P R E F A C E.

THIS single volume embraces, without the least abridgment, the whole of the articles contained in the two quartos published by BRYAN in 1816. Each of those articles has been revised, and, where necessary, corrected; and much additional matter respecting the lives and works of many of the artists, as well as more copious lists of their productions, especially of the earlier engravers, have been appended. Erroneous statements, derived from insufficient sources, have been elucidated by notes, or shown to be altogether without foundation. Where the article was scanty, and the artist of importance, it has been deemed necessary to amplify it, keeping in view however the bounds imposed by a work of this nature. Instances of this kind will be observed in the enlarged accounts of several ancient masters, whose names are now familiar to the public, but whose works were, till recently, of little consideration with amateurs. The abundant supply of pictures imported into England during the last five-and-thirty years, and the means afforded of visiting foreign countries since the cessation of war, have made the public acquainted with the names and works of numerous excellent painters, particularly of the Spanish and Dutch Schools, which were not mentioned in the former Dictionary; these deficiencies have, to a great extent, now been remedied. Distinguished modern artists, both painters and engravers, especially those of our own country, have received a due share of notice; and their brethren of France, Italy, and Germany have by no means been neglected.

A perusal of the list of writers consulted, for the purpose of enlargement or correction, will show that recourse has been had to the best authorities, both historical and critical. Where there are great discrepancies between them, the statements on both sides have been succinctly given, that the inquirer may be enabled to draw his own conclusions. In the compilation of a work of this kind it is essential that the compiler should have a competent acquaintance with the works of the different masters, that he may be qualified to detect false or partial statements, and correct the erroneous attribution of pictures of one painter to another of greater celebrity. There is no means of acquiring this knowledge so effective as being concerned in the commerce of pictures on a general and extensive scale. The intercourse with honourable dealers in pictures of high character, fortifies that knowledge; for to them it is of the greatest importance to be well acquainted with all the characteristic marks of the several masters, and the other signs by which their works are known, and by which their genuineness is ascertained. Even from those of humbler pretensions much is to be learned, in the admission and confession of practices pursued in the management of copies, or the alteration of analogous pictures, to make them pass for the genuine works of celebrated masters. The editor has had extensive practice in the sale of pictures of all schools and all ranks, and much acquaintance with dealers both foreign and English; and to the knowledge so acquired he has added that of his own observation on the chief collections, public and private, at home and abroad. Those who consult this work will have the benefit of his experience. The Dictionary has been augmented to at least double the quantity of matter contained in the two quarto volumes, there being upwards of 1300 new names of artists introduced; the additional lives, notes, corrections, and lists of pictures and rare prints, are enclosed in brackets, to distinguish them from the original work. It is probable that more will be expected by some than will be found; but to have increased the bulk would have defeated the object of the publisher, which was to produce an improved Dictionary of Painters and Engravers in a commodious form at a moderate price. This the editor thinks has, to a certain extent, been accomplished; but it is in the nature of such a work to admit of additions from time to time; and those who are best acquainted with the labour of collecting materials from so many various sources will be the readiest to pardon as trivial, what the less informed may consider as serious omissions.

In concluding these prefatory observations, the editor has to acknowledge his obligations to Messrs. Smith, brothers, of Lisle Street, London, the eminent dealers in ancient prints, for their valuable and gratuitous communications during the whole progress of the work. On all occasions of doubt respecting the authenticity, rarity, or estimate of ancient prints, he has had recourse to their storehouse of knowledge, and at all times received from them the most courteous attention, and liberal information. Any oversights in these matters must be attributed to the editor, and not to them.

To his friend Mr. C. J. Nieuwenhuys, the eminent connoisseur, the editor is indebted for valuable suggestions and remarks relative to Flemish and Dutch painters, and for permission to make extracts from his accounts of pictures, particularly of those described in his privately printed catalogue of the king of Holland's collection.

Several other well-informed friends have also assisted his inquiries, as will be seen in many of the articles where their names are mentioned; among them are some of the principal dealers, whose interest it is that the statements respecting the older masters and their works should be given correctly.

These acknowledgments may serve as indications that the editor has availed himself of the judgment of others conversant with the fine arts, in order to collect the best opinions for the inquirer's information.

INTRODUCTION.

THE benign influence which the cultivation of the Fine Arts has produced on the civilization of society through the different ages of the world, is so universally admitted, that any further disquisition on their excellence may be deemed superfluous; but, in presenting to the public a work of this nature, it may be expected that something should be said respecting the attributes of painting, as well as of its origin, and of its progress among the ancients.

Painting, which is deservedly ranked as one of the most important and interesting of the liberal arts, has been too frequently considered as merely calculated to charm the eye, and to gratify the senses; but a more deliberate reflection will convince us that it has a nobler claim to our estimation, and that its powers are capable of contributing to our instruction not less than to our delight.

The painter's art, in the exercise of its more elevated faculties, inspires the mind with a taste for whatever is good, as well as what is beautiful; fills the heart with the most salutary sensations, and promotes the love of virtue and the abhorrence of vice. Every agreeable impression of which our ideas are susceptible from the contemplation of the rich and varied scenes displayed by nature, living or inanimate, painting has the power of producing. In minds endowed with the most exquisite sensibility, it can augment the faculty of feeling, and soften the obduracy of the most inflexible. Its productions instil into mankind a love of order, of symmetry, of harmony of parts, and of general beauty.

By an admirable effort of human genius, painting offers to our regard every feature of universal nature; its empire extends through every age, and over every country: it presents us with the events of the most remote antiquity, as well as those of which we are the witnesses; and places in our view the most distant objects, not less than those by which we are immediately surrounded. In this respect, this admirable art may be said to surpass even nature herself, which can only set before us such objects as are actually present.

The accomplished painter may be affirmed to possess a universality of talent. He is an historian, a poet, the faithful imitator, or rather the rival of nature; and by the magic operation of his art, the enchanted vision is carried up into the mansions of celestial being, or descends into the regions of the unblest.

Cicero, in his oration in favour of the poet Archias, speaking of the Belles Lettres, observes, that "they nourish us in our youth, and invigorate old age; they embellish the most fortunate situation, and console us under disaster and persecution; they accompany us night and day in our journeys, and in our retreats from the world; and even when our minds are not disposed to profit by their instruction, we ought still to hold them in a just admiration, finding that, to those who possess them, they afford the most delicious gratifications." These sentiments, expressed by one of the finest geniuses of antiquity, appear to be strikingly applicable to painting, as, whether the art is practised as a profession, or exercised as an amusement and curiosity, it is productive of all these advantages.

Historic painting, from the sublime style by which it ought to be characterized, the choice of objects which concur in its arrangements, and the expansive stretch of imagination of which it is susceptible, deservedly occupies the most exalted rank in the various departments of the art. Though the historical painter may be supposed to limit the exercise of his art to such pictures as represent the events of history, yet we usually comprehend, under that denomination, whatever relates to mythology or ancient fable. This licence is also extended to such subjects as are found in the epic and tragic poets, and even to the most interesting fictions of romance. This extensive range offers to the painter of history an almost unbounded dominion, and confers on him the pre-eminence to which he is so justly entitled.

In allotting to historic painting this honourable distinction, we would by no means be suspected of a disposition to degrade any other branch of this interesting art. Unquestionably, the painter who can successfully imitate a visible object, is an estimable artist; but it cannot reasonably be denied, that he who succeeds in the higher walk of art, by the representation of objects the most difficult to be accomplished, may be presumed to possess superior endowments.

ON THE ORIGIN OF PAINTING.

IN the rudest periods of existence, the love of imitation seems to have been inherent in the nature of man; and the variety of colours and of forms appears to have been amongst the primitive sources of his enjoyments. This desire of imitating naturally led him to trace coarsely the objects which most interested his observation. Hence, instead of attempting to attribute the origin of design to any precise period or particular nation, it may be more reasonably presumed to have been indigenous in every country, where human reason has in any degree developed itself, and may be said to have been coeval with our existence.

The most untutored among the savages, who scarcely attempt to cover their nudity, have been found to be sensible to the attraction of colour, even independent of design. They select the most beautiful plumage of their birds, to embellish their vestments, and make choice of such stones or shells as are the most brilliant and varied in their colour, for their principal ornaments.

It may naturally be supposed that a great length of time must have elapsed before it was discovered that the union of design with colour contributed to increase and to vary this gratification; as it is certain that the progress of the human mind, in the acquisition of first principles, is usually languid and slow. But this discovery was no sooner made, than the germ of painting took root in the soil of human ingenuity.

The art had long been confined to a simple outline, before it was attempted to render the object represented more interesting by filling up the contour with a general staining of colour, resembling what is called illuminating; and it appears to have remained in the same uncultivated state even among nations to whom we cannot justly deny the merit of industry; such as the Indians, the Chinese, and the Egyptians; among whom the arts seem to have been doomed to an eternal mediocrity.

PAINTING AMONG THE EGYPTIANS.

PLATO, who flourished about four hundred years before the Christian era, assures us, that at the period at which he lived, the art of painting had been practised by the Egyptians upwards of ten thousand years, and that there remained, in his time, productions of that high antiquity, which were neither inferior to, nor very different from, the paintings of the Egyptian artists at the time at which he wrote. Without regarding the precise term of ten thousand years as seriously deserving of our credit, we cannot refuse our belief that the art had been practised in Egypt during the revolution of an indefinite series of time, which ascended to an indeterminate antiquity. The testimony of the disciple of Socrates therefore proves that the practice of painting was extremely ancient in Egypt; that their works were infinitely durable; but that, through a long succession of ages, the Egyptians had made little or no progress in the art.

In that superstitious country, the artist was prohibited from attempting any innovation or improvement in the old established style of his predecessor. The disciple implicitly pursued the beaten path of his instructor, who had himself been the servile follower of the rules established in the most barbarous periods of the art, a deviation from which would have been punished as a heresy in religion. Hence the artist was bereft of the stimulus of emulation; no one endeavoured to surpass another; and if, in the torpor to which the laws of his country subjected him, the artist sometimes experienced the impulse of genius, or felt the inspiration of a creative faculty, he was deterred from yielding to their impression by a frightful fanaticism, which suspended over his head the punishment of impiety.

The Egyptian painters and sculptors designed their figures in a style peculiarly stiff and formal, with the legs invariably closed, and the arms stuck to their sides, as if they had consulted no other models than their bandaged mummies. As they never dissected their dead, they must have been totally unacquainted with the construction and articulation of the bones and muscles: and though it has been pretended that the Egyptians were not ignorant of anatomy, it may be said to be little more than a mockery of the term, as it is certain that their knowledge of that science was confined to what they could learn from preparing their dead bodies for embalment.

The artists of Egypt were chiefly employed on works devoted to the purposes of religious worship, in which the figures were not only confined to particular and consecrated postures, from which they were not permitted to deviate, but were in themselves generally monstrous in their form; sometimes representing the bodies of animals with human heads, sometimes human bodies with the heads of brutes, which were often anomalous and imaginary, and which had no prototype in nature.

According to Winckelmann, the vestiges of Egyptian painting, with which we are best acquainted, are the bandages of their mummies. These productions have resisted the ravages of time, and are still submitted to the examination of the curious. In these the outline of the figures is traced with black; the colours they used were confined to four, blue, red, yellow, and green, which were not broken or blended, the red and blue being the predominant colours.

Norden, Pococke, Bruce, and other modern travellers, make mention of several colossal paintings, found on the walls of the temples, and in the tombs at Thebes, Denderah, and other places in Upper Egypt. And Winckelmann justly regrets that those curious remains had not been visited by artists, or by persons conversant in works of art, by whose testimony we might have been correctly informed of their character, style, and manœuvre. In the description given of them by Norden, the colours are said to be entire and unblended, like the paintings on the bandages of their mummies, and proves that the art, even in these gigantic productions, was confined to the manner practised in its infancy.

We have now, however, the evidence of an ingenious and enlightened artist who has lately visited these venerable relics. M. Denon, in his Voyage dans la Basse et Haute Egypte, has given a curious and interesting account of the paintings at Thebes, which he reports to be as fresh in colour as when they were first painted. The design in general is stiff and incorrect; and whatever attitude is given to the figure, the head is always represented in profile. The colours are entire, without blending or degradation, as in our playing cards, the whole exhibiting the art as it was practised in its rudest state.

We may therefore conclude, that though the Egyptians were among the earliest practisers of the art, yet, during a long series of ages, if it did not remain entirely stationary, there was little progress towards improvement; and that in Egypt the arts constantly retained their ancient style, until it passed under the dominion of the Ptolemies.

PAINTING AMONG THE GREEKS.

ALTHOUGH the history of painting among the Greeks is better known than that of the nations by whom the art was practised at a more remote period, it is still involved in considerable obscurity.

It is generally admitted that the arts were practised in Asia and in Egypt for many ages before any traces of them are to be found among that people, by whom they were destined to be carried to the highest pitch of perfection. And painting, as well as her sister arts, sculpture and architecture, are believed to have been introduced into Greece by the communication that nation held with Egypt and Asia, through the channel of the Phœnician traders.

The origin of painting in Greece was unknown to Pliny, who is the only writer to whom we are materially indebted for the few fragments which have been preserved to us of the biography of their artists. He could only obtain them from the Greek authors; and on this occasion he complains that they have not been very attentive to their accustomed accuracy.

In Greece, as in Egypt, it was to be apprehended, that, as their first efforts were rude and barbarous, the arts might have fallen into the trammels with which they had been shackled in that country from which they were imported, and have continued to languish under an hereditary mediocrity. But the rudiments they received, though their approach towards improvement was slow, were, by progressive cultivation, gradually carried to that summit of perfection in which the Greeks may indisputably be said to have remained without rivals. Their finest works have ever since been made the models of our imitation; and it has been found that nothing beautiful, grand, or graceful, can be accomplished without contemplating the monuments they have left us.

Convinced that man is the noblest production of nature, by the harmony of his construction, and the admirable proportion of his members, they applied themselves to an attentive study of anatomy, and the structure and movement of the body. Their manners and customs were of infinite advantage to the artist in the prosecution of these studies, by the frequent opportunities they afforded him of viewing the athlete, or wrestlers, in their exhibitions in the gymnastic exercises. Hence we may infer, that the Grecian artists did not entirely deduce, from the resources of their minds, that perfection and beauty of form by which their works are so characteristically distinguished. The ardent imagination of the Greeks did not permit them to confine themselves to the representation of man, they soon aspired to that of their divinities.

In a country, rich in natural productions, and blessed with a happy temperature, in point of climate; inhabited by a brave and polished people, whose religious worship was as magnificent in its forms as it was ingenious and elegant in its allegories; where victory and liberty were placed upon the altar, and where, impassioned with the love of glory, they bestowed on their heroes and philosophers the honours of deification; the arts may be presumed to have found a genial soil. Such was ancient Greece, where it was believed, with reason, that the representation of their gods and heroes in their public temples was of the greatest efficacy in the support of religion, and in promoting the love of their country.

At Athens, the portico of the Pœcile was devoted to the reception of such paintings and sculpture as recorded the brilliant achievements of their warriors, or the annals of the most distinguished and virtuous of their citizens. Inspired with such sentiments, their artists felt an enthusiasm which animated them to the most fervid exertions.

Although it has never been attempted to be denied that the ancients carried sculpture to a perfection which all the succeeding efforts of the art have been unable to equal, it has been alleged that they were less successful in painting, in which they have been said to be greatly inferior to the moderns. In the inquiry into what degree of perfection the art of painting was carried by the Greeks, the different parties who have entered into the discussion have shown an unusual contrariety of opinion. On one side, a bigoted admiration of whatever has descended to us from antiquity, has decided their unqualified superiority over every thing modern; whilst, on the other, by a determined opposition, it has as roundly been pretended that the paintings of the ancients were only worthy of exciting our contempt.

In this, as in most other disputes, it may reasonably be presumed, that the just estimation of both will be found between the two extremes. It is deserving of remark, that none of the works of the celebrated Greek painters have reached us, by which we might have been enabled to form a competent judgment of their talents. We are consequently under the necessity of regulating our ideas by the descriptions given us of them in the ancient writers. The paintings of antiquity, with which we are acquainted, are almost entirely confined to some ornaments of apartments, baths, and tombs, which were discovered in the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum, and which are very rationally believed to have been executed by very subordinate artists, who may be regarded as the ordinary painters of mansional decoration. The paintings found in the remains of Pompeii and Herculaneum cannot, therefore, serve us correctly, in forming our ideas of the state of painting even at the period at which they were executed. Painted, for the most part, on walls, and exposed for a great length of time to the air, and after the disaster buried for near two thousand years under heaps of lava and ashes, it is even surprising that they have been so well preserved. Besides, Pompeii and Herculaneum were not places of the first rank, and as the paintings found there seem to have only served as the decorations of their villas, or country-houses, we may fairly conclude that they were generally either copies, or the productions of very subordinate artists.

From a candid consideration of these, and the scanty information afforded us by the writers of antiquity of the works of their most celebrated painters, we may conclude, that as the Greeks carried sculpture to such acknowledged perfection, it will not be denied that their painters, as well as their statuaries, must have been perfect masters of design, so essential to the successful exercise of either art. In comparing the paintings of the moderns with those of the ancients, it may be fairly inferred that the latter surpassed the former in expression, in the purity of design, the attitudes of their figures, and in what is called ideal beauty. With respect to colouring, the discovery of oil-painting has given to the moderns a powerful advantage, which the ancients had no means of attaining. The ancient paintings will also be found to be inferior to those of the moderns in that illusion, which results from a perfect acquaintance with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. The modern painters have also surpassed the ancients in the arrangement of their groups, and in their knowledge of perspective.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE GRECIAN PAINTERS.

THE earliest essays of the art among the Greeks, as in the nations who preceded them, were confined to the tracing of a simple outline, called by Pliny Pictura Linearis, the invention of which is, by some, attributed to CLEANTHES, of Corinth. To this first stage of the art succeeded the introduction of other lines, indicative of the internal parts of the figure, but it was still only an outline, without colour.

This improvement is ascribed to TELEPHANES, of Sicyon, and to ARDICES, of Corinth.

The progress of the art next led to an attempt to fill up the contour of the figure with one colour, said to have been first practised by CLEOPHANTES, of Corinth, styled for his invention Monocromatos. This discovery is also attributed to HYGIEMON, DINIAS, and CHARMAS, and is said to have been improved by EUMARUS, the Athenian, and CIMON, of Cleonæa, particularly by the latter, who has the credit of having been the first who attempted to place the figure in different attitudes, to express the joints of the limbs, and the veins of the body. He is also said to have been the first who introduced folds into his drapery.

From this epoch, tradition supplies us with a more particular account of the artists who successively appeared in the advancement of painting among the Greeks, though their history is frequently enveloped in doubt and uncertainty.

BULARCHUS. The earliest picture of which the ancient writers have given a description, is the Battle of the Magnesians, painted by Bularchus, who appears to have flourished about seven hundred and twenty years before the Christian era, as, according to Pliny, this picture was purchased for its weight in gold by Candaules, king of Lydia, who died about seven hundred years before Christ. After Bularchus we encounter a chasm of upwards of two centuries and a half in the history of painting. It appears, however, that it was practised with success in the Isle of Rhodes, at the time of Anacreon, who lived about five hundred years before our era. That poet, in his twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth Odes, mentions the practice of the art, and that it was effected by mixing wax with their colours, called encaustic painting.

PHIDIAS, the celebrated sculptor, is said by Pliny to have practised painting. He flourished about four hundred and forty-five years before Christ, and painted at Athens a picture of Pericles, represented as the Olympian Jupiter.

PANÆNUS, the brother of Phidias, acquired a distinguished reputation in the art. He exercised his talents in conjunction with that immortal statuary, in adorning the temple of the Olympian Jupiter, where he painted Atlas supporting the World, and Hercules preparing to relieve him of his burthen, the son of Alcmena was accompanied by Theseus and Pirithoüs. He also painted Hercules combating the Nemean Lion; Hippodamia, the daughter of Ænomaüs, with her mother; Prometheus chained to the Rock, whom Hercules is about to deliver; and Penthesilea killed by Achilles. But the work which most contributed to the establishment of his fame, was the Battle of Marathon, with which he decorated the Pœcile at Athens. A reverend author of our country, in his History of the Fine Arts, asserts, that "in this painting the artist had portrayed from the life all the principal generals, both on the Grecian and Persian side;" in which he is, in some measure, supported by the authority of Pliny. A reference to chronology will, however, convince us, that this cannot be accurate. The battle of Marathon was fought in the sixty-second olympiad, at least sixty years before Panænus was known as a painter. Among the most distinguished leaders were Miltiades, Callimachus, Cynægyrus, &c., among the Athenians; and Datis and Artaphernes among the Persians. Miltiades died a year after the battle, Callimachus and Cynægyrus were killed in the combat, and Datis and Artaphernes were either dead or living in Persia, at an extreme old age, when the picture was painted. It is possible that these portraits might resemble the chiefs mentioned, but they must have been drawn from pictures painted in their lifetime.

POLYGNOTUS. This great painter was a native of the island of Thasos, and a contemporary of Panænus, though some years younger. He flourished about four hundred and thirty years before our era, and, as an original artist, deserves more consideration than any of his predecessors. The force of his imagination stamped painting with a kind of national character, and his style was adopted by the principal schools of Greece which succeeded him, as the compositions of the versifiers were marked, more or less, with the imagery and colouring of Homer. Endowed with a taste for poetry as well as painting, he had not only stored his mind with the beauties of the Iliad and the Odyssey, but had studied all the epic poems then extant, which furnished him with the mythological subjects with which he adorned the temples and porticoes of Athens, Delphi, and other cities of Greece.

Pliny is lavish in his eulogy on the powers of this painter. According to that writer, he was the first artist who gave an air of ease and grace to his figures; dressed his females in rich and elegant vestments; and, above all, characterized his heads with an expression which was entirely unknown before him. The history of the siege and taking of Troy, supplied the favourite subjects which occupied the talents of this great master; and though those memorable events comprehended so many interesting circumstances, and such terrible situations, that it appeared to be beyond the effort of human genius to combine or unite them; the enthusiasm of this artist, unchecked by obstacles, inspired him with such lofty and sublime conceptions, that they filled the mind with astonishment. He gave proof of his extraordinary capacity in vanquishing difficulties, in his celebrated picture of Cassandra. He represented the daughter of Priam at the moment she had been brutally outraged by Ajax in the temple of Minerva. The face of the unfortunate captive was partially covered with a veil, but the glowing blush of confusion was visible in her countenance, which displayed all the symptoms of modesty, insulted by a barbarian, who has been regarded as a hero.

This admired performance is selected by Lucian in representing the portrait of his perfect woman. "Polygnotus," he says, "shall open and spread her eyebrows, and give her that warm, glowing, decent blush, which so imitatively beautifies his Cassandra. He likewise shall give her an easy, genteel, flowing dress, with all its tender and delicate wavings, partly clinging to her body, and partly fluttering in the wind."

Polygnotus was fond of compositions which admitted of a great concourse of figures, and it was probably the taste of the particular period at which he lived, a taste which was not long predominant.

In the portico called the Pœcile, at Athens, he painted the Battle of Marathon. In the fore-ground of the picture, the Greeks and Persians were represented combating with equal valour; but in extending the view to the middle of the composition, the barbarians were seen flying to the Phœnician ships, which were seen in the distance. In this painting, Polygnotus allowed himself more licence than ever Pindar ventured to introduce into a lyric poem.

Minerva, the tutelar goddess of the Athenians, and Hercules, are made to descend from heaven; the town of Marathon is personified by a genius, and Theseus is drawn from the shades of death to witness a battle which took place some centuries after his death. This is considered the earliest anachronism that appeared in painting.

MYCON was also a contemporary of Polygnotus, and was employed with him in the Pœcile at Athens. He also painted some pictures in the Temple of Theseus, but we have no account of their subjects, nor of the abilities of the artist, though they may be presumed to have been respectable, as he worked in conjunction with Polygnotus, and as his pictures were purchased by the Athenians at large prices.

PAUSON. This painter is to be introduced nearly at the same epoch with the two preceding artists, as he is mentioned by Aristotle, in a comparison with Polygnotus, and another contemporary, Dionysius of Colophon. "Polygnotus," says that philosopher, "drew men more perfect than they were, Pauson worse than they were, and Dionysius such as they really were." From whence we may infer, that Polygnotus embellished nature by something of ideal beauty, that Pauson degraded her by a selection of her most vulgar and ignoble forms, and that Dionysius contented himself with representing nature as she usually appears.

DIONYSIUS, OF COLOPHON, approached to the perfection of Polygnotus. The subjects he chose to treat were less important; but, according to Ælian, "his works exhibited the same expressive character, the same choice of attitudes, a similar attention to propriety, and the same elegant arrangement of his draperies: but he represented the objects in a smaller proportion." By these expressions, Ælian has been supposed to explain more clearly the passage of Aristotle; and it has been thought to result from his suggestion, that Polygnotus designed his figures larger than life, Dionysius the size of life, and Pauson smaller than life. Winckelmann, however, interprets this in another manner. According to that writer, Polygnotus painted his figures better, that is to say, he stamped them with a grandeur above the scale and conformation of man. As he usually chose his subjects from mythology, or from heroic history, his figures resembled heroes, representing nature in the most select and elevated forms of ideal beauty. Pauson gave to his figures a more common and familiar air. In the opinion of Winckelmann, Aristotle meant to say that the pictures of Polygnotus were in painting what tragedy is in poetry, and that the figures of Pauson resembled the characters in a comedy, which are represented more than ordinarily ridiculous, to render the effect more ludicrous. Dionysius, whom Pliny places amongst the most famous painters, held a sober medium between Polygnotus and Pauson, and may be said to have been, with respect to Polygnotus, what Euripides was to Sophocles; the latter represented his heroines what they ought to be, the former such as they were.

AGLAOPHON, CEPHISSODORUS, PHRYLUS, and EVENOR, flourished about the nineteenth olympiad, or about four hundred and twenty-one years before Christ. The manner in which these painters are mentioned by Pliny and others, sufficiently establishes their claim to respectability.

APOLLODORUS. This painter was a native of Athens, and flourished in the ninety-third olympiad, or about four hundred and nine years before our era. After what has been already said in favour of Polygnotus, on the authority of Pliny, there is an appearance of contradiction in the high encomium that writer bestows on Apollodorus, when he asserts that he was the first who contributed to the glory of painting, and that before he appeared there was no production of the art that was worthy of attracting the attention of the spectator. This seeming inconsistency may, however, be reconciled, by stating that although Polygnotus divested his design of the stiffness and formality which existed before him, clothed his females with more elegant draperies, gave superior expression to his heads, and more varied attitudes to his figures; yet his colouring was cold and feeble, and he was little acquainted with effect. But Apollodorus showed more dexterity in the handling of the pencil, was the first who succeeded in the blending of his tones, and in the distribution of his light and shadow, by which he may be styled the inventor of the chiaro-scuro. Among his works is mentioned a picture of Ajax struck by Lightning, which was formerly at Pergamus.

ZEUXIS. This distinguished painter of antiquity was a native of Heraclea, and flourished in the ninety-fifth olympiad, or about four hundred years before the vulgar era. He is said to have been a disciple of Apollodorus. It is at least certain that they lived in habits of intimacy: and Pliny informs us, that Apollodorus wrote some verses in praise of his talents, in which he complains that "the art of painting had been stolen from him, and that it was Zeuxis who committed the theft." He did not, like Polygnotus, occupy his talents in large and abundant compositions, but confined himself to pictures consisting of a small number of figures, and was particularly successful in the beautiful forms of his women. Amongst his principal works, Pliny mentions a picture of Penelope, in which he seemed to have expressed the mind of that princess. The Crotonians having commissioned him to paint a picture of Helen, he selected five of the most beautiful young women of the city, and uniting in his single figure whatever was most perfect in his models, produced a work of the most exquisite beauty. The painter Nicomachus seeing this picture some time afterwards, could not restrain the expression of his surprise and admiration, when a bystander, not equally capable of appreciating its excellence, demanded what he saw in the picture to excite such sensations. "Ah," replied the painter, "take my eyes, and she will appear to you a goddess!" Zeuxis also painted an Assembly of the Gods, a picture of Hercules strangling the Serpent, and several other works, which are highly celebrated.

PARRHASIUS, the contemporary and rival of Zeuxis, was a native of Ephesus, and a disciple of Evenor. According to Pliny, he was the first who arrived at perfect symmetry in the proportion of his figures, gave them more relief and roundness, with an air of life and motion unknown before him. He was also particularly successful in the adjustment of the hair, and in giving a peculiarly beautiful expression to the features of his female figures. One of his principal works, representing a High Priest of the goddess Cybele, was afterwards purchased by the Emperor Tiberius, for sixty thousand sestertii. Pliny highly commends two pictures by Parrhasius, one representing a warrior running to the combat, the other a soldier taking off his armour. He also painted a celebrated picture of Theseus, which, in Pliny's time, was preserved in the Capitol at Rome; and another representing Meleager, Hercules, and Perseus, in one group, which was formerly at Rhodes.

Parrhasius was not less distinguished for his talents than remarkable for his vanity and arrogance. He styled himself the prince of painters, and asserted that he had carried the art to the highest possible perfection. He was always clothed in the most sumptuous attire, and pretended to be descended from Apollo. Notwithstanding this weakness and folly, Parrhasius cannot justly be denied the glory of having been one of the most accomplished painters of Greece.

TIMANTHES, the distinguished and successful competitor of Parrhasius, was, according to Quintilian, a native of Cythnus, in Attica, others say of Sicyon. He triumphed over Parrhasius in a picture painted in rivalry with that artist, representing Ajax disputing with Ulysses for the arms of Achilles. Born at a period of the art, when considerable progress had been made in expression, he devoted his studies particularly to that department, and was not less remarkable for his inventive faculties. Of this he gave ample proof in his celebrated picture of the Sacrifice of Iphigenia, rendered so famous by the orators and historians of antiquity. Having represented the spectators in different degrees of sadness, he had exhausted the expression of affliction in the figure of Menelaüs, her uncle, and finding that he was not able to give an expression worthy of the grief of Agamemnon, her father, he covered his face with a veil. The expressions of Pliny are remarkable: Patris ipsius vultum velavit, quam digne non poterat ostendere. It is well known that the ancients considered the expression of extreme grief as indecorous, and that, when they found themselves unable to repress the feelings of severe affliction, they concealed the face with the mantle. Consistently with this principle of decorum, Timanthes could not express the anguish of Agamemnon in a manner worthy of his character, but by covering him with a veil. Pliny appears to have weighed all his expressions. He observes, that the painter had exhausted in the other figures all the expression of sadness; but there is a great distance between sadness and the extremity of grief. Valerius Maximus expresses himself on this subject in a manner little consistent with the elevated ideas of propriety, which the Greeks had conceived of the art. That writer pretends, that Timanthes had represented Calchas sad, Ulysses afflicted, Ajax weeping, Menelaüs lamenting, and not being able to characterize the grief of the father, he covered his face with a veil. It is hardly credible, that a Grecian painter, who knew and respected the character of decency and propriety, would have represented these princes weeping and bewailing like slaves, who abandon themselves, without restraint, to all their passions and affections; or that he would have degraded personages of their rank, by a weakness which he would not have dared to bestow on the lowest Spartan woman.

EUPOMPUS. Of this painter, who was a native of Sicyon, tradition furnishes us with very scanty information. He was, however, unquestionably of great celebrity, and had the credit of being the founder of the Sicyonian school. Pliny only notices one picture by Eupompus, representing a conqueror in the Gymnastic combat, holding the palm of victory.

PAMPHILUS was a native of Amphipolis, in Macedonia, and a disciple of Eupompus. He flourished in the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, and has the reputation of being the first artist who united painting with the study of the Belles Lettres. He was well acquainted with the mathematics, which he considered so essentially necessary to the art, that he affirmed, that no painter could be perfect in it who was ignorant of them. From hence it may be inferred, that the painters of antiquity were not so totally ignorant of perspective as has been usually supposed. He distinguished himself among the painters of his time by an arrangement in his compositions, superior to whatever had been shown by his predecessors, and acquired so high a reputation, that some of the youth of the noblest families became his disciples. Such was the lustre and dignity to which he elevated the art, that by his influence an ordinance was first published at Sicyon, and afterwards made general throughout all Greece, by which painting was placed in the first rank among the liberal arts, was forbidden to be practised by slaves, and was only to be studied by persons of education and distinction. His pictures were usually of large dimensions, and his compositions more crowded with figures than was customary among the Grecian artists. One of his principal works represented the Battle of Phlius. He had the credit of having been the instructor of Apelles.

EUXENIDAS. This artist was less indebted for his reputation to his merit as a painter, than to having been the master of Aristides. ARISTIDES, the younger brother and pupil of Nicomachus, was a native of Thebes, and a contemporary of Pamphilus. According to Pliny, he was the first painter who succeeded in representing in the countenance the expression of the various passions of the human mind. Is omnium primus animum pinxit, et sensus humanos expressit, quæ vocant Græci ἄθη; idem perturbaciones. One of his most admired works was a picture representing a city stormed, and taken by assault, in which he introduced the mother of an infant mortally wounded in the bosom, and the child endeavouring to reach the breast. In the countenance of the dying parent was expressed, with infinite art, the utmost horror, lest her infant should imbibe her blood instead of her milk. He also painted a celebrated picture of a battle between the Greeks and Persians, containing upwards of a hundred figures, which was purchased by Mnason, the tyrant of Elatia, for a thousand mine, or about three thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds sterling. His picture of Bacchus and Ariadne was seen, at the time of Pliny, in the Temple of Ceres, at Rome; where was also preserved in the Capitol another work of Aristides, representing an old man teaching a child to play on the lyre.

APELLES. In the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, or about three hundred and thirty-two years before the Christian era, rose the great luminary of ancient art, in the person of Apelles. According to Pliny and Ovid, he was a native of the isle of Cos; by others he is said to have been born at Ephesus. He was a disciple of Pamphilus, and was probably of a distinguished family, as no student of mean birth was admitted into that school. Combining in himself all the excellences of the artists who had preceded him, and endowed with a genius capable of contending with the most arduous difficulties, he is generally supposed to have carried the art to the highest attainable perfection. He not only excelled in composition, design, and colouring, he also possessed an unbounded invention, was select and beautiful in his proportions and contours, and, above all, his figures were always distinguished by an unspeakable grace, which was peculiar to him, and which may be almost said to have been the effect of inspiration. No painter ever applied to the study of his art with more persevering assiduity than Apelles. He never permitted a day to pass without practising some branch of his art; hence originated the maxim, Nulla dies sine linea.

His extraordinary talents, and the polished accomplishments of his mind, secured him the patronage and esteem of Alexander the Great, whose portrait he drew several times, and received from that conqueror the exclusive privilege of painting his likeness. Among others, was a portrait of Alexander holding a thunderbolt, which was placed in the temple of Diana, at Ephesus, and was so admirably executed, that Plutarch reports that it used to be said there were two Alexanders, one invincible, the son of Philip; the other inimitable, the work of Apelles.

One of his most admired productions was a picture of Venus rising from the sea, called Venus Anadyomene, which Ovid has celebrated in his verses:

Si Venerem Cois nunquam pinxisset Apelles,
Mersa sub æquoreis illa lateret aquis.

Pliny asserts, that Alexander permitted his favourite mistress, the beautiful Campaspe, to sit to him for his Venus, and that the painter becoming enamoured of his model, the conqueror resigned her to his arms.* We are told by Ælian, in his Various History, that having painted a portrait of Alexander on horseback, which was not so much admired by the monarch as it deserved, a horse happened to be brought, which neighed at the sight of the horse in the picture, upon which Apelles is said to have addressed Alexander as follows: "Sire, it is plain that your horse is a better judge of painting than your Majesty." Bayle thinks this too rude and unmannerly to be ascribed to a painter who is represented as a man of an easy, complaisant, and polite behaviour. He must either have been a court buffoon, or a person of such odd eccentric humour, as has been sometimes met with among the most eminent artists.

It is, however, certain, that he frequently indulged in raillery. One of his disciples having shown him a picture of Helen which he had loaded with gold, "Young man," said the painter, "not being able to make thy Helen beautiful, thou hast resolved to make her rich."

One of the chief excellences of Apelles in portrait painting was to give so perfect a resemblance of the person represented, that the physiognomists were able to form a judgment as easily from his pictures as if they had seen the originals. This readiness and dexterity in taking a likeness was of singular utility to Apelles, in extricating him from a very perilous dilemma into which he was thrown, at the court of Ptolemy. When that prince reigned in Egypt, Apelles, who had not the good fortune to be in favour with Ptolemy, was driven by a storm into the port of Alexandria, where his enemies suborned a mischievous fellow, who was one of the king's buffoons, to play a trick upon him, by inviting Apelles, in the king's name, to supper. On his arrival, finding Ptolemy surprised, and not very well pleased with his visit, he apologized for his coming, by assuring the king that he should not have presumed to wait upon him, but by his own invitation.

Being required to point out the person who had thus imposed upon him, he sketched his portrait from memory, with a coal upon the wall, which Ptolemy instantly recognised to be his buffoon. This adventure reconciled him to Ptolemy, who afterwards loaded him with wealth and honours. These, however, far from blunting the shafts of envy, served only to point them with more inveterate poison.

Antiphilus, a painter of reputation, though greatly inferior to Apelles, who was then at the court of Ptolemy, accused him of having been implicated in the conspiracy of Theodotus, governor of Phœnicia, affirming that he had seen Apelles at dinner with Theodotus, and that, by the advice of that painter, the city of Tyre had revolted, and Pelusium had been taken. The accusation was totally groundless, Apelles never having been at Tyre, and having no acquaintance with Theodotus. Ptolemy, however, in the height of his resentment, without examining into the affair, concluded him guilty, and would have punished him with death, had not an accomplice of the conspirators declared his innocence, and proved that the accusation originated in the jealousy and malevolence of Antiphilus. Stung with confusion at having listened to so infamous a slander, Ptolemy restored Apelles to his favour, presented him with a hundred talents, to compensate the injury he had sustained, and condemned Antiphilus to be his slave.

On his return to Greece, as a memorial of the persecution, and to avenge himself of his enemies, Apelles painted an allegorical picture representing Calumny, in which he seems to have exerted all his inventive faculties. Of this ingenious composition, Lucian has furnished us with the following description: "On the right of the picture was seated a person of magisterial authority, to whom the painter had given large ears, like those of Midas, who held forth his hand to Calumny, as if inviting her to approach. He is attended by Ignorance and Suspicion, who are placed by his side. Calumny advanced in the form of a beautiful female, her countenance and demeanour exhibiting an air of fury and hatred. In one hand she held the torch of Discord, and with the other dragged by the hair a youth, personifying Innocence, who, with eyes raised to heaven, seemed to implore the succour of the gods. She was preceded by Envy, a figure with a pallid visage and an emaciated form, who appeared to be the leader of the band. Calumny was also attended by two other figures, who seemed to excite and animate her, whose deceitful looks discovered them to be Intrigue and Treachery. At last followed Repentance, clothed in black, and covered with confusion, at the discovery of Truth in the distance, environed with celestial light." Such was the ingenious fiction which indicated the vengeance of Apelles, and which may be regarded as one of the most admirable examples of emblematical painting that the history of the art affords. Raffaëlle made a drawing from Lucian's description of this picture, which was formerly in the collection of the Duke of Modena, and was afterwards placed in the French Museum.

It was customary with Apelles to exhibit his pictures publicly, not for the purpose of being flattered with the incense of applause, but with an intention of profiting by whatever just criticism might be made on the work. That the public might feel themselves at liberty to express their sentiments freely, he usually concealed himself behind a panel, that his presence might not be a restraint on the expression of their judgment. On one of these occasions, a cobbler found fault with some incorrectness in the representation of a slipper, and Apelles, convinced of the judicious observation of the artisan, made the necessary alteration. The picture being again offered to public view in its improved state, the cobbler, proud of the success of his first criticism, ventured to find fault with the leg, when Apelles, discovering himself, addressed to him the well-known sentence which has since become proverbial, Ne sutor ultra crepidam. The modesty of this great painter was not less worthy of admiration than his extraordinary talents. Far from being jealous of his contemporaries, he not only extolled their merit, but, favoured as he was by fortune, made use of his wealth in promoting the interest of his rivals. His generous conduct to Protogenes is generally known, and will be more particularly noticed in the account of that painter.

PROTOGENES was a native of Caunus, a city of Caria, subject to the Rhodians. It is not known of whom he was a disciple, but it is probable that he received his instruction from some obscure artist, or that he formed his style by studying the works of the painters who had preceded him. It is certain that for some time he practised ship-painting for a livelihood, that the early part of his life was passed in indigence and obscurity, and that he was considerably advanced in years before he became known as an artist. One of his principal pictures, and which has been celebrated by several writers, represented the hunter Jalisus with his Dog, which was long preserved in the Temple of Peace at Rome. It is said that this picture was the means of saving the city of Rhodes, when it was besieged by Demetrius, who, finding that the place was only assailable on that side on which was the house of Protogenes, the king chose rather to abandon his conquest, than to destroy so admirable a work of art. The atelier of Protogenes was situated without the walls of the city, where, to the astonishment of the besiegers, he continued to paint with the most perfect tranquillity and indifference, amidst the clang of war and the shouts of the soldiers. This circumstance being made known to Demetrius, he ordered the artist to be brought to his tent, when he demanded how he could persist in the quiet exercise of his profession when surrounded by the enemies of his country? Protogenes replied, that he did not consider himself to be in any danger, as he was convinced that a great prince like Demetrius did not wage war against the arts, but against the Rhodians. It was during these hostilities that he painted his famous picture of a Satyr playing on a Flageolet. Another admired work of Protogenes was a subject taken from the Odyssey, representing Nausicaa driving a chariot drawn by mules.

