to him a partition of the art; portraits were to be monopolized by Lely, and Roestraeten was to be put into possession of all other branches, whose works were to be vaunted by Lely. It is not very likely that an artist should thus relinquish that very department of his profession, in which, such a proposal told him, he was the most capable of excelling. It is more consistent with probability, that Roestraeten, doubting of success, from the superior ability and established celebrity of Sir Peter, renounced portrait painting, and had recourse to another branch of the art, in which he previously distinguished himself in his native country. He painted with great success vases of gold and silver, bas-reliefs, musical instruments, &c., which he designed with precision, and his pictures were well coloured, and touched both with delicacy and freedom. His works rose into general estimation, and he was extensively employed by the nobility and gentry of his time. In what particular year he visited England is not ascertained; but he must have resided here many years, as he met with an accident at the fire of London, and was lame for the rest of his life. He died in London in 1698. [Balkema calls him Nicolas; Immerzeel omits his baptismal name.]

ROETTIERS, FRANCIS. This artist was born at Paris in 1702. His family was originally of Antwerp, and had for many years held the situation of medallist to the mint, in France. He was probably a scholar of Nicholas de Largilliere, from whose designs he has etched the following two plates, executed with great spirit and effect:

Christ bearing his Cross.

The Crucifixion. [Both large prints, with numerous figures.

There are a few others by him, but of no importance. He died in 1770.]

ROGEL, JOHN. According to Professor Christ, this artist was an engraver on wood, and resided at Augsburg about the year 1567, but he has not specified any of his prints.

ROGER OF BRUGES. This old painter was born at Bruges about the year 1390, and was a disciple of John van Eyck at the time of the invention of oil painting by that master. He painted on a larger scale than Van Eyck, and his figures were well designed for the early period at which he lived. Van Mander mentions some pictures by this master which were preserved at Bruges in 1604.

[Roger Schabol, known as Rogier, or Roger, de Bruges, Rudiger, Ruggieri, Il Maestro Rogel, Rogerius Gallicus, and other appellations, was esteemed the best disciple of Jan Van Eyck. Of the time of his birth nothing certain is known. It is supposed that he was a native of Bruges; and it is probable that he resided there till after the death of Van Eyck. Whatever he may have done during the life of his instructor, his fame rests on what he accomplished from about 1430 to 1462; and it is in that space that his history, as a painter, should be sought for. It is pretty clearly shown by facts, and incidental relations, that much of that time was spent by him in Italy. The names given to him by Italian writers, indicate their application to a foreigner, with whose works they were familiar; as Ruggieri da Bruggia, Il Maestro Rogel, Rogerius Gallicus, &c. There is no account of the cause that induced him to visit Italy; but after the death of Jan Van Eyck, which occurred between 1420 and 1430, he might deem it advantageous to himself to carry the knowledge of what he saw so much coveted, that of painting in oil, of which he was the sole depository, to places where he would receive honour and pecuniary reward. But his ability must have been already known in Italy, for it is now beyond all doubt that he executed for Pope Martin V., who died in 1431, the renowned Oratory, or portable altar-piece in three compartments, which was presented by the pope to King John II. of Castile, and by him, in 1445, to the Carthusian monastery at Miraflores, near Burgos. This altar-piece was afterwards obtained by the Emperor Charles V., who carried it with him in all his expeditions, and used it in his private devotions: it is now the property of the king of Holland. It has been noticed, in the account of Hans Hemling, that it was seen at the residence of the emperor by Albert Durer, when he visited Bruges in 1520; for in his journal he says, "I saw the Chapel painted by Rudiger," showing that he knew of it before by report. It is more likely that Rogier communicated the knowledge of painting in oil to the Italians, than that Antonella di Messina obtained it from Jan Van Eyck. The whole story of Antonella's journey to Flanders appears to be fabulous. It is on record, that in 1449 Lionello d'Este, Marquis of Ferrara, had a triptique by him; on the left wing was painted the Expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise, on the right, the Adoration of the Kings, and in the centre, the Deposition of Christ from the Cross. There is also mention made of other pictures by him, existing in the palace of Alfonso, king of Naples. That he was at Rome in the year of the jubilee 1450, is ascertained; and all the pictures enumerated by Facius were in Italy in the year 1456, the year in which Facius published his book De Viribus illustris, wherein the artist is designated Rogerius Gallicus, Joannis discipulus et contreraneus, &c. (disciple and countryman of Jan Van Eyck). It is also conjectured that later in life he was at Venice, as there was a picture of St. Jerome and two other saints in the Casa Nani, on which was inscribed, in Roman characters, SUMUS ROGERII MANUS; in the house of a Messer Zuanne Ram, the artist's own portrait in oil, painted from a glass in 1462; and in the same city, in the collection of Messer Gabriel Vendramini, a picture of the Virgin with the Infant in her arms, and a crown on her head, standing in a temple of Flemish architecture. It does not appear, from the older writers, that he ever returned to the place of his nativity, and the time of his death is left as uncertain by them as that of his birth. Whether Rogier de Bruges and Rogier de Bruxelles be identical, or two painters flourishing at the same period, it is difficult to determine; Michiels, and other modern writers, maintain that they are identical, and the probability is in their favour, if certain facts can be established as equally applicable to Rogier Schabol de Bruges, and to Rogier Vander Weyde of Bruxelles. In the article VANDER WEYDE, there will be occasion to say something more on the subject.]

ROGER OF BRUSSELS. See VANDER WEYDE.

ROGERS, WILLIAM, an old English engraver, born in London about the year 1545. It has not been ascertained from whom he learned the art of engraving, but he worked with the graver in a neat, stiff style. He engraved a few portraits, and several frontispieces, and other ornaments of books. He is considered one of the earliest of the English engravers who practised the art in a general way. He usually marked his plates with the cipher WR.

We have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth; a small upright plate.

Henry IV. of France; a whole length.

The Earl of Essex, Earl Marshal of England.

The Earl of Cumberland.

Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk.

Sir John Harrington; the title is his Orlando Furioso.

Thomas Moffat; a frontispiece to his Theatre of Insects.

John Gerarde, Surgeon; frontispiece to his Herbal.

[ROGIER, NICOLAUS, called also KAYNOOT RUGIERO, a Flemish landscape painter, who flourished from 1520 to about 1540. He is noticed as having painted in the style of Joachim Patenier. His works are very little known; and there are no particulars respecting him.]

[ROGHMAN, H. L. MR., and P. H. ROGHMAN, supposed to be identical. There are no particulars respecting these names, except what is gleaned from two or three engraved portraits. The first name appears to a portrait of M. Barent Jansz, æt. 53, 1627, H. L. Roghman sculpsit, the H. L. and R. form a cipher; the second to a portrait of A. I. Roscius in an oval, signed P. H. Roghman, sculpsit. His name appears also to a print after Rubens, and to a portrait of Erasmus.]

ROGMAN, or ROGHMAN, ROLAND, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1597. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he was an eminent painter of landscapes. His pictures usually represent views in Holland, and the borders of Germany, which exhibit a close attention to nature in the forms, though his colouring is dark and disagreeable. We have several etchings by this artist of landscapes and views in Holland, executed in a bold and masterly style; and Peter Nolpe has engraved six plates of landscapes after this painter.

[The landscapes of Roeland Roghman have a strong resemblance to those of Rembrandt, with whom he was on terms of intimacy; but are much coarser in the penciling, and less scientific in the management of the chiaro-scuro. Time has, no doubt, added much to their blackness, and rendered them gloomy and heavy. These faults, however, have preserved to the real painter the proprietorship; for, after all attempts, the knavish part of the dealers have only been able to make a bad Rembrandt out of a picture that might have been formerly a good Roghman. His drawings with the pen are very free and spirited, and prove that he was an artist of talent. His etchings represent views of chateaux and edifices in ruins; they are graved with the point in a rapid and somewhat negligent manner. Several of the plates, where the aquafortis has not succeeded in the first instance, have been subjected to a second process, and these appear scratchy and crude. His prints consist of thirty-three pieces; and there are six more published by Peter Nolpe with the title of "Views of the Wood at the Hague," but which are not by him in that state, but only after his designs, or his etchings retouched and finished with the graver by Peter Nolpe himself. This belief is strengthened by there being two other sets of proofs of these subjects, one of which is marked R. Roghman fecit et excudit, and the other has the double address of N. Visscher and of P. Schenk. The first, marked R. Roghman fecit et excudit, are the etchings as Roghman published them himself; the second are those retouched and published by Nolpe; the third have the double address of N. Visscher and of P. Schenk. For descriptions of the whole, see Bartsch, P. G. tom. iv.; and Weigel's Supplement, for an account of the print of the mutilated bodies of the two De Witts. It is supposed that Roghman died in his 88th year, in the Old Man's House at Amsterdam. GERTRUDE ROGHMAN, whom Nagler calls his daughter, also engraved after him. Bartsch has described Le Chateau de Zuylen, engraved by her after her father's design. It is a very remarkable print, in the manner of Herman Saffleven, and is rare. Weigel controverts this, and says it is rather in the manner of P. Nolpe. Nagler describes about twenty more. There are no other particulars respecting her.]

ROKERZ, HENDRICK, an obscure Dutch engraver, by whom we have a few portraits, very indifferently executed; among which is that of William Henry, Prince of Orange, on horseback; after P. Jansse.

ROKES, HENRY. See SORGH.

ROLL, GIUSEPPE. This artist was born at Bologna in 1654, and was a scholar of Domenico Maria Canuti. There are several of his fresco works in the churches of his native city. We have some etchings by him after the principal Bolognese painters, among which are the following:

Charity; after Lodovico Caracci.
A Sybil; after Lorenzo Passignelli.

[The name which appears on this engraver's prints is Joseffo; or G. Rolli, but Zani and Bartsch call him Giuseppe Maria Roli, or Rolli. Zani says he was born in 1652, and Bartsch says in 1645; they agree that he died in 1727. Bartsch, P. G. tom. xix., describes six prints by him, and one cited by Gori; to which Nagler adds another, the title-piece to a drawing-book after Guercino. Lanzi notices Antonio Roli, or Rolli, a pupil of Colonna, born in 1643, and died in 1696, whose works in architectural decorations Cavaliere Titi extols as miracles of art. Zani calls him the brother of Giuseppe.]

[ROLLO, ———, a painter of whose history nothing is known, except that the name appears on a picture, Ecce Homo, painted in the manner of Guido, and so beautiful that it may be mistaken for the work of that master. The signature is Rollo Gallois, F. Probably he was of French origin.]

ROLLOS, PETER, a German engraver, who resided at Frankfort about the year 1620. He engraved the frontispiece to a book of Emblems, by G. de Montenay, published in that city in 1619. He executed a few other book plates, in a very indifferently style. He sometimes signed his prints P. ROL. F. [He resided at Berlin also; for there are books published at both places, of a later date than that mentioned, with his name to the plates.]

[ROMAIN, ——— DE LA RUE, painted landscapes in the manner of Jan Asselyn, Swaneveldt, and Both, for which it is said he had a remarkable talent. There is no account of him, but excellent pictures by him occasionally appear, and pass for the work of one or other of those masters. He must not be confounded with William Romeyn, the landscape and cattle painter.]

ROMAN, BARTOLOME, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1598. He was first a scholar of Vincenzo Carducci, but finished his education in the school of Velasquez. He was an eminent painter of history, and executed several considerable works for the church of the Franciscans at Alcalá de Henares. In the sacristy of the Padres Cayetano, at Madrid, there are some pictures by him, which his biographer, Palomino, in point of colouring and effect, compares to Rubens. He died at Madrid in 1659. [Bermudez places his birth in 1596. He praises him highly, particularly for his manner of drapery in his figures, in which, he says, few of the older masters equalled him. He was conscious of his talents, but very modest withal, and expected that others should seek to employ him rather than that he should solicit employment. For this reason his works are extremely rare.]

ROMANELLI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Viterbo in 1617. Having shown an early inclination for the art, his father sent him to Rome, where he had the good fortune of being taken under the protection of Cardinal Barberini, by whom he was placed in the school of Pietro da Cortona. His indefatigable application to his studies under that master, rendered him in a few years one of the most promising young artists at Rome; and he was instructed by his master to finish, during his absence in Lombardy, some paintings he had commenced in the Palazzo Barberini. On leaving the school of P. da Cortona, he altered his style, and adopted one distinguished by more elegance in his forms, though less grand and splendid than that of Cortona. He painted a picture of the Deposition from the Cross, for the church of S. Ambrogio, which was so much applauded, that Pietro, alarmed at his rising reputation, painted in competition with it, his celebrated picture of the Stoning of Stephen, in which even Bernini admitted the superiority over that of his scholar. He painted for the church of St. Peter the Presentation in the Temple, which has been executed in mosaic, and the original placed at the Certosa. On the death of Urban VIII., and the succession of Innocent to the papal chair, Cardinal Barberini was under the necessity of quitting Rome, and taking refuge at Paris, where he recommended the talents of Romanelli to Cardinal Mazarine, for some decorations which he projected in his palace. On his arrival at Paris, he was introduced by the minister to Louis XIV., who engaged him to decorate the apartments in the Old Louvre, called the Queen's Baths, where he painted a series of pictures, representing subjects of the Æneid. These, and other works, executed during his residence in France, were munificently rewarded by the king, who conferred on him the order of St. Michael. On his return to Rome he was employed in several important works, and was preparing for a second journey to France, when he died at Viterbo in 1662. [The large copy of Guido's Triumph of Bacchus at Hampton Court is by Romanelli.]

ROMANELLI, URBANO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Viterbo about the year 1644, and was instructed in the art by his father. After the death of Giovanni Francesco Romanelli, he became a disciple of Ciro Ferri. There are some of his works in the churches at Velletri and Viterbo, particularly a picture of S. Lorenzo, in the church dedicated to that saint in the latter city, which is spoken of by Lanzi in favourable terms. He died young, in the year 1682. [Zani places his birth in 1652.]

ROMANET, ANTHONY, a French engraver, born at Paris, in 1748. He was a pupil of J. G. Wille, and afterwards resided at Basle, where he engraved several plates under the direction of Christian de Mechel. We have by him several portraits and subjects after various masters, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Charles Theodore, Elector of Bavaria; after P. Battoni.
Louis Francis de Bourbon, Prince of Conti; after Le Tellier.

John Grimoux, Painter; after a picture by himself.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Death of Adonis; after Kupetzky.
The Village Printseller; after Seekatz.
The Ballad-singer; after the same.

[He was one of the engravers employed on the plates in the Galerie du Palais Royal, the Galerie d'Orleans, the Cabinet Le Brun, Picturesque Views in Switzerland, and other works of a like kind. He also engraved many detached pieces after Italian, Dutch, and French painters. He died in 1807. His names were Antoine-Louis Romanet.]

ROMANINO, or ROMANO, GIROLAMO. This painter was born at Brescia about the year 1504. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he selected the works of Titian as the models of his imitation; and in many of his pictures, in the churches at Brescia, he has approached the admirable style of that great painter. He was a contemporary and competitor of Alessandro Bonvicino, called Il Moretto; and though Vasari considers him inferior to that painter, Ridolfi regards him as at least his equal, if he did not excel him. It is observed by Lanzi, that he surpassed him in the extent of his genius and the boldness of his execution, though he is inferior to Il Moretto in the tasteful turn of his figures, and in the expression of his heads. His principal works are at Brescia and Verona. In the latter city are four pictures in the church of S. Giorgio, representing the Life and Martyrdom of that Saint, which are composed with surprising spirit and vigour. The same fecundity of invention, with a more select choice of forms, are evident in his picture of St. Apollonio administering the Sacrament, in the church of S. Maria in Calcaria, at Brescia; a grand and impressive composition, in which every thing surprises and charms. Less copious, though not less perfect, is his Deposition from the Cross, in the church of SS. Faustino e Giovita, in which, more than any other of his works, he reminds us of the great style of Titian. He died in 1566. [Lanzi says he died in advanced age, before 1566. He signed his pictures Hieronimi Rumanii, Hier. Roman, and Hieronimus Rumanus.]

ROMANO, GIULIO. The family name of this great artist was Pippi, but he is universally known by the appellation of Giulio Romano. He was born at Rome in 1492, and having discovered a marked disposition for the art, he had the good fortune of being placed in the school of Raffaello, of whom he became the most distinguished disciple. He was instructed by that illustrious painter with the execution of some of his most important designs, which he accomplished so entirely to the satisfaction of his master, that he appointed him his co-heir, with Giovanni Francesco Penni, called Il Fattore, and recommended to him the completion of his unfinished works, in case he should survive him. During the life of Raffaello, he contented himself with contributing, by the exercise of his talents, to the advancement of the great and extensive undertakings which his instructor was engaged in; and it was not till after the death of his master, that he attempted any thing of himself. It was then that his faculties had an opportunity of developing themselves, when he displayed an elevated mind, a poetic genius, unusual grandeur of conception, and a correct, though occasionally an extravagant design. He evinced more fire than Raffaello, or rather, he was not afraid of delivering himself up to a rash and dangerous impetuosity, which did not permit him to study and respect the truth and correctness of nature. His contours, harsh and severe, were divested of those graces which were the inseparable companions of the pencil of his preceptor, and his colouring was cold, crude, and unharmonious. These defects were, however, in a great measure counterbalanced by the extraordinary fecundity of his imagination, and his learned acquaintance with history and the fable. After the death of Raffaello, he was employed by Leo X. and Clement VII. in conjunction with Il Fattore, to finish the history of Constantine, in the Vatican, and executed several considerable works for the public edifices at Rome. For the church of La Trinità de Monti, he painted a fine picture of Christ appearing to Magdalene; and the Marriage of St. Catherine, for S. Andrea della Valle. It was about this time that he painted his celebrated picture of the Stoning of Stephen, for the church of S. Stefano, at Genoa, which, for the grandeur of the composition, and the pathetic expression of the martyred saint, is regarded as one of the most admirable productions of the art.

Giulio Romano had also distinguished himself at Rome as an architect; and the Conte Baldassare Castiglione, the ambassador of Federigo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, at the papal court, invited him to visit Mantua, where he was immediately employed by the Duke, in rebuilding the Palazzo del T, and embellishing it with his designs, which is regarded as the great monument of his fame, both as an architect and a painter. In this immense work, he was assisted by his disciples, Francesco Primaticcio, Rinaldo Montouano, and Benedetto Pagni. Following the example of Raffaele, he prepared the cartoons, which were executed by his pupils, and the whole was finally retouched by himself. In this prodigious undertaking, his transcendent abilities are particularly conspicuous in the two great saloons; in one of which he has represented the Fall of the Giants; and in the other, the History of Cupid and Psyche. In the former, he appears to have emulated the colossal powers of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, and to have soared to the utmost stretch of pictorial daring. After accomplishing his great works in the Palazzo del T, he was employed in ornamenting the Ducal palace at Mantua, where he painted in fresco the History of the Trojan War. In these magnificent works he has displayed every thing that the most capacious powers of invention and the most extensive resources of poetic fancy could produce. Sometimes, like Homer, he surprises by the heroic sublimity of his feats of arms; at others, like Anacreon, he captivates by his seductive representations of festivity and love. On the death of San Gallo, the architect of St. Peters, Giulio Romano was appointed to succeed him, and was preparing to return to Rome to enter on his office, when he died at Mantua, in 1546. He left a son, RAFFAELLE PIPPI, whom he had instructed in the art, and who possessed promising talents, but died at the age of 30, in 1560.

["Ambitiously desirous of uniting the varied beauties of art, Giulio Romano sought to support his poetic fulness of imagination, and his power over design, composition, and expression, by the beauties of colouring and forcible chiaro-scuro. He might perhaps have been led to this attempt by the success of Sebastian del Pombo, who, in painting the designs of Michael Angelo, had introduced Venetian colouring to Rome, and added it to Florentine expression; not, however, with the truth of Titian, or without manners adverse to natural principles. But his is not the excess to which it was carried by Giulio Romano, in whose hands it not unfrequently became caricatured. Day and night are commixed in his effects; lights and darks are arranged at will, and often in total violation of the principles of nature. Colours are heaped together of the most vivid hues, such as sunshine or the prism only can produce, accompanied by shades of deeper colour, or of the blackest night; whilst the lights and shadows are frequently interrupted in their course, without any possibility of assigning a reasonable cause. Its brilliancy and vigour have acquired for it too much applause from that portion of the world which has given its attention to pictures. Its great defects have been overlooked because of the beauties and the power of imagination united with them, but which in reality they obscure or deform." These are the just remarks of the late professor of painting, Thomas Phillips, on that vicious style, which he denounces as "an evil art founded on art, and at variance with nature." We would willingly consign to oblivion that dereliction of Giulio in designing the series of lascivious prints engraved by Marc Antonio, called The Postures, and to which the infamous Aretino, who probably suggested the subjects, appended sonnets more revolting, if possible; but unfortunately some of them exist, a stain on his moral character, the greater for having prostituted Heaven's gift of genius for the gratification of debasing sensuality. It is the duty of every writer on art to condemn such immoralities, in order to deter other gifted painters, like Giulio Romano, from sinning in their graves.]

ROMBORGH ———, a painter of Nimeguen, who was living at the commencement of the last century. He studied landscape painting at Rome, but chiefly in the works of the old masters. In his style of painting he resembles Frederic Moucheron.]

ROMBOUTS, THEODORE. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1597, and was a scholar of Abraham Janssens, under whom he studied until he was twenty years of age. In 1617 he travelled to Italy, and it was not long before his talents distinguished him as one of the most promising young artists at Rome. His works were sufficiently esteemed to secure him constant occupation; and after a residence of a few years in the capital of art, he had arrived at sufficient celebrity to be invited to visit Florence by the Grand Duke, who employed him in some considerable works for the Ducal Palace. After an absence of eight years, he returned to Antwerp, whither the reputation he had acquired in Italy had preceded him, and he painted some pictures for the churches, which excited such general admiration, that his vanity led him to believe that his abilities were equal, if not superior, to those of Rubens; who was at that time in full possession of his wonderful powers, and of the public estimation. This self-sufficiency, however to be condemned in some respects, was to him an incitement to more arduous exertions. The ambition of vanquishing so formidable an opponent inspired him with the most elevated ideas, and his happiest productions were those conceived and executed under the feelings of rivalry and competition. Although incapable of combating with so gigantic an antagonist, Rombouts retired from the field without disgrace. He possessed a ready invention, a fine style of design, an animated expression, a warm and brilliant colouring, and an uncommon facility of touch. He occasionally relaxed his mind from the severity of historical studies, by painting concerts, gallant assemblies, and merry-makings, which he executed with taste and ingenuity. Of his historical works, the most remarkable are the following: The taking down from the Cross, in the cathedral at Ghent; St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, and the Angel appearing to Joseph in his Dream, in the church of the Recolets; and Themis, with the Attributes of Justice, in the town-house. He died at Antwerp in 1637. [Others maintain that he died in 1640, at the age of 43.]

ROMEGLIALLO, GIOVANNI PIETRO. This artist was born at Morbegno, in the Valteline, in 1739, and learned the rudiments of the art from G. F. Cotta, an obscure painter of his native city, but afterwards went to Rome, where he became a scholar of Agostino Masucci. He was much occupied at Rome in copying the works of Guercino, Guido, and P. da Cortona, to which he was more indebted than to the instruction of his preceptor, for the tasteful style and expressive character, by which his works are distinguished. His principal pictures are in the public places and private collections at Como, and in the different churches of the Valteline.

ROMEO, DON JOSEF, a Spanish painter, born at Cervera, in the kingdom of Arragon, in 1701. He went to Italy when he was young, and studied at Rome under Agostino Masucci. On his return to Spain he resided for some time at Barcelona, where he painted some pictures for the church of the Merce-narios Calzados. He afterwards visited Madrid, where he was taken into the service of Philip V. He died at Madrid in 1772.

ROMEYN, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch painter of landscapes, with cattle and figures. W. Romeyn has escaped the notice of all the writers on art, although his pictures are frequently met with, and possess sufficient merit to find a place in some of the choicest collections. His style of painting is so much in the manner of Karel du Jardin, that it is probable that he was a disciple of that master. [He was contemporary with Berchem, A. Vande Velde, and Karel du Jardin; his pictures blend the manners of all three, without the servility of a copyist. They are generally small, well drawn and composed, delicately penciled, chastely coloured, and harmonized by a fine distribution of the chiaroscuro. There are several of his pictures in England, but they are frequently attributed to one or other of the above-named masters. It may be added that some of his landscapes have an Italian air and a slight resemblance to Jan Both: it is probable that he had visited Italy. Füssli says he was a scholar of M. Hondekoeter, and classes him with Berchem, Jan Asselyn, and Vander Meer de jonge.]

ROMNEY, GEORGE. This eminent English painter was born at Furness, [or Beckside, near Dalton,] in Lancashire, in 1734. He was the son of a cabinet-maker, and having from his earliest years discovered a strong attachment to drawing, he was placed under the tuition of an itinerant painter, who was at that time at Kendal, in Westmoreland, with whom he did not remain longer than two years, and afterwards resided some time at York, where he met with such success, that he was encouraged to think of visiting the metropolis, where he established himself in 1762. The following year he gained the second premium of fifty guineas, offered by the Society of Artists, by a picture of the Death of General Wolfe. In 1765 he again obtained the second premium offered by the Society for an historic painting. He was, however, more employed in painting portraits than historical subjects, and his pictures were esteemed inferior to those of few artists of his time. He soon afterwards travelled to Italy, in company with Ozias Humphrey, the celebrated miniature painter. His studies at Rome were pursued with the most persevering assiduity, and the great productions of art with which he was surrounded, were so much the objects of his delight and admiration, that it was for some time his intention to devote himself entirely to historical painting. He returned to England in 1775, and established himself in Cavendish Square, where the taste of the public, the persuasion of friends, and the resistless enticement of emolument, effectually effaced the impression stamped on his mind by the beauties of Michael Angelo and Raffaele. He now became one of the most popular and most employed portrait painters in London, and enjoyed a liberal portion of the public favour with Sir Joshua Reynolds and Gainsborough. After his return from the continent, Romney never exhibited, and consequently could not solicit the honours of the Royal Academy. He rather shunned than courted the intimacy of the artists of his time, though he peevishly complained of their neglect, which was more justly to be attributed to the singularity of his own temper and manners, which were unusually distant and reserved. As a portrait painter, he possessed great merit, to which the public were by no means insensible; and if his talents did not place him at the head of his profession, they enabled him to sus-tain an honourable contest with the most distinguished of his contemporaries. Of his historical or fancy subjects, perhaps the most admired was his picture of the infant Shakspeare, painted for Mr. Boydell's Gallery. After an uninterrupted success in his profession for more than twenty years, he retired from the metropolis to his native country, where he died in November, 1802.

[It has been said that Romney was fortunate in his biographers, but how far has his good fortune extended? He was praised and flattered, in prose and rhyme, by Cumberland and Hayley, but did either of them show sufficient knowledge, judgment, and impartiality to stamp value on their panegyrics? Gross as were their flatteries and encomiums, they were not sufficiently fulsome to satisfy his cravings, nor to gratify the exalted idea that his son had formed of his father's excellences and superiority. Unfortunately truth compelled them to the utterance of some unpalatable remarks; and any qualification of praise is resented as conveying a censure. The biography of the son has not given greater worth to the father's memory, though it may have exhibited an uncommon degree of filial affection towards a father whose selfish considerations had induced him to subdue all connubial and parental feeling, and to treat as nought those duties and ties of affection that are usually considered the proofs of a well-organized mind; those springs that stimulate genius, which if the painter or poet check in their action, all his attempts at pathos or sentiment become factitious, or mere dramatic embodiments. That Romney had from nature a feeling for the tender, the pathetic, and the sublime, might be supposed from the subjects he attempted to represent; but, whatever was the cause, he never could satisfactorily complete the conception under which his mind was labouring. He required a stimulus to proceed; and even the suggestions and the flatteries of Hayley were insufficient; he needed the stronger incitements of a Circe, and found them only in the meretricious blandishments of the fair Emma. This lady, Emma Lyon, more notorious under that of Lady Hamilton, a name which, while it goes down to posterity with that of Nelson, will continue to blight the hero's laurels; this lady served him as a model for his most successful poetic efforts. In her form and attitudes he represented Circe, Cassandra, Iphigenia, Calypso, Joan of Arc, Bacchantes, and Magdalenes. She was his "fancy's midwife," and the progeny was beautiful and alluring, but too often beauty debased by impurity of gesture, and alluring to the voluptuary only by salacious expression. His commencements of historical and poetic subjects were numerous, but the completions few. His selections were worthy of his pencil, but he wanted perseverance; his imagination was too volatile; he wandered in the fields of classic story; he ranged in the wide domains of Shakspeare; he found in each suitable objects for his purpose, seized them for a moment, felt paralyzed at his own temerity, and dropped them to follow some other equally vain pursuit. Twice, however, he succeeded, inspired by the name of Shakspeare and the form of the fair Emma; the infancy of the immortal bard, and the vaticination of Cassandra; a third subject, Ophelia with the flowers she had gathered in her hand, sitting on the branch of a tree, which was breaking under her, and insensible of her danger, the most pathetic of his pieces, he never finished. In works of fancy he was superior to Reynolds in every thing but colour; in portraiture, he more than equalled him for actual truth, but fell far below him in blandness of style, in the skilful modification of the fashion of the day to the purpose of picturesque effect, in seizing the predominating character, in the representation of intellectual qualities, and in blending, softening, and harmoniously arranging all the parts of the composition in complete unity. Setting aside the sycophantic flatteries of Cumberland and Hayley, and to give Romney the benefit of the opinion of a friendly and competent judge in the highest walks of art, of one who was as wise, good, and conscientious as a man as he was skilful as an artist, in his particular department, it will suffice to quote what has been said by Flaxman.—"When Romney first began to paint he had seen no gallery of pictures, nor the fine productions of ancient sculpture, but then women and children were his statues, and all objects under the cope of heaven formed his school of painting. The rainbow, the purple distance, or the silver lake, taught him colouring; the various actions and passions of the human figure, with the forms of clouds, woods, and mountains, or valleys, afforded him studies of composition. Indeed, his genius bore a strong resemblance to the scenes he was born in; like them, it partook of the grand and beautiful; and like them, also, the bright sunshine and enchanting prospects of his fancy were occasionally overspread with mist and gloom. On his arrival in Italy he was witness to new scenes of art and sources of study, of which he could only have supposed previously that something of the kind might exist; for he there contemplated the purity and perfection of ancient sculpture, the sublimity of Michael Angelo's Sistine Chapel, and the simplicity of Cimabue and Giotto's schools. He perceived those qualities distinctly, and judiciously used them in viewing and imitating nature; and thus his quick perception and unwearied application enabled him, by a two years' residence abroad, to acquire as great a proficiency in art as is usually attained by foreign studies of a much longer duration. After his return the novelty and sentiment of his original subjects were universally admired. Most of these were of the delicate class; and each had its peculiar character. Titania, with her Indian votaress, was arch and sprightly; Milton dictating to his daughters, solemn and interesting. Several pictures of wood-nymphs and bacchants charmed by their rural beauty, innocence, and simplicity. The most pathetic—Ophelia, with the flowers she had gathered in her hand, sitting on the branch of a tree, which was breaking under her, whilst the melancholy distraction visible in her lovely countenance accounts for the insensibility to her danger. Few painters have left so many examples in their works of the tender and delicate affections; and several of his pictures breathe a kindred spirit with the Sigismunda of Correggio. His Cartoons, some of which have unfortunately perished, were examples of the sublime and terrible; at that time perfectly new in English art. As Romney was gifted with peculiar powers for historical and ideal painting, so his heart and soul were engaged in the pursuit of it, whenever he could extricate himself from the importunate business of portrait painting. It was his delight by day, and his study by night; and for this his food and rest were often neglected. His compositions, like those of the ancient pictures and basso-relievos, told their story by a single group of figures in the front; while the back-ground is made the simplest possible, rejecting all unnecessary episode and trivial ornament, either of secondary groups, or architectural subdivision. In his compositions the beholder was forcibly struck by the sentiment at the first glance; the gradations and varieties of which he traced through several characters, all conceived in an elevated spirit of dignity and beauty, with a lively expression of nature in all the parts. His heads were various—the male were decided and grand; the female lovely: his figures resembled the antique—the limbs were elegant and finely formed; his drapery was well understood; either forming the figure into a mass with one or two deep folds only, or, by its adhesion and transparency, discovering the form of the figure, the lines of which were finely varied with the union or expansion of spiral or cascade folds, composing with or contrasting the outline and chiaro-scuro. Few artists, since the fifteenth century, have been able to do so much in so many different branches; for, besides his beautiful compositions and pictures, which have added to the knowledge and celebrity of the English school, he modelled like a sculptor, carved ornaments in wood with great delicacy, and could make an architectural design in a fine taste, as well as construct every part of the building."

In this high eulogium of Flaxman may be perceived the warmth of friendship, and the fine feeling of a critical knowledge of what constitutes excellence in the highest department of painting; but which of the artist's finished works, known at the present time, will justify the panegyric? It is to be apprehended that Flaxman was rather laying down the rules that a painter of historical subjects should observe, than describing what actually existed in his friend's productions. It is true, as a less partial but more strictly just critic, Allan Cunningham, has remarked, in his well-written account of Romney, that "his ideal and historical pieces are numerous; and it may be safely said that some of them are equal, in loftiness of thought, and in simplicity of conception, to any productions of that class in the British school. But it must not be concealed that his finished works of that order are few. For one finely finished there are five half done; and for five half done, there are at least a dozen merely commenced on the canvass. More seems to have been wanting than patronage; it may be suspected that the painter was deficient in that creative power which enables men of the highest rank of genius to body forth their groups in imagination, and completely fix them before the mind's eye, even as a living person sits for a portrait. He seems, at least, to have yielded too much to the impulse of the moment; he was ever ready to begin a new subject, but exceeding loth to finish an old one; and we have to lament that so many conceptions of a high order are left in the crude elements of the art." Much of this "still beginning, never ending," may be attributed to the frequent suggesting of subjects from the classics by Hayley, and others of his flatterers: Hayley was not a Count Castiglione, nor Romney a Raphael. Raphael knew what his subject required; but, in the modest estimate of his powers, would sometimes consult his accomplished friend as to the carrying out his first conception; Castiglione, on the other hand, knew Raphael's capability, and never volunteered advice until it was requested by the ingenuous artist. Romney was more likely to be embarrassed than benefited by having suggested to him such elevated themes as the Cumean Sibyl foretelling the destiny of Eneas; Electra and Orestes at the tomb of Agamemnon; Thetis supplicating Jupiter; the Ghost of Clytemnestra; Eurydice vanishing from Orpheus; Antigone with the dead body of Polynices; the Weird Sisters; and others of a like kind. It was, however, gratifying to both parties for the moment; the one showed his reading; the other inhaled the fumes of the incense that conveyed an intimation that his powers were suited to such high poetic subjects. But when it came to execution, not being the emanation of his own mind, not the offspring of artistic meditation, it became wearisome, and the painter was happy to escape from one task, to commence another, presented through the same sweet medium by his industrious purveyors, and which he presumed would be still more congenial to his sympathies, as being still more grandly daring. But, as Allan Cunningham observes, "it is not always from the finest passages in poetry, or the noblest in history, that artists form the best and most striking pictures; they are often found, on trial by the pencil, to owe their chief charm to what art can find neither form nor colour to express. Fortunately for himself and the world, Romney, in the absence of his officious poet, became sensible that he had attempted subjects beyond the reach of his department; and, laying such wild dreams aside, singled out occasionally homelier subjects, which, having affected his own fancy, and being embodied under the influence of genuine feeling, have secured a lasting and an honourable place to his name."

ROMSTEDT, CHRISTIAN, an obscure German engraver, who resided at Leipsic about the year 1670. He engraved a few portraits, which are very indifferently executed. His plates are marked with a cipher composed of a C. and an R. [It would seem that there were two engravers of this name, probably father and son, and that they operated from 1630 to 1720; the younger died in 1725. They not only engraved portraits, but some of the subjects in the Farnese Palace, after A. Caracci.]

RONCALLI, CAVALIERE CRISTOFORO, called DELLE POMARANCE. This painter was born at Pomarance, in the diocese of Volterra, in 1552, and studied at Rome under Niccolo Ciriagnani, called delle Pomarance, by whose instruction, and by studying the works of the best masters, he became an eminent painter of history. He was employed by Paul V. in the embellishment of the Capella Clementina, where he represented the Death of Ananias and Sapphira; and in the Basilica of S. John of Lateran, he painted a large picture of the Baptism of Constantine. These works were so much to the satisfaction of the Pope, that he conferred on him the order of Christ. He executed several other important works in the public edifices at Rome. In the church of S. Giovanni Decollato, is a fine picture by him representing the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth; and in S. Andrea della Valle, an altar-piece, representing St. Michael discomfiting the Evil Spirits. One of his most distinguished works is the Cupola of La Santa Casa di Loreto, in which he was employed by the protection of Cardinal Crescenzi. His works are not confined to Rome; he painted several pictures for the principal cities in Italy. At Naples, in the church of S. Filippo di Neri, is one of his admired productions, representing the Nativity. The pictures of Roncalli exhibit a mixture of the Roman with the Tuscan style of design. In his fresco works, his colouring is cheerful and brilliant; in his oil pictures, on the contrary, his tints are more serious and moderate, and are harmonized by a general tone of quiet placidity. He was fond of introducing landscape into his back-grounds, which he treated with great beauty and effect. He died at Rome in 1626.

RONDANI, FRANCESCO MARIA, was born at Parma about the year 1505, and, according to Affo, was brought up in the school of Coreggio, whom he assisted in his great work of the Dome of S. Giovanni. In the church of St. Mary Magdalene, at Parma, is a fine picture of the Virgin and infant Jesus, which has been sometimes mistaken for a work of Coreggio. His talents were, however, confined to compositions of a few figures, and he was incapable of emulating the daring strides of his illustrious instructor. One of his most considerable works is a picture representing St. Augustine and St. Jerome, in the church of the Eremitani. He died at Parma about the year 1548. [Perhaps Rondani was the only one that can in reality be called the pupil of Correggio. It was in that capacity that he assisted in painting the Dome of S. Giovanni. Pungileone makes mention of him on several occasions, as being connected with Antonio Allegri; and at the death of the latter, Rondani possessed the drawings and many of the Cartoons from which he had worked in the Cupola at Parma. Lanzi says that he had seen one of his Madonnas, with a Child, in the possession of the Marquis Scaranani, at Bologna, the figure bearing a swallow in her hand, in allusion to the painter's name; besides the portrait of a man, draped and designed in the Giorgione taste, at the house of Signior Bettinelli, in Mantua. His known works are of rare occurrence.]

RONDINELLO, NICOLÒ. This painter was born at Ravenna about the year 1460. He was a disciple and coadjutor of Giovanni Bellini, whose style he followed with success, and may be considered as the first artist of his native city who attempted to reform the stiff and Gothic style which had preceded him. He never, however, equalled the pictures painted by his instructor in his best time. His works are chiefly confined to the churches at Ravenna, in which his design, without being incorrect, is dry and formal, his heads are less expressive, and his colouring less vigorous, than in the works of his master. He died at Ravenna at the age of 60.

RONDOLINO. See TERENZIO.

RONSERAY, MARGARET LOUISA AMELIA DU. This lady was born at Paris in 1730. We have some neat and spirited etchings by her, after Bouchardon, and other French painters; among which are the following:

Venus rising from the Sea; after Bouchardon; finished with the graver by St. Aubin.

The Fountain of Grenelle, in six plates; after the same. These were afterwards finished with the graver by Tilbard and St. Aubin.

The Head of St. Paul; after the Cartoon painted by Pierre, for the church of St. Roch at Paris.

A View of the Tower of Palmerana; after Cochin.
A Sultan and Sultana; after B. Picart.

[RONTBOUT, J———, a Dutch landscape painter, whose pictures at first view have a slight resemblance to those of Hobbema, Ruysdael, and Dekker, and really possess considerable merit. They are generally of a small size, always on panel, and represent wooded scenery. The figures are of the same character as those in Hobbema's pictures, when painted by himself. He signed his landscapes with his name in full, or with his monogram, somewhat in the manner of Jacob Ruysdael, which has deceived many into the belief that they are by that artist. He must have been a contemporary of the three artists above named. Of the painter mentioned by Pilkington, there is no other account, which is strange if his pictures have all the beauties described by that writer. The characteristics do not agree with those of J. Rontbouts, whose landscapes are by no means uncommon, and have nothing of the air of Italy in the scenery.]

RONTBOUT, N. This artist is not mentioned by any of the Dutch or Flemish biographers, and appears to have found a place in Mr. Pilkington's Dictionary, from that author's having seen a landscape signed with his name in the possession of Thomas Cobbe, Esq. From the scenery of the picture, he is supposed to have visited Italy, and it is said to be painted with a firm and free pencil, and well coloured. [The picture mentioned by Mr. Pilkington represents a "View of a Bridge between two high Hills; and in perspective, under the grand arch, is an agreeable prospect of a river, a distant range of hills, and an antique tower on the border of the stream."]

ROODTSEUS, JOHN. This painter was the son of Albert Roodtseus, an obscure artist, and, according to Mr. Descamps, was born at Hoorn in 1615. He was a disciple of Peter Lastman, and by the instruction of that master became one of the most eminent portrait painters of his time. Some of his best pictures have been said not to be inferior to the admirable productions of Bartholomew Vander Helst. Without equalling that celebrated artist, some of his pictures in the hall of the Society of Archers, in his native town, prove him to have been an artist of great ability. They consist of three large pictures, representing the portraits of several of the members, which are painted with surprising truth and effect. He died in 1674. [Immerzeel calls him John Albert, and agrees in the foregoing account; but Balkema confounds him with his father, who was born in 1590, and died in 1648. He had a younger brother, born in 1619, and died in 1669; his name was Jacob, and he was a scholar of J. D. de Heem, and painted in his manner; and, it is said, approached him closely in excellence.]

ROOKER, EDWARD, an English designer and engraver, born in London about the year 1712. He possessed an admirable talent for engraving architectural views, of which he has given an extraordinary example in his large plate of the Section of St. Paul's Cathedral, from a drawing by Wale. We have also several other views by him, among which are the following :

- Four Views in Italy; after Wilson.
- Six Views in London; after P. Sandby.
- Twelve Views in England; after the same.

ROOKER, MICHAEL [ANGELO], was the son of the preceding artist, born in London about the year 1743, and was first instructed by his father in engraving, but was after placed under the tuition of Mr. Paul Sandby, to be instructed in drawing and landscape painting. In 1772 he painted and exhibited a view of Temple Bar, which possessed considerable merit, and was much admired. For several years he was the principal scene painter to the theatre in the Haymarket. As an engraver, he acquired considerable celebrity, and for many years engraved the head-pieces to the Oxford Almanacks. They were executed from his own drawings, and exhibit some of the best views which have been taken of that interesting city. Mr. Rooker was one of the first associates of the Royal Academy. He died in 1801.

ROORE, JAMES [OR JACOB] DE. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1686. He was the son of a goldsmith, who intended to bring him up to his own profession, but he died when our artist was very young, and his mother permitted him to indulge the inclination he had shown for the art. He was first placed under the care of Louis Vander Bosch, under whom he studied two years, and afterwards entered the school of Gaspard Jacques van Opstal. His progress under this master was uncommon, and he soon found himself in a situation to dispense with further instruction. He painted historical subjects and conversations; in the former, he adopted the style of Richard van Orlay, and in the latter imitated the pleasing style of the younger Teniers. His works were held in the highest estimation, and he was loaded with commissions, not only for the collections of Brabant and Flanders, but for those of Holland; and he found it difficult, with all his assiduity, to satisfy the extensive demand for his pictures. When he was not more than twenty years of age he was received into the Academy at Antwerp, and was considered one of the ablest artists of his time. He was much employed in embellishing the saloons of the principal mansions, and in painting the ceilings of the public edifices, in which he displayed a ready invention, and his extensive practice had given him an extraordinary facility of hand. One of his most admired performances was a saloon and ceiling, representing the History of Pandora, painted for the family of Hasselaer, in 1740. He died at Antwerp in 1747.

ROOS, JOHN HENRY. This eminent artist was born at Otterberg, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in 1631. He was the son of a poor weaver, who was unable to procure him the necessary instruction, or to support him during his studies; he was therefore apprenticed to a painter of little note of Amsterdam, named Julian du Jardin, for the term of seven years. Under this master he made little progress, as he was employed in a branch of the art uncongenial with the bent of his disposition. On the expiration of his indenture, he studied for some time under Adrian de Bie, an able designer of landscapes and animals; and it was not long before he discovered an extraordinary talent for painting horses, cows, sheep, goats, &c., in which he not only surpassed his instructor, but became one of the most celebrated painters of animals of his time. He frequently designed them in the most singular and difficult attitudes, but always with a correctness of design and character for which he is remarkable. He was invited to the court of the Elector of Mentz, where he did not confine his talents to landscapes and cattle. He painted the portrait of that prince, and those of his principal courtiers, for which he was munificently rewarded. By the recommendation of his patron, he was employed in portrait painting at several of the courts of Germany; and if he had been solely intent on the aggrandizement of his fortune, he would have entirely confined himself to so lucrative a pursuit. But his predilection for his favourite department was not to be subdued by this seductive allurements. The love of gain yielded to the pleasure of following the path to which nature had directed him. He established himself at Frankfurt, where he painted his favourite subjects with the most encouraging success. His works were purchased with avidity, and he received commissions from almost every court in Europe. A melancholy catastrophe interrupted this flattering career, and deprived the world of the exercise of his estimable abilities.

In 1685, a dreadful fire broke out in the night in the city of Frankfort, and the house of Roos was situated in that quarter in which the flames raged with the greatest violence. Anxious to save some valuable objects, he entered the house, and fell a victim to the flames, in the fifty-fourth year of his life. The landscapes of J. H. Roos present us with very picturesque scenery; his colouring is fresh and vigorous; his pencil is firm and decided, and the design of his animals is marked by precision and character. We have several admirable etchings by this able artist, in which we admire the spirited exertion of his point, and his excellent conduct of the chiaroscuro. The following are his principal plates:

- A set of eight Plates of Animals; dated 1665.
- A set of twelve Plates of domestic Animals.
- Two large Landscapes, with Ruins and Animals.
- A Shepherd sleeping at the foot of a Monument, near his Flock.

[Bartsch, who speaks of him in the highest terms of commendation, describes, in tom. i. of Le Peintre Graveur, thirty-nine of his etchings, to which Weigel, in his supplement to Bartsch, has added five, and has given an account of the variations to be found in different impressions.]

ROOS, THEODORE, was the younger brother of John Henry Roos, born at Wezel in 1638. He was first a scholar of Adrian de Bie, but afterwards was instructed by his brother. In 1659 he was invited to the court of Mannheim, where he was taken into the service of the Elector. His first performance was a large picture representing the portraits of the principal magistrates, still preserved in the council chamber. He afterwards visited several other courts of Germany, where he met with equal encouragement, particularly at Baden and Hanau. The Duke of Wurtemberg employed him in several historical works, and appointed him his principal painter. The pictures of this artist are chiefly confined to Germany, where they are justly esteemed, especially his portraits, which are said to have the merit of a perfect resemblance. His touch is firm and facile, and his colouring vigorous and clear. It is to be regretted that he had not paid more attention to the correctness of design, in which respect his best productions are frequently deficient. He died in 1698. By this artist we have a set of six etchings, of small upright landscapes, with ruins, dated 1667. They are charmingly executed, and are extremely scarce. [In addition to these six landscapes, described by Bartsch, P. G., tom. iv., Weigel describes a Holy Family with the date 1671, which is in the royal collection at Dresden.]

ROOS, PHILIP, called ROSA DA TIVOLI. This painter was the son of John Henry Roos, born at Frankfort in 1655. Endowed by nature with the genius of a painter, and assisted by the excellent lessons of his father, he gave early proofs of extraordinary capacity, and was particularly noticed by the Landgrave of Hesse, in whose service his father was at that time engaged, who took him under his protection, and to promote his improvement sent him to Italy, with a pension sufficient to support him during his travels. On his arrival at Rome, his application to his studies was assiduous and exemplary, and he was regarded as the most laborious young artist of his time. By his unremitting attention to his art, he had acquired a facility which is almost incredible. Of his extraordinary readiness of hand, a remarkable instance is recorded by C. le Blond, who was at that time a student at Rome. "It happened one day," says he, "that a few young artists and myself were occupied in designing from the bassi-rilievi of the arch of Titus, when Roos, passing by, was particularly struck with some picturesque object which had caught his attention, and requested one of the students to accommodate him with a crayon and paper. What was our surprise when, in less than half an hour, he produced an admirable drawing, finished with accuracy and finesse." He designed every object in his pictures from nature, and to facilitate his studies, he established himself at Tivoli, where he kept a kind of menagerie of animals, for the purpose of drawing them with the greater correctness. It is to be lamented, that, with possession of such powers, this able artist should have degraded his talents by indulging in all the excesses of intemperance and dissipation. His pictures, however, though painted with surprising promptitude and despatch, have no appearance of negligence or inattention. They usually represent pastoral subjects, herdsmen with cattle, &c., which he frequently painted nearly as large as life. His groups are composed with judgment and taste, and the landscapes in his backgrounds, his skies, and distances, are treated in a very masterly style. His cattle, in particular, are designed with unusual truth and spirit, and each animal is marked with the genuine character of its species. He died at Rome in 1705. Rosa da Tivoli is said, by Huber, to have etched a few plates of pastoral subjects, which are very scarce. [If the preceding character of his works be just, the pictures ascribed to him in England are libels.]

ROOS, JOHN MELCHIOR. This artist was the younger son of John Henry Roos, born at Frankfort in 1659. After being instructed some time by his father, he travelled to Italy, where he studied a few years, and on his return to Germany settled at Nuremberg, where he met with considerable encouragement as a painter of history and portraits, but his inclination leading him to paint landscapes and animals in the style of his brother, in the latter part of his life he devoted himself entirely to that branch, in which, although he never reached the excellence of Rosa di Tivoli, his pictures possessed sufficient merit to procure him the patronage of the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, in whose service he was employed several years, and for whom he painted many of his most esteemed works. He died in 1731. There is only one etching known by this artist, it represents a Bull standing, seen in front; it is inscribed J. M. Roos, fec. 1685, [and is very rare.]

ROOS, JOSEPH, a German painter and engraver, born at Vienna in 1728. He painted landscapes and cattle with considerable reputation, and was much employed by the Elector of Saxony. He was a member of the Academy of Dresden, and was afterwards made keeper of the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. His principal works are in the apartments of the castle of Schoenbrun. We have a few etchings by this artist, which are executed in a neat and spirited style, among which are the following:

- A set of six Plates of various Animals; inscribed Joseph Roos, inv. et fecit, aqua forti. 1754.
- Ten Plates of Sheep and Goats.

ROPER, ———. This artist is mentioned by Edwards as a painter of sporting pieces, race-horses, dogs, and dead game. Some of his pictures were in the exhibitions in Spring Garden, in 1761 and 1762, which period he did not long survive.

[ROSA, ANNA DI, also called BELTRANO-ROSA, and ANNELLA DI MASSIMO, was born at Naples in 1613. She studied first under her uncle Francesco di Rosa, and afterwards under Massimo Stanzioni. She obtained great reputation as an historical painter, though it may be difficult at this time to distinguish her works, as most of them were painted conjointly with her husband, Agostino Beltrano, and finished by Stanzioni, who sold them as his own. Some, however, pass under her name, and are highly extolled; among these are the Birth and Death of the Virgin at the Pietá, but not without a suspicion that she was assisted by Massimo. She has been compared with Elizabeth Sirani for her beauty, talents, and tragical death; the latter being poisoned by her servant at the instigation of some envious artists, and Annella murdered by a jealous husband, in 1649, but whether from a suspicion of infidelity, or from envy of her superior skill and reputation, is uncertain.]

ROSA, CRISTOFORO. This painter was born at Brescia about the year 1520. He excelled in painting perspective views, and lived in habits of intimacy with Titian, by whom he was occasionally employed to paint the architecture in some of his pictures. There are several of his works at Brescia and at Venice, particularly in the antechamber in the library of St. Mark, in the latter city. He died of the plague in 1576.

ROSA, PIETRO, was the son of the foregoing artist, and from the friendship that existed between his father and Titian, he was received into the school of that great painter, of whom he became one of the most favoured disciples, and few of his numerous pupils have approached so near to his admirable principles of colouring. Of this he has given proof in the pictures he painted for the cathedral at Brescia, and for the churches of S. Francesco and le Grazie. This promising young artist fell a premature victim to the plague, in the same year with his father.

ROSA, FRANCESCO DI, called PACICCO. This painter was born at Naples about the year 1600, and was brought up in the school of Massimo Stanzioni. His style is commended by Lanzi for the correctness of his design, and the expressive beauty of his heads. His colouring is tender and harmonious, with a fine impasto, by which its freshness and vigour is preserved. His easel pictures are frequently found in the private collections at Naples, and he painted some altar-pieces for the churches, of which the most deserving notice are his pictures of S. Tommaso d'Aquino, in the church of la Sanitá; and the Baptism of S. Candida, in S. Pietro d'Aram. He died at Naples in 1654.

ROSA, SALVATOR. This distinguished artist was born near Naples in 1615. He was the son of a land surveyor, who bestowed on him a liberal education, and having shown a decided partiality for the art of painting, he was placed under the care of Francesco Francazano, an artist of some reputation, who had married his sister. By the death of his father, he was reduced to such a state of indigence, that he was under the necessity of maintaining himself by the fortuitous produce of his juvenile performances, which he exposed for sale in the public market-place. He had languished for some time in this obscurity, when some of his sketches attracted the notice of Giovanni Lanfranco, who, regarding them as the productions of uncommon genius, inquired after the young artist, and with a liberality we have too seldom an opportunity of recording, relieved his wants, and encouraged him in the pursuit of his studies. He received some instruction from Aniello Falcone, an eminent painter of battles, and afterwards became a disciple of Giuseppe Ribera, called Il Spagnoletto, under whom he studied until he was twenty years of age, when he accompanied that master to Rome. The Cardinal Brancacci, who had become acquainted with his merit at Naples, took him under his protection, and conducted him to his bishopric of Viterbo, where he painted an altar-piece, representing the Incredulity of St. Thomas, for the cathedral; and other historical works. On his return to Rome he met with more powerful patronage from Prince Giovanni Carlo de' Medici, who employed him in several important works, and invited him to return with him to Florence, where, during a residence of nine years, he distinguished himself not less by his abilities as a satirical and dramatic poet, and his extraordinary talents of performing the principal parts in his own comedies, than by his powers as a painter. On his return to Rome he painted some altar-pieces for the churches, among which are four pictures in S. Maria di Monte Santo, representing Daniel in the Lions' Den, Tobit and the Angel, the Resurrection of Christ, and the Raising of Lazarus; and in the church of S. Giovanni de Fiorentini, the Martyrdom of St. Como and St. Damian.

Although Salvator possessed an inventive genius, and a commanding facility of execution, his powers were better adapted to the scale of easel pictures, than to figures of larger dimensions. Of this he has given evident proof in his admirable picture of Attilius Regulus, formerly in the Palazzo Colonna, at Rome, now in the possession of the Earl of Darnley. In his pictures of that description, we equally admire the boldness of his scenery, and the correct and spirited design of his figures. His landscapes are featured by an eccentric austerity, which is peculiarly his own. Instead of selecting the cultured amenity which captivates us in the views of Claude or Poussin, he made choice of the lonely haunts of wolves and robbers; for the delightful vistas of Tivoli, or the Campagna, he substituted hollow glens, or rocky precipices; in lieu of the rich foliage, and luxuriant verdure, of their trees and plains, we are presented with dreary wastes, or the trunk of a storm-struck oak, spreading its shattered branches through the troubled air. The inhabitants of these gloomy regions are admirably suited to their savage solitude. They are peopled by assassins, outlaws, and ferocious banditti. His marines represent the desolate and shelvy shores of Calabria, whose terrific aspect is sometimes rendered doubly disastrous by the fearful terrors of shipwreck. He frequently represented battles and attacks of cavalry, in which the fury of the combatants, and the fiery animation of the horses, are perfectly delineated. Notwithstanding the singularity and fierceness of his style, he fascinates us by the unbounded wildness of his fancy, and the picturesque solemnity of his scenes. "He gives us," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "a peculiar cast of nature, which, though void of grace, elegance, and simplicity, though it has nothing of that elevation and dignity which belongs to the grand style, yet has that sort of dignity which belongs to savage and uncultivated nature; but what is most to be admired in him is, the perfect correspondence which he observed between the subjects he chose and his manner of treating them. Every thing is of a piece; his rocks, trees, skies, even to his handling, have the same rude and wild character which animates his figures." He died at Rome in 1673. This ingenious artist has left us about ninety etchings, executed in a spirited and masterly style. They are distinguished by an intelligent management of the chiaro-scuro, and there is an uncommon vivacity and expression in the heads. He marked his plates with a monogram composed of an S. and an R. thus, R. The following are his principal plates :

A set of sixty-two Prints of banditti, soldiers, and other figures; single and in groups.
 The Fall of the Giants.
 The Death of Attilius Regulus.
 The finding of Œdipus.
 Democritus meditating.
 The Execution of Polycrates.
 Glaucus and Sylla.
 Jason charming the Dragon.
 Alexander with Apelles.
 Alexander and Diogenes.
 Diogenes throwing away his Bowl.
 Plato discoursing with his Disciples.
 Apollo and a Nymph.
 An Allegorical subject; called The Genius of Salvator.
 A set of six Plates, in the form of frieses, representing Tritons, Sea Nymphs, &c.

[Salvator Rosa was also excellent as a portrait painter. Much that is related of his private life, and some part of his artistic, is mere romance; Lady Morgan's account is not less true, and is more entertaining than most. The name, however, has a charm, and people admire his pictures, whether they understand them or not. There are many good pictures by him in England, both of sea-pieces and savage scenery; and some fine historical subjects, which are of a melancholy cast. In the National Gallery there is a quiet, sombre landscape, with figures intended for Mercury and the woodman, which cost a great deal of money, (1800 guineas,) but does not impress the spectator with any particular admiration of the powers of the painter.]

ROSA, SISTO. See BADALOCCHIO.

ROSALBA, CARRIERA. This ingenious lady was born at Chiozza, in the Venetian states, in 1675. She was instructed in the art by Giovanni Diamantini, and for some time applied herself to oil painting, which she afterwards abandoned for miniature and crayons. She carried these branches of the art, particularly the latter, to so unusual a pitch of perfection, that few artists can be said to have equalled her. She visited Paris, in company with Pellegrini, her brother-in-law, where she painted the Royal Family, the princes of the blood, and most of the nobility, and was received into the Academy, presenting at her reception a picture of one of the Muses. The portraits of Rosalba are gracefully designed and charmingly coloured. Her tints are blended with uncommon tenderness and delicacy, and her heads exhibit a lovely expression of truth and nature. She was constantly employed at most of the courts of Europe, and every where left proofs of her extraordinary ability. A constant application to her art, during a long life, deprived her of her sight when she was upwards of seventy, though she lived several years afterwards, and died in 1757.

[ROSASPINA, FRANCESCO, a very distinguished Italian engraver, was born at Bologna in 1760. It is not stated under whom he studied, but Joubert ranks him with Bartolozzi, Morghen, and Volpato. He is allowed to be the best imitator of the first, but it requires some qualification in ranking him with the second, notwithstanding his great excellence. He was equally skilful in the management of the burin, in the crayon manner, and in that of aquatint. Among his most esteemed prints are, The Dance of Cupids, after Albano; Cupid bending his Bow, after Franceschini; St. Francis, after Domenichino; the Dead Christ, after Correggio; and several portraits among those of the Illustri Italiani; particularly that of Marcantonio Raimondi. He also engraved some of the battles of Napoleon, in the style of bassi-rilievi, after the designs of Appiani. The series of twenty-five prints, in the crayon and tinted manner, after Parmigiano, are engraved by him in the finest taste, and with great intelligence, and in execution nothing can be more beautiful. He is also entitled to great praise for his superintendence of the engraving and publication of the work entitled La Pinacoteca, consisting of about seventy-two of the best paintings in the Academy of the Fine Arts at Bologna, of which Academy he was the professor. In these the drawing and character of the respective pictures are preserved with the nicest exactness possible. Whether this excellent artist has paid the debt of nature is not ascertained, but, at all events, that career is terminated which entitles him to notice, and a place among the best of his time.

ROSE, NICHOLAS. See LIEMACKER.

ROSE, SUSAN PENELOPE. According to Lord Orford, This lady was the daughter of Richard Gibson, the Dwarf, by whom she was probably instructed in the rudiments of the art. She was the wife of a jeweller, and painted portraits in water-colours with great freedom. Her miniatures were of a larger size than usual, and possessed considerable merit. She died in 1700, aged 48.

ROSEL, AUGUSTUS JOHN. This artist resided at Nuremberg about the year 1750. He distinguished himself as a painter of insects in miniature, which are said to have been designed with accuracy, and very highly finished. [He is also called Roesel von Rosenhof. He was born at Arnstadt in 1705, and died at Nuremberg in 1759. He studied and wrote on Entomology, and in 1746 published his celebrated work on the subject, illustrated with plates: it is entitled Insekten-Behustigungen, in 4 vols. 4to.]

ROSELLI, NICOLÒ. According to Baruffaldi, this painter was of Ferrara, and flourished about the year 1568. He is supposed to have been brought up in the school of the Dossi; though in some of his works, in the Certosa at Ferrara, he appears to have imitated the style of Benvenuto Garofolo. He painted several pictures for the churches in his native city, among which are an altar-piece in the cathedral, representing the Virgin and Infant in the clouds, beneath St. John the Evangelist and St. Anthony; and a picture of the Purification, in the church of S. Maria Bianca.

ROSETTI, DOMENICO. This artist was born at Venice about the year 1690. He painted architectural views and perspective with some success, but is chiefly known as an engraver. He was invited to Dusseldorp by the Elector Palatine, where he engraved twelve large plates of the history of Alexander, from Gerard Lairese, which are now become very scarce, as few impressions of them were taken. He executed several of the plates for the collection of prints after some of the most celebrated pictures at Venice, published by Domenico Louisa, in that city, in 1720. [He engraved the prints for a History of the Bible, printed at Venice in 1696; and several others of a miscellaneous character, after Palma Vecchio, Bassano, Tintoretto, P. Liberi, &c.; some of which are of a still earlier date: Zani says he operated in 1675. The year of his decease is not clearly ascertained.]

ROSI, ALESSANDRO. In the Abecedario, by Orlandi, this artist is said to have been born at Florence in 1627. He was a scholar of Cesare Dandini, under whose tuition he became a reputable painter of history. There are many of his pictures in the churches and private collections at Florence, and in the state. In the cathedral at Prato is an admired picture by him of S. Francesco di Paolo; and in the collection of the Grand Duke, two Bacchanalian subjects, which are highly esteemed. He died at Florence in 1697.

ROSLER, MICHAEL, an obscure German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1626. He engraved several portraits for a folio volume, published in that city, entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum. [There is nothing stated that is satisfactory respecting this engraver. Zani mentions Michael Roster, a German engraver, who flourished about 1728, and Nagler calls him Rössler, of Nuremberg, who lived in the first half of the 18th century.]

ROSSMAESSLER, JOHN AUGUSTUS. This artist was born at Leipsic in 1752, and was instructed in design by Frederick Oeser. He has engraved a great variety of book-plates and vignettes, which are admired for the spirit and neatness of the execution. We have also by him a few plates of views in the environs of Leipsic. This ingenious artist died at Leipsic, much regretted, in 1783.

ROSS, JAMES, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1778. We have by this artist several views of the city of Hereford, very neatly engraved; they are small plates, and are taken from drawings by G. Poulle.

ROSSELLI, COSIMO. This painter was born at Florence in 1416. It is not known under whom he studied, but he had already acquired some reputation in his native city, by the works he had executed for the churches, particularly a picture representing the Miracle of the Sacrament, in S. Ambrogio, when he was invited to Rome by Sixtus IV. to assist in the ornaments of his chapel, in conjunction with Domenico Ghirlandajo, Pietro Perugino, Sandro Boticelli, and others. The best picture he painted in the chapel was Christ preaching, in which he is said to have been assisted by his disciple Pietro di Cosimo, who painted the landscape. He died in 1484. [There is considerable uncertainty respecting the dates of his birth and decease. Lanzi says he was living in 1496, and Zani that he died in 1506. Being unable to rival his competitors in design, he loaded his pictures with brilliant colours and gilded ornaments, to please the Pope, who commended and rewarded him above all the others. The best that can be said of him is, that he was the master of Bartolomeo del Porta. Pier di Cosimo was born in 1441, and died in 1521. Though the preceding remark belongs to Cosimo Rosselli, it has been repeatedly applied to Pier di Cosimo, and has caused some confusion respecting them. It is true that the latter was more remarkable for his colouring than for his design, but that is observable in works posterior to those painted by Cosimo in the Sistine chapel. Pier di Cosimo was the master of Andrea del Sarto.]

ROSSELLI, MATTEO. This painter was born at Florence in 1578, and was first a scholar of Gregorio Pagani. He afterwards became a disciple of Passignano, with whom he visited Rome, and improved his style by studying the works of Raffaele and Polidoro da Caravaggio. On finishing his studies at Rome he returned to Florence, where he resided the remainder of his life, and his works are little known out of that city. He was much employed by the Grand Duke Cosimo II., and embellished the Villa di Coggio with several frescoes, representing the history of the family of Medici. He sometimes emulated the style of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli, as particularly appears in his picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Gaetano, which is considered his finest work, and in the Martyrdom of S. Andrea, at the Ognissanti. Although the works of Roselli are not distinguished by the masculine and vigorous design, and animated expression, which are found in some of the painters of his country, they are estimable for a correct and simple imitation of nature, a certain quiet accord and solemnity of effect, on which the eye dwells with more complacency than on the vivid productions of the most florid colourist. He particularly excelled in fresco painting, in which his works still retain their pristine purity and freshness. Such are his paintings in the cloister of the Nunziata, particularly that representing Pope Alexander IV. approving the institution of the order of the Serviti, which Pietro da Cortona regarded as an admirable work of art. He died in 1650.

ROSSETTI, GIOVANNI PAOLO. According to Vasari, this painter was a native of Volterra, and flourished about the year 1568. He was a nephew of Daniele Ricciarelli, called di Volterra, under whom he studied at Rome, and is said to have painted history with considerable reputation. After the death of his uncle he left Rome, and returned to Volterra, where he executed some altar-pieces for the churches, of which one of the most esteemed was a picture of the taking down from the Cross, in the church of S. Dalmazio. [Zani says he operated as late as the year 1600.]

ROSSI, ANDREA, an Italian engraver, who resided at Rome about the year 1770. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

The Portraits of Joseph II. and the Archduke Leopold; after Pompeo Battoni.

A Bust of the Virgin; after Carlo Dolei.

St. Margaret of Cortona kneeling before a Crucifix; after Pietro da Cortona.

[He was born about 1726, and died in 1790. There are several heads of popes engraved by him, and subjects after Caracci, Novelli, and Frezza.]

ROSSI, ANTONIO, was born at Bologna in 1700, and was educated in the school of Cavaliere Marc Antonio Franceschini, of whom he was a favourite disciple, and who recommended him, in preference to his other pupils, to execute the commissions which, from his extensive occupation, he was incapable of undertaking. Of the numerous pictures he painted for the public edifices at Bologna, his Martyrdom of S. Andrea, in the church of S. Domenico, is the most creditable to his talents. He was much employed in decorating, with his figures, the architectural and perspective views of Orlandi and F. Brizzio. [He died in 1753, according to Lanzi, but others place his birth in 1697, and his death in 1750.]

ROSSI, FRANCESCO. See SALVIATI.

ROSSI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist is mentioned by Florent le Comte as an engraver, who attributes to him a set of perspective views of Rome, published in 1640.

ROSSI, GIROLAMO, called DE RUBEIS the ELDER. This artist was born at Rome about the year 1630, but was brought up at Bologna, under Simone Cantarini. His genius led him more to engraving than painting, and we have several plates by him, after the Bolognese painters, which possess considerable merit; among others are the following:

The Portrait of Pope Pius V.; after Scipione Gaetano.
Two Cupids playing; after Guercino.
The Virgin and Infant, with St. Jerome and St. Francis; after Lodovico Caracci, inscribed, Hieronymus de Rubéis pictor, delineavit incidit.
St. Charles Boromeus kneeling before a Crucifix; after An. Caracci.

[Bartsch asserts that his etchings only amount to six; the Two Cupids playing, after Guercino; the Virgin and Infant, after L. Caracci; a half-figure of the Virgin; St. John the Baptist, after Guido; Two Infants, after Guido; and Cupid, after Guercino. He flourished about 1670.]

ROSSI, GIROLAMO, called DE RUBEIS the YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Rome about the year 1680. He chiefly resided in his native city, where he engraved a variety of plates, after the Italian painters. He also executed several of the portraits of the cardinals of his time, for a set, which was afterwards continued by Pazzi and others. They are feebly engraved. We have also by him the following prints:

The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Coreggio.
The Martyrdom of St. Agapita; after Gio. Odazzi.

[Nagler gives a list of twenty-one prints by the younger Rossi, among which he enumerates those of Pope Pius V., and of St. Charles Boromeus kneeling, attributed above to his father. According to Zani, he operated as late as 1749, but none of the dates quoted by Nagler come near to that period.]

ROSSI, MUZIO. According to Crespi, this painter was born at Naples in 1626, and was for some time a disciple of Massimo Stanzioni. From the school of that master he went to Bologna, where he frequented the academy of Guido, and at the age of eighteen was sufficiently advanced in the art to compete with the ablest artists of the time; when he painted an altar-piece for the Certosa, representing the Nativity, which was considered a prodigy of juvenile ability. On his return to Naples, he was engaged to paint the tribune in S. Pietro in Majella, which he had not entirely finished when his country was deprived of his extraordinary talent, in the bloom of life. He died in 1651.

ROSSI, PASQUALE, called PASQUALINO. This artist was born at Vicenza in 1641. Without the instruction of a master, he is said by Orlandi to have reached a respectable rank as a painter of history, by studying and copying the best works of the Venetian and Roman schools. Of his pictures in the churches at Rome, the most deserving attention are, Christ praying in the Garden, in S. Carlo al Corso; and the Baptism of Christ by St. John, in S. Maria del Popolo. In the church of the Silvestrini, at Fabriano, is a picture by him of the Madonna and Bambino; but perhaps his most estimable production is his celebrated altar-piece in the cathedral at Matelica, representing St. Gregory interceding for the Souls in Purgatory, painted in the finest style of Guercino. He also painted gallant assemblies and musical parties, which are esteemed in the choicest collections. He died in 1700. [Lanzi, as well as several other writers of credit, says he was living in 1718; Zani says he died in 1725.]

ROSSO, IL, called by the French MAÎTRE ROUX. This eminent artist was born at Florence in 1496. Although he was not a disciple of Andrea del Sarto, he was at first an admirer of his manner, and afterwards improved his powers by studying the works of Michael Angelo and Parmigiano. Endowed with a ready and inventive genius, he scorned to be the servile imitator even of Buonaroti, and at an early age he ventured to compete with the ablest of his contemporaries in the cloister of La Nunziata, where he painted a large picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, which was distinguished by a novel and intrepid style, in which he displayed both originality and taste. After painting several other pictures for the churches at Florence, particularly the Marriage of the Virgin, in S. Lorenzo, he went to Rome, where his talents were already known. He painted an altar-piece for S. Maria della Pace; and the Decollation of St. John, for the church of St. Salviati. Il Rosso had acquired considerable celebrity when that city was taken and plundered, in 1527; and with many other artists, was obliged to fly from Rome. He took refuge at Volterra, where he painted a fine picture of the Deposition from the Cross, for the Oratorio di S. Carlo. He afterwards went to Venice, where he painted for Aretin his celebrated picture of Mars and Venus, which has been engraved by his disciple Domenico Barbieri. Not meeting with the success he expected in Italy, he resolved on visiting the court of Francis I. of France, who was at that time the great encourager of art. He was very favourably received by that monarch, who immediately engaged him in his service, and appointed him superintendent of the great works which he was then engaged in at the Chateau of Fontainebleau. As Il Rosso was not less eminent as an architect than a painter, he undertook the building of the great gallery in that palace, which was executed from his plan, and which he decorated with several paintings and ornaments in stucco, many of which were afterwards destroyed by his rival and competitor, Francesco Primaticcio, to make way for his own works. Of twenty-four pictures, emblematical of the principal actions of Francis I., thirteen still remain, of which a particular description has been given by the Abbé Guget.

The style of Il Rosso, though singular, is grand. He displayed a dignity of character, a lively expression in his heads, a tasteful arrangement of his habiliments, an effective management of his light and shadow, and a daring execution; though these excellencies were accompanied by a wildness and extravagance, too frequently attached to a fertile and exuberant imagination. This able artist was well versed in literature, and had a taste for poetry and music. His conversation was agreeable, and his manners polished. The possession of such accomplishments secured him the regard and good graces of Francis I. He was in the full possession of royal favour, and of the public estimation, when he sacrificed these enjoyments to a mean and unfounded suspicion. He had contracted a friendship with Francesco Pellegrini, a Florentine painter, who was in the habit of visiting him frequently, when his house was robbed of a considerable sum. He rashly suspected Pellegrini to be the robber, against whom he brought a formal accusation; he was in consequence of the charge put to the torture, and after suffering the most horrible torments was declared innocent. The remorse of having so unjustly exposed an innocent person to so dreadful a trial, preyed upon his mind, and he put an end to his existence by poison, in 1541.

[ROSWORM, ———, a painter, of whom there is no account. He was in England about the year 1665, and copied some of Sir Peter Lely's pictures in small.]

ROTA, MARTINO. This eminent engraver was born at Sebenico, in Dalmatia, about the year 1540, but he chiefly resided at Rome and Venice. By whom he was instructed in the art of engraving is not ascertained, but he proved himself an artist of great ability. His design of the figure is unusually correct, and his extremities are marked with precision. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, and though they are not very highly finished, they are wrought in a neat, clear style. His print representing the Last Judgment, after Michael Angelo Buonaroti, is justly considered as his masterpiece, whether we consider the neatness of the execution, or the exactness with which he has preserved the correct drawing of the painter, on a scale so different from the original. This fine print, which is inscribed Martinus Rota, 1569, has been very closely copied by Leonard Gaultier, though it may easily be distinguished from the original, not only by its inferiority, but by observing that the face of the portrait of M. Angelo, which is represented in a small oval at the top, is in the original turned towards his right shoulder, in the copy it is towards the left shoulder. There is also a copy of it by J. Wierix. He engraved some plates from his own designs, and from the principal Italian painters. He usually signed his plates with his name, but sometimes marked them with a singular monogram, consisting of an M. and a wheel by the side of it, in reference to his name, Rota, in Latin, signifying a wheel, M. . The following are his principal plates, which are difficult to meet with in good impressions :

PORTRAITS.

Maximilian II., Rom. Imper. 1575.
The Emperor Rodolphus II. 1592; with the cipher.
Ferdinand I. in the costume of his time. 1575.
Henry IV., King of France.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Resurrection; dated 1577.
The same subject, differently treated.
The Murder of the Innocents.
The Last Judgment; dedicated to Rodolphus II. 1573.
Another print of the Last Judgment. This plate was left imperfect at his death, and was finished by another hand.
The Scourging of Christ. 1568.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after Titian.
Mary Magdalene penitent; after the same.
Prometheus chained to the Rock; after the same.
Christ appearing to St. Peter; after Raffaele. 1568.

[Malpe asserts that Martin Rota was born in 1532, but Zani affirms that he operated in 1540. Bartsch describes 114 prints by him, which he believes to be a complete list, and the dates range from 1558 to 1586. He denies that the print of the Resurrection, dated 1577, is by him. It is to be regretted that Zani has not quoted a single print in support of his assertion; but he is positive as to the fact. He says, remarking on the date given by Malpe, Il Rota operava come ho accennata, e sicuramente nel 1662

1540. As many of the prints described by Bartsch are without dates, Zani may have had reason to believe some of them to be of the time he mentions. Bartsch does not allude to the assertion. After the print of the Last Judgment, the portraits by Martin Rota are the most admirable, and held in the highest esteem by collectors. Of these his chefs d'œuvre are, Albert de Lasco, Baron de Kaizmarck, Rodolph II., and Ferdinand I. The Battle of Lepanto, a large print by him, is of the greatest rarity. It is a bizarre composition, the offspring of his imagination without congruity.]

ROTARI, CONTE PIETRO. This painter was of a noble family of Verona, born in 1707, and, among other accomplishments, was instructed in design. For some time he merely practised the art as an amusement, but his progress was so flattering, that he at length resolved to adopt it as a profession, and he became a scholar of Antonio Balestra, under whom he studied until he was eighteen years of age. He afterwards visited Venice, where he passed two years in contemplating the works of the best masters of that distinguished school of colouring. In 1727 he went to Rome, where he entered the school of Francesco Trevisani, and was occupied four years in studying the great works of art in that metropolis. By the advantages of travel, and an assiduous application to his pursuit, he became a correct and graceful designer, and joined to the expressive airs of his heads, an elegance of contour, and a tasteful disposition of his draperies, in which he was not surpassed by any artist of his time. His principal works in Italy are his picture of the Annunciation, at Guastalla; and the Birth of the Virgin, in the church of S. Giovanni, at Padua. He afterwards visited the courts of Vienna and Dresden, where he met with the most flattering encouragement; and in 1756 was invited to St. Petersburg by the Empress of Russia, who appointed him her principal painter, in which capacity he died, in 1762. We have several slight but spirited etchings by this artist, some of which are from his own compositions, and others after the works of Balestra; among others are the following :

The Portrait of Filippo Baldinucci. 1726.
St. Francis kneeling before a Crucifix; from his own design.
The Education of the Virgin; the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER ANTONIO BALESTRA.

Abraham and the Angels.
David with the Head of Goliath.
St. Jerome; half-length.
Venus and Æneas.

ROTTENHAMER, JOHN, was born at Munich in 1564, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by an obscure artist, named Donnaver. At an early period of his life he went to Rome, where it was not long before he distinguished himself by painting small pictures of historical subjects, which, though they retained somewhat of the German taste, were ingeniously composed, and touched with great neatness and spirit. He had acquired some reputation by his easel pictures, when he was commissioned to paint an altar-piece for one of the churches at Rome, representing several Saints, with a glory of angels. The ability which he discovered on this occasion excited universal surprise at the extent and versatility of his talents. A desire of improving himself in colouring, prompted him to visit Venice, where he particularly attached himself to studying the works of Il Tintoretto, in the Scuola di S. Marco; and he appears to have imitated the style of that master with uncommon success. During his stay at Venice, he painted some pictures for the public edifices, of which the most admired were, the Annunciation, in the church of S. Bartolomeo; and a picture of S. Cristina, at the Incurabili. Ferdinand, Duke of Mantua, employed him in several considerable works, for whom he painted one of his most admired pictures, representing Nymphs dancing. After a residence of many years in Italy he returned to his native country, and established himself at Augsburg, where he met with great encouragement. He painted a picture for the great altar of the Holy Cross, representing all the saints, which is considered one of his most capital performances, and was much employed for the private collections. He was patronized by the Emperor Rodolphus II., for whom he painted a capital picture of the Feast of the Gods, a composition of many figures, gracefully designed, and coloured with all the splendour of the Venetian school. His cabinet pictures are by no means uncommon, and they are found in the choicest collections. The back-grounds are frequently painted by John Breughel, and sometimes by Paul Brill. He was fond of decorating his compositions with rich and splendid accessories, and was particularly desirous of introducing naked figures into his pictures, which he piqued himself on designing with taste, and colouring with delicacy. He usually made choice of gay and agreeable subjects, and the airs of his heads are expressive, though not sufficiently varied. Though Rottenhamer resided great part of his life in Italy, he never entirely lost sight of the taste of his country. His design, though not very incorrect, is formal and mannered. He died at Augsburg in 1606. [1604 is the date given by several writers.]

ROVERE, GIOVANNI MAURO, called FIAMMINGHINO. This painter was born at Milan in 1570, of parents originally of Flanders. According to Orlandi, he was brought up under the Procaccini, whose style he followed, particularly that of Giulio Cesare. He painted history with some reputation, and when he did not suffer himself to be led away by a dangerous impetuosity, produced some pictures worthy of the school in which he was educated. Such is his altar-piece of the Last Supper, in the church of S. Angelo, at Milan, which is admired for the grandeur of the composition, and the expressive character of the heads. There are several of his easel pictures in the private collections at Milan. He died in 1640. [He was also a good painter of battle-pieces, and landscapes with animals; and there are engravings by him of such subjects, after his own designs; they are marked J. M. R. F. He had a brother, who painted architecture and perspective, and showed considerable talent; his name was Giambatista, and he was called il Genovesino. Several others of the same family practised painting, but not with much distinction.]

days and nights without any other sustenance than bread and water. He never undressed; and his enthusiasm for these grand works was so great, that his only boast was that he had copied all of them that had given him pleasure. Under this influence also he copied in chiaro-scuro the whole collection in the Farnese palace. He occupied himself at unusual hours, and at great inconvenience, in this arduous undertaking, but with such success as to elicit the admiration and praise of the professors of the capital. Sebastien Conca declared publicly that Annibale Caracci could not have copied better. His enthusiasm supported him during his labours; but his midnight studies, fastings, and other privations, had their effect on his physical and moral faculties, and, instead of improving, his talents seemed to diminish; and on his return from Rome the works he executed were not equal to those he had performed before his departure thither. He had, however, when at Rome, and in full possession of his faculties, painted the portrait of the general of the Dominicans; and on Rovira's return to Madrid the reverend father was at the court. The queen, Elisabeth Farnese, was desirous of having an exact portrait of Lodovico I., and the general spoke so highly of the talent of Rovira, at the same time presenting his own portrait and that of Cardinal Cienfuegos, as proofs of his ability, that the artist was sent for to execute that of Lodovico. He attended at the time appointed, coolly prepared his palette, with infinite grace posed his model, traced the contours, and sketched the whole with a facility that gave the queen and all present the utmost satisfaction. But after these happy preliminaries his mental disorder returned, and he began daubing the sketch, and covered it so with colour that not a trace was discernible. Recovering his senses, he rushed from the palace, quitted Madrid, and a few days afterwards was found at Valencia in the utmost destitution. Here the Marques de Dos Aguas took him under his protection, and received him into his house. After awhile he was commissioned to paint in fresco the vault of the sanctuary of S. Luis, and, what was remarkable, finished it without exhibiting the least aberration of mind. About this time, hearing that Corrado Guaiacinto, with whom he had formed a friendship at Rome, had arrived at Madrid, as painter to Ferdinand VI., he set out, as though it were only a visit to the next street, and walked, without any provision, to the court at Madrid, saluted his friend, and, without bidding adieu, returned on foot to Valencia. It was at last found necessary to place him, for his own safety and comfort, in the hospital de Misericordia, where he died in 1765. In the first volume of the Museo Pictórico of Palomino, there are several prints by him, which show his talent as an engraver.]

ROULLET, JOHN LOUIS, an eminent French engraver, born at Arles, in Provence, in 1645. He was first instructed in the art of engraving by John Lenfant, but he afterwards became a pupil of Francis de Poilly, and was the ablest of his scholars. On leaving that master he went to Italy, where he passed ten years, and acquired a purity and correctness of drawing which enabled him to engrave with success after the great masters of the Italian school. His print of the Marys with the dead Christ, after the celebrated picture by Annibale Caracci, formerly in the Orleans collection, now in the possession of the Earl of Carlisle, is one of the most admirable productions of the art, for the firm and correct drawing, the beauty of the graver, and the fidelity with which he has preserved the fine expression of the original picture. The following are his principal works :

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV. ; a half-length.

Francis de Poilly, Engraver to the King, ad vivum. 1680. John Baptist Lully, Musician to the King ; after Mignard.

Ascanius Philamarinus, Cardinal Archbishop of Naples.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The three Marys, with the dead Christ ; after An. Caracci.

The Virgin and infant Jesus ; after the same.

Two of the angles of the dome of the church of the Jesuits at Naples, representing St. Matthew and St. Luke ; after Lanfranco. The two other angles, representing St. Mark and St. John, are engraved by F. Louvemont.

The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth ; after Mignard.

The Virgin, with the infant Jesus in her arms, who is holding a Bunch of Grapes ; after the same, and inscribed to Madame de Maintenon.

[He died at Paris in 1669.]

ROULLIERE, LA. This artist is mentioned by Papillon as an engraver on wood of some merit, who flourished about the year 1700, but he has not specified any of his works.

ROUSSEAU, JAMES. This artist was born at Paris in 1626. After being instructed in the elements of design in his native city he went to Rome, where he applied himself to the study of perspective and landscape, and designed the most remarkable views in the vicinity of that city. He formed an intimacy with Herman Swanevelt, whose sister he married, and, assisted by the advice and instruction of that able artist, he became an eminent painter of landscapes and architectural views. On his return to Paris he met with the most favourable reception. He was employed by Louis XIV. in ornamenting the chateaux of Marly and St. Germain en Laye, and was made a member of the Academy at Paris. He was in the height of his reputation at the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, when, on account of his being a Protestant, he was obliged to leave France, and his name was erased from the list of the academicians. He retired into Holland, where he was invited to England by the Duke of Montague, and was employed, in conjunction with Charles de la Fosse and John Baptist Monnoyer, in ornamenting his mansion of Montague House. He was afterwards employed in painting several landscapes and perspective views for the palace of Hampton Court. The landscapes of Rousseau generally represent select and classic scenery, embellished with the views of magnificent architecture. He appears to have taken for his model the admirable productions of Nicholas Poussin. We have a few etchings by this artist, which are executed in a spirited style ; among which are,

A set of six Landscapes, with architecture and figures.

The Repose in Egypt ; after An. Caracci.

St. John Baptizing the People of Israel ; after the same.

[He was born at Paris in 1630, and died at London in 1693. His easel pictures resemble more the manner of Gaspar than of Nicholas Poussin. Of his etchings Dumesnil, tom. iv., has given descriptions of eight after his own designs, and of eleven from pictures in the cabinet of Jabach. The former are finished with the graver in a bold style, and show the good taste and ability of the master.]

ROUSSEAU, JOHN FRANCIS, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He has engraved a great number of vignettes and other book-plates, after Gravelot, Cochin, and others. We have also the following prints by him :

The Virgin and infant Christ ; after Vander Werf.
St. Jerome ; after Mola.

ROUSSELLET, GILES. This artist was born at Paris in 1614. It is not known under whom he learned the art of engraving, but his style resembles that of Bloemaert. His drawing is correct, and his prints possess considerable merit, though in some of them the lights are more covered than is necessary, which gives a heaviness to their effect. The number of his plates is considerable, of which the following are the most esteemed :

PORTRAITS.

Charles de Valois, Duke d'Angouleme.

Peter Seguier, Chancellor of France ; after Le Brun.

Richard de Belleval, Chancellor of the University ; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Frontispiece to the Polyglot Bible ; after S. Bourdon.

The Holy Family ; with St. Elisabeth and St. John representing the infant Jesus with a Bird ; after Raffaele.

The Holy Family ; after the same ; called La Belle Jardiniere.

The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth, St. John, and two Angels ; after the same. G. Edelinck has engraved the same subject.

St. Michael discomfiting the Evil Spirit ; after the same.
The Annunciation ; after Guido.

Four plates representing three of the Labours of Hercules and his Death ; after the same.

David playing on the Harp ; after Domenichino.

The Entombing of Christ ; after Titian.

Four plates of the Four Evangelists ; after Valentin.

The Servant of Abraham meeting Rebecca ; after N. Poussin.

Moses saved from the Nile by Pharaoh's Daughter ; after the same.

The Holy Family ; after S. Bourdon.

St. John the Evangelist ; after the same.

The Crucifixion ; after Le Brun.

The Dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin ; after the same.

The Dead Christ supported by an angel ; after the same.

The Holy Family ; after the same.

Mary Magdalene penitent ; after the same.

St. Bernard kneeling before the Virgin ; after the same.

St. Theresa in contemplation ; after the same.

[He died in 1686. His prints amount to about 74, of which Nagler has given a list.]

ROUSSELET, MARY ANN. This lady was the wife of Peter Tardieu, the engraver, and was probably a relative of the preceding artist. She engraved several plates for Buffon's Natural History ; and among other prints we have by her,

St. John in the Desert ; after Charles Vanloo.

[She also engraved some sea-peeces after Bachhuysen, William Vander Velde, and J. Vernet. She flourished from about 1760 to 1770.]

ROUSIERE, [FRANÇOIS DE LA.] This artist is noticed by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of Michael de Castelnau, Ambassador from France. [He lived about the middle of the 17th century ; very little of him is known.]

ROUX, MAITRE. See Rosso.

[ROWLANDSON, THOMAS, a celebrated designer and etcher of caricatures and humorous subjects, was born at London in 1756, and died there in 1827. At a very early period he gave presage of his innate talent for caricature, by sketching humorous representations of his schoolmaster and fellow scholars : the margins of his books were covered with these handy-works. In his sixteenth year he was sent to Paris, and entered as a student in one of the drawing academies there, where he made rapid advances in the study of the human figure ; and during his residence, which was nearly two years, he occasionally indulged his satirical talent in portraying the characteristics of the people, whose fantastic costume and manners, at that time, scarcely required the exaggerations of caricature. On his return to London he resumed his studies at the Royal Academy, where he had been admitted a student before his visit to Paris. His father, who was a city tradesman, became embarrassed from injudicious speculation, and young Rowlandson would have been without support but for the liberality of his aunt, a French lady, who had married his uncle Thomas. This lady, whose maiden name was Chatelier, amply supplied him with money; and to this indulgence, perhaps, may be traced those careless habits which attended his early career, and for which he was remarkable through life. At her decease she left him seven thousand pounds, besides other valuable property. He then indulged his predilection for a joyous life, and mixed with the gayest of the gay. Whilst at Paris he imbibed a love for gaming; and now frequented the most fashionable houses for play in London, where he alternately won and lost without emotion, till he was at length minus several thousand pounds. In this manner he dissipated more than one valuable legacy. He has been known, after having lost all he possessed, to return to his professional studies, sit down coolly to fabricate a series of new designs, and to exclaim, with stoical philosophy, "I've played the fool, but (holding up his pencils) here is my resource." However coarse and slight may be the generality of his humorous and political etchings, many of which were the effusions of a few hours, his early works were wrought with care; and his studies of the human figure at the Academy were scarcely inferior to those of Mortimer. From the versatility of his talent, the fecundity of his imagination, the grace and elegance with which he could design his groups, added to the almost miraculous despatch with which he supplied compositions on every subject, he might, had he been careful of his reputation, have become one of the best historical painters of his time. Sir Joshua Reynolds and Benjamin West each declared that some of his drawings would have done honour to Rubens, or any of the greatest masters of design of the old schools. His style, which was purely his own, was quite original. He drew a bold outline with the reed pen, in a tint composed of vermilion and Indian ink, washed in the general effect in chiaro-scuro, and tinted the whole with the proper colours. This manner, though slight, was most effective. For many years he was too idle to seek new employment, and his kind friend and best adviser, Mr. Ackermann, the well-known publisher in the Strand, supplied him with ample subjects for the exercise of his talent. At that gentleman's suggestion he executed the illustrative designs for those popular volumes, "The Travels of Dr. Syntax," "The Dance of Death," "The Dance of Life," and other well-known productions of the versatile pen of Mr. Coombe. The writer of his memoir in the Gentleman's Magazine, from which this is abridged, says, that no artist of the past or present school, perhaps, ever expressed so much as Rowlandson with so little effort, or with so evident an appearance of the absence of labour. His works are very numerous; many hundreds of his drawings have passed through the hands of the editor, some of them forming a consecutive series as rich and racy as Drunken Barnaby's Journal, and only requiring the "versification descriptive" by a Braithwaite or a Coombe, to make them as popular as Old Barnaby or Doctor Syntax were in their days.]

ROY, C. LE. This name is affixed to the portrait of And. Hercules Card. Fleury, engraved after Autreau. [Claude Leroy flourished at Paris about 1709. He engraved the portraits of Fleury, Boileau, Bossuet, and Cardinal W. Dubois, all after H. Rigaud.]

ROY, HENRY LE, an obscure engraver, by whom we have a set of six plates of Butterflies, Beetles, and other insects, etched in a style resembling that of Hollar, and retouched with the graver. They are inscribed Henry le Roy, fecit Æ. 72, 1651.

[ROY, JEAN BAPTISTE DE, commonly called De Roy of Brussels, a landscape and cattle painter, was born at Brussels in 1759. From his earliest infancy he showed a great disposition for drawing, and his father, to encourage his predilection, took him to Holland that he might have the opportunity of studying the works of the celebrated masters of that country. These and nature were his only teachers; but by assiduous attention to both he soon attained to considerable eminence as a painter. The pictures of Paul Potter, Cuyp, and Berchem, decided his choice of the department to which he would devote his talents; but the style he adopted differs from theirs, and is more analogous to that of Ommeganck than to any of the cattle painters of the Dutch school. His subjects are generally horned cattle standing in groups, grazing in meadows, or ruminating during meridian heat. His pictures seldom exhibit, like those of Cuyp, the warmth of sunshine tempered by rising clouds producing shade, and promising a refreshing shower; on the contrary, they glow with a full unmitigated blaze, and no sign to excite hope of melioration: this is their general character. Still they possess great beauties; they are attractive by their brightness of colour; the cattle are accurately designed, skilfully grouped and contrasted, and very carefully finished. In the Museum at Brussels there is a picture by him less liable to the censure of excessive heat. It represents a group of four cows and a bull, with a herdsman, issuing from a wood and passing through a pool to an adjacent meadow. Most of the best modern collections in Belgium possess specimens of his works. He had many scholars, some of them distinguished painters at the present time, in whose productions his style may be recognised. He died in 1839, and left numerous studies and sketches from nature, which are deservedly held in great estimation.]

[ROYER, JEAN LE, and AUBIN-OLIVIER, brothers-in-law, who lived in the middle of the 16th century, and were both in the service of Henry II. of France, the one as a medallist, the other as a printer. Both were skilful engravers on wood, and jointly executed the figures necessary for the understanding the "Book of Perspective," by Jean Cousin, printed and published by Jean Le Royer, in 1560. These geometrical figures are very beautiful, and consist of about sixty illustrations. Jean availed himself of his knowledge of design to embellish the works that he printed; so that the greater part of the fleurettes, vignettes, and the ornamental letters, whether in metal or in wood, employed in his editions, are his own work. In 1553 he obtained letters patent, in which he is designated "Printer in ordinary to the King, and especially in mathematics." Dumesnil has given an interesting account of the geometrical figures in Cousin's book, in tom. vii. of "Le Peintre Graveur Français," but was unable to furnish a catalogue of the other ornamental works of this learned and artistic printer.]

RUBEIS. See ROSSI.

RUBENS, PETER PAUL. In presenting the memoirs of the illustrious head of the Flemish school, we have to speak of the consummate painter, the enlightened scholar, the skilful diplomatist, and the accomplished man of the world. Peter Paul Rubens was the son of John Rubens and Mary Pipelings, both descended from distinguished families of the city of Antwerp, where his father filled the situation of one of the principal magistrates. The calamities of civil war, which desolated the Low Countries about the year 1570, obliged him to abandon his charge, and to take refuge at Cologne, where our artist was born, in 1577, on the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul, on which account he received at the baptismal font the names of those apostles. In his early years, his mind was cultivated with the most attentive care, and in the progress of a classical education, he discovered uncommon vivacity of genius, and unusual docility of disposition. The city of Antwerp having again been placed under the dominion of Spain, the father of Rubens returned to his native city, and re-entered on the administration of his office.

On finishing his studies the young Rubens was placed as a page to the Countess of Lalain, in which capacity he remained a short time, in a situation by no means agreeable to his wishes. His father dying soon afterwards, he obtained his mother's permission to pursue the bent of an inclination he had discovered for painting, and he was placed under the tuition of Tobias Verhaecht, a landscape painter of some respectability; but his genius leading him more immediately to historic painting, he became a disciple of Adam van Oort, whose works were then in high reputation. The depravity and extravagance of that artist could not fail of disgusting a student whose elevated mind, and urbanity of manners, were as remarkable as the brutal outrages of his instructor, and he soon quitted that master to enter the school of Otho Venius, who was at that time considered one of the most distinguished masters of the Flemish school. To his talents as a painter, Otho Venius united the most polished manners, and an extensive acquaintance with literature. The possession of qualities so congenial with his pursuits, rendered the tuition of Otho Venius particularly agreeable to our student, who conceived the strongest attachment and the most profound veneration for his instructor.

Rubens had reached his twenty-third year, when his preceptor assured him, that his lessons could be of no further advantage to him, and recommended a journey to Italy, as the surest means of leading to perfection those talents which had already displayed themselves with such extraordinary promise. In following the advice of his master, Rubens gratified his own particular inclination, which had been long bent on such a project. He had for some time been favoured with the patronage of the Archduke Albert, then governor of the Netherlands, who, on this occasion, forwarded his views, by giving him a particular recommendation to Vincenzo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, and in 1600 he set out on his travels to Italy.

On his arrival at Venice, he passed some time in examining the most celebrated works of the Venetian masters, and pursued his journey to Mantua, where he was received by the Duke with the most marked distinction. To fix him near his person, he appointed him one of the gentlemen of his chamber, and this honour was the more acceptable to Rubens, as it gave him the opportunity of a more intimate acquaintance with the great works of Giulio Romano, in the Palazzo del T., which were the objects of his particular admiration. The contemplation of the poetry of Homer, personified by the graphic powers of Giulio, excited his emulation to the highest pitch; and it is reported, that whilst he was occupied in painting a picture of the history of Turnus and Æneas, intending to warm his imagination by the rapture of poetry, he repeated, with energy, the lines of Virgil, commencing,

Ille etiam patris agmen ciet, &c.

The Duke, who overheard him, entered the apartment, and was not a little surprised to find his painter's mind stored with all the graces of literature. Rubens had been two years in the service of the Duke of Mantua, when he requested and received the permission of his protector to revisit Venice, for the purpose of studying the works of Titian and Paolo Veronese, which had made so deep an impression on him in his passage through that city. It was by studying the best principles of colouring at the fountain-head, that he acquired that splendid style which is so much admired in his works; and on his return to Mantua, he evinced how much he had profited by his studies at Venice, in the three magnificent pictures he painted for the church of the Jesuits, which may be regarded as some of his finest works. The Duke of Mantua being desirous of possessing the best copies he could procure of some of the most celebrated pictures at Rome, cast his eye on Rubens as the most capable of executing such a commission, and was at the same time influenced by the obliging intention of affording his favourite an opportunity of visiting the great emporium of taste and virtu. He received this flattering mark of his patron's distinction with gratitude and delight; and during his residence in the metropolis of art, he sent his employer transcripts of several of the most distinguished paintings, which were executed with no common ability, and were esteemed by his patron little inferior to the originals. He was employed by the Archduke Albert to paint three pictures for the church of S. Croce in Gerusalemme, representing the finding of the Cross by St. Helena, Christ bearing his Cross, and the Crucifixion. The two last are considered amongst his most admirable productions.

In 1605, the Duke of Mantua having occasion to send an envoy to the court of Spain, selected Rubens for the purpose, and directed him to return to Mantua from Rome, to enter on his embassy. He set out for Madrid, carrying with him magnificent presents for the Duke of Lerma, the favourite minister of Philip III. He exerted at that court his political and pictorial talents, with a dignity and propriety that raised the latter, without debasing the former, and accomplished the object of his mission entirely to the satisfaction of his employer and the King of Spain, whose portrait he painted, and received from that monarch the most flattering marks of esteem and approbation. Soon after his return from his embassy, the Duke of Mantua permitted him to revisit Rome, having been engaged to ornament the tribune of S. Maria in Vallicella, where he painted three admirable pictures, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Paolo Veronese. On leaving Rome, Rubens visited Genoa, where the distinguished reputation he had acquired in the other parts of Italy excited the public curiosity, and he was employed in several considerable works, which increased his celebrity. He painted two pictures for the church of the Jesuits, representing the Circumcision, and St. Ignatius working a Miracle, which were highly applauded.

Rubens had now been absent eight years from his native country, when he received the intelligence, that his mother was dangerously ill, and though he returned to Antwerp with all possible speed, he did not arrive until after her death. The loss of a parent, to whom he was tenderly attached, was a severe affliction to Rubens, and he had formed the project of returning to Italy, when the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella employed every inducement to retain him in their service. He consequently abandoned his intention, and established himself at Antwerp, where he built a magnificent house, with a saloon in the form of a rotunda, which he enriched with antique statues, busts, vases, and pictures, by the most celebrated painters. It was in the midst of these select productions of art, that he conceived and executed the greater part of the chefs d'œuvre which have immortalized his name. He now passed several years in the tranquil and successful exercise of his great abilities, during which time he embellished the public edifices of the Low Countries with an almost incredible number of his admirable paintings.

To accomplish the extensive undertakings in which he was engaged, and at the same time to keep alive his intercourse with the Muses, whose society he always courted with avidity, the occupation of his time was regulated with a precision which nothing was permitted to derange. He never painted without having read to him some passage of history or poetry, and the works of ancient or modern writers were equally familiar to him, as he perfectly understood and spoke with fluency seven different languages. This constant accumulation of knowledge had enriched the mind of this great painter with inexhaustible resources.

The extraordinary and well-merited fame acquired by this admirable artist, could hardly fail of exciting the envy, and consequently the injustice, of his contemporaries. Rubens, generous and affable, the liberal and beneficent encourager of art, found himself assailed by the calumnies of those who were most indebted to him for assistance. With the most audacious effrontery, they attempted to insinuate that he owed the best part of his reputation, in the great variety of works for which he was celebrated, to the talents of his disciples Snyder and Wildens, who he occasionally employed in forwarding the animals and landscapes in some of his pictures. Cornelius Schut, who was in want of employment, accused him of poverty of invention; Abraham Janssens had the hardihood to defy him to a trial of strength; and even Theodore Rombouts ventured to vilify his works. The exalted mind of Rubens treated these atrocities in a manner becoming the elevation of his feelings and the philanthropy of his heart. He relieved the necessities of the first, by procuring him employment; he answered the challenge of the second, by a dignified neglect; and replied to the sarcasms of Rombouts, by an exposure of his famous Descent from the Cross. The more effectually to establish his claim to the title of the universal painter, he finished with his own hand some of his most admirable landscapes, his lion-huntings, and other miscellaneous subjects, which covered his calumniators with shame and confusion.

The fame of Rubens had long been established at the court of France, when he was commissioned by Mary of Medicis, in 1620, to ornament the gallery of the palace of the Luxembourg. He accomplished this great work in twenty-four compartments, representing, in very ingenious allegorical and emblematical subjects, the principal events of the life of that princess. The series was painted at Antwerp, except two pictures, which he finished at Paris, in 1623, when he arranged the whole in the gallery. If the surprising number of large pictures painted by Rubens were not sufficient testimonies of the abundance and facility of his genius, this immense gallery, completed in three years, would amply demonstrate it. It was at this period that he became acquainted with the Duke of Buckingham, who accompanied Prince Charles through France, in his way to Madrid, and who afterwards became the purchaser of his rich museum of works of art. On his return to the Netherlands he was honoured with several conferences with the Infanta Isabella, on the then critical state of the government of the Low Countries, who was so satisfied with his political intelligence and capacity, that she sent him to Madrid for instructions, preparatory to a negotiation for peace between Spain and England. In 1628 he arrived in the Spanish capital, where he was received in the most gracious manner by Philip IV. and the Duke de Olivares, and acquitted himself in his diplomatic capacity entirely to the satisfaction of the king and his minister. During his residence at the court of Spain, his powers as a painter were not neglected. Philip was in possession of taste, and Olivares had splendour. Rubens was alternately caressed by both. The royal collections of the Escorial, Pardo, and Madrid, an inexhaustible mine of art, were thrown open to his view.

The Duke de Olivares had just completed his foundation of a convent of Carmelites, at the small town of Loeches near Madrid, and the King, as a mark of favour to his minister, commissioned Rubens to paint four pictures for their church, which he executed in his grandest style, and the richest glow of his colouring. They are of large dimensions, and in composition and execution are not excelled by any of his works. The first is an allegorical subject of the Triumph of the New Law, which he has personified in the most beautiful and graceful manner. The figure of Religion, seated on a superb triumphal car, drawn by four angels, with others bearing the cross, with characteristic symbols; four figures expressive of the various characters of Infidelity or Ignorance, over which Religion is supposed to triumph, follow the car, like slaves or captives bound with chains. The group is crowned with beautiful cherubim that hover in the air, with chaplets in their hands, disposed with singular art and the most charming effect. The companion picture represents the Interview of Abraham with Melchizedek, who offers him bread, and the tenth of his spoils. In the drapery of the priests and the armour of the soldiers, Rubens has exhausted every resource that his rich fund of colouring could supply. The other two pictures, of equal size and excellence with the above, represent the Four Doctors of the Church and the Four Evangelists, with their distinctive emblems: compositions of undescribable majesty and expression. He also painted eight grand pictures for the great saloon of the palace at Madrid, which are regarded as matchless specimens of his colouring; they represented the Rape of the Sabines; the Battle between the Romans and Sabines; the Bath of Diana; Perseus and Andromeda; the Rape of Helen; the Judgment of Paris; Juno, Minerva, and Venus; and the Triumph of Bacchus. For those extraordinary productions he was magnificently rewarded, received the honour of knighthood, and was presented with the golden key, as gentleman of the chamber to the king. In 1627 he returned to Flanders, and had no sooner rendered an account of his mission to the Infanta, than he was sent to England, for the purpose of sounding the disposition of the government on the subject of a peace, the principal obstacle to which had been removed by the death of the Duke of Buckingham. Though he was not at first presented to the king in the quality of an envoy, Charles was too zealous a lover of the art not to receive this illustrious painter with every mark of distinction. He engaged him to paint the ceiling of the Banqueting House, where he represented the Apotheosis of James I.

In the frequent visits with which the king honoured our painter whilst he was engaged in this considerable work, Rubens, with infinite delicacy and address, took a favourable opportunity of touching on the subject of a peace with Spain, and finding that monarch no way averse to such a measure, at length produced his credentials, and the king appointed some members of his council to negotiate with him on the subject of a pacification, which was soon after effected. Charles was so much pleased with the conduct of Rubens on this trying occasion, and so satisfied with the exertions of his pencil, that he munificently rewarded him for his labour; and on the 21st of February, 1630, conferred on him the honour of knighthood. The important object of his mission being thus happily accomplished, he returned to the Netherlands, where he was received with all the honours and distinction due to his exalted merit.

Rubens had now reached his fifty-eighth year, was in full possession of the plenitude of his fame, loaded with wealth and honours deservedly acquired, when he experienced some attacks of gout of a more violent nature than those to which he had previously been subject, and they were succeeded by an infirmity and trembling of his hand, which obliged him to renounce all works of large dimensions, and to confine himself to easel pictures. He also found it necessary to abandon all public business, except the instruction of his disciples, and limit his epistolary correspondence to a few distinguished artists, with whom he delighted to hold an intercourse as long as he lived, on which occasion he expressed himself with a warmth of feeling bordering on enthusiasm. We are indebted to the Chevalier Mehel for the preservation of one of his letters, and of some fragments of his advice to his pupils, which are sufficiently interesting to warrant their insertion. A short time before his death, he wrote a letter to Francis du Quesnoy, called Il Fiammingho, the celebrated sculptor, in acknowledgment of the receipt of some casts of the marbles he had executed at Rome, in which he wrote to him in the following terms: "I cannot express to you the obligations I feel for the models you have sent me, particularly for the casts of those admirable children with which you have decorated the tomb of M. in the Chiesa del Anima. It is not art, but nature, that we admire in forms so tender and full of life. In what terms shall I address you, on the universal and well-merited applauses you have acquired by the admirable statue of St. Andrew, which you have lately finished. Your fame and celebrity reflects honour on our country. Did not the infirmity of age, and a fatal gout, which devours me, confine me to my chair, I would fly to Rome, to indulge myself with the sight of objects so deserving of admiration. But as I cannot look for that pleasure, I must satisfy myself with the hope of seeing you soon among us; and I doubt not that our country will be proud of the works with which you will enrich it. May it please Heaven that this may happen before death, which soon will close my eyes for ever, deprives me of the inexpressible satisfaction of contemplating the wonderful productions of that able hand which I kiss with the most profound sentiments of my heart." Of the process of his colouring we have some intimation in the following extract from his lessons. "Begin," says he, "by painting in your shadows lightly, taking particular care that no white is suffered to glide into them, it is the poison of a picture, except in the lights; if once your shadows are corrupted by the introduction of this baneful colour, your tones will no longer be warm and transparent, but heavy and leady. It is not the same," continues he, "in the lights, they may be loaded with colour as much as you may think proper, provided the tones are kept pure; you are sure to succeed in placing each tint in its place, and afterwards, by a light blending with the brush or pencil, melting them into each other, without tormenting them, and on this preparation may be given those decided touches, which are always the distinguishing marks of the great master."

Rubens continued to exercise his art until the year 1640, when he died, at the age of 63. He was buried with extraordinary pomp in the church of St. James, under the altar of his private chapel, which he had previously decorated with one of his finest pictures. His widow and children erected a monument to his memory, with an epitaph, which, as it is particularly explanatory of his varied faculties, and of the honours which were conferred on him, is here inserted.

Perhaps no painter has left behind him so many and so considerable proofs of the excellence and variety of his powers. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, animals, fruit, and flowers; and it would be difficult to decide in which he most excelled.

Flanders, France, Italy, and England, abound with the admirable productions of his pencil; and it will be easily conceived that a particular detail of them is beyond the compass to which a work of this nature is necessarily limited. From his birth he had evinced a lively, elevated, and universal genius, and had enriched his mind with an extensive and intimate acquaintance with history, poetry, and the belles lettres. With the possession of such resources, he invented with facility; and his incessant practice gave him an unexampled dexterity of execution. Of the fertile powers of his imagination, regulated by learning and taste, he has given abundant demonstration, in his admirable series of allegories, in the gallery of the Luxembourg. His genius was adapted to the grandest compositions; and his powers appear to have expanded themselves in proportion to the scale on which they were called upon to act. He did not, like Raffaëlle, possess that mild inspiration of sentiment which manifests itself in the graceful and beautiful, but he was animated with that poetic fire, that displays itself in effects which astonish and surprise. His most abundant compositions seem to have been produced without effort, and creation appears to have been an operation of his will.

Rubens has been unjustly refused the merit of an able designer. His drawing is, however, generally grand and facile, his outline free and flowing, and he had a competent acquaintance with anatomy; though it cannot be denied that correctness occasionally yielded to the impetuosity of his conceptions and the vivacity of his execution, yet, in his great works, we meet with naked figures as admirable for their drawing as for their inimitable colouring. Such is his stupendous picture of the Fallen Angels, in the Dusseldorf Gallery. Of this astonishing production Sir Joshua Reynolds has favoured us with the following description: "If we consider the fruitfulness of invention which is discovered in this work, or the skill which is shown in composing such an infinite number of figures, or the art of the distribution of the light and shadow, the freedom of hand, the facility with which it is performed, and what is still more extraordinary, the correctness and admirable taste of drawing of figures foreshortened, in attitudes the most difficult to execute, we must pronounce this picture to be one of the greatest efforts of genius that the art has produced." It will not be attempted to be denied, that he preferred the brilliancy of effect to the beauty of form, and too frequently sacrificed the correctness of design to the magic of his colouring. His works exhibit those qualities which evince a daring and enthusiastic conception, rather than the characteristics of a refined meditation or profound thought. He had studied the antique, Michael Angelo, and Raffaëlle; but, far from his studies having elevated his mind to a feeling of the beautiful ideal, or an elegant selection of nature, he continued to attach himself to an unembellished imitation of the models of his country. This defect is particularly discernible in his female forms, which have seldom any pretensions to elegance or grace.

Although Rubens was not incapable of expression, yet we must not look to his pictures for the graceful and dignified airs which captivate us in the works of Raffaëlle or Domenichino; and he was more capable of expressing the violent affections of the mind, than the placid and the bland. As a colourist, Rubens deservedly holds a distinguished rank. If he is less chaste than Titian, he is more brilliant. Rubens claims our applause by the lustrous splendour of his tints; Titian secures our approbation by the purity of his tones and harmony of his effect. As an executive painter, Rubens may with truth be said to have surpassed every artist that has hitherto appeared; and the unexampled promptitude of his handling has given rise to an opinion, however erroneous, that the greater part of his large pictures were chiefly painted by his disciples, and ultimately retouched by himself. By this commanding power, which he possessed in the highest degree, Rubens was enabled to represent every object he undertook with the most characteristic propriety. His animals, especially those of a ferocious kind, are painted with a spirit and energy that is unequalled; his lions and tigers are touched with a fierceness peculiarly adapted to their character; and his horses, always of the noblest race, are designed with a fire and animation that is inimitable. In his landscapes he reminds us of the grandeur of Titian, and they are no way inferior to those of that illustrious painter. The picturesque forms of his rocks and trees, the deep shadows in his glades and glooms, the watery sunshine, the dewy verdure, the airiness and facility of his touch, exhibit a charm, and show a variety of invention, which form a striking contrast with the mild amenity and uniform glow we admire in the fascinating productions of Claude Lorraine. "The pictures of Rubens have this effect on the spectator, that he feels himself in no wise disposed to pick out and dwell on his defects. The criticisms which are made on him are indeed often unreasonable. His style ought no more to be blamed for not having the sublimity of Michael Angelo, than Ovid should be censured for not resembling Virgil."

[The pictures ascribed to Rubens in Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vols. ii. and ix., amount to about eighteen hundred; of these, no doubt, a great number were executed by his pupils and assistants, under his direction, and from sketches or designs furnished by himself. The names of these scholars and coadjutors were Anthony Van Dyck, Justus Van Egmont, Theodore Van Thulden, Abraham Diepenbeck, Jacques Jordaens, Peter Van Mol, Cornelius Schut, Jan Van Hoeck, Simon de Vos, Peter Soutman, Deodati Delmont, Erasmus Quellinus, Francis Wouters, Francis Snyders, John Wildens, Lucas Van Uden, Jodocus Mompers: of these, the greater number assisted in the figures; Snyders, in the animals and fruit; Wildens, Van Uden, and Mompers, in the landscapes. Several other distinguished Flemish painters of the period, who were not his disciples, adopted his style; among these, the most eminent were Martin Pepin, Gerard Seghers, and Gaspar de Crayer. There are upwards of twelve hundred engravings of pictures attributed to Rubens; but reliance must not be placed on many of them as being taken from his genuine works. Those by the Bolswerts, Paul Pontius, De Jode, and other contemporary engravers who worked under the master's supervision, may be considered genuine; for even if the executive part of the picture was not entirely by his hand, he designed and finished it, and it became his child by adoption. Monsieur Burtin, in his Treatise on the Knowledge necessary to Amateurs of Pictures, says, that "M. Van Parys, of Antwerp, one of Rubens's descendants by the female side, assured him that it was known by a continued tradition in the family, that there scarcely exist two hundred pictures or sketches painted entirely by Rubens himself after his return from Italy, and that among these there were not above twenty large ones, the rest having been all easel pictures, generally painted on panel, the size of which was not more than a foot for sketches, and scarcely ever beyond five feet for his finished pictures." "Having asked M. Van Parys," continues M. Burtin, "if the tradition conveyed information which were the twenty great pictures, he acknowledged that he knew only of three, namely, St. Ildefonso, St. Ambrose repelling Theodosius, and St. Ignatius exorcising the Demoniacs; three marvels of art which the gallery at Vienna has the happiness to possess." Let others, who, like M. Van Parys, have implicit faith in tradition, believe this report; records, on which greater reliance may be placed, affirm the contrary. However, there is a qualifying word in M. Van Parys's reply; he only knew of three large pictures. Monsieur Burtin, the connoisseur, and instructor of amateurs, could have supplied further information; perhaps he had not, at that time, a large picture by the master in his collection. The inscription for the monument to the memory of Rubens was written by his friend Gevartius; but the monument was not erected until about a century after his death. This pious act was performed by Jean Baptiste Van Parys, a descendant of the family, and a canon of the church in which Rubens was buried. It may be noted, that his second wife, (for he had only two), Helena Forment, afterwards married Baron J. B. Broecheven, a Flemish nobleman in the Spanish service in the Netherlands. There are nine pictures by Rubens in the English National Gallery; namely, The Abduction of the Sabine Women; An Allegory of Peace and War, or Peace and Plenty, presented by the late Marquis of Stafford; The Conversion of St. Bavon, probably a study for the large picture in the church of St. Bavon in Ghent, bequeathed by Holwell Carr; The Elevation of the Brazen Serpent, obtained by purchase; A Landscape, with a view of the Château de Stein, presented by Sir George Beaumont; A Holy Family, with St. George, and other Saints, said to be portraits of Rubens and his family, as may be said of many other Holy Families by him; A Landscape, Sunset, bequeathed by the late Lord Farnborough; The Apotheosis of James I., a sketch; and, The Judgment of Paris, for which the nation paid 4000 guineas, but for what good purpose it is difficult to say. In the Appendix to Pictorial Notices of Anthony Van Dyck, &c., by Mr. W. H. Carpenter, (a work containing an account of many curious and interesting facts relating to artists of the time, extracted from authentic documents,) will be found several letters which passed between Rubens and Sir Dudley Carleton, which throw great light on Rubens's artistic life, and the nobleness of his character in his mode of dealing with those who were desirous to possess his works. He candidly avows that such and such were not wholly executed by him, but being from his designs, and having received the last touches from his hand, he considers them as entirely his own. These letters are transcribed from the originals in the State Paper Office, and are given (those by Rubens) in the original Italian, with a correct literal translation. Every person who feels interested in the matter should read them; they are the cream of his artistic history. There are, also, in Mr. Carpenter's work, copies of warrants, orders for payment, receipts for money, and other documents from the same authentic source, relating to this great man, which will give great pleasure to his admirers, and for which Mr. Carpenter is entitled to their thanks.]

Rubens occasionally amused himself with the point, and we have a few etchings by him, which are executed in a bold and masterly style, though slight. They are as follow :

St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.

Mary Magdalene Penitent.

St. Catherine; a design for a ceiling.

An old Woman holding a lighted Candle, with a Boy lighting another by it. When Rubens had etched the plate, a few impressions only were taken off, which are now become extremely scarce. It was afterwards finished by another hand. There is a copy of this print by Cornelius Visscher.

The Portrait of an English Minister; signed P. P. Rubens, fecit.

RUBENSTEIN, or RIEBENSTEIN. This artist was a native of Germany, but resided in England several years. He painted dead game and still-life, and sometimes portraits. He was a member of the Society of Painters, in St. Martin's Lane, and died in London about the year 1763.

RUBIALES, PEDRO DE. This Spanish painter was a native of Estremadura, and flourished about the year 1545. Little is known of his works in Spain, as he resided the greater part of his life at Rome and Florence, where he studied under Francesco Salviati, whom he assisted in many of his works. One of his best productions was his picture of the Conversion of St. Paul, in the church of Spirito Santo in Sassia, at Rome. He was also a co-adjutor of Giorgio Vasari, in some of his works. [Dr. Juan de Valverde, in his work on anatomy, speaks highly of the knowledge of Rubiales in that science, and couples his name with that of Michael Angelo. Rubiales painted as late as 1560; the time of his decease is not ascertained.]

[RUBIRA, DON ANDRES DE, a Spanish painter, was born at Escacena del Campo, and was a scholar of Domingo Martinez at Seville. His application and activity were very useful to his master in the different works which he was commissioned to paint; for, it is said, he sketched the greater part of the pictures in the ancient chapel of the Cathedral, and they were terminated by Martinez. When Francisco Vieira, painter to the King of Portugal, returned from Rome by way of Seville, he prevailed on Rubira to accompany him to Lisbon, and the latter profited much by the instructions of this excellent master. On his return to Seville he exhibited such increased talent in his art, that he was soon employed on works of great importance, such as the pictures in the chapel of the Holy Sacrament, in the collegiate of San Salvador, a great part of those of the college of S. Alberto, and most of those that decorate the cloister del Carmen calzado. He also occasionally painted conversation pieces, interiors, and what are called Bambocciati. There is a picture by him of a blind man, of tall stature, singing and playing on the guitar, which is painted so naturally, and with such power, that at first view it appears to be the work of Velasquez. Rubira died at Seville in 1760.]

[RUBIRA, JOSEF DE, son of the preceding, was born at Seville in 1747. Though only thirteen at his father's death, he would not submit to be instructed by another master, but with the little he had learnt from his father, and by copying the works of Murillo, he arrived at considerable proficiency in the mechanism of the art. He was an excellent copier of the works of Murillo, and, among others, copied a magnificent picture of a Holy Family by that master, for Don Francisco de Bruno, which has deceived many an amateur. He died in 1787.]

RUCHOLLE, PETER, an indifferent French engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He engraved a few portraits, among which we have that of Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy; after Vandyck; with the address of J. Meyssens.

And Louis XIV.; after H. Rigaud.

[RUEDA, GABRIEL DE, a Spanish historical painter, resided at Granada at the commencement of the seventeenth century: there are several pictures by him in that city, which are held in great estimation. He was appointed painter to the holy church of Toledo in 1733. He died on Christmas Eve, in 1641.]

[RUFO, JOSEF MARTIN, an historical and portrait painter, was born at the Escorial, and was educated at the academy of S. Fernando. He was a successful competitor for the prizes given by that establishment, and regularly obtained the first or second, during the time he was studying there; and these competition pictures by him are still preserved in the academy. He afterwards painted many public works, among which are particularized those that represent the Life of S. Juan de la Cruz, in the cloister of the Carmelitas descalzos; and the portrait of Ferdinand VI., which was in the monastery del Paular, in the collection of the kings of Spain. He flourished in the second half of the eighteenth century.]

RUGENDAS, GEORGE PHILIP, was born at Augsburg in 1666, and was first instructed in design by Isaac Fishes, a painter of history; but his genius leading him to paint battles and skirmishes of cavalry, he formed his style by studying the works of Borgognone, and the prints of Tempesta. He had acquired considerable reputation by his pictures of that description, when he resolved to visit Italy, and, 1692, went to Venice, where he passed some time, and was assisted in his studies by Giovanni Batista Molinari. From Venice he went to Rome, where it was not long before his talents became known, and he met with such flattering encouragement in that metropolis, that he had thoughts of establishing himself there; but the death of his father obliged him to return to Augsburg, and he quitted Italy with regret in 1695. In a few years after his return to Augsburg, the war of the Succession broke out, when Rugendas had a melancholy opportunity of personally witnessing those scenes of slaughter and desolation, which his imagination had so frequently traced with his pencil. During the siege, bombardment, and pillage of Augsburg, by the French and Bavarians, in 1703, when all the citizens were overwhelmed with alarm, confusion, and despair, when himself and his property were at the mercy of the furious assailants, he exposed himself to the most imminent danger, to contemplate, with the eye of a painter, the attacks of the besiegers, which he designed with sang-froid, surrounded on all sides with carnage and destruction. He afterwards published a set of etchings from the drawings he had made under such extraordinary circumstances.

Rugendas merits a distinguished place among the painters of battles. Though he possessed an abundant and fertile imagination, his compositions are the result of judgment and reflection; his design is correct, and he consulted nature in every object he drew. Many of the most illustrious personages of Germany employed his pencil, and his works are found in the choicest collections of his country; they are very numerous, as he possessed a surprising facility of execution. His works exhibit three different styles, according to the various periods of his life. In the first he appears to have been less attentive to the correctness of design than the charm of colouring; in the second, his colouring is less attractive, but his drawing is decided and correct, and his touch more animated; in his last and best manner, he successfully combined an harmonious colouring with accuracy of design, and uncommon freedom of pencil. This ingenious artist died at Augsburg in 1742. Independent of his extensive occupation as a painter, Rugendas devoted a considerable portion of his time to engraving, and has executed a great number of plates, both etchings and in mezzotinto; among which are the following:

ETCHINGS.

A set of six Plates; entitled, Capricci di Giorgio Filippo Rugendas. 1698.

Eight Plates; entitled, Diversi Pensieri fatto per Giorgio Filippo Rugendas, Pittore. 1699.

A set of eight Plates, representing horsemen.

Six Plates of Cavalry marching.

The military operations of the French and Bavarian armies at the siege of Augsburg; in six Plates. 1704.

MEZZOTINTO.

Four Plates of Skirmishes between the Prussian and Hungarian Hussars.

Four Plates of Huntings of the Lion, Tiger, &c.

[Besides battles, he painted horse markets and horse exercises, and his pictures are filled with objects. In design he is generally vigorous and bold, but frequently unequal in his colouring; and many of his works have become black and obscure. There is a picture of the battle of Blenheim by him, and also of that of Narva, in which 8000 Swedes under Charles XII. defeated 80,000 Russians. He was the ancestor of numerous painters and engravers of the same name, some of whom are living at the present time.]

RUGENDAS, CHRISTIAN. According to Huber, he was the son of the preceding artist, by whom we have a great number of prints in mezzotint, after the designs of his father, representing marches, halts, battles, &c. [He engraved about sixty of his father's designs; and there are by him about thirty etchings from his own, which are much esteemed. He died at Augsburg in 1781, at the age of 73.]

RUGGERI, GUIDO. This artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1550. He was a disciple of Francesco Raibolini, called Il Francia, and accompanied Primaticcio to France, where he assisted that master in his great work at Fontainebleau. He is, however, more known as an engraver than a painter. He engraved several plates from the designs of Primaticcio, which are executed in a style resembling that of Marco da Ravenna; and it is not improbable that he learned engraving in the school of Marc Antonio Raimondi. His plates were usually marked with a monogram composed of a G. and an R. joined together, with an F. for fecit, RF. [The etchings attributed to this master partake of the manners of Giulio Bonasone, Caraglio, and Giorgio Ghisi; but there is great uncertainty respecting them. Bartsch classes twenty-two under the monogram F. G., (N^o. 86, tom. ix.) and mentions others in iv. and xv. with different signatures; all which Nagler places to the account of Guido Ruggieri. The inquirer will do well to consult both those authorities on the subject.]

RUGGIERI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called DEL GESSI. This painter was a native of Bologna, and was for some time a disciple of Domenichino, but he afterwards became a scholar of Francesco Gessi, whom he accompanied to Naples, and assisted him in some of his principal works in that city, and at Bologna. He visited Rome in the pontificate of Urban VIII., where he was patronized by the Marchese Giustiniana, and painted some pictures for the churches and palaces. In S. Maria della Minerva is a fine picture by him of the Nativity; and in S. Caterina a Monte Magnanapoli, he painted in fresco Mary Magdalene and St. Catherine, with St. John the Baptist, St. Dominic, and St. Philip Neri. His principal works at Bologna are, the Assumption of the Virgin, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the church of S. Barbaziano, which have sometimes been mistaken for the works of Guido. This promising artist died at Rome, at the premature age of 32, much regretted by the admirers and professors of the art. [Zani says he was born in 1606, and died in 1640.]

RUGGIERI, ERCOLE, called DEL GESSI. According to Malvasia, he was the brother of the preceding artist, and was also educated in the school of Francesco Gessi, whose style he followed with so much success, that his works are with difficulty distinguished from those of his master. Such are his picture of the Death of St. Joseph, in the church of S. Cristina di Pietralata, at Bologna; and the Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Catherine, and other saints, at the Servi.

RUIDIMAN, or REUTTIMAN, JOHN CONRAD. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of some plates of foliage, and other ornamental designs, published at Augsburg. [His name was Reutlimann; he was a goldsmith, and lived in the first half of the seventeenth century.]

RUINA, GASPARO, an indifferent engraver on wood, by whom we have a cut representing the Creation of Adam, which is evidently taken from the painting by Michael Angelo, in the Vatican, though it is inscribed, Hieronymo de Grandi, pinxit. Gaspar Ruina, fecit. [Zani and Brulliot say he was the engraver who marked his prints with three darts crossed, and sometimes accompanied with the letter G. There are several historical, mythological, and allegorical prints by him, signed Gasparo, f. or Gasparo Ruina, f. His manner is peculiar; his shadows are produced by numerous fine hatchings, which make them, in many places, appear black. He lived about the end of the sixteenth century.]

RUISCH, or RUYSCH, RACHEL. This celebrated paintress of flowers and fruit was born at Amsterdam in 1664. She was the daughter of Frederick Ruisch, the celebrated professor of anatomy. At a very early age, without the instruction of a master, or any other assistance than that of copying the prints that accidentally fell in her way, she had given such convincing proofs of an extraordinary disposition for the art, that her father procured her the lessons of William van Aelst, an eminent flower painter. She not only surpassed her instructor, but it may be very reasonably questioned whether she has not excelled every other artist, in the department which she adopted, not excepting even the admirable productions of John van Huysum. Without partaking of the enthusiasm of Descamps, who unequivocally asserts, that "in her pictures of flowers and fruit she surpassed nature herself;" it may be very justly said that she has represented those subjects in so admirable a manner, as to produce perfect illusion, which is rendered more exquisite by the selection of her objects, and her tasteful and picturesque manner of grouping them. The extraordinary talents of this lady recommended her to the particular patronage of the Elector Palatine, who, in 1708, appointed her his paintress. That prince was so great an admirer of her pictures, that he possessed a considerable portion of her finest works, for which she was munificently rewarded. Rachel Ruisch continued the exercise of her extraordinary talents with undiminished excellence, until she had reached a very advanced age, and died at Amsterdam in 1750. [She married, when young, a portrait painter, Jurian Pool, and is frequently called by that name. They lived together about fifty years, and had ten children, yet she always signed her pictures with her maiden name. She was more successful in painting flowers than fruit, and she chose exotics in preference to those that were indigenous to her country. She is admirable in her manner of grouping as well as in pencilling; and each flower is relieved by its neighbour, and all kept in perfect harmony. With great taste and judgment she introduced among her flowers the insects peculiar to the country whence they were derived; and these she depicted with microscopic accuracy. The labour she bestowed on her works prevented their being numerous; two, a flower and a fruit piece, are said to have occupied her for seven years; and these she bestowed on one of her daughters as a marriage portion. It must, however, be confessed that some of her pictures have lost their pristine lustre, and become dark; and others are attributed to her in which she had no hand. In Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vols. vi. and ix., are descriptions of about thirty only, a proof of their great rarity. They continue to command large prices when brought to public competition.]

RUIZ DE LA IGLESIA, FRANCISCO IGNACIO, was born at Madrid about the middle of the 17th century, and was a disciple of Francisco Camillo; but he perfected himself in the knowledge of colouring in the school of Juan Carreño. He was appointed painter to Philip V. in 1689, and had other services in the palace. He painted several portraits of that monarch, habited in the short black cloak and ruff; a dress which he adopted on his arrival in Spain. He was employed, with Antonio Palomino, in ornamenting several of the public buildings and churches at Madrid, both in fresco and in oil; and others were the work of his own hand. He died in 1704, and was buried at Saint Felipe Neri, where he had painted an episode in the History of the Life of Saint Joseph.]

RUIZ GIXÓN, JUAN CARLOS, lived at Seville, about the year 1677. It would seem that he had practised under Herrera the younger, as his style entirely resembles that master's. This is particularly observable in a picture of the Immaculate Conception, surrounded by numerous angels, in the cathedral at Seville, in which the grand taste, fine colouring, and bold execution would make it pass for a work of that master, but that Ruiz has signed it with his name, as he did all his productions.]

RUIZ GONZALEZ, DON PEDRO, a painter of history and other subjects, was born at Madrid in 1633, and at the age of thirty commenced the study of painting under Juan Antonio Escalante. After the death of that master he placed himself in the school of Juan Carreño, under whose instructions he made such progress that in a short time he was patronized by many persons of rank. He painted for the church of S. Millan three pictures, which were destroyed by the fire that occurred in 1720. He particularly excelled in small pieces, which he sketched with so much grace, and coloured so beautifully, that they passed for the works of some of the great masters of the Venetian school. He had the same facility in the use of the crayon; and the drawings he made in this manner he washed, and always signed with his name, averring that he did the latter that his faults might not be attributed to others. Although he commenced the study of the art late in life, he succeeded so well as to die rich at Madrid in 1709. His public works were in the churches of S. Isidoro el Real, La Merced Calzada, Enfermería de la Tercera orden de S. Francisco, S. Justo, S. Gines, S. Luis, and Monjas de Santa Ana, at Madrid.]

RUNCIMAN, ALEXANDER. This painter was a native of Scotland. He is said to have served his apprenticeship to a coach-painter, and by dint of practice to have acquired a facility of hand, and a considerable intelligence in colouring, though he was still un instructed in the design of the figure. He travelled to Italy, and on his return exhibited some pictures in 1772. The next year he settled at Edinburgh, where he conducted the Academy of Arts recently established in that city, where he painted some historical pictures, among which was the Ascension, in the episcopal church. He was patronized by Sir James Clerk, who employed him to decorate his mansion at Pennycook with some subjects from Ossian. He died about the year 1780. There are a few etchings by this artist from his own designs, among which are the following :

Sigismunda weeping over the Heart of Tancred.
A View in Edinburgh, called the Netherbow Port.

[Runciman died in 1785, in his 49th year. His best works are his sketches; his faults of extravagance are only multiplied by his pictures, in which he aimed at the manner of Fuseli.]

RUOPPOLI, GIUSEPPE, a painter of flowers and fruit, and particularly excellent in the representation of grapes, was born at Naples in 1600, and died there in 1659.]

RUPERT, PRINCE PALATINE OF THE RHINE. The invention of engraving in mezzotint was for some time ascribed to this illustrious personage, from a tradition received by Vertue from Mr. Killebrew, of Somerset House, to whom it had been communicated by Evelyn, the author of Sculptura. The circumstance which led to the discovery is thus related: The Prince, going out early one morning, observed a soldier employed in cleaning his musket from the rust, which the night dew had occasioned, and on examining it perceived something like a figure corroded upon the barrel, with innumerable small holes, close together, like friezed work on gold or silver, part of which the soldier had scraped away. He conceived an idea that some contrivance might be found to cover a copper-plate with such a grained ground of fine pressed holes, which would give an impression all black, and that by scraping away those parts which required to be white, the effect of the drawing might be produced. He communicated this idea to Wallerant Vaillant, a painter in his service; they made several experiments, and at last invented a steel roller, cut with tools, to make teeth like a rasp or file, which produced the black ground, which in some measure answered the purpose intended.

The authenticity of this account is rendered extremely questionable by the authority of Baron Heineken, whose general accuracy entitles him to considerable credit, and who decidedly asserts, that the Prince was not the inventor of it. In his book entitled Idee Generale d'une Collection complete d'Estampes, he affirms, that "it was not Prince Rupert who invented the art of engraving in mezzotint, as Vertue and several other authors pretend to say. But it was the Lieutenant-Colonel de Siegen, an officer in the service of the Landgrave of Hesse, who first engraved in this manner; and the print, which he produced, was a portrait of Amelia Elizabeth, Princess of Hesse, engraved as early as 1643. Prince Rupert learned the secret from this gentleman, and brought it into England, when he came over the second time with Charles II. [See also Laborde, Histoire de la Gravure en maniere Noire, Paris, 1839, and the article SIEGEN.]

The following are the prints in mezzotint engraved by Prince Rupert, some of which he marked with the initials R. P. F., the first letter surmounted with a crown,

A Magdalene in contemplation; after M. Merian.

An Executioner holding a Sword in one hand and a Head in the other, probably intended for that of John the Baptist, after Spagnoletto. On the sword is his monogram, and the date 1658. He engraved the head of the executioner a second time, on a smaller scale, for Mr. Evelyn's Sculptura, who informs us that it was presented to him by the Prince himself, as a specimen of the new-invented art.

[Nagler describes 16 prints by him; one has the date 1636, but this is an etching, and not a mezzotint. The British Museum contains the largest collection of his known works, among which are several of the Executioner, one of which is an extraordinary brilliant proof.]

[RUPPRECHT, FRIEDRICH CARL, landscape painter, etcher, engraver on wood, and architect, was born at Oberzenn, near Anspach, in 1779, and died at Bamberg in 1831. After receiving some preliminary instruction at Nuremberg, he went to Dresden and improved himself by studying and copying the pictures of Claude, Titian, Paul Potter, and other of the old masters, in the gallery of that city; and also turned his attention to architecture and perspective, and acquired considerable knowledge of both. In 1802 he made a tour through the south of Germany to study landscape after nature; but it being a time of war, he encountered much interruption in his progress, and, to support himself, was compelled to have recourse to portrait painting. He became acquainted with General Drouet, whose portrait he painted, and those of several of his officers, and for some time accompanied the former through Germany as his interpreter. Portrait painting was his resource, but landscape painting was his delight; he practised it both in oil and water-colours, but chiefly in the latter. These are drawn with great minuteness, and finished like miniatures, at the same time not mannered, but have an air of freedom and originality. He is, however, better known to foreigners by his etchings, which are prized by intelligent collectors, as he never left any imperfect, but would destroy the plate if it exhibited the smallest defect. His countrymen compare his etchings to those of Boissieux, perhaps for the spirit of the execution rather than the subjects. The number is not great, there being only about twenty-four, of which there are many impressions, and a few proofs of destroyed plates; to which may be added a few wood-cuts after the manner of Count Zanetti, and a lithograph. As an architect, he was employed to restore the old cathedral of Bamberg to its primitive state, and he prepared the plans, models, and drawings, for that purpose, and for some years superintended the work, but did not live to witness the completion. The cathedral possesses about a hundred and thirty of his drawings, some of which are interesting to the antiquary, as representing curious objects of ancient date discovered during the progress of the restorations. In other respects, Rupprecht possessed much knowledge, particularly of history, and showed much critical sagacity in matters connected with the fine arts. An enlarged account of his life and works was published at Bamberg in 1843, by J. Heller, and there is a portrait of him after Klein.

ETCHINGS BY F. C. RUPPRECHT.

1. Portrait of E. T. A. Hoffmann, for that writer's Phantasiestücken, published in 1819; there are four variations; the first, before the writing, is very rare. There is also a copy reversed.
2. Cover for "Germany's Celebration of the Battle of Leipsic," by K. W. Fässer, dated 1815, of which there are two variations.
3. A Peasant counting Money; two variations, and a reversed copy. Signed and dated 1814.
4. The Chapel in the Wunderburg, near Bamberg; the artist is seated under a tree, drawing; signed and dated 1815. Of this there were only a few proofs taken, and, as faults were discovered, the plate was destroyed.
5. The same Chapel, but, instead of the artist, on the right a female with a basket, and a man. This is inscribed Maria's Hülf Kirche in der Wunderburg bei Bamberg, with signature, and date 1815. The first impression, without the signature, is very rare.
6. Mary with the Child, with two Angels, under a canopy, half-length figures; beneath is inscribed Maria Hülf, 1738. On the right a view of the chapel of Wunderburg, in which is the picture. Signed and dated 1815. There are three variations; the last with a prayer.
7. The Chapel of St. Elizabeth, at Bamberg; two impressions; the second has the signature, and date 1815.
8. The Altenburg; on the left, near the rocks, a group of trees; from an old painting. R. f. 1816.
9. The Monument of Count Adelbert von Babenberg; three variations, the last dated 1816.
10. View of the Ruins of the Castle of Babenberg.
11. Monument of Adelbert in the wood near Altenburg, of which there are three variations.
12. Engraved Title to B. v. Hornthal's German Frühlingskränzen, 1816. Rupprecht fe.
13. Bamberg, from the north side, on the left a willow; F. C. Rupprecht, fec. 1817. There are four variations; the two first without signature, but with the rainbow; the third has also the rainbow and the signature; the fourth is the finished plate, of great force, but without the rainbow.
14. View of the Church of the Capuchins at Bamberg, with a single bird flying over the roof; F. C. Rupprecht, fec. 1817. There are but few impressions, as the etching was erased.
15. The same, with a flight of twenty birds; signature at bottom. There are two variations; the first is without inscription, the second has Kapuziner und Kloster-Kirche St. Heinrich und Künigunde in Bamberg.
16. Church of the Carmelites, and Convent of St. Theodore, in Bamberg, with Russian carriages, and Cossacks on horseback; signed F. C. Rupprecht, fecit, 1818. There are five variations; the first faintly drawn sky, and a white spot at convent window; second, spot worked on, but corner still light; third, the gable darker; fourth, group of three Russians taken out, and three other soldiers introduced, one of whom leads a dog; fifth, with the inscription Karmeliter-Kirche und Kloster St. Theodor in Bamberg.
17. View of the town of Höchstädt on the Aisch; signed F. C. Rupprecht, fec. 1819. There are only a few impressions of the variations of this, as the plate was destroyed. The first, clouds do not touch mountains on the left; second, the clouds touch mountains; third, the sky deepened on the right.
18. The same subject etched for Haas's History of Slavonia; signed, and dated 1819. Two variations; first, clear etching without writing; second, with Höchstädt an der Aisch.
19. First and second View of the Town-hall of Bamberg, with the lower bridge and several ships, and many figures in foreground. Rupprecht etched this piece in 1815, but too faintly, and he also discovered some faults in the perspective, he therefore erased it. He made a second attempt in 1819, but with no better success, for the aquafortis sunk too deeply. There are, however, several impressions of this latter plate existing, which differ from the first in being darker, and having the monogram C. R. f. At the bottom is inscribed Het Stadhuys to Bamberg.
20. First and second Views of the Cathedral of Bamberg; signed, and dated 1821. Rupprecht etched this view twice, the first being too faint. The second was perfectly successful, and gives the best view of this venerable cathedral. The first without clouds about the church, on the left the mark and 1821, and on the right in the margin F. C. Rupprecht, f. 1821. Second, perfect in the sky, and signed Domkirche zu Bamberg.
21. Visiting Card of the Count von Lamberg, with his name, crest, and various appropriate ornaments. There are impressions where the table is quite light.
22. The Artist's Card; a portfolio and palette on the wall.

ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD.

23. The Virgin, with the Child on her lap, after Parmigiano. At the top F. C. R., and dedication.
24. Christ in the Grave; three holy persons near him. Vignette to the work on the subterranean chapel near Bamberg.
25. An Apostle standing with folded hands, after Parmigiano and Zanetti; dated 1819.
26. St. John in a niche, with his left foot on the Dragon, &c. R. Langer, del., and Rupprecht's monogram, dated 1824.
27. Religion in the Clouds, with a cross and chalice; vignette to Benkert's Religionsfreund für Katholiken, 1820. There are two variations, the latter with the rays at the upper part continued throughout.
28. The Insignia of Priesthood; a Vignette.
29. A lithograph View of the subterranean Chapel at Bamberg, which was discovered in 1819, at the foot of the Altenburg. R. f. on the right.

N^{os}. 23, 25, and 26, are chiaro-scuros printed with two blocks.]

[RUSCHEWEYH, FERDINAND, a designer, engraver, and lithographer, who has distinguished himself by his masterly engravings after Cornelius, Overbeck, Steinle, and other great artists of the present German school; and also after Angelico da Fiesole, Raphael, Giulio Romano, Michael Angelo, Thorwaldsen, and antique bassi rilievi, was a native of Mecklenburg. He commenced his studies at Berlin about 1803, passed some time at Vienna, and in 1808 went to Rome, and associated with his highly talented countrymen studying there, and whose tastes were congenial with his own. His enthusiasm for the works of the oldest Italian masters, and his desire, in his department, to emulate the style of Marc Antonio, qualified him to be the proper exponent of those painters who were desirous of restoring the ancient simplicity and deep religious feeling of the art. Hence his name is indissolubly connected with those above named, who were determined to imbibe inspiration at the fountain-head, and by example to stimulate their countrymen not only to rival the geniuses of former times, but in purity of sentiment, truth of expression, and high poetic feeling, to surpass them. The engravings of Ruscheweyh, and others of the band, have diffused the knowledge of the works of these great artists through Europe; and historical art is resuming that dignified character that she maintained among the ancients. It would be inconvenient to enumerate the many subjects engraved by this artist, while at Rome, consisting of the beautiful illustrations of Goethe's Faust, after the compositions of Cornelius, the sacred classical subjects by Overbeck, Schiller's Eleusinian Festivals, as depicted by Wagner, in addition to a long list after the old Italians. On his return to his native country in 1832, he engraved the well-known admirable picture, by Bendemann, of the Jews in Exile, and Christ in the Temple, and Ruth and Boaz, after Overbeck: the last was published in 1834, since when there is no further record of his ability. Nagler has given a good list of his works.]

[RUSSELL, JOHN, an English portrait painter, chiefly in crayons, was born at Guildford in 1744. He was a pupil of Francis Cotes, whose manner he followed, and his portraits are not inferior to those by Cotes, though somewhat florid in colour. Time and dust have destroyed a great many. He published a work on the elements of painting in crayons, which was considered valuable at the time, and went through two editions. He was also fond of astronomy, and constructed a model showing the appearance of the moon, for which he obtained a patent: he called it the Selenographia, and published a description with plates engraved by himself. In 1788 he was elected an R. A., and died in 1806.]

RUSTICI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Siena about the year 1595, and was a disciple of Francesco Vanni. He for some time imitated the style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, and his pictures, representing subjects by torch-light, resemble those of Gerard Honthorst, called Gherard dalle Notti, though more select in his forms, and more correct in his design. He studied at Rome the works of Annibale Caracci and Guido, and painted some pictures for the public edifices and private collections, which, however, evince an originality of style which may be said to be entirely his own. His most esteemed production was his picture of the Annunciation, in one of the churches at Siena. "If he pleases in his other performances," says Lanzi, "in this he enchants." In the collection of the Grand Duke of Tuscany is a fine picture by Rustici, of an expiring Magdalene; and in the Palazzo Borghese at Rome, a St. Sebastian, which is much admired. He died in the prime of life, in 1625.

[RUTGERS, ———, called THE OLD, was an excellent designer of landscapes with the pen and in water colours, but of whom there is no account. His manner is broad and vigorous, and his figures well grouped. One of his drawings represents fishermen, at break of day, dragging their nets in a river, with others on the opposite bank similarly employed.]

RUVIALE, FRANCESCO, called IL POLIDORINO. According to Dominici, this painter was a native of Spain, though he was brought up at Naples, where he flourished about the year 1540. Having seen some of the works of Polidoro da Caravaggio at Naples, whither he had fled from the sacking of Rome, he became his disciple, and followed the style of that great artist with so much success, that he acquired the name of Il Polidorino. His principal works at Naples are, his picture of the dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary and St. John, in the chapel of the Royal Tribunal; and the Descent from the Cross, in that of the Vicaria Criminale.

RUYSDAEL, [or RUISDAEL,] JACOB. This admired landscape painter was born at Haerlem in 1636. It is not known under whom he studied, but Houbraken informs us, that, although he had given proof of extraordinary ability at the early age of fourteen, he did not at first follow painting as a profession, but for some years applied himself to the study and practice of surgery. He afterwards lived in habits of intimacy with Nicholas Berghem, and he is said to have been advised by that artist to devote his attention entirely to painting. His success warranted the recommendation of his friend; his pictures were purchased with avidity, and he soon became one of the most popular painters of his time. It has been erroneously stated, that this artist travelled to Italy, where he formed the taste of his scenery by his studies in the vicinity of Rome. It would be difficult to form a conjecture more improbable and unfounded. The landscapes of Ruysdael represent the most interesting views in the neighbourhood of Haerlem, where he almost constantly resided; or occasionally the rocky borders of the Rhine, with cascades and waterfalls, which he treated in a style so admirably picturesque, that in those subjects he may be said to be unrivalled.

In the pictures of Ruysdael, it is evident that he designed every thing from nature, and he is unusually happy in his selection of it. His trees and broken grounds are of the most pleasing forms, his skies are light and floating, and there is an agreeable freshness in his verdure, which is almost peculiar to himself. His touch is remarkably free and spirited, his colouring is chaste and clear, and his masses of light and shadow are conducted with a masterly intelligence. The talents of Ruysdael were not confined to landscapes, he painted sea-pieces with equal success, and his pictures of fresh breezes and gales of wind are equal to the productions of any artist who has treated those subjects. The pictures of this captivating painter are now justly held in the highest estimation, and are found in the choicest collections. They are sometimes decorated with figures by Adrian Vander Velde, or Philip Wouwerman, by which their value is considerably increased. He died at Haerlem in 1681. We have a few spirited etchings by the hand of this eminent painter, which, though slightly executed, produce a very natural and masterly effect. Some of them are now become extremely scarce. Mr. Strutt asserts, that "they bear some resemblance to the etchings of Waterloo." The collector will search in vain for this resemblance, as nothing can be more decidedly distinct than the prints of these artists.

[The date of Jacob Ruisdaël's birth is uncertain; it must have been before 1636, as there are pictures by him signed, and dated 1645. Balkema places it in 1640; a glaring inaccuracy. The probability is that he was born at Haerlem in 1630, as it is known that he was but a few years younger than his friend Nicolas Berchem. The pictures of Ruisdaël are so numerous and so well known in England, that it is quite unnecessary to dissertate on their style and excellences, whether in his landscapes, waterfalls, or sea-pieces; in each and all he is pre-eminently the poet as well as the painter. As every subject depicted by him is evidently from nature, it is clear that he did not find the romantic scenery of his grand landscapes in his own country. It is said that he visited Italy, but this does not rest on any sure foundation; there is more probability that he resided for some time on the borders of Germany, and there took his celebrated picturesque views of valleys between ranges of mountains, with the remains of ancient châteaux, the solemnity of woods and groves, or impetuous waterfalls. Those who wish to increase the wealth of Ruysdaël by robbing Everdingen, have made him a student of the wild scenery of Norway; but where is the authority? They find it in the frowning rocks, Norwegian pines piercing the clouds, and foaming cascades tumbling precipitously over the débris caused by many a furious northern tempest. But it is known that Aldert van Everdingen spent much of his life in depicting that scenery, and it would be difficult to point out a picture by him of an entirely placid character. A large landscape, of this class, which is in the magnificent collection at Luton, and was recently exhibited, as by Jacob Ruysdaël, at the British Gallery, bears the impress of Aldert van Everdingen's mind and pencil in every part; and there are many others by him in this country, that are equally misappropriated by the cupidity of dealers, and the credulity of collectors. Ruysdaël does not need these additions to his wealth; he is a sovereign both by land and sea, and the number of his productions in both departments, and in all their varied aspects, must continue his supremacy against every competitor. Smith's "Catalogue raisonné of the Dutch and Flemish Masters," vols. vi. and ix., contains a descriptive account of four hundred and forty-eight pictures by him, (minus those that properly belong to Everdingen, some doubtful, and a few duplicates,) and no doubt there are many more that have not come under that writer's notice. There is one picture in the Earl of Bute's collection at Luton, that deserves particular notice, as differing from all the other known productions of the artist. It represents the interior of the new church at Amsterdam, and is enriched with figures by Wouwerman. Waagen remarks, that as this great master in his few sea-pieces rivals the best pictures of the greatest marine painters, so in this he equals the most celebrated painters of architecture.]

RUYSDAEL, SOLOMON. This artist was the elder brother of Jacob Ruysdael, born at Haerlem in 1616. He painted landscapes and views of rivers in Holland, in which he imitated the style of John van Goyen, and was very probably his scholar. The pictures of Solomon Ruysdaël are poorly painted, and produce a slight and feeble effect. He died at Haerlem in 1670. [Most of the Dutch writers agree that Solomon Ruysdaël was about 20 years older than Jacob, but they are not agreed about the year in which he was born. Solomon's pictures have very little resemblance to those of Van Goyen. They are, in general, very poor affairs, and appear to be the work of one who scarcely understood the elements of the art, and careless whether he imitated nature or not. Van Goyen was a great master, and would have been ashamed of such a scholar, especially if he were called his imitator. He must have been alive in 1673, as that date appears on some of his pictures.]

RUYTER, N. DE, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1688. He appears to have imitated the style of Paul Pontius, but without much success. Among others, we have a plate by him representing Diana reposing after the Chase; after Gerard Valck.

[RY, PIETER DANKERS VAN, born at Amsterdam in 1605, was a good painter of portraits. He travelled in Sweden, and was painter to Ladislans IV. He died in 1659.]

RYCK, PETER CORNELIUS DE. According to

Descamps, this painter was born at Delft in 1566. He was first placed under the tuition of James Willem, but he afterwards became a scholar of Hubert Jacobs. On leaving that master he went to Italy, and passed some years at Venice, where he formed his style by studying the works of Giacomo Bassano. He painted history and pastoral subjects, which were esteemed in his time. [He died in 1628.]

RYCKAERT, MARTIN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1591, and was for some time a disciple of Tobias Verhaecht, an artist of considerable celebrity. On leaving that master he went to Italy, where he studied several years, and returned to his native country with a great variety of designs he had made of the most remarkable views in the vicinity of Rome. With these resources, he distinguished himself as one of the ablest landscape painters of his time. He embellished his pictures with the ruins of ancient architecture, rocks, mountains, and waterfalls; and his landscapes exhibit a grander choice of scenery than is usually to be found in the artists of his country. His works are occasionally decorated with figures by John Breughel. It is reported of this artist, that being occupied in designing the fortress of Namur, he was seized by the soldiers, and carried before the governor as a spy, who liberated him, on being convinced of the innocence of his intention. He lived in habits of intimacy with Vandyck, who painted his portrait, among the eminent artists of that time. He died at Antwerp in 1636. [Martin Ryckaert was born with one arm. His manner of painting resembles that of J. Momper. Balkema differs from all writers of credit in stating that he was born in 1570, and that he died in 1626. Füssli says he died at Paris.]

RYCKAERT, DAVID, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1615, and was first instructed in landscape painting by his father; but the high estimation in which the works of Brower and Teniers were then held, induced him to attempt similar subjects, in which he was eminently successful. The Archduke Leopold, a great encourager of art, favoured him with his particular protection. In 1651, he was appointed director of the Academy at Antwerp, and his pictures were so much admired, that it was with difficulty he could keep pace with the demand for his works. He usually painted assemblies of peasants regaling, musical parties, and the interiors of chemists' laboratories; though he occasionally attempted subjects of a more elevated character. Towards the latter part of his life he frequently represented grotesque and fantastical objects, such as spectres, incantations, the Temptation of St. Anthony, &c. These absurdities appear to have been much in vogue about that time; and even the distinguished talents of Teniers were often employed in similar whimsicalities. He gave a lively and expressive character to his heads, his colouring is clear and transparent, and his pencil is light and spirited. The pictures of David Ryckaert are not often met with in this country, though they are to be found in the most select collections of Flanders and Brabant. [According to Immerzeel, he was born in 1613, and died in 1677, though others agree with the date given in the text. It is said by Füssli and Zani that he was the son of David Ryckaert, whom Balkema calls David Van Arp Ryckaert, born in 1545, and by whom there is a picture in the Museum at Amsterdam. He must have been 68 or 70 years old when the younger David was born. The portrait painted by Van Dyck is not that of the younger

David, as it represents a man advanced in years, and he was only about 26 when Van Dyck died. Zani says the elder David Ryckaert was living in 1640.]

RYCKMAN, NICHOLAS, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1620. From the appearance of his style, it is probable that he was a pupil of Paul Pontius. His plates are executed with the graver in a neat, formal manner, and his drawing is generally incorrect. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

The Adoration of the Magi; after Rubens. The best impressions are before the address of either Gas. Huberti, or Corn. van Merlen.

The Entombing of Christ; after the same.

The Holy Family; after the same.

Christ and the Twelve Apostles; after the same; thirteen plates. The best impressions are before the address of E. Coninck.

Achilles discovered by Ulysses at the court of Lycomedes; after the same.

RYDER, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1790. He executed several plates in the dotted manner, which possess great merit. Among others, are the following :

The Captive; after J. Wright.

The Last Supper; after West.

The Murder of James I. King of Scotland; after Opie.

He also engraved after Angelica Kauffman, Shelley, &c.

[Thomas Ryder was born in 1746, and died in 1810. He was one of the artists employed by Boydell to engrave the Shakspeare Gallery, and for which he executed eight of the large plates. They are among the best, and are after Fuseli, Stothard, Smirke, Northcote, Ramberg, Durno, Hamilton, and J. F. Rigaud.]

RYLAND, WILLIAM WYNNE, an eminent English engraver, born in London in 1732. He was a pupil of Simon Francis Ravenet, who was at that time established in England. On leaving that master he went to Paris, where he studied design for some time under Francis Boucher, and received the instruction of J. P. le Bas in engraving. After a residence of five years in Paris, where he engraved several plates, he returned to England, and was soon afterwards appointed engraver to the king. He engraved two whole-lengths of his Majesty, after Ramsay, and a portrait of the Queen, after Coates. In the latter part of his life he applied himself to engraving in the chalk manner, principally from the pictures of Angelica Kauffmann, which style he is said to have first introduced into England, and which he greatly improved. The following are his principal plates :

PORTRAITS.

George III., King of Great Britain, &c.; after Ramsay; whole-length.

Charlotte, Queen of Great Britain, &c.; after Coates.

John Stuart, Earl of Bute; after Ramsay.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Antiochus and Stratonice; after P. da Cortona.

Jupiter and Leda; after F. Boucher.

The Graces bathing; after the same.

Charity; after Vandych.

Four plates representing the Muses, Urania, Thalia, Erato, and Clio; after Cupriani.

SUBJECTS AFTER ANGELICA KAUFFMAN.

Patience; oval.

Perseverance; the same.

Maria, from Sterne's Sentimental Journey.

Telemachus recognised at the court of Sparta.

Achilles lamenting the Death of Patroclus.

Penelope awakened by Euryclea.

Eleonora sucking the Venom from the Wound of Edward.

Lady Elizabeth Grey imploring Edward IV. for her husband's lands.

The Judgment of Paris.

Venus on her Car.

The Flight of Paris and Helen.

Venus presenting Helen to Paris.

Juno borrowing the Cestus of Venus.

A Sacrifice to Pan.

Cupid bound, with Nymphs breaking his Bow.

Cupid asleep, with Nymphs awaking him.

Cymon and Iphigenia.

The Interview between Edgar and Elfrida after her marriage with Athelwold. This plate was left imperfect, and was finished by Mr. Sharp, after his unfortunate death, for the benefit of his widow.

[Fourteen plates engraved for the edition of Walton's Angler, published by Sir John Hawkins in 1760.]

Ryland introduced chalk engraving (lines composed of dots) into England, and in the latter years of his life devoted himself exclusively to engraving in this style, in which he had no equal, but chiefly, except a few drawings by the old masters, after the works of Angelica Kauffman, a circumstance that is to be regretted, as the works of that lady have very little to recommend them to the lovers of art. He also engraved, in the same manner, the large plate of King John signing Magna Charta, after Mortimer; this plate he left unfinished, and it was completed by Bartolozzi for the benefit of his widow. As an etcher, or where the needle and graver are combined, Ryland was also excellent. The prints which he engraved in France were executed in this style, of which Watelet says one would suppose his etchings to be the work of a painter. In the work entitled "A Collection of Prints in Imitation of Drawings," published by Charles Rogers, in 2 vols. folio, there are fifty-seven by Ryland, besides the admirable mezzotint portrait of Mr. Rogers at the commencement. These, with few exceptions, are after the old masters, chiefly the Italian. He held the appointment of Engraver to George III., with a pension of £200 per annum; and he carried on an extensive business as a printseller. Strutt laments "that his mercantile engagements should have occupied so considerable a part of his precious time, and prevented his pursuing the arts with that alacrity his genius required, which seemed formed for great and extensive exertions. The unfinished works which he left behind him abundantly prove that he had sufficient knowledge and judgment to carry them to great perfection." These last words refer to the sad event which abruptly put an end to Ryland's labours and life at once. He was executed on a charge and presumption of forgery, in 1783. Strutt, probably from delicacy towards the widow, has abstained from alluding to the circumstance. Great interest was made to save him, but all was unavailing. Popes, and other monarchs, have pardoned, or commuted the punishment of criminals convicted, on conclusive evidence, of crimes of the deepest dye—of murder—in consideration of their great talents as artists; but Ryland lived in a commercial country, where money is the god of idolatry, and where at that period the suspicion, even, of violating its sanctity, was sufficient to put in force the barbarous laws then existing; it was a time, too, when royalty exercised all its prerogatives but that of mercy. Dr. Dodd had been executed for a like offence about six years previously, notwithstanding the universal prayers of the nation for a commutation of his sentence.]

RYN, REMBRANDT VAN. See REMBRANDT.

RYNE, JOHN VAN, a Dutch engraver, who resided in London about the year 1750. He engraved a variety of plates of views in England, the East Indies, &c., among which are the following :

- A View of Batavia. 1754.
- Fort St. George, on the Coast of Coromandel.
- Fort William, in Bengal.
- A View of Bombay, on the Coast of Malabar.
- The Cape of Good Hope.
- A View of the Island of St. Helena.

[This appears to be all that is known of him, except that he was born in Holland in 1712, and that he died in 1760; yet Zani marks him B. B.]

[RYSBRACK, G——, a painter of flowers, dead animals, and other objects of still-life, who lived in the 17th century, but of whom there is no record. His pictures are well painted, and signed.]

RYSBRAECK, or RYSBRÉCHTS, PETER. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1657, and was a scholar of Francis Milé, whom he accompanied to Paris. Following the example of his instructor, he attached himself to the study of the landscapes of Poussin, whose great style is discernible in all his works. His pictures were much admired in France, and endeavours were made to detain him at Paris, by the most flattering encouragement; but his attachment to his native country prevailed, and he returned to Antwerp, where he exercised his talents with great reputation, and was made director of the Academy there in 1713. The landscapes of Rysbraeck are distinguished by a grandeur of style, which though founded on an imitation of the admirable productions of Nicholas [Gaspar] Poussin, possesses sufficient originality to secure him from the imputation of plagiarism. His colouring is harmonious, his touch broad and free, and he possessed great facility of execution. There is, however, a want of variety, and a certain monotony in his pictures, which place them in a very inferior rank to those of his great prototype. An obscure landscape painter of this name resided at Brussels, but his works are too indifferent to be confounded with those of our artist. [Rysbraeck etched six landscapes, which evince his skill in the happy choice of his views, and his noble mode of composition; but it is to be regretted that they are not executed with more freedom, and that he has not given more lightness to the foliage of the trees. At the bottom of each, on the left, is inscribed P. Rysbraeck pinx. fecit et exaravit. They are named from the figures in them, Diana at the Bath, The Woman in a Veil, The Fishermen, Sun-rise, Conversation on the Road, The Woman with her back naked. The time of his death is not correctly ascertained, but Pilkington says in 1716. It was the manner of Gaspar, and not of Nicholas Poussin, that he imitated.]

RYSEN, WARNARD [or WERNER] VAN. This painter was born at Bommel about the year 1600, and was a scholar of Cornelius Poelemburg. He resided some time in Italy, and on his return to Holland painted landscapes, with historical figures, in the style of his instructor, which were held in consideration. According to Descamps, he abandoned painting, and became a dealer in diamonds.

RYTHER, AUGUSTINE, an English engraver and printseller, who resided in London about the year 1590. He engraved some plans of the Spanish invasion, and was principally concerned in engraving the curious Map of Yorkshire, with a view of York in one corner, and Hull in the other; published in Saxton's collection.

[The following extracts from an unpublished work of the late W. Y. Ottley, entitled "Notices of Engravers, and their Works," show that Rytther was much employed in topographical engraving.

"Robert Adams, was surveyor of the buildings, &c. to Queen Elizabeth, and, as Walpole observes, appears to have been a man of ability. He died A. D. 1595, and was buried in Greenwich church, with this inscription: 'Egregio viro, Roberto Adams, operum regiorum supervisor, architecturæ peritissimo. Ob. 1595. Simon Basil, operationum regiarum contrarotulator hoc posuit monumentum 1601.'

"Walpole states that Adams engraved a large Plan or birds'-eye view of Middleburgh, dated 1588; and also, that he drew and engraved a set of Charts, representing the different actions that took place in the Channel between the English fleet and the Spanish Armada, which was published in 1589 by AUGUSTINE RYTHER. This account, which has been adopted by Strutt and others, is very erroneous; I speak not of the plan of Middleburgh, of which I know nothing, but of the charts; for, although the name of Adams appears upon those plates, it is as the designer only, and not as the engraver. I was first assured of this fact by my erudite friend, Francis Douce, Esq., who at the same time informed me of the existence of a copy of the work in the British Museum, which I have since examined.

This work, which appears to be of extreme rarity, consists of twelve plates, including the title. The TITLE has this inscription, within an ornament of scroll-work: 'EXPEDITIO Hispanorum in Angliam vera descriptio. Anno D. M.D.LXXXVIII;' at top are the Arms of England, and at bottom those of the Lord High Admiral; it has no name of designer, engraver, or publisher; it measures, L. 19½, H. 14¾.

Then follow TEN CHARTS, of the same dimensions as the Title. They represent maps of the coast, with the DIFFERENT ENGAGEMENTS BETWEEN THE FLEETS, represented, in small, in those parts of the Channel where they occurred; the names of the different towns, castles, and sea-ports being inserted in their proper places. The sea in all of them is covered with dots, as is the case in some of Saxton's maps, and the plates, like them, have narrow, ornamental borders. They are numbered 1 to 10, at the right-hand bottom corner, and each plate, like the title, has the Arms of England and those of the High Admiral. The Chart, No. 1, represents the first discovery of the Spanish Fleet off the Lizard Point, and the 10th an attack made upon it by some English fire-ships off Calais. But as copies of all these charts are given upon a reduced scale in Pine's work on the Tapestries of the House of Lords, it becomes unnecessary to speak of them separately. Suffice it for me to add, that each plate is inscribed 'Roberto Adamo auctore;' that the 1st and 4th have the date 1588, and that the 1st, 6th, and 7th have also the name of the engraver: 'Augustinus Rytther Sculptit.'

The last plate of the work, L. 29½, H. 20½, is not numbered. It represents a general map of Great Britain and Ireland, with parts of the continental coast, and shows the track of the Armada round the two islands, in its way back to Spain. Towards the left, at bottom: 'Ro. Adamo Auctore — Augustinus Rytther Sculptit.'

"Walpole, as has been said, states that the above plates were published by Rytther in 1589, and perhaps in this he may be correct, although a small book intended by him to accompany them did not make its appearance till the beginning of 1590. This work, an 8vo, or small 4to, of only 27 pages, is entitled :

‘A DISCOURSE CONCERNINGE THE SPANISHE FLEETE INVADINGE ENGLANDE IN THE YEERE 1588, and overthrowne by her Ma^{ties}. NAVIE under the conduction of the Right-honorable the Lorde Charles Howarde, highe Admirall of Englande; written in Italian by Petruccio Ubaldino citizen of Florence, and translated for A. Ryther, unto the w^{ch} discourse are annexed certain tables expressinge the severall exploits, and conflictes had with the said fleete. These bookes with the tables belonginge to them, are to be solde at the shoppe of A. Ryther being a little from Leadenhall, next to the Signe of the Tower.’

This Title is printed from an engraved plate; and in the Dedication to the Lord High Admiral, which follows, Ryther speaks of the time which he had ‘spent in the gravings of the severall Tables belonging to the booke,’ which he terms ‘a new yeeres gift;’ so that we may conclude that it was published at the beginning of the year 1590, which is the date of the Colophon. In his address ‘to the Reader;’ he says, ‘If in the graven tables there be any thing which doth not please thee in regard of the worke, I crave pardon for it, because I count my selfe as yet but a young beginner, do but yet strive to attaine to that excellencie, which I wish for.’ And yet Ryther had, ten or twelve years before, engraved some of the maps in Saxton’s collection. He adds, and I give it as a specimen of his good taste: ‘In the booke it selfe the truth of every thing is set downe so neare as might be, and therefore it is so much the more to be regarded, being also by my friend translated faithfully, onely the Italian flourishes were here and there omitted, because in our English toong they could not sound well without suspicion of flatterie. Farewell. Thine A. Ryther.’ Then follows the narrative, in which the different plates are all along referred to in the proper places in the margin; thus: ‘As appeareth in the 1. table,’ ‘As appeareth in the 2. table,’ &c.

I have been indebted for the loan of this rare and interesting little volume to the courtesy of Roger Wilbraham, Esq., who is also the possessor of what appear to be the ten original drawings, done by some Dutch artist of moderate ability, with the help of which Robert Adams prepared the more careful designs from which the above plates were engraved.

It is stated by Sandrart, in his ‘Academia Artis Pictoræ,’ p. 274, that the designs for the TAPESTRIES OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS, ten in number, were made by Henry Cornelius Vroom, of Harlem, an eminent painter of sea-pieces and shipping, and that they were wove by one Francis Spiring. Pine, in his work on those tapestries, supposes the charts of Robert Adams to have been done for them to be worked after; and, in fact, although the tapestries represent views of the different engagements, whilst the plates of Adams are mere charts, some resemblance between the one and the other is apparent. I incline to the opinion, however, that in the first instance; Vroom made his designs from written descriptions only; that upon their being transmitted, for approval, to England, the different engagements were not thought to be sufficiently distinguished by him from each other; and that the charts of Adams were therefore sent to him, with directions to introduce into his work a little more of that appearance of order in the disposition of the contending fleets, which he would there find.

I have been led to this opinion by a set of prints of a small quarto size, representing the different engagements between the English Fleet and the Spanish Armada, which bear so complete a resemblance of style to the above tapestries, as to leave little or no doubt that they were engraved at the time from the first designs made by Vroom for that work; for they want that regularity of appearance in the disposition of the two fleets which has been just mentioned. These prints measure, L. 7 $\frac{3}{4}$, H. 5 $\frac{1}{4}$, and are engraved in a firm manner, like that of Phil. Galle; but have no artist’s name, and, in the first impressions, are not numbered. Mr. S. Woodburne possesses nine of these pieces, some of them however of a later edition, with numbers, misplaced; wanting, as I suppose, only one to complete the set; and duplicate impressions of the four following are in my own collection.

One of these represents an ENGAGEMENT near ‘PLIMMOUTH,’ which port is seen, with the name inscribed over it, in the upper part of the print on the right.—A second, an ACTION off ‘POORT-LANT,’ which name is written in the sky, on the right.—The third, an ACTION near ‘DUNNE NOSE,’ which name is also inscribed.—The fourth is not distinguished by any written name, but may be known by five alarm-beacons in a line, all of them on fire, in the extreme distance on the left.

“Enough has been said to show that there exist but very slight grounds for the supposition that the above Robert Adams practised the art of engraving.”

“Ralph Aggas, a surveyor in the reign of Elizabeth, supposed to have been a relative of Edward Aggas the printer. There is, I think, no good evidence of his having practised engraving, although from his having been mentioned as an engraver by Walpole, Strutt, and others, it becomes necessary, as in the case of Robert Adams, that I should speak of him here; but he designed, and appears to have been the publisher of the prints which follow:

I. A LARGE PLAN, OR BIRD’S-EYE VIEW OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER, 6 feet 3 inches long, by 2 feet 4 in height, engraved in wood, according to some accounts, upon six, and according to others, upon eight blocks.

There is so much obscurity, nay, seeming discrepancy of evidence, in what has been written by different persons about this old Plan of London, that, upon a first view of the subject, I had but slender hopes of coming at any thing like the truth concerning it. After some research, however, I have satisfied my own mind as to what appear the most material points; and I shall now, as briefly as I can, lay before the reader the result of my inquiries and deliberations, considering the tedious processes of inquiry and deliberation, themselves, to be but ill adapted to a work like the present.

The antiquaries of the last century—Bagford, Letter to Hearne, Feb. 1, 1714-15—Vertue, in Walpole’s Anecdotes—Gough, British Topography, vol. i. pp. 774-5—speak very decidedly of several impressions of this old Plan, extant in their time and examined by them; and it appears clear that they had seen impressions of at least two different editions.

It is, moreover, certain that we possess a faithful copy of the original plan, done from an impression of the first edition, engraved, the size of the original, upon eight plates of pewter, or other soft metal; which copy was I conjecture done in the reign of William III., by some Dutch engraver who accompanied that monarch to England. The great additions which had been made to the metropolis since the early part of Elizabeth's reign, when the first edition of the above old Plan was published, and the circumstance of its having become of extreme rarity, now rendered it a matter of curiosity, and the Dutch artist thought it a good speculation to re-engrave it.

The metal plates themselves, of this copy, afterwards came into the hands of Vertue, who republished them, with the addition of his name, 'Vertue, Soc. Antiq. Lond. excudit 1737,' and they were afterwards bought from him by the Society of Antiquaries, now the possessors of them.

Walpole has carelessly stated that Vertue, himself, re-engraved this copy, in which he has been followed by others. But it is proper to remark, (and I have to thank Mr. Douce for first informing me of this fact,) that both in the library of the Antiquarian Society, and at the British Museum, there exists an impression of these plates, evidently taken off, I should say, long before Vertue was born. Nor are these, strictly speaking, first impressions; as marks of the erasure of an inscription of two short lines, perhaps containing the name of the artist who made the copy, with its date—are, upon a careful examination, to be discovered in that part where Vertue afterwards put his name, especially in that impression which is preserved in the library of the Society of Antiquaries.

I ought not to omit to mention that in this copy, as published in 1737, by Vertue, and as it is now printed, a few small alterations appear from what it was at first; as in the church and palace of Lambeth, the houses built against St. Paul's, and two or three other places: but these, made I suppose by some ignoramus, before Vertue had the plates, are, except the first, very trifling; and I can confidently assure those lovers of topographical antiquities who have not leisure to investigate the subject for themselves, that, with these small exceptions, they have in this print a faithful copy of the first edition of the old Plan in question; a true representation of the metropolis of this now great empire 'A^{no}. Dⁿⁱ. M.D.LXX.:' for this, I doubt not, was the date upon the first edition, as it is the date affixed after the title, 'CIVITAS LONDINUM,' in the copy; the word 'circiter,' inserted in smaller characters, above, having been added by the copyist, I suppose, because, in his time, it was thought by some, as Vertue has hinted—see article, Aggas, in Walpole—that the old Plan represented the city as it was in the time of Henry VIII., or Edward VI.

The genuineness of this copy, and, as a consequence, the antiquity of the original plan of the first edition, from which it was taken, is proved, beyond all controversy, by its exact conformity in every part (even to a small tree noticed and justly insisted upon by Mr. Smith, the intelligent gentleman who presides in the print-room at the British Museum) with that engraved about 1570, upon a reduced scale, and published two or three years afterwards, in Braun's large work, entitled 'Civitates Orbis Terrarum,' which it is certain was copied from the old wood-print; which small Plan was also copied in 'La Cosmographie Universelle,' &c., printed at Paris Anno 1575, in fol. When I first ascertained this fact, after a long and careful comparison of Braun's Plan with the large one in question, at the British Museum, I prided myself not a little upon having made a new and important discovery; but I now find, though it is not I believe generally known, that Bagford found it out before me, and let him therefore have the credit of it.

I shall only add respecting the large copy, that any person conversant in the characteristics of wood engraving, will, upon examination, be soon convinced that it was made after and in imitation of a wood-print. This appears, throughout, in the absence of cross-hatchings, so difficult of application in wood engraving, but easy in engravings on metal, and most strikingly in the broad black line surrounding the print, done by many strokes of the graver, placed close to each other, so as to imitate the broad black line constantly surrounding old wood engravings.

As far as I can learn, no impression of the FIRST EDITION of the original wood-print in 1560 is now known; nor of a SECOND EDITION which there is good reason to believe was published with the addition of new streets or buildings lately erected, many years later in Queen Elizabeth's reign; for Aggas, in his verses upon the Plan of Oxford, hereafter to be mentioned, published 1588, expresses a strong desire to compliment her Majesty by publishing the Plan of London, with all its improvements, as it then appeared. [In the city of London Library at Guildhall is an impression of the second edition of the Map with the arms of King James, not engraved, but drawn with the pen, pasted over the original arms of Queen Elizabeth.—EDITOR.]

But of a THIRD EDITION, published in the reign of James I., and a FOURTH, dated 1628, two or three impressions, at least, appear to be in existence. Mr. Dodd many years ago possessed one of these, of which he has given a description in the 1st Part of his 'Repertorium.' Instead of the arms of Elizabeth, on the left, over the city of Westminster, as in the large copy and in Braun's print, it had the arms of James I., England, France, and Scotland: but Mr. Dodd observes that part of the block had evidently been taken out in that place, and a new surface supplied, upon which the arms of James had been afterwards engraved; and Bagford formerly remarked the same of the two or three impressions which had come under his notice.

On this print, says Mr. Dodd, are two tablets, one on the left of the observer, the other on the right. The tablet on the left has the title and a long prose inscription, beginning thus:

'CIVITAS LONDINUM.—This ancient and famous city of London was first founded by Brute the Trojan, in the year of the world two thousand eight hundred thirty and two, and before the nativity of our Saviour Christ, One thousand one hundred and 30, so that since the first building it is 2 thousand 7 hundred 30 and 3 Years. And afterwards was repaired and enlarged by King

Lud,' &c. &c., and ending with this pious wish: 'God prosper it at his pleasure. Amen.'

I take it for granted, that, in this inscription, Mr. Dodd has followed the spelling of the original. It is somewhat surprising that he did not remark upon the date contained in it, viz. A. D. 1603, the precise year of James's accession to the throne.

I would further remark that this inscription, which is given entire by Mr. Dodd, was, I think, probably printed from movable type placed within the above-mentioned tablet, (the alteration of the date, in each edition, seeming to render this necessary,) and also that the size of the tablet on the left, in the large copy already spoken of, appears to be of proper dimensions to receive it; whilst the smaller tablet, on the right, seems equally well adapted to the reception, without waste of space, of the verses about to be noticed. For within the tablet on the right, in Mr. Dodd's print, were these lines:

'New Troy my name when first my fame begun
By Trojan Brute, who then me placed here,
On fruitfull soyle, where pleasant Thames doth run.
Sixth Lud my Lord, my king and lover dear,
Encrease my bounds, and London, far that rings
Through regions large, he called then my name.
How famous since, I, stately seat of Kings,
Have flourish'd, aye; let others that proclaim:
And let me joy, thus happy still to see
This vertuous peer my sovereign King to be.'

The last line, which is awkward enough, refers of course to James I., whose arms were at the top of the print, in this edition. I strongly suspect that in the former edition, or editions, printed in the reign of Elizabeth, the line ran thus:

'This vertuous fair my sovereign Quene to be,'

which, besides the compliment to her Majesty, would have been prettily contrasted to the seventh line, in which the Kings of England are spoken of.

Upon the whole it appears certain that an edition of this Plan was published in 1560; and it is probable that a second was published soon after 1588; as we learn from an inscription, already mentioned, in Aggas's Plan of Oxford, printed in that year, that ten years before he had been desirous of publishing it, and we may conclude had been making preparations for it; a third edition, printed in 1603, has been just described; and a fourth with the date of 1618 is spoken of by Vertue and other writers of the last century: so that this old Plan continued to be printed, doubtless with the requisite additions of new buildings, from the early part of Elizabeth's reign till the last-mentioned date; after which it is probable the blocks were thrown aside and lost.

I have nothing to add concerning Aggas's Map of London, save that in the old editions, slips of paper were probably added at bottom, printed with movable type, and explanatory of certain initial letters, which appear, here and there, upon the body of the print.

2. A PLAN, OR BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF CAMBRIDGE, four feet long by three feet in height, engraved, it is said, on a plate, or plates, of metal, and published in 1578.
3. A PLAN, OR BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF OXFORD, also engraved on metal, and of the same dimensions as that of Cambridge. A description of this print, made from a damaged impression preserved in the Bodleian library, is given in the work of Mr.

Dodd, from which I extract the following particulars:

It is entitled 'Celeberrimæ Oxoniensis Academiæ Aularum et Collegiorum,' &c., 'elegans simul et accurata Descriptio.—Radulpho Agaso autore. An^o. Doⁿⁱ. 1578.' In illustration of the meaning of the term 'autore,' in this place, see our account of Robert Adams. The print, as will be presently shown, was not published till ten years afterwards. Distinct representations of the different Colleges and Halls are added at the sides of the Plan. Upon a large tablet in the body of the print are these verses:

'Near tenne yeares paste the authour made a doubt

Whether to printe or laye this work aside

Untill he firste had London platted out,

Which still he craves, although he be denied,

He thinks the Citie now in hiest pride,

And would make shewe how it was beste besene,

The thirtieth yeare of our moste noble Quene.

The charge not create, the thing a work of praise,

Her present shapp hereafter still to see,

To keepe length, breadth, and coursing of the waies,

Number, height and forme of buildinges as they bee,

Each man to knowe his owne by juste degree,

With all thinges else that maie adorn the same,

And leave her praise unto eternall fame.

Meantime, the measure forme and sight I bringe

Of ancient Oxford, noble nurse of skill,

A Citie seated ritche in everye thinge,

Girt with woode, water, pasture, corn and hill,

He tooke the vewe from north, and so he leaves it still.

For there the buildinges make the bravest shewe,

And from those walkes the Scholers beste it knowe.'

Upon a second tablet is inscribed 'Augustinus Ryther, Anglus, deliniavit, 1588.' Ryther, we know, practised engraving, and probably assisted in engraving the present work; if it be not entirely by his hand. Perhaps, also, he had been employed to draw the elevations of the principal buildings, above noticed, and the ornamental parts; and therefore used the term 'deliniavit' upon this occasion, as more honourable than 'sculpsit.'"]

RYX, NICHOLAS, was born at Bruges in 1637. It is not said by whom he was instructed; but having learned the rudiments of design, he embarked in a vessel bound for the Levant, and travelled through Palestine, where he made designs of the most remarkable views in the vicinity of Jerusalem, and delineated with great precision the various customs and habiliments of the inhabitants of the Oriental countries, their caravans, camels, and modes of travelling. On his return to Flanders he painted pictures of those subjects, which were much esteemed. In 1667 he was received into the Academy at Bruges. [He painted with great facility, and his manner resembles that of Vander Kabel. He died in 1695. The name is sometimes written Ryckx.]

SAAL, T., an indifferent engraver of vignettes, and other book-plates. They are executed with the graver only, in a stiff, formal style. He lived about the year 1672.

SABBATINI, ANDREA, called DA SALERNO. This eminent painter was born at Salerno about the year 1485. According to Dominici, he was the son of an opulent merchant, who intended him for the same profession; but having shown an early inclination for the art, which his father did not discourage, he conducted him to Naples, and placed him under the tuition of Raimo Epifanio, a painter of little celebrity, under whom he studied some time. The Cardinal Caraffa having employed Pietro Perugino to paint the great altar-piece of the archiepiscopal church, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, the beauty of the performance had excited universal applause, and it became the object of Sabbatini's particular admiration. He solicited and obtained his father's permission to visit Perugia, to profit by the lessons of a painter whose works he so highly esteemed. On his journey he encountered some artists, who had just left Rome, who were so loud in their praise of the works which Raffaele was then employed on in the Vatican, that he determined to visit that capital, and endeavour to gain admission into his academy. In this attempt he succeeded, and in a short time was found of sufficient ability to be intrusted by Raffaele to execute, from his designs, some of the frescoes in the Vatican, in S. Maria della Pace, and in La Torre di Borgia. Whilst he was prosecuting his studies under Raffaele, he formed an intimate acquaintance with Polidoro da Caravaggio, for whose eminent talents he had a particular respect. He had distinguished himself among the able disciples of his illustrious instructor, when he received intelligence that his father was dangerously ill, and with great regret he found himself under the necessity of returning to Salerno, to pay the last sad duties to an expiring parent, who died soon after his arrival. His first production after his return to Salerno, was an altar-piece for the church of the Benedictines, representing the Virgin and infant Saviour, with two Saints of the order; and he afterwards painted a picture for the Franciscans, of St. Francis kneeling before the Virgin and Infant, with a glory of angels, which is highly commended by Dominici. He afterwards established himself at Naples, where he was soon regarded as the ablest artist of their school. His celebrated fresco works in S. Maria delle Grazie, have been, for the most part, unfortunately destroyed by the alterations which were found necessary to be made in that church; but his oil pictures in that sanctuary, as well as those in the other public edifices at Naples, sufficiently establish his reputation. Of these the most esteemed are the following: The Assumption of the Virgin, in the Capella Brancacci, in the cathedral, the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Spirito di Palazzo; and the Madonna and Bambino, with St. Elisabeth and other Saints, in S. Domenico Maggiore. There are several of his works at Gaeta, and in other cities in the kingdom of Naples, where his easel pictures are frequently found in the private collections.

In comparing Andrea Sabbatini with the other disciples of Raffaele, Lanzi observes, that if he was inferior to Giulio Romano, he however greatly surpassed Raffaele del Colle, and others of that rank. He was a correct and tasteful designer, and his colouring is fresh and harmonious; his attitudes are elegant and select, and his masses of light and shadow are conducted with intelligence. He may be accused of occasionally being too abrupt and harsh in his delineation of the muscles. He died in 1550, aged about 65. [Most of the writers agree that Andrea died at the age of 65, but there is a difference among them as to dates. Lanzi and Zani, who are the most likely to have examined the matter, say he was born about 1480, and died about 1545. Andrea's works are almost unknown out of Naples: the Museo Borbonico, and the churches of that city, contain a great number. His earlier works are of the old Neapolitan school; in others, the artist strikingly resembles Raphael in his youthful Florentine period. Among these are two extremely beautiful little pictures in the Museum of Naples, from the history of S. Placido. There exist also several highly-finished works, evincing a noble refined feeling, and which are distinguished by their beautiful drawing, and light but warm colouring. The best is an Adoration of the Kings in the Museo Borbonico. His later works are more superficial; but they too are excellent in some portions, particularly in the heads.]

SABBATINI, LORENZO, called LORENZINO DA BOLOGNA, was born at Bologna about the year 1540. We are not acquainted by what master he was instructed in his native city, but after having painted several pictures for the churches at Bologna he visited Rome, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., where he improved his style, by an attentive study of the works of Raffaele, and imitated the great style of that master with such success, that he has by some been considered as a disciple of that great painter, although he was born twenty years after the death of Raffaele. In his smaller pictures he seems to have been emulous of imitating the graces of Francesco Mazzuoli, called Il Parmigiano, in which he was eminently successful. He was employed by the pope in the Capella Paolina, in the Vatican, where he painted, in conjunction with Frederigo Zuccaro, several subjects from the life of St. Paul. In the Sala Regia he painted an emblematical subject of the Triumph of Faith over Infidelity, personified by a representation of Religion holding in one hand the cross, and in the other the chalice, at her feet several figures descriptive of Heresy. These, and other works, were executed so much to the satisfaction of the pope, that he was appointed superintendent of the decorations then going on in the Vatican. Of his numerous pictures in the public edifices at Bologna, the following are the most deserving of notice: The Crucifixion, in S. Maria delle Grazie; the Assumption, in the church of la Morte; S. Gioachino e S. Anna, in S. Martino Maggiore; and his most celebrated performances in S. Giacomo, representing S. Michele vanquishing the Rebel Angels; the Four Evangelists; and the Four Doctors of the Church. He died at Rome in the prime of life in 1677. [Zani says he operated in 1553; if so, it is probable that he was born earlier than 1540; Ticozzi says about 1530. According to Lanzi, he availed himself of a design by Michael Angelo, in painting a Pietà for the sacristy of the church of St. Peter. No wonder that his pictures exhibit grace and grandeur, as Raphael, Parmigiano, and Michael Angelo were his models. Rosini (Storia della Pittura Italiana, plate 144) has given an outline of the Assumption of the Virgin by him, in the Pinacoteca di Bologna.]

[SABLON, PIERRE, a designer and engraver, was born at Chartres, in the department d'Eure et Loire, in 1584, according to the inscription on the oval border of his portrait: PIERRE SABLON CHARTRAIN. XXIII ANS. 1607. On the margin is inscribed

Me contemplant vn jour en deux diuerses glaces
Je veis le mien Profil despainnet naïvement;
Lors je delibéré en moy soudainement.
De grauer ce Pourtraict dont vo' voyez les traces.

There are only three other prints known by him; Lamech and Cain, copied after that by Lucas van Leyden, (Bartsch, N^o. 14.) but left in an unfinished state; it is the counterpart of the original, and has the date 1524 above on the right, (the 5 reversed.)

and the master's mark; at the bottom P. Sablon f. 1602. The good Samaritan, a small square print mentioned in the collection of Paignon Dijonval; and the Portrait of Rabelais, a three-quarter bust turned to the right, but full face. It is a medallion; on the border is inscribed FRANC. RABELESIVS; in the exergue, SUM PETULANTIS PLENE CACHINO. Pers. P. Sablon f.]

SACCHI, ANDREA. This celebrated artist was born at Rome in 1594. He was the son of Benedetto Sacchi, a painter of little note, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of design; but he had afterwards the advantage of studying under Francesco Albano, of whom he was the most distinguished disciple. On leaving the school of that painter he improved his style, by an attentive study of the works of Raffaele, Polidoro da Caravaggio, and the antique marbles, by which means he acquired a correctness and severity of design, for which his works are remarkable. He was favoured with the protection of the Cardinal Barberini, who employed him in ornamenting his palace with several allegorical works, painted in fresco, which were greatly admired. Several of the public edifices at Rome are embellished with his works, some of which have been ranked among the most admired productions of art in that capital. Such are his celebrated picture of the Death of St. Anne, in the church of S. Carlo a Catinari; the Angel appearing to St. Joseph, the principal altar-piece in S. Giuseppe a Capo le Case; and his S. Andrea, in the Quirinal. But his most distinguished performance is his famous picture of S. Romnaldo, formerly in the church dedicated to that saint, now in the gallery of the Louvre. This admirable production was considered one of the four finest pictures at Rome. The composition is extremely simple, it represents the Saint seated in a solitary valley of the Apennines, surrounded by some of his order, explaining to them his reasons for retiring from the world. Every thing in the picture breathes tranquillity and repose. The expression in the head of S. Romualdo is admirable, as is the attention with which the monks are listening to his discourse. The surprising effect that he has given to a group of six figures, all habited in white drapery, without the aid of contrast, and without the appearance of monotony, is the wonder and admiration of the artist.

The admirers of Andrea Sacchi regard him as the greatest colourist the Roman school can boast of, and he is ranked among the most correct of its designers. Though profound in the theory of the art, he was slow and deliberative in his works, and he was accustomed to remark, that the fame of a painter depended more upon the quality than the quantity of his productions. To this we may attribute the paucity of his pictures, which are, notwithstanding, in general but slightly terminated. His compositions are not often abundant in figures, but they are sufficiently numerous to give a just representation of his subjects. Mengs estimates his talents nearly on a level with those of Pietro da Cortona, which, without raising him to the elevation of the great luminaries of the art, assigns him an honourable station among its able professors. He died at Rome in 1661, aged 62. [If Andrea Sacchi was born in 1594, he would have been 67 years old at the time of his death in 1661; but Pascoli says he was born in 1599, which would make him 62. The date of his death, according to the inscription on his monument as given by Pascoli in full, is the 21st of June, 1661, at the age of

62. Lanzi, quoting from "Stato della Ch. Lateran," says, "his epitaph gives his age 63 years 4 months;" Passeri places his birth in 1600: so much for authorities. The proper characteristics of Andrea Sacchi are gravity, majesty, simplicity, sober colouring, and a pleasing harmony of tone. The celebrated picture of St. Romualdo is not in the Louvre, it was restored when the allies had possession of Paris, and is now in the Vatican. Mengs showed the narrowness of his ideas of what constitute greatness in art, when he placed Sacchi on a level with Pietro da Cortona: flutter and gaudiness, and frequent inaccuracy in design, are not to be held up against gravity, majesty, and correctness.]

SACCHI, CARLO. According to Orlandi, this painter was born at Pavia in 1617, and learned the first rudiments of design in his native city from an obscure painter named Rosso. He went to Rome, where he resided some time, and afterwards visited Venice, to study the works of the great masters of colouring. The works of Paolo Veronese were the particular objects of his imitation, in which he was not unsuccessful. One of his most esteemed productions is his picture of St. James raising a person from the dead, in the church of the Osservanti, painted much in the style of Paolo. He died in 1706. [He etched two prints, not remarkable for excellence; an Adoration of the Shepherds, after Tintoretto, and an Adoration of the Magi, after P. Veronese.]

[SACCHI, FRANCESCO, or PIER FRANCESCO, of Pavia, a painter of history, landscapes, and perspective, highly extolled by Lomazzo, and who, it is said, lived as early as 1460, and operated as late as 1526, in Lombardy and Genoa; but Lanzi suspects that there must be some error in these dates, or that the name belonged to two different artists. The style of P. F. Sacchi, in his historical pictures, resembles that of his countryman, and contemporary, Carlo del Mantegna, the scholar of Andrea Mantegna, from what may be gathered from those in Mantua, there remaining no vestiges of them in Genoa. He was a good perspective painter, delightful in landscape, and a diligent, correct designer. His altar-piece of the Four Doctors of the Church still exists in the oratory of St. Ugo. With respect to Carlo del Mantegna, he was a native of Lombardy, who, having studied under Andrea, and cultivated a complete acquaintance with his style, afterwards introduced it into Genoa. There he not only painted but taught with a degree of success that would seem incredible, were it not that the works of his imitators are still in existence.]

[SACCHI, GASPARE, of Imola, flourished in the early part of the 16th century, and painted many pictures in Ravenna, and other parts of Romagno. In the sacristy of Castel S. Pietro at Imola, there is an altar-piece with his name, and the date 1517; and at Bologna in S. Francesco in Tavola, another dated 1521.]

[SACCHI, or SACCO, SCIPIONE, is said by Scannelli to have been a scholar of Raphael. He was of Cesena. He painted a picture, in a grand style, of St. Gregory, for the cathedral of Cesena, which is inscribed Cesenas, 1545; and another of the Death of S. Pietro Martire for the church of S. Dominico. Lanzi says, doubtless he was of the school of Raphael, and not remembered out of Romagna.]

[SACCHIATI, PIETRO, a native of Ravenna, and born about 1598, is noticed by Basan, as an engraver in wood, and in chiaro-scuro, after various masters. As Basan's notice is very succinct, and no other account exists, it must be left to time to discover his works, which are possibly attributed to some other artist.]

SADELER, JOHN. This eminent engraver was born at Brussels in 1550. The profession of his father was to engrave ornaments on steel and iron, to be inlaid with gold or silver, and John Sadeler was brought up to the same business. At a very early age, however, he applied himself to the study of the human figure, which he drew correctly, though with the stiffness and formality usual at that period in the artists of his country. He was nearly twenty years of age before he commenced engraving on copper, when he executed some plates from the designs of Crispin Vanden Broeck, which were so favourably received, that he was encouraged to devote his attention entirely to engraving. He travelled through Germany to Italy, where he divested himself, in a great degree, of the dry and hard manner which is discernible in his earliest works. His plates are executed with the graver only, in a neat, clear style, and discover the hand of an able artist. His drawing is generally correct, and there is a fine expression in his heads. John Sadeler engraved with equal success portraits and historical subjects. His prints are very numerous, of which the following list comprises the most deserving of notice:

PORTRAITS.

Clement VIII.; Pont. Max.
 Mary of Medicis.
 Charles, Hereditary Prince of Sweden.
 Otho, Henry, Count of Schwarzenberg.
 Sigismund Feyerabend, famous Printer. 1587.
 George Hoefnagel, Painter of Antwerp; (piece precieuse. Joubert.)
 Martin Luther; in an arabesque border.

SETS OF PRINTS.

Eight plates of the Creation of the World; after Crispin Vanden Broeck.
 Six of the History of Adam and Eve; after Michael Coxis.
 Sixteen subjects from the Book of Genesis; after M. de Vos.
 A numerous set of plates of the Life of Christ; after the same.
 Seven plates of the Passion of our Saviour; after Christopher Schwarz.
 A very numerous set, called the Hermits; engraved in conjunction with his brothers; after the same. [In great request for their merit, and the variety of the landscapes.]
 The Twelve Months of the Year; after P. Stephens, or Stephani.
 The Four Seasons; after Hans Bol.
 The Four Times of the Day; after Theodore Bernard.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Rich Man and Lazarus; after Bassano.
 Christ entertained by Martha and Mary; after the same.

These two prints, with a third, representing Christ with the two Disciples at Emmaüs, engraved by Raphael Sadeler, after the same painter, are usually called Sadeler's Kitchens.

The Angel appearing to the Shepherds; after the same; [fine effect of night.]

The Nativity; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.

The Virgin, with the Infant sleeping, and an Angel; after An. Caracci.

St. Jerome praying; after Giles Mostaert; [finished with great care.]

Mary Magdalene in meditation; after the same; [finished with great care.]

St. Roch, with two Pilgrims; after the same.

Jesus calling to him the little Children; after Jodocus de Winghe.

The Prodigal Son; after the same.

The Annunciation; after Peter de Witt, called Pietro Candido.

Christ at table with the Disciples at Emmaüs; after the same.

The three Marys at the Sepulchre; after the same.

The Last Supper; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Ursula and her Companions; after the same.

The Nativity; after J. van Achen.

The Holy Family, with Mary Magdalene; after the same.

The Crucifixion; after the same.

The Last Judgment; after the same.

Mary Magdalene penitent; after Federigo Sustris.

Christ appearing to Magdalene; after the same.

Mankind surprised by the sudden advent of the Deluge; after Theodore Bernard; [capital.]

Mankind surprised by the coming of the Last Day; after the same; [capital.]

The Trinity; after Antonio Maria Viani.

Several Landscapes; after Paul Brill, and others.

He died at Venice in 1600. [For a more copious list of his engravings, see Nagler. Some writers say he lived till 1610; but the latest date quoted is Joa. Sadeler sculptis Venetiis An. D. 1600.]

SADELER, RAPHAEL, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Brussels in 1555, and was bred to the same profession, under his father. The success John Sadeler met with as an engraver, induced Raphael to turn his thoughts to the same pursuit, and he became a disciple of his brother. They travelled together through Germany, where Raphael engraved a variety of plates, after John van Achen, Matthias Kager, and other masters of that school. They afterwards settled at Venice, where they executed a great number of plates, many of which are deservedly esteemed. Following the example of his brother, Raphael Sadeler worked entirely with the graver, which he handled with boldness and precision. His drawing of the figure is generally correct, and the extremities are carefully marked. His prints are nearly as numerous as those of his brother, and some of them are very fine, particularly those after Van Achen, as well as some of his portraits. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Paul V.; Pont. Max.
 St. Charles Borromeus, Cardinal.
 Ernest, Archbishop of Cologne.
 Leopold of Austria, Bishop of Salzburg and Passau.
 Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria.
 Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, on horseback.
 John Dietmar, Abbot of Furstenberg.
 Hypolitius Guarinonius, M. D.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A set of four plates of the Life of the Virgin; from his own designs.
 Twenty-eight plates of the Life and Passion of Christ; the same.
 Mary Magdalene at the Sepulchre, with St. Peter and St. John; after J. de Winghe.
 Lot and his Daughters; after the same.
 The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after John van Achen.
 The Entombing of Christ; after the same.
 The dead Christ in the Sepulchre, with Angels; after the same. [This and the two preceding are held in particular estimation.]