Notwithstanding the distinguished talents of Protogenes, his fellow citizens were either insensible of his merit, or were more than usually parsimonious in the remuneration he received for his works. He lived in extreme poverty, until the generosity of Apelles, his competitor, roused the Rhodians from the indifference they had shown to his talents. When that great painter visited Rhodes, he was struck with admiration on seeing the works of Protogenes, and declared that nothing could surpass them. He demanded what price he put upon his pictures, and the painter of Rhodes having named an inconsiderable sum, Apelles, indignant at the injustice done to such admirable productions, paid him fifty talents for one picture, announcing publicly, that he would make it pass and sell it as his own. This liberality opened the eyes of his fellow citizens, who from that time held his works in the highest estimation.

EUPHRANOR. According to Pliny, this painter flourished in the hundred and fourth olympiad, or about three hundred and sixty-four years before Christ; a date, which can neither be reconciled with tradition, nor with what Pliny himself advances on other occasions. He also places Euphranor in the first rank among the artists who appeared after Pausias, who was younger than Apelles. It is, therefore, more consistent with chronology to suppose that Euphranor flourished about the hundred and fiftieth olympiad, or about three hundred and twenty years before the vulgar era. He was a native of the isthmus of Corinth, and not only distinguished himself as a painter, but excelled as a statuary, both in marble and metals. He gave a peculiar dignity to his heroes, and though Pliny extols him for an exact symmetry in his proportions, by an apparent contradiction, he informs us, that the bodies of his figures were too delicate, and the heads too large. He is said, however, to have written a treatise on symmetry. One of his principal paintings at Athens was the Battle of Mantinea, which is highly applauded by Pausanias and Plutarch. He also painted a picture of Theseus, with which he was so satisfied, that in comparing it with one of the same hero, painted by Parrhasius, he exultingly observed, that "the Theseus of Parrhasius appeared to have been fed on roses, and his with flesh."

MELANTHUS is mentioned by Quintilian, Pliny, and Plutarch, as a disciple of Pamphilus. Like his instructor, he excelled in the chaste propriety of his compositions. His school was frequented by numerous disciples, and he wrote some treatises on the art.

ASCLEPIODORUS was a contemporary of Apelles, and his works were particularly admired by that great painter, for the exact symmetry of his proportions. The esteem of Apelles, and his own merit, occasioned his works to be purchased at very large prices. And Pliny reports, that he painted twelve pictures of the Gods for Mnason, the tyrant of Elatea, for which he was paid three hundred minæ, or about nine hundred pounds for each.

NICOPHANES. This painter is ranked by Pliny among the most eminent artists of his time. He possessed a lively genius, and was not less ready in his invention than prompt in his operation. He was surnamed "the painter of courtesans," as he frequently made choice of them for his models, which is the more probable, as they were generally the most beautiful women in Greece.

NICOMACHUS was a native of Thebes, and the brother of Aristides. Of all the painters of antiquity, he was the most remarkable for the extraordinary facility of his pencil, a promptness which did not however diminish the beauty of his productions; and Plutarch compares the readiness with which he operated to that of Homer in the composition of his verses. Aristratus, the tyrant of Sicyon, having engaged him to decorate with his paintings a monument he intended to consecrate to the memory of the poet Telestus, a particular day was fixed when it was expected to be finished. The period had nearly elapsed before the painter had commenced his work, when Aristratus, irritated by his apparent neglect, threatened to punish him severely; but Nicomachus accomplished his undertaking within the limited time, and with as much beauty as promptitude.

Among his principal works was a picture of the Rape of Proserpine, which was for a long time preserved in the Capitol at Rome. At the time of his death he left imperfect a picture of Helen, called Tyndarides, which was held in such admiration, that no painter who succeeded had the boldness to attempt to finish it.

PHILOXENES, a native of Eretria, was a disciple of Nicomachus, and adopted the expeditious style of his instructor. According to Pliny, he painted for Cassander, a picture representing the Defeat of Darius by Alexander, which was esteemed one of his most considerable works.

PERSEUS was a disciple of Apelles, and though greatly inferior to his master, he may be presumed to have possessed considerable talents, as he was favoured with the particular esteem of that admirable painter, who addressed to him a treatise he wrote on the art.

PAUSIAS. This painter was a native of Sicyon, and was first instructed in the art by his father, Bries, but afterwards became a disciple of Pamphilus. He was the first artist of antiquity who introduced the painting of ceilings, which, previous to his time, had never been decorated in that manner. He also painted pictures of a small size, and was particularly successful in the representation of children. Some of his rival artists pretended that he made choice of those subjects as best suited to the slow and laboured style of his execution. To contradict the calumny, and to prove that he was capable of more spirited exertions, he finished in one day a large picture representing the infant Hercules. In his youth, he became enamoured of Glycera, the beautiful garland-maker; and one of his most admired works was a portrait of his mistress holding a garland. A copy of this picture was purchased at Athens, by Lucius Lucullus, for two talents. He also excelled in painting animals.

ÆTION. It is not without considerable uncertainty that this painter is here placed among the contemporaries of Apelles, Protogenes, and Nicomachus. Pliny takes no notice of Ætion, although he was an artist of great reputation; and we are only supported in the presumption that he lived at that particular period by a passage in Cicero, in which he mentions him with those distinguished painters, without, however, informing us that they were coetaneous. If the authority of Cicero does not sufficiently establish that Ætion lived at the same period with Apelles, and the great artists above-mentioned, the manner in which he is noticed by him, warrants his being placed among the ablest painters of Greece. Similis in pictura ratio est, in qua Zeuxim, et Polygnotum, et Timanthem, et earum qui non sunt usi plus quam quatuor coloribus, formas et lineamenta laudamus; at in Ætione, Nicomacho, Protogene, Apelle, jam perfecta sunt omnia.—(De clar. orat.)

The testimony of Cicero is supported by that of Lucian. That writer proposes as a model of perfection in the graceful style a picture by Ætion, representing the Nuptials of Alexander with Roxana. This picture had been exhibited at the Olympic games, and excited such admiration in the minds of the judges, that Proxinedes, the principal arbiter, exclaimed in the midst of the assembly, "I reserve crowns for the heads of the Athlete, but I give my daughter in marriage to the painter Ætion, as a recompence for his inimitable picture." Pliny places Apelles, and some of his contemporaries, amongst the painters who only employed four colours. This opinion is at least combated, if not rendered nugatory, by what is asserted by Cicero. Cicero was a zealous lover of the arts, had visited Greece, where he had seen, and had purchased, the works of the most celebrated artists, and if he did not possess a profound acquaintance with painting, he was at least what is usually called a connoisseur. A more ample confidence may therefore be placed in his judgment than in that of Pliny, who is believed to have been no great admirer of the art, and who appears to have been chiefly led to notice painting when he arrived at that part of his great work, which made it necessary for him to treat of the materials used by painters, as they were connected with natural history.

CRÆSILOCHUS was a disciple of Apelles, and is chiefly remarkable for the singular manner in which he treated one of his principal works, representing the Birth of Bacchus.

ARISTOLAUS. This painter was a native of Athens, and a disciple of Pausias. He was celebrated among the painters of his time for the severity of his style; from which we may infer, that he united a purity of form with a strict simplicity in his compositions. His pictures were usually confined to a single figure, and he made choice of those eminent personages whose memory was endeared to their country by their virtue and great exploits. Among these were Theseus, Epaminondas, and Pericles.

MECROPHANES was also a disciple of Pausias. His manner was dry and hard, but this defect was in a great degree compensated by a rigid correctness of design, which was duly appreciated by the artists.

ARTEMON. This artist is introduced about this period, as Pliny informs us that he painted a picture of Queen Stratonice; as it may be presumed that he painted her from life, and that it was the same Stratonice who was married to Seleucus about three hundred years before our era. He also painted a picture of Hercules and Dejanira; but his most celebrated works were the pictures which were carried to Rome, and were placed in the Octavian Portico, representing Hercules received amongst the Gods; and the history of Laomedon with Apollo and Neptune.

CLESSIDES. Although this artist is not spoken of as a painter of very distinguished talents, yet he may be presumed not to have been destitute of merit, from the celebrity he acquired by the outrageous insult he offered to Stratonice, the queen of Antiochus. Piqued at not being treated by her with the distinction which he thought he merited, he painted a picture of her in the arms of a fisherman, whom rumour gave to her as a paramour, and placing it in the most public part of the port of Ephesus, he immediately embarked. Notwithstanding the insolence of such a procedure, Stratonice would not suffer the picture to be destroyed, such was the exact resemblance the artist had given both to herself and the object of her affection.

THEODORUS, a native of Athens, was a painter of considerable celebrity. Among his principal works were the following: Clytemnestra and Ægistus slain by Orestes; several pictures of the events of the Trojan war, which were afterwards taken to Rome, and placed in the Philipian Portico; and a Cassandra, preserved formerly in the Temple of Concord. There are several other artists of antiquity of the same name, both painters and sculptors, mentioned by Pliny and Diogenes Laërtius.

NEACES. This painter is supposed to have flourished about two hundred and fifty years before the Christian era. He is said to have possessed a lively genius, and an accurate judgment. Being engaged to paint a picture of a combat between the Persians and Egyptians of the Nile, and being apprehensive that river might be mistaken for the sea, he introduced a mule drinking on the border of the Nile, and a crocodile ready to attack it. An episode by which he clearly indicated the scene of the action.

CYDIAS was a native of Cythnus, and may be presumed to have been a painter of considerable ability; as one of his pictures, representing Jason and his followers embarking for Colchis, in search of the Golden Fleece, was purchased at Rome by the orator Hortensius for forty-four thousand sesterii, which was afterwards bought by Marcus Agrippa, and placed in the Portico of Neptune, to commemorate his naval victories.

ANTIDOTUS was a disciple of Euphranor, and was more remarkable for the laborious finishing of his pictures, than for the ingenuity of his invention. His colouring was cold, and his outline hard and dry. Among the few of his pictures which have been noticed, were a Warrior ready for Combat; a Wrestler; and a Man playing on the Flute.

NICIAS. This painter was a native of Athens, and a disciple of Antidotus. Nicias not only surpassed his instructor, but was one of the most celebrated artists of his time. He painted women with great success: and Pliny reports that he was well acquainted with the principles of light and shadow, and gave an extraordinary relief to his figures. One of his most admired works represented Ulysses invoking the shadows of the dead, as described by Homer. For this picture Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered him sixty talents, about eleven thousand pounds; but such was the patriotism of the painter, that he refused the offer, and made a present of the picture to his country. It may be proper to remark, that the liberality of his fellow citizens had enabled him thus to indulge his patriotism, as he had become extremely rich by the bountiful remuneration he received for his works. At the time of Pliny, a picture of Bacchus, by Nicias, was preserved in the Temple of Concord at Rome.

ATHENION was a native of Maronea, in Thrace, and was a disciple of Glaucion, of Corinth, a painter of whom no other mention is made. He appears to have been a contemporary of Nicias, as his works are compared by Pliny to those of that painter, and without any disparity. Though his colouring was more austere than that of Nicias, it was not less agreeable. He painted a picture of Phylarchus the historian, for the Temple of Eleusis; and at Athens, Achilles discovered by Ulysses disguised as a Girl. Pliny assures us, that if he had not died young, no artist would have surpassed him.

PAINTING AMONG THE ETRUSCANS.

THE arts in general, and painting in particular, appear to have been practised in Etruria at a very remote period; and Winckelmann thinks it probable that the Etruscans had made considerable progress in the arts dependent on design, before their communication with Greece. The same inference may be drawn from some passages in the Roman authors, though the evidence of no Etruscan writer on art has been handed down to us. It is probably not without foundation, that the Romans have been accused of having endeavoured to destroy every vestige or monument which they found in the countries they overran, that no traces might be left of the antiquity of the neighbouring nations. This jealousy is in some degree corroborated by the silence of their writers, who appear only to have preserved the names of the vanquished people as triumphal trophies, and not for the purpose of making posterity acquainted with the state of their civilization, or the arts which they had cultivated, long before Romulus and his associates came to establish themselves on the banks of the Tiber.

Pliny, indeed, admits, that at Cære, in Etruria, and at Ardea and Lanuvium, in Latium, there existed in his time some paintings which attracted the admiration of the curious, and which were more ancient than the foundation of Rome. In the third chapter of the 35th book of his Natural History, he thus expresses himself: "I cannot contemplate without astonishment those paintings at Cære, which appear recent and fresh, after so many ages. The same may be said of the Atalanta and the Helen, which are seen in a ruined temple at Lanuvium. The artist has represented Atalanta naked, and both the figures are of exquisite beauty."

It had long been regretted, that the ravages of time, and the devastation of Italy, had deprived us of every vestige of the paintings of the Etruscans, when the Padre Paciaudi, a Theatine monk, discovered, near the ancient Tarquinia, formerly belonging to Etruria, several tombs decorated with paintings. He communicated this interesting discovery to the Count de Caylus, in a letter from Rome in 1760, in which he informed him that in the environs of Tarquinia are found a great number of small grotts, which had served as tombs, which were decorated with paintings on the pilasters and friezes. An exact description of some of them, with plates, has been published by Mr. Byres.

Winckelmann also speaks of the paintings found in the tombs near Tarquinia; many of the friezes represent combats and assassinations, others appear to relate to the doctrine of the Etruscans on the state of the soul after death.

From the few remains of Etruscan painting which have escaped destruction, it may be inferred that in Etruria, as in every other country, the art was nearly in the same state of rudeness in its infancy; and that at a more advanced epoch, when it began to assume a national feature, it was marked with a similar character to that which was preserved in Tuscany after the revival of the art; that it was more distinguished by grandeur than beauty, and by energy rather than grace.

PAINTING AMONG THE ROMANS.

FROM what has been said in the account of the Greek painters, it will be seen that many of their most celebrated works were transported to Rome, for the embellishment of their temples and public edifices; and we might from thence be naturally led to conclude, that painting was successfully practised and patronized among the Romans, at an early period of the republic. On inquiry, however, it will be found that for upwards of four centuries after the foundation of Rome, the Romans were occupied in pursuits very different from the cultivation of the elegant arts; and it is certain that Rome was indebted to the Etruscans for whatever she possessed in the first ages of the republic, either of sculpture, painting, or architecture.

Declared enemies of repose, they considered peace among the greatest of public calamities; and so far from contributing to the progress of science, or the perfection of any liberal art, they conceived glory to consist solely in amassing spoils amidst carnage and devastation. Bent on the conquest of distant countries, as well as those of the neighbouring nations, the triumphs of the Roman eagle were to them more worthy objects of pursuit than the most successful cultivation of the arts. When, indeed, their dominion had extended itself by a continued succession of conquests, and the ambitious pride of their consuls gratified itself, in their triumphs, by an ostentatious display of the spoils of subjugated nations, the productions of art of the different countries they had vanquished, particularly the Greeks, became the trophies which the vain-glory of the conqueror presented to a ferocious people, who had neither "an eye to see, nor a taste to feel their perfection." Even the conquerors themselves regulated their value of these productions of genius and taste rather by the estimation in which they were held by the people who had been plundered of them, than the discriminating judgment of the spoliator. The glory of their arms, and the aggrandizement of their dominion, were the great objects of Roman ambition, and this picture of their policy is even corroborated by the most distinguished of their poets :

Tu regere imperio populos, Romane, memento :
Hæ tibi erunt artes ; pacique imponere morem,
Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos.—VIRGIL.

Impressed with such ideas, it is not to be wondered at that no painter of celebrity appeared at any epoch among the Romans, whose artists were few, and those of decided inferiority.

Previous to the four hundred and fiftieth year after the founding of Rome, we have no tradition of Roman painting. About that period, FABIVS, a noble patrician, executed some paintings in the Temple of Health, on the Quirinal Mount, by which he acquired the denomination of Pictor, which descended to his family. These pictures existed until the reign of Claudius, when that temple was destroyed by fire. They were probably held in little estimation, as Pliny, to whom they must have been known, neither acquaints us with the subjects, nor commends the execution. That painting was then little respected by the Romans, and that the title of pictor was not considered as an honourable distinction, may be inferred from a passage of Cicero, in the first book of his Tusculanes. An censemus si Fabio nobilissimo homini laudatum esset quod pingeret, non multos etiam apud nos Polycletos et Parrhasios fuisse. It therefore appears that the art was held in little estimation, and that the title of pictor was rather intended to stigmatize the illustrious character who had degraded his dignity, by the practice of an art which was held in no consideration. Thus we find that the art of painting was neither esteemed nor patronized in the four hundred and fiftieth year of Rome.

The example of Fabius does not appear to have been followed by any of his contemporaries ; for we find a chasm of nearly a hundred and fifty years before any mention is made of another Roman painter, when PACUVIVS, the poet, showed his talent in the sister art in some paintings he executed in the Temple of Hercules, in the Forum Boarium. It is probable that the celebrity he had justly acquired as a tragic writer, gave a greater degree of interest to his paintings than their merit would otherwise have excited. Yet his productions do not appear to have placed the art on a more honourable footing : as Pliny informs us, that after Pacuvius the pencil was no longer to be found in respectable hands. His expression is remarkably significant, in honestis manibus. It must be allowed that the works of Fabius Pictor, and Pacuvius, could not reasonably be expected to excite a national enthusiasm in favour of an art which they only exercised as an amusement. The paintings of Fabius were the recreations of his youth ; those of Pacuvius, the diversions of his old age. But painting is a difficult and arduous art, which requires the undivided exercise of all the powers of man, and to excel in which, the most protracted period of human existence is hardly found to be adequate.

After the dissolution of the Roman republic had terminated in the establishment of the empire, and when the stern ferocity which characterized the commonwealth had yielded to softer and more polished manners, together with the cultivation of literature, it might have been expected that a more prevalent taste for painting would have discovered itself, particularly as sculpture and architecture excited a considerable degree of patronage and admiration. We find, however, from the testimony of Pliny, who certainly was not backward in giving to Rome her full share of credit in every thing relative to the arts, that from the time of Augustus to that of Vespasian, a space of about eighty years, the number of painters mentioned by that writer does not exceed seven or eight, and the majority of those of very subordinate consideration.

ARELIUS. This artist was of some celebrity at Rome a short time before the reign of Augustus. From the manner in which he is mentioned by Pliny, he must have possessed considerable ability. That writer reproaches him severely for having selected, as the models for his goddesses, the most celebrated courtesans of his time ; a reproach which he never thought of making to some of the greatest artists of Greece, who constantly availed themselves of the same practice.

LVDIVS. He distinguished himself in the reign of Augustus as a painter of views, landscapes, marines, &c., which he embellished with figures. He was the first Roman artist who painted in fresco, and he was chiefly employed in decorating the walls of the villas and country-houses, in which he is said to have excelled.

AMVLIVS. This painter flourished in the reign of Nero, who is reported by Suetonius to have himself studied the art. He was principally employed by that emperor in the embellishment of his house of gold. His works, with the palace, became a prey to the flames. Pliny represents him as a painter of low, common subjects, humilis rei pictor ; yet he mentions, as one of his principal works, a picture of Minerva, which cannot be considered as a humble or ordinary subject.

TURPILIVS, a Roman knight, painted some pictures, which were formerly at Verona. The only information Pliny affords us respecting this artist is, that he painted with the left hand.

ANTISTIVS LABEO, who had been prætor, and even proconsul of the province of Narbonne, is said to have amused himself with painting small pictures, which, instead of exciting public admiration, only brought on him the ridicule and contempt of his contemporaries. He died at an advanced age, in the reign of Vespasian.

CORNELIVS PINVS and ACCIVS PRISCVS flourished under Vespasian, and were employed by him in the Temple of Virtue and Honour, which that emperor caused to be repaired. The latter is said to have approached nearer to the manner of the ancients than his competitor.

Such is the scanty catalogue of the painters of Imperial Rome, and such the miserable ebb to which the art of painting had sunk, previous to the establishment of the Eastern empire. Nor could the magnificence and taste of the founder of Constantinople re-elevate the art from the wretched state into which it had declined. The successors of Constantine had little leisure to attend to the cultivation of the arts. Disastrous events were hastening, which threatened the existence of their dominion, and which terminated in the downfall of the empire.

If the art of painting can be said to have existed during the dark ages which succeeded, it will be found to have slumbered in a state of degradation in the cells of the Greek monks, until its revival in Italy, in the thirteenth century.

ON THE EXCELLENCE AND UTILITY OF ENGRAVING.

WHEN we consider the amusement and information which may be derived from the contemplation of prints, it becomes matter of surprise that the number of collectors has not been more considerable. Of late, however, they have been very extensively increased.

It requires the possession of an affluent fortune to be enabled to form a respectable cabinet of paintings; and it is further necessary that the purchaser should possess a cultivated taste and a discriminating judgment, which are not easily acquired, to avoid the danger of imposition. But a knowledge of prints is obtained with more facility, and the acquisition of them is practicable to almost every age or condition of life; as the indulgence of this curiosity, when kept within the bounds of discretion, may be reasonably gratified, without either inconvenience or imprudence; and a collection so formed will be found of universal utility.

Prints are known to be particularly useful in the instruction of youth, from the lively impression they stamp on the imagination, as well as the agreeable recreation they afford; and that impression will not only be more prompt, but will be probably more forcible and permanent than any that can be communicated by speech. In old age, when the pleasures and amusements of youth are forgotten, or become insipid and indifferent; amidst infirmities and debility, how acceptable a resource must it afford to be able to turn over the contents of a portfolio, which recall to the mind ideas and objects which had been effaced from the memory, and of which the variety of subjects, and the beauty of the execution, dissipate ennui, and enliven the spirits. The following admirable reflections on the usefulness and value of engravings were sent to Mr. Strutt, previous to the publication of his Dictionary. They are the observations of a gentleman of acknowledged taste, a man of science, and a lover of the arts, to whom the world has since been indebted for two most interesting works, respecting Italian biography and literature.*

“Of all the imitative arts, painting itself not excepted, engraving is the most applicable to general use, and the most resorted to from the necessities of mankind. From its earliest infancy, it has been called in as an assistant in every branch of knowledge, and has, in a very high degree, facilitated the means of communicating our ideas, by representing to the sight whatever is capable of visible imitation, and thereby preventing that circumlocution which would ill explain, in the end, what is immediately conceived from the actual representation of the object.

“From the facility of being multiplied, prints have derived an advantage over paintings, by no means inconsiderable. They are found to be more durable, which may, however, in some degree, be attributed to the different methods in which they are preserved. Many of the best paintings of the early masters have generally had the misfortune to be either painted on walls, or deposited in large and unfrequented, and consequently damp and destructive buildings; whilst a print, passing, at distant intervals, from the porte-feuille of one collector to that of another, is preserved, without any great exertion of its owner. Hence it happens, that whilst the pictures of Raffaele have mouldered from their walls, or deserted their canvass, the prints of his friend and contemporary, Marc Antonio Raimondi, continue in full perfection to this day, and give us a lively idea of the beauties of those paintings, which, without their assistance, had been lost to us for ever, or at least could have only been known to us, like those of Zeuxis and Apelles, by the descriptions which former writers on these subjects have left us.

“Perhaps there are no representations which interest so strongly the curiosity of mankind as portraits. A high degree of pleasure, of which almost every person is susceptible, is experienced from contemplating the looks and countenances of those men, who, by their genius or their virtues, have entitled themselves to the admiration and esteem of future ages. It is only in consequence of the facility with which prints are multiplied from the same engraving, that this laudable appetite is so frequently gratified. Whilst the original portrait is limited to the wall of a private chamber, or adorns some distant part of the world, a correct transcript of it, exhibiting the same features, and the same character, gives to the public at large the full representation of the object of their veneration or esteem.

“As the genuine paintings of the ancient masters are become extremely scarce, we are much indebted to prints for the truth of our ideas respecting the merits of such masters; and this is no bad criterion, especially when the painter, as is frequently the case, has left engravings or etchings of his own. With respect to the principal excellences of a picture, a print is equally estimable with a painting. We have there every perfection of design, composition, and drawing; and the outline is frequently marked with a precision which excels the picture; so that where the merit of the master consists more particularly in the knowledge of those primary branches of the art, his prints may be better than his paintings, as was notoriously the case with Pietro Testa, who, possessed of every excellence of a painter, except a knowledge of the art of colouring, acquired that reputation by his etchings which his paintings never could have procured him.

“A knowledge of the style and manner of the different masters is only to be obtained by a frequent inspection and comparison of their works. If we were to judge of Raffaele himself from some of his pictures, we should be disposed to refuse our assent to that praise which he has now for some centuries enjoyed. Every master has at times painted below his usual standard, and consequently is not to be judged of by a single picture. And where is the collection that affords sufficient specimens of any of the elder masters, to enable a person to become a complete judge of their merits? Can we, from a few pictures, form an adequate idea of the invention and imagination of a painter, of the inexhaustible variety of form and feature, which is the true characteristic of superior excellence? But let us look into a collection of prints after any eminent artist, engraved either by himself or others, and we shall then have an opportunity of judging of his merits in the first and indispensable qualifications of a painter. If we find grandeur of design united with elegant composition and accurate drawing, we have the strongest testimony of superior abilities, and from a general comparison and accurate observation of a number of such prints, we may venture to form to ourselves a decisive opinion respecting the merit of such masters. On examining the prints after Raffaele, we find that his first manner was harsh and Gothic; in short, a transcript from Perugino, but that he afterwards adopted that sublime and graceful manner, which he ever retained.

"Wherever a painter has himself handled the graver, his prints are most generally impressed with the same character as his paintings, and are therefore likely to give us a very accurate idea of his style. The prints of Albert Durer, Rembrandt, and Salvator Rosa, are all such exact counterparts of their paintings, that at this time, when the colouring of their pictures is often so far changed, as to answer little further purpose than that of light and shadow, they become in a manner their rivals; and, in the general acceptation of the world, the prints of some of these artists have been as highly valued as their paintings.

"Independent of the advantages prints afford us, when considered as accurate representations of paintings, and imitations of superior productions, they are no less valuable for their positive merit, as immediate representations of nature. For it must be recollected, that the art of engraving has not always been confined to the copying other productions, but has frequently itself aspired to originality, and has in this light produced more instances of excellence than in the other. Albert Durer, Goltzius, and Rembrandt, amongst the Dutch and Germans; Parmigiano and Della Bella, amongst the Italians; and Callot amongst the French; have published many prints, the subjects of which were never painted. These prints may therefore be considered as original pictures of those masters, deficient only in those particulars in which a print must necessarily be inferior to a painting.

"The invention of printing, in the fifteenth century, was undoubtedly the greatest acquisition which mankind ever made towards the advancement of general science. Before that event, the accumulated wisdom of ages was confined to the leaves of a few mouldering manuscripts, too expensive to be generally obtained, and too highly valued to be often trusted out of the hands of the owner. History affords many instances of the difficulty with which even the loan of a book was procured, and of sureties being required to be answerable for its return; but the discovery of printing broke down the barriers which had so long obstructed the diffusion of learning; and the rapid progress in civilization, which immediately took place, is itself the happiest testimony of the great utility of the invention. What printing has been, with respect to general science, engraving has been to the arts; and the works of the old Italian artists will be indebted to engraving for that perpetuity which the invention of printing has secured to the Jerusalem of Tasso, and the tragedies of Shakspeare and Corneille."

ON THE ORIGIN OF ENGRAVING.

As it is foreign to the present publication to treat of the antiquity of engraving, as it relates to gems, precious stones, or even medals, which may be said more properly to belong to sculpture, we shall confine ourselves to an inquiry into the origin of the invention of taking off impressions on paper, from blocks of wood, or plates of metal, which led to the production of prints.

As the discovery of engraving on wood is generally allowed to have been anterior to that on copper, it may fairly claim a priority of attention.

The generally received opinion is, that the art of engraving on wood was first practised in Germany by what were called formschneiders, or cutters of forms or models, who were employed by the *briefmaler*s, or card-painters, to carve the outlines of the figures on wood to be stamped upon the paper, to save the trouble of making a separate drawing for every card, which were afterwards coloured with the hand.

The researches of the German antiquaries have sufficiently established that cards were in use in that country as early as the year 1300. But if the report of Papillon could be esteemed deserving of credit, engraving on wood must have existed fifteen or sixteen years previous to that period, as he mentions eight engravings on wood, an account of which he had received from a Swiss officer. According to the title, they represented the warlike actions of Alexander the Great, and were executed by Alexander Alberic Cunio, and his sister, dedicated to Pope Honorius IV., who only filled the papal chair two years, 1284 and 1285. As the authenticity of this account of Papillon, who had never seen them, rests solely on the report of a Swiss officer, it has not been thought entitled to much attention.

These *briefmaler*s, or card-painters, not only made and sold all sorts of playing cards, but stamped and illuminated various images of saints: and it is the opinion of M. Breitkopf, in his Treatise on Engraving on Wood, that the impression of these images preceded that of the playing cards. According to Baron Heineken, there are preserved in several of the celebrated libraries in Germany, particularly in that of Wolfenbuttel, many of these images of saints, engraved on wood, and illuminated. In the convent of the Carthusians at Buxheim, in Suabia, a monastery of great antiquity, is preserved one of these images, representing St. Christopher, with the infant Jesus on his shoulders, traversing an arm of the sea; the Saint is preceded by a Hermit holding a lantern, and followed by a Peasant carrying a sack. This print is of a folio size, and is engraved on wood, and illuminated in the same manner as the playing cards. The following inscription, in Gothic letters, is at the bottom of the print, Christoferi faciam, die quacunque tueris. Illa nempe die morte mala non morieris. Millesimo CCCC° XX° tertio. It is, therefore, proved by this print, that images of saints, with inscriptions, were engraved on wood as early as the year 1423.

To these images of saints, succeeded subjects of sacred history, accompanied by explanations, also cut in wood. Thus we are furnished with the origin of books printed with blocks of wood, and it is a very generally received opinion, that it was this practice which gave John Guttenberg the first idea of the typographical art. Soon after the invention of printing, cuts, executed on wood, were used as the embellishment of books. The names of the first engravers who wrought in that way have not reached us, and are supposed to have been confounded with those of the printers. Among the artists who are known to us, and who may be placed amongst the earliest engravers on wood, are Jorg Schapff, who flourished as early as the year 1448; and Jacob Walch, the supposed master of Michael Wolgemut. From this period, the artists who succeeded will be found in their respective places in the body of the work.

It is surprising that the ancients, who excelled in engraving on gems, precious stones, and even on metal, from a very remote period of antiquity, should have remained for so many ages ignorant of the invention of taking off impressions from the works they executed. It was not, however, before the middle of the fifteenth century, an epoch distinguished by inventions so important to literature and the arts, that this interesting discovery appears to have been made.

The original invention of taking off impressions from engraved plates has been equally claimed by the Italians and the Germans. In support of the Italian pretensions, Vasari, in the life of Marc Antonio Raimondi, reports that Finiguerra, a Florentine goldsmith, accidentally made the discovery about the year 1460. For a particular account of this disputed invention, as well as the grounds on which the Germans build their claim to it, to avoid repetition, the reader is referred to the article Finiguerra in the Dictionary.

REMARKS ON THE DIFFERENT MODES OF ENGRAVING.

PRINTS, as well as paintings, may be divided into three general classes, historical and emblematical subjects, portraits, and landscapes, which will still admit of a subdivision.

The modes of engraving, ancient and modern, have within a few years greatly multiplied, and may be said at present to consist of the following:

Stroke engraving. This manner is effected by tracing the design upon the plate with a sharp tool, called the dry point, and the strokes, or lines, are cut on the copper with an instrument called the graver, or burin.

Etching. In etching, the traces are cut with a point, or needle, through a varnish, prepared for the purpose, and laid on the plate; and these strokes are corroded, or bitten, into the copper by aquafortis.

With the point and graver. In this, the most general mode of engraving, the subject is first etched, and afterwards finished with the graver. By this process the advantages of both are combined.

Mezzotinto. This style of engraving is executed by raising on the plate, with a toothed tool, a uniformly dark barb, or ground. The design being traced upon the plate, the light parts are scraped off by instruments, in proportion as the effect may require.

The above, being the four principal modes of engraving, call for more particular observations.

In the operation of the graver, we expect to find the strokes correct and decided. In etching, we discover an unembarrassed freedom of hand. In the united execution of the point and the graver, we have the advantage of both operations. And in mezzotinto it is required that the effect should be soft and mellow. From the form of the graver, every time it cuts into the metal it makes an angular incision, producing a firm and sharp line, except the stroke is extremely delicate, which requires to be traced with judgment and reflection, though not distinguished by great freedom of hand. On the contrary, an unrestrained liberty of execution is the characteristic of etching, in which the point runs playfully over the plate, without meeting with resistance, and follows, without effort, the slightest impulse of the hand. In this respect, etching may be said to be little different from drawing, and is effected with equal facility. But as the aquafortis does not bite equally, the lines cannot be so sharp as when cut with the graver; besides, it is difficult to give, by the simple operation of the point, that suitable accord to each part of the plate so essential to the harmony of the whole. The stroke engraver has in this a considerable advantage, in being able to increase or diminish the force at pleasure, by a stronger or more delicate trace. As stroke engraving and etching have equally their particular benefits and inconveniences, the art has been improved by a successful union, by which their advantages are increased, and their deficiency diminished. The generality of plates, both of historical and other subjects, are brought to a certain degree of forwardness by etching, and are afterwards finished with the graver; and when this process is executed with intelligence, it cannot fail to produce the happiest effect. It sometimes happens, indeed, that an etching, which only required to be partially touched on, and that in particular parts, with the graver, is, by want of judgment and dint of diligence, rendered heavy, laboured, and insipid.

In figures of a certain size, stroke engraving has a decided advantage over etching, in the expression of the muscles. The soft and delicate transition from light to shadow, so necessary in that respect, cannot be rendered with equal success with the point. Large plates in general require a force and power of execution, which is scarcely to be produced by the simple operation of the needle, and more particularly demand the vigorous aid of the graver. Etching, on the contrary, is more successful in giving effect to sketches or drawings slightly touched, in which the solidity of the graver would entirely take away that easy and spirited touch, which constitutes their greatest beauty and merit. But it is in landscape that its operation is most advantageously developed; in which the foliage, sky, ruins, distances, in short, every part of that charming branch of the art, requires the utmost lightness, as well as freedom of hand.

In mezzotinto, the operation is in direct opposition to that of stroke engraving, or etching: in the two latter, the object of the artist is to trace the shadows on the plate; in the former, his effect is produced by clearing the lights. The essential excellence of mezzotinto is mellowness, and it is from thence that it is peculiarly adapted to portraits and to historical subjects in which the figures are designed on a considerable scale. Perhaps no other branch of engraving surpasses or even equals mezzotinto in the softness of the carnations, the light floating of the hair, the folds of the draperies, the lustrous brilliancy of armour, and in the delicate imitation of the colouring of a picture. The talents of our ingenious countrymen have carried this interesting department of engraving to the highest possible perfection; their excellent productions have left those of every other country far behind, and are the admiration and delight of every lover of the art.

Engraving in dots without strokes is executed with the point upon the wax or ground, bitten in with the aquafortis, and afterwards harmonized with the graver, by the means of which instrument small dots are made. It is also frequently effected with the graver only, without the assistance of the point, particularly in the flesh and finer parts. This mode of engraving has also been practised in England with the most distinguished success.

Engraving in dots, called opus mallei. This mode is supposed to have been first practised by Janus Lutma. The design is first etched, and is afterwards harmonized with the dry point, performed with a small hammer, from which it takes its name.

Aquatinta. In this lately invented style of engraving, the outline is first etched, and afterwards a sort of wash is laid on, by means of the aquafortis, which is particularly prepared for that purpose.

By this mode of engraving, drawings in Indian ink, bistre, and other washes, are very successfully imitated.

On wood, performed by a single block. The design is traced on the wood with a pen, and those parts which should be white are carefully hollowed out. The block is afterwards printed by the letter-press printers. It is satisfactorily proved, that this, the earliest mode of engraving, led to the invention of printing.

On wood in different blocks. This particular style is called chiaro-scuro, and was designed to imitate the drawings of the old masters. It is performed with two, three, or more blocks, the first having the outline cut upon it, the second is reserved for the darker shadows; and the third for the shadows which terminate upon the lights: these are substituted in their turn, each print receiving an impression from each block.

On wood and on copper. In this mode the outline is engraved in a bold, dark style, on the copper; and two or more blocks of wood are used to produce the darker and lighter shadows, as above mentioned.

BRIEF EXPLICATION

SOME OF THE TERMS USED IN THE ART.

ACCESSORIES. There is scarcely a work of art in which, independent of the principal figures, there are not objects, which, without being indispensably necessary to the subject, essentially contribute to the beauty and perfection of the whole, and which are, in some degree, explanatory of the subject. For this purpose the artist makes choice of those circumstantial objects which are immediately relative to the action he is to represent, and which are the most proper to characterize it, by an indication of the time and place at which the event occurred. Such are, in the language of the art, called Accessories. By these means the painter supplies the place of poetical detail, by a substitution of picturesque representation; but these are always kept sufficiently subdued to prevent their distracting the attention of the spectator from the interest of the picture.

AËRIAL PERSPECTIVE. In defining aërial perspective it is to be observed, that it is not subject, as linear perspective is, to the strictness of rules, rigidly demonstrated. It indicates the degree of light which each object receives in a picture, from its proximity to, or distance from, the spectator. It is expressed by a degradation of tone, proportioned to the quantity and quality of the intermediate air that separates the object from the eye that regards it. But as that air is occasionally lighter or more dense, clearer or more vaporous, that degradation cannot always be the same, but is regulated by the scale of atmospheric purity; as in a fog, it will be more at the distance of a few feet, than in a clear sky at as many miles. There are some moments of ethereal brightness in which the distant objects appear unusually vigorous, so much so, as to be frequently considered, even when represented with the most perfect attention to truth, to be violent and unnatural. Such is frequently the case in the fine landscapes of Rubens and Titian. It is only by a strict attention to nature that the artist can succeed in the representation of aërial perspective; he will perceive that in degrading the tint, she (Nature) at the same time renders the outline more undecided, effaces angular precision, preserving only general forms, more or less explicit, as the air that surrounds them is loaded or light.

ALLEGORY. This term, as relative to the art, is a mode of communicating certain abstract ideas by the aid of symbolical figures, and is most frequently employed in fabulous or mythological representations. It is successfully used also in subjects taken from the poets, who have themselves made use of similar illusion. It sometimes happens, that when allegory is not treated with great address, the artist resembles the author of an enigma, with this difference, that the painter is desirous of being understood, whilst the enigmatist wishes to conceal his meaning. [No painter who is not essentially a poet should attempt allegory; if explanation is required, he has failed in his object.]

ANTIQUÉ. This word, originally an adjective, has, in its application to art, been adopted as a substantive, and is used to signify the precious relics of antiquity which remain to us in the statues, bassi rilievi, &c., which have been preserved to us from those remote ages in which the arts were carried to the highest perfection. This epoch of purity may be said to have existed in Greece from the time of Pericles till they reached their acmé, in the reign of Alexander.

Winckelmann assigns to Grecian art four styles: the ancient style, or that which preceded Phidias; the grand style, that which was established by that celebrated statuary, and immediately followed him; the graceful style was introduced by Praxiteles and Apelles; and the imitative was that which was followed by the crowd of undistinguished artists who succeeded, and who, finding themselves incapable of excelling their predecessors, sunk into an impotent and servile imitation.

It has been doubted whether the finest works of antiquity have descended to us, and the distinguished beauties we admire are confined to a very few celebrated statues, of which the Apollo of Belvidere, the Laocoon, the Antinous, the Torso, the Gladiator, and the Venus of Medicis, are the principal. These have been long the objects of our admiration, and the guide of the most distinguished artists. A profound study of the antique was the source from which Michael Angelo and Raffaele drew the perfection which has immortalized their names. [The Elgin Marbles in the British Museum form a treasury from which ample knowledge of the antique may be obtained.]

form, and by which it can exhibit all the various movements which the passions can excite in the human frame. This difficult, but essential effort of the art, demands a scrupulous propriety in the attitudes the painter employs in his work, and requires that the motion given to his figure is completely in character with the particular passion by which the personage is actuated. When Achilles is menaced with the loss of Briséis, it is not enough that rage darts from his eyes, every limb, the movement of the whole body, should participate in the feeling of the moment. The taste and judgment of the artist appears in making choice of those attitudes in his pictures which display, as far as circumstances will permit, the most beautiful delineation of the figure.

BACK-GROUND. This term is applied to the field or space of the picture which surrounds the figures in historical subjects or portraits; and to the different plans in the distances in landscape painting. The importance of an appropriate back-ground is not always sufficiently considered, except by artists, who, as Sir Joshua Reynolds observes, "are fully apprized how much the effect of the picture depends on it." It is of the greatest consequence that the back-ground should be in unison with the figures in tone, and that the objects introduced should be perfectly conformable to the history, and characteristically suited to the persons represented. Sometimes rich and embellished back-grounds are required, as in the splendid display of Asiatic pomp, in triumphs, and public festivals; at others, the solemnity of the subject demands an austere and unobtrusive simplicity, as in the generality of subjects of devotion, or those descriptive of any pathetic and affecting scene, in which nothing should appear that can diminish the interest inspired by the event.

BAMBOCCIALE. The Italians call by this name subjects representing fairs, drolleries, and village feasts. This appellation appears to have originated in the admiration excited at Rome by the works of Peter van Laer, a Dutch painter, who treated those subjects with great success, and who was nicknamed Bamboccio, on account of the extraordinary deformity of his body.

[BODEGONES. The Spanish term for pictures of inanimate objects, such as pieces of plate, metal and earthen vessels used for domestic purposes; also for those of dead game, fish, and fruit. Velasquez, in his early time, exercised his pencil in painting Bodegones, of which several fine specimens are preserved. It corresponds with the English term Still-life.]

BREADTH. Applied to composition, design, or the distribution of light and shadow, breadth conveys a certain idea of greatness, which is in direct opposition to the frivolous and the mean. Breadth, therefore, as it relates to art, partakes of the simple and the grand, and may be said to belong in a peculiar degree to the works of Coreggio. Grandeur is his character, breadth may be considered as his means. In the works of the great master we discover breadth, because he has considered his subject as a whole, without interrupting its general simplicity by a minute attention to subordinate parts. His masses of light and shadow are therefore broad and grand, producing one great and general effect; whereas, if they were scattered and broken, the effect would be spotty and discordant.

CARTOONS. The designs prepared by painters, intended to be executed in fresco, or wrought in tapestry. See FRESCO.

CHARGED. A term in art intended to express any thing that is outré, or extravagant. Simplicity and elegance, founded on correctness, forbid, in the general exercise of the art, every thing that is excessive or exaggerated; every thing, in fact, that is not strictly proportioned to the perfection of nature. Yet there are circumstances in which it is not only permitted, but necessary, to exceed the precise boundary of scale and proportion. Those objects, in particular, which are to be seen at a considerable distance, and where the point of view requires that the scrupulous exactitude of form, expression, and even of colour, which are required in ordinary imitation, should be aggrandized according to their distance from the spectator. Such, among others, are the paintings in cupolas, or other elevated situations.

CHIARO-SCURO. This term relates to the general distribution of the lights and shadows in a picture, and their just degradation, as they recede from the focus of light. In order to render this effect of the chiaro-scuro more intelligible, it may be well to consider it as acting on an individual object. When the light, issuing from a given point, expands itself over a particular body, an infinite number of rays, emanating from that point, are directed towards the illumined object, and strike upon every thing they can reach of its surface. The ray which first touches the nearest part of that surface, carries to it the most lively light, because it arrives in a less altered state, and reaches it by a shorter line than those rays directed to objects more removed from their source, and consequently, having further to travel, become less brilliant and luminous. These arrangements of light and shadow form the science of the chiaro-scuro, which, when properly understood, gratify the spectator with an accord, similar to that of the harmony of sounds to the ear; whereas, where the lights and shadows are indiscriminately scattered, and there is a want of union and subordination, the sight is wounded by discord and incongruity. [It comprehends not only light and shade, without which the forms of no object can be perfectly represented; but also all arrangements of light and dark colours in every degree; in short, in accordance with the compound word composing its name, which we have adopted from the Italian, the light and dark of a picture. (Professor Phillips.) The best examples among the Italians are, perhaps, to be found in the pictures of Lionardo da Vinci, Giorgione, and Correggio; among the Dutch, in those of Rembrandt, Adrian Ostade, and De Hooge.]

COMPOSITION. In the language of the art, composition consists in the general arrangement of objects which the imagination has conceived, and the putting together of individual parts to form a picturesque whole. This is considered one of the greatest difficulties the painter has to encounter. In the composition of a picture it is essential that nothing should be introduced which is not appropriate and analogous to the subject. Profusion has ever been esteemed a vice, even in the most extensive subjects, which, instead of adding to the beauty and expression of the work, diminishes the effect of both.

A composition is said to be confused when it is loaded with objects which interfere with each other by their disposition or multiplicity. A composition is conceived to be great, not from the number of the figures, but from the skill with which the artist has disposed them, so as to leave no vacancy in the space which the eye requires to be occupied. A grand composition differs from that which is usually denominated rich; the first is characterized by simplicity, the second by abundance. The compositions of Paul Veronese may be styled rich, those of Raffaello lay claim to grandeur. [Niccolo Poussin's are classical, Rembrandt's natural.]

CONTOUR. See OUTLINE.

CONTRAST. By contrast is meant, in painting, the variety in the position or motion of the different objects, and may be said to be the opposite to repetition. There are several contrasts observable in works of art, and those distinct from each other. The contrast of light and shadow, which constitutes the chiaro-scuro; a contrast in the movements of the different figures, and even in the different parts of the same figure; another in the age, sex, or passions of the different personages. Thus each figure is frequently in contrast with the others in the same group, and the several groups are also contrasted with each other. The judicious arrangement of this contrast or opposition, forms one of the great requisites of a fine picture.

CORRECTNESS. Correctness of design, as it relates to the beauty of the art, consists in the exact observance of the just proportions of the figure, as established by the models of selected nature, or the chefs d'œuvre of antiquity. It is further exemplified by giving more or less of beauty, dignity, or grandeur to the figure, according to the age, sex, or condition of the personage represented. It is not always necessary that to be correct the design should be beautiful. It is sometimes sufficient that nature, even in a form less perfect, is faithfully delineated.

COSTUME. In the works of historical painters, the laws of costume require that the subject should be treated with all possible attention to traditional veracity, in a strict regard to the customs, character, and habits of the particular country in which the event occurred. It has been further observed, that it is not sufficient that there should be nothing contrary to usage, but that some particular object should be introduced, to indicate the time and place in which the subject is represented. The same correct attention is requisite in the buildings, animals, plants, &c. The works of Niccolo Poussin are, perhaps, those in which costumal propriety has been attended to with the strictest conformity; and this may be attributed to his perfect acquaintance with the antique. It was probably this, rather than his other great qualities, that procured him the title of Le Peintre des gens d'esprit.

DEMITINT. This term in art appears to be sufficiently explicit in itself, as to its general signification; but, in order to give a more precise definition of it, it may be necessary to observe that every colour may be divided into shades or tints, which again admit of subdivision; but the word demitint ought not always to be understood literally. As every colour can be modified or broken into different shades, all of them may, according to the use the artist makes of them, be called demitints, when, in the harmonizing of the picture, they serve as a passage from one tint to another.

DESIGN. In a general sense, design means the art of imitating by a trace, or outline, the form of the object presented to the view. See OUTLINE. [It is now commonly applied to a drawing made to be engraved; and the artist is called a designer, to distinguish him from a painter of a picture. It, however, has a more extensive sense, and may be used in various ways with reference to art.]

DISTEMPER. The mode of painting in distemper is one of the most ancient that we know, if it may not rather be said to have preceded every other. Water is undoubtedly the most natural, and the simplest means of giving to coloured matter, in powder, the fluidity necessary for its employment. But as experience showed that colour so prepared, when deprived of its moisture, detached itself easily from the surface on which it was spread, means were sought to give it the necessary consistence by the introduction of sily or glutinous substances, by which it was rendered more permanent. Distemper was the general mode of painting previous to the discovery of oil-painting.

DRAPERY. The art of casting, or disposing the foldings of the drapery, requires no inconsiderable part of the painter's attention; and great judgment and taste are necessary to arrange it in such a manner as to display the form to the greatest advantage, and that the folds may correspond with the movement of the figure. In the higher walk of historical painting, the folds should be large and few, because the grandeur of the forms produces broad and simple masses of light and shadow, and it is always in the remembrance of the intelligent artist, that drapery is meant to cover, not to hide the figure.

Draperies ought to be suited to the age, character, and rank of the figures they clothe. Stuffs of a gay colour, and of a light texture, may be proper for youth; those of a soberer hue and a heavier substance, for persons advanced in years. A personage of a grave or austere character should be differently habited from a gay voluptuary; a Roman matron should not be attired like a courtesan.

DRYNESS. Applied to painting, dryness implies a harshness and formality in the outline, and a want of mellowness in the colouring. The early essays of a young artist are usually dry and hard, arising from a timid and scrupulous imitation of the most minute details of the object he adopts as a model; and this appears to have been the case with some of the greatest masters who have practised the art. That this defect is not always produced by want of talent, we have a striking proof in the example of Raffaello, whose earliest works partake of the dry, Gothic hardness of the painters who preceded him, though he afterwards acquired the grand and graceful style, by which his best performances are distinguished. Thus we find, that the defect of dryness may be corrected by study and practice, when that timidity, in which it appears to originate, is not inherent in the mind of the artist.

ELEGANCE. In relation to art, elegance is a quality which partakes of a degree of grace with a certain portion of the beautiful. Without the necessity of an exact and scrupulous purity, it is sometimes to be found attached to a sort of negligence that accompanies incorrectness. The figures of Coreggio perhaps possess more elegance than those of Raffaello, yet the superiority of the latter will not be disputed in beauty and dignity. Elegance is nearly the opposite to stiffness, and consists, in a great degree, in a graceful suppleness and flexibility.

EXPRESSION is the representation of the human frame under the impression of a particular sentiment, by which the mind is affected. As it relates to painting, it may be considered under two characters, positive and relative. A figure to which the artist may have given the most perfect expression may be entitled to positive excellence, though it may be justly condemned in a relative consideration, if it is not perfectly concordant with the general and appropriate expression of the picture.

In the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, by Domenichino, the painter has represented one of the executioners fallen down, and the others mocking him with gross and indecorous gesticulation. The expression of these figures, considered abstractedly, is positively excellent, but in a relative consideration it is entirely misplaced.

Expression may also be relatively good, without any claim to approbation in a positive sense. This is strikingly exemplified in Raffaello's St. Michael discomfiting the Evil Spirit. To vanquish the demon, the archangel expresses no exertion; acting under the influence of Omnipotence, he subdues his adversary without an effort. Contending as a man, the expression of St. Michael would have been ridiculous; as the minister of the Deity it is sublime.

FORESHORTENING is the effect that is produced by a figure viewed longitudinally, when it assumes an appearance shorter than it would be when placed perpendicularly. This mode of designing the figure is chiefly used by artists in painting domes and ceilings. In these cases it is called, by the Italians, di sotto in su [from below upwards].

FRESCO. An Italian word used to express that species of painting which is generally used on walls, roofs, and ceilings. It is effected by covering with fresh plaster, composed of lime and sand, the place to be ornamented. The artist traces on this the design prepared on his cartoon, and painting on that composition with water-colours before it is dry, they are impregnated with the plaster, and become a part of it.

Fresco painting is of all others the most adapted to those great works which form the embellishment of large public edifices, from the promptitude with which it is performed, and from its extraordinary durability. The sublime productions which have immortalized the names of M. Angelo, Raffaello, Coreggio, and Giulio Romano, at Rome, Florence, Parma, and Mantua, are painted in fresco.

GRACE may be said to be a conformation of the movement of beautiful forms, with the most amiable sentiments of the mind. As applied to art, grace cannot, like beauty, be reduced to the precision of adopted rules. Grace can neither be described, nor measured, nor determined; more fugitive, and more universal than beauty, it can neither be fixed by principle, nor established by convention. Each nation may have its peculiar idea of beauty, but grace is the same in every country. These two admirable qualities only contend with each other in their attractions, in which grace will generally be found to be triumphant:

La grace plus belle encore que la beaute.—LA FONTAINE.

GROTESQUE, a term given to those whimsical ornaments with which the Romans sometimes decorated the ceilings and friezes in their small apartments. The grotesque differs little from the species of ornament called arabesque, the name of grotesque is said to have been given to it on account of some ornaments of that description having been found in the ruins of a Roman palace, discovered in a grotto near Rome, in the time of Raffaello. That great painter being then employed in the Vatican, adopted the idea, by ornamenting in that style some of the galleries serving as passages in that palace. [The Italian word Grotesca or Grotesco is preferable to the French grotesque, especially as the latter is always used by the English in a ludicrous sense.]

GROUP signifies, in painting, the disposal of an assemblage of figures, or objects, by which they are collected and combined in such a manner, that the eye can at once embrace the whole. The advantage which results from this arrangement is the production of unity, which is one of the established beauties of the art. It is observable in nature, that in a concourse of persons they form themselves into different companies, according to their ages, conditions, and inclinations; these divisions are called groups. It is required by the best rules of art, that although subordinate groups may be introduced into a picture, they should never interfere with the principal one.

HARMONY is the congenial and accordant effect of a picture, resulting from an intelligent distribution of the light and shadow, an amicable arrangement of colour, and consistency and propriety in the composition. Mengs defines harmony to be the art of preserving a just medium between two extremes, as well in the design as in the chiaro-scuro and the colouring.

Every faculty of the art is subject to the laws of harmony. When the different parts of an ordonnance are suited to the subject, and accord amongst themselves to affect the mind of the spectator, there may be said to be a harmony in the composition. If all the parts of the composition tend to increase the interest intended to be produced, and every part of the same figure conforms with the interior sentiment with which it is meant to be affected, there will be a harmony of expression. When the manœuvre appears throughout the operation of the same hand, and the produce of the same intelligence, it may be styled harmony of execution. If the different parts of the same figure accord in indicating the same age, the same temperament, the same tender or muscular character, there will be a harmony of design. When the lights and shadows are not violently contrasted, and the demitints lead gradually and insensibly from light to shadow, it produces harmony of chiaro-scuro. And when the artist avoids bringing together colours which are not amicable, and his tints constantly participate of those which precede or follow them, it will produce harmony of colouring.

IDEAL BEAUTY is generally understood to express that perfection which is never found in individual nature, and can only be produced by a union of the various beauties selected from different forms. If we would form to ourselves a conception of ideal beauty as it was felt by the Grecian sculptors in the purest era of art, we must imagine a beauty such as it would exist if nature produced the human form in the most exquisite perfection of which it is susceptible, aided by the most elevated and dignified sentiment of art. Impressed with such ideas, the Grecian artists were continually engaged in the representation of their heroes or their gods, inspired with the zeal of expression, by the most faultless semblance of human form, that grandeur and beauty which was to be regarded as divine. "It is this intellectual dignity," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "that ennobles the painter's art, that lays the line between him and the mere mechanic, and produces those great effects in an instant, which eloquence and poetry are scarcely able to attain."

LINEAR PERSPECTIVE is a science belonging to mathematics, by which is correctly established, by geometrical rules, the diminution of the size of objects, according to their distance from the eye.

MANNER. This word is used in art in two senses. It is applied to express the particular style of a painter, as it differs from that of other masters. When manner only indicates the character of the artist, without departing from nature, it is a necessary dependence of the art, as it is indispensable that every painter should have his manner of designing and colouring, as every person has his peculiar mode of hand-writing. It is also frequently made use of to express an affectation and habit, contracted by an imitation of the peculiarities of some particular master, instead of a general contemplation of nature. This imitation must always be defective, as the object of the art is the perfect representation of nature, and not the peculiar idea that a painter may have formed to himself. [Every school has a manner distinguishing it from others; and every artist of the school participates of it, with a difference peculiar to himself. It is by a knowledge of these differences that connoisseurs decide on the school or painter of a particular picture.]

MORBIDEZZA. The Italians call morbido what is delicate, soft, or flexible, and morbidezza is used in painting to express that tenderness and fleshiness which appears in the best imitations of beautiful nature. It is particularly applicable to the carnations of women and children. Coreggio possessed, in an exquisite degree, this admirable quality, and has given examples of the morbidezza which perhaps yet remain unequalled.

ORDONNANCE. See COMPOSITION.

OUTLINE, or CONTOUR. In its most simple interpretation, outline signifies the trace by which the form of a figure or object is designed. An exact outline is that which imitates with precision the exterior form of an object viewed from a certain fixed point. Exactness relates to the fidelity of the imitation, without a reference to the theoretical or practical excellence of which the art is susceptible. Thus an exact outline may be drawn of an imperfect figure; and though this precision does not produce an agreeable imitation, it is so far estimable, as it discovers a perfect organic vision, and a dexterity of hand, which can only be acquired by great practice. A correct outline implies a more speculative idea of the art, which demands that it should not only be exact, but that it should be select in the form, and conformable to those proportions which have been adopted as the bases of perfection.

PASSION. By passion is meant, in painting, the expression of an affection of the mind as it is imprinted on the human frame. Passion may be synonymous with sentiment, with sensation, as the mind can only cease to be impassioned when it ceases to feel. In its relation to art, it is nearly connected with expression. See EXPRESSION.

PASTICCIO. The Italians apply this word, which signifies a pie, to a description of pictures which are neither entirely originals nor copies, and which are sometimes made up of different parts, taken from other paintings, as a paté is composed of various kinds of meat. This appellation is likewise extended to such productions as are entirely the invention of the artist, but in which he has imitated the style of another master, in composition, design, and colouring. These imitations are usually confined to simple and limited compositions, and are seldom successful, except in ordinary subjects. It would be necessary for an artist to draw like Raffaello, to be able to counterfeit his design. He must possess his mind, before he can imitate his expression, and be endowed with his genius, before he can equal the grandeur of his compositions.

[STYLE, in the language of writers on painting, signifies the manner peculiar to a school, or an artist, in composition, expression, drawing, and colouring. It may be grand and dignified, florid and ornate, simple and natural, as regards the treatment of the subject in general; and it may exhibit original peculiarities of forms and expressions, or capricious deviations from previously adopted modes, in the works of individual artists. Accordingly in writing or speaking of a painter whose works are not generally known, it is customary to refer to one of these types, either as to subject or manner, in the pictures of an artist with whose works the public are familiar, and say that the one under consideration painted in his style.]

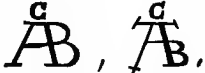

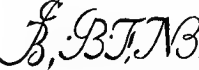

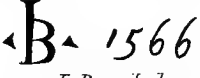

[There are many other terms recently introduced by German and French writers on art, and adopted by several English critics, which are, no doubt, very scientific and recondite; but as this Dictionary is intended for popular use, such terms have been studiously avoided throughout the work, and their 'expucation' must be left to those who employ them.]

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL DICTIONARY

OF

PAINTERS AND ENGRAVERS.

A. A—H. VANDER, an obscure Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1701. He is said to have been related to Peter Vander, A. A. the celebrated publisher of Leyden, by whom he was employed to engrave some frontispieces, portraits, and other book plates. They are executed with the graver in a coarse, heavy style, and the drawing is very incorrect. In the collection of portraits, entitled Principum et illustrium Virorum Imagines, is one by this artist, inscribed Otho Archiep. et Vice-Comes Mediolan. H. V. der Aa. del. et sculpsit. He engraved the title for the Index Batavicus, by Adrian Pars, printed at Leyden in 1701.

[AA, THIERRY VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1731, was a disciple of I. H. Keller; after quitting this master he painted in concert with G. Mets. His works consist chiefly of genii, flowers, fruit, birds, and other ornamental decorations, in which he exhibits considerable skill. He died in 1809.]

AALST, VAN. See AELST.

[AARTGENS, or AERTGENS, born at Leyden in 1498, was the son of a wool carder, and was instructed in painting by Cornelius Engelbrechts. He acquired great reputation in his day, and the most eminent artists honoured him with their friendship. Francis Floris endeavoured to draw him to Antwerp, but was not successful, as Aartgens preferred independence and poverty to exertion and affluence. He sunk into debauchery, and returning home late at night in a state of drunkenness was drowned, in 1564.

ABACCO, ANTONIO, a scholar of Antonio da San Gallo, an eminent architect at Rome, where he followed the same profession with reputation. In the year 1558, he published a valuable architectural work, entitled Libro d'Antonio d'Abacco, appartenente a l'architettura, nel quale si figurano alcune nobile antichità de Roma, with fine prints engraved by himself. He also executed the prints of the plans of St. Peter from the designs of his master.

ABARCA, MARIA DE. This lady is noticed in the history of painting in Spain, as having distinguished herself as a paintress of portraits, which were much admired, even at a period in which the art may be considered to have reached its highest pitch in that country, in the time of the celebrated Don Diego Velasquez. [She was living in 1650.]

ABATE, ANDREA [called Belvedere]. This painter was a Neapolitan, and excelled in representing fruit, flowers, vases, and other inanimate objects. He was one of the artists employed by Charles II. of Spain, and in conjunction with Luca Giordano (who painted the figures), executed several of the ornaments of the Escorial. His touch was firm and free, and was peculiarly adapted to the imitation of the still-life he represented, whilst his knowledge of the chiaroscuro enabled him to give his works a natural and pleasing effect. He is stated by Mr. Pilkington to have died in 1732; but it is most probable that his death happened at an earlier period, as Luca Giordano arrived at Madrid by the invitation of the king in 1692, left Spain in 1702, and died in 1705.

ABATI, NICCOLO DELL. According to Vidriani, this eminent painter was called dell Abati, from his technical connexion with Primaticcio, in his great works at Fontainebleau, who was made abbot of St. Martin, near Troyes, by Francis I. But Lanzi assures us that his family name was Abati, which authority is strengthened by the circumstance of several of his relatives having practised the art under the same name. He was born at Modena in 1512, and was brought up in the school of Antonio Begarelli, an able designer and sculptor, from whom he learned the first principles of the art; it is however supposed by many, that he had the advantage of being instructed by Coreggio, which is supported by his superior knowledge of foreshortening, and the boldness of his relief. One of his first performances, which brought him into notice, was his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Peter, for the Neri monks, of which celebrated work Vasari takes no further notice, than to remark, that one of the executioners is taken from a picture of Coreggio at Parma; he afterwards painted his twelve pictures from the twelve books of the Æneid, formerly in the castle of Candiano, now in the Florentine gallery, and they are alone sufficient to establish his reputation. Lanzi (who was well acquainted with their merit) says, "that in the correctness of the figures, the beauty of the landscapes, the architecture, and the animals, they merit every praise that can be bestowed on a distinguished follower of the style of Raffaele." Whilst in the prime of life, he went to Bologna, where he painted in the Palazzo Leoni, in fresco, the Nativity, an admirable performance, and at the Institute (which were perhaps more suited to his genius), four subjects in a frieze, representing musical assemblies and conversations; composed and designed with admirable taste and elegance, which have been engraved by Domenico Cunego. These works were the admiration, and became the models of the Caracci; and Agostino wrote a sonnet in honour of this artist, in which, in the flowery language of a poet, he attributes to him the symmetry of Raffaele, the sublimity of Michael Angelo, the truth of Titian, the greatness of Coreggio, and the grace of Parmegiano. Such was the excellence of his practice in fresco painting, that he is said never to have had occasion to retouch his work when dry, which gave an uncommon splendour and purity to his colouring. When Primaticcio was invited to the court of France, in 1552, by Francis I., he prevailed on Niccolo Abati to accompany him, as the most efficient coadjutor he could find, to assist in the important works he was about to engage in. He was, in effect, the great operator from the designs of Primaticcio in the magnificent gallery at Fontainebleau, of which more particular notice will be taken in the account of the works of that master. After the death of Primaticcio, he continued to be employed by the court of France, and died at Paris, in 1571.*

* [Of his numerous fresco paintings, but few, comparatively, are extant. His oil pictures also are extremely rare. The Rape of Proserpine, formerly in the Orleans' collection, is now in the Duke of Sutherland's, and is a favourable specimen of his skill in landscape painting.]

ABATI, PIETRO PAOLO, brother of the preceding artist, and a native of Modena. He excelled in painting battle pieces, and was considered unequalled, in his time, for the spirit and animation with which he designed horses, and the attacks of combatants. Some of the works of this painter are placed with distinction in the gallery at Florence. According to Vidriani he flourished about the year 1550, [and Zani places his death in 1555.]

ABATI, ERCOLE. This painter was the grandson of Niccolo dell Abati, born at Modena about the year 1563. He possessed an extraordinary genius for the art, which he disgraced by the depravity and intemperance of his conduct. Like most artists of that character, his works were the productions of negligence and haste; of which the ingenuity of the composition makes us lament the idleness of the execution. There is a picture of the marriage at Cana, by this artist, in the Florentine gallery; and he painted some pictures in the Council-hall at Florence, in concurrence with B. Schidoni. It is not surprising that they were unequal to such competition. He died in 1613. [He had a son, named Pietro Paolo, who painted several pictures at Modena, which are spoken of with commendation; he died in 1630, in his 38th year.]

ABATINI, GUIDO UBALDO. According to Passeri, this artist was a native of Città di Castello, and flourished about 1650, in which year he was admitted into the Academy at Rome. He was a disciple of Cavaliere Guiseppe Cesari, and distinguished himself as a painter of history in fresco. One of his principal works is the ceiling of the chapel of St. Theresa, in S. Maria della Vittoria, at Rome. He died in 1656, aged about 56.

ABBE, H., an engraver, who, according to M. Christ, was a native of Antwerp, where some prints by him were published in 1670. He is also noticed by M. Heineken, who only mentions him as having made some designs for the Metamorphoses of Ovid, published by Barrier.

ABBIATI, FILIPPO. This painter was born at Milan in 1640, and was a scholar of Gioseffo Nuvoloni, called il Panfilo. Under that master he made great proficiency, and proved a very reputable artist, particularly in fresco. He possessed every requisite to form a great machinist. Fertile and bold in his conceptions, his execution was commanding and resolute. In competition with Federrigo Bianchi, he painted the great vault of S. Alessandro Martyre at Milan. One of his best works was St. John preaching in the Wilderness, at Saronò. He died at Milan, in 1715.

ABBIATI, GUISEPPE, a Milanese designer and engraver, who lived in the beginning of the eighteenth century. He etched some small prints of battles, and an allegorical subject from his own design.

ABBIATIS, P. M. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of Girolamo Cornaro, procurator of St. Mark. It is without a date or the name of the painter.

ABBOT, J. There is a small etching of a horse, inscribed with this name, and dated 1767. It appears to have been the production of an amateur, for his amusement.

ABBOT, LEMUEL, an English portrait painter. He was a native of Leicestershire, and was a scholar of Francis Hayman. Without the possession of much taste, he acquired some reputation for the faithful resemblance of his pictures, particularly his portraits of men, which sometimes approach to excellence. [He painted the portraits of Cowper the poet, and Lord Nelson, which were much admired for their truth.] He died in 1803.

[ABEL, JOSEPH, a German painter of great merit, who died at Vienna in 1818; the date of his birth is not recorded. He was instructed in the school of Füger at Vienna, and is said to have distinguished himself at an early age. He was employed by the Czartorysky family in Poland, and visited Rome in 1802, where he remained six years, and produced several pictures, the subjects of which were taken from the Greek poets and ancient historians, and which gained him great applause. On his return to Vienna he painted portraits, and large historical compositions, and was also employed in the decorations of the theatre.]

[ABEL, HANS, a painter of Frankfort, who lived about 1494. He is supposed to have painted some of the beautiful windows which adorn the cathedral and several churches in that city.]

[ABEL, GOTTLIEB FRIEDRICH, a German engraver of reputation, born in 1763, was a pupil of J. G. Von Müller. He was engraver to the king of Wurtemberg; at Stuttgart. He furnished about 125 plates to Reiter's work descriptive of the various trees of Germany.]

[ABEL, —. In Malvasia this name occurs as of a French artist who, in 1650, received a hundred Roman crowns for a copy made by him of the "Communion of St. Jerome," by Domenichino; the latter had been paid, a short time previously, but fifty crowns for the original. It is to be regretted that we have not a more copious account of this successful copyist; for if the merit of his work justified the price, much doubt might be dispelled respecting the originality of many other pictures of the period, ascribed to Italian masters of high repute.]

ABENTS, LEONARD. This artist was a native of Passau, in Bavaria, and flourished about the year 1580. He engraved the plan of the city of Passau for Braun's Topography. He marked his plates with a monogram composed of an L and an A, thus, LA.

[ABEREGNO, GIACOMO, a Venetian painter who flourished about the year 1400.]

ABERLI, JOHN LOUIS, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Winterthur, in 1723. He was a pupil of Henry Meyer, and painted with success portraits and landscapes. He has published several coloured prints of views in Switzerland, which have been sufficiently admired to give birth to a great number of imitators in an inferior style. [He died in 1786.]

ABERRY, J., a name affixed to a portrait of Sir Watkin Williams Wynne; after T. Hudson. It is etched in the manner of Worlidge, and is not an unsuccessful imitation of his style. It is dated 1753.

[ABILDGAARD, NIKOLAI, a Danish historical painter of great merit, was born at Copenhagen in 1744, and died in 1809. He has been considered the best painter Denmark has produced; his principal subjects were taken from the ancient poets, and some of the best perished in the fire that consumed the palace of Christianburg in 1794. Füssli relates, that this had such an effect on his mind that he scarcely painted afterwards.]

[ABRIL, JUAN ALFONSO, lived about the middle of the 17th century at Valladolid. The convent of the Dominicans in that city had for a long time a picture of St. Paul by him, brilliant in colour, and in good taste.]

ABSHOVEN, —. This ingenious artist was a native of Antwerp, and flourished about the year 1660. He was the favourite disciple of David Teniers the younger, and the most successful follower of his style. His pictures, like those of his master, represent village festivals, the interiors of cabarets, with peasants regaling and amusing themselves, corps-de-gardes, and chemists' laboratories, in which he approached so near to the admirable style of his instructor, that his pictures may easily be mistaken for those of Teniers. His touch is uncommonly light and spirited, and his colouring clear and silvery. The works of this painter are frequently met with in Flanders, where they are judged worthy of being placed in the best collections. He died young, about the year 1665.

[Balkema says that he was born in 1648, and died in 1690. Nagler calls him Theodore van Abshoven; by others he is named F. van Apshoven. As unprincipled dealers have been in the habit of obliterating his name, in order to pass off his works for those of D. Teniers, it is difficult to reconcile the difference; not that it is of much importance to the real connoisseur. He also imitated Brecklenkamp, but was not equally successful.]

[ACCAMA, BERNARD, a portrait painter, born at Leuwarde in 1697, where he died in 1756. His works were much esteemed by his own countrymen, but are little known elsewhere.]

[ACCAMA, MATTHEW, was also a native of Leuwarde in 1702. He painted historical and emblematical subjects. He went to Italy, where he copied, with considerable talent, several pictures of the ancient masters. He died at Leuwarde in 1783.]

[ACCER, CESARE ANTONIO, an Italian landscape painter, lived in 1609, and was considered an artist of talent; but his works are little known out of Italy.]

[ACCHILLINO, —, a Bolognese painter who flourished about 1324. Verci (Storia Trevigiana) says that the portrait of Can Grande was painted by Acchillino; and Can Grande died in 1329.]

ACCIUS, CÆSAR A. M. Heineken is the only author who has noticed this engraver, and mentions a print by him of a landscape with three figures, one of which is holding a drum. It is inscribed Cæsar. Ant. Accius, fecit et in: A. D. 1609.

[ACEBEDO, or ACEVEDO, D. MANUEL, born at Madrid in 1744, was a disciple of J. Lope, but by copying diligently the works of the best masters he soon surpassed his master. He painted historical and religious subjects, and was much employed in Madrid. He died at the age of 56.]

[ACEVEDO, CRISTOBAL DE, an historical painter, born at Murcia, was a disciple of Carducho in 1585, and painted pictures for many of the convents in the capital. The nobleness of his characters, and purity of design, placed him among the good professors of his time. He painted large subjects of sacred history. The time of his death is not recorded.]

ACHEN, or ACH, JOHN VAN. This painter was born at Cologne [according to some writers in 1552, and by others] in 1556. His parents being in easy circumstances, were desirous of educating him for one of the learned professions, but whilst at school he made more use of his pen in sketching the likenesses of his companions than in his scholastic exercises, and at the age of ten years he astonished even the artists of his native city, with a drawing he had made of the perfect resemblance of an illustrious traveller, who at that time passed through Cologne. This surprising production induced his parents to comply with his wishes of becoming an artist, and he was placed under the tuition of a reputable portrait painter, called Jerrigh, or George. After passing six years under this master, he applied himself to study and copy the works of Bartholomew Spranger. When he was twenty-two years of age, he visited Italy, and first stopped at Venice; where he passed some time among the great works of art in that distinguished school of colouring. He afterwards went to Rome, where his first performance was an altar-piece for one of the chapels of the Jesuits' church, representing the Nativity. He also painted a picture which gained him great reputation, and has been considered as one of his best productions, in which he has represented the portrait of the celebrated musician Madonna Venusta playing on a lute, and introduced his own picture, holding a goblet of wine. From Rome he went to Florence, where he painted the portrait of the famous poetess Madonna Laura. The Elector of Bavaria invited him to Munich, where he produced his most capital work of the Resurrection of our Saviour, which has been engraved by Raffaële Sadler; and the Finding of the True Cross, by Helena, mother of Constantine. He painted the portraits of the Electoral family, and was liberally rewarded by his employer, who also presented him with a gold chain and medal. By the invitation of the Emperor Rodolphus, he visited Prague, where the court was then held, and was favoured with the particular patronage of that monarch. His first work was a picture of Venus and Adonis, which he designed with a taste and elegance, then little known in Germany. This performance was so much admired by the emperor, that he retained him in his service for the remainder of his life. It is but justice to this painter, to allow him the credit of being one of the first that attempted to reform the stiff and Gothic taste of his country, and although he did not entirely divest himself of it, it must be allowed that his design, always correct, approaches sometimes to grace and beauty.

[The time of his death is variously stated. Zani places it in 1600; others in 1615, 1618, and 1621. The monument erected to his memory by his widow at Prague, where he died, was discovered in 1790, and the inscription states that he died in 1615, aged 68.]

ACHEN, ARNOLD VAN, an engraver, who lived in the beginning of the last century, and is only noticed as the etcher of some frontispieces to plays, and other small works for the publishers. He was the brother of a drapery painter, called Taylor van Achen, from his expeditious manner of clothing the figures of the portrait painters of his day.

ACHTSCHELLING, LUCAS. This painter was born at Brussels, about the year 1570. He was a scholar of Louis de Vadder, an eminent master of that time, by whose instruction he became one of the ablest artists of his age. His manner is broad and bold; the foliage of his trees lightly touched, and apparently in motion; his forms and scenery are grander than is usual in the works of the artists of his country; and his distances recede with a pleasing degradation. His pictures hold a place in the choicest collections in the Low Countries, and are deservedly admired. In the collegiate church of St. Gudule at Brussels, are three large landscapes by this master admirably painted. [Died, 1631.]

[ACQUARELLI, ———, a Neapolitan painter of architecture, of great merit, who flourished about 1640.]

[ACQUISTABENE, MAESTRO, painter and designer of architecture, born at Brescia, and flourished about 1295.]

[ADAM, HANS, or JAN VAN, a designer and engraver of Nuremberg, lived in 1570. A print entitled "A Representation and Description of the Battle of Silbershausen," is ascribed to him. The mark is a figure of Adam naked standing by a tree, and also the letters H. A.]

ADAM, JACOB, an engraver, born at Vienna in 1748. He was brought up in the academy in that city. In conjunction with his countryman, John Ernest Mansfeld, he has made himself known by a series of portraits of the distinguished personages of Austria, published at Vienna, which are executed with great neatness and finish, [among which, that of the Empress Maria Louisa is accounted his best. He also executed the plates for the Vienna pictorial Bible, or Bilder Bible, which gained him considerable credit. He was living in 1808.]

ADAM, P., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. We have a few etchings of landscapes by this artist, which are executed in a poor, tasteless style. In one of them a figure is represented seated on a bank, which is engraved in the manner of Mellan, without any cross hatchings. He usually signed his plates with his name, the letters P and A being joined together.

[ADAM, PETER, a German engraver, flourished about 1730. Heineken mentions six landscapes by a master of this name, probably the same. He is also supposed to have painted some pictures which have the same monogram as the prints.]

[ADAMI, PIETRO, born at Rome, excelled in marine subjects; he painted in the year 1730; little else is known of his history.]

ADAMS, CHARLES. This artist is mentioned by M. Heineken as the engraver of a portrait of Charles Stuart, king of England. He has not, however, specified whether it is that of Charles the First or Second. It is not noticed by Grainger, nor in Bromley's Catalogue.

ADAMS, ROBERT. He was an architect and an engraver, born in London in 1540. His eminence in his profession procured him the situation of surveyor of the works to Queen Elizabeth. As an engraver, he is known by a set of prints executed by him, published by Augustus Ryther in 1589, representing the battles between the English fleet and the Spanish armada, which are now become very scarce.

ADAMS, ROBERT. He was the son of an architect, born at Kirkcaldy, in Fifeshire, in 1728. After receiving a good education at Edinburgh, his father sent him to Italy, to study the fine specimens of Roman architecture, where he remained several years. On his return to England, he was appointed architect to the king. During his residence on the continent he had made, in conjunction with Clerissean, drawings of the famous palace of Diocletian, at Salpatro in Dalmatia, and in 1764 published a volume in folio, entitled "Ruins of the Palace of Diocletian, at Salpatro in Dalmatia," with seventy-one well-engraved plates from his designs. He died in London in 1792.

[ADDA, CONTE FRANCESCO D', a Milanese amateur painter, scholar and imitator of Leonardo da Vinci, painted small pictures on panel and slate for private cabinets. An altar-piece at the Dominican church of S. Maria delle Grazie, at Milan, is attributed to him. He died in 1550.]

ADLER, PHILIP, [born at Nuremberg in 1484,] is called [erroneously] by Florent le Comte, Adler Paticina. He mentions a plate by him of St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus, dated 1518. The print described by Mr. Strutt, as his best performance, representing an altar, with the Virgin Mary crowned, and a female saint holding the infant Christ, was engraved by David Hopper, whose mark, when the print is perfect, is at the bottom of the plate. The inscription on the tablet, OCH OPUS, FECIT, PHILIPUS ADLER PATRICIUS, MDXVIII., most probably relates to the altar having been erected by Philip Adler. In the print Mr. Strutt had seen, the mark of Hopper had probably been cut off. Mr. Woodburn has a fine impression of this plate in its perfect state.

[ADMIRAAL, B., a Dutch painter, who flourished in 1662, as appears by a picture, with the name and date, representing the entrance to a city, with numerous figures, many of them in Oriental costume; the style is analogous to Weenix and Thomas Wyck, but a less delicate pencil than either. No writer has noticed this artist.]

ADOLFFZ, ———. By this engraver, who, from his name, appears to have been a native of Germany, we have a portrait of the Duke de Biron, Marshal of France, on horseback. It is now become scarce.

ADOLFI, GIACOMO. According to Tassi, this painter was born at Bergamo in 1682. He was the son of Benedetto Adolfs, a painter little known, and had not the advantage of any superior instruction to that of his father. He painted history with some reputation. Amongst several of his works in the churches at Bergamo, his picture of the crowning of the Virgin, in the church of the monastery del Paradiso, is esteemed one of his best productions. In the church of S. Alessandro della Croce, is another admired picture by this master, of the Adoration of the Magi. He died in 1741.

ADOLFI, Ciro, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Bergamo in 1683, and was also instructed by their father. He possessed a more fertile genius than his brother, and a greater facility, and distinguished himself by some considerable fresco paintings in the public edifices at Bergamo, and in the state. His principal works are the Four Evangelists, in the church of S. Alessandro della Croce, and a Deposition from the Cross in S. Maria delle Grazie. In the parochial church of Cognola, is also an admired work by him, of the Decollation of St. John. He died in 1758.

ADORF, J. A. C., according to M. Heineken, was a student in philosophy, and engraved for his amusement a portrait, inscribed Andr. Ehrig. Med. Cultor, Æt. 59. He was a native of Germany.

[ADRIANO, ———, a Spanish monk of the order of barefooted Carmelites, at Cordova, was a pupil of Paul de Cespedes. Pacheco, who knew him, speaks of him as a great artist; and Palomino states that his convent possessed for a long time a Magdalene by this master, that was considered the work of Titian. His works are rare, as he was in the habit of destroying them as soon as finished, from a modest opinion, very uncommon to artists, of their inferiority. Some fine ones, however, are preserved, through the intercession of his friends, in the names of souls in purgatory; a holy fraud that may be readily forgiven. He died about 1630.]

ADRIANSEN, ALEXANDER. This painter was born at Antwerp about the year 1625. The subjects of his pictures are sometimes flowers and fruit, which he grouped and disposed with considerable taste. His works are highly finished and well coloured, but he was particularly excellent in the painting of fish, to which he gave a surprising appearance of truth and nature, and represented them with a freshness and glittering effect of colour that produces perfect illusion. His works in this way are deservedly esteemed, and are worthy a place in the choicest collections of the curious. [Died in 1685.]