Mary Magdalene penitent; after the same.
 The Judgment of Paris; after the same; [dated 1579.]
 The Virgin and infant Christ; after Peter de Witt, called P. Candido. 1593.
 The Immaculate Conception; after the same.
 The Presentation in the Temple; after the same. 1591.
 The Resurrection of Lazarus; after Rottenhamer.
 The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Henry Goltzius.
 The dead Christ, attended by the Marys, St. John, and Angels; after J. Stradan.
 An emblematic subject on the uncertainty of life, represented by Death seizing a Lady at a Feast; after the same.
 The Crucifixion; after Palma.
 The Virgin suckling the infant Christ; after An. Carracci.
 The Holy Family, with St. John presenting a Cross; after Raffaele, without the name of the painter or his own; inscribed Qui non accipit, &c.
 The Annunciation; after Federigo Zuccaro.
 The Adoration of the Magi; after Bassano. 1598.
 Christ at table with the Disciples at Emmaus; after the same; called one of Sadeler's Kitchens.
 The Four Seasons; after J. Stradan.
 A set of six Landscapes; after P. Steevens, or Stephani.
 Two Landscapes with figures; after Matt. Brill.
 Four Landscapes, with the history of the Prodigal Son; after Paul Brill.
 A numerous set of prints, entitled Bavaria Sancta, engraved conjointly with his son Raphael, and published by him at Antwerp in 1624 and 1628.
 Several Emblematic and Allegorical subjects; after Martin de Vos.
 The great Battle of Prague, in eight sheets; very scarce; [and is considered to be his finest work.]

According to Huber, Raphael Sadeler died at Venice in 1616. [For a full account of his engravings Nagler should be consulted. Raphael Sadeler was born in 1561, as is clearly proved by the inscription on a print of the Nunziata of Federigo Zuccaro, engraved by him after that by Cornelius Cort, which runs thus: Joannes Sadeler excud. Coloniae Agripp. (Agrippinae) A. D. 1580—Raphael Sadeler sculpsit aetatis suae 19.]

SADELER, EGIDIUS, or GILES, was the nephew and the disciple of the two preceding artists, born at Antwerp in 1570. After being well grounded in the principles of design, he took up the graver, and with the assistance of his relatives, in a few years he acquired a perfect use of that instrument, and in taste and freedom of stroke surpassed his instructors. He had passed some time in Italy, where he engraved some plates after the painters of that school, when he was invited to Prague by the Emperor Rodolphus II., who retained him in his service, and assigned him a pension. He enjoyed the favour and protection of the two succeeding emperors, Matthias and Ferdinand II. He used the graver with a commanding facility, sometimes finishing his plates with surprising neatness, when the subject required it; at other times his burin is broad and bold. His plates are very numerous, representing historical subjects, portraits, landscapes, &c., some of them from his own designs, many of which are much esteemed, particularly his portraits, which are executed in an admirable style. The following are considered his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Rodolphus II. on horseback, with a Battle in the back-ground; after Ad. de Vries.
 The Emperor Matthias. 1616.
 The Empress Anne, his consort. 1616.
 The Emperor Ferdinand II. on horseback; in two sheets. 1629.
 Burkhard de Berlihing, Privy Counsellor to Rodolphus II.
 Christopher Guarionius Fontanus, Physician to the same.

John George Goedelman, Jurisconsult.
 Joachim Huber, Aulic Counsellor.
 Jacob Chimarræus, Grand Almoner.
 Cardinal de Dietrichstein, Bishop of Olmutz. 1604.
 John Matthew Warentens, Aulic Counsellor. 1614.
 Adam, Baron de Trautmansdorf.
 Siegfried de Kolonitsch.
 Ferdinand de Kolonitsch.
 Torquato Tasso, Poetarum Princeps. 1617.
 Octavius Strada, Antiquary.
 Peter Breughel, Painter, of Brussels. 1606.
 Martin de Vos, Painter, of Antwerp.
 Sigismund Bathori, Prince of Transilvania. [Those of Fontanus, Tasso, the Bishop of Olmutz, and Strada the antiquary, are rare.]

VARIOUS SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A set of twelve plates, representing Angels with the Instruments of the Passion.
 A set of fifty-two Views near Rome, entitled Vestigi delle Antichità di Roma.
 The Burning of Troy, an etching; Æg. Sadeler, fecit, aqua forti.
 Charity, represented by a female figure with three children.
 Narcissus admiring himself in a Fountain.
 Pan and Syrinx.
 St. Sebastian dying, with an Angel drawing out the Arrows from his side.
 St. Dominick receiving the Institution of his Order from St. Peter and St. Paul.
 The Scourging of Christ.
 The Crucifixion.
 The great Saloon at Prague; in two sheets.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin and Infant; after Raffaele.
 The Angel appearing to the Shepherds; after Bassano.
 The Murder of the Innocents; after Tintoretto.
 The Last Supper; after the same.
 St. Peter called to the Apostleship; after F. Baroccio.
 The Entombing of Christ; after the same.
 The Scourging of Christ; after Giuseppe Cesare d'Arpino.
 The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; after the younger Palma.
 The Rich Man and Lazarus; after the same.
 Angelica and Medora; after Carlo Cagliari.
 Hercules and Omphale; after B. Spranger.
 The Marys at the Tomb of Christ; after the same.
 The Annunciation; after Peter de Witt, called Candido.
 The Virgin and infant Jesus; copied from Albert Durer.
 Christ bearing his Cross; the same.
 Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after John van Achen.
 The Nativity; after the same.
 The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after the same.
 Several sets of Landscapes; after Breughel, Paul Brill, Roelant Savery, P. Stevens, &c.

Giles Sadeler died at Prague in 1629. [Zani designates Giles Sadeler as the Phœnix of the art of engraving. He expresses a doubt respecting his degree of relationship to John and Raphael, and supposes that he was rather the brother than the nephew of those engravers. His doubt is founded on the dedication by Crispin de Passe of the Triumphus Martirum engraved by him after the designs of Martin de Vos, in 1591, which runs thus: Ægidius et Joannes fratres, et operis hujus Auctores humilime dedicant. On another print is inscribed G. Sadeler Monachij A. 1594, without any mention of relationship. The inquirer must again be referred to Nagler for a fuller account of his prints, as they are too numerous to insert in this work.]

[SADELER, MARCUS, is supposed to have been the son of John Sadeler, and born at Munich; but there is great uncertainty respecting his paternity, and whether he was really an engraver as well as a publisher of prints. He resided many years at Venice, whither, it is said, he was taken by John

Sadeler, and it is certain that many of the prints by John, Raphael, and Giles were published by him; but only the second impressions have his address. Neither Basan, Lipowsky, nor Füssli mention any of his works; nor can it be averred with certainty that the series of prints of Christ's Passion, after Albert Durer, which Heller, in his account of that artist, ascribes to Marcus, are really by him. The series consists of fifteen prints, without signatures or dates (the latter would range from 1507 to 1513); but the second impressions have Marcus Sadeler's address. They may, however, be easily distinguished from the plates by Albert Durer, as they are all reversed. It is probable that being so closely connected with the artists of the same name, (whatever the degree of relationship,) he may have occasionally used the graver; and the ascription of the above prints to him by Heller, rendered it necessary to take notice of him.]

[SADELER, RAPHAEL, THE YOUNGER, was a pupil of his father, Raphael, and operated at Venice subsequent to the year 1596. He afterwards accompanied his father to Munich, and assisted in engraving the illustrations to Rader's "Bavaria Sancta et Pia," and also produced several other plates, which were much admired for their tasteful execution. Neither the year of his birth nor of his death has been satisfactorily ascertained. His works are so blended with those of his father that it is difficult to distinguish them; but the following are particularized:

The Annunciation; after C. Schwarz.

The Virgin and St. Anne caressing the infant Jesus; after the same.

The Holy Family, with his name and date 1613.

Venus endeavouring to dissuade Adonis from the Chace; after Titian.

Forest Scenery; after J. Breughel.]

[SADELER, TOBIAS, supposed to be the son of Giles, was also an engraver, but his works are very little known. He operated at Vienna about the year 1675. The following prints are by him:

Johann Christian Schulz, ambassador of Wurtemberg, dated 1675.

Three pictures of the Virgin in the church of St. Francis, at Bechin in Bohemia.

The picture of the Virgin in the Dominican church at Budweis in Bohemia.

The dancing Peasant and the young Bride; after S. Beham's drawing; signed Tobias Sadeler, sc. 1670. This is described as a finely engraved and brilliant piece.

The Vignettes to the first part of Priorate's History of Frederick III.

There were several other engravers and publishers of the same name and family, but their works are much mixed up with those of the preceding; nor are they of sufficient importance to entitle them to distinct notices. Those, however, who are curious in the matter, will find as much as is probably known, in Nagler's Künstler-Lexicon.]

SAENREDAM, JOHN, a Dutch designer and engraver, born at Leyden about the year 1570. According to Hnber, he was instructed in drawing and the use of the graver by Henry Goltzius and James de Gheyn. We have a great variety of prints by this artist, which are executed in a neat, clear style, and with considerable facility. His design is not very correct, and there is generally a want of effect in the management of the lights and shadows. Several of his plates are from his own compositions, which prove him to have possessed both genius and taste. He worked entirely with the graver, which he handled in a masterly manner. His best prints are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Carl van Mander; after Goltzius.

P. H. Hornamus, Poet and Physician; after Van Mander.

John Cesaree, Philosopher.

John de la Chambre, Writing-master.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Susanna and the Elders.

Hercules between Minerva and Venus.

Lycurgus giving Laws to the Lacedaemonians.

The Wise and the Foolish Virgins, in five plates. 1606.

[These are capital, and fine proofs are rare.]

An Allegorical Subject relative to the government of the Low Countries of the Infanta Isabella. The portrait of that Princess is seen under a tree on the right of the print. 1602.

The Prosperity of the United Provinces under the House of Orange; an emblematical subject. 1600.

A representation of a large Whale, which was thrown on the Coast of Holland. 1602; [rare.]

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Adam and Eve in Paradise; after H. Goltzius.

Lot and his Daughters; after the same.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after the same.

Susanna and the Elders; after the same.

Ceres, Venus, and Bacchus united; after the same; [considered among his finest works.]

The Seven Planets, the Four Seasons, the Five Senses, the Four Ages, the Three Marriages at different times of life; all after the same.

The Bath of Diana; after the same.

A set of six plates of the History of Adam and Eve; after Ab. Bloemaert.

Four plates of the History of Elijah and Elisha; after the same.

Elijah and the Widow of Sarepta; after the same. 1604.

The Angel appearing to the Shepherds; after the same. 1599.

The Prodigal Son; after the same. 1618.

Vertumnus and Pomona; after the same. 1605.

Mars and Venus; after P. Isaacc.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after Lucas van Leyden.

David carrying in triumph the Head of Goliath; after the same.

The Nativity; after C. van Mander.

Paul and Barnabas; after the same.

Adam and Eve in Paradise; after Corn. van Haerlem.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after the same.

Angelica and Medora; after the same.

Vertumnus and Pomona; after the same.

The Grot of Plato; inscribed Lux venit in mundum, &c.; after the same.

The Death of Epaminondas; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.

Camillus breaking the Treaty of Peace between the Romans and the Gauls; after the same.

The History of Niobe and her Children; in eight sheets, forming a frieze; after the same. 1594.

The Entombing of Christ; after M. Angelo Caravaggio.

The Repast of our Saviour with Levi; after P. Veronese; [in three sheets, and the rarest of his banquetts.]

[According to the best accounts, John Saenredam was born in 1565, and died in 1607. Bartsch has described 123 prints by him, and four by contemporary engravers after his designs. See "Le Peintre Graveur," tom. iii.]

[SAENREDAM, PIETER, son of the preceding, was born at Assendelft about 1597. He was a scholar of Franz Pieter de Grebber, but adopted a different style from that of his master. He painted architecture, particularly the interiors of churches, in a very neat and correct manner. His pictures were highly esteemed in his own time, and are now extremely rare. A view of the Town-house of the city of Haerlem, painted by him, was enlivened with a great number of figures, representing the solemn entry of Prince Maurice. In the Museum at Amsterdam is a view of the interior of the great church at Haerlem, also enriched with figures; the latter, in both pictures, appear to be by his own band. There are very few particulars respecting him recorded. It is said that he died in 1666. He signed his name P. Saenredam, which the editor has seen on two or more of his pictures, but some of his countrymen persist in writing it Zaanredam, or Zaenredam.]

[SAFTLEVEN. See ZACHTLEVEN.]

[SAGRESTANI, GIOVANNI CAMILLO, a Florentine painter and poet, born in 1660, studied painting in the school of Giusti, and also attended that of Carlo Cignani, whose manner he copied rather than emulated. One of his Holy Families is in the Madonna dei Ricci, the beauty of which has more of the ideal, and the colouring is more florid, than is usual with the contemporaries of this latter school. He died in 1731.]

SAHLER, C., an obscure engraver, whose name is affixed to the portrait of Adrian Stalbert, a painter. [It is difficult to say who this means. There was a German artist of this name, who lived in the 18th century. He was a goldsmith, and engraved in imitation of drawings. His names were Otho Christien Sahler. There was also a Louis Sahler, or Sailar, an engraver, who lived about the same time. He engraved William II. of Nassau, after G. Honthorst; Helena Forman, after Rubens; George, Prince of Wales, after John Smart; and the Virgin with the Infant, after Domenichino. The latter was a native of France, born in 1748.]

SAILLIAR, LOUIS. This artist, who was probably a native of France, resided some years in London, where he engraved some plates for Messrs. Boydell, among which are the following:

The Portrait of Helen Forman; after Vandyck.
The Prince of Orange; after Honthorst.
The Birth of Bacchus; after Reynolds.
The Toper; after G. Douw.

SAILMAKER, ISAAC, an English painter of marine subjects, who was appointed by Cromwell to take a view of the fleet before Mardyke. Mr. Strutt has erroneously stated "that the Honourable Mr. Walpole informs us, that he etched some plates; but the subjects are not specified." It is said in the Anecdotes, that "a print of the confederate fleet, under Sir George Rooke, engaging the French commanded by the Count de Toulouse, was engraved in 1714, from a design of Sailmaker," who lived to the age of 88, and died in 1721.

SAINT ANDRE. See RENARD.

SAINT AUBIN. See AUBIN.

SAINT NON. See NON.

SAINT MAURICE, P. DE. This amateur engraver was an officer in the French guards, who amused himself with the point. We have by him, among other prints, an old Man playing on the Flute, surrounded by [five] Children; after Le Nain.

SAITER, or SEITER, DANIEL. According to Pascoli, this painter was born at Vienna in 1649. He went to Italy when he was very young, and studied for some years at Venice, under Carlo Loth. From Venice he went to Rome, where he gave proof of his ability in an altar-piece, representing St. John preaching in the Wilderness, in S. Maria in Vallicella; and a fine picture of the Death of Lucretia, in the Palazzo Spada. He was invited to the court of Turin, where he resided several years, and painted some of his most esteemed works, among which the Cupola of the Spedal Maggiore is regarded as one of the best frescoes in that capital. In the royal collection there is a Pietà, which is worthy of the school of the Caracci. He died in 1705. [Other writers call him Seuter, and say that he was born in 1642. It is also said that he painted portraits, and engraved.]

SAITER, SEITER, [or SEUTER,] JOHN GOTTFRIED, a German designer and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1718. He was instructed in design by J. E. Ridinger, and learned engraving from G. M. Preissler. He afterwards resided some years in Italy, and, on his return to his native country, he engraved several plates, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

The Portrait of John Kupetzky, Painter.

George Philip Rugendas, Painter of battles.

Abraham sending away Hagar; after Celesti.

The Holy Family; after Andrea del Sarto.

Christ with Martha and Mary; after L. da Vinci.

The Adulteress before Christ; after Procaccini.

The Marriage of Cana; after P. Veronese.

The Flight into Egypt; after Albano.

[He died in the hospital at Augsburg in 1800. Nagler has given a list of 53 prints by him.]

SALAERT, [or SALLAERTS,] ANTHONY. This painter was born at Brussels about the year 1570. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he was a reputable painter of history. There were several of his pictures in the churches at Brussels, which are particularly noticed by Descamps in his Voyage Pittoresque de la Flandres, one of which possessed sufficient merit to render it an object of plunder to the French, and it is now in the gallery of the Louvre. It represents a Procession of the confraternity of Archers. Papillon mentions this artist as an engraver on wood, and says he executed several cuts in a bold, free style, among which are the heads of the Four Evangelists. He usually marked his prints with the cipher . [Brulliot denies that he engraved on wood; but there are the Four Evangelists, and an Ecce Homo, prints from wood, with his mark. Why Brulliot should attribute them to Christopher Jegher it is difficult to discover. The picture of the Procession of the confraternity of Archers is not now in the Louvre; there is one of the same subject in the gallery at Turin. He died in 1632.]

[SALAINO. See SOLARI.]

[SALAMANCA, ANTONIO, a very celebrated publisher of, and dealer in, prints, whose name is familiar to all collectors of the works of the old masters, flourished about the middle of the 16th century. His name is placed here as the supposed engraver of a Pietà of Michael Angelo, on which is inscribed Antonius Salamanca Quod Potuit Imitatus Exculpit. 1.5.4.7. This is the only inscription by which it may be believed that he practised engraving, except as a restorer of plates by the older masters, which he published. Two more have been ascribed to him: a portrait of Baccio Bandinelli, 1545, and the Creation of Animals, after Raphael, 1548. All the other prints with his name have excudebat, or excudit, or A. S. i. e. Antonius Scudebat, instead of Excudebat. The lovers of the fine arts are under infinite obligations to Antonio Salamanca, Laferri, and the three Rossis of Rome, for the preservation of older works, and for the many engravings each of them had executed, at his own expense, of objects that might otherwise have been lost to posterity.]

SALERNO, ANDREA DA. See SABBATINI.

SALIMBENI, ARCANGIOLO. This painter was a native of Siena, and flourished about the year 1560. Baldinucci ranks him among the disciples of Frederigo Zuccaro, although his style exhibits principles entirely opposite to those of that master. According to Della Valle, he attached himself rather to the precision and formality which distinguished the works of Pietro Perugino. Such is his picture of the Crucifixion, in the parochial church of Lussignano. His St. Peter Martyr, at the Domenicani, at Siena, is of a more modern character in the design, free from the heaviness and mannered style which too frequently characterize the works of Federigo Zuccaro.

[There are some curious errors of dates and circumstances in the accounts of Arcangiolo Salimbeni, his son Ventura, and Francesco Vanni. Zani says Arcangiolo was born in 1536, and died in 1583; Lanzi quotes a picture which has his name and the date 1579; but his widow married again, and bore Francesco Vanni in 1565. This will clear up what is said in the next article, that Ventura was very young when his father died: had the date 1583 been correct, he would have been twenty-six, which is not so very young. If we suppose that there is a typographical error, and that the date should be 1563, it is so far clear; but what becomes of the date on the picture? Lanzi at once pronounces it false. Turn to the account of F. Vanni, and there it is stated that he became the pupil of Arcangiolo Salimbeni, who had married his mother! The question arises, did Arcangiolo marry the widow of Vanni, or Vanni marry the widow of Arcangiolo? As F. Vanni is called the half-brother of Ventura, (Zani says "era fratello uterino del Cav. Francesco Vanni,") it is some proof that Arcangiolo died before 1565.]

SALIMBENI, CAVALIERE VENTURA, was the son of Arcangiolo Salimbeni, born at Siena in 1557. After being instructed in the incipient rudiments of design by his father, who died when he was very young, he travelled through Lombardy, and studied some time at Parma and Modena the works of Coreggio and Parmigiano. He arrived at Rome in the pontificate of Sixtus V., by whom he was employed in the library of the Vatican, and in the palace of St. John of Lateran. Baglione enumerates several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Rome, of which the most worthy of notice are his pictures of the Baptism of Christ, and Abraham and the Angels, in the church del Gesu; the Circumcision, in S. Simeone de Lancelotti; and the Annunciation, in S. Maria Maggiore. He afterwards visited Florence, where, in competition with Bernardino Barbatelli, called Il Poccetti, he painted, in the cloister de Servi, several pictures of the life of the Virgin. His Marriage of the Virgin, in the cathedral at Foligno; his S. Gregorio, in the church of St. Peter, at Perugia, are further proofs of the eminence of his talents.

Ventura Salimbeni possessed a ready and fertile invention; his design is graceful and elegant, frequently resembling that of Frederigo Baroccio; and his colouring is delicate and harmonious. He sometimes painted in conjunction with his half-brother Francesco Vanni, by whose principles he is said to have profited, though considerably younger than himself. As he lived in habits of intimacy with Agostino Tassi, that artist frequently painted the landscapes in the back-grounds of his pictures. He died at Siena in 1613. We have several masterly etchings by this artist, from his own designs, among which are the following:

The Marriage of the Virgin.
The Salutation.

St. Agnes.

The Baptism of Christ by St. John.

[Ventura Salimbeni was also called Bevilacqua, after his patron, Cardinal Bonifazio Bevilacqua of Ferrara. Some place his birth two years earlier than the text, but the better authority is in favour of 1557. Bartsch is persuaded that he etched only seven plates; in addition to those above named he describes, S. S. Anne and Joachim, The Destination of the Holy Virgin, The Virgin with the infant Jesus.]

[SALINCORNO, MIRABELLO, called also CAVALLORI, flourished in 1565. He was a scholar of Ridolfo Ghirlandajo, and was one of the artists who assisted in painting the grand Catafalco for the obsequies of Michael Angelo. It is, however, said that he devoted himself to pictures of the cabinet size; and one, an Annunciation, with his name and the date 1565, was in the Baldovinetti family. It is uncertain when he died, but Zani says he operated in 1578.]

SALINI, CAVALIERE TOMMASO. This painter was born at Rome in 1575. He was the son of a Florentine sculptor, who placed him under the tuition of Baccio Pintelli, an artist of little note, and without the advantage of superior instruction he became a respectable painter of history. Baglione mentions several pictures by him in the public edifices at Rome; among others, an altar-piece in the church of S. Agnese, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint; and in S. Agostino, a picture of S. Tommaso da Villanova giving Alms to the Poor. He also painted flowers and fruit with considerable success. He died at Rome in 1625. [Lanzi says he was born about 1570; Zani says he was born in 1581, and died in 1631.]

SALIS, CARLO, was born at Verona in 1680, and first studied at Bologna under Giuseppe delle Sole, but he afterwards became a disciple of Antonio Balestra, at Venice, whose style he imitated with success. There are several pictures by this master in the churches in the Venetian states; one of the most esteemed is an altar-piece at Bergamo, representing S. Vincenzo healing the Sick. He died in 1763.

[SALLIETH, MATHIAS DE, was born at Prague in 1749, and was taught engraving by J. E. Mansfeld of Vienna, and afterwards went to Paris and worked under J. Ph. Le Bas; several prints by him of that period are in Choiseul-Gouffier's Voyage pittoresque de la Grèce, Voyage pittoresque en France, and Le Brun's Gallery. Subsequently he resided in Holland, and employed himself in engraving marine subjects after his own designs, and of pictures by Dutch masters. Among the best are, the Battle of Nieuport, and three others, after D. Langendyck, in which the Dutch fleet had the advantage of the English; two after Kobell, one after A. Storck, one after Vander Capelle, and some from his own designs. Nagler has attributed four to him, after W. Vande Velde, but they are by Canot, and were published by Boydell. The time of his death is uncertain.]

SALM, A. VAN, an obscure Dutch painter of marines and views in Holland, in black and white, in imitation of pen-drawings. They are neatly finished, but have little more effect than a print. [He lived about the middle of the 17th century. The elder Vander Velde designed many marine subjects in a similar manner; merely black and white.]

SALMEGGIA, ENEA, called IL TALPINO. This

painter was born at Bergamo about the year 1556. He received his first instruction in the art at Cremona, in the school of the Campi; he afterwards became a scholar of Procaccini, at Milan, and passed fourteen years at Rome, where he particularly applied himself to the study of the works of Raffaële. Orlandi ranks him amongst the most successful followers of the style of that distinguished painter, and asserts, that his picture of S. Vitore, at the Olivetani, at Milan, has been mistaken for a work of Raffaële; and Lanzi observes, that whoever has seen that estimable performance, will not refuse Salmeggia an honourable rank among his imitators. The purity of his contours, though occasionally approaching to the minute, the beautiful expression of his heads, the delicacy of his pencil, the graceful attitudes of his figures, indicate his attachment to his illustrious model; though he will be allowed to be greatly inferior in the grandeur and elevation of his ideas, in his acquaintance with the antique, and in the felicity of his compositions. Of his numerous works at Bergamo, we have a detailed account in the Vite de Pittori Bergamaschi, by Conte Tassi, of which the most esteemed are, the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Maria Maggiore; the great altar-piece in the church of S. Grata; representing the Virgin and Child in the clouds, with a choir of angels, and below, S. Benedetto, S. Grata, and other saints; the Martyrdom of Agata, at the Teatini; and the taking down from the Cross, in S. Leonardo. At Milan, in the church of La Passione, are two of his finest works, representing Christ's Sermon on the Mount, and the Flagellation. This estimable artist died at Bergamo in 1626, aged about 70. [It may be suspected that there is error both in the date of his birth and death. Lanzi says he died old in 1626, but Zani places his decease in 1610; he, however, quotes a picture of that date. Dr. Kügler says he deserves notice from his peculiarly simple dignity, and beautiful reminiscences of Correggio and Lionardo da Vinci. Several of his pictures are in the Milan Gallery.]

[SALMEGGIA, FRANCESCO and CLARA, a son and daughter of Enea, who, to a certain extent, imitated their father's manner, but by no means equalled him. As their works are dated 1624 and 1628, this notice is introduced as a caution.]

SALMERON, CRISTOBAL GARCIA, a Spanish painter, born at Cuenca in 1603. He was a disciple of Pedro Orrente, and proved a reputable painter of history and animals. One of his most esteemed works is a picture of the Nativity, in the church of St. Francis, at Cuenca. He was employed by Philip IV. to paint a bull-fight, in honour of the birthday of Charles II. of Spain. He died in 1666.

[SALMERON, FRANCISCO, brother of Cristobal, was born at Cuenca in 1608, and was also a pupil of Pedro Orrente. His desire was to distinguish himself as a great colourist, for which purpose, it is said, he analyzed the works of Titian, P. Veronese, Tintoretto, and the Bassans, and formed for himself a style of colouring so brilliant, that no other palette was ever equal to it; it was in effect dazzling. Being thus devoted to colour alone, he had no time for the other essentials of the art, and consequently his pictures exhibit great defects. One unfinished work by him is quoted as a specimen of what he might have produced had he lived longer, and studied drawing and composition; but he was devoured by the fire of genius, says his biographer, and died at the early age of 24. It is, however, said that he left some large pictures; but his reputation rests on those of the cabinet size, which by their brilliancy overpower all those that have the misfortune to be placed near them. It does not appear that his subjects were of a religious kind, but rather of gay assemblies; the one above referred to being an Arboleda, composed of a warrior holding his horse, and five other persons, under a tuft of trees.]

[SALOMON, JEAN, called by Italian writers Giovanni Gallo, Johannes Gallus, l'Infante Gallo, and by other appellations indicative of his country, and of his being the son of the engraver known as the little Bernard, whose real name was Bernard Salomon, though he has been generally designated Salomon Bernard. [See the article in this Dictionary.] Some confusion seems to have taken place in consequence of Jean practising the art in the same manner as his father, and perhaps in conjunction with him, on little subjects for book embellishments. This accounts for Brulliot supposing that Bernard Salomon operated so late as 1598. Zani, who was very inquisitive in such matters, says that the elder Salomon operated from 1547 to 1580, and the younger from 1550 to 1590. He denies that Bernard ever engraved in wood, but he calls Jean, or the Infant Gallo, the prince of the little masters in wood, or the Callot of the engravers in wood. It was said by Viroy that he was called the Infant Gallo because he stammered; but says Zani, "Io dirò che si può giustamente chiamare il Principe de' piccoli maestri in legno, o il Callot degli incisori in legno." Brulliot, who does not even allude to the younger Salomon, gives two specimens of initials (see Dictionnaire des Monogrammes, partie seconde, N^{os}. 936 and 2464^a.) which had been communicated to him as signifying Bernard Gallo, but he adds, "On doit trouver ces lettres sur des gravures en bois, mais nous n'avons pas encore eu occasion de les voir." The first of these marks might as readily be taken for S. B. as for G. B., but it would prove nothing as regards these engravers, as it is not found on any engraving in wood. The matter after all is but of little importance to the general, and the particular Virtuosi, having got the hint, will best know how to unravel the intricacy which involves the works of the two masters, or dissipate the obscurity by which they have, till recently, been only considered as one.]

SALMINCIO, ANDREA. This artist was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Giovanni Luigi Valesio. He engraved several prints, both on wood and on copper, which he marked with a cipher composed of an A. and S. joined . [He was a bookseller at Bologna; the prints he engraved show very little talent.]

SALTARELLO, LUCA. This painter was born at Genoa in 1610, and was a disciple of Domenico Fiasella. At an early age he gave proofs of extraordinary ability, and on leaving the school of that master painted an altar-piece for the church of S. Stefano, representing S. Benedetto resuscitating a dead person, which Lanzi describes as a picture full of expression, and of a sober and harmonious colouring, developing powers which promised to reach an exalted rank in the art, if he had been permitted a longer career. He went to Rome, in search of improvement, where he fell a victim to his unremitting assiduity in the flower of his age.

SALTZBURGER, P., a German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1580. He may be placed among what are called the little masters; most of his cuts are from the designs of Jost Amman.

They are usually marked with the cipher S, and in a few instances with the P. and S. separate. SALVATOR, ROSA. See ROSA.

SALVI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called IL SASSOFERRATO. According to Lanzi, this painter was born at the castle of Sassoferrato, near Urbino, in 1605. He was the son of Tarquinio Salvi, a painter of little celebrity, who instructed him in the rudiments of design, and when he was very young he was sent to Rome, where he passed some years. He afterwards visited Naples, where he is supposed to have studied under Domenichino, during his residence in that city. Sassoferrato did not confine his studies to the works of any particular master, but occasionally imitated the style of Guido, Albano, Barocci, and even Raffaele. His pictures generally represent the Virgin and infant Christ, and he seldom ventured on more complicate subjects. His most considerable work is a small altar-piece in the church of S. Sabina, at Rome, representing the Virgin and Child, with St. Catherine and St. Dominic. He died at Rome in 1685.

[Lanzi remarks that memoirs of this painter have been long a desideratum; without being liable to the charge of great incredulity, it may be said that they are still so. Many of the pictures attributed to Sassoferrato must have been painted long before Giovanni Batista, according to the date above given, could have been in practice. A picture by his father, Tarquinio, has the name and date 1573; and as it is a large composition painted for the church of the Eremitani, he may be supposed to have been an artist of some standing at the time. This date is thirty-two years anterior to the birth of Giovanbatista; it is not therefore very presumptuous to suppose that the son of Tarquinio (who was also called Sassoferrato) was born before 1605. Several writers have stated that he lived in the 16th century. It is said that he studied in his native place under his father, then in Rome, and afterwards in Naples, but it is not known precisely under what masters, except that in his Manuscript Memoirs we read of one Domenico; this is concluded to mean Domenichino, who was employed at Naples at the time G. B. Salvi was there, and his manner of painting shows that he adopted the style of that master, though not exclusively. In which of the works of Sassoferrato is this similarity of style to be found? Were there two artists of the name who followed different courses, but whose history has been blended? Lanzi's description of the style and manner of the artist with whose works the public are best acquainted is so correct that no apology is necessary for introducing it. I have seen, he says, in the possession of his heirs many copies from the first masters, which he executed for his own pleasure. I observed several of Albano, Guido, Barocci, Raphael, reduced to a small size, and painted, as one may say, all in one breath. There are also some landscapes of his composition, and a vast number of sacred portraits; several of St. John the Baptist, but more than all of the Madonna. Though not possessing the ideal beauty of the Greeks, he has yet a style of countenance peculiarly appropriate to the Virgin, in which an air of humility predominates, and the simplicity of the dress, and the attire of the head, corresponds with the expression of the features, without at the same time lessening the dignity of her character. He painted with a flowing pencil, was varied in his colouring, had a fine relief and chiaro-scuro; but in his local tints was somewhat hard. He delighted most in designing heads with a part of the bust, which frequently occur in collections; his portraits are very often of the size of life, and of that size, or larger, is a Madonna, by him, with the infant Christ, in the Casali palace at Rome. But these characteristics do not altogether agree with the works of an artist, named Sassoferrato from the place of his birth, who was born in 1504, and was a scholar of Francesco Penni. As he died in 1590, he could not have imitated the works of Guido, Albano, and Carlo Dolci, the first of whom was born in 1575, the second in 1578, and the last in 1616. Probably the elder Sassoferrato was the painter of the imitations of Raphael, and the "peculiar Madonnas," executed in a dry manner, which marks them as of an earlier period than that in which Gianbattista lived, and the latter afterwards adopted and improved the style by imitating the richer colouring of Guido, Albano, and Carlo Dolci. About thirty years back the editor received fourteen pictures of the cabinet size from Rome, attributed to Sassoferrato; the greater part of these were imitations of Raphael, and of masters contemporary with him, with some small heads of Madonnas, all painted in a dry manner, without the slightest resemblance to the subjects or pencilling of Guido, Albano, or Carlo Dolci. The superior style of Giovanni Battista, it may be supposed, has obscured the reputation of the other, and Sassoferrato, without a distinguishing prenom, has been applied to all imitations that have the peculiarity of manner that pervades the works of both. To conclude this note as it began, memoirs of these Salvii, Salvianis, or Sassoferratos, are still desiderata.]

SALVIATI, FRANCESCO ROSSI, called IL, [also CECCHINO DEI SALVIATI.] The family name of this artist was Rossi, but he acquired the appellation of Il Salviati, from the favour and protection he experienced from the Cardinal of that name. He was the son of Michel Angiolo Rossi, born at Florence in 1510, and was a fellow student with Giorgio Vasari, first under Andrea del Sarto, and afterwards under Baccio Bandinelli. The two young friends pursued their studies at Rome with the same intimacy, and adopted similar principles. The genius of Salviati, however, directed him to a more correct design, and to a grander and more animated style, than that of his companion; and Vasari himself celebrated him as the ablest artist who was at that time at Rome. In the church of La Pace he painted the Annunciation, and Christ appearing to St. Peter, by which he gained considerable reputation; and he soon afterwards embellished the vault of the chapel of his patron with a series of frescoes, representing the life of St. John the Baptist. He was employed by the Prince Farnese to execute the cartoons for the tapestry for his palace, in which he represented the history of Alexander. In conjunction with Vasari he ornamented the apartments of the Cancellaria with several fresco works. From Rome he went to Venice, where he painted several pictures for the public edifices and private collections, particularly the history of Psyche, in a saloon of the Palazzo Grimaldi, which Vasari, with a marked partiality for his countryman and co-disciple, styles, La piu bell' opera di pittura che sia in tutta Venezia. On leaving Venice he travelled through Lombardy, and made some stay at Mantua, where he was particularly struck with the works of Giulio Romano. He afterwards visited Florence, and was employed by the Grand Duke to ornament one of the saloons of the Palazzo Vecchio, where he represented the victory and triumph of Furius Camillus, composed and painted with surprising genius and spirit; and the accuracy with which he has delineated the arms, habiliments, and costume of ancient Rome, is worthy of the most learned antiquary.

The restless and unsettled disposition of Salviati did not permit him to reside long in a place, and he readily complied with the invitation of the Cardinal de Lorraine to accompany him to France, where Francis I. had engaged some of the ablest artists of Italy in the decoration of the Chateau of Fontainebleau. He was received with distinction, and was treated with great kindness by Primaticcio, the superintendent of the works; but the jealousy and turbulence of his nature returned these good offices with ingratitude and malevolence. During his stay in France, he painted a fine picture for the church of the Celestines, at Paris, representing the taking down from the Cross. Dissatisfied with his situation in France, he returned to Rome, where he fell into new difficulties and disputes with Daniele di Volterra and Pietro Ligorio. The continual agitation of his mind brought on a fever, of which he died, in 1563.

Il Salviati possessed a rich and fertile invention; his compositions are original and abundant, and he embellished his works with magnificent architecture. He was one of the few who have been able to combine celerity of pencil with a strict correctness of design, for which he was distinguished, though occasionally bordering on the gigantic. Although he is more esteemed as a designer than a colourist, his carnations are delicate and tender, his conceptions are graceful, and the folding of his drapery is broad and simple, without concealing the beauty of his forms. The possession of these powers was poisoned by a rancorous and malignant disposition, which prompted him to vilify the works of others, and to extol his own; and by the injustice and impolicy of such conduct, he frequently found preferred to him rivals, whose talents were unworthy of his competition. [Salviati was unwise; but those who preferred inferior artists to him were unjust. It is the talent and not the man that should be considered in works of art. Partiality in the employment of painters on public works, unless for decided merit, is a fraud on posterity; of which, indeed, there is too much practised even in the present day.]

SALVIATI, GIUSEPPE. See PORTA.

SALWAY, N., an English engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1760. We have by him some portraits, which are not without merit.

SALY, JAMES FRANCIS, a French sculptor, born at Valenciennes in 1720. He resided some time at the court of Denmark, where he executed an equestrian statue of King Frederick V., of which there is a print by J. M. Preissler. He is mentioned here as the engraver of thirty plates of vases, and of four designs for monuments. They are etched with spirit. [He was born in 1717, and died in 1776. Some writers have divided him into two. He executed several other statues in bronze, but an account of them does not belong to this work.]

[SAM, ENGEL, or ANGELO, born at Rotterdam in 1699, was a good portrait painter, but excelled in the execution of familiar subjects. He imitated the manner of the Chevalier Vander Werf, and, it is said, painted a Flight into Egypt so perfectly resembling the works of that master, that even acknowledged connoisseurs were deceived by it. It would be gratifying to know where this picture is to be found, as the only one of the subject, painted by Vander Werf, is in the gallery at the Hague. Whoever has another may suspect its originality, if the above statement be true. It is also said that he imitated Metsu; this may be more readily believed; for the free penciling and colouring of this more estimable master (not to say his greater artistic knowledge) are more easy of imitation, and less likely to be at once discovered, than the laboured ivory polish of Vander Werf. There are many pictures that pass with the ignorant as the work of Metsu that possibly are by Sam. He died in 1769.]

SAMBIN, HUGUES, was an eminent architect, who resided at Dijon about the year 1522. He designed and engraved a set of pilasters, and other architectural subjects, which were executed with neatness and precision.

SAMACCHINI, ORAZIO. This eminent painter was born at Bologna in 1532, and, according to Malvasia, was instructed in the art by Pellegrino Tibaldi. He afterwards studied the works of Coreggio, and was employed to paint in fresco the great chapel in the cathedral, contiguous to the famous cupola by that distinguished master. He went to Rome in the pontificate of Pius IV., by whom he was employed, in conjunction with Marco da Siena, and others, in the decorations of the Sala Regia. It does not appear that he either approved or adopted the principles of the Roman school. The graces of Coreggio and Parmigiano had made an impression on his mind, which even the grandeur and majesty of Raffaele could not obliterate, and he returned to Bologna confirmed in his adherence to the style of Lombardy. He embellished the churches and palaces of his native city with some of their most attractive ornaments, among which are, his celebrated picture of the Coronation of the Virgin, in the church of SS. Naborre e Felice, so much applauded by the Caracci; his Presentation in the Temple, in S. Giacomo Maggiore, an admirable production, in which we are equally charmed with the elegance of the composition and the captivating expression of the Virgin and principal figures. It was considered by Agostino Caracci, by whom we have a fine print of it, as one of the most perfect pictures at Bologna. Little inferior to these are his altar-piece of the Last Supper, at the Certosa; the Crucifixion, in La Trinita; and his Fall of Icarus, in the Palazzo Lambertini.

Although the powers of Samacchini appear to such advantage in the tender and pathetic, he was not unequal to the more arduous encounter of the grand and terrific. According to Lanzi, the strength and energy of his faculties are most apparent in the vault of the church of S. Abondio, at Cremona. The figures of the prophets are dignified and commanding, and he has vanquished the difficulties of the di Sotto in Su, under very embarrassing local circumstances, in a very masterly style. He died in 1577. [Zani says in 1573.]

[SAN ANTONIO, FRAY BARTOLOMÉ DE, was born at Cienpozelos in 1708. At the age of fifteen he took the habit of the order of the Trinitarios descalzos, and after studying philosophy and theology went to Rome to study painting, of which he had acquired the elements at Madrid. He remained in Italy six years, and in 1740 returned to his convent at Madrid, which he enriched with an immense number of his productions. About this time the Academy of S. Fernando was established, for which he painted an allegorical picture representing Ferdinand VI. near the Catholic Religion, seated on a throne in the midst of the four quarters of the globe, and for which he was received as a member of that body. He died in 1782. Among the works which he painted for his convent are S. Juan de Mata receiving a purse from the hands of the Virgin to redeem captives; a Nun murdered by the Saracens; two frescoes, one representing the Arts and Sciences, and the other the Four Evangelists and the Four Doctors of the Church; also for the library, a superb picture in oil of Two Patriarchs of the order adoring the Trinity; and another, of the Virgin and Jesus, with angels above. For the church of the Trinitarios at Madrid he painted eleven pictures; among these were the grand altar-piece representing the Incarnation; Jesus asleep embracing the Cross; and others, relating to the infancy of Christ and the life of the Virgin. There were also pictures of St. Bernard and of St. Firmin; and one of a dead Christ, considered so beautiful as to be exposed alone during holy-week; and several portraits of bishops and priors of the order.]

[SANCHEZ, ALONSO, one of three artists employed to paint the beautiful frescoes at the university de Alcalá de Henares, by command of Cardinal Cisneros, the founder. He was also employed, with five others, in the embellishment of the cloister of the cathedral at Toledo, for which he was paid in 1498. In 1508 he was again employed in the same cathedral with Diego Lopez and Luis de Medina. This was a work of considerable importance, for which the artists were paid 71,150 maravedis.]

[SANCHEZ, CLEMENTE, a painter of considerable merit, both as a designer and colourist, resided at Valladolid in 1620. He painted for the Dominicans de Aranda de Duero several pictures of the Marriage and Visitation of the Virgin, the Virgin of the Rosary, a Magdalene, and a small oratory representing Jesus and Mary, S. John the Baptist, St. James, and other figures. No other particulars of him are recorded.]

[SANCHEZ-COELLO, ALONSO. This very eminent painter is said by Palomino to have been a native of Portugal, but Cean Bermudez asserts that he was born at Benifayrò, in Valencia, in the early part of the 16th century (1515). It is probable that his mother was a Portuguese, and that he took the name Coello from her. Nothing of his early history is accurately known; but, whoever was the director of his studies, it is evident that the works of Titian were his models. In 1541 he resided at Madrid, where he formed an intimacy with Antonio More, whom he accompanied to Lisbon, when the latter was sent by Charles V. to paint the portraits of the royal family. Sanchez entered into the service of Don John, who had married Joanna, the daughter of Charles and sister of Philip II.; and as he made a considerable stay at Lisbon it was, perhaps, an additional reason for supposing him to be a Portuguese. At the death of Don John his widow recommended Sanchez to her brother Philip, who at once received him as his painter in ordinary, Antonio More having quitted Madrid somewhat precipitately, in consequence of an indiscreet familiarity with his royal master; some say for daubing his cheek with carmine; others, for rapping his knuckles with the mahl-stick. Pacheco says the king appointed a residence for Sanchez in one of the houses adjoining the palace, and communicating with it by a private entrance, of which his Majesty kept the key. By this way the king, without notice, unattended, and en dishabille, would ascend to the room where the painter was occupied, nor would he suffer him to rise, or cease from his work, but leaning familiarly on the back of his chair would observe his mode of operation. He painted many portraits of Philip; some in complete armour, on foot and on horseback; some in his sporting and travelling dresses; in fact, in every variety of costume. He painted also the portraits of all the royal family, consisting of seventeen persons, who were accustomed, like the king, to enter the house without previous notice, and amuse themselves at all times with the artist's wife and children. In addition to these illustrious personages he painted the portraits of Popes Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V.; the Dukes of Florence and Savoy; Cardinal Farnese, brother of the Duke of Parma; and many of the grandees of Spain. He was honoured with the friendship of Don John of Austria, Don Carlos, Cardinal Granville, the Archbishops of Toledo and Seville, and others of high rank. With such patronage he became rich, and, it is said, he lived according to his fortune. In 1570 he painted, in conjunction with his disciple, Diego de Urbina, the triumphal arch erected at Madrid for the entry of Anne of Austria, the wife of Philip II. In 1573 he entered into an engagement to decorate with suitable subjects the principal altar of the church del Espinar, executed by the celebrated Francisco Giralte, and for which he painted what may be termed a drop-scene, to serve as a screen during the two last weeks in Lent. These works occupied him for four years, and at their completion caused an extraordinary sensation. For several years after he continued to paint portraits of the royal family, their illustrious connexions, and noblemen of the court, to be placed in the palace of the Pardo. Notwithstanding his advanced age Philip employed him in 1582 in further decorating the Escorial. For this monastery he painted his celebrated pictures of St. Paul, the first hermit, with St. Anthony; St. Stephen with St. Lawrence; St. Vincent with St. George; St. Katharine with St. Ines; and St. Justus and Pastor, in which he introduced a beautiful view of Alcalá de Henares, and the adjacent scenery. About this time he painted the portrait of his friend, Father Siguenza, which is considered a chef d'œuvre, and has been finely engraved by Ferdinand Selma; and in 1582 that of Ignatius Loyola, from casts taken twenty-nine years previously, and from instructions by Father Ribadeneyra. It is said to have been a surprising likeness, but whether it exists is not known. Such was the esteem in which he was held by Philip, that whenever that monarch was on an expedition, or a journey, and had occasion to send his commands, he addressed his letters Al muy amado hijo Alonso Sanchez Coello (To my beloved son Alonso Sanchez Coello); and he was accustomed to call him the Portuguese Titian. Indeed it is acknowledged that the great Venetian could have added little more than roundness, and perhaps a softer outline, to the portraits by Sanchez Coello. This eminent painter died at Madrid in 1590, possessed of property to the amount of 55,000 ducats, part of which he left for the endowment of an hospital. Unfortunately a great number of his portraits have been destroyed by the successive fires at the palaces of the Pardo and the Alcázar at Madrid; the pictures that remain are confined to the monastery of the Escorial. Madrid can boast, it is said, of only one picture by him, a St. Sebastian in the chapel of the convent of St. Jerome, painted in the grand style of the 16th century. See COELLO.]

[SANCHEZ-COTAN, FRAY JUAN, an eminent Spanish painter of Madonnas, flowers, and still-life, was born at Alcázar de San Juan in 1561; he was the son of Bartolomé Sanchez-Cotan, and Ana de Quinoes. He studied at Toledo under Blas de Prado, whose style he imitated, and under him made great progress in the art. The subjects then in vogue were what in Spain are called bodegones, consisting of fruit, fish, game, and vegetables of all sorts profusely collected in the larder, like those of Snyders, De Vos, Van Utrecht, and others of the Dutch and Flemish masters. These pictures, however neglected at the present time, are works of great merit, and perhaps exhibit more technical skill than subjects that hold a higher rank. It is probable that he occupied himself with these compositions for a considerable time, as there are some with his signature, and the date 1602. It appears that he was of devout habits, and of a pious disposition, as in 1604 he became a professor of the Chartreuse of Paular, which, says Bermudez, increased both his piety and his skill in painting. Here he painted several sacred subjects representing Christ's Passion, the sorrows of the Virgin, and particularly Madonnas crowned with chaplets of flowers, of exceeding beauty; all these he devoted to the decoration of his convent, or bestowed on his brethren for their private oratories. From Paular Sanchez-Cotan was removed in 1612 to the royal Chartreuse at Granada, for which he painted the principal historical pictures in that monastery. Among these were subjects from the Passion of Christ, circumstances related of the life of St. Bruno, and details of persecutions suffered by the Spanish brethren of the order in England. It is related by Palomino that he painted a Crucifixion for the Refectory of the convent, so deceptive in its appearance, that birds attempted to perch on the cross; and Cean Bermudez confesses that he, at first sight, mistook it for a piece of sculpture. His principal public works were at the Carthusian monasteries of Paular and Granada; at the Agustinos Calzados at the latter city; and at the Merced Calzada at Seville. This amiable man and excellent artist died at Granada in 1627, and was reckoned one of the most venerable monks, and also one of the best painters of Spain. Whether his brethren, the monks, or Palomino, the biographer, supposed that as his pictures were so beautiful, he must have had heavenly assistance, it is not necessary to inquire; but the one party kept the tradition, and the other recorded, that during the time he was painting the picture of St. Ildefonso receiving the miraculous Chasuble from the Virgin, she descended from heaven and honoured the painter with a sitting. Tibian, Sanchez-Coello, Velasquez, Lawrence, and all other painters of terrestrial royalty must hide their diminished heads. Yet, it is added, the works of Sanchez-Cotan had a particular analogy with his character and his virtues, and breathed decorum and devotion. His colouring was soft and harmonious, his design pure, and the attitudes of his figures manifested the tranquillity of his soul. Vincentio Carducho made a journey from Madrid to Granada to behold his works, and distinguished the painter among the monks of his order, by the serenity of his countenance being in accordance with the style of his pictures; nor did he disdain to avail himself afterwards of what he saw, to enrich some of his own pictures of similar subjects.]

SANDBY, PAUL. This admired artist was born at Nottingham in 1732. He came to London when he was fourteen years of age, and having shown an early inclination for the art, he got introduced into the drawing-room at the Tower. He had studied there about two years, when the late Duke of Cumberland, wishing to have a survey made of the north and west parts of the Highlands of Scotland, young Sandby was engaged as draughtsman, under the inspection of Mr. David Watson. In company with that gentleman he travelled through that most romantic country, and, though the leading object of his tour was the drawing of plans, in his leisure hours he made many sketches from the stupendous and terrific scenery with which it abounds. From these designs, the first offspring of his genius, he made a number of small etchings, which, on his return to London, were published by Messrs. Ryland and Bryce. Soon after his return from his northern tour, about the year 1752, he passed some time with his brother at Windsor, and during his residence there made a great number of drawings of the most beautiful views of Windsor and Eton, to which he gave so charming an effect, that they were immediately purchased by Sir Joseph Banks, by whom he was very liberally remunerated. He soon after was invited to accompany that gentleman in a tour through North and South Wales, and was employed by Sir Watkin Williams Wynne to design the most picturesque scenery in that interesting country. These he afterwards engraved in a new style, in imitation of drawings in bistre and Indian ink, called aquatinta, which he carried to a degree of perfection unknown before.

At the foundation of the Royal Academy, in 1768, Mr. Sandby was elected one of the original members; and in the same year was appointed chief drawing-master to the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, which office he held with great credit to himself and advantage to the establishment, until his death. For the following character of Mr. Sandby, as an artist, we are indebted to a late interesting publication.

"His industry was as remarkable as his genius; the number of his drawings disseminated through the cabinets of the amateurs of the arts is immense. To particularize any of his productions would be throwing a degree of neglect on those that we omitted. Their merit is of a superior kind, and the scenery he delineates is, in many cases, not merely an address to the eye, but an appeal to the mind. The towering, though almost tottering battlements of the baronial castle, display dignity in ruins, and show the instability of human grandeur. The mouldering fragments of the ivy-mantled abbey, venerable even in decay, must bring to our recollection the reverential awe with which they were once contemplated."

[Paul Sandby, it may be said, was the first reformer of topographical drawing; his predecessors had been too much accustomed to compose from prints after old and foreign contemporary masters; but he went to nature, and being thoroughly acquainted with the principles of linear perspective, he drew, on their respective sites, his views of cities, castles, cathedrals, and other objects, with characteristic truth and pictorial taste. The process by which he produced the cheerful daylight effects in his subjects, was to pen carefully the outline of every part of the composition without diminution of tint, similar to an etching. On this he distributed the shadows with Indian ink and a mixture of bistre on the foreground objects, and tinted the whole in their respective colours, which, when finished, had the appearance of aquatinta prints slightly coloured. His later productions, however, show a great improvement on this method, and a more pleasing harmony of tints; for which he was in some measure indebted to Turner and Girtin, who, on their part, were under an obligation to him for having first pointed out the right path for artists in water colours to pursue when employed on topographical subjects. A great number of his views of seats of the nobility and gentry in different parts of England were engraved by Middiman, Byrne, Milton, and other eminent landscape engravers of the time, and exhibit Paul Sandby's talents to great advantage. To his other acquirements in art he added etching and engraving in the style known as aquatinta. He was, perhaps, the first English artist who adopted this style, the secret of which, it is said, was brought into England by the Honourable Charles Greville, who purchased it from Le Prince, a French artist, and communicated it to Paul Sandby. His works in this manner are very numerous, and were popular at the time they were published. Among them are twelve from drawings in South Wales, dedicated to the Honourable Charles Greville and Joseph Banks, Esq., in 1775; the different encampments which took place in the year 1780 in Hyde Park, St. James's Park, the Museum Gardens, at Blackheath, Coxheath, and Warley Common, in which, besides the economy of a camp, many well-known characters of the day were introduced. He engraved also in the same manner a series of prints exhibiting the Sports of the Carnival at Rome, from drawings by David Allan; and the designs for Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd by the same artist. Of the views in Italy and in the neighbourhood of Rome, from drawings by Clerisseau, Fabris, Parr, and others, he engraved a considerable number, many of which are in his best style of aquatint; and a few in the manner of Piranesi are considered among the best of his works on copper. These last consist of six plates from the designs of J. Collins, and are dedicated to several noblemen and gentlemen, patrons of the fine arts. He made some attempts at caricature, in which he displayed skill in the composition and execution, and much wit and humour in the subject and characters; but it was not congenial to his temper and disposition, and he soon relinquished it. Some, in which he had ridiculed Hogarth's Analysis of Beauty, he withdrew from publication, on seeing that great painter's inimitable series of pictures of Marriage à la Mode, observing that such a man ought not to be made the subject of ridicule or burlesque. He died in St. George's Row, Hyde Park Corner, the 7th of November, 1809. Paul Sandby exercised his pen as well as his pencil, and might be considered the poet of the Royal Academy of that day, as most of their dinners were enlivened with a song written by him for the occasion. One of these was published, with the figure of a dancing-master giving lessons to a goose, at a guinea a lesson, and six guineas entrance money; at the bottom, and after the song, was a vignette of a fool's cap and bells, and a violin. The circumstance that occasioned this effusion was the following. The drawing-master and the dancing-master met at the door of a fashionable person at the same moment, and preference was given to the latter, while the former was obliged to wait till dancing was done, much to his annoyance and chagrin. Probably the artist was Paul himself, who, as a royal academician, and a drawing-master of great practice, holding the office of professor at the Military Academy at Woolwich, and moving in fashionable society, was not accustomed to be kept waiting in an ante-room, especially for a dancing-master.

The verses are as applicable at present as at the time they were written; and being a fair specimen of Paul Sandby's disposition and poetical talent, and the print being rather scarce, they are inserted here.

"Of all the fine accomplishments sure dancing far the best is,
But if a doubt with you remains,— behold the goose and Vestris;*

And a dancing we will go, will go, &c.

Let men of learning plead and preach—their toil is all in vain,
Sure, labour of the heels and hands is better than the brain.

Then talk no more, ye men of arts,
'bout keeping light and shade,
Good understanding in the heels is better than the head.

Great Whigs, and eke great Tories too,
both in and out will dance,
Join hands, change sides, and figure in,
now sink and now advance.

Let Oxford boast of ancient lore, or Cam of classic rules,
*Noverre might lay you ten to one,
his heels against your schools.

Old Homer sung of gods and kings in most heroic strains,
Yet scarce could get, we have been told,
a dinner for his pains.

Poor Milton wrote the most sublime
'gainst Satan, Death, and Vice,
But very few would quit a dance to purchase Paradise.

The soldier risks health, life, and limbs,
his fortune to advance,
While *Pique and Vestris fortunes make by one night's single dance.

'T is all in vain to sigh and grieve, or idly spend our breath,
Since millions now, and those unborn, must join the dance of death.

Yet while we live let's merry be,
and make of care a jest,
Since we are taught what is right,
and what is right—is best;
And a dancing we will go, &c."

SANDRART, JOACHIM DE. This painter and writer on art was born at Frankfort in 1606, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by Matthew Merian and Theodore de Bry. At the age of fifteen he went to Prague, where he was for some time instructed in engraving by Giles Sadeler, who, finding his genius was better adapted to painting,

* Vestris, the dancer of that day, was a great man, but not so great as he who begot him, and who, on introducing him to make his début in public, said, Remember, son, you have your father for a spectator! Skillful dancing is hereditary in the family. La Pique was also an "earth-treading star." Noverre not only danced well but wrote well on the subject; his book "sur la Danse" is the dancer's classic.

recommended him to change the graver for the pencil. In pursuance of that advice he went to Utrecht, where he became a disciple of Gerard Honthorst. Under that able instructor his progress was surprising, and he soon acquired sufficient ability to assist his master in many of his most considerable works.

Descamps asserts, that when Honthorst was invited to England by Charles I., he engaged Sandrart to accompany him, that the king bespoke many pictures of him, that he copied the portraits of Henry VIII., Sir Thomas More, Erasmus, and others, from Holbein, for the Earl of Arundel, and that he remained in England till 1627, when he went to Venice. There appears, however, to be very little authority for the account. No picture of Sandrart is mentioned in King Charles's collection; and what renders his having been in England more improbable is, that he takes no notice of it himself in the Life of Honthorst, though he mentions that artist's journey to England, and gives an account of his works here. He certainly passed several years in Italy, and at Venice copied the finest pictures of Titian and Paolo Veronese. From Venice he went to Rome, where he resided some years, and was much employed by the Cardinal Barberini, and the Prince Giustiniani, and was intrusted by the latter with the superintendence of the engravings, of the statues in his gallery. After a long residence in Italy, Sandrart returned to Frankfort. He was employed in several considerable works for the Emperor Ferdinand, and for Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria. Towards the latter part of his life he resided at Nuremberg, where he established an academy, and composed several works on art, particularly his Lives of the Painters, under the title of Academia Artis Pictoriae, published at Nuremberg in 1683. He died in that city in 1688, aged 72.

[Some writers are not content with saying that Sandrart visited England, but they add that he remained there a long time; and that he was not only the friend of Charles I., but also of the Duke of Buckingham. It is said that he left in 1627; he was therefore only 21 years of age at that time. If he came at all, it was with Honthorst, who was employed by Charles, and who left England on the 8th of December, 1628. There are documents in the State Paper Office which show that the latter was employed by Charles, and liberally paid; but not to the extent his biographers assert; and that he also painted the Duke of Buckingham and his family is clear, as the picture is now in Hampton Court palace: but there is no account of payments to Sandrart for his services. He must have been not only highly talented but indefatigable, if, before he was 21 years of age, he copied the picture of Mercury teaching Cupid to read, by Correggio, the Twelve Cæsars, by Titian, several of the finest of the portraits by Holbein, and that so exactly, says his biographer, that it was no easy matter to distinguish which were the originals; besides others, after Guido, Veronese, and Van Dyck. Van Dyck came to England in 1632. While at Rome he painted the portrait of Urban VIII.; and had also the honour of being selected as one of the twelve most eminent painters in Italy, to paint an equal number of pictures for the king of Spain. The pictures were to be of the same dimensions, and each artist to select his own subject: Sandrart chose that of the Death of Seneca. Among the distinguished twelve we find the names of Niccolo Poussino, Guido, Domenichino, Andrea Sacchi, and Guercino: to be numbered with them was indeed a high honour; and it seems that he did credit to the judgment of those who appointed him. He made, during his stay in Italy, many sketches of the ancient remains, statues, and public buildings, which, after his decease, were sold with his pictures and objects of curiosity, for a considerable sum. The works on art which he published, after his return to Nuremberg, were, Academia Tedesca della Architettura, Scultura, e Pittura; oder Teutsche Akademie, &c., 4 vols. in 2, folio, Nürnberg, 1675-79; Iconologia Deorum, 1680; Admiranda Sculpturæ Veteris Vestigia, 1680; Romæ antiquæ et novæ Theatrum, 1684; and Academia Artis Pictoriæ, 1683, collected from Vasari, Ridolfi, and Van Mander. But this is a Latin translation of what had already been published in the Academia Tedesca. A uniform edition (in German) of all his works was published at Nürnberg, 1769-75, in 8 vols. folio. His best original composition is the subject of the Last Judgment, in which he has arranged a multitude of figures with considerable skill, well drawn, and coloured in a masterly manner. There is a difference among writers respecting the time of Sandrart's decease; some say he died in 1683, but no doubt erroneously, as some of his works not published as posthumous bear a later date.]

SANDRART, JACOB VON, was a nephew of the preceding artist, born at Frankfort in 1630, and was instructed in engraving by Cornelius Dankerts and William Hondius. He engraved a great number of plates, which are executed with the graver in a clear, neat style. His best prints are his portraits, among which are the following:

The Emperor Rodolphus II.

— Ferdinand II.

— Ferdinand III.

Frederick, Prince of Norway.

Sophia, Electoral Princess of Saxony.

Ferdinand Maria, Duke of Bavaria.

Joachim Sandrart, Painter; inscribed Seculi nostri Apelles.

Joannes Paulus Auer, Painter.

[His portraits, and other subjects, are numerous; Nagler has given a list of them. He died at Nuremberg in 1708.]

SANDRART, JOHN JACOB VON, was the son of Jacob von Sandrart, born at Ratisbon in 1655. He learned the first rudiments of design from his father, and profited by the lessons of Joachim von Sandrart, his great uncle. This artist was an able designer as well as an engraver, and possessed a ready and inventive genius. We have some portraits by him, executed in a neat, tasteful style. The publications of Joachim von Sandrart are embellished with many spirited etchings by him. He also engraved several of the plates for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Elizabeth Henrietta, Princess of Brandenburg; after A. Le Clerc.

Silvius Jacob de Dunkelmann; after the same.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Holy Family; after Joachim de Sandrart.

Two subjects of the Origin of Painting; after the same.

Two subjects of the Customs and Amusements of the ancient Germans; after the same.

Æneas saving his father Anchises from the burning of Troy; from his own design.

[He died at Nuremberg in 1698.]

SANDRART, SUSANNA MARIA VON. This lady was the sister of the foregoing artist, born at Nurémberg in 1658. She was instructed in design and engraving by her father Jacob von Sandrart, and executed several plates, chiefly for the publications of Joachim von Sandrart. We have the following prints, among others, by her :

The Assembly of the Gods on the Marriage of Cupid and Psyche; after Raffaele.

The Nozze Aldobrandi; after a design by Bartoli.

A Bacchaalian subject; inscribed Immoderatum dulce Amorum.

[She died in 1718.]

SANDRART, LAWRENCE VON, was probably of the same family with the foregoing artists. His name is affixed to the frontispiece for a set of prints from Ovid's Metamorphoses, by Engelbrecht, published in 1700. [It is also supposed that he was a painter in enamel, and was living in 1710.]

SANDRINO, TOMMASO. This painter was born at Brescia in 1575. He excelled in painting perspective and architectural views, and was no mean painter of history. His principal works are the ceilings of the churches of St. Faustino, S. Domenico, and the cathedral at Brescia. There are also several of his works in the public edifices at Milan and Ferrara. He died in 1630.

SANDYS, EDWYN. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as the engraver of a portrait of Sir William Petty.

[SANFELICE, FERDINANDO, a nobleman of Naples, was the patron and scholar of Francesco Solimene. He attained a name among historical painters, and with the assistance of Solimene painted altar-pieces for several churches. He also painted fruit, landscapes, and perspective views, in which he particularly excelled; and he had the reputation of being an excellent architect. Solimene painted a gallery in his house, which afterwards became an academy for young artists, and was known as the Sanfelice.]

SANTA-CROCE, FRANCESCO RIZZO DA. According to Tassi, this artist was a native of Santa-Croce, in the Bergamese state, and flourished from the year 1507 till 1529. He was sent to Venice when he was young, where he frequented the school of Vittore Carpaccio, and, following the example of his instructor, adopted a more modern and unrestrained style than was practised by his predecessors, the Bellini. Zanetti mentions, as one of his most esteemed productions, an altar-piece in the church of Degli Angeli, at Murano, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, with S. Geremia and S. Girolamo, with a Choir of Angels, a graceful composition, and delicately coloured. [According to Zani he operated from 1507 till 1545.]

SANTA-CROCE, GIROLAMO RIZZO, DA. This painter was of the same family as the foregoing artist, and flourished, according to the dates on his pictures, from the year 1520 till 1549. He is said by Zanetti to have approached nearer to the style of Giorgione and Titian, than any artist of his time. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Venice, and in the State, which are mentioned in very favourable terms by that writer, particularly the Martyrdom of S. Lorenzo, in the church of S. Francesco della Vigna; and the Last Supper, in S. Martino; the latter is inscribed Hieronimo de Sancta Croce MDXXXVIII. [Zani gives his signature to a picture with the date 1549, and says that he operated in 1552. There are several cabinet pictures by him in the Manfrini Gallery at Venice, and also in the Berlin Museum. His small figures of angels floating in the air, or resting on clouds, are beautiful.

He has been accused of retaining some of the ancient Venetian style, but Lanzi, in speaking of his cabinet pictures, of bacchanalian and other subjects, vindicates him from the charge. He says, Not any of these productions are embued with traces of the ancient style. They display a grace of composition, study of foreshortening, and of the naked parts, a harmony of colours, forming a mixture of different schools, in which the Roman predominates, and least of all the Venetian. In his celebrated picture of the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, he availed himself of the engravings of Marc Antonio, after that of Bandinelli, and others, but without appearing a mere copyist; for he varied his figures, and especially his landscapes, in which he was very skillful.]

SANTAFEDE, FRANCESCO. This painter was a Neapolitan, and a scholar of Andrea Sabbatini, called da Salerno. There are many works of this master in the churches at Naples, of which the most deserving of notice is the Coronation of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria la Nuova. He flourished about the year 1555.

SANTAFEDE, FABRIZIO, was the son of Francesco Santafede, born at Naples in 1560, by whom he was first instructed in the art, but he afterwards became a scholar of Francesco Curia, and at length visited Rome, where he remained two years, studying the principal objects of art in that capital. On his return to Naples he was employed in several considerable works for the public edifices. For the church of the Nunciata he painted two pictures, representing the Nativity, and the Angel appearing to the Shepherds. In S. Maria de Constantinopoli, is an altar-piece by this master representing the Adoration of the Magi. Many other performances of this painter are mentioned by Dominici in his Lives of the Neapolitan Artists. The time of his death is not ascertained. [Zani says he died in 1634.]

SANTAGOSTINO, GIACOMO ANTONIO. This artist was born at Milan in 1583, and was a scholar of Giulio Cesare Procaccini, under whom he became a very reputable artist. He painted several pictures for the churches at Milan, particularly in S. Lorenzo Maggiore, in S. Maria del Lantasio, and in S. Vitore. He died in 1648.

SANTERRE, JOHN BAPTIST, a French painter, born at Magny, near Pontoise, in 1651. He was a scholar of Bon Boullongne, by whose instruction he became a reputable artist. Although he was not endowed with a fertile or ready invention, he supplied that deficiency by an assiduous application, and an attentive study after nature. His historical pictures are few, of which the most deserving of notice are his Susanna and the Elders, formerly in the hall of the Academy, now in the gallery of the Louvre; Mary Magdalene penitent, in the king's collection; and Saint Theresa, in the chapel at Versailles. He painted portraits and domestic subjects with success, which are carefully designed and painted, and exhibit a more harmonious colouring than is usually found in the works of the artists of his country. He died at Paris in 1717.

SANTI, or SANTO, DI TITI. See TITI.

SANTI, DOMENICO, [called MENGAZZINO.] This artist was born at Bologna in 1621, and was one of the ablest disciples of Agostino Mitelli. He nearly equalled his instructor in painting perspective and architectural views. The churches and palaces at Bologna possess many of his works, particularly S. Colombano, the Servi, and the Palazzo Ratta, which are embellished with figures by Giuseppe Mitelli,

Gio. Antonio Burrini, and especially by Domenico Maria Canuti. He also painted pictures of a small size, which are highly appreciated in the private collections at Bologna, and are frequently mistaken for the works of Agostino Mitelli. He died in 1694. [Bartsch, who says he died in 1697, attributes four prints to D. Santí, namely, portraits of Simone Cantarini, Lodovico, Annibal, and Agostino Caracci. The first only has his name; the second and fourth that of Canutus, and the third the word Libertas.]

[SANTIAGO-POLMÁRES, D. FRANCISCO XAVIER DE, born at Toledo in 1728, was a learned writer, an ingenious emblazoner of state documents, and a skilful designer. He held an office as receiver of crown rents, and was also employed much in copying manuscripts for the royal libraries. In these, and in literary pursuits, he was occupied for upwards of thirty years. He assisted Bayer in the formation of the Index to the ancient Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Spanish manuscripts in the Escorial; wrote on the topography of Spain, of her geographical position in America, and of matters ecclesiastical and political. But he is noticed here merely for his artistic talents, as a painter of landscapes, and an ornamental designer of frontispieces for books in Indian ink and with the pen. He painted in oil four views of Toledo, several portraits of distinguished persons, and a number of landscapes. He had a particular aptitude for the designing of frontispieces, and his talent was in great request by authors and publishers for that purpose. These will be found prefixed to many of the books printed in Spain during the second half of the last century. Santiago-Polmáres died at Madrid the 13th of January, 1796.]

[SANTIS, HORATIO DI, probably a native of Aquila, an engraver, who flourished from 1568 to 1577, according to the dates on his prints, which are chiefly after the designs of Pompeo Aquilano, so called from being a native of the same city. Bartsch has described seventeen prints by Santis, and supposes that there are others which have not come to his knowledge. Nagler has added the engravings of antique statues in the city of Rome, in 74 plates, the joint work of Horatio di Santis and Cherubino Alberti, published in 1584. There is great inequality in the prints of this artist, both with regard to the management of the burin, and the care with which they are executed; yet they have so striking a resemblance, in their general effect, to those of Cherubino Alberti, that they may be mistaken for his work.]

[SANTISSIMO-SACRAMENTO, FRAY JUAN DEL, whose name, before he became a monk, was Juan de Guzman, was born at Puente de Don Gonzalo, in Cordova, in 1611. After studying some time at Cordova he went to Rome, but did not devote much attention to the antique, or the works of Raphael; colouring, and mathematics as applicable to architecture and perspective, were his chief objects. He returned to Spain in 1634, and went to reside in Seville; where he signalized himself more by turbulence, and feats of dexterity in the management of arms, than in the skilful use of the pencil. The consequence was, that having taken part in a revolt, and being unsuccessful, he was obliged to seek refuge in the convent of the Carmelitas Calzados, (shod Carmelites,) and assume the habit as a lay brother. His restless character caused him soon to be sent from that establishment to the descalzos, or barefooted Carmelites, and he received orders to reside in the convent of Aguilar, where a severer discipline converted him from a refractory hector to a humble and pious monk.' He took the name of Fray Juan del Santissimo-Sacramento, and had permission to exercise his talent as a painter in decorating the walls of the convent, and other establishments appertaining to the order. At intervals he employed himself in translating Pietro Acolti's practical perspective from Italian into Spanish, to which he added notes correcting the errors of the author; and it is said that he even engraved plates illustrative of the work, which, however, has never been published. In 1666 he went to Cordova to paint pictures for the monastery of his order in that city, which he accomplished so much to the satisfaction of the bishop, that he retained him to decorate his episcopal palace, and other places in his diocese. He remained at Cordova till 1676, when he returned to his convent at Aguilar, where he died in 1680. His merit as a painter is but small; he was poor as an inventor, and made up his compositions by plagiarisms from prints; he aimed at the colouring of Rubens and Van Dyck, and so far succeeded in satisfying the eye, but it does not compensate for his defects in drawing.]

[SANTO-DOMINGO, FRAY VICENTE DE. This worthy monk is entitled to notice as being the first instructor of Navarrete, called el Mudo, and for his discernment of his pupil's talents at a very early age. He taught him all that he himself knew, and then very honestly advised his friends to send him to Italy for improvement. The four pictures in the church de la Estrella were attributed to Santo-Domingo, but it is now ascertained that they were painted in 1569 by Navarrete, when, for the benefit of his health, he had permission from Philip II. to reside at Logroño. But Santo-Domingo painted the chiaro-scuros on the walls of the cloister, and other pictures which are in the convent of S. Catalina de Talavera de la Reyna. There are but few particulars of him recorded; with respect to the art he was considered a good colourist; it may be supposed that he was entitled to something more, as Navarrete's four pictures referred to were attributed to his pencil. He died about the middle of the 16th century.]

[SANTOS, JUAN, a fresco painter, flourished at Cadiz in 1662. He was much employed in painting the standards for the vessels sent to the Spanish settlements in America and elsewhere. It is also recorded that he painted pretty little pictures to please certain ladies of Andalusia, who, in point of taste, are not inferior to those of any country, and, consequently, such pictures taxed both the ingenuity and delicacy of the artist, to give satisfaction to his amiable employers. It is not said that any of them were intended for public galleries; but perhaps they may occasionally be found in private cabinets.]

SANTVOORT, A. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a print representing an almanack-seller, with a town and church in the back-ground. It is neatly etched, in a style resembling that of Hollar. [There were two artists called Anthony Santvoort; the first, called also Verde, lived about 1550; the other about 1637: they were both painters, but nothing certain is known of them.]

[SANTVOORT, DIRK VAN, supposed to be the son of the latter Anthony Santvoort, painted historical pictures and portraits somewhat in the manner of Rembrandt. He must have operated long before the death of his supposed father, as there are prints after him by Jonas Suyderhoef and Theodore Matham. There is a picture by him in the Louvre representing Christ and the two Disciples at Emmons; but his chief excellence was in portraiture. Whether he had an additional name must be left to conjecture, as one of the prints by Suyderhoef is inscribed D. D. Santvoort pinxit. There is no account of his death. There were two other artists of the name of Santvoort who lived at a later period; but particulars respecting them are, if possible, more scanty than of the preceding.]

SANUTO, or SANUTUS, GIULIO, an Italian engraver, born at Venice about the year 1530. We have some prints by him executed in a coarse, heavy style, with single strokes, without any hatching, resembling a wooden cut: among others,

A print of the Birth of a monstrous Child, inscribed Jul. Sanutus Venet. fec.

Venus and Adonis; after Titian.

Apollo and Marsias; after Coreggio; in three sheets.

[Bartsch says nothing is known of this engraver except that he was a Venetian, and lived in 1540. He describes five prints by him, namely,

The Marriage of the Virgin; after Raffaele; with the engraver's mark.

The Massacre of the Innocents, signed BACCIVS BRANDIN INVEN., and Marc Antonio's cipher.

The monstrous Child, signed Jul. Sanutus Venet. Fac.

The birth of this monstrous child took place at Venice in 1540: the mother was a German.

Two winged Genii in the air supporting a globe, on which Cupid stands discharging an arrow to the left of the print; no name of engraver.

Dance of Bacchanals in a wood; signed JULIUS SANUTUS. F.

This, Bartsch says, is the most recherchée of his prints.

In addition to these, Nagler has described the following:

Apollo and Marsyas, after Correggio, with the Parnassus, after Raphael, in three sheets. The story of Apollo and Marsyas, from which the engraving was taken, ornamented the case of a harpsichord.

The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence.

St. John the Baptist.

The Tree of Life.

Venus restraining Adonis.

A Vase with two handles, ornamented with festoons and figures.

The Punishment of Tantalus.

There is another print by Sannuto, unknown to Bartsch or Nagler, representing

The dead body of Christ supported by the Virgin and angels; after Michael Angelo: it is in the collection of H. R. Willett, Esq.

It will be observed that Bryan has noticed Apollo and Marsyas, after Correggio, in three sheets. In the catalogue of the sale of Mr. James Hazard's prints, which took place in 1789, there is described under the head Ecole de Parme, A. da Correggio, Le jugement de Midas, grande pièce en hauteur, dédiée à Alphonse d'Este, Duc de Ferrare, par Giulio Sanutor en 1562, très rare." Zani designates him Nobile Giulio, B. B., and says that he was living in 1580. He calls him Sanuto, non Sanutor.]

SANZIO, RAFFAELLE. See RAFFAELLE.

[SARABIA, DIEGO SANCHEZ, an architectural designer, and painter of familiar subjects, was a member of the Academy of San Fernando in 1762. By desire of that body he designed the plans of the Arabian palace of the Alhambra, and of the elegant Greco-Roman Circus of Charles V., at Granada; he also copied the ornaments, bassi rilievi, and the ancient oil paintings of that monument. This work was presented to Charles III., who was so pleased with the execution that he commanded the original to be kept in the Academy, and contented himself with a copy. Sanchez Sarabia died in 1779, leaving a number of cabinet pictures of various subjects, in all of which his predilection for architecture is exhibited.]

SARABIA, JOSEF DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1618. According to Palomino, he was brought up in the school of Francisco Zurbaran, and became a reputable painter of history. He chiefly resided at Cordova, where he painted many pictures and altar-pieces for the churches, which are highly commended by his biographer. Of these the most esteemed are his pictures of the Conception, in the church of the convent of S. Francisco; and the Flight into Egypt, in the convent de la Victoria. He died at Cordova in 1669. [He was born in 1608, and was first placed with Augustin del Castillo, and after that master's death, in 1626, with Francisco Zurbaran. He was not deficient in merit, but he was a great plagiarist. He took his subjects from prints by Sadeler, some of which were after Rubens, and imposed them on the ignorant as his own inventions. By such means he acquired a high reputation, and considerable employment. In the monastery of St. Francis of Seville there was a Nativity, and another picture, both copied from prints after Rubens; and in the convent de Arrizaffa the Elevation of the Cross, after the same master. It is necessary to notice these appropriations, in order to put amateur travellers on their guard, as many might be induced to believe that the pictures were painted by Rubens, knowing that he had been much employed in Spain, and also from being previously acquainted with the prints from which they were copied. The best original work of Sarabia is the Flight into Egypt, which is entirely his own composition. It exhibits a noble simplicity and purity of design, a beautiful colour, and masterly handling. It is to be regretted that with such abilities he should have been guilty of glaring acts of piracy; for though it is not uncommon for painters to borrow parts from each other, they rarely venture to appropriate the whole of a composition.]

SARACINO, [or SARACENI,] CARLO, called VENEZIANO. This painter was a native of Venice, but according to Baglione, visited Rome during the pontificate of Clement VIII., where he was for some time under the tuition of Camillo Mariani, but afterwards studied and imitated the manner of Caravaggio. He was employed for several of the public edifices at Rome, and for the palaces of the nobility. For the church of S. Maria, in Trastevere, he painted the Death of the Virgin; and in the church of S. Simone there is an altar-piece by him, in the chapel of the family of Lancellotti, representing the Virgin Mary, the infant Christ, and St. Anne. In the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo he painted several fresco works, in conjunction with Giovanni Lanfranco, which are considered his best performances. He returned to Venice, whither he had been invited to paint a picture for the council-chamber, but did not live to finish it. He died in 1585, aged about 40. This artist is said to have etched some plates from his own designs, in a slight, spirited style. [According to Zani, he was born in 1585, and died in 1625; his coadjutor Lanfranco was born in 1581. There is an error in Brulliot respecting his death. It is uncertain that he engraved the three prints attributed to him.]

SARBOT. By this artist, who flourished about the year 1675, we have a print of Christ praying in the Garden, supported by an angel. It is probably from his own design, as he adds the word fecit to his name.

[SARRABAT, DANIEL, or DAVID, an historical painter in fresco and in oil, was born at Paris in 1667, and died at Lyons in 1747. His works are chiefly confined to the latter city.]

SARRABAT, JOHN, a French mezzotinto engraver, born at Andely in 1680. He was one of the earliest artists of his country who practised that mode of engraving, and his plates are very indifferently executed. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

J. B. Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux; after Rigaud.
Anthony Coytel, Painter to the King; after Netscher.
Stephen Gantrel, Engraver to the King; after Largilliere.

SUBJECTS.

The Confessor; in two plates; after N. van Haefsten.
Heraclitus, half-length; after M. Corneille.

[The name of this engraver was Isaac, not John, and he was probably born earlier than 1680, as one of his best prints, that of M. Choiseul Praslin, is dated 1695. Robert Dumesnil, tom. iii. Peintre Graveur Français, has given descriptions of twenty-eight prints by him. Laborde says that Sarrabat was born in 1670, and places him among the most eminent engravers in mezzotinto.]

SARRAGON, JOHN. This artist engraved several portraits in a neat, clear manner, resembling the works of James William Delft. Among others, is a head of Adrian Hoffer. He flourished about the year 1645. [He was a publisher: only one other print, that of G. U. Bergizomius, is mentioned by Nagler.]

SARTI, ERCOLE, called IL MUTO DI FICAROLO. This painter is an extraordinary instance how far decided genius can overcome difficulties which would generally be regarded as insurmountable. He was born at Ficarolo, a town in the duchy of Ferrara, in 1593, of a respectable family, and was deaf and dumb from his birth. Under so heavy an affliction, the only amusement that appeared to interest him, was the attempt to imitate the prints, or other objects of the kind, that fell in his way. This he effected with surprising precision, and it induced his friends to promote so decided a disposition for the art, by procuring him the means of indulging his inclination. Before he was sixteen years of age, on the occasion of a festival, on which there was to be a solemn procession, he placed on the front of his father's house a picture he had painted, almost without the knowledge of any person, representing the Adoration of the Magi. This unexpected production was the object of universal admiration and astonishment. It was regarded as little short of a miracle, and he was considered as a prodigy of genius and expectation. He was placed in the school of Carlo Bononi, an eminent historical painter at Ferrara, under whom he made a rapid progress; and he also imitated the style of Ippolito Scarsellino, his contemporary, whose works he particularly admired. The principal pictures of this artist are in the church of the Benedictines, in his native town. These performances gained him great reputation, and his works are said to combine the correct drawing of Bononi with the rich colouring of Scarsellino. He died about the year 1637, and his merit, and the singularity of his circumstances, were celebrated by the poets of his country. [There is some uncertainty respecting the time of his death; Zani says he was living in 1650.]

SARTO, ANDREA VANUCCI, called DEL. This celebrated painter is generally known by the name of Andrea del Sarto, an appellation he acquired from the occupation of his father, who was a tailor. He was born at Florence in 1488, and having shown an early disposition for drawing, he was placed with a goldsmith, to learn the business of engraving on plate. In this situation he was noticed by Giovanni Barile, an artist of little note, who persuaded his father to intrust him to his care. He remained under that master for three years, and afterwards entered the school of Pietro di Cosimo. He was, however, more indebted for the cultivation of his talents to his studies from the frescoes of Masaccio and Il Ghirlandajo, and afterwards from the cartoons of Leonardo da Vinci and M. Angelo Buonarroti, than the lessons of his instructors. On leaving the school of Cosimo, he formed an intimacy with Francesco Bigio, who had been a disciple of Mariotto Albertinelli, in conjunction with whom he executed some works in the public places at Florence, by which he acquired considerable reputation. Lanzi observes, that "his advancement in the art, and his progress from one perfection to another, was not so rapid as that of many other artists, but was gradual and slow, from year to year." He was engaged to paint in fresco, in the cloister of the Scalzi, a series of twelve pictures of the Life of John the Baptist, in chiaro-scuro, of which the cartoons are preserved in the Palazzo Rinnuccini. The Baptism of Christ is in his early manner, and discovers an undisguised imitation of Albert Durer; in the Visitation of the Virgin, painted a few years afterwards, his advancement is conspicuous; and in the Nativity of St. John, the last he painted of the series, he had nearly reached his most admired style. His next undertaking was the Life of S. Filippo Benizi, in ten pictures, in the church of the Servi. In these the genius of Andrea took a bolder flight, and they are considered among the most graceful of his works, though they were executed when he was still young, and before he had been at Rome. It has indeed been erroneously asserted, that he never saw that capital. That he passed some time in the metropolis of art, we are assured by Vasari; though he does not acquaint us at what period, he informs us that on his arrival in that city, he saw some of the works of the disciples of Raffaele, and that from the timidity of his disposition, despairing of ever being able to equal them, he returned hastily to Florence. If we are obliged to give credit to so many other instances of the pusillanimity of Andrea, there seems to be no good reason for our disputing this; and if the authenticity of that writer cannot be depended upon in his account of an artist who was his own master, written at Florence immediately after his death, and during the lifetime of his family and scholars, it will become very questionable on every other occasion. It is said to have been after his return from Rome that he painted, for the monastery of the Salvi, his admired pictures of the Descent of the Holy Ghost, the Birth of the Virgin, and the Last Supper. Of the last, Lanzi reports, "that at the siege of Florence, in 1529, the soldiers, after having assailed the suburbs of the city where the convent was situated, and destroyed the church and part of the monastery, on approaching the refectory, were so struck with the impressive beauty of this painting, that they remained motionless, and had not the heart to demolish it; imitating, on that occasion, the conduct of Demetrius, who, at the siege of Rhodes, respected only the paintings of Protogenes. But his most celebrated production is his famous picture of the Holy Family reposing, denominated La Madonna del Sacco, from the circumstance of St. Joseph reclining on a sack of corn. Of this admirable performance, a correct idea may be formed from the excellent print engraved from it by Raphael Morghen.

Andrea del Sarto possessed an extraordinary talent of imitating and copying the works of other masters, with an accuracy which sometimes deceived even the painters themselves. Of this, Vasari mentions a very remarkable instance of which he was himself an eye-witness. Raffaello had painted for the Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, afterwards Clement VII., the portrait of Leo X., seated between that prelate and Cardinal Rossi, in which the drapery and back-ground were painted by Giulio Romano. Frederick II., Duke of Mantua, passing through Florence to Rome, had seen this picture, and had requested Clement VII. to make him a present of it, when the pope gave directions to Ottavio de' Medici to send the portrait to Mantua. Unwilling to deprive Florence of so interesting a work of art, Ottavio employed Andrea del Sarto to paint an exact copy of it, which was sent to the Duke of Mantua, at the time when Giulio Romano was in his service. No person suspected the deception, even Giulio was himself deceived, and was only convinced of the fact by Vasari assuring him that he had seen it painted, and by showing him the private mark of Andrea del Sarto. Of the authenticity of this anecdote there can be little doubt, and if true, it affords a striking lesson to those connoisseurs who pretend to infallibility.

Francis I. of France being desirous of procuring the works of the most distinguished painters of Italy, Andrea del Sarto was commissioned to paint a picture for the king, and transmitted to that monarch a dead Christ, with the Virgin, St. John, Mary Magdalene, and other figures, painted in his finest manner, which is now one of the ornaments of the gallery of the Louvre. This picture was universally admired at the court of France, and the king, desirous of retaining the author in his employment, invited del Sarto to his court, with directions to his resident at Florence to furnish him with the means of undertaking the journey. Andrea, at that time reduced to a state of penury by the troubles of his country, and the parsimonious remuneration he received for his works, listened with avidity to the alluring invitation of a prince, distinguished for his munificence and his protection of the arts. On his arrival at Paris he was received with the most flattering distinction. The king was pleased with his talents and conversation; the courtiers, promoting as usual the inclinations of the prince, loaded him with the most marked civilities, and every thing conduced to render his situation agreeable. He painted a Charity, which the king particularly admired, and which is now in the French Museum. In the midst of this captivating prosperity, he received letters from his wife, which determined him to return to Florence, and under the pretext that domestic affairs required his presence in Italy, he obtained the king's permission to depart, promising to return in a short time, and to bring with him his family, for the purpose of establishing himself in France. He offered his services to the king to purchase for his collection the best pictures and marbles he could meet with, and Francis, anxious to profit by his judgment and taste, intrusted him with a considerable sum for that purpose. On his return to Florence he forgot his engagements, and broke through every bond of probity; he had the imprudence to squander away in the society of his friends and his improvident wife, not only what the liberality of Francis had remunerated him with for his works, but the funds which had been confided to his trust for the acquisition of objects of art. Reduced at length to a state of indigence and distress, and stung with the recollection of his perfidy and ingratitude, he sunk into a despondency, which was increased by his jealousy of his wife. He was ultimately abandoned by her and the false friends with whom he had wasted his substance, when his miseries were terminated by the plague which visited Florence in 1530, in the forty-second year of his age.

It has been remarked, that Andrea del Sarto would have equalled the greatest masters of the art, if he had resided longer at Rome; but it may be more reasonably presumed, that he reached as high a rank as the natural endowments of his mind permitted. If we do not discover in his works the elevation of Raffaello, it is because his mind was unequal to the conception of such sublimity; we find less variety in his expressions, because he was not possessed of the exquisite sensibility of that illustrious painter; and he is inferior to him in invention, because his genius was subordinate. His design is correct, and partakes of the style of M. Angelo; his compositions are agreeable, and his ordonnances are arranged with judgment; but he wanted that sacred fire which animates the great poet and the painter, and inspires them with their noblest and boldest conceptions. He was of a modest and gentle disposition, and his natural timidity, restraining the exertion of his faculties, stamped its feature on every thing he undertook. The heads of his Madonnas are rather pretty than beautiful, and are generally characterized by the formality of a portrait. He appears to have been little sensible of the beautiful ideal. His colouring is distinguished by the suavity and harmony of his tones; his pencil is full and flowing; and he has perhaps never been surpassed in the boldness of his relief, or his perfect knowledge of the chiaro-scuro. This celebrated painter has been erroneously supposed to have etched a plate of the Holy Family, in which the Virgin is represented kneeling before the infant Christ, with St. Joseph and St. John; it is inscribed Andrea del Sarto fatti in Roma; though neatly executed, it is totally unworthy of the hand of this artist, and the inscription most probably relates to the picture from which it was designed.

[The easel pictures of Andrea del Sarto are numerous in foreign galleries; it is to be regretted that there is not one, or more, good examples in the English national collection, to instruct the public eye, and to rescue the artist from the libellous imputations on his great talents by the spurious productions attributed to him. There are several fine specimens at Panshanger, the seat of Earl Cowper; and a few, very few, in other private collections in England, although the painter's name is very common in catalogues. No person of taste and judgment, unacquainted with his real works, can imagine that he was entitled by his contemporaries "Andrea the Faultless," when looking at the distortions called Holy Families, and Madonna with the Infant and

St. John, by Andrea del Sarto, so often obtruded on public notice. It is of very little importance whether his father was a tailor or not; but there is good ground for supposing that the appellation del Sarto was derived from a higher source. Vasari placed Andrea's death in 1530; all subsequent writers, till very recently, have adopted that date; but it is not correct, he was living at a much later period. Paolo Pino in his "Dialogo di Pittura," printed at Venice in 1548, puts the following observation in the mouth of one of the interlocutors: "Voglio che sappiate che oggidi vi sono de' valente Pittori. Lasciamo il Perugino, Andrea Mantegna, Alberto Duro, Pordonone, Sebastiano, Perin del Vaga, il Parmigianino, et altri, che sono morti; ma diciamo del nostro Andrea del Sarto, di Giacomo da Pontormo, di Bronzino, Georgino Aretino, (Giorgio Vasari,)" &c. Now Pordonone and Parmigianino died about 1540, Sebastiano del Piombo and Perin del Vaga in 1547. The conclusion is evident.]

[SARTORIUS, FRANCIS, an animal painter, who lived and practised in England during the latter part of the 18th century. He painted portraits of horses and dogs, and also hunting-pieces. Many of his productions were engraved in mezzotint and aquatint, by which he is better known than by his paintings. He died about the commencement of the present century.]

[SARTORIUS, L—— N——, probably related to the preceding, and like him an animal painter. He lived at the same period. He was patronized by the gentlemen of the turf, and recorded the contests of the race-course. Some of the jockeys and their principals were also painted by him, as connected with the nobler animals which the one rode and the other owned. There are game-pieces still existing with the name of Sartorius, but whether by L. N. or Francis is uncertain. The productions of both have been long since consigned to the stewards' rooms or the attics.]

[SARTORIUS, JACOB CHRISTOPHER, an engraver of Nuremberg, whose prints bear dates from 1674 to 1737. They are but indifferently executed, and consist of portraits and book-illustrations, in a style resembling those published by Vander Aa.]

SARZANA. See FIASELLA.

SAS, CHRISTIAN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He engraved several plates, among which are forty-five prints of the life of St. Philip of Neri, after Stella. There are some other plates by him, after Le Pomerance, and other masters. [Perhaps 1660 was the latter part of his life, as he operated in 1628.]

SASSOFERRATO. See SALVI.

SAVAGE, J., an English engraver, who resided in London about 1680. Of this artist, the noble author of the Anecdotes observes, that he "may be styled engraver to a set of heroes, whom Prior calls The unfortunate Brave. No country preserves the images and anecdotes of such worthies with such care as England. The rigour of the law is here a passport to fame. From the infringers of Magna Charta to the collectors on the road; from Charles I. to Maclean, every sufferer becomes the idol of the mob." He engraved a number of portraits of malefactors, and some of exemplary characters who fell in a better cause. His most interesting prints are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Bishop Latimer.
John a Lasco.
Algernon Sidney.

Archibald Campbell, Earl of Argyle.
Henry Cornish, Sheriff of London.
Sir Edmundbury Godfrey.
John Gadbury, Astrologer.
James Fitzroy, Duke of Monmouth.
Sir Thomas Armstrong.
Sir Henry Chauncey, Antiquary.
Sir Henry Pollexfen, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.
Arthur, Earl of Torrington.
Charles Leigh, M. D.

[Laborde observes, "the prints published by J. Savage vary so often in their style of execution that we should seek, in his name of editor, the works of several artists." They are often inscribed "sold by J. Savage at the Golden Head in the Old Baily." A very proper situation for a publisher of malefactors' portraits.]

SAVART, PETER, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1750. He has engraved several plates in the neat, finished style of Fiquet; among which are some portraits of illustrious personages of France; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV.; after Rigaud. 1771.
Louis de Bourbon, Prince of Conde; after Le Juste. [1776.]
John Baptist Colbert; [after P. de Champagne. 1773.]
De la Motte Felon; after Vivien. [1771.]
J. B. La Bruyere; after St. Jean. [1778.]
Peter Bayle; [after the same. 1774.]
Jean Racine; after Santerre. [1772.]
Nicholas Boileau Despreaux; after Rigaud; [an oval; 1769.]
[Rabelais; after Sarrabat. 1767.
Cardinal Richelieu; after P. de Champagne.
Nicholas de Catinat, Marschal de France.
Comte de Buffon; after Drouais. 1776.
Bossuet; after Rigaud. 1773.
D'Alembert; after Luserier. 1780.
Montesquieu. 1779.]

SAUBERLICH, LAWRENCE, a German engraver on wood, who, according to Professor Christ, published some wooden cuts at Wittemberg in the year 1599. He used a cipher composed of an L. and an S. [Very little is known of him: it is supposed that he died in 1613.]

[SAUERWEID, ALEXANDER, a designer and painter of battle-pieces, was a native of Courland, and received his instruction in the academy at Dresden. His representations of Cossack Skirmishes are very spirited, and had great popularity, in coloured prints, about thirty years ago. He was patronized by Alexander, emperor of Russia, and resided for a considerable time at St. Petersburg, where he died in 1844, at the age of 62. The prints from his designs in aquatint and colours are numerous, and the subjects interesting as faithful representations of military costume, and lively records of sundry warlike episodes of a period when fighting was the order of the day.]

SAVERY, JAMES. This painter was born at Courtray about the year 1545, and was a disciple of John Bol. He painted landscapes and animals, which he finished with great labour and patience, though in a hard, dry style. He died of the plague at Amsterdam in 1602.

SAVERY, ROLAND, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Courtray in 1576, and was instructed in the art by his father, whose neatness he adopted, though in a manner more natural and mellow. It has been supposed that he was afterwards a disciple of Paul Brill; but this cannot be reconciled with chronology, as that artist had left Flanders for Italy, where he passed the remainder of his life, before Savery was of an age to profit by his instruction. The resemblance of his style to that of Brill is not more apparent than to that of Breughel, and the other Flemish landscape painters of the time. He visited France in the reign of Henry IV., by whom he was employed in ornamenting the royal palaces with his landscapes. Soon after his return to the Low Countries, he was invited to the court of Prague, by Rodolphus II., in whose service he passed a great part of his life. By the direction of the Emperor he travelled through the grand and picturesque country of the Tyrolese, where nature exhibits her wildest as well as her richest beauties. In the midst of this romantic scenery he contemplated, with the eye of an artist, the stupendous rocks and rapid cascades with which he was surrounded. With his designs of these interesting views, he enriched his portfolio, during a residence of two years; and they proved an inestimable resource to him in the composition of his pictures, which are decorated with figures and animals, very highly finished. He resided at Prague until the death of the Emperor, for whom he painted a great number of pictures, when he settled at Utrecht, where he died in 1639, aged 62.

SAVERY, JOHN, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Courtray about the year 1590. According to Huber, he was the nephew of Roland Savery, and was probably his scholar, as he painted landscapes in a similar style. We have several etchings by this artist, from his own designs, among which are the following:

A set of six mountainous Landscapes, with figures, inscribed J. Savery, fec. Nic. de Clerc. ecc.

A Landscape, with a Stag-hunt; J. Savery, fec. H. Hondius.

[He was born in 1597, and died in 1655.]

SAVERY, [or SAVRY,] SOLOMON, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1601. From the circumstance of his having engraved a few English portraits, he is said to have visited this country, but it is certainly not ascertained. His works consist chiefly of portraits, which are the best of his performances, and are executed in a very creditable style. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Charles I. with a high-crowned hat, a view of Westminster in the back-ground.

Oliver Cromwell. 1649.

John Speed, the Historian, with his hat on, sitting in a chair.

Thomas, Lord Fairfax, with his hat on.

SUBJECTS.

Christ driving the Money-changers out of the Temple; after Rembrandt.

The Entry of Mary of Medicis into Amsterdam.

A set of seventeen plates for Ovid's Metamorphoses.

[The exact time of his birth and death are both uncertain. It is probable that he was a publisher as well as an engraver. Many of the prints with his name are after those by other masters. See Nagler, for a list of numerous plates with which his name is connected.]

SAVOLDO, GIROLAMO, called by Ridolfi, Girolamo Bresciano, was of a noble family of Brescia, and flourished about the year 1540. Although he practised the art only as an amusement, and bestowed his pictures gratuitously on the churches and convents, he is celebrated by Paolo Pino, in his Dialogo della Pittura Veneziana, as one of the ablest artists of his time. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he studied with assiduity the works of Titian, at Venice, where he painted several altar-pieces and easel pictures. Zanetti speaks of his picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Giobbe, as exquisitely coloured, and finished with the greatest care. Another esteemed work by Savoldo is the great altar-piece of the Predicatori at Pesaro, representing Christ with four saints, painted with surprising vigour of colouring. In the Florentine gallery there is a small picture of the Transfiguration by him, which is highly commended by Lanzi. [Zani says he operated in 1548, when he was very old: it is not likely that he lived to 1590, as some writers have said.]

SAVONA, IL PRETE DI. See GUIDOBONI.

[SAVONANZI, EMILIO, a nobleman of Bologna, who attached himself to painting when nearly arrived at manhood. He was born in 1580. He was very versatile with respect to his masters; he commenced with Cremonini, entered the school of Lodovico Caracci, next that of Guido, then of Guercino, and lastly that of Algardi the sculptor. By such means he became a good theorist, nor was he deficient in good practice, uniting many styles in one, in which, however, that of Guido is most conspicuous. It would seem that his object was variety, as he denominated himself the artist of many hands. He resided at Ancona and at Camerino, where, as well as in places adjacent, he left several works. He died in 1660.]

[SAVOYE, or SAVOYEN, CHARLES VAN, according to Balkema, was born at Antwerp in 1619, and painted, in a small size, almost all the subjects of Ovid; he was particularly fond of painting the naked figure, but his drawing was not equal to his colouring, which was highly finished. He died, according to the same authority, at Antwerp in 1669; but Zani says he was living in 1680.]

[SAVOYE, DANIEL, a painter of portraits, and an etcher in aqua-fortis, was born at Grenoble in 1644, and died at Erlangen in 1716. It is said that he was a scholar of Sebastien Bourdon. His manner of etching resembles that of Le Pautre. His initials, D. S. &c., are found on one representing a riposo, in which the Virgin is seated near a fountain attended by three angels; on the left an ass is attached by the bridle to a tree. There are other small etchings by him of Soldiers, and Costumes of the time of Louis XIII., with the same initials.]

[SAUVAGE, J— P—, (said to be of the family Lemire), was born at Tournay in 1744, and studied at the Academy at Antwerp. He essayed several styles of painting, and finally adopted that of bas relief, in which he became eminent. He settled for a considerable time at Paris, where his works were in high estimation. In 1808 he returned to Tournay, and died there in 1818. It is said that he carried the art of painting in bas relief to the highest state of perfection, and that many of his productions are surprising illusions. They are to be seen at Paris, and in several of the continental capitals of Europe, and also at Tournay. He imitated marbles and ancient Terra cottas with great success, and painted porcelain in enamel; these productions sell at a high price.]

SAUVÉ, JOHN, a French engraver of little note, who, according to Basan, flourished about the end of the 17th century. He engraved several plates after Guido, P. da Cortona, &c., and also some portraits.

SAXTON, CHRISTOPHER. To this ingenious artist we are indebted for the first county maps which were published in England. He was a native of Yorkshire, and resided at Tingley, near Leeds, in the service of Thomas Sekeford, Esq., Master of Requests. By the encouragement and at the expense of that gentleman, Saxton undertook a complete set of maps of the counties of England and Wales, many of which he engraved himself, and was assisted in the others by R. Hogenberg and others. They were published in 1579, and were dedicated to Queen Elizabeth. [See the article RYTHER.]

[SAY, WILLIAM, an eminent engraver in mezzotint, was born at a village called Lakenham, near Norwich, in 1768. He was left an orphan at the age of five years, and was brought up by a maternal aunt. Although he showed an early inclination for art, he did not practise it as a professor till his arrival in London, when he had attained his twenty-first year, and was married. He put himself under the direction of Mr. James Ward, at that time an engraver, but now better known as a painter of animals, and a Royal Academician, and with his instruction engraved his first plate. He was indefatigable, and made great progress in the art. About 1819, it is said, he engraved the first mezzotint on steel that had ever been produced. He loved his art, and has given ample proof of it in his numerous works, which consist of about three hundred and thirty, all executed by his own hands, many of which are of large dimensions, being from historical pictures and whole-length portraits. He engraved several plates after the older masters, but his principal are after the modern; among which may be cited the Dilettanti Society, after Sir J. Reynolds, several for Turner's River Scenery, two of Brigands, after Eastlake, some of the elegant compositions of Fradelle, and the Raising of Lazarus, by Hilton. Many of his plates remained unpublished at the time of his death, which occurred on the 24th of August, 1834.]

[SAYER, J——, a political caricaturist, who lived at the latter part of the 18th century. His works, it is said, are numerous, and were in favour with the high church and state partisans of the day, as his satire was levelled at the Dissenters and Whig assertors of political liberty. Like others of his class, he made the most eminent persons the objects of his attacks, and spared neither learning nor talent if opposed to the principles then in vogue. His works have met the fate of which they were worthy,—they are forgotten—except by a few collectors. His name is recorded here merely as being the precursor of Gilray, many of whose productions in the same line are worthy to be preserved for their wit and superior artistic skill. To judge Sayer by his works, he was a dull distorter of personal appearances, mistaking grossness for humour, and exhibiting little or no discrimination in the selection of circumstances. The party whose cause he exposed had need very often to be ashamed of his advocacy, and many of those he libelled could afford to smile at his imbecile attacks. Gilray's representations of humorous subjects and fashionable frivolities are so full of wit, and are so artistically composed, that they continue to amuse now the objects are forgotten; even his political satires, by the adoption of imagery drawn from poetry or history, of which they are frequently parodies, interest by the ingenuity of the application, and each of the opposing parties, Whig and Tory, could admire them according as they were levelled at the one side or the other; an indifferent person can now smile at, and perhaps approve of both. A selection from

Gilray's works of such as regard foibles and fashionable frivolities, and some of his best political caricatures, would make a volume agreeable for its humour, and interesting for its artistic excellence.]

[SBARBI, ANTONIO, a Cremonese painter, was first a scholar of Bernasconi at Milan, and afterwards studied at Bologna under Lorenzo Pasinelli. He was invited to Piacenza by the Duke Ranucci Farnese, for whom he painted various pictures, but particularly distinguished himself by the representation of animals, which he was accustomed to draw from the life. He died at Milan, but it is uncertain when, as there is only the difference of about fifty years among the writers who have noticed him; say from 1701 to 1750. The date of his birth, as given by Zani, is probably right, 1661, but he leaves the time of his decease unsettled.]

SCACCIATI, ANDREA, was born at Florence in 1642, and was first a scholar of Mario Balassi, but he afterwards studied under Lorenzo Lippi. This latter master persuaded him to apply himself to paint animals, flowers, and fruit; to which subjects his genius appeared to incline. He became a very eminent artist in that branch, and was greatly encouraged by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the principal vorker. He was living at Florence in 1704, when Orlandi published his work.

SCACCIATI, ANDREA, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence about the year 1740. In 1766 he published a set of forty-one plates in aquatinta, from the drawings of the most distinguished masters, which are in the collection of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. We have also by him,

The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after A. Dom. Gabriani.

The Holy Family; after Cambiaso.

A Subject for a Ceiling.

[According to Zani he was born in 1725, and died in 1771.]

SCAICHI, GOTTFRED. By this engraver, who flourished about the year 1623, we have a set of views of the palaces and gardens belonging to the Grand Duke of Tuscany; they are etched in a slight, poor style.

[SCALABRINO, LO, a scholar of Gianantonio Razzi, misnamed Il Sodoma, showed great poetical invention in the style of painting called grotesche. As a disciple of Razzi he would rank among the Sieneese painters; but in the church of St. Francesco, without the Tuscan gate, there are seven finely painted altar-pieces with the inscription Scalabrinus Pistoriensis. If these be not by the scholar of Razzi, then a skilful Pistoiese painter has been overlooked; if they be, then Scalabrino preferred being called of Pistoja rather than of Siena.]

SCALBERG, PETER, a French painter and engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1638. Of his works as a painter little is known, but we have a few etchings by him, some of which are from his own designs; among others are the following:

Venus and Cupid; inscribed P. Scalberg, inv. et sculpt. 1638.

The Entombing of Christ; after Raffaello.

The Battle of Constantine with Maxentius; after the same.

Diana and her Nymphs; after Domenichino.

[His name was Scalberge. Robert Dumesnil, tom. iii., has described 47 prints attributed to him. Zani says that Peter Scalberge operated as late as 1650.]

to 1636, as appears by the dates of his publications. Four of his etchings are marked Rome 1623; others without the name of a place have the dates 1625 and 1627; and others, Paris 1636. The first of these are in the manner of Paul Bril; the others resemble the style of William van Nieulant, or, perhaps nearer, that of Nicolas Moyaert. This engraver, who signed his name sometimes Scalberge, and sometimes Scalle Berge, must not be confounded with Peter Scalberge, who flourished about the same period, but was less scientific in his execution.]

[SCALIGERO, BARTOLOMEO, a native of Padua, according to some, but Zani says of Venice, was born in 1630, (perhaps earlier,) and was a scholar of Alessandro Varotari, called Padovanino. Several beautiful altar-pieces by him are still preserved in Venice, among which that in the church of Corpus Domini is held in great estimation. The time of his decease is not recorded.]

SCALIGERO, LUCIA. According to Orlandi, this accomplished lady was born at Venice in 1637. She distinguished herself by an early acquisition of the ancient and modern languages, and by several literary publications. She was also an excellent musician. As a paintress, she may be compared with the most eminent artists of her sex. She was a pupil of Alessandro Varotari, and painted several historical pictures for the churches at Venice. She died in 1700. [It may be doubted whether this lady, who was the niece of the preceding, and was still young in 1660, could have been a pupil of A. Varotari, if it be correct that he died in 1650.]

SCALVATI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1559, and was a scholar of Tommaso Lauretti. He accompanied his master to Rome, whither he was invited by Pope Gregory XIII., and assisted him in the Sala di Constantino. Scalvati was employed by Sixtus V. in the library of the Vatican, and in several other public works. He also excelled in portraiture, and painted Pope Clement VIII., and many of the principal personages of his time. He died in 1622.

SCAMINOSI, RAFFAELLE. This artist was a native of Borgo S. Sepulcro, was a scholar of Raffaellino del Colle, and flourished about the year 1610. He painted history; and Orlandi mentions a picture by him, in the cathedral at Bologna, which has considerable merit. He is, however, more known as an engraver than a painter. We have a considerable number of etchings by this artist, executed in a bold, effective style. His drawing is tolerably correct, and the airs of his heads are not without expression. He used a monogram composed of the letters R. A. S. F. thus, RT. The following are by him:

The Virgin and Child; inscribed, Raphael Schaminosius Pictor, &c. 1613.

St. Francis preaching in the Desert; also from his own design. 1604.

A set of fourteen plates; entitled Mysteria rosarii Beatae Mariae Virginis. 1609.

The Sibyls; a set of upright plates; from his own designs.

The Stoning of Stephen; after Luca Cambiaso.

The Repose in Egypt; after Federigo Baroccio.

He also etched after Raffaelle, P. Veronese, and others. [This artist, whose etchings are inscribed Raphael Schiaminossi, and Sciamonossi, was born about 1570, and was living in 1620, as appears by the date on several of his prints. Bartsch has given descriptions of 137 pieces by him, in tom. xvii. of Le Peintre Graveur.]

SCANABECCHI. See DALMASIO.

SCANNAVINI, [or SCANNAVESI,] MAURELIO, was born at Ferrara in 1655, and was first a scholar of Francesco Ferrari, but he afterwards visited Bologna, where he studied for some time under Carlo Cignani, of whom he became one of the most distinguished disciples. His pictures possess great force, and are at the same time coloured with tenderness and harmony. The most considerable work of this master is the refectory of the Dominicans, at Ferrara, representing the life of St. Dominic, in fourteen pictures. There are many other performances by this artist in the churches at Ferrara, of which a particular account is given by Bartoli; among others are the Annunciation, in the church of S. Stefano; S. Tommaso di Villanova distributing Alms to the Poor, at the Agostiniani Scalzi; and S. Brigida fainting before a Crucifix, supported by an Angel, in S. Maria delle Grazie; one of his most esteemed productions. He died at Ferrara in 1698.

SCARAMUCCIA, LUIGI, call IL PERUGINO. This artist was born at Perugia in 1616. He was the son of Giovanni Antonio Scaramuccia, an indifferent painter of history, by whom he was instructed in the elements of design; but he afterwards frequented the school of Guido, and is said by Malvasia to have also studied under Guercino. He painted several pictures for the public edifices of Perugia, Milan, and Bologna, which are distinguished by a correct and graceful design, and amenity of colour. Such are his pictures of the Presentation in the Temple, in the church of the Filippini, at Perugia; and S. Barbara, in S. Marco, at Milan. In the Palazzo Publico, at Bologna, is a large picture representing the Coronation of Charles V., by Clement VII., composed and designed in a grand style. He died at Milan in 1680. We have a few etchings by this artist, in which he seems to have imitated the style of Guido. They are executed in a free, spirited manner, though the drawing is very incorrect. Among others, we have the following by him:

Christ crowned with Thorns; after Titian.

St. Benedict praying; after Lod. Caracci.

Venus and Adonis; after An. Caracci.

[The Virgin; after the same.

These four prints, with their variations, constitute all that are known by the artist.]

SCARSELLA, SIGISMONDO, called MONDINO. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1530, and was educated for three years in the school of Paolo Veronese, of whose style he was a constant, though not a very successful follower. In the church of S. Gabriele is a picture by this master of the Conversion of St. Paul; and in the church of La Croce an altar-piece, representing the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth. There are many other works by this painter in the public edifices at Ferrara, in which city he died in 1614. [Whatever his larger works may be, his easel pictures are held in estimation.]

SCARSELLA, IPPOLITO, called LO SCARSELLINO. This eminent painter was born at Ferrara about the year 1560. He was the son of Sigismondo Scarsella, from whom he received his first instruction; but he afterwards visited Venice, where he first became a scholar of Giacomo Bassano, and afterwards studied and imitated the works of Paolo Veronese. From Venice he went to Bologna, and afterwards to Parma, contemplating the admirable works of art in those cities. On his return to Ferrara, he was greatly esteemed, and was employed in painting numerous pictures for the churches in that city, where there is scarce a public edifice that does not possess some of his works. In the church of S. Maria Nuova, are three fine pictures by Lo Scarsellino, representing the Annunciation, the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to St. Elisabeth, and the Assumption. In the refectory of the Benedictines is one of the most considerable works of this master, in which he has represented the Miracle at the Marriage of Cana in Galilee. The pictures of this distinguished painter are justly held in the highest estimation in his own country; and the few specimens of his ability which have found their way into the collections of our own, are duly appreciated. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, and his colouring is rich, yet delicate; the airs of his heads are sweet and expressive, and the action of his figures is easy and graceful. In the backgrounds of his pictures he generally introduced a portion of very charming landscape, touched with spirit, and coloured with infinite nature. He also painted some admirable portraits of the most eminent personages of his country, although it was always with difficulty that he prevailed on himself to practise that branch of the art. He died at Ferrara in 1621, aged about 61. [Zani says he was born in 1551, in which Ticozzi agrees, as he says that he died in 1621, at the age of 70: others place his birth twenty years later. Bartsch describes a single print by him, a female Saint seated, and an Angel descending with a chaplet and palm branch; another with a vase of flowers on the right, and a horse on the left; signed, but no date.]

SCHAERER, H. L. This artist, according to Professor Christ, engraved several small landscapes, which he marked with a cipher, composed of the letters I. S. L. thus, ISL. He flourished about the year 1627. [His principal prints are copies of Sachtleven and J. Saenredam, some marked H. L. and others A. L. Schaerer sculp.]

SCHAEUFLEIN, HANS, or JOHN, THE ELDER, an old German engraver, who flourished about the year 1480, and is supposed to have been a disciple of Martin Schoen, whose style of engraving he imitated, though his prints are by no means equal to those of that master. He also copied some of the plates of Schoen; among others, that in which a lady and gentleman are represented walking together, and Death appearing behind a tree, shaking an hour-glass; which was also copied by J. van Mechel, Wenceslaus, and Albert Durer. His prints are chiefly small, and he is ranked among the little masters. He marked his plates with the cipher

ISI. The following prints are attributed to him:

The Crucifixion, with the Virgin, St. John, and two soldiers; a small circular print.
The Virgin and infant Christ; the same.
St. Christopher; the same.
St. Lawrence and St. Augustine.

SCHAEUFLEIN, HANS, JOHN, THE YOUNGER, was probably the son of the preceding artist, and, according to Huber, was born at Nuremberg about the year 1487. He distinguished himself as a painter, as well as an engraver on wood, and is supposed to have been a scholar of Albert Durer, whose style he imitated, both in his pictures and in his wooden cuts. He chiefly resided at Nordlingen, and painted for one of the churches in that city an altar-piece, representing the taking down from the Cross, which, although designed in the stiff, formal manner prevalent at the time, possessed great merit.

We have several wooden cuts by this artist, which are executed in a bold, spirited style. The prints of the younger Schaeuflein are usually marked with a cipher formed of an H. and an S., to which he added two baker's peels crossed, in allusion to his name, the word Schaeuflein, in German, signifying a little peel, thus, HS . The following are his principal works:

The Creation of Eve.
Lot and his Daughters.
Christ crowned with Thorns.
Herodias with the Head of St. John.
The Feast of Herod; in two sheets.
The Life and Passion of Christ; in thirty-seven cuts; published at Frankfort in 1537. To these are added thirty-six cuts of the Miracles, Parables, &c. of Christ.
Numa Pompilius on his throne addressing the Romans.
The Death of Lucretia.
Pyramus and Thisbe.

He also engraved on copper. Mr. Strutt mentions a plate representing soldiers conversing, executed with the graver, in a bold, spirited style; and a free etching of a landscape, dated 1551.

[There is much difference among writers respecting Hans Schaeuffein, Schauflein, or Schauffein; the generality of them mentioning only one artist of the name. Bartsch observes on the foregoing statement taken from Strutt, "that there were two, an elder and a younger, seems to be a mere conjecture;" but it appears from a paper in Meusel's Neue Miscellaneen, 5 tes. Stuck, S. 210, that Hans Schaeuffein had a son of the same name who was also a painter, and that the elder Schaeuffein died at Nordlingen in 1539. Whether both, or either, ever engraved on wood, or only designed the subjects on the blocks, is a matter of doubt which it is not easy to solve. One of them was a coadjutor of Hans Burgmair in the work known as the "Adventures of Tewdranck," published in 1517, of which it is supposed that he made the greater part of the designs for the engravers, and several of the wood cuts have his marks, H with S on the cross-bar and the single peel; the same may be said of several in the "Triumphs of Maximilian." This was probably the elder Hans, who, by some writers, is said to have been born at Nuremberg in 1483, and by others in 1490, 92, or 93. His father was a merchant of Nordlingen, but settled at Nuremberg, and the son was placed with Albert Durer, and continued in that city until 1515, when he removed to Nordlingen, and died there in 1539. This date may be assumed as correct, his widow having married Hans Schwarz, a painter, in the year 1540. All the prints of a date posterior, if such there be, or with the two peels saltire-wise, as in the article, may therefore be attributed to the son, who, according to Zani, Bartsch, and others, died in 1550. When or where the latter was born must be left to conjecture; probably Nordlingen was the place of his birth and death. It must be confessed that the more the matter is examined the more complicated it becomes; almost every writer that has touched upon it has added to the complexity. What with proximity of dates, similarity of marks, subjects, and manner of designing and engraving, the works of several artists, whose initials are H. S., have been by one or other writer attributed to Hans Schaeuffein, and again referred to contemporary masters with apparently equal probability. The curious inquirer will find some occupation in consulting Bartsch, Nagler, Brulliot, Heineken, Jackson's History of Wood Engraving, and many others who have handled the subject; that he will be satisfied by his researches is more than can be promised. The seventh volume of Bartsch, "Le Peintre Graveur," contains an account of 132 pieces said to be by, or after the designs of, Hans Schaufelein, and Nagler increases the number to 177; the latter adds Leonhard to the name. There are pictures attributed to Hans Schaufelein at Nuremberg, Munich, and Berlin. Lord Lindsay, in his "Sketches of the History of Christian Art," speaks of a fresco, said to be still preserved at Nuremberg, the place of the artist's birth, and where, it is added, he passed the greater part of his life in the enjoyment of the highest professional and civic honours. This picture was painted in 1515, and represents the Siege of Bethulia, though not in strict accordance with the relation in the book of Judith; for the artist has introduced the costumes and artillery of the 16th century. Another picture is also referred to by his Lordship as a supposed work of Hans Schaufelein, being marked with his initials H. S. These letters would be but slight authority, of which his Lordship is quite aware, if the picture had not other evidence of the master's style of composition, drawing, and character, it being found in the collection of the Duca Litta, at Milan. It represents the whole history of Troy and the Trojan war, commencing with the expedition of Jason in quest of the golden fleece, and abounds with figures in an immense landscape. It is said to exhibit great invention, powerful expression, vigorous and correct design, clearness of colouring, though somewhat diminished by time, and is exquisitely finished. It is considered by his Lordship as one of the most extraordinary relics of the old German school, and he is inclined to think that this style of composition was first brought into fashion by Hans Schaufelein. From the inscription on the picture it may be supposed that the date is 1540—IDXXXX. This raises the question, whether it was painted by the father and son conjointly, and finished by the latter; or whether by the son alone, the father having died in 1539? But the previous question would be, was it painted by either? His Lordship does not positively affirm it, so it must be left to future inquirers to investigate the matter. Dr. Kugler, it may be observed, does not treat Hans Schaufelein with much consideration; he calls him a clever and dexterous mechanic, a mere imitator of his master, Albert Durer, as one who never attained a deep feeling in the conception of a subject, and says that his dry colouring is well known; but he admits that his painting of St. Bridget, in the chapel of St. Maurice, at Nuremberg, has some pretensions to grandeur of style. He speaks also of a Mocking of Christ, painted in distemper, in 1517, which is of very large dimensions, in the castle of Nuremberg, and is animated in the treatment. By this it appears that though he retired to Nordlingen in 1515, and painted his fresco of the Siege of Bethulia there in that year, he returned to Nuremberg in 1517. According to the earliest date assigned for the birth of the elder Hans, he was then only 34; at what period was he enjoying civic honours at Nordlingen?

SCHAFFNABURGENSIS, MATTHEUS, an engraver on wood, who executed the cuts for a Bible, printed at Wittenberg in 1545. He marked his prints with the initials M. S. on a tablet. [This is the same with MATHIAS, or MATTHEW GRUENEWALD, but there is very little in what is said respecting him. No two writers agree on the time of his birth and death. Some place his birth in 1450, others in 1480. Sandrart says he died in 1510, in which he is followed by Füessli. Zani admits the two last dates qualified with about, but denies that he ever engraved on wood. The various marks attributed to him are doubted by Brulliot; indeed some of them appear absurd. It is a curious circumstance that so many engravers to whom the initials M. S. are attributed should have flourished, or died, about 1550, or that, whether or not, writers should be so anxious to assign that date to so many who have used those letters; in several instances it seems guess-work, without due consideration, and has caused much confusion. The "harmless drudge" who endeavours to compile a correct dictionary from their materials is often worse rewarded than he who analyzed the sack of chaff, who did get one grain of wheat for his trouble; for the former gets nothing for his labour, not even thanks from those he endeavours to serve, but perhaps abuse if he attempt to disturb a previously formed opinion.]

[SCHAFFNER, MARTIN, a painter of Ulm, who flourished in that city, as appears by their records, from 1502 to 1539. He painted historical subjects and portraits, and ranks among the best of the German masters of the period. Some of his best pictures were at the gallery at Schleissheim (perhaps now at Munich); among them are the Annunciation, the Presentation in the Temple, the Descent of the Holy Spirit, and the Death of the Virgin. The figures are noble, yet delicate, full of feeling and expression in the heads, but are considered somewhat defective in the colouring. Several relating to the Passion of Christ are in the same gallery. There are pictures by him at Ulm, some of which partake of the Italian manner, particularly an altar-piece in the principal church, representing, in three compartments, the Holy Family, their relations, and figures of several Saints; this is dated 1521. Others by him are at Augsburg, Nuremberg, and Vienna; and Count Leutrum of Stuttgart has a fine female portrait from his pencil. Several of his marks and dates are given by Brulliot; the first consist of M with S in the centre, or the letters MSMZV, interpreted Martin Schaffner Mahler zu Ulm, as on the Adoration of the Magi, formerly in Prince Wallerstein's collection, but now in that of the king of Bavaria; and the latter 1515 to 1521, though there are others of an earlier and later period; one in the Belvidere at Vienna is dated 1490. This artist's works were formerly attributed to Martin Schöngauer, perhaps on account of the monogram MS.]

SCHAGEN, GILES VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Alkmaer in 1616. He was first instructed in the art by Solomon van Ravestein, but was afterwards a scholar of Peter Verbeck. When he was twenty-one years of age, he embarked in a vessel bound to Dantzic, where he resided some time, and painted pictures of Dutch kitchens and conversations, in imitation of the style of Ostade, which were favourably received. He also painted portraits with considerable success, both at Dantzic and Elbing. After an absence of three years, he returned to Holland, where the restlessness of his disposition did not suffer him to remain long. He went to France, and met with very flattering encouragement; his conversation-pieces were much admired, and he was employed in copying the works of the best Italian and Flemish painters, for which he possessed a particular talent. On his return to Alkmaer he became acquainted with Admiral Tromp, who engaged him to paint a picture of the engagement between the Spanish and the Dutch fleet, commanded by that officer, which, as a proof of the versatility of his talents, he executed in a manner highly creditable to him. He died at Alkmaar in 1668. We have a slight etching by this artist, representing a cottage scene, with an old man. [There is a picture by him in Lord Ellesmere's gallery, an interior with a young woman nursing a child, a boy eating, and two other figures.]

[SCHALCH, JOHANN JACOB, a landscape painter, was born at Schaffhausen in 1723, and was a scholar of Schnaetzler, and of an artist of the name of Hamilton, at Augsburg. He visited Holland and England, and died in 1770. He painted landscapes, cattle, and figures, in the manner of Breughel, it is said, and in that of his master, Hamilton, who was probably of Scottish origin, but with whose works the public are not acquainted.]

[SCHALCKE, ———, a Dutch painter of river scenery, and landscapes with cattle and figures, lived in the second half of the 17th century, but is not noticed by any of the Dutch writers on art. The knowledge that there was such a painter is derived from a landscape and view of a river with his name, painted with the spirit and freedom of Teniers, and an effect of light similar to Rembrandt. The scene is enlivened with men, waggons, and boats in action, and cattle standing in the centre. The artist seems to have confined himself to pictures of small dimensions. Nagler, who has seen a lithograph print of a sea-piece in the gallery at Prague, by Schalcke, asks with great naïveté whether he is likely to be the same as Godfrey Schalcken? Our worthy friend may be assured that he is not.]

SCHALCKEN, GODFREY. This painter was born at Dort in 1643; his father was rector of the college of that city, and was desirous of bringing him up to literary pursuits, but finding the boy's disposition for painting, he placed him with Solomon van Hoogstraten, and he afterwards became a scholar of Gerard Douw, under whom he acquired great delicacy of finishing, and a competent acquaintance with the principles of light and shadow. He remained under the tuition of that master until he had established a certain reputation, by painting small pictures of domestic scenes, chiefly represented by candle-light; subjects which his instructor had treated with such distinguished success. On leaving the school of Douw, he attempted for some time to aggrandize his style, by studying the works of Rembrandt, but despairing to equal the vigorous touch and magical effect of that extraordinary artist, he pursued his first principles, and his pictures were sought after with avidity.

To give the most natural effect to his candle-light pieces, he is said to have adopted the following system: he placed the object he intended to paint, and a candle, in a dark room, and looking through a small aperture, painted by day-light what he saw in the dark chamber. His small portraits met with the most flattering encouragement, and he had painted the principal families at Dort, when he was encouraged, by the extraordinary success of Kneller, to form the project of visiting England, and he came over in the reign of King William, when he found the greatest part of the business of portraiture, the only branch of the art which occupied the public attention, in possession of Sir Godfrey Kneller, Cloosterman, and others. To satisfy the taste of the country, he also found it necessary to attempt to paint his figures as large as life, a scale to which he had not been accustomed, and in which he was not very successful.

Delicacy and good breeding formed no part of the character of our artist, if we may credit the following anecdotes, originally related of him by Campo Weyermans, an authority, indeed, which is not always entitled to implicit belief. When he had the honour of painting the portrait of William III., it was the king's wish to be painted by candle-light, from the reputation the painter had acquired in pictures of that description. It is said that he had the gross ignorance of giving his Majesty the light to hold, until the wax ran down upon his fingers. On another occasion, when he was painting a lady, who was not very handsome, but had very beautiful hands, after finishing the head, his sitter inquired when it would be necessary for her to sit for the hands, he abruptly replied, "that will not be necessary, I always draw them from my housemaid." On his return to Holland, he settled at the Hague, where his cabinet pictures were much admired, and he continued to practise his art with great success, until he had reached his sixty-third year, when he died, in 1706.

The chief merit of the pictures of Schalcken, which, for the most part, represent night-pieces, consist in the neatness of his finishing, and his perfect intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, as it relates to objects under the influence of a fixed and local light. His touch is sweet and mellow, and his colouring warm and gilded. The subjects he selected for his small pictures are agreeably composed, and the accessories are designed and painted with care and precision. It has been regretted that he did not draw the figure more correctly, a defect which is discernible in his best productions.

[In Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. iv. and Supplement, will be found descriptions of 127 pictures by this artist; three of his best are in the royal collection. He was a clever mechanical painter, but had nothing approaching to genius. His pictures are laboured and finished with great care, and are esteemed for those qualities. His day-light pictures are the rarest, and consequently obtain the highest prices in public sales; there is a small but very good specimen in the National Gallery. His works have not kept pace with others of his class in public estimation, perhaps from his candle or lamp-light subjects having lost much of their truth by change of colour. Le Concert de Famille, in her Majesty's collection, has been engraved by Wille, and several others by different artists will be found in the Orleans, Poullain, and Dusseldorf Galleries. Brulliot attributes to him a rare etching of a three-quarter bust of a Laughing Peasant, hiding the greater part of his face with his right hand. He wears a high-pointed hat and a ruff; it is an oval, and at the bottom is inscribed Quam meminisse juvat. Balkema says that he had a nephew named Jacob, who imitated his manner successfully; and his sister, Maria, was also a painter, and it is presumed was instructed by her brother Godfrey.]

SCHAPFF, JORG. This old artist is regarded as one of the earliest engravers on wood. According to Heineken, he executed the cuts for a book of Chiromancy, by Dr. Hartlieb, published in 1448. In his Idea of a complete Collection of Prints, that author has given a copy of one of these cuts, and nothing can be more rudely executed. The book consisted of twenty-four pages, printed on both sides, the discourse being cut on blocks of wood. The name of the engraver was inscribed on one of the leaves, at the bottom, Jörg Schapff in Augsburg. [Zani says he continued to operate in 1473; the date 1448 is considered to refer to the period when the book was written, and not to the time when it was engraved. On the last page is the name, "Jörg schapff zu augsburg." If this George Schapff was a wood engraver of Augsburg, says Jackson, the style of the cuts in the book sufficiently declares that he must have been one of the very lowest class. More wretched cuts were never chiselled out by a printer's apprentice as a head-piece to a halfpenny ballad.]

[SCHATEN, HUBERT, an engraver, who resided at Copenhagen, and engraved several portraits during the latter half of the 16th century, as appears from their dates, 1675 to 1694.]

[SCHAUR, PHILIP, an engraver, of whom there is no account, but by whom there is an etching of an old man with a large beard, in spectacles, mending a pen, with an hour-glass and books before him.]

SCHEDONE, B. See SCHIDONI.

SCH EINDEL, or SCHEYNDEL, GEORGE VAN, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Rotterdam about the year 1635. He engraved several plates, which are executed in a very neat and agreeable style, resembling that of Callot. His landscapes, decorated with figures correctly drawn, and touched with spirit, are deservedly admired. He was a contemporary of William van Buytenweg, from whose designs he also engraved some plates. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

A pair of Landscapes, with Peasants amusing themselves. The Tooth-drawer.

A Village Festival, with Boors fighting.

The Companion, with a Quack-doctor.

A Winter-piece, with Skaters on the ice.

A Landscape, with a Waterfall.

A Landscape, with a Bridge.

A set of four Views of a Castle and the environs, one of them with a Windmill.

A set of twelve Landscapes, with a Dutch inscription.

A set of twelve plates of European, Turkish, and Grecian figures.

Twelve plates of Habits of the Countrymen of the several Cantons of Holland.

[There is no account of his death, but he operated as late as 1660.]

SCH EITZ, MATTHEW. This artist was born at Hamburg about the year 1646, and, according to Huber, was a scholar of Philip Wouwerman, whose style he followed for some time, but he afterwards abandoned it, to adopt that of David Teniers, and painted similar subjects, of the amusements of peasants. He etched some plates from his own designs, which are executed in a bold, free style, among which are the following :

The Four Seasons, represented by the Sports of Children ; in four plates ; M. Scheitz, fec. 1671.

Two Landscapes, with figures dancing and amusing themselves.

An old Man playing on the Violin, and a Woman singing before the door of a Cottage.

The Spectacle Merchant.

[He died in 1700. His son Andrew engraved several plates from pictures by his father; they are dated from 1657 to 1678.]

SCHELLENBERG, JOHN RUDOLF, a Swiss designer and engraver, born at Winterthur in 1740. He was the son of an obscure painter, who taught him the rudiments of the art. Among other plates, he engraved several for the work of Lavater, from the designs of Chodowiecki; and some of the portraits and ornamental prints for the Lives of the Swiss Painters, by J. C. Fuessli. He also engraved a set of twenty-four plates of insects, for a work entitled Les Caracteres des Insectes, suivant le systeme de Linnée. [Zani calls him Schollemberger; Nagler says he was born at Konau, and died near Winterthur in 1806. He gives a list of his prints. His father, Johan Ulric, was a landscape and portrait painter, born in 1709, and died about 1770.]

SCHELLENBERGER, [or SCHOLLEMBERGER, JOHAN JACOB,] a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He engraved some of the plates for Priorato's History of the Emperor Leopold; among which is the portrait of Gaspar Jellez. [He was living in 1674.]

SCHELLINCKS, WILLIAM. This painter was born at Amsterdam, according to Descamps, in 1632, and, from the style of his pictures, is supposed to have been a scholar of John Lingelback. He afterwards travelled through France, Switzerland, and Italy; and is said, by that author, to have been in England, though he is not mentioned in the Anecdotes. He painted landscapes and sea-ports, which were decorated with figures, touched with neatness and spirit. The brilliant and sunny effect in some of his pictures reminds us of the charming productions of du Jardin; his animals are correctly drawn, and his groups are tastefully composed. On the occasion of the embarkation of Charles II. for England, at the time of the Restoration, Schellincks painted one of his most capital pictures for the family of Witsen, in commemoration of that event. It was a very considerable composition, of an infinite number of figures collected on the shore, to witness the embarkation, arranged with surprising ingenuity and variety. The genuine works of this master are not often met with in this country, though they are found in the choicest collections in Holland. He died in 1678. [He wrote his name Schellings and Schellinks, as appears on several drawings, consisting of Views of Foÿ (Fowey) and St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall, made by him in 1662. He also made drawings of Stonehenge, as it then existed, and of several other objects interesting to a stranger in England. There is therefore no further question respecting his having been in England. It is surprising that there are so few of his pictures known in this country: he was an artist of first-rate talent as a landscape and marine painter; and his figures and animals are very accurately drawn, spiritedly touched, and judiciously introduced. His knowledge of perspective was also great, as is evidenced in some of his extensive views, in which the nicest gradation may be observed.]

SCHELLINCKS, DANIEL, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Amsterdam in 1638, and is said to have been instructed in the art by William Schellincks, in whose style he painted landscapes and sea-ports, with some reputation. He died in 1701. [His birth is placed by some in 1633, and by others in 1634; but the Dutch writers are very short in their accounts of him, and his works are but little known.]

[SCHELTEMA, TACO, born at Harlingen in 1760, distinguished himself as a portrait painter. He studied after nature, and copied the works of some of the best masters, particularly those of Anthony Van Dyck. After visiting Dusseldorf he went to Saxony, where he painted the portraits of several persons of rank, in the manner of the great Flemish painter; he then returned to his own country, and practised with equal success. He resided alternately at Amsterdam and Rotterdam. He painted the portraits of all the founders and directors of the Batavian Society, which are, or were, in one of the chambers of the Bourse; and numerous family pictures of the natural size, some of them in landscapes with various accessories. He died near Arnheim in 1737.]

SCHENAU, JOHN ELEAZAR, a German painter and engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1765. He etched a set of twelve plates of heads and fancy subjects, with a frontispiece, entitled Achetez mes petites eaux fortes à la douzaine. 1765.

SCHENCK, PETER. This artist was a native of Germany, but resided chiefly at Amsterdam, where he became an eminent printseller and publisher, and flourished about the year 1700. He engraved several plates, most of which are in mezzotinto, and chiefly portraits. He published a set of one hundred views in and near Rome, entitled Roma Aeterna, many of which were engraved by himself. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

King James II.
Mary, his Queen.
King William III.; four plates.
Mary, his Queen; three plates.
William, Duke of Gloucester.
Queen Anne.
George, Prince of Denmark; her consort.
George I.
Ernest, brother to George I.
Arnold, Earl of Albemarle.
Godard de Reede, Earl of Athlone.
John, Lord Cutts.
William, Duke of Devonshire.
John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough.
Charles XII. of Sweden.
Peter Schenck. 1697.
Peter Schenck, with his wife, seated at a table.
Gerard Laresse, Painter.
Martin Luther.

[Peter Schenck was born at Elberfeld in 1645, but studied drawing at Amsterdam. As an engraver he commenced with some topographical works, in which he was assisted by Gerard Valck, who afterwards taught him mezzotinto. In 1683-4 they became partners, having purchased the stock of J. Jansen, then dead, to which they added their own works, and others executed under their direction, or corrected and finished by them. It is difficult, therefore, to distinguish among their numerous publications their actual performances. The King of Poland, Augustus II., Elector of Saxony, named Schenck engraver to his court. He died at Amsterdam about 1715. Though not very eminent he was a laborious artist, as his catalogue contains an account of several hundred plates, after Ochterveldt, Netscher, Toorenvliet, Kneller, Lely, Terburg, Schalcken, Laresse, &c. Among his prints is one containing portraits of the seven English Bishops who were sent to the Tower by James II. See Nagler for a long list of prints published by Schenck.]

[SCHENDEL, BERNARD, was born at Haerlem in 1634, and was a scholar of Hendrik Mommers. He painted conversations and merry-makings, and was a good designer and colourist. The probable time of his death was about 1693. Unimportant as this artist may be, there is considerable diversity in the accounts respecting him. But this diversity affects more the accuracy of the writers with respect to dates as connected with his history, than with any matter that is at all material as regards his works.]

SCHEVENHUYSEN, ANTHONY, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1695. He engraved a set of one hundred small plates, representing the different trades in Holland.

SCHIAVONE, ANDREA, called MEDULA. This painter was born at Sebenico, in Dalmatia, in 1522. Although he discovered an early inclination for the art, the indigence of his parents did not permit them to procure him a technical education, and he was placed as an assistant to a house painter at Venice, in which situation he employed his leisure hours in designing after the prints of Parmigiano, and others, which his scanty means enabled him to procure. For some years his occupation was painting the fronts of houses and shops, to which he was recommended by the masons. His talents distinguished themselves even in this lowly employment, and Titian was so pleased with some of his humble exertions that he took him into his academy, and soon afterwards procured him employment in the library of S. Marco, where he painted several of the decorations, conjointly with the ablest artists of his time. In competition with Il Tintoretto, he painted a picture for the church of the Padri della Santa Croce, representing the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth; and though his performance was unequal to that of his formidable antagonist, he retired from the contest with applause. His talents were highly respected by Robusti, who considered him as one of the greatest painters of the Venetian school, and that eminent artist is said to have constantly kept a picture of Schiavone in his painting-room, as a model of colouring, though he strongly condemned the incorrectness of his design. He even endeavoured to imitate the style of Andrea, and painted a picture of the Circumcision, in the church of the Carmini, so much in the manner of Schiavone, that Vasari mistook it for a work of that master. With the possession of such powers, he however found it difficult to subsist. So slender was the emolument he received for his works, that he was under the necessity of adopting a slight and expeditious mode of operation, and his indigent circumstances may both account for and extenuate the incorrectness of his design. This deficiency excepted, he possessed almost every other excellence of the art. His compositions are copious and agreeable, his attitudes are graceful and elegant, resembling those of Parmigiano, whose works he had studied; his draperies are cast with taste; the heads of his females are beautiful, and those of his old men dignified and impressive. Two of the most admired works of Schiavone are in the church of the Padri Teatini, at Rimini, representing the Nativity, and the Assumption of the Virgin. He died at Venice in 1582. We have several etchings by this eminent artist, some of which are from his own designs, and others after Raffaele, Parmigiano, &c. Among others are the following:

The finding of Moses; after Parmigiano.
The Holy Family; after the same.
The Resurrection of Lazarus; after the same.
The Entombing of Christ; after the same.
St. Peter and St. John healing the Lame Man; after Raffaele.
The Rape of Helen; after his own composition.

[The names and works of Andrea Schiavone and Andrea Meldolla have been, till recently, confounded; Schiavone having had the addition of Medula, or Meldola, to his name, and Meldolla being also called Schiavone: Zani and Bartsch the two best authorities, have exposed and cleared up these mistakes. It is true that there was some excuse for the error into which previous writers had fallen. Schiavone and Meldolla were contemporaries, both studied and imitated the same masters to a considerable extent, and the etchings of both have an affinity to those of Parmigianino. Meldolla, however, was only a designer and etcher, and the greater part of his etchings are after the last-named master, and have the initials A. M. or A. Meldolla at full length. Schiavone's etchings are the Twelve Cæsars, after Titian, which are signed TITIANO V. only; and twenty-one other subjects, apparently from his own designs, ten of which are signed Andrea Schiavon f. (See Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xvi.) All the etchings mentioned in the text by Bryan, are by Andrea Meldolla, and will be found in the list given in that article. The word Medula is probably a mistake for Meldolla, there being no reason assigned why it was applied to Schiavone. In the Bridgewater collection (now the Earl of Ellesmere's) are three pictures by Schiavone; Christ before Pilate, formerly in the Orleans' Gallery; The Marriage of St. Katharine; and a copy of the Last Supper, painted by Titian, in 1564, for Philip II., the original of which is still at Madrid. There is also an Entombment by him in the Sutherland Gallery; and there are two at Burleigh that may be considered as favourable specimens.]

[SCHIAVONE, GREGORIO, (called by Ridolfi GIROLAMO,) is mentioned by Lanzi as a painter whose style is between that of Mantegna and the Bellini. He says that he is a pleasing artist, whose pictures are frequently to be met with, ornamented with architectural views, fruits, and, above all, with joyous little cherubs. One of these was in a private collection at Fossombrone, inscribed "Opus Selavonni Dalmatici Squarizoni S." Zani says he flourished from 1460 to 1490.]

[SCHIAVONE, LUCA, is praised by Lomazzo as an eminent decorative painter, who flourished at Milan about 1450. The art which he practised was, properly speaking, embroidery, not only of flowers and foliage, but extensive history pieces. With these were the walls of the churches ornamented, and also the priests' vestments, on which were worked figures of the apostles, Christ's passion, and other religious mysteries. This practice was carried formerly to a great extent, and many ladies of quality employed their needles in this pleasing and pious occupation. The names of several of the most eminent are recorded, and some are praised for their painting and their needlework at the same time. Perhaps Ferdinand VII. of Spain may be considered an artist of this class; at any rate it is a compliment to name him with Dorothea Aromatari, Arcangela Paladini, and the late Miss Linwood, all excellent needlewomen.]

SCHIAVONETTI, LUIGI. This ingenious artist was born at Bassano, in the Venetian state, in 1765. He was the son of a stationer, and from his infancy discovered a peculiar taste for drawing. Before he was thirteen years of age he had made some progress, without the help of a master, when he was placed under the tuition of Giulio Golini, a painter of some eminence, by whom he was instructed in design during three years, when the death of his preceptor deprived him of the advantage of his assistance. He had, however, attained considerable proficiency as a designer, and now turned his thoughts to engraving, to which he was probably induced by an acquaintance he formed with a very indifferent engraver, named Lorio, who was barely competent to teach him the mechanical process of the art, and to whom he had recourse for instruction. A copy of a Holy Family, in the line manner, from a print engraved by Barto Corri, after Carlo Maratti, gained him immediate employment from Count Remauidini. The works of Bartolozzi, in the chalk manner, were then in great repute at Bassano, and Schiavonetti imitated several of his prints with great success. He soon afterwards visited England, where he formed a connexion with Mr. Bartolozzi, and the admonitions of that distinguished artist were of great advantage to him in the improvement of his style. After continuing with Bartolozzi some time, he established himself on his own foundation, and from that period until that of his death, which happened in June, 1810, cultivated his talents with a success which answered the expectations which were first formed of his abilities.

Mr. Schiavonetti possessed, in an eminent degree, the first requisite, either in painting or engraving, a freedom and accuracy of delineation. The following are among his principal works:

Four plates, representing the most interesting events which preceded the murder of Louis XVI.; after the designs of Benazech.

The celebrated cartoon by M. Angelo Buonarroti, representing the Surprise of the Soldiers on the Banks of the Arno.

The Portrait of Vandyck, in the character of Paris.

The Mater Dolorosa; after Vandyck.

The Landing of the British Troops in Egypt; after Louthembourg.

A set of etchings, illustrative of Blair's Grave; after the designs of Blake.

The etching of the Canterbury Pilgrimage; after Stothard.

[To these may be added,

Dead Christ; after Vandyck.

The Portrait of Berchem; after Rembrandt.

The Death of General Wolfe, engraved from a gem by Marchant, in the original unpublished Museum Worsleyanum. There is a copy of this print in the smaller edition.

The Portrait of W. Blake; after T. Phillips.

Several in "The Italian School of Design," published by Ottley. Also, among the original designs of celebrated Italian masters, published by Chamberlaine; and several of the "Specimens of Ancient Sculpture," published by the Society of Dilettanti.

It is to be regretted that the talents of Luigi Schiavonetti were wasted on the productions of mediocre painters of the day, such as Angelica Kauffman, R. Westall, J. Boydell, and others in vogue.]

SCHIAVONETTI, NICCOLO, was the younger brother of Lodovico, or Luigi, Schiavonetti, and executed some plates in the style of that artist, though he worked chiefly in conjunction with him. He did not long survive the death of his brother.

[SCHIAVONI, NATALE, an eminent painter and distinguished engraver, still living, was born at Chiozza in 1774, Ferrario says in 1777. He studied engraving under Raphael Morghen. Although there are several other fine works from his graver, his celebrity is chiefly owing to that superb production, The Assumption of the Virgin, after Titian, which ranks him with the greatest engravers of the present time. There is also by him a portrait of the Marquis Manfredini, which is considered a chef d'œuvre, but it is a private plate, and not to be found in commerce.]

[SCHICK, GOTTLIEB, an historical, portrait, and landscape painter, was born at Stuttgart in 1779. He commenced his artistic studies in the atelier of David, but being, like others of his countrymen of the period, averse to the trammels of academical instruction, he soon left it, and went to Rome to study the works of Raphael. He endeavoured to emulate the style of that master in painting subjects from the antique, and the conceptions of the older Italian artists in those of a more religious character. He possessed a fine imagination, and his pictures are in many instances distinguished by a noble simplicity and purity of sentiment. His religious compositions, however, it is said, do not equal in fervour the examples of the 15th and 16th centuries; they exhibit more of the poet than of the devout worshipper. Giotto, Frà Angelico, Perugino, and Raphael, lived in a religious atmosphere, and were imbued from their earliest years with a sentiment of veneration for the objects on which they employed their pencils; it was that feeling which, perhaps unknown to themselves, guided them in the representation of beings the constant objects of their adoration. The modern artist takes licence, and while he imitates the old masters in forms and subjects, and seems to adopt their legendary mythology, falls below them in the expression of pious belief; in fact, his work is not conducted, like theirs, with religious awe. Three large historical pictures by Schick are mentioned in terms of high approbation; they represent the Sacrifice of Noah, (some call it the Sacrifice of Abraham,) David playing before Saul, and Apollo with the Shepherds; the last is in the palace at Stuttgart. He excelled in portraiture, and painted several members of the Humboldt family, and other distinguished persons, most of them of the size of life. His landscapes are of the heroic kind, enriched with subjects from the ancient poets. His works in general are highly commended by his countrymen for the correctness of the design, the beauty of the colouring, and their imaginative qualities. He died, according to Count Raczinski, at Stuttgart, in his thirty-first year; but Michiel says in 1818, which would make him 39.]

SCHIDONE, or SCHEDONI, BARTOLOMMEO. This captivating painter was born at Modena in 1560. Although he is generally allowed to have been brought up under the Caracci, it is remarkable that his works exhibit little resemblance to the style which characterizes that distinguished school. He rather appears to have formed his ideas by an attentive study of the works of Raffaello and Coreggio, particularly the latter, with whose admirable productions he was constantly surrounded.

Schidone had gained considerable reputation by some juvenile performances in the public edifices at Modena, when the Duke Ranuccio took him under his protection, and gave him as a residence his Villa at Felegara, that he might pursue his studies more commodiously, and with greater tranquillity. He painted several admirable pictures for his patron, which, with many other works of art, in the possession of the Duke of Modena, were afterwards placed in the collection of the King of Naples. In the Palazzo Pubblico, at Modena, he painted his celebrated frescoes of the history of Coriolanus, and seven emblematical figures, in which he emulated the grandeur of Coreggio; and in the cathedral is an admirable picture of S. Geminiano resuscitating a dead Child, which has often been mistaken for a production of that master. His large works are extremely rare, among the most esteemed of which are his picture of a Pietà, in the Academy at Parma; and the Conception, in the church of S. Francesco, at Piacenza. His Holy Families and Madonnas, though apparently his favourite subjects, are not often met with, and the paucity of his pictures is to be attributed to his unfortunate propensity to gaming, in which fatal pursuit he wasted his substance and time. His death is said to have been occasioned by the distress of his mind, brought on him by losing in one night more than he was able to pay. He died in 1616.

Of Bartolommeo Schidone it may be said, that no follower of the great style of Coreggio has approached so near him in the graceful and expressive airs of his heads, and the elegant turn of his figures. His management of the chiaro-scuro exhibits the breadth and intelligence of that admirable painter, and his colouring partakes of the impasto and purity which distinguish the works of his great prototype. His design is not very correct, but he conceals this deficiency by the loveliness of his attitudes, and the enchanting harmony of his tones. The pictures of Schidone, rendered interesting by their extraordinary beauty, as well as their extreme rarity, are held in the highest estimation, and are very valuable.

[If Schidone died young at the latter end of 1615, or the commencement of 1616, as stated by Tiraboschi and Zani, he must have been born later than 1560, for 56 cannot be called young. Zani does not mention the year of his birth, but says he operated in 1604, and died in 1615. This therefore is the earliest date of which he had acquired a knowledge; and no earlier work is quoted by any other writer. It is not likely that an artist of his talent would live till he was 44 without producing something that would make him known; nor is it probable that if he were born in 1560 he would have been a pupil of the Caracci. Lodovico was born in 1555, Agostino in 1558, and Annibal in 1560, so that with the last there was no difference of age, and very trifling with the others. Bartsch notices an etching of a Holy Family by him, which he conjectures to be a production of his youth; it is inscribed Barto. Schidono, but it bears no date. It should be noted, that Schidone was an excellent portrait painter; he painted those of his protector the Duke of Parma and family, and also all the princes of the house of Modena, so skilfully, that they are reckoned equal to the best masters of Italy in that department. Zani says he was a poet, but does not quote or refer to any of his writings.]

SCHLEY, JACOB VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1715. He was a disciple of Bernard Picart, whose style of engraving he imitated, and finished several of the plates left imperfect at the death of that master. We have also a few portraits and book ornaments by this artist; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

John Baptist Boyer, Marquis d'Argens; after Van Pée.
Anthony Bernard Prevot, Almoner to the Prince of Conti; from the same.

Bernard Picart, Engraver; after M. des Angles. 1734.
Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount de Turenne; after the same.

[The prints after Coypel for the edition of Don Quixote, published at Amsterdam in 1746.

He died in 1779.]

SCHLICHT, ABEL. This artist was born at Manheim in 1754. He has engraved several plates in aquatinta, which are mentioned by Huber in favourable terms. Among others are the following:

A Storm and Shipwreck; after Vermet.

A Calm; after the same.

A Landscape, with cattle; after A. Vandevelde.

A Landscape, with figures and animals; after Berghem.

A Landscape; after Pynaker.

Several architectural Views; after Bibiena, Pannini, and others.

[He was a painter and architect as well as an engraver; he studied perspective under L. Quaglio, and was a professor at the academy of Dusseldorf. Rost places his death in 1790, but he etched a print after Ostade in 1820, and did not die till 1826.]

[SCHLOTTERBECK, WILHELM FRIEDRICH, a designer and engraver, was born in 1777 at Hartingen in Switzerland, and was a scholar of C. von Mechel of Basle. He had a great predilection for the aquatinta style of engraving, which was then a novelty, and it may be said that his success in it made that branch of the art popular in Germany. He engraved many large prints in that manner after Claude, Both, P. Hackert, and of views taken by himself. He joined the Chalcographic Institution at Dessau in 1798, where he engraved the four fine landscapes by Claude Lorraine, then at Cassel, but now in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg; and in 1801 he went to reside at Vienna, and was employed in Mollo's Repository of Arts for several years. From 1808 till the time of his death, he was occupied in making drawings of the picturesque scenery in the Tyrol, at Salzburg, in various other parts of Germany, and in Hungary, of which he executed a great number for Mollo. They are very beautiful, and are deservedly held in great estimation. He died at Vienna in 1818. Dr. Giulio Ferrario, in his account of classical prints, has misnamed this artist Scheletterbek, and says that he has, in his collection, two very large prints in aquatinta by him, after John Both, published at Vienna in 1804, which he considers very rare, as he had not seen any others elsewhere.]

[SCHLOTTERBECK, CHRISTIAN JAKOB, a painter and engraver, but chiefly the latter, was born at Brehlingen in Würtemberg, in 1755. He engraved a number of portraits, among which are those of Lavater the physiognomist, Ferdinand Kobell, and J. J. Moser. Of his other productions the principal are Titian's Mistress after the picture in the Orleans' collection, Herodias with the head of John the Baptist, the Laocoon, and busts of Castor and Pollux, Minerva, Mercury, and Diana, from the antique, and some frontispieces and vignettes. He died about 1820.]

SCHMIDT, GEORGE FREDERICK, was born at Berlin in 1712, and was instructed in design and engraving by G. P. Busch, an obscure artist; but he afterwards went to Paris, where he became a pupil of Nicholas Larmessin. Under that able artist he arrived at a perfection, for the neatness and firmness of his graver, which has seldom been surpassed. In 1742 he was received into the Academy at Paris, and engraved for his reception plate, his fine portrait of P. Mignard. In 1744 he returned to Berlin, and was soon afterwards appointed engraver to the King. He resided at Berlin till 1757, when he was invited to Petersburg by the Empress Elizabeth, and engraved several plates with great success, particularly portraits. He returned to Berlin in 1762, when he discovered a new talent of etching and engraving, in the manner of Rembrandt, in which style he executed several plates with great ability. He also engraved in the manner of Della Bella, and Benedetto Castiglione, with the greatest success. He died at Berlin in 1775. The following is as ample a list of the prints of this ingenious artist as our limits will permit.

PORTRAITS.

The Empress Elizabeth of Russia; after L. Tocqué.
Michael, Count de Woronzow; after the same.
Nicholas Esterhazy, Count of the Roman Empire; after the same.

Frederick Henry Louis, Prince of Prussia; after A. Vanloo.

John Paul Bignon, Abbe de St. Quentin; after Rigaud.
Constantine Scarlati, Prince of Moldavia.

Charles Gabriel de Caylus, Bishop of Auxerre; after Fontaine.

Louis de la Tour d'Auvergne, Count d'Evreux; after Rigaud.

Charles de St. Albin, Archbishop of Cambrai; after the same.

Peter Mignard, Painter to the King; after the same.

Anthony Pesne, Painter to the King of Prussia; after a picture by himself.

Maurice Quentin de la Tour, Painter to the King; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after Vandyck.

The Presentation in the Temple; after Pietro Testa.

Alexander and his Physician; after Ann. Caracci.

Timodex justified by Alexander; after the same.

A Bust of the Virgin; after Sassoferrato.

Dutch Boors regaling; after A. Ostade, in the style of Vischer.

PRINTS ETCHED IN THE STYLE OF REMBRANDT.

His own Portrait, drawing.

The Portrait of Rembrandt; after a picture by himself.

Christ resuscitating the daughter of Jairus; after Rembrandt.

Christ presented to the People; after Rembrandt.

The Presentation in the Temple; after Dietricy.

A variety of Busts and Portraits; after Rembrandt, and in his manner.

[Lot and his Daughters, after Rembrandt, very rare, before the letters.

The Young Jewess and her Father, both after the same.

The Mother of Rembrandt.

The young Lord—and an old Man with a Beard, after the same.

The works of G. F. Schmidt amount to about two hundred pieces. Though all of them exhibit talent of a high order, there are some that are particularly prized for their rarity as well as beauty. Of these the portrait of the Empress Elizabeth is admired for the splendour of the accessories; the portraits of the painters Mignard and La Tour are chefs d'œuvre: Count Esterhazy, Friederic Müller, a Lutheran pastor, Count Rasumowski, Jacob Mounsey, Constantine Scarlati, the Baroness Louise Albertine de Brandt, and Antoine Pesne, are all very rare, especially proofs before the letters.]

[SCHMIDT, ISAAC, born at Amsterdam in 1740, received his first lessons in painting from Jan Van Huysum, and subsequently became a scholar of J. M. Quinkhart, with whom he remained six years. After some attempts at portrait painting, in which he did not succeed to his wishes, he applied himself to landscape, and painted several good pictures in concert with Juriaan Andriessen. His works in this way are not numerous, as he devoted much of his time to teaching, and to poetry and music. He also wrote some comedies, and translated a Life of Rubens. He was one of the founders of the drawing academy at Amsterdam in 1759, and continued to be a director till the time of his death, which occurred in 1818.]

SCHMUTZ, J. [JOHANN]RUDOLF, a Swiss painter, born at Regensperg, in the canton of Zurich, in 1670. He was a scholar of Mathias Fuessli, and at first applied himself to the study of historical painting, but not succeeding to his wishes, he turned his thoughts to portraiture, to which his genius was better adapted. He visited England at a period when Sir Godfrey Kneller was in the zenith of his reputation, and attached himself to an imitation of his style. His talents had recommended him to a flattering share of the public favour, when he died in 1715.

SCHMUTZER, JOSEPH and ANDREW. These artists were natives of Vienna, and flourished about the year 1735. They were brothers, and are included in one article, as they frequently worked conjointly on the same plate. Andrew imitated the style of Van Dalen and Bolswert, and handled the graver in a bold, clear style. We have, among others, the following prints by them :

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Charles VI. ; after Meytens.
The Empress Elizabeth Christiana ; after Averbach.
Gustavus Adolphus, Baron de Gotter.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Two Views of a Temple ; after G. Galli Bibiena.
Three subjects from the History of Decius ; after the pictures by Rubens in the gallery of the Prince of Lichtenstein.

[Andrew died at Vienna in 1739, and Joseph in 1740. There was another brother of the name of Adam, who was also an engraver, but very inferior to the other two ; he was the eldest, but died about the same time as his brothers.]

SCHMUTZER, JACOB, was the son of Andrew Schmutzer, born at Vienna in 1733. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of J. G. Wille, and adopted the pleasing style of that artist. On his return to Vienna he was appointed director of the Academy established by the Empress Maria Theresa. He engraved several plates, which are executed with the graver in a neat, clear style, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Francis I., Emperor of Germany.
Maria Theresa, his Empress.
Joseph Wenceslaus, Prince of Lichtenstein.
Wenceslaus, Prince of Kaunitz ; very rare.
Martin de Meytens, Painter to the Emperor.
C. W. E. Dietrichy, Painter.

SUBJECTS.

Mutius Scevola before Porsenna ; after Rubens.
St. Gregory refusing the Emperor Theodosius the entrance into the church ; after the same.
Venus rising from the Sea ; after the same.

[These three are among the most esteemed of his prints for the skill displayed in the execution ; the last is very highly finished.

Nagler calls this engraver Jacob Mathias, and gives a list of forty-seven prints by him. He may be ranked among the most skilful engravers of his time, and several excellent scholars were produced under his direction. He died at Vienna in 1811.]

SCHNELLBOTZ, GABRIEL. This engraver is noticed in the Series of Engravers. He is said to have resided at Wittenberg about the year 1590, where he engraved some plates, which he marked with an arrow, on which he placed an S. [The name is differently written Schnellbotz, Schnellbottz, Schnellholtz ; the last is the correct spelling. Some say he was born at Merseburg, others at Wittenberg, in 1536. It appears that, in addition to his practice as a designer and engraver, he carried on the business of a printer and bookseller at Wittenberg, and published several works there in 1562 and 1563. One of them is entitled "Illustrium Ducum Saxonie vivæ effigies ab anno nativitatæ Christi 842 usque ad annum 1563," which was reprinted in 1570, in German verse, with the title "Abconfactur und Bildness aller Grossherzogen, Churund Fürsten, welche das Land Sachsen regieret haben." Gedrucht zu Wittenberg durch G. Schnellholtz, Anno 1563. The mark S on a perpendicular arrow is the rebus of his name. Nagler calls him Formschneider and Buchdrucker. Zani says he was an engraver on wood, and operated in 1590. Strutt says he engraved a considerable number of very excellent prints.]

SCHNITZER, JOHN, an old engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1486. He executed the cuts of the Geographical Charts for the edition of Ptolemy, published at Ulm in the above year. The Map of the World is ornamented with ten heads, representing the winds, rudely cut. It is inscribed, Insculpsum est per Johannem Schnitzer de Arnshelm.

[SCHNORR VON CAROLSFELD, JOHANN VEIT, commonly called VEIT HANS, was born in 1764 at Schneeberg, in Thuringia, where his father was a member of the council. He was intended for the law, and studied jurisprudence till he was twenty-five, when his strong predilection for the fine arts induced him to abandon it, and he entered the school of Oeser, at Leipsic, of whom he became one of the most distinguished scholars. Schnorr's works are multifarious. He painted historical subjects and portraits in oil ; made designs and drew in black chalk, Indian ink, sepia, and in water colours ; modelled in clay and plaster ; in short, exercised his abilities in every branch of art. It is, however, by his skill as an engraver that his reputation has spread beyond his own country. He was a spirited engraver in aquafortis, and in the chalk and dotted manner. His subjects in this line consist of portraits of eminent persons, poetical illustrations, from his own designs and after the antique, bas-reliefs, and vignettes. Of these Nagler has given a list, and recorded many particulars of the artist that do not properly belong to this Dictionary. A sale of many of his works took place at Leipsic in 1842, probably after his death, which are described in Weigel's Catalogue made on the occasion.]

SCHOEN, MARTIN. This venerable artist, who was at the same time a painter, an engraver, and a goldsmith, may be considered as the father of the German school of engraving. He was born at Culmbach, a small town in Franconia, according to Huber, about the year 1420. Of his performances as a painter little is known. In the church of the hospital, at Colmar, are preserved two of his pictures, representing the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, both of which subjects he engraved. If he was not the earliest of the German engravers, he began to practise the art when it was in its very infancy, and carried the mechanical part of it to an astonishing degree of perfection. Although his drawing is incorrect, and his compositions partake of the stiffness and formality which characterize the works of the early German artists, his productions prove him to have possessed a fertile imagination, and exhibit both genius and judgment. In his print of the Death of the Virgin, there is a fine expression in the heads, and the accessories are finished with a beauty and delicacy of execution which has scarcely been surpassed. The prints of Martin Schoen appear to have been engraved from 1460 till 1486, in which year he died, at Colmar, where he chiefly resided. His plates are numerous, and are principally from his own compositions. He usually marked his prints with an M. and an S. with a kind of cross between them, thus, M⁺S. The following are his principal plates :

SACRED SUBJECTS.

The Life of the Virgin; twelve plates.
 Twelve plates of the Passion of our Saviour.
 The Annunciation.
 The Nativity.
 The Adoration of the Magi.
 The Flight into Egypt.
 The Wise and the Foolish Virgins; ten plates.
 The Last Judgment.
 Christ hearing his Cross.
 The Crucifixion.
 The Death of the Virgin. This was also engraved by Israel van Mecheln, Wenceslaus, and others.
 A small set of the Apostles.
 St. Anthony carried into the Air by Demons.
 St. Sebastian tied to a Tree.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Two Alchymists fighting.
 A set of twelve subjects of Ornaments for goldsmiths.
 A Ciborium.
 An incense Cup, or Censer. Engraved also by J. van Mecheln.
 A Bishop's Crosier.
 The Battle of the Saracens against the Christians, in which St. James appears on the side of the latter.
 This was probably his last plate, as it was not entirely finished.

[It is now settled that the name of this artist was Martin Schongauer, but it is not equally certain whether he was a native of Culmbach, Colmar, or Augsburg, or what were the precise years of his birth and death. It must, however, be apparent to every one who has perused the accounts that have been written concerning him since the publication of Bryan's Dictionary, that the dates given above are erroneous. It is surprising that Bryan should have overlooked the statement by Bartsch in vol. vi. of "Le Peintre Graveur," published in 1803, (eight years previous to his own work,) and rely on that of Huber. Zani and Bartsch place Martin Schongauer's birth in or about 1445; but Ottley, with still greater probability, places it in 1453. They all concur that he died in 1499. When it was a question of the priority of the discovery of engraving, it suited the theories of the disputants to carry back to as remote a period as any plausible circumstance would seem to justify, the date at which their respective countrymen flourished, on whom they were disposed to confer the honour; in most instances, however, conjecture has been substituted for fact. When inquirers like Zani, Bartsch, and Ottley investigate the several claims, whatever may be their predilections, they are not easily misled by possibilities, or even probabilities, but apply such tests as must decide the question one way or other, or show that discovery is almost hopeless. In justice to Huber it must be mentioned, that he was the first writer who excited a doubt of the correctness of the dates respecting Schongauer. In the first volume of his "Manuel des Curieux et des Amateurs de l'Art," he states "that one of his friends, M. de Lorse, a great connoisseur in whatever related to the fine arts, had informed him that during some stay which he made at Colmar, he had had occasion to search the ancient manuscripts preserved there, which treat of Schoen and his family; and that it appeared from these documents that he had lived longer than was commonly believed." The portrait of Martin Schongauer, engraved by Bartsch and prefixed to the sixth volume of "Le Peintre Graveur," was taken from a painting formerly at Nuremberg, afterwards in the collection of Count Fries, and now at Schleissheim, or Munich, on which is inscribed Hipsch Martin Schongauer Maler

1483; and in the picture is an escutcheon of arms, bearing a crescent gules on a field argent. On the back of the picture is written in old German to the following purport: "Master Martin Schongauer, painter, called Hipsch (handsome) Martin, on account of his art, born at Colmar, but of a citizen family of Augsburg. Noble by origin, &c. Died at Colmar the year 1499, the 2nd of February. May God shew him mercy. And I, Hans Largkmair, was his disciple in the year 1488." The print, to those accustomed to examine portraits by the old German masters, would not indicate a person beyond the age of thirty. Albert Durer had a vehement desire to be personally acquainted with Martin Schongauer, and for that purpose made a journey to Colmar in 1492; he, however, was not gratified, Martin, it seems, being from home at the time, but he was kindly received by his brothers, Gaspar, Paul, and Louis. If Martin had died in 1486, Albert would not have gone to Colmar to visit him in 1492. On a drawing in the possession of Baron Heineken was written, in German, "This piece was designed by Hübisch (handsome) Martin in 1470, being then a youth. I, Albert Durer, have learnt that, and have written this to his honour, in the year 1517." Bartsch observes, "that all the prints of Martin Schongauer exhibit an almost equal perfection in the management of the burin, which induces the belief that he had not commenced engraving on copper, or rather that he had not taken (preserved) proofs till after he had acquired, by great practice in ornamented plate, a thorough command of the instrument; for it is said that he united the art of the goldsmith with that of the painter." On this Ottley remarks, "If the truth of this observation be acknowledged, it will follow, as highly probable at least, that none of the engravings of Schongauer now known appertain to a period more remote than about the year 1475; at all events, there seems every reason to believe that by far the greater portion of them were executed in the last twenty years of the century in which he lived." They who are curious in the matter will find it ably discussed in Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. vi., and in Ottley's Inquiry on the Origin and early History of Engraving; and in both an ample catalogue of the prints engraved by and attributed to the artist. It is related that there was a friendly correspondence, and an exchange of their drawings, between Pietro Perugino and Schongauer; and that Michael Angelo, in his youth, studied and copied in colours the print of St. Anthony tormented by Demons, or coloured an impression of it, being particularly struck with the extravagance and variety of the composition. With regard to his pictures, there is much more uncertainty. There are works attributed to him in the galleries of Nuremberg, Munich, Schleissheim, and Vienna; but connoisseurs are divided as to the authenticity of several. Those at Colmar have the greater number of suffrages. One in particular, the Virgin in the Rose-bush, placed behind the altar in the cathedral, is celebrated for its size, composition, and excellent state of preservation; if character be added, these are the chief tests by which others attributed to him may be judged. This picture is painted on a gold ground, as, it is asserted, are almost all the authentic works of the master, and the figures are of the size of life. The Virgin is represented with the infant Jesus on her lap, seated among roses, and two angels holding a crown above her. It is carefully executed, and the colours are so blended that the touch of the pencil is imperceptible. The Crucifixion, at Vienna, is also one of his approved pictures; it is full of expression, if not of beauty, and is thought to participate in the style of the school of Cologne.]

SCHOEN, BARTHOLOMEW. According to Professor Christ, this artist was the brother of Martin Schoen. The prints attributed to this engraver, though they bear a resemblance to those of Martin, are not executed with so much neatness and expression. They are usually marked with a B. and an S. in the old German character, with a cross between them, thus, bxS. The following are said to be by him:

An old beggar Man, with an old Woman in a Wheelbarrow.

Two grotesque Heads of an old Man and a Woman.

A Man playing on a Lute, and an old Woman holding a Ladle in one hand, and a Jar in the other.

A Lover and his Mistress.

He also copied the Life of Christ, and other plates, from Martin Schoen.

[It is a subject of doubt whether there ever was an artist of the name of Bartholomew Schoen, or Schongauer. The celebrated Martin had four brothers, Gaspar, Paul, Louis, and George; but there is no mention of Bartholomew. The engraver to whom the above marks appertain was probably known, in his time, by some other name of which there is now no record. It is certain that he was of a very early period; Professor Christ reports that he had seen a print by him with the date 1479. The master's mark is to be found in the middle of the lower part of his prints within the border line. In addition to the twelve prints of the Passion of Christ, engraved after Martin Schongauer, Bartsch has given a list of ten others by this master, in which only two of the above named (the Lover and his Mistress, and the old beggar Man, with an old Woman in a Wheelbarrow, which he calls La Brouette) are included. The following are the titles:

Le Cavalier avec la Dame en croupe.

Le Paysan à la Masse d'Armes.

L'Enfant dans le Bain.

L'Enfant nud assis.

Le Paysan à l'Ail. A circular print.

L'Enfant auprès du petit Pot. In two circles.

Le Concert. Circular.

La Brouette.

Les deux Amans.

Les Sauvages.

"Le Paysan à la Masse d'Armes" has also been engraved by another ancient but anonymous master, and there is a print by Israel von Mecheln of "les deux Amans," which appears to be the original of this, but which Bartsch says he dares not affirm. The five following prints were not known to Bartsch or Nagler:

1. An old Woman holding a Stick in her right hand, on the left of the print, appears to be taking a purse of money which a man on the right holds out in his right hand; his left hand is placed on the old Woman's bosom. The mark is on a hillock at bottom towards the right. H. $\frac{3}{4}$ in., W. $\frac{2}{3}$ in. (Collection of Henry Ralph Willlett, Esq.)

3. A Pilgrim visiting a holy Hermit in his solitude. The latter wears a cowl, and is sitting on the left leaning both hands on his stick. The Pilgrim, whose hands and feet are naked, is seated between two stumps of trees which support a sloped roof leaning against a grotto, at the entrance of which is a stone table. At top, near the leaves of the tree behind the hermit, is a bird about to descend with some fruit in his beak. The monogram is in the middle at bottom. H. 5 p. 8 l., L. 5 p. (Revil's Sale at Paris in 1838.)

4. Ornamental foliage, commencing at bottom on the left and extending in three principal branches over the whole of the plate. Two birds, one of which is nearly hidden in the root of the branch, the head and neck only being visible, the other is perched on the branch which extends to and drops on the right. The monogram is in the middle at bottom. H. 4 p. 6 l., L. 3 p. 6 l. (Revil's Sale at Paris in 1838.)

5. Two Men wrestling. (Wilson's Sale in London, March, 1830.)

SCHOEN, ERHARD, a German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1530, and was probably of the same family with the preceding artists. His cuts are said to be executed with neatness and accuracy. Mr. Strutt mentions a frontispiece by him, representing a genealogical branch from Jesse to Christ, with figures of the principal personages, very delicately cut. He marked his prints with a monogram composed of an E. and an S. with a small knife under, thus, E.S. [Erhard Schön flourished from 1516 to 1550, as appears by the work entitled "Hortulus Animæ," and other books published during that period, for which he furnished the designs. Among the thirty-three wood-cuts attributed to him by Bartsch, there is one with his mark and the date 1524. He resided chiefly at Nuremberg, where he published, in 1538, a treatise on the proportions of the human figure for the use of students. This work must have been useful and popular, as it went through three editions in five years, though the wood-cuts illustrative of the author's principles are coarsely done, and apparently not calculated to facilitate the improvement of a learner. Jackson, in his treatise on wood engraving, asserts that Erhard Schoen, like many others of the sixteenth century called wood engravers, only made the designs of those prints that have his mark, and never engraved. Zani is nearly of the same opinion; he says it has not been proved. Jackson mentions some playing cards designed by this master, as being in greater request than any of his other works engraved on wood; but they are not alluded to by Bartsch or Nagler. It is supposed that he died about 1550, as there is nothing at present known that can be attributed to him after that year.]

SCHOENFELD, or SCHOONFELD, JOHN HENRY. This painter was born at Biberach in Swabia, in 1619, and was a scholar of John Sichelbein, an indifferent artist, under whom he learned little more than the rudiments of design. He visited the principal cities in Germany, and contemplated the best works of the art in the different collections, and had given proofs of considerable talent, when he determined to visit Italy in search of improvement. On his arrival at Rome he found employment in the church of S. Elisabeta de Fornari, where he painted two altar-pieces, which gained him some reputation, and he was engaged in some of the embellishments in the Palazzo Orsini. On his return to Germany, he distinguished himself as an historical painter at Vienna, Munich, Salzbourg, Augsburg, and other cities of the empire. He also was much employed as a portrait painter, and his landscapes, decorated with figures and architecture, were much admired. Among his most esteemed works are his pictures of Christ conducted to Calvary; and the taking down from the Cross, in the church of the Holy Cross at Augsburg, where he resided in the latter part of his life. In the Senate-house of that city is another fine picture by Schoenfeld, representing the race of Hippomenes and Atalanta. His compositions evince a ready and fertile invention; his design is not very incorrect, though his figures in general are rather too long, and his colouring is vigorous, though occasionally crude and glaring. He died at Augsburg in 1689. We have a few etchings by this artist, executed in a slight style, among which are the following:

A Head of our Saviour.

A pastoral subject, with a Shepherd playing on a flute and a Shepherdess holding a triangle.

A Landscape, with a Man sitting on a rock.
Infant Bacchanalians.

[Schoenfeld was born in 1609 according to all the authorities, but there is not the same agreement respecting his death. Zani and Füssli place it in 1680, Nagler and others in 1675. His etchings and other engravings, of which Nagler has given a list, amount to twenty-three; but there are some additional etchings of landscapes with rich architecture and figures, the latter, like many in his pictures, are out of all proportion to the other objects.]

[SCHOENMACKER, or SCHOENMAKERS, JAN PIETERSZ, or PIETERSZ JAN, born at Dort in 1755, painted views of cities in the manner of Vander Heyden. His pictures are much esteemed, and are to be found in the best modern collections in Holland. There were some in those of Baron Steengracht, Zuylen van Nyevelt, Onderwater van Puttershoeck, and others. As he was on friendly terms with the most eminent of his contemporary brethren, he had their able assistance, occasionally, in figures, animals, and other objects. At one of the exhibitions at Dort there were four pictures by him, in which the vessels and figures were painted by J. C. Schotel; these additions increase their value considerably. He died in 1842.]

SCHOEVAERDTS, [or SCHOVAERTS,] M., a Flemish painter of village festivals and merry-makings, in the style of Teniers. His pictures are frequently met with in the Netherlands, and though they are very inferior to those of that master, they possess considerable merit. We have a few etchings by this artist, slightly executed, from his own designs, and after other masters. [The accounts of this master are not very satisfactory. Some make him a native of Holland, others of Germany; his works, however, belong to the Dutch or Flemish schools, though they bear very little resemblance to those of Teniers, except occasionally in the subjects. His baptismal name has not been ascertained. He signed his pictures, and his two known etchings, M. Schoevaerdt, from which it is conjectured that it was either Martin or Michael. It is supposed that he was born in 1667. Balkema has confounded him with Christopher Schwartz, a totally different artist. The pictures of Schoevaerdt are generally crowded with figures in full activity, and he frequently introduces waggons and horses, and horned cattle. Two of his pictures have been engraved under the titles Fête de campagne Hollandaise, and Retour de la Fête Hollandaise; in the first is a charlatan haranguing the crowd, from which it may be inferred that he painted what the Italians call bambocciate. There are two village scenes by him in the gallery of the Louvre, under the name N. Schovaert.]

SCHOLLENBERG, H. J., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, which are neatly executed, but in a stiff, hard style. [Nagler calls him Hans Jacob Schollenberger, and says he worked at Nuremberg from 1670 to 1690. Zani says he operated from 1622 to 1674.]

SCHOONEBECK, ADRIAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He engraved a variety of frontispieces and other book-plates, and published, in two volumes, the habits of all the religious orders in Europe. [He was born at Amsterdam in 1650, and died at Moscow in 1714. He was a scholar of R. de Hooghe, whose manner he followed at first, but afterwards adopted mezzotinto. He was not very eminent in either. Laborde has noticed two of the latter, and Nagler has given a list of some others.]

SCHOONJANS, ANTHONY. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1650, and was a scholar of Erasmus Quellinus, under whom he studied until he was nineteen years of age, when he travelled to Italy in search of improvement. During a residence of ten years at Rome he distinguished himself by an exemplary application to his studies, and painted some pictures for the churches, which gained him considerable reputation. In 1678 he was invited to the court of Vienna by the Emperor Leopold, who appointed him his painter, and he had the honour of painting the portraits of the imperial family, and those of the principal nobility. He also was employed in decorating some of the churches, in which there are several altar-pieces by him. The desire of visiting England induced him to request the permission of his patron to absent himself some time from his service, and he came to this country in the reign of King William, and was employed in ornamenting some of the mansions of the nobility, and in portrait painting. Among other performances, he painted a staircase in a house, then called Little Montague House, situated at the corner of Bloomsbury Square. His portrait, painted by himself, was in the collection at Strawberry Hill. In returning to Vienna he passed some time at Dusseldorp, where he painted some pictures for the Elector Palatine, who presented him with a gold medal and chain. A. Schoonjans died at Vienna in 1726. [Others say he was born in 1655, and Balkema says he died in 1717, but he is not supported.]

[SCHOOR, NICOLAS VAN, born at Antwerp in 1666, painted fanciful subjects of nymphs, genii, and infants sporting, as adjuncts to flower-pieces by Morel, and landscapes by Rysbraeck. He also made designs for the manufacturers of tapestry at Antwerp and Brussels. He died rich at Antwerp in 1726. In the museum at Ghent there is an equestrian portrait by him of Charles II. of Spain, when that prince was about the age of eighteen.]

SCHOORE, J. V. A Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. Among other prints, he engraved a plate of St. Vincent; after Anthony Salaert.

[SCHOOTEN, GEORGE, or JORIS, VAN, an historical and portrait painter, born at Leyden in 1587, was a scholar of Conrad Vander Maas. He was a painter of considerable talent, though his works at present are but little known. Suyderhoef engraved one of his portraits, and J. G. Van Vliet a picture of Christ and the Woman of Samaria, which is one of his best prints; it is inscribed J. (Joris?) van Schooten, 1635. He died in 1658. He is supposed to have been one of the early masters of Rembrandt.]

SCHOOTER, FRANCIS. This artist engraved a portrait of Des Cartes, the philosopher, it is inscribed Franciscus Schooter ad viv. del. sculp. [This is probably the same as F. van Schooten, a professor of mathematics and philosophy at Leyden in the middle of the seventeenth century. He designed and engraved the portrait of Des Cartes, which is inscribed Franciscus a Schooten Pr. Mat. ad vivum delineavit et fecit, anno 1644, and prefixed to an edition of the "Geometria" of that date.]

SCHOREL, or SCHOOREEL, JOHN. This painter was born at Schooreel, a small town near Alkmaer, in 1495. At the age of fourteen he was placed under the tuition of an obscure artist, named William Cornelisz, and for three years had not the advantage of superior instruction. He had, however, made considerable progress in design by the vivacity of his genius, and his attentive studies after nature. In 1512 he went to Amsterdam, where he became a disciple of James Cornelisz, an historical painter of some celebrity, and under that master acquired an ability which rendered him one of the most promising young artists of his time.

The reputation of John de Mabuse, who was at that time in the service of the Duke of Burgundy, and resided at Utrecht, induced him to visit that city, for the purpose of profiting by the instruction of that master, with whom however he did not remain long. He afterwards travelled through Germany, and passed some time at Nuremberg, where he resided with Albert Durer, and was treated with great kindness by that distinguished artist. His next journey was to Venice, where he found, assembled from all parts, a number of people, for the purpose of embarking for Palestine, and among them met with an ecclesiastic of Gouda, by whom he was persuaded to accompany him to the Holy Land. On his arrival at Jerusalem he became acquainted with the superior of the monastery of Sion, by whom he was shown the most interesting views and antiquities in the city and vicinity, of which he made accurate designs. He painted for the convent a picture representing the Incredulity of St. Thomas; and in 1520 embarked for the Isle of Rhodes, where he was received with distinction by the grand master, who was a native of Germany, and painted views of the city and fortress. From thence he sailed for Venice, and afterwards travelled to Rome, and, during a residence of three years, contemplated the most remarkable objects of antiquity, and the principal works of the great masters in that capital. Adrian VI. then filled the Papal chair, and, notwithstanding the little respect he felt for the art, he employed his countryman Schorel in several works in the Belvidere, and he painted a whole-length portrait of the pope, which was sent to the college of Louvain, which had been founded by that pontiff.

On his return to Holland, Schorel established himself at Utrecht, and was much employed by the noble family of Lochorst, for whom he painted one of his most celebrated pictures, representing Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, which was placed in their chapel in the principal church. For the church of the monastery of St. John, at Haerlem, he painted a picture of the Baptism of Christ, in which he imitated the style of Raffaele; the airs of the heads are graceful and expressive, and the composition and design, though not entirely divested of the stiffness and formality which prevailed among the Flemish artists of the time, is superior to every thing that had preceded him. Many of the principal works of this artist were destroyed during the troubles in the Low Countries. He died at Utrecht in 1562.

[There is a great deal of romance in several accounts of Schoreel, founded on his erratic course of life, and probably very little certainty with regard to many of the pictures attributed to him. That he distinguished himself by nobler aspirations in art than most of his countrymen is true, and his works were better understood and more admired abroad than at home, for he had neither successor nor imitator in the same elevated style; the pictures of his contemporaries, Jan de Mabuse and Lucas van Leyden, were more consonant to their taste. It can hardly be said that he was the pupil of Jan de Mabuse, or of Albert Durer; his visits to them were but of short duration; Mabuse was too near to his own age to be his master, and of habits too dissipated for the taste of Schoreel, and his desire of seeing foreign parts was too strong to allow him to practise much under the amiable and more learned Albert. One of his quick perception would, however, profit by whatever he saw excellent in both. Many pictures have been attributed to him, and described in very glowing language, by different writers, and their authenticity denied by others. Alfred Michiels, in his work, "Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise," tom. iii., has cited fifty-one, real and apocryphal, from accounts by various authors, and from his own observation. The Death of the Virgin, formerly in the Boisserie collection, and now at Munich, is doubted by competent judges in such matters; Waagen says it has been named Schoreel without any real ground for the appellation. The Adoration of the Kings in the Museo Borbonico at Naples, which strongly resembles the Death of the Virgin, though something more sombre in tone, is there placed among pictures of the Florentine school, and is attributed to Filippo Lippi. Waagen, in his account of works of art in England, (1838,) mentions a picture by Schoreel that was, at the time he was in that country, at Corsham House, in Wiltshire; but as the greater part of the collection of pictures that decorated the family mansion of the Methuens has been since dispersed, it is uncertain where it is to be found at present. It is, however, deserving of note as a test picture of the master. It represents lovers passing the time with music and feasting, and measures two feet six inches in height, and is four feet wide. Waagen considered it very interesting, he says, "because it is probably a genuine work of a master so celebrated in the first half of the 16th century, no authenticated work by whom has hitherto been discovered." He adds, and it is a remark of great weight, "that at the time Sir Paul Methuen bought the picture by the name of Schoreel, the masters in that style, and of that period, were by no means in favour, and therefore it is not to be supposed that the name was falsely given to it by way of recommendation."]

SCHORER, JOHN FREDERICK. According to Professor Christ, this artist was a native of Nuremberg, and flourished about the year 1619. He is said to have engraved on copper, but his plates are not specified. [He was born at Augsburg, but in what year is not ascertained. Nagler has described nine prints by him, representing the Four Seasons and the Four Elements, and a design for goldsmiths' work, with the dates 1615 and 1619. Brulliot has noticed several drawings, with his monogram formed of the letters H. F. S. united, and dated from 1609 to 1639. It is supposed that he worked chiefly at Nuremberg and Cobourg, and, from his initials, that he was called Hans Friederic Schorer.]

SCHORQUEUS, J. VAN, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Madrid about the year 1600. He engraved some frontispieces and other book-plates, which are executed with the graver in a neat, stiff style. Among others is a title-page to a Commentary on the Prophets, by Balthasar, inscribed J. van Schorquens, fecit, in Madrid. [His Spanish names were Juan Scorquens. He was an excellent engraver of title-pages, of which he executed many for Spanish books from 1618 to 1630.]

[SCHOTEL, JOHN CHRISTIAN, an eminently distinguished marine painter, born at Dort in 1787, was a scholar of A. Meulemans, and subsequently of Martin Schouman, who exercised him for two years in drawing sea-pieces in water colours and Indian ink. At the conclusion of his pupilage he devoted himself to the study of nature, for which purpose he would embark in an open boat on a tempestuous sea, and note down the appearances of the agitated elements. Hence it is that his pictures of storms have such an air of truth, and excite general admiration. Nor was he less successful in his representations of calms and river-views; from the window of his residence at Dort he had objects of study constantly before him. His first exhibition of two paintings in oil at Amsterdam was eminently successful, they were received with applause by the artists, and sold for high prices. This was a stimulus for still greater exertion, and he was emulous of being the rival of his great countryman, Backhuysen. From 1814 to 1817 he worked in concert with his former master, Martin Schouman, on two pictures that embraced historical subjects, one representing the precipitous retreat of the French from before Dort, and the other the bombardment of Algiers by the allied fleets in 1816. The first of these pictures is in the possession of the literary society Diversa sed Una; the other was purchased by M. van Poliën van Nienland. Schotel always made nature his model. His skies are expansive and full of air, his clouds light and floating. In his calms he equals the younger W. Van de Velde in the smoothness and transparency of the water; and the agitation of the waves, their conflicting turbulence, and the driving clouds, in his storms, almost rival the magnificent representations of Backhuysen. All his pictures, whether calms or storms, are finished with the most scrupulous care, even to the smallest details. In 1827 the Prince of Orange purchased two large and very beautiful pictures of the artist, to present to the Emperor of Russia; these the editor saw at the Hague, in Schotel's possession, when they were brought for the Prince's inspection, and they were considered his chefs d'œuvre. He received honours from his own sovereign and other crowned heads, and was a member of several academies and societies of arts. His pictures were eagerly purchased by the rich and tasteful of his countrymen, and foreigners were equally anxious to obtain them. Some of the best collections in England are enriched with specimens, but they are generally of the cabinet size. This admirable painter died at Dort the 21st of December, 1838. His son, Peter John Schotel, paints in the style of his father, but chiefly breezes, calms, or river-scenes of small dimensions. It requires some attention and acuteness to discover a difference, and the amateur should be on his guard, if he be particularly desirous of having a picture by the elder Schotel, as the letters J. C. have been placed on some by the younger for the purpose of deception, not by the artist, but by unscrupulous dealers. Indeed the merit of the latter is so great that it assists the fraud, and many are not aware that there are, or were, two marine painters of the same name, flourishing at nearly the same period.]

SCHOUMAN, ARTUS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Dort in 1710, and was a scholar of Adrian Vander Burg. He painted historical subjects and portraits, and engraved some plates in mezzotinto, in a very indifferent style. [Aart Schouman was a painter of merit, particularly of birds, which he painted after nature in the manner of Hondekoeter and Weenix. He also painted landscapes with animals, portraits, and small historical or poetical pictures; many of the last subjects are taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses. He was an able designer and good colourist. His mezzotinto prints are after Gerard Dou, Schaloken, Paul Potter, Frank Hals, &c., so he made a good choice of masters, whatever was his skill in scraping. He resided constantly at the Hague, where he died in 1792.]

SCHRODER, HANS or JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. He engraved some plates of ornamental foliage, &c.

[SCHROEDER, FREDERIC, was born at Hesse Cassel in 1768, some say in 1772, and was a scholar of Klauber, a German engraver. He was one of the artists employed to engrave the plates for Le Musée Laurent et Robillard, Le Voyage à Constantinople, and other similar publications. He confined himself chiefly to landscapes, and engraved several after Swaeneveldt, Vernet, La Hire, Karil du Jardin, and Bommel. He also assisted in the back-grounds and ornamental parts of plates in which the figures were executed by other artists; among which were the Sabines by Massard, and Henry IV's Entry into Paris by Toschi. Schroeder was living at Paris in 1831.]

SCHUBART, PETER. This artist was a native of Germany, but resided at Venice about the year 1696. Professor Christ ascribes to him the engravings marked with the letters P. S. d. E., which he interprets, Peter Schubart de Ebreuerg.

SCHÜBLER, A. G. J., a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1626. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers, which are very indifferently executed. He engraved part of the plates for a work entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published at Altdorf and at Nuremberg in 1626.

SCHULZE, JOHN GOTTFRIED. This artist was born at Dresden in 1749, and learned the rudiments of design from Charles Hutin. After being initiated into the art of engraving by Giuseppe Camerati, he went to Paris, where he profited by the lessons of J. G. Wille, and other eminent engravers. On his return to Saxony he engraved several plates of portraits, and other subjects, particularly some prints for the Dresden Gallery, which are executed in a neat, firm style. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

The Portrait of Joseph II., Emperor of Germany.
Jupiter and Io; after Schenau.
Ceres; after Carlo Loti.
The Centaur Nessus and Dejanira; after Rubens.

PRINTS ENGRAVED FOR THE DRESDEN GALLERY.

Cupid embracing Venus; after Giulio Romano.
Venus tying the Wings of Cupid; after Louisa Eliz. Le Brun.
Venus reclining; after Mario Viani.
A Vestal; after Angelica Kauffman.

The Head of Christ; after Coracci.
The Ecce Homo; after Guido.

[Nagler calls this engraver Christian Gottfried Schulze, and says he was born in 1750, and died in 1819. He specifies 36 of his prints; the latest date is 1818.]

SCHUMANN, JOHN GEORGE, was born at Dresden in 1761, and was instructed in design in the Academy there. He engraved several plates of landscapes, which were executed in a neat, spirited style. He resided some time in London, where he engraved some prints in conjunction with Mr. Byrne. We have, among others, the following by him:

A Landscape; after Ruysdael.

A View in Saxony; after Kleugel.

Two Landscapes with animals; after the same.

A Landscape, Morning; after Both; engraved conjointly with Mr. Byrne.

A View of Windsor Castle; after Hodges; the same.

[The proper names of this engraver are John Gottlob or Gottfried Schumann. He died at Dresden in 1810. Nagler gives a list of 26 prints by him.]

SCHUPPEN, PETER VAN, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Antwerp in 1623. After being instructed in the rudiments of drawing in his native city, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of Nanteuil, and engraved, in the style of his instructor, several portraits from his own designs, which are not inferior to the best productions of the time. His design is correct, and he handled the graver with great firmness and dexterity. He also engraved several historical subjects, after various masters. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV.; after C. Le Brun. 1662.

Renaud, Cardinal d'Este. 1662.

Julius, Cardinal de Mazarin; after Mignard.

The Chancellor Seguier; after C. Le Brun.

Francis Villani, Bishop of Tournay; after L. Francois.
Francis M. le Tellier, Marquis de Louvois; after Le Febvre.

Louis le Pelletier, President of the Parliament; after de Largilliere.

Francis Vander Meulen, Painter; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin and infant Christ; after Raffaele. 1661.

The Holy Family, with St. John, who holds a pigeon; after Seb. Bourdon. The first impressions are before the drapery was put over the nudity of the infant.

The Holy Family; after Gaspar de Crayer.

St. Sebastian, with an angel drawing out the arrow; after Vanduyck.

King David; after Ph. de Champagne.

[The generality of writers say that Peter van Schuppen, the elder, was born in 1623, and died in 1702; some agree with the date in the text. Laborde differs from all of them. He places the artist's birth between 1625 and 1630, and his death between 1710 and 1715. The elder van Schuppen's prints are numerous, Nagler specifies 119.]

SCHUPPEN, PETER VAN, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris about the year 1673, and studied painting under Nicholas de Largilliere. He is said to have been a reputable painter of history and portraits, and was invited to the court of Vienna, where he was appointed painter to the emperor, and director of the Academy in that city, where he died in 1751. [Several writers call this artist Jacques or James; Zani says he was born in 1669, in which Füssli agrees.]

[SCHUPPEN, H. VAN, whether Hans or Henry is uncertain, as there are no particulars of him. His name appears at full length, H. v. Scuppen, or his monogram, H. V. S., (the H and V joined, the S on the bar of H,) on landscapes engraved after Giovanni Maggi, who flourished at Rome in the early part of the 17th century.]

SCHURMANS, ANNA MARIA. This extraordinary lady is regarded as a prodigy in the world of learning and art. She was born at Utrecht in 1607, and from her cradle discovered an unprecedented quickness of parts. She is said to have been able to read when she was only three years old, and at seven had made great proficiency in Latin, which she had acquired from occasionally hearing the lessons her brothers received from their preceptor. Her father, inferring from thence that she had an extraordinary disposition for literature, cultivated her talents with care, and procured her the means of acquiring that knowledge for which she afterwards became so justly celebrated. The Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages became so familiar to her, that she not only wrote but spoke them with a fluency and correctness that surprised the most learned. She also made a great progress in the Oriental languages, which have a relation to the Hebrew, such as the Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, and Ethiopic. Her acquaintance with the modern languages was not less extensive; she perfectly understood, and spoke readily, the Italian, French, German, and English. She was also competently versed in geography, astronomy, and the sciences, so as to be able to judge of them with exactness; and was deeply read in divinity and theology. These erudite acquirements were not made by neglecting the accomplishments usual to her sex, or the study of the fine arts. She excelled in music, vocal and instrumental, in painting, sculpture, and engraving, in all of which she was equally successful. She painted her own portrait, and those of several of her friends, and sculptured several busts, some of which are preserved in the cabinets of the curious. She etched and engraved some plates, among which is a portrait of herself, inscribed Anna Maria Schurmans an. ætat. xxxiii. c. io. io. c. xl. A. M. S. fec. with these verses:

Cernitis hic pictâ nostras in imagine vultus:
Si negat Ars formam, gratia vestra dabit.

In Holland is preserved a bust of Anna Maria Schurmans, modelled in wax, by herself, to which she affixed the following lines:

Non mihi propositum est humanam eludere sortem,
Aut vultus solido sculperè in ære meos:
Hæc nostra effigies, quam cerâ expressimus, ecce
Materiæ fragili, mox peritura, damus.

This learned lady died at Altona in 1678. [It is said that she painted history, portraits, flowers, birds, and insects, and was equally excellent in all. Unfortunately it is not stated where her genuine works are to be found. Some that have been attributed to her are very doubtful. Her hand-writing was very beautiful, of which there is abundant proof in the many existing letters, in all languages, addressed to the most learned persons of her time.]

SCHURTZ, CORNELIUS NICHOLAS, an indifferent German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1670. He engraved some portraits, and other book-plates, in a poor, feeble style. [He was living in 1689. He engraved some portraits of several celebrated physicians, and small emblematical subjects; his prints are marked with his name at full length, or with the letters C. N. S., and sometimes the same letters in a monogram.]

SCHUT, CORNELIUS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1600, and was one of the most celebrated disciples of Rubens. Possessed of a lively and inventive genius, which had been cultivated by a liberal education, and aided by the instruction of so able a master, it was not long before he distinguished himself among his numerous fellow-students. On leaving the academy of Rubens he was employed in several works for the churches, in which he acquitted himself in a manner worthy of the school in which he was educated. The reputation he acquired by his first public performances rendered him so self-sufficient and presumptuous, that he had the temerity to offer himself as a rival to his illustrious instructor, whose works he criticized, and accused their author of want of genius and invention. The generosity of Rubens returned these imprudent calumnies with acts of kindness and liberality, applauded his pictures, and recommended him to employment.

Schut was endowed with a fertile and prolific imagination, and a facility of execution, which qualified him for the functions of a machinist. Of this he gave ample proof in his frescoes in the cupola of the cathedral at Antwerp, and in other large works of that description in the public edifices of that city. Of his altar-pieces in the churches, the most deserving of notice are his pictures of the Nativity, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of the Jesuits, at Antwerp; a Dead Christ, with the Virgin and St. John, in the church of St. James, which has sometimes been mistaken for a work of Vandyck; and the Martyrdom of St. George, in the cathedral. He painted several historical and fabulous subjects for the private collections, which are ingeniously composed, though occasionally too much scattered and confused. Vandyck painted the portrait of Cornelius Schut, among the eminent artists of his country. He died at Antwerp in 1660. This artist etched a considerable number of plates from his own designs, which are executed in a spirited style, resembling that of Benedetto Castiglione; among many others, we have the following:

The Holy Family, with St. John.
The Virgin and infant Christ.
The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence.
The Saints in glory.
Christ praying on the Mount.
Mars, Venus, and Flora.
Bacchus, Ceres, and Pomona.
The Triumph of Peace.
A great number of Madonnas, Saints, and other devout subjects.

[For a list of his numerous etchings the inquirer is referred to Nagler.

There is pretty confusion among writers respecting Cornelius Schut, especially those of his own country. Some say he was born in 1590, and died in 1649; others, that he was born in 1590, and died in 1660; others, as is stated in the text, that he was born in 1600, and died in 1660; and again, that he was born in 1600, and died in 1675. This diversity of dates shows that the writers were not aware that there were two painters of the same names, who were relations and contemporaries. The one was brother, the other son, of Peter Schut the engineer, who was in the service of Philip IV. of Spain. Cornelius, the son of Peter, was born at Antwerp, and was partly instructed by his uncle; he afterwards went with his father to Spain and practised at Seville, where he died in 1675. He was one of the founders of the Academy in that city, and contributed liberally to its support. He filled the offices of consul in that institution in the years 1663 and 1666, and was president in the years 1670 and 1674.

Of his ability and character Bermudez speaks in eulogistic terms. Some of his pictures are to be found at Seville, and it is said that his drawings resemble those of Murillo, and frequently pass for such. As there is at present a manufacture of that article in action, it will be fortunate for purchasers if they get no worse counterfeits. It is a question whether the elder Cornelius Schut (for so the uncle may be called to distinguish him from his nephew) was ever in Spain, though it is said he visited his brother Peter at Madrid, and painted a large picture on the principal staircase of the imperial college there, representing St. Francis Xavier baptizing the Indians; for it is also said he died in Spain in 1675, evidently showing that the writer was confounding the two painters. In this confusion of dates it may be fairly conjectured that the earlier apply to Cornelius the brother of Peter, and the later to Cornelius the son. This, however, will leave a large margin for the time of the birth of Cornelius the brother, as Peter, it is said, operated in 1600, and had a son born to him in that year. There wants proof that Cornelius Schut, the elder, was a scholar of Rubens, in the strict meaning of the term. The latter employed him, as he did many other painters of talent who were not his scholars, in executing some of his large commissions; and it is not likely that Schut, if he had been brought up in the school of Rubens, would have had the audacity to challenge his master to a trial of skill. There are battle-pieces attributed to Cornelius Schut, the younger; but as the name is written Schuyt it leaves the matter in doubt, no writer of any authority having mentioned that either exercised his talents that way.]