AELS, ———. The name of this engraver is affixed to a print representing St. Joseph leading the infant Jesus by the hand. The back-ground is a landscape.

AELST, or AALST, EVERT VAN, was born at Delft in 1602, and was an artist of very respectable merit. He excelled in painting birds, dead game, armour, vases of gold and silver, &c. He sometimes represented these objects on a clear or white ground, in a manner that produced a singularly natural effect. All his works are very carefully finished, his pencil is clean and flowing, and he disposed the inanimate objects he represented in a very pleasing and picturesque manner. He died in 1658.

[AELST, PAUL VAN, a natural son of Peter Koech, was a good painter of fruit and flowers; he practised at Middleburg, and copied Jan de Maubeuse with success. He was assisted by Jan Mostaert in these productions. He died at Antwerp, but the date is not mentioned by those who have noticed him.]

AELST, or AALST, WILLIAM VAN. This painter was the son of a notary, born at Delft in 1620. He was the nephew of Evert van Aelst, by whom he was instructed in the art. His pictures, like those of his uncle, represent dead game and still-life; they are however much more neatly finished, and are even more preciously wrought up, than the highly valued works of Weeninix. He passed some years in France and Italy, where the polish and exquisite finish of his works rendered them extremely popular in both countries. The grand duke of Tuscany employed his talents for some time, and as a mark of his favour and approbation, presented him with a gold chain and medal. On his return to Holland in 1656, he settled at Amsterdam, where his pictures were so much admired, that he could with difficulty satisfy the demands for his works. He died in that city, in 1679.

AELTS, NICHOLAS VAN, was born at Brussels about the year 1527. At an early age he established himself at Rome, where he carried on a considerable commerce in prints, from 1550 to 1600. The names of the painter, and the engraver of the plates, executed for his collection, were frequently omitted, and his own inserted, with the word formis, to denote that he was the publisher. It is, however, sufficiently proved, that he sometimes exercised the graver, as we have several plates in which the word fecit, or sculpsit, is added to his name. M. Heineken notices a set of twelve plates of birds engraved by this artist.

ÆNEAS, P., a German engraver in mezzotinto, mentioned by M. Heineken. He was chiefly employed in portraits, and, among others, engraved that of Nicholas Blankard, Profess. a Frank, Æt. 68. P. Aeneas, fecit et excudit.

AERTS, RICHARD. According to Vanmander, this painter was the son of a poor fisherman, born at Wyck, in North Holland, in 1482. When a boy, he had the misfortune of having his leg burnt so severely, as to render amputation necessary. During a painful and tedious confinement, his only amusement was the attempt to sketch with chalk whatever objects presented themselves to his view. In those rude essays, he discovered so marked a disposition for the art, that a friend of his parents persuaded them to place him under the direction of a painter. He was accordingly sent to Haerlem, where he became a scholar of John Moestaert, the elder, a painter at that time in some repute. Under that master he made a surprising progress, and not only soon surpassed his instructor, but became one of the ablest artists of his time. His first works on leaving the school of Moestaert, were two pictures painted as folding doors to an altar-piece in the great church at Haerlem (as was usual at that time), wherein he represented two subjects from the history of Joseph and his brethren. He afterwards settled at Antwerp, and was received into the academy there in 1520. He died in that city at the great age of 95.

AERTSEN, PETER. This painter was the son of a stocking manufacturer, born at Amsterdam in 1519, [Zani and other writers say in 1507, Balkema says 1517.] Having shown an early inclination for the art, he was placed under Alaert Claessen, a reputable portrait painter. He did not however remain longer with that master than was necessary to learn the first rudiments, and before he was eighteen years of age produced some pictures of the interiors of kitchens with culinary utensils, painted with great spirit, and well coloured. These performances were much admired, and it is somewhat remarkable, that although he was so successful in his attempts in that way, he abandoned these subjects, and applied himself to the more elevated walk of historical painting, in which he acquired no little celebrity. One of his most esteemed works was the altar-piece he painted for the church of Our Lady, at Amsterdam. The principal picture represented the Death of the Virgin Mary, and on the two folding doors he painted the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi. These subjects were ingeniously composed and well drawn, and the colouring warm and harmonious. Sandrart asserts, that he received two thousand crowns for this work.

It is no slight proof of the ability of this master, that when Michael Coxie of Mechlin, one of the greatest painters of his time, was applied to for an altar-piece for the new church at Amsterdam; on seeing the works of Peter Aertsen, he declined the undertaking, observing, that they had no occasion for his exertions, possessing among them such a painter as Aertsen. He died at Amsterdam in 1573. [He had three sons, Peter, Arnold, and Theodore, who were all painters.]

AFESA, PIETRO. This painter was called della Basilicata, from his being a native of the province of that name, in the kingdom of Naples. He flourished about the year 1650. Dominici, in his Lives of the Neapolitan Painters, mentions this artist in very favourable terms. His works are preserved in many of the churches and convents at Naples. In the chapel of the monastery at Marsico Nuovo, in that city, is an altar-piece by him, representing the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, which is highly esteemed.

AGAR, JACQUES D', a portrait painter, born at Paris in 1640. He was a scholar of Simon Vouet, but did not follow the steps of his master, contenting himself with the reputation of a portrait painter. According to Lord Orford, he visited England, where he resided some time, and met with success. [He painted the portraits of several of the nobility of Queen Anne's reign; among which were the Duchess of Montague, the Countesses of Rochfort and Sunderland, Thomas Earl of Strafford, and others.] He was afterwards invited to the court of Denmark, and was greatly patronized by the king and court. The portrait of this painter, by himself, has found a place in the Florentine gallery of artists. He died at Copenhagen in 1716.

AGELLI, GIOSEFFO. According to Baglioni, this painter was a native of Sorrento, and a scholar of Caval. Cristofano Roncalli, called Pomerancio. He excelled in landscape, [and architecture,] and was applied to by several of his contemporary historical painters, to paint the landscapes in the backgrounds of their pictures.

[AGGAS, N. and ROBERT, two English painters, father and son, who were living in 1679.]

AGGAS, RALPH. This artist is mentioned by Lord Orford as a surveyor and an engraver. He engraved and published plans of Oxford and Cambridge, about the year 1578, and another of Dunwich in Suffolk, in 1589. He also engraved on wood the large plan and view of London, which was afterwards executed on copper by George Vertue.

[AGHINETTI, called GUCCIO DEL SERO, a Florentine painter, who was living in 1331, is ranked among the best artists of his time. He had a nephew, called Maestro Guccio, who was also eminent, and who died in 1409.]

[AGLIO, ANDREA-SALVATORE DI ANTONIO DI ARZO, born at Lugano in 1736, a painter on marble, who is said to be the first who discovered the method of fixing colours on that material. He died in 1786.]

[AGLIO, CLAUDIO, a German engraver, who practised at Rome in 1641.]

AGNELLI, FEDERIGO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Milan about the year 1600. He was chiefly employed in portraits, though he occasionally engraved emblematical and architectural subjects. He engraved a set of plates representing the Dome of the Cathedral at Milan, to which he has affixed his name, and that of the architect, Carolus Butius.

[AGNOLO, FRANCESCO, a Florentine painter, who flourished about 1545.]

AGOSTINO, DI SAN AGOSTINO. Of this Italian artist we have few particulars. He is merely known as the engraver of a few prints, one of which is after the Zingara of Coreggio, representing the Virgin Mary in the dress of a Bohemian, sitting with the infant Jesus, in a landscape, with St. Joseph writing.

[AGOSTINO DI MILANO, DETTO DELLE PROSPETTIVE, a native of Milan, painted at Bologna in 1525. He was a scholar of Suardi, called Bramantino from having been a favourite of Bramante; he was very skilful in aerial and lineal perspective, and imitated steps, doors, and windows, so perfectly as to deceive men and brute animals. He painted a piece at the Carmine, which for its foreshortening Lomazzo instances, along with the cupola of Coreggio at Parma, as a model of excellence.]

AGRESTI, LIVIO. This painter was a native of Forli, a town in the Roman territory. He was a fellow student with Luca da Ravenna, under Pierino del Vaga at Rome. He was a very eminent artist, and was employed by Pope Gregory XIII. in the great works that were executed by order of that pontiff in the Vatican. In the grand staircase is a considerable fresco painting by this master, representing Philip of Arragon submitting his kingdom to the dominion of Pope Eugenius III. Several other works of Agresti are in the churches and public places at Rome. In St. Caterina de Funari, he painted St. Peter and St. Paul, and a picture of the Annunciation, and in one of the chapels of S. Spirito in Sassia, is a fine altar-piece, representing the Assumption of the Virgin Mary. His best works are however in his native city of Forli. Rome possesses nothing by him equal to the chapel he has ornamented in the cathedral, where he has represented the last supper, and in the vault, some admirable figures of the prophets. He [is said to have] died at Rome in 1580, [but according to Zani he was living in 1581.]

AGRICOLA, CHRISTOPHER LUDWIG, was a painter of portraits and landscapes, born at Ratisbon [or Regensburg] in 1667.* There is a print by him of a landscape, in which he has introduced the fable of Diana and Acteon. It is signed, Agricola, fecit. [He died in 1719.]

* [He resided a long time at Naples, and painted many fine landscapes there, some of which were brought to England about twenty-five years ago.]

[AGROTE, ANTONIO, an architectural painter of the last century. He painted one of the chapels of the Carmine at Milan, and the decorations of the church of Santa Maria at Brescia, and for which Carloni painted the figures. He was living in 1750.]

AGUCCHIA, GIOVANNI, an old engraver, stated by M. Heineken to have been a native of Milan. He engraved the dome of the cathedral of that city, to which he has affixed his name at length. He also executed a plate of another public building at Milan, to which he has signed his initials, G. A.

[AGUERO, BENOIT MANUEL, a landscape and battle painter, was born at Madrid about 1623, and was a scholar of Mazo Martinez, whose style and manner he followed closely. He endeavoured to imitate Titian in his historical compositions, but was not successful. He died at Madrid in 1670.]

[AGUIAR, TOMMASO DE, a disciple of Velasquez, painted portraits, which were distinguished for the freedom of the style and their strong resemblance. Among other eminent persons he painted De Solis, the poet, who celebrates him in a sonnet. He was considered an excellent painter of small figures. He was living in Madrid in 1660.]

[AGUILA, FRANCISCO DEL, a fresco painter, resided at Murcia the latter part of the 16th century, and painted in 1570 the beautiful mausoleum of Alfonso the Wise, in that city.]

[AGUILA, MIGUEL DEL, an historical painter, who died at Seville in 1736. His pictures are valued for their near approach to the style of Murillo.]

[AGUILERA, LAGO, or DIEGO DE, was a painter of sacred history, and resided at Toledo in 1578. He was a man of conciliating manners, and a good judge of works of art; he was generally consulted by the nobility and others, as to the prices demanded by artists, and did justice to both. The greater part of his pictures were destroyed by fire. The time of his death is not known.]

[AGUIRRE, FRANCISCO DE, a pupil of Caxes, was a portrait painter, and a restorer of pictures, to which occupation he particularly devoted himself. He commenced at Toledo in 1646. He was employed to restore the pictures in the cathedral, and gave abundant proofs of his ignorance and presumption, by altering them according to his own notions; a practice that has been followed by others since his time, and to which may be ascribed the loss of many fine pictures of the best Spanish masters. In other respects Aguirre is known only by his portraits.]

AIKMAN, WILLIAM. This artist was a native of Scotland, born in Aberdeenshire in 1682. He for some time studied the law, but his inclination for painting led him to change his profession. He visited Italy, where he studied three years, and afterwards went to Turkey. On his return to Scotland he met with great encouragement as a portrait painter, in which branch of the art he chiefly excelled. He died in 1731.

[He was possessed of considerable literary qualifications, and was in intimate terms with Kneller, whose style of portraiture he imitated; and with Allan Ramsay, Thomson, and Mallet. His memory was celebrated by the two last: Mallet wrote his epitaph, and Thomson his elegy.]

AIROLA, DONNA ANGELA VERONICA. According to Soprani, this paintress was a native of Genoa, and was instructed in the art by Domenico Fiasella, called Sarezana. This lady had acquired a considerable reputation, and had painted some pictures for the churches in that city, when she became a religious of the order of S. Bartolomew dell Olivella at Genoa. [She died in 1670.]

[AKEN, F. VAN, a painter of fruit, flowers, and objects of still-life. There is no published account of him, but his pictures have his name, F. v. Aken, or his monogram.]

prize the reader not to confound this artist with John van Achen, born in 1556. John van Aken was a painter and engraver, a native of Holland in 1614. He was a contemporary and friend of Peter de Laer, called Bamboccio. This artist etched four landscapes, or views of the Rhine lengthways, numbered 1 to 4, and marked H. L. inventor, I. v. Aken, fecit. These are after Herman Sachtleven. They are executed in the manner of I. Both. We have also by him a suite of six subjects of horses in different positions, with very pleasing backgrounds lengthways, marked I. v. Aken, fecit. M. Heineken mentions a print by him, with a horse saddled in the foreground, behind, a man lying down, and another seated with his hat on, marked I. van Aken, fec. lengthways. This print is very scarce.

[AKEN, JOSEPH VAN, a Flemish artist who passed a great part of his life in England. He was employed by eminent landscape painters to introduce figures in their pictures, at which he was very skilful. He also painted on satin and velvet, and produced some excellent works. He died in London in 1749.]

[AKERBOOM, —, a Dutch painter of the interiors of cities and villages, lived about the middle of the 17th century. The execution of his works is admirable, and highly finished.]

AKERSLOOT, WILLIAM, a Dutch engraver, born at Haerlem about the year 1600. He engraved a few plates of portraits, and other subjects, amongst which are the following:

Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange; after A. vander Venne.

Amelia, Princess of Orange, with her two Daughters.

Christ taken in the Garden; H. Hondius, inv.

Christ bound; after P. Molyn.

Peter denying Christ; after the same.

[He was living in 1651.]

AKBEL, FREDERICK. This artist was of Sweden; born in the province of Sudermania, 1748. He was instructed in the art by Ackerman at Upsal, where he engraved the views of some buildings in that town, and a few portraits. In 1771 he visited Stockholm, where he had access to the instruction of the academy. There is a set of ten well-engraved portraits of Swedish personages by him, numbered from 1 to 10.

[ALABARDI, GIUSEPPE, a Venetian painter, who lived about 1600; he is highly complimented in an epigram, by F. Ruggerius, for a picture of Mars and Venus.]

[ALAMANNI, PIETRO, born at Ascoli, flourished about 1489, was a scholar of Carlo Crivelli; painted history and portraits, and was an artist of merit.]

[ALAMANNI, GAETANO, a Bolognese painter, who distinguished himself in various styles; particularly in architectural and ornamental painting. He died in 1782.]

ALBANASI, ANGELO, an Italian engraver, by whom we have some neat, spirited etchings of architectural ruins in and near Rome. From the style in which they are executed, he appears to have flourished about the commencement of the last century.

ALBANO, FRANCESCO. This admired painter was the son of Agostino Albano, a reputable silk merchant at Bologna, where he was born in 1578. Although he showed a strong inclination for the art from his childhood, his parents were desirous of bringing him up to his father's profession; but his uncle thinking he perceived in him the indications of a genius, which, if cultivated, might lead him to celebrity in an art for which he had himself a strong predilection, prevailed on his father to permit him to follow the bent of his disposition, and at the age of twelve years he was placed under the care of Denys Calvert, whose academy was at that time in great repute. Guido Reni was then a student under Calvert, and was the most advanced and the ablest of his disciples. He conceived a friendship for the young Albano, assisted him in his studies, and these kind offices led to an intimacy that existed during their lives. The great school of the Caracci began at this time to be considered as the most celebrated in Lombardy, and Guido having learned all he could acquire from his first instructor, became a scholar of Lodovico Caracci. It was not long before he was followed by Albano, and they continued their studies under that distinguished master with great assiduity, accompanied by an emulation conducive to the advancement of both. Guido, on leaving the Caracci, visited Rome, whither he was soon after followed by his friend and fellow student. It was not long before the talent of Albano brought him into notice in that metropolis of art; and Annibale Caracci, who was at that time employed in painting the chapel of San Diego, in the national church of the Spaniards, falling sick, he recommended Albano to be employed to finish it, and the greater part of the work was completed by him, in a manner that gained him great reputation. The Marquis Giustiniani employed him to ornament the gallery of his villa at Bassano, where he painted the story of Neptune and Galatea, and the fall of Phaeton. He was afterwards engaged in some considerable works in the Verospi palace at Rome, where he represented different subjects from Ovid, treated with great science and ingenuity. These performances established the fame of Albano throughout all Italy. The duke of Mantua invited him to his court, where he painted several pictures, representing the story of Diana and Acteon, and Venus and Cupid.

On his return to Rome, he executed the large works which are seen in the tribune of the Madonna della Pacé. In the church of S. Sebastiano is an altar-piece representing the martyrdom of that saint, entirely in the manner of Caracci, and a picture of the Assumption, painted in conjunction with Guido Reni. Many other works by this master are in the most distinguished situations at Rome. Among his best works at Bologna, are the Baptism of Christ, in S. Giorgio; in St. Bartolomeo, the Annunciation; and in S. Maria de Galeria, the Resurrection. The style of Albano is more beautiful than grand; his compositions are ingenious and abundant; and his figures are both elegant and graceful. He is called, by Lanzi, the Anacreon of painting; the fame the Greek acquired by the delightful fancy of his odes, Albano reached by the fascinating charm of his cabinet pictures; as the poet sung of Venus and the Loves, the painter selected the most tender and seductive subjects. The landscapes which occupy the backgrounds of his pictures are extremely pleasing, touched with great taste, and there is a freshness and delicacy in his colouring that charm the beholder. It cannot however be denied, that he is to be regarded rather as an agreeable than a great painter. The soft and delicate forms of women and children were more suited to his powers, than the delineation of the muscular movements of men; and he generally made choice of those pleasing subjects of the fable, that admitted of the graceful and amiable, rather than the heroism of history, that called for the nobler exertions of the sublime and terrific. He died at Bologna, in 1666.

[The four allegorical pictures of the Elements, now in the gallery at Turin, he painted for the Cardinal Mauriee; they are reckoned among the finest of his works, and have been copied repeatedly, some so successfully as to pass for his work.]

ALBANO, FRANCESCO. Mr. Strutt attributes to this eminent painter an etching representing the Death of Dido, which is said to be a very indifferent performance.

ALBANO, GIOVANNI BAPTISTA, was the brother and scholar of Francesco Albano. He followed the manner of that master, and gained some degree of reputation from a successful imitation of his brother in historical subjects, as well as landscapes. Some of his works have been mistaken by inexperienced collectors for those of Francesco. He died in 1668.

[ALBARETTI, —, born at Rome, was an eminent painter about 1520.]

ALBERELLI, GIACOMO. This painter was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1600. He was a disciple of Jacopo Palma the younger, with whom he was employed as a coadjutor thirty-four years. He painted history with considerable reputation, and there are several of his works in the public edifices at Venice, of which one of the most esteemed is a picture of the Baptism of Christ, in the church of the Ognissanti. [He died about the year 1650.]

ALBERICI, ENRICO. This painter was born at Vilminore, in the territory of Bergamo, in 1714, and was a scholar of Ferdinando Cairo, of Brescia, under whom he studied three years. He is stated by Tassi, in his account of the Bergamesque painters, to have been a very reputable artist; and several of his works are particularly described by that author. Among many others, he painted for the church Dei Miracoli, at Brescia, the Woman of Samaria, the Parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, the Raising of Lazarus, the Prodigal Son, and the Good Shepherd. He died in 1775.

[ALBERT, SIMON, a distinguished historical painter, born at Haerlem in 1523, was a scholar of Jean Mostaert. He lived to a great age, but the exact year of his death is not recorded.]

ALBERTI, DURANTE. The family of Alberti is greatly distinguished in the art. Durante Alberti was born at Borgo S. Sepolero, in 1538; and, according to Baglioni, visited Rome when young, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. It was not long before he distinguished himself by painting several pictures for the churches and other public edifices. In the church of S. Girolamo della Carità, one of the chapels is entirely painted by him in fresco, and the altar-piece in oil, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus, with S. Bartolomeo and S. Alessandro. In S. Maria de Monti, he painted the Annunciation. Several other churches at Rome possess the works of this eminent artist. He died in 1613, and was buried with great distinction in the Chiesa del Popolo, attended by all the principal artists in Rome. His portrait is in the academy of St. Luke.

ALBERTI, MICHELE. This painter was probably the brother of Durante, born at Borgo S. Sepolero, about the year 1527. He was a disciple of Daniello Ricciarelli, called da Volterra, and was a reputable painter of history. His principal work is a picture in the church of the Trinità de Monti, at Rome, representing the Murder of the Innocents.

ALBERTI, CHERUBINO. This eminent artist was born at Borgo S. Sepolcro, in 1552. He was the son of Michele Alberti, by whom he was instructed in the art; he became a reputable painter of history, and executed some considerable works at Rome, both in oil and in fresco, where his principal works were in the church of St. Maria in Via. He is, however, more celebrated as an engraver than a painter, and in that character he is deserving of particular attention. It is not ascertained from whom he learned the art of engraving; but, from his manner, especially in his earliest productions, it is very probable that he may have been first a scholar of Cornelius Cort, and afterwards to have formed to himself a more correct and a freer style, by studying the works of Agostino Caracci, and Francesco Villamena. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, and it does not appear that he made use of the point. His drawing, particularly in the naked, is generally correct, and the airs of his heads have a pleasing expression, but his draperies are clumsy and stiff. His works as an engraver may be considered as very extraordinary productions of uncommon genius, at a period when the art of engraving was at a great distance from the perfection to which it afterwards arrived. We are indebted to this artist for having preserved to us, in his prints, some of the beautiful friezes by Polidoro da Caravaggio, painted on the façades of the public edifices which have been destroyed by time.

The prints of this master are very numerous; the whole of his works extend to about 180 plates, 75 of which are from his own designs; the others are from M. Angelo, Raffaele, Polidoro da Caravaggio, Andrea del Sarto, and others. He generally marked his prints with one of these ciphers: $\overset{C}{\text{H}}$, or, $\overset{C}{\text{A}}$.

The following are his principal works.

Cherubino Alberti died in 1615.

[ALBERTI, ANTONIO, of Ferrara, lived in 1450, painted portraits and sacred subjects, and was distinguished in his day. He had a son of the same name, who was also a superior artist, living in 1550. There are numerous painters of the name ALBERTI recorded, but whose genuine works it would be difficult to ascertain.]

ALBERTI, PIETRO FRANCESCO. This artist was the son of Durante Alberti, born in 1584. He painted history in the style of his father, and is the engraver of a plate called Accademia de Pittori, a large print lengthways; a composition of many figures, etched with great spirit, and evidently the work of a painter. It is inscribed Petrus Franciscus Albertus, inv. et fec. [He died in 1638.]

ALBERTI, GIOVANNI, brother of Cherubino Alberti, born at Borgo S. Sepolcro, in 1558, and was instructed in the art by Michele Alberti, his father. According to Baglioni, he visited Rome in the time of Gregory XIII., and was employed by that pontiff in the Vatican. He excelled in painting landscapes and perspective, in which the figures were usually painted by Cherubino. He was also employed by Clement VIII. to paint the sacristy of St. John of Lateran. He died in 1601. His portrait is placed in the academy of St. Luke.

ALBERTINELLI, MARIOTTO. This painter was born at Florence, in 1475. He was the disciple and friend of Fra. Bartolomeo di S. Marco, whose manner he imitated, and whose merit he nearly approached. Vasari asserts, that he was of so unhappy and jealous a disposition, that on hearing some reflections passed on his works, he was so disgusted that he abandoned painting for some time. The persuasion of his friends induced him to return to the exercise of his talents. His works are held in considerable estimation; several of which are to be met with in the churches and convents at Rome, Florence, and Viterbo. At Rome, in the church of S. Silvestro a Monte Cavallo, is a picture by this master, of the Virgin and Infant on a throne, with S. Domenico, and S. Caterina da Siena; and at Florence, one of his best works, representing the Visitation, painted for the Congregazione de Preti, but since transferred into the tribune in the Florentine gallery. He died in 1520.

[ALBERTOLLI, RAFFAELLE, distinguished himself as an engraver in mezzotint and etching, and executed many portraits of eminent persons. He died at Milan in 1812, at the age of 42.]

[ALBERTONI, PAOLO, a follower of Carlo Maratta, and painted in his manner: died about 1695. There are pictures by him in the church of San Carlo, in Santa Maria, and other churches in Rome.]

ALBERTUS, H. C. This artist was a native of Saxony, and flourished about the year 1660. We have by him a portrait of John Seckendorff, Rector and Professor at Zwickau, engraved from a picture painted by himself, [which is considered a fine work of art. He died in 1680.]

ALBINI, ALESSANDRO. According to Malvasia, this painter was a native of Bologna, and a distinguished disciple of the school of the Caracci. He acquired great reputation by some designs he made for the funeral ceremony of Agostino Caracci. In the church of S. Michele in Bosco, at Bologna, is a picture by this master, of the Sepulture of St. Valerian and St. Tiburtinus; and in S. Pietro Martyro, St. Peter, St. Catherine, and St. Cecilia. [He was born in 1586, and died in 1646, according to Zani; others place his birth in 1575.]

[ALBONI, PAOLO, (Oretti calls him Paolo Antonio), was a Bolognese landscape painter. After practising some time in Italy, he went in 1710 to Vienna, where he remained nearly thirteen years, but being deprived of the use of his right side by an attack of paralysis, he returned to Bologna, and commenced painting with his left hand. He imitated the style of Ruysdael and other Dutch masters; but his latter pictures are inferior to his earlier productions. He died in 1734. He had a daughter, Luigia Maria Rosa, who also distinguished herself as a landscape painter.]

ALBORESI, GIACOMO, a Bolognese painter, born in 1632, and was a scholar of Agostino Metelli. He painted historical subjects, but was more celebrated for his pictures of architectural views. He worked chiefly in fresco, and in conjunction with Fulgenzio Mondini, painted for the church of S. Petronio, at Bologna, the Death and Canonization of St. Anthony of Padua. In the church of S. Giacomo Maggiore, he painted some subjects of perspective, in which the figures were by Bartolomeo Passarotti. He died in 1667.

ALBRECHT, C., an obscure German engraver, mentioned by M. Heineken. He worked only for the booksellers, and his plates are so indifferent, that they are not considered by that author worthy of being specified.

ALDE, H. VAN, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He etched a portrait of Gaspar de Charpentier, an ecclesiastic of Amsterdam, from a picture by himself.

ALDEGREVER, HENRY, sometimes incorrectly called Albert Aldegraef. This celebrated artist was born at Zoust, in Westphalia, in 1502. Sandrart has called him Albert, from a misinterpretation of his monogram. Being struck with the beauty of the works of Albert Durer, he went to Nuremberg for the purpose of placing himself as a disciple of that master, whose manner he followed, both as a painter and an engraver; and he became a very able proficient. On his return to his own country, he applied himself at first entirely to painting; and, according to Mr. Fnessli, painted some pictures for the churches and convents, which approach the excellence of Albert Durer. A picture of the Nativity by this master, is mentioned by M. de Piles as an admirable production.* After a few years he devoted himself entirely to engraving, and in that branch acquired a distinguished reputation amongst those artists who are called the little masters, from their having generally engraved plates of a small size. His execution is uncommonly neat; he worked entirely with the graver, in a style that is evidently founded on that of Albert Durer, and his plates are finished with great precision and delicacy. His design, without being incorrect, must, however, be allowed to be Gothic, though not more so than the artists of his country at that time. He usually marked his plates with the cipher AA.

His works are very numerous; the following is as general a list of them as the nature of this work will admit, and comprises all his principal plates: [for fuller information the inquirer is referred to the minute descriptions to be found in Heineken, and Bartsch's "Peintre Graveur."]

[The exact time of the death of this laborious artist is not ascertained; but according to the date, 1562, in some prints by him, it must have taken place subsequently.]

ALDROVANDINI, TOMMASO, an Italian painter, born at Bologna, in 1653. He was instructed in the first principles of design by his uncle Mauro Aldrovandini, an eminent architect. His talent was painting perspective views and architectural subjects, in which the figures were painted by Marc Antonio Franceschini and Carlo Cignani. His most considerable work was the Council Chamber at Genoa, which he executed in conjunction with Franceschini. He died in 1736.

[ALDROVANDINI, POMPEO AGOSTINO, cousin and scholar of Tommaso, was the most celebrated painter of his time in Italy. He was employed much in Dresden, Prague, and Vienna, in the churches, palaces, and theatres, and executed many excellent works in oil, in fresco, and in distemper. He was born in 1677, and died in 1739.]

[ALE, EGIDIUS, of Liege, flourished in the latter half of the 17th century, and was distinguished for the purity of his style, according to the principles of the Roman school. He painted in conjunction with Morandi, Bonatti, and Romanelli; and executed an altar-piece in oil, and the ceilings of the chapels in fresco, for the church of Santa Maria dell' Anima in Rome. He died in 1689.]

[ALEMAGNA, GIOVANNI, called ZOANE, ZUANE, or ZOHAN, a German painter, who flourished in the middle of the 15th century. He painted at Venice, from 1441 to 1451, and in conjunction with Antonio Vivarini, called da Murano; which circumstance has caused some controversy, from the supposition that Zuane stood for Giovanni, a brother of Antonio; but as other pictures bear the inscriptions Johannes di Alemania et Antonius de Muriano pinxit, and Antonio de Muran e Zohan Alemanus pinxit, the question may be considered as decided.]

[ALEMAGNO, GIUSTO DI, a German painter who practised at Genoa, in the 15th century. He painted in fresco an Annunciation in a cloister of S. Maria di Castello, in 1451; Lanzi considers it a precious picture of its sort, finished in the manner of the miniaturists, and which seemed to be the precursor of the style of Albert Durer.]

[ALEMANS, N., a Flemish painter of portraits in miniature, and of animals. He practised chiefly at Brussels.]

ALEN, or OLEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1651. He was an imitator of Melchior Hondekoeter, and his pictures, like those of that master, represent fowls, landscapes, and still-life. Though inferior to Hondekoeter, he represented those objects with great fidelity. [He not only copied Hondekoeter, but other masters of the period, with so much success that his copies and imitations pass for originals. He died in 1698.]

ALENI, TOMMASO, was born at Cremona in 1500, and, according to Orlandi, was a disciple of Galeazzo Campi. He painted history in the style of his instructor, and his works in the church of S. Domenico, at Cremona, where he was employed, in competition with Galeazzo, are so much in the manner of that master that it is difficult to distinguish them. [He died in 1560.]

ALESIO, MATEO PEREZ DE. This painter flourished about the year 1585. He was a Roman by birth; but he is chiefly known by the works he executed in Spain, whither he had been induced to migrate by the liberal protection bestowed on the art by Philip II. It does not, however, appear that he went thither by the invitation of the king, or that he was employed by that monarch in the Escorial. His principal works are his fresco paintings in the churches at Seville. His manner of designing partakes of the grandeur of Michael Angelo. The most remarkable performance of this master, is a colossal picture, painted in fresco, in the cathedral at Seville, representing St. Christopher carrying the infant Saviour on his shoulder. It is of prodigious dimensions, the figure of St. Christopher being nearly forty feet high. Palomino Velasco speaks of this enormous production in very high terms. He painted some other pictures for the church of St. Miguel, and the other public edifices at Seville. After residing some years in Spain, he is said to have quitted it on account of the preference given to the works of Luis de Vargas, whose superiority the candour of Alesio induced him to be one of the first to acknowledge. He returned to Rome, where he died in 1600.

ALESSANDRI, INNOCENZIO, a modern Italian engraver. He was born at Venice about the year 1740, and is said to have been instructed by F. Bartolozzi, before that artist left Venice. He has executed several prints in aquatinta, and in the crayon manner, among which are the following:

Four prints, representing Astronomy, Geometry, Music, and Painting; after Dominico Mayotto.

The Virgin Mary, with the guardian Angels and the Souls in Purgatory; after Seb. Ricci.

The Virgin Mary with a Glory of Angels; after Piazzetta.

The Annunciation; after F. Le Moine.

The Flight into Egypt; after the same painter.

Two Landscapes; after Marco Ricci.

A Set of Twelve Landscapes, after the same.

There are some other trifling prints by him.

[ALEWYN, W., an amateur painter, who made many designs after the pictures of the old masters. He resided at Amsterdam, and at Utrecht, where he died in 1839.]

ALEXANDER, JOHN. This engraver was a native of Scotland, and according to M. Heineken, practised engraving at Rome about the year 1718. His prints are slight etchings, principally after Raffaele, not very correctly drawn, and but very indifferently executed. There is a set of six middle-sized plates, lengthways, dedicated to Cosmo III., grand duke of Tuscany, as follows:

The Benediction of Abraham, dated 1717.

The Sacrifice of Abraham. 1718.

The Angels appearing to Abraham.

The Departure of Lot from Sodom.

Jacob's Ladder. 1718.

Moses and the Burning Bush. 1717.

[ALEXANDER, WILLIAM, an English artist, born at Maidstone in 1768. He accompanied Lord

Macartney to China as draughtsman; the drawings which he made of the scenery and customs of that country served to illustrate Sir George Staunton's Narrative of the Embassy. He also published a work of the Costumes of China. He was teacher of drawing at the Royal Military College at Great Marlow; and afterwards Keeper of the Antiques in the British Museum, where he made the drawings of the marbles and terra-cottas for Taylor Combe's work in 3 vols. He died in 1816.—He was a man of mild, unassuming, and gentlemanly manners, and was much respected by his contemporaries in art, and beloved by the younger students who had access to the antiquities in the Museum.]

[ALFANI, DOMENICO DI PARIS, a native of Perugia, and scholar of Perugino, was born, according to Pascoli, in 1483. He improved on the manner of his master, and his works bear a great resemblance to those of Raphael; and were it not for the delicacy and suavity of the colouring, might be assigned to his school. The reputation of his son Orazio has injured that of his father; and even in Perugia some fine pieces were long considered to be by Orazio, which have since been restored to Domenico. The difficulty of discriminating their works is increased by their having painted in conjunction several altar-pieces; particularly that at the church of the Conventuals at Perugia, which is mentioned by Mariotti. Domenico was living, according to Mariotti, in 1536; and Zani says that he painted in 1553, but does not record the year of his death.]

ALFANI, ORAZIO DI PARIS. According to Morelli, this painter was a native of Perugia, and flourished about the year 1550. He was a scholar of Pietro Perugino, and studied the works of Raffaele, whose graceful manner he imitated with such success, that some of his best pictures have been mistaken for the early productions of that master. He died about the year 1583. [Zani places his birth about 1510.]

ALFIANO, EPIFANIO D', was a monk of S. Salvi, at Valombrosa, and is mentioned by M. Heineken as a lover of the arts, who amused himself with engraving. He engraved a set of plates of festivals and decorations, dated 1592; and a book of writing, in which he styles himself Priore dello Spirito Santo di Firenze.

ALFARO, Y GAMON, DON JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Cordova, in 1640. He was first a scholar of Antonio de Castile, but finished his studies under Don Diego Velasquez, whose manner he followed, particularly in his portraits, which also partake of the pure and tender colouring of Vandyck. In the church of the Carmelites is a fine picture, by Alfaro, of the Incarnation; and in the church of the Imperial College at Madrid, is his celebrated picture of the Guardian Angel.* He died at Madrid in 1680.

* [According to Palomino he was possessed of more vanity than skill. Being employed to paint subjects from the life of St. Francis for the cloister of the convent of that name, he took them from prints, but had the folly to put to each of them Alfaro pinxit. His first master, Castillo, to chastise his vanity, obtained permission to paint one, and placed at the bottom non pinxit Alfaro, which passed into a proverb. He knew very little of design, but was a good colourist, having been employed by Velasquez, when in his school, in copying the works of Titian, Rubens, and Vandyck. He was fond of travelling, was well versed in literature, wrote poetry, and some interesting notes on the Lives of Becerra, Cespedes, and Velasquez. He painted the portrait of Calderon de la Barca, which was placed on the tomb of the poet in the church of San Salvador at Madrid. His conduct towards his patron, the Admiral of Castile, has left a greater stain on his memory than even his vanity. He forsook the Admiral when he was banished, and meanly solicited his patronage when recalled: the repulse he received produced melancholy, and caused his death.]

[ALFON, JUAN, born at Toledo, painted in 1418 several reliquaires for the cathedral, which are still preserved.]

ALFORÆ, NICCOLO GUGLIELMI. This engraver, of whom little is known, was a native of Lorraine, but resided at Rome. There is a set of twelve small upright prints of flowers by this artist, which although not very delicately executed, are done in a masterly style, and with great spirit. They are inscribed Nicholaus Guilielmus Alforæ Lotharingus, fecit, Romæ.

ALGARDI, ALESSANDRO. This eminent artist distinguished himself as an architect, a sculptor, and an engraver. He was born at Bologna, in 1598, and was educated under Giulio Cesare Conventi. As an engraver the few plates we have by him are executed with the graver in a free, bold, and open manner, in the style of Agostino Caracci. He generally marked his plates . The following are attributed to him:

The Crucifixion; a large upright plate.
The Souls delivered from Purgatory; oval.
A Blind Beggar and his Dog; after Caracci.
The Cries of Bologna, after Caracci, in eighty plates, engraved by Algardi, in conjunction with Simon Guillain.

ALGAROTTI, COUNT FRANCESCO. This eminent writer was considered one of the greatest connoisseurs in Europe in painting, sculpture, and architecture. It is affirmed, by M. Heineken, that he designed and engraved for his amusement several plates of heads, in groups, one of which, containing thirteen heads, in the style of the antique, is dated 1744.

ALIAMET, JACQUES, an ingenious French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1728. He was a pupil of J. P. Le Bas, and was first employed in vignettes for the booksellers, but he soon attempted more important works, and distinguished himself by some plates he engraved from the pictures of Vernet. He principally excelled in landscapes and sea-pieces, though he sometimes undertook other subjects.* The following are among his best prints:

A Landscape, with Figures and Cattle; after Berchem.
The Port of Genoa; after the same.
A Landscape, with a Stag-hunt; after the same.
The Female Villagers; after the same.
The Village Pleasures; after the same.
The Spanish Halt; after Wouvermans.
A Guard of Houllans; after the same.
The Moon rising; after A. Vander Neer.
A View of Boom, by Moonlight; after the same.
The Amusements of Winter; after A. Vandervelde.
A Storm; after Vernet.
A Fog; after the same.
A Fire in a Sea-port by Night; after the same.
Two Sea-pieces—The Fishermen, and Return from Fishing; after the same.
Four—The Four Times of the Day; after the same.
Two plates of the Sabbath; after Teniers.
The Birth of Venus; after Jourat.

* [His style of engraving was very neat; he worked with the graver and the dry point, expressed the various degrees of colour well, and carefully avoided any exaggeration of shadow. He died in Paris in 1788.]

ALIAMET, FRANÇOIS GERMAIN, younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Abbeville, in 1734. After having learned engraving at Paris, he came to London, and was for some time under Sir Robert Strange. He has engraved several portraits, and historical subjects, of which the following are the principal :

Mrs. Pritchard, in the Character of Hermione; after Pine.

Portrait of Dr. Sharp.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Caracci.

The Circumcision; after Guido, oval.

The Annunciation; after Le Moine.

St. Ignatius kneeling; after the same.

The Stoning of Stephen; after Le Sueur.

The Sacrifice to Pan; after A. Sacchi.

The Flattery of the Courtiers of Canute reproved; after Pine.

The Reduction of Calais; after the same.

Two—The Bathers; after Watteau.

[His works are considered inferior to his brother's, although his line is neat and firm. The time of his death is not known.]

ALIBERTI, GIOVANNI CARLO, a Piedmontese painter, born at Asti, in 1680. It is not stated under whom he studied; but, according to Lanzi, he executed several considerable works in fresco in the churches of his native city. He painted the cupola of the church of S. Agostino, representing that saint taken up into heaven surrounded by angels; and in the same church, a picture of S. Agostino baptizing a number of children, and other figures. The composition is ingenious, with a fine expression in the heads, and embellished with architecture. He died in the year 1740.

[His style consists of a mixture of Maratta, of Gio. da S. Giovanni, and of Coreggio; heads and feet that might be attributed to Guido or Domenichino; forms peculiar to the Caracci, drapery of Paolo, and colours of Guercino.]

ALIBRANDI, GIROLAMO, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina, in 1470. He studied at Venice under Gio. Bellini, and was the friend of Giorgione. He afterwards went to Milan, where he became a disciple of Leonardo da Vinci. His works are chiefly at Messina, of which one of the principal is a large picture of the Purification, in the Chiesa della Candelora. He died of the plague in 1524.

ALIENSE. See VASSILACCHI.

ALIX, JOHN, a French painter and engraver, who was a scholar of Philip de Champagne. Of his works, as a painter, we have no account; but he exercised the point for his amusement. There is an etching by him, of a Holy Family, after Raffaele, executed in a very light and pleasing style. It is marked R. V. P., for Raffaele Urbino, pinxit.

[ALIX, P. M., born at Honfleur in 1752, was a scholar of Le Bas. He engraved with the roulette a set of portraits of eminent men, which were printed in colours. In 1804 he published a large portrait of Napoleon in his coronation robes, in the same style. He died in 1809.]

[ALLAN, DAVID, a Scotch painter, was born at Alloa in 1744. He received the rudiments of his art in the academy at Glasgow, founded by Robert and Andrew Foulis, the printers. He went to Italy to pursue his studies, and gained the prize medal given by the academy of St. Luke, for the best historical composition. It is said that he resided there for some years, and painted landscapes in the style of Gaspar Poussin; but, judging from his etchings and the engravings made by Paul Sandby of the Sports of the Carnival by Allan, his studies must have been in a different direction. These productions are very poor affairs in every point of view: he may be more favourably seen in the illustrations of Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd." Mr. Allan died in 1796.]

ALLARD, ABRAHAM, an engraver and print-seller of Leyden. M. Heineken mentions twelve plates of views of towns engraved by this artist; and amongst the miscellaneous prints at the British Museum, is a large print, lengthways, representing the Garden of Love, entitled Het Lust. Hof. van Flora; partly etched, and finished with the graver in a stiff, clumsy style, inscribed A. Allart cecinit. C. Allart edit.

ALLARD, CHARLES, an engraver and printseller. According to Heineken, he scraped some mezzotintos. Of his engravings, there are, amongst the loose prints in the British Museum, four plates of the Seasons, represented in half-length figures, executed in a coarse, heavy style, without any taste.

ALLARD, HUYCH, a Dutch engraver, by whom we have some portraits, amongst which is that of David Gloxin, I. V. D.; and that of Adrianus Paw, Legat. Holland; both signed with his name.

[ALLEGRAIN, ETIENNE, a French painter, born in Paris in 1655, painted landscapes which were much esteemed: he died in 1736.]

[ALLEGRAIN, GABRIEL, son and pupil of Etienne, painted in the manner of his father: he died in 1748.]

[ALLEGRI, LORENZO, uncle to the celebrated Antonio Allegri, called Correggio, and was his first instructor in the rules of art. A Madonna, painted in 1511, and ascribed to Antonio, is supposed to be by Lorenzo; and, although the style is but middling, it is softer in tone than that of the chief part of its contemporaries, and nearer to the modern manner. He died in 1527, leaving his property to his brother Pelligrino, and his nephew Antonio, by whom he was much beloved.]

ALLEGRI, ANTONIO DA COREGGIO; or, as he sometimes signed himself, ANTONIO LIETO DA COREGGIO.* This illustrious painter may be regarded as one of those rare examples of innate and daring genius which, without a precursor, and deprived by circumstances of the advantages of technical education, ventures to supply those deficiencies from the resources of the mind. He was born at Coreggio, a small town in the duchy of Modena, in 1494. Of his origin nothing is accurately known.† The Padre Orlandi and Sandrart assert, that he was of a noble family, named de Allegris; that he received an education suited to his rank, and that he lived in affluence, and died rich. On the other hand, he is stated, by Vasari, to have been the son of a labourer, and that he lived and died in indigence. The elevated sentiments discernible in his works, and his knowledge of architecture, with other acquirements, appear to corroborate the statement of his having received a cultivated education; but the established fact of his having died of a fever, brought on by his anxiety to bring home to his family, in hot weather, on foot, a small sum paid him at Parma, in copper, is a powerful contradiction of the affluence of his circumstances.* He is said, by some of the Italian biographers, to have been instructed in the art by Francesco Bianchi,† and Giovanni Murani, called Il Frari. However that may be, it is evident this wonderful man owed little of his celebrity to any thing he could acquire from such assistance; that he was the sole founder of his fame, and the first establisher of that admirable system of grace, grandeur, and harmony, which has not hitherto been equalled, and is not likely to be surpassed. The most important work of Coreggio, is the cupola of the cathedral at Parma, finished in 1530; and it has ever been considered as one of the most extraordinary productions of the art. Its form is octangular, in which he has painted, in fresco, the Assumption of the Virgin. In the lower part of the composition, he has represented the apostles in pious admiration of the event. In the upper part is the Virgin Mary, surrounded by an immense congregation of the blessed, and environed by an infinite number of angels; some throwing incense, others chanting, rejoicing, and triumphantly applauding; in their heads the most angelic expression of joy and festivity, whilst a beautiful effusion of light is spread over the whole, forming a spectacle truly celestial. Notwithstanding the dusky hue which this admirable work has now assumed from the smoke of the tapers constantly burning in the church, and the disadvantage of a very unfavourable light, the grandeur of the forms, the admirable conduct of the design, and the astonishing effect of light and shadow in this stupendous performance,

† ["He is said to have been instructed by Francesco Bianchi." It is possible that he may have received some instruction from Bianchi, when in his fifteenth or sixteenth year; but the probability is that he took his first lessons from his uncle Lorenzo Allegrì, a painter, with whom he appears to have been a great favourite, and who bequeathed to him one-half of his property at his death. Antonio Bartolotti, called Tognino, however, appears to have been his first instructor in the more erudite parts of design. Some writers say that he was pupil to Lionardo da Vinci; others, to Andrea Mantegna; there is no substantial proof that he ever practised in their schools. In other matters of learning, it appears that Giovanni Berni taught him the elements; that B. Marastoni instructed him in eloquence and poetry; and that he studied anatomy and philosophy under Gianbatista Lombardi, who was public professor at Bologna, and afterwards at Ferrara.]

continue to excite the surprise and admiration of every judicious beholder. The dome of the church of St. Giovanni, of the Benedictines, at Parma, is another splendid display of the powers of this great painter. It represents the Ascension of our Saviour, with the twelve apostles, and the doctors of the church; which may be considered as a model of perfection, for the copious and masterly composition, and the correctness and grandeur of the design. Of his oil paintings, we have first to notice his celebrated picture called the St. Jerome of Coreggio. It represents the Virgin Mary seated, with the infant Jesus on her knee; Mary Magdalene, kneeling, embraces the foot of the Saviour, whilst St. Jerome presents a scroll to an angel. For the church of St. Giovanni he painted two altar-pieces, one representing the Descent from the Cross, and the other the Martyrdom of St. Placido. These inestimable pictures, the St. Jerome, and the two last mentioned, have been torn from their venerable situations by the revolutionary eruption of France, and are now deposited in that receptacle of spoliation and plunder, the Museum of the Louvre.‡ In the gallery at Dresden, is his famous work called the Notte,§ representing the Nativity, and an exquisite little picture of the Magdalene reading.||

This extraordinary genius is justly regarded as one of the great luminaries of the art; to him it is indebted for one of its most effective illusions, the faculty of foreshortening; and he has confessedly carried the magic of the chiaro-scuro to the highest possible pitch. Without having wandered from his obscure home, without having visited Rome, or contemplated the beauties of antiquity,¶ he was the

‡ To the honour of the French artists then resident at Rome, they presented a memorial to the National Convention, stating the injury the cultivation of art would receive from removing those chef-d'œuvres, and others, from the situation for which they were originally painted. A document, as estimable for the elegance of its composition, as for the liberal sentiment from which it emanated. It is, perhaps, superfluous to remark, that this amiable appeal met with the reception that might be expected from such a tribunal.

§ ["In the gallery at Dresden, is his famous work called the Notte." This picture it appears was painted originally for Messer Giulio Perdoniera, or Alberto Pratonieri, who agreed to pay for it scudi quaranta et un Proco grosso e grasso. This contract, it is said, Antonio communicated in a letter to his friend and scholar Lelio Orsi; and, in another account, that Lelio had a share in the transaction. The reader may place both in the same category with the copper money that caused Antonio's death.]

|| ["The Magdalene reading." It is supposed, and with good reason, that this picture was painted by desire of Manfredò, governor of Mantua, or of Veronica Gambara, the widow of his brother Giberto, lord of Correggio, to present to Charles V., when he visited, for the second time, his dominions in Italy in 1532, as a valuable and acceptable offering to a monarch who was a warm admirer and an intelligent judge of painting, and as a specimen of the ability that existed in the cities under their government. Let it be recollected that Giulio Romano, and other eminent painters, were, on that occasion, called to Mantua to decorate public buildings for this monarch's reception; and it is with great probability stated that Antonio painted in fresco the palace of Veronica Gambara for that purpose. It may not be out of place to mention here, that on the 24th of January, 1534, (the year in which he died,) Antonio is found in the palace of Manfredò in Correggio as a witness to the marriage contract between Clara of Correggio, daughter of Gian Francesco, and Ippolito, son of Veronica Gambara. This lady, Clara, some years afterwards, was sponsor to the child of Pomponio, the son of Antonio: a proof of affectionate regard to his memory.]

creator of the grandeur of his own. His forms are exquisitely soft and beautiful; and the airs of his heads exhibit a graceful tenderness of expression that is truly inimitable. His colouring is equally delicate and pure with that of Titian, with more of the impasto; and, in point of breadth of effect, he is undoubtedly his superior. [He died suddenly on the fifth day of March, 1534, in his fortieth year, and was buried with becoming pomp, in the church of San Francesco, at the foot of the altar in the chapel of the Arrivabene.]

It has been much disputed by the writers on engraving, whether this distinguished painter ever amused himself with the point. The Abbé Marolles asserts that he engraved several plates, which is positively denied by M. Heineken, whose claim to authenticity is certainly preferable. We have, however, a few etchings, signed Ant. Correg. fec.; but they are very slight, and are executed in a style greatly inferior to what might be expected from the hand of that master.*

[Although none of the writers of the time embodied a clear account of the events of Antonio's life, sufficient may be gathered from the authentic documents discovered by Tiraboschi, Antonioli, and Pungilione, to show that he was held in the highest esteem by his contemporaries. That he was of a cheerful and lively disposition may be gathered from the expression of a writer respecting him, "La vivacità e dal bro del nostro Antonio;" yet gentle and affectionate, as appears by his being sponsor on three occasions to infants of friends (in 1511, 1516, and 1518) before he had reached his twenty-second year. In 1520 he was admitted, by diploma, a brother of the Congregation Cassinensi at the monastery of St. John the Evangelist at Parma; a fraternity of which the illustrious Tasso was a member. In the same year he married Girolamo Merlini, a lady of good family, great beauty, and amiable manners, who fell in love with him, and who was his model for the 'Zingara,' probably after the birth of his first child.

without having visited Rome, or contemplated the beauties of antiquity." It is not ascertained whether Antonio ever visited Rome, but it is certain that he spent some time in Mantua, on two occasions, with the Marchese Manfredi, and the celebrated patroness of arts and letters, Veronica Gambara, widow of Giberto, lord of Correggio. There he had an opportunity of examining the works of Andrea Mantegna, the frescoes of Costa, of Lion-Bruno, and Dosso; also the grand collection of pictures, cameos, medals, and antiquities of Isabella da Este.]

* ["It has been much disputed by writers on engraving," &c. The question is now pretty generally given up, as no print has yet been ascribed to him, against which there are not valid objections as to the authenticity. Pungilione has given an account and description of an extraordinary wood print of St. Thomas, one of the figures in the cupola at Parma, of the size of four feet seven inches in height, and three feet four inches in breadth, French measure. This print, he says, was in the possession of Signor Alfonso Franceschi, a painter, and it is said to have all the characteristics of originality; but, he adds, it is unknown to whom the honour of engraving it is to be given, though it is certain it was done in the 16th century. Signor Franceschi obtained it with other cartoons by Rondani, and sketches by Allegri for the two cupolas, which had lain unobserved and decaying in the corner of a chamber of the cathedral of Parma. Zanì and Brulliot refer to two prints, each representing the Virgin and Child, one of which has the figure of a HEART with the word REGIO over it, as a rebus of CORREGGIO; the other, a heart with a dual coronet, and the word INVENT on it. These marks are evidently caprices of the engravers, as Antonio never signed his works in this manner. The same writers refer to some other prints ascribed to Correggio, but which are in their opinion evidently from his designs, or pictures, by engravers of a later period.]

By her he had three daughters and one son. She died at Parma, in 1529, to the great grief of her husband, and was buried, by her own desire, in the church of St. John there. He did not marry a second time. It appears by the public registers of Correggio that, at the time of Antonio's death, his father Pelligrino possessed considerable property in land, houses, and merchandise.]

ALLEGRI, POMPONEO, was the son of Correggio, born in 1522. He had commenced the first rudiments of art under that great master, when he was deprived of the advantage of his instruction by the death of his father when he was only twelve years of age. He is said to have continued his studies after Correggio's death, under Francesco Maria Rondani, the ablest disciple of his father. In the cathedral at Parma, there is a work in fresco, by Pomponeo, representing Moses showing the Israelites the Tables of the Law; in which, though there are many defects as a whole, there are beautiful parts, and some heads full of Correggiques expression; and, above all, an excellent colour.

ALLEGRI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1746. We have the following plates by him:

The Virgin Mary with the infant Jesus; half figures, with this inscription, Egreditur virgo de radice, &c.
The Circumcision; inscribed Guis. Allegri, Stamp. &c.
The Stoning of Stephen.
A small print of Rinaldo and Armida.
A large architectural Scene, lengthways; after Chamont.

ALLEGRI, FRANCESCO, a designer and engraver, born at Florence about the year 1729. In 1762, he published, in conjunction with his brother, a collection of one hundred portraits of the family of the Medici, with a frontispiece, engraved by himself. He also engraved fourteen portraits of Florentine poets, painters, and other eminent personages. We have also a print by him of the image of St. Francis d'Assisi, which is held in much veneration at Florence.

ALLEGRI, FRANCESCO, called DA GUBBIO. This painter was born in 1587, and was a disciple of Cavaliere Gioseffo Cesare d'Arpino. He painted history with reputation, and executed several works, both in oil and in fresco, for the churches and palaces at Rome. He had a great number of scholars, amongst which were his two sons, Flaminio and Angelo, who also painted history. He died in 1663.

ALLEMAND. See L'ALLEMAND.

ALLEN, FLOPPART VAN, a German designer and engraver, who flourished about the year 1686. The view of the city of Vienna engraved by Muller, is from a drawing by this artist, made in 1686; and he has engraved himself a large plate of the city of Prague, a slight print, with several figures, marked with his name, van Allen.

ALLET, JEAN CHARLES. This artist was a designer and engraver, born at Paris about the year 1668. He resided a long time in Italy, and is supposed to have died at Rome in 1732. Owing to his having marked his plates sometimes Charles, and sometimes Jean Charles, the collectors were for some time inclined to believe there were two artists of the name of Allet; but from the evident similarity in the style, it is no longer doubted those plates are by the same hand. He engraved several portraits and subjects from sacred history. In his execution he appears to have wished to imitate the manner of F. Spierre and Corn. Bloemaert, but he has not been very successful in his imitation. His principal plates are the following :

PORTRAITS AND HEADS.

Andrea Pozzo, Painter and Architect ; dated 1712.
Cardinal Aloisio Amodè ; after J. M. Morandù, 1698.
Ferdinand Charles de Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua ; after Ant. Lesma.

SUBJECTS FROM SACRED HISTORY.

The Conception of the Virgin ; after And. Pozzo ; oval.
The Adoration of the Shepherds ; after S. de Pesaro.
The Virgin Mary and St. Joseph adoring the infant Jesus ; after the same.
The Saviour brought before Pilate ; after P. de Petris.
Ananias restoring Sight to St. Paul ; after P. de Cortona.
The Vision of St. Paul ; from the same painter.

These two plates are considered his best works in historical subjects.

The Death of a Saint, in presence of the Virgin, St. Joseph, and St. Francis Xavier.
The Death of St. Stanislaus Kostka ; after P. le Gros, sculptor.
St. Gaëtan, accompanied with a figure of Religion, and Christ holding his Cross ; after Laz. Baldi.

Twelve plates of the Life of Christ ; after Passeri, engraved in conjunction with A. V. Westerhout.

ALLOISI. See GALANINO.

ALLORI, ALESSANDRO, called BRONZINO. This artist was born at Florence in 1535. He was the son of a painter ; but having the misfortune of losing his father when he was only five years of age, he was placed under the care of his uncle, Agnolo Bronzino, who brought him up with all the affection of a parent. Before he was seventeen years of age, he had made such progress under this able master, that he painted, from his own design, an altar-piece representing the Crucifixion, a composition of several figures ingeniously arranged, and well coloured. When he was nineteen, he visited Rome, where he remained two years. The chief objects of his admiration and study in that city, were the works of M. Angelo Buonaroti ; and the grand style of that master is discernible in his pictures. On his return to Florence, he was greatly occupied by the churches and other public edifices. He was, however, occasionally prevailed on to paint the portraits of some of the distinguished personages of his time, which he treated in a great and admirable style. In 1590, he published a book on the art of drawing the human figure, illustrated with anatomical prints, from his designs. [Some of his pictures in Rome, representing horses, are beautiful. His Sacrifice of Isaac, in the Royal Museum, is coloured almost in the Flemish style. He was expert in portrait painting, but he abused his talent by introducing portraits in the modern costume in ancient histories, a fault not uncommon in that age. On the whole his genius appears to have been equal to every branch of painting ; but it was unequally exercised, and consequently unequally expanded. Lanzi.] He died in 1607.

ALLORI, CRISTOFANO, called BRONZINO, son of the preceding artist, born at Florence in 1577. He was for some time instructed in the art by his father, but he afterwards studied under Santo di Titi, and finally improved himself in colouring, by imitating the harmonious tinting of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli. He painted several considerable works for the churches and convents at Florence, and for the palace of the Medici. He was also a very celebrated portrait painter ; and many of the most distinguished persons of his time were painted by him. [Owing to vicious habits that often seduced him from his labours, his works are extremely rare, and he himself comparatively little known. The St. Julian of the Pitti palace is the grandest effort of his genius ; his picture of Judith with the head of Holofernes is, however, more generally known. Judith, so beautifully and magnificently attired, is a portrait of his mistress ; the attendant is that of her mother, and the head of Holofernes that of the painter. Numerous copies of this, and duplicates of his most celebrated pictures, are scattered over Italy ; the productions of his scholars Tanteri, Bruno, Certosini, Cervini, and others.] He died in 1621.

[ALLSTON, WASHINGTON, a native of America, but an English painter, was an associate of the Royal Academy. He produced in England several pictures of great excellence ; particularly Jacob's Dream, a Dead Man revived by touching the Bones of Elisha, Elijah in the Desert, Uriel in the Sun, and others of high imaginative quality. He returned to his native country, where he devoted himself to elegant studies in literature as well as painting ; married a sister of the celebrated Dr. Channing, whom he survived several years, and died in 1843. It is not certain under what master he studied ; Nagler says that it was in the school of Sir Joshua Reynolds, but this is not sufficiently established ; Northcote does not mention him among the scholars, nor does his style of painting warrant the supposition.]

ALMELOVËN, JOHN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born about the year 1614 [according to Huber and Rost ; in 1624 according to others.] He is more known by some etchings of landscapes, executed with great lightness and intelligence, than by any thing he has left us as a painter. His plates are,

A set of twelve Landscapes, with small Figures ; J. Almeloven, inv. et fec.

Six mountainous Landscapes, with Figures ; Joan. ab Almeloven, inv. et fec.

Four Landscapes, the four Seasons ; after H. Safflevenen. [And several others after his own designs, and those of Safflevenen.]

The time of his death is not known.]

[ALPHEN, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch portrait painter, lived in 1620.]

[ALS, PETER, a Danish historical and portrait painter, born at Copenhagen in 1725 ; after gaining the first great prize given by the academy at Copenhagen in 1755, he went to Rome and entered the school of Mengs. He occupied himself chiefly in copying the pictures of Raphael and Andrea del Sarto, which it is said that he did with great accuracy. On his return to his own country he painted some good portraits ; but his colouring was too sombre to give a pleasing effect to his pictures of females, and he also laboured his work so much as frequently deprived them of all animation. It is singular that, after copying Raphael and Andrea del Sarto with great accuracy, he should fall into a practice so opposite to those masters ; but it affords another instance of the utter worthlessness of students copying instead of studying the works of their great predecessors. Als died in 1775.]

[ALSLOOT, DENIS VAN, a distinguished landscape and portrait painter, flourished about 1612.]

[ALTAMONTE, or ALTOMONTI, MARTINO, born at Naples in 1657, (or, according to some writers, in 1682,) painted history and architecture, and ranks among the better artists of his time. He died in 1745.]

ALTDORFER, ALBERT, a painter, and a more eminent engraver, was born at Altdorf, in Bavaria, in 1488. It has been asserted by some writers, that he was a native of Switzerland, but it has been very satisfactorily proved by M. Heineken that he was a Bavarian. He is said to have been a scholar of Albert Durer; and it is not improbable, from the resemblance of their manner, both in their pictures and engravings, particularly in their wooden cuts, although it must be confessed that Altdorfer did not equal that great artist in any of his works. Some of the paintings of this artist are preserved with great care at Ratisbon; and in the town-house is a complete collection of his engravings. As an engraver, he holds a very respectable rank amongst those artists that are distinguished by the appellation of the little masters; and his wooden cuts, which are by far the best of his performances, nearly approach to the excellence of those of Holbein. His entire work, on wood and copper, is upwards of one hundred and seventy prints; but as some of them are of little consequence, the following list of them is likely to satisfy the curious collector. The two monograms used by this master

[ALTHAM, —, a German painter, who flourished about 1660; he painted landscapes and marine subjects with considerable ability.]

[ALTISSIMO, CRISTOFANO DELL', a Florentine painter, who flourished about 1568, was a scholar of Bronzino, and an excellent portrait painter. He copied a series of portraits of illustrious men, in the possession of the Conti Giovio, for Cosmo I. of Florence. He paid more attention to the features than to other circumstances, and they are very faithfully expressed; his pictures, in general, have a high degree of finishing without an appearance of labour. The family name of this painter was Papi, but neither the year of his birth nor death has been ascertained: he was living in 1568.]

[ALTOBELLO, FRANCESCO ANTONIO, a Neapolitan painter of the 17th century, was a scholar of Massino Stanzioni, and is probably the same as Antonio de Bellis, an artist of great promise, who studied under that master, and died young in 1656. In the accounts of both it is stated that they did not follow the manner of their master; Altobello used ultramarine excessively in his pictures, which was contrary to Stanzioni's practice; de Bellis painted in the manner of Guercino, in which it abounds. Both are mentioned with like commendations, as men of genius, correct in drawing, of good invention, and skilful in composition.]

[ALTOBELLO of Cremona, lived in the early part of the sixteenth century, and is praised by Vasari in his Life of Garofalo, as being superior to most of the Lombard painters of his time. He painted frescoes in the cathedral of Cremona, and in a chapel of the church of St. Agostino there; he painted also at Milan. Resta says he was a scholar of Bramante; and Lomazzo calls him Altobello da Melone.]

ALTOMONTE, ANDREA, an Italian engraver, who resided at Vienna about 1723. He assisted A. J. de Prenner, in engraving the plates from the pictures in the Imperial Gallery, published in that year.

ALTZENBACK, WILLIAM, an engraver, who, according to M. Heineken, flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He lived at Strasburg, and, in conjunction with his son, executed twenty plates of Bible subjects.

ALUNNO, NICCOLO. This painter was born at Foligno, about the year 1450. According to the usage of the painters before Pietro Perugino, he painted in distemper, and his colouring has still preserved its original lustre. In the church of S. Niccolo at Foligno, is an altar-piece by him, of the Virgin and Infant, with Saints; and in the same church is his picture of the Pieta, so highly commended by Vasari. Some of his works are dated soon after 1500. [Mariotti, however, states that he painted as early as 1458, and that in 1460 he was established as a painter in Foligno. His works were numerous, and highly esteemed in his time.]

[ALVAREZ, LORENZO, studied at Valladolid and Madrid under B. Carducho; he established himself at Murcia, in 1638, and executed several works in the convents there, that are not without merit.]

AMALTEO, POMPONIO, was born at S. Vito, a town in the Friuli, about the year 1505, and, according to Ridolfi, was a relation, and the scholar, of Pordenone. He painted several historical works in the churches and public places in the vicinity of Friuli. At Belluno, there are some pictures painted by this master, representing subjects of Roman history, in one of the public halls. [The pictures said to be from Roman history, are probably the Three Judgments in a lozzia at Ceneda, supposed by Ridolfi to have been painted by Pordenone, but were really the work of Amalteo, and finished by him in 1536. He was living in 1577, as appears by his name and date on a picture: Zani places his death in 1588.]

[AMALTEO, GIROLAMO, the brother of Pomponio, was instructed by him, and gave proofs of a noble genius, which is manifested in his works of design in small pictures, which appeared like miniatures, in several fables executed in fresco, and in altar-pieces which he painted in the church of San Vito. Ridolfi commends him highly for his spirited manner; and another of the old writers gives his opinion that if he had flourished for a longer period he would have proved no way inferior to the great Pordenone. He died young. Graziano, in his poem of Orlando, styles him "Girolamo Amalteo de' vita santo."]

AMATO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO D', called IL VECCHIO. This painter was born at Naples about the year 1475. He was the disciple of Silvestro Bruno, or Buono, an old Neapolitan painter then in repute, but did not study long under him, as he died when this artist was young; he afterwards applied himself to the study of the works of Pietro Perugino, whose manner he followed. There are several of his works in the churches at Naples. In S. Domenico Maggiore, in the chapel of the family of Carrafa, is a picture by this master of the Holy Family. He worked both in oil and in fresco, and was an artist of considerable eminence, [and had a great number of scholars. Though professionally a painter, his favourite study was theology; and he was celebrated for his expositions of many obscure passages of Scripture.] He died in 1555.

[AMATO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO D', the younger, was nephew to the former, and was born at Naples in 1535. He excelled chiefly in colouring, and some of his pictures are as richly coloured as those of Titian. His best work is the large altar-piece of the infant Christ in the church of the Banco de' Poveri at Naples, where he died in 1598.]

AMATO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver. Of his paintings little is known; but he has left some slight etchings, which are executed with spirit, in the style of Biscaino, among which are the following:

St. Joseph seated, reading a Book, with the infant Jesus near him, an upright plate; inscribed Franciscus Amatus, inv.

St. Jerome, a similar-sized plate; with same name. The Prodigal Son.

[AMATRICE, DELL' COLA, is mentioned by Vasari in his Life of Calabrese. He painted in 1533, and resided in Ascoli del Picino; he had a distinguished name through all that province. His manner was hard in his earlier pictures, but in his subsequent works he exhibited a fulness of design, and an accomplished modern style. He is extolled in the Guida di Ascoli for his picture in the oratory of the Corpus Domini, which represents the Saviour in the act of dispensing the Eucharist to the Apostles.]

[AMBERES, FRANCISCO DE, a painter and sculptor of Toledo, the cathedral of which he ornamented with his pictures in 1502; from 1508 to 1510 he painted, in conjunction with Jean de Bourgonne and Villoldo, the arabesque chapel, which is still an interesting object.]

[AMBERES, MIGUEL DE, a Spanish painter, who was originally of Antwerp, flourished about 1640. Several of his pictures are to be found in the churches and religious establishments in Spain. His portraits are said to be painted in the manner of Vandyck.]

AMBERGER, CHRISTOPHER. This artist was born at Nuremberg about the year 1485; [Michel says 1490.] He was the disciple of Hans Holbein, [the elder,] and painted so much in the style of that master, that his works have been sometimes mistaken for those of Holbein. He painted a set of twelve pictures, representing the History of Joseph and his Brethren, which gained him great reputation. He succeeded, however, better in portraits than historical subjects. In 1530, he painted the Emperor Charles V.; and Sandrart reports, with a pardonable partiality for the fame of his countryman, that this portrait was considered by that monarch equal to any of the pictures painted of him by Titian. He certainly honoured him with a gold chain and medal on the occasion. [Fiorillo says that he imitated and copied the portraits of the younger Holbein, and that many of those pictures are considered originals by Holbein.] He died at Augsburg in 1550, [according to some; but Zani says in 1563.]

AMBROGI, DOMENICO, called MENICHINO DEL BRIZIO. According to Malvasia, this painter acquired that name from his being the scholar of Francesco Brizio. He was a native of Bologna, and distinguished himself as a painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. He also excelled in representing landscapes, perspective, and architectural views, and was much employed in the churches and palaces at Bologna. In S. Giacomo Maggiore, is a picture by this painter of the Guardian Angel, and in the Nunziata, S. Francesco, with a glory of angels. In 1653, he published some wooden cuts, from his own designs, printed in chiaro-scuro, of which one represented a woman in a triumphal car, holding two flambeaux, and a serpent, conducted by Neptune.

[AMELSFOORT, QUIRINUS VAN, born at Boile-duc in 1760, and died there in 1820. He painted allegories, history, and portraits; in the last the likenesses were remarkable for their truth.]

AMICI, FRANCESCO, a modern Italian engraver, who, according to M. Heineken, engraved some small plates of devout subjects, among which are,

Christ praying in the Garden.

Christ before Pontius Pilate.

The entombing of Christ.

AMICONI, or AMIGONI, OTTAVIO, was born at Brescia in 1605, and was a scholar of Antonio Gandini. His chief excellence was in fresco painting, which he treated with great ability, [and in the manner of P. Veronese.] In the Carmelite church, in his native city, is a very considerable work in fresco, executed in conjunction with Bernardino Gandini, the son of his master, which is much extolled by Averoldi. The subjects were taken from the Life of S. Alberto. He died in 1661.

AMICONI, or AMIGONI, JACOPO. This artist was born at Venice in 1675. He painted history and portraits. His first works at Venice were two altar-pieces in the church of the fathers of the oratorio, and a picture of St. Catharine and St. Andrew, for the church of St. Eustachio. He afterwards visited Rome, and from thence went to Munich, where he settled for some time; but his chief performances are in England, where he came in 1729, and resided many years. Whatever may be the merit of his works, they were for some time in great vogue. He was employed by several of the nobility in ornamenting their houses. After leaving England, he visited Spain, and died at Madrid, in 1758. He etched a few plates in a tame, spiritless style, of which the following are the principal:

Salvator Mundi; half length.

Jupiter and Calisto.

Zephrus and Flora.

The Four Elements; in the style of Watteau.

AMIDANO, POMPONEO. This painter was a native of Parma, and flourished, according to Lanzi, about the year 1595: From the resemblance of his works to those of Parmigiano, he is supposed to have frequented his school. If not his disciple, he was one of the most successful followers of his style. The airs of his heads are noble and graceful, and his design full of taste. His best performance is his picture in the church della Madonna del Quartiere, [which has been mistaken by good judges for the work of Parmigiano. Orlandi relates that many of the pictures of Amidano were purchased by foreigners; it is to be apprehended that, as his name does not occur in any of our catalogues, the majority of those ascribed to Parmigiano are by Amidano.]

[AMIGAZZI, GIO. BATTISTA, a painter of the Venetian school, was a scholar of C. Ridolfi; his chief talent consisted in the excellence of his copies: in San Carlo is one from a Supper by P. Veronese, not only finely drawn, but exhibiting colours fresh and vivid even at the present day.]

AMLING, CARL GUSTAVUS, a designer and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1651. He was taken under the protection of the Elector of Bavaria, who sent him to Paris for improvement, where he received the instruction of F. de Poilly, whose manner he followed, but whose excellence he never equalled, although a very respectable artist. He engraved a great number of plates, of historical subjects and portraits, but was much more successful in the latter, many of which have great merit. His drawing, particularly in the nude, is not correct; and in all his prints, except his portraits, there is a want of effect. The following list comprises all his plates, except those he engraved for the academy of Sandrart, and some prints after tapestry, which were private plates in the possession of the Elector of Bavaria. [He died in 1701.]

PORTRAITS.

Another large plate, representing the Virgin Mary treading on the Serpent, accompanied by the four Doctors of the Church; Amling, fec.

AMMAN, JUSTUS. This artist was a painter and an engraver, but owes his reputation chiefly to his excellence in the last-mentioned branch of art. He was born at Zurich in Switzerland, in 1539. Of his paintings we have no further account, than that his works in stained glass were richly and brilliantly coloured. His pen-drawings partake of the spirit and neatness of his prints, and are preserved in the portfolios of the curious. As an engraver, he was one of the most laborious of the industrious artists of his country, who have so ably and amply contributed to the advancement of the art. The number of his plates is prodigious, and his work amounts to upwards of five hundred and fifty prints, many of which being of a diminutive size, he is ranged among the artists denominated the little masters. He engraved on wood and on copper, but the latter are very inferior to the former. His drawing, in general, is tolerably correct; and his execution, particularly in his animals, is smart and spirited; his manner of engraving is neat and decided. This artist used no less than six different marks in his plates, but they all consist in a cipher composed of the letters I. and A. as follows :

COPPER PLATES.

- Twelve small plates arched—Of illustrious Women, beginning with Eve: title, Eva die Gebeverinn. Jost. Amman, fec.; Stef. Herman, exc.
- Eight figures of Warriors, small upright plates; marked, Jost. Amman, Inventor; Stefan. Herman. 1590.
- Eight plates—Of Persons fighting with Swords and Sticks; small plates, lengthways; marked with his cipher.
- Six very small plates of friezes, lengthways, Huntings.
- Eight small plates, lengthways, the Four Seasons, and the Four Elements. 1569.
- Twelve small upright plates arched—Of the Months in the Year, represented in full-length figures; Jo. Amman, fec.
- A set of plates for a Bible published at Francfort. 1571.
- The Bombardment of a Town; Jo. Amman, fec. 1570.
- Large plate, lengthways.
- Effigies Casparis de Colignon; fecit Norimbergæ, Jost. Amman, Tigurinis. 1573.

- An oval print, the Diet of the Empire; large, lengthways.
- The Marriage of Cana; middle-sized print, lengthways, J. A.
- A set of one hundred and fifteen prints of Arts and Trades, first printed under the title, Искусства, omnium liberalium mechanicarum, &c., printed at Francfort in 1564. This edition is very scarce; the book was reprinted in 1574, and again in 1588.
- A set of one hundred and three prints of subjects from the Roman History, published at Francfort, in 1572, 1573, with the Portrait of S. Feyerabendt, the celebrated bookseller.
- A book of Huntings; entitled Neue Figuren aller hand Jagd, &c. Francfort, 1582.

- A set of one hundred and twenty prints for a book; entitled Gynæceum, sive Theatrum Mulierum, &c. Francfort, 1586.

This laborious artist died at Nuremberg in 1591.

AMMAN, JOHN, a German engraver, who lived at Hanau about the year 1640. He engraved a set of small wooden cuts, representing the Passion of our Saviour. They are executed in a neat and spirited style, and possess considerable merit. They were published at Amsterdam in 1623, with Latin verses.

AMMON, CLEMENT. This artist was son-in-law to Theodore de Bry, the celebrated engraver. His principal work was the continuation of the collection of portraits; entitled, Bibliotheca Calcographica, in six quarto volumes, published by Theodore de Bry, to which he added two volumes, the first, dated Francfort, A. D. 1650, with his name, Sculptore Clemen. Ammon, junior, Calcograp., and the second published in 1652. Sculptore Clemente Ammonio chalcogr. Franc. His plates are executed in a laboured style, poor and stiff, very inferior to the works of his relation.

AMMON, JOHANN. This artist was a native of Schaffhausen, and flourished about the year 1700. He engraved a few portraits, among which is one of John Locke.

AMOROSI, ANTONIO. This painter was a native of the Communanza near Ascoli, and flourished about the year 1736. He painted some few pictures for the churches at Rome, one of which is in S. Rocco; but he is principally known as a painter of Bambocciate, and fancy subjects, in which he displayed considerable talent; [and Lanzi says, that if his colouring had been a little more brilliant, his pictures would be equal to those of the Flemish school of the same kind.]

[AMSTEL, JAN VAN, an artist who is said to have excelled in landscapes, which he enriched with numerous figures in the style of Van Eyck; but when or where he painted is not recorded. Guarienti, in his edition of Orlandi, states that there was a picture by this artist at Genoa, in the possession of an Englishman, representing the Crucifixion, containing upwards of 200 figures admirably painted. It is, however, conjectured that some better known painter is disguised under this name.]

AMSTEL, CORNELIUS PLOOS VAN. To this distinguished amateur we are indebted for a very interesting set of plates, executed in imitation of the drawings of the most celebrated of the Dutch masters. He was born at Amsterdam in 1732, and appears to have devoted himself to the art, with a zeal rarely found in persons who do not adopt it as a profession. As I am not aware that we possess any precise account of his works, it may not be unacceptable to collectors, to have a particular description of them.

[ANCHILUS, N., born at Antwerp in 1688, was a good painter of conversations and other subjects in the manner of Teniers and of Watteau. He visited London, and made copies of pictures by Snyders for Sir R. Walpole. He died at Lyons in 1733.]

ANCONA, ANDREA LILIO D', NELLA MARCA. According to Baglioni, this artist distinguished himself as a painter at Rome during the pontificate of Sixtus V., by whom he was employed in the ornaments of the library of the Vatican, and in the palace of St. John of Lateran, where he painted in fresco in the Scala Santa, Moses striking the Rock, a grand composition of many figures, and Moses with the Brazen Serpent. In a chapel of the Chiesa Nuova, he represented the Archangel Michael driving the Evil Spirits from Heaven; and in S. Maria Maggiore, is a fine fresco painting by this master, of our Saviour washing the Feet of his Disciples. After the death of his protector, he continued to ornament several of the churches and convents of Rome in the time of Pope Clement VIII. [He also painted allegorical subjects, some of which have been engraved. He died in 1610.]

[ANDERLINI, DOMENICO, a landscape painter, born at Pesaro, flourished about 1720: he was an artist of merit.]

[ANDERLONI, FAUSTINO, a modern Italian engraver, a Brescian by birth, distinguished himself in 1786 and 1794, by engraving the illustrations of several scientific works, and by the portraits of the celebrated Herder, Carlo Porta, and Schiller.

At a later date he executed a small but charming engraving of the Dying Magdalene, after Correggio, the Repose in Egypt, after N. Poussin, and Mater amabilis, after Sasso Ferrato. It is uncertain whether he is still living, if he be, his artistic pursuits are probably concluded, as his last work was about 1830.]

[ANDERLONI, PIETRO, brother of the preceding, was born in 1784, and showed an early predilection for art. He studied the fundamental principles under P. Palazzi; he next received instructions from his brother Faustino, who observing that he vacillated between painting and engraving, persuaded him to adopt the latter. After greatly profiting by his brother's tuition, he entered, at the age of twenty, the school of Longhi, where he remained for nine years. Under that eminent master he assisted in the production of many excellent works, among which was Ezekiel's Vision, after Raphael; and to some of these the master allowed the pupil to place his name, in acknowledgment of the share he had in the execution. In 1824, he went to Rome for the second time, to make drawings of the Heliodorus and Attila of Raphael; and in 1831 succeeded his master Longhi in the superintendence of the Academy of Engravers in Milan. Pietro Anderloni was (and perhaps is, for it is not ascertained whether he be still living) a member of several academies, and holds a very distinguished rank among his skilful contemporaries in the art. He is generally very happy in embodying the characteristics of the master whose picture he translates; his fault is sometimes a near approximation to the modern French manner of working too far and producing glossiness. The following are among his principal works:

- Moses defending the Daughters of Midian; after N. Poussin.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Titian.
- A Holy Family, Incendio di Borgo, and the Heliodorus, and Flight of Attila; after Raphael.
- St. John; after Lavini.
- Magdalene; after Correggio.
- Portraits of Canova, Longhi, Appiani, &c.]

[ANDERSON, —, an English painter of marine subjects, chiefly of small dimensions. His subjects are treated in a very pleasing manner, with a soft pencil and great amenity of colour.]

ANDERTON, HENRY, an English painter, who flourished about the year 1660. He was a scholar of Streater, and afterwards went to Italy for improvement. He painted historical subjects and portraits, but was principally employed in the latter. He acquired the patronage of Charles II. by a portrait he painted of Mrs. Stuart, afterwards Duchess of Richmond. He died about the year 1665.

[ANDRE, JEAN, born in Paris in 1662, was a Dominican. He went to Rome, where he received lessons from Carlo Maratti, and studied the works of M. Angelo and Raphael. He painted portraits and historical subjects, and has the character of being very correct in his designs, and a good colourist. He died at Paris in 1753.]

ANDREA, ALESSANDRO. According to M. Heineken, this artist flourished about the year 1578, at which time he engraved the portrait of Gilles de Noailles, Abbé de St. Amand, the French ambassador at the court of Constantinople.

ANDREAE, T. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a plate representing an emblematical subject, in which a Woman is lying on the ground, in the front of the print, and another Female is standing over her, holding in her hand a book, inscribed Giulio Cesare opera. It is slightly etched, in a very indifferent style, and is signed T. Andree, inv. et fec.