SCHUTER. By this engraver, who flourished about the year 1760, we have a plate of the portrait of Rembrandt, engraved for the first volume of prints, from the paintings in the collection of the Marquis Gerini.

SCHUTZ, CHRISTIAN GEORGE, a German landscape painter and engraver, born at Floersheim, in the electorate of Mentz, about the year 1730. He painted small pictures of views of the Rhine and landscapes, neatly touched, and very highly finished. He etched a few plates, among which are,

Two Landscapes; after Hausman.

[His subjects resemble those of Zachleven and Griffier, but his pictures in their treatment are very inferior to both; they are, comparatively, dry and hard. There were several landscape painters of the same name, but none of importance among the older ones. The name is sometimes written Schultz.]

SCHUUR, THEODORE VANDER. This painter was born at the Hague in 1628. After receiving some instruction in the rudiments of design in his native country, he went to Paris, where he frequented the school of Sebastian Bourdon, under whom he passed three years, and had already become an able designer, when he determined to visit Italy, for the completion of his improvement, and arrived at Rome in 1651. He contemplated the great objects of art with which he was surrounded with astonishment and delight; and his application to his studies was indefatigable. He had acquired considerable celebrity by some historical pictures he had exhibited to the public, when he was favoured with the patronage of Christina, Queen of Sweden, who, after the abdication of her throne, resided at Rome, and employed him in several works. After a residence of fourteen years at Rome, Vander Schuur returned to Holland, in 1665, and was received by his countrymen with the most flattering distinction. He was made a member of the Academy at the Hague, and was employed in decorating the public edifices. He painted the ceiling of the hall of the Burgomasters, in the town-house, representing an emblematical subject of Justice, Temperance, and Fortitude, ingeniously composed, and designed more in the Roman taste than that of his country. One of his most esteemed works is a large picture representing the Portraits of the Officers of the armed citizens, painted in 1675. He died in 1705. [His pictures exhibit very little of the Dutch taste. As he was well acquainted with perspective and architecture, he enriched his back-grounds with the ruins of ancient Greece and Rome, which he introduced with the skill of a painter, and the knowledge of an antiquary.]

SCHWABE, LAMBERT. See SUAVIUS.

SCHWARTZ, CHRISTOPHER. According to d'Argenville, this artist was born at Ingolstadt in 1550, and learned the elements of the art in his native city. He afterwards went to Venice, where he entered the school of Titian, and profited by the lessons of that great master of colouring. His countrymen have honoured him with the title of the Raffælle of Germany, with what propriety it is difficult to discover. His works exhibit neither the correctness nor the dignity of that illustrious painter, and he appears to have been more ambitious of imitating the impetuous energy and vigorous colouring of Tintoretto, than the grandeur and majesty which characterize the Roman and Florentine schools. After passing some years at Venice he returned to Germany, when Albert V., Duke of Bavaria, invited him to Munich, where he was appointed painter to the court, and resided in that city the remainder of his life. He painted many pictures for the churches and public edifices at Munich, and for the collection of his patron; several of which have been engraved by John Sadeler. His principal merit consists in the abundance of his compositions, and the force of his colouring. The airs of his heads are neither beautiful nor expressive, and there appears in his works a national stiffness and formality, of which he could never divest himself. One of the most esteemed works of Schwartz is a picture of the Entombing of Christ, in the Dusseldorf Gallery. He died at Munich in 1594.

SCHWARTZ, a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1626. He engraved portraits and book-plates in a very indifferent style, among which are the prints in a book published at Nuremberg in the year above mentioned, entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum.

[SCHWARTZ, HANS, or JOHANN, it is said was born in 1480 at Groningen, went to Italy to study, and painted history and landscapes. Zani calls him Giovanni di Groningen, detto Giovanni Vredeman, and marks him as a painter and engraver, and says he engraved in wood. It is said that he died in 1541. Some one has remarked that John Schwartz painted landscapes in the manner of Schoreel, but as there is no example of that kind quoted, and as there were several artists of the name of Schwartz who flourished at nearly the same period, it is not easy to determine whether the painter and engraver are identical or not. A noble author, in a recent elegant work on "Christian Art," mentions Hans Schwartz as the painter of a beautiful Adoration of the Kings at Munich, and says he was a pupil of Schoreel; and in a note his lordship calls Anthony More a pupil of Schwartz. According to dates Schwartz was fifteen years senior to Schoreel, and other writers say More was pupil to the latter. It seems irreconcilable that Schwartz, being fifteen years older than Schoreel, and thirty-two, or, according to some writers, thirty-nine, years older than More, they should be pupils of the same master. There is no chronological reason against More having been instructed by Schwartz, but there is some difficulty in establishing, either chronologically or topographically, that either of them were pupils of Schoreel, considering his age and the erratic life he led up to a period when both of them were accomplished masters in the art of painting. The difficulty is greater, certainly, with respect to Hans Schwartz than Anthony More. Query, Is this the Hans Schwartz who married the widow of Hans Schaufelein in 1540?]

SCHWARTZENBERG, MELCHIOR. According to Professor Christ, this artist was an engraver on wood, and executed some cuts of frontispieces for Feyerabend the bookseller. [He operated from 1530 to about 1550.]

[SCHWEGMAN, HENDRIK, a flower painter and engraver, was born at Haerlem in 1761, and studied under P. van Loo. He engraved and coloured the prints for a work entitled "Icones Plantarum rariorum," he also etched several landscapes after E. van Driest and others, in the manner of Anthony Waterloo. He died at Haerlem in 1816.]

SCHWEICKHARDT, H. W. [HENRY WILLIAM,] a modern Dutch painter, who, in consequence of the disturbances in Holland in 1786, came to England, and resided in London for several years. He painted landscapes and cattle, and particularly frost-pieces, which were held in some estimation. They were painted in a neat but spiritless style, and produced a poor, feeble effect. He etched a set of plates of animals, which he dedicated to Mr. West in 1788. [He was born at Brandenburg in 1746, and died at London in 1797. He was supposed to be Dutch from having resided some time at the Hague.]

SCHWEIZER, JOHN. This artist was a native of Heidelberg, and flourished about the year 1660. He was but an indifferent engraver, and worked principally, if not entirely, for the publishers of books. Among other prints by him, we have a portrait of William Balthazar Freuhers, after Schik, and he engraved the frontispiece and plates for a work entitled Parnassus Heidelbergensis, omnium illustrissimæ hujus academæ professorum icones exhibens, some of which are from his own designs; [and also some animals after J. H. Roos, perhaps copied from prints by that master. Schweizer died in 1679.]

SCHYNDAL, or SCHENDEL, BERNARD. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1659, and was a scholar of Hendrick Mommers. He painted assemblies of peasants regaling, fairs, merry-makings, and the interiors of Dutch kitchens, in the style of John Molenaer. He treated those subjects with considerable humour, and his pictures are ingeniously composed, though greatly inferior to the admirable productions of Brauwer or Ostade. He died in 1716. [Others place his birth in 1634, and his death in 1693.]

SCHYNVOET, J., a Dutch engraver, who resided in London about the year 1700. He engraved some plates of bird's-eye views of gentlemen's seats, from his own designs, which are executed in a style resembling that of John Kip. [He is called Jacob, 721 but very little seems to be known of him; it is supposed that he operated as late as 1727. There are prints of gardens and other subjects by him after Simon Schynvoet.

SCIARPELLONI. See CREDI.

SCILLA, or SILLA, AGOSTINO. According to Hackert, this artist was born at Messina in 1629, and was a scholar of Antonio Ricci, called Il Barbalunga. He discovered an early genius for painting, and had a competent knowledge of history and poetry. Such was the promise he evinced of excelling in the art, that Barbalunga prevailed on the senate to settle a pension on him, to enable him to pursue his studies at Rome, where he frequented the school of Andrea Sacchi. After a residence of four years at Rome, he returned to Messina, rich in designs he had made after Raffaëlle and the antique. He was a reputable painter of history, and had established an academy at Messina, which was much frequented until the stormy revolution which took place in Sicily, in 1674, obliged him to fly from Messina, and he returned to Rome, where he died in 1700. There are several of his fresco works in the churches of S. Domenico, and the Nunziata de Teatini, at Messina; and in S. Orsola, an oil picture, representing the Death of S. Ilarione, which is much admired. [He particularly excelled in painting the heads of old men; and the landscapes, figures, and animals in his historical pictures are all surprisingly true to nature. In some of his works he was assisted by his brother Giacinto, a good artist, who lived till about 1711. Agostino had a son, Saverio, who was also a painter, but he did not support the reputation of his father or his uncle.]

SCOLARI, GIUSEPPE. This artist was a native of Vicenza, and flourished about the year 1580. He was a disciple of Giovanni Batista Maganza. He painted history both in oil and in fresco; and there are many of his works in the churches at Vicenza, Verona, and Venice, which are favourably mentioned by Zanetti. According to Papillon, he executed several cuts in wood, which, though rudely executed, evince the hand of the master; among which are the following:

The Entombing of Christ.

The Dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary.

St. Jerome holding a Crucifix.

The Rape of Proserpine.

[The accounts of this artist, as far as regards the engravings on wood, is not to be implicitly relied on.]

SCOPPA, ORAZIO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Naples about the year 1642, and was probably a goldsmith. He engraved a set of fifteen plates of designs for chalices, crosiers, and other ecclesiastical ornaments. They are etched in a spirited style.

[SCORODOMOFF, GAWRIL, or GABRIEL, a designer and engraver, was born at Petersburg about 1748, but came to England when young and studied under Bartolozzi, whose manner he imitated. It is said he was the first Russian that obtained reputation as an engraver. He flourished at London from 1775 to 1782, and engraved after Sir J. Reynolds, West, Hamilton, and Angelica Kauffman, and some compositions of his own. He also engraved portraits of the Empress Catherine II., the Grand Duke of Russia, and other princes of that country, after F. Rocotoff; probably after his return to Petersburg, where he died in 1792. His prints after Angelica Kauffman, and those of the imperial family, are considered his best.]

SCORZA, SINIBALDO. According to Soprani, this artist was born at Voltaggio, a small town in the Genoese state, in 1589, and was a scholar of Giovanni Batista Paggi. He excelled in painting landscapes, which he decorated with groups of figures and animals, tastefully composed, and touched with spirit. "It would be difficult," says Lanzi, "to find in Italy a pencil which ingrafted so successfully the neatness of the Flemish execution with the taste of the Italians." He also painted easel pictures of sacred and fabulous subjects, which are found in the choicest private collections. He died in 1631. [He copied so accurately with the pen some of Albert Durer's prints, that many of the best judges in Italy were deceived by them, and supposed they were the original engravings.]

SCOTIN, GERARD, THE ELDER, a French engraver, born at Gonesse, near Paris, in 1642. He was a pupil of Francis Poilly the elder, whose style he imitated, though very inferior to him. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Alex. Veronese.

The Communion of the Magdalene; after Domenichino.

The Circumcision; after P. Mignard.

The Baptism of Christ; after the same.

The Presentation in the Temple; after C. Le Brun.

The Country Life; after Dom. Fetti.

[He died in 1718.]

SCOTIN, GERARD, THE YOUNGER, was the nephew of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1690, and was instructed in design and engraving by his uncle. He came to England, and resided some years in London, where he was chiefly employed for the booksellers. In 1745 he engraved, in conjunction with Baron and Ravenet, the six plates of the Marriage à la Mode, after Hogarth. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

The Birth of Adonis; after Boucher.

Notre Dame des Victoires; after the same.

Belsharius; after the supposed picture by Vandyck, at Chiswick.

Vortigern and Rowena; after Blackeney.

Alfred receiving the account of the defeat of the Danes; after the same.

[Nagler calls this engraver Louis Gerard, but does not quote any signature as authority.]

[SCOTIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, said to be the son of the elder Gerard, flourished at Paris in the first half of the 18th century. He engraved after H. Rigand, Boucher, Watteau, Lancret, Pater, and other French painters. Some of his prints are dated as early as 1710, and that of the Column of Versailles, J. B. Scotin, l'ainé sc.]

SCOTIN, J. B. The name of a very indifferent artist, affixed to some anatomical prints in Boudon's Anatomy, published at Paris in 1734.

[SCOTT, JOHN, a very eminent engraver of animals, particularly of horses and dogs; was born at Newcastle, where he served his apprenticeship to a tallow-chandler. At the expiration of his time his love for art induced him to visit London, and his friend Pollard, a Newcastle man, kindly gave him lessons in the elements of drawing and engraving. Pollard, it seems, was the only master to whom he was under any obligation for instruction, till the ability he displayed in his art introduced him to the notice of some of the painters of the time, especially those who were engaged in publishing extensive works. His name will be found in publications by Tresham and Otley, Britton's Cathedral Antiquities, Westall's Illustrations of the Book of Common Prayer, Physiognomical Portraits, &c.; but it is in the "Sportsman's Cabinet," and a "Series of Horses and Dogs," that he excels, as an engraver of animals, all the English artists that had preceded him. Some of his detached pieces are of great excellence; particularly Breaking Cover, after Philip Reinagle; the Death of the Fox, after Sawrey Gilpin; Warwick, a famous racer, after Abraham Cooper; and some landscapes with animals, or figures, after Weenix, Gainsborough, Calcott, and others. He died in 1828, at the age of 54.]

SCOTT, SAMUEL, an eminent English painter of views and sea-pieces, who resided in London from about the year 1725 till his death. Of this ingenious artist, Lord Orford speaks in the following terms: "If he was but second to Vandevelde in sea-pieces, he excelled him in variety, and often introduced buildings into his pictures with consummate skill. His views of London Bridge, the Quay at the Custom-house, &c., were equal to his marines, and his figures were judiciously chosen and admirably painted; nor were his washed drawings unequal to his finished pictures." He died of the gout in 1772. [Scott was an excellent painter in his style, and his pictures are deserving of more attention than has been bestowed on them; but no comparison can be instituted between his works and those of W. Vandevelde.]

[SCOTTO, FELICE, flourished at the end of the 15th century. He is reckoned among the Milanese painters, but was probably of some other school, his manner of designing being more tasteful, and his colouring clearer, than theirs in general. He painted many pictures at Como for private individuals, and at S. Croce several in fresco relating to the life of S. Bernardo. His genius was varied and expressive, and his pictures display judgment in the composition; he was one of the best artists of the period in those parts of Italy.]

[SCOTTO, or SCOTTI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, was born at Venice about 1760, and was a scholar of Vangelisti. He is known by several well-executed portraits and historical subjects. His fac similes of original drawings by celebrated masters, especially those by Raphael, are particularly fine. These, with others by Rosaspina, form the splendid work published by the Abate Celotti under the title "Disegni originali di Raffaello per la prima volta publicata, esistenti nella Imp. Accademia di Belle Arti di Venetia," 1829, folio. The painter Bossi intended to have published this work, as he was the earlier possessor of the drawings made by Scotti, but died before he could accomplish his purpose. After his death Abate Celotti bought the drawings and plates, and published them as above mentioned. Among other important works, there is an engraving by F. Scotti of Leonardo da Vinci's celebrated picture of Modesty and Vanity. His decease is not reported.]

[SCOTTO, or SCOTTI, GIROLAMO, born in 1780, was educated in the school of Longhi, at Milan. He was one of the earlier pupils of this master, and ranks among the best of them, as may be seen in his plates, which exhibit much of the new and improved style of engraving. The following are worthy of notice:

The Virgin in the Clouds, with the Child in her arms, after Raphael.

Madonna of Foligno, (the Virgin and Child only), after the same.

Mater pulchræ dilectionis, after a picture by Raphael, discovered at Genoa in 1823.

Madonna with the Child in her lap, the young St. John, and another little Boy, from a picture by Raphael, in the possession of the Duke of Terranuova.

Mary Magdalene anointing the feet of Christ, after P. Veronese.

The healing of the Children by virtue of the garments of St. Philip, after A. del Sarto. This print is dedicated to Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, 1834.

It is not stated whether this artist be still living.]

[SCOTTO, STEFANO, a Milanese painter, who flourished at the latter part of the 15th and commencement of the 16th centuries. He was an admirable painter of arabesques, and had the honour of being the master of Gaudenzio Ferrari.]

[SCRETA, CHARLES, or KARL, an historical and portrait painter, was born of a noble family at Prague in 1604. He showed an early disposition for the arts, and commenced the study of them, but the distractions of war obliged him to leave his father-land, and betake himself to Italy. For several years he resided at Venice, Bologna, and Florence; in 1634 he accompanied his friend, William Bauer, to Rome. There he studied the antique and the works of the masters of the 16th century with great diligence. He also frequented the schools of the principal contemporary masters, and studied their different manners. By his talents and application he obtained high reputation in Italy, and was even admitted as professor in the Academy at Bologna. On his return to his native country the emperor Ferdinand III. and the nobility honoured him with many commissions. In 1644 he became a member of the Academy at Prague, and in 1652 the principal of the institution. The Emperor Ferdinand confirmed the title of his family to nobility, and he spent the remainder of his life admired and honoured. He died in 1674. His works in history, allegory, and portraiture are rather numerous; many of them have been engraved. Several of them may be ranked among the best productions of his time. They exhibit a successful study of the antique and of nature; an observance of symmetry, decorum, and dignity in the characters. But with all his acquirements he belongs to the class of the Eclectics, and his works have not had any important influence on the art. It would, however, be interesting to trace his many imitations of the styles of the great masters of the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish schools, particularly in single half-length or three-quarter figures, some of which are perfect deceptions. They are not copies, and many a supposed connoisseur has been puzzled to decide respecting the master, or has decided erroneously. His imitations of Guido, Domenichino, Lanfranco, the Caracci, Murillo, and Rubens, are particularly deceptive; he was less successful, though by no means indifferent, in his attempts at Raphael, Titian, and Paul Veronese. His pictures are to be found at Prague, Salzburg, Dresden, and Schleissheim, in the churches, palaces, and private collections. There are some in England, of which the possessors are not at present aware. His subjects are taken from sacred history, or legends of the Saints; of the latter he delighted to paint imaginary portraits, and such is their strong resemblance to nature that no doubt he had living models. It is recorded that he painted his own portrait twice under that guise; once in the character of St. Giles, in the church of St. Martin, and again as St. Luke painting the Virgin, in the church of St. Mary, at Prague. One of his portraits in the Gallery at Prague has been particularly admired; it represents a lapidary and glass-cutter in his workshop. He engraved a large philosophical thesis on two plates, which was published with the title "Philosophia Universa in Universitati Pragensi," it is an allegory formed of busts and statues of members of the house of Lobkowitz: signed Car. Screta fec. 1666.]

[SCRIVEN, EDWARD, an elegant engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, was born in 1775, and died in 1841. He engraved chiefly for print-publishers and booksellers, and his works have a strong resemblance to the school of Bartolozzi. A refined taste pervades all his productions, which are too numerous to give an account of in detail. Some of them are in "Specimens of ancient Sculpture," published by the society of Dilettanti, in Dibdin's Aedes Althorpianae, in Tresham's Gallery of Pictures, and other expensive publications. He engraved the Studies of Heads from Benjamin West's large picture of Christ rejected; many detached plates for Boydell and other publishers, of the pictures of English artists; a series of portraits, chiefly after Peter Lely, of the ladies commemorated by Hamilton in Memoirs de Grammont; and most of the respectable periodicals of the day were embellished by portraits from his graver. It is not exaggerated praise to say, whatever picture he engraved, whether an historical composition or a portrait, it was improved in the translation.]

SEAMER. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a slight etching, representing a man on horseback giving his purse to a country girl, who has got a basket of eggs upon her arm. Inscribed M. Seamer, Jun. fecit. 1734.

SEBASTIANO, FRA. See PIOMBO.

[SEBILLE, GYSBERT, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known, except that he lived in the middle of the 17th century. He painted the Judgment of Solomon for the Town-house of Weesp, of which place he was a burgomaster. There are other pictures by him in that building, among which is an assembly of the magistrates in 1652.]

SECANO, GERONIMO, a Spanish painter, born at Saragossa in 1638. After learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, from an obscure artist, he visited Madrid, where he studied with assiduity the works of the great masters in the royal collection, and returned to Saragossa an able designer. Of his works in the public edifices in that city, Palomino particularly notices his frescoes in the cupola of the chapel of San Miguel, and some oil pictures in the S. Pablo. He died in 1710. [For the last twenty years of his life he practised as a sculptor as well as painter, but his works in this department are little known.]

SECCANTE, SEBASTIANO. This painter was a native of Udine, and flourished about the year 1576. He was a disciple of Pomponio Amalteo, and was a respectable painter of history and portraits. In the church of S. Giorgio, at Udine, is an altar-piece by this master, representing Christ bearing his Cross, with angels holding the instruments of the Passion, which is spoken of by Lanzi in very favourable terms. [He married the daughter of Pomponio Amalteo, and is pronounced the last good painter of his school. There were others of the same name and family, who lived about the same period, but produced nothing worthy of record.]

SECCHIARI, GIULIO. This painter was a native of Modena, but was educated at Bologna, in the school of the Caracci. He afterwards visited Rome, where he gained considerable reputation. The Duke of Mantua invited him to his court, for whom he painted several pictures, which were destroyed or carried away at the sacking of that city, in 1630. There are some of his works in the churches at Modena, which are commended by Tiraboschi, particularly an altar-piece in the cathedral, representing the Death of the Virgin. He died in 1631.

[SECU, or SEEUW, MARTIN DE, born at Romerswalen in 1520, was a scholar of Francis Floris, and a good historical painter. His style of painting is free and delicate, and not deficient in grace, but there appears to be too much of haste and inaccuracy in his drawing. His principal pictures are at Middelbourg, where he died in 1574.]

SEDELMAYER, JEREMIAH JAMES. Baron Heineken mentions this artist as a painter and engraver. He executed some plates of views of the Imperial Library at Vienna, from his own designs; published in 1737. [He was born in 1704, and died in 1761. He engraved many other subjects, portraits and history, but none of general importance. Nagler gives a list of them.]

SEGAERS. The name of this artist is affixed to a portrait of Godef. Chodkiewie, of Russia.

SEGALA, GIOVANNI. According to Zanetti, this artist was born at Venice in 1663. He was a scholar of Antonio Zanchi, and painted history with considerable reputation. That writer highly commends a picture by this master, representing the Conception, in the Scuola della Carità, at Venice, which he asserts may compete with the ablest artists of his time. He died in 1720.

[SEGARRA, JAYME, a Spanish painter, who flourished about the year 1530, as appears by his having painted the principal altar-piece of the ancient hermitage of Notre Dame de Belen, now the Misericordia, in that year. This work represented various passages in the life of the Virgin, and was executed to the satisfaction of the brotherhood, but since the renovation of the hermitage, the pictures by Segarra have been removed, and kept in a chamber of the building, as specimens of the art in his time, their places being supplied with others by Fray Juncosa.]

SEGEERS, GERARD. This eminent painter was born at Antwerp in 1589. He was first a scholar of Henry van Balen, but afterwards entered the school of Abraham Janssens, and had made considerable progress in the art when he went to Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he attached himself particularly to the vigorous style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, and became a disciple of Bartolommeo Manfredi, who had studied under that master. To the striking opposition of light and shadow, and the broad relief of Caravaggio, he added a richness of colour, which is almost general in the painters of his country, and his pictures, though exhibiting a violence of contrast, which is not authorized by a legitimate observance of nature, eclipsed, in point of effect, every thing that was placed near them. He had acquired considerable celebrity by his productions of that description, when he was invited by Cardinal Zapara, the Spanish ambassador at Rome, to accompany him to the court of Madrid. He presented him to the king, who received him in the most favourable manner, and engaged him in his service, with a considerable pension. He painted several historical subjects, and musical conversations, which were greatly admired, and after passing some years at Madrid, the desire of revisiting his native country, where the reputation he had acquired, both in Italy and Spain, rendered his fellow-citizens impatient to possess his works, induced him to request permission to return to Flanders. On his arrival at Antwerp, he painted some pictures for the churches in imitation of the style of Caravaggio, which were not so favourably received by the public as he expected. The clear and splendid colouring of Rubens and Vandyck had at that time obtained possession of the public estimation, and he was under the necessity of adopting a system more tender and agreeable than that which he had hitherto followed as his model. The facility with which he effected this change in his manner, proves the flexibility of his powers, and some of his latter pictures may be ranked among the estimable productions of the Flemish school. It was at this period that he painted his celebrated picture of the Elevation of the Cross, for the church of the Jesuits at Antwerp; the Adoration of the Magi, for the cathedral, which is admirably engraved by Vorstermans; and Peter denying Christ, of which we have a fine print by Bolswert. His most esteemed production is his picture of the Marriage of the Virgin, the principal altar-piece in the church of the Carmelites at Antwerp.

The compositions of Gerard Segers are judiciously arranged, and his design is more correct than that of the generality of his countrymen. He was well acquainted with the principles of the chiaroscuro, though usually too abrupt in the opposition of his light and shadow, and his colouring is more vigorous than chaste. It is asserted by d'Argenville, and after him by Descamps, that Segers visited England; but this rests on no other authority, nor is he mentioned in the Anecdotes. Vandyck painted his portrait, at Antwerp, among the eminent artists of his country, which is engraved by Pontius. He died in 1651.

SEGERS, or SEGHERS, DANIEL, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1590. His taste leading him to design flowers and fruit, he became a disciple of John Breughel, who at that time painted those subjects, which he afterwards changed for landscapes. He had made considerable progress in that branch of the art, when he entered the society of the Jesuits, at the age of sixteen, and abandoned painting during his noviciate. When the term of his probation was expired, he obtained permission of his superiors to visit Rome, where his brother had at that time distinguished himself. During his residence in that city, he designed every curious plant, flower, or insect that he met with, and returned to Flanders with a rich assemblage of drawings of those objects. The ability he afterwards displayed, proved that a sojourn in the metropolis of art is beneficial to every painter, whatever may be the department to which he particularly devotes himself. Segers cultivated himself the flowers which served him for models, and he gave to his imitations the beauty, brilliancy, and variety with which nature had clothed the originals. He accompanied them with insects and butterflies, designed and finished with a verity and precision, which seemed to dispute with reality. His talents were not without advantage to the religious body into which he was incorporated. Many of the princes of Europe were desirous of possessing his works, to whom they were sent as presents, whilst his convent profited by the valuable testimonies of acknowledgment which were received in return. The Prince of Orange deputed Thomas Willeborts Boschaert, his principal painter, to visit Segers, and to endeavour to procure a picture by him, on which occasion he painted one of his most capital works, which was presented to that prince in the name of the society, who were munificently recompensed for the picture. He frequently painted garlands and borders of flowers, in which the interior space was enriched by historical subjects, which Rubens did not disdain occasionally to execute. He died at Antwerp in 1660.

SEGERS, HERCULES, a Dutch painter of landscapes and animals, who resided at the Hague about the year 1650. He was a contemporary of Paul Potter, whose style he imitated, and after the premature death of that celebrated artist, his pictures were held in considerable estimation. His landscapes exhibit very agreeable scenery, and his cattle are correctly drawn, and touched with spirit.

[Hercules Segers, Seghers, or Zeghers, was born, according to Balkema, in 1625, and died in 1679; others say he was born in 1629, and died in 1675. Whichever may be the correct dates, he was an artist of great ability, and it is surprising that his pictures are so rarely recognised. It is said that he imitated the style of Paul Potter; this is not correct; nature was the model both imitated. Zeghers was equal to his contemporary in the representation of cattle, though with less of laboured finish, and far superior to him as a painter of landscape. In the latter his scenery is extensive and varied, and the play of light and shadow, according to the divisions, is scientifically true. Like Jacob Ruissdael and Philip de Koningh, he made a flat country interesting by his artistic management. It may be suspected that Rembrandt was his director in the study of nature, so much is there of that master's skilful method in the colouring and chiaro-scuro of Zeghers. That he was a favourite with Rembrandt may be gathered from finding no less than six of his landscapes in the inventory of that master's effects, taken under a law process in 1656. It is said that he invented a method of engraving and printing landscapes in colours on cloth; and also that in 1660 he practised engraving in what is now called the aquatint manner; if so, it deprives Le Prince of the honour of being the inventor. In the British Museum there are nineteen prints from etchings by this artist, and six variations, or duplicates, making twenty-five in all. Most of these show expansive grandeur of landscape, both campaign and mountainous, with rocky precipices and trees that have sustained the shock of many a storm; others, merely a flat country stretching far into the horizon, like the bird's-eye views of Rembrandt, Ruissdael, and De Koningh. In the execution they are free to coarseness, and the appearance is altogether peculiar. One piece in particular seems to have been impressed by a wood block, or an iron plate; the objects are palpable, and a tinted wash has been passed over it. Perhaps this was an experiment of the process alluded to above, of printing pictures in colours on cloth, and such a procedure might also give rise to the supposition that he was the inventor of aquatint engraving. One of the etchings has been adopted by Anthony Waterloo, who has added some foliage to the trees in the composition; it appears among his works. It is apprehended that an impartial examination and comparison of some sketches attributed to Rembrandt with these etchings by Zeghers, would shake the faith of the possessors of the former, without detracting from the artistic value of the work. In the Bibliothéque at Paris there are three etchings by him, of which there are not impressions in the British Museum; they were purchased at the sale of W. Y. Ottley's collection in 1837.]

er, who resided at Madrid in the middle of the seventeenth century. He painted with facility, and in a graceful manner, and in the representation of his subjects left nothing to be desired but a little more correctness in the figures; all the rest exhibited talent and truth. His pictures were held in great estimation by the amateurs of Madrid.]

[SEGURA, ANTONIO DE, a painter and architect employed by Philip II. in 1580 to paint an altar-piece for the monastery of St. Yuste, and for that purpose to copy the celebrated picture of Titian known as the Apotheosis of Charles V., or the Glory of Titian. Though he was doubtless employed on many other works of a similar kind, this only is particularized. He died at Madrid in 1605, and Philip III. settled a pension on his widow.]

[SEILLER, JOHN GEORGE, of Schaffhausen, a mezzotinto engraver, lived at the end of the sixteenth and commencement of the seventeenth centuries. His principal plates are portraits, and are rather to be considered with regard to the time than the merit of their execution, with a few exceptions. Laborde has specified several, of which the following have his approbation :

The Emperor Joseph I. C'est un bon travail.

J. H. Heidegger. Assez belle planche.

A Monk attempting to kiss a Girl. Très bon travail.

The Empress Eleonora. Bonne execution.

The engraver Kilian. Belle planche.

His plates are inscribed J. G. Sciller, fecit, or J. Georg Sciller fecit et ex., and sometimes Joh. Georg Sciller scalfusianus fecit.

SEIS, P. P. A. ROBERT DE. We have by this artist a slight but masterly etching, executed in the style of Rembrandt, representing Lot and his Daughters. It is inscribed with his name, to which is added the word fecit, from which we may conclude that it is engraved from a design of his own. [This is the same as Paul Pontius Anthony Robert de Seri. See that article.]

SELMA, FERNANDO, a modern Spanish engraver, now resident at Madrid. He is said to have been a pupil of Emanuel Salvador Carmona, and has engraved some plates in the style of that artist, among which are the following :

La Madonna del Pesce ; after the picture by Raffaele, in the Escurial. Fernando Selma, sc. 1782.

The Virgin and Child ; after another picture by Raffaele.

[Fernando Selma was born at Valencia in 1750, and died in 1810. He is among the best of the Spanish engravers. His later manner resembles more that of Edelinck than of his master, Carmona. He engraved the portraits of Cortes and Solis, prefixed to the quarto edition of "Historia de la Conquista de Mexico," published at Madrid in 1783, and afterwards engraved the plates for the "Maritime Atlas of Spain," which occupied him several years. He also engraved a portrait of Charles V. after Titian, Magellan the navigator, and various others; but one of his best plates is the Spasimo of Raphael. He was a man of considerable acquirements, and cultivated the two opposites, mathematics and poetry, in addition to the arts.]

SEMENTI, or SEMENZA, GIACOMO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1580, and was a fellow-student with Francesco Gessi, first under Denys Calvart, and afterwards under Guido Reni. According to Malvasia, he was one of the most successful followers of the style of Guido, and painted several pictures, for the churches at Bologna, which have been sometimes mistaken for the works of that master. Such are his pictures of the Martyrdom of S. Cecilia, in the church of S. Elena; the Marriage of S. Catherine, in S. Francesco; and the Crucifixion, in S. Gregorio.

According to Baglione, he visited Rome in the pontificate of Urban VIII., and was favoured with the protection of Cardinal Prince Maurice, of Savoy, for whom he executed several considerable works. There are some fresco paintings by this master in S. Carlo a Catinari; and in S. Maria d'Araceli, in the Capella Cavalieri, is an altar-piece painted in oil, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, with S. Gregory and St. Francis. He died at Rome, in the prime of life.

SEMINI, ANTONIO. According to Soprani, this painter was born at Genoa about the year 1485, and was a disciple of Lodovico Brea. He afterwards studied the works of Pietro Perugino, and was a successful follower of his style. His picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Domenico, at Savona, has been compared to the best productions of that master, and even to some of the juvenile works of Raffaele. He was living in 1547.

SEMINI, ANDREA, was the elder son of the preceding artist, born at Genoa in 1510, and was first instructed in the art by his father. He afterwards studied under Perino del Vaga, who had taken refuge at Genoa in 1528, after the sacking of Rome. By the advice of his instructor he went to Rome, to contemplate the works of Raffaele and the beauties of antiquity. After a residence of eight years in that capital he returned to Genoa, where he was engaged in several works for the churches and public edifices, of which the most esteemed were a picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Francesco; and the Adoration of the Magi, in La Nunziata. In these, as well as his other productions, he is a faithful follower of the style of Raffaele, though not always sufficiently correct in his design. According to Baldinucci, he painted portraits with great success. He died in 1578.

SEMINI, OTTAVIO. This artist was the younger son of Antonio Semini, and was born at Genoa about the year 1515. He learned the rudiments of design from his father, and was, when very young, placed under the tuition of Perino del Vaga, with whom his elder brother was a student. Possessed of a more lively genius than Andrea, his progress was uncommon, and in a short time he was sufficiently advanced to accompany his brother to Rome, for the completion of his studies. The works of Raffaele were the particular objects of his admiration, and he copied with great attention the antique bas-reliefs of the Colonna Trajana. He returned with his brother to Genoa, and, in conjunction with him, executed several considerable works. He decorated the façade of the Palazzo Doria with statues and architecture, designed in the finest taste; and painted some frescoes in the interior, particularly the Rape of the Sabines, so much in the style of Raffaele, that Soprani reports that it was mistaken by Giulio Cesare Procaccini for a work of that master. He was invited to Milan, where he passed the latter part of his life, and executed some of his principal works. In the church of S. Angelo he decorated the chapel of S. Girolamo with several subjects, one of which is particularly admired, representing the obsequies of that Saint. He died at Milan in 1604.

circumstances relating to St. Sebastian, still preserved in the Chapter Library of Padua: "Nicoleto Semitecolo da Venexia impense, 1367." The work is an excellent specimen of the school and time; the naked parts are tolerably well drawn, and the proportions of the figures are bold and free, though somewhat extravagantly so. It bears no resemblance to the works of Giotto, being inferior in point of design, though equal to that master in regard to colouring.]

SEMPELIUS, D. G., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1580. He copied some of the prints by Albert Durer with great success. Among his best imitations is his copy of the Descent of Christ into Hell, from the set of plates of the Life of Christ, by that master. It bears the date of the original, 1512, as well as the year in which it was engraved, 1580.

SEMOLIE, L. See FRANCO.

[SENAVE, JACOB ALBERT, born at Loo in 1758, was a painter of familiar subjects. His works were formerly more appreciated by foreigners than by his own countrymen; but since his death they have discovered their merits. He was, however, a member of several academies and learned societies. He painted a picture representing the atelier, or work-room, of Rembrandt, in which he introduced the portraits of a great number of artists, contemporaries of that master. This he presented to the academy at Ypres, and was in return made an honorary director. In the church of St. Loo is a picture by him of the Seven Works of Mercy. His works are distinguished by purity of drawing, originality in the composition, and a perfect imitation of nature. He died at Paris in 1829.]

[SENEFELDER, ALOIS, the discoverer, or inventor, of the art of lithography, was born at Munich about 1771. His father was a performer at the royal theatre of that city. It would be beside the purpose of this work to give a history of the processes adopted and the difficulties encountered by the artist in bringing this mode of multiplying drawings to perfection. Like many other discoveries or inventions, it originated in necessity, and was promoted by accident. He was placed by his father in the university of Ingolstadt, for the purpose of studying jurisprudence, but his inclination led him rather to the stage and the study of the drama. In neither was he successful. By his first piece, Die Mädchenkennner, he cleared fifty florins; his second did not pay the expenses. By the death of his father his means became straitened, and he could not afford the cost of passing his compositions through the press; he therefore endeavoured to devise some other method of printing them himself. He tried various experiments in engraving and stereotyping, but failed through want of practical knowledge, and also from the expense of the copper-plates, which he ground and polished after using for one purpose, to make them available for another. To diminish both the difficulties and expense, he made use of a fine piece of Kelheim stone for the exercises of writing backwards, and tried to print from it, but without much success. As he was ignorant of the method used by engravers of covering their ground for etching, whereby they are enabled to correct mistakes and cure defects, he had invented a chemical ink for the purpose, consisting of wax, soap, and lamp-black. One day when he had prepared a stone for etching, his mother entered the room and requested him to write a bill for the washerwoman, who was waiting for the linen. He had not even a slip of paper for the purpose, having used all in taking proof impressions, and even his inkstand was dry. As the matter was urgent, he wrote the list on the prepared stone with the chemical ink, intending to copy it at leisure. Afterwards, when about to clean off the writing, it occurred to him that by the application of aquafortis and water he might etch the stone so as to leave the writing in sufficient relief for printing from. The experiment succeeded, and as soon as he had brought this new discovery into a practical form, he applied himself to the means of bringing it into operation. Of the use of the stone as a substitute for copper, Senefelder disclaims the priority; but his experiments upon it led to the discovery of chemical lithography, and his perseverance under numerous difficulties entitles him to the honour of an original inventor. Etching on stone had been previously practised, but abandoned for the greater facility of copper; it had, however, never arrived at the state of perfection to which it was brought by Senefelder, indeed it was a lost art. With regard to the art itself, Senefelder published an account of it in 1818, which was shortly after translated into French and English, so as to make it generally known throughout Europe. His own practice was confined to his native country, where he soon initiated a number of able scholars, and having obtained a tardy patronage, he was appointed to the office of inspector of the royal lithographic establishment, with a handsome salary, and with permission to exercise his private business also. Being at length arrived at a state of ease and competence, he devoted himself to the perfecting of the art, and lived to witness its acknowledged utility not only with regard to pictorial representations, but to the general business of mankind. Alois Senefelder died at Munich in 1834. For the history of his processes in the art, the inquirer is referred to the account published by himself in 1809; and for numerous particulars relating to Senefelder and his works, his coadjutors, pupils, and publications, to the very full details in Dr. Nagler's "Kunstler Lexicon."

SENEK, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1720. He engraved the plates for the London Almanacks, from the year 1717 to 1727, with the exception of that for the year 1723, which was executed by John Clarke.

[SEPP, JAN CHRISTIAN, born at Amsterdam in 1739, was a painter of insects, which he represented with the greatest accuracy. He published some works on Entomology, in which he was assisted by his son. The principal is, "The Natural History of the Insects of Holland;" it occupies five or six volumes quarto, and is illustrated with upwards of two hundred and fifty finely coloured plates. Sepp was a member of the society Felix Meritis at Amsterdam, where he died in 1811.]

[SEPPEZZINO, FRANCESCO, a Genoese historical painter, of whom little is known except that he was born in 1530, and studied under Luca Cambiasi and Gianbattista Castilli. As an artist he was respectable, but there is no record of any public work by which an opinion may be formed of his abilities. He died in 1579.]

SEPTIMUS, HERCULES. See SETTI.

[SEPULVEDA, MATEO NUÑEZ DE, a Spanish painter, who flourished in the middle of the seventeenth century. In 1640 Philip IV. appointed him painter and gilder of the royal navy of Spain, and of the galleons and other vessels trading to the Indies, in consideration of his talent as an artist, and for his contribution of 500 ducats towards the expenses of the war in which his Majesty was engaged. His patent, among other privileges, gave him the sole right of painting all and singular the banners and standards, and other works required in the navy. He was to be paid for the same according to the estimate of two competent judges, the one on the part of the king, the other on the part of the painter, and in case of disagreement an umpire was to decide. He commenced this employment at Cadiz in 1641, and painted two flags for the navy; the one having the figure of Spain's tutelary Saint, Jago, and the other the Conception of the Virgin; for these he received the sum of 1350 reals. They were painted, as was then the practice, on serge; were well drawn and coloured, and exhibited considerable freedom and intelligence in the art. This is the extent of Bermudez's account of Sepulveda; others have spoken of him as a good painter in fresco, but have not referred to any particular work.]

[SEQUEIRA, DOMINGOS ANTONIO DE, a Portuguese historical painter and designer, was born, according to Count Raczinski, about 1760, but Nagler says in 1768. His works are numerous at Lisbon, and embrace a great variety of subjects. It appears that he gave early proofs of artistic talent, and was sent in 1788, under the patronage of the Marquis Marialva, to Rome to complete his studies. He became a scholar of Antonio Cavallucci, and arrived at considerable distinction. After remaining some time in Italy he returned to Portugal, and was employed in the churches and palaces, and his smaller works were in great request by amateurs. Sequeira had great facility in designing, and used various methods to give effect to his drawings. Sometimes he used the pen and Indian ink, sometimes crayons, at others he would produce his effects by twisted paper, the end of which he burnt in a candle. He succeeded better in his oil pictures when he painted figures of a small size, than in those of larger dimensions. Some of his subjects are from profane history, some relating to the family of his patron, Marialva, but the greater part are of a religious cast, in which St. Anthony of Padua comes in for a considerable share. One of these represents that Saint borne up by angels, and is spoken of in terms of high commendation. In 1823 he went to Paris to exhibit his picture of the Last Moments of the Poet Camoens, which elicited the applause of Gerard, Vernet, and other French painters; after which he went to Rome, and continued to paint with all the vigour of his youth. He became exceedingly devout, and his subjects partook of his deep devotional feelings; one, a Descent from the Cross, has been engraved, and is considered to be a work of great merit. The versatility of his talent has been the cause of some embarrassment in judging of the authenticity of several pictures attributed to him.]

SEQUENOT, L. This artist was probably a native of France, and flourished about the year 1671. He engraved some frontispieces and other book-plates, which are executed in a poor style.

[SERAFIN, PEDRO, surnamed el Griego, a Spanish painter who resided at Barcelona. In conjunction with Pedro Pablo, another painter of that city, he painted the doors of the organ of the cathedral of Tarragona. The composition on the outside represented the Annunciation; those within were the Nativity and the Resurrection. In addition, on a covering for one side of the organ, they painted figures of Faith, Hope, and Charity; and for the other, S.S. Thecla and Catharine. For this work, which gave great satisfaction to the Chapter, the artists were paid three hundred pounds, Catalonian money; one hundred of which they received during the operation, and the remainder at the completion. There is nothing further recorded respecting Pedro Serafin.]

SERAFINI, SERAFINO DE'. This ancient painter is mentioned by Vedriani, who describes a picture, painted by him, in the cathedral at Modena, which is inscribed with his name, and dated 1385. It represents the crowning of the Virgin, and is painted in the style of Giotto.

[Although there is but little recorded of this artist, he was probably of some importance in his time, if we may conclude from the following inscription in a chapel, not named, painted by him:

Mille trecento con septanta sei
Erano corso gli anni del Signore
E'l quarto entrava quando a so honore
Questa Capella al nobel fin minei.
Et io, che tutta in si la storiei
Fui Serafin da Mutina Pittore.

As some writers have called this artist Sebastiano, it may be as well to quote the inscription on the picture alluded to above: Serafinus de Serafinis Pinxit 1385, die Jovis 23 Martii.]

SERENARI, GASPERO, was a native of Palermo, and flourished about the year 1750. At an early period of his life he went to Rome, where he frequented the school of Sebastiano Conca. On his return to Sicily he distinguished himself as a painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. His principal works at Palermo are the cupola of the church del Gesù, and an altar-piece in the church of the monastery of La Carità.

[SERI, ROBERT DE. See SEIS, P. P. A., ROBERT DE.]

SERICUS, SOYE, or SYTIUS, PHILIP. According to Huber, this artist was a native of Flanders. He was a contemporary and disciple of Cornelius Cort, and resided at Rome about the year 1568. Mr. Strutt has noticed this artist under three different names, Philip Sericuss, Philip Soius, and Philip Syticus, though it is evidently the same engraver. He engraved a set of twenty-eight portraits of the Popes, published at Rome in 1568. We have also the following prints by him:

The Angel appearing to Joseph in his dream; C. Cort, inv. Ph. Soye, fec.

St. Francis receiving the Stigmata; F. Zuccaro, pinx. Soye, fec.

The Virgin with the infant Christ sleeping; after M. Angelo Buonaroti, Philippus Sericuss. 1568.

The Crucifixion; after the same.

[It seems to be agreed that the names Sericus, Sericuss, Syticus, Sytius, and Soye, all refer to one artist. On the print of the Virgin with the Infant sleeping, after Michael Angelo, the name is written Sericuss; on the Crucifixion, after the same, it is Syticus; on an oval portrait of Pope Pius V., the signature is Sericus fecit; others are signed Soye; all evidently the work of the same hand. Other marks have been attributed to this master; as P. S. interlaced, and P. S. in a circle, with the dates 1535 and 1538, but it seems without sufficient foundation. Zani calls him "the Master of the two Cocks fighting;" (Il Maestro ai due Galli in atto di combattere insieme,) but that mark is generally attributed to Cornelius Cort and to Jerome Cock; Zani, however, does not apply the appellation to Soye inadvertently, as he was quite aware of that circumstance, but denies that they used the mark. Soye was probably of French origin. The following prints, in addition to those above named, are ascertained to be by this master :

Adam and Eve in Paradise; after P. del Vaga, P. Sericus fecit.

Judith with the head of Holofernes; after Giulio Clovio, Phil. de Soye f.

Adoration of the Shepherds; after F. Zuccaro, Ph. Sericus fecit.

The Angel appearing to Joseph; after the same.

A Pietà; after Michael Angelo.

St. Jerome in a Landscape; after H. Muziano.

There are others which strongly resemble his manner, but with less certainty, having only the publisher's address.]

[SERIN, JAN, a painter of historical subjects and portraits, was born at Ghent in 1678. Balkema has confounded him with his father, N. Serin, an historical painter of the same place, as he says that Jan Serin was a pupil of Erasmus Quellinus, who, according to his own account, died in the same year that the younger Serin was born. The elder Serin may have been the scholar of Erasmus Quellinus, and the younger, a scholar of Jan Erasmus, his son. A picture in the church of St. Martin at Tournay, St. Martin dividing his Cloak with a Beggar, and several altar-pieces in the churches at Ghent, are attributed to Jan Serin by Balkema, but by others, with equal probability, to his father. The younger Serin was more celebrated as a portrait painter, which profession he exercised at the Hague. In 1748, when he had reached his seventieth year, he painted the portrait of the Marquis de Fenelon, ambassador at the Hague, and that of the Marchioness. There is no reported account of the precise year of his death, or that of his father.]

SERMONETA, GIROLAMO SCIOLANTE, called DA. This painter was born at Sermoneta in 1504, and is generally called Girolamo da Sermoneta. He was one of the ablest disciples of Perino del Vaga, whom he assisted in his works in the Castel S. Angelo. He was employed by Gregory XIII. in the decorations of the Sala Regia in the Vatican, where he painted in fresco the history of Pepin, king of France, after making prisoner Astolfo, king of the Longobardi, giving Ravenna to the church. In his oil pictures he is compared by Lanzi to the disciples of Raffaele, for the resemblance of his style to the illustrious head of the Roman school. Such are his pictures of the Martyrdom of S. Lucia, in S. Maria Maggiore; the Transfiguration, in S. Maria d'Ara-celi; and the Nativity, in La Pace. His most celebrated work is in the church of S. Bartholomew, at Ancona, representing the Virgin seated on a throne, with a choir of beautiful angels, with S. Bartholomew, St. Paul, and other saints, which is one of the finest works of art in that city. There are few of his works in private collections, except portraits, which he painted in an admirable style. He died in 1550. [There is probably an error in the date of the birth of Sciolante, as he was a disciple of P. del Vaga; and certainly in the date of his death, as he was employed by Gregory XIII., who ascended the papal chair in 1572. The best authorities place Sciolante's death in 1580.]

[SERRA, MIGUEL, was born in Catalonia about the year 1653. At the age of eight years he absconded from his mother's house, on account probably of her ill usage, and her having married a third time. He managed to get to Marseilles, where he obtained some instruction from an indifferent painter, and afterwards went to Rome, and remained there for some time, studying with great application the works of the best masters. At the age of seventeen he returned to Marseilles, and painted for the church of the Dominicans in that city an altar-piece, representing St. Peter Martyr, which at once established his reputation. He was soon fully employed in painting for the churches and for private cabinets, thereby adding riches to his fame. He forwarded a picture to Paris, as a specimen of his talent, for which he was elected a member of the academy, and appointed painter to the king. Having arrived at great honour and riches, he devoted his wealth to the succour of the poorer citizens of Marseilles during the plague of 1721, and in consequence became a ruined man. However, when the plague ceased, he returned with renewed ardour to his profession, and adopted for his subjects scenes which he had witnessed in that horrible time of public calamity. He painted pictures for the convents of St. Claire de Marseilles, for the Madelaine of the same city, and for the Carmelites of Aix en Provence. His easel pictures were also in great request, and, as he painted with great rapidity, are numerous. As a proof of the facility with which he exercised the brush it is related, that being solicited to paint an altar-piece for a church in his neighbourhood, he invited the parties who made the request to stay and dine with him, and leaving them to enjoy a walk in his garden, he went and executed the work before the meal was served. He died at Marseilles in 1728.]

SERRES, DOMINIC. This artist was a native of Auch in Gascony. He came to England about the year 1765, and acquired considerable reputation as a painter of sea-pieces and landscapes. When the Royal Academy was instituted, he was chosen one of the members, and some years afterwards was appointed marine painter to the king. In 1792 he was appointed librarian to the Royal Academy on the resignation of Mr. Wilton, who was appointed keeper. One of his most considerable productions was a view of Lord Howe's Engagement with the combined Fleets of France and Spain, off Gibraltar, in 1782. Mr. Serres died in 1793. [Dominic Serres was a large contributor to the exhibitions at the Royal Academy for several years after its institution. During the first ten years he exhibited about forty pictures, all of them of English naval actions. As artistic works they are of very little value, but are still looked at with respect for the gallant deeds of which they are mementos. Many of his pictures were engraved by Canot, Mason, Fittler, Vivares, and others, and were popular in their day.]

[SERVANDONI, GIOVANNI GERONIMO, a very eminent painter of theatrical scenery and architectural decorations, was born at Florence in 1695, and received his instruction in the art from Paolo Panini. He adhered closely to his master's manner, but the subjects he painted in theatres and other public buildings, as well as in mansions of the nobility, permitted a much greater display of poetic imagery, for which he was well qualified by nature and education. His reputation spread throughout Europe, and the principal theatres of Italy, France, Portugal, and other kingdoms, received their embellishments from his hand. In Paris he was received with enthusiasm, and so much satisfaction did he give to the king and nobility, that he was not only richly rewarded, but received the honour of knighthood; hence he is called Il Cavaliere Servandoni. Excellent, however, as decorative works may be that are intended to please the reigning taste of a nation, and administer to the gratification of the frivolous votaries of fashion, they only charm for a season, and with a change of taste they are expunged to make room for some newer fancy. It would, therefore, be difficult perhaps to discover now any public decorative work of Servandoni by which to judge of that talent that so much delighted his contemporaries. In the Louvre there is a picture of ancient ruins by him, painted in the manner of P. Panini. He died at Paris in 1766.]

SERWOUTER, PETER, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1574. We have by him several plates, executed with the graver, in a neat, clear style, though without much taste. He was a contemporary with John Londerseel, and his style bears some resemblance to the works of that artist. Among other prints by him are the following :

A set of twelve Huntings; after D. Vinckenbooms.

The Fall of our first Parents; after the same.

A Dutch Merrymaking; after the same.

Samson killing the Lion; after the same.

David killing the Bear; after the same.

He marked his plates with a cipher composed of a P. and an S. with a W. thus, PS. W.

[Peter van Serwouter has had the misfortune to be called by various improper names, such as Perjecouter, Persecouter, Persecuteur, Sevouter, Servatius Raeven, and others equally puzzling. In the article Perjecouter, the prints marked with the monogram P S interlaced, (Bartsch, No. 34.) and with the dates 1535 and 1538, (Bartsch, P. G. vol. xv. p. 496.) are attributed by Strutt and others to an engraver of that supposed name. The same monogram is applied by them to Peter Serwouter. But the engraver to whom that monogram properly belongs was an Italian, judging from his style, and flourished forty years before Peter van Serwouter was born. Nagler does not mention the P S monogram, nor the W, as being marks on Serwouter's prints; his name, P. Serwouter, is on several plain enough, and one has P V S in a monogram. The dates are from 1608 to 1628; the last is the date of "Thibault's Academie de l'Epée," for which Serwouter engraved several of the plates, published at Brussels in that year.]

SESSONE, FRANCESCO. This artist engraved several of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples.

SESTO, CESARE, sometimes called CESARE MILANESE. This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1500. He is generally regarded as a disciple of Lionardo da Vinci, and is considered by Lanzi as one of the closest imitators of his style. In the Ambrosiana at Milan, is a head of an old man by this painter, so much in the style of Lionardo, that it is frequently mistaken for a work of that master. On some occasions he appears to have imitated the style of Raffaele, with whom he was acquainted at Rome. In a picture he painted representing Herodias, he appears to have taken the head from the Fornarina of Raffaele; and a Holy Family, in the possession of Cavaliere Girolamo Melzi, is evidently composed and painted in imitation of the manner of that great master. He died at Milan in 1524.

[It is matter of regret that there are not more authentic particulars recorded of Cesare da Sesto. An artist who could approach so closely to the manner of Lionardo da Vinci and of Raphael, as he did on several occasions, was more deserving of attention than many contemporary painters on whom writers of the period have dissertated at considerable length.

His name does not appear among those of the disciples of Lionardo da Vinci, though he is generally considered to have been one; neither can it be said that he studied in the school of Raphael, if it be true that the latter affably expostulated with him, saying, "It seems to me strange, Cesare, that being bound in such strict ties of friendship as we two are, we do not in the least respect each other with our pencils," as if they had been rivals on a sort of equality. He was intimate too with Baldassare Peruzzi, and they worked together in the castle of Ostia. Lomazzo held him up as a model in design, in attitude, and particularly for the skilful manner in which he disposed his lights. In his celebrated altar-piece for St. Rocco he showed that he did respect Raphael with his pencil, and used the privilege of a friend by borrowing part of the composition from a picture by him at Foligno. From the Dispute of the Sacrament he likewise borrowed the figures of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist. These decorate the upper part of the picture; the lower part is occupied by SS. Cristoforo and Sebastiano, the latter being remarkable for new and beautiful foreshortening. They bear such a resemblance to the manner of Correggio that they might be easily ascribed to him, but for the name; such is the softness, union, and brightness of the carnations, and such the beauty of colouring and harmony of the whole painting. This picture used to be closed with two doors, on which were painted the two princes of the apostles, with St. Martin and St. George on horseback; all of which displayed the same maxims, though not equal diligence in the art. At the church of Saronò, situated between Pavia and Milan, are seen four figures of saints on four narrow pilasters; the two equestrians above named, and Saints Sebastian and Rocco, to whom especially invocations are made against the plague. These are inscribed Cesar Magnus, f. 1533, and are generally assigned to Cesare da Sesto; from which many are inclined to infer that he belonged to the family of the Magni; but this is doubted by others. Lanzi found such a conformity of ideas in these frescoes and the altar-piece, that he is inclined to believe they are by the same painter, and he is not satisfied with the document which states, that Cesare da Sesto died in 1524; nor is Zani, who neither gives the date of his birth nor death, but merely says he operated in 1524. The landscape parts of Cesare's pictures were painted, generally, by his friend Bernazzano, who was very eminent in that department; and Cesare in return enlivened Bernazzano's landscapes with figures, but sometimes with such licence, that what should have been auxiliary became principal. Cesare da Sesto has lost much of his due reputation by being such an excellent adopter of the manners of others; but it is a compliment to his great skill to have his easel pictures attributed to Lionardo and Raphael. In the Ambrosian library at Milan is a youthful head of Christ, in the style of the former; in the Manfrini gallery at Venice, two Madonnas, in the styles of both; and in the Museo Borbonico, at Naples, an Adoration of the Kings, the Madonna and Child being in the manner of Lionardo, and the other figures in that of Raphael.]

SESTRI. See TRAVI.

SETLEZKY, BALTHAZAR SIGISMUND, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He engraved some portraits and historical prints, as well as ornamental subjects, which are etched and finished with the graver in a stiff, formal style.

[Setleky was of Polish origin, but born at Angsbourg in 1695, and died in 1770. He engraved after Watteau, J. M. Roos, and H. Roos.]

SETTI, ERCOLE, or SEPTIMUS, HERCULES, an Italian painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1560. He was a native of Modena, and, according to Lanzi, painted some altar-pieces for the churches in that city, which he sometimes inscribed Ercole de Setti, and sometimes in Latin, Hercules Septimus. He etched several historical subjects, and some architectural ornaments, which he usually marked with the initials H. S., with the date. [He operated as late as 1593; there are only two etchings by him mentioned; one is after Guido, and the other a terminal figure.]

[SEVE, GILBERT DE, was born at Paris in 1615. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he painted portraits, history, and allegory, with considerable ability. Several of his works were placed in the public galleries at Versailles and Fontainebleau; and portraits by him of distinguished persons were engraved by Edelinck, Van Schuppen, Masson, and other eminent French engravers. He died at Paris in 1698.]

[SEVE, PIERRE DE, brother of the preceding, was born at Moulins in 1623. He received instructions in the art from his brother Gilbert, and painted similar subjects. Edelinck engraved a Holy Family by him, and others were engraved by Simoneau, Landry, Gantrel, and Dolival. He died in 1695.]

[SEVILLA ROMERO Y ESCALANTE, JUAN DE, was born at Granada in 1627. He was first placed with Andres Alonso Argüelles, an indifferent painter, who taught him the elements of the art; but he afterwards became a disciple of Pedro de Moya. From him it is probable that he imbibed the desire to imitate the style of Van Dyck, in which he succeeded. He also copied drawings by Rubens with great assiduity, and, aided by the counsels of Moya, he became an artist of considerable ability, equal to most of his competitors in Granada, and generally preferred in any public work, although among his rivals was the presumptuous but clever Atanasio Bocanegra. He painted several pictures for the churches of the Carmelite and Augustine friars, and a large one of the Last Supper for the refectory of the Jesuits, and others for the monastery of St. Jerome. He died at Granada in 1695, and was buried in the parish church of St. Miguel. The severity of his character, and his excessive jealousy of his wife, prevented him from receiving any pupils, so he left no successor to continue that style of art which he had so auspiciously introduced, particularly as regarded rich and forcible colouring in imitation of the great Flemish masters.]

SEVIN, PETER, an obscure artist, who engraved some book-plates in a very indifferent style. Among others is the frontispiece to Tachard's French and Latin Dictionary, from his own design. He lived about the year 1689. [Peter Paul Sevin was a designer and painter; he lived at Lyons, and was probably employed in designing for the booksellers. Some of his works were engraved by Cossin, Gantrel, and Le Moine; the last engraved his portrait of Madame La Vallière, and that lady did not sit to very inferior artists.]

SEUPEL, J. A. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as an engraver of portraits, which he frequently drew from the life. They are executed in a neat, though formal style, with the graver. Among others, is that of John Schilter. [He was born at Strasbourg in 1660, and died there in 1714. He engraved several plates with the burin so as to produce an effect similar to mezzotint; this perhaps induced him to attempt that manner also, of which he has left a specimen in a View of Strasbourg by Night, which is well executed.]

SEUTER, JOHN GOTTFRIED, a German engraver, born at Angsbourg in 1718. He learned the rudiments of design from J. E. Ridinger, and was instructed in engraving at Nuremberg by G. M. Preisler. He afterwards went to Italy, and was employed at Florence in engraving part of the plates from the pictures in the collection of the Marquis Gerini. We have also the following prints by him:

Abraham sending away Hagar; after A. Celesti.
The Holy Family; after A. del Sarto.
Christ with Martha and Mary; after L. da Vinci.
The Adulteress before Christ; after G. C. Procaccini.
The Marriage at Cana; after P. Veronese; in two sheets.
The Holy Family reposing in Egypt; after F. Albano.

[Gottfried Seuter, or Saiter, was a very industrious artist, and as he lived to a great age, dying in 1800, his works are rather numerous, particularly after the greatest of the Italian masters. He engraved part of the Florence Gallery, and also several in that of Sans Souci; he signed his name G. G. Saiter to his copies of Agostino Caracci's lascivious prints, published at Venice. For a detailed account of his works, which is too long to insert in this work, see Nagler.]

[SEYDELMANN, JACOB CRESCENTIUS, celebrated throughout Europe for his admirable drawings in sepia, was born at Dresden in 1750. He received his first instruction in art from Bernardo Bellotti, the nephew of Antonio Canaletto, who resided for some time in Dresden; and was further improved by Casanova, who found him one of his most industrious scholars. Subsequently he went to Rome under the patronage of the elector, and formed a friendship with Raphael Mengs, who directed his attention to the treasures of art in that city, of which he made many drawings, both from the antique and the paintings of the renowned Italian masters. These he finished in sepia in a manner entirely his own, and they were so much admired for their novelty and the beauty of the execution, that they sold readily at high prices. Many were purchased by English visitors, some by Baron von Riesch, and other noblemen of his country. He also drew the portraits of several persons of distinction, and on his return to his native country he was received with honour, and appointed professor of drawing at the Academy of Dresden. The Academy at Berlin sent him a diploma, and he was elected a member of several foreign Academies. In 1788 he commenced copying the principal pictures in the Dresden Gallery for the duke of Gotha, among which were the Notte by Correggio, and the Madonna di San Sisto by Raphael; and Titian's celebrated Venus for the Winkler cabinet. Notwithstanding these distinctions and encouragements, his love for Italy induced him to visit it again to make copies of several celebrated pictures at Rome and Naples, particularly of some by Raphael, which he executed of the same dimensions as the originals. In 1792 he returned to Dresden, and was employed by the Countess Radczivil to copy some of the finest pictures in the gallery to embellish the chapel of her country-seat. Two years afterwards he made another trip to Rome, and executed two large drawings after Raphael, and after an absence of eight months returned to superintend the continuation of the Dresden Gallery, for which he made many drawings for the engravers. This work, however, did not occupy the whole of his time; he found leisure for other undertakings. In 1804, for the fifth time, he went to Rome to execute a commission for the Count Marcolini. On his return he was commissioned by Alexander, emperor of Russia, to make copies of the Madonna di San Sisto, by Raphael; the Notte, and St. George, by Correggio; and several others, of the same size as the originals, for which he was most munificently paid by the emperor. For the Raphael copy he received one thousand ducats. He afterwards was invited to St. Petersburg to retouch the pictures which had been slightly injured in their transit, and was commissioned by the emperor to make two other drawings of a large size from the Magdalene by Correggio, and the Venus by Guido, in the Dresden Gallery. Besides the copies enumerated, after the highest order of masters, he made many after others of an inferior grade; particularly of Chevalier Vanderwerff, in which he imitated the polished manner of that painter to perfection. Seydelmann was the inventor of this delicate style of painting in sepia, and stands hitherto unrivalled in it. E. G. Krüger engraved an allegory representing the Genius of Truth, which Seydelmann designed for the Freemasons' Lodge at Dresden, and twelve other plates of antique heads; and there are several portraits engraved after him by other masters. There is an etching by Seydelmann, after J. F. Bloemen, of a figure bathing in a cavern. His high reputation continued till the time of his death, which occurred at Dresden in 1829, and his works are likely to be long admired by the lovers of the elaborate and delicate in art.]

[SEYDELMANN, APOLLONIA, of the family de Forgue, wife of J. C. Seydelmann, was born at Venice in 1767. It is probable that she was instructed by her husband, as she practised the same style of art, and obtained a great reputation for her small copies in sepia of the works of Raphael, Correggio, Guido, Cantarini, Cignani, Domenichino, Carlo Dolci, and others. She also excelled in miniature painting. In 1789 she accompanied her husband to Italy, as electoral pensioner, and assisted in forwarding his larger pieces, a practice which she continued with so much ability that no difference is discernible. A copy of Raphael's Fornarini, in the Borghese palace at Rome, was entirely executed by herself in 1823, and some smaller pieces are marked with her name only. For her merits she was admitted a member of the Academy at Dresden.]

SEYMOUR, JAMES. This artist was born in London in 1702. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he was thought superior to Wootton in the design of a horse. He was the only son of a banker, and a great lover of the art, who drew well himself, and lived in habits of intimacy with Sir Peter Lely and the artists of his time. The noble author of the Anecdotes relates the following circumstance of this painter. Charles, the old haughty Duke of Somerset, sent for Seymour to Petworth, to paint a room with portraits of his running horses, and one day at dinner drank to him with a sneer, "Cousin Seymour, your health." The painter replied, "My Lord, I really believe that I have the honour of being of your Grace's family." The Duke, offended, rose from table, and sent his steward to pay Seymour and dismiss him. Another painter of horses was sent for, who, finding himself unworthy to finish Seymour's work, honestly told the Duke so, and humbly recommended to him to recall Seymour. The haughty peer did condescend to summon his cousin once more. Seymour answered the mandate in these words, "My Lord, I will now prove I am of your Grace's family, for I won't come." He died in 1752.

SEZENIUS, VALENTINE, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. He engraved some plates of ornaments, and grotesque subjects, which he usually marked with the initials V. S.

[SHARP, WILLIAM, one of the most celebrated English line engravers, was born in 1749, at London. His father was a gunmaker. He was apprenticed to a bright engraver of the name of Barak Longmate, who was also well skilled in heraldry. At the expiration of his term of apprenticeship he commenced business as a writing engraver; his first essays when an apprentice having been on publicans' pewter pots. His flatterers wished to qualify this assertion by substituting silver tankards, but Sharp insisted on the veracity of this humble commencement. There was no degradation in such employment, as it is the initiatory operation of all apprentices of bright engravers; Hogarth had done the same. One of his first attempts in a superior branch of the art, was to make a drawing of the old lion Hector, who had been an inmate of the Tower of London for thirty years, engrave it on a small quarto plate, and expose the prints for sale in his window. The knowledge of his merit as an engraver was, however, more diffused by his engraving, after Stothard's designs, several of the plates for the "Novelist's Magazine," published by Harrison, a work on which Heath, Angus, Collyer, and other eminent artists, were also employed. He was soon distinguished among his contemporaries, and employed on works of art of the highest order, and proved himself the worthy successor of Woollet, but did not, like him, extend his practice to landscape, except when it happened to be an accessory to the subject. As proofs of his extraordinary ability, it is only necessary to adduce his prints of the "Doctors of the Church," after Guido, in which he has blended the freedom of Giacomo Frey with the careful practice of Raphael Morgho; the portrait of "John Hunter," after Sir Joshua Reynolds, wherein there is a just discrimination shown in the quality and texture of the several objects; and "Lear in the Storm," after Benjamin West, which has all the fire and energy that the subject demanded, marked by the strength and application of the lines. His style is always masterly, not servilely borrowed from any of his predecessors or contemporaries, but formed from a judicious selection of the merits of all who excelled. These he combined and blended in a manner peculiarly his own, showing more of the artist and less of the mechanic than any other engraver of his time. As this work has only to notice William Sharp as an artist, many amusing and characteristic anecdotes of his private life, which may be found in other publications, must be omitted. One or two, however, which relate to the arts, should not be excluded. Sharp was employed, by Macklin the publisher, to engrave the picture of the "Holy Family," by Sir Joshua Reynolds, (now in the National Gallery,) and produced a plate which, for all the higher qualities of the art, was considered by competent judges to be inimitable. About one hundred proofs were taken from it, and a few impressions, when Bartolozzi (it is written with regret) undertook, at the solicitation of Macklin, to improve it, by nearly obliterating the lines, and converting it into a dotted engraving! Sharp, notwithstanding the honour he conferred on the arts of the country, had not the honour of being admitted a member of the Royal Academy. It is said that it was his own fault; in other words, he was blamed for not being a sycophant, and abandoning the cause of Woollett, Strange, Hall, and other eminent engravers, who had not been deemed worthy of that distinction. It is related as a fact, that Sharp solicited Sir Joshua Reynolds to be allowed to engrave his picture of the "Infant Hercules;" that the proposal was favourably entertained by the president, who, in the course of the conversation, offered to nominate him as an associate engraver of the Royal Academy. But Sharp, full of the honour of his own profession, rejected the offer, warmly espousing the cause of those other distinguished engravers, who considered themselves and their art slighted in not being allowed to become Royal Academicians. This independent and generous conduct on the part of Sharp offended the dignity of the president; he was afterwards received coldly, and informed that the picture was engaged by Mr. Boydell. His engraving of the portrait of the celebrated Kosciusko, after West, relieved him from an unpleasant and, at that time, dangerous predicament. He was suspected of entertaining revolutionary principles, and was examined before the privy council. At one of these meetings, after being long annoyed by questions which he considered irrelevant, he deliberately pulled out of his pocket a prospectus for subscribing to the portrait, handed it to Pitt and Dundas, requesting them to have the goodness to put their names to it as subscribers, and then to give it to the other members of the council to add theirs. The singularity of the proposal, at such a time, set them laughing, and he was soon after liberated. Sharp was by no means qualified to be a conspirator; he was fond of good cheer, grew corpulent from indulging in it, and had the gout. Though an Epicurean in his living, he had implicit faith in mystical doctrines; he believed in the divine mission of the madman Richard Brothers, in the immaculate conception of Johanna Southcote, and in the reveries of Emmanuel Swedenborg. J. T. Smith, in his Life of Nollekens, mentions a ludicrous mistake which occurred in the inscription placed by Sharp under the portrait of Richard Brothers. Sharp had written below, as now appears, "Fully believing this to be the man appointed by God, I engrave his likeness. W. Sharp." The writing engraver, Smith says, put the comma after the word "appointed," and omitted it in the subsequent part of the sentence. The mistake was not discovered till several impressions had been taken, when it was rectified; but the unrectified impressions are in the greater request. Whether this be true, or only a hoax by Smith to put curious collectors on a false scent, the editor has not been able to ascertain; there is no such impression in the British Museum. The Imperial Academy of Vienna, and the Royal Academy of Munich, deemed him worthy of being ranked among their honorary members, and he was elected by both. He died at Chiswick in 1824, and was buried in the same churchyard as Hogarth, and where also repose the remains of De Loutherbourg. The following list embraces his principal plates:

The Doctors of the Church; after Guido.

Ece Homo; after the same.

Portrait of John Hunter, two plates, one large and one small; after Sir Joshua Reynolds.

The Holy Family, two plates, one large and one small; after the same.

The Witch of Endor; after B. West.

Alfred dividing his Loaf with a Beggar; after the same.

Lear in the Storm; after the same.

The Children in the Wood; after Benwell.

St. Cecilia; after Domenichino.

The Siege of, and Sortie from, Gibraltar; after Trumbull.

Some plates in Cook's Voyages; after Webber.

Portrait of Thomas Paine; after Romney.

The Portrait of Mr. Boulton.

Sir Francis Burdett; after Northcote.

Sir William Curtis; after Lawrence.

Charles I., three faces; after Van Dyck.

The Earl of Arran; after the same.

Boadicea haranguing the Britons; after Stothard.

The three Marys and dead Christ; after An. Caracci, from the picture at Castle Howard, but left unfinished.

SHAW, JAMES. This artist was a native of Wolverhampton, and was placed as a pupil with Mr. Penny. He painted portraits with some reputation, and towards the latter part of his life resided in Charlotte Street, Rathbone Place, where he died, about the year 1784.

[SHAW, JOSHUA, a self-taught artist, was born at Bellingborough in Lincolnshire, in 1776. He was left an orphan at an early age, and his childhood was passed in laborious employment. By some means he got apprenticed to a country sign painter, and when his time expired he set up for himself in the same line at Manchester, and married. He now endeavoured to improve himself in other branches of the art, and tried his hand on easel pictures in flower-pieces, still-life, and landscape, chiefly in copying works of the old masters. He came to London and exhibited some of his works, and attracted the attention of the dealers, who found him employment in copying landscapes and cattle by Berchem, Gainsborough, and others in demand, which he executed much to their satisfaction and his own. He essayed original compositions, but was not equally successful. The trade liked his copies better, especially as their customers preferred works by the older masters to those of an unknown painter. The names of Berchem, Both, and Cuypp sounded better than Shaw, and the pictures were really good enough for those who see by their ears. Having for awhile gratified the public taste, he took his departure for America, and, it seems, practised his profession there for some time with success, and probably was at liberty to paint originals, as our cousins were not sufficiently sophisticated five and thirty years ago, to judge of a picture's merit by the artist's name. Shaw had a turn for mechanics, and made some improvement in gun-locks in America; and it is said that he received a premium from the emperor of Russia for giving him lessons in naval warfare; how he managed it is not told. Whether he be still living is uncertain, but he deserves a record for his abilities, and perseverance in great difficulties, and considering that his knowledge was self-acquired.]

SHEPHERD, ROBERT. This artist was a native of England, and flourished about the year 1660. He engraved a few portraits, which are very indifferently executed. He copied on a smaller scale the battles of Alexander, from the prints which Gerard Audran engraved, after Le Brun, but they do him little credit.

SHERLOCK, ———, was a native of England, and flourished about the year 1760. We have some portraits by him; among which is that of N. J. Bapt. Cirri. He also engraved several landscapes, after Pillement, and other masters.

SHERWIN, JOHN KEYSE, an eminent English engraver, who flourished from about the year 1775 till 1795. On the death of Mr. Woollett he was appointed engraver to the king. The following are his most esteemed plates :

PORTRAITS.

William Pitt, Earl of Chatham.
George Nugent Grenville Temple, Marquis of Buckingham; after Gainsborough.
Dr. Louth, Bishop of London; after Pine.
Captain James Cook; after Dance.
Sir Joshua Reynolds; after a picture by himself.
William Woollett, Engraver to the King.
Mrs. Siddons, in the character of the Grecian Daughter.

SUBJECTS.

The Holy Family; after N. Poussin.
Christ hearing his Cross; after the picture in the chapel of Magdalene College, Oxford.
Christ appearing to Magdalene; at All Souls' College, Oxford.
The Holy Family; after N. Beretoni.
The Fortune-teller; after Reynolds.
The Death of Lord Robert Manners; after Stothard.

[John Keyes Sherwin was probably born in Essex, where his father carried on the business of a cutter of wood pins, or bolts, for shipping, a laborious employment, in which the son was occupied till he was about sixteen or seventeen years of age. Whether he had an opportunity in any way of learning to draw is not recorded, but being one day sent on business to the house of a gentleman, he saw a miniature lying on the table, which he eyed with great curiosity. The gentleman perceiving this asked him what he thought of it; to his surprise young Sherwin replied, he thought he could do something like it if he had the means. Paper was placed before him, and a pencil put into his hand, and he was desired to try. So horny had his hands become from the nature of his employment that he could scarcely handle the pencil, but in a short time he succeeded in making a tolerable copy. This excited an interest in his favour, and he was soon after placed under Bartolozzi to learn drawing and engraving. Under this eminent master he made rapid progress, and in 1772 gained the gold medal at the Royal Academy for a drawing, said to be of Coriolanus taking leave of his Family. His name is to be found in the exhibition catalogues of the Royal Academy from 1774 to 1780, as an exhibitor of drawings in chalks, some of them copies, some originals; among the latter is one of the story of Galatea from Ovid, and another described as Leonidas taking leave of his Family, &c.; this was probably a rifacimento of the one for which he obtained the prize. One of his drawings attracted much attention; it was called The Joys of Life, and was executed in red and black chalk with a mixture of colour, in the manner of Bartolozzi. The composition consisted of a beautiful female, and a figure of Bacchus surrounded by Cupids strewing flowers. In all his drawings he appears a skilful draughtsman. It is said that Bartolozzi employed him on a great portion of the celebrated print of Clytie, after Annibal Caracci; a proof, if it be fact, of that master's estimate of his talents. In his larger works Sherwin's style of engraving has a greater resemblance to that of Woollett than to that of Bartolozzi. He was not equally successful in his engraving from his own compositions as from those by other masters, though his prints of the Happy Village, and Forsaken Fair, had considerable popularity for a time. One of the best, and perhaps last, The finding of Moses, open as it is to critical censure, deserves to be recorded. In this composition the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire represents the daughter of Pharaoh, and several other ladies of high rank and fashion are introduced as her attendants. This print would have made his fortune had he been prudent; but the "joys of life" marred all by bringing the "sorrows" in their train. Sherwin was compelled to seek refuge in obscurity from the importunities and persecutions of creditors who had willingly, while he appeared prosperous, administered to his follies. For a time he found shelter in the house of his publisher, but being hunted out by bailiffs he retired to a small alehouse known by the sign of "The Hog in the Pound," at the corner of Swallow Street and Edgeware Road, where waggoners from Uxbridge and Edgeware used formerly to refresh themselves and their horses; and there he died. This information is obtained from a manuscript letter, dated October 1st, 1790, written by George Stevens, the editor of Shakspeare, to a correspondent at Cambridge, in which he says, "I am assured that Sherwin the engraver died in extreme poverty at the Hog in the Pound, an alehouse at the corner of Swallow Street; an example of great talents rendered useless by the imprudence of their possessor." Sherwin's decease is announced in the Gentleman's Magazine of the same year.]

SHERWIN, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished from the year 1670 till 1711. It is not known by whom he was instructed in design and engraving. He is said to have been a royal engraver by patent, and the only artist known to have received that honour, a distinction to which his excellence in his profession by no means entitled him. His plates are not numerous, though he exercised his art for many years. We have several portraits by him, which are executed in a formal, stiff style. He also engraved some frontispieces and other book-plates, from his own designs, among which are the greater part of the plates for the edition of God's Revenge against Murder, printed in 1669. Among his portraits are the following :

Charles I. on horseback, with a view of Richmond.
Oliver Cromwell.
Charles II.; three plates, one a whole length; prefixed to Ashmole's Order of the Garter.
Catherine, his Queen.
Christopher, Duke of Albemarle.
William III. when Prince of Orange.
Henry, Duke of Norfolk.
George I. when Elector of Hanover.
Richard Atkyns, Typograph. Reg.; scarce.
Slingsby Bethell, Sheriff of London; scarce.
Henry Scudder, B. D. Presbyt.
William Ramesay, M. D.
William Bridge, A. M. Presbyt.
William Sermon, M. D.; inscribed, W. Sherwin, ad vivum, del. et sculp. 1671.
John Gadbury, Astrol.
Judge Powell. 1711.

He also scraped a few mezzotintos, but they are very indifferent; among them is the portrait of Monsieur Beverland, which is very scarce.

[SHIPLEY, WILLIAM, the originator of "The Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce" was a drawing-master; he kept a school for that purpose in London several years, and in 1758 received a gold medal as a compliment for his exertions in giving rise to the above-named institution. There is a print by Faber of a man blowing a lighted torch, which has the name of Shipley as the painter; but whether by this artist is uncertain. He settled at Maidstone, and died there in 1804, at the age of ninety. He was brother to Dr. Jonathan Shipley, bishop of St. Asaph.]

SIBELIUS, G., a Dutch engraver, who resided in London about the year 1775. He was chiefly employed by Sir Joseph Banks, in his great botanical work. He also engraved a few portraits, among which are, Cardinal Beton; engraved for Pennant's Scotland. Mrs. Rudd; after Dodd.

SIBMACHER, JOHN. This artist etched several of the plates of the Antique Statues for Boissard's collection. They are executed in a slight, poor style. [He was of Nuremberg, and operated from 1596 to 1611.]

SICHEM, CHRISTOPHER VAN. This artist was a native of Holland, and resided at Amsterdam about the year 1600. He was a disciple of Henry Goltzius, and executed several wooden cuts from the designs of that master. He also engraved several copper-plates, but they are inferior to his engravings on wood. His prints are very numerous, which he usually marked with a monogram composed of a C, a V. and an S. thus, CVS. Among others are the following:

PORTRAITS ON COPPER.

The Emperor Charles V.; inscribed Carolus Quintus Imperator, &c. Ch. v. Sichem, sculp. et exc.

Queen Elizabeth; inscribed Ehsabeta D. G. Angliæ, &c. Ch. v. Sichem, fecit.

Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; C. van Sichem, sc. et exc.

Francis Valesius, Duke of Alençon; the same inscription.

A numerous set of Portraits of the principal Reformers of the Church, published at Amsterdam in 1609; entitled Iconica Hæresiarcharum.

A set of whole-length Portraits of the Counts of Holland and Zealand.

WOODEN CUTS.

A set of twelve Historical subjects; Christ. van Sichem, fecit.

Ester before Ahasuerus; after L. de Leyden.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Ab. Bloemaert.

The Circumcision; after H. Goltzius.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after the same.

St. Cecilia; after the same.

A set of four plates, Judith, David, Samson, and Sisera; after the same.

The Four Evangelists.

[See next article.]

SICHEM, CORNELIUS and CHARLES VAN. According to Baron Heineken, these artists were of the same family with the preceding engraver. Their works are frequently confounded together, from the similarity of their style, and from their having used nearly the same mark. To Cornelius van Sichem is attributed a numerous collection of prints, amounting to upwards of six hundred, of subjects from the Old and New Testament, of which some are copied from other prints.

[Christopher Van Sichem, according to Malpe, was born about 1580. There is no authentic notice of Cornelius Sichem. Several writers have confused the Sichems with a supposed engraver of the name of Vichem. This mistake has arisen from finding ichem below the monogram; the V in the monogram being the largest, they have erroneously concluded that it was the principal letter. With regard to Charles Van Sichem, there is more of probability that there was an engraver of that name, than of there having been one called Cornelius. K is frequently used as the initial of Karolus, or Karl, but there is perhaps no instance of its being used in Christopher, and there are two or three prints with the monogram K V S having ichem below, as in the case of C V S. So, two Sichems may be admitted, Christopher and Charles, but Cornelius wants confirmation. Christopher and Charles were probably brothers, as their works assimilate, and they flourished at the same period; Christopher operated from 1601 to 1637, Charles to 1629, as appears by dates to monograms C V S and K V S.]

SICOLANTE, GIROLAMO. See SERMONETA.

SIEGEN, LIEUT.-COLONEL VON. To this gentleman, who was an officer in the service of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, Baron Heineken attributes the invention of the art of engraving in mezzotinto, which he communicated to Prince Rupert, by whom it was brought to England. This discovery was made in 1643, in which year he scraped a plate of the portrait of Amelia Elizabeth, Princess of Hesse. He also engraved, in the same style, a Holy Family, after Caracci.

[It is now generally admitted that Louis von Siegen, or De Siegen, was the first who exercised the art of producing prints in the manner called mezzotinto. He was born in Holland in 1609, his mother being of that country, but his father was of an ancient and noble family in Germany. He went to Germany in 1620 to receive his first education; returned to Holland in 1626, and remained there till 1637, when he entered the service of the Landgrave of Hesse. Whether his services were civil or military is not quite clear, but he had the title of lieutenant-colonel. In 1641 he again returned to Holland, and employed that and part of the following year in the execution of his first engraving, which he produced at Amsterdam in August, 1642. All his other known engravings were executed in Holland or on the borders of the Rhine. Siegen died in the military service of the duke of Wolfenbützel about the year 1680. Many interesting particulars of this amateur artist and his family will be found in "L'Histoire de la graveure en manière noire," par Leon de Laborde, from which work the following list of Siegen's known plates is taken, and compared with that of Mr. Hugh W. Diamond, in the Archæologia, vol. xxvii.

1. Bust portrait of Amelia Elisabeth, Landgravine of Hesse, with a dedication, dated 1642, signed L à S. H. 17 in., W. 12½. The second state of the plate has the date of 1643.
2. Eleonora Gonzago, wife of the Emperor Ferdinand III., called by others the Queen of Bohemia. On the lower left-hand corner, G. Hondthorst pinxit anno, and on the opposite corner L. à Siegen inventor fecit, 1643. H. 20½ in., W. 16½ in.
3. Portrait of the Prince of Orange, inscribed Guilhelmus D. G. Princeps auriacus comes Nassaviæ, etc., MDCXLIII., in one row of capital letters at the bottom. Signed near the top, G. Hondthorst pinxit. L. à Siegen inventor fecit, 1644. H. 20½ in., W. 16½ in.
4. Portrait of the Princess of Orange, inscribed Augusta Maria Caroli M. B. Reg. filia Guilhelmi Princ. Aur. Sponsa. In the lower left corner, Hondthorst pinxit. L. à Siegen inv. et fecit. H. 21 in., (with the inscription,) W. 16½ in.
5. The Emperor Ferdinand III., in an oval, on the upper part of which is inscribed, Rom. Imperator semper Aug. et Boh. Rex, and on the lower part, Lud. Siegen in Sechten ex pinxit novoq; a se invento modo sculpsit Anno - Domini 1654. On the left at bottom L V S in a monogram, and opposite the date 1654. H. 16½ in., W. 12¾ in.

6. St. Bruno, a whole-length figure kneeling, turned towards the right, an open book before him. At the bottom are six verses; on the left of the verses D'nis suis Patronis, &c.; on the right, In honorem S^{ti} Brunnonis, &c. L à S jn S. An. 1654. H. 9½ in., margin 1¼ in., W. 7¾ in.
7. The Holy Family, after Annibal Caracci. Joseph holds a book in one hand, and a pair of spectacles in the other; from the latter circumstance it is generally known as "La Sainte Famille aux Lunettes." It is dedicated to Prince Leopold of Austria. At the bottom, Ludw. a Siegen humilissime offert—Annib. Caratii pinx. Lower down, Lodovicq a S. novo suo modo luscit. In the second state of the plate it is dedicated to Cardinal Mazarin, and has the date 1657.

The finest collection of the works of Siegen, Fürstenbergh, and other early engravers in mezzotinto, is in the British Museum.]

SIENA MARCO DA. SEE PINO.

SIENA, MATTEO DA. This painter was born at Siena about the year 1533, and went early in his life to Rome, where he was employed by Pope Gregory XIII. to exercise his talent of landscape painting in the loggie of the Vatican. He generally worked in conjunction with Niccolo Circignano, called Pomerancio, who painted the figures, and Matteo the landscape and architecture. They painted in conjunction a series of thirty-two pictures of the History of the Martyrs, engraved by Cavalierius. After the death of Gregory XIII. he continued to be employed by his successor, Sixtus V. He died at Rome in 1588.

[SIERRA, FRANCISCO PEREZ, is reckoned among the Spanish painters, though born at Naples in 1627, and instructed in the art by Aniello Falcone, the landscape and battle painter, and master of Salvator Rosa. His father was a native of Gibraltar, but following the career of arms in the kingdom of Naples he married a daughter of the governor of Calabria. While a student, our artist had the appointment of page to Don Diego de la Torre, secretary to the council of Sta. Clara, which was a great hinderance to his progress in painting, as he could only devote such time to it as he could snatch from his duties. He afterwards followed his patron to Madrid, where he entered the school of Juan de Toledo, a painter of battles, and by great assiduity became such a proficient as to attract the notice of Francisco Ricci, and Juan Carreño, who obtained employment for him in the house of the Marquis de Heliche. His patron, Don Diego de la Torre, also supplied him with a number of pictures by Spagnolotto, which he had brought from Naples, and employed him in copying them; and also in painting a series of Saints for a chapel in the church of the Angels, at Madrid, which he had founded. He painted for the same church a picture in honour of Santa Rosa of Lima. Later in life he was appointed to the office of general manager of the prisons of Spain, and relinquished painting, except for his amusement. Abandoning his former subjects of saints, battles, and landscapes, he confined his pencil to flower-pieces, which were much admired, and some of them found their way into the palace of the Buenretiro, and houses of the nobility.

In his old age he was afflicted with the palsy, which carried him off in 1709.]

SIGNORELLI, LUCA. This painter was born at Cortona in 1439, and was a disciple of Pietro della Francesca. He proved one of the ablest artists of his time, and was one of the first of the Tuscan painters who drew the figure correctly, though not entirely divested of the dry, stiff manner which preceded him. His most considerable work is his celebrated fresco in the chapel of the Virgin, in the cathedral at Orvieto, representing the final Dissolution and Judgment of the World, an immense composition, exhibiting surprising variety and originality of ideas, and designed in a bold and daring style, in which he evinces a perfect acquaintance with foreshortening. A performance which was admired by Michael Angelo, and which that great artist did not disdain to imitate in some parts of his Last Judgment. In the greater part of his works he is not remarkable for the beauty of his forms nor the harmony of his colouring. Lanzi cites as an exception to this his picture of the Communion of the Apostles, in the church del Gesù, at Cortona, which unites elegance and grace with a sweetness of tint that approaches to the modern. He was invited to Rome to assist in the ornaments of the Sistina, where he painted the Journey of Moses and Zipporah, and the Promulgation of the old Law, copious and abundant compositions, exhibiting an arrangement superior to his contemporaries. There are several of his works in the churches of Arezzo, Perugia, Urbino, Siena, and Florence, which establish his rank among the most eminent artists of the Florentine school, at the period in which he lived. He died in 1521.

[Among the painters at the period of the renovation of the art, Signorelli stands pre-eminent; all writers are nearly unanimous as to his superior excellence. A Dictionary, however, is not the place to dissertate on his great qualities as an artist, with relation to the time in which he lived, and the benefits derived from his productions. A reference to the print of the Last Supper in the Etruria Pittrice, and to those of the taking down from the Cross, and part of the Last Judgment in Rosini, Storia della Pittura, (plates 65 and 82,) will show his original mode of composition and design, and the energy and expression he gave to his subjects. It will also be seen that his works have served as types to some of the illustrious painters, his contemporaries or immediate followers. Zani quotes two of his inscriptions; Lucas Aegidii Signorelli Cortonensis 1502—Lucas Coritiuus. He also says he was living in 1525.]

SIGRILLI, B., a modern Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved part of the plates for the collection of prints taken from the pictures of the Marquis Gerini.

[SILO, ADAM, a marine painter, designer, and engraver, was born at Amsterdam in 1670. A Storm at Sea, painted by him for the Dutch admiral, Grave, is spoken of as a learned composition, and by which he gained a great reputation. He was also skilled in the mechanical arts, and Peter the Great, of Russia, engaged him to instruct five young Russians in ship-building, for which each paid him 100 ducats. He painted several marine pieces for the czar; the drawing of the vessels only is commended, the sky and water not being in accordance with nature. There are nine etchings of skiffs, fishing boats, and other vessels, by him, signed A. Silo inv. et fecit. It is said that he lived to the age of 90.]

SILVESTRE, ISRAEL, an eminent French engraver, born at Nancy, in Lorraine, in 1621. He was the nephew of Israel Henriot, by whom he is supposed to have been instructed in design and engraving. He formed his style by studying the works of Della Bella and Callot, and appears to have been imitated in his turn by Sebastian Le Clerc. He designed and engraved a great variety of landscapes and views, which are executed in a neat, tasteful manner, producing a charming effect. He decorated his prints with small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with uncommon spirit. His merit recommended him to the patronage of Louis XIV., who employed him in designing and engraving views of the royal palaces, the public festivals, and the places he had conquered. He was appointed drawing-master to the Dauphin, and was made a member of the Academy. The prints of this artist are very numerous, amounting to upwards of one thousand. He went twice to Italy, where he made a great number of designs, which he engraved. He died at Paris in 1691. The following are amongst his most esteemed prints:

- A set of twenty-one Views of Italy and France, representing edifices, ruins, and landscapes, with inscriptions in French.
- A set of thirteen Views in Rome and the environs; inscribed Fastes par Israel Silvestre, et mises en lumiere par Israel Henriot.
- Twelve Views of gardens and fountains; entitled Alcune vedute de Giardini e Fontane di Roma e di Tivoli, &c., with descriptions in Italian.
- Four Views in the Kingdom of Naples, in the form of friezes.
- A set of six Views of Sea-ports in the Kingdom of Naples; circular.
- Twenty-four circular plates of Views of Italian and other Sea-ports; with descriptions in French.
- Twelve of the most remarkable Views in Paris and the environs, some of which are engraved by La Bella.
- A View of Paris, from the Bridge of the Tuilleries.
- A large View of Rome; four sheets.
- Two Views of Campo Vaccino, and the Coliseum at Rome; the latter is scarce.
- The grand Carousal, or Royal Entertainment at Paris in 1662; in one hundred and eight prints. F. Chaveau engraved some of these plates.
- The Pleasures of the Enchanted Island; nine plates, with a vignette.
- A great variety of other Views and Landscapes.

[A collection of 74 views of palaces, churches, fountains, gardens, &c., in France and Italy, was published, under the title "Paysages Diverses," at Paris and Rome; and another under the title "Vues diverses de Rome et d'Italie," consisting of 105 views of Italian scenery.]

SILVESTRE, LOUIS, was the eldest son of Israel Silvestre, born at Paris about the year 1651, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by his father. He afterwards applied himself to painting landscapes and portraits, in which he had acquired considerable reputation, when he was invited to the court of Dresden by Augustus III., king of Poland and elector of Saxony, in whose service he passed many years as his principal painter. [Zani says he was the third son of Israel, that he was born in 1675, and died in 1760; others say he was born in 1644, and died in 1728. He studied painting under Bon Boullongne.]

SILVESTRE, ALEXANDER. This artist was the younger son of Israel Silvestre, and flourished about the year 1700. He etched some plates of landscapes from the designs of Louis Silvestre, his brother, which are not without merit, though very inferior to the productions of his father. [According to Zani he was the eldest son of Israel. There are great discrepancies among writers respecting the names and ages of all the Silvestres. Nagler says Alexander was born in 1650.]

SILVESTRE, NICHOLAS CHARLES. According to Basan, this artist was the grandson of Israel Silvestre, and was born at Paris in 1700. He was drawing-master to the king and the royal family of France, and died in 1767. He engraved, among others, the following plates:

- Ubaldo and the Danish Knight searching for Rinaldo in the palace of Armida; after Le Moine.
- A Hunting-piece; after Audray.

[By some he is called Nicholas Mark, and by others Charles Francis; but the latter name belongs to his father, who was second son of Israel, and born in 1667.]

SILVESTRE, SUSANNA. This lady was of the same family with the preceding artists. We have by her some plates of heads and portraits, after Vanduyck. [She was daughter of Israel Silvestre, and was married to Le Moine the painter. One of her prints is signed Susanna Silvestre Le Moine Sculp. The heads she engraved after Van Dyck are copies from other prints.]

SILVIO, GIOVANNI. This painter was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1532. He is mentioned by Lanzi as a very able artist, and is supposed to have been educated in the school of Titian. In the collegiata di Piovi di Sacco, near Padua, is a picture by this master bearing the above date, which is spoken of by that writer in very favourable terms. It represents S. Martino between St. Peter and St. Paul, with three angels, two of which are supporting his crosier, and the third is playing on the harp. The composition is elegant and graceful, and the colouring is entirely Titianesque.

[SILVIUS, or SYLVIUS, ANTHONY, whom Papillon calls Silvius Antonianus, are the supposed names of a designer and engraver on wood, who used the monogram A, and flourished from 1553 to about 1580. It is said that he was born at Antwerp in 1525, and was much employed by Christopher Plantin, the eminent printer and bookseller of that city, and by other publishers, in works requiring illustrations. The names, however, of Silvio Antonianus given to him by Papillon, proceed from a mistake of that writer. It would seem that he had observed the monogram on the wood cuts to an edition of Paerno's Fables, printed at Antwerp in 1567, and dedicated to Cardinal Borromeo by Silvio Antoniano, professor of Belles Lettres at Rome, and afterwards a cardinal himself, and hastily concluded that the editor was the engraver. Nagler has given a catalogue of books to which this engraver (whatever may be the name) is supposed to have contributed the wood cuts, vignettes, or title-pages; more interesting to book than print collectors.]

SILVIUS, [or SYLVIVUS,] BALTHASAR, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1555. He executed some plates with the graver, in a coarse style, which are chiefly from his own designs. They are usually marked with the initials B. S. Among other prints by this artist, we have one representing Lot and his Daughters, bearing the above date. [He engraved after Francis Floris, Karl Van Mander, Jerome Bos, and others.]

[SIMMONS, JOHN, a native of Nailesea in Somersetshire, was a house and ship painter at Bristol, where he died in 1780. His name appears in the early catalogues of the exhibitions at the Royal Academy as a portrait painter. There is an altarpiece by him at All Saints' church, Bristol, and another at St. John's church, Devizes: one represents the Annunciation to the Virgin, and the other the Resurrection. He painted the portrait of Ferguson, the astronomer, which has been engraved as well as some others by him. Probably the greater part of his portraits are at Bristol, or in its neighbourhood. It is said, he was known to Hogarth, who thought favourably of his talents. In the Academy catalogues his name is sometimes printed Simmonds of Bristol.]

SIMON, JOHN. This artist was a native of Normandy, and was instructed in engraving in his own country. He came to England some years before the death of John Smith, and on seeing the works of that celebrated artist, he quitted the graver, and applied himself entirely to scraping mezzotinto. Sir Godfrey Kneller, upon some difference between him and Smith, employed Simon to engrave some of his pictures in mezzotinto, which he did with considerable success, as well as from the works of other masters. We have several portraits by him, among which are the following:

Queen Elizabeth; after Hilliard.
 Charles I.; after Van dyck.
 William III.; after Kneller.
 Mary, his consort; after Vander Vaart.
 Queen Anne; after Kneller.
 George, Prince of Denmark.
 George I.; after Kneller.
 George II., when Prince of Wales; after the same.
 John, Lord Cutts; after the same.
 William, Earl of Cadogan; after the same.
 John Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury; after the same.
 John, Lord Sommers; after the same.
 Sir Richard Temple; after the same.
 William, Earl of Cadogan; after La Guerre.
 Horace, Lord Walpole; after Vanloo.
 Henry Rouvigny, Earl of Galway; after de Graves.

[This list might be considerably enlarged with the much greater names of William Shakespeare, John Milton, Alexander Pope, Joseph Addison, Richard Steele, and others, compared with whom the foregoing are insignificant.

John Simon was born about 1675, and died at London about 1755; his principal works in mezzotinto are the following:

Half-length of the Princess Mary, daughter of George II. Peter delivered from Prison; after Berchet.
 The Cartoons at Hampton Court.
 Christ and his Apostles; after Baroccio.
 Christ restoring sight to the Blind; after Laguerre; excellent.
 The Samaritan Woman; after the same.
 Portrait of the Hon. Mrs. Walpole; after M. Dahl; excellent.
 Maria Stuart; the expression infantine.
 Dorastus and Fannia; after Berchet.
 A Pastoral Scene, of which the foliage and landscape are remarkable.]

SIMON, PETER, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1680. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Robert Nanteuil, to whose style his prints bear a great resemblance, and though inferior to the works of that eminent artist, his engravings possess considerable merit. His best plates are his portraits, some of which are from his own designs. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV.; after C. Le Brun; the size of life.
 Louis de Bourbon, Prince of Condé; from his own design.
 Anna Maria Louisa of Orleans, Duchess of Montpensier; the same.
 Elizabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans; the same.

Charles d'Ailly, Duke de Chaulnes, Peer of France; after La Borde.
Jacobus Cardinalis Rospigliosus; [after C. Maratti.]
 Federigo Baroccio, Painter.

Among his historical prints we have,

The Martyrdom of St. Cosmus and St. Damien; after S. Rosa.

[Moses at the burning Bush; after N. Poussin.]

[SIMON, PETER, called THE YOUNGER, a designer and engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, was born at London in 1750. He was one of the engravers employed by Boydell on the large Shakspeare prints, and on other pictures by contemporary painters. Those he engraved for the Shakspeare gallery are among the best, of which are the following:

A scene from the Tempest; after Fuseli.
 The Merry Wives of Windsor, two plates, one after Smirke, and the other after the Reverend W. Peters.
 Scene from Measure for Measure; after T. Kirk.
 Scene from Much Ado about Nothing; after W. Peters.
 Midsummer Night's Dream; after Fuseli.
 Scene from the Merchant of Venice; after Smirke.
 Scene from As You Like It; after W. Hamilton.
 Scene from the Taming of the Shrew; after F. Wheatley.
 Another from the Induction to the Play; after Smirke.
 Scene from Henry IV.; after R. Westall.
 Scene from Romeo and Juliet; after Miller.

He also engraved many other prints that had great popularity, among which the following may be named:

The Woodman; after Gainsborough.
 The Philosopher Square, discovered by Tom Jones, and the Companion; after Downman.
 The Sleeping Nymph; after Opie.
 Frances Isabella Ker Gordon; after Sir J. Reynolds.
 The Three Holy Children; after W. Peters.
 Bust of Clytie; after J. B. Cipriani.
 Fair Emmeline, and a subject from the Vicar of Wakefield; after Stothard.

Peter Simon died about 1810.]

SIMONE, MAESTRO. According to Dominici, this old painter was a native of Naples, and flourished about the year 1325. He was a disciple of Filippo Tesauo, and when Giotto visited Naples, he improved his style by studying the works of that master. One of his principal works was a picture of the taking down from the Cross, at the great altar of the church of the Inconronata, which was esteemed little inferior to the works of Giotto. [Maestro Simone, called also Simone da Bologna, and Simone da Crocifissi, is by some considered a native of Cremona, and by others of Naples. He was first a disciple of Filippo Tesauo, and afterwards painted under the direction of Giotto. His style partakes of both. Giotto, at his departure from Naples, about 1330, recommended him to King Robert and Queen Sancia, who employed him on many works in various churches, particularly in S. Lorenzo, and Sta. Chiara. In the first he painted that monarch in the act of being crowned by his brother, the Bishop Lodovico, to whom, on his death and subsequent canonization, a chapel was dedicated in the episcopal church, and Simone appointed to decorate it, but which he did not live to execute. Dominici particularly extols a picture by him of a Deposition from the Cross, painted for the great altar of the Inconronata, and thinks it will bear comparison with the works of Giotto. Rosini refers to a picture by him of the Coronation of the Virgin, of which he has given an outline by Lasinio in his second volume of "Storia della Pittura Italiana;" it represents Christ placing a crown on the head of the Virgin, both seated under a canopy, on which are three rows of Cherubs and Seraphim; it is simple and beautiful. At the bottom is inscribed, Simon de Bonna Fecit Hoc Opus. He died about 1346. His son Francesco is also extolled for a fresco in the church of Sta. Chiara, of the Madonna enthroned, and a picture of the Trinity underneath. The pictures commenced by Simone in the chapel of S. Lodovico, Bishop of Tolosa, were finished by two of his disciples, Gennaro di Cola and Stefanone.]

SIMONEAU, [or SIMMONEAU,] CHARLES, an eminent French engraver, born at Orleans in 1639. He was instructed in the rudiments of design by Noel Coypel, and learned the art of engraving from William Chateau. His first plates were executed with the graver only, in a style resembling that of Poilly, but he afterwards introduced the point, particularly in the demitints and distances, and reserved the burin for the more prominent and vigorous parts. He engraved historical subjects, portraits, and vignettes, which are executed in a very neat and agreeable style. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Henrietta Maria, consort of Charles I.
Charlotte Elizabeth, Duchess Dowager of Orleans; after Rigaud.
Charles Francis de Brienne, Bishop of Constance; after Dumée.
Julius Hardouin Mansart, Architect to the King; after de Troy.
George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after Raffaele.
The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John; after the same.
The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Ann. Caracci.
Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after the same.
Hagar and Ishmael; after Andrea Sacchi.
The Virgin and infant Christ, with Angels; after Frà Bartolommeo.
The Stoning of Stephen; after Caracci.
Christ, with Martha and Mary; after Domenichino.
Christ's Entry into Jerusalem; after C. Le Brun.
Christ bearing his Cross; after the same.
The Nativity; after Noel Coypel.
Christ among the Doctors; after Ant. Coypel.
The Triumph of Galatea; after the same.
Venus curing the Wound of Æneas; after C. de la Fosse.
The Journey of Mary of Medicis to Pont-de-Cé; after Rubens; for the Luxembourg Gallery.
The Conquest of Franche-Comté; after Le Brun. This is esteemed his best print.

[Charles Simmoneau died in 1728. His works are rather numerous; Nagler gives a list of eighty-three plates by him. Many of them are of superior merit, and deemed worthy of being placed in the portfolios of tasteful collectors.]

SIMONEAU, [or SIMMONEAU,] LOUIS, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Orleans in 1656. He appears to have formed his style by an imitation of the works of the Andrans. By combining the point with the graver, he gave a pleasing variety to his plates, and his drawing is correct. Though his prints are not so numerous as those of his brother, the works he has left us are little inferior. The following are his most esteemed prints :

PORTRAITS.

Giacinto Serroni, Archbishop of Albi.
Anthony Arnauld, famous Theologian; after Ph. de Champagne.
Anthony le Maitre, Advocate in Parliament; after the same.
Martin de Charmois, Counsellor of State; after Seb. Bourdon.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Susanna and the Elders; after Ant. Coypel.
Lot and his Daughters; after the same.
Christ with Martha and Mary; after the same.
Christ bearing his Cross; after Ant. Dieu.
The Elevation of the Cross; after the same.
The Crucifixion; after the same.
The Assumption of the Virgin; after the ceiling by Le Brun in the chapel of St. Sulpice.
Four Plates of the Four Times of the Day; after the same.
The Four Seasons; in four plates; after the same.
The ceiling of the Pavilion of Aurora, in the garden de Sceaux; in four plates; after the same.

[Zani places his birth in 1660, and his death in 1727.]

SIMONEAU, [or SIMMONEAU,] PHILIP, was the son of Charles Simoneau, and was instructed in design and engraving by his father. Either from the want of talent, or of application, he never made any considerable progress in the art. We have the following prints by him, which do not possess much merit :

Two friezes, on one sheet, representing the Rape of the Sabines, and the Peace between the Romans and the Sabines; after the pictures by Giulio Romano in the Orleans' collection.
The three Goddesses preparing for the Judgment of Paris; after the picture by Perino del Vaga; in the same collection.
Venus and Adonis; after Albano.

[SIMONET, JEAN BAPTISTE, an engraver of considerable merit, was born at Paris in 1742, and died there about 1810. His engravings are chiefly from paintings by his own countrymen, some of them his contemporaries, among which are the works of Greuze, Moreau, Baudoin, and Aubry. He engraved also, for the Orleans' Gallery, Rachel hiding her Father's Idols, after Pietro da Cortona, and the beautiful vignette to the historical discourse on ancient painting in the "Musée Français;" the vignette plates for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published by Basan, and illustrations to the comedies of J. Racine. Some of his plates are from subjects which in France are called sentimental, but in England, where the people are more fastidious, are called free.]

SIMONINI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Parma in 1689, and was a scholar of Ilario Spolverini. He excelled in painting battles, and skirmishes of cavalry, which were well composed, and painted with great spirit. His principal residence was at Venice, where he painted, in the Sala Capello, a series of combats and warlike achievements, which were much admired. There are many of his works in the private collections at Venice, where he was living in 1753.

SIMPSON, WILLIAM, an indifferent English engraver, who flourished about the year 1635. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and, among other things, engraved the plates for Quarles's Emblems.

SIMPSON, JOSEPH, THE ELDER. According to Lord Orford, the first employment of this artist was to grave coats of arms, and other embellishments, on pewter, but having some disposition for drawing, he found access to the society of artists of the time, where he studied the figure. He was afterwards employed by Tillemans, the painter, to engrave a copper-plate of Newmarket, after one of his pictures, to which he affixed his name. He lived about the year 1710.

SIMPSON, JOSEPH, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the foregoing artist, and his father had conceived great expectation of his success from the first specimens of his ability ; but he died young, in the year 1736, without having attained much excellence. He engraved a plate of a Holy Family, with St. John, St. Sebastian, and several angels ; after Filippo Lauri, dated 1728.

SINGER, HANS, or JOHN. This artist was born at Hesse-Cassel, about the year 1510. He painted landscapes, with figures, in a free, bold manner, and chiefly resided at Antwerp, where he was received into the Academy in 1543. He was much employed in painting cartoons for tapestry.

[SINGLETON, HENRY, an English historical painter, was born at London in 1766. His father died while he was in his infancy, and he was brought up by his uncle, a miniature painter, by whom he was instructed in drawing. He became a student of the Royal Academy, and gained the gold medal for the best historical painting in 1788; the subject was taken from Dryden's Ode on Alexander's Feast, and was highly praised by Sir Joshua Reynolds. For more than fifty years he was a constant exhibitor in the Royal Academy, but never arrived at any of its honours. His pictures are numerous in historical and fanciful subjects, but seldom exhibit signs of genius in circumstances novel or striking; they have too much of manner and common-place. "Propose to Singleton a subject," said West, "and it will be on canvass in five or six hours." As was to be expected, a composition that cost so little labour was destined to a short existence. Some of his small drawings for book illustrations were popular, as also some sentimental pieces on a larger scale. Among his best works are reckoned Christ entering Jerusalem, Christ healing the Blind, Coriolanus and his Mother, Hannibal swearing Enmity to the Romans; all of which were engraved in mezzotint, and were favourite parlour prints for some time. His paintings of The Storming of Seringapatam, The Death of Tippoo Saib, and The Surrender of Tippoo's Sons as Hostages, had the good fortune to be engraved by Schiavonetti and Cardon, which, with the subjects, insured their popularity. There is an extensive series of small paintings by him of scenes taken from Shakspeare's Plays. There is much of fine fancy and discrimination of character in them, and the colouring superior to any of his larger works; if they were engraved, his fame as an artist would be greatly enhanced. He died in 1839.]

[SINJEUR, GOVERT, is mentioned among the painters of Rotterdam as having painted in the manner of Philip Wouwerman, but there are no particulars of him recorded. It would be an agreeable surprise to find the works of an original artist who painted in the manner of that consummate master; it is to be feared, however, that it would prove lost labour to seek for them.]

[SINTZENICH, HEINRICH, an engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, and in mezzotint, was born at Manheim in 1752. After receiving the elementary instructions in art in the academy of that city, he was sent to England at the expense of the Elector to complete his studies under Bartolozzi. With this able instructor he remained about four years. On his return to his own country he was appointed engraver to the court, and executed many works in the several styles he had acquired in England. Among these are portraits of noble and otherwise distinguished persons in Germany, and subjects from pictures by eminent Italian masters, such as Frà Bartolomeo, A. Caracci, P. Veronese, Domènichino, Carlo Dolce, and Solimene; as well as some after Rubens, Le Brun, and painters of later date. As his reputation increased he became a member of the academies of Munich and Berlin. Nagler has described fifty-four of his principal plates, and pointed out some of the variations. He died at Munich in 1812.]

SIRANI, GIOVANNI ANDREA. This painter was born at Bologna in 1610, and was one of the favourite disciples of Guido Reni. After the death of his admirable instructor he was employed to finish several of his works left imperfect in the churches at Bologna, particularly the large picture of S. Brunone, at the Certosini. His first productions resemble the second style of Guido, in which he followed the suavity and tenderness of his master. Such is his picture of the Crucifixion, in the church of S. Marino, at Bologna. He afterwards adopted a more vigorous opposition in his light and shadow, approaching to the principles of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, as is evident in the Feast of the Pharisee, at the Certosa; and the Marriage of the Virgin, in S. Giorgio, at Bologna. He died in 1670. We have by this artist some very masterly etchings, from his own compositions, which are usually marked with the initials G. A. S. or I. A. S., among which are the following :

The Virgin and infant Christ, to whom St. John is presenting a Bird.

St. Michael vanquishing the Evil Spirit; oval.

A Sibyl; after Guido.

Apollo and Marsyas; an oval print.

[The print of Apollo and Marsyas, signed Sirano, and another of Lucretia Dying, are all that Bartsch admits to be by G. A. Sirani.]

SIRANI, ELISABETTA. This ingenious lady was the eldest daughter of Giovanni Andrea Sirani, born at Bologna in 1638, and was instructed in the art by her father. She attached herself, however, to an imitation of the best style of Guido, which unites great relief with the most captivating amenity. It appears almost incredible, that during so short a life, not having survived her twenty-sixth year, she could have finished the long list of works enumerated by Malvasia, from a register kept by herself, amounting to upwards of one hundred and fifty pictures and portraits; and it is still more astonishing that they were chiefly of a large size, and finished with a care which excludes all appearance of negligence or haste. Her first public works appear to have been painted in 1655, when she was seventeen years of age. Her compositions are elegant and tasteful; her design is correct and firm; and there is a freshness and suavity in her colouring, especially in the demitints, which remind us of the best works of Guido. The airs of her heads are graceful and noble, and, like her admirable prototype, she was particularly successful in the expressive character she gave to her Madonnas and Magdalenes, which appear to have been her favourite subjects.

Elisabetta Sirani had acquired a distinguished reputation by the assiduous exercise of her extraordinary talents, when her brilliant career was interrupted by poison administered to her by her servant, in 1664. Her most admired works in the churches at Bologna are her pictures of the Baptism of Christ by St. John, at the Certosa; St. Anthony of Padua kneeling before the infant Christ, in the church of S. Leonardo; and the Virgin Mary with St. Anne contemplating the infant Christ sleeping, in S. Maria di Galiera. There are several of her pictures in the Zampieri, Caprara, and Zambeccari palaces at Bologna, and in the Corsini and Bolognetti palaces at Rome. We have a few etchings by Elisabetta Sirani, which are executed in a spirited style, and the extremities are finely marked. They are sometimes signed with her name, and sometimes with the initials E. S. F. Among others are the following:

The Virgin in the Clouds holding a Rosary, with the infant Jesus; from her own designs.

The Virgin weeping, surrounded by Angels, and contemplating the emblems of Christ's Passion; Elisabetta Sirani, f. 1657.

The Holy Family; after Raffaele; Elisabetta Sirani, sic incisum exposuit.

St. Eustacius kneeling before a Crucifix; Elisabetta Sirani, f. 1656.

The Decollation of St. John; Elta. Sirani, f. 1657.

[Bartsch describes ten etchings which he believes to be by Elisabeth Sirani; some are signed, others not. No one has the initials E. S. P., and the St. Eustache, in its first state, is signed Elisabetha Sirani J. F.; the copy is faintly signed Elisabetha Sirani, f. 1655.

SIRCEUS, PHILIP. This artist is noticed by Florent Le Comte, and is said to have engraved some prints after the designs of Michael Angelo Buonaroti. [This is the same artist as Sericus, or Soye.]

SIRIES, VIOLANTE BEATRICE. This lady was born at Florence in 1710, and was instructed in crayon-painting and in water-colours by Giovanna Fratellini. She afterwards went to Paris, where she learned the practice of oil-painting from a Flemish painter, who is not named. Her talent was chiefly confined to portraits, though she occasionally attempted historical subjects, as well as flowers and fruit. On her return to Florence from France, she was patronized by the Grand Duke, and was employed to paint a large picture of the portraits of the imperial family, which she executed to the satisfaction of her protector. The portrait of this ingenious lady with that of her father, painted by herself, is in the Florentine gallery of artists. [The greater number of her pictures are in oil, and are executed in good taste, and are admired for their truth and delicacy. She died about 1770.]

[SKELTON, WILLIAM, historical and portrait line engraver, was born in London, 14th June, 1763. He was descended from the ancient family of the Skeltons in Cumberland, by a branch which subsequently settled in Yorkshire. He was some time pupil of James Basire and of William Sharp. At starting on his own account, his patrons were Sir Richard Worsley, and Charles Townley, Esq.; then Boydell and Macklin; and still later, the Dilettanti Society greatly encouraged him; and some of his best engravings are from the antiques published in their valuable works. The close of his professional labours was productive of the series of his Royal Portraits, embracing representations of every member of the royal family from George III. to the accession of Queen Victoria. These portraits he published on his own account; and their having produced him a fair remuneration, together with his previous professional success, he acquired a moderate independence, which enabled him to indulge in acts of charity and goodness to others. He was for nearly sixty years a guardian of the Asylum for Female Orphans (to which charity his father, also named William Skelton, had been previously, and to the time of his death, a guardian). During the last fifty years he was on the acting committee; and so complete was his undivided devotion to the true interests of that most valuable institution, that he was latterly designated the father of the charity. He died in Upper Ebury Street, Pimlico, on Sunday, the 13th of August, 1848, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, and was interred on the Saturday following in the cemetery at Brompton.]

SKILLMAN, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1655. Among other plates, he engraved the façade of Albemarle House, and a View of the Banqueting House.

[SKIPPE, JOHN, of whose personal history very little seems to be known, was a gentleman of education, and an amateur artist. He engraved in chiaro-scuro a number of subjects, chiefly after the designs of Parmigiano, which he published from about the year 1770 to 1812. It is supposed that he received the elementary instructions in this art from John Baptist Jackson. Mr. John Jackson, in his "Treatise on Wood Engraving," (a most valuable work for all who wish to be acquainted with the art historically and practically,) says, "that from the year 1754, the date of John Baptist Jackson's tract 'On the Invention of Engraving and Printing in Chiaroscuro,' to 1819, when the first part of Mr. Savage's 'Hints on Decorative Printing' was published, the only chiaro-scuro wood-engravings which appear to have been published in England were those executed by an amateur of the name of John Skippe." He adds, "The chiaro-scuros engraved by Mr. Skippe do not appear to have been numerous; I have only seen three—St. John the Evangelist, St. Paul, and Hebe, all after drawings by Parmigiano; the latter [last] is printed from four blocks, and each of the others from three. In point of execution that of St. John is decidedly the best; it is much superior to any of the specimens given in John Baptist Jackson's work, and will bear a comparison with some of the best chiaro-scuros of Nicholas Le Sueur." Nagler has fully described twenty-eight of these chiaro-scuros, and an aquatinted etching, by John Skippe, among which the Hebe is not mentioned; so the number of his works is considerably greater than Jackson supposed. Of these described by Nagler, the editor has examined twenty-three, and several variations. It is possible that Jackson mistook one of the figures of St. John (of which there are three) for a Hebe. The figure of the saint standing and holding a chalice, has much the appearance of a female; the other two are seated, each with an eagle and an open book. The Sibyl (No. 14 in Nagler) is inscribed to John Baptist Malchair, an amateur collector of the time, who had, among others, a fine collection of this class of prints, which, it would seem, Mr. Skippe had studied while practising the art himself, and had also profited by the taste and judgment of his friend. The inscription is, "Joanni Baptistae Malchair, a quo primum artis disciplinam hausit, hoc Exemplar ad opus M. Angeli, artificio qualicunque exactum, Optime merito gratis defert Johannes Skippe." This circumstance is noticed on account of the earliest instructor of Mr. Skippe, and the friend by whom he was first disciplined in the art, being both named John Baptist. From inscriptions on several others Mr. Skippe appears to have been on terms of intimate friendship with persons of rank and learning. Among the names are those of John Lane, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Uvedale Price, Dr. John Symonds, Regius Professor at Cambridge, Dr. Blayney, Henry Jerome De Salis, and Jacob Walwyn. Neither the year of his birth nor death has been ascertained by the editor, but the earliest date that appears on a print by him is 1771, and the latest 1809. Some of his cuts, it may be noted, are from drawings by Raphael, Correggio, Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, Salvator Rosa, Rubens, Pierino del Vaga, Andrea del Sarto, and Baccio Bandinelli.]

SLABBAERT. The name of an artist affixed to a portrait inscribed Paulus Perre, Syndic. Medibourg. et Leg. Belg. in Anglia. 1660.

[SLABBAERT, or SLABBARD, KARL, a Dutch painter of interiors and familiar subjects. From his manner of colouring, and the elaborate finishing of the accessories, it is supposed that he studied under Gerard Dou; but it is only in those particulars he approaches that master. His figures are not well drawn, and have, in some measure, a resemblance to those of Isaac Ostade. The ordonnance of his compositions is not so censurable, and they who will excuse bad drawing in the figure in consideration of laboured pencilling, good colouring, and a pleasing general effect, will not despise Slabbaert. His pictures are not common; there is one in the museum at Amsterdam, of an interior with a woman cutting bread, and two children in the attitude of praying; one or two in the gallery at Salzdaalum; and there are probably three or four in England, but they are not of sufficient merit to find a place in choice collections. With respect to his birth and death, the Dutch writers are silent. Whether the preceding artist be the same is not ascertained; he operated in 1645, according to Zani, who describes him as a designer and engraver of portraits, but says nothing of him as a painter.]

SLATER, T., an English engraver who flourished about the year 1630. He engraved, among others, the portrait of George Webbe, Bishop of Limerick.

SLINGELANDT, PETER VAN. This painter was born at Leyden in 1640, and was a scholar of Gerard Douw. He followed the highly-finished style of his master, and as far as patience and polish are considered, he may be said to have equalled, if not surpassed, his instructor; though we look in vain for the characteristic expression, the magical effect of the chiaro-scurio, and the correctness of design, for which the works of Douw are eminently distinguished. Houbraken reports, as an instance of his slavish devotion to extreme finishing, that he was occupied three years, without intermission, in painting a small picture of the portraits of the family of Meerman, and that he was employed a month in finishing the lace of a ruff. When he painted a dog, a cat, or a mouse, which he was fond of introducing into his pictures, he was not satisfied until he had precisely represented each individual hair. Although he is tasteless and stiff in his compositions and the design of his pictures, they still find purchasers, at considerable prices, among the admirers of mechanical and persevering labour. He died in 1691. [There are seventy of his pictures described in Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. i. and Supplement. The highest price on record given for one is about £480 sterling. The picture was purchased by a French gentleman of an English brewer, and is now in the gallery of the Louvre; the Experts du Musée have valued it at twenty thousand francs, about £800. The best specimens of the master's works known in England, are in the Royal Gallery, that called the Bridgewater, but now the Earl of Ellesmere's, and in the collection of Sir Robert Peel.]

SLITZER. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of some large views of Scotland, executed in a style resembling that of Michael Burgers.

SLUYS, JACOB VANDER. This painter was born at Leyden in 1660, and was first a scholar of Ary de Voys, whom he left to become a disciple of Peter van Slingelandt. He imitated the polished style of his last instructor, though with less laborious finishing, and painted with considerable success small pictures of conversations, domestic subjects, and modish assemblies, which he composed and treated in an agreeable style. His pictures are well coloured, and produce a pleasing effect, but his design is neither elegant nor correct. The works of Vander Sluys are little known, except in Holland, and are there chiefly confined to Leyden, in which city he constantly resided, and died there in 1736.

SLUYTER, P., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He was principally employed in engraving frontispieces, and other book ornaments, for the publications of Peter Vander Aa.

SMIBERT, [or SMYBERT.] JOHN. This artist was born at Edinburgh about the year 1684, and served his time with a common house painter; but eager to handle a pencil in a more elevated style, he came to London, where, however, for subsistence, he was forced to content himself with working for coach painters. He was afterwards employed in copying for dealers, and learned to draw the figure by designing after casts. His efforts and ardour at last carried him to Italy, where he spent three years in copying portraits of Titian, Vandyck, and Rubens, and improved enough to meet with much business in portrait painting at his return. When his industry and abilities had thus surmounted the asperities of his fortune, he was tempted, against the persuasion of his friends, to embark in the uncertain but amusing scheme of the famous Dean Berkeley, afterwards Bishop of Cloyne, whose benevolent heart was then warmly set on the erection of a universal college of arts and sciences in Bermuda, for the instruction of heathen children in Christian duties and civil knowledge. Smibert was enchanted with a plan that he thought promised tranquillity and an honest subsistence in a healthy Elysian climate. It may easily be conceived how a man, so devoted to his art, must have been animated, when the Dean's enthusiasm and eloquence painted to his imagination a new theatre of prospects, rich, warm, and glowing, with scenery which no pencil had yet made cheap and common by a sameness of thinking and imagination. In spite of remonstrances, he engaged with the Dean, whose zeal had ranged the favour of the court on his side. The King's death dispelled the vision; Smibert, however, who had set sail, found it convenient, or had resolution enough, to proceed, but settled at Boston, in New England, where he succeeded to his wish, and died there in 1751. A panegyric on him, written there, was printed here in the Courant, 1730.

[The two first founders of painting, as an art, in America, were Scotchmen; the one was named John Watson, who settled in the capital of New Jersey, Perth Amboy, in 1715; the other was John Smibert.

(for so he wrote his name,) who settled at Boston, as above related, in 1728. The American Vasari, (so let him be called as the first collector of the biographies of American painters,) William Dunlap, traces the influence of Smybert's painting to Copley, Trumbull, and Allston. The man who had been brought up a house painter, yet had sufficient ardour for improvement in a more elevated department of art, as to travel to Italy, and other places, to study and copy the works of Titian, Rubens, and Van Dyck; and in whom Berkeley discerned those qualifications that are suited to instruct a people emerging from barbarism, was the sort of man to lay a good foundation for a school of art in the then state of America. It does not appear that he attempted any thing beyond portraiture. At Yale College, in America, there is a large picture by him representing Dr. Berkeley, some of his family, and other persons, among which is the artist himself, on their landing in America; and the best portraits of eminent magistrates and divines of New England and New York, says the same authority, who lived between 1725 and 1751, are by him. Smybert had a son named Nathaniel, who was of great promise, followed the profession of a painter for a short time, but died at an early age. Smybert and Allen Ramsay, the writer of the "Gentle Shepherd" and many other good things, were correspondents. Ramsay, in one of his letters to Smybert, dated 1736, says, "My son Allen has been pursuing the science since he was a dozen years old; was with Mr. Hiffidg" (never met with his name before) "in London for some time, about two years ago; he has since been painting here like a Raphael! sets out for the seat of the beast, beyond the Alps, within a month hence, to be away for two years. I'm swear to part with him, but canna stem the current which flows from the advice of his patrons, and his own inclinations." Well said, old Allan, spoken like a true Scotsman.]

[SMIRKE, ROBERT, an excellent painter of humorous and sentimental subjects, taken from poets and novelists, was born at Wigton in 1752. At the age of nineteen he became a student at the Royal Academy, but did not exhibit there till the year 1786; in 1792 he was elected an associate, and in the same year an academician. It is said that he painted arms on coach panels; so did Catton, whose name is among the first forty of the Royal Academicians. His pictures are numerous, generally of small dimensions, as they were mostly painted to illustrate plays, poems, or novels, and intended for the engravers. On such he seldom bestowed much variety of colour, but was particularly attentive to the chiaro-scuro; the same, indeed, may be said of his larger compositions, in which the deficiency in point of colouring is more conspicuous; they appear weak. But he made ample amends by the skilful manner in which he arranged his subjects, and by a rich display of humour in his characters, which never degenerated into buffoonery or farce. He was always the gentleman when representing the ridiculous, the affected, or the grotesque. He makes the observer think and smile, but seldom causes him to laugh outright. His favourite subjects are from Scripture, English history, Shakspeare, Don Quixote, the Arabian Nights; of the last, his illustrations of the story of The Hunchback, engraved by Daniell, are in his happiest manner. The manner in which he illustrated the plays of our immortal bard may be seen in the Shakspeare Gallery; and the truth of his conceptions of the several characters will be assented to by every tasteful reader of the poet. Many of his smaller designs, for book publications, abound with pathos and sentiment. He was a severe critic on his own performances, and was reluctant to exhibit them; two very uncommon qualities in a painter. In common with many others, he regarded with great suspicion a large portion of the soi-disant connoisseurs and admirers of the works of the ancient masters; not because he was insensible of the real merits of the old works, but because he considered such pretenders to be incompetent judges of them, and felt the depressing influence of their criticisms on modern art. He continued to practise his art till late in life; it is said that his last were the designs for the bas-reliefs in front of the Oxford and Cambridge Club House in Pall Mall, of which his sons were the architects. He had formerly designed the bas-reliefs for the Junior United Service Club, at the corner of Charles Street and Regent Street, also built under their direction. As most of his paintings and designs have been engraved by very eminent artists, they are generally known in England, and also on the continent, where they are held in high estimation. He died on the 5th of January, 1845.]

[SMIT, ANDREAS, a Dutch painter of marine subjects, lived about the middle of the seventeenth century. There is a capital sea-piece by him in the Berlin gallery. The composition represents an approaching storm; the sea is rising with a heavy swell, and several vessels are making preparation to encounter the tempest. There are several of his pictures in England, but they are attributed to other masters; the Dutch writers seem to be unacquainted with his works, for they have not noticed him. There was also an Arnold Smit, who lived about the same period, and painted landscapes and sea-pieces. His large pictures of marine subjects resemble the darkest of Backhuysen. Such is the similarity of manner, however, in pictures signed A. Smit, And. Smit, and Arn. Smit, that it may reasonably be suspected they are identical; especially as the Dutch painters of the time were careless in their signatures, and there is no authentic record of either.]

[SMITH, ANKER, an excellent engraver of small book-plates in the line manner, was born at London in 1759. He received his education at the Merchant Tailors' School, and afterwards was articled to an attorney. As he was an excellent penman, and had a taste for the arts, he amused his leisure hours in copying line engravings with the pen, some of which were so accurately done, that on being shown to James Heath, he mistook them for prints. The ability to make accurate drawings of this kind is not what an attorney requires in a clerk, therefore it was deemed advisable to transfer his services to an engraver of the name of Taylor. This master instructed him in the mechanical part of the business, and his natural talent soon enabled him to surpass his teacher. He became an assistant to James Heath, in whose name, it is said, he executed several works, among which the Apotheosis of Handel is named. Bell was now publishing an edition of the British Poets, and engaged him to engrave the illustrative plates; and he was soon employed in a similar manner by other publishers, by which means his talents became known, and his name familiar to the public. He also engraved several of the plates, which are highly esteemed, for Smirke's edition of Don Quixote. In this way his engravings are numerous. It is said that he practised also under Bartolozzi; his larger works have certainly much of that able master's manner. He was one of the engravers employed by Boydell on the "Shakspeare Gallery;" and the print of "The Death of Wat Tyler," after the picture by Northcote, obtained for him the honour of being elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He engraved the plates for a smaller edition of Shakspeare's Plays, edited by Wood, and for the works by Coombe, on "The Ancient Marbles and Terracottas" in the British Museum; and several separate plates after Lionardo da Vinci, Titian, and Caracci. It is said that he was related to Hoole, the translator of Tasso and Ariosto. He died in 1819.]

[SMITH, BENJAMIN, an engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, was born at London; the year of his birth is not clearly ascertained. He was a pupil of Bartolozzi, and was one of the engravers employed by Boydell on his "Shakspeare Gallery," of which some of the best plates are by him. He engraved chiefly after contemporary painters. Among his works are the following:

Christ healing the Sick; after B. West.
St. Peter's first Sermon; after the same.
An Allegory of Providence; after J. F. Rigaud.
An Allegory of Innocence; after the same.
Sigmunda; after Hogarth.
Bacchus; after Sir J. Reynolds.
Shakspeare nursed by Tragedy and Comedy, and The Infant Shakspeare attended by Nature and the Passions; both after Romney.
An equestrian Portrait of George III.; after Beechey.
The Portrait of Napoleon; after Appiani.
William Hogarth and his Dog; after Hogarth.
The Marquis Cornwallis; after Copley.
The Annual Ceremony of administering the Oath of Allegiance to the Lord Mayor elect, &c.
Scene from Richard II.; after Mather Brown.

This excellent engraver, of whom there are so few particulars recorded, died in 1810.]

[SMITH, CHARLES JOHN, an engraver, was born at Chelsea in 1803; he was the son of an eminent surgeon, resident there for many years. He was instructed in the art of engraving by Charles Pye. He became skilful in his profession, and was extensively employed, particularly in some of the best antiquarian and topographical publications of the time. Among these are Stothard's Sepulchral Effigies, Cartwright's Rape of Bramber, Murray's Illustrations of Johnson, Dibdin's English Tour, and similar works, some of which were only for private circulation. In 1828 he engraved and directed the publication of a volume in imperial quarto, comprising a series of facsimile autographs of royal, noble, and illustrious persons from the reign of Richard II. to that of Charles II., to which biographical notices were furnished by John Gough Nichols, F. S. A. At the time of his death he was engaged in a work entitled "Historical and Literary Curiosities," of which six numbers were published; two more, to complete it, were left unfinished. He was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. His death occurred in January, 1839.]

[SMITH, FRANCIS, a landscape painter, whose name and works appear in some of the earlier exhibition catalogues of the Royal Academy. In 1770 he exhibited Views of Naples and Constantinople; two years afterwards his name appears to a View of Naples, an Eruption of Vesuvius, and an Old Temple near Pozzuoli; and the following year to Views of London and Westminster Bridges, taken from the bottom of Arundel Street, Strand. There are some prints after drawings by him of Turkish costume and ceremonies in the seraglio. It is supposed that he died in 1779.]

SMITH, GABRIEL. This artist was a native of England, and flourished about the year 1775. Having learned the rudiments of engraving in London he went to Paris, where he acquired the method of engraving in imitation of chalk drawings; and on his return to England began to practise it, with the assistance of Mr. Ryland, with some success. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Blind leading the Blind; after Tintoretto.
Tobit with the Fish; after Sal. Rosa.
The Queen of Sheba's visit to King Solomon; after Le Sueur.
A Bear-hunt; after Snyders.

[He was born in 1724, and died in 1783. His principal plates were executed for Boydell.]

SMITH, JACOB, an obscure English engraver, who flourished about the year 1730. Among other prints he engraved the portraits of Sir Isaac Newton and Sir Hans Sloane, on one plate. The engraving is executed in a singular manner, with one spiral line, begun in the middle, and continued to the border of the plate.

SMITH, JOHN. This eminent artist is considered the best mezzotinto engraver that had appeared at the period at which he lived, about the year 1700. He is said to have served an apprenticeship to one Tillot, [or Tillet,] a painter in Moorfields. As soon as he became his own master, he learned the art of mezzotinto scraping from Isaac Becket, and received further instruction in it from J. Vander Vaart. Sir Godfrey Kneller having seen some of his performances, took him into his employment, and engaged him to engrave many of his portraits, which are the best of his works. His prints are very numerous; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS AFTER KNELLER.

Charles II. with the Star.
James, Duke of York, leaning on an Anchor.
The Duke of Schomberg on Horseback.
Meinhard, his Son, when Duke of Leinster.
William III.
Mary, his Queen.
George, Prince of Denmark [an oval].
Queen Anne, when Princess of Denmark.
John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough.
John, Duke of Buckingham.
Charles Sackville, Earl of Dorset.
Charles, Earl of Halifax.
Arnold, Earl of Albemarle.
William, Earl of Jersey.
Catherine, Duchess of Rutland.
Frances Bennet, Countess of Salisbury.
Mary Somerset, Duchess of Ormond, with a black Boy.
Henrietta, Duchess of Bolton.
Sir Richard Steele.
Joseph Addison.
Alexander Pope.
William Congreve [very fine, 1710].
John Locke.
Sir Godfrey Kneller.
John Smith, holding a Portrait of Kneller. [The engraver's own Portrait, painted by Kneller in 1696, engraved in 1716.]

[To these may be added the following, after Kneller:

Sir Christopher Wren, 1713.
Lord Euston, whole length, 1689.]

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Queen Mary II, with a high head-dress; after Vander Vaart.
James Fitzroy, Duke of Monmouth; after Wissing.
Thomas Herbert, Earl of Pembroke; after the same.
Patrick Crawford, Viscount Garnock; after Medina.

William Anstruther; after the same.
 Sir Henry Goodricke; after J. Hill.
 Mr. Sansom; after Closterman.
 Mrs. Cross, Actress; after J. Hill.
 Arcangelo Corelli, Musician; after Howard.
 William Penkethman, Comedian; after Schutz.
 Godfrey Schalcken; after a picture by himself.
 [Charles XII.; after D. Craft, 1701-2.
 William, Duke of Gloucester, and Benj. Bathurst; after T. Murrey.
 Anthony Leigh, in the character of the Spanish Friar. A beautiful print, in folio.
 Isaac Becket, J. Smith, fec.
 Thomas Murrey, Pictor, an oval.
 W. Wycherley; after Sir P. Lely; remarkably fine.
 Guilielmus Cowper, Chyrurgus; after J. Closterman; excellent.]

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A set of ten Plates of the Loves of the Gods; after Titian.
 Venus standing in a Shell; after Coreggio.
 Cupid and Psyche; after A. Veronese.
 Tarquin and Lucretia; after the same.
 Time conquering Love; after S. Vouet.
 Venus and Adonis; after N. Poussin.
 The Virgin and infant Christ; after F. Baroccio.
 The Holy Family; after C. Maratti.
 [A Woman asleep near a Light; after G. Schalcken.
 The Story of Acteon, small figures; after P. Berchet.
 M. Magdalene; after G. Schalcken. An admirable imitation of the manner of the original master. There are proofs of a second state, in which tears are introduced.
 The Angel and Tobit; after Elsheimer.]

[These additions are of prints that Laborde thinks to be particularly deserving of notice. Nagler has given a catalogue of 500. John Smith died about 1720.]

[SMITH, JOHN THOMAS, a writer on the antiquities of London and Westminster, and a recorder of obsolete customs and manners of the inhabitants, and many years keeper of the prints at the British Museum, was born in 1766. His father, Nathaniel, had been a pupil of Roubilliac the sculptor, and had formed an early friendship with Nollekens, who was a pupil of Scheemakers. These two gained many of the best prizes of the Society of Arts; Nathaniel carved three of the heads of River Deities, designed by Cipriani, which adorn arches of Somerset House. At the age of thirteen the subject of this article was introduced to the studio of Nollekens, to whom his father, Nathaniel, was then principal assistant. Here he had much practice in drawing, and after three years became a student of the Royal Academy. Having distinguished himself by some drawings in imitation of Rembrandt and Ostade, he obtained a liberal offer from Sherwin the engraver, and became his pupil. For some years after his term with that skilful engraver, he was chiefly engaged as a drawing-master. In 1791 he commenced his first work, "The Antiquities of London and its Environs," which he completed in 1800, the whole work consisting of 96 plates in imperial quarto. His next work for the illustration of the early architecture of the metropolis was the "Antiquities of Westminster;" the Old Palace, St. Stephen's Chapel, (the late House of Commons,) &c., illustrated with 246 engravings of topographical subjects, (the greater part of which no longer exist,) to which he afterwards added a Supplement. The first part was completed in 1807; the Supplement in 1809. A disastrous fire at Bensley's printing establishment destroyed 400 copies of the first part of the work, and between five and six thousand of the prints; this was a serious loss to Mr. Smith. These works were followed by another, entitled "Ancient Topography of London," which was not completed until 1815, and published, like the former, in imperial quarto, and contains 32 plates very boldly etched in a style resembling that of Piranesi. In 1816 he was appointed Keeper of the Prints in the British Museum, which, in some measure, prevented his extending the work as he had intended. He however found leisure to publish "Vagabondiana, or Anecdotes of Mendicant Wanderers through the Streets of London," which he illustrated with etchings of remarkable beggars and persons of notoriety: to this Mr. Douce wrote an introduction. His last literary production was entitled "Nollekens and his Times." This, having nothing to do with his artistic talents, may be passed over. It amused the public for a time, gave pain to his friends, raised up a host of enemies, and in some instances gave rise to a suspicion of his veracity. He once told the editor that he had collected materials for a history of St. Martin's Lane and Cranbourne Alley, in which he would give an account of all the painters, and other artists, who had dwelt in the locality for nearly a century; and also of other remarkable persons, either good or bad, that came within the scope of his history. Alas! his darling Cranbourne Alley is swept away, St. Martin's Lane is no longer the place of residence for artists, the historian is departed, and the history lost. He died, after a short illness, on the 8th of March, 1833.]

SMITH, THOMAS, an ingenious English landscape painter, who resided chiefly at Derby, and was on that account usually styled Smith of Derby, in contradistinction to the other artist of the same name who resided at Chichester. Without the help of a master he reached an eminent rank in his profession, and may be said to have been one of the first of the English artists who explored and displayed the charming scenery of his native country. We have several excellent prints engraved from the works of this painter by Vivares. He died at the Hot Wells, Bristol, in 1769. [He painted almost all the picturesque views of the Peak of Derbyshire; 40 of these, engraved by Vivares, were published, collectively, by Boydell in 1760. Other views were engraved by Mason and Elliot, and also some sporting subjects.]

SMITH, JOHN RAPHAEL. This eminent artist was the son of Thomas Smith, of Derby, the landscape painter, and was born about the year 1750. He probably was instructed by his father in the principles of design, but he adopted the branch of engraving in which he distinguished himself, particularly in mezzotinto. We have a great variety of prints by this able artist, both from his own designs and after the compositions of other masters, of which his portraits are particularly admired. Among the most esteemed are the following:

PORTRAITS AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The Duke of Devonshire.
 William Markham, Archbishop of York.
 Richard Robinson, Archbishop of Armagh.
 Joseph Dean Bourke, Archbishop of Tuam.
 Lady Beaumont.
 Lady Caroline Montague, daughter of the Duke of Buccleugh.
 Mrs. Montague.
 The Marchioness of Thomond, when Miss Palmer.
 Lady Gertrude Fitzpatrick, daughter of the Earl of Ossory.
 Lady Catherine Pelham Clinton.
 Master Crewe, as Henry VIII.
 Master Herbert, as young Bacchus.
 Lieutenant-Colonel Tarleton.
 Mrs. Musters.
 Lieutenant-General Sir William Boothby.
 [The Duke of Orleans, called Egalité, father of Louis Philippe.]

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Hyde Parker, Vice-Admiral of the Blue; after Northcote.

Miss Coghlan; after Gainsborough.

Mrs. Siddons, as the Grecian Daughter; after Lawrence.

Edward Wortley Montagu, in an Oriental dress; after Peters.

He also engraved a variety of subjects from his own designs, and from the compositions of other masters. Mr. Smith died in 1811.

[J. R. Smith was first apprenticed to a linen-draper at Derby. It is not known by whom he was afterwards instructed in mezzotint engraving and drawing in crayons, but he became eminent in both. His engravings only amount to about 150 plates. He led a life of business and pleasure, but the latter predominated, and he lost the advantages fortune placed in his way. He had a good heart, encouraged merit in others, assisted George Morland, made the world acquainted with Chantrey's abilities, gave his advice kindly and generously to all artists who consulted him, and was no man's enemy but his own. Let his merits cover his faults. For the last three years of his life he resided at Doncaster, where he died in 1812, in his 60th year.]

SMITH, WILLIAM, GEORGE, and JOHN. These brothers were natives of Chichester; William was born in 1707, George in 1714, and John in 1717. It does not appear that they had the advantage of any instruction in the art of painting, but they studied from nature with great assiduity, and had established in their family a kind of domestic academy, which supplied the place of a technical education. William devoted his attention chiefly to portraits, though he occasionally painted landscapes, flowers, and fruit. George, distinguished by the name of Smith of Chichester, excelled in landscape-painting, and reached a very eminent rank in that department. The youngest, John, also painted landscapes, in which he was little inferior to his brother, but he died in the vigour of life. Of the merit of their productions, a very favourable idea may be formed, by examining the fine prints engraved from them by Woollett, Eliot, Peake, &c. We have several sets of small landscapes, very neatly etched by these ingenious artists, from their own designs. William and John Smith died in 1764, and George in 1766. [The Smiths of Chichester were very pleasing painters for the time in which they lived; but how much of their reputation would have descended to posterity if Woollett, Elliot, and Peake had not engraved their pictures? Many painters owe the preservation of their names even, to the value the engraver has given to their works by his translation. A proof print of one of Smith's pictures by Woollett, is now worth considerably more than the original from which it was taken. John and George Smith etched, engraved, and published 53 prints of landscapes painted by themselves, and of subjects from Rembrandt. There is also a collection of "Select Views in England and Wales," after them, by Vivares and others.]

SMITS, [LUDOLF, or LUDEWYK,] called HART-CAMP. This artist was born at Dort in 1635, and acquired some reputation as a painter of flowers and fruit, but his system of colouring was so flimsy and unsubstantial, that the effect of his pictures has hardly survived the life of the painter; his works, with the name of the artist, being now almost obliterated. He died in 1675.

[SMITS, NICHOLAS, a native of Breda, and born about the year 1672, is mentioned as a good painter of subjects called historical. His composition, drawing, and colouring evince considerable talent. It is said that he died in 1731, but the Dutch writers seem to know little or nothing of his history; nor are his works of frequent occurrence.]

SMITZ, GASPAR, a Dutch painter, who, according to Graham, came to England soon after the Restoration, and who, from painting a great number of Magdalenes, was called Magdalene Smith. For these penitents, his model was a woman that he called his wife. A lady, whom he had taught to draw, persuaded him to visit Ireland, where he painted small portraits in oil, had great business, and high prices. His flowers and fruit were much admired. In his Magdalenes he generally introduced a thistle in the fore-ground. In Painter's Hall is a small picture of a Magdalene, dated 1662. He died in Ireland in 1707. [Some writers say he died in 1689. He engraved in mezzotint a portrait, a Magdalene in a Grotto, and Hagar in the Wilderness.]

SNAYERS, PETER. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1593, and was a scholar of Henry van Balen. Although he painted history and portraits with considerable success, he distinguished himself more by his pictures of battles and landscapes, which were held in great estimation. He was much patronized by the Archduke Albert, who appointed him his painter, and sent several of his pictures to Spain; and he was favoured with many commissions from that court. His figures and horses are designed and painted with surprising spirit and animation; his compositions are rich and ingenious, and his colouring sometimes approaches to the splendour of that of Rubens. The battle-pieces of Snayers decorate the choicest collections in the Netherlands, and are sometimes met with in this country, where they are justly esteemed. Vandyck painted the portrait of Snayers among the eminent artists of his country. He died in 1670; [others say in 1662.]

SNAYERS, or SNYERS, HENRY, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1612. It is not ascertained from whom he learned the art of engraving, but he imitated the style of Scheltius Bolswert with considerable success. His drawing is tolerably correct, and his prints exhibit much of the character of the masters whose works he engraved. We have, among others, by him,

The Portrait of Prince Rupert; after Vandyck.

— Adam Van Oort, Painter; after Jordaens.

The Virgin seated upon a step, surrounded with several Saints; after Rubens. The first impressions of this plate are very scarce.

The Fathers of the Church; after the same.

The Death of St. Francis; after the same.

He also engraved some plates from Titian and other masters, and a few portraits. [He signed his engravings Heinrich Snyers, H. Snyers, but never Snoyers.]

SNELLINCKS, JOHN, [OR HANS SNELLINX.] This artist was born at Mechlin in 1544. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he is celebrated by Karel van Mander, in the Life of Otho Venius, as an eminent painter of history and battles. There are some historical pictures by him in the public edifices in the Low Countries, which prove him to have possessed considerable abilities in that branch; but his chief excellence consisted in painting skirmishes and attacks of cavalry, which were considered among the ablest productions of the time. He principally resided at Antwerp, where he was much employed by the most distinguished personages of the country, and was appointed battle-painter to Albert and Isabella, the governors of the Netherlands. His compositions are judiciously grouped, his figures and horses are correctly and spiritedly designed, and the animated courage of the combatants is admirably expressed. He was perfectly acquainted with aerial perspective, and by his intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro, his pictures produce a surprising effect. The talents of this painter were highly respected by Vandyck, who not only painted his portrait among the distinguished artists of his time, but has etched a plate of it himself. He died in 1638.

SNEYDERS, [properly] SNYDERS, FRANCIS. This distinguished painter was born at Antwerp in 1579, and received his first instruction from Henry van Balen. For some time he confined himself to painting fruit and objects of still-life, in which he excelled; but he afterwards devoted his studies to a more difficult branch of the art, in which he not only surpassed all his contemporaries, but may be said not to have been equalled by any artist who has succeeded him. He painted animals and huntings, which are composed in a grand style with surprising fire and spirit. The talents of Snyders excited the admiration of Rubens, who frequently intrusted him to paint the animals, fruit, &c. in his pictures, though he himself represented those subjects in so admirable a manner. Such was his excellence in colouring, and the spirited touch of his pencil, that even in competition with the powers of that illustrious painter, the whole appeared to be the production of the same hand. M. d'Argenville asserts that he travelled to Italy, where he studied for a long time the works of Benedetto Castiglione. This cannot, however, be reconciled with chronology, as Snyders was thirty-seven years older than the Genoese painter, who was born in 1616. It is more probable that he never left Flanders, but constantly resided at Antwerp, except for a short time, when he was invited to Brussels by the Archduke Albert, for whom he painted some of his finest works, particularly a stag-hunt, which was sent by the Archduke to Philip III. of Spain, who commissioned him to paint several large pictures of subjects of the chase, and combats of wild beasts, which are still in the old palace of the Buen-Retiro. He also excelled in painting kitchens and larders stored with all kinds of dead game, fish, fruit, vegetables, &c., which have occasionally the advantage of being decorated with admirable figures by Rubens or Jordaens. We admire, in the works of this eminent painter, the richness and variety of his compositions, the correct and spirited design of his animals, and the characteristic ferocity with which he has marked their attacks and combats. His pencil is bold and free, and peculiarly adapted to express the various furs and skins of the different wild beasts he introduced into his pictures; and his colouring is clear, chaste, and vigorous. Some of his most capital works embellish the collections of this country, where they are held in high estimation. Vandyck painted an admirable portrait of Snyders, which was in the Orleans collection. We have a set of sixteen etchings of various animals by F. Snyders, executed in so spirited and masterly a style, that it is to be regretted that he did not more frequently amuse himself with the point. They are now become very scarce. He died at Antwerp in 1657.

[It is not correct to attribute these etchings of animals to Snyders; they are by Jan Fyt. The first impressions, which are very rare, were published by him in 1642, with a dedication to the Marquis de Solerio, and several of them have the name of Fyt in addition. Johannes Fyt pinxit et fecit, or Fyt only. Subsequently the plates fell into the hands of some person who erased the name of Fyt, and substituted that of Snyders: "Livre d'Animaux Peint et Gravé par Senedre." See Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. iv. It will be observed that one of the prints, N^o. 2, of the second series, has the date 1662 written backwards; a close examination will satisfy the inspector that there has been some tampering with the last 6; it is coarser than the first; the cause must be left to conjecture.]

SOBLEO. See DESUBLEO.

SODOMA, I. See RAZZI.

SOENS, JOHN. This painter was born at Bois le Duc about the year 1553. He was first instructed by James Boon, but he afterwards became a scholar of Giles Moestaert. Under that master he made great progress, and was considered one of the most promising young artists of his time. He travelled to Italy, where his manner of painting landscape was greatly admired, and he was employed by the pope, and several of the nobility of Rome, in the embellishment of their palaces. He passed some time at Parma, in the service of the duke. His manner was prompt and full of fire; he had a perfect intelligence of the degradation of tint in his distances. The figures he introduced into his landscapes were well drawn, and touched with great spirit. [He died at Parma in 1611. There is some difference respecting the year of his birth; Zani says 1547.]

SOEST, or ZOEST, GERARD. This artist was a native of Westphalia, born about the year 1637. He visited England some time before the Restoration, as he is said in the Anecdotes to have been, at that period, of established reputation as a portrait painter. His heads are animated with truth and nature, with a great relief, bold, yet highly finished. His draperies were usually of satin, in which he imitated the manner of Terburg; but he enlarged his style on seeing the works of Vandyck. He was enlisted among the rivals of Sir Peter Lely, the number of which is honourable to the talents of that painter. Emulation seldom unites a whole profession against one, unless he is clearly their superior. He was more successful in his portraits of men than women; and his taste is said to have been too coarse and ungraceful to recommend him to the softer sex. The gentle manners of Sir Peter carried them all from his competitor, though he had a considerable share of business among the men. He died in 1681.

SOGLI, NICCOLO. This painter was born at Florence in 1474, and was a disciple of Pietro Perugino. He painted history in the style of his instructor, though his figures were designed in a dryer and more laboured manner than those of his master. His chief residence was at Arezzo, where some of his works are preserved in the public edifices. In the church of La Madonna delle Lagrime is a picture by him of the Nativity, painted in a precise, formal style. He died at Arezzo in 1554.

SOGLIANI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO. This artist was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1530. He was a disciple of Lorenzo di Credi, under whom he studied several years. On leaving that master, he endeavoured to imitate the works of Bartolommeo di S. Marco, but his genius was more adapted to the simple and agreeable style of his instructor, than the grand gusto of Il Porta. Among his most esteemed performances are, his picture of Cain and Abel, in the cathedral at Pisa; and the Martyrdom of S. Arcadio, in the church of S. Lorenzo, at Florence. [He was born in 1481, and died in 1533.]

SOJARO. See GATTI.

SOITZ, G. C., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1530. He executed some of the portraits for a book entitled Templum Honoris, published at Vienna in the above-mentioned year.

SOIUS, PHILIP. This artist resided at Rome about the year 1568. He engraved from his own designs a set of half-length figures of the Popes, from the year 204 to the year 1568, when they were published. They are executed with the graver in a stiff, formal style. [This is the same as SERICUS; see that article.]

SOLARI, ANDREA. This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1530. He is sometimes called Del Gobbo, and by Vasari is denominated Andrea Milanese. That writer states him to have been a contemporary of Coreggio, and commends him as a graceful designer and an excellent colourist. One of his most esteemed works is his picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of the Carthusians, at Pavia, where he resided the latter part of his life. [Zani places his birth in 1458, and his death in 1508; he thinks him the same as Andrea Salaino, scholar of Lionardo da Vinci. Others deny this; but it is probable.]

SOLARIO, ANTONIO, called Lo ZINGARO. According to Dominici, this painter was born at Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples, about the year 1382. The history of this old artist is strikingly similar to that of Quintin Matsys, of Antwerp. He had, like that artist, followed the business of a blacksmith until he was seventeen years of age, when he conceived an affection for the daughter of Colantonio del Fiore, a Neapolitan artist, who promised him her hand, when he should merit it by becoming an eminent painter. He accordingly devoted himself with uncommon zeal to the study of design, and went to Bologna, where he became a disciple of Lippo Dalmasio, whose works were then held in the highest estimation. Aided by the lessons of that artist, and stimulated in the prosecution of his studies by the ardour of his attachment, his progress was surprising, and he returned to Naples, where he distinguished himself as one of the ablest painters of that early period, and received the reward of his constancy and perseverance. Several of the works of Lo Zingaro are preserved in the public edifices at Naples, among which the most remarkable are some frescoes, in the cloister of S. Severino, representing the Life of Benedetto; a dead Christ, with the Virgin and St. John, in S. Domenico Maggiore; and in S. Pier Martire, some pictures of the Life of S. Vincenzo. He died about the year 1455.

[The pictures by Antonio Solario hold a middle place between the school of Umbria and the German school of Alsatia. There are several in the Museo Borbonico. One in S. Lorenzo Maggiore, at Naples, of S. Francis giving the rules of his order to some monks, is grand and animated. Authors who wrote previous to Dominici say Solario was of Venice; this is supported by an inscription on a picture of the Virgin, Christ, and St. John, (of which Rosini has given an outline, plate 37), Antonius da Solario Venetus, f. The composition has the truth and simplicity of Raphael.]

SOLDI, ANDREA. This painter was born at Florence about the year 1702. He had resided some time at Aleppo, and having painted the portraits of some English merchants resident there, they gave him letters of recommendation to some of their countrymen, with which he arrived in England in 1735. For some time he had considerable employment, became a member of the Chartered Society of Artists, and exhibited with them in 1766. He did not long survive that period.

SOLE, ANTONIO DAL. This painter was born at Bologna in 1597, and was brought up in the school of Francesco Albano. He excelled in painting landscapes; and as he always worked with his left hand, he acquired the appellation of Il Manchino dai Paesi. His pictures, like those of his instructor, exhibit very pleasing scenery, and his distances recede with a charming degradation. He decorated his landscapes with groups of figures, gracefully designed and composed, in the style of Albano. He died in 1677. [Zani says he was born in 1606, and died in 1684.]

SOLE, GIOVANNI GIUSEPPE DAL, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1654, and was instructed in the first principles of design by his father, but he afterwards became a disciple of Domenico Maria Canuti, and ultimately studied under Lorenzo Pasinelli. Following the example of his last instructor, he founded his system of colouring by studying at Venice the works of the best masters of that school. He imitated the agreeable style of Pasinelli with great success; and though he was inferior to him in the clearness and harmony of his colour, he surpassed him in the correctness and energy of his design. His compositions are regulated by judgment and reflection, and are embellished with landscape and architecture, which he introduced into his picture with admirable taste. There are several of the works of this eminent artist in the public edifices at Bologna, which establish the respectability of his talents. Among the most esteemed are the Incredulity of St. Thomas, in the church of La Madonna di Galiera; the Annunciation, in S. Gabrielle; and some frescoes in S. Biagio, which are accounted his finest works. He died at Bologna in 1719.

[Giovanni Giuseppe dal Sole was ambitious of becoming every day more perfect in his art, and he raised himself by his application to one of the first stations among the painters of his time. He had constant commissions from noblemen, both native and foreign, and received invitations from the courts of England and Poland. For some time he preserved a style conforming to Pasinelli's, and, in order to improve it from the same sources, made frequent visits to Venice. In many particulars he displays exquisite grace; as in the hair and plumes of the angels, and also in the accessories, such as veils, bracelets, crowns, and armour. He seems to have been inclined to treat powerful themes, and was more observant than his master, Pasinelli, of costume, more methodical in composition, and better informed in architecture and landscape. In these, indeed, he is almost unique. The most beautiful specimens, perhaps, are to be seen at the Casa Zappi in Imola, representing Evening, Night, and Morning, all harmonized with the sober tints belonging to the subjects. His works in general exhibit the most lovely play of vivid fluctuating light, more especially in holy subjects and celestial visions. Though exact and polished, he was by no means deficient in celerity in conducting his works; but he esteemed it unworthy of an upright character to confer upon them less perfection than he was capable of bestowing. For the Giusti family at Verona he executed several scriptural histories and mythological subjects, truly beautiful; one, of Bacchus and Ariadne, which occupied but a week of his time, was pronounced by artists excellent. Yet he cancelled almost the whole, to remodel it according to his own wish, declaring that it was enough to have shown his rapidity of hand to satisfy others, but that it became his duty, by additional accuracy, to satisfy himself also. Hence his fresco, at S. Biagio in Bologna, which is his greatest work, cost him infinite labour in its completion. In conducting his altar-pieces, few and valuable, as well as his pictures for private collections, which are very numerous, he called for high remuneration, persevering in his determination to paint only with care. In his works two manners are observable; the second partakes of that of Guido. A large portion of his pictures nearly approach the taste of that master; so the surname of The modern Guido, conferred on him by so many, has not been granted as a favour, but as his desert. Bartsch describes three etchings by him; an allegorical representation of Envy, a Group of Angels, after a design for a ceiling by Pasinelli, and another of Olympus, after the same. Gori mentions one of St. Francis Xavier confuting, or rather confounding, by his holy doctrine, the satraps of Japan, also after Pasinelli. Several portraits were etched by him in 1674, which were intended for the "Felsina Pittrice," but are not found in that work.]

[SOLEMACKER, J—F—, a landscape and cattle painter, of whom there is no satisfactory account. He lived at the same time as Wynants, Ruisdael, and Berchem. It is supposed that he was a pupil of the last, but of that there is no proof. He certainly was his imitator in the grouping and forms of his cattle in some instances; but in the handling there is not the freedom of that master, and the colouring is less transparent; his shadows are black, and the general appearance of his pictures heavy. There is, however, considerable merit in them, and they are sometimes mistaken for Berchem's. It is probable that he was Berchem's senior, for the editor has seen landscapes by Wynants, in which the cattle and figures are by Solemacker, evidently painted contemporaneously; these have less appearance of imitation. Whether he ever attempted to imitate Wouwerman, as some have said, the editor will not take upon himself to affirm, as he has never seen any counterfeits of that imitable master's works that have borne the stamp of Solemacker's pencil. There are dark and heavy pictures, sometimes called Wouwerman's, evident attempts at imitation, but they are not by Solemacker. His skill lay in painting cows, sheep, and goats, not horses; and there is no mistaking his pencil. There is a piquancy in his manner, a pleasing rural choice in his subjects, and a freedom in his distribution of the objects, which, if it were not for the opacity of the colouring, would make his pictures valuable. They are generally of small dimensions, always on panel, and a good specimen may be a locum tenens for a Berchem. The name is sometimes written Soolemacker, and, improperly, Zoolemacker.]

SOLERI, GREGGIO. This painter was a native of Alessandria, and flourished about the year 1573. It is not precisely ascertained by whom he was instructed, but he was probably a disciple of Bernardino Lanini, whose daughter he married, though he did not adopt the style of that master. As a painter of portraits, Malvasia ranks him on an equality with Bartolomeo Passerotti, Giuseppe Arcimboldi, and Gio. Cremasco da Monte; and Lanzi mentions two of his historical pictures in very favourable terms.—One is an altar-piece, in the church of the Conventuali, at Alessandria, representing the Virgin, to whom SS. Agostino and Francesco are recommending the protection of the city of Alessandria. The other is a picture in the church of the Domenicani, at Casale, which is signed with his name, and the date 1573. It represents S. Lorenzo kneeling before the Virgin, with a group of three angels, designed with a grace which reminds us of Coreggio. He died in 1587.

SOLIMENE, [or SOLIMENA,] FRANCESCO, called L'ABATE CICCIO. This eminent artist was born at Nocera de Pagani, a small town about eighteen miles distant from Naples, in 1657. He was the son of Angelo Solimene, a respectable painter, who had been a disciple of Cavaliere Massimo, who, discovering in his son a disposition for literary pursuits, had him instructed in classical learning, and he is said to have passed whole nights in the study of poetry and philosophy. This assiduous application did not, however, prevent his cultivating the principles of design, for which he showed an early and decided genius. As his father intended him for the profession of the law, the time he occupied in the indulgence of his favourite propensity was by no means satisfactory to him, and he frequently remonstrated with him on the subject. Cardinal Orsini, afterwards Pope Benedict XIII., happening to pass through Nocera, honoured Antonio with a visit, and had the condescension to examine the youth in his classical acquirements. On expressing his approbation of his progress, his father observed, that it would be much more considerable if his son did not sacrifice so much of his time to drawing. The prelate desired to see his designs, and was so surprised at the uncommon talents they evinced, that he persuaded his father to permit him to pursue the bent of his inclination. After studying two years under his father, he went to Naples in 1674, where he first became a disciple of Francesco di Maria, but left that master to enter the school of Giacomo del Po. He afterwards went to Rome, where the works of Pietro da Cortona were for some time the models of his imitation. By contemplating the vigorous productions of Lanfranco and Il Calabrese, he acquired a powerful effect of light and shadow, which he afterwards softened, by adopting the sweetness and amenity of Guido and Carlo Maratti. By an accurate and well-arranged study of these matters, he formed to himself an excellent style, and distinguished himself as one of the most admired painters of his time. Among his most celebrated works are, the sacristy of S. Paolo Maggiore, and the Last Supper, in the refectory of the Conventuali at Assisi.

Solimene possessed a fertile and extensive genius, and his powers were so general, that he equally excelled in history, landscapes, portraits, animals, and architecture. His compositions are rich and ingenious, and his figures are elegantly designed, though sometimes wanting in correctness. His colouring unites tenderness with force, the airs of his heads are graceful and expressive, and his draperies are judiciously cast. He was the contemporary and friend of Luca Giordano, and after the death of that master was regarded as the ablest painter of his time. He died at Naples in 1747. [Admitting the merits of Solimena, he must be ranked with those painters who caused the declension, and accelerated the downfall, of Italian art. Pietro da Cortona, Luca Giordano, Solimena, Sebastian Conca, Pompeo Batoni, regularly followed each other in depravity of style.]

SOLIS, FRANCISCO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1629, was instructed in the art by his father, Juan de Solis, a painter little known. He painted history, and Palomino mentions as his most esteemed work a picture of Santa Teresa, in the church of San Miguel, at Madrid. He died in that city in 1684.

[Francisco de Solis was intended for the church, and educated accordingly. The little instruction he received from his father was intended rather as an amusement than as an induction to art; for it seems that his father, who had studied under Alonso Herrera of Segovia, did not practise much as a professor. However, the little information he received had the effect of withdrawing him from the study of theology to that of painting, and when he was only eighteen he painted a picture, of his own invention, for the Capuchins of Villarubia de los Ojos. This was exhibited on one of the days of a public solemnity in the convent de la Paciencia at Madrid, and attracted the notice of connoisseurs, particularly of Philip IV., who directed him to sign his name and age on the picture. This circumstance brought him into public favour, and he obtained much employment. When the queen, Louisa of Orleans, made her solemn entry into Madrid, he contributed to the splendour of the decorations by a series of paintings representing the labours of Hercules, from Claudio Coello's designs; but the work which established his reputation was an Immaculate Conception of the Virgin, with the dragon at her feet: henceforward his Conceptions were the vogue. Few professors in Spain contributed so much to the advancement of painting as Francisco de Solis. For many years he held an academy in his house, to which all young artists were admitted free of expense, to draw from the living model. He wrote an account of the lives of Spanish painters, sculptors, and architects, and even engraved several of their portraits, which he intended to publish, but was prevented by death. This manuscript is lost, which is to be regretted, as he not only had the opportunity of collecting facts, but taste and skill to set them off to advantage. He left books, prints, and drawings, which were estimated at the value of six thousand ducats. His pictures are chiefly remarkable for their colouring. Bermudez has named the principal places where they were formerly.]

SOLIS, VIRGIL, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1514. According to the usage of the time, he engraved both on wood and on copper, chiefly from his own designs. The copper-plates he engraved in the early part of his life resemble the works of Hans Sebald Beham, but when he afterwards engraved after the Italian masters, he adopted a style more open and spirited. His wooden cuts are similar to those of Jost Ammon, both with respect to the composition and execution. His works prove him to have been a man of considerable ability, and though his design is formal and stiff, some of his figures possess great merit. On account of the smallness of his plates, this artist is ranked among the little masters. His works are very numerous, amounting to upwards of eight hundred prints. He usually marked them with a cipher composed of a V. and an S., thus, V.S. or U.S. Among his multifarious productions are the following:

A variety of small Engravings on copper, representing hunting subjects; dated 1541.

A set of vases and ornaments for goldsmiths; the same. The Marriage of Cupid and Psyche, the Assembly of the Gods, Mount Parnassus, and several other subjects; after Raffaele.

The Bath of the Anabaptists; copied from Aldegrever.

WOODEN CUTS.

Several sets of small historical subjects from the Bible.

The Metamorphoses of Ovid, in one hundred and seventy cuts; published at Frankfort in 1583.

A set of cuts for the Emblems of Nicholas Reuser. 1581.

Another set of cuts for the Emblems of Andrews Alciatus. 1581.

[There has been considerable discussion respecting Virgilius Solis, particularly whether he ever engraved in wood; Zani says, decidedly, "non ha mai inciso in legno." Perhaps all that need be said on the matter is concentrated in the preliminary remarks of Bartsch to the catalogue of his prints in tom ix. of "Le Peintre Graveur," of which the following is the substance. "The little we know of the history of Virgilius Solis is supplied by an inscription at the bottom of his portrait engraved by a master who signs with the letters B. J." The inscription, which is in German, may be thus rendered:

VIRGILIUS SOLIS was my name;
Through all the world extends my fame;
For artists many, form'd by me,
Acknowledge my paternity
And call me father. I did ever
To serve them use my best endeavour;
I painted, graved with the burin;
Illumin'd, to make art alluring;
Design'd, to waken their ability;
And etch'd, to teach their hands facility;
And subjects traced on blocks of wood:—
So, no one as my equal stood
In executing works of art
With skill refined in every part.
In justice, then, the voice of fame
Has given me SOLIS for my name;
For that imports that, like the sun,
I stand alone—the only one.
When fifteen hundred sixty-two,
As Christians reckon, onward drew,
And years I counted forty-eight,
God pleased to call me from the state
Of mortal life; and His behest
Has number'd me among the blest.

By this we learn that he was born in 1514, and that he died in 1562. The inscription details all the branches of art he exercised. He painted, and illuminated prints (Sandrart says that in the latter he excelled all the artists of his time). He engraved with the burin, and etched with aquafortis; he made designs, and traced them on wood prepared for being engraved. Consequently, it may be inferred, he did not himself engrave the numerous wood cuts that bear his monogram, as is generally pretended notwithstanding the many pieces that have the cipher of the wood engraver, in addition to that of Virgilius Solis; and notwithstanding also that a great part of these were not published till several years after his death; a circumstance of itself sufficient, if not to prove, at least to excite suspicion that the cutting was done by other hands. As regards the engravings with the burin and aquafortis which bear his mark, there are such various degrees of merit in them, that so far from indicating the several epochs of an individual artist's progress, we feel at once convinced that a great number of them are executed by different engravers, who apparently were his disciples, after his designs, on which they marked his cipher. The passage of the inscription that he had formed many artists by the productions of his hand, and that they called him father, seems to confirm this conjecture in a great measure. Besides, Virgil Solis having only attained to the age of forty-eight, and having died rich, as is gathered from the preface to the collection of Bible prints, it is to be believed that he did not gain his wealth by his personal exertions only, but also by the works executed for him by his scholars. Bartsch excuses himself for not having placed the prints by Virgil Solis in a class distinct from those of inferior execution, which, in his opinion, were engraved by his pupils from his designs, from the difficulty of discovering fine impressions for comparison; but all his prints have become so rare that scarcely any but bad impressions are to be met with, even in the richest collections. The cause of this rarity is perhaps less on account of their beauty than the smallness of their size, which rendered them liable to be lost; or perhaps they were given to young children to amuse themselves in colouring them. The latter reason seems to be the better, as, however small the prints, they would have been, otherwise, preserved as book illustrations. It would seem that the wood cuts from the designs of Virgil Solis, after being used for the books they were originally intended to illustrate, were transferred to foreign printers, or booksellers, and hence some curious anomalies occur. Several are to be found in Archbishop Parker's Bible, printed by Richard Jugge in 1568. In the second edition, in 1572, two of the ornamental initial letters, originally intended for an edition of Ovid, are used. In the letter G, which forms the commencement of the first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the subject designed by the artist represents the story of Leda and the Swan; and in the letter T at the beginning of the first chapter of the Epistle general of St. John, the subject is Venus before Jupiter, with Cupid, Juno, Mars, Neptune, and other heathen deities. There is an improbable story related by John Evelyn, of Virgil Solis having had his eyes put out by order of the magistrates of Nuremberg, for having engraved the Postures of Giulio Romano; there is no mention by any writer of authority of such copies, nor the slightest evidence of his ever having been punished in any way by the magistrates. Had he lent his talent to the propagation of those infamous designs, the writer of the inscription to his portrait would hardly have thought him worthy of being placed among the blessed after his death.]

SOLOMAYOR, LUIS DE. See SCOMAYOR.

[SOLVYNS, FRANCIS BALTHASAR, a marine painter, was born at Antwerp in 1760. His sea-pieces, however, are not numerous, as his fondness for travel led him to visit India, where he employed himself in observing and depicting the customs and manners of the people. This work was first engraved and published at Calcutta in 1799, and afterwards republished at Paris in 1808, in four atlas folio volumes, with the letter-press in French and English, at the price of a hundred guineas. It consists of nearly three hundred coloured plates of the occupations, festivals, and costumes of the Hindoos. In the preface to this latter edition, the author complains of the piracy committed on his former work by a London publisher. He says, "A Mr. Orme published in London a piecemeal collection, a sort of counterfeit of a set of sketches which I had formerly published at Calcutta, and which, even in the country itself, were received with great applause. They were, however, no more than a rough outline of some part of what I now publish. An early and regular education in the imitative arts in the school of a most celebrated master; painful journeys, continued absence from my native country, long residence in a foreign climate, care, fidelity, study, and expense, I have spared none of these to acquire true and ample information, and render my work as interesting and meritorious as the subject would admit. May the reception which it meets from the public prove that the execution is not unworthy of the labour and expense." It met, however, with very little encouragement, and involved its author in pecuniary embarrassment. He died in 1824. One of his marine pieces, a view from Ostend, is in the palace at Vienna.]

SOLY, ARTHUR, an obscure English engraver, who lived about the year 1683. He was employed by Robert White, and engraved a few portraits, among which are the following:

His own Portrait; dated 1683.

Tobias Crisp, D. D., Rector of Brinckworth, Wiltshire; prefixed to his Sermons. 1689.

Richard Baxter, Presbyter. 1683.

SOMER, or SOMMEREN, MATHIAS VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He engraved a set of landscapes, marked with the initials M. V. S., and his name is affixed to a small oval portrait of John Ernest, dated 1666. [There are many portraits by him; among them, that of Oliver Cromwell.]

SOMER, JOHN VAN, was probably a relation of the preceding artist, and flourished about the year 1675. He engraved in mezzotinto some indifferent plates from the Dutch painters, and a few portraits, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The Duchess of Mazarine.

Charles Louis, Elector of Bavaria.

Michael Adriantsz [de Ruyter], Dutch Admiral; after [Karel] Du Jardin.

SUBJECTS.

Peasants drinking; after A. Both.

Dutch Boors regaling; after A. Ostade.

A Flemish Concert; after Teniers.

A Conversation; after Tevburg.

A Drinking Party; after his own design.

Abraham and the Angels; after Peter Lastman.

He usually marked his plates with the monogram

SOMER, PAUL VAN, was apparently of the same family with John van Somer. After residing some time at Paris, where he engraved several plates, he came to England, and settled in London, where he died in 1694. He etched, engraved, and scraped in mezzotinto. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

A Portrait of the Countess of Meath; after Mignard.

Tobit burying the Dead; after Seb. Bourdon.

Moses saved from the Waters of the Nile; after N. Poussin.

The Baptism of Christ; after the same.

Nil placet, &c., or the Fable of the Old Man and his Ass; after Griffier; a set of six etchings.

The Four Times of the Day; from his own designs.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; from the same.

The Holy Family; from the same.

[SOMER, or SOMEREN, BERNARD and PAUL, brothers, born at Antwerp, Bernard in 1579, and Paul in 1581. Bernard visited Italy, and on his return joined his brother at Antwerp, where, it is said, they painted some historical pictures. They were considered as men of talent. Bernard died in 1632, and Paul in 1641.]

[SOMMERAU, LUDWIG, a painter and engraver, but more known as the latter, was born at Wolfenbüttel in 1750. He was a scholar of Mechel at Basle. He engraved several portraits; and some pieces after Guido, Domenichino, Guercino, and Raphael, particularly about twenty of the designs for tapestry in the Vatican, by the last. These were published at Rome in 1780. The same has been published in London in 1837, with six additional plates, and explanations by Cattermole.]

SOMPEL, or SOMPELEN, PETER VAN. This artist was born at Antwerp about the year 1600, and was instructed in engraving by Peter Soutman, whose style he followed with success. His plates are neatly executed, and produce an agreeable effect, particularly his portraits, which possess considerable merit. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Paracelsus, the famous Physician; after Soutman.
Henry, Count of Nassau; after the same.
Philip of Nassau, Prince of Orange; after the same.
The Emperor Charles V.; after Rubens.
Cardinal Ferdinand, brother to Philip IV.; Governor of the Netherlands; after Vanduyck.
Isabella Clara Eugenia, Infanta of Spain; after the same.
Gaston, Duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIII.; after the same.
Margaret, his consort; after the same.
Philip the Bold, Duke of Burgundy; after J. van Eyck.
Frederick Henry of Nassau; after G. Hondthorst.

SUBJECTS.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after Rubens.
The Crucifixion; after the same.
Juno and Ixion; after the same.

[The only date by which we know when this master operated, is 1643 on a print of Christ journeying to Emmaus, after Rubens.]

SON, [or ZOON,] JORIS VAN. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1622. He excelled in painting flowers and fruit, and treated those subjects with considerable success. His pictures are agreeably composed, his pencil is light and flowing, and his colouring chaste and clear. [His death is placed by Balckema in 1676.]

SON, [or ZOON,] JOHN VAN, was the son of the preceding artist, and was born at Antwerp about the year 1650. His genius led him to paint similar subjects to those of his father, by whom he was instructed in the art, and whom he greatly surpassed. It was his constant practice to paint every thing from nature, and he copied every object before him with a precision and fidelity that approach to illusion. He came to England when young, and having married the niece of Robert Streater, he succeeded to a great portion of her uncle's business. He painted flowers, fruit, dead game, vases, curtains fringed with gold, Turkey carpets, and similar objects of still-life. These subjects he composed in a picturesque manner; his touch was free and spirited, and his colouring rich and transparent. This artist is called Francis van Son in the Anecdotes, but Descamps and the other authorities style him John. He died in London in 1700. [Others place his birth in 1661, and his death in 1723.]

SON, [ANTHONY, or NICHOLAS] DE. This artist, who flourished about the year 1628, imitated the style of Callot with success. We have several etchings by him from the designs of Callot, as well as some from his own compositions. Among others are the following :

A set of small Landscapes with figures and buildings.

The Village Fair; after Callot.

The Companion, representing a street, with a coach in the back-ground, and several female figures.

[This engraver was a native of Rheims. He is sometimes called Anthony, but several of his prints have N. de Son fecit.

SOPHONISBA. See ANGOSCIOLA.

SORELLO, MIGUEL. This artist was a native of Spain, but he established himself at Rome about the year 1650, where he learned engraving from James Frey. He engraved several prints after the Italian masters, but his principal work is a set of eight plates from the tapestry in the Vatican, designed by Raffaele, representing

The Nativity.

The Purification of the Virgin.

Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter.

Christ descending into Hell.

The Resurrection.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus.

Christ appearing to Magdalene.

The Conversion of St. Paul.

[As Giacomo Frey was born in 1681, and died at Rome in 1752, there is a mistake here of about 100 years. Sorello was born at Barcelona about 1700, and died in 1765. He was one of the engravers employed on the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published in 1757 and 1761.]

[SORGH, M. See ZORO.]

SORNIQUE, DOMINICK, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1722. He was a pupil of Charles Simonneau, whose style of engraving he followed with considerable success, and executed a variety of vignettes, and other book-plates, in a neat, clear style. He also engraved several portraits and other subjects, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Armand J. du Plessis, Cardinal de Richelieu; after Nanteuil.
John Louis, Duke of Epemon; after the same.
Louis de Bourbon, Admiral of France; after Mignard.
Marshal Saxe; after Rigaud.

SUBJECTS.

Diana and her Nymphs; after Coreggio.

The Rape of the Sabines; after L. Giordano.

Peasants regaling; after Teniers.

[He was born in 1707, and died in 1756. Had he been born in 1722, he would hardly have been a pupil of Charles Simonneau, who died in 1728. See Nagler for a list of his works.]

SORRI, PIETRO. This painter was born at Siena in 1556, and was for some time a scholar of Arcangelo Salimbeni, but he afterwards studied at Florence, under Cavaliere Passignano, whose daughter he married. He adopted the system of his father-in-law, which was characterized by a mixture of the Florentine and Venetian taste. He accompanied Passignano to Venice, where he improved his manner, by studying the works of Paul Veronese, whose splendid style is discernible in his best pictures. Less prompt in his operation than Passignano, his colour is more durable, and his design more graceful and correct. There are several of his works in the public edifices at Florence and the other cities of Tuscany, particularly at Pisa, where he represented, in the cathedral, the Consecration of that Basilica, and painted an altar-piece of Christ disputing with the Doctors. He died in 1622.

[SOTO, JUAN DE, a Spanish historical painter, flourished at Madrid in the early part of the seventeenth century. He was one of the best scholars of Bartolomé Carducho, and assisted him in several of his works. Although young, he was selected from among the great professors of his time to decorate in fresco the queen's dressing-room in the palace of the Pardo. He painted several pictures in oil, by which he obtained a high reputation; they were much in the style of his master, pure in design, and harmonious in colour. The expectations he had raised were, however, disappointed by his early death in 1620, in the twenty-eighth year of his age.]

[SOTO, DON LORENZO DE, was born at Madrid in 1634. He was instructed in the art of painting by Benito Manuel de Agüero, whose manner he afterwards imitated. He painted landscapes with great truth, and adorned them with figures of hermits and saints. He did not confine himself to these subjects, but painted others of a higher grade; one represents a circumstance in the life of Sta. Rosa, on a large scale, and served as the altar-piece to the church of Atocha, but is now, or was, at Madrid. In consequence of an attempt by the government to impose a tax on the artists, similar to that which had been formerly frustrated by El Greco and Carducho, Soto abandoned the practice of his pencil at Madrid and retired to Yecla, in Murcia, where he obtained the post of collector of the royal rents. During this retirement from his profession, he made sketches of the surrounding country, which are praised by Palomino, to whom he had presented several. After an absence of about fifty years he returned to Madrid, but no longer exhibited the talent of his younger days; his works were looked at with indifference, and the poor old man was reduced to the necessity of selling them in the public places for a subsistence. He died in 1688, and was buried in the parish church of S. Justo y Pastor.]

[SOTOMAYOR, LUIS DE, was born at Valencia in 1635; he became a disciple of Estéban March, the painter of battles, but not being disposed to submit to the extravagant quixotisms of that master, he left him, and entered the school of Juan Carreño at Madrid. After profiting by his instructions and example, he returned to Valencia, where he obtained much credit for his productions both in public places and for private collections. He had a fine talent for composition, in which he displayed good taste, and was an excellent colourist. He painted for the Augustine nunnery their titular saint, and St. Christopher in company with Christ and the Virgin; and for the barefooted Carmelites, two large pictures from a legend of the miraculous discovery of an image of the Virgin, called La Morenita, (or the little brown Virgin,) which is an object of their greatest veneration. He again returned to Madrid, where he died in 1673, to the regret, it is said, of his professional brethren, who had formed a high estimate of his talents as an artist.]

SOUBEYRAN, PETER. This artist was a native of Geneva, and flourished about the year 1760. He resided several years at Paris, where he engraved some of the plates for a collection of antique gems, in the king's cabinet, published by Mariette. They were engraved from designs by Bouchardon. We have also, among others, the following prints by him:

The Portrait of Peter the Great; after Caravac.

The Arms of the City of Paris, supported by Genii; after Bouchardon.

The fair Maid of the Village; after Boucher.

He also engraved a variety of vignettes and other book-ornaments after Cochin and others. [He was born in 1708, and died in 1775. Nagler places his birth eleven years earlier.]

[SOURCHES, LOUIS-FRANÇOIS DU BOUCHET, MARQUIS DE, grand provost of France, was born at the commencement of the seventeenth century. He designed and handled the point in the manner of Stefano Della Bella, of whom, it is supposed, he took lessons, during the residence of that artist at Paris from 1640 to 1649. In the print department of the Bibliothèque at Paris are preserved nineteen pieces by this amateur engraver, which are not common. They are copies after Della Bella, and are so exact that it is not surprising that proofs of them before the letters have been mistaken for the originals. But this cabinet does not possess a series of twelve pieces, which are more rare than the former, marked with a monogram supposed to belong to this amateur. They are from original designs, engraved with the point in a style so strongly resembling that of Della Bella, that Messieurs Mariette and Gersaint were deceived, and placed one of them, in their arrangement of the cabinet of M. Paignon-Dijonval, among the works of Della Bella. It represents two men fighting with swords. Robert Dumesnil, "Le Peintre Graveur Français," tom. ii., has given descriptions of these twelve pieces, which are entitled as follows:

1. Le Berger.
2. L'Homme de Qualité.
3. La Dame de Qualité.
4. Le Duel.
5. Le Porte-drapeau.
6. La Marchande de vieux Habits.
7. Le Depart pour la Chasse.
8. Le Promeneur.
9. Le Pêcheur.
10. Le Puits.
11. Les Ramoneurs.
12. Le Batelier.

The pieces after Della Bella are entitled Diuerſes figures et Maneiges de Cheuaux Gravées par le Marquis de Sourches. This inscription appears on the wall of a stable in one of them. Each print has a couplet referring to the qualities of the animals represented. According to le Père Lelong, (Bibliothèque Historique de France,) this artist engraved the portrait of Madame de Nevelet, the wife of a counsellor of the parliament of Paris; but it has escaped the researches of Dumesnil.]

SOUTMAN, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Haerlem about the year 1590. He was a disciple of Rubens, and is said to have painted historical subjects and portraits with considerable success, particularly at the courts of Berlin and Warsaw. We have several prints by this artist, as well from his own designs, as from those of Rubens and other masters, which are executed with great spirit. He appears to have aimed at giving a striking effect to his plates, by keeping all the masses of light broad and clear; but by carrying this idea too far, many of his prints have a slight, unfinished appearance, though neatly executed. The following are his most esteemed works:

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

The Fall of the Angels. The first impressions are before the address of the younger Bouttat.

The Defeat of the Army of Sennacherib.

Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter; from a design by Rubens, after Raffaele.

The Last Supper; from a drawing by Rubens, after Lionardo da Vinci.

The miraculous Draught of Fishes.

The Dead Christ at the Tomb, with the Holy Women. The first impressions are before the shadows were strengthened by Witdoeck.

The Crucifixion.

The Consecration of a Bishop.

The Rape of Proserpine.

The Triumph of Venus.

Silenus supported by a Satyr and a Negress.

A Boar-hunt. 1642.

The Hunting of the Lion and the Lioness.
the Wolf.

the Crocodile and Hippopotamus.

He also engraved several portraits of the Counts of Flanders, and other eminent personages of the Low Countries, in which he was assisted by his scholars, Snyderhoef, Louys, and P. van Sompel. [Nagler, who gives a good list of his works, places his birth in, or about, 1580. He operated in 1650.]

SPADA, LIONELLO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1576. His parents were extremely poor, and he was placed, when a boy, in the service of the Caracci, in the capacity of a colour grinder. This employment, however humble, gave him an opportunity of occasionally hearing their conferences, and of contemplating their works. Stimulated by a native disposition, he attempted some essays in design, which attracted the notice and received the commendation of his masters, who encouraged him to persevere in his pursuit, and admitted him into their academy. His progress under their instruction was surprising, and he became an eminent disciple of that distinguished school. One of his first works, which excited public admiration, was a picture of S. Francesco and S. Domenico kneeling before the Virgin, in the Chiesa de Poveri, at Bologna; and Malvasia reports, that on Guido's first seeing that performance, he sarcastically observed, that the powers of Lionello seemed to be confined to decoration, which so exasperated him, that he determined to rival the graceful and delicate style of that painter, by adopting a system more masculine and vigorous. Vindictively bent on his purpose, he had recourse to the energetic style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, whose novelty and extraordinary effect had at that time acquired him such popularity; and he went to Rome, to study under that master. In adopting the daring contrast of light and shadow which distinguishes the works of Caravaggio, he avoided the vulgarity of his character, for which he substituted somewhat of grandeur and elevation, which he had acquired in the school of the Caracci, though his forms are neither beautiful nor select. On his return to Bologna, he acquired great celebrity by a picture he painted for the refectory of S. Procolo, of the Miraculous Draught of Fishes; and still more by his celebrated altar-piece in the church of S. Domenico, representing that saint burning the forbidden books, which is considered his best performance. The latter part of his life was passed at Parma, in the service of the Duke Ranuccio, by whom he was patronized until the death of that prince. He did not long survive his protector, and died at Parma in 1622. [He sometimes marked his pictures with a sword, (in Italian Spada), crossed with the letter L.]

[SPADINO, ———, a Neapolitan painter, of whom there is no account. He painted fruit and flowers in a manner truly surprising. From what the editor has seen he can answer for the beauty of the works, but can only conjecture that the artist lived about the commencement of the 18th century.

Zani gives the names Spadino il vecchio, and Spadino il giovane, the first a Neapolitan, the other a Roman, both painters of flowers, but he gives no dates. A Veronica Spada is mentioned, who painted flowers, fruit, and birds; she was probably of Verona.]

[SPAENDONCK, GERARD VAN, a distinguished fruit and flower painter, was born at Tilburgh in Holland in 1746, and studied under the elder Herreyns at Antwerp. At the age of twenty-four he went to Paris, where for some time he practised as a miniature painter, but still pursuing his favourite branch of art, fruit and flower painting. His exquisite productions in this department attracted general attention among amateurs, and they were purchased with avidity. As he never relaxed in his endeavours at excellence, his works continued to be favourites with the public, and even considered as valuable additions to the best collections. His selections and arrangements are excellent, and his colouring true to nature. His work entitled "Fleurs dessinées d'après Nature" informs us that he was a member of the National Institute, and Professor Administrator of the Museum of Natural History at Paris, where he died in 1822.—His brother Cornelius, who was born in 1756, was also a painter of flowers. He was chiefly employed at the Sevres porcelain manufactory, but occasionally painted portraits in oil. It is not said when he died, but it was before his brother Gerard.]

SPAGNOLETTO, JOSEF RIBERA, called IL. This eminent painter was born at Xativa, in the kingdom of Valencia, in 1589. Having discovered an early inclination for the art, his parents, though in indigent circumstances, did every thing in their power to promote his desire of becoming a painter. He was placed as a student with Francisco Ribalta, under whom he studied a few years; but before he was sixteen, he determined on visiting Italy, in search of improvement, though destitute of every means of supporting himself on the journey, except what he could derive from the exercise of his juvenile talents. He arrived at Naples in 1606, where Michael Angelo Caravaggio had at that time taken refuge, being under the necessity of flying from Rome, to avoid the consequences of a homicide he had committed in that capital. The powerful and effective style of that painter had particular attraction for Ribera, who paid his court to Caravaggio with so much address, that he favoured him with his instruction during his residence at Naples. The progress of the young Spaniard was remarkable, and his early productions were so much admired, that he acquired the appellation of Il Spagnoletto. From Naples he went to Parma, where the works of Coreggio were for some time the objects of his contemplation, and afterwards visited Rome. The grandeur of Raffaelle, and the graces of Coreggio, appear, however, to have made a less lasting impression on the mind of Spagnoletto than the vigour and energy of Caravaggio, and though he for some time attempted to enliven and embellish his style, by an imitation of the higher characteristics by which the works of those illustrious artists are distinguished, it was not attended with much success.

The great number of reputable artists then resident at Rome, determined Ribera to return to Naples, where he was taken under the protection of the viceroy, and was employed in several considerable works, which were sent to the king of Spain. His principal pictures at Naples are, the Martyrdom of S. Januarius, in the royal chapel; S. Jerome and S. Bruno, in the church of La Trinità delle Monache; and the taking down from the Cross, at the Carthusians.

The genius of Spagnoletto led him to paint gloomy and austere subjects, which were peculiarly acceptable to the Neapolitans and Spaniards, such as hermits, and saints emaciated by abstinence and severity. He also selected for the subjects of his pictures images of savage greatness and terrific sublimity. In tragic compositions, the distortions of agonized nature, in martyrdoms, executions, and torments, he was eminently successful. These dreadful subjects he treated with horrific fidelity, and with a correctness of design which might serve as a study for the anatomist. He died at Naples in 1656. We have about twenty etchings by Il Spagnoletto, executed in a bold, free style, producing a powerful and fine effect. His drawing is correct, and the extremities of his figures are marked in a very masterly manner. He sometimes signed his prints with his name, and sometimes marked them with one of these monograms, SP. AR.

Bv. The following are his principal plates :

- The Dead Christ, extended on a linen cloth.
- The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew.
- St. Jerome, with an Angel blowing a trumpet.
- St. Jerome reading, with a Skull on the ground.
- The Penitence of St. Peter.
- Bacchus made drunk by Satyrs.
- The Portrait of Don John of Austria, on horseback.

[Bermudez has set at rest the question of Ribera's birth, by producing an extract from the baptismal register; he was born on the 12th of January, 1588. The foregoing article contains a tolerably correct outline of his history and character as an artist. They who are desirous of knowing more of him, not only as a painter, but as a man, will do well to consult Mr. Ford's "Hand-book of Spain," and Mr. Stirling's recently published "Annals of the Artists of Spain." These works contain all that need be required to be known, not of Ribera in particular, but of every other Spanish painter of any note. Their criticisms, also, on Spanish pictures will be found discriminating and just; no maudlin common-place repetitions, but bold, enlightened, independent remarks on subjects, characters, and artistic execution. Their censures will sometimes startle, but their truth will tend to dissipate much of the prevailing ignorance, which has too long existed, with regard to the Spanish masters. It should be noticed that Ribera was an excellent painter of portraits. His sketches, executed with the pen, or with red chalk, are much esteemed by collectors. With regard to his etchings, Bartsch has described eighteen, all that he believes really belong to him. He remarks, "the prints of Spagnoletto are reckoned among the most remarkable engravings in aquafortis. His Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew is a real chef d'œuvre, it is impossible to carry to a higher degree of truth the expression in the head of the Saint, and in that of the executioner. In all his works [of this class] purity and exactitude of design are observable, particularly in the extremities, the delicacy of the point; and the ingenious manner in which the hatchings follow the forms of the muscles and draperies. Besides, his etchings exhibit such facility and taste, such variety in the mode of execution, adapted with so much intelligence to the different objects, and apparently so little assisted by the burin that doubt is almost excited whether he ever employed it, yet the whole displays harmony and vigorous effect."]

SPAGNUOLO, GIOVANNI, called LO SPAGNA. This artist was a native of Spain, but studied in Italy under Pietro Perugino, and, according to Vasari, was one of his ablest disciples. He resided chiefly at Spoleti and Assisi, where he has left proofs of his talents, which rank him among the most respectable painters of his time. In the church degli Angioli, at Assisi, is a picture by this master, which is spoken of by Baldinucci in very favourable terms. He was living in 1524.

[Giovanni Lo Spagno, or Spagnuolo, a Spaniard by birth, was a fellow pupil with Raphael under Pietro Perugino. He settled at Spoleto, where he left many of his best works. Vasari says the colouring of Perugino survived in him more than in any of his fellow scholars; and it is asserted, that no other pupil of the school painted portraits with more truth, except Raphael. A picture by him, dated 1516, is in the chapel of S. Stefano, in S. Francesco, at Assisi. It represents the Virgin enthroned, with three saints on each side, and is remarkable for grace, nobleness, and elevated feeling; and in the chapel of the Angioli, below Assisi, he painted in fresco a series of portraits of the brotherhood of St. Francis, which are spoken of as beautiful and dignified figures. Rosini, Storia della Pittura Italiana, plate 104, has given an outline of one of his compositions, representing the Virgin and Child attended by St. Mark, St. Francis, St. Catharine, and a canonized bishop: it is worthy of Raphael at the same period. This is the same painter that is noticed in a former article, taken from Bermudez, under the name Juan de Espana.]

SPALTHOF, N., a Dutch painter, who flourished about the year 1636. It is not ascertained by whom he was instructed in the art, but he is said by Descamps to have visited Italy, where he studied several years. He excelled in painting fairs, Italian markets, carnivals, and merry-makings, which are ingeniously composed and designed in the Italian taste, resembling the style of Theodore Helmbrecker. The figures with which they are decorated are correctly drawn, and are touched with neatness and spirit.

SPECCHI, ALESSANDRO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1699. He engraved a set of plates of views of the palaces and public buildings at Rome, which are executed in a bold, spirited style. They are decorated with figures, neatly and tastefully designed. These engravings were published by Dom. de Rossi, in 1699. [He flourished from 1665 to 1706, and, it is supposed, died in 1710. His views in and about Rome were published at different periods.]

SPECTLE, or SPECKIN, VITUS RODOLPHUS, an old engraver on wood, who flourished at Strasburg about the year 1540. He executed a set of cuts for Fuchs's Herbal, published in that year, with a whole-length portrait of the author, the portraits of Henry Fullmaurer and Albert Maher, who designed the figures, and the engraver's own portrait. The cuts do great credit to the ability of the artist. [The name of this artist is variously written; Nagler calls him Specklin, or Speckle. He operated in 1549.]

[SPEER, MARTIN, or MICHAEL, a painter and engraver, was born at Regensburg in 1700. It is said that he became a disciple of Solimena; at all events he imitated his manner, and engraved some of his allegories and martyrdoms. He painted several altar-pieces and historical pictures, and there are engravings by him after his own designs. They are signed M. Speers inv. et fecit, 1742. The time of his death is not accurately known; Zani says in 1762.]

[SPELT, ADRIAN VANDER, a flower painter, was born at Gonda, according to some authorities, or at Leyden, according to others, about 1630. He was a scholar of W. Crabeth. He resided in Germany for a considerable time, where his flower-pieces were held in great estimation, and was patronized by the Elector of Brandenburg. He returned to his native country, and died at Leyden in 1673.]

SPENCER, JARVIS, a painter in miniature and in enamel, who flourished about the middle of the last century. Of this self-taught artist, Edwards gives the following account. "He was originally a gentleman's servant, but, having a natural turn to the pursuits of art, amused himself with drawing. It happened that one of the family with which he lived sat for their portrait to a miniature painter, and when the work was completed, it was shown to him; upon which he observed, that he thought he could copy it. This hint was received with much surprise, but he was indulged with permission to make the attempt, and his success was such, that he not only gave perfect satisfaction, but also acquired the encouragement and patronage of those he served, and, by their interest, became a fashionable painter of the day." He died in 1763.

SPERANZA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA. This painter was born at Rome about the year 1610. He was a disciple of Francesco Albano, under whom he became a correct designer, and improved his style by studying with great assiduity the distinguished works of art which adorn his native city. He acquired considerable celebrity as a painter of history, particularly in fresco. In a chapel in the church of S. Caterina da Siena, there are some frescoes by him, representing subjects from the life of the Virgin; and in the church of the Orfanelli is a ceiling by this master, representing, in five compartments, the Passion of our Saviour. Several other works of this painter, in the public edifices at Rome, are mentioned by Baglione. To the great regret of all the admirers of the art, this esteemed painter died, in the prime of life, in 1640.

SPERLING, JEROME, a German engraver, born at Augsburg about the year 1693. He was a pupil of Preissler, at Nuremberg, and engraved part of the plates for a collection of the churches in the city of Vienna, published by J. A. Peffel, in 1724. He also executed part of the plates engraved from the marble statues in the gallery of the King of Poland, at Dresden, published in 1733. We have also by him a set of thirteen plates of the Twelve Months of the Year, represented in allegorical subjects, with a frontispiece, representing the portraits of the Pope and the Elector of Cologne. [He engraved many portraits, chiefly after German painters. He signed his prints H. (Hieronymus) Sperling. He died in 1777.]

[SPERLING, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a painter of portraits and small poetical or historical subjects, was born at Halle, in Saxony, in 1691. He was the son of Johan Heinrich Sperling, a painter of portraits and fancy heads, who resided at Hamburg, but removed to Halle. John Christian received the elements from his father, but afterwards studied the art under Adrian Vander Werff at Rotterdam, and adopted his manner of painting. Some of his pictures are in the galleries at Dresden and Salzda hlum; and many portraits by him of persons of high rank exist in Germany. They are but little known elsewhere. He died at Ansbach in 1746.]

[SPEY, MARTIN, a painter of portraits, flowers, and dead game, was born at Antwerp in 1777. He left his native country for Paris in 1809, and remained there till the entry of the allied army, when he disappeared, and has not been heard of since.]

SPEZZINI, FRANCESCO. According to Soprani, this artist was a native of Genoa, and flourished about the year 1578. He was first a scholar of Luca Cambiasi, but he afterwards studied under Giovanni Batista Castelli. Desirous of improving himself by contemplating the works of the great masters at Rome, he visited that city, where he passed some time in studying the admirable productions of Raffaello, Giulio Romano, and M. Angelo Buonarotti. On his return to Genoa, he painted several pictures for the public places in that city, particularly an altar-piece for the church of S. Colombano, which is considered his best work. He died young, of the plague.

SPICER, HENRY, an eminent English painter in miniature and enamel. He was very extensively employed, and attained to considerable excellence as an enamel painter, though he never arrived at the beauty and delicacy of execution which distinguish the inimitable productions of Mr. Bone, whose enamel pictures infinitely surpass every thing that has appeared in that branch of the art. Mr. Spicer died in 1804, aged about 60.

SPICER, ———, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved some portraits after Sir Joshua Reynolds, among which is that of Barbara, Countess of Coventry.

[SPIEGL, JOSEPH, a mezzotinto engraver, of whom there are no particulars, except that he was born in 1772, and received his artistic education in the academy at Vienna. There are five mezzotinto prints by him :

A Holy Family; after Sassoferrato.
Mater dolorosa; after Guido.
Venus and Cupid; after N. Poussin.
Bacchus and Ariadne; after Gavin Hamilton.
A Female bathing; after Rubens.]

SPIERRE, FRANCIS. This eminent artist was born at Nancy in 1643, and went to Paris when he was young, where he became a pupil of Francis de Poilly, whose style of engraving he for some time followed with the greatest success. He did not, however, confine himself to the manner of his instructor, but went to Italy, where he formed a pleasing and novel mode of handling the graver, which was much admired. He did not long survive his return to his native country, but died in 1681. The following are his most esteemed prints :

PORTRAITS.

Pope Innocent XI.; engraved with single strokes, in the style of Mellan; Franciscus Spier, del. et sculp.
The Grand Duke of Tuscany; dated 1659.
Lorenzo, Count de Marsciano; after his own design.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin suckling the infant Christ; after Coreggio. This fine print is very scarce. The first impressions are before the drapery was inserted to cover the nudity of the child. [In Mariette's sale, an impression of this print sold for 500 francs, and in that of Sylvestre for 756 francs.]

St. Michael combating the Evil Spirit; after P. da Cortona.
The Conception of the Virgin; after the same.
The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Catherine; after the same.

The Circumcision; after Ciro Ferri.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after Bernini.

The miracle of the Loaves and Fishes; after the same.

Christ on the Cross, suspended over a sea of blood, which flows from his wounds; after the same; executed with single strokes. The first impressions are before the heads of the cherubs were added at the top.

SPIERINGS, N. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1633. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Italy when he was young, where he resided some years, and distinguished himself as a landscape painter. On his return to the Netherlands he passed some time at Paris, where his pictures were much admired, and he was for some time employed by Louis XIV. He appears to have formed his manner by studying the works of Salvator Rosa, to whose bold and eccentric style the best works of Spierings bear a great resemblance. The forms of his rocks and trees are grand and picturesque, and his touch is firm and spirited. As he was not successful in the design of the figure, his pictures are usually decorated with historical subjects by other artists. In the church of the Carmelites at Antwerp, is a fine landscape by Spierings, with figures by the elder Eyckens. [The baptismal name of Spierings is not known; Balkema boldly calls him Nicolas. He died in 1691.]

SPIERS, ALBERT VAN, was born at Amsterdam in 1666, and was a scholar of William van Inghen, an historical painter of some eminence. He had already given proof of considerable talent in his native country, when he determined to visit Rome, where his instructor, Van Inghen, had studied with so much advantage. Arrived in the metropolis of art, he contemplated with admiration and delight the wonderful productions with which he was surrounded; but, above all others, the works of Raffaele, Giulio Romano, and Domenichino, particularly occupied his attention. After passing seven years at Rome, in assiduous application to his studies, he went to Venice, to perfect himself in colouring, by studying the works of the best masters of that distinguished school. After a residence in Italy of ten years, he returned to Holland in 1697, and established himself at Amsterdam, where he was extensively employed in ornamenting the principal mansions with poetical and historical subjects, which were greatly admired, and he was regarded as one of the ablest artists of his time. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, the character of his design partakes more of the Roman than the Dutch school, and he had acquired by his studies at Venice a chaste and harmonious system of colouring. Van Spiers had established a brilliant reputation, by an indefatigable exercise of his estimable talents, when he fell a victim to a too assiduous application to his profession, in 1718.

SPILBERG, JOHN. This artist was born at Dusseldorf in 1619. He was the son of a glass-painter, who was in the service of the Duke of Wolfgang, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of design. It was his father's intention to have sent him to Antwerp, to be educated in the school of Rubens, and, as an introduction to that great painter, the Duke had favoured him with a letter to Rubens, recommending the young artist to his particular attention. He was on the eve of his departure for Antwerp, when he received the news of the death of the head of the Flemish school. He afterwards went to Amsterdam, where he became a scholar of Govaert Flinck. He prosecuted his studies under that able artist for seven years with the greatest assiduity, and on leaving his school, became in a short time a celebrated painter of history and portraits. The reputation he had acquired at Amsterdam reached the court of Dusseldorf, and he was invited to establish himself there, in the capacity of painter to the Elector Palatine. He painted the portrait of his protector, and those of the principal personages of his family, and decorated the churches at Dusseldorf with several of his historical works. For the castle at Dusseldorf he painted a series of pictures, representing the Labours of Hercules, in which he discovered a fertile and original invention, and a commanding facility of execution. For these considerable works he was liberally rewarded by his patron, and presented with a gold medal and chain, as a token of his approbation. He was commissioned by the Elector to paint a set of pictures of the Life of Christ, which he did not live to accomplish, but died in 1690.

SPILBERG, ADRIANA. This lady was the daughter of the preceding artist, born at Amsterdam in 1646, and was instructed in design and painting by her father. She excelled in painting portraits in crayons, though she occasionally practised in oil. Her portraits are said to have had the merit of an exact resemblance; they were executed with neatness and care, and delicately coloured. She was much patronized at the court of Dusseldorf, where she chiefly resided.

SPILIMBERGO, IRENE DI. According to Ridolfi, this ingenious lady was of an illustrious family of Venice, and flourished about the year 1550. Although she only practised painting for her amusement, she applied herself to the study of it with all the zeal of a professor, and is said to have had the advantage of receiving lessons from Titian. Lanzi mentions three pictures, representing subjects of sacred history, by this lady, preserved in the Casa Maniagi, which, though not very correctly designed, are coloured with a richness and harmony worthy of the ablest artists of that school. Titian is said to have painted an admirable portrait of his noble pupil, with whose family he lived in habits of intimacy.

SPILMAN, HENRY. This artist is miscalled John, by Mr. Strutt. He was born at the Hague about the year 1738, and painted portraits and landscapes with some reputation. He engraved a few plates, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Henry Tilly; after C. van Noord.
His own Portrait; after the same painter.

LANDSCAPES AND VIEWS.

Six small Landscapes, representing Views in Holland, on one sheet; inscribed Plaisante Landschapien, H. Spilman, inv. et sculp.
A View, called the Rochin; after J. de Boyer.

He also engraved three landscapes, in the style of drawings in bistre, after Everdingen, Van Borsum, and Berghem. These are said, by Hubert, to be now very scarce, the plates having been destroyed. [Henry Spilman was born at Amsterdam in 1721; some of his prints were published in 1745; indeed one after Van Goyen has the date 1632. See Nagler for a list of his works.]

SPILSBURY, INIGO, an English engraver and printseller, who resided in London about the year 1760. He engraved several plates in mezzotint, and in the dotted style, and, particularly in the latter manner, a collection of gems, which were published in numbers. We have by him a great number of portraits and other subjects, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS AND HEADS.

A set of fourteen Heads and Busts; in the manner of Rembrandt. 1767 and 1768.
 George III. when Prince of Wales. 1759.

SPINELLO, ARETINO. This old painter was born at Arezzo in 1308, and was a disciple of Jacopo di Casentino. Before he had reached his twentieth year, he surpassed his instructor, and proved superior to his contemporaries in the invention and arrangement of his subjects. In the sacristy of S. Miniato, at Florence, are still remaining some pictures by him of the life of S. Benedetto, which are the best preserved of his works. He was employed, in conjunction with the best artists of his time, in the decorations of the Campo Santo at Pisa, where he painted in fresco the history of SS. Petito ed Epiro, which Vasari ranks among his best productions. He gained great reputation by his portraits of Pope Innocent IV. and Gregory IX. In the church of S. Maria Maggiore, at Florence, he painted a series of frescoes of the Life of the Virgin, which, though stiff and Gothic in the design, were among the most esteemed productions of the early period at which he lived. He died in 1400.

[It is ascertained that Aretino Spinello painted, in conjunction with his son Parri, in 1407, the frescoes in the Sala della Balia in the Palazzo Pubblico at Siena. These paintings represent the struggle between the papacy and the empire, under the Popes Adrian IV. and Alexander III., and Frederick III., surnamed Barbarossa. After the completion of this work, he returned to Arezzo, and vigorously commenced another extensive work in the church of the Archangel Michael, representing the defeat of the rebel angels and their expulsion from heaven. The story relates that in the progress of this work his brain became overheated, and he imagined that Satan appeared to him, fiercely demanding why he had done him such foul wrong in painting him so hideous? The old painter was terror-struck, and the ghastly phantom had mastered his fancy, his eyes were fixed from thenceforth in a round dilated spectral stare, and he died of the fright shortly afterwards. For an excellent account of Aretino Spinello and his works, the inquirer is recommended to peruse the second volume of Lord Lindsay's elegant and spirited "Sketches of the History of Christian Art."]

SPINELLO, GASPARRI, or PARRI, was the son of Aretino Spinello, born at Arezzo in 1356, and was first instructed in the art by his father. His colouring was excellent, but his design was strained and extravagant. Some of his works are still preserved in the church of S. Domenico, at Florence. He was living in 1425.

SPIRINX, J., an indifferent engraver, who flourished about the year 1635. He engraved some frontispieces and other book-plates, which are executed in a slight, poor style.

SPIRINX, L., was probably a relation of the preceding artist. He engraved some frontispieces and other ornaments for books, which are dated from 1641 to 1674, which, though neater than those of J. Spirinx, have little to recommend them. We have a few portraits by this artist, among which is that of Peter de la Mothe, dated 1663.

SPISANO, VINCENZO, called Lo SPISANELLO. According to Malvasia, this painter was born at Orta, in the Milanese, in 1495. He studied at Bologna, in the school of Denys Calvart, whose style he adopted, and followed without deviation. His compositions are, however, less judicious, and his design less correct. Of his numerous works in the public edifices at Bologna, the most remarkable are, the Death of S. Joseph, in S. Maria Maggiore; the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, in S. Giacomo Maggiore; the Baptism of Christ, in S. Francesco; and the Conversion of Paul, in S. Domenico. His easel pictures, of which there are several in the private collections at Bologna, are more esteemed than his altar-pieces. He died in 1662.

SPOFFORTH, ROBERT, an English engraver and printseller, who flourished about the year 1707. From his style of engraving, Mr. Strutt thinks it probable that he was a pupil of S. Gribelin. We have a few portraits by him, among which are the following:

Queen Anne.
 George I.
 John Cole, M. D.

SPOLVERINI, ILARIO. This painter was born at Parma in 1657, and was a disciple of Francesco Monti. Although he occasionally painted historical subjects, he was more celebrated for his pictures representing battles, attacks of banditti, and assassinations, which he designed with spirit, and touched with a vehemence of pencil, well adapted to the subjects. He was much employed by Francesco, Duke of Parma. There are some altar-pieces by him in the cathedral and at the Certosa at Parma. He died in 1734.

SPOONER, CHARLES. This artist is supposed to have been a native of England, though he resided some time in Dublin. We have several portraits and other subjects by him, engraved in mezzotint, and dated from 1752 to 1762, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Thomas Prior; after John Van Nost. 1752.
 Major-General Sir William Johnson; after T. Adams. 1756.
 Miss Gunning; after Costes.

[SPOOR, W. J. L., born at Budel, in the province of North Brabant, was a scholar of Henry Antonissen, at Antwerp. In his early pictures he imitated the manner of that master; but subsequently he employed himself much in copying the pictures of Paul Potter, and other great landscape and animal painters of the Dutch school. He did not altogether neglect original subjects, in some of which he has faithfully represented nature. Prince

William had several of his pictures, copies and originals, in his collection at the Hague.]

SPRANGHER, BARTHOLOMEW. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1546. He was the son of Joachim Sprangher, a merchant of eminence, who destined him for commercial pursuits; but finding in his son a decided inclination for painting, he was placed under the tuition of John Madyn, a painter of some reputation, at Haerlem, with whom he studied eighteen months, and on the death of his instructor he became a scholar of Francis Mostaert. He afterwards travelled through France to Italy, and resided three years at Parma, where he studied under Bernardino Gatti, called Il Sojaro, who had been a disciple of Coreggio. From Parma he went to Rome, where he was favoured with the patronage of Cardinal Farnese, who engaged him in the decoration of his Villa of Caprarola, which he embellished with some landscapes, painted in fresco. He was introduced by that prelate to Pope Pius V., who appointed him his painter, and accommodated him with apartments in the Palazzo Belvidere. The first work he engaged in for his Holiness was a picture of the Last Judgment, an immense composition, of upwards of five hundred figures, painted on a copper-plate, six feet high, which he finished with great care, and it is said to have occupied him nearly three years. This picture was so highly esteemed, that after the death of that pontiff it was placed over his tomb. He was commissioned by the Pope to paint twelve pictures of the Passion of our Saviour, which he did not entirely accomplish before the death of his protector.

In 1575 Sprangher was invited to the court of Vienna, by the Emperor Maximilian II., who appointed him his principal painter. On the death of Maximilian, in 1576, he continued in the service of his successor, Rodolphus II., who engaged him in several considerable works for the palaces and churches, both at Vienna and at Prague. Sprangher was greatly respected by the Emperor Rodolphus, both for his abilities as a painter, and for his literary acquirements, which were extensive, as well as for his talents in conversation. In 1588, the Emperor ennobled him and his descendants, and honoured him, by placing round his neck, with his own hands, a gold medal and chain. He died at Prague in 1623.

With the advantage of residing several years at Rome, Sprangher seems to have been little impressed with the admirable productions of art with which he was surrounded, at least they appear to have made little or no difference in his style, which remained entirely that of his country. It is doubtful whether he ever made a single design from the antique, or from Raffaele. He contented himself with a superficial observance of those excellent models, and depended on his memory for a retention of their beauties. If he paid more attention to the works of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, instead of embellishing his style, it appears to have rendered it more extravagant and preposterous. His design is mannered and constrained, and his attitudes are affected and unnatural. These disgusting deformities are in some degree compensated by a ready and inventive imagination, rich and abundant compositions, and an alluring facility of execution. We have a few etchings by this painter, executed in a slight but masterly style; among which is,

A Figure bound to a Tree, on which the initials of his name are reversed.

[Writers are not agreed as to the exact time of

B. Sprangher's death; the greater number place it in 1628. The better authorities leave it open. With regard to his having been a scholar of John Madyn, or Mandyn, see that article. Nagler, who has given a list of numerous prints engraved from his works, attributes six etchings to him.]

SPRIETT, J. VANDER. The name of this artist is affixed to an indifferent mezzotinto portrait of Timothy Cruso, Presbyter, engraved from his own design. The print has little to recommend it but its rarity. [His name was John; he was a scholar of Verkolie, and died at London about the beginning of the last century.]

[SPRINGINKLEE, HANS. The only information there is respecting this artist is derived from Doppelmayr. It appears that he resided in the house of Albert Durer, from whom he learnt the principles of the art of design, and that he died about 1540. He was formerly ranked among the engravers on wood from his mark ISK appearing on several of the wood-cuts in the work entitled, "Hortulus animæ cum horis beatæ Virginis," &c., printed at Nuremberg first in 1518, and afterwards in 1519 and 1520. Bartsch, who has described sixty-one of these cuts, doubts whether he did more than make the designs for the engraver; Zani is decidedly of opinion that he never did engrave on wood. Jackson, speaking of the artists of the time, Springinklee among them, whose marks, or monograms, appear on wood-cuts, says, "I am extremely doubtful if those cuts were actually engraved by themselves. If they were, I can only say, though they might be good painters and designers, they were very indifferent wood engravers; and that their time in executing the subjects ascribed to them, must have been very badly employed." All, therefore, that regards this artist is wrapped in obscurity, and it can only be affirmed that he was the designer of certain subjects that appear in impressions from wood-cuts bearing his monogram, and that he was contemporary with Albert Durer; but whether he painted (which has been supposed) or engraved on wood, is uncertain.]

[SPRONG, GERARD, born at Haerlem in 1600, according to Balkema, was accounted a good painter of portraits. The same writer says he died in 1651, but others say he operated ten years later. There is a half-length portrait of a lady by him in the gallery of the Louvre; she holds gloves in her right hand.]

SPRUYT, PETER, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1740. His principal residence was at Ghent, where he was director of the Academy. We have a few etchings by this artist, after Rubens, among which are the following:

Susanna and the Elders.

Boreas and Orythia.

The Continence of Scipio.

A group of Children playing with a Lamb.

[Several of his etchings are signed E. P. Spruyt. He died about 1790, according to Nagler, who has described sixteen of his prints after Rubens, Teniers, and Van Goyen.]

SQUARCIONE, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Padua in 1394. He was more celebrated as the founder of the most distinguished academy of the early period at which he lived, and his excellent system of instructing his disciples, than for the works he executed as a painter. Not content with overrunning all Italy in search of the most curious objects of art, he travelled to Greece, where he designed the most interesting vestiges of antiquity, and returned to Padua with a rich assemblage of designs, statues, and busts, where he formed a museum, and established a school, which was at one time frequented by upwards of one hundred and thirty students; and acquired the venerable title of the father of the young painters. Of his productions as a painter little remains. Lanzi notices a picture by him formerly in the church of the Carmelitani, at Padua, afterwards in the possession of Sig. Conte de Lazara, representing S. Girolamo surrounded by several other saints, which was well coloured, with a finer expression than was usual at the time, and, above all, correct in the perspective. It bears an inscription purporting that it was painted for the noble family of Lazara in the year 1452; and is signed Francesco Squarcione, a satisfactory detection of the inaccuracy of Vasari, who calls him Jacopo. He died in 1474. [Rosini, in "Storia della Pittura Italiana," tom. iii., has given an outline of this picture of St. Jerome, and also of a Madonna and Infant in the same collection; by these the inquirer may form an opinion of the great excellence of Squarcione's performances, which are now unhappily lost. It is an honour to his name that he is recorded as the master of Andrea Mantegna and other eminent painters. Zani strongly inclines to the belief that he engraved also.]

STABEN, HENRY. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1578. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed in his native country, but he is said to have visited Venice when he was very young, where he entered the school of Jacopo Robusti, called Il Tintoretto. He had not, however, the advantage of the instruction of that able artist for any length of time, as he died before Staben had reached his seventeenth year. It does not appear that he remained long in Italy, but established himself at Paris, where he acquired considerable reputation by painting small pictures of the interiors of apartments, with figures, neatly drawn, which were well composed and agreeably coloured. One of his best performances was a picture representing the interior of a gallery, decorated with pictures and statues, in which he displayed an intelligent acquaintance with perspective, and every object was carefully finished. He died in 1658. [The picture referred to is now in England; it was imported from Paris by the Count de Morny, and sold by auction, in a collection stated to be his, in 1848. It was purchased by Messrs. Smith, brothers, the eminent picture-dealers. It was sold under the name of Palamedes, to whose works it bears no resemblance. It is but justice to the artist, Staben, to draw attention to it, as few are acquainted with his works. It is a picture that would be an ornament to the richest collection of the Dutch or Flemish masters. See note to Stalbert.]

STAEVAERTS, or STEVERS, ANTHONY PALAMEDES. This painter was born at Delft in 1604. He painted portraits, but was more frequently employed in painting conversations, and assemblies of persons playing at cards, or in musical parties. His design is not very correct, and his compositions are not distinguished by either judgment or taste. He died in 1680. [The family name was Stevens; how Anthony and his brother were both called Palamedes is not accounted for, but that is the name by which they are best known. It is apprehended that many think them one artist. The censure on Anthony is rather too harsh.]

STAEVAERTS, or STEVERS, PALAMEDES, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, and was born in London in 1607, though he is generally considered of the Dutch school, as his father, who had been a short time employed by James I. as a carver, returned to Delft whilst our artist was yet a child. The only assistance he appears to have had in his studies was an opportunity of copying some of the works of Esaias Vandervelde, whose clear and transparent style of colouring he followed with success, and excelled in painting similar subjects, representing battles and skirmishes, attacks of robbers, the plundering of villages, &c. His pictures are ingeniously composed, his figures and horses are spiritedly designed, and touched with a firm and free pencil. He had acquired a distinguished reputation among the most promising artists of his country, when he died, in the prime of life, in 1638. [This artist should be called Paul Palamedes Stevens, to distinguish him from his brother Anthony.]

STÄLBENT, ADRIAN [VAN], a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp in 1580. He painted landscapes, with small figures, neatly drawn and touched, in a style resembling that of Breughel. This artist visited England in the reign of Charles I., and is noticed in the Anecdotes, under the name of Stalband. Among other pictures, he painted a View of Greenwich, and is said to have returned to Antwerp liberally rewarded. Vandyck painted the portrait of this painter among the eminent artists of his country, which is engraved by Pontius. We have an etching by Stalbert representing the Ruins of an English Abbey, with cattle and sheep. It is signed with his name.

[He painted interiors with historical subjects in small, the earlier ones resembling the manner of old Franck, of whom it is probable that he was a pupil. In these much attention is devoted to the ornamental accessories and to the draperies of the figures. On his pictures we find the name A. V. STÄLBENT in Roman capitals, the letters A and V being joined together; on an etching it is Adrianus van Stalbert, but most writers call him Stalbert. As there was a contemporary artist of the name John Stalbert, who painted landscapes with figures in the manner of old Breughel, it has caused some confusion in the accounts of both. The artist called Staben is probably identical with Adrian Stalbert, or Stalbert; it would be the French pronunciation of the name. Felibien, from whom it is derived, says "un nommé STABEN;" he does not call him Henri, nor does the authority appear for his being so named. Adrian van Stalbert painted from 1612 to 1650, (according to dates on his pictures,) and it is generally supposed that he died about 1660.]

STAMPART, FRANCIS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1675. He was a disciple of the younger Tyssens, whose style of painting he adopted, and improved by studying the works of Vandyck. He had acquired considerable reputation as a portrait painter in his native city, when he was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Leopold, who appointed him his principal painter, in which capacity he was continued by Charles VI. If we may judge of the merit of his pictures from the singular mode he is said to have practised in executing them, we may venture to assert, that they had little of that air of life and nature which distinguishes the portraits of the great painter he attempted to imitate. As he was much employed in painting persons of condition, who had neither leisure nor patience to undergo the tedium of the usual process, he was accustomed to draw the features of his model on his canvass with white, black, and red crayons, on which preparation he painted up his picture, and only called on his sitters for a finishing visit. He died at Vienna in 1750.

STANZIONE, CAVALIERE MASSIMO. According to Dominici, this painter was born at Naples in 1585, and was a disciple of Giovanni Batista Caracciolo, whose style is discernible in all his works; but he received his best instruction in fresco painting from Belisario Corenzio, one of the most eminent artists of his time. When Lanfranco visited Naples, Stanzone had the advantage of profiting by his lessons, and was assisted in portrait painting by Fabrizio Santafede. He afterwards visited Rome, where he applied himself particularly to study the works of Annibale Caracci, and having formed an intimacy with Guido, he is said to have imitated the graceful design and amenity of colouring of that master with such success, that he was styled Il Guido Reni di Napoli. On his return to Naples he displayed an ability that enabled him to compete with the ablest of his contemporaries. There appears to have existed between this painter and Spagnoletto a jealousy and animosity, which led the latter to the commission of as black a treachery as the annals of art have produced.

Lanzi reports, that Stanzone had painted an altar-piece at the Certosa representing the dead Christ, with the Marys, in competition with Ribera, who, on the occasion, had painted his celebrated Deposition from the Cross. The picture of Stanzone having turned somewhat lower in tone, Spagnoletto recommended the monks to permit him to clean it, when he made use of a noxious preparation, by which the beauty of the work was nearly annihilated. The fathers applied to Stanzone to repair it, which he decidedly refused to comply with, declaring it should remain as it was, that so foul a perfidy might be exposed to public indignation. Among his other considerable works at Naples are the vaults of the churches of S. Paolo and del Gesu Nuovo, which may be considered as his best fresco works, and a large picture at the Certosa, representing S. Bruno presenting the regulations of his order to his monks. He painted many easel pictures for the private collections at Naples, which are highly esteemed. He died in 1656.

STAREN, or STERN, DIRK VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1540. He is ranked among what are denominated the little masters, on account of the smallness of his plates, which are very neatly executed. His drawing of the figure is generally correct, and the extremities are well marked. His prints are very numerous, and are dated from 1520 to 1550. He usually marked his plates with the initials D. and V. divided by a star, to which he generally added the date, .

The following are his principal plates, which are from his own designs:

- The miraculous Draught of Fishes. 1523.
- St. Peter sinking in the Water, calling to Christ.
- Christ walking on the Water.
- Christ tempted by the Devil.
- The good Samaritan. 1525.
- St. Luke painting the Portrait of the Virgin. 1526.
- The Deluge. 1523.

[There are two mistakes, if not more, in the foregoing account of Van Staren. His prints are not numerous; Bartsch has described nineteen only, and Brulliot was unable to discover any others. The miraculous Draught of Fishes is probably The calling of Peter and Andrew, (No. 3,) and there is no mention made of The good Samaritan, or Christ walking on the Water. With respect to date, the latest, 1544, is on The Deluge, which is the largest of his prints. In the catalogue of Ottley's prints, sold in 1837, there are two described that are not included in the list by Bartsch; a St. Christopher, and a wood-cut representing an interior, with a gallery, and numerous figures of women and men; the mark is near the middle, and the date 1526 on the left. The following are the titles and dates, as given by Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. viii.:

1. Eve and the little Cain, 1522, A. G. (Augusti) 19.
2. The Deluge (L. 14 p. 6 l.; H. 10 p. 5 l.), 1544.
3. Christ calling Peter and Andrew, 1523, Mey 30.
4. St. Peter walking on the Water, 1525, Des 30.
5. Christ tempted by the Demon, 1525, D.* V. April II.
6. Christ and the Woman of Samaria, 1523.
7. The Virgin and St. Anne, 1522, D. C. (Decembris) 31.
8. St. Bernard, 1524, Oct. 3.
9. St. Luke painting the Portrait of the Virgin, 1526, In Juli. 28.
10. St. Elisabeth, 1524, Nov. 15.
11. Venus, 1524, Oct. 20.
12. The Faun, 1522, Sept. 14.
13. The Man with a chimerical Fish, 1522, A. G. (Augusti) 16.
14. The Goldsmith, no date.
15. The Man asleep, 1532, Oct. 10.
16. The drunken Drummer, 1525, Mert. 8.
17. The Drummer and a Child, 1523, Oct. 14.
18. The Man holding a Shield, with armorial bearings, 1522.
19. The Woman holding an Escutcheon, of lozenge form, 1525.

From Ottley's Catalogue.

20. St. Christopher, the date not mentioned.
21. A wood-cut of an Interior, with a Gallery, and numerous Figures. The mark near the middle, 1526 on the left.

Whether the mark D. V. with a starling between them, and the letters D. V. separated by an asterisk in the upper part, and interpreted Dirck Verster, belong to this engraver, is not yet settled.]

STARNINA, GHERARDO. This old Florentine painter was born in 1354, and was a disciple of Antonio Veneziano. He painted history in the dry, stiff style which prevailed at the early period at which he lived, though somewhat less Gothic and hard than the immediate followers of Giotto. Vasari reports, that he was invited to the court of Spain, where he painted some pictures for the king, for which he was richly rewarded. Among the few of his works at Florence which have escaped the ravages of time, is a picture in the church of S. Croce, representing St. Jerome delivering his doctrines to his disciples, when he was at the point of death; a production in which the design and expression are perhaps superior to any performance of his contemporaries. He died at Florence in 1403. [It is certain that he survived the year 1406; Zani says he died in 1415. Rosini has given an etching by Gatti, of a Descent from the Cross, by Starnina, which shows him to have been an artist of great ability.]

STARRENBERG, JOHN. According to Descamps, this painter was born at Groninguen, and flourished from the year 1650 to 1670. He painted historical subjects, and was much celebrated as a fresco painter of ceilings, and other considerable machinal undertakings, which he composed with ingenuity, and executed with promptness and facility.

[STAVEREN, JAN ADRIAN VAN, if not a pupil, was a close imitator, of Gerard Dou. The subject in which he most excelled was a hermit contemplating a skull, reading a book, or at his devotions before a crucifix. As the scene is generally the entrance of a grotto in a wild locality, he introduces the trunk of an old tree covered with ivy or moss. His execution is as elaborate as that of Gerard Dou, but his penciling is not so clear, soft, and fluent. It is also said that he painted familiar scenes, conversations, and small groups of family portraits; there are such attributed to Van Staveren, but whether they are by the painter of hermits is not certain. The Dutch writers mention three other artists of the name, Paul, Jacob, and E.; Paul and E. are said also to have been pupils of Gerard Dou; Jacob was a painter of fruit and flowers; they all lived about the same period, that is to say, from about 1660 to 1700. The editor gives the names as he finds them, but has doubts of the right application of all, excepting that of Jacob to flower and fruit pieces; the hermit pictures that have come under his notice have no baptismal names. A Geographer in his Study, in the Louvre, is without it. Laborde mentions a mezzotinto print of a Man counting Money, a half-length, signed P. Straveremus, and says, Que signifie ce nom? The print, it may be observed, was executed in the seventeenth century, or in the early part of the eighteenth, when the artist called Paul van Staveren was living.]

STEE, P. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of Miss Salethea Dawkins; after Iver.

STEEN, JOHN [properly JAN]. This ingenious artist was born at Leyden in 1636. He was the son of a respectable brewer, who, perceiving his inclination for drawing, placed him as a pupil with Nicholas Knuffer, a painter of history, of some note, at Utrecht, under whom he studied some time. Descamps, who has been followed by Mr. Pilkington, asserts that he was afterwards a scholar of Adrian Brower; but this inaccuracy is rendered palpable by their own statements, by which it will be found that Brower died in 1640, when Jan Steen was only four years old. They have probably been led into the error by the similarity of the subjects they represented, and the congenial profligacy of their habits. It is more consistent with chronology, that he was a disciple of John van Goyen, whose daughter he married, though it is not likely that she became his wife until after the death of her father, in 1656, when Steen was in his twentieth year. His father, apprehending that he could not depend on the produce of his early exertions as a painter for a comfortable subsistence, established him in a brewery at Delft; but this indulgence, which might have placed him in easy circumstances, instead of answering his paternal intentions, served only to supply him with the means of indulging his unfortunate propensity to debauchery and excess. In a short time, from negligence and expensive pursuits, the establishment was ruined; and after repeated attempts to reclaim him, he was abandoned by his father. He afterwards became a tavern-keeper, but this undertaking was more promptly calamitous than the former, as he now found at home the means of gratifying his excesses, and he is said to have drunk more wine than any of his guests. During these occupations, he continued to exercise his talents as a painter, and it is not easy to conceive how a man, in an almost continual state of inebriety, could have produced so many and such admirable proofs of extraordinary ability.

The pictures of Jan Steen usually represent merry-makings, and the frolics and festivities of the ale-house, which he treated with a characteristic expression of humorous drollery, which requires us for the vulgarity of the subjects. He sometimes painted conversations and domestic assemblies, which he generally accompanied with some facetious trait of wit or humour, which is admirably managed. Some of his pictures of that description are little inferior in delicacy of execution to the charming productions of Gabriel Metz. His compositions are ingenious and interesting, his design is correct and spirited, his colouring chaste and clear, and his pencil free and decided. Perhaps no painter of his country has equalled him in the air of truth and nature which he gave to the expression and character of his figures. The works of Jan Steen were for some time little known or valued, except in Holland. But they are now generally held in high estimation, and are deservedly placed in the choicest collections. He died in 1689. [When the inquirer reads the descriptions of upwards of three hundred pictures by Jan Steen, contained in Smith's Catalogue raisonne, vol. iv. and Supplement, many of which are composed of numerous figures, and almost all painted with the greatest care; and when he examines the specimens that adorn the royal and other splendid collections in this country, to say nothing of the equally rich productions of his pencil elsewhere, and observes the knowledge he displays, not only of his art but of human nature, and the great discrimination of character he exhibits in all; if he does not doubt the authenticity of the many scandalous anecdotes of the master, he will at least suspect that they have been too highly coloured in the relating. How can it be believed that a man living in a continued state of inebriety and dissipation could find time to produce so many excellent works? Is it possible that the hand of an habitual drunkard could so steadily execute the mechanical part? and could a mind besotted by drink, and debased by low intercourse, moralize so admirably as he has done on the evil consequences of intemperance and the indulgence of lascivious propensities? A judicious critic, Dr. Kügler, sums up his character as an artist in a few words. "His works imply a free and cheerful view of common life, and he treats it with a careless humour, such as seems to deal with all its daily occurrences, high and low, as a laughable masquerade, and a mere scene of perverse absurdity. His treatment of the subjects differed essentially from that adopted by other artists. Frequently, indeed, they are the same jolly drinking parties, or the meetings of boors; but in other masters the object is, for the most part, to depict a certain situation, either quiet or animated, whilst in Jan Steen is generally to be found action, more or less developed, together with all the reciprocal relations and interests between the characters, which spring from it. This is accompanied by great force and variety of individual expression, such as evinces the sharpest observation. He is almost the only artist of the Netherlands who has thus, with true genius, brought into full play all these elements of comedy. His technical execution suits his design; it is carefully finished, and notwithstanding the closest attention to minute details, is as firm and correct as it is free and light." A scarce etching representing a woman seated, apparently in a drunken sleep, holding a small glass in her left hand and a bottle in the right, and other figures, in a chamber, is attributed to him. It is signed pinxit J. Steen, the J and S interlaced, on the left, and on the right H. Steen. It is a poor affair, and doubted by those best qualified to give an opinion.]

STEEN, FRANCIS VANDER, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1604. Little is known of his works as a painter, but he distinguished himself by the plates he engraved for the collection of prints known by the name of Teniers's Gallery. He was much employed by the Archduke Leopold, who assigned him a pension. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Cornelius Cort, Engraver, of Antwerp.

Theodore Coornhaert, Engraver, of Amsterdam.

Andrew del Vaulx, Professor of the University of Louvain.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family; after Titian.

The Holy Family, called La Madonna del Sacco; after A. del Sarto.

Michael Angelo's Dream; after M. Angelo.

Soldiers playing at Cards; after Manfredi.

The Martyrdom of the Eleven Thousand Virgins; from a drawing by Van Hoy, after the picture by Albert Durer, in the imperial collection.

Silenus drunk, supported by Satyrs and Bacchante; after Vandyck, (Rubens?)

Cupid shaping his Bow; after Coreggio.

Jupiter and Io; after the same.

Ganymede; after the same.

The three last prints, which are scarce, are from designs by Van Hoy, after the pictures in the gallery at Vienna. He also engraved from Teniers, and other masters. [For a catalogue of his engravings see Nagler.]

STEENWYCK, [or STEINWYCK,] HENRY, the ELDER. This painter was born at Steenwyck in 1550. He was a scholar of John de Vries, an artist of some reputation, who excelled in perspective and architectural views. Steenwyck painted similar subjects, in which he not only surpassed his instructor, but in neatness and accuracy he has scarcely been equalled by any artist who has succeeded him. His pictures represent the interiors of churches and Gothic temples, designed with surprising accuracy and precision. He frequently represented these superb edifices by torch-light, and by a judicious management of the chiaro-scuro, gave a mysterious grandeur to the effect, which is extremely picturesque and interesting. The pictures of the elder Steenwyck are usually decorated with figures by Franck. He died in 1603. [He was living in 1604.]

STEENWYCK, [or STEINWYCK,] HENRY, the YOUNGER, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Antwerp in 1589, and was instructed by his father. His pictures, like those of the elder Steenwyck, represent the insides of temples, churches, and other Gothic edifices, which he usually designed on a larger scale than those of his father. He lived in habits of intimacy with Vandyck, who painted a fine portrait of him, among the distinguished artists of his country, of which we have a print by Pontius. His talents were recommended by Vandyck to the notice of Charles I., who invited him to England, where he resided several years, and died in London, but the time of his death is not mentioned. In the catalogue of King James are found ten of the principal works of Steenwyck. The pictures he painted previous to his coming to England, are embellished with figures by John Breughel, Theodore van Thulden, and others. [He was living in 1642, as appears by that date on a picture in the museum at Berlin.]

STEENWYCK, [or STEINWYCK,] NICHOLAS. According to Descamps, this painter was born at Breda in 1640. He excelled in painting vases, musical instruments, books, and other inanimate objects, which he grouped in a pleasing manner, and represented with great truth and precision. [He painted fish admirably, not laboured, but in a very bold manner.]

STEFANESCHI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Baldinucci, this artist was born at Ronta, in the Florentine state, in 1582. He was a monk, and is generally called l'Eremita di Monte Senario. He was instructed in design by Andrea Comodi, and chiefly excelled in copying, in miniature, the works of the most eminent Italian painters, in which he was much employed by Ferdinand II., Grand Duke of Tuscany. He died in 1651.

STEFANI, TOMMASO DE. DOMINICI, in his Lives of the Neapolitan Painters, attempts to prove that the art was practised at Naples by this master before the time of Cimabué, and that it had, at that early period, reached a more improved state at Naples than it had at Florence. Whatever may be allowed for the partiality with which the Italian writers speak of their particular countrymen, Dominici appears to have established the authenticity of his statement, by the indisputable authorities he produces in his Proemio. According to that author this venerable artist was born at Naples, about the year 1230. He formed himself by the remnants of Grecian art, which had been preserved in the temples and public edifices at Naples, and had painted several pictures for the churches of S. Francesco and S. Maria delle Grazie, previous to the year 1260, at which time he was employed by the Archbishop of Naples to ornament the chapel of his palace. Several other works by him are particularly described by Dominici. He died in 1310. He had a brother, Pietro de Stefani, who also was a painter, but was more celebrated as a sculptor.

STEFANI, BENEDETTO. The name of this artist is affixed to a print representing the Battle of the Lapithæ, copied from Marc Antonio. The style of engraving resembles that of Æneas Vico. [He was of Verona, and operated about 1575; he was a publisher as well as an engraver.]

STEFANINI, GIOVANNI. This artist was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1760. We have by him an etching representing the Purification of the Virgin, after Bartholomew Spranger.

STEFANO, called IL FIORENTINO. This old Florentine painter was the grandson and the disciple of Giotto. He was born at Florence in 1301, and, according to Vasari, greatly excelled his instructor in every department of the art. The rules of perspective were little known at the early period at which he lived, and he has the credit of establishing them on more regular principles. If he was less successful in his endeavours to vanquish the difficulty of foreshortening, he has at least the credit of being the first artist who attempted it, and succeeded, better than any of his contemporaries, in giving expression to the airs of his heads, and a less Gothic turn to the attitudes of his figures. His works in the churches at Rome and Florence have perished, and Lanzi mentions, as the only vestige remaining of his productions, a picture of the Virgin and infant Christ, in the Campo Santo, at Pisa. He died in 1350.

STEFANO, TOMMASO. According to Baldinucci, he was the son and disciple of the foregoing artist, born at Florence in 1324. He attached himself more to the style of Giotto than that of his father, and followed the manner of that master with such exactness, that he acquired the appellation of Il Giottino. Such are his frescoes at Assisi, and his picture of the dead Christ, with the Virgin and St. John, in the church of S. Remigio at Florence. He died at Florence, in the prime of life, in 1356.

STEFANONE, MAESTRO. According to Domini, this painter was born at Naples about the year 1325, and was a disciple of Gennaro di Cola. In conjunction with that master, he painted some fresco works in the church of S. Restituta, at Naples. In the church of S. Maria della Pietà there were several of his works, both in fresco and in oil; the former have almost entirely perished, but the latter have resisted the ravages of time, particularly the picture at the great altar, representing the Virgin Mary and Magdalene weeping over the dead Christ, which is still well preserved. This is another proof that the practice of painting in oil was known long before the pretended discovery by Van Eyck, in the year 1410. He died about 1390.

STEFANONI, GIACOMO ANTONIO. This artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1630. He is said to have been a painter as well as an engraver. We have, among others, the following etchings by him :

The Virgin, with the infant Christ, St. John, and two Angels; after Lod. Caracci.

The Holy Family, with St. John; after An. Caracci. 1632.

Another Holy Family, with St. John presenting cherries; after the same.

The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after Agos. Caracci.

The Murder of the Innocents; after Guido.

The Martyrdom of St. Ursula; after L. Passinelli.

STEFANONI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, by whom we have a set of forty etchings, from the designs of the Caracci, intended as a drawing-book. He usually marked his plates with the initials P. S. F. [He was a publisher and engraver; he lived about 1620.]

STEIDNER, D. This artist is noticed by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a variety of devout subjects. [Whatever those devout subjects may be, Nagler, like Mr. Strutt, does not think them worth notice. He was of Augsburg, and died in 1760.]

STELLA, JAMES, an eminent French painter, born at Lyons in 1596. He was the son of Francis Stella, an artist, originally of Flanders, who had settled at Lyons on his return from Italy. His father taught him the rudiments of design, but he was deprived of his instruction when he was only nine years old. He had, however, at that early age, made such progress in design, that he found himself sufficiently advanced to be able to continue his studies without the direction of another master. When he had reached his twentieth year he travelled to Italy, and passing through Florence, on his way to Rome, he was employed by Cosmo de Medici to assist in the decorations preparing for the solemnization of the marriage of his son Ferdinand II. He also painted several pictures for the Grand Duke, who assigned him apartments in his palace, with a pension equal to that of Callot, who was at that time in his service. After a residence of seven years at Florence, where he left many proofs of his ability in painting and engraving, he proceeded to Rome in 1623. His studies in that capital were pursued with unremitting assiduity, particularly from the antique and the works of Raffaele, which he contemplated in the society of Niccolo Poussin, with whom he contracted an intimate acquaintance, and the conversation and advice of that learned artist contributed, in no small degree, to the formation of that correct style for which he is distinguished.

The works of Stella were held in considerable estimation at Rome, where he resided eleven years. In 1634 he returned to France, where his talents recommended him to the favour of Cardinal Richelieu, under whose patronage he was appointed painter to the king, with a pension, and was presented with the order of St. Michael. His principal works at Paris are the Baptism of Christ by St. John, in the church of St. Germain le Vieux; the Annunciation, in the chapel of the Nuns of the Assumption; and Christ with the Woman of Samaria, at the Carmelites. Stella was more successful in his easel pictures than his large works. His compositions are graceful and decorous, though cold and inanimate, and his design rigidly correct; but we look in vain for the sentiment and expression which characterize the admirable productions of Poussin. He died at Paris in 1647. We have some etchings by Stella, among which are the following :

The taking down from the Cross; marked with a star.

The Ceremony of doing Homage to the Grand Duke of Tuscany on St. John's Day. 1621.

[Jacques Stella died in 1657, at the age of sixty-one. His etchings consist of five pieces; a Madonna, St. George, and some children dancing, in addition to the two mentioned. There are some wood-cuts after his designs, marked with a star (Stella); they were engraved by Paul Maupain, of Abbeville.]

STELLA, FRANCIS, was the younger brother of James Stella, born at Lyons in 1601, and was instructed in the art by his brother, whom he accompanied to Italy. He painted history, but never arrived at much eminence, and was very inferior to his instructor in every respect. There are some pictures by him in the churches at Paris, among which is an altar-piece, representing the dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary and St. John, at the Augustines. He died at Paris in 1661. [According to Felibien, he died on the 26th of July, 1647, in his forty-fourth year.]

STELLA, ANTHONY BOUSONNET. This artist was the nephew of James Stella, born at Lyons in 1630. He was instructed by his uncle in the rudiments of design, and is said to have been a reputable painter, and a member of the Royal Academy at Paris, where he died in 1682. We have a few etchings by him, among which is the following :

Moses defending the Daughters of Jethro; after Poussin.

[There is a difference among writers respecting his age, some making him fifty, others only forty-eight; but as there was another Anthony, and they agree that this died in 1682, it is of no importance.]

STELLA, CLAUDE BOUSONNET. This ingenious lady was the niece of James Stella, born at Lyons in 1636. She learned the principles of design from her uncle, but applied herself to engraving, in which she greatly distinguished herself. Her plates are chiefly after the pictures of James Stella and Nicholas Poussin; and perhaps no artist has been so successful in their engravings after the latter painter, in which she has greatly surpassed John Pesne. Her design is correct, and the characters of the heads are admirably expressed. The following are her most esteemed prints :

A set of seventeen plates of pastoral subjects, including the title; after James Stella.

Fifty plates of the Sports of Children, and rural subjects; after the same.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after the same.
 Moses found in the Bulrushes; in two plates; after N. Poussin.
 Moses striking the Rock; after the same; very fine.
 The Crucifixion, called the Great Calvary; after the same; very fine.
 St. Peter and St. John curing the Lame Man; after the same.
 The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John; after the same.
 Another Holy Family, with children bringing flowers; after the same.

[She died at Paris in 1697.]

STELLA, ANTOINETTE BOUSONNET. This lady was the sister of Claudine Bousonnet Stella, born at Lyons about the year 1637, and had also the advantage of her uncle's instruction in design. Although she was not equal to her sister in the use of the graver, her prints possess considerable merit. Her drawing is generally correct and full of taste. We have, among others, the following prints by her:

Romulus and Remus suckled by a Wolf; after Ant. Bousonnet Stella.

The Entry of the Emperor Sigismund; after Giulio Romano.

STELZER, JACOB, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1720. He engraved part of the plates for the collection of prints from the antique marbles preserved in the gallery of Dresden, published in 1733. [Nagler calls him Johann Jakob, and says he operated as late as 1780.]

STEMPSIUS. See SEMPELIUS.

[STENREE, or STEENREE, by some called WILLIAM, by others GEORGE, probably because he used only the initial letter of his baptismal name, G., was a nephew of Cornelius Poelemburg, by whom he was instructed in the art, and whose manner he followed. His birth is placed at Utrecht in 1600, and his death in 1648, but on uncertain authority.]

STENT, PETER, resided in London, and carried on a considerable business as a printseller. It is supposed that he occasionally engraved. A portrait of Andrew Willet, with six Latin verses, and marked with the initials P. S., is generally attributed to him. [He carried on business in London from 1640 to 1663. Exe. generally follows his name.]

STERN, IGNAZIO. This painter was a native of Bavaria, born about the year 1698. He went, early in his life, to Bologna, where he entered the school of Carlo Cignani. He painted several pictures for the different churches in Lombardy, which possess considerable merit. At Piacenza, in the church of the Nunziata, is an altar-piece representing the Annunciation, which Lanzi describes as a graceful and elegant composition. He resided several years at Rome, where he was much employed for the public edifices and the private collections. In the Basilica of St. John of Lateran, there is a picture by Stern of the Assumption: and he painted some frescoes in the sacristy of S. Paolino. His talents were not confined to historical subjects. He also painted concerts, conversations, and what are called by the Italians Bambocciate, which were much admired. He died in 1746. [Zani says he operated in 1750.]

STETTLER, WILLIAM. This artist was a native of Berne, and, according to Fuessli, in his Lives of the Swiss Artists, was first a scholar of Felix Meyer, at Zurich, and was afterwards instructed in miniature painting, at Paris, by Joseph Werner. His talents were not confined to miniature, but he was much employed in designing historical and other subjects for the publishers. He accompanied Charles Patin in his travels through Holland and Italy, and made the greater part of the designs for the plates in his publications on medals and antiquities. He died in 1708.

STEVENS, JOHN, or STEPHANUS, a German engraver, who flourished at Strasburg about the year 1585. His plates are chiefly slight etchings, executed almost entirely with dots; and are frequently little more than outlines. They are from his own designs, and prove him to have been a man of genius. He generally marked his plates with the initials I. and S. with the date.

STEVENS, JOHN. This artist is mentioned by Lord Orford as a landscape painter, who chiefly imitated Vandiest. He sometimes painted small pictures, but was principally employed in painting pieces to be placed over doors and chimneys. He died in 1722.

STEVENS, PETER. This artist was a native of Mechlin, and is mentioned as an engraver of portraits, among which is that of Frederick, king of Prussia; after de Plasse.

[STEVENS, STEEVENS, or STEPHANS, PETER, an historical painter and landscape designer, was born at Malines in 1540. He was patronized by Rudolph II., and died at Prague, in what year is not accurately ascertained. Several of his pictures and designs were engraved by the Sadeliers and H. Hondius; these are chiefly his landscapes. There was another artist of the same name, who was a painter and engraver; he was also a native of Malines, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. Probably he is the engraver mentioned in the foregoing article, as there are several portraits engraved by him, among which is that of Count Emeric Tekely, after D. Vander Plaas, John III., king of Poland, Lodovic, Marquis of Brandenburg, Philip, Duke of Orleans, and other illustrious persons. The time of his death is not known.]

STEVERS. See STAEVARTS.

STEUDENER, M. G. We have by this artist some slight etchings, representing the Loves of the Gods, and other mythological subjects, from his own designs. They are not very creditable to his talents. [Mark Christopher Steudtner was born at Augsburg in 1698, and died in 1736. He engraved many subjects besides the Loves of the Gods, on copper, and wood, and scraped in mezzotint; at least so say Nagler and Laborde. Curiously enough, both attribute to him a mezzotint print of St. Catharine carried to Heaven by Angels, with the date 1696! It certainly has his signature, M. C. Steudtner; but how is it to be reconciled with the date of his birth? Zani gives an advantage of three years only, by placing his birth in 1693.]

STIMMER, TOBIAS. This artist was born at Schaffhausen in 1544. It is not mentioned under whom he studied, but he had acquired some celebrity by decorating the façades of the principal mansions of his native town, at Frankfort and Strasburg, with historical subjects painted in fresco, when he was invited to the court of the Marquis of Baden, to paint a series of the portraits of his ancestors, which he is said by Huber to have executed in a great style. His frescoes have unfortunately perished; but we may judge of his ability in composition and design, by the wooden cuts, which remain, executed from his works. Tobias Stimmer also engraved on wood, and in conjunction with his brother, John Christopher Stimmer, executed part of the cuts for the Bible published at Basle in 1586, by Thomas Guarin, entitled Novæ Tobiae Stimmeri sacrorum Bibliorum figuræ versibus Latinis et Germanicis expositæ. The compositions of these prints, which are small, are by Tobias Stimmer; and it is no mean proof of their merit, that Rubens declared he had studied them with attention, and had derived much instruction from them. He usually marked his prints with a monogram, composed of a T. and an S., thus TS. [He was born in 1534, and died at an advanced age. He made the designs, but never engraved on wood. See Bartsch, P. G. tom. ix., for a list of cuts from his designs.]

STIMMER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, was the younger brother of Tobias Stimmer, born at Schaffhausen in 1552, and is said to have been instructed in design by his brother. He distinguished himself as an eminent engraver on wood, and executed in a neat style several cuts from the designs of Tobias, which possess considerable merit. He marked his prints with a monogram composed of the letters C. S. T. M., thus, CSM. Besides the cuts in the Bible, mentioned in the preceding article, we have the following prints by him:

A set of cuts for the New Testament, printed at Strasburg in 1588.

A set of prints of learned persons and theologians of Germany; published by Bernard Jobio, at Strasburg, in 1587.

A set of Emblems, entitled Icones Affabræ, published by B. Jobio, at Strasburg, in 1591.

[The accounts of this artist are involved in much intricacy, confusion, and uncertainty. They who are interested in the matter will find all the light that can be brought to bear on it, and all the assistance that two able men have afforded for unravelling the perplexities, in Nagler's Kunstler Lexicon, and in Bartsch, P. G. tom. ix.]

STOCCADE, NICHOLAS DE HELT. This painter was born at Nimeguen in 1614, and was a scholar of Martin Ryckaert, whose daughter he married. His first pursuit was landscape painting, which he practised for some time, in the style of his instructor; but his genius leading him more to the design of the figure, he applied himself with great assiduity to historical painting, in which he had acquired some celebrity, when he determined to visit Italy in search of improvement, and passed several years at Rome. His studies in that capital were pursued with unremitting application, and his talents soon recommended him to public attention. He was employed in painting some pictures for the palaces and private collections, particularly for Christina, Queen of Sweden. After a residence of eight years at Rome, he went to Venice, and improved his style of colouring by studying the works of the best masters of the Venetian school. He visited Paris in his return to Holland, where he met with such distinguished encouragement, that he was induced to establish himself for some time in that city, where he was much employed, and was appointed one of the painters to the king. He did not long survive his return to his native country, but the time of his death is not ascertained. His compositions evince a ready and fertile invention, and his design bears the character of the Roman school, from which he had principally formed his style. He was also distinguished as a portrait painter. [The historical pictures by Stoccade are generally of large dimensions; some of them have had the honour of poetical commendation from his countrymen, particularly that of Andromeda chained to a Rock to be devoured by a Sea-monster, Clelia passing the Tiber, and Joseph distributing Corn to his Brethren. There are three etchings by him; Cephalus and Aurora, Susanna Bathing, and the portrait of A. van Opstat, after Van Dyck. Immerzeel places his death in 1669.]

STOCK, IGNATIUS VANDER, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. As far as can be judged from his etchings, after his own designs, he was a landscape painter of considerable ability. We have several plates by him, executed in a slight but spirited style, some of which are from the designs of Fouquieres, and others after compositions of his own. [He operated forty years later than is stated above.]

STOCK, ANDREW. This artist was a native of Holland, but resided chiefly at Antwerp, where he flourished about the year 1625. He is supposed to have been a pupil of James de Gheyn the elder, from the similarity which appears in their style. He engraved several of the plates for the Academie de L'Espée, published at Antwerp, by Thibeau; which he inscribed Andreas Stokius Hagæ Comitibus sculp. We have also by him the following prints:

PORTRAITS.

Albert Durer, Effigies Alberti Dureri. And. Stock. sc. 1629.

Hans Holbein; Effigies Holbeini, Pictoris celeberrimi. se ipse pinx. And. Stock. sculp.

Lucas of Leyden; from a picture by himself.
Peter Sneyers, Painter; after A. Vanduyck.

SUBJECTS.

The Sacrifice of Abraham; after Rubens.

Twelve plates of the Months in the Year; after Wildens.

A set of eight Landscapes; after Paul Brill.

[He was born in 1590; there is no account of his death.]

STOCK, H. The name of this artist is affixed to a portrait of Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury. [He lived about 1635.]

STOER, LAWRENCE. This artist was a native of Angsbouurg, and flourished about the year 1567. He is mentioned by Professor Christ as a painter, and an engraver on wood, and is said to have executed several wooden cuts, which he marked with the cipher S.

[STOFFE, J. V. D., a painter of battle-pieces, chiefly skirmishes of cavalry, flourished about the year 1649. His pictures are common, though his history is not known; they are generally of small dimensions, on panel, and rarely exceed thirty inches by about twenty-four. They are spirited in action, well designed, not strongly coloured, but smoothly finished. They do not rank high in commerce, but they are sometimes attributed to Stoop, or Esaias Vandevelde. He was undoubtedly a Dutch painter, though he is not noticed by Dutch writers on art. His pictures in their genuine state have his name, and sometimes the date.]

STOLKER, J., a Dutch engraver in mezzotinto, by whom we have some portraits, among which is that of Jacques de Mosscher, painter, after J. Ravestein. [He was not a master of much note, as a mezzotinto engraver, but of great modesty, for he put the name of N. Verkolie to many of his plates; there is one, however, to which he put his own, an Interior after Jan Steen. He lived in the early part of the last century, according to Laborde, but this is probably a mistake. See the next article.]

[STOLKER, JAN, a portrait painter, designer, and engraver in aquafortis and mezzotinto, was born at Amsterdam in 1724. He studied portrait painting there under J. M. Quinkhard, with whom he remained till he was twenty-three; he then removed to the Hague, where he remained nine years painting portraits and family groups; and afterwards resided at Rotterdam, occupied in the same manner, and had the honour of painting several persons of distinction. It appears that he also painted cabinet pictures of familiar subjects; one known by the appellation Rhynlande is spoken of as a chef d'œuvre. It represents the interior of an apartment in which there are an elderly woman, a girl, and a boy, habited in the old Dutch costume, and a number of accessories in an open window, admirable, it is said, for composition, expression, chiaro-scuro, and elaborate finishing. When about fifty he abandoned painting, and devoted himself to making designs in water-colours and Indian ink, in which he showed superior talent. The copies which he made in this manner of pictures by the older masters, especially those in colours, are highly esteemed. He engraved in aquafortis, according to Balkema and Immerzeel, after Rembrandt, F. Hals, Jan Steen, Schalcken, Adrian Ostade, Brecklencamp, and others. Nagler describes eight mezzotints by him after Terburg, Jan Steen, and Ravesteyn, among which are the two mentioned in the preceding article, showing that the same artist is meant. He died at Rotterdam in 1786.]

[STOM, or STOOM, MATTHEW, who was probably of Flemish origin, practised principally in Italy. He painted landscapes and battle-pieces. He died at Verona in 1702. Another of the same name, who lived about the middle of the 17th century, painted sacred subjects, of which there is one in the church of St. Cecilia at Messina.]

[STOMME, ———, a painter of subjects called still-life, of whom there is no account, but he appears to have been an imitator, if not a scholar, of John David De Heem. A picture by him is thought worthy of being preserved in the Museum at Brussels; it represents a table covered, on which there are a cruche, a plate with a broiled fish, a knife, and other objects.]

STONE, HENRY. This artist was the son of Nicholas Stone, a statuary and architect, who was master mason to James I. He is usually called Old Stone, probably to distinguish him from his younger brother, John. Henry Stone is principally known as a painter by his excellent copies from the portraits of Vandyck and the Italian masters. By his epitaph, which is preserved in the Anecdotes, it appears that he passed several years in Holland, France, and Italy, and died in London in 1653. [A copy by him of the Cornaro family at Northumberland House, said to be by Titian, is at Hampton Court. There are also a great many Van Dyck portraits in various collections painted by Old Stone.]

STONE, JOHN, was the brother of Henry Stone, and followed the profession of his father as a statuary. He also occasionally copied some of the most esteemed pictures of the old masters, in which he was not unsuccessful. Thomas Cross is said to have instructed him in the art of engraving, though he did not much attend to it. He designed and engraved one of the plates for Dugdale's History of Warwickshire. John Stone died soon after the Restoration.

STOOP, DIRCK, or THEODORE. This eminent artist has escaped the notice of the biographers of the painters, and is only briefly mentioned as the engraver of a few plates. He was a native of Holland, and was born about the year 1610. A contemporary of Peter de Laer, called Bamboccio, he adopted a similar style, and his best works are in no way inferior to those of that celebrated painter. His pictures represent hunters and sportsmen on horseback, the halts of travellers, farriers' shops, and similar subjects, which are composed and designed with a spirit and taste, which has scarcely been surpassed by Philip Wowermans, for whose works the pictures of Stoop have not unfrequently been mistaken. We have by this able artist a set of twelve admirable etchings, which for picturesque effect and masterly execution are equal to the most admired productions of the point. [See note to next article.]

STOOP, PETER, sometimes called RODERIGO. He is generally supposed to have been the younger brother of the preceding artist, born in Holland about the year 1612. He painted battles, huntings, and sea-ports, with considerable success, and went, when he was young, to Portugal, and settled at Lisbon, where he adopted the name of Roderigo, and placed the letter R. on his plates. He came to England in the retinue of Queen Catherine, and resided in this country till his death, which happened about the year 1686. We have several etchings by this artist from his own compositions, and other masters, which are executed in a spirited and masterly style. Among others, are the following:

Eight Views of Lisbon; dedicated to Queen Catherine.

A set of eight plates, representing the procession of Queen Catherine from Portsmouth to Hampton Court. 1662.

He also executed the plates for Ogilby's Æsop; after the designs of Barlow.

[Theodore, Thierry, Dierck, Dirck, and Roderigo Stoop, is an individual artist; the names being the same according to the language in which they are used. Roderigo, in Portuguese, answering to Theodoricus, or Theodorus, in Latin, from which the others are derived, and Dirck being the diminutive used by the Dutch. Stoop, the designer and engraver, is the artist to whom all these names appertain; for he varied them according to the custom of the country in which he happened to be located at the time of publishing his prints. It will be found that the first twelve of Horses, published in Holland in 1651, are signed D. or Dirck Stoop; those of Views in Portugal, R^o. Stoop, or Roderigo; those in England, sometimes R^o. and sometimes T. Stoop. What, therefore, is said in the article Peter Stoop, belongs to Theodore, Dirck, or Roderigo, who was the engraver that resided at Lisbon for some time, and was patronized by Catharine of Braganza, whom he accompanied to England on her marriage with Charles II. What induced him to go to Portugal, or when he went there, is not said, but it is certain that he was employed as painter to the court till 1662. Whether he painted the Views of Lisbon, of which he made etchings, or what other subjects, is not related. The Count A. Raczynski, who has been very particular in naming the artists of all countries who have left works in Portugal, does not mention Stoop in his work "Les Arts en Portugal," which he would have done had there been any of his paintings found there. It may, therefore, be concluded that Theodore, or Roderigo, was more of a designer and engraver than a painter. On his arrival in England he engraved and published the seven (not eight) prints descriptive of the queen's journey from Lisbon to London; and afterwards, jointly with Hollar, engraved the plates for the first part of Ogilby's translation of Æsop's Fables, after designs by Barlow; but several of those by Stoop are from his own designs. He remained in England till 1678, when it is said he returned to his own country, where probably he died. Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. iv., has given an accurate description of "The Twelve different Horses," published in 1651, and of the seven prints of "The Journey of Catherine, Infanta de Portugal," &c. Of the first, Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has pointed out the variations; of the second, that intelligent connoisseur says they are so rare that it is difficult to find a complete set. There is a set in the Sutherland collection. The first impressions are before the title at top, and before the words "Bridge d'Alcantara" near the centre of the point. Robert Dumesnil, "Le Peintre Graveur Français," tom. v., in a note to his account of the prints of Louis Meunier, has described the eight Views of Lisbon, which were executed by R. Stoop in 1660 and 1661. Of these Weigel says there is a superb set in the collection of the Archduke Charles at Vienna, and another in that of the Consul Clauss of that city. Of individual pieces, Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, describes the following: A bird's-eye view of a naval battle, being the Battle of Solebay, fought between the English and Dutch fleets on the 3rd and 4th of June, 1665. Signed Ro. Stoop, f. London. The size of the print, French measure, is H. 11p. 6l., L. 18p. 3l., the margin at bottom 3p. 4l.; it is in the cabinet of prints at Copenhagen, and is considered to be unique. Another, not less rare, is also described in the catalogue of that collection; it represents a Panorama of the theatre of war, with a chart; the chart is in the form of a curtain which genit, surrounded by trophies, are unfolding; above are branches of laurel, of which the leaves are very large. In the lower part of the print are mules with Spanish baggage, chariots, and fugitives pursued by the vanquishers; it is a picturesque bird's-eye view, after the ancient manner. In the upper part of the lower margin is inscribed Emtrado do Exercito del Rey de Castella, governado por D. Joam de Austria, no Reino de Portugal, &c.; in the other part, Rol dos cabos Portugueses, &c. A piece in Baron Lockhorst's collection is probably the same; it is described N^o. 387, one sheet, A Battle between the Spaniards and Portuguese, by Stoop. Extra rare. Another print of great rarity, said to be by him, represents Oliver Cromwell dancing on the tight rope. Weigel gives a full description of it, but as it is also mentioned by Granger, it is probably well known to collectors. There is an impression in the British Museum. To these may now be added others not known to the indefatigable connoisseurs, Bartsch, Weigel, and Robert Dumesnil, but pointed out to the editor by the no less intelligent critics in art, Messrs. Smith, dealers in ancient prints, of Lisle Street, London.

The Rape of Helen; in the British Museum.

A Skirmish of Cavalry on a road, at top Don Cantelmo, &c.; in ditto.

This print, mentioned among the five battle-pieces, is undoubtedly by Stoop.

Portrait of Charles II. (Pepys' collection.)

Portrait of Queen Catharine. (Ditto.)

In the valuable collection of J. H. Hawkins, Esq., of Bignor Park, Sussex, is a Portrait of Catharine of Braganza, wife of Charles II., inscribed Catharina D. G. Magnæ Britanniae, Franciæ et Hiberniæ Regina Filia Johannes IIII. Portug. etc.—Consecrat T. Stoop.

On the left, below the inscription, Lisbon 1662. N. Munier f. The size is H. 16½ in., W. 13 in.

N. Munier f. is evidently an interpolation, the engraving and form of the letters being very different from the other part of the writing. It is, however, a curious circumstance, as Dumesnil has pointed out the resemblance of some of Louis Meunier's etchings to those of Stoop, and even one that he copied after him. Zani is the only one who notices N. Munier, whom he describes as a Portuguese designer and engraver of portraits; perhaps he had seen this print, as he says that artist operated in 1662. Whether it be a fraudulent attempt on the part of N. Munier to pass it as his own, must be left to the more learned to decide; at all events he was a bungler to let Consecrat T. Stoop remain. It is believed that there are portraits of Charles and Catharine, two ovals in one plate, by T. Stoop; this is mentioned as a reminiscence.

There are five other pieces described by Weigel, representing Dutch battles, supposed to be by Stoop, which that true connoisseur hesitates to affirm, as they appear to him to be copied from more ancient prints. Impressions of these are in the British Museum.

With respect to these battle-pieces, Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, says, "We shall conclude this article (Stoop) by mentioning some pieces which we still hesitate to attribute to the master. These are the five following Dutch battle-pieces, which belong to a book:

- a. Battle near a Church. Above a cartouche bears the following inscription: Graef Jan van Nassou geslaghen en ghevangen Anno 1630. At the bottom, on the left, Fig. II. fol. 102. L. 13p. 3l., H. 10p. 3l. This is partly executed after a print by W. Baur in the Roman edition of Strada de bello Belg., 2 vols. Romæ, 1632—1647.
- b. Combat of Cavalry. On the right a house, above Don Cantelmo tot Burgerhout By Antwerpen geslaghen Anno 1643; on the right, Tweede Deel fol. 146. L. 13p. 3l., H. 10p. 2l.
- d. Plan of a City and its Environs. On the right is a troop of cavalry; at the bottom, on the left, Veroveringe van Thiemen Anno 1635; above, on the left, Fig. 21, fol. 215. L. 13p. 2l., H. 10p. 3l. The execution of this piece closely approaches the point of Stoop.
- e. Plan of a City and its Environs. Above, on the right, is seen the city of Wesel taken by assault, and the following inscription: Inde, naere duystre Nacht quam dit Wesel onverwacht. On the left, De Wyt vermaerde Stadt Wesel—veroverd—1629. L. 13p. 2l., H. 10p. 3l.

Weigel observes, what gave rise to some hesitation to attribute these pieces to an artist so prolific in original compositions as Dirk Stoop is, that the first is an imitation of a print by W. Baur, and that the rest are only imitations of other prints; besides, they are copies, in counterpart, after prints, probably more ancient, of a book cited below. Nevertheless the difference of the copies above described is worthy, of being remarked. The title of the book from which these imitations are taken is, Frederik Hendrik Nassau zyn leven en bedryf, door J. Commelyn. 2 Deele. Amst. 1651. Fol. The French translation has probably the same engravings; it bears the title, Hist. de la vie et des actes memorables de Frédéric Henri de Nassau, par J. Commelyn, 2 tomes. Amst. 1665. Fol. The first state of the Twelve Horses is before the introduction of any sky; the second state before numbers. It will be seen that the Combat of Cavalry, letter a, is mentioned among unknown prints by Stoop, and it again appears among those doubted by Weigel; as it is indubitably by Stoop, and the other four unquestionably by the engraver of that, the inference is obvious. Whether the two portraits in ovals on one plate of Charles II. and Queen Catharine, conjectured to exist, are the same as those in the Pepys collection, can only be decided by their discovery.

It may be useful to collectors to have the titles of the eight rare prints, Views of Lisbon, as given with descriptions for the first time, by Robert Dumensil.

1. The Title. In a cartouche, is inscribed Al Ilust^{ma}. Lv^a. D. Catharina Raynha da gran Bretanha D. V. C. R. Stoop 1660 Lix^a.; a general view of Lisbon, with sea and numerous vessels in front.
2. Vista de Santo Amaro E Prospectiva do Lugar de Bellem.
3. Visto do Covento da Madre de Deus.
4. O Palacio Reyal De Lixboa.
5. Touro Reyas nas Festas do Casamento da Raynha da Gran Bretanha Em Lixboa 1661.
6. O Palacio do Infante Dom Pedro Em o Corpus Sancto Em Lixboa.
7. A Torre E entrada da Barra de Bellem.
8. A view of the Convent of St. Jerome. On the left margin is inscribed VEVE DU PALAIS DE LISBONNE SEIOUR ORDINAIRE DES ROIS DE PORTUGAL; and on the right, VISTA DEL PALATIO DEL REI DE PORTUGALE EN LISBOA.

The first state of these prints is before the numbers or address; the second with the numbers.

It will be seen by the foregoing account that Bryan, following Walpole and other writers, has converted Theodore into Peter, and Peter into Roderigo, and in separating has confounded both. The consequence of this confusion has been, that many have doubted whether there were not four artists, Theodore, Dirck, Roderick, and Peter, of the name of Stoop; and others have denied the existence of Peter. It would be as hazardous to say that Theodore did not paint subjects such as are described in the text, as it was presumptuous to ascribe his etchings to Peter. That there was a Jan Pieter Stoop is certain, and that he painted subjects such as are attributed to Dirk Stoop, in that article, is equally so; every one conversant with pictures must have seen many examples, signed P. Stoop. Whether they were brothers, or otherwise related, is not ascertained; they flourished about the same period. Mention is made by some writers of J. Stoop, who, it is said, imitated the manner of Van Bloemen and Michael Carré; he is praised for his good colouring, spirited penciling, and knowledge of chiaro-scuro: leaving the imitation out of the question, this character will suit Peter Stoop also.]

STOOPENDAAL, B. Mr. Strutt calls this artist Daniel, and appears to have been led into the error by Basan. The prints which bear his name are inscribed, B. Stoopendaal, fec. He was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1710. In his best plates he appears to have imitated the style of Cornelius Visscher, though not always very successfully. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

A set of twelve Plates of figures and animals; dated 1651.

The first impressions are before they were numbered.

Sixty Views in Holland, entitled Les Delices du Diemer Meer; engraved from his own designs.

A set of twenty-four Views near the Hague.

Four plates representing the Departure of King William from Holland for England, his Arrival, his Meeting the Parliament, and his Coronation; inscribed B. Stoopendaal, fec.

The Robbers; after Bamboccio; B. Stoopendaal, sc.

The Attack of a Military Convoy; after the same; the same mark.

A Lime-kiln; after the same.

The last three plates are very finely copied from the prints by Visscher. He also engraved the plates for Clarke's edition of Cæsar's Commentaries, published in 1712.

[Notwithstanding Bryan's remark, there was a D. Stoopendaal, as well as a B. Stoopendaal; they were contemporaries. The set of twelve plates of figures and animals, mentioned above, are by Stoop, not Stoopendaal. Both of the Stoopendaals abbreviated their name occasionally, and signed Stoop. Their works have been jumbled together, and are so alike in subjects and manner that it is difficult to separate them. They both operated as late as 1719. It may be concluded, therefore, that Immerzeel is in error when he says that B. Stoopendaal was born in 1620.]

STORER, CHRISTOPHER. This artist was born at Constance in 1611. He travelled to Italy when he was young, and studied at Milan under Ercole Procaccini. Lanzi mentions him as a respectable painter of history. We have some etchings by him of historical subjects from his own compositions. He died at Milan in 1671.

[Johan Christopher Storer. Lanzi says that he produced works of solid taste, and he instances a picture of St. Martino, in the possession of the Abbe Bianconi, which was much valued by its intelligent owner. Subsequently he became a mannerist, and not unfrequently adopted gross or common ideas. In other points he displays much spirit, and is one of the few belonging to that age who may lay claim to the title of a good colourist. Several of his pictures have been engraved by M. Küssel, B. Kilian, Ph. Kilian, del Sole, and Bonacina. He was one of the artists employed in the decorations of Milan, on the occasion of the solemn entry of Philip IV. and Maria of Austria to that city. He etched several prints of subjects sacred and profane; these are sometimes signed Joan Christ. Storer, sometimes Giov. Christ. Storer, but never Stoer, as some have asserted. It is said that he returned to his own country, and died in his native city in 1671. There are many of his pictures in the churches and collections in Germany.]

STORK, or STORCK, ABRAHAM. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1650. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he proved one of the eminent painters of marines and sea-pieces of the Dutch school. His pictures usually represent views of the Y, or the Amstel, near Amsterdam, with a variety of shipping and boats, and a number of small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with great neatness and spirit. He also painted tempests and storms at sea, which he represented with a truth and fidelity little inferior to the admired productions of Backhynsen or Vanderveelde. The pictures of Stork are ingeniously grouped, and the vessels, and their rigging, are drawn with precision and accuracy. His colouring is clear and transparent, and his skies and water are light and floating. In the collection of Mr. Bissehop, at Rotterdam, was one of his most capital performances, representing the arrival of the Duke of Marlborough at Amsterdam, with a public procession of ships, barges, and yachts, decorated with flags, full of figures, habited in their different costumes; the composition was arranged with great ingenuity, and without the appearance of confusion, though the objects were so numerous. He died at Amsterdam in 1708.

[It is not certain that Abraham Stork died in 1708; some writers place his death in 1712, others later. Bartsch describes six very rare etchings by Abraham Stork, but from the subjects it may be doubted whether they are by the marine painter; one of them, however, is signed A. Stork. See Bartsch, P. G. tom. iv. p. 389. Stork, for so the painter signed his name, was an excellent hand at figures, and frequently embellished the landscapes of other artists with them. Perhaps there is a little exaggeration in saying that "he painted tempests and storms at sea in a manner little inferior to Vanderveelde and Backhynsen;" he was a painter of a calmer mood, and practised more in sight of port. His pictures have not yet attained their just value; some are truly excellent.]

[STORK, or STORCK, JAN, or JAKOB, painted marine subjects in the manner of Abraham Stork, but not equal in excellence. They are generally of small dimensions, and are of frequent occurrence. It is supposed that he was the elder brother of Abraham; they both lived at the same period. He signed his pictures J. Stork, or Storck; Jan or Jacob is merely conjectural.]

STOSS, FRANCIS. This very ancient engraver was a native of Germany, and is supposed to have flourished as early as the year 1460. Mr. Strutt believes him to have practised engraving prior to either Martin Schoen or Israel van Mecheln, and gives it as his opinion, that he was the tutor of Martin Schoen, from the resemblance which appears in their style, though it was greatly improved by Martin. He is said to have engraved a set of small plates, representing the Life and Passion of Christ, which were copied by Schoen. His prints are marked with an F. and an S. with a cross, thus,

F & S.

[Bartsch, P. G. tom. vi. p. 66, describes three prints by the engraver who used the mark in the text; the Resurrection of Lazarus, the dead Body of Christ, and the Holy Virgin. He says that he is very ancient, and absolutely unknown; for as to the names Francis Stoss, Stoltzhirs, and Stolzins, which different writers have given him, they have as little foundation as the opinion that he was the master of Martin Schongauer. Nagler, however, seems to think him of great importance, for he has given an elaborate article of eight closely printed pages of and concerning him and his supposed works, which those who feel interested in the subject will do well to consult.]

[STOTHARD, CHARLES ALFRED, a very distinguished designer of antiquities, painter, and illuminator, was the son of the celebrated Thomas Stothard, R. A. He was born in 1787, and after receiving a liberal education, was placed as a student in the Royal Academy, where he evinced great talent in designing from the antique. His father being engaged to paint the staircase at Burleigh House, he accompanied him thither from time to time, during the four years he was employed on that work, and while there made drawings of the monuments in the churches of that locality. This awakened in him a predilection for a pursuit in which he afterwards became so eminent, but which eventually cost him his life. In 1811 he exhibited a fine picture of the Murder of Richard II. at Pontefract Castle, in which he gave proof of his great knowledge of the costume of the time, and the portrait of that unfortunate monarch he painted from his effigy in Westminster Abbey. He now commenced his great work, "The Monumental Effigies of Great Britain," a work of great research, selected from the cathedrals and churches, for the purpose of bringing together and preserving correct representations of the best historical illustrations extant, from the Norman Conquest to the time of Henry VIII., and etched throughout by himself with a delicacy and fidelity which, till the appearance of this great work, was quite unknown to the present age. It is now considered indispensable to antiquaries and artists, and indeed to every gentleman who is desirous of being acquainted with the costumed history of the period, and the heraldic bearings of all those illustrious persons whose names are recorded for valorous achievements, or other deeds beneficial to their country. The heraldic emblazonry is of the highest order for correctness and beauty. In 1816 he was deputed by the Society of Antiquaries, of which he had become a member, to make drawings from the Tapestries at Bayeux. While engaged on this work he visited the Abbey of Fontevraud, where he discovered the effigies of the Plantagenets, the existence of which had been doubted, owing to the destructions which had taken place during the revolution. These were added to his work, and in the edition published by Mr. Bohn are superbly illuminated in imitation of the originals. Subsequently he made drawings for the Society of the pictures discovered on the walls of the painted chamber. In prosecuting this work he recovered the long-lost art of embossing gold on the surface of the material, as practised by the old Italian and German illuminators, and which contributes so much to the splendour of ancient Missals, and other Manuscripts. His last undertaking was for illustrating the account of Devonshire in Lysons's Magna Britannia. For that purpose he left London in May, 1821, and arrived at Bere Ferrers on the 27th. The following day he began making tracings of the stained glass window in the church, when his feet slipping from the ladder on which he stood, he fell and died on the spot, his head having struck on a monument in the chancel. His wife, a very talented lady, (now Mrs. Bray), who accompanied him in his journey to France, published an account of their tour through Normandy, Brittany, and other parts, which was illustrated with 21 plates from designs by her husband; those representing costume were coloured, to give them their full effect.]

[STOTHARD, THOMAS, a painter and designer of historical, poetical, and fanciful subjects in general, was born at London in 1755. He was the son of a publican. His father dying when he was only five years old, he was left to the care of some relations, and being a sickly child, he was sent by them to be nursed in the country; and at eight years old he was placed in a school at Stretton, near Tadcaster, the birth-place of his father, where he remained till he was of a suitable age to be put out as an apprentice. Having shown an inclination for drawing, by copying some of Houbraken's heads, his friends placed him with a designer of patterns for brocading silks. The trade declining, and his master dying before the expiration of his term, he was left to his own resources. Having, however, minutely studied nature in the drawing of flowers and other ornaments, and taken every opportunity of improving his knowledge, he at once struck out a more profitable profession for himself by making illustrative designs for the Town and Country Magazine, published by Harrison of Paternoster Row; this made him known, and he was soon employed on other publications, particularly Bell's edition of the British Poets, and Harrison's Novelist's Magazine. These illustrations attracted the notice of Flaxman, and a friendship commenced between the two artists, probably of advantage to both. To improve himself he became a student of the Royal Academy, where he studied with great diligence. The first picture he exhibited was Ajax defending the dead Body of Patroclus, which so nearly resembles the designs of Mortimer, an artist at that time in vogue, that it might be mistaken for his work. This shows how readily young artists of talent imitate bad examples when they happen to be popular. Stothard, however, did not long continue this mode of imitation, but adopted a style of his own. He was made an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1785, an Academician in 1794, deputy Librarian in 1810, and on the death of Mr. Birch in 1812 was appointed Librarian in his stead. It is supposed that Stothard made upwards of five thousand designs, three thousand of which have been engraved. As most of these were illustrations of popular literature, his reputation was widely diffused not only through England but on the continent. His latest productions for this purpose were embellishments for the poems of his friend and patron Samuel Rogers, all of which are exquisitely beautiful. The poems and the designs are worthy of each other. Among his larger works may be enumerated those he did for Boydell's Shakspeare, The Canterbury Pilgrims, the Ceremony of the Fitch of Bacon at Dunmow, and the Wellington Shield. He painted the staircase at Burleigh House, the seat of the Marquis of Exeter, in fresco; the figures are seven feet in height. He also designed the ceiling for the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh. He furnished designs for chasers in silver and other metals, particularly for the eminent goldsmiths Rundell and Bridge, and the outlines of many distinguished works of English sculpture may be traced to him. Stothard's excellence as an artist lay in design and composition. His style was certainly mannered, but in character and expression truth and nature prevailed; his humour never degenerated into caricature, nor his grace into affectation. His productions appealed to the mind; he never missed the true sentiment of his subject, and he was particularly careful of adopting the proper costume. In representing the sports and humours of children, especially in the infantine form, he is without a rival among modern artists, and his female figures are distinguishable for simplicity of outline and graceful action. He is better in domestic than heroic subjects, for he was a close observer of men and manners; not that he failed in embodying the conceptions of the poet correctly when called upon to embellish his work, but it was the placid, the playful, or the sentimental that best suited his genius. His designs are eagerly sought, and increase daily in value, notwithstanding the immense number he executed. This is owing to their truth, simplicity, and beautiful expression, not, as in many other instances, to its being a fashion to collect them; and as long as truth and simplicity have charms they will continue to delight. As a colourist in oil painting, it must be acknowledged that he is weak, particularly in subjects of dimensions above the cabinet size. His pictures want force though not deficient in harmony, and have too much the appearance of being painted in tempera, or water colours. He died on the 27th of April, 1834, and was buried in Bunhill Fields. There are portraits of him by Harlowe, Jackson, and Wood, and a bust in marble by Baily, the eminent sculptor, the pupil and worthy successor of Flaxman. Two of these portraits have been engraved, one by Worthington, the other by Bond. It is said that he gave the preference, before all his other works, to fifteen small pictures which he painted to illustrate John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; these were engraved by Strutt, and published by J. Thane. He was once asked why he did not go to the Academy dinner, always given previously to the opening of the Exhibition, and to which sundry opulent persons are generally invited; he said he wanted shaving, and did not think it worth the trouble; for, continued he, I have no peculiar enjoyment in partaking what others are deprived of, but on the contrary feel myself less happy by being separated from the many to devour selfishly what, to be enjoyed, requires to be shared in common.]

STRADA, VESPASIANO. According to Baglione, this artist was of Spanish parentage, but was a native of Rome. It is not mentioned under whom he studied, but he probably learned the rudiments of the art from his father, who was an obscure painter. He worked chiefly in fresco, and had embellished the churches and public edifices at Rome with several of his historical paintings, when his promising career was interrupted in the prime of life. The following are amongst his most considerable works. In the cloister of the monastery of S. Onofrio, are different subjects from the life of that Saint; in the church of S. Maria Maddalena al Corso, the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to St. Elisabeth, and the Adoration of the Shepherds. He died at Rome, at the age of thirty-six years, in the pontificate of Paul V. We have several etchings by this artist from his own compositions, which prove him to have been a man of considerable genius. They are executed in a slight, hasty style, but they discover the hand of the master. He usually marked his plates with the initials V. S. F. or V. S. I. F., and sometimes VES. ST, I. FE. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

Christ shown to the Jews, [or little Ecce Homo, VESP. STRA. I. F.]

Christ crowned with Thorns, [or great Ecce Homo, VESPASIANO STRADA, I. F.]

The Holy Family, with St. John. [No mark.]

The Virgin, supported by two Angels. [VESPASIANO ST. I. F.]

The Marriage of St. Catherine. [VESPASIANO STRADA, I. F.]

The Virgin and infant Christ. [Vespasiano Strada, i. f.]

[Baglione says that Vespasiano Strada died during the pontificate of Paul V., at about the age of thirty-six; this at latest would be 1620. Malpe says he was born in 1591, and died in 1624. But one of his prints is dated 1595, on which Bartsch remarks, that supposing this print, which exhibits his greatest power, was done by him at the age of twenty, he must have been born about 1575. If Baglione is correct, he was born a few years later, and was a precocious artist. Bartsch, P. G. tom. xvii., has given descriptions of twenty-one pieces by him, which he believes to be a complete list. Fifteen of these have his name at full, or abbreviated: one only has V. S. I. F.]

STRADA, or STRADANUS, JOHN. This painter was born at Bruges in 1536, and was first instructed by his father, who was an artist of little celebrity. He afterwards studied under Peter Aertsen, until he found himself sufficiently advanced to undertake a journey to Italy. He studied at Rome the antique, and the works of Raffaele and Michael Angelo, and attached himself to Francesco Rossi, called Salviati, whose style he in some measure adopted. In conjunction with that painter, and Daniello da Volterra, he was employed in the decorations of the pontifical palace of Belvidere, where he acquired considerable reputation. He was invited to Naples by Don John of Austria, to represent his military achievements, in which he acquitted himself in a manner worthy of the ablest artists of his time. Vasari engaged him to visit Florence, where he was employed, conjointly with that painter, in several considerable works for the ducal palace, and the churches and other public edifices. In the church of the Nunziata, at Florence, is one of his most celebrated works, representing the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, with a great number of figures. In S. Croce is a fine picture of the Ascension; and in S. Maria Nuova, the Baptism of Christ by St. John. In the chapel of the Palazzo Pitti are two small altar-pieces by him, representing the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi, which are much admired. The talents of this artist were not confined to historical subjects; he was not less successful in painting huntings, processions, and battles. Stradanus possessed a fertile invention, and a constant practice had given him uncommon facility of execution, both in oil and in fresco. His design was usually correct, though occasionally heavy and mannered, and his colouring was vigorous and effective. He was a member of the Academy at Florence, where he died in 1605. [He was an indefatigable artist. He made many designs for tapestries. His works have been engraved by Galle, C. de Pass, Wierix, Collaert, Goltzius, Sadeler, and others. The engravings after his pictures amount to above four hundred pieces. In 1578 was published at Antwerp, a work under the title "Stradani Venationes Ferarum, Avium, Piscium," &c., illustrated with 94 plates of all kinds of hunting, and fights of animals, engraved by several of those artists. Though he lived and practised so long in Italy, he did not divest himself of his Flemish manner. Some of his cabinet pictures are well composed, and very brilliant in colour.]

[STRAATEN, JAN JOSEPH IGNATIUS VAN, a painter of dead game and flowers, was born at Utrecht in 1766, and was a scholar of C. van Geelen. His pictures are in the style of J. Weenix, well composed and highly finished. In the landscape part he was assisted by his countryman, Swagers. He died in 1808.]

STRAETEN, HENRY VANDER. This artist was a native of Holland, born about the year 1665. It does not appear that he had any other means of improvement than his studies after nature, and without the help of a master he reached an eminent rank in the art as a landscape painter. He visited England about the year 1690, where he met with great encouragement, and his gain was considerable, which he squandered away as fast as he acquired it. The noble author of the Anecdotes records the following instance of his eccentricity and dissipation. "One day sitting down to paint, he could do nothing to please himself. He made a new attempt with no better success. Throwing down his pencils, he stretched himself out to sleep, when thrusting his hand inadvertently into his pocket he found a shilling; swearing an oath, he said, 'It is always thus when I have any money—get thee gone,' continued he, throwing the shilling out of the window, and returning to his work, produced one of his best pictures. This story he related to the gentleman who purchased the picture." The pictures of Vander Straeten resemble those of Ruysdael and Hobbima; and some of his productions, soon after his arrival in this country, are not very inferior to the works of those admired masters. Towards the latter part of his life, his expensive and profligate habits reduced him to the necessity of despatch, and his last pictures are the mere shadows of his former ability.

[This is, no doubt, the same artist as Nicolas Vander Straeten, who, Balkema says, was born at Utrecht in 1680, and went to London, where he died in 1722. Other writers say he was born in the same year, and came to England in 1690, "and met with great encouragement." He would have deserved it, if he painted like "Ruisdael and Hobbema" at ten years of age. The same authority says he painted ten pictures in one day! Really, on reading these circumstances, one is apt to exclaim with the good bishop, who had attentively perused Gulliver's Travels. "I don't believe that one-half can be true."]

STRANGE, SIR ROBERT. This distinguished engraver was born in one of the Orkney Isles, in 1721. He was descended from a younger son of the family of the Stranges of Balcasky, in the county of Fife, who settled in Orkney at the time of the Reformation. He was originally intended for the law, but some drawings and unfinished sketches, which he had produced without the help of an instructor, having been shown to Mr. Cooper, a drawing-master at Edinburgh, they were so highly approved by him, that he proposed that the young man should be placed under his tuition. The proposal being entirely agreeable to his own inclinations, was immediately adopted. He had made considerable progress under that master's instruction, when a fatal interruption to the arts took place in Scotland, by the unfortunate civil war which broke out on the arrival of the young Chevalier. As soon as tranquillity was restored, Mr. Strange came to London, and soon afterwards formed the project of visiting Paris for improvement in the art of engraving, which he had begun to practise with success. On his way to the capital of France, he made some stay at Rouen, where he frequented the Academy, and obtained an honorary prize for design, though his competitors were numerous. On his arrival at Paris he became a pupil of Le Bas, from whom he learned the use of what is called the dry point, which he afterwards improved, and used with such success in his engravings.

In 1751 he returned to London, at a period when historical engraving had made little progress in England, and he devoted himself to that arduous and difficult branch of the art, of which he may be justly considered as the father in this country. In 1761 Mr. Strange gratified a wish he had long entertained of visiting Italy, for the purpose of making designs from the most celebrated pictures of the distinguished masters of the different schools, from which he purposed engraving plates, some of which he executed abroad, and others after his return to London. In his tour he was every where favoured with the most flattering marks of attention and respect. He was made a member of the academies of Rome, Florence, Bologna, Parma, and Paris.

In 1787 Mr. Strange received the honour of knighthood, but did not long survive that mark of distinction, and died in 1792. The works of Sir Robert Strange consist of about fifty plates, engraved from the most eminent painters of the different schools of Italy, distinguished by a bold and intelligent execution, exhibiting an admirable union of the point with the graver, and producing a vigorous and harmonious effect. The following are among his most admired prints :

PORTRAITS.

- Charles I.; whole-length; after Vanduyck. 1770.
 Charles I. with a page, and his equerry holding his horse; after the same. 1782.
 Henrietta Maria, Queen of Charles I., with the Prince of Wales and Duke of York; after the same. 1784.
 The Children of Charles I.; after the same. 1758.
 A Bust of Raffaele; after a picture by himself; inscribed Ille hic est Raphael, &c. 1787.
 A Portrait of himself; from a design by J. B. Greuze.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- St. Cecilia; after the picture by Raffaele; formerly in the church of S. Giovanni, at Bologna, now in the French Museum. [Not there now.] 1771.
 The Virgin and infant Christ, with Mary Magdalene, St. Jerome, and two Angels; after the famous picture by Coreggio, formerly at the academy at Parma; now in the gallery of the Louvre. [Not now.] 1768.—[1771.]
 Venus reclining; after the picture by Titian; in the Florentine Gallery. [1768.]
 Danae; after the same; from the picture belonging to the King of Naples. 1768.
 Venus and Adonis; after the same; from a picture in the same collection. 1762.
 Mary Magdalene, penitent; after Guido. 1762, [and 1773.]
 The Death of Cleopatra; after the same. 1777.
 Fortune flying over a Globe; after the same. 1778.
 Venus attired by the Graces; after the same. 1759.
 The Chastity of Joseph; after the same. 1769.
 The Virgin, with a choir of Angels; Te Deum laudamus; after C. Maratti. [1760?]
 The Virgin, with St. Catherine and Angels, contemplating the infant Jesus sleeping; Parce somnum rumpere; after the same. [1760?]
 Christ appearing to the Virgin after his Resurrection; after Guercino. 1773.
 Abraham sending away Hagar; after the same. 1763, [and 1767.]
 Esther before Ahasuerus; after the same. 1767.
 The Death of Dido; after the same. 1776.
 Belisarius; after Sal. Rosa. 1757.
 Romulus and Remus; after P. da Cortona. [1757.]
 Cæsar repudiating Pompeia; after the same. [1757?]
 Sappho consecrating her Lyre to Apollo; after C. Dolci. 1787.
 The Martyrdom of St. Agnes; after Domenichino. 1759.
 The Choice of Hercules; after N. Poussin. [1759.]
 The Return from Market; after Ph. Wouvermans. One of the first plates he published, engraved at Paris in 1750.

[As every engraving by Robert Strange is worth recording, the following are added from the Catalogue raisonné of M. Charles Le Blanc, to complete, as far as is known, the list of his works. The numbers prefixed are according to M. Le Blanc's arrangement.

4. The Holy Virgin; after Guido. 1756?
 5. The Angel of the Annunciation; after the same. 1756?

6. The Annunciation; after the same. 1787?
 8. The Offspring of Love; after the same. 1766? The picture is in the Marquis of Westminster's collection.
 10. The infant Jesus plating a Crown of Thorns; after Murillo. 1787?
 11. The infant Jesus asleep; after Vanduyck. 1787?
 13. St. Agnes; after Domenichino. 1759? The picture was, perhaps is, at Kensington Palace.
 16. The Magdalene; after Guido. 1753.
 18. The Magdalene; after Correggio. 1780.
 19. Laomedon, King of Troy, detected by Neptune and Apollo; after Salvator Rosa. 1775.
 21. The finding of Romulus and Remus; after P. da Cortona. 1757?
 22. The Death of Cleopatra; after Guido. 1753..
 26. Apollo rewarding Merit; after A. Sacchi. 1755.
 28. Venus blinding Cupid; after Titian. 1769.
 31. Cupid sleeping; after Guido. 1766?
 32. Cupid; after Schidone. 1774.
 33. Cupid; after Vanloo. 1750.
 36. Lips, an allegorical representation of the south-west Wind.
 37. Zephyr, an allegorical representation of the west Wind. 1760. This and the preceding were engraved from bassi rilievi, which ornament the tower of Andronicus Cyrrhestes at Athens, and are inserted in the first volume of "The Antiquities of Athens," by Stuart, chap. iii. plates 17 and 18.
 38. Justice; after Raphael. 1765.
 39. Meekness; after the same. 1765.
 40. Liberality and Modesty; after Guido. 1755.
 42. The first of Duties; after Schidone. 1781.
 44. The Death of the Stag. 1749. A vignette to "Beckford's Thoughts on Hunting," at least so it appears in the fourth edition, published in 1796.
 47. Half-length of Charles I.; after Van Dyck. This, and Nos. 52, 56, 57, and 58, were engraved for the first edition of Smollett's History of England, in quarto, published in 1757.
 50. The Apotheosis of Octavius and Alfred, Children of George III., who died in their infancy; after Benjamin West. 1787.
 51. Charles James Edward Stuart, called the Young Pretender.
 52. Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland. This is engraved after the print of Mary Queen of Scots, by Vertue; without the name of the artist.
 55. Parmigiani Amica, or the Mistress of Parmigiano; after Parmigiano. 1774.
 56. James Graham, Marquis of Montrose; after Van Dyck.
 57. Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford; after the same.
 58. Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex; after Holbein.
 59. William Hamilton, of Bangor, a Poet. 1760. This portrait is found at the head of a collection entitled "Poems on several Occasions," London, 1760, octavo.
 60. Robert Leighton, Archbishop of Glasgow. 1758. This portrait is found at the head of "Selections from the Works of Archbishop Leighton, with a sketch of his Life, by the Rev. W. Wilson, D. D." London, 1758.
 61. Archibald Pitcairn, Physician and Poet; after J. B. Medina; bust in a medallion, supported by a plinth, on which is inscribed,
 Scire potestates herbarum et tangere plectrum,
 Pitcairno Phoebus munera magna dedit.

It is said that Strange retouched Dorigny's plates of the Transfiguration, and the cartoons by Raphael, at Hampton Court. It is also stated, that about the year 1790 he had eighty copies of selected proofs of his works bound, to which he prefixed a dedication to the king, and an introduction on the progress of the art of engraving, and remarks on the pictures that he had engraved. There are three states of almost all the prints by Strange; pure aquafortis before the letter, and with the letter. The first state, which was only a trial, is very rare; the second is also rarely met with, because he had the honesty not to suffer more proofs to be taken than were subscribed for.

He published "A descriptive Catalogue of a Collection of Pictures, and of thirty-two Drawings, collected by him in Italy." Also, "An Inquiry into the Rise and Establishment of the Royal Academy of Arts; to which is prefixed a letter to the Earl of Butc."

Strange was a member of the Academies of Paris, Rome, Florence, Bologna, and Parma, but not of the Royal Academy of London. The king, however, thought him worthy of knighthood, and accordingly he was dubbed in 1787: he enjoyed this honour for about five years, when he died, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Paul, Covent Garden.

An excellent catalogue of his prints by M. Charles Le Blanc, has been published by Rudolph Weigel, of Leipzig, enriched with some valuable notes by the editor: it forms part of the work entitled "Le Graveur en taille douce."

[STRASTER, FRAY GERONIMO, a Franciscan, who resided at the convent of his order in Valladolid, in 1613, when he engraved, with considerable ability, the plates to a work entitled "Historia del Monte Celia de nuestra Señora de la Salceda," written by D. Fr. Pedro Gonzalez de Mendoza, archbishop of Granada. Zani says he operated in 1601; at present no more of his works, or history, is known.]

[STRATEN, GEORGE VANDER, a Flemish portrait painter, who resided in Portugal about the middle of the 16th century, as appears by an order from the queen to pay him 7600 reis for the portrait of Dom Antonio, and his receipt for the money, signed Joans Van der Z Estraten, July 4th, 1556. He received a further sum of 80 cruzades, for painting the portrait of Prince Dom Sebastien, the youngest son of the queen, on the 14th December of the same year. By these documents it would seem that he was painter to the court.]

[STRAUCH, LORENZ, born at Nuremberg in 1554, was a skilful portrait and architectural painter, and also painted on glass. Bartsch, P. G. tom. ix., describes an etching by him, a View of the Market-place at Nuremberg, with the date 1599, which was the only one known to him. Nagler, however, gives a list of twenty-two, some of which are signed with his name in full, and dated as late as 1614; others with the mark . Whether they are all by Lorenz Strauch can only be decided by inspection, and that by an experienced eye. Some writers interpret the mark Lorenz Schnitzner; Lorenz Stoer, and others of the period, used the same. Doppelmair, Zani, and Bartsch say that he died in 1630, but Nagler places his death in 1636.]

STREATER, ROBERT, an English painter, born in London in 1624, and was a scholar of du Moulin. He did not confine himself to any particular branch of art, but painted history, portraits, landscape, architecture, and still-life. At the Restoration, he was appointed serjeant-painter to Charles II. His principal works were, the theatre at Oxford; some ceilings at Whitehall, which have perished; the Battle of the Giants, at Sir Robert Clayton's; and the pictures of Moses and Aaron, in the church of St. Michael, Cornhill. He died in 1680. He occasionally amused himself with the point, but his etchings are very indifferent. The following are by him:

The Battle of Naseby; a large print on two sheets.

Some Architectural plates; after J. Dinante, &c.

STREEK, JURIAN VAN. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1632. He occasionally painted portraits, but is more known as a painter of dead game, musical instruments, books, vases, and other inanimate objects, which he designed correctly, and finished with uncommon neatness. He composed those subjects in a pleasing manner, and introduced an effect of light and shadow, which is extremely picturesque. He died in 1678. [A skull, a ball of soap, and a sepulchral lamp are frequent objects in his compositions. When he marked his pictures he used J V S in a monogram.]

STREEK, HENRY VAN, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Amsterdam in 1659, and received his first instruction from his father, but was afterwards a scholar of Emanuel de Wit. He was a reputable painter of architectural views, which his perfect acquaintance with perspective enabled him to design with unusual accuracy and precision. His pictures generally represent the interiors of magnificent buildings, churches, temples, and palaces, which were frequently embellished with figures by some other artist. He died in 1713.

STRETEN. See STRAETEN.

STRINGA, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Modena in 1635, and was a scholar of Lodovico Lana. He improved his style by studying the works of Guercino, and the best pictures which composed the celebrated Galleria Estense, of which he had the direction. He painted several historical subjects for the churches, and the ducal palace at Modena; and there are some of his works in the public edifices at Venice. He died in 1709.

[Stringa was endowed with a rich imagination, and was spirited and rapid in execution; he produced much which was greatly commended, both in the cathedral and other places. His distinguishing characteristics are, the depth of his shades, the somewhat disproportioned length of his figures, and an inclination to the capricious in his actions and compositions. He painted history, landscape, and architecture, and also engraved in aquafortis. Bartsch, tom. xix., has described three etchings by him; the Disciples placing Christ in the Sepulchre, a Female Painting, signed F. Stringa In. F., and a portrait of Francis II., duke of Modena; to these Nagler has added another, St. John with the Cross, signed and dated 1682. All these are tolerably large prints, being about 12 inches by 8 inches, except the last, which is about 9 by 6. Zani says he was also a writer, but does not mention on what subject; he marks him BB.]

STRINGA, FERDINANDO. This artist engraved part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples in 1750.

STROZZI, BERNARDO, called IL CAPPUCINO, and sometimes IL PRETE GENOESE. This painter must not be confounded with Ippolito Galantini, also called Il Prete Genoese. He was born at Genoa in 1581, and was a disciple of Pietro Sorri. At an early period of his life he became a monk of the order of St. Francis. This retirement did not, however, oblige him to abandon his pursuits as an artist, and he distinguished himself as a reputable painter of history. Of his fresco works at Genoa, the most considerable is his representation of Paradise, in the church of S. Domenico, a copious and ingenious composition, and coloured with a vigour approaching to oil. At Novi and Voltri are several altarpieces by him. He was however more occupied for private collections and galleries than for the churches. In the Palazzo Brignole is a picture by this painter representing the Incredulity of St. Thomas; it is in an apartment amidst the works of the most distinguished colourists, which appear languid and subdued by its superior vigour and brilliancy. His design is not sufficiently correct, and his forms are neither select nor beautiful; but the heads of his old men exhibit a grand and impressive character, and are painted with spirit and energy. He died in 1644.

[Strozzi left the cloister, when a priest, to contribute to the support of an aged mother and a sister; but the one dying and the other marrying, he refused to return to his order; and being forcibly recalled and sentenced to three years' imprisonment, he contrived to make his escape, fled to Venice, and there passed the remainder of his days as a secular priest. He was accustomed to paint portraits, in which department he was superior to all his contemporaries, and in all his larger compositions he painted the figures from life. Hence there is a want of ideality, and often a meanness in his heads, particularly in those of the females and children. He sometimes painted half-figures in the manner of Caravaggio. In the Florence Gallery there is a picture by him known by the title dellu Moneta, the figures half-size and exhibiting great vivacity. In the Louvre there are two, a St. Anthony of Padua caressing the infant Jesus, and the Virgin with the Infant in the clouds; but his best works are to be seen in Genoa and Venice. He is esteemed the most spirited artist of his own school; and in strong impasto, richness, and vigour of colour has few rivals in any other, or rather in this style of colouring he is original and without example. He was buried at S. Fosco in Venice, with this inscription: Bernardus Strozzius Pictorum splendor, Liguria decus.]

STRUDEL, PETER. This artist was a native of the Tyrolese, born in 1680. He studied at Venice under Carlo Loti, under whose direction he became a reputable painter of history. He had acquired considerable celebrity on leaving the school of that master, when his talents recommended him to the patronage of the Emperor Leopold, who invited him to his court, appointed him one of his painters, and was so satisfied with his abilities, that he conferred on him the dignity of a baron. He had embellished several of the churches and public edifices of Germany with his historical pictures, when he died, at Vienna, in 1717. [There is great difference among writers respecting Baron Peter von Strudel's birth; some place it in 1648, others in 1660, which, according to circumstances, and the value of the authorities, seems to be the true year. The date of his death is correct. His works are confined to Germany.]

STRUTT, JOSEPH, an English engraver, and writer on art, born about the year 1745. He engraved a variety of plates in the crayon and dotted manner, which are executed with great neatness and delicacy. We are indebted to Mr. Strutt for a laborious and interesting work, his Biographical Dictionary of Engravers, which he embellished with several plates, engraved by himself. He also published the Antiquities of England, with plates of his own execution. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Birth of Venus. 1779.

Pandora presenting the fatal Box to Epimetheus. 1779.

Candaules presenting his Queen to his favourite Gyges; after Le Sueur. 1787.

[Joseph Strutt published other valuable works besides his Dictionary of Engravers; all of which are illustrated with prints of great interest, cleverly executed. The principal are, Horda Angel-cynnian, or the Manners and Customs of England from the time of the Saxons; Chronicles of England; Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England; Dresses and Habits of the People of England; Sports and Pastimes; and he left an unfinished romance in manuscript, entitled Queen-Hoo-Hall, which Sir Walter Scott, in 1808, endeavoured to complete. He died probably a few years previous to this, as Sir Walter calls it a posthumous production of the late Mr. Joseph Strutt. In addition to the plates to his own literary productions, Strutt engraved twelve illustrations for the Pilgrim's Progress, after T. Stothard; Candaules exposing his Wife to Gyges, after Le Sueur; Venus in the Island of Cyprus; Pandora; an Allegory of America, after R. E. Pine; and others for publications of the day.]

[STRY, ABRAHAM VAN, a painter of portraits, landscapes and cattle, and familiar subjects, was born at Dort the 31st of December, 1753. He commenced with his father, who was an ornamental painter, and showed a great disposition to paint fruit and flowers, but was obliged, by the nature of his father's profession, to assist him in historical subjects, landscapes, and bas-reliefs. When arrived at the age of manhood, he quitted the decorative line, and commenced painting portraits, landscapes, and cattle, in the manner of Cuyp, and interiors with representations of the various occupations of the middle classes, particularly of shopkeepers and general dealers. In such subjects he arrived at a great degree of excellence, especially in the management of the chiaro-scuro. His colouring inclines to the gay, and his penciling is rather full; but it may be expected that time will meliorate both. He ranks among the modern Dutch masters, whose works will hereafter be in request out of Holland. Two of his pictures are in the Museum at Amsterdam, and specimens are to be found in some of the best collections in the Netherlands. He died on the 7th of March, in 1826, according to Immerzeel; in 1824, according to Balkema; and in 1830, according to Nagler.]

[STRY, JACOB, or JAMES, VAN, landscape and cattle painter, was born at Dort in 1756. He received his earliest instruction in painting from his father, who, it is said, was thoroughly acquainted with the theory and practice of it. He afterwards studied at Antwerp under Andrew Lens, and also at the academy of that city. His progress was so rapid, that he was considered to be the most promising landscape painter of the time. But though he studied nature, he had a great predilection for copying and imitating the works of other masters. Cuyp and Hobbema were the models he most affected, particularly the former. Such, indeed, was his success, that many of his imitations of Albert Cuyp have passed as originals of that master; it is only when they have Van Stry's name that they are excluded from choice collections at present. Whether it be from affection to Cuyp, or from a desire to place Van Stry's pictures in their proper position, the dealers very carefully obliterate his name from those that are particularly good, and substitute that of his type; so that his works are frequently praised and esteemed, not for what they are, but for what they are supposed to be. Some of his copies of Hobbema are very masterly; they are not so common as his imitations of Cuyp. As far as reputation is concerned, it was rather unfortunate that he was content to be so much the follower of others; for he was really a painter of great talent, both in landscape and animals, and might have taken a high position if he had imitated nature only. Some of the Dutch writers exult that pictures by him have been sold from four to seven hundred florins in Holland; it would be no difficult matter to point to some in England that have obtained, by judicious management, as many pounds sterling. He died in 1815. In the Museum at Amsterdam there are three capital pictures by him, of landscapes with figures and cattle. He was a corresponding member of the Royal Institute of the Netherlands, and is highly eulogized by several contemporary writers for his general knowledge as well as artistic abilities.]

[STUART, GILBERT, an eminent American portrait painter, was born in the State of Rhode Island in the year 1754. Soon after coming of age he went to England, and was introduced to Benjamin West, with whom he practised for some time. He showed considerable ability, and some portraits that he exhibited brought him into public notice. He rose into eminence, and his claims were acknowledged even during the life of Sir Joshua Reynolds. His high reputation as a portrait painter, as well in Ireland as in England, introduced him to a large acquaintance among the higher classes of society, and he was in the road of realizing a large fortune had he continued in England. He returned to America in 1793, and resided chiefly in Philadelphia and Washington, in the practice of his profession, till about the year 1805, when he removed to Boston, where he remained to the time of his death. During the last ten years of his life he had to struggle with many infirmities; yet such was the vigour of his mind, that it seemed to triumph over the decays of nature, and to give to some of his last productions all the truth and splendour of his prime. He died in 1823. While in England he painted the portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Benjamin West, W. Woollett, Alderman Boydell, John Kemble, Dr. Fothergill, and other persons of less note. Of his American portraits, that of Washington is the chef d'œuvre; it is really a capital performance, and may vie with the best of Sir Joshua Reynolds. He painted the President several times; once for the late Marquis of Lansdown; this was engraved by James Heath, and the American writers exclaim with bitterness against the want of fidelity in the translation, and the want of honesty in doing it without the painter's sanction. They who wish to know more of this painter, will find a long rambling anecdotal account of him in Dunlap's "History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States." Whether the artist will rise in their esteem by the perusal is more than can be promised; had the relator wished that he should, he would have omitted the greater portion. But Dunlap professes to be a great lover of truth, and seems to think that no circumstance, however scandalous and detrimental to the character of his hero, should be omitted.]

STUBBS, GEORGE. This eminent painter of animals was born at Liverpool in 1724. He particularly excelled in the anatomy of the horse, and was much employed in painting the portraits of the most celebrated racers of his time, which he not only designed with correctness, but with a characteristic spirit for which he was particularly distinguished. Though Mr. Stubbs was chiefly engaged in that branch of the art, his talents were capable of higher exertions, as he has proved by his picture of Phaeton with the Horses of the Sun, and his admirable delineation of the tiger. He died in 1806.

Mr. Stubbs was an associate of the Royal Academy. In 1766 he published a work entitled "The Anatomy of the Horse," with plates etched by himself, after his own designs. [At the age of thirty Stubbs went to Rome for improvement, it is said, but in what, as regarded the line of art he adopted, does not appear. He painted pictures on large plates of iron in enamel, which are not now of much value. He etched and scraped in mezzotinto several plates of animals from pictures painted by himself, which will always be esteemed. Other pictures by him were engraved by Woollett, Earlom, Green, Hodges, and other eminent engravers. His son, George Townley Stubbs, who was born in 1756, and died in 1815, engraved several of his father's pictures of animals, and a few pictures after others.]

[STUERBOUT. See DIRCK VAN HAERLEM.]

[STURMIO, HERNANDO, is mentioned by Bermudez among the Spanish painters, but supposed by other writers to be a German; Racinski thinks he was a native of Zurich. He resided at Seville about the middle of the sixteenth century, and painted the altar of the chapel of the Evangelists in the cathedral there, in several compartments. In one of these St. Gregory is represented saying mass, in another the Resurrection of Christ, in others the four Evangelists and several Saints, among which are the patronesses of Seville, Santa Justa and Santa Rufina. One of these compartments is inscribed, Hernandus Sturmius Ziriccensis faciebat, 1555. The figures are said to be designed with freedom, and the colouring is good. Racinski thinks him quite an original painter, though in parts he discovers the influence of Michael Angelo, particularly in the figures of the Evangelists Luke and John.]

STURT, JOHN. According to Lord Orford, this artist was born in London the 6th of April, 1658, and was a pupil of Robert White. His chief excellence consisted in the engraving of letters. His principal work is his book of the Common Prayer, published in 1717, which was very neatly engraved on silver plates. The top of every page is ornamented with a small historical vignette. He died in 1730.

STUVEN, ERNEST. This artist was born at Hamburg in 1657, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by an obscure painter, named Hins. In 1675, when he was eighteen years of age, he went to Amsterdam, where he studied some time under John Voorhout, a reputable painter of history and portraits. Finding that the pictures of flowers and fruit by Abraham Mignon were at that time in the highest estimation, and having himself an inclination for that branch of the art, he became his disciple, and though his works are not so exquisitely finished nor so delicately coloured as those of his instructor, they entitle him to a respectable rank among the flower painters of his country. He died in 1712.

SUARDI, BARTOLOMMEO, called BRAMANTINO, was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1520. He acquired the name of Bramantino from his having been a favourite disciple of Bramante Lazzari. Like his celebrated instructor, he distinguished himself both as an architect and a painter. He accompanied Bramante to Rome, where he improved his style of design, and acquired a chaster tone of colouring, and a broader cast of his drapery. Lanzi notices as some of his principal works a dead Christ, with the Marys, in the church of S. Sepolcro, at Milan; and a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with St. Ambrose and St. Michael, in the Galleria Melzi. In the church of S. Francesco are also some pictures by this master, composed and designed in a style superior to his contemporaries of the Milanese school.

[SUÁREZ, or JUÁREZ, LORENZO, lived about 1600, and painted, in conjunction with Cristobal de Acebedo, several works in the city of Murcia, his native place, as is related by Jacinto Polo in "Las Academias del Jardin." Such are the Martyrdom of St. Angelo, in the convent of the shod Carmelites; a St. Ramon Nonnato, and a St. Pedro Nolasco receiving the Sacrament, attended by several Angels, for the sacristy of the Mercenarios calzados. These three pictures are sufficient to show how well he understood composition, the casting of the draperies, and how to exhibit natural expression.]

SUAVIUS. See SUTERMAN.

SUBLEYRAS, PETER, a French painter, born at Uséz, in Languedoc, in 1699. He was the son of Matthew Subleyras, an artist of little celebrity, from whom he learned the elements of design. When he was fifteen years of age, he was placed under the tuition of Anthony Rivalz, of Toulouse. On leaving that master he went to Paris, and frequented the Academy, where he obtained the first prize, by a picture representing the Brazen Serpent. He was in consequence sent to Rome, under the pension of the king, where he finished his studies. The mode of living at Rome, and the opportunity of contemplating the interesting objects with which that capital is embellished, had for him such attraction, that he established himself there for the remainder of his life. By the exercise of his estimable talents he acquired such celebrity in that metropolis, where the abilities of foreigners are not distinguished on slight pretensions, that he was engaged to paint an altar-piece for the Basilica of St. Peter, which he lived to see executed in mosaic. It represents St. Basil celebrating Mass before the Emperor Valens, and is engraved by Domenico Cunego. He painted many historical works for the churches at Rome, and other places in Italy, and was also much employed as a portrait painter. He died at Rome in 1749. We have a few etchings by this artist, executed in a spirited and tasteful style, among which are the following, after his own designs:

The Brazen Serpent.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter.

Mary Magdalene washing the Feet of Christ.

A set of four Plates from Fontaine's Fables. (?)

The Holy Family; in an oval.

St. Bruno restoring a Child to life.

Martyrdom of St. Peter. (?)

There are two of his pictures and three of his sketches in the gallery of the Louvre; two in the Brera, at Milan; and at Alton Tower, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury, in England, one representing the fall of Simon Magus.]

SUBTERMANS, or SUSTERMANS, JUSTUS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1597, and was a scholar of William de Vos. On leaving the school of that master he discovered an unusually promising talent, when he determined to visit Italy in search of improvement. He travelled through Germany to Venice, where he passed some time, and afterwards went to Florence, where his abilities recommended him to the notice of Cosimo II., Grand Duke of Tuscany, who appointed him his painter, in whose service he remained until the death of that prince, and was also favoured with the protection of Cosimo III. Subtermans painted history and portraits, and in the latter is considered little inferior to Vandyck. When that distinguished painter visited Florence, he expressed the greatest admiration of his works, and painted his portrait, of which we have an etching by Vandyck among the eminent artists of the Flemish school. His historical pictures are grandly composed, and his design, refined by his studies in Italy, is elegant and correct. His colouring possesses the clearness and brilliancy of his country, and he was well acquainted with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. One of his most considerable works is in the gallery at Florence, representing the Florentine nobility swearing fealty to Ferdinand II. In this immense composition he has introduced the portraits of the most distinguished personages of the time. He died in 1681. [There seems to be no good authority for calling him Subtermans.]

SUEUR, EUSTACHIUS LE. This distinguished painter of the French school was born at Paris in 1617. He was the son of an obscure sculptor, who, discovering his disposition for painting, placed him under the tuition of Simon Vouet. He was more indebted for the extraordinary reputation he afterwards acquired to his studies from the antique marbles which had been brought into France, and the pictures of the Roman school, to which he had access in the principal collections, than to the precepts of his instructor. His style exhibits little of the character of his country, and the simplicity of his compositions and the purity of his design procured him the honourable title of the French Raffaele. In 1640 he was received into the Academy at Paris, and painted for his picture of reception St. Paul casting out a Devil. He was soon afterwards engaged in his celebrated series of twenty-two pictures, representing the Life of St. Bruno, formerly in the cloister of the Carthusians, afterwards purchased by the king of France, and now arranged in one of the apartments of the Luxembourg. Of the original beauty of these interesting productions we can only form a very imperfect idea, as they have been so materially damaged, and so injudiciously repaired, that, in the generality of them, little remains but the evanescent traces of their primitive character. A more precise opinion of his powers may be conceived from his fine picture of St. Paul preaching at Ephesus, painted for the church of Notre Dame, now in the gallery of the Louvre, and the Descent from the Cross, formerly in the church of St. Gervais. His compositions are noble and elevated, and there is a naïveté in the airs of his heads, and in his attitudes, which is extremely interesting; his draperies are simply and grandly cast, and though his colouring is without vigour or force, it is tender and delicate, and well adapted to the particular character of his works.

The French biographers do not hesitate to compare the talents of Le Sueur with those of Raffaele; and M. Watelet, certainly the least prejudiced of their critics, elevates his talents to nearly a level with those of the illustrious head of the Roman school. Whatever allowance we may be disposed to make for the pardonable bias of national partiality, it will be readily allowed, that no painter of that school, N. Poussin only excepted, who ought rather to be regarded as a Roman than a Parisian, divested himself so much of the affected and theatrical style, which is the distinguishing characteristic of the artists of his country. This eminent painter died in 1655. We have a solitary etching by Le Sueur, representing the Holy Family, half figures. [The twenty-two pictures representing circumstances in the Life of St. Bruno are now in the gallery of the Louvre, and twenty others of different subjects. Mr. Phillips, the professor of painting to the English Royal Academy, in his Lectures, observes, that Le Sueur pursued the track of N. Poussin in painting history; that he felt like a man of fine and elevated mind, and deserved the title bestowed on him of the French Raphael. But the unpretending style of Le Sueur, interesting as it was, was not destined to receive support from the tide of patronage then in full effect in his country; it flowed with more congenial and fertilizing influence over the exuberant abilities of Le Brun.]

SUEUR, PETER LE, called the ELDER, a French engraver on wood, born at Rouen in 1636. He was a disciple of du Bellay, and, according to Papillon, greatly surpassed his instructor. Among other prints, he executed a wooden cut, representing Judith, from Goltzius, dated 1670. He generally used a monogram composed of a P. an L. and an S. thus,

. He died at Rouen in 1716.

SUEUR, PETER LE, called the YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Rouen in 1663, and was instructed in the art of design and engraving on wood by his father. His drawing was tolerably correct, and his cuts are executed with great delicacy. He engraved some devout subjects and biblical prints; and Papillon mentions an emblematical subject by him, called Alpha and Omega, in which the Christian Religion is represented by a naked figure, and Idolatry concealed by a veil. He usually marked his prints with the initials P. L. S.

SUEUR, VINCENT LE, was the younger brother of the foregoing engraver, born at Rouen in 1668. After being instructed in the principles of the art by his father, he was sent to Paris, where he became a pupil of John Papillon. He distinguished himself as an engraver on wood, and his cuts were esteemed, though not very correct in the design. Papillon mentions as his best print, The Soldier's Farewell, engraved in 1702. He executed several cuts in chiaro-scuro, among which is Mercury and Prometheus, after P. Farinato. He marked his prints with the initials V. L. S.

SUEUR, NICHOLAS LE. This artist was the son of Peter le Sueur, the younger, born at Paris in 1690. He also excelled as an engraver on wood, and was the most eminent of his family. He executed several fine cuts for the Crozat collection, chiefly in chiaro-scuro, which gained him great reputation. He also engraved, in a very tasteful style, the ornaments which embellish the edition of Fontaine's Fables, from the designs of Bachelier. Among others, we have the following cuts by him, executed for the Crozat collection:

- Fishermen drawing their Nets; after Giulio Romano.
- The Mass; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.
- The Egyptians overwhelmed in the Red Sea; after Gio. Fran. Penni, called Il Fattore.
- Christ with the Apostles; after Raffaello del Colle.
- The Man and the Lion; after Bal. Peruzzi.
- The Death of St. Francis Xavier; after Lod. Gimignani.
- The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after G. B. Lenardi.
- The Annunciation; after G. M. Morandi.
- The Virgin appearing to St. Philip Neri; after L. Garzi.
- The Virgin on a Throne, surrounded by Saints; after P. Pietri.

[He died at Paris in 1764.]

SUISSE, LE, an engraver on wood, mentioned by Papillon, who, among other prints, executed a large cut, representing the Turkish army arranged in order of battle. At the bottom of the print is an eulogium in praise of the artist. [This is probably the same as Christopher Stimmer.]

SUIZER, JOHN. By this artist, who flourished about the year 1650, we have some book-plates and portraits, among which is a head of Felix Wyssius, an ecclesiastic, dated 1655. [This is probably the same as John Schweizer, who engraved portraits of several of the clergy of the Reformed Church, and published some of animals by J. H. Roos, which, by an equivocal title, he endeavoured to pass as his own. He was but an indifferent engraver, and died in 1679.]

SULIVAN, LUKE. This artist was a native of Ireland, but came to London when he was young, and became a pupil of Thomas Major. He practised miniature painting as well as engraving, and had considerable employment. As an engraver, he was chiefly engaged on plates from the pictures of Hogarth, and sometimes worked conjointly with that artist. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

- The infant Moses presented by his Mother to the Daughter of Pharaoh; after Hogarth; W. Hogarth, et L. Sullivan, sc. 1752.
- Paul before Felix; after the same; L. Sullivan, sc. 1752.
- The March to Finchley; after the same. 1761.
- The Temptation of St. Anthony; after Teniers.
- A set of six Views of Country-seats.

SUNMAN, ———, [or SOUMANS, WILLIAM,] a Dutch portrait painter, who came to England in the reign of Charles II., and after the death of Sir Peter Lely, got into considerable business; but being less successful than Riley in a portrait of the king, he retired to Oxford in disgust, and was employed to paint the large pictures of their founders, now in the picture gallery. In term time Sunman went constantly to Oxford; the rest of the year he passed in London, where he died about the year 1707.

SURCHI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, called DIOLAI. According to Superbi, this painter was a native of Ferrara, and flourished about the year 1543. He was a disciple of the Dossi, whom he assisted in several of their principal works in the palaces of Belriguardo, Giovecca, and Cepario. He painted history with considerable reputation, and distinguished himself also as a painter of grotesque ornaments and landscapes. In the Pittura di Ferrara, by Barotti, are noticed several of the works of this master, particularly the Marriage of St. Catherine, in S. Anna; and the Adoration of the Shepherds, in S. Giovannino.

The style of Surchi resembles that of Dosso Dossi in the graceful air of his figures, and the lively expression of his heads. His colouring is more vigorous, though less harmonious, than that of his instructor. He died in 1590. [There is no reason assigned for his being called Diolai, God help him!]

SURRUGUE, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1695. He was instructed in design and engraving by Bernard Picart, whose style he adopted with success, and, like his instructor, united the point with the graver in a very agreeable manner. The effect of his prints is pleasing, and he would have reached an eminent rank among the engravers of his country, if his drawing had been more correct. He was a member of the Academy of Paris, where he died, in 1769. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis de Boullogne, Painter to the King; after Matthieu.

Joseph Christopher Veirier, Sculptor.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Margaret; after Raffaele; for the Crozat collection. St. Jerome in the Desert; after Bal. da Siena; engraved by N. Chateau, and finished by L. Surrugue; same collection.

Christ curing the ten Leprous Men; after Girol. Genga; for the same collection.

Abraham sacrificing Isaac; after A. del Sarto.

The Birth of the Virgin; after P. da Cortona.

Abraham sending away Hagar; after Le Sueur.

Venus nursing Love; after Rubens.

A Flemish Merry-making and the Fortune-teller; two plates; after Teniers.

[It was not for want of practice that he was incorrect in his drawing; for his prints are numerous, and after some of the greatest masters of the Italian, Flemish, and French schools, as may be seen in the Crozat Cabinet, the Dresden Gallery, and similar collections. Nagler has given a good list of them.]

SURRUGUE, PETER LOUIS, was the son of Peter Surrugue, born at Paris in 1717, and was taught the art of engraving by his father. His style resembles that of his father, though inferior to him. He engraved several plates of historical subjects and portraits, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

René Fremin, Director of the Academy; after Latour.

Simon Guillin, Sculptor to the King; after N. Coypel.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Nativity; after the celebrated picture by Coreggio in the Dresden Gallery; called La Notte.

The Virgin and Infant, accompanied by St. Jerome and two other saints; after Guido.

The Judgment of Paris; after Henry Goltzius.

He also engraved after Charles Coypel, Pater, Chardin, Teniers, and other masters. [He died in 1771.]

[SUTERMANS. See SUBTERMANS.]

SUTERMAN, LAMBERT, or SUAVIUS. It was for some time believed that Lambert Lombard and Lambert Suterman, or Suavius, were one and the same artist. Baron Heineken has, however, satisfactorily proved that Lambert Suterman was a painter and engraver, and a disciple of Lombard. He was a native of Liege, and flourished about the year 1550. We have several plates by him after Lambert Lombard, as well as from his own designs. They are executed with the graver, in a neat, finished style. He usually signed his prints with the initials L. S. Among others are the following:

SUBJECTS AFTER LAMBERT LOMBARD.

The Resurrection of Lazarus; Lambert Lombard, inv. L. S. 1544.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus.

The Entombing of Christ.

St. Peter and St. John healing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple.

The taking down from the Cross.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Twelve Apostles; dated 1545, 1547, and 1548.

The Head of Christ; circular. 1559.

The Head of the Virgin; the same.

Some portraits, among which is that of M. Angelo Buonaroti.

[The names of Suterman, or Susterman, Suavius, Suster, and Sustris, have been so mingled together by different writers, that it is difficult to decide whether they refer to one or more artists; especially as all have the prenom of Lam- bert, and all are of the same country, and are said to have flourished about the same period, namely, the second half of the sixteenth century. There is a picture in the Louvre attributed to Lambert Suster, who, it is said, was a scholar of Titian and Christopher Schwarts, and died at Munich in 1600.]

[SUVEE, JOSEPH BERNARD, an historical painter, was born at Bruges in 1743. He was taught drawing by Mathias de Visch, under whom, it is said, he made astonishing progress. He afterwards entered the Academy of St. Luke, at Paris, and further improved his talent under the guidance of the director Bachelier. In 1766 he was appointed to the superintendence of the gratuitous school of design at Paris, to which he devoted himself for five years. In 1771 he contended for the prize of being sent to Rome as a student with a pension, and was unanimously declared the victor. This was not only a triumph to the artist, but to his countrymen, who, on his visiting Bruges for a short time previous to his departure for Rome, received him with acclamation. He was met by the principal inhabitants, and in a grand procession carried to the Academy of Arts, where he was complimented in due form by the secretary of the establishment, and thence to the Hotel de Ville, where the magistrates were assembled. Here the congratulations were renewed, and he was presented, in the name of the city, with a pair of silver candlesticks and snuffer-stand, according to the custom of rewarding the students who obtained the first prizes at the academy of Louvaine, and invited to a splendid banquet of one hundred and twenty covers. The whole of the city was spontaneously illuminated by the inhabitants on the occasion. On his arrival at Rome he applied himself to the study of the antique, and composed a great number of pictures. At the expiration of his year he visited Naples, Sicily, and Malta; and for six years more studied the works of the great masters in those places, when he returned to Paris and exhibited the results of his studies, by which he gained increased reputation, and became a member of the Academy. He now laboured assiduously; was a constant exhibitor at the Louvre, and always with general approbation. At the commencement of the French Revolution he was appointed to the vacant office of director of the Royal Academy at Rome, but the circumstances of the times prevented his departure till 1801, when, under the auspices of Napoleon, he went to fulfil his functions. He occupied the situation for about six years, and died suddenly on the 9th of February, 1807. As he composed with great facility, his pictures are numerous; "Les Annales du Salon de Gand," for 1823, contains a complete list of them. In the academy at Bruges is The Origin of Painting, and in one of the churches of that city, The Resurrection of Christ; at Ypres, The Reception of the Virgin in the Temple, and The Adoration of the Angels after the Nativity; but his principal works are in France.]

SUYDERHOEF, JONAS. This eminent designer and engraver was born at Leyden about the year 1600. He was instructed in design and engraving by Peter Soutman, whose style he followed, but excelled him in the delicacy and harmony of his execution. Although his plates are finished with uncommon neatness, they produce a vigorous as well as a pleasing effect, and his prints exhibit an unusual intelligence of the chiaro-scuro. He advanced his plates considerably with the point, and finished them with the graver in a very picturesque style.

He engraved a variety of subjects after different masters, and a considerable number of portraits, which are admirably executed. His prints are deservedly held in the highest estimation, of which the following are the most esteemed:

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Maximilian; after Lucas of Leyden.
 The Empress Maria, his consort; after the same.
 Maximilian, Archduke of Austria; after Rubens.
 Philip III., King of Spain; after the same.
 Albert, Archduke of Austria, Governor of the Netherlands; after the same.
 Isabella Clara Eugenia, Infanta of Spain, his consort; after the same.
 Charles I., King of England; after Vandych.
 Henrietta Maria, his Queen; after the same.
 Francis de Moncade, Count d'Ossonne; after the same.
 John the Bold, Duke of Burgundy; after P. Soutman.
 Charles the Warlike, Duke of Burgundy; after the same.
 Aldus Swalmius, the old Man with the Beard; after Rembrandt.
 René Descartes, Astronomer; after F. Hals.
 Anna Maria Schurmans; after J. Lievens.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Fall of the Angels; after Rubens.
 The Virgin embracing the infant Jesus; after the same.
 A Bacchanalian subject; after the same.
 A Drunken Bacchus, supported by a Satyr and a Moor; after Rubens.
 The Hunting of the Lion and Tiger; after the same.
 The Peace of Munster, containing the Portraits of the Plenipotentiaries; after G. Terburg; one of his finest plates.
 Dutch Peasants quarrelling; after the same.
 The Burgomasters of Amsterdam; after Theod. de Keyser.
 Three old Women regaling; after Ostade.
 Three Boors, one playing on the Violin; after the same.
 The Tric-trac Players; after the same.
 Dutch Boors fighting with Knives; after the same.
 Dutch Boors dancing, called the Ball; after the same.

[Several writers place his birth in 1613; the date of his death seems to be unknown. Zani says he operated from 1631 to 1668.]

[SWAGERS, FRANCIS, a landscape and marine painter, was born at Utrecht in 1756. He received his artistic instruction in Holland, where he acquired some reputation, but afterwards he went to Paris, and continued to reside there till his death in 1836. His pictures are rather numerous, and consist chiefly of views in Holland, in the neighbourhoods of Haerlem, Utrecht, Dort, and Rotterdam; and marine subjects off the coast. From his long residence in Paris he imbibed much of the French taste, and his pictures exhibit a mixture of the Dutch and French schools. They are, however, pleasing compositions, and are in esteem.]

[SWAINE, FRANCIS, an English marine painter, who lived in London from about 1770 to 1780. He painted small sea-pieces in the style of the elder W. Van de Velde, and moonlight scenes. He was chiefly employed by the dealers, perhaps for the express purpose of copying Van de Velde's pictures, as there are many called English Vandeveldes that are certainly by Swaine. He earned his bread but got no reputation, though a clever painter. His very name is held in abhorrence when pronounced before one of his own pictures; for it deprives old Vandevelde of the honour, and endangers the dealer's profit. It is by no means to be inferred that he equals W. Van de Velde in his execution; that is not the point. He resembles him sufficiently to satisfy those who judge by their ears, especially when they are told that Vandevelde's English pictures are somewhat different to those he painted in Holland, and what they most delight in is his name.]

SWANENBURG, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Leyden about the year 1581. According to Huber, he was a disciple of John Saenredam. His style of engraving is bold and free, and his prints bear some resemblance to the manner of engraving of Henry Goltzius. He had a great command of the graver, but it is to be regretted that his drawing is not more correct. The following are his most esteemed plates:

PORTRAITS.

Maurice, Prince of Orange Nassau.
 Ernest Casimir, Count of Nassau.
 John William, Duke of Cleves.
 Daniel Heimsius, Historian. 1608.
 Abraham Bloemaert, Painter.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Esau selling his Birth-right to Jacob; after P. Morelsen.
 The Resurrection; after the same.
 The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Ab. Bloemaert.
 The six Penitents; after the same.
 St. Jerome in the Desert; after the same.
 St. Peter penitent; after the same.
 Lot and his Daughters; after Rubens.
 Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after the same.
 The Judgment of Paris; after M. Mireveldt.
 Perseus and Andromeda; after J. Saenredam.
 A Village Festival; after D. Vinckenbooms.
 A set of fourteen Plates, entitled The Throne of Justice; after Joachim Wytenwael. 1605, 1606.

[The date of his death is not ascertained.]

SWANEVELT, HERMAN. According to Huber, this eminent landscape painter and engraver was born at Woerden in 1620. He is said to have been first a scholar of Gerard Douw, to whose style of painting he for some time applied himself; but his disposition directing him particularly to landscape painting, he left that master, and travelled to Italy, whilst he was very young. On his arrival at Rome he was indefatigable in his studies. He was frequently seen in the most sequestered places, designing the most interesting views and the most remarkable vestiges of antiquity in the vicinity of that capital. These studious and solitary promenades procured him the appellation of the Hermit of Italy. In 1640 he became the disciple of Claude Lorraine, whose admirable productions he had long contemplated with wonder and delight. By the assistance of so able an instructor, and his attentive observance of nature, Swanevelt became one of the most celebrated painters of landscape of his time; and though his scenery is less extensive and select, and his colouring less brilliant and glowing, than that of his inimitable preceptor, few artists have surpassed him in the suavity and tenderness of his tints, or the delicate degradation of his aerial perspective. The forms of his trees and rocks are grand and picturesque, and his plants and foliage are touched with characteristic propriety and spirit. His pictures are usually embellished with the choicest reliques of ancient architecture, and decorated with groups of figures and cattle, tastefully composed, and designed with elegance and correctness. The works of this painter are held in the highest estimation in Italy, where he resided nearly the whole of his life, and died at Rome in 1690.

We are indebted to Herman Swanevelt for several of the most beautiful etchings which are to be found in the portfolios of the collector. They are executed in a free, masterly, and spirited style, though the point is handled with uncommon neatness and dexterity. They are sufficiently interesting to call for a particular detail of them :

A set of eighteen small oval plates, representing Views in Italy, and rural subjects; entitled Varia campestri fantiſcæ & Hermano Swanevelt, invent. et in lucem editæ.

A set of thirteen Italian Landscapes, including the title; dedicated to Gideon Tallement.

A set of twelve Views in and near Rome; entitled Diverses Vues dedans et dehors de Rome, &c. 1653.

A set of seven Plates of Animals, with landscape backgrounds, and figures.

A set of four Arcadian Landscapes, with Nymphs and Satyrs.

A set of four Landscapes with Biblical subjects.

A set of four Mountainous Landscapes, with different representations of the Flight into Egypt.

A set of Four Views of the Apennines, with pastoral subjects.

A set of six grand Landscapes, with the history of Venus and Adonis.

A set of four Landscapes, with different Saints and Mary Magdalene.

[According to Zani, the family name of this artist was FISCHER, and he was born in 1618. Descriptions of his beautiful etchings, to the number of 116, will be found in Bartsch, P. G. tom. ii. It is perhaps too late to look for authorities to confirm that he was ever the pupil of Gerhard Dou, or of Claude; both assertions rest on very slender foundations.]

[SWEBACH, JAMES, called also Fontaines, a prolific painter of battles, marches, encampments, and landscapes, is claimed as a native both by France and Belgium. He flourished from 1800 to 1824, and many of his pictures were exposed at the Paris exhibitions, where he chiefly resided. He was in England for a short time, and the few pictures he produced there were favourably received. All his compositions of military subjects and hunting-pieces are remarkably spirited, and show him to be well acquainted with the manœuvres of the field, either as a soldier or a sportsman. He died about the year 1824. He left a son, Edward Swebach, who painted and designed subjects similar to those of his father: he was living in 1838. J. Swebach etched a great number of his own compositions, which were published collectively at Paris, in five volumes, quarto, under the title "Encyclopedie Pittoresque; ou, Suite de compositions, caprices, et etudes utiles aux Artistes." Other pieces by him were engraved by Couché, Beauvinet, and Bertaux; and since his death many have been executed in lithography, mezzotinto, and colours, probably under the direction of his son Edward.]

SWELINCK, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Amsterdam about the year 1620. He engraved a set of emblematical subjects, after A. V. Venne. They are executed with the graver in a neat style, resembling that of the Wierixes. [He flourished from 1624 to 1635. He engraved some subjects of the Life of the Virgin, the Resuscitation of Lazarus, and St. John the Evangelist; they are in ovals with arabesque borders, signed J. S.]

SWERTS, or SWEERTS, MICHAEL, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1655. He etched several plates, chiefly from his own compositions, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

John van Bronchorst, Painter.

Herman Saftleven, Painter.

His own Portrait.

SUBJECTS.

The dead Christ, supported by the Marys and St. John.
A Man seated in a chair, smoking, and a Boy standing by him.

[He was a portrait painter, though he is only known by his engravings. His engravings amount to sixteen, several of which are signed Michael Sweerts Eques pin. et fecit. Bartsch doubts whether he engraved the portraits of Bronkhorst and Saftleven; they are not in his list.]

SWIDDE, WILLIAM. This artist was a native of Holland, but chiefly resided in Sweden, where he flourished about the year 1690. He engraved several of the plates for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna, containing views of the principal buildings, &c. in Sweden. We have also by him a set of six landscapes, with figures and cattle, after Dirk Dalens. He usually marked his plates with the initials W. S. [He also engraved the plates for Puffendorff's Life of Charles Gustavus; and there are some large marine pieces by him with the date of 1680.]

SWITZER, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver on wood, who resided in England about the year 1614. He was employed by Speed to cut the coins and seals for his History of Great Britain, from the originals in the Cottonian collection. Speed calls him the most exquisite and curious hand of that age. In the Harleian Library was a set of wooden cuts, representing the broad seals of England, from the Conquest to James I. inclusive, neatly executed, which Vertue believed to have been cut by Christopher Switzer, and were the originals from which Hollar copied those published by Sandford. He had a son also named Christopher, who also engraved on wood, and whose works are sometimes confounded with those of his father. [This probably is the same as Christopher Stammer.]

SYBRECHT, JOHN. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1625, and was the son of an obscure painter, who taught him the rudiments of design. He afterwards imitated the style of Nicholas Berchem and Karel du Jardin, with unusual success. The Duke of Buckingham returning through Flanders from his embassy to Paris, found Sybrecht at Antwerp, was pleased with his works, invited him to England, and employed him at Cliefden. He painted landscapes and views of the Rhine, and his pictures were held in considerable estimation. His pictures in water-colours are more frequently met with than his oil paintings. He died in 1703, and was buried in St. James's church. [The successful imitations of Berchem and Karel du Jardin by Sybrechts, or Sibrechts, must, long ago, have been appropriated by those masters. None of the pictures bearing his name, which have come under the notice of the editor, resemble the works of Berchem and du Jardin, except that they are landscapes with cattle.]

SYDER, DANIEL, called IL CAVALIERE DANIELLE, was born at Vienna in 1647. After being instructed in the principles of design by an artist, who is not mentioned, he went to Venice, where he became a scholar of Carlo Loti, whose style he followed with such success, that before he left his school it was difficult to distinguish the works of the disciple from those of his master. He had painted some pictures for the churches and private collections at Venice, when he determined to visit Rome, to improve his style of design, by studying the antique, and the works of the great painters of the Roman school. The works of Carlo Maratti were at that time in the highest reputation, and he became a student under that eminent painter, of whom he was one of the most favoured and most distinguished disciples.

Desirous of bringing the abilities of his pupil into public notice, Carlo Maratti procured him the commission to paint two pictures for the church of S. Filippo Neri, called La Chiesa Nuova, representing the Last Supper, and the Miracle of the Manna. These works established his reputation, and his talents recommended him to the patronage of the duke of Savoy, who invited him to his court, appointed him his principal painter, and conferred on him the order of knighthood. Syder painted portraits with not less success than historical subjects. He possessed a fertile invention, and his compositions are copious and ingenious. His figures are designed in the graceful style of Maratti, and his colouring, formed on the principles of the Venetian school, is tender and natural. He died at Rome in 1721. [The family name of this artist was Seutter, not Syder; he has also been called Saiter, Seiter, Sauter, Soiter, and Schuter. His sobriquet among painters was Avonstern, or Hesperus. According to Zani, he was born in 1642, and died in 1705: Füssli agrees with the latter date. There is an anecdote equally honourable to the duke of Savoy as to Seutter. One day the duke sat for his portrait, and the painter appeared in some confusion, having forgotten his mahlstück; the prince offered him his walking-cane enriched with diamonds, asking if that would answer his purpose. The painter made use of it while the duke sat, and presented it to him as soon as he rose; but the attendants, who were previously instructed, prevented him from returning it, observing that their master never resumed a gift which he had voluntarily bestowed.]

SYMPSON. See SIMPSON.

SYSANG, [JOHN CHRISTOPHER.] By this engraver, who flourished about the year 1746, we have several portraits, executed in a neat, clear style, for a work entitled Portraits Historiques des Hommes illustres de Danemark, published in the above year.

SYTICUS. See SERICUS.

T

TACCONE, INNOCENZIO. Innocenzio Taccone, a native of Bologna, was a disciple, and, according to Baglione, a relative of Annibale Caracci. He accompanied that great artist to Rome, where he assisted him in many of his works. In the vault of the church of S. Maria del Popolo, he painted three large frescoes, from the designs of Annibale, representing the Crowning of the Virgin, Christ appearing to St. Peter, and St. Paul taken up into the third heaven. Of his own compositions, the most considerable are some pictures in S. Angelo in Pescheria, in the chapel dedicated to S. Andrea, representing the principal events of the life of that Apostle. He died at Rome, in the prime of life, in the pontificate of Urban VIII.

TAFFI, ANDREA. To this ancient master, who was born at Florence as early as the year 1213, the Florentines were indebted for the revival of the art of working in mosaic. Vasari reports, that some Greek painters in Mosaic being employed in ornamenting the church of S. Marco at Venice, he visited that city, with the hope of becoming acquainted with their mystery, and succeeded so well, that one of them, named Apollonius, not only instructed him in the art, but was prevailed on by him to accompany him to Florence, where they executed, in conjunction, some devout subjects in the church of S. Giovanni. He died in 1294. [He was the first that introduced in pictures angels playing on the violin; and perhaps the first also that painted the exteriors of cabinets for the reception of ornamental presents to newly-married couples, a custom borrowed from the Greeks.]

TAGLIASACCHI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Borgo S. Donnino, near Piacenza, and flourished about the year 1730. He was a scholar of Giuseppe del Sole, and for some time painted history in the style of his master; but acquired a more graceful and elegant design, by studying the works of Coreggio, Parmigiano, and Guido. He had not an opportunity of gratifying his desire of contemplating the works of Raffaele, as his parents would not permit him to visit Rome. His principal works are at Piacenza; and Lanzi speaks in very favourable terms of a picture by him in the cathedral of that city, representing the Holy Family. He died in 1737. [He also excelled in portrait painting.]

TALÁMI, ORAZIO, was born at Reggio in 1625, and was a scholar of Pietro Desani. He afterwards visited Rome, where he passed some time, and applied himself particularly to the study of the works of Annibale Caracci. On his return to his native city, he distinguished himself as a reputable painter of history and architecture, both in oil and fresco. He died in 1699. [Zani, who calls him the master of the Die, and of the Fish-hook, says he died in 1705.]

TALPINO. See SALMEGGIA.

TAMBURINI, GIOVANNI MARIA. This painter was a native of Bologna, and was first a scholar of Pietro Facini, but afterwards studied under Guido Reni. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was employed for several of the churches at Bologna. His most esteemed works are, his pictures of S. Antonio di Padova, in the church of La Morte; and the Annunciation, in S. Maria della Vita. He flourished about the year 1640. [He was also an engraver.]

TANCREDI, FILIPPO, was born at Messina in 1655. He studied some time at Naples, and afterwards visited Rome, where he entered the school of Carlo Maratti. In the Memorie de' Pittori Messinesi, he is said to have possessed a ready and fertile invention, a tolerably correct design, and an agreeable style of colouring. He resided a great part of his life at Palermo, where he painted the ceiling of the church of the Teatini, and that of Il Gesu Nuovo. He died at Palermo in 1725. [Zani says in 1722.]

TANJÉ, PETER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1700. He was a very industrious artist, and engraved a great number of plates of portraits, and various subjects, as well as vignettes, and other book-plates. The most considerable of his works are five large plates, engraved from the famous paintings on glass in the windows of the church of St. John, at Gouda. He also engraved some plates for the Dresden Gallery. Among others we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

George II., King of England, &c.; after Faber. 1762.
Charles VII., Emperor of Germany; P. Tanjé, sc.
Christina, Queen of Sweden; after S. Bourdon.
His own Portrait; after J. M. Quinckhard.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS FOR THE DRESDEN GALLERY.

A dead Christ; after Francesco Salviati.
The Chastity of Joseph; after Carlo Cignani.
Children dancing; after Albano.

The Card-players; after M. Angelo Caravaggio.
Tarquin and Lucretia; after Luca Giordano.

[According to Zani, and others of authority, he was born in 1706, and died in 1760.]

TANZI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Alagna, near Novara, in 1574. It is not mentioned under whom he studied, but he was a competitor with the Carloni in several public works at Milan, and distinguished himself particularly by a picture he painted of the Battle of Sennacherib, in the church of S. Gaudenzio, at Novara, a composition exhibiting as much vivacity as intelligence. He died in 1644. [There is considerable uncertainty about the time of Antonio Tanzi's death, as he had two brothers, Giovanni and Melchiorre, who flourished at the same time, and Giovanni's death is placed in 1644.]

[TAPIA, DON ISIDORO DE, a painter of historical pictures, was born at Valencia in 1720. He was a scholar of Evaristo Muñoz. Among the paintings by him in his native city, the grand altarpiece for the church of St. Bartholomew, and an Oratory for the Carmelite convent, representing Santa Teresa and the Four Doctors of the Church, are praised for the beauty of the colouring. He went to Madrid in 1743, and was considered a professor of ability; he afterwards passed into Portugal, but nothing is said of his performances there. He died at Madrid in 1755. He was a member of the Academy of S. Fernando, where is preserved a picture of Abraham's Sacrifice, painted by him.]

[TARABOTTI, or TARABOTTA, CATERINA, was a native of Vicenza, and instructed in painting by Alessandro Varatori and his sister Chiara. She practised chiefly at Verona, where she painted several historical pictures that are mentioned with high commendations, as being equal, if not superior, to any of those by her contemporaries. She operated as late as 1659; the time of her birth and death are not accurately ascertained.]

TARAVAL, G., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints, he engraved some architectural subjects, from the designs of Dumont. [Louis Gustavus Taraval was born at Stockholm in 1737; he was an architectural designer and engraver. He was sent to Paris by his father, Thomas Raphael Taraval, who was a portrait painter, and who died in 1750. The elder brother of Louis, Jean Hugues, born at Paris in 1728, was employed at the Gobelins manufactory, but also painted portraits and familiar subjects: he died about 1785. Louis was living in 1790.]

[TARDIEU, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, a geographical engraver, was born in 1757, and died in 1822. His principal works are,

Les Cartes marine de l'Atlas de Commerce.
Les Plans des Capitales de l'Europe.
Cartes in the Atlas de Mentelle.
Several plans in "le Voyage pittoresque en Grèce," by Choiseul Gouffier.
Les Palatinats de Cracovie, Plack, Lublin, et Sandomir.
The folio Atlas for the quarto edition of the "Voyage du jeune Anacharsis."
Atlas du Voyage aux Terres Australes.
Atlas for l'Histoire des Guerres des Français en Italie; after Lapie.
A grand map of Russia in Europe, in six sheets.]

[TARDIEU, JEAN BAPTISTE PIERRE, a geographical engraver, was born at Paris in 1746, and died, 1816. His works are numerous; the principal are,

Cartes des Pays bas, 53 plates, engraved for the Empress Maria Teresa.

Cartes de Chasses du Roi, by direction of Louis XVI.
Cartes du Voyage de Sorini en Grèce et en Turquie.
Cartes de l'édition de Volney.
Cartes Topographiques de la Saxe-Gotha, 25 plates.]

[TARDIEU, JEAN CHARLES, a distinguished French historical painter, was the son of James Nicholas Tardieu, and born at Paris in 1765. He painted a great number of pictures by order of the government, which were placed in the galleries of the Luxembourg, Versailles, St. Cloud, and Fontainebleau; also in the Museum at Rouen, and in the cathedral. In addition to these he exercised his pencil on classical and poetical subjects for private individuals; and seems to have been fully employed during the reigns of Napoleon, Louis XVIII., and Charles X. He also made copies of several pictures by P. Champagne. He was living in 1831, and continued to exercise his pencil both in landscape and historical painting.]

TARDIEU, NICHOLAS HENRY, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris in 1674. He was first a pupil of P. le Pautre, and was afterwards instructed by John Audran. This artist may be ranked among the distinguished engravers of his country. His design, though occasionally mannered, is generally correct, and by a judicious union of the point and the graver, he finished his plates in a tasteful and effective style. He was engaged in some of the most important publications of his time, and engraved several plates for the Crozat Collection, the gallery of Versailles, and others. He was received into the Academy at Paris in 1720, and died in that city in 1749. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Louis Anthony, Duke d'Antin; after Rigaud; engraved for his reception plate at the Academy, in 1720.
John Soanon, Bishop of Senes; Nic. Tardieu ad vivum fecit. 1716.

SUBJECTS AFTER DIFFERENT MASTERS.

Four subjects of Roman History, in the form of friezes; after Giulio Romano.
Jupiter and Alcmena; after a cartoon by the same.
The Annunciation; after Carlo Maratti.
The Holy Family, with Angels presenting Flowers and Fruit; after Andrea Luigi d'Assisi.
Adam and Eve; after Domenichino.
The Scourging of Christ; after Le Brun.
The Crucifixion; after the same.
An emblematical Subject, representing the principal qualifications of a perfect Minister, Secrecy, Fortitude, and Prudence; after Le Sueur. This print is scarce.
Christ and the Woman of Samaria; after N. Bertin.
Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene; after the same.
The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after Seb. Bourdon.
The Crucifixion; after Joseph Parrocel.
The Conception; after Anthony Coyppel.
Apollo and Daphne; after the same.
The Wrath of Achilles; after the same.
The parting of Hector and Andromache; after the same.
Vulcan presenting to Venus Armour for Æneas; after the same.
Venus soliciting Jupiter in favour of Æneas; after the same.
Juno directing Æolus to raise a Tempest against the Fleet of Æneas; after the same.

The three last form part of a set of prints of the History of Æneas, painted in the Palais Royal by Ant. Copel.

TARDIEU, ELIZABETH CLARA. This lady was the wife of the preceding artist. Her maiden name was Tournay, and, among other prints, she engraved the following:

The Concert; after J. F. de Troy.
The Mustard Merchant; after Charles Hutin.
Two plates of the charitable Lady and the Catechist; after P. Dumesnil.

The Old Coquet; after the same.
The Repose; after Jeaurat.

TARDIEU, JAMES NICHOLAS, the son of Nicholas Henry Tardieu, was born at Paris in 1718, and instructed in the art of engraving by his father. In his mode of executing his plates he used the point less, and the graver more than his father; hence his prints have a neater appearance, though very inferior in spirit and picturesque effect. His plates, however, possess considerable merit. He was a member of the Academy at Paris. He engraved a considerable number of portraits, and other subjects, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XV.; after Vanloo.
His Queen; after Nattier.
Maria Henrietta of France; after the same.
The Archbishop of Bourdeaux; after Restout.
Robert Lorraine, Sculptor to the King; his reception plate at the Academy. 1749.
Bon Boulogne, Painter to the King; the companion.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Christ appearing to the Virgin; after Guido.
Mary Magdalene penitent; after Paolo Paganì.
The Pool of Bethesda; after Restout.
Diana and Acteon; after F. Boucher.
The Miseries of War; after Temiers.
A pair of Landscapes; after Cochin the younger.

He also engraved some plates for the gallery of Versailles, after Le Brun. LOUISA TARDIEU, his wife, who was the daughter of the celebrated medalist Du Vivier, also engraved some plates.

TARDIEU, PETER FRANCIS. This artist was cousin-german to the foregoing engraver, by whom he was instructed in the art. He was born at Paris in 1720, where he engraved several plates, which, though inferior to those of his relatives, are not without merit. Among others, we have the following by him:

The Judgment of Paris; after Rubens.
Perseus and Andromeda; after the same.

These two pictures were engraved from the pictures in the collection of Count Bruhl. He also engraved several architectural views, after Panini; a set of plates for Fontaine's Fables, after Oudry; and several plates for Buffon's Natural History. MARY ANN TARDIEU, his wife, whose maiden name was Roussellet, was also an engraver. We have by her a print of St. John in the Wilderness, after Carl. Vanloo. She also assisted in the plates for Buffon's publication. [P. F. Tardieu died in 1772.]

TARDIEU, PETER ALEXANDER, a modern French engraver, who was probably of the same family with the preceding artists. He was born at Paris in 1756, and was a pupil of J. G. Wille. We have by him, among other prints, the portrait of Henry IV. of France, after Porbus, engraved for the collection of the Palais Royal. [Pierre Alexandre Tardieu was nephew of Jacques Nicholas Tardieu; he engraved a great number of plates, many of which are portraits of eminent persons; among them are,

Three of Henry IV. of France; after Janet and Pourbus.
Two of Voltaire; after Largillière and Houdon.
The Earl of Arundel; after Van Dyck.
Mareschal Ney; after Gerard.
Napoleon (for the Coronation); after Isabey.
Marie Antoinette; after Dumont.
Montesquien, Paul Barras, and others.

His principal historical engravings are,

St. Michael overcoming Lucifer; after Raphael.
The Communion of St. Jerome; after Domenichino.

Judith and Holofernes; after Allori.
Psyche abandoned; after Gerard.

He was the successor of Bervic in the Institute; made chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1825; and was living at Paris in 1831. Among his scholars were Desnoyers, Bertonnier, and Aubert.]

[TARDIEU, PIERRE, a geographical engraver, son of Antoine François Tardieu, was born at Paris in 1784, and was living in 1837. He engraved several maps and plans after Humbolt, de Buch, and Brousted; also the Atlas for "l'Histoire Ancienne" of M. Segur; some plates of a map of the county of Mayo in Ireland; La Carte des Routes de Poste de l'Empire in 1811, by order of the Emperor Napoleon; and many other works of importance. The foregoing are noticed to distinguish them from those by his father.]

TARICCO, [or TARRICO,] SEBASTIANO. This painter was born at Cherasco, in the Piedmontese, in 1645. Della Valle asserts, that he studied with Guido and Domenichino in the school of the Carracci; an inaccuracy altogether surprising in an Italian writer on art, as the great founders of that school died many years before he was born. It is probable that he formed his style by an attentive study of their works, as is apparent in the pictures he painted for the public edifices and private collections at Turin. He died in 1710.

TARUFFI, EMILIO, was born at Bologna in 1632, and was a fellow-student with Carlo Cignani, under Francesco Albano. In conjunction with Cignani he painted some pictures in the Palazzo Pubblico, at Bologna, and accompanying him to Rome, was his coadjutor in his frescoes in S. Andrea della Valle. Of his works in the public edifices at Bologna, the most esteemed are, his picture of the Virgin presenting the Rosary to S. Domenico, in the church of S. Maria Nuova; and the Virgin, with a glory of Angels, appearing to S. Celestino, in the church dedicated to that saint. He painted landscape in the charming style of his instructor, which he decorated with figures elegantly grouped and correctly designed. He died in 1694. [He was born in 1633, and was assassinated in 1696. He was excellent in portraiture, and was a skilful imitator of the manner of the older masters. There is an etching by him, with the date 8th May, 1651, when he was only eighteen. It is dedicated to Cardinal Savello, and represents a whole-length portrait of him, attended by a dwarf and several other persons, on a large sheet.]

TASCA, CRISTOFORO. According to Tassi, this painter was born at Bergamo in 1667, and after learning the rudiments of design in his native city, studied at Venice the works of Antonio Bellucci and Carlo Loti. He established himself in that city, where he was employed in painting several pictures for the public edifices, of which the most deserving of notice are, the Birth of the Virgin, in the church dell' Assunzione; the Death of St. Joseph, in SS. Filippo e Giacomo; and in S. Marta, the Nativity, and the Baptism of Christ by St. John. He died at Venice in 1737.

TASNIERE, G. According to Basan, this artist resided at Turin about the year 1670, where he engraved part of a set of prints from the hunting subjects, and portraits of the nobility, painted by John Miel, in the palace of the Duke of Savoy, which were published at Turin in 1674, entitled La Venaria reale Palazzo di piacere, &c. He also engraved several plates from the pictures of Domenico Piola, a Genoese painter. They are executed entirely with the graver, in a coarse, tasteless style. [G. Tasniere sculps. Taurini, 1703.—G. Tasniere Bourgundus scu. Mediolano.]

TASSART, PETER JOSEPH, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Brussels about the year 1736. His pictures are little known, but he etched several plates, particularly after Rubens, among which are the following :

Jonas thrown into the Sea.
The Woman taken in Adultery.
The Virgin and Child, with St. Elisabeth and St. John.
The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence.
The Parting of Venus and Adonis.

TASSI, AGOSTINO. The family name of this painter was Buonamici. He was born at Perugia in 1566, and studied at Rome under Paul Brill, although he was desirous of being considered a disciple of the Caracci. He painted landscapes in the style of his instructor, and was considered one of the ablest artists of his time, when, Lanzi informs us, for some crime, which is not mentioned, he was sent to the galleys at Leghorn. During the term of his confinement, he occupied himself in designing the maritime objects with which he was surrounded, and after his liberation they became the favourite subjects of his pictures. He painted with great success sea-ports and calms, with shipping and fishing-boats. His tempests and storms at sea were not less happily represented, and were touched with unusual spirit and energy. He also excelled in architectural and perspective views, in which he distinguished himself by some admirable productions in the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo, and in the Palazzo Lancellotti. Agostino Tassi has the credit of having been the instructor of Claude Lorraine. He died in 1642. We have a few slight but spirited etchings by this artist, representing storms at sea, and shipwrecks. [He was born in 1565, and died in 1644.]

TATORAC, V. According to Papillon, this artist executed a set of one hundred and fifty wooden cuts for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published in 1537; and a print of the Annunciation, for a Prayer-book, dated 1530.

[TAUNAY, NICOLAS-ANTOINE, a landscape, historical, and general painter, was born at Paris, and died there in 1830. He seems to have possessed a universal talent, so far as subject is concerned, in painting. He painted several of the battles and victories of the General and Emperor Napoleon, among which were, the passage of the Alps; the battle of the bridge of Lodi; the battle of Ebersberg; the entry of the imperial guard under the triumphal arch erected at the barrier of Pantin; and many others. He also painted sea-ports, pastoral scenes, subjects from history and poetry, landscapes with cattle, sentimental and humorous pieces, fairs, and village festivals. He was a scholar of Casanova, but painted more in the manner of the French school. His smaller pieces are most esteemed out of France.]

TAURINI, R. This artist is mentioned by Papillon as a skilful engraver on wood, and a disciple of Albert Durer. [He was born at Rouen, and operated as late as 1572. He was a skilful carver in wood and stone, and an architectural designer. He was called Monseigneur Richard, and Ricardus Gallus. It is not known that he ever engraved in wood.]

TAVARONE, LAZZARO. According to Soprani, this painter was born at Genoa in 1556, and was a favourite disciple of Luca Cambiaso. He accompanied that master to Spain, whither he was invited by Philip II. in 1583, and not only assisted him in his great work in the Escorial, but after the death of Cambiaso was employed to finish the paintings left imperfect by that master. He remained for some years in the service of the king of Spain, and returned to Genoa rich in the designs of his instructor, and munificently rewarded. He particularly excelled in fresco painting, to which he gave a vigour approaching to oil. His principal works at Genoa are his frescoes in the tribune of the cathedral, representing subjects from the Life of S. Lorenzo, and the façade of La Dogana, or Custom-house, representing St. George and the Dragon. He died in 1641, aged 58. [He died in 1631, at the age of 75.]

TAVELLA, CARLO ANTONIO, called IL SOLFAROLA. This painter was born at Milan in 1668, and was a scholar of Peter Molyn, called Il Tempesta, whose vigorous manner he for some time followed with a fire and spirit which acquired him the name of Il Solfarola. He afterwards adopted a style distinguished by more amenity and tenderness, from studying the works of Benedetto Castiglione and Gaspar Poussin, and is considered the ablest landscape painter of the Genoese school, after Antonio Travi, called Il Sestri. There are many of his works in the private collections at Genoa, of which the principal are in the Palazzo Franchi. His landscapes are sometimes decorated with figures by Domenico and Antonio Piola, and more frequently by Stefano Magnasio. He died at Genoa in 1738. [He had two daughters, Angela and Teresa, who painted landscapes, and lived about the middle of the eighteenth century.]

TAVERNER, WILLIAM, an English amateur painter, who followed the profession of a proctor in Doctors' Commons. He, however, studied and practised the art of painting landscapes, with a zeal and success which would not have been unworthy of an eminent professor. The noble author of the Anecdotes mentions some pictures by Taverner in the possession of the Earl of Harcourt, and Mr. Fauquier, which might have been mistaken for the works of Gaspar Poussin, and were not unworthy of that celebrated painter. [He died in 1772.]

[TAVERNIER, FRANÇOIS, a French historical painter, was born at Paris in 1659, and died there in 1725. There are no particulars of his life recorded, but it is said that he painted history with considerable ability.]

TAVERNIER, MELCHIOR, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1630. He was a printseller as well as an engraver, and on an inscription on one of his plates, styles himself engraver and copper-plate printer to the king. His prints are chiefly portraits; but he also engraved some ornaments, and other trifling subjects, from his own designs. They are very indifferently executed with the graver. We have by him, among others, the following :

A Bust of the Duke of Alençon, crowned with laurel.
An Equestrian Statue of Henry IV. of France; inscribed, Melchior Tavernier a Paris, graveur et imprimeur du Roi, &c. 1627.

[TAYLOR, JOHN, more distinguished for his cheerfulness and longevity than for any of his productions as an artist, was a scholar of Francis Hayman. His early practice was that of taking likenesses in pencil, which he found to be more amusing than profitable, and therefore by the advice of his friends, Paul Sandby and J. A. Gresse, adopted the business of teaching. By this he accumulated a sufficient sum to retire with comfort. He used to be called the father of the English school, as he was an original member of the "Society of Incorporated Artists," and survived all the rest. He died on the 21st of November, 1839, in his ninety-ninth year. He had made a nice calculation by investing a great part of his savings in the long annuities, which expired also in 1840. He was a man of remarkably sober, cheerful habits, and showed great activity and good humour to the last.]

[TAYLOR, SIMON, an eminent painter of botanical subjects, was patronized by Lord Bute about the year 1760; and afterwards was employed by the celebrated Dr. Pothergill. The collection of plants painted for the latter was sold by the Doctor to the Empress of Russia for £2000; those he painted for Lord Bute were sold by auction in 1794, and are to be found in various collections of natural history. His usual charge for drawing a single plant was three guineas. Little else of his history is known. It is supposed that he died in 1794.]

TAYLOR, T., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1735. He engraved several plates for the collections published by Mr. Boydell, among which are the following :

Democritus and Protagoras; after Salv. Rosa.

A Flemish Collation; after Van Harp.

Two emblematical Vignettes for Boydell's collection; from the designs of J. Gwyn.

[TEISSIER, JAN GEORGE, born at the Hague in 1750, painted portraits and landscapes in a very respectable manner, but was better known as a copier of the works of the older masters, and a repairer of their damaged pictures. He had sufficient merit to recommend him to a place in the direction of the Academy of Design at the Hague, and as sub-director of the museum. He formed several excellent scholars; among them were Bésanger, Valois, Harry, and Carpenthus. Teissier died at the Hague in 1821.]

[TEISSIER, JEAN, a French engraver, who operated at Paris about 1770. He was a scholar of Philip le Bas; among his engravings are Les Mangeurs des Huitres; after Bénard.

Le Marchand de Poissons de Dieppe; after the same.]

[TELLIER, JEAN LE, nephew and residuary legatee of Nicholas Poussin, was a good painter of portraits and historical subjects. He painted several pictures for the churches at Rouen, and one, the Death of St. Alexis, for the church at Gravelines. A Holy Family, and the Miracles performed at the Tomb of St. Augustine, both in the church dedicated to that saint, are works of great merit. Formerly there were many of his smaller pictures in private collections at Rouen, where he principally resided, and probably died. The notices of him are only incidental.]

TEMINI, GIOVANNI. The name of this artist is affixed to a portrait of Carlo Gonzales, Duke of Mantua; it is slightly etched, and finished with the graver. [He operated in 1622.]

TEMPEL, ABRAHAM VANDEN. This artist was born at Leyden about the year 1618, and was a scholar of George van Schooten. He painted small pictures of historical subjects, conversations, and portraits. His works are very highly finished, and he had the credit of being the instructor of Francis Mieris, the elder. Although his pictures are not so highly wrought up as those of Mieris, he holds a respectable rank among the artists of his country, who distinguished themselves by the neatness of their pencil, and the delicacy of their colouring. He died at Amsterdam in 1672. [Vanden Tempel was an eminent portrait painter; in this department very few of his contemporaries were superior to him.]

TEMPESTA, ANTONIO. This artist was born at Florence in 1555, and was first a disciple of Santi di Titi, but he afterwards studied under John Stradanus. Endowed with an ardent and inventive genius, he in a short time surpassed both his instructors in the fecundity of his ideas, and the facility of his execution. His favourite subjects were battles, cavalcades, huntings, and processions, which he composed in a grand style, and painted with unusual spirit and energy. He also painted historical subjects and grotesque ornaments; and during a long residence at Rome was much employed by Gregory XIII. in the gallery and loggie of the Vatican; and by the Marchese Giustiniani, in the decorations of his palace. In the church of S. Stefano Rotondo, is a fine picture by Antonio Tempesta, of the Murder of the Innocents. The extent of his genius, and the variety of his powers, are evident in the numerous etchings he has left, which amount to upwards of eighteen hundred. With the exception of an occasional extravagance in the design, they are very able and masterly performances. He usually marked his plates with one of these monograms, A.Æ.T.ÆA. Among his numerous prints are the following :

A set of plates of subjects from the Old Testament, generally called Tempesta's Bible.

Twenty-four plates of the Life of St. Anthony.

A set of one hundred and fifty prints from Ovid's Metamorphoses.

Thirteen plates of the Labours of Hercules.

The Four Ages of Man; in four plates.

A variety of Huntings of different animals

Several plates of Battles and Cavalcades.

The Entry of Alexander into Babylon.

Diana and Acteon.

The Crucifixion; inscribed Ant. Tempestes. 1612; scarce.

[Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom xvii. has given a descriptive catalogue of 1460 pieces by Antonio Tempesta, which he believes to be a complete list of his works; Gori makes them amount to 1519, according to what is reported by other writers, but Brulliot inclines to the side of Bartsch. Both artists and amateurs may profit by an attentive consideration of his works. He died in 1630. The earliest of his known etchings is dated 1589, the latest 1627.]

TEMPESTA, or TEMPESTINO, DOMENICO. According to Lanzi, this artist was born at Florence in 1652, and was a scholar of Baldassare Franceschini, called Il Volterrano. He painted portraits and landscapes with some reputation, but distinguished himself more as an engraver than a painter, and is said to have received instructions in engraving from R. Nanteuil and Gerard Edelinck. Among other prints, he engraved a set of portraits of the Electors Palatine. [His proper name was Marchi. He was called Tempestino from having been a pupil of Peter Moly, who was also named Tempesta. He was a great traveller, but there is much uncertainty in his history. If he ever distinguished himself as an engraver, his works have evaded the researches of those most curious in such matters. He was living at the beginning of the 18th century, and the date of his death is variously given; some placing it in 1718, others in 1737. It may, however, be apprehended that there were two artists called Domenico Tempesta, and the accounts of them have been blended.]

TEMPESTA, PETER. See MOLYN.

TENIERS, DAVID, THE ELDER. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1582, and was educated in the school of Rubens. He for some time applied himself to historical painting, and visited Italy, for the purpose of studying the best works of the celebrated painters of that school, but his genius leading him to landscape painting, he placed himself under the tuition of Adam Elsheimer, at Rome, and studied under that master for six years. On his return to Flanders he adopted a different style, and painted, with the most flattering success, rural sports, merry-makings, temptations of St. Anthony, fortune-tellers, &c. He treated those subjects with considerable humour and ingenuity, and his pictures were universally admired, and were purchased with avidity. They would still have been considered among the happiest efforts of the art in that particular branch, if they had not been so greatly surpassed by the inimitable productions of his son. We have a few etchings by this painter, but they are not easily distinguished from those of David Teniers the younger, as they are very similar in the style, and bear the same mark. The following are usually attributed to him:

A Pilgrim, with his staff and chaplet.

A Peasant putting a plaster on his hand.

The Bust of a Peasant with a fur cap.

[David Teniers, the elder, died in 1649.]

TENIERS, DAVID, THE YOUNGER. This celebrated painter was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1610, and received his first instruction from his father. He afterwards studied for some time under Adrian Brouwer, and is said to have had the advantage of receiving the lessons of Rubens in the principles of colouring. He painted similar subjects to those of the elder Teniers, but his compositions are infinitely more varied and ingenious, his colouring is more chaste and transparent, and his pictures exhibit the most spirited and captivating facility of execution. The talents displayed by this extraordinary artist soon excited universal admiration, and he was employed and patronized by the most illustrious personages of his time. The Archduke Leopold William, then governor of the Low Countries, appointed him his principal painter, and gave him the superintendance of his gallery, which contained the works of the most distinguished masters of the Italian as well as of the Flemish school. He painted small copies of the principal pictures of that collection, in which he imitated the particular style of each master so successfully, that he was called the Proteus of painting. These imitations he caused to be engraved, and published in a folio volume, dedicated to his patron; it is now generally called the Teniers' Gallery. The first edition was published at Brussels in 1660, and contains about 200 engravings. He did not limit his mimic powers to merely copying, he painted several pictures, called pasticcios, of his own compositions, but executed so perfectly in the style of Titian, Tintoretto, Bassano, Rubens, and other eminent masters, that they have frequently been mistaken for the original work of those painters. The author was present at the sale of one of the principal collections at Brussels, in which was a picture of Mary Magdalene kneeling in a grot, the figure as large as life, which had been regarded, for many years, by the most experienced judges, as an admirable production of Rubens; some difference of opinion arising, the picture was taken out of the frame, when the name of David Teniers, jun., with the date, was discovered at the bottom of the picture, which had been concealed by the border of the frame.

It was not, however, to his imitative faculties that Teniers was indebted for his greatest celebrity. He was a constant and faithful observer of nature, and in his favourite subjects, representing village festivals and merry-makings, Flemish fairs, and kermesses, gypsies, and incantations, he has displayed a characteristic originality, and a naïveté of expression, in which he is unrivalled. That he might have an opportunity of studying from life the rustic character of the peasantry, their rural sports and rejoicings, their quarrels and their combats, he established himself in a retired situation in the village of Perk, between Antwerp and Mechlin, where he could mingle with their pastimes, and observe, with a painter's eye, their character under the impulse of the various passions; and it is surprising that he has been able to give such an admirable variety to representations, which, in their nature, appear confined and uniform. His landscapes, though perfect representations of nature, have an appearance of sameness and monotony, from his scenery being generally confined to the vicinity of the village in which he resided, where the flatness of the country admits of little change; but he amply compensates for this want of variety, by the truth and simplicity with which he has represented these homely views. His pencil is light and dexterous, and by his continual practice he had acquired a promptness of execution which is almost unexampled. His trees, without choice or grandeur in their forms, are touched with a spirit and a taste for which he is remarkable. His skies are light and floating, and there is a silvery charm in the colouring of his best pictures, which is peculiar to himself.

He is not less admirable in his interiors of cabarets, with peasants smoking and regaling, corps de gardes, and chymist's laboratories, in which he surpassed Ostade in his knowledge of perspective; and is not less master of the principles of the chiaroscuro. The works of Teniers, though extremely numerous, are justly held in the highest estimation. It was not unusual for him to finish a picture, of a medium size, in a day, and he used jocosely to observe, that to contain all the pictures he had painted, it would be necessary to have a gallery two leagues long. Teniers was of infinite service to the landscape painters of his time, in decorating their works with his admirable figures; and the value of the pictures of Artôis, Van Ūden, and others of his contemporaries, is considerably enhanced by such embellishment. This popular painter died at Brussels in 1694, aged 84. We have several etchings by this artist, executed in a slight but spirited style; they are usually marked with the cipher D, as are those of the elder Teniers, which renders it difficult to identify their prints. The following are said to be by him:

Flemish Peasants dancing.

A Village Festival.

The Temptation of St. Anthony.

Peasants shooting at a mark.

The Inside of a Cottage, with a dead Calf hanging, and figures.

A Landscape, by moon-light, with a Cottage, and figures sitting near the fire.

[The dates on some of his best pictures are from 1643 to 1653, though there are many fine ones painted during the same period, and others ten years later that are not dated. Indeed there are no dates between 1653 and 1665, when he was in his full vigour. The last that have been discovered are 1678-9; these are one or two small pictures not more than 9 inches by 8. It is not likely that he studied under Brauer, who was his senior by only two years, though he imitated that master's style in some of his pictures; nor is there any proof that he practised in the school of Rubens, though no doubt he profited by observing his principles of colouring and general arrangement. His outset was not so very flattering; for it is said that he had the mortification of seeing the works of Tilborgh, who was his pupil, and others preferred to his; it was not until he was patronized by the Archduke Leopold William that he became distinguished. With regard to his imitations of Italian masters, or what is termed Pasticci, there is now very little danger of passing them but for what they are; some are very clever, and the best resemble Paul Veronese, or the Bassans, in little. His attempts at Rubens are failures; the monkey is always discoverable. The number of authentic pictures by him, of which there are records, may be fairly reckoned at one thousand, and of spurious at least five hundred more. Smith's "Catalogue raisonné of the Works of the Dutch and Flemish Masters," (volume the third, and Supplement,) contains descriptions of 900, all of which may be considered as genuine. Add to these about one hundred in the galleries at Schleissheim and Munich, sixty-five mentioned by Cumberland as being in the royal collection at Madrid, and nineteen spoken of by Descamps, and we have a total of 1089, from which a few errors and repetitions may be excepted. Perhaps there are many more in existence of which there is yet no written account; if so, the enormous value his pictures now bear will be sure to bring them to light. Some of his pictures are of large dimensions; one at Schleissheim is 13 feet 6 inches by 10 feet, and contains 1138 figures, those in the foreground being about 12 inches high; others also abound with figures, such as the Fair at Ghent, N^o. 103 of Supplement, 340; a Village Fête, N^o. 104, 93; N^o. 137 of vol. iii., another Village Festival, contains 150; and numerous others might be quoted. Many of his pictures have been sold in public sales at sums varying from 300 to 1500 guineas, and some in royal and public collections have been estimated at 2000 and upwards. It is certain that he etched, but so did his father; the difficulty is in distinguishing their several works in this way, and, as far as regards the merits of the etchings, it is of no importance. A French engraver, G. de Vivier, etched some imitations, after pictures by Teniers, and marked them with the monogram used by that artist, though he has, in other instances, attributed the subjects to Anton. van Heuvel, a scholar of Gaspar De Crayer; others are the acknowledged work of Coryn Boel. They who are curious in the matter may see a collection in the British Museum. The best authorities concur in placing his death in 1690, at the age of 80.]

TENIERS, ABRAHAM, was the younger brother of the foregoing artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1618, and was instructed in the art both by his father and brother. He painted Flemish festivals in the style of David Teniers the younger, and though his pictures are very inferior both in the colouring and execution, from the similarity of the subjects, they are sometimes mistaken by the inexperienced for the productions of his brother.

TEOSCOLI. See GRÈCHE.

TERASSON, H. This artist is mentioned by

Mr. Strutt as the engraver of some plates of insects, executed in a neat, but stiff style. [He resided in London, and is supposed to have been a native of England, but there are no particulars of him.]

[TERBRUGGEN. See VERBRUGGEN.]

TERBURG, GERARD. This painter was born at Zwoll, in the province of Over-Yssell, in 1608. He was the son of an artist, of whom little more is known than that he had studied at Rome, by whom he was taught the rudiments of design. Without the help of any other instruction, he had acquired some reputation, by painting small portraits, when he formed the project of travelling through Germany to Italy. From the subjects which he painted, and the mode of finishing he had adopted, it was not very probable that the beauties of Rome would have much influence on his style; nor does it appear that they had sufficient attraction to detain him long in Italy, as we find him soon afterwards at Paris, where the polished neatness of his finishing, and the pleasing subjects he painted, were so much admired, that he was induced to reside in that city for some time. On his return to Holland, the encouragement he met with was not less flattering, and he was considered the most popular and the most employed artist of his time. He attended the congress assembled at Munster, in 1648, for the negotiation for the treaty of peace, and on that occasion painted his celebrated picture, representing the portraits of the plenipotentiaries and principal personages assembled on that occasion, which is regarded as his masterpiece. Of this interesting production we have an admirable print by Snyderhoef. He was invited by Count Pigorando, the Spanish ambassador at the congress, to visit Madrid, where he was very favourably received, and was much employed by the court and the principal nobility. The king conferred on him the order of knighthood, and rewarded him munificently for the pictures he had painted. He returned to Holland, and settled at Deventer, where he died, in 1681.

The pictures of Terburg generally represent conversations, musical parties, ladies at their toilet, and similar domestic subjects. He also excelled in small portraits. Though his works are well coloured, and finished with care, his design is neither elegant nor correct, and his pencil has nothing of the taste and dexterity so much admired in the pictures of Metz. His chief excellence lies in the finishing of his draperies and other accessories, particularly white satin, which he painted inimitably, and which he generally introduced into all his pictures.

[The known pictures by Terburg, omitting portraits, amount to about one hundred; and these for their delicate finishing, particularly in the white satin dresses of the ladies, are highly valued. The Music Lesson, now in the collection of Sir Robert Peel, sold in 1767 for £112, and in 1826 was bought by Sir Robert at 920 guineas. Another, called The Letter, or Female Curiosity, was sold in 1762 for £144, and in 1837 for £640. The Congress of Munster in 1648, a picture only 17 inches by 22, obtained £640 in 1804, but in 1837 it was sold for £1890. All that are found in public or royal collections are estimated enormously. For the fullest account of the master and his works, the inquirer should consult Smith's "Catalogue raisonné," vol. iv. and Supplement.]

TERENZI, TERENCE DA URBINO, called IL RONDOLINO. This painter was a native of Urbino, and flourished about the year 1600. He was a scholar of Frederigo Baroccio, and, according to Baglione, visited Rome, where he was favoured with the protection of Cardinal Montalto. He is said to have possessed an extraordinary talent of imitating the works of the old masters, to which he gave an appearance of antiquity, which deceived some of the most experienced judges. Having practised one of these deceptions on his benefactor, imposing on him a picture, painted by himself, for a work of Raffaele, he was discarded by his patron with disgrace and contumely. There is a picture of his own composition in the church of S. Silvestro, at Rome, representing the Virgin and Infant Christ, with several Saints. He died in 1620. [According to Zani, Terenzi, or Terenzio, called il Rondolino, and Terenzio d' Urbino, were different artists. The one named il Rondolino was born at Pesaro, and flourished about 1550: he was a distinguished artist, and painted on antique vases. Terenzio d' Urbino was the fraudulent imitator, and lived at the time specified in the text.]

[TERLEE, N— VAN, born at Dort in 1636, and died there in 1687. It is said that he was a scholar of Rembrandt, and became a good historical painter; his pictures exhibiting much of genius, a fine taste in the design and composition, and agreeable colouring. Mention is made of one in particular, the Rape of Europa. He is also spoken of, incidentally, as one of the good historical painters of the Dutch school.]

TERMISANO, DEZIO. This painter was a Neapolitan, and a scholar of Giovanni Filippo Criscuolo. He flourished about the year 1580. Dominici, in his Lives of the Neapolitan Painters, mentions a picture by this master in the church of S. Maria detta a Chiazza, at Naples, representing the Last Supper, signed with his name, dated 1597.

TERRY, G., an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished from 1770 to 1788. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits; among others, we have the following by him:

The Rev. John Towers; after Fisher. 1770.

The Rev. William Huntingdon. 1786.

The Rev. Richard Johnson, B. A., Chaplain at Botany Bay. 1787.

George Saville Carey, prefixed to his Lectures on Mimicry.

TERSAN. See CAMPION.

TERWESTEN, AUGUSTINE. This painter was born at the Hague in 1649. Without the help of an instructor he had made sufficient progress in design, by drawing from prints and plaster casts, to be employed by the goldsmiths as a chaser on gold and silver, which profession he followed until he was twenty years of age, when he turned his thoughts to painting, and became a scholar of an artist named Wieling, who had some reputation as an historical painter, under whom he studied two years. His instructor being invited to the court of the Elector of Brandenburg, he placed himself under the tuition of William Doudyns, an eminent painter of history, and in a short time found himself sufficiently advanced to undertake a journey to Italy, on the produce of his talents. He travelled through Germany to Rome, where he applied himself, with the greatest assiduity, in studying the most interesting works of art in that capital, and where he met with sufficient employment to enable him to continue his residence for four years. He afterwards visited Florence and Venice, and in 1678 returned to Holland, where he distinguished himself as one of the ablest artists of his time. His talents were chiefly employed in painting historical or emblematical subjects, for the decoration of the ceilings and apartments of the principal mansions at the Hague, Amsterdam, and Dort, which he embellished with subjects frequently taken from Ovid, which he composed with great readiness and ingenuity, and by an extensive practice had acquired an unusual facility of execution. One of his most admired performances was a saloon he painted for M. Baarthout van Slingelandt, at Dort, which is spoken of by Descamps in terms of the highest commendation. He had the credit of having been the principal means of re-establishing the Academy at the Hague on a respectable footing, which had for some years been in a state of decadency.

In 1690 he was invited to the court of the Elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Prussia, who appointed him his principal painter, and made him director of the Academy at Berlin, on the dismissal of Joseph Werner from that situation. He decorated the royal palaces with some of his best works, and continued to exercise his abilities to the entire satisfaction of his protector, until the year 1711, when he died at Berlin. Terwesten possessed a ready and fertile invention; his design is more correct than the generality of the artists of his country; his colouring is chaste and natural, and he was remarkable for the promptness of his handling. [As an instance of his rapid execution, Houbraken relates that he paid him a visit while he was employed painting the hall of the burgomaster Van Slingelandt, and observed a design sketched only with the crayon on the chimney-piece. He invited Terwesten to suspend his work and take a walk with him; but he said he had something to do that would engage him about two hours, and if Houbraken would call on him at that time he would attend him. On his return he saw the chimney-piece finished, although it consisted of several figures. There are etchings by him from his own compositions.]

TERWESTEN, ELIAS, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at the Hague in 1651. His inclination leading him to painting, he became the disciple of his brother, and for some time applied himself to the design of the figure; but not succeeding to his expectation, he attempted to paint animals, flowers, fruit, and still life, in which he was more successful. Following the example of his brother, he travelled to Italy, and settled at Rome, where his works were held in considerable estimation, and where he died, in 1724. [He was employed by the Elector of Brandenburg to collect casts from the antique statues at Rome, for the use of the Academy at Berlin; and he also purchased for that prince the very valuable curiosities amassed by the celebrated Bellosi. By artists he was called "The Bird of Paradise."]

TERWESTEN, MATTHEW. This artist was the youngest brother of Augustine Terwesten, born at the Hague in 1670. He was for some time instructed by his brother, but afterwards studied successively under Daniel Mytens and William Doudyns. Possessed of a decided genius for the art, and aided by the instruction of those able masters, he discovered the most promising talents, and on the departure of Augustine Terwesten for the court of Berlin, when he was twenty years of age, he was intrusted to finish some considerable works, which were left imperfect by his brother. He acquitted himself on that occasion with so much ability, that he received several commissions, and met with the most flattering success. One of his earliest patrons was M. Schuilenberg, the principal minister of King

William, in Holland, for whom he painted a ceiling, representing Diana and her Nymphs, which gained him great reputation. This encouragement, so far from rendering him self-sufficient and conceited, only inspired him with a more ardent desire of cultivating his talents with more alacrity and perseverance. He had long entertained an ardent desire of visiting Italy, where his brother had studied with so much advantage. The liberality of his protector enabled him to carry his favourite plan into execution, and he arrived at Venice in 1694, where he attached himself to the study of the works of Titian, Il Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese, and frequented the school of Carlo Loti. He afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he found his brother Elias, and passed three years in contemplating and designing after the works of the most distinguished masters. On his return to Holland he was received into the Academy of the Hague, in 1699, and met with very extensive employment, in painting historical and fabulous subjects for the decoration of the principal mansions at the Hague. He was soon afterwards appointed director of the Academy, and exercised the functions of his office with much credit to himself, and with great advantage to the students. Among his most esteemed productions are, the saloon and cupola at the hotel of Mr. Fagel; some pastoral subjects painted for M. Van Boetslaer; and a picture of Christ praying on the Mount of Olives, in the church of the Jansenists, at the Hague. He died in 1735. [He was living in 1750. In the museum at Amsterdam there is a portrait by him of the Princess Mary, afterwards Queen of England, and consort of William III.]

TERZI, CRISTOFORO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1740. He was a scholar of Giuseppe Maria Crespi, called Il Spagnuolo, and acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history. There are several of his works in the public edifices and private collections at Bologna, among which the most worthy of notice is his picture of S. Petronio kneeling before the Virgin, in the church of S. Giacomo Maggiore. He died at Bologna in the prime of life in 1743. [He was born in 1692.]

TERZI, FRANCESCO. This artist was born at Bergamo about the year 1520, and was a disciple of Giovanni Batista Morani. According to Tassi, he painted history with some reputation, and distinguished himself, whilst he was yet young, by two pictures he painted for the church of S. Francesco, at Bergamo, representing the Nativity of Christ, and the Assumption of the Virgin. He was invited to the court of the Emperor Maximilian II., who appointed him his painter, and he passed the greater part of his life in Germany. He died at Rome, at an advanced age, in 1600. He engraved a set of portraits of the princes of the house of Austria. [The "portraits of the princes of the house of Austria" were not engraved by Francesco Terzi, but by Gaspar ab Avibus, who signed them Gaspar Patavinus, incisior, 1569.]

TESAURO, FILIPPO, or PIPPO. According to Dominici, this old painter was born at Naples about the year 1260. He was a disciple of Tommaso de Stefani, and became one of the ablest artists of that early period. Dominici describes several of the works of Tesauro in the public edifices at Naples, of which none have escaped the ravages of time, except some frescoes in the church of S. Restituta, representing the Life of S. Niccolo Eremita. He died at Naples in 1320.

TESAURO, BERNARDO. This artist is supposed to have been of the same family with Filippo Tesauro, and was born at Naples in 1440. He was a disciple of Silvestro Buono, and was an artist in great reputation at the time in which he lived. Though many of his works have been injured and destroyed by time, some of his pictures, remaining in the public places at Naples, are mentioned by Dominici in very favourable terms. He approached nearer to the modern style than any of his predecessors or contemporaries, in the judicious arrangements of his compositions, and in the natural air and expression of his figures. His chief performance was an altar-piece in the church of S. Giovanni Maggiore, representing the Assumption of the Virgin. [Operated in 1480.]

TESAURO, RAIMO EPIFANIO, was the son and disciple of Bernardo Tesauro, and flourished about the year 1490. He painted several considerable works in fresco in the public edifices at Naples. In the church of the S. Nunziata is a fine picture by this master representing the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to St. Elisabeth; and at the great altar of the church of S. Lorenzo, is one of his most esteemed performances, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Anthony, St. Jerome, and St. John Baptist, painted in 1494. [He was living in 1501.]

TESTA, PIERRO, called IL LUCCHESE. This artist was born at Lucca in 1611, and is supposed to have received his first instruction in the art from Pietro Paolini. He afterwards studied at Rome, first under Domenichino, and afterwards under Pietro da Cortona; but having spoken disrespectfully of the talents of the latter, he was dismissed from his school. He applied himself with great assiduity to designing after the marbles and the remains of architecture in that capital, and it is said that there is scarcely a vestige of antiquity from which he had not made a design. He is said to have been of a morose and melancholy disposition, and created himself a number of enemies by the injurious manner in which he spoke of the productions of his contemporaries. Of his works in the public edifices at Rome, the most worthy of notice are, his picture of the Death of S. Angelo, in the church of S. Martino a Monti; and the Sacrifice of Iphigenia, in the Palazzo Spada. His pictures are more frequently to be met with at Lucca, of which those in the church of S. Paolino, and in the Buonovisi Gallery, are regarded amongst his finest works. Though his design is occasionally somewhat extravagant, it is generally correct, and his colouring is vigorous and effective. His compositions are, for the most part, crowded and confused, though their variety discovers a ready and fertile invention. His female figures are without elegance, and the airs of his heads have neither beauty nor expression. He was drowned in the Tiber in 1650, at the age of thirty-nine; it is doubtful whether by accident, or that he threw himself into the river in a fit of despondency.

As an engraver, Pietro Testa is deserving of particular attention; and though his prints have the same merits and defects as are found in his pictures, they are held in considerable estimation. His style of etching is free and masterly, resembling that of Antonio Tempesta, but of superior execution. In Mariette's collection were ninety-two etchings by this master. He sometimes marked his plates, which are all from his own designs, with the cipher T.

The following are the most worthy of notice:

Abraham sacrificing Isaac. P. Testa fecit

The Holy Family, with Angels presenting refreshments ; [rare.]
 The Virgin and Infant, who is embracing the Cross ; [rare.]
 The Adoration of the Magi.
 The Crucifixion.
 Four plates of the History of the Prodigal Son ; P. Testa, fe. Rome.
 The Martyrdom of St. Erasmus.
 St. Jerome praying.
 St. Roch and two Bishops interceding for the cessation of the Plague.
 Thetis directing the infant Achilles to be plunged into the river Styx ; P. Testa, fecit.
 Achilles dragging the Body of Hector round the walls of Troy ; P. Testa, aq. for.
 Socrates at Table with his Friends ; P. Testa. 1648.
 The Death of Cato ; the same inscription.
 The Sacrifice of Iphigenia.
 Four plates of the Seasons of the Year, with the Signs of the Zodiac.
 The Triumph of Bacchus.
 [Faith, Hope, and Charity ; one of his rarest prints.
 Magdalene in the Desert ; very rare.
 A young Woman in a Swoon, surrounded by Cupids ; exceeding rare.]

He also engraved several allegorical and emblematical subjects. [Lanzi and others say that Pietro Testa was born in 1617. From his youth he manifested a violent inclination for the arts. In order to see the works of the great masters, he travelled to Rome disguised in a pilgrim's habit ; and when there employed himself assiduously in drawing from the antique statues, bassi-relievi, and ruins, and studying the most celebrated pictures. From want of being known, his works were little attended to, and he was reduced to a state of extreme indigence. Sandrart discovered him drawing among the ruins ; took him home, relieved his necessities, and obtained employment for him in the Giustinian Gallery. Pietro Testa, says Strutt, drew with great taste, and marked the extremities of his figures in a very masterly manner. The characters of his heads are finely expressed, and the female faces are often very beautiful. When the extravagance of his fancy did not hurry him beyond the bounds of nature, his outlines are correct and elegant. The draperies of his females are flowing and easy, and so contrived as to show the form of the figure very distinctly ; yet these beauties are often obscured by ill chosen and awkward attitudes. He seems to have paid no attention to the management of the chiaro-scuro ; his lights are scattered, without forming any great masses, and so produce little or no effect. His works however are deserving of careful examination by young artists ; they will be sure to find sufficient reward for their labour.]

TESTA, GIOVANNI CESARE. This artist was the nephew of Pietro Testa, born at Rome about the year 1630, and is supposed to have received his instruction in design, and in the use of the point, from his uncle, from the resemblance in their style. His etchings are chiefly from the designs of Pietro Testa, though he engraved after other masters. We have, among others, the following plates by him :

The Portrait of Pietro Testa ; J. Cesar Testa, sc.
 The Death of Dido ; after P. Testa.
 The Centaur Chiron instructing Achilles to throw the Javelin ; after the same.
 The Emperor Titus consulting Basilides respecting his expedition against Jerusalem ; after the same.
 The Communion of St. Jerome ; after the celebrated picture by Domenichino.

TESTANA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an Italian engraver, born at Genoa about the year 1645. He resided chiefly at Rome, where, in conjunction with William Vallet and Stephen Picart, he engraved some plates from medals and antique gems, for the work of Canini. We have also plates by him after some of the pictures at Rome, among which are the following :

The Guardian Angel ; after Pietro da Cortona.
 The Baptism of Constantine ; after Agost. Caracci.
 [He was living in 1700.]

TESTANA, GIOSEFFO, was related to the preceding artist, born at Genoa about the year 1650. He was established at Rome in 1680, and engraved part of the plates for a work entitled Effigies of the Cardinals now living, published in that year. We have also, among others, the following prints by him :

St. Margaret ; after P. da Cortona.
 An allegorical subject of Religion holding the Portrait of Pope Alexander VII. ; after the same.

[TESTELIN, HENRI, the brother of Louis Testelin, was born at Paris in 1616, and was a scholar of Simon Vouet. He was a portrait painter, engraver, and writer on art. He wrote a work entitled, "Sentimens des plus habiles peintres sur la pratique de la peinture et de la sculpture, mis en tables de préceptes, avec plusieurs discours académiques, ou Conférences tenues en l'Académie Royale desdits Arts," &c. This work was much esteemed at the time, and is now become very rare. It is in a folio of forty pages, printed with the address of la Ve. Marbre-Cramoisy, M. DC. XCVI., consequently after the death of the author, if M. d'Argenville be correct in stating that he died in 1595. It is ornamented with plates, being examples of proportions, expressions of heads, the drawing, and general ordonnance of a picture according to the established doctrine of the Academy. The subjects are engraved by Henri Testelin, after designs of different masters. The vignettes of the book are probably from his own designs, though he has not marked them, not deeming it necessary to do so, as they were the ornaments of a book published with his name. The following are the titles of pieces engraved by him :

Studies of expression in Heads, in outline.
 Studies of antique Statues, with proportions.
 Studies of expression in Heads ; after Le Brun.
 The Israelites gathering Manna ; after N. Poussin.
 The Holy Family ; after Raphael. This is from the picture in the Louvre, in which there are angels scattering flowers ; also engraved by Edelinck.

St. Michael vanquishing the Evil Spirit ; after Raphael.

As to the sets of plates, amounting to about fifty prints, attributed by d'Argenville to Louis Testelin, they were engraved by Louis Ferdinand, after that artist's designs. It may be noticed that Louis wrote his name indifferently Tettelin, Tetelin, Testelin ; Henri gave the preference to Testelin. Henri held the office of secretary to the Academy of Paris, of which he was a member, and at the death of his brother, succeeded him as professor of painting. He is more particularly noticed as a painter of portraits than in any other department of the art.]

TESTELIN, LOUIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1615, and was one of the numerous scholars of Simon Vouet. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was made a member of the Academy of Paris in 1648. His principal pictures are the Resurrection of Tabitha, and the Scourging of St. Paul, in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris. He died in 1655. He etched several plates, most of which are from his own designs. The following are his prints most worthy of notice :

The Israelites gathering the Manna ; after N. Poussin.

The Holy Family.

St. Michael vanquishing the Evil Spirit.

The Crucifixion.

Several sets of plates of the Sports of Children, amounting together to about fifty prints.

[The only print among those quoted as by Louis Testelin, is the Holy Family, which is after his own design; the Israelites gathering Manna, and St. Michael and the Evil Spirit, are by his brother Henri. See the preceding article.]

TEUCHER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, who resided in Paris about the year 1750, where he engraved a print called the Virgin of the Rose, after Parmigiano, for the collection called the Dresden Gallery.

TEXIER, G. This artist was a native of Paris, and flourished about the year 1780. He engraved several plates, representing landscapes, conversations, and serenades, which are etched and finished with the graver in a neat, clear style. [He was a scholar of Ph. Le Bas. He engraved views in Switzerland, vignettes, and other book-prints. He must not be confounded with Victor Texier, who engraved for the Musée Français, and also views of the Alhambra, chemists' laboratories, and other subjects. He was living in 1824.]

[TEXIS, JEROME. A print representing Mount Calvary, with Christ on the cross between the two thieves, signed Heiromimus (sic) Texis Faciebat, Carmagnolie 1.5.6.1, was in the possession of the late Mr. Lloyd. He does not appear to have been noticed by any writer on the art.]

THACKER, ROBERT. By this English artist, who styles himself designer to the king, we have a large print, in four plates, representing the cathedral church at Salisbury. He flourished about the year 1670.

THELOTT, JACOB GOTTLIEB, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1730. He engraved several portraits; among others, that of Guido Patten, M. D., of Paris. He also engraved part of the plates for a work entitled Representation des Animaux de la Menagerie de Prince Eugene, published in 1734. They are executed with the graver, in a neat, but formal style.

THEODORE, A. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the designer and engraver of a print representing a Procession in Holland, etched and retouched with the graver, in a style resembling that of Hollar. It is dated 1636.

THEODORE, ———. According to Basan, this artist was a scholar of Francis Milé, and painted landscapes in the style of that master. He etched several plates from the designs of his instructor, among which are the following:

A set of large Landscapes.

Thirty-four Landscapes, of a middle size.

Six circular Landscapes.

[It is not ascertained who is this artist shadowed under the name of Theodore. If it be not merely a sobriquet, it can only be a baptismal prefix, and not a family name. He engraved with a light point twenty-eight pieces after François Milé, which are inscribed Francisque pinxit, avec privilege du Roy; or Francisque pinxit, Simon excedit cum privilegio Regis. These, according to Bartsch and Robert Dumesnil, have a great analogy to the etchings of Vander Cabel, though Houbraken and P. Mariette attribute them to Gerard Hoet: the known pieces by Hoet are totally different. The inquirer is referred to Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. v., and to Dumesnil, Peintre Graveur Français, tom. i., for full descriptions of the prints, and for their opinions on the subject. Zani notices him as a landscape painter and engraver, marks him B B, and says he lived about the year 1700.]