ANDREANI, ANDREA, a painter, and very celebrated engraver, born at Mantua, [according to some,] about the year 1540; [but Brulliot says 1560, and died in 1623.] His works as a painter are little known, as he appears to have devoted himself to engraving at an early period of his life, when he settled at Rome, some time after the art of engraving on wood had been, as is asserted, first practised by Hugo da Carpi. His works are confined to wooden cuts, which are printed in the chiaro-scuro, and he carried that branch of engraving to a much higher degree of perfection than it had reached before him. His merit is duly appreciated by all who are conversant in prints. His drawing is correct, his execution is neat and spirited, and in a very masterly style. The number of prints attributed to this master is very considerable, as he is reported to have procured the blocks executed by other artists, and after retouching them, published them as his own. His works have frequently been confounded with those of Albert Aldorfer, from his having used a similar cipher,  and sometimes  or

AA.

The following is a list of his works :

[ANDREASI, IPPOLITO, a scholar of Giulio Romano: he assisted him in his cartoons, and produced pictures of merit in S. Barbara and elsewhere.]

[ANDRIESSEN, ANTONY, born at Amsterdam in 1746, painted, in conjunction with his brother Jurriaan, landscapes and figures: died in 1813.]

[ANDRIESSEN, JURRIAN, born at Amsterdam in 1742, was a scholar of A. Elliger, and J. M. Quinkhart. He was an able artist in decorative painting; the decorations of the new theatre at Amsterdam were done by him and Numan. Several distinguished living Dutch painters are from his school. He died in 1819.]

[ANDRIESEN, or ADRIENSES, HENDRICKS, surnamed Manckenhein, born at Antwerp in 1600, a painter of still life. He composed with great skill, and finished his pictures artistically. He died in Zealand in 1655.]

[ANDRIOLI, GIROLAMA, a Veronese painter, whose name and date, 1606, are inscribed on an altar-piece of San Domenico, and other saints, in the church of Santa Caterina di Sienna at Verona.]

[ANDRIOT, or HANDERLOT, FRANZ, or FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, born in Paris about 1655, practised both in France and Italy, especially in Rome. He followed the style of Poilly, but is not to be classed with that distinguished master. His works are, however, esteemed and sought after for the subjects and the masters after whom he engraved. Among the most esteemed are, Two Annunciations, after Albano; a Magdalene, after Guido; the Holy Family with a Rose, after Raphael; Madonna and bambino, after Guido; the Crowning with Thorns, after Domenichino, and the same after An. Caracci; the Good Samaritan, after Poussin; and other subjects of sacred history. The date of his death is not mentioned in any of the notices respecting him.]

[ANEDA, JUAN DE, was born at Burgos, where he painted in 1565, in concert with Juan de Cea, several pictures, which are still to be seen in the cathedral.]

ANESI, PAOLO. This painter was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1720. He painted landscapes with considerable reputation, and there are several of his pictures in the palaces and private collections at Florence and at Rome.

He was one of the masters of Francesco Zuccherelli. [It should be added, that he painted ancient ruins in the manner of P. Panini, and that he flourished until a much later period than before stated.]

ANGARANO, OTTAVIANO. According to Zanetti, this artist was of a patrician family of Venice, and flourished about the year 1650. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed in the art, but he was a reputable painter of history, and acquired considerable celebrity by a picture he painted for the church of S. Daniele, at Venice, representing the Nativity, which is highly commended by his biographer, and of which there is an etching, by himself.

[ANGE, FRANC. L', DI ANNECY, born in 1675, was a pupil of Crespi, and became a Philippine at Bologna. His chief merit, as an artist, was in small scriptural pieces, which Lanzi saw at Vercelli, and of which he speaks in terms of commendation: died 1756.]

ANGELI, FILIPPO D', called IL NAPOLITANO. This painter was born at Rome in 1600. He was the son of an artist who was employed under Sixtus V.; and was called il Napolitano, from his being sent to Naples when he was very young. He excelled in painting landscapes and battles, and, according to Baghioni, was much employed in ornamenting the palaces and villas at Rome. He frequently painted architectural views, with a number of figures arranged and composed with great ingenuity. He died at Rome during the pontificate of Urban VIII. in 1640. We have a set of thirteen small etchings by this artist, of military habiliments, &c., which are marked with the name, Filippo de Liagnio Napol., [which Heineken ascribes to Angeli, but this is disputed, as there is good reason to believe that they are by Felipe de Liano, a distinguished Spanish painter. The artists of the name of Angeli, or Angelis, are numerous; but recorded facts to discriminate them are few.]

ANGELI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. See IL MORO.

[ANGELI, GIULIO CESARE, born about 1570, studied in the school of the Caracci. He was more remarkable for his colour than design, and excelled rather in the draped than the naked figure. There is a vast work by him in the church of S. Agostino in Perugia: he died in 1630.]

[ANGELI, GIUSEPPE, a Venetian painter, scholar of Piazzetta, whose style he imitated, was born about 1715. He painted cabinet pictures, and some altar-pieces. His heads have considerable expression, and his extremities are well drawn. He was living in 1793.]

ANGELI, NICCOLO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1635. He was a disciple of Remigio Cantagallina, and, in conjunction with his instructor, engraved a set of plates, representing the festivals which took place at Florence on the occasion of the marriage of the Prince of Tuscany, from the designs of Giulio Parigi.

ANGELICO, FRA. GIOVANNI, DA FIESOLE. See FIESOLE.

[ANGELINI, SCIPIONE, a native of Perugia, according to Pascoli, but according to others, of Ascoli, born in 1661, was a skilful painter of flowers; in his pictures they appear newly plucked, and sparkling with dew drops. He painted a great number, which he sold to dealers who exported them to England, France, and Holland. He practised in Rome, and died in 1729.]

ANGELIS, PETER. This painter was born at Dunkirk in 1685. After learning the rudiments of design in his native town, he visited Flanders and Germany, and resided some time at Dusseldorp, where he had an opportunity of improving himself, by studying the paintings in the Electoral Gallery. He painted conversations, and landscapes with small figures, into which he was fond of introducing fruit and fish. He came to England about the year 1712, where he met with great encouragement, and resided here sixteen years. In 1728 he set out for Italy, and passed three years at Rome, where his pictures were admired; but being of a reserved disposition, and without ostentation, he exhibited his works with reluctance; his studious and sober temper inclining him more to the pursuit of his art than to the advancement of his fortune. In his return from Italy, with an intention of again visiting England, he made some stay at Rennes, in Bretagne, and met with so much employment, that he settled in that city, where he died in 1734, in the forty-ninth year of his age. His style was a mixture of those of Teniers and Watteau, with more grace than the former, and more nature than the latter. His pencil is easy, bright, and flowing, but his colouring is occasionally faint and nerveless.

ANGELO, MICHAEL, BUONAROTI. This sublime artist, who distinguished himself as a painter, a sculptor, and an architect, was born in 1474, in the castle of Caprese, in the territory of Anezso in Tuscany; of which fortress his father was the governor. He was descended from a noble family, which he has rendered still more illustrious by the magnificent monuments of exalted genius he has left us, which have ever been regarded as the most astonishing productions of human art. His father, Lodovico Buonaroti Simone, was desirous of bringing him up to some of the learned professions, and he was placed at a grammar school at Florence, to receive the incipient rudiments of a classical education. His progress in learning was by no means deficient, although it was observed that his mind was more occupied by his attention to drawing, than to his studies. He sought every opportunity of cultivating an acquaintance with the young students in painting of his age, and his parents perceiving the positive bent of his genius, placed him at the age of fourteen as a pupil with Domenico Ghirlandaio, an artist from whose instruction a genius of his cast could derive little more advantage than mere mechanical facility; and it is not surprising that he soon surpassed, not only his fellow students, but his instructor. Lorenzo de Medici, the great patron of art, had at that time founded an academy for the promotion of design and sculpture, and had formed in a garden at Florence a museum of antique statues, bassi rilievi, and busts, for the use of the students. Michael Angelo was the most frequent visitor of this valuable assemblage, and it may be said to have been the school in which he formed and nurtured those prodigious powers that were destined to astonish and delight the world of modern art. The industry and improvement of Michael Angelo were not long unnoticed by Lorenzo the Magnificent, whose taste and discernment discovered in his first attempts the indication of extraordinary genius; and when he was sixteen years of age, he took him under his immediate protection, and accommodated him with apartments in his palace. He did not however enjoy this patronage more than two years, as Lorenzo de Medici died in 1492. It is not within the compass nor the intention of this work to notice the admirable productions of this great artist in sculpture, which he appears to have preferred to painting; he has however contributed more to the grandeur of design, so essential to both, than any artist that has existed, or that probably will ever exist. On the death of his protector, Michael Angelo visited Bologna, Venice, and afterwards Rome, where he executed his celebrated marble of the Pietà; and made a cartoon of St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, for the church of S. Pietro in Montorio, which may be considered as his earliest work in painting, in 1500. His next picture was a Holy Family, painted in 1502, for his friend Angelo Doni, and which was afterwards placed in the tribune of the gallery at Florence. It was soon after that he was engaged to paint a fresco for the great saloon in the ducal palace at Florence, of which Lionardo da Vinci had already decorated one side with an admirable work, representing a battle of cavalry. On this occasion, M. Angelo made choice of a subject peculiarly adapted to his wonderful powers; it represented a number of Florentine soldiers bathing in the Arno, surprised by an unexpected attack of the enemy, and hurrying out of the water to arm and defend themselves; expressed with an energy of design, and a daring display of muscular anatomy, that astonished the beholder. Of this noble design he only executed the cartoon which is known by the name of the Cartoon of Pisa; the troubles of the times having prevented its intended completion in fresco. In 1508, Julius II. formed the design of ornamenting the walls and ceiling of a chapel in the Vatican, which his uncle had built from the design of Baccio Pintelli, and M. Angelo was solicited to undertake the work; a commission by no means agreeable to his wishes, as he had not hitherto accomplished any great work in fresco, and because he was desirous of proceeding with the monument of his Holiness, for which he had made a superb design four years previous. He was however obliged to comply with the imperious orders of Julius II., and he reluctantly commenced the cartoons for the ceiling of the Sistine chapel; the most sublime monument of daring and dignified genius, that has been produced in the art in ancient or modern times. This stupendous work, finished in 1512, he accomplished in the almost incredible space of twenty months, by which he has immortalized his fame, and has left to the artists of posterity an inexhaustible mine of instruction and improvement. The next work in painting by M. Angelo, was a picture of Jupiter and Leda, with the Birth of Castor and Pollus, painted in 1529 for Alfonso Duke of Ferrara, and which was afterwards purchased by Francis I. of France. This picture, with many other objects of art, have most probably been destroyed by the scruples of bigotry, as it does not appear amongst the pictures in the gallery of the Louvre, from whence it would certainly not have been excluded by a similar feeling. Under the successors of Julius II.; Leo X., Adrian VI., and Clement VII., Michael Angelo was almost entirely employed in sculpture, and occasionally in military architecture, and it was not until the pontificate of Paul III. that he undertook his celebrated work of the Last Judgment, which occupies one end of the Sistine chapel. This prodigious production is fifty-four feet high, and forty-three feet wide, and the immensity of its composition may be conceived from its having occupied this wonderfully expeditious painter seven years, and was finished in 1541. His next works were, the Conversion of St. Paul, and the Crucifixion of St. Peter, painted for the opposite chapel in the Vatican, called Paolina, by direction of Paul III. These were the last works in painting of this great master; and having reached his sixty-eighth year, he found the fatigue of fresco painting more than he could support, and he received the Pope's permission that Pierino del Vaga should be allowed to finish the work after his design.

It has long been a matter of dispute whether Michael Angelo ever actually painted in oil; all doubt however on the subject seems now to be removed by the Abbati Lanzi having discovered that the Holy Family in the gallery at Florence, the only picture by him supposed to be painted in oil, is in distemper. It is however certain that many pictures were painted in oil from his designs by his contemporary artists, and Sebastiano del Piombo, Jacopo da Puntormo, and Marcello Venusti, were those who were the most employed in that way. Fresco painting was certainly better adapted to the elevated character of his compositions; which required a simple and solid arrangement of colour, rather subdued than enlivened, and producing a grand and impressive effect, which could not have been expressed by the glittering splendour of oil painting. The prominent feature of the works of Michael Angelo is grandeur, and it is a grandeur that is peculiarly his own. If he ever departed from the purity of the antique, it was an error that grew out of greatness. The vastness of his conceptions can only be equalled by the gigantic powers of his execution. His faculties have been admirably expressed by one who knew well how to estimate them. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in one of his beautiful lectures, says, "The poetry of the art, Michael Angelo possessed in the most eminent degree; and the same daring spirit, which first urged him to explore the unknown regions of the imagination, impelled him forward in his career beyond those limits which his followers, destitute of the same incentives, had not strength to pass. He was the bright luminary from whom painting has borrowed a new lustre, under whose hands it assumed a new appearance, and became another and superior art; and from whom all his contemporaries and successors have derived whatever they have possessed of the dignified and majestic." He died in 1563.

ANGELO, MICHAEL AMERIGI, DA CARAVAGGIO. This painter was born at Caravaggio, a village in the Milanese, in 1569. He was the son of a mason, and was employed when a boy to prepare the plaster for the fresco painters at Milan. The habit of seeing them work inspired him with the ambition of becoming an artist; and without the instruction of any particular master, he attached himself to a faithful imitation of nature, and formed to himself a manner which, from its singularity, and a striking effect of light and shadow, became extremely popular. For a few years he confined himself to painting fruit, flowers, and portraits, which were much admired for the fidelity of their resemblance. Such was his rigid adherence to the precise imitation of his model, that he copied nature even in her deformities, and he afterwards continued the same slavish mechanism in the higher department of historical painting. He passed the early part of his life at Venice, where he greatly improved his colouring by studying the works of Giorgione; and the pictures painted in his first manner are infinitely preferable, in point of colour, to his latter works. On leaving Venice he went to Rome, where his first performances were executed in conjunction with Cav^{re}. Guiseppe Cesari. The novelty of his manner both pleased and surprised, and his works soon became so generally the objects of public admiration, that some of the greatest artists then in Rome were induced to imitate, without approving, the new style of Michael Angelo. Guido and Domenichino, to gratify a corrupt public taste, were for some time under the necessity of abandoning their suavity and their grace, to follow the vulgar though vigorous trickery of Caravaggio. This infatuation did not, however, continue long; the attractions of the grand and the beautiful resumed their dominion over public opinion. The merit of Caravaggio is confined to colour, and to an extraordinary effect, produced by a daring contrast of light and shadow, which only belongs to nature in abstracted situations. To give it veracity we must suppose the light to proceed from a partial and prescribed aperture, which alone can sustain the illusion. He seldom ventured on works that required the arrangement of a grand composition, to which his want of academic study rendered him totally inadequate; he contented himself with subjects that he could represent in half-length figures, and which did not demand a correct delineation of the nude. His saints and heroes are the representatives of the porters who served him for models, and which he never thought it necessary to attempt to ennoble. It must, however, be admitted that his works possess wonderful force, and that the distribution of light and shadow is conducted with admirable intelligence. His principal works at Rome, are the Crucifixion of St. Peter, in the church of St. Maria del Popolo, and the Entombing of our Saviour, in the Chiesa Nuova. At Naples, in the church of S. Domenico Maggiore, there is a fine picture by him of the Scourging of Christ; and in St. Martin's is one of his most admired works, representing Peter denying Christ. He died at Rome in 1609.

ANGELO, MICHAEL CERQUOZZI, called DALLE BATTAGLIA. He was born at Rome in 1600. An early inclination for the art induced his father to place him under the tuition of Pietro Paolo Bonzi, commonly called il Gobbo dei Frutti. His first pictures, like those of his master, represented fruit and flowers; but he soon quitted those subjects, and painted battle-pieces, with such reputation that he acquired the name of dalle Battaglia. The works of Peter de Laer, called Bamboccio, were at this time extremely admired at Rome; and Cerquozzi, to gratify the public taste, adopted similar subjects to those of Bamboccio, representing fairs, and scenes of pastoral festivity, in which he was very successful, and his pictures of those subjects are the best of his works. He excelled the Fleming in character and the taste of his design, and Bamboccio was superior in his landscapes and his knowledge of the chiaro-scuro. He operated with extraordinary facility, never making any design for his works; and he frequently painted a picture from the mere recital of some singular circumstance that was related to him. His best pictures were the Four Seasons, painted for the Salviati Palace at Rome. He died in 1660.

ANGELO, MICHAEL, COLONNA. This painter was born near Ravenna in 1600, and was first a scholar of Gabrielle Ferrantino, but he afterwards finished his education under Girolamo Curti, called il Dentone. In conjunction with that master he executed some considerable works in fresco, in the churches and palaces at Bologna, in which the architecture and perspective were generally painted by Dentone, and the figures by Colonna. Their most admired works were the great perspective painted for St. Michael in Bosco, and a saloon in the palazzo Grimaldi. Philip IV. of Spain invited this artist to Madrid, where he painted several works in fresco, and was liberally rewarded by that monarch. He died in 1687.

[ANGELO, called ANGELUCCIO, a scholar of Claude Lorraine, was living in 1680, but died young. He is mentioned as an artist of considerable talent; his works are perhaps sometimes mistaken for his master's.]

ANGELO, MICHAEL, called IL CAMPIDOGGIO, a painter of fruit and flowers, born at Rome in 1610. He was a scholar of Fioravanti, and was called il Campidoglio from an office he held in the Campidoglio, or the Capitol, at Rome. His touch was bold and spirited, and his colouring rich and harmonious. There is a fine picture by this painter in the collection of the Duke of Marlborough at Blenheim, [and many others in England, but at present not sufficiently appreciated.] He died in 1670.

ANGELUS, PETER, an obscure engraver, who flourished about the year 1611. Mr. Strutt mentions an ornamental frontispiece by him, engraved for a folio volume of Lud. Tena's Commentaries on St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews. It consists of several figures, with the Trinity represented at the top. The figures are rudely designed, and the plate is executed entirely with the graver, in a bad, tasteless style.

ANGIERS, PAUL, an engraver, of whom little more is known than that he resided in London about the year 1749, and that he was instructed in the art by John Tinney. He was chiefly employed in engraving for the booksellers, and executed several small plates, principally landscapes, which are etched in a neat style, but without much taste. His best print is a landscape after Moucheron, called a View of Tivoli. There is a print, dated 1749, by him, of a view of Roman ruins, after Panini, very neatly engraved.

ANGIOLILLO, called ROCCADERAME. This artist was a Neapolitan, and flourished about the year 1450. He was a disciple of Antonio Solario, called il Zingaro, and, according to Dominici, painted several pictures for the churches at Naples. One of his most esteemed works was a picture in the church of Lorenzo, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Francis, St. Anthony of Padua, and St. Louis. He died about the year 1458.

ANGLUS, BENJAMIN. This artist is mentioned by M. Heineken as the engraver of two emblematical subjects, one after Antonio Tempesta; the other is probably from his own design, as he adds the word fecit to his name.

ANGOSCIOLA, [or ANGUISCIOLO,] SOFONISBA. This celebrated paintress was of an ancient family, born at Cremona in [1530 or] 1533. She received her first instruction in the art from Bernardino Campi, but afterwards became a scholar of Bernardo Gatti, called Sojaro. After leaving those masters, her first effort in the art was an effusion of filial affection, expressed in a portrait of her father and two of his children. This performance was universally admired, and she was soon considered as one of the most eminent portrait painters of her time. She did not however confine herself to portraits, but painted some historical subjects of a small size, that were highly esteemed, and established her reputation. The fame of this paintress induced Philip II. of Spain, the great encourager of art in his time, to invite this lady to Madrid, where she arrived about the year 1560, attended by three of her sisters.

One of her first works in Spain was a portrait of the Queen Isabella, which was presented by the king to Pope Pius IV., to whom she was nearly related, accompanied by a letter addressed to his Holiness by Sophonisba, to which that pontiff replied in an epistle, highly extolling her performance, and assuring her that he had placed it amongst his most select pictures. [She was married twice; first to Don Fabrizio di Moncada, a Sicilian nobleman, after whose death she returned to her own country by way of Genoa, where she was married to Orazio Lomellino, the captain of the galley in which she made the voyage.] Palomino Velasco states that she died at Madrid in 1575; but we have more correct tradition of her from her countrymen, who assert that she reached the great age of 93, and died in 1626. [Lanzi and Zani say about 1620.] Her sisters, Lucia, Europa, and Anna Maria, practised the art, but their talents were eclipsed by the superior merit of Sophonisba. In the collection of the Earl of Pembroke at Wilton, there is a picture by this lady, representing the Marriage of St. Catharine; [at Althorp, Northamptonshire, her own portrait, playing on the harpsichord; and some where in England, the picture of her sisters playing at chess, which was in the collection of Lucien Buonaparte.]

ANGUS, W., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1790. He engraved several landscapes and views, in a very beautiful and masterly style. They are chiefly executed with the graver. [See the following article.]

[ANGUS, WILLIAM, an English designer and engraver of landscapes and buildings, who flourished from about 1786 to 1820. He engraved and published a great number of views of gentlemen's seats in England and Wales, which were executed by him in a delicate and pleasing manner. He was also employed on many other topographical works, which are to be found in the publications of the period, illustrative of the beauties of the country. He did not confine his graver to his own designs, but exercised it on those of Paul Sandby, Edward Dayes, Samuels, and others of high repute.]

ANICHINI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, of whose life we have no particulars. Among other plates engraved by him, we have the following:

A Holy Family, small plate, lengthways; dated 1655.

The Good Samaritan; small, lengthways.

[ANIMOLA, VINCENZO, called VINCENZO ROMANO, was born at Palermo, and was living in 1528. He was a scholar of Raphael, and went to Messina after the sacking of Rome.]

[ANJOU, RENÉ OF, king of the Two Sicilies, duke of Lorraine, and Count of Provence, (father to the wife of Henry VI. of England,) was a good painter for his station. He painted his own portrait, which was extant some years ago in the chapel of the Carmelites at Aix; and there is a print from it in Montfaucon; he is supposed to have painted that of Charles VII. of France, also. He painted miniatures in Missals and on glass; and was lauded as one of the best artists of his age. The events of his life belong to history.]

ANNA, BALDASSARE D', a Fleming by birth, but of the Venetian school of painting. He was a pupil of Corona of Murano, and after his master's death completed several of his works. He also produced some original pictures for the Servi and other churches, which, though inferior to those of Corona in the selection of forms, surpass them in the softness, and sometimes in the force of the chiaro-scuro.

ANRAAT, PETER VAN, a painter of history, born about the year 1635. Notwithstanding the merit of this master, little is known of the circumstances of his life. According to Houbraken, he was a very eminent historical painter, and that author extols a picture by him, representing the Last Judgment, which, he says, was a considerable composition of many figures, well designed, and painted in a bold and free manner. [Balkema describes him as a painter of portraits, animals, and conversation pieces. He resided at Amsterdam in 1672.]

ANSALDO, GIOVANNI ANDREA. According to Soprani, this artist was born at Voltri, a small town near Genoa, in 1584. He was a scholar of Orazio Cambiasi. Struck with the beauty and splendour of the works of Paolo Veronese, he studied them with great attention, and formed to himself an excellent system of colouring, both in oil and in fresco, particularly the latter. His chief work was the cupola in the church of the Santissima Annunziata at Genoa. Many other works of this master are in the churches and palaces in that city. He possessed a fertile invention, and his compositions, which are always ingenious, are decorated with architecture and landscape, introduced with a very happy effect. He died in 1638, [having acquired the reputation of being one of the best painters of his time in fresco and in oil. Ratti assures us that his name was simply Andrea Ansaldo, not Giovanni Andrea.]

ANSALONI, VINCENZIO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a disciple of Lodovico Carracci. Under so able an instructor he became a reputable painter of history. Malvasia speaks in very favourable terms of an altar-piece by this master, in the chapel of the family of Fioravanti, in the church of St. Stefano at Bologna, representing the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; and in the church of the Celestine monks is a picture by him, much admired, representing the Virgin Mary with the infant Saviour in the Clouds, and below, St. Roch and St. Sebastian. [According to Zani, he flourished about 1615, and died young.]

[ANSELIN, JEAN LOUIS, a French engraver, born in Paris in 1754, and died in 1823, was a pupil of A. de Saint Aubin. His chief engravings are from the works of French masters in poetical and historical subjects.]

[ANSELMI, GIORGIO, born at Verona in 1722, was a pupil of Balestra; he painted the cupola of San Andrea at Mantua in fresco, and died in 1797.]

ANSELMI, MICHAEL ANGELO. This painter was born at Siena in 1491, and was a disciple of Gio. Antonio Vercelli, called Sodoma. His principal residence was at Parma, where one of his first performances was a considerable work painted from a design of Giulio Romano, representing the Crowning of the Virgin Mary. He painted several pictures of his own composition for the churches in Parma, some of which bear a resemblance to the style of Correggio. He died in 1554, [according to Lanzi, but Zani says 1560.]

[ANSIAUX, JEAN-JOSEPH-ELEONORA-ANTOINE, a French historical and portrait painter, a scholar of Vincent, was born at Liege in 1764. His works are numerous from sacred and profane history, and in poetical subjects. He also painted portraits of several distinguished persons, ministers, and generals of Napoleon, and ranks among the best artists of the French school in the 19th century. In the church of St. Paul, at Liege, there are three pictures by him. He died at Paris in 1840.]

ANTIQUUS, JOHN. This artist was born at Groningen in 1702, and learned the art of glass staining from Gerard vander Veen, which he practised for some years; but he afterwards became a scholar of John Abel Wassenberg, a respectable painter of history and portraits, under whom he studied some time. He afterwards went to France, where he was much employed as a portrait painter, but did not long remain at Paris, being desirous of visiting Italy. He resided chiefly at Florence, where he was employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany for six years. His principal work was a large picture of the Fall of the Giants, which was esteemed of sufficient merit to occasion the sketch of it to be placed in the Florentine Academy. After passing several years in Italy, he returned to Holland, where he met with a very flattering reception, and was employed by the Prince of Orange, in the palace of Loo, where he painted a large picture of Mars disarmed by the Graces, and several other considerable works. He was a correct designer, and a good colourist; his long residence in Italy had given him a taste that is discernible in all his works. He died in 1750.

ANTOINE, SEBASTIAN, an engraver of no great celebrity, born at Nancy in Lorraine. We have by him a portrait of R. P. Augustin Calmet, a large oval plate, dated 1729; the Enterprise of Prometheus, from the ceiling at Versailles, painted by Mignard; and a representation of the crown of jewels with which Louis XV. was crowned, 1722. He worked chiefly with the graver, in a slight, feeble style.

ANTOLINEZ, DON JOSEPH, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1639. At an early age he was sent to Madrid to study under Don Francisco Rizi, one of the painters of Philip IV. He painted history and portraits, and was also admired for the landscapes he introduced into his works. In the church of La Magdalena at Madrid, are two pictures by this master, which are favourably spoken of by Palomino, representing the Miraculous Conception, and the Good Shepherd. He died at Madrid in 1676.

[ANTOLINEZ DE SARABIA, FRANCISCO, nephew of Joseph Antolinez, was an historical landscape painter, and studied in the school of Murillo, whose taste and manner of colouring he followed. He went to his uncle at Madrid in 1672; but notwithstanding he had already distinguished himself as a painter, he left the profession for literary pursuits, and for the purpose of obtaining a lucrative situation at the bar, having been originally educated at Seville for the law. Being unsuccessful, he was compelled again to have recourse to painting, as a means of subsistence. It was then that he produced those small pictures from the Bible and the life of the Virgin, which are so much admired by amateurs for their invention, colour, and facility of execution. He died in 1700, regretted by the true friends of art, who lamented the misapplication of those talents with which he was gifted by nature.]

ANTONELLA, DA MESSINA. See MESSINA.

ANTONIANUS, SILVANUS. According to Pappillon, this artist was an engraver on wood, and flourished about the year 1567. He executed a set of cuts for a book of Fables, published at Antwerp in 1567, entitled Centum Fabule ex antiquis auctoribus delectæ, et a Gabriele Faerno Cremonensi, carminibus explicatæ. Antuerpiæ ex officina Christoph. Plantini. He usually marked his prints with a monogram composed of an S and an A, thus, A.

ANTONIO, MARC. See RAIMONDI.

ANTONIO, DA TRENTO. See TRENTO.

[ANTONIO, PEDRO, was born at Cordova in 1614, and was a scholar of Antonio del Castillo. Some pictures which he painted for the convent of S. Paul at Cordova, established his character as a good colourist. He died in 1675.]

[ANTONISSEN, HENRY, a painter of landscapes and cattle, was born at Antwerp in 1737. His style is weak and ineffective, so that his works are not sought for out of his own country. Ommeganck was one of his scholars; and others now living, and whose works are popular, received their first instructions in his school. He died in 1794.]

ANTONISZE, CORNELIUS. This artist was born at Amsterdam, about the year 1500. He excelled in representing the interior views of towns, which he did with uncommon fidelity. In the treasury chamber at Amsterdam is a picture by this master, representing a view of that city as it was in 1536. He afterwards painted twelve pictures of views in the same city, with its principal public buildings, which he engraved on twelve blocks of wood. These prints are rare, but are still to be found in the collections of the curious.

APENS, C., a Dutch engraver, who resided at Groningen about the year 1673. He engraved the portrait of Samuel Maresius, theologian; dated 1673.

APOLLONIO, JACOPO. This painter was born at Bassano in 1584. He was the grandson, and one of the ablest scholars, of Jacopo da Ponte, called Bassano. His style is precisely that of his instructor, and his works are only distinguished from those of Jacopo da Ponte, by a less vigorous tone and a less animated touch. In the dome at Bassano is a Magdalene by this master, and a picture of S. Francesco at the Riformati; but his most esteemed work is the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church dedicated to that saint. He died in 1654.

APPEL, JACOB. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1680. After passing some time under Timothy de Graaf, he was instructed in landscape painting by David Vander Plas. According to Descamps, he at first imitated the works of Tempesta, but changed his manner, and adopted that of Albert Meyering. His landscapes are not without merit; but he is said to have been more successful in portraits, which he painted with great success. He died in 1751.

[APPELDOORN, JEAN, a landscape painter and clever designer, was scholar to Jordanus Hoon, at Amersfort, where he was born, in 1765. He painted but few pictures in oil. He resided nearly fifty years at Utrecht, and died at Amersfort in 1838.]

[APPELIUS, JEAN, born at Middlebourg, flourished in 1778 as a painter of history, portraits, and landscapes. His productions are generally large, and exhibit much artistic talent.]

APPELMAN, BERNARD, [or BARENT.] This artist was born at the Hague in 1640. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but from the subjects of his pictures, it is probable that he had visited Italy. His landscapes are taken from the picturesque views in the vicinity of Rome. He was for some time employed by the Prince of Orange, and decorated a saloon in the palace at Soesdyk with very pleasing landscapes painted in a good style, and well coloured. He also painted portraits with reputation; [and put in the landscape backgrounds of many of the portraits of Jan de Baan and others. He died in 1686.]

APPELSMAN, G. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1670. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, and other book plates, for the publishers. Among others, he engraved the portrait of Thomas Bartholinus, and several of the plates for the octavo edition of his anatomical work, published in 1674. They are neatly executed with the graver, but in a stiff, formal style.

[APPIANI, ANDREA, a modern Italian painter, born in 1754, excelled both in fresco and oil painting. There is much originality in his style, and a gracefulness that approaches Correggio. His best performances in fresco are to be seen at Milan; in oil, Rinaldo in the garden of Armida, Olympus, and Venus and Love are specimens of great beauty. Napoleon sat to him for his portrait, and appointed him his painter; the portrait is in England. The frescoes of the royal palace at Milan have been engraved by Rosaspina. He was a member of the Legion of Honour, and a knight of the Iron Crown. At the restoration of the Bourbons he lost his pension, and an attack of apoplexy, which he had suffered in 1813, having rendered it impossible for him to paint, he was reduced to the extremity of selling all his drawings and other valuables to procure subsistence. He lived in this condition until 1818, when another attack of apoplexy caused his death.]

APPIANI, FRANCESCO, was born at Ancona in 1702, and was a scholar of Domenico Simonetti, called il Magatta. He afterwards studied at Rome, in the time of S. Conca, and Mancini, with whom he lived in habits of intimacy, and acquired a pleasing and harmonious style. Of this he has given proof in his picture of the Death of S. Domenico, painted by order of Benedict XIII., and which procured him the honour of a gold medal and chain. He resided the greater part of his life at Perugia, where he painted the vault of the cathedral, and many other works, and continued to paint with great vigour till he reached his ninetieth year, and died in 1792.

[APPIANO, or APLANO, NICOLÒ, a Milanese painter, flourished in 1510. It is said that he was a scholar of Lionardo da Vinci, and Cesariani compares him with the greatest masters of the age. No subsequent writer on the fine arts, except Zani, has mentioned him. Perhaps his works are ascribed to some great known master of the same school.]

APSCH, JEROME ANDREW, a German engraver on wood, born at Nuremberg about the year 1490. He assisted Hans Burgkmair in executing the wooden cuts for a book published at Vienna, entitled Der Weysse König, or The Wise King, containing the principal events of the life and reign of the Emperor Maximilian I. They consisted of two hundred and thirty-seven prints. He died in 1556.

AQUA, CRISTOFANO DELL, an obscure engraver, who was employed chiefly for the booksellers. He engraved some architectural views, a portrait of the King of Prussia, and an upright plate of Merit crowned by Apollo, after Andrea Sacchi. They are executed with the graver in a feeble style.

AQUILA, FRANCESCO, FARAONE. This eminent designer and engraver was the elder brother of the celebrated Pietro Aquila, and was born at Palermo in 1676. He established himself at Rome about the year 1700. His engravings are numerous, and some of them highly esteemed. His style of execution is perhaps neater than that of Pietro, but he is very inferior to him in correctness of drawing and expression. He sometimes worked with the graver only, but his plates in that way are cold, and wanting in effect; by no means equal to those in which he called in the assistance of the point. Some of his prints are after designs of his own composition. His works are a set of twenty-two large plates, entitled Picturæ Raphaelis Urbinateis ex aula et conclavibus Palatii Vaticani, &c. Franc. Aquilo, del. et incid., 1722.

[AQUILA, GIORGIO, called Maestro Giorgio da Firenze, flourished from 1314 to 1325. He was a native of Florence, and is said to have been the first Italian artist who used nut oil in painting.]

AQUILA, PIETRO, was the younger brother of Francesco, and with him settled at Rome, about the year 1700. The early part of his life was passed in a seminary, preparatory to his devoting himself to an ecclesiastical life; and on his arrival at Rome he actually became a monk, which seclusion did not prevent his following his natural propensity for the art. According to Baldinucci he was a respectable painter, but his reputation has reached a higher rank as an engraver. His drawing is extremely correct, and he etched his plates in a bold and free manner. His best prints are those he engraved after the Caracci, which are very highly esteemed. The number of his plates is very considerable, some of which are engraved from his own compositions: viz.

- The Adoration of the Magi.
- The Flight into Egypt; dedicated to B. C. de Vingtomillia.
- The Holy Family, with St. John kissing the Foot of our Saviour.
- Lions fighting; an emblematical subject; inscribed spe suscitât iras.
- Portrait of Livio Odeschalchi; with ornaments.

- The Triumph of Bacchus; after the same.

These four prints are fine.

Cesare Fantetti engraved thirty-six of the first prints in this Bible; the rest are engraved by Pietro Aquila, and very superior to those of Fantetti.

The Farnese Gallery, in twenty-five plates, with the Statues and Ornaments.

The Chamber of the Palace Farnese, in thirteen plates; inscribed Imagines Farnesiani Cubiculi.

The Assembly of the Gods, from the painting by Lanfranco, in the Villa Pinciana at Rome; inscribed Deorum Concilium ab Equite Joanno Lanfranco, &c.; in nine plates.

There are some other plates by this artist, which will be found in the Dictionnaire des Artistes, by M. Heineken.

AQUILA, POMPEO DELL. This artist is stated, in the Abecario Pittorico of Padre Orlandi, to have been a very reputable painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. He flourished in the latter part of the sixteenth century. There is a fine picture by this master, in the church of St. Spirito in Sassia at Rome, representing the taking down from the Cross, of which there is a print by Horatius de Sanctis, 1572. Several considerable works by him in fresco are to be seen at Aquila, where he was born.

[ARAGON, JUAN DE, an historical painter who resided at Grenada in 1580, and was one of the distinguished professors who ornamented the beautiful monastery of St. Jerome, founded by the great Captain.]

ARALDI, ALESSANDRO. This painter was born at Parma about the year 1470, but studied at Venice under Giovanni Bellini. He painted history in a style which Lanzi denominates antico moderno. In the church of the Carmelites, at Parma, is a picture by this master, representing the Annunciation, which is mentioned as a very creditable performance. He died in 1528.

ARBASIA, CESARE. This painter was a native of Saluzzo. He flourished about 1600, in which year he visited Spain during the reign of Philip II. It does not appear that he was employed by that monarch in the Escorial, or that he remained long in Spain. He painted the ceiling of the cathedral at Cordova, and returned to Italy. His style is an imitation of the works of Leonardo da Vinci, and he is incorrectly stated to have been his scholar. His chief excellence was in fresco painting, of which the ceiling of the church of the Benedictine monks at Savagliano, and other considerable works, bear testimony. [He was an artist of great ability, and one of the founders of the academy of St. Luke, at Rome. He painted some excellent pictures at Malaga and Cordova, in fresco and oil. For a picture of the Incarnation, and some other works in the cathedral of Malaga, he was paid three thousand ducats. At Cordova, in 1583, he painted in fresco the martyrs of that place, in the sanctuary of the cathedral. He visited Spain in 1579, and probably left that country about nine years afterwards with Federigo Zucchero, his former master, and went to Rome, which accounts for his being connected with the academy of St. Luke, as Federigo was its first president. He died in Spain in 1614, and is ranked by Palomino and Bermudez among the Spanish painters. Palomino's account of this painter is incorrect in almost every fact.]

ARCA, LIONARDO DELL', an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. He engraved some plates of ornaments and grotesque figures.

ARCIMBOLDI, GIOSEFFO, a Milanese painter, [was born at Milan in 1533.] He excelled in painting the interiors of kitchens, with fruit, vegetables, culinary utensils, &c., and occasionally introduced into his pictures grotesque figures and drolleries, [formed of flowers and fruits, which at a distance appeared like human figures.] He was a favourite artist of the Emperors Maximilian and Rodolphus, in whose service he was employed the greater part of his life. [He died at Prague in 1593.]

[ARCIONI, DANIELE, of Milan, a worker in Niello, who is highly praised by Ambrogio Leone, but of whom little is known in the history of the arts. He appears to have been a contemporary of Maso Finiguerra and other eminent Niellotori.]

ARCO, ALONSO DEL, called el Sordillo de Pereda, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1625, and was a disciple of Antonio de Pereda. This artist was deaf and dumb from his birth; he was nevertheless an eminent painter, both of history and portraits. Several of his pictures are mentioned by Palomino, particularly the Miraculous Conception, and the Assumption of the Virgin in the cloister of the Trinitarios Descalvos at Madrid, and in the church of San Salvador a fine picture of S. Teresa; [Bermudez enumerates a great number in the churches at Madrid, and other public buildings throughout Spain.] He died at Madrid in 1700.

ARDELL, JAMES M^c. This admirable mezzotinto engraver was either a native of Ireland or of Irish parents. He was born about the year 1710, and is justly regarded as one of the ablest artists in his branch of engraving that has practised the art.

The number of his plates is very considerable, the greater part of which are portraits of persons of distinction by the principal painters of his time. He also scraped a few plates from historical subjects by Vandyck, Murillo, Rembrandt, &c., some of which are extremely fine. The following may be considered as his best plates:

 Mr. Mac Ardell died in 1765.

[ARDEMANS, TEODORO, an eminent architect, sculptor, and painter, was born at Madrid in 1664, and studied painting in the school of Coello. As he chiefly followed architecture and sculpture, his works as a painter are few, but the fresco with which he ornamented the vault of the sacristy of S. Francis at Madrid is considered a masterpiece. It is said that he also made some engravings. It is probable that he was living in 1730, as he survived his friend Palomino, who died in 1726, and wrote the eulogy prefixed to the second volume of his works.]

ARDENTE, ALESSANDRO, a Piedmontese painter, who appears, from the dates on his pictures, to have flourished from the year 1565 to 1592. In the church of S. Paolini, at Lucca, is a picture of S. Antonio Abate, bearing the former date; and at Mocaliere, near Turin, an altar-piece of the Adoration of the Magi, with the latter. At Turin, in the Monte della Pietà, is a picture of the Conversion of St. Paul, by Ardente, painted with a greatness of style that would induce us to think he was educated in the Roman school. He was painter to the court of France, where he died in 1595.

[ARELLANO, JUAN DE, born at Santorcaz in 1614, was a scholar of Juan de Solis, but not succeeding in the higher branches of art, he copied the pictures of Mario de Fiori, and afterwards by attention to nature became very eminent in this department. His pictures are highly esteemed in Spain, and are to be found in most of the collections. He died in 1676.]

[ARENDS, JAN, born at Dort in 1738, was a scholar of J. Ponse, and painted landscapes and marine subjects. He was well skilled in perspective, and practised engraving. He died at Dort in 1805.]