[THEODORE CASPAR, BARON DE FURSTENBERGH, one of the earliest engravers in mezzotinto, flourished in 1656, as appears by that date on one of his prints. No further particulars are known of his history. Hugh W. Dimond, Esq. has, in the Archæologia, described six of his engravings, and one other to which he has put the word doubtful, but which Laborde admits among the six described in his work, "Histoire de la Gravure en maniere noir," as having indications that entitle it to be considered as a production of Furstenbergh. The following is a list of those described by Mr. Dimond:

1. Head of John the Baptist, large as life, on an oval charger; in the imperial collection at Vienna.
2. Portrait of the Emperor Leopold, a half-length in armour, standing; in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna.
3. Fredericus D. G. Marchio Badensis et Hachberg*, &c.; the bust of a round flat-faced man with a large wig, in armour; oval with corners. In the collection of the Archduke Charles.
4. The daughter of Herodias taking the head of John from an aged woman, who has a candle in her left hand, and presents the charger with her right.
5. Portrait of Leopold William, Archduke of Austria; an oval with square corners, the bust surrounded by an inscription of his name and titles; underneath are four lines in Latin, and the following inscription: Theodorus Casparus a Furstenbergh Canonicus Capitularis Moguntia et Spira, Colonellus, ad vivum pinxit, et fecit, 1656.
6. A bust of Christ crowned with thorns, and surrounded by the nimbus, the left shoulder bare.
7. (Doubtful). Virgin and Child; after Correggio; at the bottom, in capitals, "Maria in Egypti solitudine. Corregi pinxit." At Dresden.

On this print Laborde remarks, "Le faire dénote les premiers essais de l'art; les traces du berceau se remarquent sur la marge, et l'ensemble se rapproche des travaux de Furstenbergh. On pourrait d'autant mieux lui attribuer cette planche, que la tête de la Vierge et celle de l'enfant sont surmontées de la même bizarre auréole qui ne se trouve ni dans le tableau, ni dans les productions des autres graveurs, et qu'on ne voit que sur deux gravures signées par cet amateur: la tête de Christ (N^o 6), et celle de St. Jean" (N^o 1). Zani, who had seen an impression of this print in the Bibliotheca Dei P.P. delle Salute, at Venice, supposed it to be by Francesco Nassi, who engraved the Notte di Correggio, which he dedicated to Giuseppe Olgiati, bishop of Parma and Como. As Olgiati was elected to the bishopric of Parma in 1694, and to that of Como in 1712, Francesco Nassi was of a much later time than Furstenbergh. The subject has been engraved in mezzotinto by several others, among them Earlom, but none has introduced the curious form of the nimbus, or auréole, used by Furstenbergh. Laborde describes a print not mentioned by Dimond; he calls it

Saint Marc, Saint Jerome, or an Arab enveloped in his cloak; being an old man clothed in a long white garment which covers his head; above his right shoulder appears the head of a lion. It has no mark, but in its technical treatment resembles that of the head of St. John.

This is all that is at present recorded of the amateur artist Theodore Caspar a Furstenbergh; not even his family name is known; by some writers he is noticed only as Theodore Caspar, without addition.]

[THEOLON, ETIENNE, a French painter of interiors and conversations, was born in 1739, and died at Paris in 1781. He was a scholar of Joseph Vien, but did not follow his style of painting. Being of a delicate constitution, he was slow in finishing his pictures, and consequently they are not numerous. His works were in great estimation during his life; and he was admitted a member of the Academy at Paris.]

[THEOTOCOPULI, or TEOSCOPOLO, DOMENICO, called also IL GRECO, and EL GRIEGO, supposed from his name to have been of Greek origin, but born in one of the Venetian states. It is also said that he was a scholar of Titian, but this is uncertain, as he is not named among that master's disciples, though in many of his earlier pictures there is a manifest imitation of his style. The time of his birth is placed about 1548, but the most authentic account of him, as an artist, commences in 1577, when, according to Cean Bermudez, he was practising at Toledo. It is certain that the greater part of the pictures ascribed to him were painted in Spain, and he occupies a considerable space in the history of the art in that country during the period of his residence there, till the time of his death in 1625. Many of the distinguished Spanish painters were his scholars, or profited so much by imitating his manner as to be deemed so. No painter of his time obtained more applause for the excellence of some of his productions, or deserved more censure for his occasional derelictions from the true principles of his art. Mr. Ford observes, that what he did well was excellent, while what he did ill was worse than any body else. One of his remarkable pictures, which has received the approbation of all writers on the subject, is, The parting of our Lord's Raiment, which he painted for the cathedral of Toledo, when he took up his residence in that city in 1577, and which still remains there. It is said that in this picture he introduced his own portrait, as that of the centurion in black armour, and that of his beautiful daughter, as one of the Marys in the foreground. If he was born, as supposed, in 1548, at this time he would have been but twenty-nine years of age, and too young to have a daughter old enough to personate the character: but the exact time of his birth is a matter of uncertainty. Another picture by him, worthy of all commendation, is, The Burial of the Count of Orgaz, in the church of Santo Tomé. This nobleman re-edified the church, and was buried there in 1323. As he was not only a powerful but a religious grandee, St. Stephen and St. Augustine (so says the legend) thought it their duty to attend to his obsequies, and came down from heaven to place his body in the tomb: this forms the subject of the picture. Nothing, says Mr. Stirling, can be finer than the execution and contrast of the heads of the two Saints and the dead Count; nor did Giorgione or Titian ever excel the splendid colouring of the warrior's black armour, rich with gold damaskeening. The same writer pronounces it to be, with all its faults, (and he points out several in the upper part,) the finest picture in Toledo, and one of the noblest productions of the Castilian pencil. Teoscopolo was also an excellent painter of portraits, several of which are in the royal gallery at Madrid, and would do honour to Velasquez; his own and that of his beautiful daughter are now among the Spanish pictures in the Louvre. Mr. Stirling, in his valuable and very delightful work, "The Annals of the Artists of Spain," has obliged the world with an engraving of the fine Hellenic features of the painter, and pronounces the portrait of his daughter one of the finest gems of the collection, and would be a gem even in the royal gallery of Spain. Theotocopuli was also an architect and a sculptor; some will have it that he was also an engraver on wood, but this is doubtful. Zani intimates that it is wrong to confound him with Domenico delle Greche; and it is clear the latter was an older artist, who engraved the print, after Titian, of Pharaoh and his Host drowning, which bears the date 1549. Much confusion has arisen from Italian writers calling artists after their country, as il Greco, il Fiammingo, il Tedesco, instead of that of their family, especially when baptismal names are similar. Cean Bermudez has given an account of the pictures painted by Theotocopuli for the churches and other public places at Toledo, Madrid, and elsewhere; and Mr. Ford, in his "Hand-book of Spain," and Mr. Stirling, in his "Annals of the Artists in Spain," have described several with great acumen and vivacity. See the article GRECHE in this Dictionary.]

[THEW, ROBERT, a very excellent engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, was one of the artists employed by Boydell on the large plates for his edition of Shakspeare's Plays. Of these he engraved scenes from The Tempest; after Wright.

The Merry Wives of Windsor; after Peters.

The Taming of the Shrew; after Smirke.

A Winter's Tale; after Hamilton.

As You Like It (the lover in the Seven Ages); after Smirke.

The Cauldron scene in Macbeth; after Reynolds.

King John; after Northcote.

Richard II., Bolingbroke entering London; after the same.

Henry IV., the Boar's Head Tavern; after Smirke.

Henry IV., Henry asleep; after Boydell.

Henry VI., Countess of Auvergne's Castle; after Opie.

Mortimer and Richard Plantagenet; after Northcote.

Richard III., Burial of the Children; after the same.

Henry VIII.; after Peters.

Timon of Athens; after Opie.

Cymbeline, Imogen and Pisanio; after Hoppner.

Hamlet, Ghost on the Platform; after Fuseli.

And several other interesting pieces after contemporary painters; but information respecting him is so very scanty, that the exact time of his birth and death has not been discovered by the editor.]

THIBOUST, BENOIT, a French engraver, born at Chartres about the year 1655. He resided some years at Rome, where he engraved several plates after various Italian masters, and a set of thirty-four plates, without the frontispiece, representing the Life of St. Turribius, after Gio Batista Gaetano, entitled Vita Beati Turribii, Archiepiscopi Limani in Indis, published at Rome in 1679. He worked with the graver only, in a slight, open style, resembling that of Mellan, though very unequal to that artist. Besides the above-mentioned work, we have the following prints by him:

St. Theresa; after a design of Bernini.

St. Bibiena; after the same.

St. Thomas d'Aquinas; after Giacinto Calandrucci.

St. Rosa kneeling before the Virgin; after A. Baldi.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after the same.

St. Peter of Alcantara; after the same.

The Crucifixion; after Scipione Gaetano.

[He operated twenty years later than the date mentioned in the text.]

THIELE, JOHN ALEXANDER. This artist was born at Erfurt, in Saxony, in 1695. He is said to have been a scholar of an obscure landscape painter, named Manyoky, but was chiefly indebted for the talent he afterwards displayed to his studies from nature. His pictures represent the beautiful scenery on the banks of the Sala and the Elbe; and he acquired sufficient celebrity to be appointed painter to the court of Dresden. J. A. Thiele has the credit of having been the master of Dietrichy. We have several etchings by this artist, consisting of views in Saxony, from his own designs. They are dated from 1726 to 1743. Those of the latter dates are very superior to his early plates. [He was born in 1685, and was instructed in the art by C. L. Agricola. He died at Dresden in 1752.]

THIELEN, or COWENBERG, JOHN PHILIP VAN, [called also Righolz.] This artist was born at Mechlin in 1618. He was of a noble family, and was Seigneur of Cowenberg, on which account he usually signed his pictures J. P. Cowenberg. An early inclination for the art induced him to take lessons of Daniel Segers, the celebrated flower-painter, and his progress was such that he afterwards followed it as a profession. His pictures, like those of his instructor, usually represent garlands of flowers, surrounding some subjects of history: festoons, decorating vases ornamented with bas-reliefs; and bouquets in vessels of crystal, which he represented with surprising lustre and clearness. In competition with Segers, he was engaged to paint a picture for the Abbey of St. Bernard, near Antwerp, on which occasion he exerted all his ability, and his performance was judged to be little inferior to that of his master. He arranged his flower-pieces with great taste; and though his pictures are less brilliant and forcible than those of Segers, they are very highly finished and delicately coloured. He particularly excelled in representing the various insects which he introduced into his pictures, which he designed with the utmost precision, and they are surprisingly finished. He died in 1667. [Several of the best of J. P. van Thielen's productions are in the royal collections in Spain. Weyerman highly commends a garland by him, which encircles a picture by Poelemburg representing a Nymph asleep and a Satyr watching her. He also painted landscapes with hunting subjects, and architecture.]

THIELEN, MARIA THERESA, ANNA MARIA, and FRANCES CATHERINA VAN. These ladies were the daughters of John Philip van Thielen, and were instructed in the art of flower-painting by their father, in which they arrived at considerable excellence. Maria Theresa, the eldest, also painted portraits with some reputation. [Maria Theresa was born in 1640, Anna Maria in 1641, and Frances Catherina in 1645.]

[THIELENS, JAN, a Flemish painter, who flourished at Antwerp about 1694. He painted interiors of the workshops of painters and sculptors, and laboratories of chemists, in the manner of David Teniers.]

THIERS, BARON DE, a French amateur engraver, who etched a few plates of landscapes and small subjects, after Boucher. He lived about the year 1760.

THIM, MOSES, a German engraver, who resided at Wittenberg about the year 1613. I find no specification of his prints, but he is said to have marked his plates with the initials M. T., sometimes separate and sometimes joined together thus, M.

[He was a printer: Zani denies that he ever engraved either on wood or copper.]

THOMAN, [or THOMANN,] CHRISTIAN RAYMOND, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1613. He engraved some of the plates for the collection of prints from the antique marbles in the Dresden Gallery. [There is an error in the preceding date, as C. R. Thoman was living and operated in 1733.]

THOMANN, JAMES ERNEST. This painter was born at Hagelstein in 1588, and received his first instruction in the art from an obscure painter, in his native place. At the age of seventeen he travelled to Italy, and on his arrival at Rome became a disciple of Adam Elsheimer, whose style he adopted, and imitated with such success, that it is sometimes difficult to distinguish their works. During a residence of fifteen years in Italy, he visited Naples and Genoa, where his pictures were held in no less estimation than at Rome. After the death of his friend and preceptor he returned to Germany, and established himself at Landau. He painted landscapes of a small size, very neatly finished, and, like those of his instructor, they are usually decorated with figures representing historical or Biblical subjects, correctly and tastefully designed. He died at Landau in 1653. [Jacob Ernest Thomann von Hagelstein was born at Landau; the Italians called him il nobile Giacomo.]

[THOMANN, PH. ERNEST, the grandson of Jacob Ernest, born at Augsburg in 1657, and died in 1726, was a painter and mezzotinto engraver. He painted some pictures for churches. Among his prints one is mentioned by Laborde as being tolerably good; it is the portrait of Narcissus Rauner in ecclesiastic costume, half-length, inscribed with the artist's name, to which he adds ab Hagelstein.]

THOMAS, JOHN. This painter was born at Ypres, in Flanders, about the year 1610, and had the advantage of being educated in the school of Rubens. After passing some years under that able master, he travelled to Italy, with his friend and fellow student, Abraham Diepenbeke. He proved a worthy disciple of that great school, and distinguished himself by several considerable works, particularly in Germany, where he passed the greater part of his life. The Emperor Leopold appointed him his principal painter in 1662, with a considerable pension. In the church of the Barefooted Carmelites, at Antwerp, is an altar-piece by this master, representing St. Francis kneeling before the Virgin and infant Christ. We have a few etchings by this master, executed in a bold, spirited style; among which are the following:

A Lady at her Toilet, holding a Portrait; J. Thomas, inv. et fec.

A Shepherd and Shepherdess.

A Satyr embracing a Shepherdess.

A Pastoral Subject, composed of six figures, three Men and three Women, one of the Men playing on the Bagpipes.

[John Thomas also practised mezzotinto engraving. Laborde mentions several plates by him; among which are,

A Female at a window, with a lantern; after G. Dou.

A Lady, supposed to have some resemblance to Christina of Sweden, attended by an armed Cupid.

The bust of a Warrior wearing a helmet, and holding a lance over the left shoulder. Motto, Pro Deo et Patria.

Portrait of the Emperor Leopold.

Portrait of Titian.

Diogenes Philosophus.

The dates are 1658 to 1661 inclusive. He died about 1673.]

THOMASSIN, PHILIP, a French engraver, born at Troyes, in Champagne, about the year 1536. He went to Rome when he was young, where he resided the greater part of his life. According to Huber, he was a pupil of Cornelius Cort, and followed the style of that artist with considerable success. He worked entirely with the graver, in a clear, firm style. His plates are numerous, amounting to upwards of two hundred, of which about fifty are from the antique statues at Rome. The following are his most esteemed prints :

The Portrait of Philip Emanuel of Lorraine, Duke de Mercoeur.

A set of fourteen plates, with the title, "Christ and the Twelve Apostles;" after Raffaele.

St. Margaret; after the same.

St. Cecilia; after the same.

The School of Athens; after Raffaele.

The Dispute on the Sacrament; after the same.

The Defeat of the Saracens in the Port of Ostia; after the same.

The Conflagration of the Borgo Vecchio; after the same.

The Holy Family; after Federigo Zuccaro.

The Adoration of the Magi; after the same.

The Miracle at the Marriage of Cana; after Taddeo Zuccaro.

The Nativity; after Ventura Salimbeni.

The Purification of the Virgin; after F. Baroccio.

The Last Judgment; after F. Vanni.

Apollo and the Muses; after Bal. Peruzzi; a frieze.

[The date of his decease is not accurately known, but he was living in 1613.]

THOMASSIN, SIMON, was of the same family with the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Troyes, 1638. After being instructed in the rudiments of design at Paris, he went to Rome, and studied for some time in the French Academy established there. He devoted himself to engraving, which he practised with considerable success. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear style, but without much intelligence in the effect of the light and shadow. His drawing is more mannered than incorrect, and his extremities are not marked with that freedom and lightness which distinguish the hand of the great master. He was a member of the Academy at Paris, and was one of the engravers to the king. His most considerable work was a folio volume of plates from the statues and other marbles in the palace and garden of Versailles. We have also, among others, the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Louis Duke of Burgundy. 1698.

Maria Adelaide of Savoy, Duchess of Burgundy.

Paul Beauvillier, Duke of St. Aignou. 1695.

Charles XII. of Sweden.

Peter Corneille; after Le Brun.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Miraculous Draught of Fishes; after Raffaele.

The Transfiguration; after the same.

St. Paul taken up into the third Heaven; after N. Poussin.

Christ praying on the Mount; after Le Brun.

[Zani places his birth in 1652, and his death in 1732.]

THOMASSIN, HENRY SIMON, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Paris in 1688, and was first instructed by his father, but was afterwards a pupil of Bernard Picart, and accompanied that master to Amsterdam, where he passed two years, and engraved some plates. He returned to Paris, and was received into the Academy in 1728. His plates are executed with more freedom than those of his father, and he availed himself more of the assistance of the point. He died at Paris in 1741. We have, among others, the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

The Portrait of Louis XIV., presented to the Arts by Minerva; after L. de Boulougne; engraved for his reception into the Academy. 1728.

Louis, Dauphin of France; after Tocqué.

The Bust of Cardinal de Fleury, supported by Diogenes, who had at length found an honest man; after Rigaud.

John Thierry, Sculptor to the King; after N. Largilliere.

Carlo Cignani, Painter; after a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after P. Veronese; for the Crozat Collection.

Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; after D. Feti; the same.

Melancholy; after the same; for the same. [This print is considered a chef d'œuvre.]

The Magnificat, or the Song of the Virgin; after Jouvenet.

Coriolanus overcome by the solicitations of his Family; after La Fosse.

The Plague at Marseilles; after J. F. de Troy.

He also engraved some plates from Coypel, Watteau, and other masters.

[THOMPSON, HENRY, an English historical and poetical painter, was a native of Portsea, and son of a purser in the navy. Very little of his history relative to the art is known, though he was a royal academician, and also keeper of the Royal Academy. The only pictures by him of which his friends have taken note as being of the poetical class, are the Perdita, and Eurydice hurried back to the Infernal Regions; of the latter there is a good mezzotint print. In 1828, owing to bodily affliction, he retired to his native place, Portsea, where he took up his permanent residence, and amused himself chiefly with boating, and sketching marine objects, which he presented to his friends. He died on the 6th of April, 1843, at the age of seventy.]

THOMPSON, R., a printseller, who resided in London, and died in 1693. He published several portraits in mezzotint, some of which are supposed to have been scraped by himself. [One is deserving of notice; it is a half-length of Thomas Wyndham, Esq. S. Ralph Cole, Bart. pinxit. R. Tomson, excudit.]

THOMSON, WILLIAM. This artist was a native of Dublin, but practised portrait painting in London, where his name appears in the catalogues of the exhibition from the year 1761 to 1777. Though he was not considered a painter of the first eminence, his pictures possessed the merit of a faithful resemblance, and a natural tone of colouring. He died in London in 1800.

THORNHILL, SIR JAMES. This eminent English painter was the son of a gentleman of an ancient family, in Dorsetshire, [Derbyshire,] and was born at Weymouth in 1676. His father having been reduced to the necessity of selling his paternal estate, his son was obliged to look out for a profession for support. Having conceived an early inclination for painting, he came to London, where he was assisted by [his uncle] Sydenham, the celebrated physician, who placed him under the tuition of an artist of little note, whose name is not mentioned; but he was more indebted to his own genius and application than the precepts of his instructor. He had acquired considerable celebrity as a painter of history, when he travelled through Holland and Flanders, from whence he went to France. It is somewhat surprising, and it is perhaps to be regretted, that he did not visit Italy, where his taste would have acquired more correctness and delicacy.

On his return to England, his abilities soon excited public attention, and raised his reputation to the greatest height. He was appointed by Queen Anne to ornament the cupola of St. Paul's cathedral, where he painted, in eight compartments, the history of that apostle, composed and designed in a grand style. These have been engraved in eight prints, by Du Bosc, Beauvais, Baron, G. Vander-gucht, and Simmoneau. He was afterwards employed in decorating an apartment at Hampton Court with some emblematical subjects, relative to the history of Queen Anne and her consort, George, Prince of Denmark. Among his principal productions are the great saloon and the refectory in Greenwich Hospital. These considerable works display a bold and inventive genius, well adapted to the composition of allegorical and emblematical subjects, in which he was chiefly employed. Yet, high as his reputation was, we are informed, by the noble author of the Anecdotes, that he was far from being generously rewarded for some of his works; and for others he found it difficult to obtain the stipulated prices. His demands were contested for his paintings at Greenwich; and though La Fosse, the French painter, received two thousand pounds for his work at Montague House, and five hundred pounds more for his support, Thornhill could obtain only forty shillings a square yard for the cupola of St. Paul's, and the same for Greenwich. He was honoured with the particular patronage of George I., by whom he was knighted, and was elected to represent his native town in parliament.

By the favour of the Earl of Halifax, Sir James was permitted to copy Raffaele's cartoons at Hampton Court, on which he employed three years. At the sale of his pictures, after his death, these fine copies were purchased by the then Duke of Bedford, and were placed in a gallery in Bedford House, Bloomsbury, until that edifice was taken down, when the late Duke made a present of them to the Royal Academy.

Sir James Thornhill died in 1734, leaving a son, James, for whom he had procured the appointment of serjeant-painter, and a daughter, who was married to the inimitable Hogarth. We have a few etchings by Thornhill, executed in a bold, slight manner; among which is one representing Adam and Eve.

THOURNEYSER, JOHN JAMES. This artist was born at Basle in 1636, and received his first instruction in engraving at Strasburg, from Peter Aubry. He afterwards visited France, where he engraved several plates in a style resembling that of F. de Poilly. Some of his prints are executed with a single stroke, in the manner of Claude Mellan. We have several portraits by this artist, chiefly of persons of his native country, and that of Louis XIV. when young, supported by Minerva and Apollo. He also engraved a variety of frontispieces and other book-plates, and executed part of the plates for a set of prints published by Catherine Patin, in 1691, from select pictures. He usually marked his plates with a cipher composed of an H. for Hans or John, and a T., thus, HT. [The name is sometimes written Thourneysen. He died in 1718. His son, of the same name, occasionally assisted his father in his plates; he operated as late as 1736.]

THUFEL, or TEUFEL, JOHN. According to Professor Christ, this artist was a native of Saxony, and flourished about the year 1570. He executed some wooden cuts, which he marked with the initials I. T. F.; the F. for fecit. [He operated from 1540 to 1568; he was called the master of the pick-lock, (grimaldello), and of the trefoil.]

THULDEN, or TULDEN, THEODORE VAN. This painter was born at Bois-le-Duc in 1607, and was brought up in the great school of Rubens, of whom he was one of the most distinguished disciples. His illustrious instructor held his talents in sufficient estimation to employ him as an assistant in some of his principal works, and he is said to have had a considerable share in forwarding the paintings for the Luxembourg Gallery. He visited Paris in 1633, where he was engaged to paint a series of twenty-four pictures of the Life of St. John of Matha, for the choir of the church of the Mathurins, of which he etched and published the plates. On his return to Flanders, he painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices at Antwerp, Mechlin, Ghent, Bruges, and other cities in Flanders, some of which have been mistaken for the works of Rubens. He did not confine himself to historical subjects, but sometimes painted rural pastimes and village festivals, in which he excelled. Among his most esteemed works are the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church of the Bernardines, at Mechlin; the Martyrdom of St. Adrian, in the church of St. Michael, at Ghent; and the Assumption of the Virgin, formerly in the church of the Jesuits at Bruges, which is considered his finest work. He died in 1676. We have a considerable number of etchings by Theodore Van Thulden, both from his own designs and after the compositions of other masters. They are executed in a slight but clear and determined style, among which are the following:

A set of twenty-four plates of the Life of St. John of Matha; after the pictures painted by himself. 1633.

The History of Ulysses, in fifty-eight plates; from the pictures painted by Primaticcio at Fontainebleau. 1640.

Eight plates of the Triumphal Arches designed by Rubens for the entry of the Cardinal Infant Ferdinand into Antwerp.

The Prodigal Son; in eight plates; from his own designs.

[Theodore Van Thulden ranks among the best of the scholars of Rubens, and perhaps may be reckoned the most useful of all to that master in forwarding his larger works. He possessed a universal genius in art, and could cope with any subject. He ornamented the churches of Peter Neefs, and the landscapes of Wildens and Mompers, with figures; and even Snyder was indebted to him for assistance in his hunting-pieces. There is some uncertainty about the exact time of his death; but Balckema gives no authority for placing it so late as 1686.]

THURSTON, JOHN, born at Scarborough in 1774, was principally employed in designing book illustrations, which may be found in most of the editions of the poets and novelists put forth by enterprising publishers, and led much to the improvement of the public taste in that mode of embellishment. His compositions are always pleasing, and well suited to the subject; sometimes he exhibits power for greater undertakings, but it is uncertain whether he ever executed any thing on a large scale. He died in 1822.]

THYS, GYSBRECHT. This painter was a native of Antwerp, and, according to M. Descamps, flourished about the year 1625. He was one of the ablest portrait painters of his time, and his works in that branch of the art have been sometimes mistaken for the pictures of Vandyck. He also excelled in painting landscapes, with figures and animals. [He was a scholar of Adrian Hanneman. In his smaller landscapes with figures he imitated the manner of Poelmburg. Some of his pictures are dated 1660. Balkema says he died in 1684.]

[THYS, PETER JOSEPH, born at Lier in 1749, but educated in the Academy at Antwerp, where he obtained several of the prizes awarded to students. He also studied under Koeck, the painter of flowers, and in his house became acquainted with Spaendonck, with whom he went to Paris. He afterwards established himself at Brussels, and was employed to decorate the orangery of the palace of Laeken with flower-pieces. These were carried off by the French in 1792. During the latter part of his life he was employed in repairing, or what is called restoring, the pictures of his predecessors, in which he was very adroit, and he continued this, perhaps more profitable, occupation till the time of his death in 1823.]

TIARINI, ALESSANDRO, was born at Bologna in 1577, and was first a scholar of Prospero Fontana, and afterwards of Bartolommeo Cesi. Being under the necessity of flying from Bologna on account of a quarrel, he retired to Florence, where he studied for some time under Domenico Cresti, called Passignano. He had painted some pictures at Florence, and in the state, in the style of the last master, when the fame of Lodovico Caracci induced him to venture on returning to Bologna, the circumstance which had driven him into exile having subsided. He immediately applied himself to the study of the works of Lodovico, not as a copyist or imitator, but for the purpose of improving and aggrandizing his manner, by a contemplation of the great style of that master. The attempt was not fruitless to an artist possessed of ingenuity and invention, and already well grounded in the theory of the art. In a short time his works assumed a new character, and in the taste of his compositions, the conduct of the chiaro-scuro, and the expression of the passions, he appeared to have been educated in the school of the Caracci. He still preserved an originality of character, featured by a gloomy solemnity, corresponding with the melancholy turn of his disposition. His attitudes and airs of his figures are serious and pathetic, and the tones of his colouring quiet and subdued. The subjects he selected were not less congenial with the grave and sedate character of the painter. La Madonna addolorata, the Sorrows of Magdalene, and the Repentance of St. Peter, were represented by him in a manner extremely affecting and impressive. His principal works in the public edifices at Bologna are, a fine picture of the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, weeping over the instruments of the Passion, in the church of S. Benedetto; St. Catherine kneeling before a Crucifix, in S. Maria Maddalena; a Pietà, in S. Antonio; and S. Domenico resuscitating a dead Person, in the church dedicated to that saint. The last-mentioned picture excited the surprise and admiration of Lodovico Caracci, who declared it was equalled by few productions of the time. He died in 1668.

TIBALDI, PELLEGRINO, called PELLEGRINO DA BOLOGNA. According to Zanotti, this eminent artist was born at Bologna in 1527. He was a disciple of Bartolommeo Ramenghi, called Il Bagnacavallo, and distinguished himself as an architect as well as a painter. His principal studies at Bologna were from the works of Giorgio Vasari, in St. Michael in Bosco. In 1547 he went to Rome, where the works of Michael Angelo were the particular objects of his attention. Baglione mentions as one of his earliest works in that city, a picture of the Archangel Michael, in the Castel S. Angelo, which gained him great reputation. He afterwards painted the ceiling of the chapel of St. Denis, in the church of S. Luigi de Francesi, representing a battle, grandly composed. In conjunction with Marco da Siena, he painted the ceiling of the Capella Rovere, in the church of La Trinità de Monti, from the cartoons by Daniello da Volterra. These performances recommended him to the protection of Cardinal Poggi, who employed him in ornamenting his Vigna, near the Porta del Popolo, which he embellished with some admirable works in fresco. His patron further employed him in the completion of his palace at Bologna, now the Palazzo dell Istituto, which was finished from his plan, and which is regarded as one of his principal works as an architect. The interior of the palace is also decorated with some frescoes, representing subjects from the Odyssey, which are considered by Vasari as some of his finest productions. He constructed the chapel of his protector, in the church of S. Giacomo Maggiore, and embellished it with some admirable paintings, representing St. John preaching in the Wilderness, and the Division of the Elect from the Reprobate. These were long the admiration of the Caracci, and were models of study to them and their numerous disciples. The Cardinal Poggi next employed him in the erection of a chapel in La Madonna di Loreto, where he painted the Nativity, the Presentation in the Temple, the Transfiguration, and the Decollation of St. John.

In 1586 he was invited to Spain by Philip II. in the capacity of architect and painter, and was employed in the Escorial, where he painted the greater part of the lower cloister, having expunged the unsuccessful production of Frederigo Zuccaro. Pellegrino acquitted himself in this invidious task to the entire satisfaction of his royal employer. The subjects represent the Purification, the Flight into Egypt, the Murder of the Innocents, Christ tempted in the Wilderness, the Election of the Apostles, the Resurrection of Lazarus, the Expulsion of the Money-changers from the Temple, and the Resurrection of Christ. The compositions are grand and copious, the figures are models of correctness, designed in a free and masterly style, with great attention to truth and nature.

Several pictures by Tibaldi are to be seen in the great church at Madrid, representing St. Michael with the Fall of the Angels, the Martyrdom of San Lorenzo, and two very grand compositions of the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, which he executed to replace those by Zuccaro, of the same subjects, which Philip had rejected. But the work which, above all others, establishes his reputation in Spain, is the ceiling of the library. In this ingenious composition he appears to have had in mind the School of Athens, by Raffaello. He has personified, in different compartments, the Arts and Sciences, the four Doctors of the Church, with the ancient philosophers Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, and Seneca, accompanied with their characteristic attributes and insignia, with beautiful groups of children and figures supporting the cornice and festoons, in a variety of attitudes and foreshortenings, designed with a grandeur and expression which prove him to have been a worthy emulator of the great style of Buonaroti. After a residence of nine years in Spain, Pellegrino returned to Italy, richly remunerated for his services, and died at Milan in 1600. [The proper names of this artist are Pellegrino Pellegrini. The exaggerated praises and censures on his works by different writers may be left to balance each other. His oil pictures are extremely rare out of Italy and Spain. They partake much of the manner of Innocenzio da Imola, with something of the character of Michael Angelo. The Caracci named him Il Michelagnolo riformato; no mean compliment, coming from them. Zani places his death in 1592.]

TIBALDI, DOMENICO PELLEGRINO, was the younger brother of Pellegrino Tibaldi, born at Bologna in 1540, and learned the rudiments of design in his native city. He is said to have been a painter, but on very slender authority. As an architect and an engraver, he acquired a distinguished reputation. We have some etchings by him executed in a spirited style, among which are the following :

The Virgin and infant Christ; after Parmigiano.
The Trinity; after Orazio Samacchini.
Peace subduing the God of War; after Pell. Tibaldi.

[The etchings by Domenico Tibaldi consist of nine pieces, which are described by Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xviii.; but that accurate observer is of opinion that he engraved many more, as these exhibit such a skilful management of the burin as is only acquired by much practice. The following are the titles of those described :

1. The Repose in Egypt; from his own design.
2. The Holy Trinity; after Samacchini. 1570.
3. The Virgin with a Rose; after Parmigiano.
4. St. Francis of Assisi; copied from two prints by C. Cort; the landscape from one with the date 1567, and the figure from another with the date 1568, both after pictures by Girolamo Muziano.
5. The Penitent Magdalene; after Titian.
6. Peace; properly the Triumph of Peace; after his own design.
7. Portrait of Pope Gregory XIII.; after Passarotti. 1572.
8. View of the grand Fountain in the Piazza Scaffieri at Bologna. 1570.
9. The Palace. This view of a magnificent palace, ornamented with columns and statues, is from a design of G. Alphisi. It is in two plates, with the date 1566; but Bartsch is of opinion that there should be a third plate to complete the composition, as only the left wing and centre are shown, and there are borders to the tops and bottoms and the left side, but none to the right.

Zani says he was born in 1532, and died in 1583; he grants that his epitaph states that he was born in 1540, and that he died in 1582, but he exclaims,

How many epitaphs are badly written !
How many badly read, however good !
How many writings, in themselves befitting,
Are by the readers wrongly understood !

A large book, says the Abate Marini, might be compiled of the mistakes committed, even by celebrated authors, in copying inscriptions.]

TIDEMAN, [or TIEDEMAN,] PHILIP. This painter was born at Hamburg in 1657. He was of a respectable and opulent family, who intended him for one of the learned professions, and gave him a liberal education; but his inclination for the art occasioned him to pay great attention to drawing, without, however, neglecting his studies. He was at length permitted to indulge his propensity, and was placed under the tuition of Nicholas Raes, a painter of history of some reputation, under whom he studied eight years. He had made considerable progress under that master, when the fame which Gerard Lairese had acquired at Amsterdam induced him to visit that city, to contemplate the works of that painter, which had produced so lively a sensation on the public opinion. On his arrival at Amsterdam, he was admitted into the school of that eminent painter, who soon discovered in his disciple sufficient ability to employ him as an assistant in some of the numerous and important commissions in which he was at that time employed. The talents he had displayed as a coadjutor of Lairese recommended him to public notice, and on leaving that master he was extensively employed in ornamenting the public edifices and the principal mansions with historical and allegorical subjects, which he composed and painted in the ingenious style of his preceptor. The advantages of classical instruction, aided by the learned precepts of Lairese, enabled him to treat subjects of history and the fable with unusual intelligence and propriety; and some of his compositions were regarded as models for the historical painters of his country. Among his most admired productions was a saloon he painted for the family of Verschuur, at Hooru, in which he represented, in a series of pictures, the History of Æneas, which he treated with a classical propriety, and an originality of invention, which was universally admired. He died at Amsterdam in 1705.

TIEPOLO, GIOVANNI BATISTA, one of the last eminent painters of the Venetian school, was born at Venice in 1697. He was a scholar of Gregorio Lazzarini, whose careful and studied style was a useful check to the natural impetuosity of his genius. At first he imitated the manner of Gio. Battista Piazzetta, though in a clearer and livelier tone of colouring. Such is his picture of the Shipwreck of S. Satiro, in the church of S. Ambrogio at Milan. He afterwards studied with success the works of Paolo Veronese, and, though very unequal to that distinguished painter in the airs of his heads and the turn of his figures, he approached him in the splendour of his colouring, and in the breadth of his light and shadow. Possessed of a lively invention, and an uncommon facility of execution, he was admirably qualified for the functions of a copious machinist, and his large fresco works, of ceilings, and other decorations, representing allegorical subjects, are considered his best performances. After giving proofs of his ability at Milan, and in other cities in Italy, Tiepolo was invited to the court of Spain. He painted several splendid frescoes in the new palaces at Madrid, which were sufficiently admired to excite some degree of jealousy in Mengs, the popular court painter, who was then in the height of his celebrity. Of these, a particular description will be found in Mr. Cumberland's Catalogue of the Paintings in the King of Spain's Palaces. He died at Madrid in 1770. We have about fifty-six etchings by this master, executed with taste, neatness, and spirit; of which the following are the most deserving of notice :

The Adoration of the Magi. This is esteemed his best print.

A set of twenty-four Fancy Subjects.

Ten Fancy Subjects, of a smaller size.

[According to the best authorities Tiepolo was born in 1693. His pictures are fantastical in composition, and meretricious in colouring; they are well suited for apartments decorated in the vile taste of the age of Louis XIV. Some of the larger pictures by Antonio Canal, called Canaletto, have figures by Tiepolo, and they accord well with the scenery.]

TIEPOLO, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Venice about the year 1726, and was instructed by his father, and painted some historical subjects in the churches at Brescia. He accompanied Gio. Batista Tiepolo to Spain, where he assisted his father in his works in the palace at Madrid. We have several etchings by this artist, in some of which he has imitated the style of Benedetto Castiglione. Among others are the following :

A set of twenty-seven plates of the Flight and the Resurrection of the Holy Family in Egypt.

The Passion of Christ; in fourteen plates.

A set of twenty-six Heads, in the style of Benedetto.

The Virgin appearing to St. Theresa; after Gio. Bat. Tiepolo.

St. Ambrose preaching to the People; after the same.

[A set of eight pieces of Satyrs, Turks, and Arabs.]

It is supposed that he died in Spain about 1795.]

TIEPOLO, LORENZO, was the younger brother of Gio. Domenico Tiepolo, and painted and etched in the style of his father.

[TIERENDORFF, JEREMIE VAN, a Flemish historical painter, who lived about the year 1626. There is a picture by him in the church of St. Peter at Ypres, representing Christ delivering the Keys to the Apostle; and another in the church of St. James, of the Nativity.]

TILBURG, EGIDIUS, or GILES VAN, THE ELDER. According to Descamps, this painter was born at Antwerp about the year 1578. He was a contemporary of David Teniers the old, and painted similar subjects, representing Flemish wakes and festivals, which were esteemed at the time in which he lived. [He died about 1632. Balkema says he was born in 1570, and died in 1622, which would be three years before his son was born.]

TILBURG, GILES VAN, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Brussels in 1625, and was first instructed by his father; but on the death of that painter he became a scholar of the younger Teniers, at the time when Francis Du Chatel studied under that master. He imitated the style of his last instructor with some success, and Teniers had sometimes the mortification of seeing the works of Tilburg preferred to his own. His pictures represent peasants regaling, and village feasts, which are ingeniously composed and vigorously coloured, though infinitely inferior to those of Teniers in the lightness and dexterity of his pencil, and in the clearness and purity of his colouring. The works of the younger Tilburg are held in considerable estimation in Flanders, where they are found in the best collections. [He died in 1678, according to some writers, but it is not quite certain. As his father died in 1632, he could not have received much instruction from him; and it is more likely that he was a pupil of Brauwer, or Craesbecke, than of David Teniers. His manner of painting bears no resemblance to the last. The name is sometimes written Tilborch and Tilborgh.]

[TILIUS, JEAN, a native of Bois le Duc, painted conversations in which he imitated the manner of Terburg. There are no particulars of him recorded.]

TILL, JOHN CHARLES VAN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1644. He was chiefly engaged in engraving portraits and other book-plates. His name is affixed to an indifferent etching of a bust of Ferdinand Talienschger, crowned by Minerva. It is inscribed Joh. Carl van Till, 1644. [He died in 1676.]

TILLART, [or TILLARD,] JOHN BAPTIST, a French engraver, who resided at Paris when Basan published his Dictionary in 1760. We have by him several etchings of the national dresses of the Savoyards and Russians; after St. Aubin, Le Prince, and others.

[Jean Baptiste Tillard, was born at Paris in 1740, and was a scholar of Fessard, but engraved in much better taste than his master. His works are very numerous, chiefly book-plates, and deserve the particular attention of amateurs. He was living in 1786. Among the principal of his illustrative prints may be named,

A portion of the views in Choiseul-Gouffier's Voyage de la Grèce.

The Vignettes for an edition of Tasso; after Cochin.

The figures for the quarto edition of Telemachus; after Monnet.

The greater part of the prints for the Travels of the Abbe Chappe in Siberia.

A suite of Savoyards, with the title "Mes Commissionnaires, mes Gens," &c.

A Portrait of Pope Clement XIV.; after D. Porta.

Hagar in the Desert; after J. Vernet.
Russian Shepherds; after Le Prince.]

TILLEMANS, PETER, was born at Antwerp in 1684, and was instructed in landscape painting by an indifferent artist, whose name is not mentioned. He visited England in 1708, and first attracted notice by his excellent copies after Borgognone and other artists, particularly Teniers, of whose works he preserved the freedom and spirit. He also painted landscapes, with small figures, sea-ports, and views, of his own composition; and when he came to be known was employed by several persons of distinction. He also excelled in painting views of the principal country-seats, huntings, races, and drew horses in perfection. He was favoured with the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire, for whom he painted one of his best pictures, representing a view of Chatsworth, and was much employed by Lord Byron, whom he instructed in drawing. He died at Norton, in Suffolk, in 1734.

TILLEMANS, SIMON PETER. This artist was born at Bremen about the year 1602. He passed the early part of his life in Italy, where he was esteemed as a painter of landscapes. He also painted portraits with reputation, and was invited to the court of Vienna by the Emperor Ferdinand, whose portrait he painted, with those of several of the most distinguished personages of the court. He was living in 1668. [He was also called Schenk and Vangameren. Balkema says he died in 1670.]

TILLIARD, F. This artist was a native of France, and resided at Paris about the year 1760. He was principally employed in engraving portraits, which are executed with the graver in a neat, finished style.

TILSON, HENRY. According to Lord Orford, this artist was educated under Sir Peter Lely. After the death of that master, which happened in 1680, he went to Italy, in company with Dahl, where he resided seven years, copying and studying the works of the best masters with great diligence. He excelled in painting portraits, both in oil and crayons, and was likely to make a figure in his profession, when he became deranged in his senses, and shot himself, at the age of thirty-six. He painted his own portrait two or three times, once with a pencil in his hand, leaning on a bust, it was inscribed H. Tilsona. Roma, 1687. Dahl gave Tilson his own portrait, inscribed Memoria per mio caro amico Enrico Tilson, fatto Roma. 1686.

TIMOTEU, DA URIBINO. See VITE.

TINELLI, CAVALIERE TIBERIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1586, and for some time was a scholar of Giovanni Contarini, but afterwards studied under Leandro Bassano, whose style he followed, particularly in his portraits, in which he excelled. He introduced a mode of representing his portraits in some historical character, which met with great encouragement. His small pictures of historical and fabulous subjects were no less admired, and he was considered one of the popular painters of his day. Some of his pictures found their way into the collection of Louis XIII., king of France, who esteemed them sufficiently to confer on him the order of knighthood. He occasionally painted large pictures and altar-pieces, in which he was less successful than in those of a cabinet size. He resided the greater part of his life at Florence, where his works were esteemed. According to Ridolfi, the pressure of some domestic afflictions sunk him into a state of melancholy and despondency, and he is said to have put an end to his life in 1638.

TINGHIUS, A. M. This artist is mentioned by Basan as the engraver of a plate from a drawing by Callot, formerly in the cabinet of M. de Julienne. He flourished about the year 1760. [Strutt says he engraved the great Temptation of St. Anthony from the drawing by Callot. Zani notices an engraver of the name Antonio Meitinghius, a Florentine artist, who flourished in 1627, and he refers from Tinghius to that name. Again he says, Meitingh, non Tinghius. Are Basan and Strutt in error?]

TINTI, CAMILLO, was born at Rome about the year 1738, and was employed by Gavin Hamilton to engrave some of the plates for his Schola Italica; among which are the following:

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Parmigiano.
Meleager and Atalanta; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.
Christ praying on the Mount of Olives; after Lanfranco.

TINTI, LORENZO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1634. He was a scholar of Gio. Andrea Sirani, and painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Bologna in the style of his master, of which the most worthy of notice are, his picture of the Scourging of Christ, in the church of La Madonna del Fiombo; and the Virgin and infant Christ, with several Saints, in S. Tecla. We have several etchings by this artist, among which is the frontispiece to the Funeral Pomp of Francis I., Duke of Modena; after Francesco Stringa. He also etched several plates from some of the painters of the Bolognese school, particularly after Elisabetta Sirani. [Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xix. describes nine pieces by this artist, two of which, a Holy Family and an Allegory, are after Elisabeth Sirani; the rest are portraits and frontispieces to books. One has the date 1671. Gori mentions two others, the Virgin with the Infant, after Guido, and a portrait of Dr. J. C. Clandinus, after Dominic Ambrogio. Zani places his birth in 1626, and his death in 1672.]

TINTORETTO, GIACOMO ROBUSTI, called IL. This distinguished painter was born at Venice in 1512. He was the son of a dyer, on which account he acquired the name of Il Tintoretto. From his infancy he discovered a marked disposition for the art, and covered the walls of his father's house with those infantine and artless sketches which are the sure indications of decided genius. His father, so far from controlling this marked propensity, had him instructed in the rudiments of design, and placed him as a disciple of Titian, under whom he had the advantage of studying some time. The rapidity of his advancement, which outstripped that of all his fellow students, alarmed the jealousy of his instructor, who had the meanness to expel him from his academy. This apparent indignity, so unjust and unmerited, did not however abate his courage, nor disconcert the progress of his career; it served only to inspire him with more vigorous and extensive conceptions. He formed the daring project of creating a new style, founded on a union of the beauties of Venetian colouring with the Florentine grandeur of design. In a short time he established a school of art, and, to excite the emulation of his disciples, had the following precept inscribed on the wall of his painting-room: Il Disegno di Michel Angiolo, e il Colorito di Tiziano. He furnished himself with the best casts he could procure, from the antique marbles and bassi-relievi, and had models sent him from Florence, taken by Daniello da Volterra from the figures of the tomb of the Medici, by Michael Angelo Buonaroti. From these, we are told by Lanzi, his studies were unremitting, which he often continued by the light of the lamp, for the purpose of giving greater breadth and power to the effect of his light and shadow. To acquire a perfect acquaintance with foreshortening, which was less studied by the Venetians than the Lombards, he is said to have suspended the models of figures in the air; and frequented the lectures and dissections of the anatomist, to acquire a complete knowledge of the muscular construction of the human figure. These pursuits he followed with a genius, which Vasari, though inimical to him, is forced to admire, and calls the most daring that has appeared in the art; an imagination rich in novel and extensive ideas, and a picturesque enthusiasm, capable of conceiving and representing the most violent and varied expression of the passions. Such were the endowments possessed by Tintoretto, and such the system he for some time adopted in his studies. But what avails the most unbounded genius, says Lanzi, or all the gifts necessary to form a consummate artist, without diligence, a virtue which, according to Tully, includes every other? Unfortunately for the fame of Robusti, this essential qualification is generally found incompatible with the furor of despatch. Of the fecundity of his invention, and the unexampled facility of his execution, he gave a decided proof on the following occasion. The members of the Confraternity of S. Rocco, at Venice, having determined to decorate their church with a painting representing the Apotheosis of their patron saint, commissioned some of the popular artists of the time, Paolo Veronese, Andrea Schiavone, Salviati, F. Zuccaro, and Tintoretto, to prepare sketches of the subject, that the most approved might be carried into execution. On the day appointed for the decision, when the other painters presented their designs, Tintoretto produced his finished picture, to the surprise of all present. His astonished competitors rendered justice to so extraordinary an exertion, and denominated him, Il furioso Tintoretto, un fulmine di Pennello.

The impetuosity of his genius, and the extraordinary promptness of his hand, together with an ardent desire of embracing every opportunity of distinguishing himself, induced him to paint several large works for the convents and monasteries at Venice, for little more than the expense of the canvass and colours. It is not to be wondered at, that the effect of this unusual readiness and despatch was the frequent production of works unworthy of his more attentive exertions; and it was this inequality in his performances which occasioned Annibale Caracci, in one of his letters to Lodovico, to remark, that Il Tintoretto was sometimes equal to Tiziano, and was often inferior to himself. Of the merit of his principal works, he appears to have been himself fully sensible, as he particularly distinguished three of them, by signing them with his name. These are, his admired picture of the Crucifixion, painted for the Scuola di S. Rocco, at Venice, of which we have a fine engraving by Agostino Caracci, the Marriage at Cana in Galilee, painted for the Refectory of the Crociferi, and now in the Sacristy of S. Maria della Salute, of which there is a print by his disciple Odoardo Fialetti; and his celebrated picture called Il Servo, representing the Miracle of the Venetian Slave, who having been condemned to martyrdom by the Turks, invoked the protection of St. Mark, who appearing to succour him, the instruments of the executioners are broken, and the crowd of his persecutors is dispersed; it was formerly in the Scuola di S. Marco, and is now in the gallery of the Louvre. This extraordinary picture is regarded as his master-piece. The composition is grand and judicious, the design is strictly correct, and the forms select and dignified. The effect of the chiaro-scuro is striking and impressive, and the colouring is not inferior to the finest works of Titian, either in purity or power. Next in merit to these may be ranked his pictures of the Assumption, in the church of the Crociferi; and the Resurrection, in the Scuola di S. Rocco. Many other estimable works of Robusti, in the public edifices at Venice, are particularly mentioned by Zanetti in his Pittura Veneziana. On his inferior performances, the produce of an unbridled imagination and an ungovernable impetuosity, which, it must be confessed, form the majority of his works, it will be less necessary and less agreeable to dwell. "Of all the extraordinary persons," says Vasari, "that have practised the art of painting, for wild, capricious, extravagant, and fantastical inventions, for furious impetuosity and boldness in the execution of his works, there is none like Tintoretto; his strange whimsies are even beyond extravagance, and his works seem to be produced rather by chance than in consequence of any previous design; as if he wanted to convince the world that the art was a trifle, and of the most easy attainment." The enthusiasm of his genius, and the energy of his pencil, are indeed beyond all conception: and though, in the torrent of his executive powers, he frequently breaks through all the bounds of reason and propriety, and outrages every rule of character and costume; such is the seductive charm of his colour, and the fascinating magic of his chiaro-scuro, that we cannot refuse him the tribute of our admiration. A just idea of the strength and extent of his faculties can only be formed by contemplating them in the immense works he has left in the public edifices at Venice. What is to be seen of him elsewhere, affords only an exhibition of his infirmities. This eminent painter, like the greater part of the artists of his country, excelled in portraits; but in these will be found the same inequality that is seen in his historical works. He died at Venice in 1594. We have only one etching by this painter, representing

The Portrait of the Doge Paole Ciconia.

[It is not correct to say Tintoretto was a disciple of Titian, and had the advantage of studying under him for some time. According to Ridolfi, he was with him only ten days, when Titian, seeing some very spirited drawings in his studio, inquired who made them, and on being informed that they were by Tintoretto, ordered one of his scholars to conduct the boy home. The story is a strange one, and it may be supposed that there was something more belonging to it than is related. Clever students are too apt to commence by criticising their instructors. The Miracle of St. Mark, which was taken by the French, has been restored to Venice, and is now in the Academy there. This picture, on its first appearance, was received with unbounded applause; it even extorted the approbation of Aretine, the friend of Titian, and vilifier of almost every one else, who wrote to Tintoretto in its commendation, and judiciously added, "happy would you be, if, instead of being so expeditious, you could prevail on yourself to be a little more patient." The late Mr. Phillips, in his excellent Lectures on Painting, draws the following character of Tintoretto and his works: "All his pictures manifest an imagination of the brightest quality, accompanied with vast knowledge of the human figure, and of drapery, at the command of an energetic hand, capable of impressing it on the canvass at a stroke; sometimes most happily exerted, at others with the extreme of folly and absurdity; most frequently the latter. The churches and halls of the different communities of Venice are overloaded with the productions of his fertile pencil. In that of St. Roch alone there are sixty pictures by him of sacred subjects, which exhibit a combination of extraordinary power, and weakness in the control of it; or rather an abandonment of the attempt, such as sets all criticism at defiance. The freedom of his execution, and the beauty of his tones of colour, are worthy of being added to the grandeur of design of M. Angelo. Indeed, his own style of design is more masterly than Titian's; free and large, with fine form acquired by study from the best antique figures." Some of his pictures are of enormous size. The Crucifixion is forty feet in length; and there are two, The Worship of the Golden Calf, and The Last Judgment, each about sixty feet high. These are filled with figures drawn in grand style, and painted with powerful colour and execution. No one knew better how to employ composition to the purpose of filling a portion of space, and that with beautiful forms; in this respect he is paramount in the Venetian school. It should always be borne in mind, that Tintoretto is equally great in landscape and portraiture. There are many of his productions in both departments in England; but the absurd propensity of attributing every thing that is excellent to the most celebrated name of a school, has deprived him of the reputation to which he is entitled, and kept the public in ignorance of his merits; the name of Titian, in most collections, does homage to the talents of Tintoretto. Mr. Samuel Rogers possesses the study for the celebrated picture of The Miracle of St. Mark.]

TINTORETTO, MARIETTA ROBUSTI, called. This lady, the daughter of Giacomo Robusti, was born at Venice in 1560. She was instructed in the art by her father, and devoted herself to portrait painting, as the most suited to her sex, in which she acquired considerable reputation. She painted many of the principal personages at Venice, but her celebrity was not confined to her native country. She was invited to the court of the Emperor Maximilian, and that of King Philip II. of Spain; but her father's affectionate attachment to her could not be prevailed on to consent to a separation from her. She died in the prime of life, in 1590.

TINTORETTO, DOMENICO ROBUSTI, called. This artist, the son and disciple of Giacomo Robus-ti, was born at Venice in 1562. He followed the traces of his father, but, as Ascanius followed those of Æneas, non passibus æquis. There is a great similarity in the airs of the heads, in the colouring, and in the harmony of the effect; but his works are greatly inferior to those of his father in invention, in the spirit of his pencil, and in the vigour of his colouring. His principal works are in the Sala di Consiglio, and in the Scuola di S. Marco, at Venice; in some of which he is said to have been much assisted by his father. He was more successful in portraits than in historical painting, and painted many of the principal personages of his time. He died in 1637.

TISCHBEIN, JOHN HENRY, THE ELDER. This artist was born at Hayna, near Hesse-Cassel, in 1722. He received his first instruction in the art from an obscure painter of his own country, named Fries; but he afterwards studied at Paris, under Carl Vanloo. After passing some time under that master he went to Venice, where he frequented the school of Gio. Batista Piazzetta. He painted history with some reputation, and was appointed painter to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. He etched several plates from his own designs, among which are the following:

Venus and Cupid.
Cupid stung by a Bee complaining to Venus.
Nymphs Bathing.
Hercules and Omphale.
Menelaus and Paris.
Thetis and Achilles.

The Resurrection; after the picture he painted for the church of St. Michael, at Hamburg.

[He died in 1789.]

TISCHBEIN, JOHN HENRY, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Hayna in 1751, and was taught the rudiments of design by his father. His genius led him to landscape painting, though he occasionally practised portraiture. The picturesque views of Switzerland were the favourite subjects of his pictures. He engraved several plates both with the point and in aquatinta, among which are the following:

Acis and Galatea; after Moore.
Bacchus and Ariadne; after the same.
A Stag-hunt; after Ruthard.
A Landscape, with Cattle; after P. Potter.
A Mountainous Landscape; after Rembrandt.
A Landscape, with Animals; after J. H. Roos.

[TISCHBEIN, HENRY WILLIAM, was the second son of John Henry, the elder. He distinguished himself as a painter of mythological, historical, and pastoral subjects, and also in animal painting. A number of his pictures are said to be in the ducal residence at Holdenburg; his countrymen speak of them with enthusiasm. But the work by which he is best known to foreigners, consists of the admirable designs, which he also engraved in outline, of the collection of ancient Greek vases belonging to Sir William Hamilton, in which not only the forms but the poetic subjects are executed with the greatest exactitude, and in the pure taste of the originals. This work was published at Naples in 1791, in three volumes folio, under the title of "The Hamilton Vases." Tischbein was at the time director of the Academy of Painting in that city. Notwithstanding his devotion to the classical subjects of antiquity, he was careful to represent those of more modern date in their true characters, and to depict them in vigorous colouring. It is supposed that he died about 1829.]

TISCHLER, ANTHONY, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He engraved part of the plates for the collection of prints from the pictures of the cabinet of Count Bruhl. [He was living in 1774.]

TISI. See GAROFALO.

TITI, SANTO DI. This painter was born at Citta S. Sepolero, in the Florentine state, in 1538, and was first a disciple of Agnolo Bronzino, but, according to Baldinucci, he afterwards became a scholar of Baccio Bandinelli. But his principal improvement was derived from his studies at Rome, during a long residence in that city, where he designed with great assiduity from the antique, and after the works of the best masters. He returned to Florence a correct and graceful designer, and distinguished himself as the ablest painter of his time among his countrymen, except in his colouring, which is occasionally languid, with somewhat of a want of relief. He excelled in architecture and perspective, with which he successfully embellished his pictures, and gave to his compositions both dignity and variety. Among his most esteemed works are, his picture of Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, in the church of S. Croce, at Florence; and the Resurrection of Lazarus, in the cathedral of Volterra. There are also several of his works in the private collections in Florence, of which one of the most celebrated is the Baptism of Christ by St. John, in the Corsini palace. It is an elegant and graceful composition, correctly designed, with a more vigorous colouring than is usually found in his works. He died at Florence in 1603.

TITI, TIBERIO, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Florence in 1578, and was instructed in design by his father. He did not, however, follow the same style, but devoted himself to portrait painting, which he practised with success. He also excelled in drawing small portraits with lead, in which he was much employed by Cardinal Leopold de Medici; and a considerable collection of heads, designed by him for that prince, are carefully preserved in the Florentine Gallery. He died in 1637. [Zani calls him Valerio, and says he was born in 1573, and died in 1627.]

TITIAN, TIZIANO VECELLI, DA CADORE, called. This distinguished painter, the great founder of the true principles of colouring, was of a noble family of Friuli, born at the castle of Cadore, according to Ridolfi, in 1477. Having shown an early inclination for the art, he was sent, when he was ten years of age, to Venice, and placed under the protection of his uncle. He is said, by Lanzi, to have received his first instruction in the art from Sebastiano Zucati, and was afterwards successively the disciple of Gentile and Giovanni Bellini. Under these masters he followed a servile and laboured imitation of nature; and it was not until he had seen the works of Giorgione that he quitted the tame and spiritless style which characterized the works of his first instructors, and adopted a bolder outline, greater freedom of hand, and a broader effect of light and shadow. When he was eighteen years of age he painted a portrait of the head of the noble family of Barbarigo, which excited universal admiration, and soon afterwards was employed, in conjunction with Giorgione, to paint the two fronts of the Fondaco de Tedeschi; and his portion of the undertaking having been preferred to that of his competitor, served to establish more firmly his growing reputation. On the death of Giorgione, in 1511, he succeeded him in several important commissions, in which he was employed. He was soon afterwards invited to the court of Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara, for whom he painted his celebrated picture of Bacchus and Ariadne, and two other fabulous subjects, in which he still retained somewhat of the style of Giorgione. It was at the court of Alfonso that he became acquainted with Ariosto, whose portrait he painted, and was celebrated by the poet in his Orlando Furioso.

In 1523, the senate employed him to ornament the Sala del Gran Consiglio, where he painted, among other considerable works, the famous Battle of Cadore, between the Venetians and Imperialists. This grand performance was destroyed by fire, but its composition has been preserved to us by the print engraved from it by Fontana. He soon afterwards painted his celebrated picture of S. Pietro Martire, for the church of S. S. Giovanni e Paolo, at Venice, which is generally regarded as his chef d'œuvre in historic painting. Notwithstanding the importance of these works, the remuneration he received for them was not sufficient to place him in easy circumstances, and he was even in a situation bordering on indigence, when the praises bestowed on his works, in the writings of his friend Pietro Aretino, recommended him to the notice of Charles V.; and when that monarch visited Bologna in 1530, to be crowned by Pope Clement VII., he was invited thither to paint the portrait of the Emperor, and those of his principal attendants, for which he was liberally rewarded, and commissioned to paint several pictures for his new patron. On the departure of Charles V. from Bologna, Titian returned to Venice, where he found Il Pordenone in possession of a considerable portion of the public favour. The superiority of his talents, however, triumphed over those of his respectable competitor, and he was extensively employed for the churches and public edifices. It was about this time that he was invited to the court of Federigo Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, whose portrait he painted, and a series of the twelve Cæsars, for a saloon in the palace, beneath which Giulio Romano afterwards painted a subject from each of their histories.

In 1543 Pope Paul III. visited Ferrara, where Titian painted his portrait, and was invited by that pontiff to Rome; but having formed an engagement with Francesco della Rovere, Duke of Urbino, he was under the necessity of declining the invitation. Having accomplished his undertaking at Urbino, he was again invited to visit Rome by the Cardinal Farnese, and arrived in that city in 1548, where he was received in the most distinguished manner. He was lodged in the palace of the Belvidere, and painted, for the second time, the portrait of the Pope, whom he represented sitting between the Cardinal Farnese and Prince Ottavio. It was about this time that Michael Angelo Buonaroti is said to have paid him a visit, whilst he was painting his famous picture of Danaë, and, after expressing his admiration of the beauty of the colouring, lamented that the Venetian painters paid so little attention to design. The Pope, to retain him at Rome, is said to have offered him the lucrative office of Fratel del Piombo, vacant by the death of Frà Sebastiano del Piombo, but he declined accepting the appointment, from conscientious motives.

Titian had no sooner returned to Venice from Rome, than he received so pressing an invitation from his first protector, Charles V., to visit the court of Spain, that he could no longer refuse it, and he arrived at Madrid in the commencement of the year 1550. During a residence of three years in Spain, he painted many admirable pictures, for which he was richly rewarded. He was appointed a gentleman of the chamber to the Emperor, who conferred on him the order of Saint Iago, and constituted him a Count Palatine of the empire. Charles did not only grace this eminent artist with the splendid titles and ornaments above mentioned, he bestowed on him more solid marks of his favour, appointing him rents in Naples and Milan, of two hundred ducats annually each, besides a munificent compensation for every picture he painted.

Titian had quitted Spain before Philip took possession of the throne; the arts, however, had rapidly advanced. As soon as Philip had finished building the Escorial, he conceived the idea of enriching it with every thing suitable to the magnificence of its scale, and he cast his eye towards his father's favourite painter, Tiziano, then returned to his native country. Whether he solicited him to return to Spain does not appear, but it is certain that he employed him in many commissions. The pictures which Titian painted in Spain, and those he sent thither, form, of themselves, a large and magnificent collection. The catalogue of the Escorial, and of the palaces at Madrid, give but a very imperfect idea of the works of Titian in Spain. Many, and some of those the finest, of his productions, have been withdrawn from public view by the scruples of bigotry, among which is the inimitable picture of the sleeping Venus, which was made a present by Philip IV. to King Charles I. when Prince of Wales, on his visiting Spain, and which, after the death of that unhappy monarch, was purchased by the Spanish ambassador then resident in England. This admirable picture was one of the few works of art which escaped the conflagration of the palace of the Pardo, and it is reported by Palomino, that when the dreadful accident was reported to the king, he earnestly demanded if the Titian Venus had escaped the flames; on being assured that it was safe, he calmly replied, "then every other loss may be supported."

In 1553 Titian returned to Venice, and was soon afterwards invited to Inspruck, where he painted the portraits of Ferdinand, king of the Romans, his queen, and family, in one picture, which is said to have been one of his finest productions. The talents of this eminent painter were permitted a career of unusual longevity, and he continued the exercise of his art until the year 1576, having lived within one year of a century, when he died of the plague. Towards the close of so long a life, it may be reasonably imagined that his works exhibited the infirmities of senility, and that his last works were little more than the prattle of old age, but, as it has been justly observed, it was the prattle of Nestor.

From the foundation of the Venetian school, a mode of proceeding was adopted, which, though well calculated to give the painter a greater promptness of execution, a more commanding dexterity of hand, and a more chaste and lively colouring than is to be found in the artists of the Roman or Florentine schools; was also the means of introducing a want of correctness in their design, and a neglect of purity in their forms. Their method was, to paint every thing without the preparation of a drawing, whereas the Roman and Florentine painters never introduced a figure of which they had not studied and prepared a model or cartoon. Following the system of his countrymen, Titian painted immediately from nature, and possessed of a correct eye, tuned to the harmony of effect, he acquired a style of colouring perfectly conformable to truth. Satisfied with this identity of imitation, he was little sensible of the select beauty of form, or the adaptation of that characteristic expression, so essential to the higher order of historic painting. In his works of that description, if we look for the fidelity of the historian, he will be found, like the other artists of his country, little scrupulous in point of accuracy. He neither presents us with the precise locality of the scene, the strict propriety of the costume, nor the accessories best suited to the development of the subject; attributes so estimable in the works of those painters who consulted the best models of antiquity.

"Raffaëlle and Titian," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "seem to have looked at nature for different purposes; they both had the power of extending their view to the whole; but one looked for the general effect produced by form, the other as produced by colour. We cannot refuse to Titian the merit of attending to the general form of his object, as well as colour, but his deficiency lay, a deficiency at least when he is compared with Raffaëlle, in not possessing the power, like him, of correcting the form of his model, by any general idea of beauty in his own mind."

As Titian contented himself with a faithful representation of nature, his forms were fine when he found them such in his model. If, like Raffaëlle, he had been inspired with the genuine love of the beautiful, it might have led him to have courted it in selected nature, and in her more attractive charms to be found in the polished graces of the antique; the purity of his design, thus united with the enchanting magic of his colouring, would have stamped him the most accomplished painter that the art has produced. But, although Titian cannot with propriety be placed among those artists who have distinguished themselves by the excellence of their choice, and the purity of their sentiment, he is not altogether wanting either in grandeur or dignity. Like Michael Angelo, he occasionally exaggerated or aggrandized his design, but it was rather to render nature more tender and fleshy, than, like Buonaroti, to render it more vigorous and muscular. A genial feeling for colour, rather than a correct principle of composition, induced him to make prominent the most beautiful parts of his figures, as affording the best masses and the boldest relief. His female figures and children are preferable to those of his men, and he has given them an air of naïveté and ease, which, though not absolutely grace, is nearly allied to it, and it is generally supposed that both N. Poussin and the sculptor [Francis Quesnoy, called Il Fiammingo, who excelled in the design of infantile beauty, formed their idea of it by contemplating the works of Titian.

As a colourist, Titian holds an unrivalled dominion over every competitor. No painter has viewed nature with so chaste an eye, and to none were the tender blandishments of her tinting more confidentially communicated. In his pictures, the tones are so subtly melted, as to leave no intimation of the colours which were on his palette; and it is perhaps in that respect that his system of colouring differs so materially from that of Rubens, who was accustomed to place his colours one near the other, with a slight blending of the tints. He had observed that in nature every object offered a particular surface or character, transparent, opaque, rude, or polished, and that all these objects differed in the strength of their tints and the depth of their shadows. It was in this diversity that he found the generality and perfection of his art. Hence, as Mengs remarks, in imitating nature he took the prevalent for the whole, and represented his fleshy tones, chiefly composed of demitints, totally by demitints, and divested of demitints those passages in which few were discernible in nature. By these means he arrived at an undescribable perfection of colouring, which approaches to illusion.

In invention and composition, he confined himself to a representation of what appeared to him to be naturally necessary to the subject; and this strict adherence to individuality prompted him to introduce into his historical pictures, instead of ideal characters analogous to the subject, heads designed from life, with a precision which gave to the most interesting subjects of history the formality of portraiture. That he was capable of occasionally venturing beyond this boundary, he has given proof in his fine picture of S. Pietro Martire, in which his admirer Algarotti asserts, that the most fastidious critic "cannot find the shadow of a defect." The composition of this celebrated picture is admirable, and, though composed of very few figures, they are spiritedly designed, full of action, and marked with a grandeur seldom found in the works of this artist.

As a painter of portraits, Titian is indisputably entitled to the highest rank. To the nobleness and simplicity of character which he always gave them, he added what Sir Joshua Reynolds calls "a sort of senatorial dignity," a natural and unaffected air, which distinguishes his personages from those of every other artist, and to his transcendent excellence in this branch he is indebted for a great portion of his fame.

To the celebrity of Titian as a painter of history and portraits, is to be added his excellence in landscape painting. Whether it is predominant, or introduced as an accessory, it is always treated by him in the grandest and most picturesque style. Such is the admirable back-ground of his famous picture of S. Pietro Martire, than which it would be difficult to find, in the whole range of art, a more sublime and impressive accompaniment, so artfully conducive to the terrific effect of the subject.

This great artist is said to have engraved both on copper and on wood. The copper-plates attributed to him are several large landscapes, from his own designs, which are etched in a slight, but masterly style, among which is one with a shepherd leading his flock to a brook and playing on his pipe. Of his wooden cuts the following are considered the most authentic:

The Marriage of St. Catherine; inscribed, Titianus Vercellius Inventor lineavit.
Samson and Delilah; no mark.

The Triumph of Faith, represented by a procession of Patriarchs, Evangelists, Saints, Martyrs, &c., a long frieze of eight or ten prints; dated 1505.

[Titian painted four pictures, called The Triumphs, which were in England about eighteen years ago, and in the care of the editor. As a purchaser could not be found for them at the time collectively, they were sold by auction, and went into different hands. Since then they have been sought for on account, it is said, of the king of Holland, with very liberal offers for their recovery, and are probably again assembled together. Of these, writers have noticed only The Triumph of Faith, and that from the wood-cuts with the date 1505, quoted in the text. The four pictures bear so strong a resemblance to each other in invention, composition, and execution, that they must have emanated from the same mind, and have been the work of the same hand, whether they preceded or followed the wood-cuts. Though superior in invention, they have not the masterly handling, and rich glow of colouring, that distinguish Titian's works of a later period. They may all have been painted before he was thirty; he was twenty-eight when the wood-prints of The Triumph of Faith were published. It is likely that he took the idea from the Triumphs of Petrarch. These four pictures were engraved about eighty years ago by Silvestro Pomarede, and were supposed to be the work of Bonifazio; but Bonifazio was born in 1491, and it is not probable that such subjects could be treated as these are by a youth of fourteen or sixteen years of age. The following are descriptions of the subjects, written by the editor, with the pictures before him:

The Triumph of Time.—A winged figure, as an emblem of Time, is seated on a car drawn by deer, emblems of fleetness, and is measuring with compasses a sphere, on which is inscribed the signs of the zodiac, indicating that time exists only by the motion of the heavenly bodies. The accompanying figures denote the different stages of human life: Infancy, Adolescence, Maturity, and decrepit Old Age, with their several occupations, are conspicuous. An Eastern monarch is in advance of the car; probably this figure is meant for Solomon, and to show that Knowledge and Wisdom anticipate Time's career, and look forward to something beyond his reach. Another figure in European costume, and bearing a sceptre, is looking back, as angry at the slow approach of Time. This may mean Ambition, that ever thinks Time too slow for his projects. Two grave senatorial characters are conversing by the side of the car, and keeping pace with its movements, to show that experienced statesmen walk with the times. An old man, in the last stage of life, is supporting himself with crutches, while two infant boys are employed, the one in endeavouring to remove his props, and the other in pushing him forward, to make way for himself. The other figures are of equal signficancy, and may be easily interpreted.

The Triumph of Fame.—An allegorical figure of Fame, seated on a car, is blowing a trumpet, proclaiming the deeds of a dying warrior, who is recumbent below her, resting on an emblem of death. One foot of the goddess is placed on the warrior's head, and near to it the book of history lies open, to show that his memory will survive his death. The car is drawn by lions, intimating that strength and generous courage are conductors to fame. Bellona, looking forward, is advancing with a standard, followed by Minerva, who is regarding Fame, to show that, in order to acquire valuable renown, Wisdom should accompany War. The Muses are in attendance, as the proper handmaids of Fame, with an additional female figure, as Painting, or Sculpture, with a Torso at her feet, to show that through their means the brave and worthy obtain immortality. A warrior, probably Pericles, a legislator, and several philosophers, follow the car; the two first in advance of the rest; as warriors, lawgivers, and patrons of the fine arts, are the first to have their fame promulgated. In the back-ground are seen two Roman consuls on horseback, followed by their army, and a king prostrate before them, imploring their clemency; and more distant, two armies engaged. These are placed in the distance, to show that war for ambitious purposes has but a secondary claim to the honours of Fame; and the true objects are those who have benefited mankind by good laws, precepts of wisdom, or dying in defence of liberty and their country, as is shown in the characters of Pericles, Solon, the several philosophers, and the dying figure, which perhaps personates Leonidas, or Epaminondas.

The Triumph of Death.—Before Death, on a car, are seated the Fates, Atropos, Lachesis, and Clotho, to show that the work of the first depends on destiny. The car is drawn by strong oxen, of the buffalo kind, implying that though slow in his advances, Death is not to be retarded by obstacles, as these animals will not stop at any opposition that is within their strength to master. The weight of the car is crushing the bodies of persons of all ages. A pope with his tiara, several warriors, and other figures, are strewed around in promiscuous heaps, to show that Death makes no exceptions, and levels all distinctions. Pyramus is dying, and Thisbe immolating herself on his body, out of the regular course of the car, indicating that suicides anticipate their natural end; the same is represented by the bodies of Antony and Cleopatra on the right. The flag of Antony, with its staff broken, placed against the stump of a decayed tree, shows that illicit love brings loss of honour as well as loss of life. In the back-ground are two figures flying from the approach of the car, and two others following and imploring Death to take them; a storm is raging at sea, and a vessel foundering.

The Triumph of Faith, or of the Christian Religion.—The Saviour is seated on a globe, placed on a triumphal car, which is drawn by the symbols of the four Evangelists, assisted by the efforts of the doctors of the church, as interpreters of the Gospel. Their persons and rank are denoted by the tiara, scarlet hat, and mitre; and they are intended to personate Pope Gregory, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine. The attendant group represents the contributors to the Triumph, in the persons of the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and confessors. As the foundation of Christianity is laid in faith, Abraham, "the father of the faithful," takes precedence; Noah, the accepted of God, stands next; David, from whom Christ proceeded in the flesh, and the first to prophesy concerning him, follows; and near to him, bearing a cross, is the penitent thief, as the proto-confessor. Behind these are other figures, probably designating the prophets; the one with uplifted eyes represents Job as saying, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and he is placed in the back-ground, as being somewhat apocryphal. Next to the thief stands one of the sibyls, in whose writings a prophecy of Christ's coming is said to have been found, and other females, as the earliest believers in his doctrines and Divinity. John the Baptist, bearing his emblem as the herald of Christ.

is next; Peter and Andrew, the first called disciples, supporting the Virgin Mary, follow; the proto-martyrs, Stephen and Lawrence, close the group. A figure in shadow, probably intended for St. Paul, as being first a persecutor, afterwards called, stands behind them.

In front of the picture, before St. Jerome, are two children; the one blowing a trumpet, as proclaiming the joyful news of the Gospel; the other holding a sword and a branch, to denote that martyrdom was necessary to its final triumph. Between Jerome and Augustine are four children; one bearing a basket of fruit on his head, another sounding a trumpet, and two embracing; these represent the fruits of Christianity, glory to God, and brotherly love and affection towards mankind. A dog is introduced as the symbol of watchfulness and obedience.

As auxiliary to the allegory, the artist has represented in the back-ground, to the left, the miracle of St. Christopher, as admitted by his creed, and a procession of martyrs and confessors passing through difficult mountains to swell the triumph; and on the right our first parents, emblems of natural religion; Moses and Aaron, as promulgators of the written law; and two other figures, one armed and bearing a flag, and the other a palm branch, denoting Christian warfare and victory, and the final triumph of the Christian dispensation; these last are seen ascending in a cloud to the presence of the Ancient of Days.

It is not shown satisfactorily that Titian ever visited Spain, though asserted by Palomino, and even by so accurate a writer as Cean Bermudez. Palomino is evidently wrong, according to his dates and the circumstances he mentions. He says that Titian resided there from 1548 to 1553, and grounds this assertion on the date of his patent, as Count Palatine, which he says was signed by the Emperor at Barcelona in the latter year; in that year the Emperor was confined by the gout at Brussels. Bermudez gives the proper date of the patent, 1535, when the Emperor was at Barcelona, preparing for his expedition against Tunis, and says that Titian passed the two previous years in Spain. He endeavours to support this by the evidence of the portrait of the Empress Isabella, arguing that it must have been painted in Spain, as she never left that country after her marriage, and before 1538, when she died. But it is well known that many of his portraits of great personages were not painted from life; for instance, that of Solymán the Magnificent, whom Vasari mentions among the subjects of his pencil, but it is not said that he ever visited that monarch; and that of the Empress he finished at Venice in 1544. The strongest negative evidence is the series of letters written by Aretine to Titian and other friends from 1530 to 1555, which may be said to contain a chronicle of the painter's movements, but wherein no mention is made of any journey to Spain, or of his residence there. The works of Titian, to be rightly understood, should be seen at Venice, or in the royal palaces at Madrid, and in the Escorial; many of those attributed to him elsewhere, particularly in England, would induce the belief that his merits have been greatly overrated, (which would be rank heresy,) or that the greater part are injured pictures, copies, or productions of inferior painters. Not but some private collections contain good specimens on a small scale; among the best, perhaps, are those in the Earl of Ellesmere's possession, though not in all their pristine beauty. In the National Gallery are two that are not questioned; Bacchus and Ariadne, and the Rape of Ganymede. The gallery of the Louvre boasts of about twenty, compositions and portraits. Bartsch has described eight prints attributed to Titian, but is of opinion that he never engraved on wood or copper.]

TITIANO, GIROLAMO DANTE, called IL. According to Ridolfi, the family name of this artist was Dante. He was brought up in the school of Titian, and was employed by that master to assist him in several of his works. By frequently painting in conjunction with him, and sometimes copying his works, some of his pictures, retouched by Titian, have been taken for the original productions of that painter. He sometimes painted from his own designs, and his picture in the church of S. Giovanni, at Venice, representing SS. Cosmo e Damiano, is worthy of the school in which he was educated.

[TITO, POMPILIO. According to Professor Christ, this engraver resided at Rome about the year 1685. He has not, however, specified any of his prints, but says that he marked them with the initials P. T. with the date.]

TIVOLI, ROSA DI. See ROOS.

[TOBAR, DON ALONSO MIGUEL DE, an historical painter, and copier of Murillo, was born at Higuera, near Aracena, in 1678. He went young to Seville, and placed himself under a painter of very little ability, of the name Juan Antonio Faxardo; but he profited more by his own application than by the instruction of his master. He applied himself to copying the easel pictures of Murillo, and became so great an adept, that many passed, even in his time, as originals. Sometimes he varied the compositions, at others introduced new accessories, which still more aided the deception. In the church of St. Isidora, at Seville, are two pictures, one representing The Good Shepherd, and the other, The young St. John, which are copies, with variations, of the two so well known in England, formerly in the collection of Sir Simon Clarke, but now in those of Baroness Rothschild and the National Gallery. His talent for copying brought him into great repute, and probably obtained for him a rich wife, the widow of Don Pedro Ramoz, and also the office of a familiar of the Inquisition. It is a curious circumstance that so many Spanish painters should have been appointed to that office; perhaps their profession qualified them for being good spies, who, while painting the personal likeness of their sitters, could look also into their consciences. In 1729 he succeeded Teodoro Ardemans as painter to Philip V., and removed to Madrid. He continued to work at his art with great assiduity, and, in addition to his copying, painted a great number of portraits of distinguished persons, among which that of the Cardinal de Molina is specially mentioned. Of his original compositions, the most deserving of notice are, the picture in the cathedral of Seville, called Our Lady of Consolation, in which the Virgin is represented enthroned, holding the Infant in her lap, and attended by SS. Francisco and Antonio; The Divine Shepherdess, in the Queen of Spain's gallery, in which the Virgin, in a pastoral dress, is feeding lambs with roses. All writers on Spanish art speak highly of both. Of his copies after Murillo, the most celebrated, as such, is one painted for the church of Santa Maria la Blanca de Sevilla;

it represents the Virgin, St. Joseph, Jesus, and St. John, and always passed for the work of Murillo till the original was discovered in the palace at Madrid. It is impossible to say how many more there are that pass for the works of the great master, and which are called replicas: seeing that Tobar in his copies gives the same faces and expressions, the same style of colouring and handling in his draperies, and pays attention to every peculiarity accorded to Murillo. While Tobar loses the praise of faithful duplicity, Murillo gains the doubtful honour of being a repeater of his own works. Tobar died at Madrid in 1758.]

TOBIN, J. This artist was a native of England, and flourished about the year 1770. He etched several plates of landscapes, from H. Grim. He also executed some tinted plates after Both, Ostade, and other masters.

TOCQUE, JOHN LOUIS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1696. He was first a scholar of Nicholas Bertin, and afterwards studied under Hyacinth Rigaud. Tocque devoted himself chiefly to portrait painting, in which he acquired considerable reputation, and was made a member of the Academy at Paris. He was invited to the court of Petersburg by the Empress Elizabeth, where he painted the portrait of that princess, and met with the most flattering encouragement. He died in 1772.

TOEPUT, LOUIS. This painter was born at Mechlin in 1550, but, according to Descamps, went into Italy at an early period of his life, where he passed the remainder of his days. He was much esteemed as a landscape painter, and also represented fairs and markets, which were well painted and finely coloured. He chiefly resided at Trevigi, in the Venetian state, where he was living in 1604. [He was an eminent and versatile painter. He was called Lodovico di Trevigi, and sometimes signed his pictures Lodovico Pozzo.]

TOL, VAN. This artist was a copyist and imitator of the style of Gerard Dou. Although his works are very inferior to those of the admired painter he followed as his model, some of his pictures are very highly wrought up, and are well coloured. He painted conversations and family subjects similar to those of Dou.

[Dominick van Tol was the nephew and scholar of Gerard Dou, and one of his most successful imitators; that is to say, in copying his uncle's pictures. Some of his copies approach so near to the originals that, under his own name, they have obtained in public sales prices from £150 to £350 sterling. His interiors with conversations, in which he is more original, partake of the manner of Brekelenkamp. His pictures are better known than his history. Mention is made of David and Peter van Tol, but there is reason to believe they are identical with Dominick. He was living in 1680.]

TOLEDO, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Lorca, in the kingdom of Murcia, in 1611. He was the son of Miguel de Toledo, an obscure artist, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of design. According to Palomino, he went to Italy when he was young, and first studied at Naples, under Aniello Falcone. He afterwards went to Rome, where he became the disciple and friend of Michael Angelo Cerquozzi, called delle Battaglie. On his return to Spain he established himself at Granada, and acquired a distinguished reputation as a painter of battles and sea-pieces. His abilities were not, however, confined to those subjects. He gave proof of considerable talent as a painter of history; and there are several of his works in the churches at Granada, Murcia, Madrid, and Alcalá de Henares, of which the most creditable to his reputation are, the Assumption of the Virgin, at the Colegio de San Estevan, at Murcia; and the Conception, in the church of las Monjas, at Madrid. He died in 1665. [He served in the army in his youth, and distinguished himself by his gallantry; he was made captain of horse, and when he retired from the service still retained the title "el capitán." His battle-pieces of a small size are numerous and well executed, both of land and sea fights. He made the design for the battle of Lepanto, painted by Mateo Gilarte. In his religious compositions he was less successful, and laid himself open to some severe sarcasms. There was another painter called also Juan de Toledo, who flourished from 1641 to 1645. He painted a number of pictures in the cathedral; a small one of the Virgin, Christ, and St. John is preserved in the sacristy.]

TOLOSANO. See BARON.

TOMBE, NICOLAS LA. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1616. After learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he travelled to Italy, and resided some years at Rome, where he was chiefly employed in painting small landscapes and architectural subjects, which he decorated with figures in the Italian costume. He sometimes painted views of the vestiges of ancient buildings and monuments, in the vicinity of Rome, with landscapes in the back-grounds, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Cornelius Poolemburg. He also occasionally painted small portraits, in which he was much employed after his return from Italy. He died at Amsterdam in 1676. [His landscapes are enlivened with a great number of small figures, spiritedly painted. He was nicknamed Stoppertje, on account of his inveterate habit of smoking.]

[TOMKINS, PELTRO WILLIAM, an English engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, was a very distinguished scholar of Bartolozzi. He was born at London in 1760, and died in 1840. Many of his early works were after Angelica Kauffman, and painters of the time, all well executed, and generally improvements on the original designs; but his most valuable engravings are those executed after the old masters, both Italian and Dutch, for the publications entitled "The British Gallery of Pictures," being selections of some of the finest in possession of the English nobility and gentry; and that of the "Stafford Gallery." Of these some impressions were taken in colours, and for beauty and delicacy of tint are equal to highly finished drawings. He also engraved the illustrations for a splendid edition of "Thomson's Seasons," after pictures by W. Hamilton, and for a poem by Bland Burgess, called "The Birth of Love," or, "The Triumph of Cupid," from designs by the Princess Elizabeth of England. One very rare private plate by him is the portrait of Margaret Audley, Duchess of Norfolk; after Lucas de Heere. It is a square three-quarter length; she is standing, her right hand on a table on which is her name, and the date 1562. The original impressions of this plate are dated 1791.

Many small ornamental prints for publications of the day have his name, but are probably by his scholars, under his direction; they, however, bear the impress of his tasteful superintendence.]

TOMKINS, WILLIAM, an English landscape painter, born in London about the year 1730. In 1763 he obtained the second premium of twenty-five guineas for a landscape, which was much admired, and was among those who were first elected associates of the Royal Academy. He was employed by the Earl of Fife to paint some views of his Lordship's seat in Scotland, and continued the exercise of his talents with great respectability until his death, in 1792. [He painted numerous landscapes and views of gentlemen's seats in England; there are also some copies of Hobbema and other Dutch landscape painters by him. There was a Charles Tomkins, who flourished at the same time, and painted similar subjects of English views and country seats, among others that of Gorbambury House, in Hertfordshire.]

TOMOLIUS, LUCA, the name of this engraver is affixed to a small portrait of F. Lælius Contesino, executed with the graver in a coarse style. [This is probably the same as Lucas Tomiolus, whose name appears to a portrait of Antonius Paulutius.]

[TOMS, PETER, a scholar of Hudson, a drapery painter to Sir Joshua Reynolds, was one of the first forty royal academicians, and also held a situation in the Herald's Office. In the catalogues of the three first exhibitions at the Royal Academy his name is found, with R. A. annexed, to an Allegory, a Portrait, and The Burdock and other wild Plants, a specimen of a work intended to be published. He went to Ireland to practise as a portrait painter, but not meeting with encouragement he destroyed himself, in 1776. As his father was an engraver, perhaps he was the son of the artist mentioned in the succeeding article.]

TOMS, W. H., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1740. He engraved several views and architectural subjects, some book-plates, and a few portraits. The following are among his prints most worthy of notice:

The Portrait of Sir Philip Percival; after Vanddyck.
Two Views of Greenwich Hospital; after Lauranson.
Four Views of Gibraltar; after Macé.
A set of eight Views in the Island of Jersey.

TOORNVLIIET, JAMES, [or JACOB.] This painter was born at Leyden in 1641, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by an obscure artist, who is not mentioned. He for some time applied himself to portrait painting, and had acquired some reputation in that branch, when, in 1670, he was induced to accompany his friend, Nicholas Rosendaël, in a journey to Italy. On his arrival at Rome, the works of Raffaele were the particular objects of his admiration, and he was inspired with the ambition of distinguishing himself as a painter of history. He pursued his object with great assiduity, and became a careful and correct designer. To improve himself in the principles of colouring, he visited Venice, where he resided some time, and studied with attention the works of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese. After an absence of six years he returned to Holland, where he commenced his new career with the most sanguine expectations. These flattering prospects were, however, never accomplished. His style of design, founded on the taste of the Roman school, was either not intelligible, or not agreeable to his countrymen; and, notwithstanding the respectability of his talents, they were neither admired nor employed. His compositions are ingenious, his design more correct than is usual in the painters of his country, and his colouring clear and natural. He died at Leyden in 1719.

[TOPINO-LEBRUN, JEAN BAPTISTE, born at Marseilles in 1796, and guillotined at Paris in 1801, for conspiring against the life of the first consul, is remembered for his picture of the Death of Caius Gracchus, which was purchased by the government and placed in the Museum at Marseilles. He had been a pupil of David, and imitated him both in politics and painting, but was not equally successful in either.]

TORBIDO, FRANCESCO, called IL MORO. This painter was born at Verona about the year 1500, and was for a short time a scholar of Giorgione, but he afterwards became a disciple of Liberale da Verona. With somewhat of the rich colouring of Giorgione, his works exhibit the correct design and the careful finishing which distinguish the productions of Liberale. His process was extremely slow, which may account for the paucity of his pictures. There are few of his works in the churches; among those most deserving of notice are some frescoes representing the Life of the Virgin, in the cathedral at Verona, of which that of the Assumption is deservedly esteemed. There is also an admired picture by him in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Venice, representing the Transfiguration. His easel pictures are frequently found in the private collections at Verona and Venice. He was much employed in painting portraits, which he finished with extraordinary neatness and precision, and they are said to have possessed the merit of a faithful resemblance. He died in 1581, aged about 81. [If Francesco Torbido was born about 1500, or, as Zani states, 1504, it is not likely that he was a scholar of Giorgione, who died in 1511. All the Italian writers who notice him, however, say that he was so for some time. It is also said that he studied under Stefano da Sevio; now that master flourished from the middle to the latter part of the 15th century. There must be some error, therefore respecting Torbido's birth. Füssli says he died in 1522, in his eighty-second year. It is also said that the frescoes in the cathedral of Verona were painted by Torbido from designs by Giulio Romano; according to the last date Giulio was only 32 when Torbido died.]

TORELLI, CESARE. According to Baglione, this painter was a native of Rome, and a disciple of Giovanni de Vecchi. He flourished in the pontificate of Sixtus V., and was employed both as a painter and a mosaicist in the library of the Vatican, and in the Scala Santa, in St. John of Lateran. In the church of La Madonna del Orto, he painted, in fresco, two sibyls larger than life, which are considered as his finest works. [He died in 1615.]

[TORELLI, FELICE, a painter of Verona, was born, according to Zanotti, in 1667, Zani says in 1670, and died in 1748. He was of the school of Giangioseffo dal Sole, but had previously studied the art under Santo Prunato. He was a painter of strong character, fine chiaro-scuro, and of no common merit in oil pictures for altar-pieces. These are to be found at Rome, Turin, Milan, and other cities of Italy. That in the church of the Dominicans, at Faenza, is one of his best works. It represents St. Vincenzio in the act of exorcising a female, presumed to be possessed, and in which he has finely varied the heads, the draperies, and the attitudes. His manner sometimes resembles that of Baroccio. His wife, Lucia, also painted some pictures for churches, in which she imitated the style of her husband; but her chief excellence lay in portraiture, which obtained admission for her own in the Royal Gallery at Florence: she was born in 1678, and died in 1762.]

[TORELLI, IL CAVALIERE GIACOMO, a celebrated painter of architecture and theatrical scenery, was born in 1608, and died in 1678. He was the first, it is said, that invented shifting scenes and machinery for dramatic representations, and, for the surprise they occasioned, was named il gran Stregone, the great magician.]

[TORBENBURG, GERARD, born at Amsterdam in 1737, was a scholar of J. Ten Compe, and of C. Pronk. He painted landscapes and views of cities, which equalled in beauty the works of his skilful instructors. His drawings are held in great estimation; a copy by him of a picture by Wouwerman was thought worthy of a place in the celebrated Braamcamp collection. He also decorated the interiors of houses with paintings, (a practice once common in Holland, even by Teniers, Pynacker, Weeninx, and Hondekoeter,) among which was that of the Baron Van Esse, called the Old House of Scheffelaar, for which he received 400 florins. Torenburg died at Nykerk in 1785. In the Museum at the Hague there is a picture by him, representing a view of the Amstel, at Amsterdam.]

TORNIOLO, NICCOLO. According to Malvasia, this artist was born at Siena, and flourished about the year 1640. He resided some time at Bologna, where he painted two pictures for the church of S. Paolo, representing Cain slaying Abel, and Jacob wrestling with the Angel. [Some of his pictures are painted on variegated marble.]

TORRE, FLAMINIO. This artist was born at Bologna in 1621, and was first a scholar of Jacopo Cavedone, but afterwards studied under Guido Reni. His greatest excellence was the exactness with which he copied the pictures of the most eminent masters, which he did with such precision, that it was difficult for the most experienced eye to distinguish his copy from the original. He painted, however, some pictures of his own composition for the churches at Bologna, of which the most esteemed is a Deposition from the Cross, in S. Giorgio. We have a few etchings by F. Torre, among which are the following:

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Francis and St. Jerome; after L. Caracci.

The Patron Saints of the city of Bologna; after Guido.
Pan conquered by Love; after Agos. Caracci.

[Bartsch describes seven prints by him, which he says are in great request by amateurs. They are engraved with a firm point, in the taste of a designer who was consummate in his art, and approach to the manner of Pesarese, called Cantarini, under whom he studied. The titles are as follow:

1. Samson; after Guido.
2. The Virgin accompanied by the infant Jesus and St. John; his own design; dated 1639.
3. The Virgin with St. Jerome and St. Francis; after Lodovico Caracci.
4. The Virgin and patron Saints of Bologna; after Guido.
5. St. John the Evangelist; from his own design. Signed F. T. F.
6. Three Children bearing a Plateau, on which are two vases and a glass; signed G. R. T.
7. Pan conquered by Cupid; after Ag. Caracci.

Flaminio Torre died at Modena in 1661.]

TORRENTIUS, JOHN. According to Descamps, this artist was born at Amsterdam [others say at Haerlem] in 1589, and was not less remarkable for the talents he possessed as a painter, than for the depravity of his morals. In the early part of his life he painted conversations, domestic subjects, and still-life; and his pictures were greatly admired for the beauty of the finishing, and the truth and delicacy of the colour. But he afterwards fell into a dissolute and abandoned course of life, and he selected for the subjects of his pictures the most disgusting indecencies, surpassing even the most licentious outrages of Petronius or Aretin, which his extraordinary ability only rendered more objectionable. To profligacy he added impiety, and attempted to justify his atrocities by propagating tenets subversive of every moral principle and all the bonds of society. The magistrates at length found it necessary to interfere. He was arrested as the head of this detestable sect, underwent the question, and was sentenced to twenty years imprisonment. By the intercession of some persons of consideration, among whom his biographer places the English ambassador, he obtained his liberty. Torrentius came over to England, but, giving more scandal than satisfaction, he met with no encouragement, and returned to Amsterdam, where he remained concealed till his death, in 1640. [Balkema, following Sandrart, says that he died under the infliction of torture in 1640, and that his works were burnt in public by the common executioner; but Houbraken's account is according to the text. He was of the sect called "Adamites."]

[TORRES, CLEMENTE DE, born at Seville in 1665, was a disciple of D. Juan de Valdes Leal. By his talent and application he became one of the best painters of his time, both in oil and fresco. In this latter manner he painted the figure of St. Fernando which is over the principal door of the convent of S. Paul of Seville, and the three first Apostles, larger than life, with groups of angels above each, in other parts of the same convent. For the friars of the order of Mercy, he painted in oil the two Saints John, and the Virgin of Belen, or Bethlehem. He went to Madrid about 1724, where he formed a friendship with Antonio Palomino, in whose praise he wrote a sonnet: Palomino returned the compliment by describing him as a distinguished painter, and a laurelled scholar of the Muses. He afterwards went to Cadiz, where he died in 1730. At Seville, in a private collection, there are pictures by him, in oil, of the Four Evangelists, richly coloured and elaborately finished. In the church of S. Felipe Neri, at Cadiz, he painted, in fresco, on the arch of the principal chapel, the figure of the Eternal Father. The amateurs of Andalusia possessed many of his easel pictures. Torres was also a skilful draughtsman; his drawings strongly resemble those of Murillo, and pass for such.]

[TORRES, MATÍAS DE, born at Espinosa de los Monteros in 1631, studied under his uncle, an indifferent painter, at Madrid, and in the Academy there. He also received lessons in colouring from the younger Herrera. Wishing to produce striking effects in his larger historical works, he imitated the style of Caravaggio, but missed his principles, and produced little more than blackness and obscurity. He, however, painted smaller pictures, landscapes, and battle-pieces, in a graceful and free manner, and these were esteemed by the amateurs of his time. His sons, who were skilful illuminators, assisted in some of his works of this kind; but dying before him, the old man was overtaken by sickness and poverty, and died, as he was being carried to the public hospital, in 1711. Some of his pictures are in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg. It was this Matias de Torres who challenged the arrogant Boccanegra to a trial of skill in some public place, on any subject that might then and there be proposed by the spectators; but that boaster, after accepting the challenge, was fearful of the encounter, and slunk away from Madrid. The larger works of Matias Torres were painted in the church of S. Geronimo, in the convents of La Victoria, the Trinitarios Descalzos, the Capuchinos de la Paciencia, and several other public buildings.]

TORTEBAT, FRANCIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1610. He was a disciple of Simon Vouet, whose daughter he married, and was a reputable painter of portraits. We have several very spirited etchings by Tortebat, executed in a style resembling that of Michael Dorigny. He engraved the plates for L'Anatomie des Peintres, by De Piles, from designs by John Calcar. The following are also by him :

Peace descending upon earth; after S. Vouet.
St. Louis carried up to Heaven by Angels; after the same.
Samson breaking the Pillars of the Temple of the Philistines; after the same.

[Some writers say he was born in 1600, others in 1626, to which date Robert Dumesnil inclines. But if he married Simon Vouet's daughter during her father's life-time, this is not probable; for Vouet died in 1641, when Tortebat would have been only fifteen years old. He died at Paris in 1690. For an account of his etchings see Robert Dumesnil, Peintre-Graveur Français, tom. iii. They amount to twenty-five, and among them are twelve illustrative of the abridgment of "Vesalius's Anatomy," which are probably those mentioned in the text as plates for "L'Anatomie des Peintres," by De Piles. Some of these are inscribed F. Tortebat delin. Sculp. et excud., and one has the date 1668: no mention is made of John Calcar.]

[TORTOLERO, PEDRO, a Spanish painter and engraver, of whom the less that is said the better for his memory as an artist. He was born at Seville about the beginning of the 18th century, and died from an accident in 1766. All that is said of him, both as a painter and engraver, is negative.]

TORTOREL, J. [JEAN.] This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1570. He engraved both on wood and on copper, and, in conjunction with James Perrissin, executed a set of twenty-four large prints, representing the War of the Huguenots. They are coarsely engraved, but not without some spirit.

[To understand rightly what concerns Jean Tortorel and Jacques Perrissin, the inquirer should refer to Robert Dumesnil's excellent work, "Le Peintre-Graveur Français," tom. vi. There he will find ample details of the forty prints on which their reputation rests. Some are impressions from copper-plates, others from wood-blocks; some have the name or mark of Tortorel only; some, those of Perrissin; and some, the mark common to both. These prints are illustrations of a book in folio bearing the following title: "Histoires diverses qui sont memorables touchant les Guerres, Massacres, et Troubles advenus en France en ces dernieres annees. Le tout recueilly selon le tesmoignage de ceaux qui y ont esté en personne, et qui les ont veus, lesquels sont pourtraits à la vérité." The dates of the circumstances represented are from 1559 to 1570. There is an edition of the work in Latin, but Dumesnil prefers giving the descriptions from that in French. Both are rare; a complete copy, without mutilation or disfigurement, exceedingly so. The work having passed through many editions, several of the copper-plates used in the earlier ones became weak and ineffective, and were replaced by wood-cuts by the same artists, or by others; those so replaced are of course of the greatest rarity. Dumesnil confesses that he has never met with a single copy of the work containing all the prints that he describes; and should such a perfect copy be found, it would be inappreciable. Malpé and Baverel attribute to Perrissin alone a series of Tritons and marine Monsters, small pieces lengthways, with his cipher reversed; these Dumesnil says he has not seen. For the marks used by both artists, either separately or in conjunction, see the article PERRISSIN.]

[TOSINI was the family name of the celebrated Frà Angelico da Fiesole. He was the second son of Pietro Tosini of Florence, and was named Guido. He was called di Fiesole because he was brought up in the convent of San Domenico di Fiesole, where he received the appellations of Giovanni dell'ordine de' Predicatori, Frà, or Frate Guido, il Beato Angelico, Giovanni-Angelino, il Frate Fiorentino, and Frà Giovanni Fiorentino. It is thought necessary to notice these different appellations as applied by various writers to one artist, lest when they occur they should be supposed to belong to several. This divine artist is shortly noticed in the article FIESOLE, as Frà Angelico da Fiesole. It is there supposed that he was living in 1452; but Zani quotes a document bearing the date 1457, which he conjectures refers to some work done by him in that year. He was also called Guidolino di Vicchio di Mugello, and Frater Johannes de Mugello. Every thing relating to him or his works, however trifling it may appear, deserves mention; as in this age of inquiry respecting early art, it may lead to some discovery of importance to its history.]

TOSS, J. The name of this artist is affixed to a spirited etching, representing the adoration of the Shepherds; after C. Hochfield.

TOURNIER, ROBERT, a French engraver, born at Caen in 1676. He engraved several of the plates for the architectural work by Antoine Desgodetz, entitled Les Edifices Antiques de Rome. He also executed a set of vases from the designs of Charles Errard, and some plates of Madonnas, after Guido. [See the next article.]

[TOURNIER, or TOURNIERE, ROBERT, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1676. He received his first instruction in painting from Lucas de la Haye, a Carmelite friar, but went young to Paris, and entered the school of Bon Boullongne. He became a good historical and portrait painter. In 1721 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Painting, and was made professor in 1735. He painted several large pictures for churches, and the portraits of some persons of distinction; but he preferred exercising his talent on smaller subjects, in which he imitated the manner of Gerard Dou and Godfrey Schalcken. He was a favourite with the regent duke of Orleans, who took great delight in seeing him paint. Several of his portraits, and other pictures, have been engraved by Drevet, Daullé, Sarabat, Chereau, and others. Zani, who places his birth in 1667, (probably a misprint for 1676,) marks him as an engraver; but there was another artist of the name of Tournier, who was of Toulouse. He had studied in Italy under Moses Valentin, whose manner he sometime followed. He was living in 1670, and etched after Guido, Polidore Caravaggio, and Errard, according to Füssli. It is probable that the two artists have been confounded. Zani calls the latter Gio-Giacomo, (Jean Jacques,) or M. G. When Robert Tournier grew old, having no relations at Paris, he returned to the place of his nativity, where he died, according to all accounts, in 1752. Some writers notice him under the name of Tourner, and others under that of Tournieres.]

TOWNLEY, CHARLES, an English mezzotinto engraver, by whom we have several portraits, and other subjects, executed in a superior manner. Among others are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Lionardo da Vinci; after a picture by himself.
Annibale Caracci; the same.
Domenichino; the same.
Peter Paul Rubens; the same.
Rembrandt; the same.
Sir Joshua Reynolds; the same.
Percival Pott, Surgeon, F. R. S.; after Reynolds.
Joseph Allen, M. D.; after Romney.
Sir Hyde Parker, Vice-Admiral; after the same.

SUBJECTS.

Agrippina weeping over the Tomb of Germanicus; after Cosway.

Bulls fighting; after Stubbs.

TRABALLES, FRANCESCO. According to Baglione, this artist was a native of Florence, and flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII. In the Chiesa de Greci, which was founded by that pope, are two altar-pieces by this painter, one representing the Annunciation, and the other Christ disputing with the Doctors.

TRABALLESE, GIULIO, [or GIULIANO,] an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence about the year 1728. He made the greater part of the designs for the collection of portraits of the illustrious men of Florence, which were engraved by Allegrini and others. We have several etchings by him, from the most eminent Bolognese painters; among which are the following:

The Communion of St. Jerome; after Agos. Caracci.
The Conversion of St. Paul; after L. Caracci.
St. Alo and St. Petronius kneeling before the Virgin; after Cavedone.
The Circumcision; after Guido.
The Communion of St. Catherine; after F. Brizzio.

[He was living in 1808.]

TRAINI, TRIANI, or TRIANO, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1400. He was the most distinguished disciple of Andrea Orcagna. Vasari mentions a picture by him, in the church of S. Caterina at Pisa, representing S. Tommaso d'Aquino, which, in point of composition, colouring, and effect, surpassed the works of his master.

[Of this picture Rosini has given a print in his "Storia della Pittura Italiana," (plate 20,) in which St. Thomas appears seated in the centre, having several open books on his knees. Above him, to the right and left, are figures of Moses, St. Paul, and the Four Evangelists, and in a more elevated position, in the centre, that of the Saviour, from whom rays of light are descending on the head of the Saint; similar rays of inspiration descend on the heads of the other six, each of whom holds the volume of his writings open to St. Thomas, and from these additional rays proceed to enlighten his understanding. These rays altogether form a triangle. St. Thomas is seated in the middle of seven concentric circles; on his right is Aristotle, and on his left Plato, each holding an open book towards him, and rays descend from the Saint to illuminate their pages. Below is the figure of Averroes recumbent, his book open but turned down; it is, however, favoured with a ray. On each side of Averroes is a group of monks and pious females, each distinguished in a similar manner; among them is one with his head covered, evidently not of the priestly order and is probably the portrait of the painter. This is supposed to be the only remaining specimen of the master's works, though there are two others recorded; a portrait of St. Dominic, with six small subjects from his life on the predella, painted for the same church as the picture of St. Thomas Aquinas, and the banner of the fraternity della Laude, painted for the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Pisa, in 1341. Zani notes him as a portrait painter also; marks him B. B. and says he operated in 1390.]

TRAMAZZINO, FRANCO. This artist is noticed by Florent le Comte as the engraver of a print, representing a solemn entry into the city of Rome, which he speaks of as scarce. [He operated in 1561.]

[TRAMULLES, FRANCISCO, was born at Perpignan at the commencement of the 18th century. He was the son of a Catalonian sculptor, who was employed at the time in the cathedral of Perpignan. He was first sent to Paris to study painting, and afterwards to Barcelona to the school of the elder Viladomat. As he advanced in years he devoted his attention to the study of the works of the old masters at Madrid, where he remained about two years copying their pictures. On his return to Barcelona he opened a school of design, and obtained a great number of scholars. His reputation having reached Perpignan, he was employed to paint three large pictures for the cathedral there, representing the espousals of St. Julian and Sta. Basilsa, patrons of that city, St. Augustine writing, and St. Peter's Repentance. These pictures elicited great applause. He painted others for the city of Gerona, and for the churches and convents of Barcelona. He died in the latter city, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, and was buried with great pomp in the convent of S. Francisco, at the expense of his scholars, by whom he was much beloved. In his style of painting he made Luca Giordano his model, perhaps from seeing so many by that master at Madrid; but his pictures are well composed and have a good effect.]

[TRAMULLES, MANUEL, born at Barcelona in 1715, was the younger brother of Francisco. Like him, he studied under Antonio de Viladomat, whose manner he so closely imitated that their works may be confounded. This, however, is only with respect to those of his earlier time, as he afterwards attempted to introduce a new mode of colouring, which was less agreeable, and consequently inferior to that of his master. Like his brother, he opened a school, but for painting from the living model, which was frequented by many scholars. He was very studious, and very patient in his manner of teaching. The Marquis de la Mina patronized and employed him to decorate the Opera House at Barcelona; and the chapter of Barcelona commissioned him to paint six pictures for the sanctuary, in which is placed the body of S. Olegario; and also a large picture, containing numerous figures, of Charles III. taking possession of the canon's stall in the cathedral, which pertains to the kings of Spain. He distinguished himself by his perspectives in the church of Sta. Maria del Mar, and his monuments in that of Semana santa de S. Pedro de las Puellas in the same city. He died the 3rd of July, 1791. His chief works are in the churches and convents at Barcelona; and there are a few of his pictures at Tarragona and Gerona.]

TRASI, LODOVICO. This painter was born at Ascola in 1634, and was a scholar of Andrea Sac-chi, at the same time with Carlo Maratti; he afterwards became the disciple of his fellow student. In his easel pictures he resembles the style of Maratti; but in his larger works and altar-pieces he imitated the less laboured and more spirited manner of Sacchi. Such is his fine picture of S. Niccolo, in the church of S. Cristoforo, at Ascola, which is esteemed one of his best works. In the cathedral are some frescoes by him, of which the most admired is the Martyrdom of S. Emidio. [He died about 1694.]

[TRAVERSE, CHARLES FRANÇOIS DE LA, born at Paris, was a scholar of Boucher. He was sent to Rome with a pension from the crown to pursue his studies for six years; he afterwards went to Naples to explore the excavations at Herculaneum; from thence he passed with the Marquis D'Osson to Madrid, and resided in the Spanish capital for many years. He was not employed on any public work, but painted many small pictures for individuals. These consisted of landscapes and flower-pieces, which he painted more in accordance with the style of the Flemish than the Spanish schools, especially in colour. He painted an allegory in honour of the birth of an Infant of Spain, which was engraved by Carmona, but it did not procure him any royal favour. He returned to Paris, where he died in 1778.]

TRAVI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Sestri, in the Genoese territory, in 1613. On account of his deafness, he is generally known by the name of Il Sordo di Sestri. He was originally a colour-grinder to Bernardo Strozzi, who instructed him in design, and he afterwards studied landscape painting under Godfrey de Wael, a Flemish painter of some celebrity. He acquired considerable reputation in that branch of the art, and painted a great number of pictures at Genoa, and in the state, which possess sufficient merit to find a place in the best collections. He died in 1668. [He had a son named Antonio, who was also a landscape painter; he survived his father.]

[TRAUT, W———. A wood print, representing Niccolo, detto il cieco da Pistoia, seated by an old woman who is blowing a flute, which he holds in his hands; signed W. Traut Sc. F. Villamena Invent. There are four Latin and four German verses at bottom. An impression was in the collection of the late Mr. Lloyd. Perhaps this is the same as William Trautner, a German designer and engraver.]

TREMOLLIÈRE, PETER CHARLES, a French painter, born at Chollet, in Poitou, in 1703. He was sent to Paris when he was young, where he became a scholar of John Baptist Vanloo, under whom his progress was remarkable. Having gained several prizes at the Academy, he was sent to Rome, under the pension of the king, where he studied six years. On his return from Italy he resided some time at Lyons, where he painted three pictures for the church of the Carmelites, representing the Nativity, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Presentation in the Temple, which gained him considerable reputation. In 1734 he returned to Paris, and in 1737 was made a member of the Academy there, on which occasion he painted, as his picture of reception, Ulysses shipwrecked on the Island of Calypso. He painted several historical and fabulous subjects for the Hotel de Soubise, and was engaged to prepare the cartoons for a set of tapestry for the king, representing the Four Ages of the World, but he died of a consumption in 1739. Tremolliere was considered as one of the most promising artists of his country at the time at which he lived. He possessed an extensive genius; his compositions were noble and judicious, and his design graceful and correct. He etched a set of studies, after Watteau, and had commenced the seven Works of Mercy, from his own designs, but he only lived to finish two of them.

TRENTO, ANTONIO DA. This artist was born at Trent, in the Venetian states, about the year 1508. He studied painting for some time under Parmigiano, but, by the recommendation of that master, he afterwards devoted himself to the art of engraving on wood, in the manner called chiaroscuro. It is supposed that he was instructed in the process by Ugo da Carpi, to whom the invention of it is attributed. He executed several cuts from the designs of Parmigiano, which are justly esteemed. He generally used three blocks to each print; the first for the outline, the second for the dark shadows, and the last for the demitint. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

The Virgin embracing the infant Jesus; after Beccafumi.
The Holy Family; after A. del Sarto.

The Decollation of St. Peter and St. Paul; after Parmigiano.

The Tiburtine Sibyl showing the Virgin and the infant Christ to the Emperor Augustus; after the same.

Circe receiving the Companions of Ulysses; after the same.

Psyche saluted by the People with the Honours of Divinity; after the same. [Salviati.]

[Bartsch is of opinion that Antonio da Trento and Antonio Fantuzzi are identical; Zani thinks differently, and in several parts of his "Enciclopedia delle belle Arti," particularly in the notes to Antonio Cavalli and Antonio Fantuzzi, combats that opinion. It would not be satisfactory to an inquirer to have an abridgment of the discussion between these two learned critical investigators, and of others who have mingled in the dispute; it can only, therefore, be recommended to peruse both, and to decide according to the weight of evidence. It is agreed that Antonio Fantuzzi and Antonio da Trento flourished about the same period, that is to say, from 1530 to 1545; though it is contended that one was of Bologna, and the other of Trent. It is said that Fantuzzi, who worked under the direction of Parmigiano, absconded from his master, at the same time carrying with him many of his drawings, etchings, and wood-cuts, with which he went to France and connected himself with Primaticcio at Fontainebleau, who engaged him to engrave some of his works on copper. Among the thirty-seven prints described by Bartsch, and attributed by him to Fantuzzi, there are several with signatures that corroborate this statement. Still there are circumstances that strongly incline to the other side. For an account of the prints in chiaroscuro, attributed to Antonio da Trento, see Bartsch, tom. xii.; and for the etchings by Antonio Fantuzzi, see tom. xvi.]

TRESHAM, HENRY, R. A. This estimable artist was a native of Ireland, and received his first instruction in the rudiments of the art in the academy of Mr. West, in Dublin. He afterwards came to England, where he was for some time employed in drawing small portraits, when he was favoured with the patronage of Lord Cawdor, and was invited to accompany that nobleman in his travels to Italy. During a residence of fourteen years on the continent, chiefly at Rome, he prosecuted his studies with great success, and returned a correct and elegant designer. He had distinguished himself by several designs for the principal publications of the time, when Mr. Boydell formed his prodigious project of illustrating the works of Shakspeare with prints engraved from pictures painted by the most eminent artists of the British school.

Mr. Tresham was engaged to contribute the exertion of his talents to that great undertaking. The subjects allotted to him were three scenes from the play of Antony and Cleopatra; and it is only a just tribute to his abilities to allow that he acquitted himself in a manner which merited and received the public approbation.

Soon after Mr. Tresham's return from Italy, his health became considerably impaired, and for several years previous to his death he was reduced to a state of feebleness and infirmity which incapacitated him from attempting any arduous undertaking; but his mind was not less alive to the interest of the art, which, to the last, was the chief object of his solicitude.

Mr. Tresham was not less distinguished by the amiable qualities of his heart, than for the elegance of his taste as an artist; and he was equally beloved by a large circle of friends, as he was respected by his brother academicians. He died in 1814.

[Tresham was a better designer than painter. His subjects are well composed, and exhibit much of the Italian gusto. On his return from Rome he was connected with several other gentlemen picture-dealers, and he had a gallery for exhibition, in which the connoisseurs of the day might find Correggios, Raphaels, and Carraccis always ready for sale. Many of these have since changed their high-sounding names, as the knowledge of masters has increased. He superintended a work of engravings from pictures by the old masters, and for which he wrote the descriptions. It is entitled the "British Gallery," and was completed in 1818. The coloured copies form, perhaps, the most exquisite volume which has ever illustrated pictorial art. These were published singly at six guineas the plate; so the whole number, twenty-five, amounted to one hundred and fifty guineas. See H. G. Bohn's Catalogue. He also wrote some light poetry, of which it was difficult to pick out the meaning, except when it was too broad to be mistaken, as in that on "Antique Rings."]]

[TREV, CATHERINE, a painter of fruit and flower-pieces, was the daughter of a painter of the name of Marquard Treu, of whom but little is known, and was born in 1747. There are pictures by her in the Dusseldorf Gallery. She was probably a native of Germany.]]

TREVU, MARTIN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1540. He was contemporary with John Sebald Beham, and Henry Aldegrever, and, from the small size of his prints, is generally placed among what are called the little masters. His plates are engraved from his own designs, and they prove him to have been a man of genius, though inferior to the artists above mentioned in the clearness and precision of the execution, and in the correctness of his drawing. His compositions are judiciously arranged, in which he appears to have studied the style of Lucas van Leyden. He sometimes marked his plates with the initials M. T. with the date, and sometimes with a monogram composed of those letters, thus, M. He engraved a variety of moral and emblematical subjects; and, among others, we have the following prints by him:

A set of six small prints, called the Progress of the Prodigal; dated from 1541 to 1543.
Two Figures playing on Musical Instruments.

[There is no account of an artist of this name; it is merely a conjecture of Christ in his Dictionary of Monograms. Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. ix., has described forty-two pieces by the artist who used the mark M. but Brulliot considers the list incomplete. It will be seen in the descriptions that some of his pieces cannot be classed among the moralities. The following is an abridgment:

1. The Judgment of Solomon; dated 1540.
2. The five wise Virgins; same date.
- 3—14. The History of the Prodigal Son; 1541—1543.
- 15—23. Peasants dancing. As these pieces are marked consecutively, it seems there should be twelve; nine only are described; the date on one is 1542. Some of the pieces are pretty free.
- 24—35. Persons of Condition dancing. Four of the suite are not described. The first impressions have the date 1542; on the second it is altered to 1543. The freedoms are more en règle.
36. The Surprise; a peasant finding his wife in the arms of a monk; dated 1640.
37. La polissonerie. Two women (femmes perdues) holding a youth on a bench while a third is emptying a pitcher of water sur le derrière; 1540.
38. The ill-used Husband. A woman, wearing breeches, is beating her husband with a stick, and dragging him by the hair of his head.
39. An ornamental design.
40. Another with two heads of Satyrs.
41. Design for a sheath for a knife, on which is a youth embracing a lady; date 1540.
42. A Poniard in its sheath, on which is a gentleman with a hawk on his left hand, and a lady with a little dog in her arms; 1540.

The two last are of much larger dimensions than the rest, which are all small. Malpe, who assigns to this engraver the mark M. attributes to him thirteen larger pieces of Christ and his Apostles; but there is no certainty in the matter.]]

TREVIGI, or TREVISI, GIROLAMO DA. This painter was born at Trevigi in 1508. He went to Rome when he was very young, and formed a correct and graceful style of design, by studying the works of Raffaele, and the best masters of the Roman school. He afterwards resided some time at Bologna, where he painted several pictures for the churches, of which the most esteemed were a series of pictures in S. Petronio, representing the Life of S. Antonio di Padoua; and the Presentation of the Virgin, in the church of S. Salvatore. According to Ridolfi, he afterwards visited England, in the reign of Henry VIII., and was employed by that monarch as a painter, an architect, and a military engineer. He attended the king in his expedition into Picardy, and assisted at the siege of Boulogne, where he was killed, in 1544.

[According to Zani the name of this painter was Pennachi, or Pennachio. He was the son of Pier-Maria Pennachi of Trevigi, and born about 1496. He was an artist of considerable talent; he painted portraits in the admirable manner of Raphael. The series of pictures representing the miracles of St. Francis, in the church of S. Petronio, are in chiaroscuro. The late Mr. Edward Solly possessed a picture by him of the Virgin seated on a throne with the Infant standing before her; angels with musical instruments above; saints on each side, and the patron, for whom it was painted, kneeling at the foot: signed HIERONIMUS. TREVISIUS. P. It was formerly in the church of St. Salvatore, (the catalogue says St. Domenico,) at Bologna; it is now in the collection of Lord Northwick. Vasari mentions it as "la migliore delle cose sue." One of his pictures (probably a portrait) is inscribed F. Sabba Cast.

Preceptore. Hier. Tarvis. Pict. Faciebat, 1533. He was also called Girolamo da Trivigi Juniore, to distinguish him from Girolamo da Aviani, who was likewise of Trevigi: the latter died about 1496, the supposed time of the former's birth.]

TREVILLIAN, WILLIAM. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of Oliver Cromwell's Porter, dated 1650.

TREVISANI, CAVALIERE FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Trevigi in 1656. He was the son of Antonio Trevisani, an architect of some reputation, by whom he was instructed in the first rudiments of design. He afterwards became the disciple of Antonio Zanchi, at Venice. He afterwards visited Rome, where he renounced his first principles, and adopted those of the most popular artists then resident in that city, where he was favoured with the patronage of Cardinal Chigi, who employed him in several considerable works, and recommended him to the protection of Pope Clement XI., who not only commissioned him to paint one of the Prophets in St. John of Lateran, but engaged him to ornament the cupola of the cathedral at Urbino, where he represented, in fresco, emblematical subjects of the four Quarters of the World, in which he displayed great invention and ingenuity. The churches and public edifices at Rome abound with his works, of which the most esteemed are, his picture of the Death of St. Joseph, in the church of the Roman College; the Virgin contemplating the Instruments of the Passion, in S. Maria, in Vallicella; and his picture of Antony and Cleopatra, in the Palazzo Spada, painted as a companion to the Rape of Helen, by Guido. He possessed an extraordinary talent of imitating the style of the old masters, in which he was much employed by the Duke of Modena, in copying the works of Coreggio, Parmigiano, and other distinguished painters. He died in 1746.

[There are different accounts of the birth-place of Cavaliere Trevisani; some say he was born at Rome, others at Castel Franco, or at Capo d'Istria. It appears, however, that he took refuge in Rome to avoid the anger of the relations of a Venetian lady whom he had clandestinely married. He possessed great versatility of talent in his art; he was equally skilful in the lower as well as the higher departments. He painted history, portraits, architecture, landscape, and even objects of still-life, with the same degree of excellence. His works were much coveted, and he was constantly employed. He received the honour of knighthood, it would seem, not for his original productions, but for the copies he made for the Duke of Modena of pictures by Correggio, Parmigiano, and Paul Veronese. His compositions are generally abundant in figures; the forms graceful, the handling free, and the colouring clear and rich, partaking both of the Flemish and Venetian schools, but not with the brilliancy of either.]

TREVISANI, ANGELO, was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1750. Though he occasionally painted historical subjects, in which he has given proof of considerable ability in his altarpiece in the church of la Carità, and other pictures in the public edifices at Venice; he was more esteemed and more employed as a portrait painter, by which he acquired both fame and fortune.

TRIERE, P. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1780. He engraved several plates representing historical subjects and conversations, which are neatly executed with the graver.

TRINGHAM. This artist is noticed by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a portrait of the Reverend Samuel Clark, and several book-plates. He flourished about the year 1750.

TRISTAN, LUIS, a Spanish painter, born at a village near Toledo in 1594. He was a scholar of Dominico Teotocopoli, called Il Greco, under whose tuition he became an eminent artist, and is said by Palomino to have surpassed his master in the correctness of his design and the purity of his taste. This superiority, so far from exciting any jealousy on the part of his master, he was one of the first to applaud his talents, and brought them into practice and display, with all the advantages in his power. The monks of La Sisla, in the neighbourhood of Toledo, had applied to Dominico Greco for a picture of the Last Supper; he was under the necessity of declining the commission, on account of indisposition, but recommended his pupil, Luis Tristan, to the undertaking, whose services were accepted. On the delivery of the picture, the monks were satisfied with the performance, but considered the price demanded for it, of two hundred ducats, as exorbitant, and it was agreed to refer the matter to Dominico. Having deliberately surveyed the picture, he turned to his disciple with a menacing tone and air, and upbraided him with depreciating his talents, by demanding for his work a recompence so unequal to its merit; directing him to roll up his picture, and offering himself five hundred ducats for it. The fathers made the due atonement, and the money was paid. Some of his most esteemed works are in the cathedral, and the church of St. Clara, at Toledo. It is no mean proof of the respectability of his talents, that the celebrated Velasquez professed himself his admirer, and quitting the precepts of Pacheco, his instructor, formed his style from the works of Tristan. He died at Toledo in 1649. [According to Bermudez, Luis Tristan was born in 1586, and died in 1640. He painted a series of pictures, which are considered his masterpieces, for the church of Yepes, in 1616, when he was in his thirtieth year; and in 1619, the portrait of Cardinal Sandoval, Archbishop of Toledo, in which he united the elaborate execution of Sanchez Coello with much of the spirit of Titian. The churches of Toledo possess many of his pictures, and others are to be found at Madrid.]

TRIVA, ANTONIO. According to Tiraboschi, this painter was born at Reggio in 1626, [or 1627,] and studied under Guercino, at Bologna. He was a reputable painter of history, and distinguished himself by some pictures he painted for the churches at Reggio and Piacenza, which have been celebrated by the poet Boschini. He was invited to the court of the Elector of Bavaria, in whose service he died in 1699. [He was ambidexter, and painted as well with his left hand as with his right. He etched cleverly. Bartsch has described four etchings by him, which he says are carefully executed. The following are the titles: 1. Susanna and the Elders. 2. A Repose in Egypt. 3. The Virgin, half-length, seated, holding the infant Jesus in her arms. 4. An Allegory; a young Man looking in a Mirror, and seeing Voluptuousness, the Furies, and Death; and other emblems. All these are signed with his name. Füssli mentions five more; four views in Italy, and a frontispiece to a book. It represents a genius in the air, carrying a large packet, on which is inscribed, Schediasmata accademica Passarini.]

TROGER, PAUL, a German painter and engraver, born at Zell, in the bishopric of Brixen, in 1695.

After acquiring the rudiments of design in his native town, he visited Fiume, and became a scholar of Dom. Giuseppe Alberti. He afterwards established himself at Vienna, where he acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history, and was made director of the Imperial Academy. We have several spirited etchings of historical subjects and landscapes by this artist, from his own designs. Among others are the following :

The Holy Family; Paul Troger, fec. 1721.
St. Joseph embracing the infant Jesus.
The Dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin.
Six Landscapes, with ruins and figures.

[He was born in 1698, and died in 1777.]

TRONCHON, [A. R.,] a modern French engraver, who flourished [from 1740 to] about the year 1760. He engraved several plates after Noel Nicholas Coypel, and other masters.

TROOST, CORNELIUS. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1697, and was a scholar of Arnold Boonen. He occasionally painted conversations and gallant subjects, in a pleasing style, and acquired the appellation of the Dutch Watteau; but he also distinguished himself as a portrait painter, and was much employed in painting large pictures for the halls of the different companies at Amsterdam. Of these, the most considerable is a picture in the College of Physicians, containing the portraits of the most eminent practitioners of the time; and another in Surgeons' Hall, representing the principal members of that corporation. He painted in crayons as well as in oil, and his works are highly esteemed in Holland. He died in 1750. We have a few prints by this artist, chiefly executed in mezzotint; among which are the following :

The Portrait of Pietro Locatelli, Painter.
The Bust of an old Man with a Beard. 1734.
A Girl drawing by the Light of a Lamp.
[A Woman on the Steps of a Door, holding a light, and taking leave of a Gentleman in black.]

[Cornelius Troost was formerly called the Dutch Watteau, but of late it has been discovered that his pictures in their treatment bear a greater resemblance to those of Hogarth; strictly speaking, he resembles neither, except that in some instances his subjects are analogous. He does not exhibit the grace and elegance of the French artist, nor the keen, discriminating, satirical humour of the English. His pictures are, however, true to nature, and faithfully portray the enjoyments of high and low life, according to the customs and manners of the people of Holland in his day. They are more prized by his countrymen than by others; but his drawings in colours are in more general esteem. The late Baron Verstolk de Soelen, the Dutch minister of state, possessed a great number, most of them excellent artistic performances. They were disposed of by public sale at Amsterdam in 1847, with the rest of his large collection of fine drawings and prints. SARA, the daughter of Cornelius Troost, painted portraits in oil, and made drawings of several of her father's pictures of subjects from private life. She died about 1793.]

[TROOST, WILLIAM, a portrait and landscape painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1684, and was a scholar of John Glauber. He went to Dusseldorf, where he married the daughter of J. Van Nikkelen, the painter to the court, and was employed in painting the portraits of many persons of distinction. He afterwards returned to his own country, where he occasionally painted portraits, but chiefly devoted his time to landscapes, both in oil and Indian ink; the latter are considered valuable. His style in landscape partakes of that of his first master, Glauber. His wife, Jacoba Maria Van Nikkelen, was also a painter; she had been a scholar of Vander Myn, and excelled in painting fruit and flower-pieces.]

[TROOSTWYK, WOUTER JAN, (Walter John,) a landscape and cattle painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1782. He studied drawing under Anthony Andriessen, and painting under Juriaan Andriessen. He commenced by copying the works of the best Dutch masters in the department which he had selected; but afterwards was indignant if he heard his works compared with those of Paul Potter, Karel Du Jardin, or Adrian Vandevelde, asserting that, like them, he had made nature his model. His pictures, however, have a resemblance to the works of those masters, and some are worthy to rank with them. He died in 1810. He had a full estimate of his own merits. Having obtained the prize given by the society called Felix Meritis for the best landscape, he resolved not to enter the lists again, declaring that he would not in any way injure others, who ought to live by their art. Was this good-will or arrogance?]

TROSCHEL, HANS, or JOHN, a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1620. He was a disciple of Peter Isselbourg, but afterwards studied in Italy under Francesco Villamena. His style of engraving is, however, very inferior to that of Villamena, both in drawing and execution, and his plates, though neatly engraved, are stiff and laboured. He engraved several emblematical subjects from the designs of various Italian masters, as well as frontispieces and other book-plates; together with some portraits; among which is one inscribed, Fortunius Licetus, Philosoph. He frequently marked his plates with a cipher composed of an H.

and a T., thus, HT. [He was born about 1592, and died in 1633. He sometimes added the figure of a thrush to his monogram, in allusion to his name.]

TROSCHEL, P. This artist was probably a relation of the engraver mentioned in the preceding article. He resided at Nuremberg about the year 1650, and appears to have been chiefly employed by the booksellers. He engraved some frontispieces and other book ornaments, which are executed with the graver in an indifferent style. He usually marked his plates with the initials P. T. [He was called Peter Paul; he flourished as late as 1661.]

TROSCHEL, JAMES. Professor Christ mentions an engraver of this name, to whom he attributes, as his mark, the initials I. T. F. [He was also a painter. He was born in 1583, and died in 1624.]

TROST, ANDREW. According to Professor Christ, this engraver was a native of Carniola, and flourished about the year 1680. He usually marked his plates with the cipher A. [He was also a painter of familiar subjects. He was living in 1695.]

TROST, C. See TROOST.

TROTTI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI BATISTA, called IL MALOSSO. This painter was born at Cremona in 1555, and was brought up in the school of Bernardino Campi, of whom he was the most distinguished disciple. He was employed by the court of Parma, in conjunction with Agostino Caracci; and though the works of the latter were preferred, Agostino allowed that he had found in Trotti "a hard bone to crack," on which account he acquired the name of Il Malosso. He did not attach himself to the style of Bernardino Campo, but studied the works of Coreggio, and imitated the gay and brilliant manner of Bernardo Gatti, called Il Sojaro, the most successful follower of the style of that great master. The airs of his heads are graceful and expressive, like those of Il Sojaro; but he was apt to repeat himself, and there is frequently a sameness both in his characters and attitudes; a defect which ought perhaps to be attributed to negligence and despatch, as he cannot be accused of sterility of invention; of this he has given ample proof in the pictures he painted for the churches of S. Francesco and S. Agostino, at Piacenza, and in the other public places, representing the Conception of the Virgin, which subject he has treated with a varied originality of idea, which evinces the most extensive capacity of invention. His most esteemed works, and those for which he received the order of knighthood, are his frescoes in the cupola of S. Abbondio, and in the Palazzo del Giordani, at Parma. One of his last works was a picture of a Pietà, in the church of S. Giovanni Novo, at Cremona, which bears the date 1607. [Perhaps it was from a desire to perpetuate this acknowledgment of his ability by Agostino Carracci, that he inscribed one of his pictures Jo. Baptistæ Trottus dictus Malossus Cremon. faciēbat an. a partu Virginis, 1594. His family also seem to have been proud of the appellation, as his nephew, Il Cavaliere Euclide Trothi, who was a painter, adopted it. He painted contemporaneously with his uncle.]

TROUVAIN, ANTHONY, a French engraver, born at Montdidier in 1666. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with great neatness and dexterity, and his prints produce a very pleasing effect. If he was not a pupil of Bernard Picart, he appears to have been an imitator of his style. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Peter Daniel Huet, Bishop of Avranches. 1695.
Francis le Bouthellier, Bishop of Troyes.
John Pesne, Painter and Engraver. 1698.
René Anthony Houasse, Painter; after Torbæat.
John Jouvenet, Painter; after a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS.

The Annunciation; after Carlo Maratti.
Christ restoring Sight to the Blind; after Ant. Coypel.
The Marriage of Mary of Medicis with Henry IV., and the Minority of Louis XIII.; after the pictures by Rubens in the Luxembourg Gallery.
Silenus drunk; after Ant. Coypel. [From the sixth Pastoral of Virgil.]

[He operated in 1707.]

TROY, FRANCIS DE. This artist was born at Toulouse in 1645. He was the son of Nicholas de Troy, a painter of little celebrity, from whom he received the first rudiments of design; but he was sent to Paris when he was young, where he became a disciple of Nicholas Loir, and for some time applied himself to the study of historical painting, and had made sufficient progress to become a member of the Academy at Paris, in 1674, on which occasion he painted for his picture of reception Mercury and Argus. The brilliant success of Claude Le Fevre as a portrait painter, induced him to abandon historical subjects, and attach himself to the more lucrative and more certain branch of painting portraits, in which he became one of the most celebrated artists of the French school. One of his principal public works is a large picture, in the church of St. Genevieve, representing the magistrates of Paris invoking the protection of that saint. For the Hotel of the Duke de Maine, he painted an admired picture of Æneas relating his Adventures to Dido. He was sent by Louis XIV. to the court of Munich, to paint the portrait of Maria Christina, of Bavaria, afterwards Dauphiness of France, which was placed in the gallery of Apollo. The portrait of Francis de Troy, painted by himself, is in the gallery of artists at Florence. He died at Paris in 1730. [There is a very rare etching by him of the Catalfalque for the funeral of Maria Teresa, the wife of Louis XIV., which took place in 1683. On the right, at bottom, is inscribed Troy, J.]

TROY, JOHN FRANCIS DE, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1676. After receiving the instruction of his father, until he had made considerable progress in the art, he travelled to Italy, where he studied some years, and soon after his return to Paris was made a member of the Academy. He was employed by Louis XIV., for whom he painted a series of cartoons for tapestry, representing the history of Esther; and several large allegorical subjects for the Hotel de Ville. The king appointed him director of the French Academy at Rome, where he resided great part of his life, and acquitted himself, in the administration of his office, in the most respectable manner. The king conferred on him the order of St. Michael, and honoured him with other marks of his particular esteem. He was not less distinguished as a painter of portraits than historical subjects. He died in 1752. [Some place his birth in 1679.]

TROYA, FELIX, a Spanish painter, born at San Felipe, near Valencia, in 1660. He was a disciple of Gaspar de la Huerta, and painted history with considerable reputation. His pictures are found in almost every church or public edifice in the district of Spain in which he resided, and are more remarkable for vigour of colouring than correctness of design. His most esteemed works are in the church of S. Agostino, at Valencia, where he died in 1731.

TROYEN, JOHN VAN. This artist was a native of the Netherlands, and flourished about the year 1650. He engraved some of the plates from the pictures in the collection of the Archduke Leopold, commonly called Teniers' Gallery. They are slightly executed, and the drawing is incorrect. Among others are the following:

The Daughter of Herodias with the Head of St. John; after L. da Vinci.
Magdalene penitent; after Coreggio.
Christ healing the Sick; after P. Veronese.
The Adoration of the Magi; after the same.
The Entombing of Christ; after Pordenone.

TROYEN, ROMBOUT VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp about the year 1600. It is not known by whom he was first instructed in the art, but in the Chronological Tables, by Harms, it is said that he went to Italy, where he studied some time. He distinguished himself as a painter of the ruins of ancient architecture and other interesting objects, in the neighbourhood of Rome, which he embellished with figures representing subjects of history or the fable. His pictures bear some resemblance to those of Cuylenburg, and, like the works of that artist, they have darkened considerably since they were painted. His cabinet pictures are preferable to those of a larger size. He died in 1650. [It is said, by Balkema, that he had never visited Italy, but painted the views from his own imagination, and that with the greatest truth. He painted portraits; for Suyderhoef engraved one after him. He lived and died at Amsterdam.]

TRUCHI. This artist was a native of France, but resided in London in 1730, and, in conjunction with William Philip Benoit, engraved a set of twelve plates of subjects taken from the novel of Pamela, from the designs of Higmore. [There were two engravers of the name Truchi; one signed D., or Dominic, the other L. Truchi; they lived at the same period, and their merits were equal.]

[TRUCHOT ———, a French painter of landscapes and architectural views, of whom there is little known but his works; he died about 1823. Among his recorded pictures are, a view of Canterbury Cathedral; view of St. Michael's Mount, in Normandy; Abelard reading a Letter from Eloisa, and Eloisa in Prayer before an Altar; the Grand Staircase of the Palais Royale; Henry, Count de Bouchage in a Cloister; interiors of several churches and chapels, and views of ancient ruins in various parts of France. Some of his pictures have figures by Xavier Le Prince.]

TSCHERNINGK, D., [DAVID,] a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1639. He engraved several frontispieces and other book-plates, which are executed with the graver in a very indifferent style.

TSCHERNINGK, JOHN. This artist was probably of the same family with the preceding engraver. He engraved some portraits and other book ornaments in a neat but formal style. [There were two of the name, father and son; the elder operated in 1634, the younger was living in 1685. They were publishers as well as engravers. A portrait painter of the name Andrew, probably of the same family, lived in 1660.]

TUCARRI, GIOVANNI. According to Hackert, this artist was born at Messina in 1667, and was the son of an obscure painter, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of design. He excelled in painting battles and skirmishes, and possessed such extraordinary facility of execution, that the number of his pictures is almost incredible. There are many of his works in Germany, where they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1743.

TULDEN. See THULDEN.

TURA, [OR TURRA,] COSIMO, called COSME DA FERRARA. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1406, and was a disciple of Galasso Galassi. He painted sacred subjects in the dry Gothic style which prevailed at the time at which he lived. Several of his works remain in the churches and public edifices at Ferrara, of which a particular account is given by Cesare Barotti, in his Pittura e Sculture di Ferrara. He was also much employed in illuminating missals; and his oil pictures are finished with the laboured minuteness of miniature. Borso d'Este, Duke of Ferrara, employed him in the decoration of one of the apartments in his palace, where he painted the Twelve Months of the Year, in fresco, which are mentioned by Baruffaldi as very masterly performances for that early period. Of his altar-pieces, the most worthy of notice are, his pictures of the Annunciation and the Nativity, in the cathedral; and Christ praying in the Garden, at the Cappuccini. He died in 1469. [One of his pictures, a Madonna and Saints, under splendid, but overloaded, architecture, is in the Berlin Museum. — Kugler. In Rosini, Storia della Pittura Italiana, tom. iii., is an outline of a Madonna and Bambino, which is sufficiently chaste in all respects.]

TURCHI, ALESSANDRO, called L'ORBETTO.

D'Argenville, and the other French biographers, who have been followed by Mr. Pilkington, date the birth of this artist in 1600, and at the same time assert that he was a disciple of Felice Riccio, called Brusasorci, who died in 1605. This infraction of the order of chronology is to be repaired by a reference to the more authentic evidence of the Italian writers on art, and we find, on the authority of Passeri and Il Padre Andrea Pozzo, that he was born at Verona in 1582, and died at Rome in 1648. He acquired the name of L'Orbetto, from his having been occupied, when a boy, in the humble station of conductor to a blind beggar. In this lowly condition he was noticed by Brusasorci, who discovered in him so decided a disposition for the art, that he took him under his protection, and with the assistance of his instruction, in a few years he surpassed his master. On leaving the school of Riccio, he went to Venice, where he studied some time under Carlo Cagliari, and acquired a chaste and natural style of colouring. To improve himself in design, he afterwards visited Rome, and by studying the works of the best masters of that school, he formed a style peculiarly his own, in which he attempted to combine the Roman taste of design with Venetian colouring. In competition with Andrea Sacchi and Pietro da Cortona, he painted some pictures in the church of la Concezione, which were not discreditable to his talents as a rival. He painted several other altar-pieces for the churches at Rome, of which the most esteemed are, a picture of the Flight into Egypt, in the church of St. Romualdo; the Holy Family, in St. Lorenzo in Lucina; and St. Carlo Borromeo, in S. Salvatore in Lauro. He was much employed on cabinet pictures, representing historical subjects, which he frequently painted on black marble. His best performances, however, are at Verona, and of these the most worthy of notice are, his picture of the Forty Martyrs, in the church of St. Stefano; and a Pietà, in the church of La Misericordia, in which he appears to have emulated the great style of the Caracci, in the grandeur of the composition, the admirable expression of the heads, and the impressive solemnity of the colouring.

TURCO, CESARE. According to Dominici, this artist was born at Naples, about the year 1510. He was first a disciple of Giovanni Antonio d'Amato, but he afterwards studied under Andrea Sabbatini, called da Salerno. He painted history with considerable reputation, and there are several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Naples, particularly an altar-piece, in the church of S. Maria delle Grazie, representing the Baptism of Christ by St. John; and a picture of the Circumcision in the church del Gesu. He died in 1560.

TURK, the ———. See LIOTARD.

[TURPIN, PIERRE JEAN FRANÇOIS, painter of natural history in water-colours, was born in 1775, and had no instructor but nature and his own application. He made upwards of six thousand drawings in water-colours on vellum, which have been engraved by Scellier, Plee, Bouquet, Coutant, Massard, and others, for works on natural history. Among those which they illustrate may be named, the Travels of Humboldt and Bompland; the great work on Egypt; the plants of New Caledonia; Les Icones de M. Decandolle; L'Iconographie Vegetale; L'Atlas du Dictionnaire des Sciences Naturelles; and Duhamel's beautifully illustrated treatise on Fruit Trees. This clever and industrious artist was living in 1831.]

TUSCHER, M. [MARCUS.] This artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1743. He painted conversations and dramatic subjects, and etched some plates from his own designs, among which is a theatrical scene, spiritedly executed, bearing the date 1743. [Marcus Tuschler was an excellent engraver and designer. He was born at Nuremberg in 1706, the natural son of a lace-maker, and was brought up in the hospital for orphans, in that city. He was afterwards placed under J. D. Preisler, with whom he remained about ten years, and evinced great talent for drawing and composition. From the school of Preisler he went to Rome, and was employed by Stosch for two years. It is also said that he worked in France and in Holland. It is very probable that he was in England also, as in the edition of Norden's Travels in Egypt and Nubia, published at London in 1757, there are some plates by him, one of which is inscribed F. L. Norden del. M. T. fecit, 1748. Most of his plates are marked with his name in full, and consist of historical subjects, portraits, vignettes, and other book illustrations. It is believed that he left England for Denmark, and that he died about the year 1755. Walpole, who mentions him, says he was a painter and an architect. Füssli describes him as almost a universal artist; as a painter, copper-plate engraver, sculptor, carver in wood, and gem engraver; he places his death in 1751, at the age of forty-five, and takes occasion to mention him in a subsequent article as the famous Mark Duschler.]

TUTIANI, BARTOLOMEO. This artist is said to have been an engraver on wood, though his works are not specified. He marked his prints with a Gothic monogram, thus, T. [Bartsch mentions only one wood-cut with this mark; it represents Christ insulted by the Jews, and occurs in a work printed at Augsburg in 1515. There is no foundation for saying it is by B. Tutiani, of whom nothing certain is known.]

[TYN, LAMBERT DE, born at Antwerp in 1770, was a scholar of P. Van Regemorter. He painted interiors with conversations by candle-light; landscapes by moonlight; and other familiar subjects. He died in 1816.]

TYROFF, MARTIN, a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg, and engraved a considerable number of book-plates and portraits. Among the latter is that of Charles a Linne, architect to the King of Sweden. [He lived about 1750, and was a publisher as well as an engraver.]

TYSON, MICHAEL. This gentleman was a fellow of Bennet College, Cambridge. He painted for his amusement, and etched some plates, particularly the portrait of Archbishop Parker, taken from the illumination of a manuscript by T. Berg, preserved in the library of Bennet College. It is probable, from the precise resemblance in the prints, that the portrait of that prelate, by Remigius Hogenbergh, was engraved from the same painting. He also engraved a portrait of Sir William Paulet, from an old picture, the painter of which is unknown; and that of Jane Shore, from a picture at King's College, Cambridge. [He lived about 1770.]

TYSSENS, PETER. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1625. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed in the art, but, from the resemblance of his works to those of Vandyck, it is probable that he principally formed his style by studying the works of that master. He distinguished himself both as a painter of history and portraits; and, in both, he approaches so near to the correct design and chaste colouring which characterize the productions of the eminent artist above mentioned, that it is not always easy to discriminate between their performances. After the death of Rubens and Vandyck, he was considered one of the ablest painters of his time, and was made director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1661. His compositions are copious and ingenious; his design more correct than is usual in the painters of his country, and his colouring is clear, chaste, and harmonious. There are several altar-pieces by him in the churches in Flanders, which sustain his reputation, in the vicinity of the works of the most celebrated artists of the Flemish school. Among those most worthy of observation are, his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Benedict, in the church of the Capuchins at Brussels; the Crucifixion, at the Barefooted Carmelites; and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of St. James, at Antwerp; the last-mentioned has frequently been mistaken for a work of Vandyck. He died in 1692. [Balkema says he died in 1682; but writers of more credit leave the matter open.]

TYSSENS, AUGUSTINE, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1655. He was instructed in the rudiments of the art by his father, but his genius leading him to landscape painting, he applied himself to studying the works of Nicholas Berghem, of whose style he became one of the most successful followers. His pictures, representing landscapes, with ruins, embellished with figures and cattle, correctly drawn and neatly touched, were highly esteemed, and placed in the choicest collections. He was director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1691. [Zani says he was born in 1660, and died in 1710. Balkema places his birth in 1662, and his death in 1722. It is probable there is some confusion in the dates respecting Augustine and Nicolas.]

TYSSENS, N. [NICOLAS.] This artist was the younger son of Peter Tyssens, born at Antwerp in 1660. He learned the first principles of design from his father, and is said to have visited Italy, and passed some time at Rome, Naples, and Venice. It can hardly be supposed that his journey was undertaken for the improvement of his style, as he never aspired to a higher branch of the art than a painter of still-life. His pictures represented dead game, flowers, fruit, armour, sabres, and other military weapons, which he rendered interesting, by a correct and faithful delineation, a picturesque and ingenious arrangement, and an intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro. [Balkema says he died at London in 1719.]

VAART, JOHN VANDER. This artist was born at Haerlem in 1647, and was a scholar of Thomas Wyck. He visited England in 1674, and was first employed by William Wissing in painting his draperies, but he afterwards distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes, objects of still-life, and dead game, in the last of which he particularly excelled. He died in London in 1721.

We have by this artist a few portraits, engraved in mezzotinto, which are but very indifferently executed. He had the credit of instructing John Smith in the art of scraping in mezzotinto. Among others are the following portraits by him:

King Charles II.; after Wissing.
Ann Scott, Duchess of Monmouth; after Kneller.

Edward Wetenhall, Bishop of Cork; ad vivum del.
Robert Fielding, called the Bean; after Lely.

[There is some uncertainty about the date of Vander Vaart's birth; Füessli and others place it in 1667, at which period Thomas Wyck was in England. If Vander Vaart came to England in 1674, it is not likely that he was first employed by Wissing in painting draperies, Wissing being then only in his eighteenth year, and it is said he did not visit England till about 1680. Laborde, noticing Vander Vaart as a mezzotinto engraver, says he was born in 1674; this makes "confusion worse confounded," for T. Wyck died in 1686, and Wissing in 1687, when Vander Vaart would have been at most but thirteen years old.]

VACCARO, ANDREA. This painter was born at Naples in 1598, and was a disciple of Massimo Stanzioni. He for some time attached himself to an imitation of the style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, and some of his early productions were sometimes mistaken for the works of that painter. By the advice of Stanzione, he afterwards abandoned that manner, and adopted principles founded on the grace and amenity of Guido. Such are his pictures at the Certosa, and in the church of the Teatini, at Naples. After the death of Massimo, he was considered the ablest artist of the Neapolitan school, and was without a rival until the arrival of Luca Giordano from Rome, to whom he was little inferior. He died in 1670. [He used a monogram similar to that of Andrea Vannucchi, (del Sarto,) which has caused some of his easel pictures to be attributed to that artist.]

VACCARO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1636. He was a scholar of Francesco Albano, and is chiefly known as a painter of perspective and architectural views. He published a treatise on perspective, embellished with plates engraved by himself, from his own designs. His prints consist of twelve perspective views of ruins, fountains, and other edifices in Italy, inscribed Fr. Vaccaro, fec. [It is probable that he was born earlier, as he operated in 1650. He died in 1687.]

VACCELLINI, ———. See VASCELLINI.

VADDER, LOUIS DE. This painter was born at Brussels in 1560. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he may be ranked amongst the ablest landscape painters of his country. From the grandeur of his style, and the picturesque beauty of his scenery, it is probable that he resided some time in Italy, where he appears to have made the works of Titian the particular objects of his study; as his best productions bear a striking resemblance to the admirable landscapes of that distinguished master. His touch is uncommonly firm and free, and his colouring, though vigorous, is tender and chaste. The forms of his rocks and trees are noble and select, and his distances are distinguished by a vapoury degradation, which is only to be found in the works of the most faithful observers of nature. The pictures of Vadder are deservedly esteemed in his native country, where they are found in the choicest collections. His merit would have been more generally known in England, had not his works been frequently imposed upon the public under borrowed names. We have a few spirited etchings of landscapes by this artist, executed in the style of Lucas Van Uden. [Bartsch, tom. v. P. G., has described eleven etchings by De Vadder. In the catalogue of Mr. James Hazard's prints, which were sold at Paris in 1787, there is a lot

(2937) consisting of "Une suite de sept petits paysages en travers, et trois doubles, avec des changements, dont un avant et avec la figure, et les deux autres, plus ou moins travaillés; un autre paysage, plus que le double plus grand, s'y trouve aussi deux fois, dont l'un est avant les figures et la lettre; et enfin un paysage de moyenne grandeur, en travers, deux fois le même, dont l'un est avant, qu'à la suite du monogramme furent gravées les lettres Adder fe.; formant un petit œuvre de quatorze pièces, rare et curieux." Some of these variations are not noticed by Bartsch. It is supposed that he died about 1623.]

[VAFFLARD, PIERRE ANTOINE AUGUSTIN, a French historical and portrait painter, was born at Paris on the 19th of December, 1777. He was a pupil of Regnault. His works consist chiefly of poetical subjects; which are well chosen, and executed with ability. He also painted interesting events in French history regarding noble actions of Henry IV., Napoleon, Prince Poniatowski, the Barriades in July, 1830; Molière reading his "Tartuffe" in the house of the cardinal legat, and the death of that inimitable writer, which has been engraved by Migneret. He was employed to restore the decorative paintings of the galleries of Versailles and the Tuileries. Many of his pictures were purchased by the government, and distributed in various public places. He was living in 1832.]

VAGA, PIERINO DEL. The name of this artist was Pietro Buonacorsi, but he was called del Vaga, from having been instructed in the art, and conducted to Rome, by a painter of that name. He was born at a village near Florence in 1500, of very indigent parents; his father was killed in battle, and his mother dying of the plague before he was two months old, he is said to have been reared by the milk of a goat; and, as a destitute orphan, was taken under the protection of an artisan named Andrea de Ceri, whose house was frequented by several young artists of Florence.

At an early age Pierino discovered a decided inclination for the art, and when he was eleven years old was placed under the tuition of Ridolfo Ghirlandaio, by whose instruction he became an expert and correct designer, and had made considerable progress, when his talents were noticed by a Florentine painter of some reputation, who conducted him to Rome, in 1515, where he had an opportunity of studying after the antique, and the works of Michael Angelo. His merit became known to Giulio Romano and Gio. Francesco Penni, called Il Fattore, two of the principal disciples and the coadjutors of Raffaele in his works in the Vatican, by whom he was recommended to that illustrious artist, who discovered in him sufficient ability to employ him in the execution of his designs in the Loggie of the Vatican. Such was the utility and variety of his powers, that he was equally successful in assisting Giovanni da Udine in the stucco and grotesque ornaments, Polidoro da Caravaggio in his antique subjects in chiaro-scuro, and in executing the biblical subjects from the designs of Raffaele. Of these, the most remarkable are, the Battle of Joshua, the Israelites passing the Jordan, the taking of Jericho, Abraham preparing to sacrifice Isaac, Jacob wrestling with the Angel, and Joseph and his Brethren. He is ranked by Vasari as the greatest designer of the Florentine school, after Michael Angelo Buonaroti; and the partiality of that biographer does not hesitate to pronounce him the most distinguished of the disciples of Raffaele.

After the death of that master he was employed by Leo X. and Clement VII., in conjunction with Giulio Romano and Gio. Francesco Penni, to finish the great works in the Vatican. One of the earliest productions he exhibited at Rome, of his own composition, was a picture he painted for the church of S. Marcello, representing the Creation of Eve, in which he discovers with what success he had studied the works of Michael Angelo.

Pierino del Vaga was in full possession of the public esteem, when the arts and artists experienced a disastrous visitation, on the sacking of Rome, in 1527. Compelled to fly from the capital, and plundered of all he possessed, he took refuge in Genoa, where he was graciously received by Prince Doria, who at that time projected the embellishment of his superb palace, near the gate of St. Thomas. It was upon this occasion that Pierino displayed the extent of his powers, and the fecundity of his invention; and it has been made a matter of dispute whether the decorations of the Palazzo del T, at Mantua, by Giulio Romano, or those of the Doria Palace at Genoa, by del Vaga, do more honour to the great school in which they were educated. In one of the apartments he has represented Jupiter fulminating the Giants; and in others, several subjects from Roman History, and the Metamorphoses of Ovid. He also designed a series of cartoons of the History of Æneas. In these considerable works he was assisted by coadjutors, in the choice of whom he is reproached with not being sufficiently scrupulous, and the grandeur of the design is occasionally impoverished by the feebleness of the execution. He died at Rome in 1547.

VAJANI, ANNA MARIA. This lady resided at Rome about the year 1650, where she engraved part of the plates for the Justinian Gallery. [She excelled as a painter of flowers. Bartsch has described five prints by her, but with no great commendation.]

VAJANO, [or VAJANI,] ORAZIO. This painter was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1600. He resided chiefly at Milan, and acquired considerable reputation by some pictures he painted for the churches of S. Carlo, and S. Antonio Abate, which are judiciously composed, and designed with correctness, though feeble and languid in the colouring. There are also several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Genoa. [He was also called Alessandro. He flourished about 1628. Bartsch has described a print by him of a dead Christ near the tomb, and also one of a Magdalene engraved after him by Sebastian Vajani, an artist of whom nothing else is known.]

VAILLANT, WALLERANT. This artist was born at Lisle in 1623. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Antwerp, at that time the residence of many eminent painters, where he became the disciple of Erasmus Quellinus. On leaving the school of that master he adopted portrait painting, as the most lucrative branch of the art, as well as that most adapted to his genius, and met with very encouraging success. He was advised to visit Frankfort, at the time of the coronation of the Emperor Leopold, whose portrait he painted, and those of several of his attendants. The Marshal Grammont invited him to accompany him to Paris, where he was so fully employed, and so liberally remunerated, that in a few years he returned to Flanders with a competent fortune. He is said to have visited England in the suite of Prince Rupert, who communicated to him the then newly-discovered process of scraping in mezzotinto. He engraved a great variety of plates in that manner, as well from his own designs as after other masters, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Prince Rupert. [Two; one in armour, and one with his arms crossed and leaning his head on his left hand.]
His own Portrait.
The Portrait of his Wife.
Desiderius Erasmus.
John Frobenius, the celebrated Printer of Basle.
Sir Anthony Vandyck.
Barent Graat, Painter.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Barbara; after Raffaelle.
Judith; after Guido.
The Holy Family; after Titian.
The Temptation of St. Anthony; after Cam. Procaccini.
The Bust of a Warrior; after Vintoretto.
Venus lamenting the Death of Adonis; after Eras. Quellinus.
The Prodigal Son; after Mark Gerard.
Judith and Jael; after Gerard Lairesse.

He also engraved several subjects from Terburg, Metzu, Francis Hals, Brower, Bega, and others. He died at Amsterdam in 1677. [For a fuller account of W. Vaillant, see Laborde, "Histoire de la Gravure en maniere noire."]

VAILLANT, BERNARD, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Lisle in 1625, [others say 1627.] The success of Wallerant Vaillant as a portrait painter, induced him to adopt the same pursuit, and he received his principal instruction in the art from him. He chiefly excelled in painting portraits in crayons, and having accompanied his brother in his journeys to Frankfort and Paris, he was much employed in that branch. On his return to the Low Countries, he established himself at Rotterdam, where he resided the remainder of his life. He engraved several portraits in mezzotinto, among which are the following:

John Lingelbach, Painter; after Schwarz.
Paul Dufour; after Wallerant Vaillant.
Charles de Rochefort; B. Vaillant ad vivum faciebat.
1671.

He also engraved two busts of St. Peter and St. Paul; from his own designs. [See also LABORDE.]

VAILLANT, JAMES. This artist was also the brother and scholar of Wallerant Vaillant, born at Lisle in 1628. Whilst young, he visited Italy, and passed two years at Rome. On his return to Flanders he was invited to the court of the Elector of Brandenburg, who employed him in painting some considerable historical subjects, which he executed to the satisfaction of his employer. He was sent by the Elector to Vienna, to paint the portrait of the Emperor, who presented him on the occasion with a gold medal and chain. On his return to Berlin, the Elector expressed great satisfaction, and on seeing the portrait, highly applauded the performance. He died young, to the great regret of his employer and the artists of his time. [It is said that he died at Berlin in 1670; Laborde and Zani say he died in 1691; Fiessli, after Descamps, says he died young. As there was also a John Vaillant, perhaps they have been confounded.]

VAILLANT, ANDREW, was the youngest brother of Wallerant Vaillant, by whom he was instructed in design, and in the art of engraving. He etched a few plates of portraits, after the pictures of Bernard and James Vaillant, among which are the following:

Aloisius Bevilaque; after Bernard Vaillant.
John Ernest Schrader; after James Vaillant.

[Andrew was born in 1629, and operated in 1689.]

VAL, DU. This artist is mentioned by Papillon as an engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1650, and was remarkable for the neatness and delicacy of his execution. He notices twenty cuts by him for the "Miraculous History of Notre Dame de Liesse," which he says were highly esteemed. His other prints are chiefly from the designs of James Stella and N. Cochín. [This engraver is sometimes mentioned as Sebastiano, and sometimes as Stefano Du Val; but there is a degree of mystification about him which wants clearing. The book of the "Miraculous History" must be very rare; Zani never met with a copy. He must not be confounded with Sebastiano D'Vi, or D'Val Ut, who lived a century earlier. See that article.]

VAL, DU, MARK, was probably of the same family with the preceding artist. His name is affixed to a plate representing the Adulteress before Christ, from his own design. It is executed with the graver in a neat but tasteless style. The letters of the name are reversed on the plate. [Mark Du Val was an engraver in wood; he flourished from 1560 to 1580. He was called Le sordé de Charles IX., King of France. It is probable that he has been confounded by Papillon with the other Du Val, who must have lived about a century later, if he engraved after Stella and Cochín.]

[VAL, or VL, SEBASTIANO D', UT, an engraver, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century. All that is known of him is that he engraved two plates, on one of which is the date 5558. Bartsch says that he was certainly a painter of merit, and probably a Venetian. The two prints by him are,

A Repose in Egypt, in which the Virgin, with the Infant in her arms, rests at the base of a rock on the right, and Joseph is seated on the left. On a tablet is inscribed Sebastiano D' VL; on another tablet, which an angel holds in the air, is written Piu alto non so dir che Mater Dei. Etched in a very spirited manner.

Prometheus, attached to Mount Caucasus, tormented by the Vulture. On a stone to the right is inscribed Sebastiano D' Val. Ut. 5558. (Bartsch says 15558.)

Zani interprets this inscription thus: Sebastiano De Valentini Utinense. With respect to the mistake of the first figure in the date, 5 instead of 1, he conjectures that the artist intended to mark the age of the world from the creation, 5558, which would correspond with the year in which he operated, that is to say, 1558 of the Christian era. "La qual data viene sempre a corrispondere all'anno, in cui operava, che è sicuramente quello del 1558." With submission to so great an authority, it would be 1554, as, according to the chronological tables, the world was created 4004 years before the birth of Christ.]

[VAL, ROBERT DU. This painter is noticed by Bryan, and others, under the names Nicholas Duval. He was born at the Hague in 1644, and after studying under Nicolas Wieling went to Italy, and became an imitator of Pietro da Cortona. On his return to Holland he was employed by William, Prince of Orange, afterwards king of England. It is said that he was sent to Hampton Court to put the Cartoons of Raphael in order; whether to repaint, or, in modern phrase, to restore them, is not said. He was appointed director of the Academy at the Hague, and died there in 1732.]

[VALDELMIRA DE LEON, JUAN, was born at Tafalla in Navarre. He was instructed in the rudiments of design by his father at Valladolid, and after his death entered the school of Francisco Rizi, at Madrid. He assisted that master in several of his works, particularly in the frescoes of S. Antonio of the Portuguese, at Toledo, in the Retiro, and other places. But his chief excellence was in painting flower-pieces, which are said to equal the best of Arellano. He excited the jealousy of his fellow disciples when living, and the regret of numerous friends at his death, which occurred in his thirtieth year.]

VALDÉS, DON JUAN DE. This Spanish artist was born at Seville in 1631, and distinguished himself as a painter, a sculptor, and an architect. Palomino informs us, that it is uncertain by whom he was instructed, but that he was more indebted to his own genius, and his assiduous application, than to the lessons of his preceptor. Of his works as a painter, the most worthy of notice are a series of pictures of the history of the Prophet Elias, in the church of the Carmelites; the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, in the church of S. Francesco, at Cordova; and the Triumph of the Cross, in la Caridad, at Seville. He lived in habits of intimacy with Murillo, who was a great admirer of his works. He died at Seville in 1691.

[Don Juan de Valdes Leal was born at Cordova in 1630, and descended from an ancient family of Asturia. He practised for some time in the school of Antonio del Castillo. He occupied a distinguished place among the painters of Seville, and was one of the founders of the Academy there; he was of course on intimate terms with Murillo. He painted numerous pictures in the churches of Seville, and some in those of Cordova. At the death of Murillo he was considered the head of his profession. There are two engravings by him, one with his monogram, the other with his names at full. He died of paralysis, the 14th of October, 1691.]

[VALDES, DON LUCAS DE, a painter and engraver, was the son of Juan de Valdes Leal, and his wife Isabella Carrasquilla, who also exercised the art of painting. He was born at Seville in 1661, and from his infancy showed a great disposition for the arts; but his father, being desirous that he should be well instructed in Latin and the mathematics, placed him with the Jesuits. Notwithstanding at the age of eleven he engraved, in aquafortis and the burin, four plates, which are to be found in "Fiestas de Seville á la canonizacion de S. Fernando," and represent emblematic allusions to the virtues of that Saint. From the goodness of the execution it may be suspected, however, that he was in some measure assisted by one of his parents. He afterwards attached himself to painting, particularly in fresco, and acquitted himself with extraordinary facility. If he did not give grandeur to his figures, he was correct in his drawing, and showed great knowledge of perspective, and as much intelligence in architecture as any painter of the time. He became mathematical master of the Marine College at Cadiz, but continued the exercise of the pencil and graver till his death in 1724. His sacred subjects are chiefly in the churches of Seville, and there is one in the Museum of that city. He also painted portraits, several of which he engraved; among them that of Father Francisco Tamariz, and that of the philanthropist Mañara, the founder of an hospital of charity at Seville, for which his friend Murillo painted eleven pictures. Of these eleven pictures five were abstracted by Soult; and part of the stolen goods are now in England; namely, the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Bethesda,

Abraham receiving the Angels, and the Prodigal's Return. His son, Juan de Valdes, distinguished himself as an engraver, particularly in religious subjects for books of devotion. In 1732 he engraved an Immaculate Conception, with many angels; in 1734, a half-length portrait of the venerable Fray Tomas de Santa Maria; and in 1736, the venerable P. Contreras, and S. Francisco de Borja adoring the Holy Sacrament, with a glory of angels.]

VALDOR, JOHN, was a native of Liege, and flourished about the year 1620. At an early period of his life he went to Paris, where he chiefly resided. We have a considerable number of plates by him, representing saints and subjects of devotion, which are executed with extraordinary neatness and precision. He also engraved part of the plates for a book, entitled Les Triomphes de Louis le Juste, published at Paris in 1638, which are his best performances. We have besides, by him, a Repose of the Holy Family, after Herm. Swanvelt; and a Head of St. Ignatius, very highly finished. [He was living in 1649.]

[VALENCIA, FRAY MATIAS DE, originally Lorenzo Chafiron, a painter of religious, historical, and other subjects, was born at Valencia in 1696. After acquiring some knowledge of painting he went to Rome, and became a disciple of Corrado Giacinto, whose manner he imitated. He returned to Valencia, and passed to Granada to obtain assistance from an uncle there, but being disappointed in his expectations, and reduced to necessity, he took refuge in a convent, and assumed the habit: he was drowned in 1749. In the refectory of the convent to which he belonged there was a picture of the Last Supper by him; and several of his smaller subjects were in the collections of private persons in Valencia.]

[VALENCIENNES, PIERRE HENRI, a landscape painter, was born at Toulouse in 1750, and died at Paris in 1819. His principal pictures are, Cicero discovering the tomb of Archimedes; two subjects from Œdipus; Philoctetes in the island of Lemnos; a View of the ancient city of Trezina, the Vale of Tempé, and the Dance of Theseus. Besides these he painted a great number of landscapes. Several of his pictures have been engraved. He published a treatise on perspective and landscape painting. He was a member of the ancient Academy of Painting, and of the Academy of Toulouse, and a chevalier of the Legion of Honour.]

VALENTIN, PETER, [MOSES.] This painter was born at Colomiers en Brie in 1600, and studied some time under Simon Vouet, but he left that master before he had made any considerable progress, and travelled to Rome, where he passed the remainder of his life. He may therefore be rather considered of the Roman than the French school. The powerful and vigorous style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio made so strong an impression on him, that he attached himself to an imitation of it, with a devotion that was never diminished. Like that artist, he indulged in an extravagant, but effective contrast of light and shadow; like him, he was a faithful follower of nature, and was equally indifferent and unfortunate in his choice of it; like him, he was frequently incorrect, and always ignoble. He was, however, an intelligent master of the chiaroscuro, and his masses are disposed so as to produce the most striking effect. Though he occasionally painted altar-pieces for the churches, his powers appear to have been better adapted to other subjects, which he also appears to have painted in preference. His best pictures represent fortune-tellers, gamblers, concerts of music, and corps de gardes; to which his taste was more competent than to the dignity of historic painting. The patronage of Cardinal Barberini, nephew to Urban VIII., procured him the commission to paint a large picture for the Basilica of St. Peter, representing the Martyrdom of S. S. Processo e Martiniano, which is esteemed his best historical picture. He also painted for his patron the Decollation of St. John, in the Palazzo Barberini; and there is an admired picture by him in the Corsini palace, of Peter denying Christ. This artist died in 1632, at the early age of 32, of a fever, brought on by going into a cold bath when he was heated. [His name was Moses, not Peter. The French claim him as belonging to their school, but without reason. There are several pictures by him in the Louvre. Dumesnil attributes an etching to him, which is not common. It represents a Soldier between two Women who are telling his fortune, and another man is picking one of their pockets. It is inscribed F. L. D. Chartres excudit.]

VALERIANO, PADRE GIUSEPPE. According to Baglione, this painter was a native of Aquila, and flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Clement VIII. It is not said under whom he studied, but he imitated the style of Sebastiano del Piombo, though more heavy in his style of design, and more gloomy in the tone of his colouring. In this manner he painted for the church of S. Spirito in Sassia, two pictures, representing the Transfiguration, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost. He afterwards became a religious of the Society of the Jesuits, and painted several pictures of the Life of the Virgin for the Chiesa del Gesu, of which the Annunciation is considered his best performance.

VALESIO, or VALEGIUS, FRANCESCO. This artist is mentioned by Florent Le Comte as a painter as well as an engraver. He certainly engraved several plates from his own compositions, which are executed with the graver in a neat, but formal style. We have a variety of frontispieces and other book-ornaments by him; but his most considerable work is a set of plates of Hermits, engraved for a book, entitled Illustrium Anachoretorum Elogia, written by Jacobus Cavacius, a Benedictine monk, published at Venice in 1612. According to Le Comte, he also engraved some portraits, and other prints, after the designs of Pietro Facini, and other masters.

VALESIO, or VALEGIUS, GIACOMO, an Italian engraver, who was a native of Verona, and flourished about the year 1574. His plates are executed with the graver only, in a style resembling the works of Cornelius de Cort, but very inferior. Among other prints, we have one of St. Michael vanquishing the Evil Spirits, after P. Veronese, bearing the date 1574. [Jacom. Valegio fecit, 1587. Nicolo Valegio, another engraver, flourished about the same time; he was also of Verona, and both were publishers.]

VALESIO, GIOVANNI LUIGI. This artist was a native of Bologna, and was brought up in the school of Lodovico Caracci. He painted some pictures for the churches of his native city, but is more known as an engraver, and painter of miniatures. Among his works at Bologna are, a picture of the Scourging of Christ, in the church of S. Pietro; the Annunciation, at the Mendicanti; and St. Roch curing the persons afflicted with the Plague, in the church dedicated to that Saint. According to Baglione, he died at Rome, in the pontificate of Urban VIII. He etched several plates from his own designs, and those of other masters, as well as a variety of emblematical subjects, frontispieces, and other book-plates. Among others, we have the following prints by him, from his own designs :

The Virgin, with the infant Christ seated on her lap.
Venus threatening Cupid.
Venus chastising Cupid.

[He was the son of a Spanish soldier, and born at Bologna in 1561. He died at Rome about 1640. He did not commence studying the art till he was thirty. He approached nearer to the style of Agostino Caracci in his engravings than any other of that school. Bartsch, tom. xviii. P. G., has described 111 prints by him, to which he has added 16 mentioned by Malvasia, but acknowledges that he had never seen them.]

VALET, or VALLET, WILLIAM, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1636, [and died in 1704.] He is supposed to have been a pupil of Francis Poilly, and afterwards studied some time at Rome. He engraved several plates from the Italian and French masters, which are executed chiefly with the graver, which, though inferior to the works of Poilly, possess considerable merit. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy.
Louis, Duke of Mantua.
Alessandro Algardi, Sculptor.
Andrea Sacchi, Painter; after C. Maratti.
The Bust of Peter Corneille, crowned by Melpomene and Thalia; after Paillet.
[Olympia Maldachini, Roma, 1657.]

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Nativity; after Raffaello.
The Holy Family; after the same.
[Melchisedeck bringing presents to Abraham; after the same.]
The Last Supper; after Raffaello.
The Holy Family; after Guido. Cornelius Bloemart has engraved the same subject.
The Holy Family; after Albano. [From the picture in the Louvre, called "La Laveuse."]
A Repose in Egypt; after C. Maratti.
The Virgin, with the infant Christ and St. John; after An. Caracci.
The Annunciation; after Courtois.
The Resurrection; after N. Loir.
St. John the Baptist before Herod; after Le Brun.
The Adoration of the Magi; after Poussin.
The Assumption of the Virgin; after J. Miel.
The Holy Family; after James Stella.
The Crucifixion; after the same.

VALK, or VALCK, GERARD, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1626. He was first a servant to Abraham Blooteling, but having married his sister, was instructed by him in the art of engraving, and was afterwards in partnership with him. He visited England with his brother-in-law, and was employed for some time by David Loggan. He also assisted Peter Schenk in the publication of the large Dutch Atlas, in two folio volumes, in 1683. We have several portraits, and other subjects, engraved by him, both in mezzotinto and with the graver, some of which possess considerable merit. Among others are the following :

PORTRAITS WITH THE GRAVER.

Hortensia, Duchess of Mazarin; after Lely; one of his best plates.
Robert, Lord Brooke.
John, Duke of Lauderdale.
Eleanor Gwyn; after Lely.

PORTRAITS AND SUBJECTS IN MEZZOTINTO.

William, Prince of Orange; after Lely.

Mary, Princess of Orange; after the same.
Louisa, Duchess of Portsmouth; after the same.
Mary Davis, Actress; after the same.
A Girl holding a Lamp; after G. Douw.
David and Bathsheba; after B. Graat.
[A Trumpeter presenting a letter to a Lady; after Terburg.
A Death's Head crowned with laurel.
Cupid asleep; after Guido.
A Woman searching for Fleas.]

VALK, PETER. This artist was born at Lewarde, in Friesland, in 1584, and formed his manner of painting by studying the works of Abraham Bloemaert. He afterwards visited Italy, and passed some years at Rome. On his return to Holland, he distinguished himself as an historical painter, and excelled also in portraits and landscapes. He engraved a few plates, in which he imitated the style of Philip Galle, and are chiefly copied from the prints of that master; among which is one representing Time and Truth.

[VALKENBURG, or VALCKENBURG, LUCAS VAN, born at Malines, between 1530 and 1540, (for writers are not agreed respecting the date,) was a landscape painter, and also painted portraits in small. He was patronized by the Duke of Lintz, for whom he painted a great number of pictures; and on his return to his native city died on the road, in 1582, according to some, and in 1625, according to others.]

[VALKENBURG, or VALCKENBURG, MARTIN VAN, was a younger brother of Lucas, and the dates respecting his birth and death are equally uncertain. Some say he was born in 1533, and died at Frankfort in 1574; others, that he was born about 1542, and died in 1636. He accompanied his brother in search of the picturesque, and made numerous designs of the beautiful views in the environs of Aix-la-Chapelle and Liege. It is probable that both the artists have been confounded with others of the same name.]

[VALKENBURG, MARTIN VAN, born at Malines about 1542, painted very pleasing landscapes, enriched with historical and allegorical figures; some of which have been engraved by Crispin de Passe. He died at Frankfort in 1636. His pictures are marked VV.]

VALKENBURG, THEODORE. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1675, and was first a scholar of Cuienburg, but he afterwards studied under Michael van Muscher, and ultimately under John Weenix. By the lessons of the last-mentioned master, he arrived at an unusual ability in painting animals, huntings, and especially dead game, in which he particularly excelled. He also painted portraits with considerable success.

In 1696 he travelled to Germany, with the intention of visiting Italy, but he was commissioned to paint some pictures at the court of the Duke of Baden, which were greatly admired, and he was persuaded to visit Vienna with a particular recommendation to the Prince of Lichtenstein, who received him in the most gracious manner. He was employed and caressed by the principal personages in that capital; and such was the reputation he acquired, and the liberal remuneration he received for his works, that he renounced his project of visiting Rome, and, during a residence of a few years at Vienna, he amassed a competent fortune. The desire of revisiting his native country induced him to abandon these advantages, and to resist the flattering offers made him, to prevail on him to remain in Germany. He returned to Holland, where his works were not less esteemed, and he was employed to paint some pictures for the palaces at Loo. He continued to exercise his talents with reputation until the year 1721, when he died of an attack of apoplexy. Though Valkenburg was an eminent portrait painter, his most esteemed works are his pictures of dead game, which are not much inferior to the admired productions of Weenix.

VALKER, WARNER VAN, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1610. He painted historical subjects, and etched a few plates from his own designs, which are executed in a bold, spirited style, among which are the following:

The Good Samaritan.

Venus sleeping, surprised by two Satyrs.

An old Man and Woman seated at a table, with the figure of Death giving his hand to the old Man; dated 1612.

[The Dutch writers call him Warnard Vanden Valkert. He was born about 1572, according to some; others say 1575 and 1580. He was a scholar of Henry Goltzius, and painted historical pictures in his manner; he also painted portraits. There are pictures by him in some of the churches at Utrecht. One has the date 1620; he was living in 1623.]

VALLÉE, or VALEE, SIMON. This artist was born at Paris about the year 1700. He was a pupil of Peter Drevet, and has engraved several plates, which are etched and finished with the graver in a neat, tasteful style. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

John de Troy, Painter to the King; after Fras. de Troy.
John Francis Savary, Curate of St. Menchoult; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Transfiguration; after Raffaele.

St. John in the Desert; after the same.

The Flight into Egypt; after Carlo Maratti.

The Resurrection of Lazarus; after Girolamo Muziano.

The finding of Moses; after Francesco Romanelli.

Christ hearing his Cross; after Andrea Sacchi.

The Death of the Virgin; after M. Angelo da Caravaggio.

The Sacrifice of Abraham; after Ant. Coyvel.

Christ calling to him the Little Children; after P. J. Cazes.

The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after the same.

[Unless there be an error in the date of his birth, this cannot be the same S. Vallée who engraved the series of four landscapes, in folio, after N. Poussin, for there is a print by him with the date 1706. It is the portrait of a Lady in a Garden, attended by a young negro, and she appears about to gather a pink; at the bottom, Rigauld pinx. 1701—S. Vallée sc. 1706. Zani notices a Stefano de la Valée, called also il Cav. Poussin, who was an amateur painter and engraver, and operated from 1724 to 1764; the same that M. Bernard asserts was born in 1722, and died in 1803.]

VALLENBURGH, ———. This painter was born at Nuremberg in 1555, and was instructed in the first elements of design by an obscure artist, who is not mentioned. He travelled to Venice when he was young, where he studied the works of Titian and P. Veronese, and returned to Germany with an agreeable and harmonious style of colouring, and great facility of execution. Though he occasionally painted historical subjects, he was more successful in representing perspective views of public places, with markets, fairs, and festivals, in which he usually introduced a great number of figures, designed with tolerable correctness. His works are little known except in Germany, where they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1623. [This probably means Frederick Valkenburgh, who died in 1623. There is no account of an artist of the name of Vallenburgh.]

[VALLET, PIERRE, a designer and engraver, born at Orleans about the year 1575. He bore the title of "Brodeur ordinaire du Roi" to Henry IV. of France, and was living in 1642. He is noticed by Robert Dumesnil, "Le Peintre Graveur Français," tom. vi., as the engraver of 124 prints which decorate "Les Aventures amoureuses de Theagene et Charicléé," published in 1613, a bibliographical bijou of the greatest rarity; a Plan of the City of Paris, after François Quesnel; the flowers in the work entitled "Le Jardin du Roy très Chrestien Henry IV. Roy de France et de Navare. Dedie à la Royné," published in 1608. In this edition is the portrait of the artist with his name and the date. It has also that of the keeper of the garden, Jean Robin, a eunuch, who reared the first acacia in France. This is also a very curious work, and would much interest the floriculturists of the present day. Nothing further is recorded of Pierre Vallet, except that he was connected in some other work with two artists, now very little known, P. Fatoure, and G. Giovane, or Gabriel Le Jeune, who flourished at Paris in 1609; it is supposed that Fatoure was a designer, and Le Jenne an engraver, but they worked conjointly.]

VALLORY, THE CHEVALIER DE, a French amateur engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He etched for his amusement several small landscapes, and other subjects, after Boucher. [This is probably the Chevalier Theodore Vallory; but there was a Cavaliere Antonio, who operated thirty years earlier: he was an Italian.]

VALPUESTA, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Osma, in Old Castile, in 1614. He was a disciple of Eugenio Caxes, and, according to Palomino, was the most successful follower of his style. His principal works are in the churches and convents at Madrid, of which the most remarkable are, a series of pictures of the Life of the Virgin, in the church of San Miguel; the Holy Family, with St. Joachim and St. Anne, in the chapel of the Hospital del Buensuceso; and six pictures representing the life of St. Clara, in the convent of the Franciscan Nuns. He died at Madrid in 1668.

VAN, ———. VAN, VANDE, VANDEN, and VANDER, being only articles preposed to the Dutch, Flemish, and German names, when the artist is not found under the letter V, the article will be met with by referring to its proper initial letter; as Van Achen under Achen, Vande Velde under Velde, Vanden Berg under Berg, Vander Borcht under Borcht, &c. &c.

VAN BALEN. See BALEN.

[VANDAEL, JOHN FRANCIS, an excellent painter of fruit and flowers, was born at Antwerp in 1764, but went early to Paris and settled there. He was self-instructed in art, but made such progress that he soon distinguished himself at the exhibitions. On one occasion he obtained the prize of 4000 francs, and on two others, the large gold medals. He did not confine himself strictly to fruit and flowers, but painted other subjects, in which such objects might be introduced with propriety. Three of his pictures are in the Luxembourg; two, which he painted for the Empress Josephine, are at Munich; they represent an Offering to Flora, and the Tomb of Julia. He was also patronized by the Empress Marie Louise, who took one of his pictures with her to Parma. Many of his pictures were to be seen in the chateaux of St. Cloud and de Trianon, and also in the collection of the Duchesse de Berri. They may all be ranked as fruit and flower-pieces; the other parts being subordinate to these objects. The date of his decease is not ascertained. He was a member of the Academies at Amsterdam and Antwerp, and also of several other societies, and a chevalier of the Legion of Honour.]

[VANDEN DYCK, DANIEL, an engraver, was born, according to Brulliot, in France, but Boschini and others say he was a native of Flanders. He was an historical painter, and an engraver in aquafortis. He went to Venice, and became inspector of the gallery of the Duke of Mantua in 1658. Though it is said that he painted with great reputation historical compositions and portraits, in which he was assisted by his wife Lucretia, a daughter of Nicolas Renier Mabuse, whom he married at Venice, none of his pictures are otherwise noticed. Robert Dumesnil, tom. iii., has described five etchings by him, all of which have his name. Three of them are among those that some writers have attributed to Anthony Van Dyck. They are marked with a star.

- * 1. Susanna and the Elders; Dani. Vanden Dyck in et fecit.
- * 2. The Virgin and Infant; DV. Dyck in et fecit.
- 3. St. Katharine; DV. Dyck I., the two first letters joined as a monogram.
- 4. The dedication of Eneas; dedicated by the artist to the Marquis Gicalteri, a noble Venetian.
- * 5. A Bacchanalian scene; Silenus drunk at table, supported by a Bacchante; Dani. Vanden Dyck fecit.

In Rigal's catalogue mention is made of a Shepherdess and Shepherd, half-length figures; and others, it is said, are marked with his cipher only, one of which has the date 1626: these Robert Dumesnil has not seen. The Shepherdess and Shepherd is attributed by others to John Thomas.]

VANDERBURGH, ADRIAN. This painter was born at Dort in 1693, and was first a scholar of Arnold Houbraken, but he afterwards acquired a more finished style, by imitating the works of Mieris and Metz. He painted with considerable success small portraits, domestic subjects, and conversations, which were agreeably coloured, and painted in a neat, polished manner, though very inferior to the artists he adopted as his models. His pictures are, however, found in the collections in Holland, where they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1733.

[VANDERGUCHT, BENJAMIN, a portrait painter and picture-dealer, was the thirty-second child of Gerard Vandergucht the engraver, by his only wife, who survived him several years. Benjamin was a student at the school in St. Martin's Lane, and afterwards at the Royal Academy. He painted the portraits of actors, among them those of David Garrick, as Steward of the Stratford Jubilee, and of Woodward the Comedian, which is in the Lock Hospital. He relinquished painting for picture dealing, picture cleaning, and repairing, which he probably found a more profitable occupation. He was drowned in the Thames, near Chiswick, in 1794. His father, Gerard, was an engraver of book-prints for publications in the early part and middle of the 18th century. See the articles GUCHT, VANDER.]

VAN, DIEST. See DIEST.

VANDYCK, SIR ANTHONY. The memoirs of this admirable painter are so interestingly connected with the history of English art, that we can scarcely avoid considering him as our own country man. He was born at Antwerp in 1599, and, according to Houbraken, was the son of a painter or glass, by whom he was instructed in the elementary principles of design, and was afterwards placed under the tuition of Henry Van Balen, a painter of considerable reputation, who had studied in Italy. He had already made a rapid progress under the master, when the brilliant reputation of Rubens and the sight of some of his finest works, inspired him with the ambition of becoming his disciple and by the intercession of some mutual friends, he was received into the academy of that illustrious painter. It was not long before the intelligent eye of Rubens discovered in his disciple talents of no ordinary cast; he soon found him of sufficient ability to effectually assist in the numerous commissions in which he was engaged, and he was intrusted to forward several of the works of Rubens, from his designs, to a point which required little more than the ultimate touches of his master. Whilst he was a pupil of that distinguished painter, an accident occurred which established his superiority over all his fellow students.

It was the custom of Rubens, as a relaxation from his laborious application, to take an airing or horseback in the evening, when his painting-room was locked up, under the care of a confidential domestic. The numerous students, desirous of an opportunity of examining the mode of his process from the commencement to the finish of his works prevailed on the guardian, by frequent presents, to admit them into his atelier. At the time when he was engaged on his celebrated picture of the Descent from the Cross, their curiosity was more particularly excited, and, as they eagerly pressed forward to examine the work, Diepenbeck, pushed by one of his fellow students, fell against the picture, and effaced an essential part of it, the face of the Virgin and the arm of Mary Magdalene, which had been just finished. Consternation seized every countenance, the dread of their master's displeasure, and the consequent dismissal from his school, was the prevalent feeling, when John Van Hoeck assumed a presence of mind, and addressing his companions proposed, as they had yet three hours of daylight that the ablest of them should immediately undertake to repair the damage the picture had sustained and named Vandyck as the most likely to succeed. Every one applauded the nomination, and Vandyck, apprehensive of the consequences, was prevailed on to undertake the office, though despairing of success. On the succeeding morning, Rubens entered his painting-room, attended by his disciples and, regarding the picture, he pointed to the part repaired, observing, "there is a head and an arm that are by no means the worst of what I did yesterday;" and, though on approaching nearer to the picture he discovered the alteration, he was so satisfied with what had been done, that he did not think proper to change it.

It has been asserted by D'Argenville, and others that this circumstance, and the growing ability of Vandyck, alarmed the jealousy of his instructor, and, in consequence of it, he advised him to renounce historical subjects, and devote himself to portrait painting, in which branch he had already discovered extraordinary ability. But this calumny is easily refuted by the established generosity and liberality of Rubens' nature, and a reference to facts. If Rubens had really been jealous of the uncommon powers of his disciple, it is not very probable that he would have endeavoured to promote them, by recommending him to visit Italy, where he had himself studied with so much advantage. On this subject, Lord Orford justly observes, that "Addison did not advise Pope to translate Homer, but assisted Tickell in a rival translation." It is, however, certain, that Rubens not only urged him to undertake the journey, but pointed out to him the objects, the study of which he conceived would most conduce to his improvement.

It is no less incontrovertible, that Vandyck painted a great variety of historical pictures, after he left the school of Rubens, of which Descamps gives a particular account of seventy-seven in the churches and public edifices, which form only a part of his works.

Vandyck did not hesitate to follow the advice of his instructor, and, as a proof that they separated on the most amicable terms, he presented Rubens, previous to his departure, with two historical pictures, and the portrait of Rubens's second wife, Helen Forman, as a proof of his gratitude and esteem, and received in return one of Rubens's finest horses.

In 1619, when he was twenty years of age, Vandyck left Antwerp, on his travels to Italy, and first visited Venice, so attractive to the artists of his country, as the great theatre of colouring, where he studied with attention the works of Titian, and imbibed so deeply the tints of that admirable painter, that he is generally allowed to approach nearer to the delicacy and purity of his carnations than even Rubens. He afterwards went to Genoa, where the fine style he had acquired recommended him to the notice of the principal nobility, many of whose portraits he painted, as well as several pictures for the churches and private collections, which excited universal admiration. Desirous of visiting the great objects of art which embellish the capital of Italy, he left Genoa for Rome, and soon after his arrival was introduced to Cardinal Bentivoglio, who had been nuncio from the pope into Flanders, and to whom his talents were already known. He soon afterwards painted his celebrated portrait of that eminent prelate, which has always been considered one of the most admirable productions of portraiture. This fine picture was long an ornament of the Gallery at Florence, and is probably there still. He painted some historical subjects for the cardinal, and several portraits of the most distinguished personages; but finding his works reviled and criticised by the artists of his country, then resident at Rome, because he could not be prevailed on to partake of the carousals and nocturnal orgies of the Bentevogel society, he left that capital, and returned to Genoa, where he was received in the most flattering manner, and met with constant employment. Whilst at Genoa, he was invited to Palermo, where he painted the portrait of Philibert, Prince of Savoy, the Viceroy of Sicily, and was engaged in several commissions for the court, when the breaking out of the plague obliged him to leave Palermo, and he soon afterwards returned to Flanders.

The promising genius Vandyck had displayed before he left Antwerp, and the brilliant reputation he had acquired in Italy, had excited an anxious curiosity in his countrymen, to witness the improvement of his talents by the advantages of travel, and the different religious communities were desirous of employing his pencil. His first public work, after his return, was his celebrated picture, painted for the church of the Augustines, representing St. Augustine in ecstasy, supported by angels, with other saints, of which we have a print by P. de Jode. This performance procured him great reputation; Rubens was one of the most zealous of its admirers, and one of the loudest extollers of his fame. Of this picture Sir Joshua Reynolds observes, that "it is of great fame, but that in some measure it disappointed his expectations; that it has no effect, from the want of a large mass of light, the two angels making two small masses of equal magnitude; and adds, that the figure of St. Augustine is dressed in black, though in the print it makes the principal light." In confirmation of the justness of this criticism, and in vindication of the judgment of the painter, it is worthy of remark, that in the picture, as originally painted by Vandyck, the drapery of St. Augustine was white, and, with the two angels who support him, formed one principal mass of light. It is upon record, that the ignorance of the monks obliged Vandyck to alter the dress of their patron saint from white to black, and the painter was reluctantly obliged to submit to so mortifying a dilemma, before he could obtain payment for the picture.

He was now loaded with commissions, and the principal public edifices at Antwerp, Brussels, Mechlin, and Ghent, were embellished with the productions of his pencil. It was about this time that he painted the series of inimitable portraits of the eminent artists of his time, which have perhaps never been equalled, for the admirable variety of attitudes, and the characteristic expression in the airs of the heads. They were engraved by the most eminent artists of the time, Vorstermans, Bolswert, Pontius, and others, and several of them were etched by Vandyck himself. One of the most admired of his performances, and which, more than any other of his works, evinced the advantage he had derived from his studies in Italy, was the picture he painted for the church of the Recollets, at Mechlin, representing Christ crucified between the two Thieves, with Mary Magdalene and St. John. This admirable picture is worthy of the best time of the Caracci, in composition and expression, in the variety and extensiveness of the design, and the judicious disposition of the whole. In the efforts which the Thieves make to detach themselves from the Cross, he has successfully encountered the greatest difficulties of the art, and the look of grief and resignation in the Virgin is above all praise. In the opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds, "this, upon the whole, may be considered as one of the finest pictures in the world, and gives the highest idea of Vandyck's powers; it shows that he had truly a genius for history painting, if he had not been taken off by portraits." Another of his most admired works, formerly in the church of the Recollets, at Antwerp, representing a Pietà, or the Dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin, with St. John and two Angels, which has been finely engraved by Bolswert, is now in the Gallery of the Louvre. In this admirable performance he appears to have had in mind the famous Dead Christ, with the Marys, by Annibale Caracci, to which the exquisite expression in the head of the Virgin is hardly inferior.

The general admiration excited by these able productions, and the applause bestowed on them by Rubens, did not fail to rouse the jealousy and envy of his contemporaries, particularly those who had been his fellow-students, and whose works were not equally successful. They accused him of tameness and littleness of invention, and asserted, that he was incapable of handling a brush; the delicacy and correctness of his design, and the finesse of his touch, they represented as meanness and timidity, and they were indefatigable in their intrigues, to revile and calumniate his works. These cabals were not the only unpleasant circumstances which conspired to render his situation in Flanders disagreeable.

In addition to the indignity he had experienced from the Augustine monks already mentioned, he was destined to encounter one more humiliating from another quarter. The canons of the Collegiate church at Courtray commissioned him to paint a picture for their principal altar, and, on this occasion, he was desirous of surpassing himself. He chose for his subject the Elevation of the Cross, and bestowed on it all his art to render the performance accomplished. The picture was sent to Courtray, and was no sooner placed, than the canons hurried with impatience to examine it. To the astonishment and mortification of Vandyck, the chapter viewed him and his production with the utmost contempt, they declared the picture to be detestable, and the author a miserable dauber. After pronouncing this notable decree, they withdrew from the church, and it was with difficulty that he could procure payment for the picture. In a short time, the altar-piece having been seen by several artists and persons of judgment, was declared not only to be one of his finest works, but a chef d'œuvre of art. The worthy canons now became sensible of their error, and as some reparation for the outrage they had offered him, they resolved to commission him to paint two more pictures for their church. But Vandyck, with becoming indignation, refused to comply with their demand, observing, that there was a sufficient number of daubers at Courtray to answer their purpose, and that he had determined never more to expose himself to the brutality of insolence and folly.

Wearied and disgusted with these continued contrarities, he readily accepted an invitation from Frederick, Prince of Orange, to visit the Hague, whose portrait he painted, and those of his family, the principal personages of his court, and the foreign ambassadors.

The encouragement given to the arts by Charles I. induced Vandyck to visit England in 1629. He was lodged with his friend and countryman, George Geldorp, the painter, and for some time entertained hopes of being introduced to the notice of the king; and the neglect he experienced is not easily accounted for. Not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he returned to Antwerp, not a little chagrined and disappointed, and had made up his mind to establish himself there for the remainder of his life, when a portrait of Sir Kenelm Digby, painted by him, being shown to the king, he expressed a desire that Vandyck should be invited to return to England.

In 1631 he arrived a second time in London, and was presented by Sir Kenelm to the king, by whom he was most graciously received. He was lodged at Black-Fryars, among the king's artists; thither his Majesty frequently went by water, and viewed his performances with delight, not less charmed with his conversation than the beauties of his pencil. Charles frequently sat to him himself, and bespoke several pictures of the queen, his children, and courtiers. On the 5th of July, 1632, the king conferred on him the honour of knighthood, at St. James's, and soon afterwards granted him an annuity of two hundred pounds a year for life. The patent is preserved in the Rolls, and is dated 1633, in which he is styled painter to his Majesty.

Vandyck now became the most popular artist of his time; he was overwhelmed with business, and though he was indefatigable, and possessed an almost unexampled facility, it was with difficulty he could keep pace with the commissions with which he was loaded. The liberal remuneration he received for his pictures enabled him to support a splendid establishment; he kept a sumptuous table, which was frequented by persons of the highest distinction, and is said to have often detained his sitters to dinner, for an opportunity of studying their countenances, and of retouching their pictures again in the afternoon. His natural disposition led him to indulge in pleasure and expense. He was fond of music, and liberal to the professors of it, and was a generous encourager of all such as excelled in any art or science, many of whose portraits he painted gratuitously. He married the daughter of the unfortunate Lord Gowrie, who brought him no other dower than a noble name and great personal beauty. Soon after his marriage he left England with his lady, and went to Antwerp, on a visit to his family and friends, and afterwards proceeded to Paris.

Emulous of the glory Rubens had acquired by his splendid works in the Luxembourg, Vandyck is said to have visited that capital with the hope of being employed in the then projected decoration of the gallery of the Louvre; but on his arrival, he found the commission already disposed of to Nicholas Poussin, who had been brought from Rome for that purpose. Vandyck returned to England, and still retaining the same ambition of executing some public work in competition with his master, he proposed to the king, through the channel of Sir Kenelm Digby, to decorate the walls of the Banqueting-house, of which the ceiling was already adorned by Rubens, with the history and procession of the order of the Garter, for which the sum demanded was eight thousand pounds. The proposal was more agreeable to the king's wishes than suited to the state of his finances. The approaching troubles of the times would, at all events, have prevented its completion. Vandyck did not long survive the rejection of his proposal. His luxurious and sedentary life brought on the gout, and injured his fortune. He endeavoured to repair it by the egregious, but then prevalent folly, of the pursuit of the philosopher's stone, in which he was perhaps encouraged by the example or advice of Sir Kenelm Digby. He died in Black-Fryars, December 9th, 1641, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral with a funeral pomp suited to his extraordinary abilities, and the universal esteem he had acquired by the urbanity of his manners and the liberality of his heart.

It is, perhaps, without example in the history of the art, that a painter, cut off in the vigour of his life, should have left such a multiplicity of works, the number of which is perhaps not exceeded by those of Rubens, though he died so young. If we cannot, in a general view, place him on an equality with Rubens as an historical painter, it will be allowed that he surpassed him in the correctness of his design, in the delicate expression of his heads, in the truth and purity of his colouring, and in the tender melting of his tones. If he had less boldness of conception, and less fecundity of invention, his compositions are regulated by judgment and propriety, and it may be reasonably presumed, that if, like his illustrious instructor, he had devoted himself to that branch, and had not been chiefly engaged in portrait painting, he possessed a genius, as well as every other requisite, to have reached the highest rank among the painters of history.

In portraiture Vandyck will not be denied the most honourable place after Titian, and it will then be admitted that Titian only retains this superiority in the heads of his portraits, and that in the hands and accessories he was inferior to our painter, both in correctness and elegance. His attitudes are easy and natural, and they captivate by an air of unaffected simplicity for which his portraits are singularly remarkable. His heads are full of life and expression, without any thing of the coldness and insipidity which are frequently found in the productions of the portrait painter. Independent of the many admirable pictures he painted of the king and the royal family, there are in England many fine portraits of distinguished personages, which are among the principal ornaments of the mansions of the nobility.

This distinguished painter occasionally amused himself with the point, and has etched several plates, which are executed with a spirit and fire bordering on enthusiasm. They consist chiefly of portraits of the most eminent artists of his time, from his own designs. Little attentive to the neatness or minuteness of his execution, his point is animated with a vigour and energy which are perhaps without example. The following are his principal works :

[It is probable that Van Dyck's father was something better than a painter on glass, as stated by Houbraken; other writers say he was a woollen-manufacturer. His mother was skilful in embroidery, which she wrought with considerable taste from designs both of landscape and figures. In a letter addressed to the Earl of Arundel, dated Antwerp, 17th July, 1620, it is stated, "Van Dyck lives with Rubens, and his works are beginning to be esteemed little less than those of his master. He is a young man of one-and-twenty, whose parents are persons of considerable property in this city, and it will be difficult, therefore, to induce him to remove." He entered the school of Rubens in 1615; so that he had then been five years under the tuition of that able master. The anecdote that is related of his having repainted the face of the Virgin and the arm of the Magdalene in a picture of the Descent from the Cross, by Rubens, which some of his fellow pupils had injured, was rendered doubtful by the story being applied to another picture, a St. Sebastian. But neither story is true; for the Descent from the Cross was painted by Rubens in 1611, and put up in the cathedral in 1612, as appears by the "Registres du Serment de l'Arquuse," three years at least before Van Dyck entered the school of Rubens; and the picture of St. Sebastian, in the church of the Augustines, was not finished till 1628. These facts have been ascertained by Monsr. François Mols, a native of Antwerp, and appear in his manuscript notes to "Descamps' Lives of the Flemish Painters," and are quoted from the copy in the possession of his Excellency Monsieur Sylvain Van de Weyer, by Mr. W. H. Carpenter, in the emendations to his Memoir of Van Dyck. That respecting his treatment by the Augustine monks, at Courtrai, is also shaken by the discovery of Van Dyck's autograph letter, acknowledging, with thanks, the receipt of the money, as well as of some gauffres, a cake for which Courtrai is celebrated, presented to him by the canons. The chapter could not view his picture and him with contempt, for he was not present when the picture was about to be placed in the chapel for which it was painted; not for the principal altar. It appears by a letter, dated Antwerp, the 8th of May, 1631, addressed by Marcus Van Woonsel to M. de Braye, a canon of the cathedral, that the picture was ordered by the latter for a particular chapel in the building, and that the sum of 600 florins was the price; when finished it was sent through the agency of the said Marcus Van Woonsel. Whether any dispute arose among the parties, which served as a foundation for the anecdote, does not appear; it is said that the canons, even now, make great difficulty of showing the original letters of Van Dyck in their possession, which induces the belief that they do not tell to the advantage of their predecessors. The love affair, which retarded his journey to Italy in 1619, seems to be more authentic. In passing through Saveltheim, a village near to Brussels, he became enamoured of a beautiful young woman of the name of Anna Van Ophem. The charms of her person more than counterbalanced the desire of visiting and contemplating the antiquities and pictures of Italy; he staid long enough with her to paint, at her solicitation it is said, two pictures for the parish church. The subject of one was, St. Martin dividing his Cloak with a Beggar, in which he introduced his own portrait as the saint, mounted on the horse presented to him by Rubens on commencing his journey. This pious offering obliterated the scandal, especially as the priest, and some others of the parish authorities, according to Michel, found that it was worth 4000 florins, and accordingly sold it to a Monsieur Hoet for that sum. But the villagers, who were delighted with the picture, were not so readily disposed to part with their patron saint, though personated by an unrepenting sinner; they armed themselves, their wives, and their children, with agricultural implements, determined to prevent the removal. A party was soon at the heels of Monsieur Hoet, who was obliged to escape through the priest's garden, and make the best of his way back to Brussels. The picture remained in the church till 1806, when, after considerable resistance by the inhabitants, it was taken by the French and removed to the Louvre, where it remained till 1815, when it was restored to its original situation. The other picture was a Holy Family; the characters being represented by his inamorata and her parents. During the war in Flanders the French infidels, the foragers for the army, who neither respected the sacred subject, nor knew the value of it as a painting, actually cut it up, it is said, and made sacks of it for their grain. Mr. Mols, who died in 1790, in his manuscript notes to Descamps, observes that this is a mistake, as the picture was still to be found in the church, over the altar of the Virgin. Van Dyck also painted the beautiful Anna's portrait, surrounded by several dogs, belonging to the Infanta Isabella, of which she had the care. This was preserved at the château de Tervure, a hunting-seat of the Duke Charles of Lorraine. Possibly her father was keeper of the hounds. Rubens, hearing of his pupil's infatuation, went to the village of Savelthem, roused him to a sense of his situation, and urged his instant departure for Italy. Another anecdote, which may or may not be true, is, that Van Dyck, passing through Haerlem, was desirous of seeing Frank Hals, whose portraits he much admired, but Frank was only to be found at the tavern. Van Dyck sent word that a stranger waited to have his portrait painted, and Hals made his appearance. Being told that he could only have two hours to execute the picture, he seized his palette and brushes, and on the first canvas that came in his way finished it within the stated time. Van Dyck on seeing it expressed satisfaction, observing that he thought painting a very easy process, and would like to try what he could do, requesting Hals to take the seat he had occupied. The latter soon perceived that his visitor was no novice in the use of his implements; but on seeing the performance he cried out with astonishment, "You are Van Dyck, for none other can do what you have done!" It is said that he visited England in 1629, and lodged with his friend and countryman, Geldorp the painter; but this is not certain. In 1632 he came by invitation from the Earl of Arundel, at the command of Charles I. It was the sight of the portrait of Nicholas Lanier, the chapel-master; not that of Sir Kenelm Digby, that induced Charles to send for Van Dyck. It was not the daughter of Lord Gowrie that he married; it was his granddaughter. Maria Ruthven was the daughter of Patrick Ruthven, a physician, fifth son of Lord Gowrie. It is said that his attention was at one time directed to Lady Stanhope; if so, he did not behave with his usual gallantry, for he disputed with the lady about the price of her portrait. The lady, it seems, was in love with Carey Raleigh, and probably Van Dyck perceived it; he sent her word that if she would not give the price demanded, he could sell it to another who would give more. When Charles withdrew secretly from Whitehall, he directed Colonel Whalley to return several pictures to different parties, and among them "my Lady Stanhope's picture to Carey Raleigh." By his wife, Maria Ruthven, he had one daughter, who was married to a gentleman of the name of Stepney; by this marriage there was issue one son, who became a merchant-grocer, and was the father of George Stepney, the poet, born in 1663. The number of pictures, portraits, and large historical compositions, attributed to Van Dyck, makes it almost incredible that so many should be the productions of one who had devoted so much of his time to pleasure, and died so young. In "Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish Painters," vol. iii. and Supplement, will be found descriptions, and interesting particulars, of upwards of nine hundred and fifty; and others are occasionally presenting themselves, which had not fallen under his observation. Many might be added for which the possessors claim his paternity, but they belong more properly to contemporary painters who were his assistants, or copyists, or adopted his style of portraiture, in which the resemblance would be much assisted by the costume of the time; some are not far below him. The pictures which he painted in Italy have more of the Venetian colouring than those of a subsequent period; but some of those painted at Genoa are deficient in this respect; they are called his Genoese pictures. On his return to Antwerp he recurred to the Flemish mode, occasionally blending the two. The earlier portraits he painted in England are brilliantly coloured and carefully finished in all their parts; but as business increased they were executed with more despatch, and much of the subordinate portion was left to be completed by his pupils or assistants, the head and the hands only being painted by the master.

There is a document preserved in the State Paper Office, which exhibits the prices charged by Van Dyck for portraits painted by him of Charles and Henrietta Maria, and other members of the royal family. It also shows that the king made very serious deductions from those charges, and also that the painter's pension was not regularly paid. The document is supposed to be in Van Dyck's handwriting, and is headed Whether this act of appraisement was spontaneous on the part of the king, or prompted by others, does not appear. The reduction in the queen's account is not less rigid; the claim on her Majesty for £380 is reduced to £200; which appears to be an enormous excision. The royal accountant did not think his painter entitled to interest on the five years' arrear of his pension, and in casting up has made the sum total £75 less than it should be, supposing that no deduction was made from the price charged for "Une piece pour la maison a Green Witz." "The King and all his Chevaliers" are set down by the painter without a price, and the royal appraiser seems to have thought them worth nothing.

"Le Roy alla ciasse," which is reduced in the bill from £200 to £100, is probably the same that is now in the Louvre; it represents Charles descended from his horse, with his equerry, the Marquis of Hamilton, and a page in attendance with his cloak. It was purchased by Madame du Barri, at the sale of the Marquis de Lassay's pictures in 1770, for 24,000 francs, (£960), and in 1816 was valued by the Experts du Musée at 100,000 francs (£4000). "Le prince Carles avecq le ducq de Iarc, (York), the princesses Maria, Elisabeth, and Anne," reduced from £200 to £100, are now in the royal collection, and the picture is considered worth at least 1200 guineas. The two portraits of the Queen, painted for "Mons^r Barnino," were intended for the sculptor Bernino, to enable him to execute a bust of her Majesty, in the same manner as he had done that of her husband Charles. The inquirer will do well to consult Mr. W. H. Carpenter's "Pictorial Notices," consisting of a memoir of Sir Anthony Van Dyck, a descriptive catalogue of his etchings, and a variety of interesting particulars relating to other artists patronized by Charles I. The greater portion of the matter is extracted, with much discrimination and industry, from original documents in the State Paper Office, the Office of Public Records, and other authentic sources. There is much credit due to Mr. Carpenter for rescuing from oblivion documents so valuable as relating to Rubens, Van Dyck, and other contemporary painters of the Flemish school, whose works occupy so large a space in all the best English collections, as well as in foreign countries. For the history of Rubens and Van Dyck it is indispensable.]

VANDYCK, PHILIP. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1680, and was a scholar of Arnold Boonen, under whose tuition he remained until he surpassed his instructor. He painted small portraits in the style of his master, but was more successfully employed in painting similar subjects to those of Mieris and Metzcu, representing conversations, ladies at their toilets, and gallant assemblies, which are ingeniously composed, and painted with neatness and delicacy, though unequal to the admired productions of the masters he imitated. In 1710 he established himself at Middleburg, where he was much employed. He was afterwards invited to the Hague, and was patronized by the families of Wassemaer, Fagel, and Schuylenberg, for whom he painted some of his best pictures. The reputation he had acquired recommended him to the notice of William, Prince of Hesse, who not only engaged him to paint several pictures, but commissioned him to purchase the choicest works of art he could meet with in Holland and Flanders, for the rich collection he was then forming at Cassel. In this undertaking he acquitted himself with judgment and taste, and entirely to the satisfaction of his protector. On his return to the Hague, he painted the portraits of the Stadtholder and those of his family, as well as several pictures for the cabinet of that prince, and continued to exercise his talents with great respectability until the year 1752, when he died at the Hague. Two of his happiest productions have been thought worthy of being placed in the gallery of the Louvre. They represent a young lady at her toilet, and a lady playing on the guitar. [These two pictures are not now in the Louvre; one is at the Hague, and the other in the Museum at Brussels. The Louvre has two others, relating to Abraham and Hagar.]

VANGELISTI, VINCENZO, an Italian engraver, born at Florence about the year 1744. He visited Paris when young, where he became a pupil of John George Wille. He has engraved several plates in a neat, finished style, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Amand de Bourbon, Prince of Conty.
George Louis, Count de Buffon; after A. Pujos.

SUBJECTS.

The Virgin and Infant; after Raffaele.
Venus chastising Cupid; after Agos. Caracci.
Pyramus and Thisbe; after Guido.

[Zani says he was born in 1738; and Ferrario, that he committed suicide in 1798, having previously defaced all his plates. He had several pupils, who have since distinguished themselves as eminent engravers; among them, Longhi and F. Anderloni. His capo d'opera is the plate of Pyramus and Thisbe, from a picture attributed to Guido, but in reality from one by De la Hire. He was the first director of the School of Engraving instituted at Milan in 1790 by Leopold II. Longhi succeeded him.]

VANLOO, JAMES. This painter was born at Sluys, in Holland, in 1614, and learned the rudiments of design from his father, an obscure artist, who sent him to Amsterdam, where he had an opportunity of profiting by the instruction of a master who is not named. He became a reputable painter of history and portraits, and, in the prime of life, established himself at Paris, where he was principally employed in portraiture. He became a member of the Academy there, and painted for his picture of reception the portrait of Michael Corneille, the elder, which is a creditable specimen of his abilities. Of his historical pictures, Honbraken mentions as the most considerable the Bath of Diana, and the discovery of the Pregnancy of Calisto. He is said to have been a correct designer of the naked, and an agreeable colourist. He died at Paris in 1670.

VANLOO, JOHN BAPTIST, was the grandson of the preceding artist, born at Aix in Provence, in 1684. His father, a painter of little celebrity, taught him the elements of design, and, possessed of a decided genius for the art, his advancement was extraordinary, without the aid of superior instruction. He had already acquired considerable reputation by some pictures he painted for the churches and public edifices at Toulon, when the siege of that place, in 1707, obliged him to return to Aix. He was soon afterwards taken under the protection of the Prince of Carignan, who enabled him to indulge the desire he had long expressed, of visiting Rome, where he studied the works of the best masters, and received some lessons from Benedetto Luti. His talents were not neglected at Rome; he painted some pictures for the churches and palaces, of which one of the most esteemed is the Scourging of Christ, in S. Maria in Monticelli. He was invited to the court of Turin, where he was for some time employed by the Duke of Savoy, whose portrait he painted, with those of the principal nobility. He afterwards passed some time at Paris, where he became a member of the Academy, and painted for his picture of reception Diana and Endymion. For the church of St. Martin des Champs, he painted the Entry of Christ into Jerusalem; and in St. Germain des Prés, is a picture by him of St. Peter delivered from Prison.

In 1737 he came to England, where, according to the Anecdotes, his first works were the portraits of Colley Cibber and Owen Mac Swinney, whose long silver hairs were extremely picturesque, and contributed to give the new painter reputation. He was favoured with the patronage of Sir Robert Walpole, by whom he was introduced to the Prince and Princess of Wales, whose portraits he painted. Vanloo soon bore away the chief business of London from every other painter. His likenesses were very striking, though not often flattering, and his heads were coloured with force. His draperies and other accessories were usually painted by Van Aken, and Vanloo's scholars, Eccardt and Root. In 1742 he found his health considerably impaired, and he was advised to try the effect of the air of his native country, Provence, where he died in 1746.

VANLOO, CHARLES ANDREW, called CARLO. This artist was the younger brother of John Baptist Vanloo, born at Nice in 1705. He was instructed in the rudiments of design by his brother, whom he accompanied to Rome, and studied for some time under Benedetto Luti. He returned to Paris in 1723, where he gained the first prize for historical painting, and was employed, with his brother, to repair the paintings by Primaticcio, in the Gallery of Fontainebleau. In 1727 he again visited Italy, and passed some time at Rome, studying the works of the best masters. He was invited to the court of Turin, and passed some years in the service of the King of Sardinia, where, among other considerable works, he painted a series of subjects taken from Tasso.

In 1734 he returned to France, and was received into the Academy the following year; his reception picture represented Apollo and Marsyas. He now became one of the most popular artists of his time, and in 1752 the king conferred on him the order of St. Michael, and afterwards appointed him his principal painter, in which capacity he died, in 1765. His principal works at Paris are his pictures in the church of the Augustines, called les Petits Peres, and one of his esteemed productions is in the gallery of the Louvre, representing the Marriage of the Virgin. By his studies in Italy, he acquired a correctness and simplicity of style, which had a useful influence in reforming the modern French school from the affected and theatrical manner introduced into it by Coypel and De Troy. His countrymen have not scrupled to attribute to him the design of Raffaele, the grace of Coreggio, and the colour of Titian. A juster homage to his talents would have been to compare him to the best of the modern Italian painters. His merit, though eclipsed by a comparison with the brilliant luminaries of the brightest era of the art, appears to a respectable advantage when compared with his contemporaries.

VANLÓO, LOUIS MICHAEL. This artist was the son of John Baptist Vanloo, born at Toulon in 1707. He received his instruction in the art from his father, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, though he was more distinguished for his excellence in portraiture. He was made a member of the Academy at Paris, and painted for his reception a picture of Apollo and Daphne. Philip V. of Spain invited him to the court of Madrid, and appointed him his principal painter. After the death of that monarch he returned to Paris, and continued the exercise of his talents with great success. He died in 1771.

VANMANDER, CHARLES. This painter and writer on art was born at Meulebeke, near Courtray in 1548. He was of a noble family, and received an education suited to his rank. At an early age he discovered a lively genius for poetry and the belles-lettres, and a decided disposition for painting. To cultivate the latter, on finishing his literary pursuits, he was placed under the tuition of Lucas de Heere, a painter and poet of Ghent, with whom he studied some time, and afterwards became a disciple of Peter Vlerick, an historical painter of some eminence at Courtray. He had acquired considerable reputation by some pictures he had painted for the churches in Flanders, when he determined to visit Italy, and passed three years at Rome, where he was assiduously employed in designing the remains of antiquity, and studying the works of the best masters. He formed an intimate acquaintance with Bartholomew Sprangher, and, in conjunction with that artist, was employed for some of the public places and private collections at Rome. For the town of Terni, in the Roman state, he painted one of his most esteemed pictures, representing the Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew. After a residence of three years in Italy, he had thoughts of returning to Flanders, when he was prevailed on, by his friend Sprangher, to accompany him to Vienna, where he met with the most flattering encouragement, and received a pressing invitation to enter the service of the Emperor; but his attachment to his native country prevented him from accepting so honourable a mark of distinction.

He experienced from his friends and countrymen the most lively expressions of kindness and favour, and received commissions for a variety of considerable works. One of his earliest productions after his return from Italy, was a picture of Adam and Eve in Paradise, in which he evinced how much his style of design had been reformed by his studies at Rome. This performance was followed by a more arduous undertaking, representing the Deluge, in which he described the horror of the scene, and the varied expression of terror, grief, and despair, in the most striking and pathetic manner. He was in full possession of the public estimation, both as a painter and a poet, when this state of tranquil prosperity was interrupted by the calamities of war, with which the Low Countries became at that time afflicted. He took refuge in Holland, and settled at Haerlem, where he formed an intimacy with Henry Goltzius, and, in conjunction with that artist, established an academy there, in which he introduced the style of design he had acquired in Italy. Among his principal works in Holland were, St. John preaching in the Wilderness; the Adoration of the Magi; and Christ bearing his Cross. In 1604 he removed to Amsterdam, and died in that city in 1606. We are indebted to Vanmander for an account of the painters of antiquity, and those of the Italian and Flemish schools from the year 1366 to 1604.

[Alfred Michiels, in the preface to "Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise," has given an account of Karel Van Mander, as a specimen how the life of a painter should be written. It is lively, romantic, and interesting. It details in poetical language his birth, parentage, education; his various occupations and adventures; his love "pour une belle personne de dix-huit ans, plus gracieuse que les plus charmantes, pauvre et obscure, mais si bonne et si douce que l'amour profond de Van Mander pour elle lui donna le courage de l'épouser, sans craindre la tempête qui devastait la Flandre!" Having married this charming person, he established himself at Courtray to escape the horrors of war, which ravaged his native place. From Courtray he was driven by the plague to seek shelter at Bruges; but on his journey, with his wife and children, was met by a band of marauders, who stripped them of all they possessed, even to the clothes of the infant in arms. Luckily one of the bandits threw away an old garment, in which Van Mander wrapped himself, and, as luckily, his wife, searching the pocket, found a piece of gold which the robber had unwittingly left there. This put the painter in good humour; he consoled his wife by telling her that he would paint at Bruges to obtain wherewith to feed and clothe themselves, and ended by taking the infant from her arms, dancing, and singing with all his might "une chanson joyeuse," so that she could not refrain from laughter in the midst of her tears. In this plight they reached the city. But his adventures were not at an end; the plague attacked this place of refuge also; death appeared in his most hideous forms, and the Spanish troops kept the city in a continual state of anxiety. Finding that no tranquillity was to be enjoyed in a country ravaged by soldiers and afflicted by Heaven, he determined to seek peace and security in the United Provinces. Holland had just freed herself from the yoke of Spain; the national flag floated on her fortresses and on her vessels; William the Taciturn protected, sword in hand, the liberty of a regenerate people; and the Lutheran doctrines excited in their minds that enthusiasm which produces great actions. Van Mander embarked for Holland, and reached Haerlem without accident. Here he established himself, painted for the churches and for private individuals; formed an academy, and had numerous scholars. In his hours of leisure he wrote an abundance of verses. He translated the Iliad of Homer; the Georgics and the Bucolics of Virgil; the Metamorphoses of Ovid; and began his Lives of the Painters. The last he finished at Zevenbergen, between Haerlem and Alkmaar, where he remained for a year. At this place his early love for dramatic representations revived. He composed an allegory touching the arts, which his pupils performed. The inhabitants of the neighbourhood were invited; the piece was enlivened with fire-works; the theatre ornamented under his direction with crowns, garlands, and trophies composed of all the instruments used by painters; the exhibition was received with general applause. From Zevenbergen he went to reside at Amsterdam. Here he fell sick; and, although he endeavoured to vanquish his pain by his courage, he was obliged to send for a doctor. From that moment his situation became perilous; for he found it was two against one, says the biographer. The man of skill (Michiels calls him Le guérisseur) expedited the business by a debilitating regimen, and the patient died of weakness. His brothers surrounded him at this most important moment, (au moment suprême,) and endeavoured to console his wife, who with seven children wept about his funeral bed. They crowned him with laurel in his coffin; three hundred friends and amateurs followed him to the field of eternal repose; a multitude of panegyrists feelingly deplored his loss; his name for a long time was encircled with glory among the people of Belgium and Holland. At the present time his celebrity is somewhat clouded; the bad taste of his pictures has not maintained its brilliance; and his other works are read only by the learned, or rather they read but one, the "History of Painters." Of this work Michiels gives a short critical analysis, in which censure predominates; and he promises to complete this study of the painter-writer at the commencement of his fourth volume. This specimen, he says, shows what resources the biography of artists present. Not only does the interest not exclude truth, but supposes it. A heavy and monotonous recital, in losing all character, in neglecting the real attributes, falls into a species of falsehood, as it puts a skeleton in the place of a man. As the foregoing is but the skeleton of Michiels' full-fledged figure, the reader may judge of its dimensions. The writer of a dictionary of artists is compelled by necessity to abridge many circumstances that are very interesting to readers of romance, and notice those only that treat of facts relating to the painter's performances. It is for these that a dictionary is consulted; and the inquirer is generally satisfied if they are clearly stated, however short and unembellished. As our respected friend, Michiels, has not completed his biographical portrait, it would be premature, and perhaps unjust, to accuse him of having omitted what is considered the most essential part in the history of an artist, a description of his works. It must be confessed, at the same time, that he has laid down some very excellent rules how this should be done; and done it might be, in the manner he proposes, provided that a volume could be allotted to the life of every painter. Whether patient readers would be found is another question. All former biographies, folios and octavos, would be but post-chaise companions, mere hand-books, compared to a work so elaborated. It may, however, be suspected that what he says of other compilations might be equally the fate of this: "On en lit quelques pages, on se traine sur la texte, puis on bâille de lassitude, et on tourne ses regards ailleurs." To escape these disagreeable sensations, the many prefer such abridged accounts as this and other dictionaries present, and the compilers only have to toil through the fatiguing relations, to select what will save the reader the same unpleasant labour. To those who are willing to encounter it, we cannot recommend a more pleasant travelling companion and guide than Alfred Michiels.]

VANNI, FRANCESCO CAVALIERE. This painter was born at Siena in 1563, and was taught the rudiments of design by his father, an artist of little celebrity, who died when he was very young. He afterwards became the disciple of Arcangiolo Salimbeni, who had married his mother. According to Baglione, he visited Rome when he was sixteen years of age, where he entered the school of Giovanni de Vecchi, under whose direction he designed from the antique, and studied the works of the best masters: the style of Baroccio particularly attracted his attention, which he imitated with great success, and returned to Siena a graceful and correct designer. He afterwards visited the different cities of Lombardy, and at Parma was some time occupied in copying the works of Coreggio and Parmigiano. By the recommendation of Cardinal Baronio, he was invited to Rome, to assist in the decoration of St. Peter's, where he painted his celebrated picture of Simon the Magician, which, although considerably damaged by imprudent cleaning, still excites admiration. It is designed and coloured in the style of Baroccio. For this performance, Clement VIII. conferred on him the order of Christ. He painted several other pictures for the public edifices at Rome, of which the most considerable are, St. Michael vanquishing the rebel Angels, in the sacristy of St. Gregorio; a Pietà, in S. Maria in Vallicella; and the Assumption, in S. Lorenzo in Miranda. His best performances are, however, to be met with at Siena, in some of which he approached nearer to the graceful style of Baroccio, than even the disciples of that master. Such are his pictures of the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the chapel of Il Refugio; and S. Raimondo walking on the Sea, in the church of the Dominicans. The latter is considered the finest work of art in that city.

Although Vanni appears to have generally adopted the style of Baroccio for his model, his design is usually more correct, particularly in the hands, and his touch is more animated and facile. His compositions, though seldom abundant, are characterized by judgment and propriety, the airs of his heads are dignified and expressive, and his colouring is tender and harmonious. He died at Siena in 1610. We have a few etchings by this able artist, which are designed and executed in so correct and spirited a style, that it is to be regretted that he did not more frequently amuse himself with the point; among others are the following:

The Virgin with the infant Jesus sleeping.
St. Catherine of Siena.
St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.
The ecstasie Vision of St. Francis.

[Francisco Vanni was born in 1565. His father married the widow of Arcangiolo Salimbeni, who died in 1563, not in 1583, as is generally supposed. See the note to the article ARCIANGIOLO SALIMBENI. Lanzi observes, that the widow of Arcangiolo married again, and bore Francesco Vanni in 1565, consequently the latter could not be the scholar of Arcangiolo, though such an idea is very prevalent. Bartsch describes but three etchings as genuine by F. Vanni; St. Francis receiving the Stigmata he omits; two others attributed to the master, The Virgin reading and the Infant asleep, and St. Francis meditating a Crucifix, he considers the first doubtful, the second false.]

VANNI, RAFFAELLE, was the son of Francesco Vanni, born at Siena in 1596, and received his first instruction in the art from his father, whom he had the misfortune to lose when he was only thirteen years of age. He was afterwards sent to Rome, and recommended to the care of Antonio Caracci, under whose tuition he is said, by Mancini, to have acquired an ability superior to his father. Posterity, however, has not ratified so favourable a decision. He is generally allowed to have been a bold and correct designer, and to have possessed a judicious management of the chiaro-scuro. The works of his contemporary, Pietro da Cortona, appear to have had for him peculiar attraction, and he has imitated the splendid style of that master in the greater part of his works. His picture of the Birth of the Virgin, in the church of La Pace, is entirely Cortonesque; as are also the angles and cupola of S. Maria del Popolo. He was made a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1655. [The time of his death is not ascertained. His brother, Michelangiolo Vanni, is more celebrated as the inventor of staining marble than as a painter.]

VANNI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Baldinucci, this artist was born at Florence in 1599; other authorities state him to have been a native of Pisa. He was a disciple of Cristoforo Allori, and painted history with some reputation. Of his works as a painter, the most considerable is a picture of S. Lorenzo, in the church of S. Simone, at Florence. He is, however, more known as an engraver than a painter. We have by him several etchings, executed in a spirited and masterly style, although the drawing is not very correct. Among others are the following:

A set of fifteen Plates from the paintings by Coreggio, in the cupola of S. Giovanni, at Parma.
The Martyrdom of S. Placido; after the same.
The Marriage of Cana; after P. Veronese.

[Bartsch says he died at Florence in 1660. He thinks that the seventeen prints mentioned in the text include the whole of his engravings, though Gori has attributed others to him, after Bamboccio and P. Veronese.]

VANNINI, OTTAVIO. This painter was born at Florence in 1585, and was first a disciple of Gio. Batista Mercati, but he was afterwards instructed by Anastagio Fontebuoni, and ultimately entered the school of Domenico da Passignano, whom he assisted in many of his principal works. In the pictures he painted from his own designs his execution is laboured and cold; and though he is diligently attentive to the individual parts, the whole is feeble and ineffective. He died in 1643. [Lanzi allows that he was a good colourist; and Zani marks him B. B.]

VANNUCCHI. See SARTO.

VANNUCCI. See PERUGINO.

VANSOMER, PAUL. This artist was born at Antwerp about the year 1576, and, according to Vanmander, resided at Amsterdam in 1604, with his brother Bernard, where they practised portrait painting with great success. Paul Vansomer soon afterwards visited England, as there are several English portraits by him, dated from 1606 to 1620. He was one of the ablest painters of portraits who visited this country previous to Vandyck. His portrait of the Lord Chamberlain, William, Earl of Pembroke, in St. James's Palace, is equal to any production of the time. He painted two pictures of James I., one of which was engraved by Vertue; his queen, Anne of Denmark, and several of the nobility. Vansomer died about the age of forty-five, and was buried in St. Martin-in-the-Fields, as appears by the register, January 5, 1621: Paulus Vansomer pictor eximius sepultus fuit in ecclesia. [The accounts given by different writers of Paul and Bernard Van Somer, or Van Someren, contradict each other. Balkema says that they established themselves at Amsterdam, where they both died; Bernard in 1632, and Paul in 1641. If so, the Paul of our text was not the brother of Bernard. But writers of more authority say that he was. As there were several artists, painters and engravers, of the same name, much confusion has been caused by the writers not attending to dates. What is said of Paul Vansomer in the text, so far as his being an excellent portrait painter; of his painting many of the English nobility; of his residing in England a considerable time, and dying there, is correct. Some have even confounded him with the engraver of the same name; this is not so. Paul the engraver flourished much later than Paul the painter; and mezzotinto scraping was not known during the life of the latter.]

VANUDEN, LUCAS. This painter was the son of an artist of little repute, born at Antwerp in 1595, and was taught the rudiments of design by his father. He had not the advantage of any superior instruction, but, endowed with a decided genius for landscape painting, he was indefatigable in his studies from nature, and passed his leisure hours in the fields and forests, where he designed with fidelity every object which appeared to him picturesque or remarkable, and was particularly attentive to the peculiar appearance of the atmosphere, from the time the rising sun dissipates the vapours, till it sinks in the horizon. He represented these effects with uncommon truth and precision, and by an attentive study of the admirable landscapes of Rubens, he acquired an excellent tone of colouring, and a vigorous and animated touch. His extraordinary merit recommended him to the particular attention of Rubens, at a period when Antwerp was the residence of so many able artists. That distinguished master assisted him with his advice; he frequently employed him to paint the landscapes in the backgrounds of his historical pictures; and occasionally embellished the landscapes of Vanuden with his admirable figures. The congeniality of their taste and execution gave to these performances the appearance of being the productions of the same hand.

Some of the small landscapes of Vanuden, which are esteemed his best works, bear so strong a resemblance to those of Rubens, that they are only distinguishable by a less daring execution, and have the effect of those of Rubens viewed through the medium of a diminishing optic. His pictures represent views in Flanders; and though the local confines of his country do not admit of the extensive vistas which we admire in the expansive scenery of Claude or Poussin, he compensates, in a great degree, for this privation, by a faithful and interestingly simple representation of nature. Some of the latter works of Vanuden are decorated with the figures of David Teniers; and this embellishment is no small enhancement of the value of his pictures. We have several etchings by this able artist, which are executed in a picturesque and masterly style; among which are the following:

- Ten Landscapes and Views in Flanders, of various sizes; from his own designs.
- Four Landscapes; after Rubens. The first impressions are before the name of Rubens was inserted.
- Two Landscapes with figures; after Titian; one with a Holy Family, and the other with the Good Samaritan.

[Bartsch has given descriptions of fifty-nine etchings which he attributes to Lucas Van Uden; he, however, acknowledges that several of them bear so strong a resemblance to those of Louis de Vadder, that experienced connoisseurs often find themselves embarrassed in their endeavours to distinguish them. Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has added two, and has also pointed out the variations that exist of the greater number. He has also thrown light on those described by Bartsch, and marked with the letters P A I, which he has restored to the true master. This master is P. A. Immenraet, a contemporary of Van Uden, whose name has been unaccountably corrupted by most of the Flemish and Dutch writers to Emelraet. On account of this misnomer, probably, the works of Immenraet were said to be very rare, though the fine landscapes of Emelraet, as adjuncts to the historical compositions of other painters, were well known. It is hazardous to dissent from Bartsch, who says these letters, P A I, are, according to all appearance, the initials of some painter after whom Lucas Van Uden made the engravings. The letters are traced with a fine point on five of the plates enumerated by Bartsch, numbers 15 to 20 inclusive. Neither of these has the name or mark of Van Uden; it must not therefore be said that the misappropriation (if it be so) was the act of that artist. But they are included in a series of eight etchings, the first of which (Bartsch, No. 13) is inscribed Lucas van Uden invenit. Franciscus van den Wyngaerde excudit. Weigel remarks, that three other pieces (Nos. 27, 32, and 34) have the same letters, and consequently he considers them to be the works of Immenraet. But there are more feathers to be plucked from Van Uden. The numbers 36 to 40 inclusive, and 43 and 44, in Bartsch's Catalogue, are claimed by Robert Dumesnil for Jean Bonnacroy. Of this engraver very little is known. Zani mentions him as Giovanni, or Giovanni Sebastiano Bonnacroy, a Fleming, but gives no date; he however marks him B B., a proof that he knew his works, and classes him as a landscape painter and engraver. There are some slight differences in the descriptions of Bartsch and Dumesnil. Bartsch, No. 36, says, "Au milieu du devant on aperçoit un berger entouré des plusieurs moutons. Il semble être un genou en terre." Dumesnil says, "Au milieu du devant on aperçoit l'enfant prodigue agenouillé gardant des pourceaux;" and he names the piece "L'Enfant prodigue." The impressions seen by Bartsch must have been before the inscription J. Bonnacroy fec. Exc. Another is inscribed J. B. F. Bonnacroy F.; a third, J. Bon, the latter part being hidden by the work, as is also the case in another. To these seven Dumesnil has added one, not mentioned by Bartsch, "Le Cheval effrayé," signed Joan. Bonnacroy Inv. Fec., treated in the manner of Louis de Vadder. Dumesnil remarks, that in five or six of these pieces Bonnacroy was evidently inspired by Lucas Van Uden and Louis de Vadder, so as to produce an illusion. See Robert Dumesnil's excellent work, "Le Peintre Graveur Français," tom. iii. See also Bartsch, "Peintre Graveur," tom. v., and R. Weigel's invaluable Supplement. A remark, however, must be made on the print, N^o. 57, of Bartsch, known as the "Watering-place." The first impressions are inscribed Lucas van Uden pinxit et excud. Afterwards it bears Pet. Paul Rubenius pinxit—Lucas van Uden fecit—Franciscus van den Wyn-gaerde excudit. The picture is now in England, and in the collection of the Duke of Buccleuch; it was formerly in that of the Duc de Tallard, and afterwards of the Duke of Montague. The solution of the discrepancies on the prints is, that Van Uden painted the landscape, and Rubens the cattle and figures. In the first instance, Van Uden conceived that he had a right to claim it, as probably the figures were considered by him as merely embellishments to his landscape; in the second, Wyn-gaerde, the publisher, may have suggested that the name of Rubens would be more advantageous to the sale of the print. It may be observed, that it is not engraved by Bolswert, or any other that Rubens generally employed on his landscapes. The subject is well known, from the admirable print by Brown. In the catalogue of James Hazard's prints, sold at Brussels in 1789, there are fifty-six attributed to Van Uden: among them is a first impression of this disputed landscape, before the line at bottom; it is described as a pure aquatints etching, before the retouch, signed Lucas van Uden pinxit et excud.: and said to be unique. The writer of the catalogue adds, "Cet article est interessant." The British Museum, however, possesses two of these prints; first, the pure etching, with the name of Van Uden pinxit et excud.; second state, with the inscription as before, and without the line at bottom; and also the third state, with the name of Rubens. In the same collection is a print by Van Uden which seems to have escaped the notice of all writers on the subject. It is a bird's-eye view of the mansion of Cleypael, and the territory thereunto appertaining, inscribed L. van Uden delineavit et fecit, ANNO MDC.LXI. It is to be found in a book entitled "Notitia Marchionatus," &c., by Jacob Le Roy, published at Amsterdam in 1678. It measures L. 18 $\frac{3}{4}$ in.; H. 12 $\frac{3}{4}$ in. It is supposed that Van Uden died about 1662.]

VAN UDEN, JAMES, was the brother and scholar of the preceding artist, and painted landscapes in the style of Lucas Vanuden; but his pictures are in every respect very inferior.

VANVITELLI, or VANVITEL, GASPARE, called DAGLI OCCHIALI. This painter, though generally considered of the Italian school, was born at Utrecht in 1647. He excelled in painting architectural and perspective subjects, and has represented the views of modern Rome, and of different cities and seaports in Italy, with a precision approaching to those of Venice by Canaletto. His delineation and admeasurement of the buildings and other objects are exact, and his tints are natural and agreeable; though he is very inferior to Canaletto in the spirit and animation of his touch, and in the lustre and brilliancy of his colouring. He died at Rome in 1736. [The family name of this painter was Witel, but having passed the greater part of his life in Rome and Naples, he Italianized it to Vanvitelli. There was another of the same name, who was a scholar of Matthew Withoos, and painted similar subjects to those of that master. Luigi Vanvitelli, the architect who built the magnificent palace at Caserta, was the son of the painter called Occhiali.]

VARCO, ALONSO DE. According to Palomino, this Spanish painter was born at Madrid in 1645, and was a disciple of Don Josef Antolinez. He painted landscapes in the style of his instructor, and was much employed for the convents and the private collections at Madrid, in which city he died in 1680.

VARDY, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1749, by whom we have a print representing the Gothic hall at Hampton Court, executed in a neat, spirited style.

[VAREGE, ———, if not a scholar, a close imitator of Cornelius Poelemburg, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He painted small landscapes with figures, generally on copper. He is not noticed by the Dutch or Flemish writers, and from the name it may be conjectured that he was of French origin.]

VARELA, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1606. He was a scholar of Pablo de las Roelas, and painted history with considerable reputation. Amongst his most considerable works are his pictures of the Martyrdom of San Vicente, in the church dedicated to that Saint; and an altar-piece representing St. Michael, in the convent of la Merced. There are also several of his pictures in the private collections at Seville, where he died in 1656. [Varela must have been born earlier than 1606, as he was employed in 1618 by the Carthusians of Santa Maria to make copies of certain pictures painted by Gaudin for the grand Chartreuse at Grenoble. Bermudez commends his correct drawing and Venetian colouring, and notices The Last Supper, in the church of San Bernardo, as one of his best works. The picture is signed with his name, and dated 1622.]

[VARGAS, ANDRES DE, was born at Cuenca in 1613, and went while young to Madrid, where he placed himself under Francisco Camilo; he applied attentively to drawing, but still more so to the style of colouring of his master, in which he soon succeeded. Camilo became his friend, and through his recommendations he was employed both in the churches and by private persons. On his return to Cuenca he painted in fresco the chapel of Our Lady of the Sanctuary, and several large pictures in oil. He had some of the qualities of a good painter, and would have been so but for his carelessness, and the bad system he adopted of regulating the quality of his work by the price. He died in 1674. His works are in churches at Madrid, Cuenca, Hiniesta, and in private collections.]

VARGAS, LUIS DE. De Vargas was one of the most eminent Spanish painters of the sixteenth century. According to Palomino, he was born at Seville in 1528. Having learned the elements of the art in his native city he went to Italy, and passed seven years at Rome, where his studies were principally directed to the works of Pierino del Vaga. On his return to Seville he found himself unable to compete with Pedro Campaña, whose works were at that time in great repute, and he returned to Rome, where he renewed his studies with increased alacrity. A second residence of seven years in that capital, and an attentive study of the works of Raffaele and Michael Angelo, which were the models he now consulted, enabled him to return to Spain an able and correct designer. Soon after his arrival at Seville he gave proof of extraordinary ability in two pictures he painted for the cathedral, representing Christ bearing his Cross, and Adam and Eve. The latter gained him great reputation, and was so much admired by Matteo Perez Alesio, a painter of eminence, that, on contemplating his performance, he exclaimed, that one limb of the Adam of de Vargas was worth more than the whole composition of his colossal St. Christopher; and returning soon after to Italy, gave that honourable testimony of his own candour, and the merit of de Vargas, which is noticed in the Life of that artist. He executed several other works for the churches at Seville, both in oil and in fresco; among the most esteemed of which are the principal altar-piece in the cathedral, and a picture of the Virgin holding a rosary, in the convent of San Pablo.

De Vargas was not less distinguished for his excellence in portrait painting, than for his historical pictures; some of his productions in that branch are by his Spanish biographer compared to the works of Raffaele. He died at Seville in 1590.

[Palomino, in his account of Luis de Vargas, has mistaken dates and circumstances. Vargas was born in 1502, and died in 1568. According to Bermudez, he went to Italy in 1527, and according to Pacheco, remained there twenty-eight years, and returned to his own country about the middle of the 16th century. The first picture which he painted after his return was a Nativity for the cathedral at Seville, in 1535, and which it appears still exists as an altar-piece in the chapel dedicated to that event. This date Bermudez found in the records of the chapter, and the picture is inscribed Tunc discobam Luissus de Vargas. There seems to be no proof that he returned to Spain after an absence of only seven years, which would be in 1534, to compete with Pedro Campaña, who was at that very time in Italy, and did not make his appearance at Seville till about 1548. The great works of Vargas were painted in fresco, and unfortunately little of them now remains. Among the most remarkable was the subject of Christ bearing his Cross, called "La calle de la Amargura," which he painted in 1563. Criminals going to execution were allowed to stop at the church where this picture was to perform their devotions before it. About thirty years after its completion, it was repaired by Vasco Pereyra, a Portuguese artist. The Last Judgment, painted for the Casa de la Misericordia, is a wreck. The upper part of the composition presents traces of the Redeemer, the Virgin Mary, and the Apostles; but the lower part, in which were groups of the elect and condemned, is completely effaced. The same fate has befallen the figures of the Apostles, Evangelists, and other Saints, which he painted in the niches of the tower of the cathedral, in the last year of his life. Of his pictures in oil, that which has obtained most admiration is one representing the genealogy of Jesus Christ in the flesh, to which they have given the Italian name "La Gamba," on account of the compliment paid to it by Mateo Perez Alesio, as mentioned in the text. The anecdote, however, is not true; for Vargas died fifteen years before Perez painted his St. Christopher. Luis de Vargas was mild, benevolent, and charitable, suffering with patience the attacks and injuries of his rivals. In his house he led the life of an anchorite. At his death they found in the chamber to which he used to retire for his devotions, the hair shirts, scourges, and other instruments of penitence and mortification, and even a coffin in which he was accustomed to repose and ruminate on death. Yet he was, in his intercourse with the world, of a cheerful disposition, and occasionally indulged in a witty expression. An indifferent artist having painted Christ on the Cross, asked his opinion of the figure; Vargas replied, "It is well; it seems to be saying—Lord, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Ceán Bermudez says that Vargas painted many pictures, both in fresco and in oil, equal to the best masters of Italy. Nothing could be more correct than his contours, nor grander than his forms, nor better understood than his foreshortenings; for in these particulars he was superior to the most renowned of his countrymen who have followed him. If in his smaller pictures (those painted on panel in oil) the aerial effect and gradations of light and tints had been equal to the splendour of his principal colours, the beautiful foldings of his draperies, the nobleness of the expressions and of the attitudes, the graceful air of the figures, the strict imitation of nature in the accessories, he would have been the best painter of Spain; but these defects were very common in his time, and the greatest artists were not free from them.]

VAROTARI, DARIO. This painter was born at Verona in 1539, and was a scholar of Paolo Veronese, though he did not entirely follow the principles of that master, but endeavoured to imitate the style of Titian, particularly in the airs of his heads. His chief residence was at Padua, where he became the founder of a respectable school. Some of his principal works are in the church of S. Egidio, in that city. There are also several of his pictures in the churches at Venice, and in the state. He died in 1596. [Dario was respectable as a painter, but much more eminent as an architect.]

[VAROTARI, DARIO, JUNIORE, was the grandson of the preceding, and son of Alessandro Varotari, called Il Padouanino. He flourished about the year 1660. He was a painter, engraver, poet, and physician. Though his works as a painter are not known, his portraits have been highly extolled for the spirit of their attitudes, their colouring, and exquisite taste in the manner of Giorgione. In Bartsch we find two portraits engraved by him; that of his grandfather, Dario Varotari, and of Vincentius Gussonus, Eq., both signed with his name. There are no other particulars of him as an artist, except that he painted rather to please his friends than for gain.]

VAROTARI, ALESSANDRO, called IL PADOUANINO, was the son of the elder Dario Varotari, and born at Padua in 1590. His father dying when he was only six years of age, he was instructed in the art by a painter who is not mentioned. He, however, derived his principal improvement by studying the fresco works of Titian, which remained at Padua, and his juvenile copies of some of them were the surprise and admiration of the artists. He was sent to Venice when he was very young, where the talents he discovered at so early an age procured him the name of Il Padouanino. At Venice he continued his studies after the works of Titian, and at length entered so entirely into his manner, that he was considered one of the most successful followers of his style. If his design had been equal to his colouring, few painters of the Venetian school would have surpassed him. He generally selected subjects which admitted the introduction of the naked, in which he was as successful in the beauty and tenderness of his carnations, as deficient in the correctness of his drawing. His most considerable works at Venice are, the Marriage at Cana, in the Capitolo della Carità; four pictures representing subjects from the Life of St. Dominick, in the refectory of S.S. Giovanni e Paolo; and a Miracle of the Virgin, in S. Maria Maggiore. He died in 1650.

[His eulogy by Lanzi should not be omitted. Padouanino, says that excellent critic, was always equal to the task of handling any subject that had before been treated by Titian; his softer with grace, his more powerful with strength, his heroic with dignity; in which last, if I mistake not, he surpassed every disciple of that master. "Le donne, i cavalier, l'armi, e gli Amori," these, and let me add to them his boys, were the favourite subjects of his pencil, which he exhibited to the most advantage, and which he most frequently introduced in his compositions. He knew how to treat landscape as well, and in some of his small pictures has succeeded admirably. He was familiar with the science of the sotto in su, (ceiling painting, seen from below to above,) of which he gave a most favourable specimen in the church of St. Andrea di Bergamo, in three admirable histories of that Saint. It is a work embellished with beautiful architecture, and replete with graces. He has approached equally near to his model in the sobriety of his composition, in the very difficult use of the middle tints, in his contrasts, in the colour of his flesh, in smoothness and facility of hand. In forming a judgment of his productions it is necessary to be on our guard against a variety of copies; many of his disciples having so happily imitated him that Venetian professors with difficulty distinguish their hands from that of their master.]

VAROTARI, CHIARA. This lady was the daughter of Dario Varotari, [the elder,] and flourished at Venice about the year 1648. She was instructed in the rudiments of design by her father, and is celebrated by Ridolfi, and in the poetry of Boschini, for her extraordinary talents in portrait painting. In the Florentine Gallery of the portraits of artists, is that of Chiara Varotari, painted by herself.

VASARI, GIORGIO. According to Bottari, in his Note alle Vite del Vasari, this painter and eminent writer on art, was born at Arezzo in 1512. He is said to have received his first instruction in design from a glass painter, named Guglielmo da Marsiglia, commonly called Il Prete Gallo; but he afterwards studied under Michael Angelo Buonaroti and Andrea del Sarto. His greatest improvement was derived from his studies at Rome, whither he was conducted by Cardinal Ippolito de Medici, who had taken him under his protection, and by whose family he was afterwards loaded with riches and honours. He designed from the antique marbles, the works of Michael Angelo in the Sistine chapel, and the frescoes of Raffaele in the Vatican; and formed to himself a style in which he discovered his predilection for the works of Buonaroti.

Having acquired some reputation as a painter, he applied himself to the study of architecture, in which he became one of the ablest professors of his time, and united in himself the various acquirements by which Giulio Romano and Pierino del Vaga, following the example of Raffaele, had so eminently distinguished themselves. He was employed in several public works at Rome, particularly in different parts of the Vatican, and in the Sala della Cancelleria, where he painted, by the direction of Cardinal Farnese, a series of frescoes, representing the principal actions of Pope Paul III. In the church of S. Giovanni Decollato he painted for the principal altar the Martyrdom of that Saint, which is one of his most esteemed pictures in oil.

There are many other works by Vasari in the different churches in Italy, among which the most remarkable are three sacred subjects in the refectory of S. Michele in Bosco, at Bologna; the Feast of Ahasuerus, in the church of the Benedictines, at Arezzo; and the Adoration of the Magi, at the Conventuali, at Rimini.

In 1553 he was invited to visit Florence, by Cosimo I., who employed him in the superintendance of the important works in which he was then engaged in the Palazzo Vecchio, where the decorations were executed by Vasari and his disciples. Of these the most considerable was the apartment of Clement VII.; in which he has represented that Pope crowning the Emperor Charles V.; and in the other compartments the principal actions and victories of that monarch.

He is allowed to have been an able designer, and to have been a competent master of the ornamental style. But, from the extent and variety of his undertakings, he occasionally fell into negligence and manner, and he was at all times languid and cold in his colouring.

Vasari is more celebrated as a writer than as a painter. His principal work was a History of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects, from the period of Cimabue till his own time, entitled Vite de piu eccellenti pittori, scultori, e architetti, first published at Florence in two volumes in 1550, and republished with large additions, and the heads of the artists, in three volumes, in 1568, [and again in 1648. Since that period many excellent editions have appeared, both in quarto and octavo; the latest is one published at Florence, 1832—1838, edited by Maselli; another is now in progress in duodecimo, cura di una Società di Amatori delle Arti belle. A German translation, of considerable excellence, is in the course of publication, and an English translation is promised in Mr. Bohn's Standard Library.] He died at Florence in 1576.

[It seems probable that Giorgio Vasari was born earlier than 1512, if any thing can be gathered from his own account of himself in the following words: "Dirò bene che dopo aver io ne'miei primi anni designato quante buone pitture sono per le Chiese d'Arezzo mi furono insegnati i primi principj con qualche ordine da Guglielmo da Marzilla Frazese.—Condotti poi l'anno 1524 a Fiorenza da Silvio Passarini Cardinal di Cortona, attesi qualche poco al disegno sotto Michelagnolo, Andrea del Sarto, ad altri." Several writers of authority say he died in 1574. We know not whether it will be to the credit of Vasari, or otherwise, to quote the following sentence from the Abate Pietro Faruli's Annals of Arezzo: "L'Abate D. Silvano Razzi, Camaldolese, scrisse le Vite de' Pittori, e le donò a Giorgio (Vasari) che le stampò sotto il suo nome." But il Padre Serafino Razzi, the brother of D. Silvano, only says "può vedere il tutto nelle vite de' Pittori, Scultori, e Architetti scritte per la maggior parte da D. Silvano Razzi, mio fratello, per il Sig. Cav. M. Giorgio Vasari Aretino, suo amicissimo." It is but justice to all parties to give these quotations, as Giorgio is so frequently accused of partiality and misstatements in his otherwise very valuable work.]

VASCELLINI, GAETANO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Castello S. Giovanni, in the Bolognese state, in 1740. He learned the principles of design from Ercole Graziani, and was instructed in engraving by Carlo Faucci at Florence. We have by him some portraits from those in the Florentine Gallery, and several subjects after various Italian masters, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Andrea Vannuchi, called del Sarto.
Daniello Ricciarelli, da Volterra.

SUBJECTS.

St. Joseph and St. Francis of Paula; after Seb. Conca.
Mary Magdalene penitent; after F. Furino.
Venus; after Titian.
Danaë; after the same.

[VASCO, denominated GRAN-VASCO, a Portuguese painter. Whether he is to be recognised as Ferdinand de Vizeu, Gran-Vasco de Vizeu, Fernandez Vasco de Casal, or simply Vasco-Pereira, or Vasco-Fernandez, is not finally determined. If reliance can be placed on Portuguese testimony, or rather assertion, he was the greatest painter that ever lived; not only are his pictures the most excellent, but the most numerous. All in Portugal that have not secured a name are by Gran-Vasco. Attendants on strangers, who are desirous of seeing the pictures in the churches, have no difficulty in naming the master. And pray, who is Gran-Vasco?—inquired an impertinent. Gran-Vasco! exclaimed the Cicerone with contemptuous surprise at the ignorance of the inquirer,—Gran Vasco—is Vasco de Gama! Possibly he was as near the truth, as far as regarded the pictures, as more erudite Portuguese connoisseurs. Zani notices Vasco-Pereira, a Portuguese painter, who operated in 1594, and marks him BB; and Cean Bermudez has given an account of him among the Spanish artists. Count Raczynski, who was desirous of identifying him with Gran-Vasco, and who examined a small picture by Vasco-Pereira, with the date 1575, abandons the idea for the present, and has left the elucidation of this difficult subject to his friend M. J. Berardo, who has undertaken the task with great zeal, spirit, and intelligence. Until the results of M. Berardo's inquiries are made known it would be premature to enlarge on the subject. The conclusions he had arrived at in 1844 were the following: That Gran-Vasco was the son of another painter; that his name was simply Vasco Fernandez; that it is of no importance whether he was born in the city of Vizeu or in a mill in the vicinity; that he flourished in the reign of Dom Sebastien; and that all traditions and memoirs in contradiction to these facts, which he may have put forth in former statements, ought to be dismissed as having no foundation. He has also given a copy of the baptismal register, which proves that Vasco, the son of Francisco Fernandez, painter, and Marie Henriquez, his wife, was baptized at the church of Vizeu, on the 18th of September, 1552. For an account of his works, real and apocryphal, the inquirer is referred to "Les Arts en Portugal," by the Count A. Raczynski, a book which will gratify him in the perusal, as abounding with much information respecting artists very little known, and sound criticism conveyed in a frank and pleasing manner.]

[VASCO-PEREYRA, a Portuguese painter, who resided at Seville, in great credit, at the end of the 16th century. He was employed in 1594 to repair the fine fresco of Christ bearing his Cross, painted only thirty years previously by Luis de Vargas. He was one of the artists employed in the cathedral of Seville in 1598, to form the magnificent funeral decorations for the service on the death of Philip II., and showed as much talent as any therein engaged. He painted the decollation of St. Paul for the convent of that order, in competition with Mohedano and Vasquez. He executed many other works which have ceased to exist in Spain, though some are to be found in Portugal. He was reckoned a skilful designer, but dry and hard as a colourist, as may be noted in the Four Doctors of the Church painted by him for the library of the chartreuse of Santa Maria de las Cuevas, and an Annunciation in the college of S. Hermenegildo. He died at the commencement of the 17th century. See GRAN-VASCO.]

VASCONI, FILIPPO. By this engraver, who flourished about the year 1720, we have several plates of Views in Venice and the vicinity.

VASQUEZ, ALONSO, a Spanish painter, born at Ronda in 1589, and was educated at Seville, under Luis de Vargas. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was a contemporary and rival of Francisco Pacheco. His design is correct, and discovers an intimate acquaintance with anatomy, and his pictures are painted with freedom and facility. His principal works are in the monastery of the Barefooted Carmelites at Seville. He died in that city in 1650. [Alonso Vasquez was a scholar of Antonio Arfian; he was one of the artists employed on the magnificent catafalque for the funeral of Philip II. in 1598, and consequently was born earlier than 1589. It is also incorrect to say that he died in 1650, as his death occurred many years before Pacheco published his work in 1649. The exact date is not known, and few of his pictures exist.]

VASSALLO, ANTONIO MARIA. This artist was a native of Genoa, and flourished about the year 1670. He was a scholar of Vincent Malo, of Cambrai, who had studied under Rubens. Vassallo excelled in painting landscapes, animals, fruit, flowers, &c., which were admirably coloured, and touched with great spirit and freedom. He also occasionally painted historical subjects, in which he had given proof of considerable ability, but died young.

VASSEUR, JOHN CHARLES LE, a modern French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1734. He was a pupil of Daulle and Beauvarlet, and has engraved several plates, chiefly after the works of the modern French painters, in a neat, finished style. Among others are the following:

The Triumph of Venus; after Boucher.
The Death of Adonis; after the same.
The Continence of Scipio; after Le Moine.
Diana and Endymion; after J. B. Vanloo.
Apollo and Daphne; after Luca Giordano.
The Triumph of Galatea; after J. F. de Troy.
The Parting of Hector and Andromache; after Restout.
Alexander and his Physician; after the same.
Tarquin and Lucretia; after A. Peters.
The Milk-maid; after J. B. Greuze.
Thais, or the beautiful Penitent; after the same.
[The Step-Mother; after Greuze.
The Widow and the Curate; after the same.
The Will destroyed; after the same.
Lionardo da Vinci expiring in the arms of Francis I.; after Menagoot.
The Four Seasons; after Gallet.
A Holy Family; after R. Mengs.]

He also engraved from Aubry, Krause, Lagrenée, Dietricy, and others. [He died in 1816.]

VASSILACCHI, ANTONIO, called L'ALIENSE. This painter was born in the Grecian island of Milo, in the Archipelago, in 1556. He was sent to Venice when he was young, where he became a scholar of Paolo Veronese. Ridolfi informs us, that his progress under that master was such as to excite the jealousy of his instructor, who dismissed him from his academy, and advised him to confine himself to pictures of a small size. Confident in his powers, and suspecting that Paolo was practising towards him the same disgraceful illiberality which Titian had shown to Tintoretto, he applied himself to his studies with redoubled alacrity. One of his earliest public works was a picture of St. Sebastian, with a glory of angels, for the church of S. Maria delle Vergine, and, on its being reported that it was from a design of Paolo, he determined to dispose of all the drawings he had made in the school of that master, as a proof of his determination to abandon his style. He now applied himself to study the works of Il Tintoretto, and acquired a boldness and energy of style which approached the best productions of that master. Such are his pictures in the Chiesa de S.S. Apostoli, at Venice, representing Abraham sacrificing Isaac, Cain slaying Abel, and the Brazen Serpent. In the Sala dello Scrutinio are several of the best productions of Aliense, which prove him to have possessed a fertile and inventive genius, an excellent tone of colouring, and an unusual facility of execution. He died at Venice in 1629.

VAST, VANDER. The name of this artist, who was probably a native of Holland, is affixed to some etchings of landscapes, which are executed in a tasteful and spirited style. [It is supposed that he is the same as Adrian Vander Veert, or Weerd. See that article.]

VAUGHAN, ROBERT, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He was chiefly employed in executing portraits, and other plates, for the booksellers, which are more sought after for the characters they represent, than the merit of the prints. He engraved a monument in Dugdale's "Warwickshire," and some of the maps; the prints for Morton's "Ordinal," and part of those for Ashmole's "Theatrum Chemicum," in 1651.

Vertue informs us, that during the interregnum, Vaughan engraved a portrait of Charles II. to which he affixed so offensive an inscription, that after the Restoration an accusation was preferred against him. We have, among others, the following portraits by him :

James I.
Launcelot Andrews, Bishop of Winchester.
Sir John Wynn, of Gwedur, Bart.; scarce.
George Clifford, Earl of Cumberland.
John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester.
Sir Francis Drake.
Arthur Hildesham, Preacher at Ashby-de-la-Zouch.
Sir Walter Raleigh.
Sir Thomas Lyttleton, Chief Justice of the King's Bench.
Thomas Wilsford, Mathematician.
Edward Terry, Rector of Greenford, Middlesex. 1655.
Henry Vere, Earl of Oxford.
Robert Vere, Earl of Oxford.
Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford.
James Usher, Bishop of Armagh.
Sir George Croke, Chief Justice of the King's Bench.
Benjamin Jonson, Poet.
Edward Turgis, Poet; scarce.

VAUGHAN, WILLIAM. This English engraver was probably a relation of the artist mentioned in the preceding article. He flourished about the year 1660, and, like Robert Vaughan, was principally employed by the booksellers in frontispieces and other book ornaments. We have by him three prints, engraved for a small folio pamphlet, describing the "Sufferings of Sir William Dick, of Braid," which are now become scarce. He also engraved a set of thirteen plates of animals, entitled "A Book of such Beasts as are most useful for drawing, graving, or arms painting and chasing;" designed by F. Barlow, and engraved by William Vaughan. 1664.

VAUQUER, ———. This artist was a native of France, and probably followed the profession of a goldsmith. He engraved, from his own designs, several plates of flowers and ornamental foliage, which he entitles Livres des Fleurs, propres pour orfevres et graveurs.

UBERTINI, FRANCESCO, called IL BACHIACCA. According to Baldinucci, this painter was a native of Florence, and flourished from about the year 1530 till 1557. He painted history with considerable reputation, and also excelled in the grotesque and ornamental style. One of his best historical works is his picture of the Martyrdom of S. Arcadio, in the church of S. Lorenzo, at Florence. The latter part of his life was passed in the service of the Grand-duke Cosimo, for whom he executed several cartoons for tapestry, and painted some historical pictures for his gallery. [His historical pictures are generally on a small scale, with numerous figures; there were two in the collection of the Rev. Mr. Sandford, exhibited a few years ago at London, very spirited and interesting. One of them, Joseph sold by his Brethren, is engraved in Rosini, "Storia della Pittura Italiana," plate 133. He was also a worker in gold and silver.]

UCCELLO, PAOLO MAZZOCCHI, called. This old painter was born at Florence in 1349, and was a disciple of Antonio Veneziano. He was one of the earliest artists who applied themselves to the study of perspective, in which he was greatly assisted by Giovanni Manetti, a celebrated mathematician of the time. He distinguished himself as a painter of animals, but he particularly excelled in designing all sorts of birds, of which he had formed a large collection of the most curious, on which account he acquired the appellation of Uccello. In the church of S. Maria Novella, at Florence, are several subjects of the Old Testament, which he had selected for the purpose of introducing a variety of beasts and birds, designed with surprising neatness and precision. Among others, are Adam and Eve in Paradise, the Family of Noah entering the Ark, the Deluge, &c. These subjects he treated with so much truth and nature, that he may be styled the Bassano of his time. He also painted landscapes, with ruins and figures, which, from his knowledge of perspective, were designed with a correctness and intelligence unknown to his contemporaries.

Lanzi mentions a colossal portrait of Gio. Aguto on horseback, painted by Paolo, in the cathedral at Florence, which is considered one of the boldest designs of that early period. He died in 1432. [Zani says it is wrong to suppose him of the family Mazzocchi; he signed his pictures Pauli Uccelli Opus, and he was living in 1436. His picture of the Deluge is engraved in Rosini, plate 30.]

UCHTERVELT. See OCHTERVELT.

UDINE, GIOVANNI NANNI, called DA. The family name of this painter was Nanni, though he is occasionally called by Vasari, Ricamatore. He was born at Udine in 1494, and having discovered an early disposition for the art, by designing the animals and birds pursued by his father in the chase, he was sent to Venice, where he was placed under the tuition of Giorgione, and acquired a competent acquaintance with the principles of the chiaro-scuro, and an excellent tone of colouring. The fame of Raffaëlle had reached Venice, and inspired Giovanni da Udine with an ardent desire of visiting Rome, to contemplate the works of that illustrious artist. His protector, the patriarch Grimani, desirous of promoting his wishes, furnished him with letters of recommendation to Count Baldassare Castiglione, by whom he was introduced to Raffaelle, and was admitted into his school. He was employed by that great master in painting the ornamental accessories in many of his works, consisting of animals, birds, fruit, flowers, &c. At the time he was thus employed by his illustrious preceptor, the discovery was made of the precious remains of antiquity in the baths of Titus. Giovanni da Udine was selected by Raffaelle to make designs from the beautiful grotesque ornaments in stucco, found in the different apartments. He not only succeeded in his commission to the entire satisfaction of his master, but discovered a process of compounding a stucco, which had the same appearance, and probably the same durability, as that used by the Romans. He was now employed by Raffaelle to execute the greatest part of the arabesque and grotesque ornaments in stucco, in the loggie and apartments of the Vatican, which he finished in so tasteful and masterly a style, that they have ever been the objects of universal admiration.

After the death of Raffaelle he was employed by Clement VII. in conjunction with Pierino del Vaga, to ornament that part of the Vatican called La Torre di Borgia, where they represented the Seven Planets; the emblematical figures were designed by del Vaga, but the grotesque ornaments and symbolical decorations were executed by Giovanni da Udine. In 1527 he was compelled, by the sacking of Rome, to fly from that city, and he took refuge at Udine, where he was for some time employed. He was afterwards engaged at Florence, by the family of the Medici, in several considerable works. He returned to Rome in the pontificate of Pius IV., where he died in 1564, and was buried in the church of La Rotonda, near the tomb of Raffaelle.

[Zani places his birth in 1489, and his death in 1561, to which Lanzi seems to assent. With respect to the family name, there is no certainty. Nanni, or Nani, in some places in Italy stands for Giovanni, and Ricamatore signifies a designer or worker of embroidery. His beautiful decorations in the loggie of the Vatican may have obtained for him the latter appellation. An engraving from his picture of Christ disputing with the Doctors, in the Academy at Venice, will be found in Rosini, "Storia della Pittura," plate 148.]

UDINÉ, MARTINO DA, called PELLEGRINO DI SAN DANIELLO. This painter was born at the castle of San Daniello, ten miles distant from Udine, about the year 1480, and was a disciple of Giovanni Bellini, during that painter's residence at Udine. He acquired the name of Pellegrino from an expression of approbation bestowed on his talents by his master, Bellini, who, on seeing some of his early productions, exclaimed, Pellegrino! or excellent! He painted several pictures for the churches at Udine, which raised his reputation to a level with that of his instructor, whose works were at that time in the highest estimation. In the cathedral is one of his admired productions, representing St. Joseph, with the infant Christ and St. John, which was esteemed not inferior to the picture of S. Marco, by Bellini, in the same church, which is considered his master-piece. But his most celebrated performance is an altar-piece in S. Maria de Battuti, representing the Virgin, with several female saints, and St. John the Baptist, in which he displayed a dawning of the breadth of style, and the mellowness of colouring, which were afterwards carried to such perfection by Giorgione. In the church of S. Antonio, at San Daniello, are some paintings in fresco by Pellegrino, representing the Life of Christ, which are highly commended by his biographer Renaldi. He died soon after, in 1545.

[VEAU, FRANCESCO, a painter of architecture and perspectives, was born at Pavia in 1727, and died in 1768. He was an excellent painter in the decorative style, but there are no particulars of him recorded.]

VEAU, JOHN LE, a French engraver, born at Rouen about the year 1736. He went to Paris when he was young, where he became a pupil of J. P. Le Bas, and has engraved several plates, in the neat and spirited style of that eminent artist, among which are the following:

A Pair of Views in Flanders, by moonlight; after Vander Neer.

A View of Montserrat; after Vernet.

The Fishermen; after the same.

The Cascade of Tivoli; after La Croix.

A View of Puzzoli; after the same.

The Village Blacksmith; after Berghem.

A Landscape, with a Shepherd watching his Flock; after Ruysdael.

Abraham sending away Hagar; after Dieitricy.

The Shepherdess of the Alps; after Aubry.

[This is perhaps the same artist that Zani names John James Le Veau, a designer and engraver of landscapes, born in 1729, and died in 1785.]

VECCHI, GIOVANNI DE. This painter was born at Borgo S. Sepolero, in 1536. He went to Rome when he was young, where he first became a disciple of Raffaelle delle Colle, but he afterwards studied under Taddeo Zuccaro, who was at that time employed by Cardinal Alessandro Farnese, in the embellishment of his palace of Caprarola, where, in conjunction with his instructor, he executed several considerable works. There are many of his pictures in the churches at Rome, of which a particular description is given by Baglione. In S. Lorenzo in Damaso, is one of his most esteemed productions, representing the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; in the cupola of the Chiesa del Gesu, he painted in fresco the Four Doctors of the Church; and in S. Maria d'Araceli are several pictures of the life of St. Jerome. He died at Rome in 1614.

VECCHIA, PIETRO [DELLA] was born at Venice in 1605, and was brought up in the school of Alessandro Varotari, called Il Padouanino. He did not, however, adopt the style of that master, but applied himself to an imitation of the works of Giorgione and Il Pordenone, in which he was so successful, that some of his pictures have been mistaken for the productions of those masters. His powers were better adapted to familiar and fancy subjects than to the dignity of history, and his best pictures represent armed soldiers, banditti, and corps-de-gardes, which he painted with great vigour and effect. His talent in imitating the works of the old masters induced the doge and senate of Venice to employ him to copy, in oil, the historical works in mosaic, which are in the church of St. Mark, which he executed with great ability, and painted two altar-pieces of his own composition, for the same church, representing the Crucifixion, and our Saviour driving the Money-changers out of the Temple. His colouring is warm and tender, and he was well versed in the principles of the chiaro-scuro. He died in 1678.

VECELLI, TIZIANO. See TITIAN.

VECELLI, FRANCESCO, was the brother of Tiziano Vecelli, the great luminary of the Venetian school, and was born at Cadore, in Friuli, in 1483. After being instructed by his brother in the elements of the art, he served some years in the army, and he was probably induced to turn his thoughts to painting as a profession, by the extraordinary success of his brother. He painted some pictures for the churches and public edifices at Venice, which possessed sufficient merit to alarm the jealousy of Titian, particularly a picture of the Transfiguration, in the church of S. Salvatore, which gained him great reputation. But his most celebrated performance, and which frequently has been taken for a work of Titian, is a picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Giuseppe, at Belluno. By the persuasion of Titian, he is said to have abandoned painting in 1531, and devoted himself to commercial pursuits. [Strange, if true, that Titian should persuade him to abandon a practice in which he was so successful!]

VECELLI, ORAZIO. This artist was the son and disciple of Titian, born at Venice in 1540. He distinguished himself as a painter of portraits, some of which were esteemed little inferior to those of his father; though he occasionally painted historical subjects, one of the most considerable of which was in the ducal palace at Venice, but was destroyed in the conflagration. He died in the same year with his father, in 1576. [Zani calls him "figlio naturale di Tiziano seniore."]

VECELLI, MARCO, called MARCO DI TIZIANO. This artist was the nephew of Titian, born at Venice in 1545, and accompanied that distinguished painter in his journeys to Rome and Germany. He was the favourite disciple of his great instructor, and approached nearer to his style, both in composition and colour, than any of his relatives. There are several considerable works by him in the palazzo di S. Marco, among the most esteemed of which is an allegorical subject on the peace of Italy, in the antechamber to the Sala del Consiglio. Another admired work of Marco Vecelli is a picture in the Sala della Bussola, representing the Doge Leonardo Donato kneeling before the Virgin and infant Christ. He also painted several considerable works for the churches at Venice, Treviso, and in the Friuli, particularly a picture of Christ fulminating the world, and the Virgin and several Saints interceding, in S. S. Giovanni e Paolo, at Venice. He died in 1611.

VECELLI, TIZIANO, called TIZIANELLO, was the son of the preceding artist, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century acquired some reputation by the pictures he painted for the public edifices at Venice. The excellent principles which had been established by the great founders of the Venetian school had, however, now given way to negligence and manner, which is evident in all his works. His best productions are his portraits, which possess the merit of resemblance, and a natural tone of colour.

VECELLI, CESARE. This artist was the younger brother of the celebrated Titian, and flourished about the year 1590. We have by him a set of prints engraved from the designs of Titian, in a spirited and masterly style, representing the ancient and modern habiliments of various parts of the world, published at Venice in 1590, entitled, De gli Habiti Antichi e Moderni di diverse parte del mondo, Libri due fatti da Cesare Vecellio. A second edition of this work appeared in 1664, with a more explanatory title, as follows: Raccolta di figure delineate dal gran Tiziano, e da Cesare Vecellio suo fratello diligentemente intagliate. [Cesare Vecelli was not the brother of the celebrated Titian; he was of another branch of the family. He did not engrave the woodcuts to the work entitled De gli Habiti Antichi e Moderni, &c., mentioned in the text, though they have been so long attributed to him; they were executed by Christopher Chrieger, of Nuremberg. Neither were the designs made by the great Titian nor by Cesare; so the title to the edition of 1664 is altogether false.]

VECQ, JAMES LA. This painter was born at Dort in 1625, and was educated in the school of Rembrandt, whose excellent manner of colouring, and admirable conduct of the chiaro-scuro, he successfully imitated. After leaving that excellent school, by an unaccountable caprice and want of judgment, he abandoned the principles of his able instructor, and adopted the manner of John de Baan. He painted history and portraits, but attached himself chiefly to the latter.

A singular anecdote is reported by Houbraken in his Life of this artist. Whilst he was in France, he was applied to by an old priest, at Sedan, to paint his portrait. When La Vecq attended him for that purpose, he informed him, that, some years before, he had his portrait painted by a Fleming, but that it was so little to his liking, that he had ordered it to be put into his garret. La Vecq expressed a curiosity to see this wretched performance, but his surprise was not little, when he discovered, on wiping away the dust, one of the finest heads Vandyck had ever painted. How many are there of the laity who do not judge better than this ecclesiastic! [and how many improbable anecdotes of a like kind are recorded! Curiously enough, all such discoveries are of the best works of the master!]

VEEN, MARTIN VAN. See HEMSKIRK. [They who are desirous of knowing more of Martin van Veen, or Martin Hemskirk, than is related in a previous article, will find the history of his life, detailed with all the zest of a romance, in the third volume of Alfred Michiels' "Histoire de la Peinture Flamande et Hollandaise." They will also find subjoined a catalogue of his works, to the number of one hundred and twenty-nine pieces, copies and originals, or the knowledge of which is derived from prints, or the writings of Karel Van Mander and others. The present location of many is also pointed out, so that a travelling inquirer may gratify his curiosity by inspecting them. In the article Martin Hemskirk, it is said he died in 1573; several writers, however, place his death in 1574.]

VEEN, OTHO and GILBERT VAN. See VENIUS.

VEENHUYSEN, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about the year 1656. He engraved a set of views of the public buildings in that city, which are executed in a neat, slight style. They are embellished with figures, which are designed with tolerable correctness. They were published at Amsterdam in 1656, with descriptions in Dutch and French. [He also drew portraits, and operated in 1677.]

VEGEL, J. S. Mr. Strutt has considered this artist worthy of record, though he pronounces him "an obscure engraver of frontispieces and other book plates, which he executed in so bad a style, that they by no means merit notice." [It may be suspected this means one of the Vogels; but with so bad a character, it is not worth the inquiry.]

VELA, CHRISTOVAL, a Spanish painter, born at Jaen in 1598, and was first a scholar of Pablo de Cespedes, but afterwards studied under Vincenzo Carducho. He chiefly resided at Cordova, where he painted history with some reputation, and was esteemed a correct designer, though languid and weak in his colouring. In the cloister of the convent of San Augustin, at Cordova, is a series of the Prophets; designed in a grand style. He died at Cordova in 1658. [Whatever he did good has been destroyed by the restorers: he was drowned in the well of his own house.]

VELASCO, DON ANTONIO PALOMINO. This Spanish painter, and the principal biographer of the artists of his country, was a native of Valencia, where he flourished about the year 1700. He painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Valencia, Salamanca, and Granada, and was one of the painters to Philip V. of Spain. He is, however, more known as a writer on art than as a painter. He published an elaborate treatise on the Art of Painting, in two folio volumes, published at Madrid, in which he notices upwards of two hundred painters and sculptors, who flourished in Spain, from the time of Ferdinand the Catholic to the conclusion of the reign of Philip IV. Of this work there was an abridgment, in Spanish, published in London in 1742, entitled, Las Vidas de los Pintores y statuarios eminentes Espanoles. Of which there is an English translation.

[Don Aciselo Antonio Palomino de Castro y Velasco, the Vasari of Spain, was born at Bujalance in 1653. His parents were Don Bernabé Palomino and Donna Maria Andrea Lozano, who, being in good circumstances, transferred their residence to Cordova, in order to bestow an education on their son suitable to his rank. Here he studied grammar, philosophy, theology, and jurisprudence; but his ruling passion discovered itself by his devoting his leisure hours to copying prints. In 1672, the painter Juan de Valdes Leal returned from Seville to Cordova, and was shown some of his productions; he gave him encouragement to proceed, and taught him the fundamental rules of painting; this decided his course, and he acknowledged Valdes Leal as his only master. He made great progress, but did not abandon his literary studies, and was ordained for the church. In 1675 he received some further instruction and encouragement from Juan de Alfaro, who recommended him to visit Madrid, and study the works of the great masters there. But Palomino continued his studies at Cordova till 1678, when Alfaro returned to Madrid, and Palomino accompanied him. He found employment at the court, and gave so much satisfaction to his friend Alfaro, that he appointed him by his will to finish some pictures which he had commenced, but was unable to terminate from debility. He next formed a friendship with Juan Carreño, and Coello, and was chosen by the latter to assist in painting the ceiling of the queen's gallery at the Alcázar; he executed his part so much to the satisfaction of his coadjutor, that he, having other works to accomplish at the Escorial, left him to finish it. This he performed with entire success, and obtained the approbation of the king, and consequently of the critics of the court. This obtained for him the honorary distinction of king's painter, but without salary. On the marriage of Charles II. with Donna Maria Ana de Neoburg, in 1690, he designed the arches and other ornaments for the bridal entry to the city, which confirmed him in his place, and entitled him to the emoluments. In 1692, the arrival of Luca Giordano caused some consternation among the Spanish painters; but Palomino maintained his position. Luca was probably not so well versed in Christian theology as in heathen mythology, and Palomino was able to instruct him in the subjects he was called upon to paint. This he did with such delicacy and perspicuity, that Giordano embracing him exclaimed, "The work is already finished!" In 1697 he went to Valencia, where he painted the frescoes in the presbytery of the church of S. Juan del Mercado, and remained there for three years, with the exception of a short period passed at Madrid, and painted several important pictures. In 1705 he went to Salamanca to paint the frescoes in the convent of S. Esteban, in which he represented the church militant and triumphant, accompanied with many allegories. On his return to Madrid he produced many other pictures; and in 1715, published the first volume of his "Museo Pictórico," on which he had been employed for many years. He had previously painted the sacristy of the chartreuse of Granada, representing St. Bruno supporting the World, and a glory of Saints and Angels; five pictures for the grand altar at Cordova, and the hieroglyphics which adorned the funeral of Donna Maria Luisa de Saboya. He published the second volume of the "Museo Pictórico," or Lives of the Spanish Painters, in 1724. From this time his health began to decline; and his wife having died in 1725, he entered fully into orders, and was ordained priest. He died in the following year, and was buried on the 13th of August, with great funeral pomp, in the same grave as his wife, in the church of S. Francisco, at Madrid. It was deemed but justice to Palomino Velasco to add thus much to the scanty notice taken of him in the text; the limits of a dictionary do not permit to enter so largely as is perhaps desirable into the history of one who did so much to preserve the fame of others. Neither is this the place to analyze his book on Painting and Painters, which, with many oversights, contains a vast store of good materials, and which, until the more exact work of Cean Bermudez appeared, was the only one worth consulting for a knowledge of the arts and artists of Spain.]

[VELASCO, LUIS DE, an historical painter, who is entitled to a place among the talented artists of Spain, has not only been unnoticed by Palomino and Ponz, but had the misfortune to have his works attributed by them to others. He resided at Toledo in 1564, and painted several pictures for the cloister of the cathedral. In 1581 he was appointed painter to the chapter, and in November of the same year began his picture of the Incarnation of Christ, which is over the door of the cloister, and which Antonio Ponz has attributed to Blas del Prado; this and three others for altar-pieces he finished in 1584-5. One of these represents the Virgin, of exceeding beauty, holding the Infant in her arms, accompanied by S. Antonio, S. Blas, and a female Saint; above are four angels holding an imperial crown, and below an armed warrior worshipping; and the figures of S. Cosme and S. Damian form the laterals. These pictures have been highly and justly praised, as forming a noble and beautiful work. Palomino has erroneously attributed them to Blas del Prado, as Ponz had that of the Incarnation. But the archives of the cathedral show that they were executed by Luis de Velasco, by order of the archbishop, Cardinal Quiroga, and taxed by Miguel Barrosa in 1585 at 419,788 maravedis, which was paid to him in that year. He also pointed the portrait of the Cardinal in 1594, and that of D. Garcia de Loaysa in 1599; both of which were placed in the chapter-room of the cathedral. There are other excellent works by him, but few in number. In his drawing he is correct, his characters are noble in form, his colouring harmonious; and his style exhibits a good acquaintance both with the antique and the best masters of Italy. He died at Toledo in 1606.]

[VELASCO, CRISTÓBAL DE, was the son and disciple of Luis de Velasco. He adopted the maxims and imitated the style of his father, but did not arrive at the same degree of excellence. In 1598 he painted the portrait of the Archduke Albert, before he renounced the archbishopric of Toledo to espouse the Infanta Isabella. This was placed in the winter chapter-room of the cathedral with the series of portraits of other prelates. He painted for Philip III. seven views of cities in Flanders, to place in his hunting residence in the woods of Valsain, for which he received the sum of 20,673 reals. His son, MATIAS DE VELASCO, was also an historical painter; he accompanied the court of Philip III. to Valladolid, and painted some pictures for the royal nunnery of the Carmelites of that city, representing several mysteries in the life of the Virgin. Ponz supposed these pictures were by a Fray Arsenio Masacio, because he painted a S. Francisco and a Santa Clara in the same place; but Palomino asserts that they were painted, as well as several others in Valladolid, by Matias de Velasco.]

VELASQUEZ, DE SILVA, DON. DIEGO. Don Diego Velasquez de Silva, the most distinguished painter of the Spanish school, was born at Seville in 1594. He was of a noble family, originally of Portugal, which had been reduced by the troubles of their country, and had established itself in Andalusia. His parents, although in very narrow circumstances, gave their son a liberal education, and as he had evinced, during his literary studies, an extraordinary genius for drawing, he was permitted to indulge his inclination, and was accordingly placed under the tuition of Francesco Herrera the elder, a rigid instructor, but of considerable ability. The morose manner and brutal temper of that master becoming insupportable to the gentle nature of the young Velasquez, he quitted his school, and entered the academy of Francisco Pacheco, a man of letters, and an able designer. Under that master his talents began to display themselves in a variety of sketches from nature, of peasants and ordinary people, in peculiar habits and occupations, as they struck his fancy in the streets. In these first sallies of his genius, he gave a faithful and striking representation of the manners and characters of the lower orders of the people, and the various accessories and objects of still-life, with which he accompanied them, were designed and painted with unusual fidelity and spirit. Of these early productions one of the most celebrated is his picture, now in the new palace at Madrid, of the old Water-carrier of Seville, portrayed in a tattered garment, which, through its rents, discovers naked parts of the body, giving water to a boy to drink out of his barrel, in which he exhibits a wonderful character of nature and expression, with an unusual degree of science in muscular anatomy. Velasquez continued to paint subjects of this familiar description for some years, and, when urged by some of his friends to aspire to a higher department of the art, he replied, that he preferred being the first in that humble walk, to holding a second place in the higher cast of historic painting. He had studied five years in the academy of Pacheco, when that master bestowed on him his daughter in marriage, and his father-in-law having received from Italy some pictures by Guido, Caravaggio, and others, the contemplation of them excited Velasquez to a more elevated idea of his art. He now turned his thoughts to history and portrait, and conceived an ardent desire of visiting the rich treasures of art amassed in the royal collections at Madrid, in the Escorial, and in the palace of Bueno Retiro.

In 1622 Velasquez left Seville to visit the metropolis of Spain, where he had passed upwards of a year, when his talent recommended him to the notice of Conde de Olivarez, the favourite minister of Philip IV., who took him under his immediate protection, and accommodated him with apartments in his palace. He afterwards introduced him to the king, who expressed his desire to have his portrait painted by Velasquez. This was the most immediate crisis of his fame and fortune. Philip had been painted by the most eminent artists of the time, who had successively exerted themselves in portraying a young sovereign, in possession of every thing which could excite their emulation and reward their ability. He painted a portrait of Philip on a large scale; the king was drawn in armour, mounted on a magnificent steed, with a back-ground of beautiful scenery. In this trying attempt he succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectation, and all the cognoscenti joined in giving the palm to Velasquez, above all his predecessors. So complete was his triumph, that Olivarez was directed to inform his inmate, that the royal person of Philip would in future be intrusted to no other pencil but his.

When Velasquez had finished the portrait of the king, he received permission to exhibit it in a public street in the city; the courtiers applauded it to the skies, and the poets wrote sonnets in his praise. He was next employed to paint the infants Don Carlos and Don Fernando, and the portrait of the minister, his patron, mounted, like his royal master, on a noble Andalusian courser, richly caparisoned.

Fortune now began to shower her favours on him. He was appointed principal painter to the king, with a liberal salary, besides a munificent remuneration for his pictures. Great rewards being thus heaped upon Velasquez, great things were expected from him, and though he had distinguished himself beyond all his contemporaries as a portrait painter, he had not yet attempted any considerable historical composition.

Vincenzio Carducho, Eugenio Caxes, and other artists, who had preceded him in the public favour, had signalized themselves by painting a subject of great public interest, the expulsion of the Moors from Spain by Philip III. He now determined to enter the lists with these competitors, by painting a picture of this popular event. On this occasion he produced a superb composition; in the centre he placed the king, armed, and in the act of commanding a party of soldiers, who are escorting a group of Moors, of different ages and sexes, to an embarkation, which awaits them in one extremity of the picture; on the other side is personified the kingdom of Spain, as a majestic matron, in armour, with part of a stately edifice. This distinguished performance he signed with the following inscription: Didacus Velasquez Hispalensis Philip IV. Regis Hispan. pictor ipsiusque jussu fecit, anno 1627. Velasquez had no sooner completed this celebrated picture, than he again experienced the favour and munificence of his sovereign. He was made one of the chamberlains to the king, and received an additional stipend, in support of his new dignity.

In the same year, 1627, Rubens visited Madrid, in his quality of ambassador, and formed an intimacy with Velasquez, for whose extraordinary talents he had the highest respect. This intercourse led to frequent dissertations, on the part of Rubens, respecting the state of the arts in Italy, which inspired his friend with an irresistible desire of visiting Rome and Venice, for the purpose of contemplating the beauties of antiquity, and the works of the best masters.

Velasquez was now in such favour, that he had no sooner expressed his desire for a tour to Italy, than he found his wishes anticipated by every facility and indulgence on the part of his royal protector. The Duke d'Olivarez was directed to furnish him with a sum, amply sufficient for the expenses of his journey, and to supply him with the warmest recommendatory letters.

In 1629 he embarked at Barcelona, and, on his landing at Venice, was lodged in the hotel of the Spanish ambassador. The works of Titian, in the palace of St. Mark, excited his admiration, nor was he less surprised and delighted on seeing the admirable productions of Tintoretto, in the Scuola di S. Rocco, particularly the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. After a residence of a few months at Venice, he proceeded to Rome, where he was most graciously received by Cardinal Barberini, nephew to Urban VIII., who procured him apartments in the Vatican, where he had, at all times, access to the productions of Michael Angelo Buonaroti and Raffaëlle. He studied the works of those illustrious artists with unremitting attention and delight. During his residence at Rome, he painted his celebrated history of Jacob when his sons present him the bloody garment of Joseph, one of his most capital performances. He also painted at Rome his fine picture of the Discovery of the Infidelity of Venus, as related by Apollo to Vulcan, who is represented at his forge, attended by the Cyclops; a subject which enabled him to display his art in its fullest extent. The light and shadow from the reflection of the forge, and the sparks which fly from their hammers, produce a surprising effect. The athletic forms and dusky hues of the Cyclops are artfully contrasted with the beautiful proportions and fine tints in the figure of Apollo. The character of Vulcan is finely conceived, and the composition is arranged with infinite judgment. Both these performances were transmitted to King Philip, by whom they were placed in the most distinguished situations in his palace.

After an absence of a year and a half Velasquez returned to Spain, passing through Naples in his way, where he painted the portrait of Donna Maria of Austria, Consort of Ferdinand III. Absence had not impaired his favour with the king, who made him one of the gentlemen of his wardrobe, and appointed him a painting room in his palace, of which the king himself kept a private key, for the purpose of visiting his painter without the forms of ceremony, as Charles V. had done to Titian.

In 1638 Velasquez painted his celebrated picture of our Saviour on the Cross, now in the convent of S. Placido, at Madrid. This single figure would be sufficient to immortalize the fame of Velasquez. It is designed with great simplicity and nature, but with an expression in the features, an affecting air in the reclining of the head, and an harmonious tone of colouring, at once so tender, and of such effect, that nothing can exceed it. It was about this time that he painted his famous picture representing the celebrated General Pescara receiving the keys of a Flemish citadel from the governor of the place. The group of generals, soldiers, citizens, horses, &c., and the striking effect of the town and landscape, in the back-ground, have established the fame of this noble picture, as one of the finest productions of the master. Mengs decidedly calls it the chef d'œuvre of Velasquez, and has pronounced it to be faultless, except in the circumstance of the soldiers' lances, which he criticises as being too long. Surely this is a very trivial remark, to fall from the pen of such an authority, and, trivial as it is, there is great reason to doubt if it is founded in truth. After all, who would expect that any eminent critic, after pronouncing the performance to be faultless in every essential or noble part, would seriously state this trifling remark as an exception? It is not surprising that the productions of this period of his life were executed in his best style, when his taste had been refined by his studies at Rome, his judgment matured by experience, and his fire not yet abated by years; caressed by his sovereign, applauded by his contemporaries, and at the summit of all worldly prosperity.

In 1643 the minister d'Olivarez was dismissed from his employment, and banished from court, to his town of de Toro. The good fortune of Velasquez received no shock by the disgrace of his patron. In the year 1648 the king intrusted him with a particular embassy to Pope Innocent X., and he was, at the same time, commissioned to purchase the finest works of art, both statues and pictures, which he could meet with in Italy, for the royal collection. On this expedition he embarked at Malaga, and having landed at Genoa, he passed through Milan, Padua, and from thence to Venice, where he passed some time in reviving his acquaintance with the admirable productions of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese; and had the good fortune to purchase some capital pictures by the best Venetian masters. He afterwards visited Bologna, where he was not less fortunate in making several valuable acquisitions, and engaged Michael Angelo Colonna, and Agostino Mitelli, to visit Spain, to assist in the decoration of the royal palaces. On his arrival at Rome he was received with great favour and distinction by the pope, and, as the business confided to him afforded him leisure to exercise his professional talents, he was engaged to paint the portrait of Innocent X., and those of several of the cardinals and the nobility of Rome. The pontiff, in token of his satisfaction, presented him with a gold medal. The academicians of Rome elected him of their body, and sent his diploma after him to Spain.

After an absence of nearly three years, in 1651, Velasquez took his departure from Genoa, on his return to Spain, freighted with a magnificent collection of antique statues, busts, and a variety of pictures by the most distinguished Italian painters. He arrived in safety with his cargo, and was received by his royal master with his accustomed kindness and favour. In 1656, Philip conferred on him the order of Santiago, an honour only bestowed on persons of eminent pretensions, either in rank or for service. He continued to experience the protection of his sovereign, and the public estimation, until the year 1660, when he died at the age of 66. He was buried, with the most distinguished funeral honours, in the superb church of San Juan.

[The proper names of this great artist, according to a custom prevalent in Spain, and as given by Cean Bermudez, are Don Diego Rodríguez de Silva y Velasquez; his father's being Juan Rodríguez de Silva, and his mother's, Geronima Velasquez. He was born at Seville, in 1599, not in 1594, as stated by Palomino, and was baptized in the church of S. Pedro on the 6th of June in that year, as appears by the registry. For the purpose of those who only occasionally refer to a dictionary, the foregoing account, correct in most of the particulars, may be deemed sufficient; but not so for the gratification of the enthusiastic admirers of the painter, who desire to be informed of every event in his life, and to be made acquainted with every work that emanated from his mind, or was executed by his hand. To give these details would require a volume, and that volume of facts would be as interesting as a Spanish romance. Fortunately, three English gentlemen, men of high education, cultivated taste, and excellent critics in works of art and literature, whose knowledge of pictures is derived from ocular inspection, and not from partial panegyrics or traditional common-places, have recently favoured the world with their observations and judgment on Spanish painters, among whom Velasquez is allotted a full share. The inquirer, therefore, has only to consult Mr. Ford's "Hand-book for Travellers in Spain;" Sir Edmund Head's "Hand-book, or History of the Spanish and French Schools of Painting;" and Mr. Stirling's "Annals of the Artists of Spain;" to be made fully acquainted with the life and character of Velasquez and his works, and at the same time to be instructed in all that relates to the Spanish schools, and delighted with the manner in which the knowledge is conveyed. So vivid are their descriptions they justify the observation, that the most interesting part of the life of an artist is to be found in his studies and his works. Frequent mention is made of the intimacy which subsisted between Philip IV. and Velasquez, as much to the honour of the king as to that of the painter, and of the monarch's appropriation of the productions of his favourite's talents; this explains why so few of this great artist's works were till recently known out of Spain. Velasquez essayed almost every subject within the province of his art, and succeeded in all that he undertook. He was equally successful in painting fruit, flowers, animals, interiors; portraits on foot or horseback, whether men or women, infancy or old age; historical landscape, or transcripts from nature; or the more elevated representation of events recorded in sacred or profane history. With regard to his mode of painting landscape, it is altogether different from that of the Flemish or Dutch masters, whose careful finishing often compels the inspector to use a magnifying medium to comprehend the accurate details. Velasquez produces the objects at once; the canvass is scarcely covered; the contours are free; earth, trees, and sky, clouded or serene, form one harmonious mass. If approached too near, the scene appears confused, uncertain, chaotic; viewed at a proper distance, the confusion assumes form, and presents nature simple, beautiful, and sublime. In portraiture he excels all his countrymen, and rivals the best of other schools. The pleasure derived from beholding his equestrian figures is enhanced by observing the temerity with which he places them in the most unpromising aspects. Under his management littleness assumes magnitude. See Philip mounted on his Andalusian steed, prancing over an arid plain against an unbounded horizon, encompassed with the blaze of a burning sun, with no accessory to justify shadow for contrast or relief; yet, amidst this apparent neglect, or defiance of the rules of art, the portrait becomes illusive, and presents all the characteristics of reality: the hair is agitated, the blood circulates in the fresh and fair countenance, the eyes are observant, the mouth ready for speech, and you are under the delusion that horse and rider are living, and in action. In compositions called historical he avoided those mysteries so generally treated by the artists of Italy and Spain, selected from Scripture, or the legends of the church; not from inability to accomplish whatever was grand, pathetic, or picturesque in those writings, but from a preference to the realities of life. He eschewed gods and goddesses, angels and beatified saints; his vocation was among men; he studied nature in her known forms and workings, and abandoned the ideal to those who preferred soaring in the regions of fancy, and embodying imaginary representations of improbable fictions, or of "things invisible to mortal sight." His pictures from sacred history are therefore few, and relate chiefly to events recorded as matters of fact. Of this kind is the celebrated Crucifixion, painted for the nunnery of S. Placido, but now in the royal gallery of Spain. "Never," says Mr. Stirling, "was that great agony more powerfully depicted. The head of our Lord droops on his right shoulder, over which falls a mass of dark hair, while drops of blood trickle from his thorn-pierced brows. The anatomy of the naked body and limbs is executed with as much precision as in Cellini's marble; and the linen cloth wrapped about the loins, and even the fir-wood of the cross, display his accurate attention to the smallest details of a great subject." Cumberland, in his "Anecdotes," remarks, "If there were nothing but this single figure to immortalize the fame of Velasquez, this alone were sufficient." The Forge of Vulcan, his single attempt in heathen mythology, exhibits him to great advantage as an anatomist and painter, but will not obtain for him the praise of feeling like the poet. Los Bebedores, or Los Borrachos, a drunken revel of nine vulgar figures, is, however, perfection; all good judges who have seen it concur in its praise. Mr. Stirling says, "For force of character and strength of colouring, this picture has never been excelled; and its humour entitles Velasquez to the name of the Hogarth of Andalusia." Mr. Ford, in his "Hand-book of Spain," observes, "This mock coronation of a drunken group combines the humour of Teniers with the breadth and effect of Caravaggio. The actors may indeed be low in intellectual character, but they are true to the life, and if deficient in elevated sentiment, are rich in meaning, and are transcripts of real men." The finished picture is in the royal gallery of Spain, and the original sketch in England, at Heytesbury House, in Wiltshire. Las Hilanderas, or the Spinners, ranks as one of his most famous pictures. It represents a large room of a tapestry manufactory, in which females of different ages are employed spinning and winding, and others exhibiting goods to a customer. From such simple materials he has, as if by magic, produced a wonderful work of pictorial art. For truth of character, perspective arrangement, and delusion of light and shadow, it is considered marvellous. It ornaments the royal gallery of Spain. His last great work, entitled, Las Meninas, or Maids of Honour, and called by Luca Giordano, "The Theology of Painting," completed his triumphs in the art. It was painted in 1566, and represents a large room in the old palace in which are assembled the Infanta Margarita with her attendants, and Velasquez at his easel as occupied in painting, but pausing to converse, or to observe the effect of his performance. Notwithstanding the difficulties the painter had to encounter, in consequence of the absurd costume of the court at that period, he succeeded by a skilful arrangement of the characters, principals and subordinates, by the introduction of the dwarfs Maria Barbolo and Nicolasito Pertusano, as contrasts to the greater personages, a large tawny hound, and other accessories; by management of chiaro-scuro, gradation of perspective, and all the appliances of art by which art is disguised, in producing a picture which, so long as the materials exist, will continue to charm the intelligent, and excite the admiration of all classes. It is recorded that Philip came frequently to observe the progress of the work, and, at the termination, being asked by the painter if his Majesty saw any thing wanting, replied, Yes, one thing more; then taking the pallet and pencil from the hands of Velasquez, drew on the breast of his portrait the red cross of the order of Santiago, which distinguished honour he afterwards confirmed.

In England, until recently, Velasquez had been better known by his portraits than by his landscapes or historical pictures, and it was generally supposed that his talent was confined to the first. In that department his productions are numerous; but as his portraits were chiefly of persons considered illustrious, whether by courtesy or otherwise, or of men of high families, distinguished for learning or their political station, they were seldom seen out of Spain. The chances of war, however, exposed many of them to the power of the conqueror, by whom, for the artistical merit, they were transferred to other localities. Some few personages of other nations had the good fortune to have their likenesses preserved for posterity by his magical pencil, and their virtues are enhanced, and their vices extenuated, in admiration of the workman's ability. It is on record that he commenced a portrait of the misled and unfortunate Charles, Prince of Wales, afterwards king of England. There being a negotiation for a treaty of marriage between that prince and the Infanta Donna Maria, daughter of Philip IV., Charles was determined to have a view of his intended bride before the conclusion. With the romantic spirit of a youth of three and twenty who had a will of his own, and had been tutored by his father in high notions of royal prerogatives, and in other respects humoured as a baby, he secretly departed for Spain, accompanied by the Duke of Buckingham, and appeared at Madrid to the consternation of the English ambassador, and to the delight of Philip, who from policy affected to admire his gallantry. Exactly at this period Velasquez had been introduced to the court, under the auspices of the Count-duke Olivares, and had obtained so much of the royal notice as to evince that he was one whom the king would thereafter delight to honour. It does not however appear that he received the royal command to paint the portrait of the romantic visitor; but there was sufficient interest in the circumstances of his arrival, of his being at that moment the great object of attention, and likely to become a member of the royal family of Spain, to prompt Velasquez to secure his portrait. Pacheco relates that he contrived to take a sketch of the prince as he accompanied the king to a chace; that he did more may be supposed from Charles having presented him one hundred crowns. But one hundred crowns, even at that time, was not a princely recompence for a finished portrait, by the heir-apparent of England at the wealthy court of the master of the Indies. The reward, however, shows that something was done by the painter of which the prince was cognizant; what that something was, whether a sketch, a study, an ebauche, or a finished portrait, and what has been its destiny, are now matters of conjecture. The question has lately been agitated, and discussed circumstantially, without producing conviction in the minds of some who would be well pleased with the discovery.

The grand landscape in which a Boar-hunt, according to the old Spanish fashion, is represented at the Pardo, now forming a part of the English National Gallery, has awakened attention to the ability of Velasquez in this department. Edwin Landseer, referring to this picture, says, "I never saw so much large art on so small a scale;" yet, it required five years' consideration on the part of government before funds could be allowed for the purchase, though strongly recommended by the trustees. A prompt movement by Sir Robert Peel at last withdrew it from foreign competition, and preserved it to the nation. A similar landscape is in the Ashburton collection; in those of the Duke of Sutherland, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the Earl of Clarendon, there are others. Of those that by way of distinction are called historical pictures, the best accounts will be found in the "Hand-book of Spain," by Richard Ford, Esq., and in the "Annals of the Arts in Spain," by William Stirling, Esq. The lively descriptions by those gentlemen place the subjects distinctly before the mind's eye of the reader, and their critical remarks, blending instruction and entertainment, are evidently the results of personal observation, and not of traditional report.

The editor intended to give a full catalogue of the master's works; but that has been done already by Mr. Stirling from the best sources known, and will be found at the end of his third volume. The greater and better part being, however, in Spain, it would not, perhaps, interest the majority, who have not the opportunity of visiting that country; so it has been deemed advisable to mention those only that are in England, and therefore accessible. The following list contains all that have come to the editor's knowledge by inspection or otherwise.

PICTURES BY VELASQUEZ, IN ENGLAND.

Head of a Girl. Althorp. Earl Spencer.

Mr. Stirling, in the "Annals of the Artists of Spain," has given a beautiful summary of the character of Velasquez as a man, independent of his talent as an artist. He remarks, that "the records of his life are more ample than those of any other artist of Spain, and the facts which illustrate his character as a man are worthy of the works which display his genius as an artist. The short notices of Pacheco, his father-in-law, indicate the affectionate regard in which he was held by his nearest kindred; and that he was no less esteemed in the wider circle of the court is evinced by the sorrow expressed at his death, which was as great as a court is capable of feeling. He was kindly remembered by Philip; for when certain charges, of what nature is not stated, brought against him after his death, made it necessary for his executor to refute them in a private audience, the king, after listening to the defence, made answer: 'I can believe all you say of the excellent disposition of Diego Velasquez.' His native nobleness of mind was shown in his grateful remembrance of the patronage of the count-duke Olivarez; when that powerful favourite was disgraced and banished from court he visited him in his exile, at Loeches. Half a life spent amidst the contaminating influence of courtiers, could not destroy his sense of gratitude for early favours. To the honour of Philip it is recorded, that this conduct, though contrary to the established etiquette of courts, so far from exciting resentment, raised the artist in his esteem; for in the very year of Olivarez's dismissal, Velasquez was made assistant gentleman of the royal chamber." The same excellent writer continues: "No mean jealousy ever influenced his conduct to his brother artists; he could afford not only to acknowledge the merits, but to forgive the malice of his rivals." An instance is adduced in which he not only showed the humility of a great mind, but a readiness of wit in retorting on his calumniator. There was a precious piece of criticism often in the mouths of his detractors, namely, "that he could paint a head, and nothing else." This being once repeated to him by Philip, he replied, that "they flattered him, for he knew of no one of whom it could be said that he painted a head thoroughly well." It is no matter of surprise that Velasquez and Rubens were intimate and sincere friends; such men could only feel esteem for each other. But he must have possessed great sweetness of temper, as well as commanding superiority of intellect, to subdue the natural ferocity of Ribera, and the impetuosity of Alonso Cano, and compel both, so jealous as they were of rivals, to accept favours from him, and silently admit his superiority. Had he possessed the smallest particle of envy, Alonso Cano and Murillo would have been, of all the contemporary Spanish artists, the objects of his fear and dislike; but of these two he was the particular protector, and by his influence on all occasions, when they needed it, promoted their interest.

"His example and influences," says Mr. Stirling, "doubtless tended very greatly to the preservation of that harmony which prevailed among the artists of Madrid in the reign of Philip, and presents so pleasing a contrast to the savage discord in the schools of Rome and Naples, where men contended with their rivals not merely with the pencil, but with the cudgel, the dagger, and the drug. The favourite of Philip, in fact the minister for artistic affairs, he filled the position with a purity, and a disinterestedness, very uncommon in the councils of state; he was the wise and munificent distributor, and not, as too many would have been, the greedy monopolist of royal bounties. To befriend an artist less fortunate than himself, was one of the last acts of his amiable and glorious life." It would occupy more space than can be afforded in a dictionary to quote the numerous noble and amiable traits in the character of Velasquez; they are recorded more or less in every account of him both as an artist and as a man. The public, particularly the amateurs of Spanish pictures, are under a great obligation to Mr. Stirling for the light he has thrown, not on Velasquez only, but on all the Spanish painters, in his recently published work, "The Annals of the Artists of Spain;" it has supplied a desideratum in a manner truly gratifying; and, combined with Mr. Ford's particulars of Spanish pictures, in his "Hand-book for Travellers in Spain," has superseded the necessity of any other work on the subject.

[VELASQUEZ MINAYA, DON FRANCISCO, a knight of the order of Santiago, painted familiar subjects for his amusement. He resided at Madrid about 1630.]

VELDE, ESAIAS VAN DE. This artist was born at Leyden about the year 1590, and was instructed in the art by an obscure painter, called Peter Denyn. He painted landscapes, with figures and cattle, but particularly excelled in battles, skirmishes of cavalry, and attacks of banditti, which were ingeniously composed, and touched with a light and spirited pencil. The neatness of his touch, and the correctness of his design, induced several of his contemporaries to engage him to decorate their pictures with his figures. We have several etchings by Esais van de Velde, which are executed with neatness and spirit, they consist of landscapes and views from his own designs, and are usually marked with the initials of his name. [The best authorities place the birth of Esajas van de Velde in 1597, and his death in 1648. Among his etchings are a Whale cast ashore on the coast of Holland in 1614, with a number of persons viewing and measuring it; Peasants at the door of a Cottage, with a village in the distance; several small Landscapes, published collectively at different times. They are inscribed Esijas, or Esajas Vanden Velde invent.]

VELDE, JOHN VAN DE, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, and was born at Leyden about the year 1595. He painted landscapes and merry-makings, but distinguished himself more as an engraver than as a painter. We have a considerable number of prints by him, which are executed in two different styles, directly opposite to each other. His plates of landscapes and views are chiefly etched, and his point is free and spirited; the lights are broad and clear, and, though his shadows occasionally want strength, they in general produce a pleasing and masterly effect. His other prints are executed with the graver, sometimes assisted with the dry-point, in a highly-finished style, resembling that of Count Goudt. They chiefly consist of night-pieces, or scenes by candle-light, and such subjects as require great depth of shadow. The following are his principal works :

PORTRAITS.

John Acronius, Theologian ; after Francis Hals.
 Jacob Mattham, Engraver ; after P. Soutman.
 John Torrentius, Painter ; 1628.
 Lawrence Coster ; after J. van Campen.

SUBJECTS CHIEFLY FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Twelve Months, in twelve plates ; numbered. 1616.
 Another set of the Twelve Months ; larger.
 The Four Seasons ; in four plates ; after Valck. 1617.
 A set of four plates of the History of Tobit ; [after Wtenbroeck.]
 The Four Elements ; after W. Buytenwoegh.
 The Four Times of the Day.
 The Magic Lantern ; after P. de Molyneux.
 The good Samaritan.
 The Pancake Woman.
 A set of six Landscapes, with ruins, figures, and cattle ; [after G. Vander Horst.]
 The Sorceress ; considered his best plate ; engraved in 1626.
 The Trictrac-players.
 A Village Festival. 1623.
 A View in Italy ; after Tempesta.
 A View of the Chateau of Brussels, with a tournament.
 A set of Thirty-six Landscapes, entitled Playsante Landschappen, door Jan van der Velde. C. Visscher, ecc.
 St. Francis kneeling, with a book and a skull before him ; after W. van Boons.
 The Mountebank selling Medicines.

He engraved besides a great variety of landscapes, views, and other subjects. [To his etchings may be added a series representing Spanish Troops marching in the Low Countries during the years 1638, 1641, and 1645, with other military scenes, after Jacob Martis de Jonge. A half-length portrait of Oliver Cromwell in armour, with his head uncovered ; it is an oval within a square. In the angles are the letters O. C. P. R. encircled with palms and laurels. It is engraved with the burin and the point on a plate prepared as for mezzotinto scraping. It is rare. John van de Velde was born in 1593, according to the better authorities.]

VELDE, WILLIAM VAN DE, THE ELDER. This painter was born at Leyden in 1610, and in the early part of his life followed the occupation of a mariner. It is not mentioned at what time he turned his thoughts to painting, or by whom he was instructed in the art ; but before he was twenty years of age he had acquired considerable reputation as a painter of marine subjects, which he usually represented in black and white, in imitation of drawings in Indian ink. His technical acquaintance with every description of shipping, with their various forms and rigging, particularly qualified him for a precise and faithful representation of these objects. His talents recommended him to the notice of the States of Holland, and Descamps acquaints us, that he was accommodated by them with a small vessel for the facility of accompanying their fleets, for the purpose of designing their different manœuvres, and was present in various sea-fights, in which he exposed himself to the most imminent danger, in the prosecution of his studies. He is said to have been a witness of the sea-fight between the Duke of York and the Dutch Admiral Opdam, in 1665 ; and the more memorable engagement, the following year, between the English fleet under the command of the Duke of Albemarle, and the Dutch under Admiral de Ruyter.

King Charles II., who had become acquainted with his talents during his residence in Holland, invited him to England, where he arrived some time before 1675, as, in that year, the king settled a salary of a hundred pounds per annum on him. He continued in the same capacity in the service of James II. until his death, in 1693, and was buried in St. James's church, with the following inscription on his tomb-stone : " Mr. William van de Velde, senior, late painter of sea-fights to their Majesties, King Charles II. and King James, died in 1693."

[Many of the larger pictures of sea-fights bearing the signature of W. van de Velde, are from designs by the father, and executed in colours by the son ; those painted in a coarse and loose manner are probably entirely by the former. Such are a series of twelve naval engagements and sea-ports in the palace at Hampton Court, though signed like the best of the younger Van de Velde ; they are dated 1676 and 1682.]

VELDE, WILLIAM VAN DE, THE YOUNGER. This inimitable marine painter was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was born at Amsterdam in 1633. He received his first instruction in the art from his father, but afterwards studied some time under Simon de Vlieger, an eminent painter of sea-pieces, whose works were then held in high estimation. His progress under that master was extraordinary, and he not only surpassed his instructor, and all his contemporaries, but he arrived at a perfection, in the particular branch to which he devoted himself, which is universally allowed to be unrivalled. " The palm," says Lord Orford, " is not less disputed with Raffaëlle, for history, than with Van de Velde, for sea-pieces." He had acquired the most distinguished reputation in his native country, by the admirable cabinet pictures with which he enriched the collections in Holland, when his father prevailed on him to join him in London. His talents soon recommended him to the notice of the king, who engaged him in his service, with an equal salary to that of his father. He resided chiefly at Greenwich, which had been chosen as a situation best suited to his professional pursuits.

During the life of the elder Van de Velde, he was principally employed by the king in painting pictures from the designs of his father, as appears from the following privy seal, purchased by Dr. Rawlinson, the antiquary, among the papers of Secretary Pepys. " Charles the Second, by the grace of God, &c., to our dear cousin, Prince Rupert, and the rest of our commissioners for executing the place of Lord High Admiral of England, greeting. Whereas we have thought fit to allow the salary of one hundred pounds per annum unto William van de Velde the elder, for taking and making draughts of sea-fights ; and the like salary of one hundred pounds per annum unto William van de Velde the younger, for putting the said draught into colours, for our particular use ; our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby authorize and require you to issue your orders for the present and future establishment of the said salaries to the aforesaid William van de Velde the elder, and William van de Velde the younger, to be paid unto them, or either of them, during our pleasure, and for so doing, these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge. Given under our privy-seal, at our palace of Westminster, the 20th day of February, in the 26th year of our reign."

The exercise of his extraordinary talents was not confined to the service of the king, he was employed by the nobility, and painted an infinite variety of sea-pieces, calms, and storms, which are still the ornament of the principal collections.

The compositions of the younger Van de Velde are distinguished by a more tasteful arrangement of his objects than is found in the productions of any other painter of marines. His vessels are most correctly designed, and, from the improvement which had taken place in ship-building, are of a more graceful and pleasing form than those of his predecessors; the cordage and rigging are finished with a delicacy, and at the same time with a freedom, which are without example; and his small figures are drawn with a correctness and touched with a spirit which are inimitable. In his calms, the sky is brilliant and sunny, and in the glassy smoothness of the water every object is reflected with a luminous transparency, which is only to be met with in the works of this admirable artist. In his squalls or fresh breezes, the swell and curl of the waves is delineated with a truth and fidelity which could only be derived from an attentive and accurate observance of nature; and in his storms and hurricanes, the tremendous conflict of the elements, and the horrors of shipwreck, are represented with a striking solemnity that affects the beholder.

This eminent artist died in 1707, as appears by this inscription under the print of his portrait: Gulielmus Van de Velde, junior, navium et prospectuum marinarum pictor, et ob singularem in illâ arte peritiam à Carolo et Jacobo 2 do. Magnæ Britannia regibus annuâ mercede donatus. Obiit 6 Apr. A. D. 1707. æt. suæ. 74.

[It is probable that the greater part of the fine cabinet pictures by W. van de Velde, the younger, which are now so highly appreciated, were painted before he came to England. The views are off the Dutch coast, and the vessels are principally those of Holland; and the figures also are mariners of the country. These bear the impress of one mind and one hand, and none other can claim a share in the honour of producing them. Some of a later date may be from studies made previous to quitting the place of his nativity; and, therefore, present similar scenes, and take rank accordingly. It follows, that his most admired pictures were painted before he was five-and-forty; not but many of great excellence were the productions of a later period. Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. vi. and Supplement, describes about three hundred and thirty; making allowance for repetitions, and for some executed in conjunction with his father, there will remain at least three hundred that may be safely considered authentic. His drawings are very numerous, especially sketches and studies, and prove the indefatigable pains he took to be accurate in the forms of his vessels, their appurtenances, and the ordonnance of his compositions. It was a saying of a late eminent and very tasteful collector, that he possessed as many as would cover an acre of ground: this may have been an exaggeration; but it is known that during the years 1778 and 1780, there were about eight thousand sold by public auction. It is also recorded, that his execution was so rapid in sketching, that he frequently filled a quire of paper in an evening. Many of his larger pieces represent actions between the English and Dutch fleets, and on these he often wrote over the ships their names and those of their commanders; and under his own vessel in front, V—Veld's Gallijodt, or Myn Gallijodt, proving that he was a spectator of the battle. His sketches are executed in broad black lead only; his more finished drawings with the pencil or pen, and shaded with Indian ink. In the late Baron Verstolk de Soelen's collection, sold at Amsterdam in 1847, were several of high quality and great interest.

At the sale of M. Goll de Frankenstein, at Amsterdam, in 1833, a drawing in Indian ink of "Vessels becalmed," sold for £40, and another for £27. In the same year, at the sale of M. de Vos's collection, a Calm obtained £31; and a "View off the coast at the Texel" was purchased for the museum at Haerlem, at the sum of 1600 florins, £144 sterling. These may be considered noble prices for drawings, which require so much care in their preservation, but bear no comparison with the estimate of his pictures. A few examples of the value of the latter may be interesting.

A View off the entrance of the Texel, in the Earl of Ellesmere's collection, which sold in 1766 for £80, is now estimated at £1000; another in the same sold in 1765 for £84, now worth £500. A Sea-view, which at the Choiseul sale in 1772 brought only £31, in 1828 sold for £300, and is now in the collection of Sir Robert Peel. The Departure of Charles II. from Holland in 1660, sold in 1781 for £82, and recently for £800. A View off the coast of Holland sold in 1816 for £144, and in Sir Simon Clarke's sale in 1840 for £1029. Three pictures in Lady Stuart's sale produced 2220 guineas, one of which sold in Sir Lawrence Dundas's, in 1794, for 250 guineas. A View on the Sea-shore, 16 inches by 12, in 1726, (nineteen years only after the painter's death,) sold for £9, and in 1835 for £108.

The picture known as "Le coup de Canon," brought in 1786 £52, and in 1790 only £36; at the sale of Jeremiah Harman's collection in 1844 it sold for 1380 guineas.

This account of prices might be considerably enlarged, were the editor disposed to divulge his knowledge of private transfers; but such transactions are not of the same validity as those that are patent.]

VELDE, ADRIAN VAN DE. This admired painter was born at Amsterdam in 1639. It does not appear that he was related to the two preceding artists. He discovered, whilst he was yet at school, a decided disposition for painting, and covered the walls of his father's house with sketches of every description of animals, designed with an intelligence very unusual at that early age. This marked inclination for the art induced his father to place him under the tuition of John Wynants, under whom his progress was so extraordinary, that it surprised his instructor. Wynants was one of the ablest landscape painters of his time, and he educated his pupil in the system he had himself pursued, of studying every thing from nature. Our artist passed the greater part of the day in the fields, designing every thing that was essential to his pursuit; and he was soon convinced, that, in the particular branch of the art to which he devoted himself, the conceptions of the happiest and most inventive genius fall short of the abundance, the variety, and the truth, which the study of nature affords. He did not, however, confine himself to landscape and animals, he drew from the model, and became a correct designer of the human figure.

Wynants, who was himself deficient in this respect, had hitherto been under the necessity of applying to other artists, to decorate his landscapes with figures and animals, which service was usually rendered him by Philip Wouwerman or John Lingelback. He now found a more than adequate resource in the talents of his disciple, and some of the finest landscapes of Wynants are adorned with figures and cattle by Adrian van de Velde, which form no inconsiderable part of their value. Such was his excellence in these auxiliary embellishments, that many of his contemporaries applied to him for similar assistance, and the pictures of Vander Heyden, Hackaert, Hobbema, [Ruisdael, Verboom, Moucheron,] and others, have frequently the advantage of being ornamented with his figures and animals.

Although Adrian van de Velde was brought up in the school of a landscape painter, and had not the advantage of a regular education in the higher walk of historic painting, such was the extent of his genius, and the variety of his powers, that he acquired considerable reputation by an altar-piece he painted for the Roman Catholic church at Amsterdam, representing the taking down from the Cross, which was not less admired for the correctness of the design than the beauty of the colouring. He painted, for the same church, several historical subjects taken from the life of Christ, which sufficiently prove that he would have distinguished himself as a painter of history, if he had not chiefly devoted himself to another branch of the art. The scenery in his landscapes is frequently confined to the pasture in which his cattle are grazing; but this humble prospect is always represented with so much truth and nature, that it captivates by its simplicity. The colouring of his trees, his herbage, and plants, is fresh and juicy, and they are touched with as much spirit as delicacy. His skies are brilliant and clear, and his pictures exhibit a sparkling glow of sunshine, which is almost peculiar to himself. His animals, particularly the cows, sheep, and goats, are designed with a correctness and perfection which has never been surpassed. His pictures are deservedly held in the highest estimation, and as he died in the prime of life, the number of them, though always very highly finished, establishes his indefatigable application, as well as his uncommon facility of execution. He died at Amsterdam in 1672. We have by this charming artist about twenty etchings, executed in a finished, but masterly style. They are usually marked with the initials of his name, A. V. V.

A set of three small plates of Cows grazing.

A set of ten plates, representing Cows and other domestic animals, with a Bull for the title.

Three plates of Sheep.

A Return from the Chase.

A large Landscape; lengthways.

A Landscape with historical figures. This print is scarce.

[The following are the titles of the twenty-one etchings described by Bartsch, "Peintre Graveur," tom. i.:

1. A Cow and a Bull; A. V. V. f. 1659.
2. A Cow lying down; Adrian van de Velde f. 1657.
3. The Three Oxen; A. V. Velde f.
4. Two Cows and a Sheep; A. V. V. f.
5. Three Cows; A. V. V. f.
6. The Ox in the Water; A. V. V. f.
7. The Horse; A. V. V. f.
8. The Calf; A. V. Velde f. 1659.
9. The Dogs; A. V. Velde f. 1659.
10. The Goats; A. V. Velde f.

11. The Cow and two Sheep at the foot of a tree. 1670. A. V. V. F. This is one of his principal works and is a real chef d'œuvre.
12. A black and white Ox and three Sheep; A. V. V. F. 1670. This is of the same beauty as the preceding.
13. Two Cows at the foot of a tree; A. V. V. F. Like the preceding in execution, and probably of the same date: a superb piece. This, with the two preceding, sold in Count Rival's sale for 400 francs.
14. The Ewe suckling a Lamb; A. V. V. F. 1670. Etched with a very delicate point.
15. Two Sheep; A. V. V. F. 1670.
16. A Goat; A. V. V.

The six last pieces, forming a series, are generally found together, but they are very rare; particularly the last of the series, which is extremely so. This piece has been copied by Mr. Gibbon for Mr. Sheepshanks's intended catalogue.

17. A Shepherd and Shepherdess with their flocks; Adryaen Vande, Velde, fe, et, Ex, 1653. Very rare. It sold in Count Rival's sale for 200 francs.
18. The City Gate; A. V. Velde f. 1653; the figure 3 reversed.
19. A halt of Huntsmen; A. V. Velde f. 1653. This, with the preceding, sold in Count Rival's sale for 355 francs.
20. A male and a female Peasant. There is neither signature nor date to this etching, but there is scarcely any doubt that it is of the same year as the three preceding, as it is engraved exactly in the same taste as N^o. 17: it is extremely rare; it was not in Count Rival's collection. It has been copied by Bartsch.
21. A Peasant on horseback; A. V. Velde f. 1653. This is also extremely rare: an indifferent impression in Count Rival's sale brought 101 francs.

It will be noted, that as the five last etchings are of the year 1653, the artist (if the date of his birth be given correctly) was only fourteen years old. To this list Rudolph Weigel, in his valuable Supplement to Bartsch, has added the four following:

22. A Landscape with peasants and travellers; signed A. V. Velde f. An impression of this print was in the cabinet of Count Rival, and another in that of the king of Holland, being the only two known at the time that the Count Rival's catalogue was published, in 1817: it was sold in his sale for 405 francs. There is a copy by Mr. Benjamin P. Gibbon, intended for a catalogue of Mr. J. Sheepshanks's collection, but which has not yet appeared.
23. A Woman spinning; A. V. Velde, f. 1653. This is also described in Count Rival's catalogue, and there said to be the only impression known: it was sold in his sale for 950 francs.
24. A Cavalier and two Sportsmen; A. V. Velde f. 1653. This is also described in Count Rival's catalogue, as the only one known; it was sold in his sale for 950 francs. It has been copied by Gibbon for Mr. Sheepshanks's catalogue, which has not yet appeared. A less faithful copy is to be found among the Painters' Etchings by Walker.

Weigel, however, observes that there are other known impressions of these three prints. They were in the collections of Ploos van Amstel, Leyden

v. Vlaardingen, Josi, and the Count de Fries; and are to be found in the Musée at Amsterdam, in the British Museum, and in the cabinet of the Archduke Charles at Vienna.

25. A Cow lying down. On this impression are the letters E D. interlaced; but they appear to be printed with type. It is in the collection of the Archduke Charles.

It may be useful to mention a small oblong piece of A Sheep lying down, which is marked A. v. V. This has been copied excellently by Mr. Gibbon for Mr. Sheepshanks: the original is in the British Museum. Weigel is of opinion that it bears a strong resemblance to the manner of J. van der Meer de Jonge. For a knowledge of the variations of those described by Bartsch, the inquirer should consult Rudolph Weigel's "Supplement," Leipzig, 1843.

For the fullest details of Adrian van de Velde's pictures the readiest reference will be to Smith's "Catalogue raisonné of the Works of the Dutch and Flemish Masters," vol. v. and Supplement. In these volumes there are about one hundred and eighty described, with the names of many of the collections through which they have passed, or where they are at present located. It may, however, be gratifying to the less curious to be informed of the increased estimate that has been placed on this master's works during the last seventy or eighty years; a few examples are therefore quoted. The numbers are those in the catalogue.

No. 2. A mountainous Landscape, in which Jacob, his family, and servants appear conducting their flocks and herds, sold, in the year 1765, for £130; in 1811, at M. Le Brun's sale at Paris, it brought 24,000 francs, £960.

No. 5. Watering Cattle, sold, in 1754, for £135, and in 1810, for £688. It is now in her Majesty's collection.

No. 8. Peasants with Cattle fording a stream, sold, in 1771, for £280; in Sir Simon Clarke's sale, in 1840, for 760 guineas. It is now in the collection of Sir Robert Peel.

No. 15. A Landscape with Cattle, Peasants, and Sheep, sold in the famous Braamcamp collection, in 1771, for £218, and in the Brentano, in 1822, for £746. It is now in the Museum at Amsterdam.

No. 26. La Chasse Royale, sold in the Lormier sale, in 1763, for £53, and in the Count Perre-gaux's, in 1841, for £1125. It was purchased for the Baron Rothschild.

These advances in price are large, but they are not commensurate with the higher estimates made by Experts of many that are in public galleries and royal collections, and therefore not likely to be subjected to the chances of sales, as may be the case with those belonging to private persons; the valuers are therefore always on the safe side.]

VELDNER, [or VELDENER.] JOHN. A German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1480. He is said to have executed a set of cuts for a book entitled "Speculum Humanæ Salvationis," translated into the German language, published in 1483. They are cut in the rude style in which the art was practised at that early period.

[John Veldener was a man of considerable talent; he was a designer, an engraver, and a printer. He was probably a native of Westphalia, as Italian writers call him Giovanni di Westphalia. He operated as a designer so early as 1447; he printed the book called "Fasciculus Temporum," in Latin, ornamented with wood cuts, at Louvaine, in 1474; "Caroli Viruli formulæ Epistolare, in 1476; that entitled "Speculum Humanæ Salvationis," also with wood cuts, at Culembourg, in 1483; and "Historia Santæ Crucis," at the same place, in the same year. These are facts regarding John Veldener. Whether he really designed and engraved the cuts that ornament those books is a question that has exercised the industry and ingenuity of several able writers to maintain or refute. It is certain that he used the privilege of dividing the wood blocks with the cuts for "Speculum Humanæ Salvationis," which was first printed in folio, to make them admissible to his quarto edition. They are not so very rude as might be inferred from what is said in the text. Had Veldener's name not appeared already in the Dictionary, the editor would have left him to Heineken, Santander, Ottley, Zani, and Jackson, with others who have written elaborately, and some of them learnedly, on the subject of the books, and respecting him. To those writers the inquirer is referred for further information.

VELLI, [or VELLI,] BENEDETTO. This artist was a native of Florence, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He painted history with some reputation, and Lanzi mentions in favourable terms a large picture by him in the cathedral at Pistoja, representing the Ascension. [There is, perhaps, an error in saying he flourished in the middle of the seventeenth century, as his picture was painted as a companion to one by Gregorio Pagani, who died in 1605; Zani says that Velli operated in 1588.]

VENANZI, FRANCESCO. In the "Memorie de Pittori Pesaresi e Urbinati," by Gioseffo Montani, this painter is said to have been a native of Pesaro, and flourished about the year 1670. He was for some time a disciple of Guido, but afterwards studied under Simone Cantarini. He did not, however, attach himself to the style of either of those masters, preferring the more vigorous and effective manner of Guercino and the Gennari. In the church of S. S. Gervasio e Protasio, at Bologna, is a fine picture by him, representing the Descent of the Holy Ghost; and in the church of S. Antonio, at Pesaro, are two subjects from the life of that saint, which are considered his finest works. [His names were Giovanni Battista, not Francesco; a picture by him is signed Joan. Venantius Pisaren-sis, F. 1687.]

[VENDRAMINI, JOHN, an eminent engraver, was born at Roncade, near Bassano, in 1769. He pursued his studies in his own country till the age of nineteen, when he came to London, and completed his artistic education under Bartolozzi. In 1805 he went to Russia, and spent two years in that country. He was patronized by the emperor and the court, and his talents so highly appreciated, that he was refused a passport when he was desirous of returning to England. He, however, with the assistance of his friend, the Duke of Saracaprìolo, at that time Neapolitan ambassador, contrived to escape, disguised as a courier charged with despatches. What hastened his departure, as he informed the editor, was an accident that happened to a large cameo, Alexander and Olympia, which he was employed to design and engrave for the emperor. This being one of the most valuable antique gems known, he was commanded to execute his work in the palace. By accident the laurel that encircled the brow of Alexander was broken, and the artist was well aware that no excuse would pacify the autocrat, he therefore adopted the dangerous resolution of taking it out of the palace to be repaired. He might have received a few strokes of the knout for the first offence; a visit to Siberia would have been the sure reward for the second. Being known to the guard, he was suffered to pass without question; he hurried with all the terrors of apprehension to a jeweller, had the fracture skilfully repaired, and returned to the palace without his absence being noticed; nor was the circumstance discovered till some years afterwards.

On his return to England he continued his profession with diligence and success. He engraved several popular pictures by contemporary painters; but those on which his reputation stands are after works by the old masters. Among these are the Vision of St. Catherine, after Paul Veronese; St. Sebastian, after Spagnoletto; Leda, after Lionardo da Vinci; and lastly, the Raising of Lazarus, after Sebastian del Piombo.

Vendramini was a very accurate draftsman, and frequently engraved from the picture without making a previous drawing. He died at London the 8th of February, 1839.]

VENTENI, GIULIO CESARE, a Bolognese gentleman, who was a great admirer of the art, and studied it with the zeal of a professor. He was born at Bologna about the year 1609, and was instructed in design by Filippo Brizio, who had studied under Guido. We have several etchings by this amateur artist, executed in a spirited style; among which are the following:

The Guardian Angel; after Dom. Maria Canuti.
Tancred and Clorinda; after the same.
The Virgin of the Rose; after Parmigiano.
A Landscape, with the Holy Family; after An. Caracci.

He usually marked his plates with the monogram

 [Zani places his death in 1697.]

VENEZIANO, ANTONIO. See MUSIS.

VENEZIANO, SEBASTIANO. See PIOMBO.

VENEZIANO, CARLO. See SARACINO.

VENEZIANO, ANTONIO. Vasari and Baldinucci are at variance respecting the place of nativity of this painter; the former states him to have been born at Venice in 1310, and to have studied at Florence under Agnolo Gaddi; the latter, whose pretensions to accuracy are highly respectable, asserts that he was a native of Florence, and acquired the name Veneziano from his long residence at Venice, where he executed several works in the Ducal Palace. His principal works are at Pisa and Florence. Some of his pictures are still preserved in the Campo Santo at Pisa, representing the history of S. Ranieri; and at Florence is his most celebrated performance, of the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes. His style was less dry and formal than the generality of his contemporaries, and he is said to have carried fresco painting to a higher degree of perfection than it had attained previous to the period at which he lived. He died in 1384.

VENEZIANO, DOMENICO. This painter was born at Venice in 1420, and, according to Vasari, was a disciple of Antonio da Messina after he had learned the secret of oil-painting from John van Eyck, by whom he was made acquainted with the recent discovery. He afterwards resided some time at Loreto and Perugia, and ultimately settled at Florence, where his works, both on account of their merit and the novelty of the process, were greatly admired. He formed an intimacy with Andrea del Castagno, an eminent Tuscan painter, to whom his friendship induced him to intrust the secret.

Urged by the ambition of remaining the sole possessor of so valuable a discovery, Castagno conceived the horrible design of assassinating his friend, and effected his treacherous project in 1476, when Domenico Veneziano was in his fifty-sixth year. His principal works are in the church of S. Lucia, and in the monastery degli Angeli, at Florence.

VENIER, NICHOLAS. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a set of twelve plates, representing the Months of the Year, after Bassano.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, OTHO. This estimable artist was of a distinguished family of Holland, and was born at Leyden in 1556. He was carefully educated by his parents in the belles-lettres, and though his progress in the study of the classics was remarkable, they did not oppose the decided inclination he discovered for painting. He received some lessons in design from Isaac Nicholas, and was afterwards a scholar of Jodocus van Wighen. When he had reached the age of fifteen, the civil wars obliged him to leave his native country, and to retire to Liege, where he continued to prosecute his studies, both in literature and in the arts. His talents recommended him to the notice of Cardinal Grosbeck, at that time Prince Bishop of Liege, who, desirous of procuring him the best means of improvement, advised him to visit Italy, and furnished him with letters of particular recommendation to Cardinal Maduccio at Rome. On his arrival in that capital, he was received by his Eminence with the greatest kindness, and was accommodated with apartments in his palace. He became a disciple of Federigo Zuccaro, and by the instruction of that master, and an attentive study of the best productions of the art, and the beauties of antiquity, he acquired a correctness of design, and a more elevated taste, than was possessed by any of his Flemish competitors.

After a residence of seven years in Italy, Otho Venius visited Germany, where he passed some time in the service of the emperor, who made him the most flattering proposals, to retain him at his court. The desire of returning to the Low Countries induced him to decline so honourable an invitation, and passing through Munich and Cologne, where he painted some pictures for the Duke of Bavaria and the Elector, he arrived at Brussels, where Alessandro Farnese, Prince of Parma, who was at that time the governor of the Netherlands, appointed him his principal engineer, and painter to the court. He drew the portrait of his protector, and executed several other works, which established his reputation as the most eminent painter of his time.

After the death of the Prince of Parma, Otho Venius established himself at Antwerp, where he embellished the churches and public edifices with several celebrated pictures. It was at this time that Rubens became his disciple, and it is no mean claim to celebrity, to have been the instructor of that illustrious artist.

When the Archduke Albert, who succeeded the Prince of Parma in the government of the Low Countries, made his public entry into Antwerp, Otho Venius designed the triumphal arches which were erected on the occasion, and the ingenuity of the compositions was so much admired by the Archduke, that he invited him to the court of Brussels, appointed him his principal painter, and master of the mint, which situations he filled with great respectability until his death, in 1634.

The works of Otho Venius exhibit a fertile and inventive genius; his compositions are learned and judicious, and his design, formed by his studies at Rome, is more graceful and correct than that of any of his contemporaries of the Flemish school. The airs of his heads are graceful and expressive, his draperies are cast with ease and propriety, and he was one of the earliest of the Flemish artists who had a perfect intelligence of the principles of the chiaro-scuro. Among his principal works in the public edifices in the Low Countries are, the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the church of the Capuchins at Brussels; the Last Supper, in the cathedral at Antwerp; the Resurrection of Lazarus, in the church of St. Bavon at Ghent; and the Adoration of the Magi, in the cathedral at Bruges.

Otho Venius distinguished himself in literature as well as in the arts, and published several works, which were all embellished with plates, chiefly engraved by his brother, Gilbert Venius, from his designs. Among others are the following: a History of the War of the Batavians against Claudius Civilis and Cerialis, from Tacitus; Horace's Emblems, with observations; the Life of Thomas Aquinas, and the Emblems of Love, divine and profane.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, GERTRUDE. This lady was the daughter of Otho Venius, and was born at Brussels about the year 1600. She was instructed in the art by her father, and excelled in painting portraits. There is a print of a portrait of Otho Venius, painted by her, engraved by Rucholle.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, GYSBERT, or GILBERT, was the younger brother of Otho Venius, and was born at Leyden about the year 1566. He engraved a variety of plates, executed with the graver, in a style resembling that of Cornelius Cort. He probably visited Italy with his brother, as we have several prints by him, after the works of the Italian masters. His drawing is tolerably correct, and the character of his heads is not without expression. He also engraved a great number of plates from the designs of his brother, chiefly emblematical subjects, and some portraits, which possess considerable merit. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Ernest, Duke of Bavaria; in a medallion, supported by Fame.

Cardinal Alessandro Farnese; after Otho Venius.

Giovanni da Bologna. 1589.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Four Seasons; after Raffaele del Colle. 1589.

These have been incorrectly stated to be from the designs of Raffaele d'Urbino.

The Spousal of Isaac and Rebecca; after Bal. Peruzzi; in five sheets, in the form of a frieze; fine and scarce.

The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth; after F. Barocci.

The Crucifixion; after the same.

The Emblems of Horace; after Otho Venius.

The Emblems of divine and profane Love; after the same.

The Life of St. Thomas Aquinas; a set of several plates; after the same.

[He was born at Leyden in 1558, and died at Antwerp in 1628.]

[VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, ROCHUS, born at Antwerp in 1650, excelled in painting live and dead birds, which he finished with great care. He died at Haerlem in 1706.]

[VENNE, ABRAHAM VANDER, a portrait painter, born in 1586, and died in 1650. There is a portrait of Prince William I. by him in the Museum at Amsterdam.]

[VENNE, ADRIAN VANDER, born at Delft in 1589, was a scholar of Jerome van Diest. He excelled in fancy designs for illustration; he made those that ornament the works of the Dutch poet Cats, and furnished numerous vignettes for the printers of his time, in which he exhibited good taste and a lively imagination. He was equally facile in painting; and though some of his pictures are of immense size, the number is said to be prodigious. The subjects of some are the famous battles fought in Flanders. He painted the portrait of Prince Maurice on horseback, accompanied by his brothers, and other members of the Nassau family. He also possessed considerable literary talent, and published several works of a satirical tendency. He died at the Hague in 1662.

[VENNE, HUBERT VANDER, born at the Hague, painted bas-reliefs, groups of children, vases, and other ornaments. There are no particulars of him, but he is supposed to have been of the same family as the preceding.]

[VENNE, JAN VANDER, born at Brussels, painted landscapes, which are sometimes enlivened with figures by Bant.]

VENTURINI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO. This artist was born at Rome about the year 1619. From the style of his engraving, it is probable that he was a disciple of Giovanni Batista Galestruzzi. He etched several plates from the works of Italian masters, among which are the following:

A set of Plates; after Polidoro da Caravaggio; from the designs of Galestruzzi.

Diana and her Nymphs at the Chace; after Domenichino.

The Pulpit of St. Peter's; after Bernini.

A bird's-eye View of the Palaces and Gardens in and near Rome.

VENUSTI, MARCELLO. This painter was born at Mantua in 1515, and was a scholar of Pierino Buonacorsi, called del Vaga; but he was more indebted for the reputation he acquired, to his study of the works of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, and the pictures he painted from the designs of that master. He executed several works, from his own compositions, in the churches and public edifices at Rome, which are mentioned by Baglione, among which he particularly notices the Martyrdom of St. Catherine, in the church of S. Agostino; and St. John preaching in the Wilderness, in S. Caterina alli Funari. The Cardinal Alessandro Farnese employed him to copy the stupendous picture of the Last Judgment, by Michael Angelo, on a small scale, which he accomplished in so perfect a manner, that it excited the admiration of that illustrious artist, who engaged him to paint, from his design, an altar-piece for the Capella de Cesi, in the church of La Pace, representing the Annunciation; and in various other works. In the palazzo Borghese is a fine picture by him of Christ bearing his Cross, from a design by Michael Angelo. He died in 1576.

VERAT, DARIUS. Mr. Strutt notices this artist as the engraver of a print representing two Women, half-length, one of which is combing her hair. It is slightly etched, and inscribed Alex. Verat, pinx. Darius filius sculp. [These names signify Alexander and Darius Varottari.]

VERBEECK, or VERBEECQ, PHILIP, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. He engraved several plates in a style so nearly resembling that of Rembrandt, though anterior to that artist, that his prints have been sometimes confounded with those of that distinguished master. Among others we have the following:

- A Bust of a young Woman, with a hat and a pelisse.
- A Bust of a Man, with a turban and feather.
- Esau selling his Birthright to Jacob.
- A King seated on his Throne, with a Man kneeling before him.
- A Shepherd seated at the foot of a tree. 1619.

[There were several artists, painters and engravers, of the name Verbeeck, or Verbeeck, who operated during the first half of the 17th century; they have been confounded with each other. Philip operated at the same period as Peter Verbeeck, both being engravers as well as painters and designers: but Peter signed P. C. Verbeeck, and dated from 1619 to 1639; Philip also dated in the latter year. But there was a G. Verbeeck, whose manner of etching also resembles that of Rembrandt; it is to this artist the print of Esau selling his Birthright to Jacob belongs, and he operated as late as 1659. Peter Verbeeck was also a painter of landscapes, with subjects of hunting parties, halts of travellers, and conversations; he was one of the first instructors of Philip Wouwerman, whose early pictures bear some resemblance to his. Both Peter and Philip Verbeeck were natives of Haerlem; it is probable that G. Verbeeck was of the same place and family, though there is a slight difference in the spelling of the name, a circumstance very common with the Dutch artists of the period. Brulliot describes a print of "A Shepherd standing," signed P. C. Verbeeck, and dated 1639. He wears a bonnet ornamented with a feather, and is dressed in a short cassock, with a calabash on his right side, and holds a crook; he is accompanied by a dog. This seems to have escaped the notice of other writers. Two small busts, in ovals, of a Man and a Woman, in Oriental costume, have the same signature and date. Acknowledged connoisseurs having attributed the etchings of the Verbeecks to Rembrandt, makes it desirable to clear up the confusion that has hitherto existed. The inquirer will be assisted by consulting Bartsch's Catalogue of the works of Rembrandt; Zani, Enciclopedia Metodica, parte seconda, vol. iii.; Brulliot, Dictionnaire des Monogrammes; Rigal's Catalogue; and probably Nagler, whose Dictionary has not at present reached the name.]

[VERBIUS, or VERBUIJS, ARNOLD, called the Libertine, a painter of history, portraits, and lascivious subjects, was born at Dort about 1646, and died in Friesland in 1704.]

VERBOOM, ——. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1620. He painted landscapes in a very pleasing style, which deservedly find a place in the best collections of his own country, though little known in England. We have a few charming etchings by the hand of this able artist, which are executed with taste and spirit.

[It is surprising that so little notice should have been taken by the Dutch writers of Verboom, considering his excellence as a landscape painter, and the beauty of his two known etchings. He flourished about the middle of the 17th century, as appears by the date 1654 on one of his pictures, and was probably a native of Haerlem, as he painted and etched the surrounding scenery. His style of painting participates of that of Waterloo and Both, but not so warm as the latter, and occasionally approaches that of Jacob Ruisdael. His landscapes are generally well wooded, and the foliage lightly touched and verdant, but time has in some instances deepened the tones. Occasionally they are enriched with figures and animals by Wouwerman, or Lingelbach. His pictures are, however, of rare occurrence; indeed, so much so that they are scarcely known out of Holland. Besides the two etchings described by Bartsch, first impressions of which, though of extreme rarity, are well known to all intelligent print collectors, it is supposed that there are others to which he omitted to put his name. Indeed, only one of those described has his name, V'Boom f., though there can be no doubt of the other. There is a series of six landscapes engraved after him by Gronsveld. Bartsch writes his name A. H. V. Boom; others call him Abraham Verboom; on a picture seen by the editor, the signature is A. Verboom. In the Museum at Amsterdam there is a woody scene near a river, by him; and in the Museum at Brussels, a landscape, with figures preparing for the chase; the figures and animals are by Lingelbach. The two prints described by Bartsch are,

1. Le Hameau. It is so called from a hovel which is seen in the distance, towards the right, of a landscape in which there are several trees, the tallest having but little foliage; the name is at the top on the left. L. Gr. Gl., H. 4p. 10l.
2. La piece d'eau. A landscape, of the same dimensions as the former, in which there is a sheet of water in the centre extending to the bottom of the print on the left. Several trees are on the banks; the largest is lopped above, some of the branches have very little foliage, and others are quite bare. There are six or seven more at unequal distances. The view is terminated abruptly by a horizontal line.

Bartsch remarks that these two prints are so very rare that they were not to be found in some of the most celebrated collections, such as those of Marcus Vander Dussen, Ploos van Amstel, and others equally renowned. Heineken does not mention them in his Dictionary, nor does Basan, nor Strutt, in their accounts of engravers; a proof that they were absolutely unknown to them. The earliest impressions are those in which there is the least appearance of the burin, and before the skies were expressed by horizontal lines. There are modern impressions which, according to Weigel, are very bad.]

[VERBRUGGE, ANDRIESZ, GYSBERT, was born at Leyden the 12th of July, 1633, according to Immerzeel, but Füessli and Zani say twenty years later. He was a scholar of Gerard Dou, but confined himself chiefly to portrait painting. He passed some time in England, but returned to his own country and established himself at Delft, where he died, says Füessli, in 1730, in his 77th year. It is said that a great number of portraits and cabinet pictures, of considerable merit, by him are to be found at Delft: the discovery will occasion some surprise.]

VERBRUGGEN, [or TERBRUGGEN,] HENRY. This painter was born at Utrecht in 1583, and was brought up in the school of Abraham Bloemart. As soon as he was able to subsist on the produce of his talents, he determined on visiting Italy, and resided ten years at Rome and Naples, where his merit recommended him to the notice of several of the nobility, and he painted many pictures for the public edifices and private collections, which were admired for the correctness of the design, and for the boldness of his handling. He particularly distinguished himself by an altar-piece he painted for one of the principal churches at Naples, representing a Deposition from the Cross, composed in a grand and impressive style. On his return to Holland, he chiefly resided at Middleburg, where he continued to exercise his talents with great respectability, until his death in 1640, at the age of 52. When Rubens made his tour through Holland, he was particularly struck with the works of Verbruggen, and pronounced him to be one of the ablest painters of his country. [The name is Terbruggen, not Verbruggen; all the authorities agree that he died at Utrecht in 1629, in his 41st year.]

VERBRUGGEN, GASPAR PETER. This painter, born at Antwerp in 1668, was the son of Peter Verbruggen, an artist of whom nothing further is known, than that he was director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1659; and he probably learned the rudiments of design from his father. Having acquired considerable reputation in his native city as a painter of flowers and fruit, he established himself at the Hague in 1706. The Greffier Fagel employed him, in conjunction with Matthew Terwesten, in the decoration of his hotel. The figures were painted by Terwesten, who was an eminent historical painter, and the festoons of flowers and fruit, with the other ornaments, were executed by Verbruggen. In 1708 he was made a member of the Academy at the Hague, where, during a residence of several years, he amassed a competent fortune, with which he returned to Antwerp.

The works of Verbruggen evince an uncommon facility of execution, and his style exhibits the loose and spirited touching of John Baptist Monnoyer, rather than the polished finishing of Van Huysum, or Rachel Ruysch. Towards the latter part of his life he became negligent, and his productions of that period are very inferior to those of an earlier date. He died in 1720.

[Note. The celebrated sculptors and carvers in wood, Pieter and Henri François Verbruggen, should not be confounded with the painters of the same name. Their masterly works were to be seen in the cathedral and churches at Antwerp in pulpits, confessionals, and other ecclesiastical ornaments; and in the carved decorations of many noble mansions in Belgium. Sad havoc was made of them during the war, and some magnificent pieces were sold to brokers and consigned to England.]

VERCRUYS. See KRUGER.

[VERDIER, FRANÇOIS DU, sometimes called Van Hawken, a French historical painter, designer, and engraver, was born in 1651, and died in 1730. He was a scholar of Le Brun, and copied many of the works of his master; he is better known by these than by his original compositions. His drawings are numerous in France; they are chiefly in black or red chalk heightened with white; but have the appearance of being plagiarisms from Le Brun without additional excellence.]

VERDIZOTTI, GIOVANNI MARIA. This artist was born at Venice in 1525, and, according to Ridolfi, was the scholar and friend of Titian. He excelled in painting landscapes, in the great style of his instructor, though generally of a small size, and embellished them with figures, usually representing some subject of history or the fable. Tradition speaks of him as a man of letters and a poet. Among other literary works, he published a Translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and the Æneid; and, on the death of Titian, celebrated the memory of his master with a Latin poem. He died at Venice in 1600.

VERDOEL, ADRIAN. This painter was a native of Holland, and was born about the year 1620. He was brought up in the school of Rembrandt, whose manner he followed. His design was more correct, and his compositions more elevated than those of his master, but he was unequal to him in the harmony of his colouring, and the effect of the chiaroscuro. His pictures are little known, as he quitted the art, and engaged in commercial pursuits. [It is said that he studied under Leonard Bramer and one of the De Wittes previous to entering the school of Rembrandt. He died at Flushing in 1681.]

[VERDUSSEN, JOHN PETER, was an excellent painter of horse-fairs, hunting-pieces, and other subjects, in which animals formed the principal objects. Some of his pictures are to be found in the Munich collection, and occasionally in England. There are but few particulars respecting him recorded, but he flourished from 1743 to 1763, in which year it is supposed that he died.]

VERELST, SIMON. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1664, and distinguished himself as a painter of flowers and fruit. He visited England in the reign of Charles II., where his works were extremely admired; he was extensively employed, and his prices were the highest that had ever been given for similar subjects. The noble author of the Anecdotes has given so whimsical a picture of the vanity and conceit of this eccentric artist, that the insertion of it will not be deemed uninteresting. "The Duke of Buckingham patronized him, but having too much wit to be only beneficent, and perceiving the poor man to be immoderately vain, he piqued him to attempt portraits. Verelst, thinking nothing impossible to his pencil, fell into the snare, and drew the duke himself, but crowded it so much with fruit and sun-flowers, that the king, to whom it was shown, took it for a flower-piece. However, as it sometimes happens to wiser buffoons than Verelst, he was laughed at till he was admired, and Sir Peter Lely himself became the real sacrifice to the jest; he lost much of his business, and retired to Kew, whilst Verelst engrossed the fashion, and for one half-length was paid a hundred and ten pounds. His portraits were exceedingly laboured, and finished with as much delicacy as his flowers, which he still continued to introduce into them. Lord Chancellor Shaftesbury going to sit to him, was received by him with his hat on. 'Don't you know me?' said the peer. 'Yes,' replied the painter, 'you are my Lord Chancellor: and do you know me? I am Verelst. The king can make any man chancellor, but he can make nobody a Verelst.' Shaftesbury was disgusted, and sat to Greenhill. He called himself the god of flowers, and went to Whitehall, saying, he wanted to converse with the king for two or three hours. Being repulsed, he said, 'He is king of England, I am king of painting, why should we not converse familiarly together.' He showed an historic piece, on which he had laboured twenty years, and boasted that it contained all the several manners and excellencies of Raffaele, Titian, Rubens, and Vandyck." His absurdities were not diminished by the inconsiderate applause bestowed on his works, and the homage paid him by the poets of his time; among which were the following lines by Mr. Prior:

When famed Verelst this little wonder drew,
Flora vouchsafed the growing work to view;

Finding the painter's science at a stand,
The goddess snatched the pencil from his hand,
And finishing the piece, she smiling said,
Behold one work of mine, that ne'er shall fade.

He died in 1710.

[It was an absurdity of Walpole to say that Sir Peter Lely lost much of his business through the popularity of Verelst; Lely died in 1680, when Verelst was only sixteen years old. Probably much of the other gossip is of the same stamp.]

VERELST, HERMAN, was the brother of the preceding artist, and chiefly resided at Vienna, until it was besieged by the Turks in 1683, where he acquired some reputation as a painter of fruit and flowers, and sometimes attempted history. The success of his brother induced him afterwards to visit England, where he passed the remainder of his life, and died in 1700. [There seems to be a mistake here either with regard to date or relationship; it is stated in the following articles that his daughter was born in 1630, and his son in 1667.]

VERELST, CORNELIUS, was the son of Herman Verelst, born at Vienna in 1667, and accompanied his father to England, where he met with success in painting similar subjects.

VERELST, MARIA. This accomplished lady was the daughter of Herman Verelst, born in 1630, and learned the first rudiments of design from her father, but was more indebted to the instruction of her uncle, Simon Verelst, with whom she principally resided. She excelled in painting portraits of a small size, and occasionally attempted history. She had received an excellent education; was a great proficient in music, and spoke Latin, German, Italian, and other languages. [If the date be correct she could hardly have received instruction from Simon Verelst, who was her junior by thirty-four years.]

VERENDAEL, N. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1659. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, but he acquired considerable celebrity as a painter of flowers and fruit. His works are very highly wrought up, and he appears to have been desirous of imitating the delicate finishing of Abraham Mignon. Every object is faithfully copied from nature, and the insects, which he was fond of introducing into his pictures, are designed and touched with surprising minuteness and precision. His flower-pieces are tastefully arranged, and they are generally preferred to his pictures of fruit. Although the works of this painter are little inferior to those of Mignon, they are still very unequal to the admirable productions of John van Huysum and Rachel Ruysch. [They are beautiful productions, and worthy of a place in any collection. He died in 1717.]

[VEREYCKE, HANS, by his contemporaries called Little John, was born at Bruges in 1510. He painted portraits and landscapes with considerable ability; he showed good taste in his selection of the latter, and gave them an agreeable and natural air in the representation. It is supposed that he died about 1569.]

VERGAZON, HENRY, a Dutch painter of landscapes and ruins, who resided in England in the reign of William III. He also painted portraits of a small size, but was chiefly employed in painting the back-grounds of Sir Godfrey Kneller's pictures.

VERHAECHT, TOBIAS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1566. It is not known who was his instructor, but he had acquired some celebrity as a landscape painter, when he determined to visit Italy, in search of improvement. He resided some time at Florence, where his talents recommended him to the notice of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, for whom he painted several large landscapes and views, and afterwards visited Rome, where his works were held in no less estimation. On his return to Flanders, he was considered one of the ablest landscape painters of his time, and had the credit of being the first master of Rubens. His scenery is grand and extensive, and he possessed a more perfect acquaintance with aerial perspective than any of his contemporaries. He embellished his landscapes with the ruins of antiquity, of which he had made a variety of designs during his residence at Rome. As he was not very successful in painting figures, those in his pictures are usually by the eminent painters of his time, particularly by Franck. He died in 1631.

[VERHAGHEN, PETER JOSEPH, an historical painter, was born at Aerschot the 19th of March, 1728, according to Immerzeel, (Balkema says 1720,) and was instructed by Kerckhoven and Beschey. He was indefatigable in his application, and produced a great number of pictures, remarkable for their colouring. He was patronized by Prince Charles of Lorraine, and by the Empress Maria Teresa. At the expense of the government he travelled through France, Sardinia, and Italy. At Rome he painted an Ecce Homo, and Christ at Emmaus, which attracted much attention. The richness of the composition and the beauty of the colouring of the latter astonished the Italians, says his biographer, and they could scarcely credit that it was painted by Verhaghen. Such was the admiration it excited at Rome, that the Pope, Clement XIV., desired to know the painter. At an audience, his Holiness was so charmed with his talents and modesty, that he accorded him, continues his biographer, plenary indulgence at the hour of death for himself, his relations and connexions to the third degree, and for thirty other persons at his nomination. This was pretty liberal; but his Holiness did something more substantial, in a worldly sense; he presented the artist with two gold medals. After painting several other pictures, he took an affectionate leave of the liberal Pope, and returned to Vienna, where he was graciously received by the Empress, to whom he presented his picture of Christ at Emmaus. This her Majesty placed in her bed-chamber; his Ecce Homo was located in the royal chapel; and a third picture, not named, was sent to keep company with St. Stephen in the Imperial Gallery. He was appointed principal painter to the Empress, who made him the present of a gold snuff-box with an enamelled portrait of Maria Christina. These favours, however, could not induce him to remain at Vienna; so he returned to Louvain on the 24th October, 1773, when he was met by such a cavalcade to welcome him, that neither a horse nor a carriage, says his biographer, was to be found in the city. Such honours would have turned the head of any one but a painter; he took them calmly and philosophically. He did not relax his industry; he painted numerous other pictures; but, says the biographer, the fecundity of his pencil caused him often to neglect the drawing and finishing. An enumeration of his works would be too long for insertion; but are they not to be found in the churches and convents of his country, and at Rome and Vienna? and are they not recorded in the "Messager des Sciences Historiques" for the year 1839? Verhagen died the 3rd of April, 1811.]

VERHELST, EGIDIUS, or GILES. According to Huber, this artist was a native of Bavaria, and was born about the year 1742. After being instructed in the rudiments of design in his native country he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of John George Wille, and on his return to Germany engraved several portraits and other subjects, in the neat and finished style of that master. Among others, we have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

Charles Theodore, Elector of Bavaria. 1790.
Elizabeth Augusta, his consort.
The Elector of Treves.
A. W. Ifland.

SUBJECTS.

A set of five plates for a Translation of Tasso's Jerusalem.
Two Heads, characteristic of Innocence and Simplicity; for the work of Lavater.

[Egidius (Giles) Verhelst, or Verelst, was the son of a Bavarian sculptor, and born in 1742. For some years he followed the profession of his father, and practised at Munich, Stuttgart, Augsburg, Dusseldorf, Mannheim, and other cities. At Mannheim he was appointed Professor of Design to the Academy, and a member of that of Dusseldorf. Being desirous, however, of acquiring further knowledge in art, he went to Paris, and placed himself under the direction of J. G. Wille, to improve himself in engraving, which he had previously practised. After some stay with this able master, he returned to Munich, and made it his profession. There are several well-executed portraits by him, and book-illustrations, particularly those that ornament the translation of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata by Heinsius. He was living in 1790.

There was another of the same name, who was a designer and engraver, and flourished about 1733. He was the son of an older Egidius, a sculptor, and probably the uncle of the preceding; but there are no particulars of him, and he is noticed here merely to prevent confusion.]

[VERHELST, PETER, (some call him PAUL), a painter of familiar subjects in the manner of Gerard Dou, Mieris, and Slingelandt, was born about the year 1614, but where is not on record. He treated his subjects with great ability in drawing, colouring, and composition, and much skill in the distribution of light and shadow. Though his pictures are in the style of the masters above named, they have no appearance of copying, or studied imitation. By a date on one it appears he was living in 1659; how much later it is impossible to say, as the editor can find no account of him in the Dutch writers.]

VERHEYDEN, FRANCIS PETER. This painter was born at the Hague in 1659, [others say 1657.] He followed the profession of a sculptor until he was forty years of age, and was one of the artists employed in modelling the figures and ornaments for the triumphal arches erected on the public entry of William III. into the Hague, in 1691. Having seen some pictures of animals by Francis Snyders, he was so struck with them, that he determined to abandon sculpture, and devote himself to painting. In this change of profession, contrary to the expectations of his friends, he was very successful. He painted huntings of various animals, which were ingeniously composed, and designed with a spirit and correctness little inferior to the distinguished artist he had adopted as his model. He also excelled in painting fowls and dead game, in the style of Hondecooter, and acquired a freedom of touch, and a boldness of pencilling, that is surprising, when we consider the late period of his life at which he commenced painting. His pictures are little known, except in Holland, where they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1711.

[VERHEYDEN, MATTHEW, probably the son of F. P. Verheyden, born at Breda in 1700, is spoken of as a good portrait painter. He was first placed under Michael Carré, but having lost his father at the early age of eleven, he was taken under the protection of Terwesten and Netscher, and pursued his studies with great assiduity. At the age of fifteen he went to the Hague, and profited by the instructions of Karil de Moor. From these able masters he must have derived great information; and it seems that he gave such general satisfaction as enabled him to live in that place with competence and comfort. His portraits, however, like those of many other good painters, are not known out of Holland, being attributed perhaps to masters with whose names the public are more familiar.]

VERHOEK, PETER CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Boodegraven in 1642. He was a disciple of Abraham Hondius, under whom he became an able designer of animals. He afterwards travelled to Italy, where he studied attentively the works of Il Borgognone, and distinguished himself as a painter of battles and skirmishes of cavalry. He met with very flattering encouragement both at Rome and Naples, where his works were generally admired. His small figures and horses are correctly drawn, and touched with great spirit and animation. He also painted landscapes in a pleasing style, which he decorated with figures in the manner of Callot. [He was born in 1633, and died in 1702. He first studied under Vander Ulft, as a painter on glass; and afterwards at Bologna.]

VERHOEK, GYSBERT, or GILBERT. This artist was born at Boodegraven in 1644; he was the younger brother of the painter mentioned in the preceding article, from whom he received his first instruction in the art, but he afterwards became a scholar of Adam Pynaker. He did not, however, attach himself to the style of that master, but painted similar subjects to those of his brother, representing battles, marches of cavalry, and encampments. He particularly excelled in the drawing of horses, in every action or attitude, and the animated touch of his pencil was peculiarly adapted to the subjects he painted. The works of this artist are frequently found in the collections in Holland, though little known in this country. He died in 1690.

[VERHUIK, or VERHUIITS, CORNELIUS, said to have been born at Rotterdam in 1648, painted a variety of subjects, but was chiefly distinguished for his skirmishes and hunting-pieces. It seems that he spent some time in Italy, where his works were much admired. For this reason, perhaps, his countrymen have taken but little notice of him. He died about 1702. The editor, however, suspects that he is identical with Peter Cornelius Verhoeck, mentioned above.]

[VERHULST, PETER, a native of Dort, painted fruit, flowers, and insects, in the manner of Otho Masseur, or Marcellis. He was a scholar of William Doudyns, which is all that is said of him.]

VERKOLIE, JOHN, was born at Amsterdam in 1650, and was the son of a locksmith, who brought him up to his own profession; but having met with an accident when he was about twelve years of age, which confined him for three years to his bed, he amused himself, during a painful and tedious confinement, with copying whatever prints or other objects of art he could procure. After his recovery he was permitted to indulge the propensity which he had discovered, and he became a disciple of John Lievens, by whose instruction he was in a short time sufficiently advanced to dispense with further assistance. The works of Gerard Pietersz van Zyl were at that time held in the highest estimation, and instead of following the style of his instructor, he endeavoured to imitate the high-finished manner of that master. He was chiefly employed in painting portraits of a small size, though he occasionally painted historical subjects and conversations, which were well coloured, and touched with neatness and delicacy. He died in 1693.

John Verkolie was one of the earliest engravers in mezzotinto in Holland. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Stephen Wolters; Amator Artium; after Kneller.
William Henry, Prince of Orange.
Hortensia de Mancini, Duchess of Mazarin; after Lely.
His own Portrait; after de Leeuw.

SUBJECTS.

Diana and Calisto; after Gasp. Netscher.
Venus and Adonis; after his own design.
Venus and Cupid. 1682.
Pan and Flora.

VERKOLIE, NICHOLAS. This artist was the son and the disciple of John Verkolie, and was born at Delft in 1673. His father died when he was twenty years of age, but he had made sufficient progress in the art to continue the prosecution of his studies without the aid of another master. For some time he painted small portraits and domestic subjects in the style of his father, but he afterwards applied himself to historical painting, in which he became one of the ablest artists of his time. Amongst his most esteemed works are three pictures, formerly in the collection of M. de Neufville, at Amsterdam, representing David and Bathsheba, Moses saved from the Nile, and St. Peter denying Christ. His compositions are simple and judicious, his design is more correct and graceful than is usual with the artists of his country; his colouring is tender and harmonious, and his pencil is firm, though delicate. The pictures of Nicholas Verkolie are found in the choicest collections in Holland, where they are deservedly admired. He died at Amsterdam in 1746. This artist also distinguished himself as a mezzotinto engraver, and carried that art to a much higher degree of perfection than his father. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Bernard Picart; after Nattier.
John Peter Van Zomer, holding a print in his hand; after A. Boonen.

SUBJECTS.

The Holy Family; after Ad. Vander Werff.
Diana and Endymion; after Gas. Netscher.
Bacchus and Ariadne; after the same.
A Shepherd and Shepherdess; after the same.
An Entertainment in a Garden; after J. B. Weenix.

[VERMEER, JAN, more generally called DELFT VANDER MEER, or VANDER MEER OF DELFT. Of an artist whose works are so highly valued, it is surprising that so little is known. It is said that he was a scholar of a painter of the name of Charles Fabritius, who lost his life when the powder explosion occurred at Delft in 1654, and that he followed the manner of his master, portrait painting and perspectives. It is said that he was born in 1632; it is known by his pictures that he operated in 1667. The subjects he most frequently painted were females occupied in domestic concerns, or engaged in the amusements of reading, writing, music, or cards. These he treated with much of the elegance and suavity of Gabriel Metsu in the figures, and an approach to Peter De Hooze in perspective and chiaro-scuro. But he did not confine his pencil to interiors; he painted landscapes and views of cities with equal ability. A view of the town of Delft, at sunset, is now in the Gallery at the Hague; it is one of the most unpretending yet surprising pictures of the kind. The editor was present at the sale in 1818, when it was purchased for the king of Holland at the sum of 5000 florins. Another by him is in the Museum at Amsterdam; it represents the staircase of the convent of St. Agatha, at Delft, where William, the first Prince of Orange, was killed in 1584. The Dutch, who had formerly neglected his pictures, are now fully alive to their merits and value, and so are others; consequently they obtain high prices when they appear in sales, which is but seldom. He probably died towards the end of the seventeenth century, as there is some where an account of his effects being sold about that time.]

VERMEULEN, CORNELIUS, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1644. In the early part of his life he passed some time in France, but afterwards chiefly resided in his native city, where he engraved many plates, of which the most estimable are his portraits, as his drawing was not sufficiently correct to succeed in historical subjects. He worked entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear style. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Anne Boleyn, Queen of Henry VIII.; engraved for Larrey's History.
Catherine Howard; for the same.
Catherine Parr; for the same.
Lady Jane Grey; for the same.
Robert, Earl of Leicester; for the same.
Oliver Cromwell; for the same.
William III.; for the same.
Maria Louisa of Orleans; after Rigaud.
Philip V. of Spain; after Vivien.
Maximilian Emanuel, Elector of Bavaria; after the same.
Louis de Luxembourg, Marshal of France; after Rigaud.
Maria Louisa de Tassis; after Vanduyck.
Peter Mignard, Painter; from a picture by himself.
Nicholas Vander Borch, Painter; after Vanduyck.

SUBJECTS.

Bacchus and Erigone; after Guido; for the Crozat Collection.
Mary of Medicis escaping from the city of Blois; after the picture by Rubens, in the Luxembourg Gallery.

[VERMEULEN, ANDREW, born at Dort in 1763, was instructed in painting by his father. His subjects are landscapes with figures, horses, and cattle, very lively and full of colour. He also painted winter scenes, with figures skating and otherwise amusing themselves on the frozen canals in Holland. They are good furniture pictures; many of them were purchased by English dealers about thirty years ago, and since that time a number of copies, or imitations, by a lady resident in Holland, the wife of a dealer, have been sent over, and which in some instances are even superior to Vermeulen. He died at Amsterdam in 1814.]

[VERMEULEN, CORNELIUS, father of Andrew, was born at Dort in 1732, and was an ornamental painter and picture dealer. He copied pictures of the older Dutch masters that came into his hands in the way of his trade, by which he acquired a good style of colouring; but did not produce any original composition remarkable for correctness in design. He died at Dort in 1813.]

VERMEYEN, JOHN CORNELIUS. This painter was born at Beverwyck, near Haerlem, in 1500. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed, but his ability recommended him to the protection of the Emperor Charles V., who engaged him in his service, and he attended that monarch in many of his expeditions. In 1535 he was present at the taking of Tunis by the Emperor, where he made designs of the most remarkable events of the siege, from which he executed the cartoons for the suit of tapestry, which is said to ornament the Escorial. Towards the latter part of his life he principally resided at Brussels, where he painted some pictures for the churches and public edifices, which are mentioned by Vanmader in very favourable terms; particularly two altar-pieces in the church of St. Gery, representing the Nativity and the Resurrection. He died at Brussels in 1559.

[As his father, Cornelius, who flourished in 1490, was a painter, it may be supposed that he instructed his son.

Vermeijen's talents were not confined to one department of his art; he equally excelled in historical subjects, portraiture, and landscape. He was also well skilled in mathematics, geometry, and architecture. The pictures which he painted of the Imperial progresses, and the views of cities in Spain and elsewhere, are supposed to have perished in the fire at the Pardo in 1608. It must not be omitted that he was a great favourite with Charles V., not only for his ability as a painter, but for his long beard. This must have been enormous, if it be true that, though the wearer was a tall man, it used to trail on the ground, and the Emperor, when in a playful mood, would tread upon it for amusement.

Vermeijen was also an engraver. Brulliot claims the credit of being the first to notice him as such, and has given descriptions of four of his etchings, which he says are executed with a broad point, but free and expressive, and in a taste peculiar to the master. He gives his cipher, thus, , which properly signifies Jean Cornelisz, and is to be found on the following prints :

1. The Virgin and Infant accompanied by an Angel, 1545; L. 12p. 8l., H. 9p.
2. A Man duped; composition of several half-length figures. At the bottom is inscribed, Sic Hispana Venus loculos excantat amando, sic fucata rapit bastia Stultus amans, 1545; L. 15p. 7l., H. 11p. 3l.
3. A young Woman with a Cat, half-length profile, 1546; H. 7p. 9l., L. 5p.
4. A young Woman seated on a Couch, apparently sewing, 1545; H. 9p. 2l., L. 6p. 4l.

It may be noted that, owing to the peculiarity of wearing so long a beard, he was called Barbato, Barbudo, Barbalonga, Hans with the Beard, and other appellations; and he is sometimes mentioned as Hans or Jan May, Majo, or de Mayo.]

are several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Novara and Alessandria, but his most esteemed work is a large picture of Daniel in the Den of Lions, in the library della Passione at Milan. This picture is regarded by Lanzi as one of the ablest productions which had appeared in Milan since the time of Gaudenzio Ferrari. In the expression of his heads, he appears to have studied the works of the Caracci, and his colouring is warm and harmonious. One of his last works was a large picture painted for the refectory of the Padri Olivetani, at Alessandria, representing Christ and the Samaritan Woman, in which he introduced an admirable landscape, with the city of Samaria in the distance.

VERNET, JOSEPH. This eminent artist was born at Avignon in 1712. After receiving some instruction in the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Rome, where he became a disciple of his countryman, Adrian Manglard, a painter of landscape and sea-pieces, of some celebrity. His progress under that master was extraordinary, and it was not long before he surpassed his instructor. During a residence of many years at Rome and Naples, he painted a great variety of landscapes, sea-ports, and other marine subjects, which were greatly admired, not only by the Italians, but by the collectors of every country. He gave to his landscapes and views the beauty and freshness of nature, and ornamented them with groups of charming figures, arranged with unusual taste, correctly designed, and touched with uncommon neatness and spirit. The reputation he had acquired in Italy induced Louis XV. to invite him to return to France, where he was engaged to paint a set of pictures of the sea-ports of that kingdom. He executed his commission with great ability, though the exactness and precision requisite for the representation of his subjects deprived them of the picturesque and striking effect which we discover in the views of his own selection, and gave them somewhat of the formality of portraiture. He afterwards painted many pictures of views near Rome, the environs of Tivoli, and of Italian sea-ports, which were justly held in the highest estimation; and he continued the exercise of his extraordinary talents with undiminished reputation, until he reached the age of 77, when he died, in 1786. We have a few small etchings by this ingenious artist, executed in a neat and spirited style; among which are the following :

- A Landscape, with a Bridge and part of a Village.
- A Shepherd and Shepherdess.
- A View of a Market-place.
- A Canal, with Fishermen.

[His name was Claude Joseph Vernet. He was born in 1714, and died in 1789. Bryan is not the only writer of a dictionary who has erred in arithmetic; according to his dates Vernet would have been only 74 when he died; but in another dictionary, where Bryan is reflected on for what was evidently a typographical error, of placing a cipher for a 6, the same dates are given, and the painter is said to have arrived at 81. In a recent work the dates are given correctly, but it is added, that he died at the age of 77. We are none of us infallible.]

[VERNET, ANTOINE CHARLES HORACE, generally known as Carle Vernet, was the son of Claude Joseph Vernet, the celebrated painter of landscapes and marine subjects. He was born at Bourdeaux the 14th of August, 1758. He commenced the study of painting early under the instruction of his father, and at the age of seventeen obtained the second grand prize at the Academy of Painting; and in 1782 he gained the grand prize, which entitled him to the privilege of going to Rome with a pension. In 1787 he became a member of the Academy, and in 1814 a member of the Institute. As he is so universally known by prints from his pictures of general interest, it may suffice to name a few of his larger works which belong peculiarly to France. These are, The Battle of Marengo; A Battle with Mamelukes; The Emperor Napoleon giving orders to his Marshals on the morning of the Battle of Austerlitz; The Portrait of Napoleon on Horseback; The Bombardment of Madrid; The Battle of Rivoli; The Emperor hunting in the Woods of Boulogne; The French Army entering Milan; The Battle of Wagram; and others of like important events during the Imperial reign. The number of other subjects by him would fill a volume in description; they consist of military scenes, hunting-pieces, familiar occurrences, and creations of fancy. He was considered among the best of his time as a painter of horses, and there are many small equestrian portraits by him. Many of his pictures have been lithographed. He died in 1836, a Chevalier of the order of St. Michel, and of the Legion of Honour. He was the father of the no less celebrated Horace Vernet, still living, an honour to his country.]

VERNICI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Malvasia, this painter was a native of Bologna, and was brought up in the school of the Caracci. He painted history with considerable reputation, and distinguished himself by several pictures he painted for the churches and public edifices at Pesaro and Urbino, particularly in the latter city, where he was appointed principal painter to the Duke, in whose service he died in 1617.

VEROCCHIO, ANDREA. This artist was born at Florence in 1432. He distinguished himself more as a sculptor than a painter. As he was one of the ablest designers of his time, his academy was much frequented, and he had the credit of counting among his disciples Pietro Perugino and Lionardo da Vinci. Tradition states him to have abandoned painting on the following occasion. The monks of S. Salvi, at Valambrosa, having engaged him to paint a picture representing the Baptism of Christ by St. John, Lionardo da Vinci, who was at that time his scholar, was engaged by his master to paint the figure of an angel, which made a part of the group; the pupil performed his task in a manner that so far surpassed the rest of the picture in the beauty of the design, and the superiority of the execution, that Verocchio, chagrined at being thus outdone by a youth, resolved to relinquish the pencil for ever. Baldinucci asserts, that he practised painting rather as a pastime than a profession, and that his greatest excellence was in the founding of metals. He died in 1488.

[They who possess what they consider pictures by Andrea Verocchio may be left to enjoy their opinion; though it is improbable that one who took so much pains to design the human form correctly, should have produced such abortions as are frequently attributed to him. He, who could not, in his last moments, dying in an hospital at Venice, endure the sight of an ill-carved crucifix, but insisted on having one brought, the work of Donatello, to cheer his parting soul, had too high a sense of the beautiful to put forth such trash. Verocchio was the first, in conjunction perhaps with Poljouolo, to take moulds of the human form, for the purpose of making casts to serve as models for designing. See L. DA VINCI.]

VERONA, MAFFEO. This painter was born at Verona in 1576, and was a disciple of Luigi Benfatto, but he derived more advantage from studying the works of Paolo Veronese than the instruction of his master. He is said, by Ridolfi, to have painted with uncommon celerity, and to have particularly excelled in fresco. There are many of his works in the public edifices at Venice, among which are two pictures in the chapel dedicated to S. Isidoro, in the church of St. Mark, representing Christ bearing his Cross, and the Crucifixion. In the same church are two altar-pieces by him, of the Desposition from the Cross, and the Resurrection. He also painted several pictures for the cathedral at Udine, and for the churches of his native city. He died in 1618.

VERONESE, PAOLO. See CAGLIARI.

VERONESE, ALESSANDRO. See TURCHI.

VERRIO, ANTONIO. This artist was born at Naples in 1634. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed, but as soon as he had made sufficient progress in the art to travel on the produce of his talents, he went to France, and settled at Toulouse, where he met with employment, and painted a picture for the principal altar of the church of the Carmelites, which is described in Du Puy's "Traité sur la Peinture." Charles II., wishing to revive the manufacture of tapestry at Mortlake, which had been interrupted by the civil war, invited Verrio to England, but instead of engaging him in that pursuit, he employed him in ornamenting Windsor Castle, where he executed most of the ceilings, one side of St. George's Hall, and the chapel. On the ceiling of the former he had represented Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury, in the character of Faction; and in a picture representing Christ healing the Sick, he absurdly introduced himself, Sir Godfrey Kneller, and Baptist May, surveyor of the works, in long periwigs, as spectators of the miracle. He has recorded himself as the author of these gaudy works in the following inscription, over the tribune at the end of the hall:

Antonius Verrio Neapolitanus non ignobili stirpe natus ad honorem Dei,
Augustissimi Regis Caroli secundi et Sancti Georgii
Molem hanc felicissimâ manu
Decoravit.

The king rewarded him liberally. It appears by a memorandum preserved by Vertue, that he received near seven thousand pounds for his performances at Windsor. On the accession of James II. Verrio was again employed at Windsor, in Cardinal Wolsey's tomb-house, then destined for a Romish chapel.

The Revolution was by no means agreeable to Verrio's religion or principles. He is even said to have refused, for some time, to work for King William. He was employed by Lord Exeter at Burlington, where he painted several apartments, which are reckoned among his best productions; and afterwards executed many considerable works at Chatsworth, among which the altar-piece in the chapel, representing the Incredulity of St. Thomas, is considered one of his best pictures. By the persuasion of Lord Exeter, he at length consented to serve King William, and was employed to paint the great staircase at Hampton Court, which is so wretched a performance, that Lord Orford observes, "It appears as if he had spoiled it from principle." He died at Hampton Court in 1707. [According to Zani, and other authorities, he was born at Lecce, in the province of Otranto, in 1639. Pope has immortalized him in one of his Epistles :

"On painted ceilings you devoutly stare,
Where sprawl the saints of Verrio and Laguerre."

[VERRYKE, or VEREYCKE, HANS, called also Kleyn Hanskin, or Little John, was a painter of Bruges, and lived about the middle of the 16th century. He was eminent in landscapes with figures, and for painting on glass. He was also a portrait painter. He painted the portraits of Karl van Mander's uncle Claudius, his wife and children, in a triptique, the centre of which represented the Virgin in a landscape. He flourished from 1530 to 1556.]

VERSCHURING, HENRY, a Dutch painter, born at Gorcum in 1627. His father, who was a captain of infantry in the Dutch service, was desirous of bringing him up to the profession of arms, but the feeble constitution of his son prevented him from carrying his project into effect; perceiving the boy's disposition for designing, he placed him under the tuition of Theodore Govertz, a portrait painter of some reputation, by whom he was instructed, until he was thirteen years of age. His genius leading him to a different department of the art, he quitted his first instructor, and became a scholar of John Both, at Utrecht, and had studied six years under that distinguished artist, when he was recommended by his preceptor to visit Italy for improvement, where he had himself studied with so much advantage. On his arrival at Rome, he frequented the Academy, and employed himself in designing after the best models. His taste leading him to paint animals, huntings, and battles, he particularly studied every thing that could be useful to him in that branch of the art. He designed the most remarkable and picturesque views in the vicinity of Rome, with the remains of ancient architecture, with which he enriched the back-grounds of his pictures. His works were greatly admired, not only at Rome, but at Florence and Venice, where he passed some time. After a residence of ten years in Italy, he returned to Holland, where the troubles of his country afforded him but too frequent opportunities of witnessing the melancholy calamities of warfare. He followed the armies into the field, and designed with the greatest truth and fidelity the disastrous events of which he was an eye-witness. Although he occasionally painted landscapes, his best pictures represent battles, attacks of banditti, and the plundering of villages. He possessed a fertile and inventive genius, and there is a great deal of fire and animation in all his works. His figures and horses are correctly designed, and touched with lightness and spirit. He was a man of so respectable a character, that he was chosen to be one of the burgo-masters of the city he lived in, and he accepted the office, with the condition that he should not be obliged to quit his profession.

Verschuring was honoured as a magistrate, esteemed as an artist, and beloved by his fellow citizens, when, going on an excursion by water, he was unfortunately drowned, near Dort, in 1690, in the sixty-third year of his age. We have a few slight but spirited etchings by this artist, representing battles and skirmishes, which are now become scarce.

[It is merely a matter of taste to say which are the best pictures of Henry Verschuring, for all that have come under the editor's notice have their beauties. His views in the vicinity of Rome are enriched with objects that belong to the scenery, and figures that exhibit the manners and customs of the country, so that the whole composition appears to have been painted simultaneously.

Bartsch describes only four etchings by him; two have his name in full, the others the initials only :

1. A Battle; in the middle two Horsemen galloping to the left, one armed with a helmet and shield, the other with his head bare sounding a horn to rally the troops. H. Verschuring, f. There are two variations.
2. The Travellers; in the middle a Woman mounted on an Ass, with a young Boy before her, and a Man on horseback by her side; in the foreground a large Dog barking at the Travellers. H. Verschuring, f.
3. The two Dogs; a small piece, slightly engraved. On the left a Greyhound with his head lifted up as if howling, and on the right a Dog crouched, turning his head towards the Hound. H. V. S. in a monogram.
4. The Three Dogs; this is of the same size as the preceding, and engraved in the same taste. On the right a Greyhound standing and turning his head towards a Dog lying down, a third Dog is in the background near the left. The artist's cipher at bottom.

Weigel has not added any to the list, but there are three others that have so strong a resemblance to H. Verschuring's style of etching, that an eminent connoisseur in such matters has noted them in manuscript, without vouching for their authenticity: it may tend to elucidation to quote them :

A Dog reclining, in profile, head to the right bowed to the ground between the fore-paws, collar on the neck with initials A I M—stump of a tree on the right. No name. L. 3½ in., H. 1½ in.

A Man holding a saddled Horse by the bridle, near the centre; on the left an Officer, a back figure, with a sword under his arm, is watering; another figure in the background and in shadow, apparently on horseback, is giving directions to the Man holding the bridle. On a stone towards the middle, P. B. In. L. 4½ in., H. 3½ in.

A Horse-race. In the centre in front a Man is at full gallop towards the right, where figures and a post are seen in the distance; another Man is following from the left; above are several figures, one of whom is seated in state in front of a portico. No mark. H. 6½ in., W. 5 in.

VERSCHURING, WILLIAM, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Gorcum in 1657, and was for some time instructed by his father; but his inclination leading him to a different branch of the art, he was permitted to indulge his propensity, and became a disciple of John Verkolie. He painted with success small portraits, conversations, and domestic subjects, which were finished in the pleasing style of his instructor, and by which he had acquired considerable celebrity, when he abandoned painting, and applied himself to commercial pursuits.

[VERSCHUUR, LIEVEN, a marine painter, was born at Rotterdam, and flourished in the latter half of the seventeenth century. His manner resembles somewhat that of De Vlieger; equally free, but perhaps more lively in colour. His sea-pieces and river-scenes by moonlight are excellent. In the Museum at Amsterdam are two pictures by him; one represents Charles II. of England entering the port of Rotterdam, and the other, the punishment of a surgeon for having attempted to poison Admiral Van Nes. ALBERT, the brother of Lieven, was a portrait-painter. They both died in the same year, 1691.]

[VERSTEEG, or VERSTEIGH, MICHEL, a painter of landscapes, and interiors of apartments by lamp or candle-light, was born at Dort in 1756. He commenced by painting landscapes with figures and cattle, which he did in a very pleasing manner, somewhat resembling Jansons, though evidently aiming at the older and greater masters; in colouring they are verdant, yet warm, and the details are carefully attended to, particularly in the trees, which are sometimes too much elaborated. He afterwards abandoned landscape, and painted interiors, with subjects called conversations, by lamp-light, or candle-light, in which he became eminent. Without reaching the excellence of Schalken in penciling, he often equals him in the effects of his light and shadow, and the scientific distribution over a larger space. His pictures of this class are to be found in the best collections in his own country, and some few have been brought to England. He lived much respected to a good old age, but the editor has not ascertained the exact year of his decease; it was about 1840. He was a member of the Royal Institute of the Netherlands, and of the Academy of Painting at Antwerp; the latter honoured him with a medal, in testimony of the merit of his beautiful works.]

VERSTRAELIN, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. We have by him a plate representing Maurice, Prince of Orange, lying dead, surrounded by his officers and guards. In the foreground are two children holding his achievement. This print is more valued for its rarity than the merit of the execution.

VERTANGEN, DANIEL. According to Descamps, this artist was born at the Hague in 1598, and was a disciple of Cornelius Poolemburg. He painted similar subjects to those of his master, representing landscapes, with small figures, principally Nymphs bathing, Bacchanals, and subjects from Ovid. His pictures are pleasingly composed, and are, like those of his instructor, finished with great neatness, and agreeably coloured. They are, however, very inferior to those of Poolemburg, both in respect to force and the beauty of the colouring. From the similarity of the subjects, the best works of Vertangen have occasionally been mistaken for those of Poolemburg, but this can only happen to the inexperienced collector.

VERTUE, GEORGE. The memoirs of this estimable artist and antiquary have been detailed in so interesting a manner, by the noble author of the Anecdotes of Painting in England, a work, chiefly digested and published from the manuscript notes of Mr. Vertue, that we cannot present our readers with a more satisfactory account of him than by giving the following extract from it.

George Vertue was born in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, London, in the year 1684. His parents were more honest than opulent. About the age of thirteen he was placed with a master who engraved arms on plate, and had the chief business of London; but who, being extravagant, broke and returned to his country, France, after Vertue had served him about three or four years.

Returned to his parents, Vertue gave himself entirely to the study of drawing for two years, and then entered into an engagement with Michael Vandergucht for three more, which term he protracted to seven, engraving copper-plates for him, when, having received instructions and advice from several painters, he quitted his master on handsome terms, and began to work for himself. This was in the year 1709. The first twelve months were passed in drawing and engraving for books. The art was then at the lowest ebb in England. The best performers were worn out; the war with France shut the door against recruits; national acrimony, and the animosity of faction, diverted public attention from common arts of amusement. At that period the young engraver was recommended to Sir Godfrey Kneller, whose reputation, riches, parts, and acquaintance with the first men in England, supported what little taste was left for virtú, and could stamp a character wherever he designed to patronize.

At intervals of leisure he practised drawing and music, learned French and a little Italian. It appears that he afterwards acquired Dutch, having consulted in the originals all that had been written in those three languages on the art to which he was devoted.

His works began to draw attention, and he found more illustrious patronage than that of Kneller. Lord Somers employed him to engrave a plate of Archbishop Tillotson, and rewarded him nobly. The print will speak for itself. It was the groundwork of his reputation, and deserved to be so. Nothing like it had appeared for some years, nor at the time of its production had he any competitors. Edelink was dead in France, White in England, Van Gunst in Holland.

In 1711 an Academy of Painting was instituted by the chief performers in London, Sir Godfrey Kneller was placed at the head; Vertue was one of the first members, and drew there for several years. To the end of that reign he continued to engrave portraits from Kneller, Dahl, Richardson, Jervas, Gibson, and others.

On the accession of the present royal family he published a large plate of the head of the king, of which a great many were sold, though by no means a laborious or valuable performance. However, it was shown at court, and was followed by those of the prince and princess. All concurred to extend his business. In any recess from that he practised in water-colours, sometimes attempting portraits; oftener copying from ancient or curious pieces, which he proposed to engrave. So early as the year 1713, he commenced his researches after the lives of our artists, and began his collections, to which he added prints by former masters, and every thing that could tend to his great work, the History of the Arts in England. His thirst after British antiquities soon led him to a congenial Mæcænas. That munificent collector, Robert Harley, second Earl of Oxford, early distinguished the merit and application of Vertue. Another patron was Heneage Finch, Earl of Winchilsea, whose picture he painted and engraved, and who, being president of the Society of Antiquaries, on its revival in 1717, appointed Vertue, who was a member, engraver to it. The plates published by that society from curious remains, were most of them by his hand, as long as he lived.

The university of Oxford employed him for many years to engrave their almanacks; instead of insipid emblems that deserved no longer duration than what they adorned, he introduced views of public buildings and historic events. In 1730 appeared his twelve heads of poets, one of his capital works. Vertue's next considerable production was a set of heads of Charles I. and the loyal sufferers in his cause, with their characters subjoined, from Clarendon. This was scarce finished, before Rapin's History of England appeared. The two brothers, Knaptons, engaged Vertue to accompany it with effigies of kings, and suitable decorations. This undertaking employed him for three years. He next engaged with the Knaptons to engrave some of the illustrious heads, the greater part of which were executed by Houbraken, and undoubtedly surpassed those of Vertue; yet his performances by no means deserved to be condemned, as they were by the undertakers, and the performer laid aside. In 1740 he published his proposals for the commencement of a very valuable work, his historic prints, drawn with extreme labour and fidelity, and executed in a most satisfactory manner.

To the indefatigable exertions of this laborious artist we are indebted for the preservation of many valuable antiquities, besides the numerous portraits he engraved for the illustration of English history. He continued his researches, and the exercise of his art, until he reached his seventy-second year, when he died in 1756, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. His works are extremely numerous, and consist of portraits, copies from old pictures, and antiquities of every kind. Lord Orford has given a complete list of them at the end of his catalogue of engravers. The following is as ample a list of his prints as our limits will permit:

PORTRAITS.

King Richard II.; from the painting in Westminster Abbey.
 Queen Elizabeth; after Isaac Oliver.
 Mary, Queen of Scots; after Zuccaro.
 Queen Anne; after Kneller.
 King George I.; 1715; very large.
 The same; smaller; 1718; a better print.
 George, Prince of Wales.
 The Princess of Wales, with an Angel bringing a Crown; After Amiconi.
 Frederick, Prince of Wales; after Boit.
 Princess Anne.
 William, Duke of Cumberland; after Jervas.
 Princess Mary.
 William Seymour, Duke of Somerset.
 Henry Somerset, Duke of Beaufort.
 William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle.
 John, Duke of Marlborough.
 John, Duke of Buckingham.
 Philip, Duke of Wharton; after Jervas.
 Lionel, Duke of Dorset.
 Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey.
 Francis, Earl of Bedford.
 Edward, Earl of Dorset.
 Heneage, Earl of Winchelsea.
 Edward, Earl of Oxford, sitting; with many pieces of his collection round him.
 Sarah, Duchess of Somerset.
 Elizabeth, Countess of Shrewsbury.
 Dorothy, Countess of Sunderland.
 Sophia, Countess of Granville.
 Archbishop Warham.
 Archbishop Cranmer.
 Archbishop Parker.
 Archbishop Tillotson.
 John Robinson, Bishop of London.
 Edward Chandler, Bishop of Durham.
 Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury.
 William Loyd, Bishop of Worcester, sitting in his library; one of his best prints.
 John Spencer, Dean of Ely.
 Humphrey Prideaux, Dean of Norwich
 Sir Thomas More.
 Sir Nicholas Bacon.
 Sir Francis Bacon.
 Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls, sitting; fine.
 Sir John Vernay, Master of the Rolls; fine.

HISTORIC PRINTS, AND PRINTS WITH TWO OR MORE PORTRAITS.

Henry VII. and his Queen, with Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour.

Three Children of Henry VII.

Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and Mary, Queen of France.

Frances, Duchess of Suffolk, with Adrian Stoke, her first husband.

Thomas, Earl of Arundel, his Countess and Children; a private plate.

Thomas, Earl of Strafford, and his Secretary.

The Earl of Strafford's three Children.

William, Duke of Portland, his Duchess, and Lady Mary Wortley.

The Procession of Queen Elizabeth to Hunsdon-house.

The Tomb of Lord Darnley. James I. when a child, Earl and Countess of Lenox, &c., praying by it.

The Battle of Carberry-hill.

Edward VI. granting the palace of Bridewell for an hospital.

The Court of Wards, with an explanation.

VERVEER, ARY HUBERTSZ. This artist was born at Dort in 1646. He painted history, and is said to have been a correct designer, but was heavy and black in his colouring. In attempting to imitate the magical effect of Rembrandt, his tints became gloomy and obscure, and his best performances appear to have been the productions of negligence and despatch.

VERWILT, FRANCIS. This artist was born at Rotterdam in 1598, and was a scholar of Cornelius de Bois, a landscape painter of little celebrity, whom he soon surpassed. He was a successful imitator of the works of Cornelius Poelemburg, and his landscapes are decorated with figures, in the style of that master. His pictures are highly finished, and his colouring is brilliant and clear. [He died in 1655.]

VEYTH. See VYTH.

UGGIONE, or OGGIONE, MARCO, was a native of Oggione, near Milan, and was born about the year 1480. According to Lanzi, he was one of the most favoured disciples of Lionardo da Vinci, and may be regarded as one of the ablest painters of the Milanese school. He did not adopt the elaborate and finished style which was followed by the majority of the scholars of Lionardo, but principally distinguished himself by his extensive works in fresco, which were admired for the beauty and boldness of his design, and the purity of his colouring, which has lost nothing of its original freshness. Such are his great works in the church of La Pace, at Milan, and, above all, his picture of the Crucifixion, in the refectory, composed in the grandest style, correctly designed, with an admirable expression in the heads, which would not have disgraced his illustrious instructor. He copied the celebrated Last Supper, painted by Lionardo da Vinci for the refectory of the Padri Domenicani at Milan, for the Carthusians at Pavia, in so exquisite a manner, that it almost compensates for the loss of the original. Of his oil pictures, two of the most esteemed are in the churches of S. Eufemia, and S. Paolo in Compito, at Milan, which, though highly respectable, are inferior to his fresco works. He died in 1530.

[The exact year of Marco da Oggione's birth is not ascertained; it was probably ten years earlier than that supposed in the text. His pictures painted in fresco in the church and refectory of Santa Maria della Pace, at Milan, are now in the Brera; they were removed from the walls by Barezzi. Whatever difference of opinion may exist respecting the merits of his original works, there can be none with regard to the obligation he has conferred by his copy of "The Last Supper" by Lionardo da Vinci. That copy is now in the Royal Academy of Arts in England, and has every right to be considered the most accurate extant. The editor reverts with pleasure to the part he took in placing it there. It was imported to this country by a foreigner in conjunction with Mr. Jones, a gentleman at that time actively employed in the traffic of works of art. By the editor's advice it was for a short time exhibited, but attracted very little attention. The artists who were invited, scouted it; it was but a copy;—they wanted the original. That, however, Cavaliere Bossi's book, del Cenacolo, showed was impossible, as scarcely a vestige of it remained two centuries before. The importers were disappointed, and somewhat embarrassed; it was again rolled up to try its fortune elsewhere. As a last resource, the editor wrote an article, which was inserted in the "Annals of the Fine Arts," a publication of the day, conducted by Mr. James Elmes, of which a copy may perhaps some where exist, and this attracted the more particular notice of Mr. Thomas Lawrence, and the picture was bought at his recommendation, at an abated price. The true lover of art will always prefer this old unassuming copy to any of later date, however well got up, as is observed by Mr. Wornum. The same intelligent writer on art justly remarks that "the mere fact that Oggione's copy was painted for people who must have been well acquainted with the original, and by a distinguished pupil of Lionardo from the original when in a perfect state, ought to be sufficient guarantee for its fidelity, notwithstanding its imperfections, making of course due allowance for the different capacities of the two men."]

UHLICK, an obscure German engraver, who resided at Leipsic. The name of this artist is affixed to a portrait of John Melchior Jacob, dated 1719. It is neatly engraved, but in a stiff, formal style. [According to Zani he operated as late as 1740.]

VIA, AGOSTINO A. This artist was a native of Verona. His name is affixed to a print representing Daniel in the Lions' Den, after Pietro da Cortona.

VIA, ALESSANDRO DELLA, an Italian engraver, who resided at Venice about the year 1730. He engraved several portraits, which are very indifferently executed, and a plate, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Sebastian and other saints, after Paolo Veronese.

VIANEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1660. He engraved several portraits, as well as frontispieces and other book-plates. We have also by him several views in Amsterdam. His plates are chiefly executed with the graver, in a neat style, though without much taste. Among his portraits are the following:

Frederick William I., King of Prussia.
Augustus Pfeiffer, superintendent at Lubec.
John Turetin, Theologian, of Geneva.

[Brulliot is of opinion that the views in Amsterdam are by Isaac Van Vinne; but he attributes to Vianen the plates to Le Noble's Fables.]

[VIANEN, PAUL VAN, a portrait painter, as we learn from a print in which he appears seated at work on a portrait, in an oval, of Jan Van Aken, which rests on his easel. There are three persons in the print, all in the prime of life; they wear ruffs, and look towards the spectator. Below is inscribed, "In hac tabella qui pingitur, Ioannes ab Aken; qui pingit, Paulus Vianensis; uterque arte celeberrimus"; and in the margin, joannes lutma de oude inv.—jacobus lutma fecit aquaforti et exc.—Whether this is the same as Paul Van Vianen, the goldsmith, modeller, and chaser, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century, may be worth inquiry.]

VIANI, GIOVANNI [MARIA.] This painter was born at Bologna in 1637, and was a fellow student with Pasinelli, in the school of Flaminio Torre. Few of his contemporaries equalled him in the correctness of his design, which he continued to improve by a constant attendance at the academy, to draw from the model, and to cultivate his knowledge of anatomy, a practice he continued till the end of his life. To his perfect acquaintance with the figure, he added an elegance in his forms, a grace in his attitudes, and an amenity in his colouring, which remind us of the admirable productions of Guido. In the public edifices at Bologna, he has left several proofs of his ability, of which the most esteemed are, the Annunciation, in the church of S. Giuseppe; and S. Filippo Benizi carried up to Heaven; and the Crowning of the Virgin, at the Servi. He died in 1700. [Bartsch describes four etchings by him; Christ crowned with Thorns, after Annibal Carracci; St. Francis with the Infant Christ in his arms, after Lodovico Carracci; Dido, after Annibal; and War, after Lodovico. Other pieces are cited by L. Crespi.]

VIANI, DOMENICO [MARIA.] was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Bologna in 1670, and was educated under his father, who kept a rival academy to that of Carlo Cignani, which was much frequented. Guidalotti, who has written the life of this artist, extols his talent as superior to that of his father; an opinion to which few of the judicious will be inclined to subscribe. He is not only inferior to the elder Viani in the correctness of his design, but in the beauty of his forms, and in the truth and delicacy of his colouring. He is, however, bolder in his outline, and more vigorous in the opposition of his lights and shadows, in which he appears to have imitated the works of Guercino; and more extravagant in his ornaments, which he acquired by his studies after the Venetian masters. In the church of La Natività, at Bologna, is a series of the Prophets and the Evangelists by him; and in the church of S. Spirito, at Bergamo, is a picture representing a Miracle wrought by S. Antonio, which is mentioned by Lanzi in very favourable terms. He died at Pistoja in 1716. [Zani says he was born in 1668, and died in 1711. Bartsch describes an etching by him of Joseph with the infant Jesus.]

VICARO, FRANCESCO. By this artist we have a set of neat etchings of landscapes, executed in a spirited style, and as they appear to be the productions of a painter, are probably from his own designs. [This is the same as Francesco Vaccaro. See that article.]

[VICENTE, BARTOLOME, a landscape and fresco painter, born at Saragossa in 1640, studied painting under Juan Carreno at Madrid. It is said that he spent seven years in copying pictures at the Escorial, and those he most admired for their colouring and taste were the works of the Bassans. He painted a few pictures at Madrid, some of which were from designs by his master. Having acquired the reputation of a good painter he returned to Saragossa, and employed himself in teaching mathematics, and painting landscapes of small size, which he treated in an agreeable manner. Among his larger works are quoted a fresco for the convent of the Augustines, the altar-piece of the church of St. Lawrence, and St. Peter in Prison, in the University. Some of his pictures are said to exist in the Hieronymite convent at the Pardo, near Valladolid. He died at Saragossa in 1700.]

VICENTINO, ANDREA. This painter was born at Venice in 1539, and was a scholar of the elder Palma. He painted history in the style of his instructor, and was employed in several considerable works, representing subjects from the history of the Republic, in the Sala del Gran Consiglio, in the palace of St. Mark. He also painted easel pictures for private collections, of which Lanzi particularly notices one in the Florentine Gallery, representing the Anointing of Solomon, King of Israel. He died in 1614.

VICENTINO, BATISTA, an Italian engraver, who was a native of Vicenza, and flourished at Venice about the year 1540. In conjunction with Giovanni Batista del Moro, he engraved a set of fifty plates of landscapes, with ruins and architecture, which are executed in a bold, spirited style. He usually marked his prints Batista, P. V. F., and accompanied them with Latin inscriptions, descriptive of the particular views they represented. [This is the same as Batista Pittoni. See that article.]

VICENTINO, FRANCESCO MAFFEI, was a native of Vicenza, and flourished about the year 1630, and he was a scholar of Santo Peranda; but he afterwards improved his style by studying the works of Paolo Veronese. He painted many pictures for the churches and public edifices at Padua, where he principally resided, and died in that city in 1660.

VICENTINO, GIOVANNI NICCOLO, called ROSSIGLIANI, an Italian painter, and engraver on wood, born at Vicenza about the year 1510. His cuts are executed in chiaro-scuro, in which he made use of three blocks; among others are the following:

Hercules killing the Lion; after Raffaele.

A Sibyl reading a Book; after the same.

Venus embracing Cupid.

The Death of Ajax; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.

[See Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xii., where it will be found that this artist signed Joseph Nicolaus Vicentini, and Nic. S. Vicentino, I.; for the other names, Giovanni, and Rossigliani, he thinks there is no good foundation. He is also called Gioseffo Scolari Vicentino. These capricious variations have caused much confusion.]

VICENTINO, NICCOLO. See BOLDINI.

VICO, or VICUS, or VIGHI, ENEA. This artist was born at Parma about the year 1512. He is said to have been instructed in design by Giulio Romano. The distinguished reputation Marc Antonio had acquired at Rome by his engravings, excited his curiosity, and he visited that capital, where he became his disciple. Naturally of an ardent disposition, he appears not to have been endowed with sufficient patience to finish his plates in the beautiful style of his instructor; and, although he perfectly understood the design of the figure, his impetuosity did not permit him to pay proper attention to the correctness and beauty of his outline, a quality so justly admired in the works of Marc Antonio. His prints, notwithstanding these defects, are held in considerable estimation.

Enea Vico was also an engraver on wood; we have by him a wooden cut of the portrait of Charles V., Emperor of Germany, surrounded by emblematical figures, composed with taste and well drawn. It is executed with great care, and the hatchings, in imitation of strokes, are well expressed. He engraved a variety of medals, and a set of thirty-six antique gems. When he did not sign his plates with his name at length, he marked them with the initials Æ. V., sometimes upon a tablet, and sometimes without it. His prints are extremely numerous, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

PORTRAITS.