ARETUSI, CESARE. This painter was a native of Modena, and flourished about the year 1590. It is not said under whom he studied, but he formed his style from the works of Bagnacavallo. In conjunction with Gio. Batista Fiorini, he painted the cupola of the cathedral of St. Pietro, at Bologna. His portraits were very highly esteemed, and his great success in that line will account for his having executed so few historical works. He painted several of the most illustrious personages of his time, and his merit in that branch of the art is equal to any artist of his time. His portraits have a beauty of colour, and a breadth that remind us of the works of Correggio. [Tiraboschi conjectures that Aretusi was a son of Pelligrino Munari, and that he was called Modenese, having been born in Modena; and Bolognese by others, because he lived in Bologna, and there took up his citizenship. Lanzi observes that he was distinguished as a colourist in the Venetian taste, but in point of invention, weak and dull, while Gio. Batista Fiorini, on the other hand, was full of fine conceptions, but worthless in his colouring. These two artists formed an intimate friendship, and by uniting their powers produced paintings of considerable merit. In the Guida di Bologna they are rarely divided; and Lanzi believes that in every picture attributed to Aretusi we ought to seek for some companion of his labours. Nevertheless, in the branch of portrait, Cesare possessed merit above sharing it with others; and he also succeeded in copying the works of excellent masters better than any other of his age. He could assume the style of almost every painter, and even pass off his imitations for originals. In his imitations of Correggio he was more particularly successful, and received a commission to execute a copy from the celebrated Notte, by that master, for the church of S. Gio. di Parma, where it still remains. Mengs, who saw it, declared that were the original at Dresden by any accident lost, it might be well supplied by so fine a duplicate. It was this performance that obtained him the honour of restoring the painting executed by Correggio for the tribune of the same church, which had been removed to extend the choir; and such was the success of that picture, says Ruta in his Guida, from its accurate imitation of the taste displayed in the original, of its conception and of its harmony, as to lead those unacquainted with the fact to suppose it to be the work of Allegri. This is confirmed by Pungileoni in his "Memorie Storiche di Antonio Allegri, detto Il Correggio."

[ARFIAN, ANTONIO DE, a painter from the school of Seville, studied under Murillo and L. de Vargas. He was employed on several important works, both in fresco and in oil; among which was the grand altar-piece of the cathedral which he painted in 1551, in concert with Antonio Ruiz. The time of his death is not mentioned, but he was living in 1587.]

[ARGUELLO, J. B., painted still-life, at Seville, in 1594.]

[ARIAS FERNANDEZ, ANTONIO, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Madrid, and studied under Pedro de las Cuevas. At the age of 14 he painted the great altar-piece of the Carmelites at Toledo, which gained him great credit. Far from being inflated by the praises he received, he pursued his studies with greater emulation, and at the age of twenty-five was one of the best painters at Madrid. The Duke d'Olivarez selected him to paint the series of portraits of the kings of Spain which were in the saloon of the ancient palace. Is it to be credited that with such high protection, and with such great talents for painting, and an irreproachable life, Arias should end his days in an hospital? His death occurred in 1684, according to some of his biographers, and to others, in 1680. He left a daughter, who also practised painting with applause.]

ARLAUD, JAMES ANTHONY. This artist was born at Geneva in 1668. His first employment in the art, was painting small ornamental miniatures for the jewellers. He however attempted some portraits, and was sufficiently successful to encourage him to settle at Paris, when he was about twenty years of age. It was not long before he distinguished himself in that metropolis, and his pleasing style of painting portraits and fancy subjects recommended him to the patronage of the Duke of Orleans, who, being fond of the art, became his pupil, and accommodated him with apartments in the palace of St. Cloud. This encouragement stimulated the efforts of Arlaud, and he was considered as the most ingenious artist in that branch of his time. He was also favoured with the protection of the Princess Palatine, who presented him with her portrait, set with diamonds, and on his expressing a desire to visit England, gave him a letter of recommendation to the then Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline. He had the honour of painting her portrait, which was much admired, and also several of the nobility, and was liberally rewarded. He returned to Paris, where he remained for a few years, and having acquired an ample fortune, he settled at Geneva, his native country, where he died in 1743.

[ARMANNO, VINCENZIO, or VINCENT ARMANN, a Fleming by birth, was born in 1598; he practised at Rome as a landscape painter. His pictures are praised for their similitude to nature, which, without much selection of ground, or trees, or accompaniments, charms by their truth, and a certain stillness of colour, pleasingly chequered with light and shade. He is highly to be commended too in his figures, and is copious in his invention. Passeri relates that he was imprisoned by the Inquisition for eating flesh on fast days, and that on his liberation he quitted Rome in disgust, and retired to Venice, where he died in 1649.]

[ARMENINI, GIO. BATISTA, a native of Faenza, and pupil of Perin del Vaga, published in 1587, at Ravenna, a work entitled "True Precepts of Painting;" but is considered a better theorist than practitioner.]

ARMESSIN. See L'ARMESSIN.

[ARNALD, GEORGE, an English landscape painter and member of the Royal Academy. See Appendix.]

ARNAU, JUAN, a Spanish painter, born at Barcelona in 1595, and a scholar of Eugenio Caxes. He painted history, and was chiefly employed for the churches and convents of his native city. In the monastery of the Augustines there are several pictures painted by him, representing subjects from the life of St. Augustine, and in the church of Santa Maria de la Mar, is a picture of St. Peter to whom Angels are presenting the Keys. He died in 1693.

ARNOLD, JONAS, or ARNOUL, a designer and engraver. He drew the portraits and figures engraved by Philip Kilian. Sigismund van Bircken, Spiegel dec Ehren, or Mirror of Honour. Amongst his own engravings are:

Louis Dauphin; after the same.

ARNOLD, JOHN, an engraver of no great merit. We have by him, among other things, a small plate of Daniel in the Lions' Den, after Fr. Xav. Palco.

ARNOULLET, BALTHASAR, a French engraver on wood, who resided at Lyons. According to Pappillon, he executed a large wooden cut of the town of Poitiers.

ARNOULT, N., a French engraver, who resided at Paris, and acquired some reputation by his portraits à-la-mode of the personages at court. Of this kind there is a set of six figures in folio, published in 1673 and 1674. There is also a portrait of Madame la Marquise d'Angean, at her toilet; with several others, engraved in a poor, coarse manner.

ARPINO, IL CAVALIERE D'. See CESARI.

ARREDONDO, DON ISIDORO, an eminent

Spanish painter, born at Colmenar de Oreja in 1653. He was first a scholar of Don Joseph Garcia, but he afterwards studied under Don Francisco Rizi. He painted history with great reputation, and on the death of Rizi was appointed painter to Charles II. of Spain. One of his principal works was a large picture of the Incarnation, which Palomino mentions as a very grand composition. Several other works by this painter are described by that author. He died in 1702.

[ARREGIO, or AREZZO, PABLO DE, is named among the Spanish painters, but it is more probable that he was an Italian, as his name imports. He painted in 1506, in conjunction with F. Neapoli, the doors of the great altar of the cathedral of Valentia, the subjects from the life of the Virgin, which are admired for correct design, noble character, grandeur of form and expression, and all those fine qualities in art that belong to the school of Lionardo da Vinci, of which both the painters are supposed to have been scholars.]

[ARTEAGA Y ALFARO, MATIAS, an eminent painter and engraver of the school of Seville, where he was born; he was a pupil of Juan de Valdes. He painted numerous perspective views, in which he introduced subjects taken from the legends of the Virgin. He distinguished himself also in engraving. He was secretary to the academy of Seville, and died in 1704.]

ARTEVELT, ANDREW VAN. This painter was born at Antwerp, about the year 1570. He excelled in painting sea-pieces and storms, which he represented with great force and effect. [He resided for some time at Genoa.] Vandyck painted his portrait amongst the celebrated artists of his country, [and probably he did so when he visited Genoa in 1620. There is no record of Artevelt's death.]

[ARTIGA, FRANCISCO DE, a celebrated landscape and historical painter, born at Huesca. He painted several Sibyls, Conceptions, and perspective views, remarkable for their invention, design, and colouring. He was also an engraver, an architect, mathematician, and an author of reputation. He died in 1711.]

ARTOIS, JACQUES, was a very eminent landscape painter, born at Brussels in 1613. From his manner it is probable that he was a scholar of John Wildens. The landscapes of Artois are faithful representations of the scenery of his country; the fields and forests in the neighbourhood of Brussels were the subjects of his pictures, which are touched with a light and free pencil. His skies and distances are extremely well conducted, and his trees of grand forms, with a foliage that appears to be in motion. They are very frequently decorated with admirable figures by David Teniers, which very materially enhances their value, although the merit of his landscapes is considerable. [Zani says he was living in 1666; other writers place his death in 1665.]

ARZERE, STEFANO DALL. According to Ridolfi, this painter was a native of Padua, and painted several altar-pieces for the churches and convent of that city. In the Chiesa degli Eremitani, he painted some subjects from the Old Testament, and two pictures of St. Peter and St. Paul. In the church of the monastery of the Padri de Servi, the picture of the principal altar is by this master.

ASAM, COSMUS DAMAN, a Bavarian painter and engraver, who, after studying some time at Rome, resided at Munich, where he succeeded both in history and portraits. There are some prints by this master from his own designs, marked Cosmus Asam, of which are:

A Franciscan Monk kneeling, with the Virgin Mary in the Clouds, surrounded by Angels.

St. Joseph presenting a Book to a Bishop: both from his own designs.

[ASCANI, PELLIGRINO, DA CARPI, an admirable painter of flowers, of the Modenese school, and of the last century.]

ASCH, PETER JOHN VAN. This artist was born at Delft in 1603. His talent lay in painting landscapes of a small size, and according to Houbraken, was one of the most admired artists of his time. He was a man of an estimable character, and his care and solace of an aged father and mother, who were long sick, prevented his painting so many pictures as his industry under other circumstances would have produced, and has occasioned them to be very scarce, even in his own country. The time of his death is not known.

[ASENSIO, ———, a Spanish painter, lived at Saragossa about the end of the 17th century, and distinguished himself in portraiture.]

ASHFIELD, EDMUND, an English painter in crayons, who had been a scholar of Michael Wright. His portraits were much admired. He was the instructor of Lutterel, whose merit in crayon painting surpassed his master's.

ASNE, L'. See MICHAEL L'ASNE.

ASPER, HANS JOHN, a Swiss painter, born at Zurich in 1499. He was contemporary with Holbein, and painted portraits in the style of that master, in which he gained great reputation. He was not less esteemed for his drawings of game, birds, and flowers; &c., which he imitated with much truth and nature. Notwithstanding the merit of this artist was such as to be thought deserving of a medal being struck to record it, he lived and died in poverty. [He had great reputation in his day; but he has been deprived of much of it, by his portraits being ascribed to, and sold as the work of Holbein.] His death happened in 1571.

ASPERTINO, GUIDO. This painter was born at Bologna about the year 1460. He was the scholar of Ercole di Ferrara, and proved a very reputable painter of history. His principal work, which he finished in 1491, was the Crucifixion, placed under the portico of the cathedral at Bologna. He died in the prime of life, [about 45,] and was much regretted as a very promising artist.

ASPERTINO, AMICO, was the younger brother of Guido Aspertino, and was born at Bologna in 1474. He was the scholar of Francis Francia, and, according to Vasari, was called Amico da due Penelli, from his being able to paint with both hands at the same time. He painted history, but did not arrive at any great celebrity in the art. He was of a most capricious and whimsical disposition, approaching sometimes to mental derangement. [Instead of due Penelli it should be due Prezzi, as it seems he painted well or ill according to the price he was to receive. There is also another account why he was called Amico da due Penelli, but it is of little importance, as his works are little valued. He died in 1552.]

ASPRUCK, FRANTZ, a designer and engraver, a native of Germany. From the resemblance of his drawing to that of R. Spranger, it is probable he may have been his scholar. There are a few prints by him with the initials of his name, F. A., viz.

Four small plates, half-length figures—Of the Archangels, Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, and Uriel.

Cupid and Anteros, half-length figures, small plate; Franz. Anspruck B. fecit.

[ASSCHE, HENRI VAN, born at Brussels in 1775, showed from his earliest years a predilection for painting, and received from his father, who was a distinguished artist, the first principles of design and perspective. He was afterwards placed with De Roi of Brussels, from whom he received further instructions in painting; two journeys in Switzerland contributed to develop his talent as a landscape painter. Several fine pictures by him may be seen at Brussels, Ghent, Lille, and Haerlem, some of which are enriched with figures and animals by Ommeganck. He died in 1841.]

ASSCHOONEBECK, ADRIAN. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1690. We have by him some slight incorrect etchings, representing the Flight of James the Second from England.

ASSELYN, JOHN, called CRABBETJIE, a celebrated landscape painter, born at Antwerp in 1610. He was a scholar of Esais Vandevelde, but he went to Italy when young, where he remained several years. He was denominated Crabbetje by the society of the Flemish artists at Rome, on account of a contraction in his fingers. His pictures represent views in the vicinity of Rome, decorated with figures and cattle, in the manner of N. Berghem, and enriched with vestiges of Roman architecture. His skies and distances are tenderly coloured, and there is a charming effect of sunshine in some of his works that resembles the warmth of John Both. His pencil is remarkably firm and neat, and the trees and plants are touched with great sharpness and spirit. His pictures are highly esteemed, and are worthy a place in the choicest collections. He died in 1660.

[ASSEN, JAN VAN, born at Amsterdam in 1631, was a good painter of history and landscape, in the Italian manner; he studied particularly the works of Antony Tempesta. He died in 1695.]

ASSEN, JOHN WALTHER VAN, was one of the early engravers on wood, and is said to have been born in Holland, about the year 1490. A contemporary of Lucas of Leyde, he seems to have held a pre-eminence amongst the engravers on wood, as Lucas did amongst those on copper. His wooden cuts are of an admirable execution, and are highly appreciated by the collectors. The monogram he ordinarily made use of is composed of an I., a W., and an A., thus,  his work is as follows:

A set of six prints, of a circular form, about nine inches diameter, representing the Passion of our Saviour; marked with his cipher, and dated in 1513 and 1514, viz. Our Saviour praying in the Garden, three of the Disciples sleeping below, and in the distance, Jews, conducted by Judas, entering the Garden; very fine. Jesus betrayed by Judas, is seized, and St. Peter cutting off the Ear of Malchus.

The Scourging of Christ.

Christ bearing his Cross.

The Crucifixion, with St. John and the Marys at the Foot of the Cross.

The Entombing of Christ.

A set of six large prints, each containing six different subjects in architectural compartments, and in the middle of the prints, the words; 1. Superbia. 2. Lucuria. 3. Invidia. 4. Ira. 5. Gula. 6. Avaricia; and their opposite virtues.

There is also a small print by this artist, representing an armed Figure on Horseback; inscribed St. Hadrianus Amstelodamus in Adibus Donardi Petri, &c.

[Brulliot, in his Dictionary of Monograms, says,

“These marks (referring to those in the margin of his work, and similar to those here introduced) are found on historical pictures and a great number of wood prints, some of which are described by Bartsch. These figures have been always interpreted by Werner van Ossanen, or Walter van Assen; notwithstanding these names are not exact, for Carl van Mander (he adds) more correctly names this artist Jacques Cornelisz van Oostanen. This is confirmed by a set of six circular wood prints, subjects, the Passion of Jesus Christ, of which there is a second, but ancient, edition with this title, ‘Historia Christi patientis et morientis iconibus artificiosissimus delineate per Jacobium Cornelisz, &c.’ The mark, notwithstanding, does not coincide with the name; it ought, then, to have relation to the family name of this artist, who is not known; for Jacques Cornelisz, or Corneliszoom, signifies Jacques son of Cornelius. Yet, he adds, it is indubitable that this mark (meaning that on the tablet) belongs to this artist, as Mr. Koning, a distinguished connoisseur in Bibliography, at the Hague, possesses a book which belonged to this artist, and in which he had written with his own hand, ‘Dit Boek behoort toe Jacob Cornelisz Schilder tot Amsterdam in die Calver straat.’ There are only two pictures known by him; one in the royal collection at the Hague, representing a half-length of Herodias, which has been erroneously attributed to Quintin Matsys; and one mentioned in the Catalogue of Mr. Campe’s Collection at Leipsic.” Bartsch, on the other hand, says “that this monogram, which has been improperly (mal à propos) explained by Werner van Ossanen, is almost generally attributed to J. W. van Assen, an artist of whom little is known except that he lived in Amsterdam in 1517.”

[ASSERRETO, GIOVACCHINO, born at Genoa in 1600, studied under Borzone and Ansaldo, by whose instructions he profited so well, that at the age of sixteen he painted a picture of the Temptation of St. Anthony, for the monks of that order. In several churches and religious houses in Genoa are altarpieces by him: he died in 1649, leaving a son of the name of Giuseppe, who painted historical subjects in the style of his father, but died young.]

ASSISI, ANDREA LUIGI DI, called IL INGEGNO. This painter was born at Assisi, about the year 1470. He was the fellow student and competitor of Raffaele, under Pietro Perugino, and on account of his promising disposition was called il Ingegno. Older than Raffaele by some years, he assisted his master in the Sala del Cambio, and other works, and was the first of the school that attempted the aggrandizement of the style, that was still followed by Perugino, and a softer tint in colouring. This is visible in the Sibyls and the Prophets he painted in fresco, in the Basilica of Assisi. Lanzi observes, that in beholding these and others of his works, we are affected with more than usual compassion, at the distressing destiny of this extraordinary artist. In the midst of his flattering career he was struck with blindness in the bloom of life. [The whole of this account is shown by Von Rumohr to be a tissue of errors derived from Vasari. The only authentic work known by Assisi, is a coat of arms painted for the town-house of Assisi in 1484, which is insignificant.]

[AST, BARTHOLOMEW VAN DER, of Utrecht, painted small pictures of flowers and fruit, in the manner of Breughel, in which he introduced insects, shells, drops of water, and other accessories; but unfortunately his pictures are defective in ordonnance and harmony, though each object by itself possesses merit. In 1629 he presented to the hospital of St. Job, at Utrecht, a picture of fruit.]

ASTA, ANDREA DELL, was born at Naples in 1673, and was brought up in the school of Francesco Solimene. After passing some years under that master he went to Rome, where he studied some time, and introduced into the style of his country something of an imitation of the works of Raffaele. Amongst his best pictures, on his return to Naples, were the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Agostino. He died at Naples in 1721.

ASTLEY, JOHN, an English portrait painter, born at Wemm in Shropshire. He was a scholar of Hudson, and afterwards visited Italy, about the same time that Sir Joshua Reynolds was at Rome. He possessed talents of a superior order, and painted portraits with great reputation and success. A lady of large fortune, whose portrait he had painted, conceived an affection for him, and offered him her hand: on his marriage he relinquished the profession. He died in 1787.

ATHANASIO, DON PEDRO. See BOCCANEGRÀ.
AVANZI, JACOPO, DA BOLOGNA. This ancient painter was a native of Bologna, and according to Malvasia flourished about the year 1370, and was a disciple of Franco da Bologna. In the Chiesa di Mezzaratta in that city, were some of the works of this master, which that author asserts possessed sufficient merit to receive the praise and approbation of Michael Angelo Buonarrotti, and of the Carracci. [There is much obscurity and conjecture mingled in the various accounts of this painter.]

AVANZI, GIUSEPPE. This artist was a native of Ferrara, and painted several pictures for the churches and convents in that city, which are particularly noticed in the description of the pictures and sculpture of Ferrara, by Guarini. In the church of the Madonna della Pietà, are four pictures of subjects from the life of S. Gaetano, and in the church of S. Domenico, is the Marriage of St. Catharine, considered as his best work. [He was of the school of Costanzo Cattanio, and was born in 1655; he is better known for the quantity than the quality of his works. He died in 1718.]

[AUBERT, AUGUSTIN, an historical, landscape, and portrait painter, was born at Marseilles in 1781. His principal subjects are from sacred history, several of which are of large dimensions. His landscapes are taken chiefly in the environs of Marseilles.]

AUBERT, JOHN, a French engraver; his prints are little more than slight etchings, and without much effect. He engraved the portrait of Gillot, an upright oval plate; a set of academy figures, from Edm. Bouchardon; and a book of studies for drawing, from Raffaello and other masters, after drawings by Bouchardon.

AUBERT, MICHEL. This artist was born at Paris in 1700. He engraved portraits and historical subjects. His manner is slight and free, and in some of his historical prints he appears to have imitated the style of Gerard Audran, but not with very great success. His plates are:

AUBIN, AUGUSTIN DE ST., a very laborious French engraver, born at Paris in 1720. He was a member of the academy of painting, and a very ingenious artist. He was taught the art of engraving by Laurent Cars, and his style is similar to that of his instructor. He engraved a prodigious number of plates, of historical subjects, portraits, frontispieces, vignettes and other ornaments for books, as well as the collection of gems of the Duke of Orleans, and the collection of medals, amounting to near three thousand, belonging to M. Pellerin. As his work is interesting, not only from the merit of the prints, but by their variety, it seems necessary to give a more detailed list of them than usual.

AUBIN, CHARLES GERMAIN DE ST., a French designer and engraver, brother of Augustin, born at Paris in 1721. He engraved several plates from his own designs of flowers and fancy pieces.

AUBIN, GABRIEL JACQUES DE ST., a painter and engraver, brother of the preceding artists, born at Paris in 1724. He painted historical subjects, and has engraved the two following plates from his own designs, viz.:

Six statues—Of the Christian Virtues, on one plate.
View of the Exhibition of Pictures in the Louvre in 1753.

[AUBIN-SAINT, AUGUSTINE DE, a skilful French engraver, born at Paris in 1736, and died in 1807. Besides compositions of his own, he engraved the works of several Italian and French masters, of which a list may be found in Heineken.]

AUBRIER, ———, a French engraver, by whom we have a portrait of Cæsar Borgia, Duke of Valentinois.

AUBRY, ABRAHAM. This artist was a native of Oppenheim, and flourished about the year 1650. He chiefly resided at Strasburg, where he carried on a considerable business as a printseller. He engraved eleven of the twelve plates representing the Twelve Months of the Year; after Sandrart; the other, the Month of May, was engraved by F. Brun.

AUBRY, PETER. According to Huber, this artist was born at Oppenheim, about the year 1596. He was probably related to the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was also established at Strasburg as a printseller. He engraved a great number of portraits of eminent persons of different countries, a long list of which is given by M. Heineken. They are executed with the graver, in a very indifferent style. Among others are the following:

Oliver Cromwell.
 Bernard, Duke of Saxe-Weymar.
 Ferdinand Ernest, Count of Wallenstein.
 John Schmidt, Doctor in Theology.
 Michael Virdunga Kittinga, Professor at Altdorf.

AUBRY, JOHN PHILIP, an engraver and print-seller, who resided at Frankfort about the year 1670, and was probably a relative of the two last-mentioned artists. He engraved a great number of plates for the booksellers, as well as for his own collection. They chiefly consist of portraits, and are executed in a very indifferent style.

[AUBUISSON, MARQUIS D', painted and exhibited, from 1812 to 1822, several poetical and historical pictures; namely, Paris taking leave of Helen, Hector forcing Paris to quit Helen, Alexander and Bucephalus, and the Punishment of Hebe.]

AUDEBERT, JOHN BAPTIST, a French engraver, born at Rochfort in 1759. He engraved the plates of l'Histoire Naturelle des Singes, &c., published in 1800. He particularly excelled in designing and engraving animals, and other objects of natural history. He died in 1800.

AUDENAERDE, or OUDENAERDE, ROBERT VAN. This artist was a reputable painter, and a still more celebrated engraver. He was born at Ghent in 1663, and was first a scholar of Francis van Mierhop, but he afterwards studied under John van Cleef. When he was twenty-two years of age, he went to Rome, where he became a disciple of Carlo Maratti. Under this master, he became a respectable painter of history. As he amused himself with the point in his leisure moments, some of his plates were shown to Carlo Maratti, who recommended him to devote himself entirely to the art of engraving. He however painted several pictures for the churches of his native city. His best work is the great altar-piece in the church of the Carthusians at Ghent, representing St. Peter appearing to a group of Monks of that order. In the church of St. James, is a picture by him of St. Catherine refusing to worship the False Gods. Several other works by this master are in the churches and convents in that city, which are painted entirely in the style of C. Maratti. He is now to be noticed as an engraver. The plates which he executed entirely with the graver, are not considered equal to those in which he introduced the point. His drawing shows a perfect acquaintance with the human figure, and is very correct. The principal part of his prints are after the pictures of Carlo Maratti. The following is a list of his plates:

AUDRAN, CHARLES. This artist was the first of the family of Audran that became eminent in the art of engraving, in which it holds so distinguished a rank. He was born at Paris in 1594. In his infancy he showed a great disposition for the art; he received some instruction in drawing, and when he was young went to Rome to perfect himself, where he produced some plates that were admired, and encouraged him to increase his assiduity. He adopted that species of engraving that is entirely performed with the graver, and appears to have formed his style by an imitation of the works of Cornelius Bloemaert, and is even more finished. On his return to France he settled at Paris, where he died in 1674, aged 80. He marked his prints in the early part of his life with a C., until his brother Claude, who also engraved a few plates, marked them with the same letter, he changed it for K. as the initial of Karl. The following are his principal prints:

[AUDRAN, CLAUDE, the second son of Claude the brother of Charles Audran, was born at Lyons in 1639. He studied drawing with his uncle Charles at Paris, and subsequently went to Rome. On his return he was engaged by Le Brun at Paris, and assisted him in his Battles of Alexander, at the Passage of the Granicus, the Battle of Arbela, and in many other of his works; and was an imitator of his style. He painted also in fresco, under the direction of Le Brun, the chapel of Colbert's Château de Sceaux, the gallery of the Tuilleries, the grand staircase at Versailles, and other works. He drew well, and had great facility of execution. He died at Paris in 1684.]

AUDRAN, GERMAIN. This artist was the nephew of Charles Audran, and was instructed by him in the art of engraving. He was born at Lyons in 1631, and died in that city in 1710. His merit was considerable, although very inferior to some other artists of his family. He engraved several plates, consisting of portraits, and a variety of ornaments, ceilings, vases, &c., amongst which are the following:

The portraits of Charles Emanuel II., and of Frances of Orleans, in an oval; after Caravaglia.

AUDRAN, GERARD. The name of this distinguished engraver is familiar to every admirer of the art, which he may be said to have carried to the highest pitch of perfection, particularly in his large plates of historical subjects. He was the son of Claude, and the nephew of Charles Audran, born at Lyons in 1640. After learning the first principles of design and engraving from his father, he was sent to Paris, and placed under the tuition of his uncle, where he remained some time. He afterwards visited Rome for improvement, and he is said to have studied under Carlo Maratti. During a residence of three years, he executed some plates which gained him great reputation, particularly a portrait of Pope Clement IX. The fame of Gerard Audran induced the great minister Colbert, who was a liberal encourager of the arts, to invite him to return to Paris; and soon after his arrival he was appointed engraver to the king, with a considerable pension, and apartments in the Gobelins. He now applied himself with great assiduity, and became intimately connected with the celebrated painter Charles Le Brun, whose principal works are the subjects of some of his finest plates; and it may be said that the pictures of that great master have been embellished by the admirable graver of Gerard Audran. The Battles of Alexander will ever be regarded as a lasting monument of their fame. The plates of this artist are very numerous. He died at Paris in 1703, aged 63. The following is a list of his principal works:

- AUDRAN, BENOIT. He was the second son of Germain Audran before mentioned, and was born at Lyons in 1661. He received his first instruction in the art of engraving from his father; but had afterwards the advantage of studying under his uncle, the celebrated Gerard Audran. Although he never equalled the admirable style of his uncle, he engraved many plates of historical subjects and portraits, which have justly established his reputation as an excellent artist. His style, like that of Gerard, is bold and clear; his drawing of the figure is very correct; and there is a fine expression of character in his heads. He was a member of the academy, and was appointed engraver to the king, with a pension. He died in 1721, aged 60. The following are his principal plates:
- PORTRAITS.

- AUDRAN, JOHN. This artist was the brother of Benoit, and the third son of Germain Audran, born at Lyons in 1667; and having learned the rudiments of the art under his father, he was also placed under the care of his uncle, the famous Gerard Audran. Before he was twenty years of age he displayed uncommon ability, and became a very celebrated engraver. In 1707, he was made engraver to the king, with a pension and apartments at the Gobelins. The hand of a great master is discernible in all his plates; and without having attained the extraordinary perfection of Gerard Audran, his claim to excellence is very considerable. This laborious artist engraved until he was upwards of eighty years of age, and died in 1756.

AUDRAN, LOUIS, the youngest son of Germain Andran, born at Lyons in 1670, and was instructed in engraving by his uncle Gerard. He did not execute many plates, but assisted his brothers in forwarding theirs. He died at Paris in 1712, aged 42. He engraved some copies of the large plates executed by his relatives. There is a set of seven middle-sized plates by him of the Seven Acts of Mercy; after Bourdon.

[AUGUSTINI, JAN, born at Groningen in 1725, painted flowers with some degree of merit; but his portraits were considered to possess an astonishing resemblance: he died at Haerlem in 1773.]

[AUSTRIA, DON JUAN OF, the son of Philip IV., and brother of Charles II. of Spain, was not only an amateur of painting, but practised it with the ardour of a professor. Engene de las Cuevas was his master. The celebrated Carreno, seeing a painting by Don Juan, said, without flattery, "if he had not been born a prince, he might, with his talents, have lived like one."]

AUTGUERS, C., an obscure French engraver, who resided at Lyons about the year 1623. He worked chiefly for the publishers, and engraved some portraits and other book plates, which are very indifferently executed.

AUVRAY, ———, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. According to M. Heineken, he engraved some portraits of French comedians and others.

[AVED, JACQUES ANTOINE JOSEPH, born at Douay in 1702, was a scholar of Picard; he was a good painter of portraits, which, with their draperies and accessories, he finished carefully and beautifully. He died at Paris in 1766.]

AVEELE, or AVELEN, J. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Leyden about the year 1696. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and, among other plates, engraved the frontispiece for the nineteenth volume of the work entitled Thesaurus Antiq. Rom., published by Peter Vander Aa, in 1698.

AVEEN, ADRIAN. This artist was a native of Amsterdam, and flourished about the year 1700. He engraved several views of gentlemen's country-seats in Holland, which are executed in a neat but formal style.

AVELINE, ANTHONY, a French designer and engraver, born in Paris in 1662. He engraved a number of plates of landscapes, and views of the palaces and chateaux, in France and other parts of Europe, executed in a neat and agreeable style. The following are worthy of notice:

Six landscapes, numbered; marked Aveline in: et fec.

Twelve Landscapes, not numbered; same mark.

Sixteen Views of Versailles.

Twenty Views of the Royal Palaces and Chateaux near Paris.

Twenty Views of Cities and Ports, in different parts of Europe.

Twelve Views of the public Edifices in Paris.

AVELINE, PETER, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris in 1710. He is supposed to have been of the family of the preceding artist. He was instructed in the art by John Baptist Poilly. His drawing, though not very incorrect, is stiff and formal. He was, however, a very reputable artist; and it is to be regretted that he did not make a better selection of subjects for the exertion of his talent, and that he employed a great portion of his time in trifling and insignificant sketches. The following are his prints most worthy of notice:

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

AVELINE, FRANCIS ANTHONY, was the cousin and the scholar of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1718, but did not equal him in talent. He worked chiefly for the booksellers at Paris, and afterwards visited London; but either had not sufficient ability or industry to succeed, for, according to Bassan, he died in indigence. We have the following plates by him:

The Four Seasons; copied from Peter Aveline.
 Six Chinese figures; after Boucher.
 The Chinese Bark; after the same.
 The Spanish Musician; after J. E. EVELSEN.

AVELLINO, GIULIO, called IL MESSINESE. This painter was a Sicilian, born at Messina about the year 1645. He is said to have been a scholar of Salvator Rosa, and painted landscapes in the grand style of that master. He settled at Ferrara, where landscape painting, since the time of Dossi, had been almost abandoned, and was much employed by the Ferrarese nobility, and that of Cremona. He enriched his landscapes with ruins, architecture, and figures, spiritedly designed, and boldly touched. [The Signori Cremona and Donati possess select specimens; and there is scarcely a collection in Ferrara or Romagna which does not value itself on possessing them.] He died in 1700.

AVELLINO, ONOFRIO. According to Dominici, this painter was born at Naples in 1674, and was brought up in the school of Francesco Solimene. He afterwards passed some years at Rome, where he painted the vault of the church of S. Francesco di Paola, which is considered his best performance. In the church of S. Maria de Montesanto is an altar-piece by this master, representing a subject from the Life of S. Alberto. He died in 1741.

[AVEMAN, WOLFF, a native of Nuremberg, was a pupil of Henry Steenwyck, and painted interiors of churches and other buildings in the manner of his master. He died in 1620.]

[AVER, JOHN PAUL, a painter of Nuremberg, born in 1636; died, 1687; painted history, portraits, and landscapes.]

AVERARA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Bergamo about the year 1508. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he formed his style of colouring from the works of Titian. Ridolfi mentions some fresco paintings by this master in favourable terms, particularly two pictures in the church of St. Francesco, at Bergamo. [He painted landscape and architecture, and was greatly celebrated in his day for his observance and skilful representation of nature, not only in the scenery, but in the figures and animals with which he ornamented his subjects. The beauty of his tints, the design of his infant figures, and the nature of his landscapes, all show that he aspired to the Titian manner. Muzio, in his "Teatro di Bergamo," pronounces him a universal genius.] He died in 1548.

AVERBACH, JOHN GOTTFRIED. According to M. Heineken, this artist was born at Mulhausen in 1687. He was painter to the Emperor Charles the Sixth. He engraved a plate, from his own design, in which he has represented his own portrait painting that of his wife. He died at Vienna in 1743.

[AVERCAM, HENRI VAN, surnamed de Stomme van Campen, was born at Kampen about the end of the 16th century, and lived and died in that city: his singular taciturnity obtained for him the surname of the mute. He produced many pictures, principally landscapes ornamented with cattle, and marine subjects; but they have lost much of their value on account of the change of colour. His drawings with the pen, and in black chalk, are still held in great estimation.]

AVIANI, ———. This painter was a native of Vicenza, and flourished about the year 1630. He excelled in painting perspective and architectural views, which were frequently embellished with figures by Giulio Carpioni. His pictures usually represent the most remarkable views in Venice, though he occasionally painted landscapes and seaports, which are held in considerable estimation.

AVIBUS, GASPAR AB, or PATAVINUS, an engraver, born at Padua about the year 1530. From his style, it is very probable he learnt the art under Giorgio Ghisi, called Mantouano, as his plates are executed entirely in his manner, and he also has copied some of his works. He sometimes signed his prints GAS.F., or G. A. P. F., and often marked them with a curious monogram, formed of the letters which compose the word Gaspar . They are dated from 1560 to 1580. His prints are:

- The Espousals of the Virgin Mary; after P. Veronese; Gaspar ab Avibus, Citadlenstz, fe. 1577.
- The Woman taken in Adultery; Gasparo Osello Padovano, f.
- The Scourging of Christ; Gaspar ab Avibus, Citadlenstz, fecit.
- Christ crowned with Thorns; Gaspar Patavinus, f. 1566.
- The Last Supper; after Lam. Lombard; copied after a print by Mantuano; marked Gaspar, P. F. 1564.
- Apollo and the Muses on Mount Parnassus; after Penni, Gaspar, f.; copied from Mantuano.
- Venus and Adonis, and its Companion, a Youth carrying his Mistress on his Shoulders; after L. Penni; copied from Mantuano; marked Gas., f. 1563.
- Venus bathing; after the same; ditto; Gasp., f. 1564.

His principal work was a large volume, in five parts, containing the portraits of the Emperors and Princes of the House of Austria, full-lengths; engraved in the style of the Sadlers; signed Gaspar Patavinus, incisor. 1569.

AVICE, THE CHEVALIER. This amateur etched for his amusement some plates in a slight, though spirited style, after N. Poussin, and other masters; of which the most esteemed is a middle-sized plate of the Adoration of the Magi, after Poussin.

[AVILA, FRANCISCO D', a portrait painter of Seville, distinguished for the suavity of his colour, and the truth of his likenesses. There were several Spanish painters of the 16th and 17th centuries of the name Avila, but whose works are not sufficiently recorded to speak of them with certainty.]

AVOGADRO, [PIETRO, called] BRESCIANO. This painter was a native of Brescia, and flourished about the year 1730. He was a scholar of Pompeo Ghiti, whose style he followed with a mixture of Venetian colouring, especially in the carnations. The contour of his figures is graceful, and the general effect of his pictures is harmonious and pleasing. His principal work is the Martyrdom of S. S. Crispino and Crispiano, in the church of S. Joseph, at Brescia. [Lanzi observes that, in the opinion of many, Avogadro holds the first place after the three great painters of Brescia; these are Bonvicino, Gamba, and Savoldo.]

AVONT, PETER VAN DER. This artist was born at Antwerp about the year 1619. He painted landscapes, enriched with figures well drawn, and touched with great spirit. He frequently decorated the landscapes of Vinckenboom. He was also an eminent engraver; by him we have the following plates:

The Virgin Mary, with the infant Jesus, St. John, and St. Anne.

The Virgin suckling the Infant, with St. John and an Angel.

The Virgin and Infant in the Clouds; inscribed Regina cœli.

The Magdalene ascending to Heaven; Pet. van Avont, inv. et exe., &c.

Twenty-four small plates of Children; on each plate a Child and an Angel. They were published in the set entitled Pædopegnion, by W. Hollar.

The Four Elements, represented by Four Children.

Two Bacchanalian subjects of Children; one, Bacchus drawn in his Car; the other, Bacchus carried by Four Children; Pet. van Avont, inv., fec., et exe.

AVRIL, JEAN JAQUES, a modern engraver, born at Paris, [according to Gabet, in 1744; Brulliot says in 1736; but as he died in 1832 the former is probably the correct date.] He was a scholar of J. G. Wille, and has engraved several plates, which are deservedly admired. By him we have [about 540 pieces, some of large dimensions, among which are,]

Mars going to Battle; after Rubens.

Mars returning from Battle; after the same.

A Shepherd and Shepherdess; called the Croc-en-jambe; after the same.

Apollo with the Seasons, dancing; after Poussin.

Diana and Acteon; after Albano.

The Bathers surprised; after the same.

Venus revenging herself on Psyché; after de Troy.

Pygmalion and his Galatea; after Marillier.

St. Geneviève; after C. Vanloo.

Fishermen returning; after Vernet.

Travellers in a Storm; after the same.

The Shipwreck; dated 1775; after the same.

The Double Recompence of Merit; after P. A. Wille.

French Patriotism; after the same. 1788.

The Taking of Courtray; after Vandermeulen. 1782.

The Passage of the Rhine; after Berghem.

Catherine II. on her Travels; after F. De Meys. 1790.

Ulysses and Penelope; after Barbier.

Combat of the Horatii and the Curiacii; after Barbier.

1787.

[AVRIL, JEAN JAQUES, son of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1771; he engraved many excellent plates of pictures by the old masters, and statues in the Louvre. He was one of the principal engravers employed in the work of Robillard and Laurent. Nagler reports his death in 1831, but Gabet does not mention it.]

AUROUX, NICHOLAS, an engraver mentioned by M. Heineken, who says he was a native of Lyons. That author speaks of four portraits by him, and a print of the Virgin Mary holding the infant Saviour, with St. John kissing his Foot; inscribed Sancta Mater; published at Lyons. There is also a Frontispiece by him to the second volume of Daniel Sennertus; dated 1650.

AUSTIN, WILLIAM, an English engraver, born in London about 1740. He was instructed in the art by George Biekhams, and has engraved some plates of landscapes, after Vander Neer, Ruysdael, and Zuccarelli. His principal work was a set of ten plates, of Views of Ancient Rome, and the Ruins of Palmyra.

[AUZON, MADAME, born in Paris in 1775, a distinguished paintress of familiar subjects and portraits. She was instructed by Regnault; and several of her interesting pictures, purchased by the French government, the Duchess de Berri, and the Society of Friends to the Arts, have been engraved.]

AXARETO, or ASSERETO, GIOVACCHINO. According to Soprani this painter was born at Genoa in 1600. Having shown an early inclination for the art, he was placed under the tuition of Luciano Borzoni; he afterwards studied under Giov. Andrea Ansaldi, and at the age of sixteen painted a picture for the Confraternity of St. Anthony, representing the temptation of that saint, which procured him great reputation. He afterwards painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Genoa. He died in 1649.

AXARETO, GIOSEFFO, was the son and scholar of Giovacchino, and painted history in the style of his father. According to Soprani he was a very promising artist, but died young.

AXELT, JOHN, a German engraver, mentioned by M. Heineken. He appears to have confined himself to portraits, which are but indifferently executed. He engraved,

The Emperor Joseph; after A. Hanneman.

George Frederick, Prince of Waldeck.