Charles V., surrounded by emblematical figures, inscribed, INVENTUM SCULPTUMQUE AB AENEAE VICO PARMENSE, MDL.

Bust of Giovanni de Medici, in a border. 1550.

Bust of Cosimo de Medici, when young.

Bust of Alfonso II., Duke of Ferrara.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Army of Charles V. passing the Elbe; from his own design.

The Battle of the Amazons; inscribed, Bellum Amazonum. 1543.

A Female Figure, with her arms extended, over which appears an Owl flying in the air; after Parmigiano. 1548.

A free subject of Vulcan and Venus; after the same. 1543.

The Battle of the Lapithæ and Centaurs; after Il Rosso. 1542.

The Dispute of Apollo with Cupid; after Baccio Bandinelli.

The Academy of Baccio Bandinelli; after the same.

The Conversion of St. Paul; after F. Salviati.

Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after M. Angelo Buonaroti.

The Entombing of Christ; after Raffaele. 1548.

The Death of Lucretia. 1541.

Jupiter and Leda; after M. Angelo Buonaroti.

A Bacchanalian Subject; after the same.

The Annunciation; after Titian.

A set of twelve Vases; from the designs of Polidoro da Caravaggio.

A set of fifty plates of the Habillments of different Nations; from his own designs.

[It is imperative that the inquirer refer to Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xv., for full information respecting Eneas Vico, and his works. He will there find descriptions of nearly 500 prints by him. It may, however, be noticed that probably he was born in 1520, as stated by Bartsch and Zani, and died about 1570. His first master was Tomasso Barlacchi, who was a print publisher. Zani and Bartsch are decidedly of opinion that Eneas Vico never engraved on wood; and the latter says there does not exist after his design even, an engraving in wood.

VICTOR, or FICTOOR, JOHN, a Dutch painter, who, according to the dates found on his pictures, flourished about the year 1640. This able artist has escaped the notice of every biographer, although his works are found in the choicest collections, a distinction to which their extraordinary merit deservedly entitles them. From his style of penciling, and his intelligent management of the chiaro-scuro, it is more than probable that he was educated in the school of Rembrandt; and, though there is less depth and glow in his colouring than in some of the best productions of that admired master, his tints are clearer, and not less chaste. His pictures usually represent subjects taken from the Old Testament, which are treated entirely in the manner of Rembrandt. He sometimes signed his name Fictoor, as appears from a picture by him in the Gallery of the Louvre, which is inscribed Jan Fictoor. 1650.

[The history of the Victors, or Fictours, is lost in obscurity, though their works are now pretty generally known. It is certain there were several of the name; we find Jan, F., S., Jacob, or Jacques, and Lodovick, or Laurens, and they appear to have been contemporaries. Jan was the eldest, and probably the father of the others. He was of Flemish origin, and studied in the school of Rubens, though he afterwards adopted the manner of Rembrandt. So closely does he approach that master, that it is impossible to divest one's mind of the belief that he practised under him, though there be no other evidence than what appears in his pictures from sacred history. It would scandalize some were the editor to point out works that have hitherto been attributed to Rembrandt, which owe their paternity to Jan Victor; but there are such, and in rich collections too. It is not meant that they possess all the excellences of the great master, but sufficient of his principles to deceive, without a close examination by a duly qualified connoisseur. The possessors seldom have a doubt; if they are dealers, never.

The diversity of manner that appears in the pictures which have the name of Victor, or Victor, both in the subjects and the execution, clearly shows that they are not from the same mind nor the same hand. Jan Victor, having imbibed in the school of Rubens a taste for the elevated, chose the historic, though he sometimes exercised his pencil on portraiture. It is true, that with the penciling and colouring of Rembrandt, he adopted his characters, and not the more refined and dignified of Rubens. The historical pictures with the name, however, belong to him.

Whether F. and S., Jacob and Lodovick, chose different walks, or painted occasionally together, is not easy to determine. There are pictures of village pastimes and peasants' occupations, travellers refreshing at inns, fish-markets, fruit-stalls, and similar subjects; and of fowls, fish, landscapes with animals, and objects of still life, which belong to them. In the landscapes with travellers, and peasants at alehouses, there may be observed a resemblance to pictures attributed to Camphuysen. F. Victor was known as a painter of familiar subjects, Lodovick of still life, Jacob of animals; they all flourished from about the middle of the 17th century. It is supposed that Jan, the chief of the name, who operated in 1620, was born about 1600, and died about 1670.]

VICTORIA, VICENTE. This Spanish painter was born at Valencia in 1658. He went to Rome when he was young, where he became a scholar of Carlo Maratti. He distinguished himself in Italy as a painter of history, and was taken into the employment of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. His portrait is among those of the distinguished artists in the Florentine Gallery. He also painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Valencia. He died at Rome in 1712. We have a few etchings by this artist; among which are the following:

The Virgin and infant Christ in the clouds, with a glory of angels, and St. John, St. Francis, and St. Jerome below; after Raffaele.

The Last Supper; after Ciro Ferri.

The Resurrection; after the same.

[He was more eminent in literature and antiquarian knowledge than in painting; his highest praise for the last being that he imitated, but did not equal, Carlo Maratti. It was the Madonna di Foligno that he engraved, and dedicated to the Grand Duke Cosmo III. There are a great number of etchings and engravings by him, which are neatly executed.]

[VIDAL, DIEGO, THE ELDER, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Valmaseda in 1583. He painted a picture of a naked Christ, and one of the Virgin with the Infant in her arms, which were deemed worthy a place in the cathedral of Seville, of which he was a prebend, and are commended by Bermudez; Pacheco, who had seen the drawings of Vidal, speaks of them in eulogistic terms. He died at Seville the 30th of December, 1615. He is called the elder to distinguish him from his nephew of the same name.]

[VIDAL DE LIENDO, DIEGO, called THE YOUNGER, born at Valmaseda in 1602, was nephew of the foregoing, and like him was both a painter and a canon of the cathedral of Seville. He also followed his uncle's example in going to Rome to study the arts and divinity together. His pictures in the sacristy of the cathedral of Valencia evinced considerable skill, and represent a variety of Saints, and a copy of Raphael's picture of the Archangel Michael triumphing over the evil one. These figures are all of the size of life. The artist died at Seville the 9th of August, 1648.]

[VIDAL, DIONISIO, was born at Valencia about 1670, and was a disciple of Antonio Palomino, and also his travelling companion to various places with Juan Conchillos, visiting shrines and antique remains, by which he obtained both pleasure and instruction. On his return to Valencia he was employed to paint in fresco the vaults of the church of St. Nicolas, which he executed from designs furnished by Palomino, who does not fail to describe the subjects at large, and by no means to the disadvantage of the master or his disciple. The subject of course relates to the life and miracles of the Saint, much of which is represented in allegory and by symbols. He painted pictures in several other churches, but some are destroyed, and some are of no great importance. He died at Tortosa while employed in painting the chapel of the Holy Virgin of the Girdle; it is not said in what year.]

VIDAL, GERALD, a French engraver, born at Toulouse in 1742. He resided chiefly at Paris, where he engraved a variety of plates after the modern French painters, among which are the following:

Jupiter and Io; after Ch. Monnet.

Jupiter and Antiope; after the same.

Venus and Adonis; after the same.

Rinaldo and Armida; after the same.

Paris and Helen; after David.

[VIDAL, JOSEF, a painter of battles and familiar subjects, was born at Vinaroz, and was instructed by Esteban March at Valencia, under whom he distinguished himself, as a successful imitator of that master's vigorous style. He had a son of the same name, who was also a painter, but not of equal talent to his father.]

[VIDAL, L.—, a painter of fruit, flowers, dead birds, and other natural objects. Of this artist there is no account, but his manner of composition resembles that of the elder Van Os, though he appears to have been an earlier painter. His drawing is very accurate, and his penciling delicate, but the tone is sometimes too low for effect. The poppy seems to have been a favourite, as it occupies a conspicuous place, but he makes the rose, the tulip, and sundry wild flowers combine with it in perfect harmony. The dew drops on the leaves are as transparent as those in pictures by Van Huysum, and a bird's nest with eggs almost equals that master.]

VIEHL, PETER, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1755. He was a pupil of B. L. Prevost, and has engraved several plates, in a neat, finished style; among others are the following:

The Judgment of Paris; after Rottenhamer.

The Bath of Diana; after Mettai.
A pair of Landscapes; after Ruysdael.

[VIEIRA, FRANCISCO, a Portuguese painter, born at Lisbon in 1699, studied painting in the school of Trevisani at Rome, and further improved himself by copying the works of Annibal Caracci in the Farnesian Gallery. He resided for nearly seven years at Rome in the suite of the Marquis of Abrantes, and having carried off the first prize in the Academy of St. Luke, he returned to Portugal. At this time he was only in his sixteenth year, but he was commissioned by the king, John V., to paint a large picture of the Mysteries of the Eucharist, which it seems he accomplished to the satisfaction of his Majesty in six days; he afterwards had the honour to portray the royal countenance, to be used as a model at the mint for the coin dies. He had now formed an attachment to a young lady of a high family, and this gave rise to some romantic adventures, her friends being opposed to their union, and he being equally determined to possess her. A convent, a journey to Rome, a disguise, an elopement, a hairbreadth escape from a pistol ball, and other incidents, occupy some years of his life, but still employed with his pencil in Italy and Spain. The love affair being settled, and Vieira recalled to Portugal by the king, he fixed his residence at Lisbon, where, for forty years, he painted for the palace, convent of Mafra, and other places, with much reputation. Many of his pictures are said to have perished in the great earthquake at Lisbon in 1755, but some of the best escaped. Count Raczinski particularizes a few of his works. He mentions one obtained by the Count de Lippe, a magnificent picture of St. Anthony; another, an Adoration of the Kings, purchased by an Englishman named William Hudson, at a large price; an excellent picture of St. Augustine at the entrance of the convent of Grace, a St. Francis near the principal altar in the church of the Infant Jesus; pictures of the Apostles Peter and Paul, and others of St. François de Paule, and of Paul the first Hermit. To these he adds the enchanting pictures of the unhappy Dona Inès de Castro, and of Duarte de Pacheco, which are to immortalize his memory. He was skillful as an architect, and a specimen of his talent is referred to in a fountain which he designed for the garden of Don Gusmao. In 1744 he entered the religious order of Santiago; and in 1755 his wife, the nun Ignez, for whom he encountered so many adventures, died. He relinquished the pencil from that time, and retired to spend the rest of his days in pious meditation. He died at Lisbon in 1783. Cean Bermudez speaks favourably of his drawing, and the vigour of his fancy; and says he etched and engraved in a manner to satisfy the intelligent.]

[VIEIRA, FRANCISCO, THE YOUNGER, a Portuguese by birth, who studied painting in Italy, and came to England at the latter end of the 18th century. He exhibited some pictures at the Royal Academy in the years 1798 and 1799; one of which is described as Viriato, the Lusitanian chief, exhorting his countrymen to take vengeance for the perfidy of Galba. Vieira, during his stay in England, resided with Bartolozzi, and probably studied under him, as he is also said to have been an engraver. He married and returned to his own country, where, it is said, he died in 1805. He is called the younger, to distinguish him from the more eminent painter spoken of in the preceding article.]

VIEN, JOSEPH MARIA. This artist was born at Montpellier in 1710, and studied at Paris under

Charles Natoire. He afterwards visited Rome, where he passed some years in designing from the antique, and the best masters of the Roman school. On his return to France he was admitted a member of the Academy at Paris, and was afterwards appointed professor of painting. He painted several pictures for the churches at Paris and at Versailles, which gained him considerable reputation. We have a few etchings by this artist, among which is a set of thirty small plates, representing the different habits of the Turkish masquerade given at Rome by the pensioners of the Royal Academy of France. He also engraved the following prints:

Lot and his Daughters; after de Troy; [after his own design also.]

A set of five Bacchanalian subjects; from his own designs.

[Joseph Marie Vien was born the 18th of June, 1716, at Montpellier, and died at Paris the 27th of March, 1809. He was a very prolific painter of subjects religious and profane, and gained as much reputation by the one as the other. For the churches he painted Jesus instituting the Eucharist, The Raising of Lazarus, The Preaching of St. Denis, The Holy Virgin attended by Angels, Saints receiving Crowns in reward for Martyrdom, Miracles, and Legends for the edification of devotees. For places less sacred, The parting of Hector and Andromache, Helen pursued by Eneas, Venus wounded by Diomed, Briseis in the tent of Achilles, Sappho playing on the Lyre, Cupid and Psyche, a young Greek Girl comparing her breast to a Rose-bud, Sports of Nymphs and Cupids, Union of Hymen and Love, the Adventures of Lot and his Daughters; and judging by the numbers, these latter subjects were his favourites. He was a member of several Academies in France and Italy. Napoleon created him a Count of the empire and Commandant of the Legion of Honour; he was also a member of the Senate. He was the master of David, and considered the regenerator of painting in France.]

VIENOT, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. He imitated, with considerable success, the style of engraving adopted by Pontius. We have the portraits of Philip IV., King of Spain, and his Queen, Elizabeth of Bourbon, copied by him on a smaller scale, from the prints engraved by Pontius, after Rubens. He also engraved some plates from John Both, Pellerin, and other masters. [There was another engraver of the same name, who operated fifty years later.]

VIGHI, ———. See VICO.

VIGNALI, JACOPO. This painter was born at Florence in 1592, and was a disciple of Matteo Rosselli. His style resembles that of Guercino, not so much in his forms as in the breadth of his masses, and in the vigorous effect of his light and shadow. His principal works in oil are in the church of S. Simone, at Florence; but he appears to greater advantage in the frescoes with which he has decorated the chapel of Buonaroti. He died in 1664.

VIGNON, CLAUDE, a French painter and engraver, born at Tours in 1590. He studied several years in Italy, where he attached himself to the style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, which he followed with some degree of success, though he was equally ignoble in the selection of his forms; and without his excellence in colouring. He died in 1670. We have by this artist several etchings executed in a spirited and masterly style, among which are the following:

A set of thirteen plates of the Life of Christ.
St. John in the Desert.

St. Philip baptizing the Eunuch of the Queen of Candace.
The Martyrdom of St. Andrew.
The Crowning of the Virgin.

[For an account and description of twenty-seven etchings by him, see Dumesnil, P. G. F., tom. vii. He left two sons, Claude François, and Philippe, who were both painters, but neither distinguished himself.]

VIGRI, CATERINA. This paintress was born at Bologna in 1413. She is sometimes called S. Caterina di Bologna, from the sanctity of her life, which was chiefly passed in a cloister. She rarely painted in oil, being principally engaged in illuminating missals, and painting in miniature. She died in 1463.

VILA, SENEN. According to Palomino, this Spanish painter was a native of Valencia, and a disciple of Estevan Marc. He resided chiefly at Murcia, where he painted a great number of pictures for the churches and public edifices, particularly for the convent of Santa Isabel, the monastery of Santo Domingo el Real, and the Enfermaria di San Francisco. He was a more able designer than a colourist, and gave great expression to his heads. He died in 1708.

VILA, LORENZO, was the son and disciple of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was born at Murcia in 1682. He painted history in the style of his father, and had gained considerable reputation by the pictures he painted for the churches, particularly a Holy Family, for the refectory of S. Fulgenzio, at Murcia, when he became an ecclesiastic, and died in 1713.

VILADOMAT, DON ANTONIO. This painter was born at Barcelona in 1678. He is said to have made a surprising progress in the art, without the help of an instructor, and when he was twenty-one years of age, was engaged to paint a set of pictures of the Life of St. Bruno, for the Carthusians at Monte Allegre, in which he evinced extraordinary powers of native genius, unassisted by the advantages of a technical education, or improved by travel. He also painted three subjects from the Life of St. Francis, for the cloisters of the Franciscans, at Barcelona, which were greatly admired. He died in 1755.

[Mengs regarded Antonio Viladomat as the principal Spanish painter of the day, and other good judges have spoken of his works with approbation. He did not confine his talents to subjects for churches and convents; he painted landscapes of great beauty, and battle-pieces admired for their spirit; and he was no less successful in portraiture. For the last seventeen years of his life he was afflicted with paralysis in his hands, and of course ceased to work with the pencil. He left a son named Joseph, who was also a painter, but very inferior to his father. The works of both are to be found in the churches and convents of Barcelona.]

VILLACIS, DON NICHOLAS DE. This Spanish painter was of a noble family of Murcia, and, after receiving some instruction in design in his native city, his parents sent him to Madrid, to enter the school of Don Diego Velasquez. He afterwards travelled to Rome, where he improved his style, by studying the most remarkable works of art in that capital. On his return to Spain he established himself at Murcia, where he distinguished himself by several considerable works, of which the most important was a series of pictures of the Life of San Blas, in the convent of la Santissima Trinidad de Calzados: and the Martyrdom of S. Lorenzo, in the church of the Dominicans. [Being rich, he painted chiefly for his amusement, and therefore his works are rare in public places. His correspondence with Velasquez is said to be still in existence. He died in 1690.]

VILLAFRANCA, PEDRO. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a Head of Frederick Orday de Valais.

[Pedro de Villafranca Malagon, a Spanish engraver and painter, was born at Alcolea in La Mancha, and received instruction at Madrid from Vincencio Carducho. He, however, preferred the graver to the pencil, and is one of the few Spaniards that have excelled in the art. He engraved a great number of title-pages, portraits, and illustrations, particularly for the Books of Official Rules of the Orders of Santiago, Calatrava, and Alcantara; these are also embellished with portraits of Philip IV., to whom he was appointed engraver in ordinary, with a salary of 100 ducats. The dates of these works are from 1640 to 1660. The pictures that have been noticed as by him, are some which he executed for the church of San Felipe el Real at Madrid, for which the prior paid him 20,136 reals. The time of his decease is not ascertained, but his last known print is the portrait of Calderon, engraved in 1676.]

VILLAIN, G. R., [GERARD RENAUD,] a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved a portrait of M. Dufour de Ville Neuve; after Mauvern.

VILLAMENA, FRANCESCO. This eminent designer and engraver was born at Assisi about the year 1566. According to Baglione, he visited Rome in the pontificate of Sixtus V., where he applied himself with great assiduity in designing from the antique, and the works of the most distinguished masters. It is not certainly known by whom he was instructed in the art of engraving, but he is generally supposed to have been a fellow student with Agostino Caracci, under Cornelius Cort. His style of engraving is bold and open, and he handled the burin with uncommon facility. The effect of his prints is more clear than powerful, from the lights being too equally diffused over the whole subject, which gives them a slight and unfinished appearance. This defect is, however, discernible in most of the productions of that time, and is compensated in a great degree by the correctness of the drawing, and the expression in the heads.

The prints by Villamena are numerous, they are occasionally signed with his name at length, sometimes with the initials F. V. F., and he sometimes used the monogram . The following are his most considerable works:

PORTRAITS.

- Cesar Baronius Soranus, Cardinal. 1602.
- Christophorus Clavius, Bambergensis e Societ. Jesu. 1606.
- Robertus Bellarminus Politianus.
- Christiern IV., King of Denmark.
- Galilee Galliei, of Pisa, famous Mathematician.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

- St. Theresa meditating in her Cell.
- Mary Magdalene penitent, crowned by an Angel.
- St. Francis praying before a Crucifix.
- A set of six grotesque Figures, one of which is a Monk begging, accompanied by two Children.
- A print called The Boxers, representing a Man fighting against a crowd of people.
- Another print, called The Antiquary, representing John Alto standing in one of the streets of Rome.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Moses showing the Brazen Serpent to the Israelites; after Ferrau da Faenza.

The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Francis; after the same.

The Holy Family, with St. John, St. Elisabeth, and St. Anne; after Raffaele. 1602.

The same subject; engraved at Rome in 1611.

St. Bruno, with his companions, doing penance in the Desert; after Lanfranco.

The taking down from the Cross; after Baroccio.

The Presentation in the Temple; after Paolo Veronese.

This plate was begun by Agostino Caracci, and was finished by Villamena; it is scarce.

St. Bernard, with the Virgin in the clouds; after Vanni.

A set of twenty Scriptural subjects, from the paintings by Raffaele, in the Vatican, called Raffaele's Bible.

[He died about 1626.]

VILLAVICENCIO, DON PEDRO NUÑEZ. This Spanish painter was of a noble family of Seville, and was born in 1635. He was taught design as an accomplishment, in which his progress was so uncommon, that he was induced to enter the school of Bartolome Esteban Murillo, for the purpose of cultivating painting, rather as an amusement than as a profession. He afterwards studied at Malta, under Matteo Preti, called Il Calabrese, and for a short time followed the vigorous style of that master, but he returned to the tender and harmonious tinting of Murillo. He made presents of several of his works to the convents at Seville, where he died in 1700. [According to Bermudez, he painted children in a very beautiful manner, very little inferior to Murillo; and was also distinguished as a portrait painter.]

VILLE, A. DE. The name of this artist is affixed to a slight etching of an architectural frontispiece, ornamented with figures, from his own design. It is very indifferently executed.

[VILLEGAS MARMOLEJO, PEDRO DE, born at Seville in 1520; it is not said under whom he studied, but from the beauty of his style it is supposed that he received his artistic instruction at Rome. Ponz supposed that he studied in the school of Raphael; but that could not be, as Raphael died in the same year as Villegas was born. He may have studied his works as well as those of other great Italian masters, and formed his style from theirs. His fine picture of the Visit of Mary to Elisabeth, in the cathedral at Seville, partakes of the manner of Pedro Campaña, and has been attributed to that master; and his Lazarus in pontifical Robes, which he painted for the hospital of the Lazarinos, Bermudez considers equal to the best of that master. These are strong proofs of the merits of Villegas. Pacheco, however, has spoken disparagingly of him and his works; but the key to this will be found in the friendship that subsisted between Villegas and Arias Montano, the compiler of the great Polyglot Bible, published at Antwerp, and whose principles were opposed to those of the Jesuits, of whom Pacheco was a violent partisan. Such disingenuousness militates more against the credit of Pacheco than the merits of Villegas. If there were no other commendation of the latter, it would be sufficient to say he possessed the friendship of Arias Montano. His works are become scarce. He died in 1597, and was buried in the church of San Lorenzo, where there is an Annunciation, and a Virgin and Infant, by him, adorning the altar. His friend Montano wrote the epitaph on his tomb.]

[VILLEGUAIN, or VILLEGUIN, ETIENNE, a French historical and portrait painter, by whom there are some creditable pictures, was born in 1599, and died in 1668.]

[VILLEREY, ANTOINE CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, an engraver, born at Paris in 1768, according to Joubert, in 1754, according to Gabet, was a scholar of Romanet. He engraved several of the plates of Musée Filhol; a great part of the vignettes for the edition of Voltaire published by Renouard; the Battle of Austerlitz for the work "Concours décennal;" Innocence and Love, after Prud'hon; Hymen and Happiness, after the same; and twenty-six plates for the Galerie de St. Bruno, after Le Sueur He was living in 1831.]

[VILLOLDO, JUAN DE, an historical painter, who resided at Toledo at the commencement of the sixteenth century, with great credit in his profession. As a proof of the estimation in which he was held, the chapter of the cathedral employed him to paint several pictures for the Muzarabic chapel, which he commenced in 1508, and, with the assistance of Juan de Borgoña and Amberes, terminated in 1510. From this period till 1547 there is no record of his works, but in that year we find him employed by the bishop of Placencia to adorn a chapel which he had re-edified in the parish of St. Andrew, at Madrid. This was a work of considerable importance both for the number of the pictures, and the great variety of subjects; but he finished it in 1548, a proof of the fecundity of his imagination, and the rapidity of his pencil. The subjects were from the fall of Adam, and the principal circumstances of the life and death of Christ, to the number of forty-five. They are praised by Bermudez for correctness of design, and for purity in the antique style. The exact year of his death is not ascertained; but it is supposed to be after 1551.]

VILSTEREN, VAN, a Dutch engraver in mezzotint, by whom we have some portraits, among which is that of the Burgomaster Bikker.

[VIMERCATI, CARLO, so called, but whose family name was DONELLI, born at Milan in 1660, was a scholar of the Procaccini. He exhibited but few of his pictures at Milan, he painted more at Codogno, and in his best manner, and also in the new style of D. Crespi, which was inferior to that of the Procaccini. He died in 1715.]

VINCENT, HUBERT, a French engraver, who resided at Rome about the year 1691. He engraved a few plates in a very indifferent style; among others are the following:

The Nativity, called The Notte; after Coreggio.

The Judgment of Paris; after Paolo Veronese.

[VINCI, GAUDENZIO, said to be a native of Novara, in Piedmont, flourished about 1511. It is not ascertained under what master he studied, but two pictures attributed to him have a certain resemblance to the works of Perugino, Francia, and Lionardo da Vinci. Lanzi places him among the imitators of the last. Mention is made of an altarpiece at Arona, near Milan, in the manner of Lionardo, which Lanzi designates an astonishing production; it has the name Gaudenzio Vinci, and the date 1511. This picture, however, was long considered as the work of Gaudenzio di Ferrari, who flourished at the same period, and painted others in neighbouring places. Whether the latter ever assumed the name of Vinci, or that the baptismal name of the two artists caused a misappropriation, cannot now be resolved; it is certain that the same style of painting is attributed by writers to both. But there is another picture with the date 1500, in the Manfrini palace at Venice, which at different times has been ascribed to Perugino and to Luini, showing that it partakes of the manner of both; this is now said to be probably a work of Gaudenzio Vinci. It represents Christ washing the feet of his Disciples, and is praised for its solemn and beautiful arrangement. The draperies are partly in the style of Perugino, partly in the manner of the old Venetian painters; the heads partake of the Umbrian and Venetian schools, mixed with that of Lionardo. This can hardly have been painted by Gaudenzio di Ferrari, who was then only in his sixteenth year. The matter may be worth further inquiry, as some reputations are concerned in it.]

VINCI, LIONARDO DA. Vasari and other biographers have dated the birth of this illustrious artist in 1445, but it has been satisfactorily ascertained by Carlo Amoretti, in his "Memorie Storiche di Lionardo da Vinci," and by Durazzini, in his "Elogio degli Illustri Toscani," that he was born at the castle of Vinci, situated in the lower vale of the Arno, in 1452. He was the son of Pietro da Vinci, a notary of the Signory of Florence, who perceiving, from the infantine sketches he amused himself with in his childhood, a decided inclination for the art of painting, determined to assist his natural propensity, by procuring him the advantages of a technical education. He was placed under the tuition of Andrea Verocchio, a friend of his father, who was an eminent master of design, and possessed a distinguished reputation as a sculptor, an architect, and a painter. The extraordinary faculties of the pupil secured the attentive cultivation of the preceptor, and his progress in the art was such, that in a short time he was able to assist his instructor as a coadjutor. Verocchio having been employed by the monks of S. Salvi, at Valombrosa, to paint an altar-piece for their church, representing the Baptism of Christ, Lionardo was intrusted to paint the figure of an angel, and performed his task with such beauty and correctness of design, and such felicity of execution, that the rest of the picture was totally eclipsed; and tradition reports, that Verocchio was so much mortified at the discomfiture, that he relinquished the pencil for ever.

Lionardo now entered the world with the sanguine expectations of youth, beloved for the grace and urbanity of his manners, and beheld with admiration for the extent and variety of his acquirements. His studies had not been confined to painting. He was an able architect, had a perfect knowledge of anatomy, was extremely well skilled in mechanics, a master of optics and geometry, and had applied himself thoroughly to the study of nature and her operations. To arts and literature he added the accomplishments of the body. His person was vigorous and finely formed; he was a poet, a skilful musician, and a master of all the favourite exercises. He understood the management of the horse, and was very dexterous in the use of arms. The possession of such extraordinary qualities soon spread his reputation over all Italy.

After painting some time at Florence, Lodovico Sforza, Duke of Milan, invited him to his court, in 1494, where he appointed him director of the Academy of Painting and Architecture, which he had recently revived with additional splendour and encouragement. Lionardi had no sooner entered on his office, than he banished all the Gothic principles established by his predecessor Michelino, and introduced the beautiful simplicity and purity of the Grecian and Roman style.

Desirous of rendering the extensive capacity of Lionardi useful as well as ornamental to his state, the Duke of Milan engaged this distinguished engineer in the stupendous project of conducting the waters of the Adda, from Mortesana, through the Valteline, and the valley of Chiavenna, to the walls of Milan, a distance of nearly two hundred miles; an enterprise which had hitherto been regarded as impracticable. Lionardo was not insensible of the arduousness of such an undertaking, and, in order to pursue, with greater tranquillity, his studies of those branches of philosophy and mathematics, which are most applicable to mechanics, he sought retirement at Vaverola, the seat of his friend, Francesco Melzi, where he devoted himself to the most profound research into history and antiquity. He observed how the Ptolemy's had conveyed the waters of the Nile through the several parts of Egypt, and how Trajan had opened a commerce with Nicomedia, by rendering navigable the lakes and rivers lying between that city and the sea. The impediments of nature gave way to the daring efforts of genius and science, and he accomplished this immense work, to the astonishment and admiration of all Italy.

Having thus served his patron in the capacity of engineer, the Duke next employed him to embellish his metropolis with the productions of his pencil. His principal work at Milan was his celebrated large picture of the Last Supper, painted for the refectory of the Padri Dominicani, in the church of S. Maria delle Grazie, a performance which history ranks amongst the most admirable productions of the art. He chose that interesting moment of the subject, when our Saviour declared to his disciples, that one of them would betray him. The surrounding apostles appear thunderstruck by such a prediction; the most distant from the Redeemer, doubtful if they have heard it right, are anxiously inquiring of their nearer neighbours the precise meaning of the prophecy. Some express their astonishment, some their indignation, whilst others exhibit the most candid expression of their innocence. Judas alone, though anxious to conceal his guilt, unequivocally discovers himself to be the betrayer. The head of our Saviour he did not finish, not being able to design a character equal to the conception he had formed in his mind. It was afterwards completed by Gio. Batista Armenini. It has long afforded matter of infinite regret, that this admirable picture had not been painted in distemper, instead of a composition of oil and varnish, which occasioned it to begin to crumble, and fall to pieces, fifty years after it was painted. Of this extraordinary production, only three heads remain of the original, and of those, little more is now discernible than the outline. The world of art is, however, compensated, in some degree, for its loss, by several excellent copies, some of which are by his most distinguished disciples. Of these, the most worthy of the original, are that by Marco Uggione, at the Carthusians at Pavia; another in the refectory of the Franciscans, at Lugano, by Bernardino Luini; and one in La Pace, at Milan, by Giovanni Paolo Lomazzo. He also painted an altar-piece of the Nativity, which was presented to the Emperor.

The wars of Italy now began to interrupt the progress of Lionardo. In 1500, his patron, the Duke of Milan, was overthrown in battle by the French, made prisoner, and conducted to France, where he soon after died in the castle of Loches. These disastrous events proved fatal to the arts at Milan, the Academy was suppressed, its professors dispersed, and Lionardo lost every thing, except his talents, his application, and attractions. The disorders of Lombardy, and the downfall of the Sforzi, his protectors, obliged Lionardo to quit Milan, and to take refuge at Florence, where the arts were still sheltered by the genial patronage of the Medici.

In 1503, the Council having determined to decorate their chambers with the works of the best masters, Lionardi was appointed to execute one side of it, and Michael Angelo Buonaroti, who was then in his twenty-ninth year, and whose gigantic powers had already displayed themselves, was fixed on as his competitor, in undertaking the other. Jealousy of each other's ability, as is usual, excited animosity between them, and the rivalry of these great artists divided Florence into parties, who embittered their disputes, without endeavouring to reconcile their differences.

Raffaelle, who had recently left the school of Pietro Perugino, was induced, by the fame of this great contest of their transcendent powers, to visit Florence. The grace and delicacy of Lionardo's style, compared with the dry and Gothic manner of Perugino, excited the admiration of the young painter, and inspired him with a more modern taste. During a residence of thirteen years at Florence, he produced some of his best works, among which may be ranked his cartoon of St. Anna, intended for an altar-piece for the church of the Padri Servi; his celebrated cartoon of the battle, designed for the great council-chamber; and his much famed portrait of Mona Lisa, called La Gioconda, which is said to have occupied him four years.

Lionardo had not hitherto seen Rome, when the elevation of Leo X. to the papal throne, whose love and protection of the arts were universally known, induced him to visit that capital in 1513, whither he went, under the protection of Giuliano de' Medici. He was graciously received by the Pope, who determined to employ him, when, Vasari informs us, he was discouraged from proceeding, by an observation of the pontiff, who, on being informed that Lionardo, in consequence of his Holiness's commission, had begun to distil his oils, and prepare his varnishes, exclaimed, that "nothing good could be expected from a painter who thought of finishing his works before he had begun them." It is more probable that, being now declined into the vale of years, he found himself unable to contend with such rivals as Michael Angelo and Raffaelle, then in the zenith of their fame. His residence at Rome not proving agreeable to him, he was induced to accept of an invitation he received from Francis I. to visit the court of France. He was received by that splendid monarch with the most flattering attention. The fatigues of the journey, and the change of climate, reduced him to a state of languor and infirmity, which rendered him incapable of undertaking any work of importance. During an indisposition of five years, he continued to receive the most attentive marks of that monarch's esteem, who frequently visited him during his illness, and he is said to have expired in the arms of the king, in 1519.

As a painter, Lionardo may be regarded as the first who attempted to reconcile minute and elaborate finish with grandeur of idea and dignity of form. He particularly attached himself to the expression of character, and the just delineation of the affections of the mind. If, in this sublime department of the art, he was afterwards excelled by Raffaelle, he had at least the glory of having surpassed in it every painter who had preceded him, and of having opened a path, unknown before, which was afterwards so successfully trod by Raffaelle himself. His design is correct and pure, and if he did not, like Raffaelle, venture into the region of the beautiful ideal, he selected nature in her most perfect forms, and gave to his figures a grace with which the artists of his time were entirely unacquainted.

In his compositions, like the painters of antiquity, he was an enemy to confusion, and to avoid it, like them, he only introduced into his pictures such figures as were essentially necessary to his subject. Although it does not appear that he ever sedulously cultivated an acquaintance with the antique, he distinguished himself by an elevated taste, and a perfectly correct imitation of the models he consulted. To him we are chiefly indebted for the establishment of the principles of the chiaro-scuro, which gave birth to that magical relief for which his works, and those of his disciples, are so peculiarly remarkable.

An artist of such universality of talents and habits of industry, for some years at the head of an academy, may be supposed to have left behind him various writings on art. He composed several treatises and discourses on different subjects, among which are,

A Treatise on Hydraulics, explaining the nature, equilibrium, and motion of Water, with designs.

A Treatise on Anatomy.

The Anatomy of the Horse. This work is noticed by Vasari, Borghini, and Lomazzo. Lionardo had a peculiar talent in drawing that noble animal, and designed this treatise for the use of those who painted battles and triumphs.

A Treatise on Perspective.

A Treatise on Light and Shadow.

His principal work is a Treatise on Painting. It was first published, in folio, at Paris, in 1651, entitled, "Trattato della Pittura di Lionardo da Vinci. Novamente dato in Luce; con la vita dell' istesso autore, scritta da Raffaelle du Fresne, &c., Parigi, 1651," with figures designed by Nicholas Poussin. It was translated into English, and published by John Senex, London, 1721.

Of the above compositions, the last is the only one which is in possession of the public, the others remain in manuscript in different libraries.

One of the volumes of his drawings, with his manuscript observations, is preserved in his Majesty's collection. It consists of a variety of heads, portraits, caricatures, single figures, horses, and animals; botany, optics, perspective, mechanics, and anatomical subjects. It may perhaps gratify curiosity to be informed in what manner this interesting assemblage should have contributed to enrich the collection of the king. The whole of Lionardo's works and papers were left by will to his friend Francesco Melzi, as a token of his regard. They were collected, after his decease, into thirteen volumes, and deposited at Vaverola, where they remained, after the death of Melzi, in the possession of his infant heirs. Those invaluable treasures were afterwards obtained from the children of Melzi, by the nefarious pretences of Lelio Gavardi, their tutor. He was, however, induced, by the zealous remonstrances of Gio. Ambrogio Mazzenta, a noble Milanese, to return the whole to Orazio Melzi. In gratitude for the restoration of this valuable bequest, Melzi presented Mazzenta with six of the volumes. Of these, Cardinal Borromeo had one, which is now in the Ambrosian library; Ambrogio Figini had another, which has since descended to Ercole Bianchi, his heir; Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, had a third volume; and the other three became the property of Pompeo Leoni, one of which is that now in the royal collection. On the cover of the volume is inscribed in gold letters, Disegni di Leonardo da Vinci restaurati da Pompeo Leoni. It is probable that this inestimable curiosity was acquired for Charles I. by the Earl of Arundel, when he was ambassador to the Emperor Ferdinand II. in 1636. It was fortunately preserved during the civil wars, and was discovered in the same cabinet in which Queen Caroline found the portraits of the principal personages of the court of Henry VIII., by Hans Holbein.

[So much has been written on and about Leonardo da Vinci, that to attempt to give any further information respecting him would seem supererogatory. Yet there remains much that requires elucidation, which time perhaps will discover. He ranks by universal consent in the quintumvirate of great painters since the revival of the art; sharing largely in the applause bestowed on Antonio Allegri, Giorgione, Raphael, and Titian, and often receiving the praise of being the prototype of their several distinguishing qualities. The account given in the text is perhaps sufficient for the general inquirer, as it contains the facts detailed by numerous other writers; and erudite connoisseurs know where to look for particular information interesting only to them. The less learned are careless to know whether he was the natural son of Ser Pietro da Vinci, a noble or a notary, and "una donna libera," and afterwards legitimized by form of law; or whether he should be called Leonardo Vinci, dei Vinci, or da Vinci. The appellation Leonardo da Vinci has obtained, and will continue to be his cognomen, though he signed one of his pictures in 1492 "Leonardus Vinci," and three prints designed, and said to be engraved, by his hand, are inscribed in Roman capitals, ACCADEMIA DI LEONARDO VINCI. In Sir Mark Sykes's collection, a print is thus described: "A singular ornament on a dark ground, a circle, ACADEMIA LEONARDI VIN. H. 10 $\frac{1}{4}$, W. 8 $\frac{1}{4}$ ." Moreover, the medal executed during his life bears the inscription, "Leonardus Vincicus Florentinus," and his epitaph, said to have been dictated by himself, concludes with "Sum Florentinus Leonardus Vincia proles." Certainly these are matters of very little importance, and only interesting to the curious; whatever his paternity, he was a nobleman by superiority of genius; he had his patent from Heaven, and earthly kings could confer no additional honour; he lived and died the great Leonardo. The date of his birth is now generally allowed to be 1452, though Roscoe, in his Life and Pontificate of Leo X., adopting the statements of the older writers, places it about 1443. Paulus Jovius says he died in his sixty-seventh year. All who have written accounts of Leonardo da Vinci concur in praising, in the most glowing terms, two of his grandest works in painting and composition, which have ceased to have existence, it may be said, for the last two centuries; The Last Supper, and the cartoon of a Battle between the Florentine and Milanese Troops in 1440. Of the first, a tolerably correct idea may be formed from the copy executed by his scholar, Marco d'Oggione, now in the English Academy of Arts; and the composition of the cartoon may be partly gathered from the caricatured excerpt by Rubens, so finely engraved by Edelinck. It has been repeatedly said, in an unqualified manner, that he did not finish the head of the Saviour in the picture of The Last Supper; this is a mistake, arising from a misapprehension of the reply of his friend Bernardo Zenale, whom he consulted on the subject; that reply had a comparative reference to the beautiful heads of John and James.

If Leonardo left the head of Christ in an unfinished state, whence did Marco d'Oggione derive his sublime representation of the face of the Redeemer? Fuseli, lecturing on the copy, says, "The face of the Saviour is an abyss of thought, and broods over the immense revolution in the economy of mankind, which throngs inwardly on his absorbed eye—as the Spirit creative in the beginning over the water's darksome wave—undisturbed and quiet. It could not be lost in the copy before us; how could its sublime conception escape those who saw the original? It has survived the hand of time in the study which Leonardo made in crayons, exhibited with most of the attendant heads in the British Gallery, and even in the feeble transcripts of Pietro Testa. I am not afraid of being under the necessity of retracting what I am going to advance, that neither during the splendid period immediately subsequent to Leonardo, nor in those which succeeded to our own time, has a face of the Redeemer been produced which, I will not say equalled, but approached the sublimity of Leonardo's conception, and in quiet and simple features of humanity, embodied divine, or, what is the same, incomprehensible and infinite powers. To him who could contrive and give this combination, the unlimited praise lavished on the inferior characters who surround the hero, whilst his success in that was doubted—appears to me not only no praise, but a gross injustice."

Thomas Phillips, the late professor of painting, in his second lecture to the students of the Royal Academy, relates the observations made by him and Mr. Hilton on their examination of the remains of the picture in 1825. He says, "Of the heads, there is not one untouched, and many are totally ruined. Fortunately that of the Saviour is the most pure, being but faintly retouched; and it presents, even yet, a most perfect image of that Divine character. Whence arose the story of its not having been finished it is difficult now to conceive, and the history itself varies among the writers who have mentioned it. But," he continues, "perhaps a man so scrupulous as he (Leonardo) in the definition of character and expression, and so ardent in his pursuit of them, might have expressed himself unsatisfied, where all others could see only perfection."

Fuseli sums up the character of Leonardo, as a painter, thus: "The universality of Leonardo da Vinci is become proverbial; but though possessed of every element, he rather gave glimpses than a standard of form; though full of energy, he had not powers effectually to court the various graces he pursued. His line was free from meagreness, and his forms presented volume, but he appears not to have ever been much acquainted, or to have sedulously sought much acquaintance, with the antique. Character was his favourite study, and character he has often raised from an individual to a species, and as often depressed to caricature. The strength of his execution lay in the delineation of male heads; those of his females owe nearly all their charms to chiaro-scuro, of which he is the supposed inventor; they are seldom more discriminated than the children they fondle; they are sisters of one family. The extremities of his hands are often inelegant, though timorously drawn, like those of Christ among the Doctors in the picture we saw lately exhibited. Lionardo da Vinci touched in every muscle of his forms the master-key of the passion he wished to express, but he is ideal only in chiaro-scuro." The picture alluded to is now in the National Gallery; Waagen and Passavant both deny its authenticity; the first attributes it to Bernardino Luini, the latter inclines to think it the work of Francesco Melzi. According to these critical tourists, England is very poorly provided with paintings by Lionardo da Vinci; almost every one that came under their review is assigned to Luini, or some other disciple, or imitator, of the great man. But some are allowed to be painted from cartoons designed by him, and to exhibit much of his genius and taste in the expression. A few cartoons, and other drawings, are admitted to be genuine. Considering how little knowledge of pictures the gentlemen of this country possessed, before these great connoisseurs came to enlighten them, we ought to be thankful for the information, and grateful for any concessions. The story of Lionardo having died in the arms of Francis I. is now exploded. He died at the chateau of Cloux, near Amboise, on the 2nd of May, 1519, and, according to the journal of Francis, preserved in the royal library at Paris, the court was on that day at St. Germain en Laye. It is more probable that he died in the arms of his beloved friend and disciple, Count Francesco Melzi, to whom he bequeathed his manuscripts and studies. Melzi, in the letter written by him to Lionardo's relations immediately after his death, makes no mention of the circumstance, which he would have done had it occurred; and Lomazzo distinctly says that the king first learned the death of Lionardo from Melzi.

The drawings discovered in the royal collection have been engraved by Bartolozzi and Tomkins, and published by Chamberlaine, in imperial folio, with the title "Imitations of the original Designs of Lionardo da Vinci," &c. Others have been engraved and published in various parts of Italy. Of his "Trattato della Pittura," there are several editions of much later date than that quoted in the text. Count Algarotti held this work in such high estimation, that he thought it the only one necessary to be placed in the hands of a student in the art.

A few words may be added respecting Lionardo da Vinci as an engraver. Zani, who, on all occasions, stoutly opposed those writers who asserted that several celebrated painters had engraved on wood, was willing to concede the exercise of that art to Lionardo; but he produces no satisfactory instance to show cause for his concession. He, perhaps, intended to do so at some future opportunity, as he concludes by saying per ora non più.

There are good reasons, in the opinion of competent judges, for believing that he etched, or engraved on copper with the burin. In the British Museum are the following, two of which are thought to be undoubtedly by him.

The Bust of a young and beautiful Female. This exquisite and unique specimen is undoubtedly from the hand of Lionardo. It was formerly in the renowned Storck collection, from which it passed into that of Sir Mark Sykes. At the sale of his cabinet, in 1824, it was purchased for Mr. Wilson at the sum of sixty-four pounds; that gentleman had a fac simile engraved as a frontispiece to his privately circulated catalogue of rare prints, justly considering it as the most wonderful gem of his extraordinary collection. The lady is seen in profile turned to the left, her hair is dressed in a fanciful manner, one of the braided locks passes over her bosom, and the sleeves of her robe are ornamented and bound with ribbons. Height $4\frac{1}{2}$ in., Width 3 in.

In a note to the article in his catalogue, Mr. Wilson has inserted the following letter from Mr. W. Y. Ottley.

31, Devonshire Street, December 31st, 1827.

MY DEAR SIR,

I have been very remiss—but you see I will not let the year close upon us without writing a confirmation of my former opinion, that the beautiful little print, representing the bust of a young Lady, in profile, which was formerly in the collection of Sir M. M. Sykes, and now graces your own select cabinet, was engraved by the hand of Lionardo da Vinci himself, and not after his design by some contemporary unknown engraver: there is a genuine feeling and knowledge of beauty, evinced by the artist in marking the delicate features in that face, to say nothing of the hair, &c., which every way denote the hand of the original designer, and which, I think, no other engraver of the time possessed in an equal degree. I always considered it highly probable, that the horses' heads are also by him; and I am much disposed to ascribe to his hand a circular plate, (or two, if I mistake not,) representing the twistings of a rope, which indeed bear his name. Lionardo not having been hitherto mentioned as an engraver, is to me no objection to the fact of having been so. Indeed, from his versatile character, and his fondness for novel studies of all kinds, it is difficult to conceive that he should never have taken up the graver. You are aware that his master, Verrochio, is expressly termed an engraver by Vasari. Excuse this hasty note, &c.

W. Y. OTTLEY.

Mr. Wilson also remarks that there is in the Royal Library at Paris, among the unsorted prints of Marolles, a small circular engraving of a male head, in a similar style, and of similar execution. On the left are the letters АСНА, and on the right LI—VI, the last four letters probably denoting the name of the artist.

Study of Heads of three Horses. Bartsch places this extraordinary print among the works of J. A. De Brescia, to whose style it bears, in the opinion of connoisseurs, not the slightest resemblance. Mr. Ottley's opinion is contained in the foregoing letter; and living judges, whom the editor has consulted, and whose discernment in these matters is acknowledged, think that it undoubtedly is from the hand of Lionardo. Mr. Ottley, in his "Inquiry into the History of early Engraving," page 473, in a note, says, "That even Lionardo da Vinci might have occasionally practised engraving, I was some years ago led to think, upon the occasion of turning over the invaluable volume of designs in his Majesty's collection; in which I found, pasted on the leaves amongst Lionardo's studies of horses, two engravings, or, perhaps, two pieces of the same engraving, representing horses' heads, executed exactly in the taste and manner of his drawings. From what I remember of these fragments, I suspect they are no other than the anonymous print mentioned by Bartsch, vol. xiii., and ascribed by him to Jo. Ant. Brixianus, cut in two." This was written in 1816. There is a modern copy of this print on India paper.

A large print of a Lady in a rich dress, not mentioned in any catalogue, and presumed to be unique, has been also attributed to Lionardo; by inspection, and comparison with the first-mentioned head, the editor is of opinion that it is not so. He is inclined to think it by an artist accustomed to the ornamental work of a goldsmith; and that both the design and execution are probably by Verocchio, though it may, at present, be difficult to prove it.

Before proceeding to speak of others, it will be but just to quote a passage which occurs in the account of Andrea Verocchio by Vasari. That there may be no mistake, it is given in the original. "Sono alcuni disegni di sua mano nel nostro libro, fatti con molti pazienza e grandissimo giudizio, in fra quali sono alcune teste di femmina con bell' arie e accomodate di capelli, quali per la sua bellezza Lionardo da Vinci sempre imitò. Sonvi ancora due Cavalli con il modo delle misure e centine da farli di piccoli grandi che vengano proportionati e senza errori." It will be observed that Vasari says "alcuni disegni," and not alcune stampe; and Zani, speaking of A. Verocchio, says, "Non si hanno prove ch'ei fosse anche Incisore." The passage in Vasari could not have escaped his notice.

While inspecting the before-mentioned prints at the British Museum, the editor's attention was directed by Mr. Carpenter, the intelligent keeper, to one of extraordinary beauty in the same portfolio, classed with the works of John Duvet. The ingenious composition, the spirited delineation of the animals, the minute attention to the landscape, particularly the back-ground, and, above all, the drawing of the figure seated on an eminence to the left; every part executed with a delicate point, and showing mastery of hand, and a combination that could emanate only from the most exalted genius, induced Mr. Carpenter to believe it to be the production of Lionardo da Vinci, an opinion in which the editor fully concurs. Bartsch has described this print among those by John Duvet, N^o. 44, vol. vii., page 515, with the title "Poison et contre poison;" it is, no doubt, a nobler allegory than he imagined, and, instead of "un homme nud," he might have termed the figure that of the Dodonean Jupiter. It may be suspected that Guido was acquainted with the design, and that it formed the model for his Apollo.

Among the drawings so often alluded to by Vasari, is one called the Head of a Magdalene; of this Rosini has given an engraving in the fourth volume of "Storia della Pittura Italiana." which is worth inspection; it is a type of Lionardo's manner in drawing, expression, and graceful attitude: too richly decorated, however, for the character of a Magdalene.]

[VINCK, J——, a landscape and portrait painter, of whom there are no particulars. His landscapes are in the mixed manner of Vinckenbooms, Paul Brill, and Breughel, and appear to have been painted in the early part of the 17th century. His portraits are known only by the engravings that have his name.]

VINCKENBOOMS, DAVID. This painter was born at Mechlin in 1578, and was the son of Philip Vinckenbooms, an obscure painter in distemper, by whom he was taught the elements of the art, and it does not appear that he had the advantage of superior instruction. He painted landscapes in the style of Roland Savery and John Breughel. They are sometimes decorated with subjects from the Bible, and sometimes with fairs and merry-makings, which are ingeniously composed, and the design of his figures is tolerably correct, though his touch is dry and hard. One of his most considerable works is a picture in the hospital of the Old Men, at Amsterdam, representing a crowd of people attending the drawing of a lottery by torch-light. He occasionally painted historical subjects, in which the landscape served as a back-ground. Of this description is a picture of Christ bearing his Cross, in the collection of the Elector Palatine; and another at Frankfort, representing Christ restoring Sight to the Blind. He engraved a few plates of landscapes, from his own designs, which he usually marked with a monogram, composed of a D, a V, and a B, thus,

DB. [He died about 1629. Some of his landscapes have been engraved by N. De Bruyn. In the British Museum are four drawings by him, finely executed with the pen, and washed with Indian ink; they represent the story of the Prodigal Son.]

VINKELES, RENIER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1741. He was a pupil of J. Punt, and engraved some plates of historical subjects, landscapes, and conversations; but he was principally employed in portraits, among which are his own, with those of J. Schmidt, and J. Andriessen, and the portrait of M. Braamcamp.

VINNE, JOHN [ISAAC?] VANDER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Haerlem about the year 1730. We have a set of twelve plates of views in the environs of Haerlem, by this artist, after Peter Bout, executed in a very neat style. [This is probably Isaac Vander Vinne, who engraved also after T. Wyck. He was a publisher at Haerlem.]

VINNE, VINCENT [LAURENSZ] VANDER. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1629. From his infancy he discovered a marked disposition for drawing, and had made considerable proficiency without the help of a master, when he was placed under the tuition of Francis Hals, one of the most eminent artists of his time. Under so excellent an instructor, his advancement was such, that he was able in a short time to travel by the produce of his talents. He visited Germany, Switzerland, and resided some time at Paris; and wherever he went, his ability insured him employment and protection.

In 1657 he returned to Haerlem, where he passed the remainder of his life. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, and drolleries; and in each of those branches discovered an uncommon facility of execution, an admirable tone of colouring, and a faithful imitation of nature. Towards the latter part of his life, the desire of gain induced him to grasp at every commission which was offered him, and his last works are the productions of negligence and despatch. His best performances are his portraits, in many of which he approaches to the spirited touch and truth of character, which we admire in the productions of Hals. He died in 1702.

VINNE, LAWRENCE VANDER, the son of [Vincent Laurensz Vander Vinne,] was born at Haerlem in 1658, and was instructed by his father, whose style he attempted to follow, but never rose above mediocrity. His principal merit consisted in painting flowers and plants, and he was much employed by the botanists of his time. He had two younger brothers, JOHN and ISAAC, who both practised the art, but lived and died in obscurity. [According to Immerzeel, he died in 1729. He not only painted flowers, but landscapes and cattle, in the manner of Berchem, of whom he had been a scholar.]

[VINNE, JAN VANDER, a son of Vincent Laurensz Vander Vinne, was born at Haerlem in 1663, and was a scholar of Jan van Hugtenburg. He resided in England some time, where he painted landscapes with hunting subjects, and horse races. Some of these are respectable, and show artistic knowledge, but others by him are the works of a mere artisan, or house decorator. The quantity of make-up mountainous back-ground indicates that he worked for low wages. In old houses there are some remains to be found on wainscot panels. Perhaps he came to England to study the scenery and the horses, for on his return to Haerlem he continued to paint hunting-pieces, and occasionally skirmishes, by which he acquired wealth. He had a younger brother, Isaac, who was also a painter and engraver. Both, ultimately, left the practice, and engaged in commerce; Isaac as a publisher. Jan died at Haerlem in 1721, and Isaac in 1740.]

[VINNE, VINCENT VANDER, was the son of Jan Vander Vinne, probably the engraver, and was born at Haerlem in 1736. During his youth he painted fruit and flower-pieces, but afterwards adopted landscape and cattle painting. He was much employed in ornamenting the interiors of houses, a custom prevalent in Holland; and these pictures are seldom known beyond their locality, not being to the taste of other countries, and therefore not sufficiently valuable to remove, though they are painted on canvass. He died at Haerlem in 1811.]

VINSAC, CLAUDE DOMINICK. This artist was born at Toulouse in 1749. He engraved several portraits, and designs for goldsmiths, in the dotted manner, which are neatly executed. Among the former are,

Frederick Henry Louis of Prussia; after his own design.
P. Camper, a celebrated Physician; after Pujos.

VIOLA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Bologna in 1576, and was a scholar of Annibale Caracci, whose admirable manner of painting landscape he very successfully adopted. In company with his fellow student, Francesco Albano, he visited Rome, and in conjunction with him was employed in ornamenting the palaces of the nobility, and his landscapes are frequently embellished with beautiful figures by Albano. One of the works which first brought him into repute, was a large landscape, painted for the Vigna of Cardinal Alessandro Montalto, where Paul Brill was employed at the same time, and whose pictures were then highly esteemed. The grandeur, both of the style and subject, of Viola's landscape, greatly excelled the production of the Fleming, and acquired him great reputation. Some of his most admired performances are in the saloon of Apollo, in the Villa Aldobrandini. He died at Rome in 1622. [There was another painter of the name who flourished at the same time: he was of Bergamo.]

[VISCH, MATTHIAS DE, was born at the village of Renningen in 1702. He studied under Joseph Vanden Kerkhove at Bruges, became a student of the Academy also, and obtained the first prize in 1721. He went to Paris in 1723; thence to Italy, where he remained nine years. On his return to Bruges he painted the picture of Hagar and Ismael in the Desert for the church of St. Jacques, and opened a school of design. It seems that he is remembered more for his zeal in furthering the knowledge of painting among the youth of Bruges than for any superior talent shown by him in the practice of it. He painted the portrait of Maria Teresa for the city of Bruges, and several for other communities of Flanders. He collected materials for a history of painting in Belgium, which he gave to Descamps, who made use of them for the Lives of the Flemish Painters. De Visch died in 1765, it is said from fatigue by over-exertion, on the restoration of the Academy, which had been consumed by fire, to make the students rival those of the Academy of Antwerp.]

[VISO, EL P. FR. CRISTOBAL DEL, a painter, and brother of the order of San Francisco, died at the end of the 17th century at Madrid, where he resided in quality of commissary-general of the Indies. All the saints of his order which are to be seen in the chapter-house of the convent of San Francisco, at Cordova, are by Father Viso, and show his talent.]

VISPRES, [FRANÇOIS SAVERIO,] a French painter and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1730. He engraved several portraits in mezzotint, among which are those of Louis XV. and others of the Royal Family of France. He visited London about the year 1765, where, among other prints, he engraved a portrait of the Chevalier D'Eon. [He was living ten years later.]

VISSCHER, CORNELIUS. This celebrated designer and engraver was born at Haerlem about the year 1610. He was a pupil of Peter Soutman, though he did not follow the style of that master, but adopted a manner of his own, which he carried to a perfection that has hardly been equalled. He drew with correctness and taste, and the plates that he executed from his own designs, which are esteemed the finest of his works, sufficiently attest the extent of his genius. His execution is clear and delicate, and no artist has surpassed him in the talent of harmonizing the operation of the point with that of the graver. His plates of the portrait of Gellius Bouma, the Pancake-woman, the Rat-catcher, and the Bohemian Woman, may be cited as models of perfection in that style of engraving. It will be allowed, however, that he is less successful in the plates that he executed of historical subjects, from the Italian and Flemish painters, particularly in the prints he has engraved after Rubens, which are inferior to the productions of Vorstermans, Bolswert, and Pontius. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

- A Portrait, supposed to be that of himself, with a high-crowned hat, and his hand on his breast; inscribed Corn. Visscher, fecit. anno 1649.
- Another Portrait of Cornelius Visscher, with a similar hat, and enveloped in his cloak; Corn. Visscher, fecit. anno 1651.
- Andreas Deonyszoon Winius, called the Man with the Pistol. The scarcest and most valuable of his portraits. [A proof of this portrait sold at M. Debois's sale in 1845 for 1660 francs.]
- Gellius de Bouma, Minister of the Gospel, at Zutphen; fine.
- William de Ryck, Oculist, of Amsterdam; fine. This portrait and the preceding one are commonly called the great Beards. [A proof of this sold in Debois's sale for 1020 francs.]
- Cornelius Vosbergius, pastor of Spaerwouw, with a book in his hand. 1653; fine and scarce.
- William Vanden Zande, Theologian; after Soutman; fine; and very rare.
- David Peiterz de Vries, Grand-master of Artillery to the States of Holland; scarce.
- Jacob Westerbaen, Lord of Brandwyck, &c.; very rare.
- Coppenol, called the Writing-master. 1658.
- Constantine Huygens, Lord of Zuylichem; inscribed with his motto, Constantin. 1657; scarce.
- William, Prince of Orange; after G. Honthorst. 1649.
- Mary, daughter of Charles I., his consort; after the same. 1649.
- Charles II., King of England; after the same. 1650.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Pancake-woman. The first impressions are before the address of Clement de Jonghe.

The Rat-catcher. The best impressions of this plate are before the name of Clement de Jonghe, and without the title.

The Bohemian Woman, with three Children, one of which she is suckling. In the first impressions the name of Visscher is upon the margin, at the bottom of the print. It was afterwards effaced, to make room for the inscription, and placed on the upper part of the plate.

A Boy holding a Candle, and a Girl with a Mouse-trap.
A Cat sleeping on a Napkin; fine, and extremely rare. [Called the small Cat. It is extremely rare, and the only impression ever sold was in M. Revil's collection, from which it was purchased by Mr. F. Standish for 1200 francs. It is now with his collection in the Louvre.]

A Cat sleeping, with a Rat behind her.

The Coronation of Carolus Gustavus and the Queen of Sweden.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Angel directing the Departure of Abraham; after Bassano.

Abraham's Arrival at Sichem; after the same.

Susanna and the Elders; after Guido.

Magdalene penitent; supposed to be after Parmigiano; very fine. [Not a Magdalene, but simply the head of a female of which the picture is at Hampton Court.]

The Entombing of Christ; after Tintoretto.

The Resurrection; after P. Veronese.

The Holy Family, with St. John presenting a Pear to the infant Christ; without the name of the painter.

The Last Judgment; after Rubens. The best impressions of this plate are before the address of Soutman.

The Virgin and Infant, crowned by Angels; after the same.

Achilles discovered by Ulysses at the court of Lycomedes; after the same.

The travelling Musicians; after A. Ostade; very fine.

Two Men, and a Woman holding a Glass; after the same.

The Skaters; after the same; very fine. [This is an interior with several figures near a large chimney: in front lies a pair of skates, from which the print has obtained its name.]

The Surgeon; after A. Brower.

A Man playing on the Violin, others singing; after the same.

A Landscape, called the Attack of the Convoy; after P. de Laer.

Another Landscape, called the Coach robbed; after the same.

The Lime-kiln; after the same.

A set of four Landscapes; after Berghem.

Another set of four Landscapes; after the same.

[Cornelius Visscher, the engraver, died in 1670. Though the foregoing list of his prints is rather extensive, many more might be added. Proofs of all that are enumerated are very rare, and command high prices. Some of them are incomparably fine. There were two portrait painters of the same name, but of an earlier period; one of them was drowned in his passage from Hamburg to Amsterdam, about the middle of the 16th century; of the other there are no particulars that can be relied on. A very fine collection of the works of Cornelius Visscher is in the British Museum.]

VISSCHER, JOHN, was the younger brother of Cornelius Visscher, and flourished about the year 1650. Although he did not possess the extensive talents of his brother, he has left proofs of his ability as an engraver, which rank him amongst the most eminent artists of his country. His plates are more forwarded with the point than those of Cornelius, and his style of etching is uncommonly picturesque and effective. His prints after Berghem and Ostade are among the happiest productions of the art. He also engraved several portraits, which sufficiently establish his ability in the use of the graver. Of his numerous prints, the following are the most deserving of notice:

PORTRAITS.

John de Uytenbogaert; Joh. de Visscher, sc.

Peter Prolius, Minister of the Gospel at Amsterdam.

Abraham Vander Hulst, Vice-Admiral of Holland.

Peter Paul Rubens; after Vandjck.

Michael de Ruyter, Admiral of Holland; after Berchemans.

Portrait of a Negro, holding a Bow and Arrow in his hand; after a design by Cornelius Visscher.

SUBJECTS AND LANDSCAPES AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Peasants playing at Trictrac; after A. Ostade.

A Woman spinning and a Man reeling; after the same.

Peasants dancing; called Ostade's Ball; after the same.

Peasants regaling at the door of an Ale-house; after the same.

A Country Wedding, called Ostade's Bride; after the same.

Several Peasants dancing in a Cottage, called Berghem's Ball; after Berghem. [His finest print.]

A set of four Landscapes, the Four Times of the Day; after the same.

Several sets of Landscapes with figures and animals; after the same.

A set of six plates of Figures and Animals; after K. du Jardin.

A set of four plates of various Subjects; after P. van Laer. These prints have been sometimes incorrectly attributed to Cornelius Visscher.

Several Landscapes, &c.; after Ph. Wouermans.

A set of twelve Landscapes and Views; after J. Van Goyen.

A set of twelve Landscapes and Sea-ports; after Herm. Swanevelt.

[Jan Visscher was born in 1636, at Amsterdam. Though not equal to his brother, his works are in great esteem. Some, indeed, prefer his landscapes after Berchem to those by Cornelius.]

VISSCHER, LAMBERT. According to Huber, this artist was the brother of Cornelius and John Visscher, and flourished about the year 1664. He resided several years at Rome and Florence, where, in conjunction with Cornelius Bloemaert and Francis Spierre, he engraved some plates from the paintings by Pietro da Cortona, in the palace of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. We have also some portraits by him. The following are his prints most deserving of notice:

PORTRAITS.

Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France; after Vanloo.

Anne of Austria, Queen of France; after the same.

John de Wit, Pensionary of Holland.

Cornelius Tromp, Vice-Admiral of Holland; after F. Bol.

SUBJECTS AFTER P. DA CORTONA.

Seleucus yielding Stratonice to Antiochus.

Virtue withdrawing a young Man from the embraces of Voluptuousness. One of the ceilings of the palace.

VISSCHER, NICHOLAS JOHN, an engraver and printseller, who resided at Amsterdam about the year 1600. He was probably of the same family with the artists already mentioned. We have a variety of etchings by him, executed in a spirited and masterly manner, consisting of small landscapes, with figures and animals, views, &c. He also engraved several portraits. Among others, we have the following prints by him, which are sometimes marked with a monogram, composed of a C, an I, and a V: the first letter for Claus, which is an abbreviation of Nicholas, thus, .

PORTRAITS.

Charles I., King of England, with a round hat; marked with his monogram.

William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury.

James II.
James, Duke of Monmouth.
John Calvin.
Desiderius Erasmus.

SUBJECTS.

An Allegorical subject on Human Life.
A set of Views of Country-seats in Holland.
A View of the Castle of Lovensteyn, which was used as a state prison for Hogerheets and Grotius. On each side of the plate are medallions exhibiting the legends of the two illustrious prisoners; scarce.

He also engraved after Jodocus Momper, and other masters.

[VISSCHER, THEODORE, a landscape and animal painter, born at Haerlem in 1650, studied under Nicholas Berchem, but afterwards went to Italy, where, from his drunken habits, he acquired the name of Slempop. Some of his pictures, however, are painted in a superior manner, and resemble those of his first instructor; others are the productions of ebriety and negligence. He died, according to some writers, in 1699, and according to others, in 1707.]

[VISSIELLET, M——, an engraver, respecting whom history is silent; it is conjectured from his name that he was a native of France, and from his works that he lived about the commencement of the 17th century. Dumesnil, tom. iii., has enumerated forty-three of subjects from the New Testament, and of Apostles and Saints. They are engraved in a coarse manner, and with little variety, resembling the wood-cuts of J. Stella, of which they seem to be a repetition. Some are signed MV. F., and one has the name M. Vissellet, F.]

VITALBA, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He was a pupil of Wagner, whose style he imitated. In 1765 he came to England, and engraved several plates for Mr. Boydell. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

Cupid, with two Satyrs; after Agostino Caracci.

A pair, Spring and Summer; after Fil. Lauri.

Herodias with the Head of St. John; after L. Pasinelli.

[He was living in 1790.]

[VITALI, ALESSANDRO, born at Urbino in 1580, was a scholar and imitator of Federico Barocci. He copied for the convent della Torre the Annunciation of Loreto in such a manner that it might be taken for the original. Barocci was pleased with his talent, and willingly retouched some of his pictures; it is supposed that he assisted him in this way in the St. Agnes and St. Agostino, placed by Vitali, one in the Duomo, the other in the church of the Eremitani, where he may be said to surpass himself. He died in 1630.]

VITALI, CANDIDO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1680. He was brought up in the school of Carlo Cignani, and was advised by his instructor, who was always attentive to the particular genius of his disciples, to devote himself to painting animals, birds, flowers, and fruit. His pictures of those subjects were greatly admired at Bologna, and through all Italy, for the delicacy of his touch, the beauty of his colouring, and the tasteful arrangement of his compositions. He died in 1753.

VITALI, GIOSEFFO. This artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1700. He was a scholar of Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole, and painted history with some reputation. There are several of his works in the churches at Bologna, of which the most worthy of notice are, a picture of the Annunciation, in the church of S. Antonio; S. Petronio, in SS. Sebastiano e Rocco; and the Martyrdom of S. Cecilia, in the church dedicated to that saint.

VITE, [VITI, or VITA,] TIMOTEO DELLA, DA URBINO. This painter was born at Urbino in 1470, but was educated at Bologna under Francesco Francia, with whom he remained until he was twenty-six years of age, when he returned to Urbino, and had given proof of great ability, when the fame acquired by Raffaele, his countryman and relation, by his great works in the Vatican, induced him to visit Rome, where his talents recommended him to the particular favour of that illustrious artist. Lanzi informs us that Raffaele engaged him to assist him in painting the celebrated Sibyls, in the church of La Pace, and was so satisfied with his performance, that he permitted him to retain the cartoons. His residence at Rome was not of long duration, and he returned to Urbino, where, in conjunction with Girolamo Genga, he executed several important works for the cathedral, and other public edifices in his native city. Siena and Forli also possess some of his most considerable works. His first style retained somewhat of the dry and Gothic manner of Francia, as is evident in his earliest works at Urbino, after his return from Bologna; but by his connexion with Raffaele, and his attentive study of his works, he became a graceful and correct designer, though he never possessed great powers of invention, nor a bold and vigorous execution. His most esteemed productions are, his picture of the Conception, in the church of the Osservanti, at Urbino; and Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, in S. Angelo, at Cagli. He died in 1524. [Of his style of design and composition, a specimen may be seen in Rosini, plate 90, taken from a picture in the Milan Gallery: it represents the Virgin standing between St. John the Baptist and St. Sebastian, in a landscape. That he was a disciple of Francia is proved by the following extracts from that master's journal: "1490, 8 Luglio, Timoteo Vita preso in nostra Botega. 1495, addi 4 Aprile, Partito il mio caro Timoteo, che Dio le dia ogni bene, e fortuna."—It is probable that he was a relation of Raphael.]

VITE, [VITI, or VITA,] PIETRO DELLA, is believed to have been the brother of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, who was probably his instructor in the art, as he painted history in a similar style, though very inferior to him. Lanzi conjectures that this is the artist mentioned by Baldinucci by the denomination of Il Prete di Urbino, who was a relative, and one of the heirs of Raffaele.

VITE, GIOVANNI DELLA. See MIEL.

[VITRINGA, WIGERUS, but generally called William, was a marine painter, who flourished from the middle to the end of the 17th century. Balkema and Immerzeel say he was born at Leuwarde in 1657, and the former says he died in 1721. Other writers say he was living in 1744. There must be error in these dates, as there are drawings by him, with his name, dated 1652. His style of painting fluctuates between those of Backhuysen, who is supposed to have instructed him, and William Van de Velde; and sometimes resembles that of Riet-schoof, but does not appear to be the result of servile imitation. His storms are sometimes excellent. This approximation to other masters is perhaps the cause that his pictures are not easily recognised, and they seldom have his name. His drawings, in Indian ink washed with bistre, are better understood; they have his name, and are frequently dated. It is said that he was a Jurisconsult, therefore a man of education; but, from his numerous drawings and paintings, it would seem that he devoted more time to the arts than to the study of the law.]

VITUS, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, born about the year 1536. The circumstances of his life are little known. He is supposed to have been instructed in engraving by Agostino Veneziano, called de Musis, whose style he imitated with some success. In the prime of life he became a religious of the monastery of Valombrosa, in the Apennines. We have by him several prints, executed with the graver, among which are the following :

St. Bartholomew ; inscribed, Dom. Vitus ordinis Valisumbrosæ Monachus excidit Romæ. 1576.

St. Joachim holding a Censer ; after A. del Sarto.

Jupiter and Calisto ; inscribed, Dominicus V. F.

A River God ; after the antique.

A set of small plates, representing the Passion of our Saviour, with borders, ornamented with birds, beasts, &c.

A set of plates from the Antique Statues ; Dom. Vitus, fec.

VIVARES, FRANCIS. This artist was a native of France, but he passed the greater part of his life in England. He was born at Montpellier about the year 1712, and was indebted for his principal instruction in design and engraving, to J. B. Chate-lain, after his arrival in London. Being a man of considerable genius, he improved upon the style of his instructor, and became one of the most eminent engravers of landscape of his time. He was particularly successful in his plates after the works of Claude Lorraine, and his prints preserve much of the air and picturesque beauty which distinguish the productions of that admirable painter. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

A set of four Views of Ruins ; after J. Smith.

Eight Views in Derbyshire ; after Thos. Smith of Derby.

A Landscape, called the Hop-gatherers ; after Geo. Smith.

A Landscape ; after Gainsborough.

A View in Holland, by moonlight ; after Vander Neer.

A Land-storm ; after Gaspar Poussin.

A Tempest, with the history of Jonas ; after the same.

A Landscape, Morning ; after Claude Lorraine.

The Companion, Evening ; after the same.

The Enchanted Castle ; after the same.

A View in the Environs of Naples ; after the same.

[Francis Vivares was the son of a tailor, and was for some time employed in that occupation. His principal works are after Claude, and show good taste in the selection and execution. His pieces amount to about one hundred and fifty. He died at London in 1782, and is ranked among the English engravers, much to the mortification of the French.]

[VIVARINI, ANTONIO, called also DA MURANO, of which place he was a native. He flourished about the middle of the fifteenth century, as appears by pictures dated 1444 and 1451. He occasionally painted in conjunction with his brother Bartolomeo, and Zuan, or Giovanni, Alamanno ; some of these, altar-pieces, exist at Venice, and are rich in colouring, resembling the style of Bellini in that particular ; in others, in which Giovanni had no share, the colouring is pale, with a strong preponderance of blue and white. From this circumstance it is presumed that the former were coloured solely by the German. Plate 61, in Rosini, gives a favourable impression of his skill as a designer, both in architecture and the figure ; the Virgin and Child in the central compartment are natural and elegant. His brother, BARTOLOMEO, one of whose pictures, dated 1465, is in the royal gallery at Naples, was more licentious in his arrangements and accessories, and more ornamental in his draperies, as may be seen in plate 67 of Rosini. He painted also in conjunction with Marco Basaiti ; a large altar-piece, begun by Bartolomeo and finished by his coadjutor, is in S. Maria de' Frari, at Venice. It represents, in the upper part, The Coronation of the Virgin, and in the lower, St. Ambrose, surrounded by several other Saints ; and is considered a severe but beautiful and dignified work. Of the decease of these brothers there is no published record on which reliance can be placed, but it is said that Bartolomeo lived to the end of the century.]

VIVERONI, F. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of some very indifferent views in Ireland.

VIVIANI. See CODAGORA.

[VIVIANI, OTTAVIO, a painter of architecture and perspectives, was born at Brescia, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He is frequently confounded with Viviani Codagora, who lived about the same time, and painted similar subjects, but in a superior manner. Codagora studied in the Roman school, Ottavio in the Venetian. His instructor in architecture and perspective was Tommaso Sandrini, and in landscape he received lessons from Agostino Tassi at Genoa. His smaller pictures, as is usual with this class of painters, are made up of the remains of ancient ruins, selected and arranged for picturesque effect, in which he shows judgment and taste ; but sometimes the composition is too much crowded, and perhaps overloaded with ornament. He was excellent in figures, and used them with great advantage in showing the relative height of objects. There is great variety in his colouring, too much for perfect harmony ; but, on the whole, the effect is striking, and such pictures being intended for mere decoration, their richness does not offend. His knowledge of perspective is exhibited on all occasions, and his chiaro-scuro assists the illusion, but time has embrowned his shadows, and given too solemn a gloom to his temples and lengthened arcades. The exact time of his decease is not known ; it is placed by different writers in different years, confounding him with Codagora.]

VIVIEN, JOSEPH, a French painter, born at Lyons in 1657. He was brought up under Charles Le Brun, and, for some time, painted portraits in oil, with considerable success. But he afterwards adopted painting in crayons, which he carried to a perfection unknown before him, and established a reputation which will probably survive the transient and perishable nature of the vehicle of his talent. The merit of his portraits was not confined to a perfect resemblance ; his heads exhibited an uncommon appearance of life and nature, and an admirable expression. His carnations were fresh and pure, his touch vigorous and spirited, and the general tone of his pictures was tender and harmonious. He occasionally accompanied his portraits with historical or emblematical subjects, illustrative of the character or history of his model ; in which he did credit to the school in which he was educated. He passed the latter part of his life in the service of the Elector of Bavaria, for whom he painted some of his best pictures. His portrait, by himself, is placed among the distinguished artists in the Florentine Gallery. He died in 1735. [His portrait of the great Fenelon, author of Telemachus, is in the Louvre. His countrymen called him the French Van Dyck ; he was so.]

VIVIER, JOHN DU. This artist was born at Liege in 1687, but chiefly resided at Paris, where he was received into the Academy in 1718. He particularly excelled in engraving dies for medals, and was appointed medallist to Louis XV. in 1735. We have also a few plates by him, which are executed in a neat, clear style; among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Bartholet Flemael, Painter.

Peter de Gouges, Advocate in Parliament; after Tournaire.

SUBJECTS.

The Entombing of Christ; after A. van Heuvel.

The Temptation of St. Anthony; after the same.

The Dutch Cook; after the same.

[John or Jean Du Vivier, the medallist, and G. De Vivier, or Du Vivier, the engraver, were different persons; the last three prints quoted above belong to the latter. Jean Du Vivier, born in 1687, could not have engraved prints published before 1666, and they appear in the catalogue of M. de Marolles of that date. Though these prints are inscribed with the name of Van Heuvel, two of them are after Teniers. It is curious that Du Vivier should have put the name of Van Heuvel to these, and then put forth etchings in the manner of Teniers, marked with that artist's monogram; it is, however, fact that he did so. What personal pronoun the letter G stands for is not ascertained; but the engravings signed G. De Vivier are Dutch, not French.

The following are described by Robert Dumesnil, in "Le Peintre Graveur," tom. iii. :

1. Christ in the Sepulchre; Anton. van Heuvel invent. ; G. de Vivier, fecit. Four verses in Dutch, beginning, "Hier is het leven soet."
2. The Four Evangelists, in one piece, no mark.
3. The Temptation of St. Anthony; Anton. van Heuvel invent. ; G. de Vivier fecit.
4. Thetis and Chiron; the Centaur holding the infant Achilles in his arms; no mark.
5. A Flemish Kitchen; Ant. V. Heuvel pinxit ; G. du Vivier fecit.
6. The Flageolet Player; no mark.
7. The Tippler; in the manner of Rembrandt; no mark.
8. A Landscape outside of a fortified city; a winter scene. Many figures are skating, and otherwise amusing themselves on the ice; persons of condition, in coaches and on foot, dressed in the costume of the time of Louis XIII., or the minority of Louis XIV., are looking on; no mark.

VLERICK, PETER. This painter was born at Courtray in 1539. He was the son of a lawyer, who, perceiving his inclination for the art, placed him under the tuition of William Snellaert, a painter in distemper, with whom he only continued a short time. The reputation of Charles d'Ypres, an able designer and painter of history, who had studied in Italy, induced him to leave his first instructor, and to become his disciple. The morose and capricious disposition of that master prevented his remaining with him longer than two years; but he had already made sufficient progress in the art to undertake a journey to Italy on the produce of his talents. He travelled through France, and met with such encouragement, during a short residence in Paris, that he was enabled to proceed to Venice, where he entered the school of Il Tintoretto. Aided by the advice and example of that able artist, he acquired an admirable style of colouring, and a prompt and vigorous execution.

Descamps reports, that Tintoretto held the talents of Vlerick in such estimation, that he offered him his daughter in marriage; but his desire of visiting

Rome, and his attachment to his native country, prevented his accepting the proposal. After a residence of four years at Venice, he proceeded to Rome, where he applied himself, with uncommon assiduity, in designing from the antique, and studying the works of the best masters. During his residence at Rome, he executed some considerable works in conjunction with Girolamo Muziano. In 1568 he returned to Flanders, and established himself at Tournay, where he resided the remainder of his life. Van Mander, who was his disciple, mentions the following as his principal works, and states him to have been an artist of great ability. The Brazen Serpent; Judith with the Head of Holofernes; the Four Evangelists; and the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary and St. John. He died in 1581.

ULFT, JACOB VANDER. This painter was born at Gorcum about the year 1627. It is not known under whom he studied the art, but his first occupation appears to have been painting on glass; and there are some windows executed by him in the churches of Gorcum, and in Guelderland, which are little inferior to the works of the celebrated brothers, Dirk and Wouter Crabeth, in the beauty and vivacity of the colouring. He afterwards distinguished himself as a painter of historical pictures, of a cabinet size, which are ingeniously composed, and the small figures, with which they generally abound, are correctly drawn, and touched with great neatness and spirit. From the subjects and scenery he represented, it would be presumed that he had resided some time at Rome, but it is satisfactorily ascertained, by the Dutch biographers, that he never was out of Holland. His pictures usually represent subjects of the Roman History, processions, and markets, in which he introduced the most remarkable views in Rome and the vicinity. He was perfectly acquainted with perspective and architecture, and copied this scenery from the best prints and drawings he could meet with, which he selected with judgment and taste. His works are generally crowded with figures, tastefully grouped, and in their respective habiliments he showed a marked attention to the propriety of costume. As his pictures are very highly finished, and his time was much occupied by the duties of his office, (being one of the burgomasters of the city,) his works are rarely to be met with, and are scarcely known except in Holland, where they are highly esteemed. [His drawings, of which there are several in England, are more pleasing than his pictures, the latter being too florid, and so highly laboured as to appear like painting on glass. It is said that he painted a view of London Bridge and the parts adjacent, the river covered with boats. The exact time of his death is not known, but some say in 1679.]

VLEIEGER, SIMON DE, was born at Amsterdam about the year 1612, and acquired a considerable reputation as a painter of sea-pieces and landscapes; although it is not known by whom he was instructed. He had the credit of being the master of William van de Velde, the younger, and, though his merit was eclipsed by the brilliant talents of his disciple, his pictures are deservedly placed in the choicest collections. We have a few etchings by this artist, representing views in Holland, and rural subjects, executed in a spirited and masterly style.

[Simon de Vlieger was really a very clever master, and deserves more notice than has been bestowed on him. Like Vangoyen, he is judged by his inferior productions, or by pictures that have been injured by time in their colouring, or by injudicious cleaning. His selections are picturesque, his compositions are not crowded with unnecessary objects, his execution is remarkably free, and in the representation of the effects of a gale, or fresh breeze, he approaches the grandeur of Ruisdael. Unfortunately his colours, in many instances, have faded, or vanished altogether, particularly in the sky, so that his pictures appear cold or murky; still a master-mind and hand may be discerned. Bartsch has described, P. G., tom. i., twenty etchings by him of landscapes, rivers, canals, and animals; some of these approach the style of Waterloo. The time of his death is not ascertained; one of his etchings has the date 1642.]

VLIET, JOHN GEORGE VAN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Delft in 1610, and was one of the numerous disciples of Rembrandt. Of his works as a painter little is known; but we have a considerable number of prints by him, which are executed in imitation of the style of his master. His plates amount to about ninety, most of which are from the designs of Rembrandt, a few after J. Lievens, and some from his own designs. They produce a surprising effect; the lights being broad and clear, and the shadows dark. His drawing is very incorrect, and his draperies clumsy and mannered. Notwithstanding these defects, the prints by Van Vliet are held in considerable estimation. He sometimes signed them with his name, and sometimes used the monogram . The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS AND HEADS; AFTER REMBRANDT.

- Bust of a Man, with his face in shadow. 1634.
- Bust of an old Man, with a turban and aigrette.
- The Head of a Warrior.
- An old Man with his hands joined, apparently in great affliction. 1634.
- Bust of an Oriental Character, with a fur cap.
- An Old Woman reading. One of his best prints.

SUBJECTS AFTER REMBRANDT.

- Lot and his Daughters; very fine.
- The Baptism of the Eunuch.
- St. Jerome praying in a cavern, with a book and a crucifix. This is the finest print.

SUBJECTS AFTER J. LIEVENS.

- Jacob obtaining his Father's Blessing instead of Esau.
- Susanna and the Elders.
- The Resurrection of Lazarus.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

- An Assembly of Peasants regaling.
- The Rat-catcher.
- A set of twenty-two plates of the Arts and Trades.

VLIET, HENRY VAN. This painter was born at Delft in 1608, and was instructed in the art by his uncle, William van Vliet, a reputable portrait painter. For some time he practised portraiture, but afterwards distinguished himself as a painter of perspective and views of the interior of churches and temples, in the style of Emanuel De Wit, which are frequently represented by torch-light, and produce a picturesque and pleasing effect. They are decorated with figures neatly and correctly drawn. [He painted portraits in the manner of Mireveldt, and scenes by moonlight; but his best works are interiors of churches, more by daylight than torch-light, and only inferior to De Wit. The date of his birth is uncertain; it is said that he died in 1646, which is equally so.]

[VLIET, WILLIAM VAN, born at Delft in 1584, painted historical subjects and portraits: his works are very little known. He died in 1642.]

ULIVELLI, COSIMO, was born at Florence in 1625, and was a disciple of Baldassare Franceschini, called Il Volterrano. He was a successful follower of the style of his instructor; and Lanzi observes, that he painted history so much in the manner of Franceschini, that his works have been sometimes mistaken for those of that master, though, to the intelligent observer, they will appear less elegant in the forms, less chaste and effective in the colouring, and mannered and laboured in the execution. [He died in 1704.]

ULRIC, JOHN. This artist was a native of Germany, and is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as a very skilful engraver on wood, in the manner distinguished by the appellation of chiaro-scuro. Baron Heineken conjectures that he lived before Ugo da Carpi, and prior to the commencement of the sixteenth century; but the style of composition, the drawing, and the execution of his prints, render it more probable that he flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century, and he apparently formed his taste by studying the works of the Italian masters. He usually marked his prints with a monogram formed of an I. and V. separated by two swords crossing each other, between which is a small tree . Among others we have the following cuts by him:

- A Naked Figure shooting Arrows at a Snake which is entwined round an Infant.
- A Knight armed by his Esquire.
- The Crucifixion.

[See the article PILGRIM, JOHN ULRIC. It is not so certain that he was a native of Germany; it is probable that he was an Italian. It would require a long dissertation, if the question were entered into, and probably with no very satisfactory result. As at present advised, it may be safer to let the matter rest: those more interested than we are may recommence the battle; we will join the victors, and woe to the vanquished! It is a mistake to say there are two swords in the tablet; they are two peaceable pilgrim staves, and are improperly represented in the cut.]

ULRICK, HENRY, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1590. We have by him a few portraits, executed in a stiff, formal style, and a small circular print, representing the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary and St. John. [He was a publisher as well as an engraver, and operated from 1590 to 1628. He was of Nuremberg; there is a series of twelve circular prints by him, and several others.]

UMBACH, JONAS. This artist is mentioned by Baron Heineken as a German painter and engraver, but his works are not specified.

[Jonas Umbach was born at Augsburg in 1624, and died in 1680, according to Zani, but Brulliot says in 1700. He was an historical painter, and engraver. There are a great number of small etchings by him, executed with a broad point and very spirited. Many have his name in full, and others only his monogram. The most complete catalogue of his prints is that by Winkler. Some of his pictures and designs have been engraved by others; as he made many drawings for goldsmiths and booksellers. There was a younger Jonas, but there are no particulars respecting him, except that he drew portraits.]

VOEIRIOT, ———. See WOEIRIOT.

VOERST, ROBERT VANDER. This artist was born at Arnheim about the year 1596. His style of engraving resembles that of Giles Sadeler, and his plates are executed with the graver in a clear, neat manner. He visited England when he was young, as he engraved a considerable number of English portraits, and his latest works in that country are dated 1635. Vanderdoort, who mentions him three or four times in King Charles's Catalogue, expressly calls him the king's engraver, for whom he executed two plates, one of his Majesty's sister, the other from Vandyck's picture, of the Emperor Otho, painted to supply the loss of one of Titian's Cæsars. We have, among others, the following portraits by him :

Charles I. and his Queen; on one plate; after Vandyck.
Prince Rupert.
James Stewart, Duke of Lennox; after Geldorp.
Robert, Earl of Lindsey; after Mirevelt.
Philip, Earl of Pembroke; after Vandyck.
Ernest, Count Mansfeld; after the same.
Simon Vouet, Painter; after the same.
His own Portrait; after the same.
Edward, Lord Littleton.
James, Marquis of Hamilton.
Henry Rich, Earl of Holland.
William Fielding, Earl of Denbigh.

[To these may be added,

Sir Kenelm Digby; after Van Dyck.
Inigo Jones; very fine; after the same.
Christian, Duke of Brunswick; after the same.
Sir George Carew; after the same.
Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia; after Gerard Honthorst.

Zani places his birth in 1610, and his death in 1669.]

VOET, ALEXANDER, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1613, and, from his style, is supposed to have been a pupil of Paul Pontius. His graver is sufficiently neat, but his drawing is incorrect, and he is very inferior to his model in the general effect of his prints. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after Rubens.
The Holy Family returning from Egypt; after the same.
The Virgin and Infant, to whom Angels are presenting Fruit; after the same.
The Martyrdom of St. Andrew; after the same.
Seneca in the Bath; after the same.
The Entombing of Christ; after Vandyck.
Folly, holding a Cat; after Jordaens.
The Card-players; after De Vos.

VOET, CHARLES BOSCHART. This painter was born at Zwolle in 1670, and was instructed in the rudiments of design by his elder brother, who, though he was not a professional artist, had learned drawing, for the purpose of assisting him in his studies of botany and natural history; and was a correct designer of flowers, plants, and insects. Having made considerable progress under his brother, he applied himself to an attentive study of those objects from nature, and became one of the most eminent artists of his time. Descamps asserts, that his talents recommended him to the protection of the Earl of Portland, whom he accompanied to England, and was much employed by that nobleman, as well as by King William III. He is not, however, mentioned in the Anecdotes, and it is more probable, that though he was taken into the service of that monarch, he continued to reside in Holland, as he was chiefly employed in decorating the palace at Loo. He painted flowers, fruit, plants, birds, and objects of still-life, which were designed with correctness and precision, and very highly finished. He died at the Hague in 1745.

VOGEL, BERNARD, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1683. He chiefly resided at Augsbourg, where he engraved several portraits, some of which are executed with the graver, and others in mezzotinto. Among others are the following :

John Kupetzky, Painter. 1737. [Of which Laborde has given a fac simile.]
Christopher Weigel, Engraver; after Kupetzky. 1735.

[It is said that he died in 1737.]

VOGHTER, HENRY, a German engraver on wood, who, according to Professor Christ, was born at Strasburg about the year 1507. He is said to have imitated the style of Albert Durer with some success. He executed the cuts for a drawing-book, entitled "A Book of the extraordinary and marvellous Art, very useful to all Painters, Sculptors, Goldsmiths," &c., printed at Strasburg in 1540. [According to Zani, he was born in 1497, and died in 1537. But there was another wood engraver of the same name and family, and called the younger, who was born in 1513, and operated in 1545.]

VOISARD, STEPHEN CLAUDE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1746, and was a pupil of B. Baron. He engraved some plates after the French painters, and we have by him a neat copy of the Battle of La Hogue, by Woollett, on a smaller scale.

VOLANT. This artist is mentioned by Papillon as a native of France, and an engraver on wood. He has not specified any of his works. [There were two engravers on wood, Antoine Voulant, who operated in 1564, and George, who was living in 1600; nothing further is said of them.]

VOLIGNY, ———. Florent Le Comte mentions this artist as an engraver, but his principal talent was drawing portraits with a pen, which he afterwards washed with India ink, in a soft and delicate manner, which were greatly admired. [This probably means Voligny de Tonneres, an engraver, who died in 1699.]

[VOLKAERT, NICHOLAS and KLAASZ, father and son, painters of Haerlem, flourished in the 15th century; the elder about 1450, the younger from 1480 to the end. They painted chiefly in distemper, after the ancient manner, and were accounted good artists for the time. They also made designs for the glass painters, as the name occasionally occurs on fragments of windows that perhaps formerly belonged to convents, or churches that no longer exist, and which have been imported in large quantities by Jews, and other brokers of no particular religion.]

[VOLLERDT, or VOLLAERT, JOHN CHRISTIAN, or CHRISTOPHER, born at Leipsic, was a scholar of Alexander Thiele. It is supposed that he was the painter of small landscapes, views on the Rhine and in Switzerland, somewhat in the manner of Schutz, enlivened with figures and animals. Many of them were imported about twenty years ago by the traffickers in moderate-priced pictures, and were sufficiently pleasing to find a ready sale. He died in 1769, in his 61st year. Some of his pictures have been engraved.]

VOLLEVENS, JOHN. This painter was born at Gertruydenberg in 1649. He was first a scholar of Nicholas Maas, but his principal improvement was derived from his studies under John de Baan, one of the most eminent portrait painters in Holland, with whom he remained eight years, and, after the death of that master, succeeded to the greater part of his practice, and became one of the most popular and most employed artists of his time. The Prince of Courland, and the Prince of Nassau, Stadtholder of Friesland, were among his particular patrons. His portraits have the merit of a perfect resemblance, his colouring is clear and chaste, and his touch bold and free. He died at the Hague in 1728. [His son, of the same name, was also a good portrait painter, but there are no particulars respecting him, except that it is supposed he was a short time in England.]

VOLPATO, GIOVANNI, a modern Italian designer and engraver, born at Bassano about the year 1738. He went to Venice when he was young, where, according to Huber, he received some instruction from Bartolozzi, and engraved several plates after Piazzetta, Maiotto, Amiconi, Zuccarelli, M. Ricci, and others. He afterwards visited Rome, where his talents found a wider field. Gavin Hamilton employed him to engrave several of the plates for his Schola Italica Picturæ; and he was the principal artist employed in the execution of the splendid set of coloured prints, from the works of Raffaele, in the Vatican, and in various other considerable publications. Among his most esteemed works are the following:

PLATES ENGRAVED FOR THE COLLECTION OF
G. HAMILTON.

The four Sibyls; from the paintings by Raffaele, in the church of S. Maria della Pace.
The Marriage of Alexander and Roxana; after Raffaele.
Modesty and Vanity; after L. da Vinci.
Perseus and Andromeda; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.
Christ praying on the Mount; after Coreggio.
Mary Magdalene at the feet of Christ, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; after P. Veronese.
The Marriage of Cana; after Tintoretto.
The Gamesters; after M. Angelo da Caravaggio.

SUBJECTS AFTER GAVIN HAMILTON.

The Death of Lucretia.
Innocence.
Juno.
Hebe.
Melancholy.
Gaiety.

ILLUMINATED PRINTS AFTER THE PAINTINGS
BY RAFFAELLE.

The School of Athens.
The Dispute on the Sacrament.
Heliiodorus driven from the Temple of Jerusalem.
Attila stopped by the appearance of St. Peter and St. Paul.
St. Peter delivered from Prison.
Mount Parnassus.
The Burning of the Borgo Vecchio.
The Miracle of the Mass at Bolsena. This plate was engraved by his disciple Raphael Morghen.

A variety of other works, consisting of the most remarkable views in and near Rome, and other subjects. [He signed some of his early prints Giovanni Renard, either as a play on his name, or to signify his own astuteness.]

VOLTERRA, DANIELE RICCIARELLI, called DI. The family name of this distinguished artist was Ricciarelli, but he is more generally designated by that of Daniele di Volterra, from the place of his birth. He was born in 1609, and was first a disciple of Giovanni Antonio Razzi, called Il Sodoma, but he afterwards studied under Baldassare Peruzzi. Not meeting with the encouragement he expected in his native city, he went to Rome, and was first employed as a coadjutor to Pierino del Vaga, in the Vatican, and in the Capella Massimi, in the church of La Trinità de Monti. He was, however, chiefly indebted for the reputation he afterwards acquired to the friendship and instruction of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, who assisted him with his designs for the works he executed for Agostino Chigi, in the Farnesina, and others of his most celebrated productions. But the chief monument of his fame was the series of frescoes he executed in the Capella Orsini, in the church of La Trinità de Monti, which occupied him seven years, representing the History of the Cross. In these he is said to have been greatly aided by the stupendous powers of Buonaroti. The principal painting was the much-famed Deposition from the Cross, which, after the Transfiguration, by Raffaele, and the Communion of St. Jerome, by Domenichino, was universally considered the finest picture at Rome. Of this sublime production, the world of art has been deprived by the ignorance and barbarism of the spoliators of Europe. Desirous of removing one of the greatest ornaments of Rome to their receptacle of robbery and plunder, they attempted to detach the plaster from the wall, when the whole crumbled to pieces. Of the grandeur of the composition, the boldness of the design, and the admirable expression in the heads of the fainting mother of Christ, and the holy women who support her, some idea may be formed from the fine print engraved from it, by Dorigny. In another chapel of the same church is the Assumption of the Virgin, and the Presentation in the Temple, painted from the designs of Daniele di Volterra, by his disciples Gio. Paolo Rossetti and Michele Alberti. After the death of del Vaga, in 1547, he was appointed, by Pope Paul III., by the recommendation of Michael Angelo Buonaroti, superintendent of the works in the Vatican, and employed to finish the ornaments of the Sala Regia, which had been begun by Pierino.

His last great work, as a painter, was his celebrated picture of the Murder of the Innocents, for the church of St. Peter, at Volterra, which was afterwards purchased by the Grand Duke Leopold, and placed in the tribune of the gallery at Florence.

On the death of Pope Paul III., in 1549, Julius III., who succeeded, divested Daniele of his employment of superintendent of the Vatican, and his pension, and it appears that the latter part of his life was chiefly devoted to sculpture.

Pope Paul IV., from religious scruples, having considered the Last Judgment of M. Angelo Buonaroti unsuitable to the sanctity of the place, on account of the nudity of some of the figures, had determined on destroying the work, when Daniele was prevailed on to undertake to clothe the exceptional figures, out of respect for that distinguished performance. He died at Rome in 1566.

VOLTERRANO, IL. See FRANCESCHINI.

[VONCK, or VONCK, C——, an artist of great talent, who painted birds, quadrupeds, and objects of still-life, in the manner of Melchior Hondokoeter and Francis Snyders. There is no satisfactory account of him; but his works are found in some of the richest collections. In the Dresden Gallery there is a landscape by Jacob Ruisdael with birds beautifully painted by Vonck; this gives some idea of the period in which he flourished. His pictures are also described in various old catalogues, and on all occasions with commendation for correctness of design, and beauty of colouring. It is probable that some of the pictures about which persons of discernment hesitate when they find them attributed to Snyders and Hondokoeter, are by Vonck; but dealers are so jealous of the reputation of great masters, that they credit them with every picture that has a resemblance to their known works. Pity that amateurs do not prefer merit to name, and spare themselves the vexation of a discovery that they have courted imposition by their preference. There was another painter of the name, who resided at Middchourg about 1750; he also painted birds, and still-life subjects in the manner of Artus Schoumans, of whom he was probably a scholar. He was living in 1778.]

[VOOGD, HENDRIK, a landscape painter, born at Amsterdam about 1766, was a scholar of Juriaan Andriessen, and a protégé of M. D. Versteeg. He was furnished by the latter with the means of visiting Italy, where he painted some of the most beautiful scenery. One of his pictures which he sent to the Societé des Sciences, at Haerlem, obtained for him a pension of fifty ducats per annum for three years. Thus encouraged, he continued his studies with assiduity till he was acknowledged to be the principal landscape painter at Rome, and designated the Dutch Claude. At intervals he sent pictures to the exhibitions at Amsterdam, two of which were particularly admired, representing the environs of Rome; these were exhibited in 1810 and 1814. Whether he ever revisited his native country does not appear: he died at Rome in 1839.]

VOORHOUT, JOHN. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1647. He was the son of a watchmaker, who, perceiving his disposition for drawing, placed him under the care of Constantine Verhout [or Verhout] of Gouda, a painter of conversations and gallant assemblies, with whom he passed six years; but an ambition to distinguish himself in a higher department of the art, induced him to return to Amsterdam, where he became a disciple of John van Noort, who had acquired some reputation as a painter of history and portraits, under whom he studied five years.

In 1672, when the French army entered Holland, Voorhout took refuge at Frederickstadt, and from thence removed to Hamburg, where he met with very flattering encouragement, both in painting portraits and historical subjects. After an absence of three years, tranquillity having been established in the Low Countries, the solicitations of his friends, and the desire of revisiting his native country, induced him to return to Holland, and his success was not less encouraging than it had been at Hamburg. He painted the portraits of the principal personages of the city, and was commissioned to paint several historical subjects, by which he acquired great reputation; among which was a picture of the Death of Sophonisba, which has been celebrated by the Dutch poet Smidt. Voorhout is ranked, by Descamps, among the ablest painters of his country; the subjects he selected from the Greek and Roman history were noble and elevated, and he treated them with propriety and judgment. His pictures are found in the choicest collections in Holland. [The Dutch writers are not agreed respecting the date of his decease. Some say in 1700, others in 1710. But, to make it more difficult, they mention two brothers of the name, whom they distinguish as Voorhout the elder and Voorhout the younger, and say they both painted in the same manner, without mentioning what manner of subjects they painted. They add, the elder died in 1723, and his brother, Jan, in 1749.]

[VOORT, or VOERST, CORNELIUS VANDER, a portrait painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1580. His pictures are mentioned with commendation for skill in the arrangement, and freshness in the colouring. It is said that he died in 1632. The capricious manner of the Dutch painters in signing their names, or of their biographers in writing them, renders it very difficult to ascertain which artist is meant, or to whom a work is to be apportioned under the appellation Vander Voort, Voerst, Voorst, Voors, or

Vervoort, which are frequently used indiscriminately.]

VOÛRT, M. VANDER. The name of this artist is affixed to a spirited etching, representing boys playing with musical instruments. It is apparently the work of a painter, and exhibits considerable ability. [This is probably Michael Vervoort, a painter and engraver, who flourished about 1745.]

VORSTERMAN, LUCAS, THE ELDER. This eminent engraver was born at Antwerp about the year 1580, and at first studied painting in the great school of Rubens; but was afterwards advised, by his illustrious preceptor, to devote himself entirely to engraving. No painter had the satisfaction of seeing so great a number of his best works so finely engraved as Rubens. He was surrounded by artists of the greatest ability, who worked immediately under his eye, and who had the advantage of his assistance and advice, which contributed, in no small degree, to the beauty and excellence of their prints. Of these, no one has more successfully engraved from the designs of Rubens, than Lucas Vorsterman. His drawing is correct, and the characters of his heads full of expression. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with great facility, though he was always more attentive to the general effect, than to the neatness and regularity of the execution; and, in his best prints, he has transcribed with surprising fidelity the life and spirit of the original paintings. His plate of the Adoration of the Magi, after Rubens, is regarded as one of the finest productions of the art. He visited England in the reign of Charles I., where he resided eight years, from 1623 to 1631, and was employed by that monarch and the Earl of Arundel. Vorsterman usually signed his plates with his name, but he sometimes used a cipher composed of an L. and a V. joined together thus, V. His prints are very numerous, of which the following are the most esteemed:

PORTRAITS AFTER VANDYCK.

Charles I., King of England.
Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel.
Isabella Clara Eugenia, Infanta of Spain.
Gaston, Duke of Orleans.
Ambrose Spinola, Governor of the Low Countries.
Wolfgang William, Duke of Bavaria.
Francis de Moncade, Count of Ossone.
Nicholas Rockox, a Magistrate of Antwerp.
Anthony Vandyck, Painter.
Peter de Jode, the elder, Engraver.
Charles de Mallerie, Engraver.
James Callet, Engraver.
Theodore Galle, Engraver.
Wenceslaus Koeberger, Painter.
Deodatus Delmont, Painter.
Peter Steevens, Amateur, of Antwerp.
John Van Mildert, Statuary.
Hubert Vanden Enden, Painter.
Lucas Van Uden, Painter.
Cornelius Sachtleven, Painter.
Orazio Gentileschi, Painter.
John Lievens, Painter and Engraver.

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk; after Halbein.
Sir Thomas More; after the same.
Erasmus; after the same.

 A Bear-hunt; after F. Snyders.
 A Concert, consisting of five persons, one of which is a Girl playing on the Guitar; after Adam de Coster, being a companion to the Concert, engraved by Bolswert; after Theodore Rombouts.

VORSTERMAN, LUCAS, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was born at Antwerp about the year 1605. Although he had the advantage of his father's instruction, his prints are very inferior, in every respect, to those of the elder Vorsterman, and he never rose above mediocrity. The following are considered his best productions:

PORTRAITS.

Lucas Vorsterman the elder; after Vanduyck.
 Sir Hugh Cartwright; after Diepenbeck.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Trinity; after Rubens.
 Part of the ceiling of Whitehall; after the same.
 The Virgin in the Clouds, surrounded by Angels; after Vanduyck.
 The Satyr, and the Peasant blowing hot and cold; after J. Jordaens. This print greatly resembles that of the same subject engraved by his father.
 The Triumph of Riches; after Holbein.
 The greater part of the Plates for the hook on Horsemanship, by the Duke of Newcastle.
 Several of the Plates in the collection called the Gallery of Teniers.
 Various other subjects from other masters, and some portraits from his own designs.

VOS, MARTIN DE, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1520. He was the son of Peter de Vos, an artist of sufficient ability to be received into the academy at Antwerp, in 1519, from whom he received his first instruction in the art. He had afterwards the advantage of frequenting the school of Francis Floris, under whom he studied until he was twenty-three years of age, when he determined to visit Italy, and passed some years at Rome, where he improved his style of design by studying with attention the works of the great painters of the Roman school. The charm of Venetian colouring engaged him to visit Venice, where he had the good fortune to conciliate the esteem and friendship of Il Tintoretto, who not only instructed him in the best principles of colouring, but employed him as a coadjutor to paint the landscapes in his pictures. With the aid of such advice and assistance, de Vos became an admirable colourist, and gained such reputation, that he was employed in painting the portraits of several of the illustrious family of the Medici, as well as in some historical subjects which added to his fame.

After an absence of eight years, De Vos returned to Flanders, where the celebrity he had acquired in Italy excited public curiosity, and he was commissioned to paint several altar-pieces for the churches at Antwerp, and the other cities of the Netherlands. He was also much employed as a portrait painter, and there is an appearance of nature in his heads, which was unequalled at the period at which he lived. He was received into the academy at Antwerp in 1559. He continued the exercise of his talents until the year 1604, when he died, at the age of 84. His principal works in the cathedral at Antwerp are, the Marriage at Cana; the Incredulity of St. Thomas; the Miracle of the Loaves; the Temptation of St. Anthony; and the Resurrection. In the church of St. James is a fine picture of the Last Supper.

[Martin de Vos was born in 1531, and died in 1603, consequently at the age of 72. His works, both in portraiture and historical compositions, were numerous, and had considerable influence on the art in his time; but many of his pictures were destroyed by the Iconoclasts. Whatever he may have gained in Italy, his surviving pictures show that on his return to Flanders he reverted to the characters and manners of his country. In history he must be judged by Flemish canons; in portraiture he is the precursor of Rubens and Van Dyck, who perhaps owe more to him than their admirers are willing to acknowledge.]

VOS, PETER DE, was the brother of Martin de Vos, and painted history, but his works are little known.

VOS, WILLIAM DE. This artist was the nephew and scholar of Martin de Vos, and painted history in the style of his instructor, in which he acquired considerable reputation. His portrait was painted by Vanduyck, among the distinguished artists of his time, which he also etched, and it was finished with the graver by Bolswert.

VOS, PAUL DE. This painter was born at Alost, about the year 1600. From the subjects and style of his pictures, it is probable that he was a disciple of Francis Snyders. He painted animals and huntings with great ability, and his works are little, if at all, inferior to those of that distinguished artist. He was much employed for the royal collection of Spain; and there are several of his finest works in the palace of Bueno Retiro, which are deservedly held in the highest estimation. His animals, particularly his dogs, are drawn with uncommon correctness and spirit, and his colouring is clear and harmonious. [He died in 1654.]

VOS, SIMON DE, was born at Antwerp in 1603, and had the advantage of studying in the school of Rubens, under whom he became a very eminent painter of history and portraits. There are some altar-pieces by him in the churches at Antwerp, which have been sometimes mistaken for the works of his illustrious instructor. Such are his picture of the Resurrection, in the cathedral; the Descent from the Cross, in the church of St. Andrew; and St. Norbert receiving the Sacrament, in the abbey of St. Michael. Sir Joshua Reynolds commends this picture, and speaks of him, as a portrait painter, in the following terms: "De Vos was particularly excellent in portraits. There is at Antwerp his own portrait, painted by himself, in black, leaning on the back of a chair, with a scroll of blue paper in his hand, so highly finished, in the broad style of Coreggio, that nothing can exceed it." Simon de Vos was living in 1662.

[VOS, DE. Of this name, and apparently of the same family, there were several other painters nearly contemporaries. As most of them painted landscapes, portraits, and animals, their works and names have been confounded. Among them are, Cornelius, a second Peter, a second William, a Henry, and other baptismal appellations, but very little information to enable the inquirer to distinguish their works. A race of painters of the name continues in Holland to this day.]

VOSTERMAN, [properly VORSTERMAN,] JOHN. This artist was born at Bommel in 1643. He was the son of a portrait painter, who taught him the first rudiments of design, but he afterwards studied at Utrecht, under Herman Zachtleven, and became one of the most admired landscape painters of his time. Whatever was his merit, his vanity was at least equal to it. He visited Paris, where he assumed the title of Baron, and, for a short time, kept up the establishment of a person of rank. His necessities obliged him to return to Holland, and, in 1672, on the approach of the French army, he removed from Utrecht to Nimeguen, where his talents became known to the Marquis of Bethune, for whom he painted several landscapes and views of the Rhine, and by whom he was employed to collect the best works of art that he could meet with. Soon after the Restoration he came to England, and was employed in painting a view of Windsor, and a few other works for the king, but, demanding extravagant prices for his pictures, he did not receive many commissions, and his emoluments not being able to support his extravagance, he was arrested for debt, and was released from his confinement by a contribution of his countrymen.

Sir William Soames being sent ambassador to Constantinople, by James II., Vosterman accompanied him, intending to paint the most remarkable views in that country; but Sir William dying on the road to the Ottoman court, his project was prevented. Before his departure from England, he had been invited to Poland, by his patron the Marquis of Bethune, and he probably went thither on the death of the ambassador. Had the industry of Vosterman been equal to his genius, he would probably have equalled any landscape painter of his country. The scenery of his pictures is frequently taken from the borders of the Rhine; his colouring is chaste and agreeable, and he was a perfect master of aerial perspective. His views are usually decorated with boats and small figures, which are correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. [It is said that he died in 1699, but it is not certain.]

VOU, I. DE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He engraved views and buildings in Amsterdam, which are etched and finished with the graver in a neat, clear style.

VOUET, SIMON, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1582. He was the son of Lawrence Vouet, a painter of little celebrity, by whom he was taught the rudiments of the art, and, without the aid of better instruction, he acquired some reputation in portrait painting. When he was twenty years of age, the Baron de Sancy engaged him to accompany him, as his painter, to Constantinople, where he drew the picture of the Grand Signor; and though it was impossible to do it otherwise than by the strength of memory, and from a view of him at the ambassador's audience, it is said to have been extremely like. He afterwards went to Rome, where he was favoured with the protection of Pope Urban VIII., and his nephew the Cardinal, by whom he was employed in St. Peter's, and painted several pictures for the Barberini palace, which are amongst his best works. He resided at Rome fourteen years, and, in 1624, was chosen prince of the Academy of St. Luke.

In 1627 he returned to France, and was appointed principal painter to Louis XIII., who had allowed him a pension during his residence in Italy. He was employed in decorating the palaces of the Louvre, the Luxembourg, and St. Germain's; the hotels Richelieu and Bouillon; and painted several pictures for the churches at Paris, of which the most esteemed are the principal altar-piece in St. Eustache, representing the Martyrdom of St. Agnes; and the Assumption of the Virgin, in St. Nicholas-des-champs. He died at Paris in 1641.

The first style of Vouet resembled that of Valentin, and the pictures he painted at Rome possess considerable force, but after his return to France, the multiplicity of his engagements induced him to adopt one more expeditious, and which had little to recommend it, except a surprising facility. His genius was unequal to grand compositions; his design is mannered, and not always correct; his colouring false, and the character of his heads without expression. France is, nevertheless, indebted to him for being the first who attempted to reform the French school from the insipid and barbarous manner which prevailed before him, and introducing somewhat of a better taste, which was afterwards greatly improved by his numerous disciples, among whom he had the credit to rank Le Brun, Le Sueur, Mignard, and others.

[Robert Dumesnil has made us acquainted with an etching by Simon Vouet. It represents a "Holy Family," in which the infant Jesus, in the arms of the Virgin, holds in one hand a bunch of cherries, and with the other tries to take a bird which Joseph presents on his forefinger. The figures are half-length, except the child, in a landscape. Signed St. Vouet jn. sculp. 1633.

Doriguy and others have engraved about one hundred and fifty plates of scriptural and historical subjects, painted by S. Vouet in the Barberini palace, the Louvre, the Luxembourg, St. Germain's, and the churches of Paris; these were published collectively at Paris in 1627-65. There is great diversity among writers regarding the dates of his birth and death; but the best authorities agree with those given above.]

VOUILLEMONT, SEBASTIAN, a French engraver, born at Bar-sur-Aube, about the year 1620, [others say 1623.] He was a pupil of Daniel Rabel, and afterwards went to Rome, where he resided several years. We have by him several prints engraved from the works of the Italian masters, as well as from his own designs, and those of Rabel, his master, of which his etchings are the best; when he attempted to finish them with the graver he was less successful. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher V. The following are among his best prints :

The Murder of the Innocents; after Raffaella. 1641.
Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after the same.
Mount Parnassus; after the same.
The Holy Family; after N. Poussin.
The Virgin and Infant Christ; after Parmigiano.
The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Albano.
A young Man presenting Money to a Fortuneteller.

VOYEZ, NICHOLAS JOSEPH. This artist was born at Abbeville in 1742. He went to Paris when he was very young, and became a pupil of Beauvarlet, his fellow citizen. We have several plates by him executed in the neat style of his instructor, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Louis XVI.; engraved in 1785.
Marie Antoinette, Queen of France.
Marie Adelaide Clotilde Xaviere of France.
Prince Henry of Prussia.

SUBJECTS.

Angelica and Medoro; after Blanchard.
The Astrologer; after G. Douw.
An old Man in meditation; after the same.

He also engraved from the pictures of Greuse, Baudouin, and other masters. [His brother François, also an engraver, was born in 1746, and operated in 1802. There is nothing important respecting them.]

VOYS, ARY DE. This painter was born at Leyden in 1641. His father was a celebrated organist, and was desirous of bringing him up to the same profession; but his son discovered so little taste for music, and so decided a disposition for the art, that he was induced to place him under the tuition of Nicholas Knifer, a painter of history of some repute, at Utrecht, with whom he continued two years, when he returned to Leyden, where he became a disciple of Abraham Vanden Tempel. De Voys, however, did not adopt the manner of either of his instructors; he formed an intimacy with Peter van Slingelandt, who had been a disciple of Gerard Douw, whose highly-finished style he followed with the greatest success. Although he occasionally attempted history on a small scale, his best productions are portraits and conversations, and domestic subjects, which are little inferior to the works of Metzù or Mieris. His drawing is very correct, and his colouring clear and transparent, with a perfect intelligence of the chiaro-scuro. The pictures of this artist are extremely scarce, as they are very carefully finished; and he is said to have passed several years of his life in idleness and dissipation, in consequence of his having married a person of considerable fortune. [Balkema says he died in 1698. There are pictures by him in the Museum at Amsterdam and in the Gallery at the Hague. There are also two in the Louvre, one of which is supposed to be the portrait of Pynacker, the landscape painter. Several are to be found in English collections; they are chiefly of single figures, and when perfect are very beautiful in the execution.]

URBINO, RAFFAELLE SANZIO DI. See RAFFAELLE.

URBINO, TIMOTEO DI. See VITE.

URBINO, LUCA DI. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a set of prints for a drawing-book, from the designs of M. Angelo, the Caracci, and other great masters. They are executed with the graver, and his drawing is generally correct. On one of the plates, in the book above-mentioned, he inscribed his name at length, LUCAS DE URBINO F, but he usually marked his prints with a monogram composed of several letters, thus,

LS.

[VREE, or VREEM, NICOLAS DE, a flower painter, born at Utrecht in 1650, was celebrated in his day for the lightness of his pencil, and the fresh and natural brilliancy of his colours; his works, however, are but little known out of Holland. He died at Alkmaar in 1702.]

VRIES, JOHN FREDEMAN DE. This painter was born at Leewarden, in East Friesland, in 1527. He was sent, when young, to Amsterdam, where he became a scholar of Renier Gueritsen, under whom he continued five years, and applied himself with great assiduity to perspective, and in designing architectural views.

In 1549 he went to Antwerp, where he was employed, in conjunction with others, in painting the triumphal arches which were erected on the public entry of the Emperor Charles V. and his son Philip into that city; on which occasion he proved himself an artist of considerable ability. He was much employed in decorating the saloons of the principal mansions with perspective views, which he designed with such truth and effect, that the illusion was complete. He travelled through Germany and Italy, and he every where met with encouragement and employment. After his return to Antwerp, the latter part of his life was principally occupied in making designs of architectural and other subjects, for the printers, particularly Jerome Cock, who published a great variety of prints from his designs. For his works, as an engraver, see the article FRISIUS.

VRIES, ADRIAN DE. This artist was a native of the Low Countries, and was probably of the same family with John Fredeman de Vries. He is said to have been a painter of architecture, and we have by him a set of large, coarse etchings, representing theatrical decorations, executed in a hasty, slight style.

[VRIES, JOHN RENIER DE, a landscape painter, and probably a scholar of Jacob Ruisdael, whose manner he imitated, flourished from about the middle to near the end of the 17th century. He painted a great number of small landscapes on panel, generally forest scenery, in which he frequently introduces a cottage, and in the distance a mill, sometimes with the effect of sunshine, but more frequently without. His manner partakes of Ruisdael and Dekker; and his colouring has the sombre hues of the latter. He contrives to throw the light on the trunk of an oak, or some other large tree, which is generally laboured with close attention to nature. The figures introduced are of a clownish character, and evidently painted by himself. His pictures are mostly signed with his monogram, which bears so strong a resemblance to that of Jacob Ruisdael, that many have been, and are, deceived by it.]

[VRIES, SALOMON DE, born at Antwerp in 1556, was the son of a painter of the name of Jan De Vries, by whom he was instructed. He painted landscapes ornamented with ruins, which are not badly composed, but his colouring has become dark, producing an unpleasant effect, and diminishing their value. He died at the Hague in 1604.

There were several other painters that bore the name of De Vries, but the editor cannot cite any examples of their works, nor rely on the accuracy of the accounts he has met with respecting them.]

VROOM, HENRY CORNELIUS DE. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1566. He was the son of a sculptor, who died when he was very young, and his mother having afterwards married Cornelius Henricksen, a painter on china, he was instructed in the rudiments of design by his step-father. His inclination at first led him to paint views of towns, and he resided some time at Rotterdam, but, not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he embarked on board a vessel bound to St. Lucar, and from thence proceeded to Seville, where he remained some time, but met with no better success. He afterwards visited Italy, and during a residence of two years at Rome, was employed by the Cardinal de Medici, and became acquainted with Paul Brill, whose advice and assistance were of infinite service to him. On leaving Rome he went to Venice, where he did not remain above a year, and, passing through Milan, Genoa, Turin, and Paris, he returned to Haerlem, where he was industriously employed in painting small devotional subjects, which he purposed to dispose of in Spain, and with that intention he embarked a second time for Seville, but was shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal, and found his way to Lisbon, destitute of every thing but his talent, where, relating the danger he had escaped, he was engaged to paint a representation of the tempest which he had described, in which he succeeded so happily, that it was purchased by a Portuguese nobleman, at a considerable price. Vroom continued to be employed, and he improved so much in painting sea-pieces and storms, that on his return to Holland he applied himself entirely to that branch of painting. At this period, the great Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral of England, whose defeat of the Spanish Armada had established the throne of his mistress, being desirous of preserving the detail of that illustrious event, had bespoken a suit of tapestry, describing the particulars of each day's engagement. Francis Spiering, an eminent maker of tapestry, undertook the work, and engaged Vroom to draw the designs. The painter came to England to receive instructions, and to execute his commission; and contracting a friendship with Isaac Oliver, was drawn by him. He returned to his own country, and painted a large picture, which was much admired by Prince Maurice, of the seventh day's action of the fight above-mentioned. Vroom died rich, in what year is not mentioned.

[The tapestries wrought from the designs of Van Vroom, representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada, having perished in the fire which consumed the houses of parliament, his manner of treating the subject can be judged of now only by the engravings made by Pine, and published in 1730, accompanied by ten charts of the sea-coasts of England. Some writers say that he died in 1619; Immerzeel says he died at Haerlem in 1640. It would seem that Vroom was of a roving disposition, and that he made a second voyage to Spain; for we find his name blended with that of Henri de las Marinas, a marine painter, born at Cadiz in 1620, but whose parentage is not mentioned. Particulars respecting him are very scanty; but it is agreed that he visited many foreign countries. His works are now very little regarded.]

[VROOMANS, NICOLAS, particularly celebrated for the manner in which he painted serpents and other reptiles, was born in Holland in 1658, or 1660, and died about 1719. He represented with great truth in design and colour, and beautifully penciled, all sorts of wild plants, briars, and parasitical creepers, among which he placed toads, frogs, mice, moths, worms, spiders in their webs, birds' nests, and other objects; in all of which he is excellent, but remarkably so in the forms and movements of the serpent tribe. His pictures are of rare occurrence in England.]

[UTRECHT, ADRIEN VAN, born at Antwerp in 1599, was an eminent painter of domestic fowls, dead game, and objects of still-life. In these departments he was but little inferior to Francis Snyders. He frequently assisted other artists by the introduction of fruit and flowers to their pictures as accessories. He went to Spain, where he was much employed by Philip IV.; and it was there he painted the magnificent assemblage of fruit in the large picture by Rubens of "Pythagoras and his Disciples," which is now in Buckingham Palace. This portion has been erroneously attributed to Snyders. He died at Antwerp in 1651.]

[VUEZ, ARNOLD, an historical painter, highly lauded by some, and equally condemned by others, was born at Oppenois, near St. Omer, in 1642. He studied at Rome, and was employed by Le Brun at Paris and Versailles. His works are said to be numerous in the religious establishments at Lille, Cambrai, and Douay. They are said to be abundantly rich in the composition, and ornamented with architecture, but badly coloured. He died in 1724.]

VUIBERT, or WIBERT, RÈMI, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1607, and is supposed to have been a scholar of Simon Vouet. His works as a painter are little known, but he engraved several prints after some of the most eminent Italian painters, as well as from his own designs. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

Adam receiving the forbidden Fruit from Eve; after Raffaello.

The Judgment of Solomon; after the same.

Apollo and Marsyas; after the same.

The taking down from the Cross; after N. Poussin.

The Cure of one possessed of a Devil; from his own design.

[The engravings of Remy Vuibert are dated from 1635 to 1663. Robert Dumesnil, "Le Peintre Graveur Français," tom. ii., has described twenty-nine, after Raphael, N. Poussin, Domenichino, Pietro da Cortona, François Du Quesnoy, (the sculptor called Il Fiamingo,) and Vuibert's own designs. But there are others that have not, probably, come under his observation, as the latest date quoted by him is 1643; whereas Zani quotes "Remigius Vuibert Gallus sculpsit Ki. An. 1663." Vuibert resided for a considerable time at Rome, and probably died there. He was on intimate terms of friendship with N. Poussin, who speaks of him in his correspondence with M. de Chantelou. In some instances his engravings are analogous to the manner of François Perrier, in others to that of P. Sealberge.]

VYL, J. DEN. The name of this artist is affixed to a few etchings of cows and sheep, which appear to have been executed about the end of the sixteenth century. They are scarce. [This is probably the artist by whom there are many drawings to be found in Holland, signed I. den Vyl, or den Uyl; at present there are only five of his etchings described: an Ox and a Sheep, a Bull, two Oxen, a Dog, and a Buffalo. In style they approach those of Nicholas Moojaert, but do not equal them in merit.]

UYTENBROECK, MOSES, called LITTLE MOSES. This artist was a native of the Low Countries, and flourished about the year 1640. He is supposed to have been a scholar of Cornelius Poelembeg, whose style he imitated. He painted landscapes, which he usually embellished with subjects taken from history, or the fable. We have several very spirited etchings by this painter, which are much esteemed. He died in 1650.

[The name of this artist is written in divers manners; as Moses van Utenbroeck, Vytenbroeck, Veit van den Broeck, Van Brouck, Vtenbroeck, Wtenbroeck, Wtenbroeck, and other modes of spelling. He flourished from 1615 to 1646; the time of his death is uncertain. In his paintings he imitated the style of Adam Elsheimer, and Cornelius Poelenburg, particularly the latter; and it is probable that many of his landscapes, with fabulous subjects, have been attributed to that master. Of his etchings and engravings Bartsch has given a description of fifty-eight, in tom. v. of Le Peintre Graveur; to these Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has added nine, and has also given full particulars of the variations of those described by his predecessor. The following are the titles, in the order in which they appear in Bartsch and Weigel:

1. Portrait of the Artist; on a pedestal is written Moyes van Wtenbroeck pictor.

SUBJECTS FROM THE BIBLE.

2. Abraham dismissing Hagar; M. Wtenbroeck. 1620.
3. Hagar and Ishmael in the Wilderness.
4. The Angel comforting Hagar; M. Wtenbroeck, 1620, the figure 2 reversed.
5. Hagar in the Wilderness, seated at the foot of a tree, and Ishmael resting his head on her hip; Wtenbroeck fe. J. V. ex.
6. Hagar and Ishmael in the Wilderness, walking to the left.
7. Hagar seated at the foot of a large Tree; Mo. V. Vyt. f. Ma. V. Vy. ex.
8. Hagar comforted by the Angel; the Angel floats on a cloud above, on the left.
9. Abraham going to sacrifice Isaac; M. Vtenbroeck 1620.
10. The Angel preventing the Sacrifice; M. Wtenbroeck fecit. 1646 Hh. ex.
11. Samuel anointing Saul King of Israel; Wtenbroeck. 1620—J. C. Visscher excu.
12. Bathsheba at the Bath, an old Woman presenting a Letter from King David.

HISTORY OF TOBIT.

13. The elder Tobit confiding his Son to the care of the Angel; M. V. B. 1620—Broer Jans excu. Hage.
14. Tobit alarmed at the sight of a monstrous Fish; Mo. Wtenbroeck. 1620. There is a copy of this print by an anonymous engraver. It differs from the original in several points; particularly in the omission of the Ox, which a man is driving to the right in the former. On the copy is inscribed M. Uyttenbroeck in. J. C. Visscher ex.
15. Tobit carrying the Fish, accompanied by the angel Raphael.
16. Tobit restoring sight to his Father; M. v. Wtenbroeck. 1621.
17. The Holy Family returning from Egypt.

FABULOUS SUBJECTS.

18. Juno delivering Io to Argus.
19. Mercury conversing with Argus; M. v. brouck 1621.—J. C. Visscher ex.
20. Argus attending his Cattle.
21. Argus requesting Mercury to stay with him.
22. Mercury lulling Argus to sleep; Goats reposing on the right.
23. Mercury preparing to cut off the head of Argus.
24. Mercury lulling Argus to sleep; a dog reposing on the right.
25. The same subject. In the distance, to the right, is a Man driving a Cow and some Goats.
26. Apollo guarding the Herd of Admetus; the first impressions are without signature; the subsequent are marked M. V. Wtenbroeck ex., written twice, towards the middle of the lower part of the print.
27. Battus betraying Mercury.

28. Mercury punishing Battus.
29. Mercury upbraiding Battus.
30. Bacchus and Ariadne.
31. Diana and her Nymphs; Mo. V. Vytenbroeck f. Mo. V. Vytenbroeck ex.
Vertumnus and Pomona.
33. Silenus drunk; M. V. Wtenbroeck f. Ma. V. Wtenbroeck ex. First impressions are without the names.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

34. A Man and a large Gourd; Mo. V. Vyt. f. M. V. Vy. ex.
35. A Woman seated, and a Child with a large Gourd on its shoulder; a Goat and a Cow in the distance; Mo. v. Uyttenbroeck f. Ma. v. Uyttenbroeck ex. The first impressions are without the names.
36. A Woman kneeling near a streamlet, and a Shepherd standing near a wooden enclosure; Mo. V. Vytenbroeck f. Mo. V. Vytenbroeck ex.
37. A Peasant Family; Mo. V. Vytenbroeck f. Ma. V. Vytenbroeck ex.
38. A Woman from bathing; her back is towards the spectator, and she holds her shift in her hands.
39. A similar subject, but she is seen in profile, and her face is turned towards the spectator. A very beautiful print, and remarkably piquant in effect.
40. A Woman bathing, surprised by a Shepherd.
41. to 44. Subjects of Animals; Cows, Horses, Goats, and Asses.
45. Arcadian Shepherds; Mo. V. Vytenbroeck f. Ma. V. Vytenbroeck ex.
46. A Woman and three Children; Mo. V. Vytenbroeck f. Ma. V. Vytenbroeck ex.
47. A young Mother on her knees before an old Man seated near the door of a house; Mo. V. Vytenbroeck f. Ma. V. Vytenbroeck exc. First impressions are without the names.
48. A Shepherd and Shepherdess; the latter has her head ornamented with flowers.
49. A Land-storm, in which a Woman is taking refuge in the arms of a Shepherd, and alarmed animals are precipitating themselves on each other; a Cow and two Goats are under shelter.
50. Indians gathering Tobacco; M. V. Brouck.
51. Indians preparing Tobacco; M. V. Brouck.
52. A Landscape, with a Man driving a laden Ass and several Goats before him.
53. A Landscape, with a Tower and two Obelisks.
54. A Landscape, with a round Tower and Ruins.
55. A Landscape, with a Man walking, and a Woman on an Ass.
56. A Landscape, with Figures, and Animals on a bridge.
57. A Landscape, with Cattle, and Jacob wrestling with the Angel.
58. A Landscape, with a Temple, and the Angel and Tobit.

To the foregoing, Weigel, in his "Supplement to Bartsch," has added,

59. Salmacis and Hermaphroditus; in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna. Described also in Rigal's catalogue.
60. Apollo guarding the cattle of Admetus. Described in Rigal's catalogue.
61. A rocky Landscape, in which are two Men and a Woman walking. It has the address of N. Visscher, with the initials J. C. V. interlaced. In the collection of the Archduke Charles, and described in Rigal's catalogue.
62. Indians employed in dressing Tobacco. This, and numbers 50 and 51, belong to a book entitled "Tabacologia," by John Neander, published by Elzevir in 1622. They appear also in a second edition, published in 1626, but badly retouched.
63. A Cow standing, two Sheep and a Goat lying down. Described in Robert Dumesnil's catalogue, No. 1.
64. A Cow ruminating. In the same catalogue, No. 2. Mo. V. Vyt. f. Mo. V. Vyt. ex.
65. A wild Horse. In the same catalogue, No. 3.
66. A Landscape, with Ruins, and two Shepherds (Mercury and Argus?). In the collection of the Archduke Charles.
67. St. Peter and St. John curing the lame Man at the gate of the Temple; with the mark of N. Visscher, as editor, and the date 1615. In the collection of the Archduke Charles.]

UYTENWAELE, JOACHIM. This artist was born at Utrecht in 1566. He was the son of a glass painter, who taught him the rudiments of design, and he followed his father's profession until he was eighteen years of age, when he became a scholar of Joseph de Beer, under whom he studied three years, when he travelled to Italy, and passed some time at Padua. In that city he became known to the Bishop of St. Malo, and accompanied that prelate to France. He remained in his employment two years, when he returned to Utrecht, where he passed the rest of his life. He painted history in the style of Bartholomew Spranger, and his design, like that of the artist he took for his model, is frequently strained and extravagant. His cabinet pictures are more esteemed than those of a larger size. Van Mander speaks in favourable terms of two small pictures by this master, in the collection of the Elector Palatine, representing a Feast of the Gods, and Mars and Venus. [His small pictures of feasts of the gods are rather numerous, they resemble the works of Cornelius de Haerlem on a reduced scale, but much richer in colour. They are remarkable for elaborate finishing, and are really beautiful of their class. He died young, about 1640.]

VYTH, or VEYTH, JOHN MARTIN. This artist was born at Schafhausen in 1650. After receiving some instruction in design in his native country, he travelled to Italy, and passed some years at Rome and Venice. He attached himself particularly to the study of the works of M. Angelo Buonaroti, whose great style of design is discernible in all his works. He painted history, and enriched the collections at Basle, Berne, and Schafhausen, with several historical pictures, which prove him to have been one of the noblest artists of his country, although his merit was not duly rewarded, as he lived in indigence. He died in 1717.

W

WAAL, or WAEL, JOHN DE. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1557, and was a disciple of Francis Frank the elder. He painted history in the style of his master, and had acquired sufficient celebrity to be received a member of the academy in his native city, when he died in the prime of life. [The dates of his birth and death are contradictory. Füessli says he died in 1633, at the age of 75; and so says Zani. That is certainly not the prime of life. Van Dyck painted his portrait. His pictures are very rare. See the note to the article, JOHN BAPTIST DE WAEL.]

WAAL, or WAEL, LUCAS DE, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1591, and was first instructed in the art by his father; but, as his genius led him to landscape, he was afterwards placed under the tuition of John Breughel. He followed the style of his preceptor with great success, and, on leaving that master, he travelled to Italy, and passed some time at Genoa, where his works were highly esteemed, and he met with very flattering encouragement. Although his pictures occasionally represent battles and attacks of cavalry, which are well composed, and touched with great spirit and animation, his most esteemed works are his mountainous landscapes and waterfalls, in which the scenery is extremely picturesque; his colouring is chaste and natural, and his pencil neat and spirited. He died in 1676.

WAAL, or WAEL, CORNELIUS DE. This artist was the younger brother of Lucas de Waal, and was born at Antwerp in 1594. He received his first instruction in the art from his father, John de Waal; but he afterwards accompanied his brother to Italy, and resided some time at Genoa, where, according to Lanzi, he painted some pictures for the churches, but he chiefly excelled in painting battles, marches, skirmishes of cavalry, and processions, in which he gained a distinguished reputation. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, his figures and horses are correctly designed, and his touch is peculiarly adapted to the subjects. The fury of the combatants, the dismay of the vanquished, and the suffering of the wounded, are delineated in his pictures with admirable expression. He was much employed by the Duke of Arschot, and painted several of his best pictures for Philip III., king of Spain, by whom they were held in the highest estimation. He died in 1662. We have by this artist several very spirited etchings from his own compositions, among which are the following:

A set of seven prints; inscribed Iltri, D. D. Guilielmo Vander Straten, venustas hasce imagines. C. de Wael amoris dicat. They represent a variety of subjects, among which are some of Peasants quarrelling and amusing themselves.

WAAL, or WAEL, JOHN BAPTIST DE. This artist is said, by Huber, to have been a nephew of Cornelius de Wael. We have by him some slight etchings, from the designs of his uncle, among which is a set of eight prints, representing the history of the Prodigal Son.

[Bartsch has started a difficulty regarding this artist. He says, "We have a series of five prints representing the Life of the Prodigal Son, which are engraved after designs by Cornelius De Wael. Three of these pieces are anonymous, the other two are executed by a John Baptiste de Wael, who has marked them with his name, and the date 1658. This artist, contemporary with Cornelius de Wael, or perhaps his son, is absolutely unknown. In comparing the two signed prints with the fourteen pieces of which we here give the descriptions, (tom. v. Peintre Graveur,) and which bear also the name of John Baptiste de Wael, it becomes evident that these latter cannot be the work of the John of 1658, so much difference is there in composition, drawing, and the point. There is therefore no doubt that the author of them is John Baptiste de Wael, who, according to Descamps, was the father of Cornelius."

Bartsch then gives an account of John de Wael, whom he designates the Old, corresponding with what is said in a previous article, adding the circumstance, that he travelled with another painter, of the name of John de Mayer, to Paris, where he acquired a fortune, and died in 1633.

The fourteen prints described by Bartsch consist of landscapes, with figures and animals, and are named according to the subjects. They were published collectively, as they are numbered consecutively in Arabic figures at the bottom, on the right. The first print serves as the title, and bears the following dedication and inscription: "Ill^{mo}. ac Orn^{mo}. Dno. Gasparo de Roomer bonarum Artium Maccenati dign^{mo}. D. D. D. Johannes Bapt^{us}. de Wael." On the lower margin: Con licence de superiori in Roma da Vincenzo Billy vicino l'orologio della Chiesa noua. Hence it may be concluded that he was some time in Italy, though the circumstance is not noticed by biographers. It may be added, that Rudolph Weigel concurs with Bartsch in his remarks, previously cited.]

[WAARD, or WAERD, ANTHONY DE, born at the Hague in 1689, was a scholar of Simon Vander Does, and afterwards studied at Paris. He is mentioned as a painter of historical subjects, portraits, landscapes, and animals, and also as a decorator of the interiors of apartments. Of his history nothing further is recorded, and his works are scarcely known out of Holland. It is said that they are esteemed there, and obtain high prices. It is conjectured that he died at the Hague in 1752, as a sale of his collection of pictures was made there in that year.]

[WAAS, or WAES, AART VAN, a native of Gouda, and scholar of Wouter Crabeth, travelled in Italy and returned to Gouda, where he painted some pretty pictures of familiar subjects, and died in 1646, says Balkema, but Immerzeel says in 1650. This is all that is related of him as a painter; but in a catalogue of prints (Hazard's) there are nine grotesque subjects attributed to him both as painter and engraver. What the subjects are of eight that are uprights, is not said; but the ninth represents a painter, disgusted with his art, "qui fait ses ordures sur la palette et les pinceaux." At the bottom of the print is inscribed "om dat ick door de konst, &c. 1645."]

WACHSMUTH, JEROME, a German engraver, who chiefly resided at Vienna. He engraved, among other prints, the Elements and the Seasons, from his own designs, in which he has shown a humble imitation of the style of Bernard Picart.

WÆGMAN, HENRY. According to Fuessli, in his Lives of the Swiss Painters, this artist was born at Zurich in 1536. He is little known as a painter, but several of his drawings are preserved in the portfolios of his countrymen, which, his biographer informs us, possess great merit, and resemble the vigorous and spirited style of Paolo Farinato.

WAESBERGE, ISAAC, a Dutch engraver, who flourished from the year 1650 till 1660. We have by him several portraits, among which is that of Admiral de Ruyter, after H. Berckmans. It is executed in a style resembling that of Cornelius Visscher.

WAGNER, HANS ERHARD. According to Professor Christ, this artist was a native of Strasburg, and engraved a considerable number of copper-plates, which were printed in that city by John Heyden. He usually marked his prints with a cipher composed of an H and E joined together, and followed by a W, thus, HEW. [He flourished about 1690.]

WAGNER, JAMES, was probably of the same family with the preceding artist, and is said by Professor Christ to have inscribed his prints, J. Wa. fec.

[WAGNER, JOHN GEORGE, born at Dresden in 1732, was a scholar of the celebrated Dietrich. He painted landscapes with pastoral subjects, Nymphs bathing, and other Arcadian relaxations and pastimes; the picturesque scenery on the borders of the Meuse, and also maritime compositions. His pictures are very pleasing, and partake largely of the manner of his instructor; indeed they have been frequently sold in England as the works of Dietrich. His drawings in water-colours are highly esteemed, and for their peculiar beauty will continue to be so, by intelligent amateurs. This excellent artist died in 1767. He is sometimes called the younger, to distinguish him from another of the same name, who was a portrait and historical painter, and flourished a century earlier.]

WAGNER, JOSEPH. This artist was born at Thalendorf, on the Lake of Constance, in 1706. He first studied painting under Jacopo Amiconi, at Venice, but was persuaded by his instructor to turn his thoughts to engraving. He accompanied his preceptor to Paris, where he received some lessons in engraving from Laurence Cars, and in 1733 visited England with Amiconi. His first productions here were the portraits of the three princesses, Anne, Amelia, and Caroline, daughters of George II. He executed several other plates during his residence in this country, and returned to Venice, where he established himself as an engraver, and carried on a considerable business as a printseller. His prints are very numerous, and he had a number of scholars, who became eminent in the art; among which were Bartolozzi, Flipart, Berardi, and others. The following are considered his best prints:

PORTRAITS AFTER AMICONI.

Peter the Great, Emperor of Russia, conducted by Minerva.
Anne, Empress of Russia.
Elizabeth Petrowna, Empress of Russia.
Carlo Broschi, called Farinelli, Musician.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Education of the Virgin; after Amiconi.
The infant Christ sleeping; after the same.
The Holy Family; after P. Veronese.
The Interview between Jacob and Rachel; after L. Giordano.
Rebecca receiving the presents from Eliezer; after the same.
The Death of Abel; after Benedetto Luti.
Mary Magdalene in the House of the Pharisee; after the same.
The Virgin and infant Christ; after Solimene.
The Assumption of the Virgin; after Piazzetta.
St. John in the Desert; after C. Vanloo.
Twelve Landscapes and Pastoral subjects; after Zuccherelli; engraved by Wagner and his pupils.

[He died in 1780.]

WAKKERDAK, P. A. The name of an artist affixed to a portrait of Kenou Simons Hassalaer. [Nothing seems to be known of this artist's history. He engraved in mezzotint a landscape after Jan Asselyn, showing a cavern, with ruins near it, and peasants of both sexes at the entrance.]

WALBURG, ———. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as a designer and engraver. His name is affixed to a portrait of John Frederick Gronovius, from a design of his own, which is very indifferently executed.

WALCH, JACOB, an old German engraver, who flourished about the year 1480, and is supposed by some to have been the master of Michael Wolgemut, but the accuracy of this supposition is extremely questionable. The engravings attributed to this artist bear a great resemblance to those of Israel van Mecheln, and have the laboured appearance of imitation. It is more probable that he was a disciple of that master. The copper-plates by Wolgemut bear no resemblance to those by Walch, who never engraved on wood, whereas the greater part of the works of Wolgemut are wooden cuts. His drawing, as was usual at that early period, and his compositions, have all the stiffness and formality which characterize the primitive productions of the German school. The prints attributed to this artist are marked with a W, to which is added a kind of cross, thus, W ∇ , among which are the following:

St. Elisabeth seated on a species of Throne, reading.
The Virgin Mary appears below, with the infant Christ. On the right hand, David is represented with his harp, and on the left, Aaron. Behind the throne rises a genealogical stem of the lineage of Christ, from David to Joseph, represented by half figures; a very large upright print.

A Gothic Ornament for a crossier.

The Inside of a Gothic Building.

A Ship striking against a Rock, inscribed Phaetoe.

Several small plates, representing Tents, with Soldiers armed, and on horseback.

Some narrow upright plates, representing different Saints, standing in niches of Gothic architecture.

Three Skulls in an arch, ornamented with Gothic work.

Mr. Strutt observes, that there are some few prints marked with the cross only, without the W.; but these have all the appearance of being more ancient than those of Walch, and differ in every respect from them. They are much more rudely engraved, and in a bolder and more determined style, resembling that of Martin Schoen, with whom the artist was probably a contemporary. Among these are the following:

A Wild Man fighting with a Bear; a small upright plate.

A Woman seated, caressing a Unicorn; the same.

WALCH, GEORGE, a more modern engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He appears to have been chiefly employed in engraving portraits, which are executed with the graver in a very indifferent style. Among others is a portrait of Lucas Frederick Behaim, of Nuremberg. [He also engraved in mezzotinto, and operated in 1678.]

WALCH, S. The name of this artist appears on some very indifferent portraits in mezzotinto. [If this does not apply to the preceding, it may mean an amateur engraver of the name Sebastien, who lived about 1756. He was a native of Switzerland, and engraved in mezzotinto, after the manner of D. V. Preissler, a series of portraits of the burgomasters of Zurich from 1336 to 1740, from designs by J. C. Füsslin, to which he put his name.]

WALE, SAMUEL. This artist was born in London, and was brought up as an engraver on plate. He afterwards studied design in the academy in St. Martin's Lane. He also practised painting, in which he imitated the manner of Francis Hayman, and executed several decorative pieces for ceilings. But his chief employment was designing for the booksellers, the principal part of which drawings were engraved, with great spirit, by Grignon. He understood architecture and perspective, and greatly assisted Mr. Gwynn, in the decorations of his architectural drawings, particularly in the section of St. Paul's, and was of service to him in the literary part of his publications. At the establishment of the Royal Academy, Wale was chosen one of the founders, and appointed first professor of perspective to that institution. Upon the death of Mr. Wilson, he was also made librarian, both which places he held till his death, which was on the 6th of February, 1786. We have a few slight etchings of vignettes by him from his own designs. [He made designs to illustrate an edition of Izaak Walton's Angler; his name appears frequently in the early exhibition catalogues of the Royal Academy, but rather as a designer than as a painter. His subjects are taken generally from ancient English history, and are described as "stained, or washed, drawings." Either from indolence, or lack of invention, he exhibited the same drawings more than once; but he is scarcely remembered now by any other than those made for book illustration.]

[WALES, JAMES, born at Peterhead, in Scotland, in 1748, of respectable parents, showed his genius for drawing at an early age. He was educated at the University College of Aberdeen: he went to the East Indies in 1791, but in what capacity is not said, and died at Bombay in November, 1796. He has left many excellent portraits in India. He designed the picture of the Mahratta Durbar, which was afterwards completed in England by Thomas Daniell, R. A., and also engraved by him. He made all those splendid drawings of the Caves of Ellora, and the plans, which were, after his death, published by Thomas Daniell. In pursuit of this arduous undertaking he caught the fever of the country, which proved fatal. He has left also some admirable portraits of Indian princes and their ministers, now in the possession of Sir Alexander Malet, Bart., of Wilbury House, in Wiltshire.

In the article relating to Thomas and William Daniell, it is stated that all the drawings for the "Oriental Scenery," published in six volumes, were, with the exception of the "Excavations," made by William; this would induce the supposition that the "Excavations" were by Thomas. The writer of the memoir from which the article was taken should have been more explicit, if acquainted with what is stated above. The prints of the Caves of Ellora all bear Mr. Wales's name as well as Mr. Daniell's; and the editor is informed that the drawings were given to the latter as part payment for his painting the Mahratta Durbar, from designs furnished by James Wales, for the late Sir Charles Warre Malet, Bart., who married his daughter, and that the picture is still in the family's possession. It is not intended to detract from the great and acknowledged merit of the Daniells that these circumstances are related, but as an act of justice due to an artist of high talent, with whose works the public are acquainted, but whose name has hitherto been unrecorded.

On reference to the work of "Oriental Scenery" by T. and W. Daniell, there will be found the twenty-four Views of the Mountains of Ellora and the Hindoo Excavations, drawn by James Wales, and engraved under the direction of Tho. Daniell, dedicated to Sir Charles Warre Malet, Bart., the late British resident at Poonah. This is satisfactory, as it vindicates Daniell, and places the name of James Wales in an honourable position.]

WALKER, ROBERT, an English portrait painter, who was contemporary with Vandyck, and improved his style by studying the works of that eminent artist; but he did not attract much notice until the time of the Commonwealth, when he was employed to paint the portrait of Cromwell, and those of the principal personages of the republican party. He drew the Protector more than once. One of those portraits represented him with a gold chain about his neck, to which was appended a gold medal, with three crowns, the arms of Sweden, and a pearl, sent to him by Christiana, in return for his picture, by Cooper, on which Milton wrote a Latin epigram. This head, by Walker, is in the possession of Lord Mountford, at Horseth, in Cambridgeshire, and was given to the late lord by Mr. Commissary Greaves, who found it in an inn, in that county. Another is at the Earl of Essex's, at Cashiobury. He also painted Cromwell and Lambert together. This was in Lord Bradford's collection. A fourth was purchased for the Grand Duke of Tuscany, whose agent having orders to procure one, and meeting with this in the hands of a female relation of the Protector, offered to purchase it, but being refused, and continuing his solicitation, to put him off, sho asked five hundred pounds, and was paid it. Walker had for some time an apartment in Arundel House, and died a little before the Restoration. His own portrait is in the picture gallery at Oxford.

WALKER, ANTHONY, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He was instructed in the principles of engraving by John Tinney, an artist of little note. He was for some time chiefly employed in engraving frontispieces and vignettes, from his own designs, for the booksellers, some of which are not destitute of merit, though heavy and dark in the execution. He also engraved several plates for the collection of Mr. Boydell. The following are his best prints:

The Village Lawyer and his Clients; after Holbein.

The Angel departing from the House of Tobit; after Rembrandt.

A View of the City of Worcester; after J. B. Chatelain.

A View of Lord Harrington's Park; after the same.

WALKER, WILLIAM, was the brother of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was also much employed for the collection of Boydell. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Family of Sir Balthazar Gerbier; after Vandyck.

Diana and Calisto; after F. Le Moine.

The Power of Beauty; after Fil. Lauri.

Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene; after P. da Cortona.

The Young Bird-catchers; after Netscher.

The Girl and Chickens; after Amoroso.

The Boy and Bird's-nest; after the same.

A Flemish Entertainment; after Van Harp.

Jacob watering Rachel's Flocks; after Trevisani.

Isaac blessing Jacob; after the same.

Lions at play; after Rubens.

[WALL, WILLEM RUTGAART VANDER, born at Utrecht in 1756, was an excellent painter of landscapes and animals; he also designed the figure with anatomical correctness. He was the instructor of the celebrated Jan Kobel. He died at his native city in 1813.]

WALMSLEY, JOHN. This ingenious landscape painter was descended from a highly respectable family of Rochdale, in Lancashire, and was born in Ireland in 1763, at which time his father (who was a major in the army) was with his regiment in that country. Having had some serious dispute with his friends he left them, and came to London, to procure a livelihood by his exertions. He had already made some progress in landscape painting, and was engaged as a scene painter at the King's Theatre, after which he was employed in the same capacity in that of Covent Garden. This branch of the art not agreeing with his health, he left the metropolis, and went to Bath, where he practised landscape painting with considerable reputation for the last ten years of his life. He died in 1805.

WALRAVEN, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, who resided at Amsterdam about the year 1740. According to Basan, he etched several small plates from his own designs.

[Isaac Walraven was born at Amsterdam in 1686, and died there in 1765. He was an amateur artist, but studied under Gerard Rademaker, after whose death he went to Dusseldorf to copy pictures in the gallery there. He had a talent for composition, and understood colouring and chiaro-scuro, but was defective in drawing, and his pencil wanted precision and firmness. Notwithstanding some of his pictures are esteemed and obtain good prices; two of Children Sporting, of small dimensions, sold for 800 florins, and another, an historical subject, for 1500, at the sale of his collection shortly after his death. His etchings are in the manner of Stephen Della Bella.]

[WALRAVEN VAN HAERTEN, NICOLAS, an engraver in mezzotint and aquafortis, and probably a painter also, flourished from 1677 to 1709, according to the dates on his prints. Nothing of his history is accurately known, but it is supposed that he was a native of Gorcum. His subjects are of a low kind, chiefly of smokers and tipplers of both sexes. Bartsch has described nine prints by him, all that he was acquainted with; three of which are in mezzotint, the rest etched with aquafortis and finished with the burin. He commends his execution of the first, but condemns him for the latter, observing that he had no taste in the point, nor talent for handling the burin; he adds that his prints are difficult to find. Weigel, however, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has increased the number to thirty-nine, consisting of engravings in both manners. Several of these are in the collection of the Archduke Charles, at Vienna, and some are mentioned in the catalogues of the Count Rigal, and Robert Dumesnil. This is no doubt the same artist mentioned in a former article under the name of Nicolas van Haeften; but as he is also called Walraven, it is deemed advisable to place him under both heads. The editor has seen some excellent portraits in oil with the name of van Haeften, but they appear to him to be of an earlier date, probably twenty years, than the first quoted.]

[WALSCAPELLE, or WALTSKAPELLE, JACOB, a painter of fruit and flower-pieces, of whom there is nothing recorded. His pictures, however, are very beautiful in every respect. In colouring and transparency they resemble the brilliancy of J. D. De Heem, with the same fresh look of nature. His groups of flowers placed in globular water-bottles are tastefully arranged, and have additional interest from the butterflies, moths, and other insects on the leaves, represented with great accuracy; the sparkling dew-drops, the reflections on the body of the bottle, and the flower stalks seen in the water. It is probable that he was contemporary with the De Heems, if not a scholar of John David. His pictures are found in some of the very best collections in Holland, which makes it the more surprising that so little of the painter's history should be known. There are several fine specimens in England that have passed through the editor's hands.]

WANDELAAR, JOHN, a Dutch designer and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1692. He was instructed in design and engraving by the elder Folkema, and became very eminent in the art. He engraved several portraits and other book ornaments for the publishers, but his best productions were the thirty-four plates he executed for the great anatomical work by Albinus, entitled Tubulae sceleti et musculorum corporis humani. The drawings were made from the subjects by himself, under the direction of that celebrated anatomist. There is an English translation of this capital work, in which the figures are copied in the same size as the originals, engraved by Grignion, Ravenet, Scotin, and others. [He died at Leyden in 1759. It is said that he also painted portraits, some of which were engraved by Houbraken.]

[WANS, or WAMPS, ———, surnamed the "Captain," was a Flemish painter, who lived during the first half of the 17th century, and was accounted a good landscape painter. He also made copies of the works of Van Dyck. There are no other particulars of him recorded.]

[WARD, WILLIAM, a very eminent engraver in mezzotinto, flourished during the latter part of the last century and in the early part of the present. He was the brother of James Ward, the celebrated animal painter, and father of W. J. Ward mentioned in the next article. He engraved many of the pictures of his brother-in-law, George Morland, which had an extensive sale. He also engraved numerous portraits after Reynolds and others, and a few historical pictures, in which he displayed great talent. He was an Associate of the Royal Academy.]

[WARD, WILLIAM JAMES, mezzotinto engraver, was the son of the preceding. Having family connexion with several eminent artists, he exhibited a talent for drawing at a very early age, and in his twelfth year obtained the silver medal of the Society of Arts for an elaborate drawing of the Madonna della Seggiola of Raphael. He combined an extraordinary depth and richness of colour with true artistic feeling in his portraits, which rendered them exceedingly effective. His style was more adapted for transferring the manly portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds and John Jackson than the airs of fashion in those of Sir Thomas Lawrence. He indulged in the imprudent habit of plunging into a cold bath every morning during summer or winter, which produced insanity, and he died on the first of March, 1840, in his fortieth year. He engraved, Admiral Sir P. Durham; after F. Gyrant.

Prince George of Cambridge; after Lucas.

Lady Vernon Harcourt; after Jackson.

The Infant Hercules (the single figure); after Sir J. Reynolds.

Earl Grey, K. G.; after Jackson.

And many others, chiefly after his relation, Jackson.]

WARNIR, JOHN. This artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1636. He is chiefly known as a copier of some of the prints by Albert Durer, and other old German masters. His plates are neatly executed, but have all the servility of imitation. He copied the print by Albert Durer, representing St. Jerome seated before a Crucifix, with a city in the back-ground, which is inscribed Jh. Warnir, Æ. 16, 1636, and the following year, when he was seventeen, he copied the Twelve Apostles, after the same master, which he marked Jh. W., Æ. 17. He is supposed to have died very young.

[WARREN, CHARLES, an eminent engraver, whose talent was chiefly employed on small plates for book-illustrations, especially of the poetry and novels published by Bell, Harrison, Cadell, and other enterprising booksellers of the day. Recorded particulars of his life are very scanty; but it is said that he was the first that attempted the difficult process of engraving on steel, of which he produced specimens that were exhibited at the Society of Arts in the Adelphi. His plates are numerous, and of greater excellence than those of most of his contemporaries of the same class; two of high merit are the portrait of Alexander Pope, and The Broken China Jar, after a small picture by Wilkie. He also engraved several of the beautiful illustrations to Don Quixote, after Smirke. He died in 1823.]

WASSEMBERG, JOHN ABEL. This painter was born at Groeninguen in 1689. He was the son of an advocate, who, intending him to follow the same profession, gave him the incipient rudiments of a classical education; but finding that his son paid more attention to drawing than to his studies, he yielded to the bent of his inclination, and placed him under the tuition of John van Dieren, an artist of some eminence, with whom he remained until he was twenty-three years of age, when he went to Rotterdam, where he formed an intimacy with Adrian Vander Werf. That distinguished painter aided him with his assistance and advice, and the instruction he received from him enabled him to return to Groeninguen with the reputation of one of the most promising young artists of his time. He gave proof of his talents by painting several saloons and ceilings in the principal mansions of his native city, and was much employed in portraiture, in which he particularly excelled. His celebrity in that branch recommended him to the patronage of the Prince of Orange, whose portrait he painted, with that of the princess, and those of the most distinguished personages of the court. He was not less celebrated for his pictures of a cabinet size, representing subjects from sacred history, finished in the polished style of Vander Werf, which were esteemed little inferior to those of that admired painter. He died in 1750. [His daughter, Elizabeth Gertrude, painted in a similar manner, and sometimes approached closely to Gerard Dow. She died in 1782.]

WASSER, ANNA. This ingenious lady was a native of Switzerland; she was the daughter of Rudolf Wasser, a member of the council of Zurich, where she was born in 1679. She discovered early marks of a quick and lively genius, and when she was not more than twelve years of age, had acquired a competent acquaintance with the Latin and French languages, and had made considerable progress in the Belles Lettres. She now began to take lessons in design, for which she evinced so decided a disposition, that her father was induced to procure her the instruction of Joseph Werner, of Berne, one of the most eminent artists of Switzerland. By the instruction of so able a master, she made a surprising progress in drawing, and attempted some pictures in oil, which she soon abandoned for miniature, in which she arrived at a perfection little short of that of Werner himself. Her reputation spread throughout all Germany, and there was scarcely a court in the empire from which she did not receive commissions. The Duke of Wurtemberg, and the Margrave of Baden-Durlach, were among her most distinguished patrons. Her talents were not confined to portraits, she excelled in painting pastoral and rural subjects, which she composed with great ingenuity, and finished with uncommon delicacy. She died in 1713.

WASTMAN, C. A. According to Mr. Strutt, this artist resided in Russia about the year 1736, where he engraved several portraits, but in so indifferent a style, that they are not worth specifying.

WATELET, CLAUDE HENRY. This distinguished amateur, and writer on art, was born at Paris in 1718. His father was receiver-general of the finances, to which honourable situation he succeeded. In his youth he united the study of the arts with that of the Belles Lettres, and having finished his education, he travelled through Germany to Italy, and passed some time at Rome, where he formed an intimacy with M. Pierre, an eminent French artist, with whom he contemplated the most remarkable works of art in that capital. Some time after his return to Paris he published, in 1761, his poem on the Art of Painting, embellished with plates, from the designs of M. Pierre, etched by himself, and finished with the graver by Lempereur. He was the principal author of a very laborious and ingenious work, which was published in 1792, [four years] after his death, with additions by M. Levesque, entitled Dictionnaire des Arts de Peinture, Sculpture, et Gravure. As an engraver, M. Watelet may be ranked among the most zealous and the most successful amateurs who have practised the art. His plates amount to upwards of a hundred, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS AFTER COCHIN.

Claude Henry Watelet; engraved in 1753.
John le Rond d'Alembert, of the French Academy.
P. Joliot de Crebillon, of the French Academy.
J. P. M. Pierre, Painter.
Louis de Silvestre, Painter.
The Count de Vence.
A. B. J. Turgot.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Venus nursing the Loves; after Rubens.
A Corps de Garde of Monkeys; after Teniers.
A Landscape, with Figures; after K. du Jardin.
A large Landscape; after J. Both.
A pair of Views of Ruins; after Panini.

WATERLOO, [OR WATERLO.] ANTHONY. The place of nativity of this admirable painter and engraver is not precisely ascertained, but he is generally believed to have been born at Utrecht, about the year 1618. It is certain that he resided there the greater part of his life, and the scenery of his pictures is usually taken from the environs of that city. His landscapes are characterized by the most interesting simplicity, sometimes representing the entrance into a forest; a broken road, with a few trunks of trees; a solitary cottage, or a water-mill; but these domestic views are treated with so much truth and nature, that they are evidently the unsophisticated transcripts of what he saw. His skies are light and floating, his colouring is chaste and natural, and the foliage of his trees and plants is touched with great spirit, as well as with a marked attention to their different species. The genuine pictures of this charming artist are very rarely to be met with, as much of his time was occupied in engraving, and as he was unfortunately addicted to habits of intemperance, to which he fell a victim in the prime of life. As an engraver, his works have long been the admiration of the intelligent, and continue to be a source of instruction to the artist, and amusement to the collector. His plates, according to the descriptive catalogue of them by Adam Bartsch, amount to one hundred and fifty-five, and consist of various sets of landscapes and views, from his own designs. They are etched with great spirit and facility, in a very masterly style, and are usually retouched with the graver, to harmonize the lights, and invigorate the shadows. He sometimes marked his plates with the initials A. W. f., and sometimes with the cipher AW. Of his numerous prints, all of which are picturesque and interesting, the following are particularly esteemed:

A set of six upright Landscapes, among which is his celebrated print of The Water-mill.

A set of six Landscapes, with subjects from the Fable, representing Alpheus and Arethusa; Apollo and Daphne; Mercury and Argus; Pan and Syrinx; the Parting of Venus and Adonis; and the Death of Adonis.

A set of six Landscapes, with subjects from the Old Testament.

[The etchings of Anthony Waterloo, or Waterloo, are so interesting, and so much esteemed by collectors, that Adam Bartsch has scrupulously described one hundred and thirty-six; and of these he has selected eleven of the rarest impressions, and minutely pointed out their variations from those of more frequent occurrence. Rudolph Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has followed that eminent connoisseur step by step through his laborious examination, and noted the varieties that have come under his observation throughout the whole of the catalogue. He has also described an etching that had escaped the vigilance of Bartsch, which Monsieur Duchesne, keeper of the prints in the Bibliothéque at Paris, and author of the "Essai sur les Nuelles," had discovered in the collection of M. F. Verachter, at Antwerp. Of this etching another impression is described in the Duke of Buckingham's catalogue, which is now in the British Museum. It is entitled L'Homme au bord de la Riviere, (a man on the bank of a river,) and represents a landscape with a stream running from the right to the left through the middle; at the end is seen a half-ruined tower on a hollowed rock; on the right of the foreground two large trees, one having the branches extended to the distance, near to which is seen a man turned towards the river and resting on a stick. At the bottom, on the left, A. Waterloo fec. H. 5p., L. 4p., with a margin of two lines. It will be adding something to the information communicated by these eminent critics in art, to make known to curious amateurs the further discoveries made by the well-known dealers in ancient prints, Messrs. Smith, brothers, of Lisle Street, London, and which they have kindly permitted the editor to transcribe from their private notes, for the general benefit.

Variations noted by Messrs. W. and G. Smith, in addition to those by R. Weigel, in the etchings by Anthony Waterloo, described by Bartsch.

In No. 1. The first, aquafortis before the initials; second, additional work, sky added, and has the initials; third, has No. 8 at top on the right.

In No. 2. The second has the sky and letters added; the third has No. 7 at top on the right.

In No. 70. The first, before the trunk of a second tree beyond the large one in the middle; foliage is also different at top; at Munich: second, trunk added.

In No. 83. Only three trees in the middle of first, also before a tall dry branch out of some branches on the left side; Archduke Charles, at Vienna: second, as in Bartsch.

In No. 84. The first, foreground generally less worked, before several additional branches of trees, and previous to one dropping from a large tree down to the ground; in the same collection: second, as described by Bartsch.

In No. 85. First, before some bushes more distant towards the middle; beyond what appears to be water remains of the monogram A. W. at bottom on left: second, as described.

In No. 86. First, a tree on the right is dry at top; Archduke Charles: second, as above with a branch added.

In No. 87. First, two figures are seated on the edge of a bank on the right, before some dry branches proceeding from trunks of two trees on the left; same collection: second, as described.

In No. 88. First, before branch growing out of a stump in front on the right; trees on the left dry at top; same collection: second, as described.

In No. 90. First, before dark etchings in foreground.

In No. 91. First, before dark etchings on bank.

In No. 92. First, before the name.

In No. 93. First, less worked.

In No. 98. First, before the bushes on the edge of the hill were continued from the castle to the bottom; difference in the trunk of a tree on the left, the first being lighter: the second, as described.

In No. 99. First, before additional dry branches on the right of the distance; second, as described.

In No. 104. First, three trunks of trees only on the right of the cascade, beyond three pollard trees, termination of foliage lighter; Archduke Charles: second, as described.

In No. 106. First, top of the large tree light and before two dry branches growing out of the bottom of the trunk on the left side; second, as described.

In No. 107. First, has a small number 2 before a small tuft of rushes in the water on the left of a large Duck; Archduke Charles.

In No. 108. First, before a second shorter dry branch, an inch above a longer one, at the end of the large trees on the right; it is about one inch and three quarters from the top; formerly in Mr. Wilson's collection.

In No. 111. First, before down trunk of a pollard tree in the middle, &c.; Archduke Charles.

In No. 114. First, with No. 1.

Having given these variations, not noticed by any other writer, it is only necessary to recommend the inquirer to consult Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. ii.; Weigel's Supplement to Bartsch; and Mr. Wilson's "Catalogue raisonné of the Select Collection of Engravings of an Amateur," privately printed, London, 1828, for the fullest information, at present attainable, respecting the etchings of Anthony Waterloo. He will then discover the importance of the above remarks to a collector. The drawings of Waterloo are also in high estimation; they are generally executed in black chalk and in Indian ink: in the late Baron Verstolk's collection there were several. With regard to his paintings, they are of extreme rarity, and consequently seldom met with in commerce. The pictures of Waterloo and Nainjncx bear so close a resemblance to each other that they are frequently mistaken, and the figures and animals in the landscapes of both are generally by some contemporary artist, perhaps by Jan Asselyn, or J. B. Weenix. There is no certainty respecting the time of Waterloo's death; some writers place it in 1660, others in 1679: one circumstance is perhaps too true, that he died poor in the hospital of St. Job, near to Utrecht. That eminent connoisseur, Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys, assures the editor that he has never met with a genuine picture by Waterloo inscribed with his name.]

WATMAN, HENRY. This artist is mentioned by Professor Christ as an engraver of landscapes, and is said to have marked his prints with an H and a W joined together.

WATSON, CAROLINE. This eminent engraver was born in London about the year 1760. She was instructed in the art by her father, and has engraved several subjects and portraits, both in mezzotinto and in the dotted manner, which possess great merit. Among many others we have the following prints by her:

PORTRAITS.

Prince William of Gloucester; after Reynolds.
 Lord Malmsbury; after the same.
 Mrs. Stanhope; after the same.
 Sir Joshua Reynolds; after Reynolds.
 Earl of Bute; after Gainsborough.
 Ozias Humphry, Painter; after the same.
 Mrs. Drummond and Children; after Shelley.
 Mrs. Siddons, as the Grecian Daughter; after Shrivif.
 Miss Bover; after Hoppner.
 Benjamin West, Esq.; P. R. A.; after Stuart.

William Woollett; after the same.

Sir Robert Boyd, Governor of Gibraltar; after Smart.

WATSON, THOMAS, an eminent English engraver in mezzotinto. He was born in London in 1750, and may be ranked among our ablest artists in that particular branch of engraving, although he died at the premature age of 31, in 1781. Of his numerous prints, the following are among the most esteemed:

PORTRAITS.

Six, of the Windsor Beauties; after Lely.
 Lord Apsley and his Brother; after N. Dance.
 Frances, Countess of Jersey; after Gardner.
 Alderman Sawbridge, in the character of a Roman senator; after West.

PORTRAITS AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland.
 Lady Bamfylde.
 Lady Melbourne.
 James Hay, Earl of Errol.
 Lady Broughton.
 Dr. Newton, Bishop of Bristol.
 Warren Hastings.
 Mrs. Sheridan, as St. Cecilia.
 Georgina, Countess Spencer.
 Lady Townshend, and her two Sisters.
 Mrs. Crowe.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Jupiter and Mercury, with Philemon and Baucis; after Rembrandt.
 The Virgin, with the infant Jesus and St. John; after Coreggio.
 The Death of Mark Anthony; after N. Dance.

WATSON, JAMES. This artist was of the same family with the engraver mentioned in the preceding article, and distinguished himself not less than his relative as a scraper in mezzotinto. We have by him a great number of interesting plates, among which are several from the portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds, which are particularly deserving of notice. Among his most admired prints are the following:

PORTRAITS AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

Anne, Duchess of Cumberland.
 Elizabeth, Duchess of Buccleugh, with her daughter.
 The Duchess of Manchester, with her son, as Diana and Cupid.
 The Countess of Carlisle.
 Sir Jeffery Amherst, Commander-in-chief in America.
 Jemima, Countess Cornwallis.
 Robert Drummond, Archbishop of York.
 Barbara, Countess of Coventry.
 Sir John Cust, Speaker of the House of Commons.
 John, Marquis of Granby.
 John Hely Hutchinson, Secretary of State in Ireland.
 Doctor Samuel Johnson.
 Lord and Lady Pembroke, with their Son.
 Vice-Admiral Sir George Bridges Rodney.
 Lady Scarsdale, with her Son.
 Isabella, Countess of Sefton.
 Frances, Marchioness of Tavistock.
 Miss Price.
 Henry Woodward, Comedian.
 Mrs. Abington, as Thalia.

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Paul Pontius, Engraver; after Vandych.
 Doctor Busby; after Riley.
 Charles, Duke of Richmond; after Romney.
 The Duchess of Leinster; after the same.
 John, Duke of Argyll; after Gainsborough.
 Miss Lascelles, with a Greyhound; after Cotes.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A Madonna; after Reynolds.
 The Children in the Wood; after the same.
 Rubens and his Family; after J. Jordæns.

WATTEAU, ANTHONY. This eminent painter was born at Valenciennes in 1684. His parents were in indigent circumstances, and were unable to cultivate his genius as it deserved. He was, however, placed with an obscure artist in his native city, with whom he remained, until he discovered the incapacity of his preceptor to render him further assistance. In 1702 he connected himself with a scene-painter, who was on his way to Paris, and, on his arrival in that city, for some time assisted his associate in painting theatrical decorations for the Opera-house. This resource was not of long duration; his companion having accomplished his commission quitted Paris, and Watteau was left in a situation of embarrassment and obscurity, which rendered it difficult for him to subsist. In this state of destitution he became acquainted with Claude Gillot, an artist who had acquired some celebrity as a painter of grotesques, and subjects from the Fable; a similarity of style, and in their disposition, increased the esteem Gillot had conceived of his talents; he received him into his house, instructed him in all he knew, and it was not long before Watteau surpassed his master. He further improved his style, by studying the splendid works of Rubens, in the Luxembourg Gallery, and acquired an admirable system of colouring, in which he may be said to have excelled every painter of his country. His success as a colourist induced him to turn his thoughts to historic painting, and, with that intention, he was assiduous in designing from the model, and even obtained the first prize at the Academy, for a subject of history. Fortunately for his fame, he did not persist in that career, in which, it is probable, he must have contented himself with a rank in the herd of mediocrity; he discovered a new path to celebrity; he painted balls, masquerades, gallant and pastoral subjects, in a style which has given rise to a host of imitators, without producing a rival. His figures are designed with finesse, and have the suppleness and ease of nature. His colouring fresh and splendid, is equally admired in the tenderness of his carnations, the brilliancy of his habiliments, and in the verdure of his landscapes. The national taste of his country prevails, however, in his most esteemed productions; and Lord Orford justly observes, that "he painted imaginary nymphs and swains, and described a kind of impossible pastoral, a rural life, led by those opposites of rural simplicity, people of rank and fashion. Watteau's shepherdesses, nay, his very sheep are coquettes, yet he avoided the glare and cliquant of his countrymen, and though he fell short of the dignified grace of the Italians, there is an easy air in his figures, and that more familiar species of the graceful, which we call genteel. His nymphs are as much below the forbidding majesty of goddesses, as they are above the hoyden awkwardness of country girls. In his halts and marches of cavalry, the careless slouch of his soldiers still retain the air of a nation that aspires to be agreeable as well as victorious."

Watteau visited England in the reign of George I., but the indifferent state of his health did not permit him to remain here longer than a year. He returned to France, where he died in 1721. This ingenious artist etched a few plates in a slight, spirited style, among which are the following:

A set of twelve plates of Habits a-la-mode.
Soldiers fatigued with their March.

[According to Dumesnil, the whole of Watteau's etchings consist of eight only; seven of those entitled Figures de Modes, and one called La Troupe Italienne. Five of Figures de Modes are by Thomassin, De Place, and Jeurat; Soldiers Marching is by Boucher. See Dumesnil, tom. ii. But there are other etchings by Watteau, particularly an oblong landscape with figures, which is very scarce. To speak of Watteau's paintings as they deserve would require a long dissertation, which must be deferred; at present all that can be said is that they are very beautiful of their class, and very, very rare in commerce.]

[WATTS, WILLIAM, a very industrious and excellent landscape engraver, who flourished during the last quarter of the 18th century. He published, in 1779, "Views of the Seats of the English Nobility and Gentry," and was engaged in many other similar works, in conjunction with Paul Sandby, Ingleby, Middiman, Fittler, Angus, Milton, &c. By the lovers of picturesque scenery, the works of all these engravers, as well as of the contemporary designers, will always be held in estimation for their beautiful selection, truth, and simplicity, and fine artistic execution. The editor is informed that Watts is still living; if so, he must be a centenarian: his artistic career is at all events terminated.]

WAUMANS, CONRADE, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1630. He was a pupil of Peter Bailliu, whose style he imitated, and his plates are little inferior to those of his instructor. His drawing is not more correct than that of his master. We have by him several portraits and historical subjects, after the painters of his country, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

PORTRAITS.

Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange; after Vanduyck.
Emilia de Solms, Princess of Orange; after the same.
Don Antonio de Zuniga; after the same.
John Both, Landscape painter; after Willaerts.
Herman Zachtleven, Painter; after a picture by himself.
David Bailli, Painter; the same.
Cornelius Jansen, Painter; the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Descent from the Cross; after Rubens.
The Assumption of the Virgin; after the same.
The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Vanduyck.
Mars and Venus; after the same.

[It is probable that this artist was born earlier than 1630, as he operated in 1642, but the editor can find no particulars of his life.]

WEBBER, JOHN. This artist was born in London in 1752. His father, who was a sculptor, was a native of Berne, in Switzerland, and sent his son to Paris when he was young, where he received part of his instruction as an artist; and on his return to London frequented the Royal Academy. Having acquired considerable reputation as a designer of landscape, he was appointed draughtsman to accompany Captain Cook, in the last voyage he made to the South Seas, for the purpose of designing whatever was remarkable in the different countries they might explore. From this voyage he returned in 1780, when he was employed by the Lords of the Admiralty to superintend the engraving of the prints executed from the drawings which he had made. When this work was concluded, he published, on his own account, a set of views of the principal places he had visited. They were etched and acquainted by himself, afterwards coloured, and produced a very pleasing effect. He then devoted his attention to landscape painting. His pictures produce a pleasing effect, and are carefully finished, though perhaps with too much attention to the minutiae, and occasionally somewhat gaudy in the colouring.

Mr. Webber was elected an Associate in 1785, and Royal Academician in 1791. He died in 1793.

WEBBERS, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1656. He engraved several views of the churches and public buildings at Amsterdam, which were published in 1656, with a description in Dutch and French. They are very indifferently executed.

WEELING, ANSELM. This artist was born at Bois le Duc in 1675. His father was an officer in the service of the States General, and intended him for the profession of arms, but he yielded to the decided disposition his son discovered for the art, and placed him under the care of an obscure painter, named Delang, from whom he learned the rudiments of design. Finding that he could profit but little by the instruction of such a preceptor, he left Bois le Duc and went to Middleburg, where he became acquainted with Jacob Bart, who possessed a collection of the works of the most eminent masters of the Dutch school, who permitted him, for two years, to study and copy the pictures of the most celebrated painters. He was particularly attached to the productions of Godfrey Schalcken and Adrian Vanderwerf, whose style he followed with great success. His most esteemed pictures are those he painted in imitation of the former of those artists, representing subjects by candle-light, some of which have been mistaken for the works of Schalcken. He was a competent master of the principles of light and shadow, his colouring is rich and glowing, and his design is tolerably correct. In the latter part of his life he is said to have become a slave to intemperance and debauchery, and his earlier performances are infinitely superior to those of a later date. He died in 1749.

WEENINX, [OR WEENIX,] JOHN BAPTIST. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1621. He was the son of John Weeninx, an architect of considerable celebrity, who dying when he was very young, he was placed by his mother with a bookseller, with the intention of bringing him up to that business; but such was his inclination for drawing, that he was permitted to follow the bent of his genius, and he first became a scholar of John Micker, a painter little known; but he afterwards had the advantage of being instructed by Abraham Bloemaert. Under so able a master, his progress was uncommon, and in a short time he surprised his preceptor, by the facility and precision with which he designed the principal buildings, castles, and ruins in the vicinity of Amsterdam. He drew with equal spirit and accuracy all kinds of animals and huntings, and the applauses he received encouraged him to attempt the same subjects in oil. On leaving the school of Bloemaert, he passed two years under Nicholas Moojaert, to whose style he was much attached. When he was eighteen years of age he found himself sufficiently grounded in the art to dispense with further assistance, and he painted several pictures, which were favourably received by the public. This flattering encouragement only served to render him more desirous of improvement, and he formed the project of visiting Italy. On his arrival at Rome he was particularly struck with the magnificence of every object by which he was surrounded; but, above all, by the sublime monuments of ancient grandeur, which remain in the architectural ruins in the environs of that capital. His talents recommended him to the notice of many of the principal personages at Rome. The Cardinal Pamphili was amongst his most distinguished protectors, who not only favoured him with many commissions, but settled on him a pension, besides the remuneration he received for his pictures. That prelate was desirous of retaining Weeninx at Rome, but the solicitations of his family, and his desire of exhibiting the ability which had gained him such celebrity in Italy, to the notice of his countrymen, induced him to return to Holland, after an absence of four years. The curiosity of his fellow citizens produced him extensive employment, and he had acquired the reputation of one of the most distinguished artists of his country, when he died, in the vigour of his life, in 1660, aged 39.

It is difficult to form an idea of the various and extensive powers of this artist; he painted history, portraits, landscapes, sea-ports, animals, and dead game; and in all these different branches acquired the reputation of uncommon ability; but his particular excellence was in painting Italian sea-ports, enriched with noble architecture, and decorated with figures representing embarkations, or the activity of commercial industry. In these subjects he has perhaps only been surpassed by Nicholas Berghem, whom he has the credit of ranking among his numerous disciples.

[Bartsch attributes two etchings to J. B. Weeninx; The Bull, and The Man seated; the first he says was engraved in his youth, and is signed Batta Weeninx; the second is not finished, but is designed in very good taste, and engraved with a dexterous point, showing the master to be well exercised in the art. He observes, previously, that there is such a difference between them, both in the taste of the drawing and the management of the point, that it may be believed that they are not by the same hand, whence he infers that Weeninx engraved them at two very distant periods of his life. Rudolph Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, describes five others: A Bull standing in a mountainous landscape, in which there are a tower and an aqueduct; signed J. B. Weeninx, the J and B interlaced. A Cow standing in a landscape signed above Gio. Batta Weenin A. D.—1649, a di 19 Oltre, the letters reversed, and at bottom J. Weeninx. A Bull and an Ass in water, on the right a dog swimming, and on the left a man and some ruins, no signature. A Fountain, near to which are a cavalier, another figure, and a dog, in front of a magnificent building, signed J. Weeninx; and a View in Italy, in which are introduced a monastery, ruins, pilgrims, &c., not signed. Weigel expresses a doubt whether the second piece mentioned by Bartsch, and the Fountain, described by himself, are not by the younger Weeninx.

In the Duke of Sutherland's gallery there is a landscape by J. B. Weeninx, in which there is a tomb inscribed with the following riddle:

Cy git le père, cy git la mère,
Cy git la sœur, cy git le frère,
Cy git la femme, et le mari,
Et il n'ya que deux corps ici.

1651. Giovan Battista Weeninx.]

WEENINX, [OR WEENIX,] JOHN, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Amsterdam in 1644, and was instructed in the art by his father until he was sixteen years of age, when he had the misfortune of being deprived of the assistance of that eminent artist, by his premature death. He had, however, made sufficient progress in the art to prosecute his studies without further assistance, and he found that the best system to follow was an attentive observance of nature. Though less universal than his father, he painted with great reputation landscapes, animals, flowers, and fruit. But he particularly excelled in the representation of dead game and huntings, in which he may be said to have surpassed every artist of his country. His celebrity in that branch of the art induced the Elector, John William, to invite him to his court, and many of his most considerable works are in the gallery at Dusseldorf, and in the chateau of Bensberg, a hunting seat of the Elector Palatine, which he decorated with a series of hunting pieces of the Boar and Stag, in which the animals are designed and painted with a correctness and spirit, which cannot be too much admired. His landscapes are very inferior to those of his father, and it is evident that he considered them as merely accessories to his principal subject. In his large pictures, his compositions are ingenious and picturesque, his touch is bold and animated, his colouring clear and brilliant, and he always exhibits a perfect acquaintance with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. His works of a cabinet size are exquisitely finished, without impoverishing the spirit of his touch, or diminishing the breadth of his light and shadow. His works are deservedly held in the highest estimation, and are placed in the choicest collections. He died in 1719.

[It would be an idle question to discuss whether John Weenix, in his representations of animals, exhibits more talent in painting one species than another, he is really so excellent in all. The objects, however, that rivet the attention most are, perhaps, the birds. The soft down of the duck, the glossy plumage of the pigeon, the splendour of the peacock, the magnificent spread of an inanimate swan, producing a flood of light, and serving as a contrast to all around it, are each so attractive that it is impossible to see and examine them without feeling delight at their truth, and expressing admiration of the skill of the painter, in rivalling nature without apparent labour. But his living hounds and other dogs and dead hares are not less true; and the objects of still-life, such as sporting instruments, ornamented vases, fruits and flowers, and other accessories with which he embellishes the principal subject, are all represented with the same fidelity and beauty, and claim from the observer their meed of applause. It has been said that his landscapes do not equal those by his father; they are such as accord with his subjects, and no more need be required. There are many of the master's works in England, to be found only in the collections of tasteful and opulent amateurs, as they are constantly progressing in value. Among those that have come under the editor's notice, are a large picture of a dead Swan and a Peacock, of the natural size, tied to a tree, in a garden richly embellished with accessories, and in which a lady and gentleman, attended by a page, are passing near a fountain. This was in the late Sir Charles Bagot's collection. Another, from the Brentano collection, is now at Raynham Hall, the seat of Lord Charles Townsend; it is somewhat larger than the preceding, and exhibits a beautiful landscape, in the foreground of which are a large hound and two dead ducks; on the right, near a superb vase, are two hares, a pheasant, a brace of partridges, a woodcock, a gun, and other accessories, and is a very important picture of the master.

A very tasteful picture of a Dead Peacock and a Dead white Duck, with other birds, most admirably painted, in a landscape with elegant architectural background, is in the possession of Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys. The late William Beckford had an exquisite specimen, consisting of a group of game, a hare, a pheasant, partridges, &c.

Those specified are types of the master, and may serve as examples to test the truth of others that are sometimes falsely attributed to his inimitable pencil. Though John Weenix lived to the advanced age of 75, there is no diminution in the beauty and finish of his latest pictures; one in the king of Holland's private collection, signed J. Weenix, f. 1718, the year previous to his death, ranks as a chef d'œuvre.]

WEERDT, ADRIAN DE. According to Descamps, this painter was born at Brussels in 1510, and studied at Antwerp, under Christian Queburgh, [Queborn,] a landscape painter little known. He afterwards visited Italy, where he passed some years, and applied himself particularly to study the works of Parmigiano. On his return to Flanders, he executed several pictures in the graceful style of that distinguished master, particularly a series of the Life of the Virgin, by which he had acquired great reputation, when the troubles of the Low Countries obliged him to quit Brussels, in 1566, and take refuge at Cologne, where he died soon afterwards.

[All the notices of this artist are unsatisfactory; they contradict each other when they are not borrowed. By some he is called Abraham, by others Andrea; Brulliot conjectures that Abraham De Weerd was an engraver on wood, but gives no dates, nor other particulars to justify applying it to the painter. Zani marks Adrian as a landscape painter, engraver, and author, B. B., says he operated in 1566, and died very young. Füssli places his death in 1570, at Cologne; Immerzeel in 1566; and Balkema says he died at Bologne in 1552. It may be noted that his family name was Hoste.]

WEERT, J. DE. This artist, who flourished about the year 1605, was probably a native of the Low Countries, though he chiefly resided at Paris. He was principally employed by the booksellers, and engraved several frontispieces and other book ornaments in a neat, though tasteless style. They are executed entirely with the graver, and his drawing is heavy and incorrect. We have also by him a set of prints from his own designs, representing the Life and Passion of Christ, published by John Le Clerc, with French verses to each print.

WEESOP. In the Anecdotes of Painting in England, this artist is said to have arrived here in 1641, a little before the death of Vandyck, of whose manner he was so successful an imitator, that several of his pictures have passed for those of that master. He left England in 1649, saying, "he would never live in a country where they cut off their king's head, and were not ashamed of the action." The noble author observes, that it had been more sensible in an artist to say, he would not stay where they cut off the head of a king who rewarded painters, and defaced and sold his collection.

WEIGEL, JOHN. This artist was a native of Germany, and is said to have been an engraver on wood. He is mentioned by Mr. Strutt, but his works are not specified.

[Hans, or Jan, Weigel, was a designer, engraver in wood, and printer at Nuremberg; he operated in 1535, and died in, or about, 1590. He marked his cuts HW. These letters are found on portraits, and on a wood cut representing two unruly horses, one of which appears to have just thrown his rider, the other is galloping to the right, where a man is attempting to catch his bridle; near to a little dog, on the same side, is the artist's mark. Hans Weigel is also known by his book of costumes, and by ornamental book-titles, some of which have his initials. 'Gedruckt zu Nurnberger bey Hans Weygel Formschneyder, bey dem Sonnenbad.']

WEIGEL, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He engraved a set of prints of subjects taken from the Old and New Testaments. Each plate contains four prints, and the number of the plates amount to one hundred for the Old Testament, and one hundred and ten for the New. The title of this collection is Sacra Scriptura loquens in imaginibus, &c. They appear to be all engraved by himself, and from his own designs. According to M. Heineken this artist also engraved in mezzotinto.

[Christopher Weigel was born at Redwitz in Bohemia, in 1654; from 1666 to 1678 he went successively to the cities of Hof, Jena, and Augsburg, to study the different branches of engraving. In 1682 he went to Vienna; in 1683 to Frankfort; returned to Vienna in 1688, to Augsburg in 1691, and finally settled at Nuremberg, where he established himself as a dealer in prints on an extensive scale. He died in 1725.

There is a mediocre mezzotinto by him, inscribed "Carolus V Dei gratia Lotharingæ Barri, &c. Dux. C. Weigel f. et ex. 1688."

[WEINHER, HANS OF JAN, a painter and engraver, of Weilheim, in Bavaria, was in the service of the Duchess Maximilienne in quality of valet de chambre. He studied engraving under Frederic Sustis, and published his first print on the 12th of January, 1610. He afterwards studied under Christopher Schwartz, and engraved several pieces after his pictures. On an etching in aquafortis, representing Christ seated on a stone, and surrounded by soldiers holding lances and flags, is the mark attributed to him HW with a bunch of grapes. Occasionally his etchings are found with the grapes only. There is no account of how long he flourished, or of his works as a painter.]

[WEINHER, PETER, a designer and engraver, and also assayer of the Mint to the Duke of Bavaria, lived at Munich in 1580. Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. ix., has described twelve prints by him; but Brulliot cites many others. They are generally inscribed Petrus Weinher Bavarus fecit, or Petrus Weinher Varadinus Bavarus, or Bavarica; to which he occasionally adds Monachij and the date.]

WEIROTTER, FRANCIS EDMUND. This ingenious artist was born at Inspruck in 1730. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of J. G. Wille, and became an able designer of landscapes. He afterwards travelled to Italy, where he remained some time, and returned to Paris with a copious collection of drawings from the most picturesque views of that delightful country. In 1767 he was invited to the court of Vienna, where he was appointed Professor of the Academy of design.

We have a great number of charming etchings by this artist, which are executed in a free, spirited style. They consist of landscapes, views of ruins, bridges, churches, cottages, &c., and are formed into sets, and numbered. The following are among the most esteemed of his numerous prints:

- A set of twelve Views in Normandy, with a Dedication.
- Twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Prince of Kaunitz.
- A set of twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Prince of Staremberg.
- Twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Duke Albert of Saxe-Teschen.
- A set of twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Archduchess of Austria.

[Weirotter died at Vienna in 1773. A collection of several series of his etchings, consisting of 186 pieces, was published in 1760 and following years. His works are generally found in the cabinets of collectors of taste, and are prized for the beautiful figures and elegant buildings with which they are enriched, and for the harmonious distribution of the light and shade.]

WEISBROD, CHARLES, a modern German engraver, born at Hamburg in 1754. He was a pupil of J. G. Wille at Paris, and has engraved a great number of plates of landscapes, in a neat, clear style. He executed several of the plates for the cabinets of Poullain, Choiseul, and Praslin. We have also some prints by him after Pynaker, A. Vande Velde, Ruysdael, and other masters.

WEISHUN, SAMUEL, a German engraver, who resided at Dresden about the year 1630. He engraved a considerable number of portraits, which are executed with the graver in a neat, but formal style. Among them is a head inscribed Daniel Senuestus, Wittenb. Profess. 1627. According to Professor Christ, he engraved a set of portraits of the Princes of Saxony, which he sometimes marked with the initials S. W., and sometimes with those letters joined together. [According to Zani, he was a goldsmith, as well as a designer and engraver. He operated as late as 1650.]

WEISSE, GOTTHELF WILLIAM. This artist was born at Dresden about the year 1750, and was instructed in engraving by Giuseppe Canale. He had given proof of considerable ability, when he was invited to the court of Hesse Cassel, where the Landgrave appointed him his principal engraver. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; after Graff.
The Landgravine of Hesse-Cassel; after Tischbein.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Apollo playing on the Lyre; after Tischbein.
A Landscape, with a Waterfall; after Everdingen.
A Landscape, moonlight; after Dietricy.

WELBRONNER, NICHOLAS. Mr. Strutt attributes to this artist the engravings on copper, marked with an N and a W, and dated from 1530 to 1536, representing ornamental foliage and small figures, in imitation of Sebald Beham, among which are the following:

- A figure of Adam; a small upright plate; dated 1534.
- Eve, with the Serpent; the companion.
- A small frieze, representing Children fighting. 1533.

[The real name of this engraver is NICOLAS WILBORN; the error of calling him Welbronner belongs to Professor Christ. Brulliot, with apparent good reason, attributes to him the eighteen etchings described by Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. viii. page 543, under the letters N. NW. (No. 265 of the monograms). These consist of,

1. A Portrait of Bernard Knipperdolling, the chief of the Anabaptists of Munster, dated 1536; copied from the print by H. Aldegrever, No. 183 reversed.
2. Victory and Fame; copied from No. 18 of the master of the Caduceus.
3. A Sacrifice to Priapus; copied, with some variations, from No. 19 of the same master.
4. A Triton making love to a Siren; copied in reverse from No. 24 of the same master, with some amendment in regard to decency.
5. A winged Horse, above his head is written El Tempo. The monogram in a tablet.
6. A Frieze, in which is represented the triumph of Paris and Helen, with other figures. The mark in a tablet, and the date 1535.
7. Saturn in a Car drawn by a Frog and a Dragon, and other symbols: the mark at bottom, on the right. It is supposed that he engraved the other six planets.

8. Infants amusing themselves with warlike sports, on a frieze; a tablet with the letter N and the date 1533 is suspended from the branch of a tree.

The other ten consist of vignettes and ornaments, among which are the two of Adam and Eve, mentioned in the text; they properly form but one, being the two sides designed for the sheath of a poniard, and go together.

Brulliot says he is acquainted with fourteen more by the artist, one of which has his name in full, NICOLAS WILBORN, and the date 1536. This is also the design for the sheath of a poniard, ornamented with foliage, among which are seen above, a lord and a lady, and a human skeleton; and below, Adam and Eve at the tree of life. Above the lord and lady are crowns; in that on the left is the name of the artist, and in that on the right the date, the figures reversed.

Brulliot remarks that Professor Christ has not only misnamed this artist, but falsely explained the monogram, as signifying Nicolas Manuel Deutsch.

[WELL, ARNOLD VAN, born at Dort in 1772, a scholar of Andries Vermeulen, painted cabinet pictures in the manner of the Van Strys, and also winter scenes, and landscapes by moonlight. His pictures are admitted into good collections. He died in 1818.]

WENCESLAUS, OF OLMUTZ. The name of this old German engraver is inscribed on a copy of a print, representing the Death of the Virgin, originally engraved by Martin Schoen. The name is written at length, with the date 1481. This circumstance, together with a resemblance in the style, though inferior, has given rise to a conjecture that he was a disciple of Martin Schoen. We have, however, some other plates by the same artist, in which he has attempted to imitate the style of Israel van Mecheln; and it has been asserted by Mr. Strutt, that the ancient German engravings marked with a W only, which have usually been attributed to Michael Wolgemut, are evidently the productions of the same artist, and are copied from the works of Martin Schoen and Israel van Mecheln. He mentions the following as such, which are marked with the W only.

COPIES FROM THE PRINTS OF MARTIN SCHOEN.

The Annunciation, with a Flower-pot in the front, the Deity appears above.

A Gentleman and Lady walking, Death appears behind a tree in the background.

The Last Supper.

The Crucifixion of St. Andrew.

A set of small upright prints representing the Life and Passion of Christ.

COPIES FROM THOSE OF ISRAEL VAN MECHELN.

Four naked Women, with a Globe hanging from the ceiling; dated 1494. Albert Durer has engraved this subject so exactly, that it appears that he had rather taken his copy from that of Wenceslaus than from the original.

An old Man leading a little Boy, with a Woman having a Girl on her back, following him.

A Lover entertaining his Mistress.

[The whole of the matters relating to Wencelas D'Olmutz and Michael Wohlgemuth, as engravers, is involved in mysterious confusion, from which much effort has been made to extricate them, and to give to one or the other the laurel of victory; each name has its champions pretty equally matched in strength, in skill, and the active use of the only weapon allowed in such combats. The spectator can applaud both sides for courage and dexterity, but finds it difficult to decide which has the best of the battle; neither party will submit to be conquered. The stouter champions on both sides maintain their good humour, and exchange courtesies, like true knights of the golden age of chivalry; some of their squires, however, who feel bound to support their masters à l'outrance, occasionally lose their temper, and use hard words. There is no necessity for it, especially if the combatant is not a native of Olmutz or Nuremberg; and hard words, though they may anger an opponent, will not enlighten his understanding, nor cause him to acknowledge himself convinced. The duty of the editor does not compel him to mingle in the fray, so as to take part with one side or the other: he who wishes to know the grounds and merits of the contests may consult Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. vi., and Ottley's "Inquiry into the History of early Engraving," being principals, not to mention numerous others who are partisans: Zani seems fairly bewildered for once; he is hors de combat, and cries out for assistance. See notes to the letters O and W in vols. xiv. and xix., parte prima, of Enciclopedia Metodica delle belle-Arti.

Strutt and Heineken both mistook, and have misstated, the inscription on the print of the Death of the Virgin. The inscription is 1481. WENCESLAUS DE OLOMUCZ IBIDEM. Strutt gives a fac simile of the characters in plate ix., No. 194 of the monograms, but substitutes the English particle of for de; and, speaking of the inscription in his account of Wenceslaus, seems to be at a loss about the word ibidem: for he says, "underneath the print is written with the pen Wenceslaus of Olmutz in Bohemia. But I hardly think the letters will bear that interpretation. I have therefore, for the satisfaction of my readers, copied the whole inscription, at length, upon the plate at the end of the volume."

Heineken, who mentions the print twice, transforms the words Olomucz Ibidem into Olohucz. J. biofh. It is hoped that an etymologist will some day arise, and, taking the hint from Heineken, by a little transposition of letters, and interpretation of meanings, according to the process usual in such cases, reconcile all the differences respecting W. D'Olomucz and Wohlgemuth, and prove to his own satisfaction, at least, if not of others, that they are identical.

Bartsch has described 57 prints which he attributes to Wencelas D'Olmutz, and one which he considers doubtful. Brulliot says the list is not complete, as he is acquainted with more than a dozen pieces that are not inserted. See note to WOHLGEMUTH.

WENG, [or WENIG,] J. G. The name of this artist is affixed to a print representing Minerva visiting the Muses. It is etched in the manner of De Hooghe, in a neat style. It is dated 1630, and appears to have been the work of a painter.

WENGH, ———. Mr. Strutt mentions a print with this name affixed to it, dated 1509, representing a male and female figure almost naked. Over the head of the man, who is attended by a dog, is written PARIS, and over the woman, EGENOE, probably by mistake for Oenone, the nymph of Mount Ida, whom Paris forsook for Helen. The print, he observes, has nothing, but its scarcity, to recommend it, and appears to be the work of a German, imitating the style of the early Italian engravers. [The name is variously written, Wenig, Wening, or Weng, but nothing certain is known of him.]

WERDLER, ———. This artist engraved a portrait of Charles, Lord Cathcart, in armour.

WERDMULLER, RUDOLF. This artist was born at Zurich in Switzerland, in 1639, and was a disciple of Conrad Meyer. He had given promise of uncommon ability as a painter of history and portraits, when he was unfortunately drowned, in 1668, in the twenty-ninth year of his age.

WERENFELS, RUDOLF. According to Fuessli, this artist was born at Basle, in Switzerland, in 1629. He received his first instruction in the art at Amsterdam, but he afterwards travelled to Italy, where he studied some time. He chiefly distinguished himself in portraiture, and was much employed at several of the courts of Germany. His portraits are frequently accompanied with appropriate accessories, which were ingeniously composed, but his colouring was cold and feeble. He died in 1673.

WERF, ADRIAN VANDER. This admired painter was born at Kralinger-Ambacht, near Rotterdam, in 1659. Having discovered an early disposition for the art, he was placed under the care of Cornelius Picolett, a portrait painter of no great ability, under whom he remained two years, when he became a scholar of Eglon Vander Neer. He had made considerable progress under that painter, when a picture by Francis Mieris was brought to his master to be copied. Vander Neer thinking that none of his disciples were so capable of succeeding in so delicate an undertaking as Vander Werf, intrusted him with the commission, which he executed in so perfect a manner, that it deceived the most intelligent judges. When he was eighteen years of age he left the school of Vander Neer, and established himself at Rotterdam, where he met with the most flattering encouragement. He became intimately acquainted with M. Flink, who possessed an extensive collection of drawings, by the best Italian masters, to which he had at all times access, and it was from these models, and by drawing after the best casts from the antique, that he formed a more correct and elevated taste of design than any painter of his country.

In 1696, the Elector Palatine visited Holland, and, in passing through Rotterdam, was particularly struck with the works of Vander Werf. He commissioned him to paint a picture of the Judgment of Solomon, and his own portrait, which he intended to send to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, to be placed among those of the most distinguished painters in the Florentine Gallery, and invited him to bring the two pictures, when finished, to Dusseldorp. The following year he undertook the journey, and delivered his pictures, which were greatly admired by the Elector and all his court. That prince was desirous of his remaining in his service at Dusseldorp, but Vander Werf excused himself, urging the necessity he was under of returning to his family and friends at Rotterdam. He engaged to devote six months in the year to the service of the Elector, for which he received a liberal pension. He continued to be employed by that prince until the death of the Elector, in 1717; and several of his most capital pictures are in the gallery at Dusseldorp. Ten of his pictures were purchased by Sir Gregory Page, a few years before the death of Vander Werf, which happened in 1722.

No painter has carried finishing to so high a pitch as Vander Werf, yet his pictures produce a less pleasing effect than those of Gerard Douw and Francis Mieris. Sir Joshua Reynolds gives the following critique on the pictures in the Dusseldorp Gallery. "The most distinguished pictures in this room are the Vander Werfs, which are twenty-four in number. Three of them are as large as life; a Magdalene, whole-length, and two portraits. The Magdalene was painted as a companion to the St. John of Raffaele, but it was not thought, even by his friends and admirers, that he had succeeded; however, he has certainly spared no pains; it is as smooth and as highly finished as his small pictures, but his defects are here magnified, and consequently more apparent. His pictures, whether great or small, certainly afford but little pleasure. Of their want of effect it is worth a painter's while to inquire the cause. One of the principal causes appears to me, his having entertained an opinion that the light of a picture ought to be thrown solely on the figures, and little or none on the ground or sky. This gives great coldness to the effect, and is so contrary to nature and the practice of those painters with whose works he was surrounded, that we cannot help wondering how he fell into this mistake.

"His naked figures appear to be of a much harder substance than flesh, though his outline is far from cutting, or the light not united with the shade, which are the most common causes of hardness; but it appears to me that in the present instance the hardness of manner proceeds from the softness and union being too general; the light being every where equally lost in the ground or its shadow.

"In describing Vander Werf's manner, were I to say that all the parts every where melt into each other, it might naturally be supposed that the effect would be a high degree of softness; but it is notoriously the contrary, and I think for the reason that has been given; his flesh has the appearance of ivory or plaster, or some other hard substance. What contributes likewise to give this hardness, is a want of transparency in his colouring, from his admitting little or no reflexions of light. He had also the defect which is frequently found in Rembrandt, that of making his light only a single spot. However, to do him justice, his figures and his heads are generally well drawn, and his drapery is excellent; perhaps there are in his pictures as perfect examples of drapery as are to be found in any other painter's works whatever."

[In Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the works of the most eminent Dutch and Flemish Painters, vol. iv., and Supplement, there are about one hundred and fifty pictures by this master described.]

WERF, PETER VANDER, was the younger brother of Adrian Vander Werf, born [at Kralinger-Ambacht,] near Rotterdam, in 1665, and was instructed in the art by his brother. He for some time confined himself to copying the works of Adrian; but he afterwards painted pictures of his own composition, some of which were retouched by his brother. Though he occasionally painted history, his pictures more frequently represent domestic subjects and small portraits, in which he was much employed. One of his principal productions is a picture in the hotel of the East India Company, representing the portraits of the Directors at that time. Without equalling his brother in the extreme polish of his finishing, the pictures of Peter Vander Werf are very highly wrought up, and have sometimes been mistaken for the works of Adrian. He died in 1718.

WERNER, JOSEPH. This artist was born at Berne, in Switzerland, in 1637. He was the son of a painter of little celebrity, by whom he was instructed in the first rudiments of the art; but he afterwards was sent to Frankfort, where he became a scholar of Matthew Merian the younger. Aided by the instruction of that able master, his progress was so unusual, that it even surprised his preceptor, who, desirous of procuring for so promising a talent the best means of improvement, recommended him to travel to Italy, and introduced his pupil to the patronage of M. Muller, an amateur of fortune and taste, who was going to Rome, by whom he was invited to accompany him in his journey. So advantageous an offer was particularly agreeable to our young artist, who, by his amiable manners and ingenious conversation, conciliated the favour and esteem of his protector.

During his residence at Rome, Werner was indefatigable in designing from every object which could conduce to his advancement. He for some time painted in oil and in fresco, but his predilection for high finishing induced him to prefer miniature, which he carried to a perfection which has perhaps never been surpassed. His historical subjects are ingeniously composed, and designed with a correctness and taste very unusual in that confined branch of the art. His colouring is clear and forcible, and his heads have a fine expression. He was also much employed in portraiture, in which he particularly excelled. In returning from Italy he passed through France, where his talents recommended him to the notice of Louis XIV. He was invited to Versailles, where he painted the portrait of the king, and those of several of the principal personages of the court; and was also much employed in historical and emblematical subjects, which were so much admired, that the most flattering proposals were made to him to induce him to establish himself in France, but he had already accepted an invitation he had received from the court of Inspruck, where he painted the portrait of the Archduchess, and was recompensed with a liberal remuneration, and presented with a gold medal and chain. In 1696, Frederick, Elector of Brandenburg, and first king of Prussia, appointed him director of the Academy at Berlin, with a liberal salary. He died in 1710.

WESEL, TELMAN VAN. This artist was probably a native of Germany. It appears, by an inscription on one of his plates, that he was a goldsmith as well as an engraver. His prints are chiefly copies from the works of Albert Durer, and other German masters, and are very indifferently executed. Among others are the following:

Adam and Eve; after the print by Albert Durer. Upon the tablet, on which the name of A. Durer appears in the original plate, is inscribed, TELMAN VAN WESEL, GOLDSMIT.

Several Soldiers conversing; after the same; marked T. M. W.

St. Christopher; after one of the old German masters; marked T. W.

[WEST, BENJAMIN, an Anglo-American historical painter, was born at Springfield, province of Pennsylvania, in North America, October 10th, 1738. From his earliest infancy he evinced a great inclination for drawing, and made many untaught efforts to arrive at a knowledge of it. His biographers dwell largely on his childish endeavours, and would persuade the world that he was a prodigy in art from his cradle. At eight years old he received some lessons in colouring from a party of wandering Cherokee Indians, who were pleased with his rude drawings of birds, fruits, and flowers. Give honour where honour is due; West's first instructors in colouring were the wild children of the woods; the future president of the Royal Academy of Great Britain took his earliest lessons in painting from a tribe of Cherokees! The Indians perceived that he had talent, and being unwilling to leave such a boy in ignorance, they taught him archery also. His knowledge of drawing the bow was useful to him in after life; he availed himself of it on his first visit to Rome, in giving his opinion of the Belvidere Apollo. From this time he groped his way as well as he could, availing himself of every circumstance that tended to enlarge his knowledge of the mechanical part of painting, without the assistance of any competent instructor on scientific principles. On the death of his mother he removed, in the eighteenth year of his age, to Philadelphia, and established himself as a portrait painter. Having painted the portraits of as many Philadelphians as desired it, he repaired to New York and continued his practice. He found it a profitable trade, and was enabled to amass money: but he yearned to be acquainted with the higher grades of painting, and for that purpose planned a journey to Rome. This shows the aspiring disposition of the man, and that he possessed an innate propensity for art; he knew his deficiencies, he felt the want of instruction; he calculated that among the works of the Italian masters, of whom he had heard, all his wants would be supplied. Fortunately for him, a merchant of the name of Kelly, of New York, was sitting to him for his portrait, and to him West expressed his desire of visiting Italy for the purpose of improving himself in art. This noble-minded merchant heard his story, paid him ten guineas for his portrait, gave him a letter to his agents at Philadelphia to facilitate his passage to Leghorn, shook him by the hand, and wished him a good journey. On presenting the letter to the agents it was found to contain an order for fifty guineas, "a present to aid in his equipment for Italy." Allen, a merchant of Philadelphia, was then sending a cargo to Leghorn, and offered the artist a free passage. Thus assisted he took his departure, and arrived at Rome in July, 1760. An American in search of art was a novelty in Rome, and of course caused a sensation. Having a letter of introduction to Lord Grantham, he was at once introduced to the best society. The artists and others were curious to observe the effect of a sight of the Apollo Belvidere, the Venus, and the paintings of Raphael, on one whom they supposed was only a half-cultivated savage. With this view it was arranged that the first object of great art on which his feeling should be tried, should be the Apollo. The figure was enclosed in a case, and when the keeper threw open the doors West exclaimed, "My God—a young Mohawk warrior!" The Italians did not relish the comparison of their noblest statue to a wild savage; but when West described the admirable symmetry of their persons, the elasticity of their limbs, and their unconstrained motions, and added, "I have seen Mohawks often standing in the very attitude of this Apollo, watching with an intent eye the arrow just discharged from the bow," they admitted the justness of his exclamation, and no longer considered him a semi-barbarian.

West continued in Italy for about three years. After seeing the treasures of Rome, he visited Florence, Bologna, Venice, Parma, and other states, made copies of certain celebrated pictures, and painted some originals. The funds with which he started would have been but a poor supply for his protracted stay; but his friends, Allen and Kelly, the merchants of Philadelphia, Governor Hamilton, and other of his admirers, were determined that his studies should not be frustrated for want of means. "I regard this young man," said the generous merchant, "as an honour to his country; he is the first that America has sent forth to cultivate the fine arts; he shall not be frustrated in his studies; for I shall send him whatever money he may require." "I think with you," said Hamilton, "but you must not have all the honour to yourself, allow me to unite with you in the responsibility of the credit." Thus nobly supported, West was enabled to devote his mind untroubled to the study of the great objects of art around him. In the middle of the year 1763 West arrived at London, with no intention of remaining in England; but his reception there decided his future course. Patronized by church dignitaries and noblemen, introduced to royalty, and favourably received by artists and literary men, a return to America was no longer his desire; he sent for the lady of his early attachment, married, and settled for life in old England. For nearly sixty years he held a prominent position among the painters of the country; he produced numerous pictures both from sacred and profane history, and probably his works had some effect, at the time, in inciting others to attempt this higher order of painting; but he did not create a school, nor has his style survived him. The subjects of his first historical compositions he selected, or rather they were selected for him, from ancient history or biography. Agrippina landing with the Ashes of Germanicus, the Departure of Regulus from Rome, the Death of Epaminondas, Cyrus liberating the Family of the King of Armenia, Segestus and his Daughter brought before Germanicus, and other incidents to be found in Greek and Roman history, and in Plutarch's Lives. But he deserves more credit for having been the first to paint modern history divested of Grecian and Roman costume. His Death of Wolfe was an astonishing innovation; it alarmed existing prejudices; it struck a heavy blow at, and was a great discouragement to, artistic conventionalities. The ample paludamentum, the helmet, spear, and shield, were to be abandoned, and their places supplied, if the subject was European, by the military regulation coat, the cocked hat, and the musket with the bayonet. The bases, which covered the nether parts of the Greek and Roman soldiers, but permitted the painter to exhibit his knowledge of anatomy, were to be removed for the less picturesque objects—leathern breeches, and the ornamental greaves and sandals, for well blacked and polished boots.

West's picture was successful with the public; and having received the approbation of the king, the prejudices of Reynolds and the opposing artists were overcome. Perhaps no English picture ever had so great a degree of popularity as the Death of Wolfe. West painted many pictures for George III., and projected many more which circumstances prevented being carried into execution. Those for St. George's Hall, at Windsor, are among his best, and are with great propriety taken from English history.

On the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds he was appointed to the president's chair, and took his place on the 24th March, 1792. He delivered an inaugural address, which was much applauded, but, says his biographer, it must have cost him little thought, as it dwelt but on two topics—the excellence of British art, and the gracious benevolence of his Majesty. It is scarcely necessary to speak of more than three or four of his larger works, as there is such an equality of merit in them all. Next to his Death of Wolfe, and Battle of La Hogue, perhaps he obtained the greatest share of reputation for the painting of Death on the pale Horse, in which certainly he displayed more of poetic imagination than in any other of his compositions. Christ Rejected has much merit; in general interest it surpasses the others. Christ healing in the Temple, now in the National Gallery, supercedes the necessity of saying any thing respecting his manner of treating a subject, nor of his style in painting it. Foreign nations are acquainted with his works through the admirable engravings of Woollett, Sharpe, and Hall; his Death of Nelson was engraved by James Heath. He died on the 11th of March, 1820, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

It is said that he painted and sketched in oil upwards of four hundred pictures, many of them of large dimensions; yet his pictures are rarely met with in collections: his sketches are the most esteemed. Many of his figures are quite original, they are not to be traced to any other master; and as he was careful not to imitate the older masters, so succeeding painters have religiously avoided imitating him.]

[WESTALL, RICHARD, an English historical and poetical painter and designer, was born about the year 1765. He was placed as an apprentice with an engraver of heraldry on silver and other materials, who lived in Gutter Lane, Cheapside. Towards the end of his apprenticeship he was permitted by his master to attend at the Royal Academy in the evenings to practise drawing, where he formed an acquaintance with Mr. Lawrence, afterwards Sir Thomas. At the conclusion of his servitude he and Mr. Lawrence took a house, jointly, at the corner of Greek Street, Soho Square, having two entrances; on the door in Greek Street was placed the name of Westall, on that in the Square the name of Lawrence.

It is not necessary to follow Mr. Westall in his progress; the subjects he chose, and the style in which he represented them, were suitable to the time; he became a favourite with the public, to whom his manner was new, and his affectations appeared elegant. Episodes of Love seemed best suited to his gentle mind and pencil; he painted pictures of Sappho in the Lesbian shades, the Boar that killed Adonis brought to Venus, Calypso entertaining Telemachus in her Grotto, the Marriage Procession as described on the Shield of Achilles, Venus recumbent attended by Cupids, and numerous others of the amatory kind, all sufficiently Platonic and modernly classical. But he did more: he was employed by Alderman Boydell to embellish Milton and Shakspeare; in his illustrations of the first there is grace, and sometimes an approach to grandeur; in the other he is genteel and pretty. He painted subjects taken from the History of England for Bowyer, and was equally successful. His representations of the church of England services and ceremonies were favourites with the serious part of the public, and there is a propriety in them that is much more impressive than the real proceedings on many occasions. His style of book-illustrating was so popular that publishers found it their interest to employ his pencil, especially on second editions, to give additional sweetness to the light romantic or sentimental poetry so interesting to young ladies, and so serviceable to their admirers in furnishing appropriate quotations in the ball-room. One prevailing fault, however, is, that his armed knights all appear to be of the feminine gender; they are too delicate for the rough usages of war; they might do for the stage; they might figure in a make-belief modern tournament; but for a real melée with men at arms in the olden time, such as some of the aforesaid poems describe, alas! the ponderous mace or battle-axe, nay, the very sound of the brazen trumpets, clarions we should say, would shiver such heroes and their panoply instantly into atoms. Still we must not entirely lay the blame to Westall, he administered to the taste as he found it; the public, that is to say the readers of such works, were delighted, the publisher was satisfied, and the artist well paid.

Mr. Westall was elected an academician in 1794, in the same year that Mr. Lawrence and Thomas Stothard arrived at the like honour. In 1808 he published a volume of poems, with the title "A Day in Spring," which he ornamented with plates engraved by J. and C. Heath from his own designs. By his exertions he accumulated a sum of money that would have been a handsome competence, but he unfortunately engaged in the speculation of picture dealing with works of the old masters; a trade particularly dangerous to a modern painter. Like some others, he made a few successful hits, which only tended to accelerate his ruin; these successful hits were more owing to the ignorance of the buyers than the knowledge of Westall of the works in which he dealt. Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, Paolo Veronese, and Schiavone, were favourites with him; they had been so time out of mind with others, and consequently their works were copied or imitated to a great extent; the artist picture dealer could not discern the difference between them, and his lay brothers of the craft supplied him abundantly with what they called and he believed to be genuine specimens, though in an injured state. The expense of repairing, and restoring in the true Venetian manner of colouring, and the addition of splendid carved and gilt frames, so necessary for a picture of estimated great value, and also some improvident partnership engagements, produced pecuniary embarrassment, and reduced the artist to the necessity of receiving the allowance which, it is said, the Academy assigns to its poor members to save them from absolute want.

Westall gave lessons in drawing to the Princess Victoria, now her most gracious Majesty; and how effective those lessons have been, the beautiful drawings of his royal pupil abundantly prove. His works are fast falling in public estimation; a new and better style of illustration has arisen, which has superseded his, and others of his contemporaries; and which would be still better if there were less of conventionality, and fewer artistic conversazioni, the bane of young artists of talent. Mr. Westall died on the fourth of December, 1836.]

[WESTERBAEN, J——, a portrait painter, eminent in his time, was living in 1659 at the Hague. He painted the portraits of Geestranus, and other learned men, which were engraved by H. Barry. The date of his decease is not mentioned.]

WESTERHOUT, ARNOLD VAN, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1666. After having received some instruction in design and engraving in his native city he went to Italy, and established himself at Rome, where he engraved several plates from his own designs, and after the works of the Italian painters. His style of engraving resembles that of his countryman, Robert van Audenaerde. We have several portraits and historical subjects by him, executed with the graver, in a neat, clear style, but without producing a powerful effect. Among others are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Cardinal Giacomo Antonio Moriga; after L. David.
Prince Rospoli; after Ant. David.
Michele Angelo Tamburini, General of the Jesuits; after Ant. Odaï.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A Female Figure, with a Unicorn; after An. Caracci.
The Descent from the Cross; after Dan. di Volterra.
St. Paul preaching at Athens; after Gio. Bat. Lenardi.
The Muses protecting the Monuments of Art from the Destruction of Time; after the same.

[He also engraved some portraits in mezzotinto. He died about 1725.]

[WET, GERARD DE, born at Amsterdam in 1616, and died there in 1679, was a scholar of Rembrandt, whose manner he imitated; he also painted landscapes, and was accounted a good colourist.]

[WET, or WETH, JOHN DE, and JACOB DE WET, or WETH. It is uncertain whether these names belong to one or two painters, as there are pictures so signed of different kinds. Those with the name of Jacob are imitations of the manner of Rembrandt, and the subjects are taken from Scripture. John De Wet was not only a painter but a picture dealer; he resided at Haerlem, and is probably the same that is mentioned in the note to Wouwerman, as drawing the attention of amateurs to the superiority of that artist's works over those of Bamboccio. Nothing, however, is known of the pictures by De Wet out of Holland; perhaps they are some of the coarse imitations of Rembrandt which occasionally appear in sales under that master's name.]

WET, P. F. This artist etched some plates of ornamental foliage for goldsmiths and jewellers. They are executed in a slight style.

WEYDE, ROGER VANDER. In a note to this article in Mr. Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters, M. Descamps is accused of inaccuracy, for having mentioned this painter as a different artist from Roger of Bruges; and it is attempted, in a very unsatisfactory manner, to prove that they were "one and the same person." The accusation is proved to be totally groundless, by the original authority of Karel van Mander, the most authentic biographer of the Flemish artists of that early period, who distinctly states them to be two different artists. Roger of Bruges was a native of that city, and a disciple of John van Eyck, consequently a much older artist than Vander Weyde, as will be seen by reference to that article.

Roger Vander Weyde was born at Brussels about the year 1480. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he is mentioned by Van Mander in very favourable terms, and as one of the first painters of his country who introduced a graceful style of designing, and a characteristic expression in his heads. Among his principal works were four pictures in the council-chamber of the Town-house at Brussels, representing subjects connected with the administration of justice. He painted a picture of the taking down from the Cross, for the church of St. Gertrude, at Louvaine, which was greatly admired. It was afterwards sent to the king of Spain, and a copy of it, by Michael Coxcis, was put in its place. He died in 1529.

[The identity or duality of Roger de Bruges and Roger Vander Weyde has been long a vexatious question. Recent researches go very far to show that both names apply to one painter. The naming of artists by writers after the place of their birth, the school in which they studied, or the city which had been their principal residence, has given rise to much ambiguity; and unfortunately the earlier writers on art and artists have used the names, too often, indiscriminately. It now appears that Roger Vander Weyden was born at Brussels about the year 1401, and that he was sent early to Bruges to study painting under the celebrated brothers, Hubert and Jan Van Eyck; that he remained there till the death of Jan, and his long residence obtained for him as a painter the cognomen of Roger de Bruges. It was not, however, forgotten by the citizens of Brussels that he was a native of their growing city, when his talent marked him as an object worthy of attention. He was employed by them to decorate their newly-erected Town-hall, and afterwards appointed painter to the city. This appears in the archives of the city of Brussels, where there is an entry of a resolution with the date 1436: "that after the death of Master Roger, salaried painter to the city, there shall be no other artist officially appointed. This resolution it seems was in consequence of the great expenditure in the erection of the Hotel de Ville, and the necessity felt of being more economical in future. In 1449 he is mentioned again in the archives as Roger Vander Weyden, painter to the city of Brussels. "Meester ROGERIEN VANDER WEYDEN, portrateur der stad van Brussel." In 1450, the year of the jubilee, he went to Rome to contemplate the works of the painters there, and was delighted with the productions of Gentile da Fabriano. But his own works had preceded him; for, previous to 1431, he had painted for Pope Martin V. the famous chapel, which afterwards passed into the hands of the Emperor Charles V., and is now in the possession of the king of Holland. This, however, was not the only work he had executed for Italy, previous to his visiting that country; for in 1449 Cyriac of Ancona saw in the palace of Lionel d'Este a picture of the Descent from the Cross painted by Roger. Some of the Italian painters had also imitated his manner and that of his master, Jan Van Eyck; among them was Angelo Parrasio, a Siense, who painted the nine Muses in the palazzo Belfiore, and in colouring them adopted their style as his model. It is probable that he remained some years in Italy, and painted many pictures there; those attributed to the name of Roger de Bruges are also attributed to Roger Vander Weyden. History is silent with regard to both names for a series of about twelve years from the year of the jubilee, and it is only by the discovery of pictures executed during that period that it is made apparent Roger de Bruges, or Roger Vander Weyden, must have continued for a considerable time painting in Italy. A portrait of Roger, painted by himself, was in the possession of a Spanish gentleman of the name of Zuanne Ram, at Venice, in 1531, and is said to have borne the inscription Rugerio da Bruxelles, and the date 1462. From writing his name in Italian it is inferred that he was at that time in Italy, and used the language that would be best understood by those with whom the picture was to remain. Whether he paid an intermediate visit to his own country is not clear; but it is recorded that he painted an altar-piece for the cathedral church of Middelbourg, a city founded by Chevalier Peter Bladelin in 1444, and completed, as to essentials, in 1464. This picture, which represents the Adoration of the Shepherds, and the Wise Men returning thanks for having arrived at the termination of their journey, in which is also the portrait of Peter Bladelin, and a view of the Castle and

Church of Middelbourg, is now at Berlin. It is ascertained that Roger Vander Weyden died at Brussels the 16th of June, 1464, and was buried in the church of St. Gudule; the following is the entry in the burial registry: "Magister ROGERUS VANDER WYDEN excellens pictor cum uxore, liggen voor Ste. Catelymen outaer, onder eenen blauwen steen." This entry must have been made at a later date, as his wife, Elisabeth Goffaerts, survived to the year 1477. The date of Roger's death is corroborated by a document in the archives at Brussels, by which it appears that on the 5th day of October, 1464, his widow paid to the prévôt of the cloister of Coudenberg, at Brussels, the sum of twenty golden peeters to purchase an income, on condition that he and his successors should celebrate the anniversary of the late Roger Vander Weyden, painter, and of his widow, Elisabeth Goffaerts, when she deceased.

Roger Vander Weyden had a son named Goswin, who was dean of the confraternity of St. Luke in the years 1514 and 1530, and painted so late as 1535. The Museum at Brussels contains eleven pictures by him. The handling is more rude, the execution less finished than that of Roger, but viewed at a distance they have a resemblance to the manner of pictures attributed to him. Little, however, is known of Goswin or his works. Van Mander is accused of having caused the confusion of names by calling the father Roger de Bruges, and the son Roger Vander Weyden; and not knowing the true date of the death of either, he places that of his supposed Roger in 1529, and says that he died of the English malady, the sweating sickness, in that year; now it happened that Quintin Metsys died of the malady that same year, and it is possible that Van Mander, who wrote hastily, applied the circumstances to Vander Weyden. The error, however, has continued, and writer after writer has copied the statement, and hence we have a Roger de Bruges, and a Roger Vander Weyden. That Roger Vander Weyden was recognised as the principal scholar of the Van Eycks long before Van Mander wrote, is clear from his name being quoted by Vasari, Opmeer, and Giucciardini, and always in conjunction with, or in allusion to, Van Eyck. Lamponius, who praises so highly Roger of Brussels, says nothing of Roger of Bruges, whence an advocate for their duality infers that the latter had abandoned his native place and adopted the other; what is this but admitting their identity?—Roger, by whatever other name he is distinguished, is the link between the Van Eycks and Hans Hemling; but with regard to his authentic works it is feared that there is no certainty, except that of the celebrated portable oratory of Charles V., now belonging to the king of Holland, which is supported by the authority of Albert Durer. There is no picture known with the painter's family name; how, then, is the question to be decided? One affirms that a picture is by Roger de Bruges, another asserts it is by Roger de Bruxelles, or Roger Vander Weyden, neither party disputing the excellence of the work. Some distinguish between the finer and the coarser execution; the first they apportion to Roger de Bruges, the second to Roger Vander Weyden, on the false ground that the latter lived at a later period, and painted the pictures now ascertained to be by his son Goswin. The accounts of Roger de Bruges and Roger of Bruxelles are parallel in dates and circumstances, except that no mention is made of the place where, or the time when, Roger de Bruges died; the last notice of him is the portrait dated 1462, which equally applies to Roger of Bruxelles. The place and time of Vander Weyden's death are certain, and in his epitaph Brussels is made to mourn for him, as an artist never equalled, and whose loss can never be supplied. This of itself completes the parallel, and almost establishes the identity. The editor, however, does not presume to decide the question; he only places before the inquirer the facts that have presented themselves in the course of his researches, as on all occasions he makes very light of names, but attaches much importance to merits.

In the note to Roger of Bruges the name Schabol is introduced as being that of his family; the authority on which the editor relied fails in establishing that fact; it belongs to another painter of a much later period.—See the note to ROGER OF BRUGES.]

WEYDMANS, N. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a small print representing a country surgeon performing an operation on the forehead of a woman. She is supported by a man, who stands behind her. It is executed in a slight, scratchy style, so as to resemble an etching. It is from a design of his own, and appears to be the production of a painter, though very indifferently engraved. [There were two portrait painters of the name of Weydeman; Frederic William, who was born in 1668, and died in 1750; and Charles Emilius, his cousin, or nephew, born in 1685, and died in 1735. The latter engraved, but in what manner does not appear. Of N. Weydmans there is no account.]

WEYER, GABRIEL, a German painter and engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1610, where he painted several pictures, and made many designs for the engravers. He also executed several wooden cuts in a spirited style, which are marked with a monogram composed of a G. and W. thus, GW. [He died in 1640.]

WEYER, HANS, or JOHN. This artist, who flourished about the year 1610, was a native of Coubourg, and a painter. According to Professor Christ, he engraved several plates in an excellent style, which are marked with the letters H. E. W. and dated 1610, and 1612. [He was an admirable designer, but there is some difficulty in apportioning the engravings that really belong to him.]

WEYER, NICHOLAS. Professor Christ attributes to this artist the engravings marked and dated thus, N. 1567 W. He has not, however, specified any of the subjects.

[WEYERMAN, JOHN, painted fruit and flower-pieces. He was born in Holland in 1636; travelled into Italy; probably returned to his own country, and died in 1681.]

WEYERMANS, JAMES CAMPO. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1679, and was a scholar of Ferdinand van Kessell. He painted flowers, fruit, and still-life, but his productions are not above mediocrity. He published the Lives of the Dutch Painters, in three volumes, which is a compilation from Houbraken, disfigured by gross falsehoods and absurdities. He died in 1747.

WEYERS, JOHANSEN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1611. According to Professor Christ, he marked his plates with a bunch of grapes, which in German bears some allusion to his name. He engraved some plates from the designs of Christopher Schwaartz. [See WEINHER, HANS.]

WHEATLEY, FRANCIS. Mr. Wheatley was born in London in 1747, and received his first instruction as an artist in Shipley's drawing school. When young, he obtained several premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts. By the strength of his natural abilities he acquired a considerable portion of talent as a painter, and, having formed a friendship with Mr. Mortimer, he increased his knowledge in the art, and assisted that gentleman in painting the ceiling at Bocket Hall, the seat of Lord Viscount Melbourne. He had formerly been employed in the decorations at Vauxhall. His inclination appeared to lead him equally to figures and landscapes, but, in the early part of his life, he met with considerable employment in painting small whole-length portraits, which induced him for some time to make that his particular pursuit. After practising some years in London, he visited Ireland, and was much employed in Dublin, where he painted a large picture, representing the Irish House of Commons, in which he introduced the portraits of the most remarkable political characters, and it gained him great reputation. On his return to London, he painted a picture of the Riots which took place in 1780, from which Mr. Heath engraved an excellent print for Boydell. He now became a very popular painter of rural and domestic subjects, for which he had a peculiar talent, and his productions of that description were greatly admired. When Boydell projected his great undertaking of the illustration of Shakspeare, with prints engraved from pictures painted by the most eminent English artists, he was engaged to contribute his talents to the accomplishment of that splendid work, for which he painted twelve pictures, by which his merit, as a composer and a colourist, may be best estimated.

Mr. Wheatley was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1790, and Royal Academician in 1791. He was for several years afflicted with long and severe paroxysms of the gout, and died in 1801.

WHITE, ROBERT. This artist was born in London in 1645, and was a pupil of David Loggan, for whom he designed and engraved several architectural views. He was much employed in drawing portraits with black lead, upon vellum, in which he excelled, and has engraved plates from several of them. The heads of Sir Godfrey Kneller and his brother, in Sandraart's Lives of the Painters, were engraved from drawings by White, whose portrait Sir Godfrey painted in return. In 1674 he engraved the first Oxford Almanack, and the title plate to the History and Antiquities to that university.

Few artists have exceeded Robert White in the multiplicity of English portraits he has left us. They are frequently disfigured by large, tasteless borders, by no means ornamental. Most of his plates are executed with the graver. He scraped a few heads in mezzotint, but they are very inferior to his other prints. He died at his house in Bloomsbury in 1704. Of his numerous portraits, the following are among the most esteemed:

James I.; after C. Jansen.

George, Earl of Cumberland, habited for a tournament; fine.

Charles I.; after Vandyck.

Another of Charles I.; after Van Vorst.

Prince Rupert; after Kneller.

Charles II.; after the same. 1679.

Another of Charles II., whole length, in the robes of the Garter.

James II. under a canopy, with Archbishop Sancroft and the Chancellor Jefferies.

James II. when Duke of York, in the robes of the Garter.

Maria Beatrix of Este, his consort; after Kneller. 1686.

Henry, Duke of Gloucester.

Lady Mary Joliffe; scarce.

Heneage, Earl of Nottingham.

Thomas, Duke of Leeds.

Sir Edward Ward, Chief Baron. 1702.

Sir George Treby, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. 1694.

Samuel Pepys, Secretary to the Admiralty; after Kneller.

George, Earl of Melvil; after Sir John Medina.

James, Earl of Perth; after Kneller.

Another Portrait of the same; after Riley; fine.

Bishop Burnet; after Mrs. Beale.

Sir Alexander Temple.

Lady Susanna Temple.

Lady Anne Clifford.

Thomas Flatman; after Hays.

Sir John Fenwick; after Wissing.

The Seven Bishops; seven small ovals in one plate.

The Five Bishops who suffered Martyrdom; five ovals in one plate.

[Duke of Norfolk, mezzotint; after Kneller.

John, Earl of Radnor, ditto, ditto.]

WHITE, GEORGE, was the son of the preceding artist, and flourished about the year 1720. He was instructed by his father in the principles of designing and engraving, and is said to have occasionally painted both in oil and in miniature. After the death of his father he finished the plates left imperfect by him, and also engraved some portraits in the same style, which are executed in a neat, clear manner, particularly those of the Duke of Ormond and Lord Clarendon, prefixed to the "Rebellion in Ireland." But his best prints are in mezzotint, in which he frequently etched the outline before the ground was laid upon the plate, which sometimes adds to the firmness of the effect. The year of his death is not known, but he worked as late as 1731, as appears from the date of his portrait of Bishop Weston. The following are his most esteemed works:

PORTRAITS IN MEZZOTINTO.

Sir Richard Blackmore, M. D.; after J. Vander Bank.

Sylvester Petyt, Principal of Bernard's Inn; fine.

Nicholas Sanderson, Professor of Mathematics, of Cambridge.

John Baptist Monnoyer, Painter; after Kneller.

John Dryden; after the same.

Alexander Pope; after the same.

Thomas Bradbury; after Gibson.

George Hooper, Bishop of St. Asaph; after Hill.

Colonel Blood, who stole the Crown.

William Dobson, Painter; from a picture by himself.

[A Man playing on the Violin; after Frank Hals. 1732.

Henry Purcell; after Frank Hals? 1732.]

PORTRAITS IN THE STYLE OF HIS FATHER.

James Gardiner, Bishop of Lincoln; after Dahl.

Charles II., King of Spain; begun by Robert White, and finished by George White, whose name is affixed.

The Duke of Ormond.

Lord Clarendon.

WHITE, CHARLES, was born in London in 1751, and was a pupil of Pranker. On leaving that master he quitted the manner of stroke engraving, and worked chiefly, if not entirely, in the chalk style. He was for some time engaged on trifling subjects from designs by ladies, but in the latter part of his life he was employed in works of more importance, which he unfortunately did not live to see completed. He died of a fever in 1785.

WHITE, THOMAS. This artist was a native of London, and flourished about the year 1760. He was for some time employed by Mr. Ryland to assist him in the back-grounds of his plates, and afterwards engraved the greater part of the architectural prints for the continuation of the "Vitruvius Britannicus," by Wolf and Gandon. His name is also affixed to a print of a landscape, after Breughel. The plate was etched by T. Saunders, and White was assisted by Ryland in the finishing of it. He died in London about the year 1776.

WIBERT, ———. See VUYBERT.

WICHMAN, J., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1683. His name is affixed to a large print, representing the Besieging and taking of Stadtwien by the Troops of the Emperor of Germany. The portraits of the German and Turkish generals are represented at the top, and those of the Emperor of Germany and the Grand Sultan at the bottom. It is a coarse, slight etching, very indifferently executed.

WICKSTEAD, PHILIP. This artist was a native of London, and was a disciple of Mr. Zoffani. He distinguished himself chiefly by painting small whole-length portraits. He studied some time at Rome, where he became acquainted with Mr. William Beckford, and accompanied that gentleman to Jamaica. He practised there some time as a painter, but afterwards became a planter, in which undertaking he was not successful. This disappointment brought on a depression of spirits, for which he sought relief in intemperance, which hastened his death, about the year 1790.

WIDEMAN, ELIAS. This artist was a native of Germany, and resided at Augsbourg, about the year 1648. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved a great number of portraits, frontispieces, and other book-plates, from his own designs. They are executed in a stiff, formal style. His most considerable work is a set of plates of illustrious personages, published at Augsbourg in 1648, entitled, Comitium Gloriæ centum qua Sanguine qua Virtute illustrium Herorum Iconibus instructum, &c. E. Wideman, del. et sculp.

WIDITZ, ———. Professor Christ mentions this ancient engraver on the authority of Bernard Jobin. He does not specify any of his prints, but he is said to have been a native of Strasburg. [He was an engraver in wood, and operated about 1570; but there are no particulars respecting him that can be relied on.]

WIELANT, or WILLANT. The name of this engraver is affixed to some portraits, among which are the following:

John Colerus; after Bodecker.

John Clauberghius.

[The name Wielant is probably a corruption of Vaillant.]

[WIELING, NICOLAS, an historical and portrait painter, is supposed to have been a native of Holland, but neither the year, nor the place of his birth, is recorded. He was much employed by Frederic William, the Elector of Brandenburg, who appointed him painter to the court in 1671. He died at Berlin in 1689. His manner of painting is more in accordance with the Flemish than the Dutch masters; and some of his pictures have a resemblance to those of Van Dyck. He had a son of the same name, who was also a painter, but there is no further account of him.]

WIENBROUCK, M. V. The name of this artist is affixed to some slight, incorrect etchings, executed in the style of a painter, among which is one representing an old man seated, to whom a youth is relating a message.

WIERENGEN, CORNELIUS. This artist was born at Haerlem about the year 1600. He excelled in painting sea-pieces and storms, which he represented with great truth and precision. We have several etchings by this painter, representing landscapes and sea-views, which are executed in a neat, spirited style. [He was called Cornelius Nicolas, or Claas, Van Wierengen; he was not only a good marine painter, but excelled in landscape, as appears by a series of fourteen pieces engraved by Nicolas Jan Visscher. He was living in 1635. Balkema says he died at Haarlem in 1658, but his dates are not to be relied on.]

[WIERINGA, GERARD, born at Groningen, was the son and scholar of his father, Jan, a painter of ornaments. After learning the principles of the art, he went to Dusseldorf to study the pictures in the gallery there. In 1790 he returned to his native place, and gave lessons in drawing, and painted landscapes, sun-sets, and winter scenes, for one of which he obtained the gold medal given by the Academy at Leyden. He died in 1817.]

WIERIX, or WIERX, or WIERINX, JOHN, an eminent Dutch designer and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1550. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he appears to have formed his style by an attentive study of the works of Albert Durer, and has copied several of the prints of that master with a precision bordering on servility. Though he engraved several plates from his own designs, he appears to have possessed little genius for invention. His plates are executed with the graver, in a very neat, finished style, and his drawing is usually correct. The prints of this artist are held in considerable estimation by the curious collector. The following are among his best works :

PORTRAITS.

Rodolphus II., Emperor of Germany.
Philip William, Prince of Orange.
Eleanora de Bourbon, Princess of Orange.
James I., King of England, and his Queen; scarce.
Philip II., King of Spain.
Catherine de Medicis, Queen of Henry II. of France.
Henry III., King of France.
The Countess de Verneuil.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Resurrection; inscribed Insanus Miles.
Mary Magdalene seated at the entrance of a Grot; J. Wier, inv. et fec.
An allegorical subject, representing the Redemption of Mankind.
The Four Elements; Wierix. 1601.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The little Satyr; copied from the print of Albert Durer, when he was only twelve years of age.
Adam receiving the forbidden fruit from Eve; copied from the celebrated print of the same subject by Albert Durer; upon a tablet is inscribed Albert Durer, inventor. Johannes Wierix, fec. at. 16.
St. Hubert kneeling before the Stag, with a Crucifix on its forehead; a copy, reversed, from the print by Albert Durer, marked with the cipher of that artist.
St. Jerome in meditation; copied from Albert Durer.
The Marriage of St. Catherine; after D. Calvaert.
The Sacrifice of Abraham; after M. de Vos.
Christ taken down from the Cross; after Otho Venius.
The Last Judgment; finely copied from the print of that subject by Martin Rota, after M. Angelo Buonarroti.
Christ taken down from the Cross; after Bern. Passeri.

The prints of this artist are usually marked with the initials I. W. F., and sometimes I. H. W. F., to which he occasionally added his age, and the date of the year in which the plate was engraved.

WIERIX, or WIERINX, HIERONIMUS, or JEROME, was the younger brother of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Amsterdam in 1552. He is supposed to have learned the art of engraving from John Wierix, whose style he imitated so exactly, that it would be difficult to distinguish their works, if they were not differently marked. The prints by Jerome are executed in a neat and finished a style as those of his brother, and are characterized by the same stiffness and formality. His prints are more numerous than those of John Wierix, and chiefly consist of devout and allegorical subjects, saints, and fathers of the church, many of which are from his own designs. They are sometimes marked with the initials of his name, thus, H. W., or H. W. F., or J. HIERONIMUS W. Fe., and sometimes with a monogram composed of an H, an I, and an E, joined together, and followed by a W, thus, HEW. The following are his principal works :

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Charlemagne.
Henry of Bourbon, King of Navarre.
Queen Elizabeth.
Sigismund III., King of Poland.
Alessander Farnese, Duke of Parma.
Sir Francis Drake.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

St. Cecilia.
The Temptation of St. Anthony.
St. Bruno, the founder of the Carthusians.
St. Charles Borromeus.
The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Francis and St. Anthony.
The Virgin and Infant, with a Glory of Angels.
The Crucifixion.
The Death of Lucretia.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Christ dead, supported on the knees of the Virgin; after J. Mabuse.
Christ calling to him the little Children; after C. van de Broeck.
The Death of the Virgin; after Otho Venius.
Christ at Table, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; after the same.
Christ crowned with Thorns; after G. Mostaert.
The Four Doctors of the Church; after M. Lucas Romanus.
The Scourging of Christ; after the same. One of his best prints.
The Baptism of Christ by St. John; after H. Hondius. fine.
The Vision of Daniel; after Van Haecht.
Jupiter and Danaë; after the same.
[Christ expiring on the Cross; after P. Aquila, considered his best piece for purity of engraving.
The Resurrection of Christ; after L. Romanus; a large and capital print.]

WIERIX, or WIERINX, ANTHONY, was the youngest of the family of the Wierixes, born at Amsterdam about the year 1554. His small plates are executed in the neat, finished style of his brothers, but his larger prints exhibit more freedom and facility. He engraved similar subjects, and frequently worked in conjunction with John and Jerome Wierix. His prints are usually signed with his name. The following are his most esteemed works :

PORTRAITS.

Pope Clement VII.; Ant. Wierix.
Philip Emanuel of Lorraine, Duke de Merceur.
Isabella of Austria, Daughter of Philip II. of Spain.
Margaret, Queen of Philip III. of Spain.
Cardinal Bellarmin.
Albert of Austria, Archbishop of Toledo, Governor of the Low Countries.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

St. Theresa.
 St. Sebastian.
 St. Dominick receiving the Rosary from the Virgin.
 The Marriage of St. Catherine.
 The Entombing of Christ.
 St. Jerome praying, accompanied by two Angels; dated 1584; fine.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Adoration of the Magi; after M. de Vos.
 The History of the Prophet Jonas; in four plates; after the same.
 The Holy Family reposing in Egypt; after Cam. Procaccini.
 The Death of St. Francis; after the same.
 A set of sixty-nine plates, representing the Life and Passion of Christ, with the Death and Assumption of the Virgin; in which he was assisted by his two brothers.

[The time of the death of the three Wierixes is not recorded; they all flourished in the early part of the seventeenth century. Their united works in the collection of M. de Marolles amounted to twelve hundred pieces.]

WIGMANA, GERARD. This painter was born at Workum, in Friesland, in 1673. It is not ascertained by whom he was instructed, but he went to Italy when he was young, where he is said to have studied the works of Raffaele and Giulio Romano. On his return to Holland he acquired some reputation as a painter of historical subjects, of a cabinet size, which are as remarkable for their patient and laborious finishing, and the gaudiness of his colour, as for the vulgarity of his characters, and the incorrectness of his design. His studies in Italy, instead of purifying his taste, and elevating his style, appear to have only served to render his affectation of the sublime more clumsy and preposterous. He selected, for the subjects of his pictures, the most interesting events of sacred and profane history, which he disfigured by a burlesque perversion of characteristic expression, and a total inattention to the propriety of costume. With all these defects, he had the vanity to assume the title of the Raffaele of Friesland, and was so satisfied with his own performances, that he was induced to demand exorbitant prices for his pictures, which he was surprised to find the public were not disposed to pay. Disappointed at the unfavourable reception his works met with in his own country, it is said by Descamps that he visited England, where he met with no better success. He returned to Holland, and settled at Amsterdam, where he died, in 1741.

WILBORN, NICHOLAS. See [note to] WELBRONNER.

WILDE, FRANCIS DE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1705. He resided at Amsterdam, where he etched a few very small plates, which are executed with great neatness and spirit, apparently from his own designs. Among others are the following:

The Angel appearing to Abraham; Fr. de Wilde, fecit, 1705.

Venus rising from the Sea.

The Fable of the Wolf and the Dog; circular; 1704.

A View of the City of Chalons.

A View of a Sea-port.

A Landscape, with figures.

WILDE, MARIA DE. This lady was probably a relation of the artist mentioned in the preceding article. She engraved a set of fifty plates from antique gems, which were published at Amsterdam in 1703.

WILDENS, JOHN. This artist was born at

Antwerp in 1584. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art, and it is generally supposed that he was more indebted to his diligent studies from nature, than to the precepts of a master. He was constantly occupied in the fields and forests, in designing every object that appeared to him to be picturesque or remarkable. He had acquired a distinguished reputation as a landscape painter, when his talents attracted the attention of Rubens, who employed him to assist in the extensive commissions in which he was engaged, by painting the landscapes in the back-grounds of his pictures; and perhaps no coadjutor of that illustrious artist surpassed Wildens in imitating the freedom of his touch, and the harmony of his colouring. Such was the congeniality of their operation, that the whole appeared to be the produce of the same hand. There are several of his landscapes in the public edifices at Antwerp, embellished with figures by the ablest of his contemporaries, of which the most esteemed are two pictures in the chapel of St. Joseph, with figures by John Bockhorst, called Langen Jan, representing the Holy Family, and the Repose in Egypt. He died in 1644. [Zani and Brulliot say that John Wildens was an engraver as well as a landscape painter. Brulliot, who says he was born in 1580, attributes to him the following views of chateaux in Holland: Teylingen, Egmont op de Hoeff, T'Clooster tot Rynsburch, T'huys te Cleef by Harlem, Werdenburch, and Rossum. They are marked in the margin J. W. fecit. Robbertus de baudous excudit Amstelodami, 1616. The same letters, accompanied by the syllable inv., are found on prints engraved after him by Peter Nolpe, consisting of six allegorical subjects relating to the house of Orange, and its connexion with Great Britain by marriage. The name Joan. Wild. and J. Wild. invent., is found on two prints, in a series of twelve representing country occupations during the months of the year; that of June engraved by Andrew Stock, and that of December by J. Matham. Van Dyck painted his portrait.]

[WILHELM VON COELN, or MEISTER WILHELM, a painter of Cologne, of whose works nothing certain is known. It is supposed that he was born at the little village of Herle, and it is ascertained that he was settled at Cologne in 1370, and several pictures preserved in that city are attributed to him. He is noticed in the Annals of the Dominican Monks of Frankfort, wherein is said: "In that time, 1380, there was at Cologne a most excellent painter, to whom there was not the like in his art; his name was Wilhelm, and he made pictures of men which almost appeared to be alive."—This seems to be the extent of our knowledge of him; all besides is conjectural. To him are attributed several pictures, still preserved, painted at the latter part of the fourteenth and early part of the fifteenth centuries; among them, one in the St. Castors-Kirche, at Cologne, painted in 1388, a large altarpiece for the church of St. Clara, in the same city, now in a chapel of the cathedral; the Sancta Veronica in the collection at Munich; a Madonna and Infant, and a Crucifixion, in the Wallraf Museum at Cologne. The most important work, however, which has been ascribed to him is the "Dom-bild," the altarpiece in the cathedral at Cologne, painted in 1410; this is disputed by others, and given to MEISTER STEPHAN, who, it is said, was a pupil of Meister Wilhelm. After much research by several competent persons, there has been little or nothing discovered to put the question of the authorship of this or the others beyond a doubt. There had been, before the time allotted to Meister Wilhelm and Meister Stephan, several good artists, for the period, at Cologne, and, certainly, others contemporary with them, whose names are not recorded. It is not surprising, after a lapse of more than four centuries, that all pictures of merit discovered in that city should be attributed to the two artists whose names alone are preserved as connected with the place. An investigation of their just claims belongs to the history of the art, and till they are decided by further discoveries it is useless to hazard conjecture on the subject. The inquirer who is desirous of knowing more of these masters and of the pictures attributed to them, and of many others, their contemporaries or immediate predecessors and successors, real or conjectural, will find much detail relating thereto in the German writers on the ancient schools of Cologne, Bruges, Nuremberg, and Antwerp; particularly in Kügler, Nagler, Racinski, Rathgeber, &c.; and he may consult with advantage the notices of Lord Lindsay in his History of Christian Art; Sir Edmund Head's Notes to Kügler; and the account of Wilhelm von Coeln, by Ralph Wornum, in the Supplement to the Penny Cyclopædia. The lithographic prints by Strixner and others, after the pictures by these old masters of the school of Cologne, and its offshoots, are the best expositors of their style, and will be found more satisfactory than the most laboured critical or poetical descriptions.]

[WILKIE, DAVID, an artist whose works are so universally known, and the circumstances of whose life, both as a painter and a member of society, have been so fully detailed by Allan Cunningham, that it is only necessary to commemorate him in this Dictionary by a few dates and facts, and a short enumeration of his works. He was the son of the Rev. David Wilkie, pastor of Cults, county of Fife, where he was born in 1785. At the age of fifteen he entered the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, then under the direction of Mr. John Graham, where he remained four years. In 1805 he came to London, and in the following year exhibited his Village Politicians, having in the mean time supported himself by the produce of some small pictures exposed for sale in the shop window of a dealer. In 1807 he exhibited the Blind Fiddler, painted for Sir George Beaumont at the price of fifty pounds: it is now in the National Gallery. This picture at once established his reputation. The year following he exhibited the Card Players; and in 1809, the Cut Finger and the Rent Day: in this year he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy. In 1811 he was made a Royal Academician, and gave, as his diploma picture, Boys digging for Rats. From this time until 1825 he regularly produced, and as regularly sold at increased prices, year by year, his well-known works. In 1811, a Game-keeper, and a Humorous Scene; in 1812, the sketch of Blindman's Buff, and the Village Festival, sold to Mr. Angerstein, and now in the National Gallery: for the latter picture he received 800 guineas; in 1813, the finished picture of Blindman's Buff; in 1814, The Letter of Introduction, and Duncan Gray; in 1815, Distraining for Rent; in 1816, The Rabbit on the Wall; in 1817, The Breakfast; in 1818, The Errand Boy; in 1819, The Penny Wedding; in 1820, The Reading of a Will, painted for the king of Bavaria; in 1821, Guess my Name, and Newsmongers; in 1822, Chelsea Pensioners Reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo, painted for the Duke of Wellington at the price of £1200; in 1823, The Parish Beadle; in 1824, Smugglers offering run Goods for Sale, and The Cottage Toilet; and in 1825, The Highland Family. These were the pictures exhibited by him, but there are others painted during the time by order, and which do not appear in the Exhibition Catalogues: among these are, Alfred in the Neat-herd's Cottage, painted for Alexander Davison, for 150 guineas, and sold by the editor in the sale of that gentleman's collection for 500 guineas; The Whisky Still; The China Menders; The Pedlar; several portraits and small pictures of minor importance. About the year 1825 Wilkie lost a considerable sum of money in a speculation in which he was engaged, which had a visible effect on his constitution; and serious apprehensions were entertained for the safety of his bodily and mental faculties. He was interdicted by his medical advisers from all professional labour, and advised to travel. He departed on a tour to Rome and Madrid, and remained out of England till 1828.—Notwithstanding the injunctions of his physicians he made a great number of studies, and nearly completed some pictures, both in Italy and Spain; and on his return astounded the admirers of his talent by a total change in the style of his execution, the choice of his subjects, and the principles of his chiaro-scuro. Opinions are divided as to the gain or loss the world of art has sustained in this proceeding of David Wilkie. He certainly had the right to choose his subjects and the manner of painting them; he had established his reputation as the painter of character in common and humble life, and was probably ambitious of proving his power in more elevated scenes, and with persons allied to the historic. His treatment of these subjects did not meet with the same favour as his familiar representations with the public in general, but they found their admirers, and it cannot be said that it was entirely owing to the influence of his name. On this head we must avoid criticism.

On the death of Sir Thomas Lawrence in 1830, he was appointed principal painter in ordinary to George IV., whose portrait he painted in Highland costume; in 1836 he was knighted by William IV., and the royal favour continued; and on the accession of her present Majesty he painted the picture of her first council, and had also a few sittings for her portrait. It had been considered the privilege of the court painter to paint the numerous resemblances of the monarch usually called for on a new accession; but Wilkie was not commanded to execute any of these: this omission he considered as a slight on his reputation; but his royal mistress effaced the impression, for it is understood that the mission of the artist to paint the portrait of the Sultan was wholly suggested by the Queen.

The principal pictures painted by Wilkie in his second manner are the following: The Spanish Posada; The Maid of Saragossa; The Guerilla's Departure and Return; John Knox preaching; Spanish Monks; Columbus; Peep-o-day Boys; Mary Queen of Scots escaping from Lochleven castle; The Empress Josephine and the Fortunisteller; The Discovery of the Body of Tippoo Saib; Benvenuto Cellini and the Pope; The Irish Whisky Still; and several portraits. The School, an unfinished picture, which was sold in his sale after his death, and bought by Mr. Farrer for £756, participates of both styles; it has been engraved by his friend John Burnet. The result of his expedition to Constantinople was the production of many interesting scenes of oriental life, character, and costume, which have largely increased his reputation. Having accomplished his mission, he was on his return to England when he was seized with sudden illness off Gibraltar, which in a few hours terminated his existence, on the 1st of June, 1841. His body was committed to the deep. A marble figure, not very like him either in stature or characteristic expression, has been placed, by public subscription, in the inner hall of the National Gallery.]

WILLAERTS, ADAM, was born at Antwerp in 1577, and distinguished himself as a painter of marines, sea-ports, and views of the coast, with a variety of shipping and boats. His pictures are generally embellished with groups of small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. He also painted conflagrations, representing villages and ships on fire; and his works of that description are well coloured, and produce a striking effect. In the year 1600 he left Antwerp, and established himself at Utrecht, where his works were held in considerable estimation. He died in that city in 1640. [Balkema differs from all other Flemish or Dutch writers, in saying that Adam Willaerts was Regent of the hospital of St. Job, from 1639 to 1660; but Zani leaves the year of his death open by putting in the column the figures 166., thus raising the question of authority.]

WILLAERTS, ABRAHAM, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was born at Utrecht in 1613. For some time he was instructed by his father, but he afterwards studied under John Bylaert, a painter of little celebrity. On leaving that master he went to Paris, where he entered the school of Simon Vouet, and became a reputable painter of history. Returning from France to Holland he visited Brussels, where he was taken into the service of Prince Maurice, in whose employment he passed several years. He died at Utrecht in 1660. [That he was living in 1660 is certain; Immerzeel and Balkema say he died in 1671. He painted the portrait of Jan Both.]

WILLE, JOHN GEORGE. This eminent engraver was born at Königsberg in 1717. After learning the rudiments of design in his native country he went to Paris, when he was nineteen years of age, where he applied himself to stroke engraving, which he afterwards carried to a high pitch of perfection, and few artists have equalled him in the clearness and beauty of his execution. He particularly excelled in representing the brilliancy and softness of silk and satin draperies, and the delicacy of his graver was admirably adapted to express the polished finishing of the most celebrated Dutch painters. He has engraved several charming plates from pictures by G. Douw, Mieris, Metz, Schalken, Netscher, and others, which give a perfect idea of the style of the original paintings. We have also by him many excellent portraits, after the French artists, which are executed in a very beautiful style, particularly those of the Marquis de Marigny, the Count de St. Florentin, and J. B. Massé. Wille had a great number of pupils, several of whom have imitated his style with considerable success. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

James Francis Edward Stuart, called the old Pretender.
Charles James Edward Stuart, called the young Chevalier.

Henry Benedict Stuart, Cardinal York.

Prospero, Cardinal Colonna; after Pompeo Battoni.

Frederick II., King of Prussia; after Pesme.

Marshal Saxe; after Rigaud.

Woldemar de Loevendael, Marshal of France; after de la Tour.

Louis Philippeaux, Count de St. Florentin; after Toequé.

Abel Francis Poisson, Marquis de Marigny; after the same.

C. E. Briseux; Architect.

Margaret Elizabeth de Largilliere; after N. de Largilliere.

Elizabeth de Gouy, wife of H. Rigaud; after Rigaud.

Joseph Farrocel, Painter; after the same.

John de Boullogne, Comptroller-general of Finance; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Death of Cleopatra; after Netscher.

The Death of Mark Anthony; after Pomp. Battoni.

Le Maréchal-des-Logis; after P. A. Wille.

Les bons Amis; after Ostade.

Le Menagere Hollandoise; after G. Douw.

La Liseuse; after the same.

L' Instruction Paternelle; after Terburg.

La Gazetteiere Hollandoise; after the same.

La Tricoteuse; after Mieris.

L' Observateur Distrait; after the same.

La Cuisiniere Hollandoise; after Metz.

Le Concert de Famille; after Schalken.

Les Musiciens Ambulans; after Diétricy. The first impressions of this plate are before the letter e, in the word electorale in the dedication.

Les Offres Reciproques; after the same.

La Petite Ecoliere; after J. E. Schenau.

La Maitresse d'Ecole; after P. A. Wille.

Les Soins Maternels; after the same.

Les Delices Maternelles; after the same.

[Monsieur Charles Le Blanc, in his valuable work entitled "Le Graveur en Taille douce," now in the course of publication, has given a detailed account of one hundred and seventy-five engravings by John George Wille, and of the variations that appear in the different impressions. To this account his publisher, the celebrated Rudolph Weigel of Leipsic, has added many important notes. It is, therefore, unnecessary to increase the list above given, as the amateur will have greater satisfaction in referring to a work of such undoubted authority.

The dates on his prints range from 1738 to 1790. His talent was duly appreciated during his life, and accordingly he was a member of the Academy at Paris, and also of the Academies of Ronen, Augsburg, Vienna, Berlin, and Dresden. He was appointed engraver to the king of France, the emperor of Germany, and the king of Denmark. Several sovereigns sent young men to him to be instructed in the art. Among his most distinguished pupils may be named Schultze, Schmutzer, J. G. Müller, Bervic, Chevillet, the brothers Guttenberg, Halm, and Dannel. Heineken and Huber say he was born at Grossenlinden, near to Giessen, in 1715: Fuessli agrees in the place, and Zani in the date. He died in 1807.]

WILLE, PETER ALEXANDER, was the son of John George Wille, and was born at Paris in 1748. After receiving some instruction in design from his father, he frequented the Academy at Paris, and afterwards was a scholar of Vien and Greuze. He distinguished himself as a painter of domestic and other subjects, and was made a member of the Academy at Paris. Some idea may be formed of his abilities as a painter, from the prints engraved from his pictures by his father. He amused himself occasionally with the point, and etched a few prints, among which is one called Le Petit Vauxhall, from his own design.

WILLEBORTS, THOMAS, sometimes called BOSSCHAERT. This painter was born at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1613. After having learned the rudiments of the art in his native city he was sent to Antwerp, where he became a disciple of Gerard Segers, under whom he studied four years, when he was advised by his preceptor to visit Italy. During his stay at Rome he assiduously studied the works of the best masters, and returned to Antwerp a correct and graceful designer. Although that city was then the residence of the greatest artists of the Flemish school, the talents of Willeborts were not eclipsed by their ablest productions. He was commissioned to paint several altar-pieces for the churches at Antwerp, and the other cities in Flanders and Brabant, which are not disgraced by a comparison with the works of Rubens and Vandyck. In portraiture he approached the truth and suavity of the latter, and several of his heads have been mistaken for those of that admirable artist. He was much employed by the Prince of Orange, for whom he painted several considerable works, particularly a large allegorical picture of War and Peace, which is ingeniously composed, and admirably coloured. Two of his most esteemed pictures are, the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the church of the Carmelites, at Antwerp; and the Martyrdom of St. Basil, at the Capuchins, at Brussels. In 1649 he was made director of the Academy at Antwerp, and died in that city in 1656. [Some of his portraits were engraved by Paul Pontius, and Theodore Van Kessel. His pictures are not confined to his own country; they are to be found in some of the best foreign collections.]

WILLEMANS, MICHAEL. This artist was born at Lubeck in 1630. Desirous of procuring better instruction in the art than he could obtain in the place of his nativity, he went to Amsterdam, where he first became a scholar of Jacob Backer, but he afterwards entered the school of Rembrandt, under whom he studied several years, and became a reputable painter of history. On his return to Germany, he was much patronized by the Elector of Brandenburg, for whom he executed several considerable works, particularly a large picture of Vulcan forging the Arms of Mars, which is spoken of as a very able performance; he was also employed at several other courts in Germany, where his pictures are highly esteemed. He died in 1697. [He was also an engraver; for some cause, not stated, he retired to a monastery, where he died. His proper name was Michael Willmann.]

WILLEMS, MARK. This artist was born at Mechlin about the year 1527, and was a scholar of Michael Coxcie. He was a very eminent painter, he composed with facility, and his figures are well drawn. In the cathedral at Mechlin is a fine picture by this master, of the Decollation of St. John. When Philip, King of Spain, made his public entry into Mechlin, this artist was employed to paint a triumphal arch on the occasion, which gained him great credit, though he was then only twenty-two years of age. He died in 1561.

WILLIAMS, ROBERT. This artist was a native of Wales, and flourished about the year 1715. He distinguished himself as an engraver in mezzotinto, and we have by him a number of portraits, some of which are finely executed, and many of them are interesting in the illustration of English history; among which are the following:

Charles I.; after Vandyck.
Edward, Lord Littleton, Lord Keeper; after the same.
Charles II.; two plates; after Lely and Kneller.
James II., when Duke of York; after Cooper.

Mary Beatrix, his Queen; after Wissing.
William III., when Prince of Orange; after the same.
Mary, Princess of Orange; after the same.
Henry Somerset, Duke of Beaufort; after the same.
William Russell, Duke of Bedford; after the same.
James Fitzroy, Duke of Monmouth.
James Butler, Duke of Ormond; after the same.
Charles Somerset, Marquis of Worcester; after the same.
The Countess of Derby.
Sir Charles Cotton; after Riley.
Theophilus, Earl of Huntingdon; after Kneller.
George, Prince of Denmark; after Wissing.
Anne, Princess of Denmark; after the same.
Lord Cutts, when Mr. Cutts; after the same.
Lord Fitzroy, Duke of Northumberland; after the same.
Charles Lennox, Duke of Richmond; after the same.
Sir George Rook; after Dahl.
Sir John Houblon, Alderman of London; after Closterman; scarce.
Sir Edmund King, M. D.; after Lely.
Barbara Villiers, Duchess of Cleveland; after Kneller.
Ann Scott, Duchess of Monmouth; after Wissing.
Catherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester; inscribed Mrs. Sidley; after the same.
Dorothy Cressy; after Kneller; scarce.
Thomas Betterton, Actor; after the same.
John Campbell, Duke of Argyll; after Closterman.
Sir Richard Blackmore, M. D. and Poet; after the same; fine and scarce.
[William, Earl of Portland; after Simon de Bois.]

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM. The name of this artist is affixed to two views of the town of Halifax. They are slight etchings, and are probably the productions of an amateur of that place.

WILLIAMS, JOHN, an English portrait painter, who is said to have been a scholar of Richardson. He painted a half-length portrait of Mr. Beard, the celebrated singer, from which there is a mezzotinto print by M^cArdell. Mr. Williams was an artist of considerable ability, and his portraits were much and deservedly admired. The time of his death is not precisely ascertained, but it is supposed to have happened about the year 1780.

WILLIAMSON, P., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He resided in London, and was apparently a publisher, as well as an engraver. We have by him some portraits, among which is that of Mildmay, Earl of Westmoreland. He also engraved some small plates of subjects relative to the concealment of Charles II., dated 1667.

WILLINGEN, PETER VANDER, was born at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1607. His pictures represent subjects of still-life; vases of gold and silver, books, and musical instruments, which are very highly finished, and produce a very natural effect. [The time of his death is not authenticated; Balkema says 1665. An artist of the same name and time painted interiors of churches.]

[WILS, or WILTS, JAN, a landscape painter, of Haerlem. He was the father-in-law of Berchem, who married his daughter, and has the credit of having improved that master in his style of landscape painting. Berchem frequently embellished his landscapes with cattle and figures, and such are now attributed entirely to the latter. They may, however, be distinguished by a peculiar green in the vegetation, and less of freedom in the handling than the real works of Berchem. Wils also imitated Jan Both with considerable success. Particulars of his life are wanting.]

WILSON, RICHARD. This distinguished landscape painter was born in Montgomeryshire in 1714. He was the son of a clergyman, who possessed a small benefice in that county, but, soon after the birth of our artist, he was collated to the living of Mould, in Flintshire. At an early period of his life young Wilson discovered a marked disposition for drawing, and was sent to London, where he was placed under the tuition of Thomas Wright, an obscure painter of portraits. To this branch of the art Wilson for several years devoted himself, and it appears that he had acquired considerable reputation in that department, as, about the year 1749, he painted a large picture of George III., then about ten years of age, with his brother, the late Duke of York, for Dr. Hayter, Bishop of Norwich, at that time tutor to the princes. After having practised some years in London, he went to Italy, where he continued the study of portrait painting, being still unacquainted with the genuine bias of his genius, and probably might have remained long ignorant of the peculiar bent of his talents, but for the following circumstance. In his moments of relaxation from his ordinary pursuits, Wilson had painted a landscape, which having been accidentally seen by Zuccherelli, that artist was so struck with the merit of the performance, that he strongly recommended him to apply himself to landscape painting. Another occurrence, which happened nearly at the same time, tended to confirm him in his determination to follow that pursuit. The celebrated French painter, Vernet, was at that time at Rome, where his works were held in the highest estimation; and happening to visit Wilson's painting room, was so struck with a landscape he had painted, that he requested to become the possessor, offering in exchange one of his best pictures; the proposal was readily accepted, and the picture delivered to Vernet, who, with a liberality as commendable as it is unusual, placed it in his exhibition-room, and recommended the painter of it to the particular attention of the cognoscenti. His progress in landscape painting must have been rapid, as he had some pupils in that line of art whilst at Rome, and his works were so much admired, that Mengs painted his portrait, and received in return a landscape by Wilson. It is not known at what time he returned to England, but he was in London in 1758; and his picture of Niobe was in the first exhibition of the Society of Artists, in 1760, by which he acquired great reputation.

The talents of Wilson did not, however, secure him that encouragement and distinction which his abilities deserved. He was doomed to encounter the galling indifference of a tasteless public, which was probably aggravated by the jealousy and intrigues of some of the most distinguished of his contemporaries, with whom he did not live on very amicable terms. This has also been said to have partly resulted from his own conduct, which was by no means distinguished by a conciliatory disposition, or great suavity of manners. Conscious of his own powers, and disdaining to sue for protection, his transcendent abilities were suffered to exert themselves under the oppression of indigence and obscurity, and, participating the destiny of many illustrious artists who had preceded him, the beauty and value of his works were not discovered until death had rendered him equally insensible of admiration or neglect.

At the institution of the Royal Academy, Mr. Wilson was chosen one of the founders, and after the death of Hayman he solicited the situation of the librarian, which he retained until his decayed health obliged him to retire to his brother's in Wales, where he died in May, 1782.

In the Supplement to Pilkington's Dictionary, published in 1798, a prejudiced and an absurd parallel is drawn between the works of Claude Lorraine and those of Wilson, whilst it is, at the same time, admitted, that their styles were so different, that no comparison of them can be justly made. The slightest inspection of his works will convince us of the originality of his style. In his studies in Italy, he wisely avoided all imitation of the artists of that country who had preceded him, and he adopted a manner peculiarly his own, which was not less original than varied and interesting. His views in Italy are selected with judgment and taste, and it has been justly observed, "that in his pictures the waving line of mountains, which bound the distance in every point of view, the dreary and inhospitable plains, rendered solemnly interesting by the mouldering fragments of temples, tombs, and aqueducts, are all indicated in a masterly manner, exhibiting that local character which cannot but be considered as peculiarly grand and classical." In his English pictures he is particularly successful in the fresh and dewy brightness he has given to his verdure; and though, being sometimes employed to paint particular views, which were less picturesque than he would have selected, and consequently partook of the formality of portraiture, they are always treated with taste and ingenuity. For the satisfaction of collectors, it may not be improper to notice his frequent repetition of the same subject or view, as there are several of his pictures which he has repeated three or four times, with little or no variation, a circumstance which has sometimes given rise to a suspicion of the originality of some of his works, which are really the productions of his pencil.

WILSON, BENJAMIN. This artist was a native of Leeds, in Yorkshire. Having shown some talent for drawing, he was sent to London when young, and was recommended to Dr. Berdmore, master of the Charter-house, who took him under his protection. It is uncertain whether he was regularly educated in the art, but by his natural disposition, and assiduous application, he became a very reputable painter of portraits. He was among the first of the portrait painters of his time who endeavoured to introduce a better style of relief and of the chiaro-scuro into his pictures, and his heads are coloured with more warmth and nature than those of the generality of his contemporaries.

About the year 1773 he was appointed master painter to the Board of Ordnance, which he retained till a few years before his death. He died at his house in Great Russell Street, in 1788. We have several etchings by this artist, among which are the following:

An old Man's Head, with a hat and feather, and a ruff; in imitation of Rembrandt.

A small Landscape, lengthways; in imitation of the same master.

His own Portrait, in a wig, with very little drapery.

A coarse etching, entitled The Repeal. It was published upon the repeal of the American stamp act, and contains the portraits of the leading men of the ministerial party.

[There are several mezzotint engravings after him, two of which are Garrick in the characters of Hamlet and King Lear.]

WILSON, W., an English engraver in mezzotint, by whom we have some portraits, among which is that of the Countess of Newburgh; after Dahl.

WILSON, WILLIAM. This artist engraved several landscapes, after Claude Lorraine, Poussin, and other masters. They are executed with the graver, in a neat style.

WILT, VANDER, a Dutch mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. He scraped several plates from the pictures of Brower, Schalken, and other masters. [Zani names the mezzotinto engraver Ferdinand, and Laborde says, F. Vander Wilt, and quotes his account from Brulliot. But Brulliot calls him Thomas, a painter of portraits and familiar subjects, born at Piershil the 29th of October, 1659, who was a scholar of Jan Verkolje, and exercised his profession as a painter and mezzotinto engraver at Delft, and was living in 1729. Zani mentions Thomas as a portrait painter and engraver, (he does not say in mezzotinto,) who operated from 1687 to 1699. The monogram given by Brulliot would indicate Thomas ;

that by Laborde being in relief, on a very dark tablet, is not so decisive. Portraits with the name of Vander Wilt have passed through the hands of the editor ; they are painted somewhat in the manner of Constantine Netscher, well drawn, all the parts carefully finished, the colours brilliant, but rather too florid in the draperies, and defective in chiaro-scuro.]

WILTON, ———, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1670. He engraved several plates, representing various subjects, which are executed in a style resembling that of Romeyn de Hooghe, though very inferior.

[WINDLER, or WINDTER, J. W., an engraver, who lived at Nuremberg in the middle of the eighteenth century. Portrait of Johannes Carolus Scheurl a Deffersdorf, J. W. Windter del. et sculps. Norib. 1754. Füssli calls him Windler, and says he operated in 1735. Brulliot, who names him John William Windter, says he operated between the years 1730 and 1760, and that his mark, J. W. W., is found on portraits for the most part after Paul Decker, Kenkel, and other painters of Nuremberg. He died in 1765.]

WINGANDORP, F. This artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1672. He engraved several frontispieces and other book-plates, which are very indifferently executed.

[WINGHEN, JONOCUS, or JOSSE, VAN, an historical painter, was born at Brussels in 1544. He went young to Italy, and after four years' study at Rome returned to Brussels, and was appointed principal painter to the Prince of Parma. His love of change induced him to quit the service of the prince, and establish himself at Frankfort, where he painted an allegorical picture of Germany alarmed, under the form of a naked woman chained to a rock, with the figure of Time flying above, coming to deliver her. Two others are recorded ; The Last Supper, and Apelles and Campaspe. His known pictures are very few, though he was a distinguished painter in his day, and lived to a good age. He died at Frankfort, Zani says in 1613, but according to Füssli and Brulliot in 1603 ; the two last say in his sixty-first year, but according to that date he would have been only fifty-nine. His son, Jeremiah, born in 1578, was also a painter of history and portraits ; some of his pictures are in the gallery at Dusseldorf ; the subjects and the marks resemble those of his father, and probably have caused some confusion in the accounts of both. Jeremiah died in 1648.]

WINSTANLEY, HENRY, was the projector and builder of the Eddystone Lighthouse, and perished in the ruins when it was destroyed by a violent storm. In 1694, he was clerk of the works at the palace of Audley-end, of which he designed and etched a series of pretty views, which he dedicated to James II., and added an inscription in honour of Sir Christopher Wren. They are now become very scarce. [They are generally included in the five-volume edition of Kip's Views, in which is also found a very large view of the lighthouse in which he perished. The inscription beneath it is, "This Draught was made and engraven by Henry Winstanley of Littlebury, Gent. and is sold at his Water-works ; where also is to be seen at any time y^e modle of y^e said Building, and principal Rooms for sixpence a piece."]

WINSTANLEY, HAMLET, was the son of Henry Winstanley, and was designed by his father for a painter. With that intention he was placed under the tuition of Sir Godfrey Kneller, by whom he was instructed in the principles of design. On leaving that master he went to Italy, where he resided some years, and after his return to England applied himself entirely to engraving. He etched a set of twenty plates from pictures in the collection of the Earl of Derby, by Titian, Tintoretto, P. Veronese, Bassano, Guido, Castiglione, Spagnoletto, C. Maratti, Rubens, Vandyck, Rembrandt, &c. He also engraved a set of prints from the paintings by Sir James Thornhill, in the cupola of St. Paul's. He died about the year 1760.

WINTER, GILES DE. This painter was born at Leeward in 1650, and was a scholar of Renier Brakenburg, whose style he imitated with considerable success. He painted similar subjects to those of his master, representing Dutch boors regaling, and the recreations of the cabaret. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and his colouring is brilliant and clear, but his design is even more incorrect than that of his instructor, and, like him, he neglected the study of nature, to adopt the negligence and despatch of a mannerist. His pictures are little known, except in Holland, and there they are not held in much estimation. [He died in 1720.]

[WINTTER, JOSEPH GEORGE, a designer and engraver of animals, flourished in 1787. He was a native of Germany. He published a number of pieces after his own designs and those of Melchior Roos, Teniers, Peter van Laar, Berchem, Wouwerman, and other masters. Fifty-three of these were in the Rigal collection. He is not mentioned elsewhere, unless he be the same as Gio-Guglielmo, indicated by Zani as a painter of animals, and an engraver, who operated in 1764. There were several others of the name Winter, painters and engravers, but their works have not come under the editor's notice.]

WIRZ, JOHN. This artist was born at Zurich in 1640, and was a scholar of Conrad Meyer. He practised portrait painting with considerable success, but he is more deserving of notice as the engraver of a set of forty-two plates, from his own designs, for a book written by himself, entitled Johannis Wirzii Romæ Animale Exemplum, &c., published in 1677. They are etched in a neat, spirited style, resembling that of John William Baur. He also etched two plates after Holbein, one representing a female, with a naked child holding an arrow, and the other a woman with two children. We have also by him a small whole-length portrait of Theodore Meienus, after Meyer. [He died in 1710.]

WISSING, WILLIAM. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1656, but was instructed in the art by William Doudyns, a painter of history, at the Hague. On leaving that master he went to Paris, where he did not remain long, and afterwards visited England, about the year 1680. He was for some time employed to assist Sir Peter Lely in his numerous works, and, after the death of that eminent artist, he became a favourite painter. He drew all the Royal Family, and particularly the Duke of Monmouth, whose portrait he painted several times, which ingratiated him with the king and the ladies of the court. Although he found a formidable rival in Sir Godfrey Kneller, he still was extensively employed, and after the death of Charles II. was appointed principal painter to his successor, by whom he was sent into Holland to paint the portraits of William and Mary. He did not long survive his return to England, and died at Burleigh, the seat of the Earl of Exeter, in 1687. We have a mezzotinto portrait of Wissing, inscribed Gulielmus Wissingus inter pictores sui sæculi celeberrimos, nulli secundus, artis suæ non exiguum decus et ornamentum, immodicis brevis ætas.

WIT, or WITTE, PETER DE, called PIETRO CANDIDO. This painter was born at Bruges in 1548. It is not known under whom he studied, but he travelled to Italy when he was young, where he formed an intimacy with Giorgio Vasari, and assisted that master in the works he was employed on in the Vatican. He painted with equal success in oil and in fresco, and was employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany in several considerable works in the palace at Florence, and designed some cartoons for tapestry. Maximilian, Elector of Bavaria, invited him to Munich, where he passed the remainder of his life. John Sadeler has engraved several prints from the works of this master, among which are the Annunciation, Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus, the Holy Women at the Tomb of our Saviour, and the Last Supper. [The time of his death is uncertain; some place it in 1599, others after 1620. His brother, Cornelius, was very eminent as a landscape painter, but the accounts respecting him are strangely confused.]

WIT, or WITTE, GASPARD DE, was born at Antwerp in 1621. He visited Italy, where he remained several years, and on his return acquired considerable reputation in painting small landscapes, very highly finished, in which he generally introduced architectural ruins, of which he had made designs during his residence in Italy. [He died in 1673. His brother, Peter de Witte, junior, was also a landscape painter; he was born in 1620, and died about 1669.]

WIT, or WITTE, EMANUEL DE, was born at Alkmaar in 1607, and was a scholar of Evert van Aelst, a painter of still-life. He did not, however, adopt the style of his instructor, but for some time applied himself to portrait painting. Not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he studied perspective and architecture, and became one of the most eminent artists of his country, in painting interior views of churches and temples, which he embellished with figures correctly drawn, and touched with great spirit. He gave a striking and picturesque appearance to his pictures, by frequently representing the sun shining through the windows, on part of the building, which is finely contrasted with that which is in shadow, and produces a natural and pleasing effect. The different ornaments of the buildings are designed with the utmost precision, and every object is touched with a masterly and bold pencil. His best pictures represent the insides of the churches at Amsterdam, with groups of figures, habited in the dresses of the times. He died in 1692. [It is to be regretted that a man of his superior talents as an artist should have been of a morose disposition, and apt to depreciate the works of others. This bad temper brought him at last to contempt and poverty, and he was found drowned in a canal at Haerlem, with a cord round his neck. It is said that he destroyed the best picture he ever painted in a fit of passion, or indignation, on being refused the full stipulated payment by the representatives of the son of Admiral De Ruyter, who had ordered it.]

WIT, JACOB DE. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1695, and, having shown an early inclination for the art, when he was fourteen years of age he was placed under the tuition of Albert van Spiers, a painter of history of some eminence, under whom he studied three years. The desire of contemplating the admirable productions of Rubens and Vandyck, and the other distinguished masters of the Flemish school, which embellished the public edifices at Antwerp, induced him to visit that city, where one of his uncles resided, and possessed a choice collection of valuable pictures. At Antwerp he became a scholar of Jacob van Halen, a painter of little celebrity, under whom he did not continue longer than two years, when he devoted himself entirely to the study of the works of Rubens and Vandyck.

In 1712 and 1713 he made designs from the paintings by Rubens in the four ceilings of the Jesuits' church, in thirty-six compartments, which were destroyed by lightning in 1718, and we are indebted to De Wit for the preservation of these admirable compositions, which were afterwards engraved, from his designs, by John Punt. He was principally employed in painting ceilings, and the decorations of splendid apartments, consisting of emblematical and allegorical subjects, which he composed with great ingenuity, and his colouring is clear and agreeable. He was particularly successful in the design of children, which he was fond of introducing into his pictures.

In 1736 he was employed by the magistrates of Amsterdam in the embellishment of their great Council-chamber with several subjects from the Old Testament, which is his most considerable work, in which he has discovered an inventive genius, and great facility of execution. He also painted several altar-pieces for the catholic churches in Holland, which are very creditable performances. His sketches, or models for his large works, are touched with neatness and spirit, and are very well coloured. They are held in considerable estimation. He was living in 1744. [His decorative pictures of children sporting, painted in chiaro-scuro, are remarkably fine, and are held in the highest estimation.]

[WIT, DE. There are several other artists of the name; such as Francis, Anthony, E. and B., painters; and others who were engravers: but the accounts are so mingled and confused that it would require a long examination to disentangle them, and after all, to no very good purpose.]

WITDOECK, HANS, or JOHN, an eminent Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1600. His name is differently inscribed on his plates; it is sometimes written Witdoeck, sometimes Witouck, and occasionally Witdouck. The talents of this artist were employed under the immediate inspection of Rubens, and he engraved several plates from the pictures of that distinguished painter, which, though less correct in the drawing, and less admirable in the mechanical part of the execution, than those of Vorsterman, Bolswert, or Pontius, are still estimable for a vigorous and powerful effect, and as they are, in several instances, the only prints we have of the capital pictures from which they are engraved. He also executed some plates from the works of other eminent artists of the Flemish school. The following are his best prints :

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

Melchizedeck presenting Bread and Wine to Abraham.

[1638. Proofs before the letters are very rare.]

The Nativity. This plate has undergone several alterations, chiefly to add to the effect. The first impressions are without the address of Corn. Coeberchs; the second are with that address. The plate afterwards came into the possession of S. Bolswert, who retouched it, by which it was greatly improved. He also effaced the name of Coeberchs, and inserted his own.

The Adoration of the Magi; engraved in 1638. There are also different impressions of this plate. [The date is probably a mistake. See the other dates.]

The Elevation of the Cross, in three sheets. His most capital print. [1638.]

Christ with the two Disciples at Emmaus. There are some impressions of this plate printed in chiaro-scuro, under the direction of Rubens, which are very scarce. [1638.]

The Assumption of the Virgin. The impressions of this plate with the address of Corn. van Merlen, are retouched. [1639.]

The Holy Family, with St. John. The first impressions of this plate are before the address of Moermans.

Another Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth and St. John. The best impressions have the address of R. J. de Bert. St. Cecilia. This plate was retouched and improved by Bolswert.

He also engraved several plates from the works of Cornelius Schut, and other masters. [The time of his decease is not ascertained.]

WITHOOS, MATTHEW. This painter was born at Amersfort in 1627, and was a scholar of Jacob van Kampen, a painter of history and an architect. On leaving that master he travelled to Italy, in company with Otho Marcellis, where, instead of pursuing the line of art in which he was educated, he adopted that of his travelling companion, and distinguished himself as a painter of curious plants, reptiles, and insects. He represented these exotic objects with surprising truth and precision, and his pictures were very highly finished. During a residence of two years at Rome, he was much employed by Cardinal de Medici, for whom he painted a great variety of subjects of that description, for which he was liberally rewarded. On his return to Holland, in 1650, his works were not less admired than they had been in Italy; and they were readily purchased at considerable prices. The approach of the French army, in 1672, induced him to retire into North Holland, and he settled at Hoorn, where he died, in 1703.

WITHOOS, JOHN, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Amersfort in 1648, and was instructed by his father, until he had acquired sufficient ability to undertake a journey to Italy on the produce of his talents. During a residence of several years at Rome, he was employed in designing the most picturesque views in the vicinity of that capital, which he painted, in water-colours, in a neat, finished style, and his pictures of that description were much admired. Though he met with very flattering encouragement at Rome, the solicitations of his friends induced him to return to Holland, where his works were not less admired. He was invited to the court of the Duke of Saxe Lawenburg, in whose service he remained until his death, in 1695.

WITHOOS, PETER. This artist was the younger brother of John Withoos, and received his first instruction in the art from his father. He excelled in painting flowers, plants, and insects, in water-colours, on vellum, which he finished in a very delicate style, and they were accurately designed, and coloured from nature. His works are highly esteemed in Holland, where they are purchased at considerable prices. He died at Amsterdam in 1693.

WITHOOS, FRANCIS, was the youngest son and scholar of Matthias Withoos, and painted plants and insects in water-colours, in the style of his brother, but was very inferior to him. He died at Hoorn in 1705.

[WITSEN, NICOLAS, a landscape engraver, flourished about 1659.]

WITTIG, BARTHOLOMEW. This artist was a native of Oels, in Silesia, and flourished about the year 1640. He excelled in painting festivals and concerts of music. In the gallery of the Louvre is a picture by him, representing a sumptuous banquet, which possesses considerable merit. He died in 1684.

WOLFGANG, GEORGE ANDREW, a German engraver, born at Chemnitz, in Saxony, in 1631. He followed the profession of a goldsmith, and engraved a few historical subjects and portraits, which are executed in a stiff, dry style, and possess little merit. Among others, we have the following prints by him :

PORTRAITS.

George Frederick, Margrave of Brandenburg; after C. Zierl.

Peter Muller, Jurisconsult.

SUBJECTS.

A Sacrifice to Diana; after J. H. Schoenfeld.

Saul consulting the Shade of Samuel; after J. Werner.

A set of ten subjects from the Old and New Testament; after Io. Umbach.

[Laborde quotes the following mezzotinto prints by G. A. Wolfgang :

Johannes Koch, a medallion; very good, well expressed.
A young Warrior in armour, with flowing hair; pretty plate.

A young Man with long curled hair, and an old Man with a beard; very pretty plate.

He died in 1716.]

WOLFGANG, ANDREW MATTHEW, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Augsburg in 1662, and learned the principles of design and engraving from his father. We have by him several portraits of distinguished personages of Germany, of which the most esteemed is that of the Margrave of Anspach, of that time. [He died in 1736.]

WOLFGANG, JOHN GEORGE. This artist was the younger son of George Andrew Wolfgang, born at Augsburg in 1664, and received his instruction from his father. He had acquired considerable reputation as an engraver, when he was invited to the court of Berlin, in 1704, and was appointed engraver to the king. We have a considerable number of portraits by him, which are executed in a much neater style than those of his father and brother. He also engraved a set of prints for a work in folio, entitled Notitia Universitatis Francofurtanæ.

published in 1707. The following are among his most esteemed portraits :

Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg; from the equestrian statue by Jacobi.
Augustus William, Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburg; after Franck.
John Melchior Dinglinger; after A. Pesne.

[He died in 1743.]

WOLFGANG, GUSTAVUS ANDREW. This artist was the son of Andrew Matthew Wolfgang, and was born at Augsburg in 1692. He was instructed in design and engraving by his uncle, John George, and executed several plates of portraits in the same neat style. [He died in 1774.]

WOLGEMUT, MICHAEL, an ancient German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1434. Of his works as a painter little is known; a picture by him is preserved in the gallery of the Louvre at Paris, representing Christ brought before Pilate, which exhibits the dry, Gothic style, which characterized the German school previous to the period of Albert Durer.

Wolgemut flourished soon after the commencement of engraving in Germany, and has been supposed to have been instructed in that art by Jacob Walch. This supposition is, however, extremely questionable, as will be found by a reference to the article Jacob Walch. As Mr. Strutt appears to have given the most clear and satisfactory account of these two artists, we shall quote that author at length on the present occasion.

"Wolgemut was a man of genius. He engraved both on wood and on copper; but his works on wood are far more numerous, and more generally known, than those on copper. It is said that his mark was the letter W only, and it is true that we have a great number of prints marked with a simple W; but it is equally certain that they do not all, if any of them, belong to Wolgemut. I have already informed the reader, in the account of Wenceslaus, an ancient engraver on copper, and contemporary with Martin Schoen, that he used the W alone as a mark, and the greater part of his works consist of copies from the engravings of other masters; and the same hand is easily traced in all or the far greater part of the prints so marked; for which reason one may fairly conclude that they are all the productions of one and the same person. Besides, judging from the boldness and merit which appear in the engravings on wood by Wolgemut, together with the originality of the designs, we cannot easily be led to conceive that there should be that servility and laboured style of execution (all of which fails of producing a clear effect) in his works on copper only, for the prints, marked with the W, are every way inferior to what might justly have been expected from Wolgemut, the engraver of the Nuremberg Chronicle.

"We have some few excellent engravings on copper executed about this time; these have much of that spirited style in them which appears in the wooden cuts of Wolgemut, and they are marked with a W surmounted by a small o, thus, $\overset{\circ}{W}$, and these prints, I verily believe, are the productions of his graver. For this reason, I shall describe the one following very particularly, and this may serve as a specimen for all the rest. In the collection of Dr. Monroe, I found a very fine impression. It is ten inches and a half high, by seven inches and a half in width, and represents an old Man seated in a praying posture; he has a standard or flag resting upon his left shoulder, and a book before him; behind him is an armorial shield, with three different bearings, and at the bottom a cave with a gate before it. Above the figure is a scroll, upon which is written, SCÆ WILHELME DUX AQUITANIÆ ET COMES PICTAVIENSIS. The head of this figure is well drawn, the hands are marked in a spirited manner, the folds of the drapery are broad, and boldly expressed, and the whole is composed in a style which does much honour to the artist. With respect to the mechanical part, it is executed with the graver only, in a dark, clear style, so as to have the effect of a neat etching."

In conjunction with William Pleydenwurff, he designed and executed the wooden cuts for the large folio work, compiled by Herman Schedel, and printed at Nuremberg, in 1493, usually known by the appellation of the Nuremberg Chronicle. Michael Wolgemut has the honour of counting among his disciples the celebrated Albert Durer. The following prints are generally attributed to him :

Christ crowned with Thorns, with the Virgin and St. John.

The Crucifixion, with St. John and the Holy Women.

The Entombing of Christ.

The Resurrection.

St. Sebastian.

St. Christopher.

A Cavalier and a Lady walking in a garden, Death holding an Hour-glass is seen behind a tree. The same subject, with some variation, was engraved by Albert Durer.

A Sea-monster carrying off a Nymph.

Three Women, or Witches, with a Globe over their heads, with the letters O. G. H. and an appearance of Hell in the back-ground; dated 1494. The same subject was also engraved by Albert Durer.

A set of thirteen plates of Christ and the Twelve Apostles.

Huber mentions a wooden cut by Michael Wolgemut, printed in chiaro-scuro, representing Christ at table with his Disciples, which is said to be extremely scarce.

[With regard to Michael Wohlgenuth as an engraver, there is nothing conclusive: the greatest connoisseurs are at issue on that point. Bartsch expresses strong doubt on the subject, and thinks that the prints marked with the letter W belong rather to Wencelas d'Olmutz, and accordingly places them to his account. Zani, on the other side, expresses great surprise that Bartsch should deprive Wohlgenuth of the honour of engraving with the burin; but at the same time stoutly affirms that he never engraved in wood: "Non ha mai inciso in legno; e questa è una notizia immutabile." It is asserted that he engraved some of the wood cuts for the Nuremberg Chronicle; but Ottley goes only so far as to say he furnished the designs, and superintended the execution, and that it is "more than probable" that he proved with his own hand, to the subordinate artists employed, the practicability of that style of workmanship which he required. But he does not give an instance of the "more than probable." The style of workmanship required was the cross-hatchings, and Ottley would lead his reader to believe that Wohlgenuth was the first to introduce that improvement in wood engraving. He says, "Wohlgenuth perceived that, though difficult, it was not impossible,"—and "to him belongs the praise of having been the first who duly appreciated the powers of the art;" then follows the "more than probable." On this passage John Jackson, in his "Treatise on Wood Engraving," remarks: "Although it is true that cross-hatchings are not to be found in the earliest wood engravings, yet Mr.

Ottley is wrong in assigning this material improvement in the art to Michael Wohlgenuth; for cross-hatching is introduced in the beautiful cut forming the frontispiece to the Latin edition of Breydenbach's Travels, folio, first printed at Mentz, by Erhard Reuwich, in 1486, seven years before the Nuremberg Chronicle appeared. The cut is not only the finest wood engraving which had appeared up to that date, but is in point of design and execution as superior to the best cuts in the Nuremberg Chronicle, as the designs of Albert Durer are to the cuts in the oldest editions of the Poor Preachers' Bible."

Mr. Jackson further remarks: "Wohlgenuth, as associated with wood engraving, has too long been decked out with borrowed plumes; and persons who know little or nothing either of the history or practice of the art, and who are misled by writers on whose authority they rely, believe that Michael Wohlgenuth was not only one of the best wood engravers of his day, but that he was the first who introduced a material improvement into the practice of the art. This error becomes more firmly rooted when such persons come to be informed that he was the master of Albert Durer, who is generally, but erroneously, supposed to have been the best wood engraver of his day. Albert Durer studied under Michael Wohlgenuth as a painter, and not as a wood engraver, and I consider it as extremely questionable if either of them ever engraved a single block."

Many other writers on the subject might be quoted for and against, but those above named are generally considered the best authorities: connoisseurs need not be told who are the belligerents.

It is admitted that Michael Wohlgenuth was a painter, and, for the period in which he lived, a good one. But there is a great deal of uncertainty respecting the authenticity of pictures attributed to him. What by one writer is considered his work, is by another ascribed to Hugo Vander Goes, and by a third to Justus of Ghent, and possibly is by neither. It may be readily believed that his earlier pictures are sufficiently uncouth in many particulars, but they are interesting in the history of the art. There are five of these in the gallery at Munich, representing the Nativity, the Agony in the Garden, the Crucifixion, the Deposition, and Resurrection. Commenting on these pictures, Lord Lindsay remarks, that though inferior and uncouth as regards expression, attitude, design, drapery, and landscape, the powerful and deeply seated piety of the artist has printed itself on his work, and animated the Saviour's head, especially, although common-featured, with a divine expression attained by few of his contemporaries. But, his Lordship adds, simplicity and sincerity are the guides to truth, and Wohlgenuth's career was one of improvement to the last. In a note his Lordship gives a list of pictures ascribed to Wohlgenuth, of different dates, existing in Germany. But the most important of his works, on which there is scarcely any difference of opinion among connoisseurs, is one in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. It was painted in 1511, and represents St. Jerome seated on a throne, with the donors, a man and a woman, kneeling at his side. There are incidents of his history depicted in the back-ground in small groups; the female figures are particularly sweet and pleasing, and the portraits of the donors excellent. This is considered his chef d'œuvre. He survived this triumph of his old age eight years, dying in 1519 at the age of eighty-five. Three years previous to his death Albert Durer painted his portrait, which is preserved at Munich. See note to WENDELAS D'OLMUTZ.]

WOLTERS, HENRIETTA. This celebrated painteress in miniature was born at Amsterdam in 1692. She was the daughter of Theodore van Pee, an artist of little celebrity, by whom she was taught the first rudiments of design. She was afterwards instructed in miniature by James Christopher Le Blond, and it was not long before she surpassed her preceptor in the delicacy of her touch and the beauty of her colouring. The portraits of Vandyck were the models she most consulted, she copied some of them in miniature with surprising accuracy, and though on so small a scale, her copies preserved all the suavity of tint, and truth of character, which distinguish the works of that admirable portrait painter. Her extraordinary talents soon attracted public admiration, and she was employed to paint the portraits of the principal families at Amsterdam.

When Peter the Great was in that city, he honoured our artist with a visit, and was so much pleased with the beauty and delicacy of her performances, that he made her the most flattering offers of his favour and protection, to induce her to visit Petersburg, which her attachment to her own country prevented her from accepting. Her reputation reached the court of Berlin, whither she was invited by Frederick William, king of Prussia, but her constant employment, and her partiality for the city of Amsterdam, where her husband carried on an extensive commerce in works of art, induced her to decline the invitation. She continued to exercise her talents with great respectability, until the year 1741, when she died at Amsterdam.

WOOD, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished in London about the year 1745. He engraved several plates for the set of landscapes published by Mr. Boydell in 1747. They are executed in a clear, neat style, and possess considerable merit. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

A Mountainous Landscape; after Sal. Rosa.

Two Landscapes; after Gaspar Poussin.

Two Italian Landscapes; after Claude Lorraine.

A Fire-light; after Rembrandt.

The Lake of Nemi; after Wilson.

A View of London from Greenwich; after Tillemans.

WOODCOCK, ROBERT. According to Lord Orford, this artist was of a gentleman's family, and became a painter by genius and inclination. He had a place under the government, which he quitted to devote himself to his art, which he practised solely on sea-pieces. He designed those subjects from his childhood, and studied the technical part of ships with so much attention, that he could cut out a ship with all the rigging, to the utmost exactness. In 1723 he began to practise in oil, and in two years he copied above forty pictures of Vanderveelde. With so good a foundation he openly professed the art, and his talent became so respectable, that the Duke of Chandos gave him thirty guineas for one of his pictures. He died of the gout, in 1728, in the thirty-seventh year of his age.

WOOLASTON, J. This artist is mentioned by the noble author of the Anecdotes. He was born in London about the year 1672, and painted portraits, which had the merit of strong resemblance, though perhaps not otherwise excellent, as his prices were very low. Besides painting, he performed on the violin and flute, and played at the concert of that extraordinary person, Thomas Britton, the small-coal man, whose picture he drew twice, one of which portraits was purchased by Sir Hans Sloane, and is now in the British Museum.

WOOLLETT, WILLIAM. This eminent English engraver was born at Maidstone, in Kent, in 1735. He was instructed in engraving by an obscure artist named Tinney, but he was indebted for the admirable and original style, for which his works are distinguished, to the resources of his own genius. By an intelligent union of the point and the burin, he carried landscape engraving to a degree of beauty and perfection which was unknown before him, and which perhaps still remains unequalled. The foregrounds of his plates are as admirable for depth and vigour as his distances for tenderness and delicacy; and in his exquisite prints from the pictures of our inimitable Wilson, he appears to have impressed on the copper the very mind and feeling of that classic painter. The talents of Woollett were not, however, confined to landscapes, he engraved, with equal success, historical subjects and portraits. The extent of his abilities, and his extraordinary merit, are so universally acknowledged, that any further comment on them is unnecessary. His character as an artist and as a man, has been drawn up by one of his friends with so much truth and simplicity, that it is here inserted. "To say that he was the first artist in his profession would be giving him his least praise, for he was a good man. Naturally modest and amiable in his disposition, he never censured the works of others, or omitted pointing out their merit. His patience under the continual torments of a most dreadful disorder, upwards of nine months, was truly exemplary, and he died, as he had lived, at peace with all the world, in which he never had an enemy. He left his family inconsolable for his death, and the public to lament the loss of a man, whose works (of which his unassuming temper never boasted) are an honour to his country." He died the 23rd of May, 1785. The following is an ample list of his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

George III., King of Great Britain; after Ramsay.
Peter Paul Rubens; after Vandyck.

LANDSCAPES AND SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A View of the Hermitage of Warkworth; after Hearne.
The Merry Villagers; after Jones.
A Landscape, with Æneas and Dido; after Jones and Mortimer.
A Landscape, with Buildings; after John Smith.
Another Landscape; after George Smith; the first premium print.
The Hay-makers; after the same.
The Apple-gatherers; after the same.
The Rural Cot; after the same.
The Spanish Pointer; after Stubbs.
A View of Snowden; after Wilson.
Celadon and Amelia; after the same.
Ceyx and Aleyone; after the same.
Cicero at his Villa; after the same.
Solitude; after the same: by Woollett and Ellis.
Niobe; after the same.
Phaeton; after the same.
Meleager and Atalanta; after the same.
The Jocund Peasants and Merry Cottagers; after C. Dusart; a pair.
The Fishery; after Wright.
The Boar-hunt; after Pillement.
Diana and Acteon; after Fil. Lawri.
A pair, Morning and Evening; after Swanevelt.
A Landscape, with figures and a Waterfall; after An. Caracci.
Macbeth and the Witches; after Zuccherelli.
The Enchanted Castle; after Claude, by Woollett and Vivares.
The Temple of Apollo; after the same.

Roman Edifices in ruins; after the same.
A Landscape, with the Meeting of Jacob and Laban; after the same.
The Death of General Wolfe; after West.
The Battle of La Hogue; after the same.

[Woollett stands at the head of the first class of landscape engravers; no other artist's works were more exclusively his own, or embraced a wider field of subject, or a more rich and varied character of execution. Since his time some of the most eminent have availed themselves of the talent of others in forwarding their plates, and, according to present practice, it would be difficult to find a large engraving entirely the work of one hand. Others may have represented the softness of flesh more perfectly; it is only in this particular, perhaps, that he will be found wanting, and that merely as relates to forms and figures where flesh is the principal object. The advance which the art of engraving made in his hands was immense. He was the first who conceived and embodied in practice the happy idea of uniting in one plate the three methods of engraving; namely, by aquafortis, the burin, and the dry point. By this union, and a just distribution of light and shadow, he rivalled the colours of the painter and produced the optic illusion of the picture.

Longhi, who was not very prodigal of praise on engravers in his own line, remarks, that "Woollett in his works exhibited so much artistic mastery, so much vivacity and boldness of touch, so much force and harmony of chiaro-scuro, so much variety of tint, so much intelligence in aerial perspective, so much truth, in fact, and so much pictorial illusion, that he was, for all contemporary engravers, and is for those of the present time, the marvel and the example."

The two plates by Woollett which have received from foreign amateurs the highest admiration, are The Death of General Wolfe, and The Battle of La Hogue; of these their praise is unbounded. In a manuscript catalogue, written by the late Alderman Boydell, mention is made of two proofs of the Niobe before the letters; if such are in existence they are invaluable. When the Alderman's selected prints were sold by the editor, they were not amongst them. It should be recorded that Woollett, during his life, superintended the taking impressions from his important plates, and it was his custom to destroy such as exhibited any imperfection in the printing. The credit of some modern engravers would not suffer by following the example, instead of identifying themselves with publishers, and putting forth, as they frequently do, impressions from overworked or retouched plates, and calling them proofs. From artists they degenerate into mere traders, preferring present emolument to enduring reputation.

In the Biblioteca Italiana, tom. xxi., is a very eloquent and discriminating eulogy on Woollett's artistic merits.]

WOOTTON, JOHN, an eminent English painter of landscapes and animals, who flourished about the year 1720. He was a scholar of John Wyck, and became a distinguished artist in the branch which he principally pursued. He particularly excelled in designing the sports of the turf and the field, and his horses and dogs were drawn with surprising spirit and accuracy. He was employed by the principal frequenters of Newmarket in painting the portraits of their favourite racers; and he was not less eminent in subjects of the chase, of which the most esteemed were seven pictures of fox-hunting, which were engraved by Canot. He painted a picture of William, Duke of Cumberland, with a view of the routed rebel army near Culloden, of which we have a print by Baron. His talents were not, however, confined to these subjects, he painted landscapes with considerable success, in which he sometimes imitated the style of Claude Lorraine and Gaspar Poussin. He died in 1765.

WORERIOT, or VOEIRIOT, PETER. This artist was born at Bar-le-Duc, in Lorraine, about the year 1525. He chiefly resided at Lyons, where he followed the profession of a goldsmith and an engraver. We have several prints by him, from his own designs, executed in a neat style; his drawing, as was usual with the artists of his time, is not very correct, and there is not much effect in his prints, from the lights being scattered, and a want of depth in the shadows. They are, notwithstanding, held in considerable estimation. He usually marked his copper-plates with a complicated monogram, composed of several letters, which appear to be the initials of his name, and the place of his nativity, thus,

Among others, he engraved a set of plates for a book published at Lyons in 1556, entitled Pinax Iconicus antiquorum, ac variorum in sepulchris rituum. According to Papillon, he also engraved on wood, and his cuts are said to be very numerous, and executed with great neatness and delicacy. His wooden cuts are marked with a double cross, called the cross of Lorraine †.

COPPER-PLATES MARKED WITH HIS MONOGRAM.

The Sacrifice of Abraham.

Moses saved from the Nile.

Phalaris put into the Brazen Bull.

A Woman with two Children in her arms, throwing herself on a funeral pile.

Two small Landscapes, with a great number of figures.

The Battle betwixt Constantine and Maxentius; after Raffaele.

[Of this short account it is only necessary to correct the spelling of the name of the artist, the date of his birth, and explain the intricate monogram with which his prints are marked. His name is PIERRE WOERIOT; he was born in 1532, as appears by the inscription to his portrait, engraved by himself in 1556; "Petrus Woeiriot Lotharingus has faciebat eiconas evivs effigies haec est anno suae aetatis. 24.—1556." At the age of thirty he assumed, for some reason not clearly explained, the surname De Bonzey, and the letters P. W. D. B., worked into the monogram, signify Pierre Woeiriot De Bonzey.

Robert Dumesnil, Peintre Graveur Français, tom. vii., has given a long and very interesting account of the artist, and minute descriptions of his numerous works to the number of 401 pieces. This elaborate and entertaining account is recommended to the inquirer's perusal; he will there find that Pierre Woeiriot was no common man; and that it is a fortunate circumstance for his memory to be recorded by such an able biographer, and his works described by so consummate a critic, as Robert Dumesnil.]

WORLIDGE, THOMAS, an English painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He practised miniature painting for some time, and afterwards attempted portraits in oil; but not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he applied himself entirely to engraving. Worlidge adopted a style resembling that of Rembrandt, and finished his plates with the point of the graver, or the scratchings of a dry point. His prints are very numerous, and possess considerable merit. They chiefly consist of heads in the manner of Rembrandt and portraits. He engraved a considerable number of antique gems, a complete set of which, in the first state of the plates, and printed on satin, is now of much mercantile value. We have also the following prints by him:

Marcus Tullius Cicero, after the marble at Oxford.

The Installation of the Earl of Westmoreland as Chancellor of the University of Oxford.

His drawings on vellum in Indian ink and black lead are highly esteemed. He died at Hammer-smith in 1766, aged about 65. [Neither the year nor the place of his birth is ascertained. He first practised as a painter at Bath; afterwards in King Street, Covent Garden, where he painted portraits in crayons and oil; among these are Mary Squires, Elizabeth Canning, and Kitty Fisher. He designed and engraved "The Theatre at Oxford as it appeared on the Installation of the Earl of Westmoreland;" a work of considerable labour, containing a multitude of heads and figures, most of them portraits, among which is that of the artist. His death is said to have occurred in 1768.]

WORMS, ANTHONY VON, a German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1530. He was a native of Worms, in the palatinate of the Rhine, from which city he derives his name. Florent le Comte miscalls him Vuormace. He executed several cuts, which, though in a Gothic style, are not devoid of merit. His prints are usually marked with an A and a W intersected, thus .

[Bartsch describes eleven wood-cuts by him, several of which have the date 1529, and one has the inscription Coloniae, per Anthonium de Vormacia Pictorem. Brulliot says there are several others, and also two on copper; one represents a naked Man sitting in a Cavern and Death standing near to him, it has the date 1522 above the monogram; the other represents St. Andrew holding his cross in one hand and a book in the other, a young man is kneeling near the saint. Some of the marks given by Brulliot differ from that in the text; one is surmounted by the date 1526, another is in a shield, and a third has a figure above like an unshelled snail.]

WORNER, T. W. The name of this artist is affixed to an etching, representing an Emperor crowned with laurel by Hercules and Minerva. It is neatly, though slightly, executed, and is apparently the production of a painter, and from his own design, as he adds the word fecit to his name.

WORSDALE, JAMES, an English portrait painter, who was a scholar of Sir Godfrey Kneller, but was dismissed by his master, for marrying his wife's niece without his consent. He never arrived at great excellence in the art, but, being possessed of a talent for humour, and of a convivial disposition, he acquired friends and considerable custom, and was appointed master painter to the Board of Ordnance. He published several poetical pieces, songs, &c., besides the following dramatic productions; a Cure for a Scold, a ballad opera, from Shakspeare's Taming of a Shrew; the Assembly, a farce, in which Mr. Worsdale himself played the part of Old Lady Scandal admirably well; the Queen of Spain; and the Extravagant Justice. He died in 1767.

[WORST, JAN, a landscape painter, born in 1625, passed some time in Italy making drawings of the scenery which he afterwards painted. He died in Holland in 1680.]

WORTMAN, CHRISTIAN ALBERT. According to Huber, this artist was a native of Pomerania, and flourished about the year 1730. He was instructed in engraving by Wolfgang, and at the age of twenty-five was invited to the court of Hesse Cassel, where he was appointed engraver to the Landgrave. In 1727 he went to Petersburg; where he engraved the portraits of several of the principal personages of the court. Among others, we have the following portraits by him :

Anna, Empress of Russia; after L. Caravac.

Alexis, son of Peter I.; after Lundden.

Ernest Louis, Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt.

WOUTERS, FRANCIS. This painter was born at Liere, in Brabant, in 1614. After receiving some instruction in the rudiments of the art, he was sent to Antwerp, where he entered the school of Rubens. He applied himself to the study of landscape painting, in which he became one of the most eminent artists of his time. His pictures generally represent the most picturesque views in the Forest of Soignes, near Brussels, which he embellished with figures, representing historical or fabulous subjects, which were correctly drawn, and ingeniously grouped. His pencil is bold and free, resembling the style of his celebrated instructor, and his colouring is clear and brilliant. He occasionally painted history, and there are some altar-pieces by him in the churches in the Netherlands, particularly Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in the church of St. Peter, at Louvaine; and the Visitation, in the church of the Augustines, at Antwerp; but he is less successful in his large pictures than in those of a smaller size. He was much in favour with the Emperor Ferdinand II., but coming to England with the ambassador of the imperial court, in 1637, his pictures pleased at court, and he was appointed chief painter to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. On the misfortunes of the royal family he returned to Antwerp, and was appointed director of the Academy in that city, where, in 1659, he was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun. We have a set of four landscapes etched by Francis Wouters in a slight, but masterly style. They are dated 1649.

WOUTERS, G. By this artist we have some large prints, representing views in and near Rome, with figures. They are executed in a spirited and masterly style, resembling that of Callot; they are inscribed G. Wouters, Cavalier, del. et sculp. [This is probably Gomar Wouters, an historical and landscape painter. He was a native of Flanders, but practised chiefly at Rome. He flourished towards the end of the 17th century.]

[WOUTERS, JAMES, called also Vosmeer, born at Delft in 1584, was an excellent painter of landscapes, but quitted that department for fruit and flower painting, in which he showed equal talent. He went to Italy, but returned to the place of his nativity, where he died in 1641.]

WOWERMANS, PHILIP. This admired painter was born at Haerlem in 1620; he was the son of Paul Wowermans, a painter of history, of little celebrity, from whom he received the first lessons in design; but his genius leading him to a different branch of the art, he became a disciple of John Wynants, and by the instruction of that excellent landscape painter, his progress was so uncommon, that it surprised his preceptor. He frequently decorated the landscapes of his master with his admirable figures and animals. On leaving the school of Wynants, he applied himself to an attentive study of nature, of which his taste enabled him to make a judicious selection. It does not appear that he visited Italy, or that he ever quitted the city of Haerlem. The little that is known of his private life it is painful to relate. Although his works possess all the excellencies we can wish, high finishing, correctness, agreeable compositions, and a charming taste for colouring, they scarcely afforded him the pittance of a miserable subsistence, and he languished long in indigence and obscurity. To supply the wants of a numerous family, he was obliged to work without relaxation; but such was his love for his art, that the most urgent necessity could never induce him to leave any of his works in a neglected or unfinished state. The pictures of Peter de Laer, called Bamboccio, at that time engrossed the admiration of the Dutch collectors, and the charming productions of Wowermans were suffered to remain unnoticed and unknown.

The disappointment and chagrin at finding his works so much neglected, is supposed to have impaired his health, and he died in 1668, in the forty-eighth year of his age. To prevent any of his children from following the profession of a painter, a short time before his death he ordered all his studies and drawings to be burnt, declaring that his exertions had been so ill recompensed, that his son should not, by the possession of them, be induced to follow a pursuit from which he had derived nothing but poverty and wretchedness.

The pictures of this charming painter are now justly held in the highest estimation; they usually represent hunting and hawking parties, horse-fairs, encampments, halts of travellers, farriers' shops, and other subjects into which he could introduce horses, which he designed with a correctness and spirit which has never been equalled. Some of his landscapes are simply composed; others are enriched with architecture, and his scenery, always picturesque, is constantly diversified with a charming variety. His figures, as well as his horses, are admirably drawn, and are grouped with uncommon taste and ingenuity. His touch, though firm, is exquisite, and though his pictures have the appearance of the most precious finishing, he must have painted with extraordinary facility, as few artists have left behind them such a number or such a variety of interesting productions. He was perfectly acquainted with the best principles of the chiaro-scuro; and the distribution of his masses is masterly and intelligent. His skies and distances, his trees and plants, are the genuine representations of nature.

We have only one etching by this celebrated painter, which is extremely scarce: it represents a horse standing, turned to the right, and tied by the bridle to the stump of a tree. Near the top of the plate, on the left, are inscribed the letters W. Fec. 1643, in a reversed way. The size of the print is seven inches by four inches seven-tenths, and it is executed in so masterly a style, that we regret it is his only effort. There is a copy of it.

[The name is WOWERMAN. Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys prefaces his account of the painter with the remark, "that the anecdotes of the life of Wowerman, which Houbraken undertook to communicate about half a century after the painter's death, are very vague and contradictory, and entirely founded on hearsay. This, indeed, Houbraken admits, and gives us to understand that he merely details reports as he received them. Houbraken states that from his commencement Wouwerman appears to have been fortunate in meeting with many admirers; and his remarkable talent deserved their patronage, for he surpassed all competitors in his line. He was assured that Wouwerman by his industry had accumulated enough to give his daughter 20,000 guilders (nearly £200) as a marriage portion. Some, continues Houbraken, have declared that he had a son who followed his profession; and that previous to his death he burnt his drawings, from the apprehension that his son, if left in possession of them, might become too indolent to study from nature; while others have reported that, not being on friendly terms with his brother Peter, and unwilling that he should derive any advantage from them, he determined on their destruction. Again, he says, others had informed him that the drawings thus consigned to destruction were not his own, but designed by other masters. After several contradictions of this kind, he relates the anecdote of John de Wet, the painter and picture-dealer, drawing the attention of the connoisseurs to the comparative merits of Wouwerman and Bamboccio, whose pictures were at one time more esteemed than those of Wouwerman. 'All our connoisseurs,' said de Wet, 'appear to prefer the works of those who have been at Rome;' he then produced two pictures of the same size and description, the one painted by Bamboccio, the other by Wouwerman, of whom he had ordered it for the purpose; and having expatiated on its superior merits, though the artist had never been at Rome, desired their opinion. They all agreed in giving that of Wouwerman the preference. This (Houbraken imagines) affected the mind of Bamboccio to such a degree as to contribute to his untimely death. The mortification must have been a long time operating; for Wouwerman had been in his grave five years when Bamboccio committed suicide. In relating this anecdote Houbraken contradicts himself, as he previously states that Bamboccio was born in 1613, and that he lived to his 60th year." Mr. Nieuwenhuys remarks that, "the Dutch language being little known throughout Europe, and consequently its writers not generally read, foreign authors have been guilty of propagating misstatements and asserting them as facts, by which their readers have been misled. D'Argenville, a French writer, has related circumstances without giving any other authority for his assertions than that of his having obtained them on a journey into Holland. This is not sufficient to prove that his statements are more deserving of credit than the former Dutch writer, who appears to have been, on many points, misunderstood by D'Argenville. D'Argenville takes credit to himself for the discovery that Wouwerman died in indigence, and comes to this conclusion from the circumstance of Wouwerman burning his drawings to prevent his son from embracing so uncertain a profession; but D'Argenville's authority is no better than Houbraken's, from whose book he obtained his information: and after all, the fact of the destruction of these drawings is no more to be depended on than Houbraken's conflicting reports about Bamboccio. Descamps, whose writing is but a varied repetition of D'Argenville, makes the ridiculous addition that Wouwerman never quitted Haerlem; but his mountainous landscapes are sufficient evidence to prove that this must be erroneous, and that he actually visited other countries. By referring to Houbraken we may judge how far later biographers, who have treated on the same subject, are to be depended upon; particularly as nothing positive has been discovered concerning the history of Wouwerman's life since that writer." Referring to the different manners that appear in the pictures by Wouwerman, Mr. Nieuwenhuys remarks, "We are enabled to trace his progress in several of his pictures; for it is easy to observe, in some of his works, that he had studied Peter van Laar and Wynants. It has therefore been conjectured, and with reason, that he must have been a disciple of the latter master; but the particulars as to what time he may have studied in that school, are entirely unknown, and have never been stated by any writer on whom we can depend. Those specimens, however, of Wouwerman in which he has shown that he at one time imitated Wynants, are certainly not his earliest works, as they were produced when he had already made considerable progress, and, consequently, the style of painting rustic landscapes with sandy roads engaged his pencil even in his most flourishing days. His first style (called his Bamboccio manner) was entirely that of Peter van Laar, and is very inferior indeed when compared with his finer works." Mr. Nieuwenhuys concludes his remarks by saying, "I have before observed that all the information we possess regarding the life of Wouwerman is very contradictory; and the more I reflect the more I am convinced that such is the fact."

In these remarks, particularly the last, the editor concurs; but there is a difficulty respecting his having been a pupil of Wynants. For what purpose did he enter the school of that master? Certainly not to learn to paint animals and figures; and Mr. Nieuwenhuys has shown that the landscapes in which he has, in some measure, imitated Wynants, are not his earliest works. The frequency of his painting figures and animals in that master's landscapes would naturally induce an occasional imitation, especially when the subject required sandy hillocks and broken roads; but this is no proof that he was ever the pupil of Wynants. There is more likelihood that he was instructed both in landscape and animal painting by Peter Verbeek of Haerlem, to whose landscapes and hunting-pieces his earlier pictures bear a resemblance; and that his connexion with Wynants was rather that of a coadjutor than as a pupil.

As to his merits being overlooked and his pictures neglected or undervalued during his life, the assertion can hardly require refutation. Would all the most eminent landscape painters of his country and time solicit an artist whose abilities were not esteemed to embellish their works? Would an artist whose productions were neglected or undervalued continue to paint picture after picture, bestowing the greatest care and diligence in perfecting the beauty of all, to the number of nearly eight hundred known, independent of his illustrations of the works of others?—it may rather be concluded that the good payment he received was a stimulus to exertion. But if he did not sell his pictures, how comes it so many hundreds are so carefully preserved in all parts of Europe? and that they have been found in collections and in families where they have been from so early a period that the record of the acquisition is lost. The tradition that says he destroyed his drawings before he died, does not say that he had a house full of unsold pictures at the time; certainly, had that been the case, it would have been an excusable act of resentment if he had destroyed them too; but they had gone forth to the world, and we may rather suppose that the artist shortened his life by over-exertion, than that he died of vexation and in poverty, from his works being unappreciated and from a lack of patronage.

Examine the subjects of his pictures; do they in any way betray poverty of circumstances on the part of the painter?—Gentlemen and ladies of rank going out hawking or hunting, or returning from their sports; gallantly attired and attended, all joyous as the day; no incident omitted that could add interest to the scene; all indicating that the artist himself was a frequent partaker of such sports, and fully conversant with the polished manners of the higher orders of society. See his acquaintance with the Manège; his thorough knowledge of all the rules of horsemanship and the deportment of cavaliers. Accompany him to the field of battle; he sets his squadrons in the field, and makes his divisions with the skill of an accomplished general. The attack, the mêlée, the combat, the individual displays of skill in the management of arms, are such as could only be depicted by one who had been an eye-witness of such scenes, and was himself an accomplished master of the use of warlike weapons. Poor artists, in any sense, are rarely so accomplished: but should there be one with the acquirements of a gentleman, yet so reduced in circumstances as to be obliged to work for a maintenance, would he repeat the same glorious representations if he found his skill and labour unappreciated and unrewarded? Artists do not work solely with a desire for posthumous fame. If Wouwerman had not found a purchaser for one of his grand battle-pieces, he would hardly have painted a second; but he painted many. So with his sporting-pieces; they abound. If we observe the care with which every part of almost all his pictures is finished, particularly when of larger dimensions and full of subject, we must conclude that the painter was not pressed by want; he took time to perfect his works. Did he, as a necessitous artist would do, repeat the composition? A repetition by him of the same composition is not known. But he lived in the most glorious era of the art in Holland, when good painters and good judges of their works, so necessary to each other, co-existed, and it is not reasonable to suppose that those who prized more highly the landscapes of Ruisdael and Wynants when embellished with the figures and animals of Wouwerman, were insensible to the merits of a picture painted entirely by his hand. His finished drawings are certainly very rare. This does not, however, justify the statement that he destroyed all those that he possessed. From the wonderful facility with which he must have painted it may be concluded that he seldom made more than a slight sketch of his composition, perhaps mere indications of the ordonnance, and, like many other great painters, (Wilkie for instance,) set no value on them when his picture was accomplished. The few on which he bestowed care, and which still exist, are highly esteemed by connoisseurs, and consequently command large prices when they occur in sales. A small example of this class was sold by the editor in the collection of Richard Cosway for fifty guineas, and purchased by Messrs. Woodburn. One in the collection of M. De Vos, of Amsterdam, sold in 1834 for 1030 florins, which, with the additional charge of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on sales in Holland, is about £88 sterling, and was bought for Baron Verstolk. In the Baron Verstolk's sale, which occurred at Amsterdam in 1847, the same drawing, lot 69, named Le Cheval qui pisse, sold for 1341 guilders, which, with the sale charges, make about £120 sterling. In the same sale, lot 206, Le Manège sold for 1002 guilders, which with the opgeld is about £90. An Interior of a Stable, lot 300, a slight drawing which, according to a written memorandum on it by the artist, had served merely for the ordonnance of a picture, sold for about £30. This memorandum mentioned also the price of the picture for which it had served as the basis. For a copious account of the works of this wonderful painter, who died at the early age of forty-eight, consisting of between seven and eight hundred pictures, the inquirer should consult "Smith's Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish Painters," part the first and Supplement; and for the two etchings attributed to him, see Bartsch, P. G. tom. 1., Weigel's Supplement to Bartsch, and Brulliot's Dictionnaire des Monogrammes, part first, No. 2024.]

WOUWERMAN, PETER, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, and was born at Haerlem about the year 1625. He was first a scholar of Roland Rogman, but afterwards studied under his brother, whose style he followed with so much success, that some of his best pictures have sometimes been mistaken for the early productions of Philip. He painted similar subjects to those of his brother, representing huntings, fairs, &c. His figures and horses are not so correctly drawn as those of Philip Wouwerman, his pencil is neither so spirited nor so delicate, and his colouring is less clear and transparent. Although his works possess considerable merit, the judicious collector will easily distinguish between them and the inimitable productions of Philip.

WOUWERMAN, JOHN. This artist was the youngest brother and the scholar of Philip Wouwerman, and was born at Haerlem about the year 1628. His pictures represent landscapes, with figures and buildings, and are painted in a more pleasing tone of colour than those of Peter Wouwerman, and his touch is more spirited and masterly. He died in 1666, in the prime of life.

WRIGHT, INIGO, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1770. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

The Family of Van Goyen; after J. Van Goyen.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after F. Lauri.

WRIGHT, JOSEPH. This artist is distinguished by the name of Wright of Derby, at which place he was born in 1734. He was a scholar of Thomas Hudson, at the same time with Mortimer, and on leaving that master returned to Derby, where he established himself as a portrait painter, and met with very flattering encouragement. In 1765 he sent two pictures to the Exhibition, which were much admired, and the following year exhibited three pictures of subjects by candle-light and fire-pieces, which established his reputation in that particular branch of the art. In 1773 he visited Rome, and other parts of Italy, and returned to England in 1775. Mr. Wright was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1782, but having taken offence at Mr. Garvey's being chosen Royal Academician before him, he resigned his Associate's diploma in disgust, though he continued to exhibit occasionally with the Academy.

In 1785 he made an exhibition of twenty-four of his own works, at the great room in the Piazza, Covent Garden, of which the principal picture represented the Destruction of the Floating Batteries before Gibraltar. He died in 1797.

[Joseph Wright was excellent in painting history, portraits, and landscape. His conflagrations and effects of fire-light are capital. The public are acquainted with but few of his works, such as have been engraved. Of these, some are in mezzotinto, the Blacksmith's Forge, the Air-Pump, and the Gladiator; others in the line manner, as the Dead Soldier, engraved by Heath, and a Scene from "A Winter's Tale," by Middiman, in which the painter and engraver may be said to rival Wilson and Woollett. Other pictures by him of the historic kind are, The Destruction of the Floating Batteries at Gibraltar, Edwin at the Tomb of his Ancestor, Belshazzar's Feast, Hero and Leander, and the Lady in Milton's "Comus." His Eruption of Vesuvius, and View of Ulswater, are powerful examples of skill in representing landscape under totally different aspects. His works seem to have been preserved with due care by his townsmen, who purchased them from the easel, and also by their descendants, for they are seldom to be seen in public sales.]

WRIGHT, RICHARD. This artist was born at Liverpool about the year 1735. Without the advantage of a technical education, he acquired a respectable talent, as a painter of sea-pieces, by his own genius and industry, having been bred to the humble occupation of a house and ship-painter. In 1764, the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., offered a premium for the best picture of a sea-view, when Mr. Wright became a candidate, and obtained the prize. In 1766 he gained the first premium, of fifty guineas, by a sea-piece, from which Woollett engraved his celebrated print of the Fishery. He was a member of the chartered Society of Artists, and died about the year 1775. [There was a French copy made of Woollett's engraving of the Fishery to which the name of Vernet was affixed as the painter: this must have been done without Vernet's knowledge, as he was too just a man to assume what did not belong to him, or to countenance a fraud detrimental to the reputation of a brother artist. His conduct towards R. Wilson when in Italy was a proof of his liberal spirit.]

[WULFHAGEN, FRANCIS, born at Bremen in 1620, was a scholar of Rembrandt, and painted after the manner of his master, and obtained considerable reputation. He died in 1678.]

WULFRAET, [or WULFRAAT,] MATTHIAS. This artist was born at Arnheim in 1648. He was the son of an eminent physician, who purposed bringing him up to the same profession; but he attended more to drawing than to his studies, and his father, yielding to his decided disposition for the art, placed him under the care of Abraham Diepram, a painter of drolleries and drunken frolics. He did not, however, adopt the some subjects as his master, but painted, with considerable success, conversations, and assemblies of persons in higher life, which were composed with taste, and delicately finished. He also painted small portraits and domestic and historical subjects, which were held in great estimation in Amsterdam, where he chiefly resided, and where he died in 1727.

WUST, CHARLES LOUIS, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints, he engraved a plate representing the Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew, after Mattia Preti, called Il Calabrese. It is neatly executed, but in a labouring, heavy style; and the drawing is incorrect.

WYCK, THOMAS. This painter was born at Haerlem in 1616. He excelled in painting sea-ports, shipping, and small figures, and, from the subjects of his pictures, which frequently represent the ports in the Mediterranean, he appears to have resided some time in Italy. They are usually embellished with a great number of small figures, representing the inhabitants of different nations dressed in the habits of their respective countries, correctly designed, and touched with great spirit, in a style resembling that of Peter de Laer. He also painted fairs and public markets; and was not less successful in representing the interiors of chemists' laboratories, with their utensils. He came to England about the time of the Restoration, and was much employed. In Burlington-house is a view of the Parade in St. James's Park, with Charles II., his courtiers, and women in masks, walking. The statue of the Gladiator is at the head of the Canal. He also painted a View of London, before the fire, and the Thames, taken from Southwark, and exhibiting the great mansions of the nobility then on the Strand, of which there is a print. He also painted the Fire of London more than once. His pictures are well composed, his colouring warm and transparent, and his pencil is bold and free. He died in 1686. We have a few small etchings by Thomas Wyck of landscapes, with figures, executed with neatness and spirit. They are now become scarce.

WYCK, JOHN, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Haerlem about the year 1640, and was instructed by his father, whom he accompanied to England. John Wyck distinguished himself as a painter of battles and sieges; nor was he less successful in painting huntings and processions. He appears to have imitated the style of Philip Wowermans, but on a larger scale; and though inferior to his model in the neatness and delicacy of his finishing, his horses and figures are correctly drawn, and are touched with great spirit and animation. His pictures are well composed, and his landscapes represent very agreeable scenery. He sometimes painted large pictures, such as the Battle of the Boyne, and the Sieges of the Naarden and Namur, but they are inferior to his small pictures. In the portraits of the Duke of Schomberg on horseback, by Kneller, the horse, and the battle in the back-ground, were finely painted by John Wyck. He painted several views in Scotland, and in the Isle of Jersey, and made the designs for a book of hunting and hawking. He died at Mortlake in 1702.

[Bartsch, P. G. tom. iv., describes twenty-one etchings by J. Wyck; and Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, adds four, and also points out the variations that occur in all. Bartsch remarks that the prints of J. Wyck are so rare that but few collections contain a complete set. Balkema says he died in 1677, and Walpole says in 1682, but neither of them is supported by any writer of credit.]

WYNANTS, JOHN. This eminent landscape painter was born at Haerlem in 1600. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he was one of the most distinguished artists of his time, and established an academy, which has produced some of the ablest painters of the Dutch school. He has the credit of ranking among his disciples Adrian Vandevelde, Philip Wowermans, and other eminent masters, who occasionally contributed to the embellishment of his landscapes, by the addition of their admirable figures and animals.

The pictures of Wynants are faithful transcripts of the scenery of his country, and, though the views are generally flat and confined, he has represented, with such truth and simplicity, the broken grounds and winding sandy roads, the plants and stunted trees, the cottage and the hovel, that he always presents us with a perfect representation of nature. From the facility with which he painted, his works are by no means uncommon, though their merit secures them a place in the choicest collections, and they are very valuable. He died in 1670.

[It is surprising that so little is recorded of the life of John Wynants; not even the name of his master is known; his works therefore, like those of Philip Wouwerman, must form his history. As there is no resemblance to the style or colouring of any previous Dutch painter to be observed in his landscapes, it may be inferred that he acquired the art of painting by his own observation of nature and sedulous study. It may also be inferred that much of his time had been devoted to instructing others in landscape painting, though but small traces are to be found of his manner in the productions of those said to have been his pupils. Among others, who became eminent as figure-painters, tradition has given him Philip Wouwerman and Adrian Vandevelde as scholars, as his landscapes are so frequently embellished with their figures and cattle. For the same reason Lingelbach, Schellings, Wyntranck, Barent Gaal, and Soolemaker, may be included. But none of their landscapes partake of his style. What then did he teach them? The earliest dated picture of Wynants with figures by Lingelbach is 1651, when the latter was in his 26th year, and after his return from Italy; those embellished by Wouwerman and Adrian Vandevelde, as well as the rest, are of a later period. The first dated picture with figures by Wouwerman is 1659; that with figures by Adrian Vandevelde is 1660. Wouwerman continued his assistance to 1668, the year of his death, and Lingelbach to 1671. As most of the landscapes by Wynants, in which other artists painted the accessories, are not dated, it can only be conjectured by the skill displayed that they were no longer pupils of any master. It is clear, however, that they were all attached friends of Wynants, and admirers of his ability as a landscape painter, and perhaps proud of having their reputation connected with his.

In the notice of John Wynants, introductory to an account of his works, in "Smith's Catalogue raisonné," the following discriminating observations as to his different manners of painting occur. "His early works usually represent the picturesque habitation of the peasant, or the ruins of some ancient mansion, an adjacent road, and the surrounding country. These are always painted in a neat and careful manner, in a tone of colour tending to brown or blackish hues.

In his second period he becomes more excursive, breaks into an open country, and encounters a wide expanse of landscape, composed of hill and dale, woods and rivers, embellishing the lovely scene with a rich variety of objects, such as sandy banks, winding roads, withered trees, and wild plants. Occasionally his views are more confined, and the eye is entertained with a faithful picture composed of a clayey bank, a rugged road, an old tree, wild flowers, herbage, and a sedgy pool. Such, with few deviations, compose the views of the whole of his productions; but, notwithstanding the similarity of the scenes represented, there is great disparity in their quality, those of his middle time being clear and luminous in effect, and delightfully delicate in the execution. No artist furnished more luxuriantly the fore-grounds of his pictures, or gave greater variety of form and tint to the soil in which the dock, the thistle, and the bramble seem to be indigenous. In the latter years of his life his execution is frequently coarse, and his colouring brown and heavy; defects by no means compensated by the great practical knowledge and masterly handling which such pictures at all times exhibit." Then follows, in vol. vi. and Supplement, vol. ix., a descriptive account of more than 200 pictures by the master; a record of their migrations, and of their locations at the time the Catalogue was written, the prices they have obtained at public sales, and the writer's estimate of the value of many that are to be found in public galleries, or collections from which there is no probability of their removal.

The year in which Wynants died is not ascertained. Several of his pictures have the date 1671; and in the collection of Farquhar Fraser, Esq., (Smith's Catalogue, 159.) is a landscape by him signed and dated 1673. In the Dictionary of Painters by MM. Van Eynden and Vander Willegan, published in 1816, it is stated that he died in 1677; but this date is not adopted by subsequent writers.]

WYNGAERDE, FRANCIS VANDEN, a Flemish engraver, who resided at Antwerp about the year 1640. We have by this artist several spirited etchings, principally after Rubens, which possess great merit, though the drawing is frequently incorrect; among which are the following:

Samson killing the Lion; after Rubens.

Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene; after the same.

The Nuptials of Peleus and Thetis; after the same.

A Bacchanal, in which Bacchus is represented drinking out of a Cup, into which a Bacchante is pressing the juice of the Grape; after the same.

A dead Christ, supported by the Marys; after Vanduyck.
Achilles discovered amidst the Daughters of Lycopedes; after the same.

The Return from Egypt; after John Thomas.

Flemish Peasants regaling at the Door of an Alehouse; after Teniers.

[The Temptation of St. Anthony; after the same.

Portrait of Lucas Vosterman; after Lyvius.]

[Vanden Wyngaerde was a print publisher as well as a designer and engraver.]

[WYNTRANCK, ———, a Dutch painter of landscapes and water-fowl. He flourished during the time of Wynants, Ruisdael, and other eminent landscape painters, whose pictures he enriched with wild ducks and other aquatic birds, which he painted in the most exquisite manner. His own landscapes represent marshy grounds with pools backed by alders and willows, serving merely as the scene in which to display his masterly skill in ornithology. The birds are full of life and activity, their plumage soft and flexible as in nature, and the colours equally true. Few, if any, surpassed him in this department. Pictures painted entirely by himself are rare; but the great contemporary landscape painters availed themselves of his ability to give additional beauty and value to their compositions; hence his works are generally found in conjunction with others. Nothing of his history is recorded; the very short notice of him by Immerzeel shows that he was unacquainted even with his name, which he writes Wyntranck, and Balkema has copied it, without additional information.]

WYTMAN, MATTHEW. This painter was born at Gorcum in 1650, and studied for some time under Henry Verschuring. His first pursuit was landscape painting: but he afterwards became a scholar of John Bylaert, and applied himself to painting conversations, and domestic subjects, in which he imitated the style of Gaspard Netscher with success. He also painted flowers and fruit, and his pictures of that description were not without great merit. He had acquired considerable reputation, and had met with very flattering encouragement, when he died, in the prime of life, in 1689.

X

[XAVERY, JACOB, a painter of historical subjects, portraits, landscapes, sea-ports, fruits, flowers, and bas-reliefs, was born at the Hague in 1736. He was the son of Jacob Xavery the sculptor, and was instructed in painting by Jacob de Wit. He practised at Amsterdam, Breda, the Hague, and passed some time at Paris. Occasionally he imitated the manner of Berchem in his landscapes, and approached closely to his master, Jacob de Wit, in his representations of bas-reliefs in chiaro-scuro. He painted portraits of several distinguished persons, among which were those of M. Braamcamp, and the sculptor Cressant. Of his private history there is but little recorded; his pictures are found in good collections in Holland; and the time in which he flourished was from about the middle to the latter part of the 18th century. Though the foregoing particulars, as regards the different classes of pictures painted by Xavery, are applied by Dutch writers to Jacob, there is some uncertainty in the matter; as there was a contemporary artist, probably his brother, whose names were GERARD JOSEPH XAVERV, to whom works of the same kind are attributed.]

XAVIN, PAUL. This artist, with his brother, Hubert Xavin, are mentioned by Papillon as natives of Paris, and engravers on wood. He has not, however, specified any of their works. [They flourished about 1540.]

XIMENES, or ZIMENES, JUAN FERNANDEZ. See MUDO.

[XIMENEZ ANGEL, JOSEF, a scholar of Antonio Rubio, of Toledo, succeeded Claudio Coello as painter to the cathedral of that city, in 1695. He painted part of the frescoes of the hermitage of Fonseca, in which he represented incidents in the life of the Virgin, and the work was considered creditable; he also painted a St. Anthony for the parish of St. Bartholomew at Toledo, and other pictures from sacred history, the subjects of which are not specified.]

[XIMENEZ DE ILLESCAS, BERNABÉ, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Lucena in 1613, and from his infancy showed a disposition for the art by copying prints. It does not appear that he was educated in any school of painting, but was rather intended for the military profession. In the latter capacity he went to Italy, when his fondness for drawing and painting revived, and during six years while he was stationed there he studied the works of the great masters, and became a tolerable, if not a very good, painter. On his return to Spain he painted for private persons, and was occupied on his first public work at Andujar in 1671, when he died. Leonard de Castro and Miguel Parrilla were his scholars. Count Raczyński notices a picture by him, The Battle of Santiago, in which there are numerous figures, in the collection of the Count di Taroca at Lisbon.]

[XIMENEZ DONOSO, JUAN, a Spanish historical painter and architect, was born at Consuegra in 1623. His father Antonio taught him the elements of painting, and he received further instruction in the school of Francisco Fernandez, at Madrid. At the death of Fernandez he went to Rome, where he remained studying for seven years. He applied himself particularly to fresco painting and perspective, not caring for the antique, or the works of the great masters of painting in Italy. He returned to Madrid with more presumption than talent, and practised for some time in the school of Carreño. He formed an intimacy with Claudio Coello, and they painted conjointly several works in fresco, particularly a grand subject in the vestry of the cathedral at Toledo. He, however, executed some pieces without the assistance of Coello; among them a respectable picture of St. Peter of Alcantara. He painted the grand altar-piece of St. Philip Neri, which was destroyed by fire in 1720. He succeeded Francisco Rizi as painter to the Chapter of Toledo, and he restored, that is to say repainted, the grand altar-piece by Rizi in the church of St. Gines, which excited the indignation of all his professional brethren. He painted several pictures for the Benedictines of San Martin, representing incidents in the life of their patron saint: and Palomino speaks of a Virgin of the Conception for the church of San Nicolas, which he considered his best work. He was much employed in the practice of architecture; in which he exhibited consummate bad taste that accorded well with the knowledge of his patrons, and insured his success. An enumeration of his works in this department of art does not belong to this Dictionary, but may be found in Bernudez. His chief merit was in his colouring and the relief he gave to his figures; and with more care and less vanity he would have been a good painter. He died of apoplexy in 1690, and was buried in the church of Saint Gines.]

[XIMENEZ, FRANCISCO, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Tarazona in 1598. He studied painting in that city, but went to Rome to improve himself, and remained there some years. Having obtained the character of a good colourist, he returned to his own country, and was employed to paint two large pictures for the cathedral of the Seu at Saragossa. He painted also for the chapter of the cathedral of Teruel an Adoration of the Kings, which it seems he borrowed from a picture by Rubens, or from a print after that in the palace at Madrid. He was a better colourist than designer; the greater part of his works being painted in fresco, or distemper, have perished. He died in 1666, from over-exertion in completing a large picture within a specified time. He left his property to form a fund for the support in their studies of the sons and for marriage portions of the orphan daughters of painters.]

[XIMENO, JOSEF, a Spanish designer and engraver, made the designs for the sumptuous edition of Solis's History of the Conquest of Mexico, published at Madrid in 1783, and also for the edition of the Galatea of Cervantes, published in 1784. He made vignette designs for other works, which are not remarkable for original invention, and have more of French common-place illustration of poetry than of Spanish ingenuity in devices. He was living and operated in 1791.]

[XIMENO, MATIAS, a painter of old Castille, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He painted the four pictures of the lateral altars of the Jeronimites of Siguenza, representing the Incarnation, the Nativity, the Epiphany, and the Presentation in the Temple. They are good both in design and colouring. He also painted the Conversion of St. Paul, which is considered his best work: it is dated 1652.]

Y

YANES, HERNANDO. This Spanish painter was a native of Almedina. He flourished about the year 1531, and is said to have studied at Rome, under Raffaele. His principal works are in the churches at Cuenca, of which the most esteemed are the Adoration of the Magi, and Christ dead in the lap of the Virgin.

[The pictures which Hernando Yanes painted about the year 1531 were executed for a prothonotary, canon, and treasurer of the cathedral of Cuenca, named Don Gomez Carillo de Albornoz, a man of considerable taste and judgment in works of art, who had visited Rome and Bologna. Don Gomez mentions these pictures in his will, and attests that they were all painted solely by the hand of Yanes; a proof that he was of high reputation. The subjects of the pictures were, The Nativity, a Pope and a Bishop, Prophets, Saints, Apostles, and the Resurrection of Christ; and Bermudez praises them for drawing, colouring, attitude, expression, and elaborate execution, and likens them to many Italian pictures of the time at which they were painted. The Pietà and the Adoration of the Kings, in composition and drawing, are said to resemble the style of Lionardo da Vinci, and induce a belief that he studied in that school. Don Gomez in all his transactions with Yanes found him a strictly honourable man; and on several occasions he speaks of him as an extraordinary painter. It is not ascertained when he died, but it is supposed between 1550 and 1560.]

YANUS, ———. Papillon mentions this artist as an engraver on wood, and speaks of his works as very delicately executed, but does not describe any of his cuts.

YEATES, NICHOLAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. He executed a few plates of portraits, in a very indifferent style, among which is that of Sir William Waller, General for the Parliament.

YEPES, THOMAS DE. This artist was a native of Valencia, and excelled in painting flowers, fruit, fish, and still-life. There are many of his works in the private collections at Madrid, Seville, and in his native city, where they are highly esteemed. He died in 1674.

[YOUNG, JOHN, a mezzotinto engraver and designer, but better known for his outlines of various celebrated Galleries of Pictures in England, which he published with descriptions. They were considered good at the time, and supplied the place of catalogues. Among them are the Stafford, Angerstein, Grosvenor, Leicester, and Miles collections; historically considered, they will always be useful. His best mezzotinto print is after a picture by Mortimer, representing the memorable pugilistic contest between Broughton, the prize-fighter, and Stevenson, coachman to Sir William Wyndham. John Young held the office of Keeper of the British Institution in Pall Mall, and was an active promoter of the Artists' Benevolent Fund. He died in 1825.]

[YPEREN, or YPRES, KAREL VAN, was born at Ypres in 1510; he studied in Italy and became a good historical painter in the manner of Tintoretto. He returned to the place of his nativity, and died there about 1563 or 4.]

YVER, PETER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about the year 1747. Among other plates he engraved a few portraits.

YUSO, FRAY MATIAS ANTONIO TRALA. This Spanish painter was born at Valencia in 1680. He became a monk of the order of St. Francis, and was principally employed in painting pictures of the Virgin and Holy Families, for the church of his monastery, which are said to have possessed considerable merit. He died in 1753.

Z

ZAAGMOOLEN, MARTIN. This artist was a native of Holland, but neither the place of his nativity, nor the master under whom he studied, are mentioned. Houbraken notices him as a painter of history, and describes a picture of the Last Judgment by him, in which were introduced a great number of figures, very incorrectly drawn, and feebly coloured. [He operated from 1640 to 1660. He was the master of John Luyken, and Michael Musscher; so, if he was not a good painter himself, he formed good scholars.]

ZAAL, J., a Flemish engraver, by whom we have a large etching, representing a Boar-hunt, after Snyders. It is executed in a bold, masterly style, and the masses are broad and powerful, but the drawing is not very correct. [It is uncertain whether his name was Isaac or Jan: he operated in 1673.]

ZABELLI, or ZABAGLIO, ANTONIO. This artist was born at Florence about the year 1740. He engraved several portraits for the collection published by Allegrini, at Florence; and some plates after the principal pictures at Naples: among which are the following:

Mary Magdalene; after Guercino.

The Flight into Egypt; after Guido.

The Meeting of Christ and St. John; after the same.

The Three Marys at the Tomb of Christ; after Ani, Caracci.

ZABELLO, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO. This Italian engraver, according to Orlandi, was a native of Bergamo, and flourished about the year 1546. He marked his prints with a die, to which he added the date.

ZACCHETTI, BERNARDINO. This painter was a native of Reggio, and flourished about the year 1523. He is supposed, by Tiraboschi, to have been a disciple of Raffaele; but Lanzi considers this conjecture not well founded. His picture in the church of S. Prospero, designed and coloured in the style of Garofalo, and others of his works, of a similar character, have probably given birth to such an opinion.

ZACCHIA, PAOLO, IL VECCHIO. This painter was a native of Lucca, and flourished about the year 1527. He is supposed by Lanzi to have studied at Florence, and painted history with considerable reputation. There are several altar-pieces painted by him in the public edifices at Lucca, which prove him to have been an artist of great ability, particularly the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of S. Agostino; and the Ascension, in S. Salvatore. In the latter he evinces an acquaintance with foreshortening, superior to the artists of his time. [Rosini has given an etching of the Marriage of the Virgin in the church of the Augustines at Lucca; the composition resembles the antique in simplicity.]

ZACCOLINI, PADRE MATTEO. According to Baglione, this artist was born at Cesena, in the Roman states, in 1590, and distinguished himself as a painter of perspective, in which he is said to have instructed Domenichino and Nicholas Poussin. He became a monk of the order of the Theatines, and his principal works are in their church of S. Silvestro, on Monte Cavallo. He wrote some treatises on perspective, the manuscripts of which are preserved in the Barberini library. He died in 1630.

ZACHTLEVEN, [or SAFTLEVEN,] CORNELIUS. This painter was born at Rotterdam in 1606. It is not known from whom he received his first instruction in the art, but he settled at Antwerp, where he acquired considerable reputation as a painter of drolls and drunken frolics, in which he imitated the style of Adrian Brouwer. He also painted the interiors of farm-houses and kitchens, with the recreations of the villagers, in which he appears to have made the works of David Teniers his model. Some of his best pictures represent corps de gardes, with soldiers playing at cards and amusing themselves, embellished with armour, helmets, and warlike implements, which are drawn with precision, and touched with great spirit. His works of that description are well composed, and his design is bold and free. Though his pencil is less delicate and spirited, and his colouring less clear and harmonious, than in the productions of the two eminent artists whose style he followed, his pictures possess considerable merit, and are thought deserving of a place in the best collections. We have a few etchings by Cornelius Zachtleven, executed in a spirited style, from his own designs; among which are the following:

A set of five grotesque subjects, representing the Five Senses.

Twelve small plates of Dogs, Cats, Fowls, &c.

A Landscape, with Goats and a Goatherd; etched in a bold, masterly style.

[Writers differ with respect to the date of his birth; some place it in 1612, in which case he would be the younger brother of Herman, who was certainly born in 1609. The time of his death is not ascertained, but he was living in 1661.]

ZACHTLEVEN, [or SAFTLEVEN,] HERMAN, was the younger brother of Cornelius Zachtleven, born at Rotterdam in 1609, and is said to have been a scholar of John van Goyen. He did not, however, follow the style of that master, but applied himself to designing the most picturesque views on the borders of the Rhine and Meuse, which he painted in a neat, highly finished style, and introduced an infinite number of figures and boats, which are correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. His skies are light and floating, and his perfect acquaintance with aerial perspective, enabled him to give to his distances a pleasing and natural degradation. His colouring is clear and transparent, and his pencil light and firm. It has been asserted that he travelled to Italy, but it is proved by the Dutch biographers, that he never went further from his native country than to visit Guelderland, and the Duchy of Cleves, for the purpose of making designs of the most interesting views in that neighbourhood. His drawings of that description enrich the portfolios of the curious; and his pictures are found in the choicest collections. He resided the greater part of his life at Utrecht, where he died, in 1685.

Herman Zachtleven etched a few plates of landscapes, from his own designs. They are executed in a neat, spirited style; among others are the following:

A Landscape, with Cottages, and some Cows in the foreground.

A Mountainous Landscape, with figures.

A set of six Landscapes, numbered.

A Landscape, with two Elephants.

[Bartsch has described 36 etchings by Herman Saftleven, to which Weigel adds two, and in Rigal's Catalogue five more are attributed to him; but the last are disputed. For interesting particulars, the curious inquirer is recommended to consult Bartsch, Weigel, Brulliot, and Delalande's notes to the Rigal Catalogue.]

ZÄECH, BERNARD, a German engraver, by whom we have a set of ruins, after Jonas Umbach. They are etched, and finished with the graver in a very neat style. [There are no satisfactory accounts of this engraver. In addition to the five etchings by him after Jonas Umbach, there is a small square print of a landscape with figures, animals and ruins, of his own composition, showing that he was a designer as well as an engraver. Daniel Zaech, a painter, goldsmith, and engraver, operated in 1613. Brulliot mentions twelve pieces, designs for goldsmiths' work, consisting of Vases and Goblets, marked B. Z. 1581; he is doubtful whether they are by Bernard Zaech.]

ZAGANELLI. See COTIGNOLA.

ZAGEL, MATTHIAS. This ancient German engraver is named by different authors Zatzinger, Zasinger, and Zinck. He flourished about the year 1500, and, from the style of his engraving, was probably a goldsmith. His plates are executed with the graver, in a neat manner, but without the least taste, and his compositions and drawings are very indifferent, and in so stiff and Gothic a style, that if his prints were not dated, they would be judged to be anterior to those of Martin Schoen. It has been observed, that as he used the graver with great delicacy and timidity, his plates could not resist many impressions, and that after they were retouched, the prints were very bad. It is therefore necessary to see the early impressions of them to form a proper judgment of the merit of his works. He usually marked his plates with the letters M Z, in a Gothic character, thus, ¹⁵⁰⁰ MZ, or . The following are his principal plates:

Solomon's Idolatry; dated 1501.

The Virgin and infant Christ, in which she is represented holding a Cup to catch the Water from a Fountain. 1501.

St. Catherine, with the Instrument of her Martyrdom.

St. Ursula.

St. Christopher carrying the infant Christ on his shoulder.

The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian.

Socrates and [Xantippe; or a man subjugated by his wife.]

A Cavalier seated, in a Landscape, entertaining his Mistress.

A March of Soldiers, preceded by a Drummer and a Fifer.

A Lover and his Mistress, embracing. 1505.

An Assembly of Courtiers, some dancing, called The Great Ball.

A Tournament in the Streets of Munich, called The Great Tournament.

All these prints are very scarce.

[In addition to the prints mentioned above, Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. vi. page 371, et seq., describes nine under the following titles:

The Decollation of John the Baptist.

St. Sebastien pierced with Arrows.

St. George encountering the Dragon.

The Martyrdom of St. Barbe.

St. Katharine reading.

St. Margaret holding a Cross.

Meditation on Death, represented by a naked woman standing on a skull, and holding a sun-dial.

A Cavalier with a Lady en croupe, galloping, in a landscape.

Light and Obscurity, represented by a woman holding part of her dress before an Owl, &c.

The various guesses that have been made at the name of the artist who used the mark given in the text, show pretty clearly that there is no certainty, at present, of the true one. In addition to those quoted, he is also called Mathias Zingler and Matthew Zeyssinger; but with the same uncertainty. Whatever his name, there can be but little doubt that he worked as a goldsmith, and the dates on several of the prints establishes the time in which he operated, it is supposed at Munich. But he was also a painter, and as such he is called Martin Zage, and ranked with Wohlgemuth; a picture of the Crucifixion, said to be by him, is in the gallery at Vienna, and is commended as a simple and excellent work. It would be tedious, and perhaps unsatisfactory, to quote the various speculations respecting this old artist; the inquirer who may be desirous of knowing the various opinions of those who have endeavoured to explicate the subject, will find some amusement in consulting Zani, Enciclopedia delle Belle Arti; Bartsch, Peintre Graveur; Brulliot, Dictionnaire des Monogrammes; and the various German and other writers to whom in the course of their remarks they refer.]

ZAGEL, or ZAGHEL, THEODORE. This artist is mentioned by Orlandi in the Abecedario, as the engraver of a print representing a Woman with her back towards the spectator. It is marked with the cipher Z.

ZAGO, SANTO. This painter was a native of Venice, and was brought up in the school of Titian. He was not an unsuccessful follower of the style of that great master, and painted some pictures for the churches at Venice, which were highly esteemed, particularly an altar-piece, in the church of S. Caterina, representing Tobit and the Angel. [He was a superior painter in fresco, and operated about 1550.]

ZAIS, GIUSEPPE. This painter was a native of Venice, and studied under Francesco Zuccherelli, during his residence in that city. He painted landscapes with considerable success. He possessed a genius more inventive and original than his instructor, but was inferior to him in the facility of his touch, and the suavity of his colouring. He also painted battle-pieces, which possessed great merit. He died at an advanced age, in 1784.

ZAMBONI, MATTEO. According to Crespi, this artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1700. He was one of the ablest disciples of Carlo Cignani, and painted history with considerable reputation. He had given proof of very promising talents, in two altar-pieces in the church of S. Niccolo, at Rimini, representing the Life of S. Pietro Celestino, and of S. Benedetto; when he died in the bloom of life.

ZAMBRANO, JUAN LUIS, a Spanish painter, born at Cordova in 1599. He was a disciple of Pablo de Cespedes, and was a successful follower of the style of that master. His principal works are in the cathedral at Cordova, and in the church of the convent of Los Martyros, where he painted two altar-pieces, representing the Stoning of Stephen, and the Martyrdom of S. Acisclo and S. Victoria. In the colegio de Santa Catalina, is a fine picture by him of the Guardian Angel, and a St. Christopher, which Palomino describes as designed in the great style of Michael Angelo. He passed the latter part of his life at Seville, where he painted several altar-pieces for the church of St. Basil, and died in that city in 1639.

[It is agreed that Zambrano was a scholar of Cespedes, and at that master's death he established himself at Seville. Cespedes died in 1608; it follows that Zambrano was born earlier than 1599. His manner of painting was correct and spirited, and his colouring brilliant. His easel pictures were highly esteemed, and were purchased chiefly by the amateurs of Andalusia. His best public works were three large pictures of subjects taken from the life of St. Basil, which he painted for the convent of that Saint.]

ZAMORA, JUAN DE. This artist was a native of Seville, and flourished about the year 1650. He distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes, embellished with historical figures, in which he appears to have imitated the style of the best masters of the Flemish school. Some of his most considerable works are preserved in the episcopal palace at Seville. [Juan de Zamora was living in 1671. He painted several historical works from Scripture for the Cardinal Spinola, but his landscape backgrounds were considered the best parts. There was also a Diego Zamora, who painted at the latter part of the sixteenth century in the cathedral of Seville, but nothing further is mentioned of him.]

ZAMPEZZO, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Cittadella, near Bassano, in 1620, and studied at Venice, under Jacopo Apollonio. He was a successful imitator of the style of his instructor, and painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Bassano, which were esteemed little inferior to the works of his master. He died in 1700.

ZAMPIERI, ———. See DOMENICHINO.

ZAN, BERNARD, an engraver mentioned in the Abecedario, who is said to have flourished about the year 1571. He marked his prints with the initials B. Z., with the date; but his works are not specified.

ZANARDI, GENTILE. According to the Padre Orlandi, this paintress was a native of Bologna, and was instructed in the art by Marc Antonio Franceschini. She possessed an extraordinary talent of copying the works of the principal masters with a softness and amenity of colour that surprised the artists of her time; and also painted historical subjects of her own composition.

ZANCARLI, POLIPHILOS. This artist is mentioned by Florent le Comte as the engraver of twelve plates of antique foliage for friezes. [He was an ornamental designer, and operated about 1624. Many of his designs were engraved by Odoardo Fialetti, of which an account may be found among that master's works in Bartsch, tom. xvii. It may be noted, that he is also called GIANCARLI, Gian and Zan being synonymous, according to dialects.]

ZANCHI, ANTONIO, was born at Venice in 1639, and was a scholar of Francesco Rusca. According to Lanzi, he is more noted for the number of his works, in the public edifices at Venice, than for their merit. In the scuola di S. Rocco, is his most considerable performance, representing the plague which afflicted Venice in 1630. In the church of S. Girolamo there are several of his works, particularly the Good Samaritan, and the Prodigal Son. He died in 1722.

ZANETTI, COUNT ANTONIO MARIA, a Venetian nobleman, who was not only celebrated for the curious collection of works of art which he possessed, but also for his own ingenious productions. He was born at Venice in 1680, and was taught drawing as an accomplishment, for which he conceived so strong an attachment, that at the age of fourteen he etched a set of twelve plates, from his own designs, representing studies of heads and figures, which he dedicated to Dr. Mead. Assisted by Antonio Maria Zanetti, his relation, and others, he executed and published a great number of etchings and engravings on wood, in chiaro-scuro, from the drawings of Raffaele, Parmigiano, and other celebrated painters, many of which he had purchased at the sale of the Arundelian collection. They are divided into two sets, and together consist of ninety-nine prints on copper and wood, with the portrait of Zanetti, engraved by Faldoni, from a painting by Rosalba, in the front of the work. He marked his prints with a monogram, composed of an A, an M, and a Z, thus, M. We have also by him,

A set of twelve etchings of Figures and Animals; after B. Castiglione.

A set of eighty prints of Antique Gems.

[A collection of Statues in the palace of St. Mark, and other public places, at Venice, which are praised by Cignonara.]

He died at Venice in 1757.

ZANETTI, ANTONIO MARIA, THE YOUNGER, was the nephew of the amateur mentioned in the preceding article, and was born at Venice about the year 1720. He was librarian of St. Mark, and was not less distinguished than his uncle for his zealous attachment to the arts. In 1760 he published a set of eighty plates, designed and etched by himself, from the works of the Venetian painters, entitled Varie Pitture a fresco de principali Maestri Veneziani, &c. [He published other artistically learned works respecting the Venetian painters. Zani says he was born in 1716, and died in 1778.]

ZANGRIUM, JOHN BAPTIST, a Flemish engraver, who resided at Louvain about the year 1600. He published in 1602 a book of dresses, with the title Album Amicorum habitibus Mulierum omnium nationum Europæ. By the side of each figure is an ornamental mantle, with a helmet, and a blank left for a coat of arms. They are neatly executed, but without much taste. In the beginning of the work are introduced the portraits of the Duke of Brabant; Isabella Clara, his duchess; and Justus Lipsius.

ZANI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Giovanni Andrea Sirani. He intended to form a collection of etchings from the works of the most eminent Bolognese painters, and for that purpose had completed the drawings from the cloisters of S. Michele in Bosco, but died young before the etchings were finished. [He operated in 1640, according to Zani, but Bartsch says he flourished in 1660. There is but one print known by him, which is of great rarity; it is a "Glory," after L. Caracci.]

ZANIMBERTI, FILIPPO. This painter was born at Brescia in 1585, and was brought up in the school of Santa Peranda. He painted history in the style of his instructor, and there are several pictures by him in the churches at Brescia and at Venice, which establish his reputation as an artist of considerable ability, particularly a large picture of the Miracle of the Manna, so much commended by Ridolfi and Zanotti. He also excelled in painting easel pictures for private collections, representing historical or fabulous subjects, into which he introduced a great number of small figures, well composed, and touched with great spirit. He died in 1636.

ZANOTTI, GIOVANNI, PIETRO. This artist, though of Italian origin, was born at Paris in 1674. He was sent when young to Bologna, where he became a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli. Under that master he acquired an agreeable tone of colouring, a mellow pencil, and an intelligent acquaintance with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches at Bologna, of which the most esteemed are, the Incredulity of St. Thomas, in the church of S. Tommaso dal Mercato; the Resurrection, in S. Pietro; the Nativity, in La Purità; and a large picture in the Palazzo Pubblico, representing the Ambassadors from Rome swearing fidelity to the Bolognese. He resided great part of his life at Cortona, where he also distinguished himself by several pictures he painted for the churches, particularly Christ appearing to Magdalene; Christ bearing his Cross; and the Murder of the Innocents.

Zanotti was a laborious and intelligent writer on art; of his numerous publications, the most considerable is his Storia dell'Accademia Clementina di Bologna, published in two volumes, quarto, in 1739. He died in 1765.

ZARINENA, FRANCISCO. According to Palomino, this painter was born at Valencia about the year 1550. He went to Italy when he was young, where he is said to have had the advantage of studying in the school of Titian. His principal works are in the monastery of San Miguel de los Reyes, without the walls of Valencia. In composition and colouring they are worthy of the school in which he was educated. He died in 1624. Francisco Zariñena had two sons, CRISTOBAL and JUAN, who were his disciples, and painted history in the style of their father. There are several of their works in the public edifices at Valencia. [Francisco Zariñena was a scholar of the elder Ribalta; Cean Bermudez says nothing of his studying in the school of Titian.]

ZARLATTI, GIOSEFFO, an Italian engraver, born at Modena about the year 1635. We have a few etchings by him, of historical and fancy subjects, from his own designs, executed in so spirited and pleasing a style, that his premature death, at a very early age, is deeply regretted.

ZATZINGER, ———. See ZAGEL.

ZE, DE. The name of this artist is affixed to a small print representing Christ dead in the Tomb, attended by an Angel. It is executed entirely with the graver, in a style resembling that of John Sadeler, and is apparently from his own design.

ZEEMAN, REMY, or REINIER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1612. He excelled in painting sea-views and shipping, which he designed with great correctness and precision, and the figures he introduced into his pictures are well drawn, and touched with spirit. We have several etchings by this artist, from his own designs, which are executed in a bold, free style; among which are the following:

A set of eight plates of Shipping; designed and engraved by Remy Zeeman. 1632.

A set of four Views in Amsterdam. 1636.

A set of four Sea-ports in Holland; published at Amsterdam in 1656.

The Four Elements; in four plates; Reinier Veeman, fec. Two Views in Paris, one of the Faubourg St. Marceau, the other of the Gate of St. Bernard.

A set of twelve Views of Shipping; published in London by Ar. Tooker.

[According to several authorities, the family name of this artist was NOOMS, and it is supposed that he obtained the sobriquet of Zeeman from having been a sailor in his youth, and which was confirmed by his painting and etching scarcely any other than marine subjects. Bartsch describes upwards of one hundred and fifty etchings by him, and Weigel in his Supplement increases the number to one hundred and seventy-seven: of some, however, he expresses a doubt. The collector will do well to consult both these authorities. Neither the place nor the time of the artist's birth is ascertained. The editor has seen pictures by him not much inferior to Van de Velde in the quality of the painting, but darker in the colouring, and over-crowded in the composition. It is said that he painted many pictures for Frederick William of Prussia; and that he imitated Jan Both and Claude Lorraine in landscape: the latter assertion requires confirmation. His works are esteemed in Holland, and are deserving of consideration elsewhere.]

ZEEMAN, ENOCH. This artist is mentioned by the noble author of the Anecdotes. He resided several years in London, where he met with considerable employment in painting portraits and heads, in the laboured style of Denner. He died in 1744, leaving a son, PAUL ZEEMAN, who followed the same profession. ISAAC ZEEMAN, brother of Enoch, also practised the art, and died in 1751, leaving a son, who was also a painter.

ZEGHERS, ———. See SEGHERS.

[ZEITBLOOM, BARTHOLOMEW, an ancient German painter of the school of Ulm, to whom many pictures of an early period in private collections, and in some old chapels in Germany, are attributed. Nothing authentic of his history is recorded, but his pictures are described as being powerful and striking for the time in which they were painted. It is said that the forms are awkward, the arms and legs meagre and stiff, but the heads beautiful, with an expression of mild serenity and repose; that the colouring is brilliant and powerful; the carnations firm and vigorous in tone. Dr. Kugler, in his hand-book of the German and Flemish painters, mentions several pictures by the master, and others by painters who acted under his influence: the subjects are mostly figures of saints, or scenes from the life of Christ, and of John the Baptist. They are dispersed in various localities; two ascribed to the master are in the Pinacothek at Munich.]

ZELOTTI, BATISTA. This painter was born at Verona in 1532, and was brought up in the school of Antonio Badile. He was the fellow-student and friend of Paolo Veronese, with whom he co-operated in several important works in the public edifices at Venice. He is called by Vasari, Batista da Verona, and is numbered, by that author, among the disciples of Titian. His picture of the Holy Family, in the Carrara collection, is painted entirely in the style of that master, and it is to his studies in that school that he was indebted for that warmth and harmony of colouring, in which he surpassed Cagliari. He particularly excelled in fresco painting, and his ability in that branch induced Paolo to court his assistance in many of the great works in which he was engaged; and some of the frescoes by Zelotti have been attributed to that master. The great emblematical subjects, painted by Zelotti in the hall of the Council of Ten, in the Palazzo di S. Marco, at Venice, have been engraved by Valentine le Febvre, as the works of Paolo Veronese. He was more successful in fresco than in oil-painting, although some of his works in the latter are deservedly admired, particularly his two pictures representing the Conversion of St. Paul, and Christ with his Disciples in the Fishing-bark, in the cathedral at Vicenza. He possessed great fecundity of invention; his compositions are learned and judicious, and his touch is bold and animated; but he is inferior to Il Veronese in the graceful turn of his figures and the beauty of his heads. He died in 1592.

[ZENALE, BERNARDO, called also Bernardo da Triviglio, was a native of Triviglio, in the Milanese territory. He was a painter of history and architecture; he excelled in the latter. In his old age, in 1524, he composed a work on perspective, wherein he treated the question, whether objects represented small and in the distance ought to be less distinct, in order to imitate nature, than those that are larger and more near? This he explained in the negative; contending that distant objects should be as highly finished and well-proportioned as those more fully before the eye. The greater part of his works, as a painter, have ceased to exist; but Rosini, Storia della Pittura Italiana, plate 93, has given one of his compositions of a votive picture, in which the Virgin with the Infant is enthroned, attended by the four Doctors of the church, and the donors with their two children kneeling and worshipping. Two angels hold a crown over the head of the Virgin. It is presumed that he practised with Lionardo da Vinci, for they were intimate friends. It was this Bernardo Zenale who dissuaded Lionardo from attempting to carry the head of Christ, in his celebrated Last Supper, to a higher degree of beauty and perfection than he had bestowed on it. Alluding to the beauty with which Lionardo had endued the heads of the two Saints James: "Leave the face of Christ as it is," said Zenale, "for you will never be able to make it worthy of Christ among those apostles." Lionardo adopted the advice; a proof of his reliance on the judgment of Bernardo. Zani says he was born in 1426, and died in 1526; if the first date be correct, he was ninety-eight years old when he published his work on perspective.]

ZENCI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1570. He worked in a style resembling that of Marco da Ravenna, and he is supposed to have been a disciple of that master. His prints are, however, very inferior, and his drawing is incorrect. He engraved a set of portraits, to which he affixed a frontispiece ornamented with figures. The work is entitled, Illustrium Surenconsultorum Imagines. [The name of this artist was Zenoi, or Zenoni, not Zenci. He engraved some pieces after Gualdo Clovio and Raphael.]

ZENOBIO, ———. See CARLEVARIIIS.

ZENONI, DUCE. This artist appears from his name to have been a native of Italy. He was a goldsmith, and engraved a few plates of portraits, which are neatly executed with the graver, but in a stiff, formal style. Among others is a portrait of Henry III. of France, an oval plate, with an ornamental border, from his own design; it is inscribed, Duce Zenoni Orefice f. 1634.

ZENTNER, J. L., a German engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1780, and afterwards visited England. He engraved several plates representing landscapes, animals, dead game, &c., which are etched, and finished with the graver in a neat, clear style.

ZETTER, PAUL DE. This artist was a native of Hanover, and flourished about the year 1630. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, from his own designs, which are executed with sufficient neatness, but in a stiff, tasteless style. He engraved several plates for Boissard's collection of portraits. His prints are sometimes marked with the initials P. D. Z. fec., and sometimes with a cipher composed of a P and a Z joined, .

ZIARUKO, JOHN, was a native of Poland, and was probably a painter. We have by this artist a set of large etchings, from his own designs, representing the ceremonies used at the coronation of Louis XIII. of France. They are executed in a slight, spirited style.

ZIFRONDI, ANTONIO. According to Tassi, this painter was born at Clusone, in the Bergamese state, in 1657. After being instructed in the rudiments of design he went to Bologna, where he entered the school of Marc Antonio Franceschini, and by the instruction of that able artist became a reputable painter of history. There are many of his works in the churches and private collections at Clusone, which prove him to have possessed a ready invention, and uncommon facility of execution. One of his most admired works is a picture of the Annunciation, in the church of S. Spirito. He died in 1730.

ZILOTTI, DOMENICO BERNARDO. This artist was born at Borsò, near Bassano, about the year 1730. He painted landscapes in the style of Francesco Zuccherelli, which possess considerable merit. We have several etchings by Zilotti, some of which are from his own designs, and others from the works of Simonini, Marieski, and others, which are executed in a neat, spirited style.

[ZINCK, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a celebrated painter in enamel, was born in Sweden, or at Dresden, in 1685. He came to England in 1706, and studied under Boit, whom he soon surpassed. He was patronized by George II. and other members of the royal family, for whom he executed numerous portraits in enamel. One of his finest works was a copy of Isaac Oliver's portrait of Mary Queen of Scots, which was in the possession of Dr. Mead. It has been said that he rivalled Petitot; this is not exact, for he did not paint like him, nor approach that master's excellence by many degrees. He was, however, superior to most others of his time, and still continues to hold a high rank in the art. He was much employed, and his works are numerous, but many are attributed to him which he did not execute. In 1737 Zinck paid a visit to Germany; on his return to England, finding his sight injured by so much application, he retired from business. His reputation, however, was so great, that Madame Pompadour solicited him to copy in enamel a portrait of the king of France, which she forwarded to England for the purpose. He died at South Lambeth, near to London, in 1767. It is said that he etched in aquafortis; if so, it was probably for his own amusement.]

ZING, or ZINGG, ADRIAN, was a native of Switzerland, and was for some time instructed in engraving by John Rudolf Holzhalb, of Zurich; but he afterwards went to Berne, where he became a pupil of Louis Aberli, with whom he remained two years. He afterwards visited Paris, where he received some lessons from John George Wille, by which his style was greatly improved. During a residence of seven years at Paris, he had acquired considerable reputation, when he was invited to Dresden by the Elector of Saxony, where he was appointed engraver to the court, and was made a member of the Electoral Academy. We have a variety of landscapes and views by this ingenious artist, which are executed in a neat, clear style, and produce a very pleasing effect. Among many others we have the following prints by him:

Two Marine Views; after Vernet; one entitled La Peche heureuse; the other L'Ecueil dangereux.

A Landscape, with Nymphs bathing; after Dietricy.

A Moonlight; after A. Vander Neer.

Two Views on the Maine; after C. G. Schutz.

A pair, representing the Port and the Gulf of Naples; after P. Mettay.

ZING, ———. See ZAGEL.

ZINMERMAN, MICHAEL. According to Papillon, this artist was a native of Vienna, and flourished about the year 1550. He is said to have been a painter, as well as an engraver on wood, and executed the cuts of a large geographical chart, consisting of ten parts, which join together. It represents the kingdom of Hungary, with the arms of the provinces, from a design of Wolfgangus Lazius, Physician and Historiographer to the Emperor Ferdinand I. Papillon describes it as a very fine performance.

[ZOAN ANDREA, the imaginary name of an engraver who flourished in the early part of the sixteenth century, and marked his plates with the letters Z. A. Zani was the first to explain these initials by Zoan Andrea, which he says is the same as Giovanni Andrea, Zoan being the Venetian pronunciation of Gian. It would follow that the artist was a Venetian; but Ottley questions the accuracy of this, and asserts that "his manner of engraving resembles that practised by Mantegna, Bramante, and Gio. Antonio da Brescia. One of his plates, he says, appears to have been done from a design of Mantegna; another, representing a Lion vanquished by a Dragon, after Lionardo da Vinci; and upon the whole there seems better reason to place him in the Lombard school than in the Venetian." Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. xiii., has described thirty-three prints attributed to this engraver, the greater part having the mark, and on one, which is copied after Albert Durer, is the date 1516. Ottley, in his unpublished Catalogue of Engravers, which unhappily he did not live to complete, describes several others. The print of a Lion vanquished by a Dragon, after Lionardo da Vinci, is a different composition from that mentioned in the notice of Lionardo in this Dictionary, as being in the British Museum, and which Bartsch ascribes to John Duvet. Ottley concludes his notice of Zoan Andrea by saying, "I shall make mention of certain wood-engravings bearing the initials z. a. and i. a. when I come to speak of Giovanniandrea Vavasore, an artist who resided at Venice at the close of the fifteenth and the commencement of the sixteenth century, and with whose name Zani was unacquainted." That part of his Dictionary has not been printed.

The inquirer who is desirous of being more fully acquainted with what relates to this master and the works attributed to him, will do well to consult Ottley's "Inquiry into the Origin and early History of Engraving;" Zani, "Materiali," and "Enciclopedia Metodica," vols. iv. and ix., parte seconda, in the notes. In the British Museum are four prints by Zoan Andrea which have not been noticed by any of the writers:

A reversed copy of the Virgin and Infant, with a Monkey; after Albert Durer: H. 6½ in., W. 4½ in.

St. Jerome sitting writing.

Two upright plates of Ornaments.

In Robert Dumesnil's Catalogue there is one described not noticed elsewhere: it is an ornamental piece. On the left is a satyr supporting a tablet on which are a horseman and three foot soldiers fighting; on the right a child stands on a cornucopia; at bottom a medallion portrait with an inscription: H. 5p., L. 4p.]

ZOBOLI, JACOPO, was a native of Modena, and flourished about the year 1740. He was first a disciple of Francesco Stringa, but afterwards studied at Bologna, and from thence went to Rome, where he died, in 1761, with the reputation of a respectable painter of history. One of his principal works at Rome is a picture of S. Girolamo, in the church of S. Eustachio, which is finely composed, and exhibits a harmony of colouring superior to most of his contemporaries. [Zani places his death in 1767.]

ZOCCHI, GIUSEPPE. This artist was born at Florence in 1711. He was chiefly employed in embellishing the palaces of the nobility in that city and its vicinity with ceilings and other decorations, particularly those of Rinuccini and Gerini. He made drawings of the most remarkable views in Florence, and the villas in the environs, which he caused to be engraved and published in sets. The figures which he introduced into them were etched by himself, and two entire plates of the last set. He died at Florence in 1776. [Zani and Ticozzi place his death in 1767. He engraved several plates after Guido, Simone da Pesaro, P. da Cortona, Solimene, and others.]

ZOCCHI, or ZUCCHI, GIOSEFFO. See ZUCCHI.

ZOFFANY, JOHAN. This able artist was born at Frankfort about the year 1735. He came to England when he was about thirty years of age, but for some time met with so little encouragement, that he was reduced to great distress, until he attracted the public attention, by a portrait he painted of the Earl of Barrymore, which laid the foundation of his future reputation. He soon afterwards acquired considerable celebrity by the portraiture of the most celebrated dramatic performers in their favourite characters, which were designed and painted with surprising truth of expression, and admirably coloured. Of these, the most successful were his pictures of Garrick in Abel Druggier, of which we have an excellent print by Dixon; Foote and Weston in Dr. Last, engraved by Finlayson; and Foote in Major Sturgeon, engraved by Haid. Among his most distinguished works were the portraits of the royal family, with those of the members of the Royal Academy.

Having expressed a desire of visiting Italy, his Majesty is said to have graciously interested himself so far on the occasion, as to give direction for his being recommended to the Grand Duke of Tuscany. Whilst he was at Florence, he painted his celebrated picture of the Florentine Gallery, now in the king's collection. A short time after Zoffany's return to England, he obtained permission to go to the East Indies, where he acquired a competent fortune by the exercise of his talents. Although he continued to paint after his return from India, it was evident that his powers, as well as health, were considerably debilitated, and the latter productions of his pencil exhibited little of the spirit and vigour which characterized his earlier works.

Zoffany was a member of the Royal Academy. [According to Zani, he was born in 1733, and died in 1772.]

ZOLA, GIUSEPPE. This artist was born at Brescia in 1675, and distinguished himself as a landscape painter of considerable ability. He resided the greater part of his life at Ferrara, where there are several of his works, in the public edifices and private collections, which are painted in a bold, free style. He usually introduced into his pictures subjects of sacred history, in which the figures are not equal to the landscape. Some of his best productions are in the church of S. Lionardo, at Ferrara. He died in 1743. [In some of his carefully-painted pictures, the figures are remarkably elegant and highly finished; like many other painters, he became negligent as his business increased.]

ZOPPO, MARCO. This painter was born at Bologna about the year 1445. He learned the rudiments of design in his native city, but he afterwards studied at Padua, under Francesco Squarcione. Educated in the same school with Andrea Mantegna, he became a respectable competitor with that distinguished artist in several public works at Padua. He resided some time at Venice and Pesaro, and painted an altar-piece for the church of the Osservanti, in the latter city, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, seated on a throne, surrounded by several saints. It is inscribed with his name, and dated 1471. He died in 1517. [He was originally a scholar of Dalmasio Lippi. The picture mentioned in the text as having the date 1471 is now in the Museum at Berlin. It is doubtful whether he lived so late as 1517; some writers place his death in 1498.]

ZORG, HENRY MARTIN ROKES, called, This artist was born at Rotterdam in 1621. He was the son of Martin Rokes, the master of the passage-boat from Rotterdam to Dort, who, on account of his extraordinary care and attention to passengers, and the commissions he received, acquired the appellation of Zorg, or Careful, and the name descended to our artist. Having shown an early disposition for the art, he was sent to Antwerp, where he was placed under the tuition of David Teniers the younger, and became an eminent painter of similar subjects to those in which his celebrated instructor had acquired so distinguished a reputation. His pictures represent the interiors of Dutch apartments, with figures regaling and amusing themselves, in which he sometimes imitated the style of Adrian Brouwer; and the general character of his works is a mixture of the different attributes of the above-mentioned eminent artists. He also painted conversations and domestic subjects, fairs, and fish-markets, which are ingeniously composed and correctly drawn: his colouring is warm and mellow, and he had a competent knowledge of the principles of the chiaro-scuro. He died in 1682. [The pictures of Zorg are purely Dutch, not Flemish; they have more resemblance to Ostade, Bega, and Brauer, than to Teniers. When they are found in a pure state, they are worthy of a place in any collection of Dutch pictures. His first master was W. Buytenweg of Rotterdam.]

ZOROTI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, who, according to Florente le Comte, resided in Germany, where he engraved some portraits.

ZOUST, ———. See SOEST.

ZUBERLEIN, or ZIBERLIEN, JACOB. This artist was a native of Tubingen, in Germany, and flourished about the year 1590. He is said to have been a painter, but is more known as an engraver on wood, and executed a considerable number of wooden cuts, among which are the frontispieces for the Annals of Crusius, printed at Frankfort in 1595. He usually marked his prints with a monogram composed of an I and a Z, thus, , to which he sometimes added a small tub.

[ZUBOZ, ALEXIS, a mezzotinto engraver, lived in the first half of the 18th century. He was a scholar of P. Picart, but went to Russia and practised at St. Petersburg. He engraved a series of the emperors of Russia; to the portrait of Peter the Great he put his name with the date 1729. His name is also found on the portraits of Anne Petrowna and Catharine Alexowna. The expression is sufficiently good, but there is nothing remarkable in the execution.]

ZUCCARO, or ZUCCHERO, TADDEO. This painter was born at S. Angelo in Vado, in the duchy of Urbino, in 1529. He was the son of Ottaviano Zuccaro, a painter of little celebrity, by whom he was instructed in the elementary principles of design; but he afterwards became a disciple of Pompeo da Fano. Desirous of improving himself by studying the works of the great masters at Rome, he ventured to visit that city when he was only fourteen years of age. Young, and unprotected in that great capital, he was obliged to follow the humble occupation of a colour-grinder. In that state of destitution, he had still the courage to devote a portion of his time to the prosecution of his studies; and it frequently happened, that after passing the day in designing from the works of Raffaelle, in the Palazzo Chigi, he was compelled to sleep under the loggie of the palace, being without the means of providing himself with a lodging. In this miserable condition, he was noticed by Daniello de Por, a painter then in some estimation, who favoured him with his assistance and advice; and in 1547, when he was eighteen years of age, he was employed to decorate the façade of the Palazzo Mattei, with some emblematical subjects in chiaro-scuro. By this, his first public work, he acquired considerable reputation, and he was soon afterwards engaged by the Duke of Urbino to paint a series of frescoes; in a chapel of the cathedral. He also executed some considerable works at Pesaro, and returned to Rome in the time of Julius III., where he was employed by that pontiff, and by his successor, Paul IV., in the embellishment of the Vatican, particularly in the apartments called Il Torronie. In a chapel of the church of S. Maria della Consolazione, he painted in fresco several subjects of the Passion of our Saviour, which are considered among his best performances. He was next employed by Cardinal Farnese to ornament the villa he had built at Caprarola; and it was on this occasion, more than any other, that he discovered the talents of an able artist. He represented the most memorable actions of that illustrious family, particularly those of Paul III. and Alessandro Farnese, in a variety of compartments, in which he has evinced great powers of invention, and a judicious arrangement of his subjects.

On the merit of these performances, Lanzi observes, that the admirers of art who visit the palace of Caprarola, usually return from it with a much more favourable idea of the powers of Taddeo, than they had conceived before they went thither; and adds, that he was assisted, in the execution of that great undertaking, by some young artists, who afterwards proved superior to himself. John Joseph Prenner has engraved this work in a set of forty-five plates, published in 1748.

Taddeo Zuccaro died at Rome in 1566, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, worn out with continual exertion, and some disposition to excess. He was buried in the church of La Rotonda, near the remains of Raffaelle, and the following epitaph was afterwards inscribed on his tomb by his brother, Federigo: Federicus mærens posuit anno 1568, moribus, picturâ, Raphaëli Urbinati simillimo. An unwarrantable flattery, which can only be palliated by the partiality of fraternal affection.

ZUCCARO, or ZUCCHERO, FEDERIGO, was the younger brother of Taddeo, born at S. Angelo in Vado, in 1543, and was placed, when he was very young, under the tuition of his brother, at Rome, who paid the greatest attention to his education. In a few years he was sufficiently advanced in the art to be able to assist Taddeo in several of the considerable works in which he was engaged, and was employed by Pope Pius IV., in conjunction with Federigo Baroccio, in the Palazzo Belvidere, where he painted the History of Moses and Pharaoh; the Marriage of Cana; and the Transfiguration. These works gained him great reputation; and Taddeo, far from being jealous of his rising fame, furnished him with further opportunities of distinguishing himself, by making him his coadjutor in his great works in the Vatican, and the Villa Farnese, at Caprarolo. He was invited to Florence by the Grand Duke, to finish the cupola of S. Maria dei Fiori, which had been left imperfect by Giorgio Vasari, and he executed the commission to the entire satisfaction of his employer. Taddeo finding how great a resource the talents of his brother had been to him, earnestly solicited him to return to Rome, and soon after his arrival, he [Federigo] had to lament the loss of his brother, in the prime of life.

Gregory XIII., who had succeeded to the papal throne, engaged him to paint the vault of the Capella Paolina. Whilst he was thus employed in the Vatican, having some difference with the officers of his Holiness, he painted an emblematical subject of Calumny, in which he represented the portraits of the individuals who had offended him, decorated with the ears of Mîdas, and exhibited the picture over the portico of the church of St. Luke, on the festival of that saint. Finding that this imprudent sally of his resentment had excited the displeasure of the Pope, he determined to fly from Rome, leaving his work in the Paolina unfinished. He took refuge in France, where he was for some time employed in the service of the Cardinal of Lorraine. From thence he went to Flanders, where he painted several cartoons for tapestry.

In 1574 he arrived in England, and was very favourably received. He painted the portrait of Queen Elizabeth, and those of several of her courtiers, and it is affirmed by Lord Orford, that Mary, Queen of Scots, also sat to him, from which a print was engraved by Vertue. It may, however, be reasonably presumed, that the portrait of Mary, said to have been painted by Zuccaro, was copied from some other picture of that unfortunate princess, as, at the period of Zuccaro's arrival in England, she was in close confinement, and had already passed several years of that rigid imprisonment, which was terminated by a mock trial and a brutal execution. What other pictures he painted here we have no certain account of, probably they were not numerous, as his stay was not long; historic subjects were not at that time in fashion, and he had a bigoted attachment to his religion.

He returned to Italy, and resided some time at Venice, where the patriarch Grimani employed him to finish the fresco ornaments of his chapel, which had been begun by Batista Franco. He added, from his own compositions, the Resurrection of Lazarus, and the Repentance of Mary Magdalene. For the same place he painted a large picture of the Adoration of the Magi, which was much admired. In conjunction with the best Venetian masters of his time, he was employed in the embellishment of the hall of the Grand Council at Venice, and his performances were so much admired, that the republic conferred on him the order of knighthood. He now ventured to return to Rome, and the Pope not only overlooked his indiscretion, but employed him to finish the work he had begun in the Capella Paolina.

During the pontificate of Sixtus V. he was invited to the court of Madrid by Philip II., who employed him to paint the frescoes in the lower cloister of the Escorial. In this undertaking he did not succeed to the satisfaction of the king. Whether Philip's expectations were raised too high by the report his emissaries in Italy had made of Zuccaro's talents, or whether the vanity of the painter, for which he was remarkable, disgusted him, it is certain, that of all the artists who were employed at the Escorial, he alone failed of success. At the same time that Philip dismissed him from his service, he compensated him, in the most liberal manner, for what he had done; and, it is said, that the payments made to Zuccaro were larger than to any other painter who had visited Spain. After his departure, his works in the Escorial were expunged, and were replaced by others of Pellegrino Tibaldi. On his return to Rome he commenced the establishment of the Academy of St. Luke, for which he had received letters patent from Gregory XIII., and at his death, which happened in 1609, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, he bequeathed all his property to the Academy.

Federigo Zuccaro possessed a ready and inventive genius, but his compositions are frequently incongruous and extravagant; his design is not incorrect, but an affectation of grandeur, a predilection for despatch, and a commanding facility, led him into the vices of a mannerist. His forms are by no means select, the characters of his heads are frequently repeated, and exhibit the formality of portraiture. His colouring is clear and brilliant, but without mellowness or harmony. [There seems to be some uncertainty about the time of his birth and death; Zani says he was born in 1539, and died in 1619. Judging by the works he was employed on in conjunction with his brother Taddeo, 1539 is the probable date. The other of his death may be an error of the press.]

ZUCCHERELLI, [or ZUCCARELLI], FRANCESCO. According to Lanzi, this painter was born at Pitigliano, in Tuscany, in 1702. He was first a scholar of Paolo Anesi, but he afterwards studied successively under Gio Maria Morandi, and Pietro Nelli. For some time he applied himself to historic painting, but his natural genius leading him to another branch of the art, he afterwards confined himself to landscapes, with small figures, in which he acquired a pleasing and elegant style, which was greatly admired, not only in Italy, but throughout Europe.

In 1752 he visited England, where he met with very flattering encouragement, and several of his pictures were engraved by Vivares, and other artists. At the foundation of the Royal Academy, Zuccherelli was chosen one of the original members. About the year 1773 he returned to Italy, and settled at Florence, where he vested a considerable sum of money, the produce of his talents, in the security of one of the monasteries which were suppressed, a few years afterwards, by the Emperor Joseph II. By this unfortunate circumstance he was reduced to indigence, and at an advanced age was obliged to resume his pencil, which he had relinquished. He died at Florence in 1788.

In the early part of his life Zuccherelli amused himself with the point; among others, we have the following etchings by him:

A set of various studies; from the designs of A. del Sarto. The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John and S. Anne; after the same.

The Wise and the Foolish Virgins; after Gio. Menozzi. The Statue of Victory; after the sculpture of M. Angelo Buonarroti.

ZUCCHI, JACOPO. This painter was born at Florence about the year 1541. He was a disciple of Giorgio Vasari, and assisted that master in several of his works. According to Baglione, he visited Rome when young, in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., where he was favoured with the patronage of Cardinal Ferdinando de Medici, who employed him in some considerable fresco works for his palace. There are also several altar-pieces by him in the public edifices at Rome, of which the most worthy of notice, are the Nativity of St. John, in the church of S. Giovanni Decollato; and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in S. Spirito in Borgo.

ZUCCHI, ANDREA. This artist was born at Venice about the year 1675 [or 1678]. He engraved part of the plates for a collection of prints from the most celebrated paintings at Venice, consisting of fifty-seven plates, published by Lovisa. We have also by him a set of twelve prints of Venetian habitments. The following are among his best works:

Tobit and the Angel; after Titian.

St. John the Evangelist; after the same.

St. John the Baptist; after P. Veronese.

The Martyrdom of Paolo Erizzo; after P. Longhi.

The Birth of the Virgin; after Niccolo Bambini.

The Miracle of the Manna; after G. Porta.

The Goddess Cybele in a Car, drawn by Lions; after Tintoretto.

Aurora and Tithon; after the same.

Aeneas saving Anchises from the Burning of Troy; after Seb. Ricci.

[He died in 1740.]

ZUCCHI, FRANCESCO. This artist was born at Venice in 1698. He was the son of Andrea Zucchi, and was instructed by his father in the art of engraving. He was invited to Dresden, to engrave some plates from the pictures in the Electoral Gallery. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

The Portrait of a Spaniard; after Rubens; in the Dresden Gallery.

The Portrait of a Lady, resembling one of Rubens's wives; after the same; in the same collection.

St. Helena worshipping the Cross; after Gio. Bettini Cignaroli.

Two Allegorical Subjects; after Antonio Balestrà.

[Some place his birth in 1692, others in 1695, and his death in 1764.]

ZUCCHI, LORENZO, was the younger brother of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Venice in 1704. He was instructed in design and engraving by his father, Andrea Zucchi. In 1738 he was appointed engraver to the Elector of Saxony, and was employed to execute several plates for the collection of the Dresden Gallery. The following are among his best prints:

The Seven Sacraments; after Spagnoletto.
 The Martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul; after Nic. del Abati.
 The Crowning of St. Catherine; after Rubens.
 A Sacrifice to Venus; after Ger. Lairesse.
 The Flaying of Marsyas; after Langetti.
 St. Michael combating the Dragon; after Torelli.
 The Tribute-Money; after Titian.
 David with the Head of Goliath; after Luc. Giordano.

[Zani says he died in 1779; Ticozzi says, 1783.]

ZUCCO, FRANCESCO. According to Tassi, this painter was a native of Bergamo, and flourished about the year 1605. He first studied at Cremona, in the school of the Campi, and was afterwards a disciple of Pietro Moroni. He painted history and portraits with considerable reputation, in which he sometimes imitated the style of Paolo Veronese with such success, that some of his works have been mistaken for the productions of that master, particularly two pictures representing the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Gottardo, at Bergamo. He died in 1627.

ZUGNI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Brescia in 1594, and, according to Ridolfi, was a scholar of Palma. He was inferior to his instructor in the selection of his forms and the ease of his attitudes; but he surpassed him in the impasto and vigour of his colouring. He particularly excelled in fresco, and frequently embellished with his figures the architectural and perspective views of Tommaso Sandrino. His works in oil also possess great merit; one of his most esteemed pictures is an altar-piece representing the Circumcision, in the church of S. Maria delle Grazie, at Venice. He died in 1636, aged 62. [This is palpably wrong; Zani's dates are, born in 1557, and died in 1621, which coincides with Ridolfi.]

ZUPELLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was a native of Cremona, and flourished about the end of the fifteenth century. He painted landscapes, which he usually embellished with figures, representing subjects from sacred history. His style, though dry and Gothic, exhibits originality, and a graceful air, which distinguishes his figures beyond those of the generality of his contemporaries. In the church of the Eremitani, at Cremona, is a landscape, with a Holy Family, by this master, which is mentioned by Lanzi in very favourable terms. He died in 1636, aged about 62. [Lanzi says he flourished at the close of the fifteenth century; and Zani allows him to 1520: the date in the text is clearly wrong. Perhaps it should be 1536, which is good latitude.]

ZURBARAN, FRANCISCO. According to Palomino, this Spanish painter was born at Fuente de Cantos, in the vicinity of Seville, in 1596, and was a disciple of Pablo Roelas, under whose direction he applied himself with such diligence and success, that he soon acquired the reputation of an eminent painter of history. Captivated by the bold effect and vigorous chiaro-scuro which distinguish the works of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, he adopted the style of that master, at the same time adhering closely to nature, which he faithfully followed, without extravagance or caprice. His first public performance was the History of San Pedro Nolasco, painted for the cloister of La Merced Calzada, and it gained him great reputation. The monks are all habited in white draperies, which are managed with infinite art and delicacy. There are many other works by him in the public edifices at Seville; and at Cordova, particularly in the Colegio de San Pablo.

About the year 1630 he was invited to Madrid, was appointed painter to the king, and employed in the palace of Buenretiro, where he painted a series of pictures of the Labours of Hercules. In the Casa de Campo, and the other royal palaces, there are many other pictures by Zurbaran, as well as in the private collections. He was in great favour with Philip IV., in whose service he died, in 1662.

[Francisco Zurbaran was baptized on the 7th of November, 1598, which was probably the day of his birth. His father, being a husbandman, intended to bring his son up in the same employment; but he showed so much aptitude for painting, that he was released from the plough, and placed under the tuition of Juan de Roelas. Under this able master, and by his own talents and application, he soon acquired both knowledge and reputation. He determined to follow nature in all things, nor would he paint a piece of drapery even without the object before him. His admiration of the works of Caravaggio led him to imitate that master's style, and he obtained the title of the Caravaggio of Spain. In 1625 he was employed by the Marquis of Malazon to paint some pictures for the chapel of St. Peter in the cathedral of Seville, consisting of incidents in the life of that apostle, and which he executed with great ability; and nearly at the same period he painted his famous picture of St. Thomas Aquinas for the altar of the church of the college of that saint in Seville. This is considered as his finest work for correct imitation of nature, and for force of chiaro-scuro; and as a whole, is perhaps not surpassed by any production of the Spanish school. After this he painted eleven pictures for the Hieronymite Friars at Guadaloupe, from the life of St. Jerome; and other altar-pieces, all which he executed with applause. On his return to Seville, he painted three magnificent pictures for the Carthusians of Santa Maria de las Cuevas, in which his observance of nature, and his pictorial skill, are strikingly obvious. To these he added a great variety of works painted for monasteries and churches; for the church of St. Paul, a Crucifixion, which he signed with his name, Franciscus de Zurbaran, and with the date 1627, remarkable for its boldness of relief, which in the figure produces the effect of carving. It is not stated at what period he arrived at Madrid; but in 1633 he painted several fine pictures for the Chartreuse of Xeres, and on one of these he inscribed his name as painter to the king; an honour which he shared with Velasquez, who was at that time in possession of the royal favour. It does not, however, appear that he was employed at the court till about 1650, when, by the desire of the king, he was sent for to paint the Labours of Hercules in the palace of the Buenretiro. It is said that Philip, according to his usual custom with Velasquez, often visited him during the progress of the work, and that one day he expressed his admiration of the performance by laying his hand on the painter's shoulder, and calling him "painter of the king, and king of painters." His pictures were numerous in the churches and monasteries of Seville, Guadaloupe, Madrid, and other public places. Those in the Museum at Seville are considered his finest works; in the gallery at Madrid is one of the infant Jesus asleep, equal in beauty and grace to those of the same subject by Guido and Murillo. In the collection of the Duke of Sutherland is one painted by him in 1653, representing the Virgin with the infant Christ and St. John, which is truly said by an excellent judge to be "one of the most delicious creations of the Spanish pencil."

Mr. Stirling, in summing up Zurbaran's character as a painter, places him in the first rank of the Spanish school. Though not equal to Velasquez and Murillo in several respects, in colouring he is not inferior to these great masters. He remarks, that though his tints are always sober and subdued, they have much of the brilliancy and depth of Rembrandt. He designates him "the peculiar painter of monks, as Raphael is of Madonnas, and Ribera of martyrdoms; and says he studied the Spanish friar with as high a relish as Titian painted the Venetian noble, or Van Dyck the gentleman of England." For excellent descriptions of some of Zurbaran's finest works, see the "Annals of the Artists of Spain," by William Stirling, M. A.]

ZUSTRUS, [or SUSTRIS,] LAMBERT. This painter was a native of Germany, and flourished about the end of the sixteenth century. He was first instructed in the art by Christopher Schwartz, of Munich; but he afterwards travelled to Italy, where he became a disciple of Titian, and was a successful imitator of the admirable colouring of that master, though he still retained the dry and Gothic style of design which characterized the productions of his country at that period. In the gallery of the Louvre is a picture by Zustrus, representing Venus and Cupid, with Mars in the back-ground. [See the note to SUTERMAN.]

ZWOLL, J. ANCKER DE, an old German engraver, who flourished about the year 1500. He has been supposed to have been a disciple of Israel van Mecheln, whose style he imitated, though very inferior to him. His compositions are crowded and confused, and his drawing of the figure meagre and incorrect. The works of this ancient artist are now very rarely to be met with, and their scarcity, rather than any merit in the execution, renders them interesting to the collector. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The Virgin Mary, with the infant Christ, who holds a Cross in his hand.

The Virgin and Child, with St. Elisabeth and two Angels. St. Christopher on horseback, carrying the infant Christ. Christ praying in the Garden.

Christ betrayed.

The Crucifixion.

The Entombing of Christ.

[Whether the word on the prints, which serves to designate this engraver, is ZWOLL or ZWOTT is still a question. Otley is of opinion that it indicates the place of his nativity or residence, and writes it ZWOLL. Zani, on the contrary, calls him J. Ancher de Zwot, non Zwoll, Il maestro alla Navetta, o alla Spuola da Tessadri. Bartsch also distinguishes him as "Le Maître à la Navette," and writes the word ZWOTT. As it is in German characters on the prints Bartsch could hardly be deceived. The following are the titles of eighteen subjects so marked, described in "Le Peintre Graveur," tom. vi.

1. The Adoration of the Kings.
2. The Last Supper.
3. Christ at the Mount of Olives.
4. Christ taken in the Garden.
5. Christ Crucified between two Thieves.
6. The same subject differently treated.
7. The Entombment of Christ.

8. The Saviour standing holding an open Book in one hand, and giving benediction with the other.
9. The Virgin with the Infant holding a Cross.
10. The Virgin with the Infant, who is turning the leaves of a Book.
11. St. Augustine seated between Statues of S. S. Jerome and Lawrence.
12. St. Christopher on Horseback bearing the Saviour on his shoulders.
13. St. George encountering the Dragon.
14. St. Gregory celebrating Mass.
15. St. Anne with the Virgin, Infant, and figures of Angels.
16. A Youth in conversation with an aged Pilgrim.
17. A Skeleton in a vaulted Tomb.
18. A design of Gothic Architecture, resembling the upper part of an Altar, with statues and coats of arms.]

ZYL, [or ZEYL,] GERARD PIETERSZ VAN. This artist was born at Amsterdam in 1606. He distinguished himself as a portrait painter, and visited England in that capacity about the year 1635, when Vandyck was in full possession of the public favour. He formed an intimate acquaintance with that distinguished artist, who occasionally employed him to assist in the draperies and back-grounds of his pictures. By the frequent opportunities he had of profiting by the example and instruction of Vandyck, he became a successful imitator of his style; and after a residence of a few years in London, he returned to Amsterdam, where he met with very extensive employment, and acquired the appellation of the second Vandyck. Like that master, he particularly excelled in painting hands, and his colouring is chaste and clear. He died in 1667. [He is also called Gherard Van Leyden. He painted conversations, and other familiar subjects, but was principally employed on portraits.]

ZYLVELT, ADAM VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1635. He engraved a set of plates from the designs of John Lingelbach, representing sea-ports, &c. We have also several portraits by him, some of which are from his own designs. He imitated the style of John Visscher with some success. Among others, we have the following portraits by him:

Dirk Volkhertz Coornhaert, or Cuernhaert, Engraver. Stephen le Moine, Doctor in Theology at Leyden.

Christopher Wittichius, Professor of the University of Leyden.

Herman Witsius, Professor of Theology at Franeker.

John Hasius, Minister of the church of Haerlem.

Cornelius Bosch.

[ZYNNDT, or ZUNDT, MATHIAS, an engraver, who flourished during the latter half of the 16th century. Bartsch describes three prints by him:

Portrait of Louis III. de Bourbon-Conde. 1568.

Portrait of John de Raleta, Grand Master of Malta. 1566.

View of the city of Grodno, in Lithuania. 1568.

Each of the above is signed with his name, either Zynndt or Zündt.

Brulliot mentions an etching with a mark supposed to be his; it represents a Vase with figures of Tritons, standing on sea-horses' feet, and surmounted by a figure of Neptune. He says that Bartsch's list is incomplete, as he knows of several others with the engraver's name, as above, or his mark, which have not been noticed in any of the catalogues.]