A set of Portraits of the Kings of Spain, Hungary, and Bohemia, &c.; and many of the plates in Freheri Theatrum Virorum Eruditione Clarorum.

[AXTMANN, LEOPOLD, a clever animal painter, born at Fulneck in Moravia, in 1700, was the pupil of John George Hamilton of Vienna, and rivalled him in reputation. He settled at Prague, and died there in 1748. He excelled in painting dogs and horses, and there are several good pictures by him in Bohemia.]

[AYALA, BARNABI, an historical painter at Seville, studied under Zurbaran, and imitated his manner in his tints and draperies. No doubt many of his pictures are passed off at this day as the work of his master. He was one of the founders of the academy at Seville in 1660, and attended there till 1671; but as his name does not appear with the subscribers to the statutes in 1673, it is supposed that his death occurred in that year.]

[AYBAR XIMENES, PEDRO, pupil of F. Ximenes, imitated the style of his master; he painted historical subjects, and the pictures he produced in Calatyud, in 1682, are praised for their composition, design, and colour. There is no account of him after that year.]

AZZOLINI, [or MAZZOLINI,] GIOVANNI BERNARDINO. This painter was a Neapolitan, and flourished about the year 1510. His principal residence was at Genoa, where several of his works are in the churches and convents. In the church of S. Giuseppe in that city, are two pictures by this master, representing the martyrdom of St. Apollonia and the Annunciation, which are mentioned by Soprani as works of great merit. [He excelled in wax work, and formed heads with an absolute expression of life.]

B.

[BAADER, AMALIE, was born at Erding in Bavaria, in 1763. She studied engraving under J. Dörner, the director of the gallery at Munich, and practised it for amusement, not as a profession. Her mark, an A and B interlaced, is found on copies, after Rembrandt, Schmidt of Berlin, and some Italian masters.]

[BAAK, HATTIGH JAN, a painter of Utrecht, who lived in the middle of the 17th century, as we find by a picture in the hospital of Saint Job of that city, with the date 1642. It is a landscape and figures in the manner of Poelenburg, and approaches so near to that master, that it may be concluded he was one of his scholars.]

BAAN, JOHN DE, an eminent portrait painter, born at Haerlem in 1633. After receiving some instruction from an uncle named Piemans, he was sent to Amsterdam, and placed under the care of Jacob de Backer, a reputable painter, under whom he remained until he was eighteen years of age, and soon after leaving that master, distinguished himself as a very respectable artist. His success in portrait painting was such, as to occasion his paying little attention to the other branches of the art. His merit recommended him to the principal personages of his country, whose portraits he painted. King Charles II., who had become acquainted with his talents during his residence on the continent, invited him to England, and he had the honour of painting that monarch, and several of the nobility. He was a great admirer of the works of Vandyck, and he imitated in his pictures the style of that admirable painter. One of the best performances of De Baan, was the portrait he painted of Prince Maurice of Nassau-Ziegen. [He painted many portraits of distinguished persons of the time, some of which are not inferior to those of Vandyck. Louis XIV., after conquering part of Holland, was desirous of having his portrait painted by De Baan, and sent for him to Utrecht for that purpose; but the painter excused himself by observing, that, in the midst of his country in mourning, he could not think it proper for him to trace the features of her conqueror.] He died at the Hague in 1702.

BAAN, JACOB DE, was the son and scholar of John de Baan, born at the Hague in 1673. When he was twenty years of age he came to England, amongst the attendants of King William. The celebrity of his father, and the favour of the court, procured him immediate employment, and he painted the Duke of Gloucester, and several of the nobility. Notwithstanding this flattering encouragement, his desire of seeing Italy induced him to abandon it; and he visited Florence, on his way to Rome, and was favoured with the protection of the Grand Duke. On his arrival at Rome he applied himself with great diligence in studying the works of great masters, and painted some portraits and conversations, which were much esteemed. He promised to surpass his father in the art, but died at the early age of 27, in 1700.

BABEUR, THEODORE, a Dutch painter of conversations and concerts. He appears to have confined himself to painting half-length figures. He made choice of such subjects as admitted of mirth and conviviality; and his pictures generally represent musical assemblies, card-players, &c., painted in a free, bold manner, in which his drawing is preferable to his colour. [He was born in 1570, and was a scholar of Peter Neefs; he painted interiors of churches in the manner of that master. He died in 1624.]

BABYLONE, FRANCIS DE, an old engraver, who has sometimes been denominated the Master of the Caduceus, from his having marked his plates with a caduceus. He appears to have flourished about the year 1550. His manner of engraving is original. His plates are all executed with the graver, with fine strokes, and not much crossed. His drawing of the figure is not very correct. His prints are, however, esteemed for the neatness of their finish, and highly valued on account of their rarity. The following is a list of his prints:

Apollo and Diana; small upright plate.

Three Men bound; the same.

The Virgin Mary and Infant resting on the Stump of a Tree, and St. Joseph leaning his Head on his Hand; a square plate; half-length figures.

The Virgin Mary sitting at the Foot of a Tree, the Infant Jesus standing by her side, Elisabeth is seated near him, and an Angel playing on a musical Instrument; St. Joseph is on the right-hand of the print.

The Wise Men's Offering; a small upright plate.

St. Jerome writing, with a Crucifix before him.

Two small upright plates—One represents a Man carrying a Boat, and the other a Woman with a Child in her Arms. Jerome Hopper has engraved both these subjects on one plate, larger; and has surrounded the Head of the Woman with Stars and a Glory.

A Sacrifice to Priapus; a free subject; copied after Marc Antonio.

[Recent discoveries have shown that the artist known as "the Master of the Caduceus," has been misnamed François de Babylone, and that his real name is JACOB DA BARBARY. Brulliot, in his Dictionary of Monograms, mentions two pictures by this master, one having the letters J A D B with the caduceus, and the other the name Jac. da Barbary, with the caduceus and the date 1504. Bartsch is inclined, from the style of his designs, to consider him an Italian; Zani, on the contrary, of Dutch or French origin. Bartsch enumerates twenty-four prints with his mark; and Brulliot mentions four others not described by the former, nor by himself. Ottley, also, speaks of a Holy Family not mentioned by Bartsch.]

BACCARINI, JACOPO. This painter was born at Reggio about the year 1630. He was a scholar of Orazio Talmi, and painted history in the style of that master. Two of his most esteemed pictures are, a Repose in Egypt, and the Death of S. Alessio, in the church of S. Filippo, at Reggio. He died in 1682, aged about 52.

[BACCI, ANTONIO, a native of Mantua, or Padua, (for authorities differ,) was an eminent flower painter, and flourished about 1663.]

BACCIARELLI, ———, a modern Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved a few portraits, among which is that of Augustus Stanislaus Poniatowski, king of Poland.

BACCICIO. See GAULI.

BACCIO. See FRA. BARTOLO. PORTA.

BACCIOCHI, FRA. FERRANTE. This painter was a monk, of the order of the Filippini. Some of his works are noticed in Barrotti's account of the paintings and sculpture at Ferrara. One of his best pictures was the Stoning of Stephen, in the church of S. Stefano in that city; and in St. Maria del Suffragio, there was a Holy Family by this master.

BACHELEY, JAQUES, a French designer and engraver, born at Pont l'Evêque in Normandy, in 1712. We have several prints by him, of landscapes, &c., after the Dutch masters; amongst which are the following:

- View in Italy; after Bart. Breemberg.
- View on the Tiber; after the same.
- View of the Bridge of Voges; after the same.
- View of Rotterdam; after Van Goyen.
- The Castle of Ryswick; after Ruysdael.
- View near Utrecht; after the same.
- A Storm on the Coast of Greenland; after J. Peeters.
- The Redoubt of Schenck; after B. Peeters.
- The Entrance of the Maes River; after the same.
- The View of Havre de Grace; after his own design.

He was a member of the academy of Rouen, where he died in 1781, aged 69.

BACHIOCCI, CARLO. According to Averoldi this painter was a native of Milan. That author, in his Scelte Pitture di Brescia, mentions several of the pictures of this master in the churches and convents in that city, particularly in the monasteries of S. Giacomo and S. Filippo.

[BACHMANN, GEORGE, an eminent Dutch or German portrait painter, who flourished about 1660, and died in 1681.]

BACKER, JAQUES DE. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1530. He was the son of an artist of no great celebrity, from whom he received his instruction in the art. His father dying when he was young, he was taken into the employment of a dealer in pictures, named Palermo; on which account this artist was sometimes called Jacopo Palermo. Whilst in the employment of this person, he gained a great facility of handling, and became an excellent colourist from the practice of copying the works of the great masters. He, however, painted several historical pictures from his own designs, which are highly praised by Karel van Mander; three of which he particularly commends, representing Adam and Eve, and a Charity, and the Crucifixion; and states him to have been one of the most promising young painters of his time. He died in 1560.

BACKER, JACOB DE, a Dutch painter, born at Harlingen in 1608, or according to some authors in 1609. It is not mentioned by whom this artist was instructed, but he is universally allowed to have been a very reputable painter. His chief residence was at Amsterdam, where he distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits. Such was the extraordinary facility and promptitude of this artist, that Houbraken asserts that he finished the half-length portrait of a lady, dressed in a troublesome drapery and loaded with jewels, in one day. He also acquired great reputation as a painter of history; and his pictures were extolled in the poetry of Vondel, his countryman. Several of the pictures of this master are in Spain. In the cathedral at Antwerp, the altar-piece of the chapel of the family of Plantin is painted by this master, representing the Last Judgment; it is a grand composition, correctly drawn, and finely coloured. He died in 1651. [Zani and Nagler place his death in 1641.]

BACKER, ADRIAN DE. This painter was the nephew of Jacob de Backer, born at Amsterdam in 1643. He was sent to Italy when he was young, where he studied several years, and acquired a taste and correctness of design not very common in the artists of his country, which is discernible in all his works. His most esteemed picture is in the town-house at Amsterdam, representing the Judgment of Solomon; it is an ingenious composition, and is painted in a good style. He died at Amsterdam in 1686.

[BACKER, NICOLAS DE, born at Antwerp in 1648, came to England, and was employed by Kneller as an assistant. He also painted perspective views of English churches. It is said that he died in London in 1689. This is probably the same artist that Nagler calls Johan Jakob Bakker, and was with Kneller in 1690.]

BACKEREEL, WILLIAM and GILES. Mr. Pilkington has been led into an error respecting the painter he has noticed under the name of William Backereel, whom he states to have been a disciple of Rubens, and to have painted history. William Backereel was older than Rubens by seven years, according to the biographers of the Flemish artists, who have been followed by M. Descamps. He painted landscape, and resided principally in Italy. Giles Backereel was contemporary with Rubens, and it is probable may have been of his school, though nearly of the same age, from the resemblance of his manner to that of Rubens. The pictures described by Mr. Pilkington, in the church of the Augustines, at Antwerp, were painted by Giles Backereel; who lived always in the Low Countries, where he decorated the churches with pictures, which justly entitle him to the rank of one of the ablest artists of his country, at an epoch when they were in the zenith of their fame. During a long residence in the Netherlands, the author had an opportunity of examining particularly the works of this admirable painter; and it will not be speaking of him with partiality, to assert that some of his pictures may be compared with the works of Rubens and Vandyck; and this assertion may be made without any detriment to the fame of either of those great masters. In the cathedral at Bruges, is an altar-piece by Giles Backereel, representing St. Charles Borromeo administering the Sacrament to a numerous group of persons attacked by the Plague. The composition of this fine picture is grand and striking; the drawing more correct than Rubens, yet bold and decided; and in colouring, it is equal to the chaste and delicate tinting of Vandyck. In the church of the Augustines, at Antwerp, is an admirable picture by this painter of the Crucifixion. At Brussels, in the church of the Franciscans, is a much admired work of this master, representing the Virgin Mary and infant Saviour, with St. Beatrice and other Saints.

BACKHUYSEN, LUDOLPH, a very celebrated painter of sea-pieces and storms, born at Embden in 1631. He was of a respectable family, and was intended by his parents for a mercantile profession, for which purpose he was sent to Amsterdam. His time was, however, more occupied in the society of the painters than in the counting-house, and he at length became a pupil of Aldert van Everdingen, under whom he remained some time. His fondness for shipping led him frequently to the port of that commercial city, where he made drawings of the different vessels. These designs were admirably executed with a pen, and were ardently sought after by the collectors, who purchased them at liberal prices. This encouragement induced him to attempt the representation of similar objects in painting. His first essays were successful, and his pictures were universally admired. He frequently exposed himself to the greatest danger, by hiring fishermen to take him out to sea in the most tempestuous weather, to observe the forms of the waves mounting to the clouds and dashing against the rocks; and he has represented that fearful element in its most tremendous agitation, with a fidelity that intimidates the beholder. His pictures of these awful subjects have raised his reputation even higher than that of W. Vandervelde, although the works of the latter, which represent the sea when calm, or in light breezes, are much superior, and are indeed inimitable. In the latter part of his life he amused himself with etching some plates of views of shipping on the Y, a small arm of the sea near Amsterdam. He died in 1709.

[BACKHUYSEN, LUDOLF, grandson of the great marine painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1717, and died at Rotterdam in 1782. He was a good painter of horses and battles.]

[BACLER D'ALBE, LOUIS ALBERT GUILLAIN, BARON DE, a French artist, was born in 1761 at St. Pol, (Pas de Calais,) and died in 1824. He was general of brigade, and held other military and civil offices under Napoleon. He painted several views in Italy during the incursions of the French; the Battle of Lodi, and the Passage of the Po. The latter were painted under the inspection of the general. He afterwards commemorated several other victories of the French armies; he also painted classical subjects, such as the Death of Paris, Œdipus wandering in Greece, and some interesting landscapes.]

[BACON, SIR NATHANIEL, brother of the great Sir Francis Bacon, is merely mentioned as an amateur painter, who practised the art for his amusement. His manner was that of the Flemish school. There are pictures existing by him, it is said, at Gorhambury, the family seat, consisting of a whole-length portrait of himself, a half-length of his mother, and a Cook-maid with Fowls, admirably painted. Several others, elsewhere, are also mentioned. It is clear that he was known to be attached to the art of painting, by his monument in the chancel of Culford church having, in addition to his bust, a palette and pencils.]

BACQUOY, MAURICE, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1720. He engraved a set of vignettes for the History of France, by Pere Daniel, from the designs of Boucher. We have also by him a set of landscapes and views, and a naval combat, after P. D. Martin, one of the four battles engraved at Paris for the Czar Peter.

BACQUOY, JOHN, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris about the year 1730. Among other book plates he engraved a set of vignettes for the edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published by Basan, which are executed in a neat, finished style.

BACQUOY, PETER CHARLES. This artist is the son of John Bacquoy, and was born at Paris in 1760. Besides a variety of book plates, which are very neatly executed, we have several prints by him, after the modern French painters, among which are the following:

The Portrait of Charles Gravier, Count de Vergennes.

Four Landscapes; after J. B. Benard.

La ruse d'Amour; after Ant. Borel.

La Ruine; after Watteau.

BADALOCCHIO, SISTO. According to Malvasia, the family name of this painter was Rosa. He was born at Parma in 1581, and was educated in the school of Annibale Caracci. He attended that great master to Rome, and assisted him in some of his celebrated works in that city. He was an accomplished designer, possessed an inventive genius, and would probably have proved one of the most reputable painters of that distinguished school, if he had been permitted a longer career in the art. His principal works were the two pictures he painted in the Verospi palace at Rome, representing Polyphemus seated on a Rock, with Galatea and her Nymphs on the Sea; and Polyphemus hurling a Rock on Acis and Galatea; which have been engraved by John Jerome Frezza. Sisto Badalocchio etched several plates, in a free and masterly style, which are, in general, more finished than those by Guido Reni, though not quite so elegantly or so carefully drawn. His ordinary mark was S. B., f. We have the following plates by him:

The Statue of the Laocoon; after the antique marble.

Six plates—Of the Apostles from the Cupola at Parma; after Coreggio.

Fifty-one plates, after subjects from the Bible; painted by Raffaello in the Vatican, engraved in conjunction with Lanfranco, and dedicated to Annibale Caracci. 1607.

The Holy Family, with St. John; after Schidoni; Sisto Badalocchio, fecit.

He died in the prime of life. [Zani says in 1647.]

BADARACCO, GUISEPPE, called IL SORDO. This painter was a native of Genoa, and a scholar of Andrea Ansaldi, under whose tuition he remained some years. He was called il Sordo, from his difficulty of hearing. After leaving the school of Ansaldi he visited Florence, where he was so struck with the beauty of the works of Andrea del Sarto, that he applied himself with assiduity to the study of the pictures of that admired artist. He proved a very reputable painter of history, and executed several works for the churches and public edifices at Florence, where he died in 1657.

BADARACCO, GIOVANNI RAFFAELLE, was the son and scholar of Guiseppe Badaracco, born at Genoa in 1648. After studying some time under his father he went to Rome, and entered the school of C. Maratti. Aiming at a freer and bolder style, he appears to have preferred the works of P. da Cortona to those of his master. There is great suavity and a fine impasto in his colouring, which a profusion of ultramarine has preserved in all its brilliancy. He was much employed in easel historical pictures. Of his large works, the most important were some pictures in the Certosa at Polcevera. He died in 1726.

BADENS, FRANCIS. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1571. He was the son of an obscure artist, by whom he was instructed in the principles of design, but he had afterwards the advantage of visiting Italy, where he remained four years. On his return to the Netherlands he gave ample testimony of the advantages he had derived from his studies. Van Mander speaks of this artist in very favourable terms, as a painter of history and portraits, and says he excelled in painting what are called conversations, or subjects of gallantry. His style of design partook of the taste he had acquired in Italy, and like most of the painters of his country, he was an excellent colourist.

BADENS, JOHN, was the younger brother of Francis Badens, and was also instructed in the art by his father. He was born at Antwerp in 1576, and following the example of Francis, he went to Italy at an early period of his life, where he resided several years. He afterwards visited Germany, where his works were highly esteemed, both in historical subjects, and portraits. He was favoured with the patronage of several of the princes of the empire, and acquired in that country both fame and fortune. Returning to his native country, where he purposed to pass the remainder of his life in the tranquil enjoyment of the fruits of his talents and industry, he was robbed and pillaged by banditti of all he possessed. This unfortunate event threw him into a state of languor and despondency, that occasioned his death in 1613, aged 37. [Balkema, Nagler, and Zani state that he died in 1603, at the age of 27.]

BADIALI, ALESSANDRO, a painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1626. He was a disciple of Flaminio Torri, and painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices at Bologna. He was accidentally shot when he was forty-five years of age. As an engraver, he etched several plates in a slight, free style, from his own designs and others.

He marked his prints with an A and B, AB. We have the following prints by him :

The Virgin Mary seated, with the infant Jesus on her lap; a Bishop and a Monk kneeling; from his own design.

The Holy Family; after Flaminio Torri.

Christ taken down from the Cross; after the same.

The Virgin Mary and infant Christ; half-length.

The Repose in Egypt; Sirvanus in.

Another Repose in Egypt, where the Virgin is holding a Linen to cover the Infant lying on her Knee; Sirvanus in.

The two last prints are generally attributed to A. Badiala. [There is much discrepancy, in regard to the birth of this artist, among the several writers, but they in general agree that he died at the age of 45 or 47.]

BADILE, ANTONIO. This artist was born at Verona in 1480. According to Lanzi, he was the first of the Veronese painters who divested himself entirely of the Gothic manner that prevailed before him, and was superior to his contemporaries in the expression of his heads and the delicacy of his colouring. His pictures of the Raising of Lazarus, in the church of S. Bernardino, and the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, with several Saints, in S. Nazaro, so highly praised by Rodolfi, are worthy of the instructor of Paolo Veronese and Zelotti. He died in 1560.

[BADOUX, ROBERT DE, of Brussels, was a marine painter. There are engravings with his name, and the date 1628.]

[BAECK, JOHN GEORGE, an engraver of Augsburg, about the year 1700. He engraved portraits, of which a great part are mentioned by Heineken, and he also engraved after other masters. His mark is B. fe.]

BAENER, JOHN ALEXANDER, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1670. Among other plates, he engraved an emblematical subject, representing a man kneeling at the feet of another man, with a book before him; and a hand, holding a sword, is striking from the clouds at the latter. It is executed with the graver in a coarse, heavy style.

BAERSTRAET, properly BEERSTRAETEN, JOHN. This painter, whose works are justly held in great estimation, has escaped the notice of the biographers of his country, and is called by Mr. Pilkington, Baerstrat. His name, as signed on his pictures, is Beerstraeten, and they are dated about the year 1660. He sometimes painted sea-pieces; but his works the most deserving of notice, are his pictures of Winter, in which he has represented the principal cha-teaux in the neighbourhood of Amsterdam, with a number of figures amusing themselves on the ice, well drawn and neatly touched. These subjects he has treated with infinite art, and they produce a wonderfully natural effect. [He died in 1687.]

BAGLIONI, CESARE. This artist was a native of Bologna, the son of an obscure painter, from whom he received some instruction; but he had the advantage of being a contemporary of the Caracci, and without being a disciple of that school, he adopted their style, particularly in landscapes, in which he excelled. He was a universal artist, and painted history, animals, fruit, &c.; all of which, according to Malvasia, possessed considerable merit. The principal works of this master are at Bologna and Parma, where they were highly esteemed. In the church of the Madonna del Soccorso, at Bologna, is a picture of the Ascension, and in S. Giorgio an altar-piece, representing St. Anthony and St. Martha. He died at Parma about the year 1590. [Baglioni was living in 1610, as appears by his being employed in that year by the Duke Ranuzio Farnese to paint the church or oratory of Stirone, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin; the foundation of which was laid in 1599. This is clearly shown by documents preserved by the Canon Treccasali and recorded by Zani.]

BAGLIONI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI. This painter was a native of Rome, and a scholar of Francesco Morelli. He was employed in many considerable works at Rome during the pontificates of Clement VIII. and Paul V. In the church of S. Maria dell Orto, he painted a chapel in fresco, where he represented the life of the Virgin; and in S. Nicolo, in Carcere, there is a fine picture of the Last Supper. But his most esteemed performance was his picture in St. Peter's, of that Saint raising Tabitha from the dead, for which he was made a Knight of the Order of Christ by Pope Paul V. He was the author of the Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects, who flourished at Rome, from the Pontificate of Gregory XIII. until that of Urban VIII., from 1572 to 1642.

BAGNACAVALLO, BARTOLOMEO RAMENGHI, called DA. The family name of this eminent painter was Ramenghi; but the denomination he is usually known by in the art is Bagnacavallo, so called from the place of his birth, which took place about 1486. He was first a scholar of Francis Francia; but, according to Bumaldi, he went to Rome, and was admitted into the school of Raffaello, and discovered sufficient ability to be employed by that illustrious painter to assist him in some of the important works in which he was engaged. The principal pictures of his own composition are in the churches at Bologna, and it is sufficient to establish their merit, that they were the objects of the admiration and the imitation of the Caracci, and their school. He died in 1542. [Baruffaldi states that he was born in 1484, and died in 1542, and produces documents in proof: other writers had placed his birth in 1493, and his death in 1551.]

BAGNACAVALLO, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was the son and scholar of Bartolomeo, and according to Malvasia, assisted his father in the work he executed in the Cancellaria at Rome. When Primatecchio went to France to undertake his great work at Fontainebleau, he engaged this artist to assist him. On his return to Bologna, he painted several pictures for the churches, and was made chief of the academy in that city in 1575.

BAILLE, ALEXANDER, an obscure engraver, who flourished about the year 1764. He engraved a plate representing a half-length figure of St. Cecilia; after Francesco Fernandi. It is signed with his name, with the above date.

BAILLEUL, F. This artist was a native of France, and resided at Paris about the year 1722, where he engraved part of the plates which were published at that time, representing the ceremonies of the Coronation of Louis XV.

BAILLIE, CAPTAIN WILLIAM. This ingenious amateur acquired a distinguished reputation as an engraver. He was a native of Ireland, born about the year 1736, and passed the early part of his life in the army, from which he retired with the rank of captain of cavalry. On leaving the service Captain Baillie devoted his life entirely to the arts, and was for many years considered as one of the most enlightened connoisseurs of his time. By this gentleman we have several plates engraved in various manners; but his most admired productions are those he executed in the style of Rembrandt, and his charming copies after the prints of that master. The work of Captain Baillie consists of about a hundred plates, of which the following are the principal, some of which are signed with his name, and some marked with the cipher .

BAILLI, DAVID, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1584. He painted portraits, and perspective views of the interiors of churches and temples. His portraits were esteemed for their correct likeness, and they were extremely well coloured. His church pieces are much admired, though inferior to those of Steenwyck, or P. Neefs. He died in 1638.

BAILLU, or BAILLIU, an engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1614. After having learned the first principles of engraving in his own country, he visited Italy for improvement, where he engraved some plates. He returned to Antwerp about 1635, and engraved several of the works of the most celebrated of the Flemish masters, particularly Rubens and Vandyck. Although by no means equal to Vostermans, Bolswert, or Pontius, his prints are held in considerable estimation. The following are his principal works:

BAILLU, or BALLIU, sometimes written BALEAU, BERNARD. This engraver was a native of the Netherlands, born about the year 1625. His plates are entirely executed with the graver; they consist chiefly of portraits, with some historical subjects. He engraved several of the plates for the collection of portraits of Cardinals; entitled Effigies Cardin. nunc viventium, published at Rome, besides which we have by him the following prints:

The Cardinal Ursini, afterwards Pope Benedict III. 1672.

Canute, King of Denmark; after C. Panig.

BAILLY, J. The name of this artist is affixed to some spirited etchings, after Callot, in which the neat style of that master is imitated with considerable success.

BAILY, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1790. He engraved some landscapes and views, in aquatinta, which possess much merit.

BAJARDO, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Genoa about the year 1620. It is uncertain under whom he studied, but he was a reputable painter of history, and executed several works for the churches and public edifices at Genoa, which are deservedly esteemed, particularly in the portico of S. Pietro, and in the cloister of S. Agostino. His compositions are judicious, his design graceful, and he possessed great facility of execution. According to Soprani, he fell a victim to the plague, which visited Genoa in 1657, when he was in the prime of life.

BAKER, JOHN, an English painter of flowers and fruit, born about the year 1736. Mr. Baker was one of the original members of the Royal Academy. A very creditable specimen of his talents is in the council-chamber in Somerset House.

BAKKER, BAPTIST DE. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1770. He engraved several plates, representing portraits, landscapes, and views, which are executed in a neat finished style.

[BAKKER, N., a native of Antwerp in 1648, was a scholar of Godfrey Kneller in London, where he died in 1689. He painted historical subjects and portraits, and was considered a good designer and a fine colourist.]

BALASSI, MARIO. This painter was born at Florence in 1604. He was first a scholar of Jacopo Ligozzi, and after the death of that master, he successively studied under Roselli, and Cav^o Domenico Passignani. He assisted the latter in the works he executed at Rome by order of Pope Urban VIII. He copied the Transfiguration of Raffaele for the family of Barberini, who placed it in the church of the Conception, or the Capuchins, at Rome. In the church of S. Andrea is a picture of his own composition, of St. Bernard, and in the Stigmata, another of St. Francis. He died in 1667.

BALDI, ANTONIO, a designer and engraver, born at La Cava, in the kingdom of Naples, about 1692. After having passed some time under Solimani he became a pupil of Magliari, to learn the art of engraving. He chiefly resided at Naples, where he engraved several plates, principally from his own designs, amongst which are :

The Emperor Charles VI. ; oval.
 Don Carlos, King of the Two Sicilies ; oval.
 Nicholas Cyrillus ; S. Cyrillus, p.
 Maria Aurelia Caracioli, a Nun ; oval.
 St. Ignatius of Loyola ; oval ; Ant. Baldi ex Prototypo.
 The Monk Raffaele Manca, with an Angel ; oval.
 The Communion of St. Mary of Egypt ; A. Baldi, in. et sc.
 St. Philip of Neri in Heaven ; inscribed Cui nomen dedit, &c.
 St. Emigdeo interceding for the Neapolitans ; Divo Emigdo in terra, &c.
 St. Gregory, with the subjects of his Miracles, 1738 ; Ant. Baldi, fec.

[According to Zani he was living in 1760.]

BALDI, LAZARO. This painter was born at Pistoja in 1623. He went to Rome when he was very young, and became a scholar of Pietro da Cortona. Under so able an instructor he became a very eminent artist, and painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices at Rome, which are particularly described by the Abate Titi. In the pontifical palace at Monte Cavallo, there is a fine picture by this master, representing David and Goliah, and in the church of St. Luke an altar-piece of the Martyrdom of St. Lazaro. He died in 1703.

BALDINI, BACCIO, a Florentine goldsmith, born about the year 1436, who, according to Vasari, was instructed in the art of engraving by Maso Finiguerra. The history of this old artist is not more accurately ascertained than that of others of his contemporaries. What appears most certain respecting him is that he was the engraver of nineteen plates for Dante's Inferno, after the design of Sandro Botivelli, printed at Florence by Niccolo Lorenzo della Magna in 1481. He died at Florence in 1515.

BALDINI, FRA. TIBURZIO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1611. It is not said under whom he studied ; but according to Averoldi, he painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Brescia, of which the most esteemed were the Marriage of the Virgin with St. Joseph, and the Murder of the Innocents in the Chiesa delle Grazie. [His taste reminds us of the excellent school that flourished in 1500 ; magnificence in the architecture, great copiousness of composition, and clearness of effect ; but in the general tone of his tints, and of his flesh, somewhat cold.]

BALDINI, PIETRO PAOLO. According to the Ab. Titi, this artist was a native of Rome, and was a disciple of Pietro da Cortona. He painted history with considerable reputation ; and that author describes several of his works in the public edifices at Rome, which are deservedly admired. Among others, are some pictures in the churches of S. Niccolo di Tolentino, and S. Maria di Loreto ; but above all he commends an altar-piece representing the Crucifixion, in the church of S. Eustacchio, which is finely composed, and designed with great care and correctness.

BALDINI, VITTORIO, an Italian engraver on wood, who, according to Papillon, flourished about the year 1599. Among other prints, he executed the wooden cuts for the frontispieces to the acts of the play of Aminta, written by Tasso, published in 1599.

BALDOVINETTI, ALESSIO, an old Florentine painter mentioned by Vasari, who says he was born in 1425. He painted history and portrait, in oil and in fresco, in the dry Gothic style, usual at his time. He died in 1499. [Zani, on the authority of Francesco Albertini, says, that Baldovinetti was born in 1368, and died at the age of 80 in 1448, in which Vasari concurs. Bottari followed the statement of D. Manni, as given in the text ; but Zani thinks Albertini is the more entitled to credit, as his work was printed in 1510.]

BALDREY, J., a modern English engraver, who flourished about the year 1790. He engraved a few portraits, and other subjects, in the chalk style ; among which are the following :

The finding of Moses ; after Sal. Rosa.
 Diana and her Nymphs ; after C. Maratti.
 The Benevolent Physician ; after Penny.

BALDRIGHI, GUISEPPE. This painter was born at Pavia in 1722. After studying for some years at Florence, under Vincenzo Meucci, he was invited to the court of Parma, where he was appointed principal painter to the Duke. He established a school of painting in that city, which was respectably frequented. One of his most admired productions is a picture of Prometheus, in the saloon of the academy at Parma ; and he painted a large picture of the Portraits of the Family of Filippo, Duke of Parma, which gained him great reputation. He died at Parma in 1802, aged 80.

BALDUCCI, GIOVANNI, called COSCI. According to Baldinucci, this painter was a native of Florence, and was a scholar of Batista Naldini. He afterwards went to Rome, where he was taken under the protection of the Cardinal de Medici, afterwards Leo XI., by whom he was employed for some time. Several of his works are at Rome, and at Florence. Towards the latter end of his life he visited Naples, where he painted some pictures for the churches, and died there in 1600.

BALDUNG, JOHANSEN, or HANS, a German painter and engraver, born towards the end of the fifteenth century at Gemund in Suabia. In the cathedral at Friburg, there are some of his paintings, which are much in the style of the pictures of Albert Durer, with whom he was contemporary. One of these is signed Johan. Baldung, Cog. Grien, Gamundianus Deo et Virtute Auspibus faciebat, 1516. This artist is sometimes called Baldung Grün. As an engraver, he worked only on wood, and his blocks are executed in a bold style, and possess great merit. [Bartsch, Brulliot, and Zani are of a different opinion; they all agree that he did engrave on copper. Bartsch mentions two, and Brulliot alludes to several. Zani maintains that Baldung and Bresang are one and the same artist. See BRESANG.] Although his drawing is not very correct, there is a good expression in his heads. His prints are usually marked with one of these ciphers,

HB or IGB. We have the following prints by him :

- Adam and Eve in Paradise, Eve plucking the Apple.
- The Fall of Adam; inscribed on a Tablet, Lapsus humanis generis. 1511.
- Christ and the Twelve Apostles. 1514; in thirteen plates.
- The Crucifixion, with St. John supporting the Virgin, and Mary Magdalene behind the Cross; fine, in chiaro-scuro.
- Bacchus drunk, near a Tun, a Cupid making water on him.
- An Incantation; in chiaro-scuro. 1510.
- Two Landscapes; very scarce.
- A Man with a Horse, large upright; no date.
- Four small upright prints—Solomon's Idolatry; Samson and Dalila; David and Bathsheba; and Aristotle and Phryne. Very fine.
- The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth and St. Catherine; half length. 1512.
- Two prints of Horses in a Forest; marked BALDUNG. 1534.

BALECHOU, JOHN JAMES, a very celebrated French engraver, born at Arles in 1715, and died at Avignon in 1764. This artist carried the handling of the graver, as far as regards the clearness of the strokes and brilliancy of colour, to a higher perfection than any engraver of his country that had practised the art before him, and if neatness of execution was the greatest merit of a print, few artists would have an equal claim to distinction; but if the excellence of the plate is to express the effect produced by the painter, to give the true design, and, if it may be so expressed, the colour of the picture, his pretensions to superiority will be considerably diminished. Notwithstanding the fascination of his execution, it will be admitted by every judicious observer, that his flesh appears like marble, and that the deficiency of his drawing incapacitates him from giving the true effect of the style and character of the painter. This defect, it must be confessed, is most discernible in his historical prints and some of his portraits; and it will be admitted that his three plates after Vernet are among the fine productions of the graver, although they have been so much surpassed by our own incomparable Woollet. The following are his most considerable works :

PORTRAITS.

- Anne Charlotte Gauchier; after Aved.
- Madame Aved; after the same.
- Jacques Gabriel Grilloit; after Autrean.
- Charles Henri Friso, Prince of Orange; after Aved.
- Don Philippe, Infant d'Espagne; after Viatky.
- Charles Porree, Jesuit; after Neilson.
- Jean de Jullienne, celebrated amateur; after de Troy.
- Madame Jullienne; after the same.
- Charles Rollin, &c.; after C. Coypel.
- Charles Coypel, painter; after himself.
- Prosper Jolyot de Crebillon; 1751; after Aved; fine.
- Henri, Comte de Bruhl; after L. Sylvestre; fine; but it must be before the name of Balcchou, as it was ill-retouched.
- Auguste III. Roi de Pologne; after Rigaud; very fine; but only the first impressions are so; the plate was much altered afterwards.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- Infancy and Youth; two fancy subjects; after D. Bardon.
- Five fancy subjects; after E. Jeaurat.
- La Force; the Portrait of Elisabeth of France; after Nattier.
- St. Genevieve; after C. Vanloo.
- The Storm; after Vernet.
- The Calm; after the same.
- The Bathers; after the same.

BALEN, HENRY VAN, a very eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1560. He was instructed in the art by Adam van Oort, who was also the master of Rubens. On leaving that school he went to Italy, where he studied some years, and painted several pictures which were greatly admired. On his return to Antwerp, he was so much employed that it was with difficulty he could satisfy the demand for his works. Henry van Balen may be ranked among the excellent artists of his country. He was one of the first of the Flemish painters that succeeded in the purity of colour, which was afterwards carried to such perfection by Rubens and Vandyck. In his cabinet pictures, he generally made choice of very agreeable subjects, and frequently represented the Metamorphoses of Ovid, in figures of a small size, well drawn, and admirably coloured; in which the landscapes were generally painted by John Brengel, [some of his landscapes are painted by Kierings.] His works of this description were extremely popular, and were placed in the choicest collections. He did not, however, confine himself to works of a small size, but painted many esteemed pictures for the churches. In the cathedral at Antwerp there is a fine altar-piece by Van Balen. The centre piece represents the Virgin Mary, with the infant Saviour and St. John; and on the two folding doors a choir of angels: it is an excellent picture. For another altar in the same church, he painted St. John preaching in the Wilderness, with a number of figures; well composed and admirably coloured. Van Balen was the first instructor of Vandyck. He died in 1632.

BALEN, JOHN VAN. He was the son of Henry van Balen, born in 1611, and was instructed by his father. After having made considerable progress in the art, his father sent him to Italy, where he had himself derived such advantage from his studies. He remained some years at Rome, and appears to have attached himself to the works of Francesco Albano, whose charming style he has imitated without attending to his purity of design. In all his pictures the taste of his country is discernible; and although his colouring is excellent, and his pencil free and flowing, we have always to regret his want of taste, and his inattention to the correctness of contour. He generally painted cabinet pictures, although he sometimes attempted larger works, in which he was less successful.

BALESTRA, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Verona in 1666. It is not known under whom he first studied the art, but at the age of twenty-one he went to Venice, and became the scholar of Antonio Belucci. After passing a short time with this master he went to Bologna, where he remained some time, and afterwards visited Rome, where Carlo Maratti was then in high reputation. He attended the academy of that master, and became a very reputable artist, gained the prize at the academy of St. Luke in 1694, and was employed to paint several pictures for the churches and palaces at Rome. His style bears some resemblance to that of Carlo Maratti, and without being entitled to the character of a great painter, his works are held in considerable estimation. In the church of S. Ignazio at Bologna, is a picture by this master, representing the Virgin and Infant, with S. Ignatius and S. Stanislaus. He etched some plates from his own designs, in a free masterly style, which he sometimes marked with his name at length, and sometimes with the cipher AB. We have by him:

The sketch of the Head of a Warrior.

Two Soldiers; one standing, and the other sitting down. The Virgin Mary and Infant in the Clouds, with St. John; inscribed Mater pulchra dilectionis; Antonius Balestra, inv. et fec. 1702.

The Three Angels, with Abraham.

Portrait of an Architect, Michele St. Michele.

[Balestra selected the best from every school, uniting variety of beauties in a style of his own, which partakes least of all of the Venetian, though he taught in Venice. He promoted the reputation of that school both by his lectures and example, and left two excellent imitators in his scholars Mariotti and Nogari. He died in 1740.]

[BALLI, SIMONE, a Roman artist, who not being duly appreciated in his own city, went to Genoa and practised under Pazzi. His style resembled that of Andrea del Sarto, and he also painted small pictures on copper. He flourished about 1600.]

[BALLINI, CAMILLO, the son of an eminent jeweller at Venice, flourished, according to Zani, about the latter part of the sixteenth century: he was both a painter and engraver. Lanzi says he painted in Venice in the age of the Mannerists; but Zani speaks of him as an artist of talent, and Ludovico Dolce commends him for his application and assiduity.]

BALTEN, PETER, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1540. He painted landscapes, village festivals, and fairs, in the style of Peter Breughel. His small figures are correctly drawn and neatly touched, and his landscapes are like those of P. Breughel, views of Flanders, painted with great precision. He was received into the academy at Antwerp in 1579, and died in 1611.

BALTESYS, F., an obscure English engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. There is a portrait by him of Sir William Brog, colonel of a Scotch regiment serving in Holland.

[BALTZ, J. GEORGES, a painter of miniature portraits and landscapes on porcelain, was born at Strasbourg in 1760. He is mentioned because many of these are found in cabinets in France, Russia, and England, and hereafter it may be interesting to the possessor to know by whom they were painted.]

BALZER, JOHN, a German engraver, born at Kukus, in Bohemia, in 1738. He chiefly resided at Prague, where he carried on a considerable trade in prints. In conjunction with his brother, Matthew Balzer, he engraved and published several works; amongst which are the following:

A set of fifty plates of Landscapes, Battles, and Conversations; after Norbert Grund, an old German painter.

Two sets of Portraits of Artists and literary Characters of Moravia and Bohemia; published at Prague in 1773 and 1775.

The Portrait of Francis, Edmund Weirotter; 1791; fine.

BAMBINI, GIACOMO. This painter was a native of Ferrara, and a scholar of Domenico Mona. There are many of the works of this master in the churches and other public edifices in his native city. In the cathedral are three altar-pieces, representing the Annunciation, the Flight into Egypt, and the Conversion of St. Paul. A particular account of his other works will be found in the Pittura e Scolture de Ferrara. He died in 1622.

BAMBINI, NICOLO, was born at Venice in 1651, and first studied under Giulio Mazzoni at Venice; but afterwards went to Rome, where he became a scholar of Carlo Maratti. According to Lanzi, he was a correct and elegant designer, with a chaste and simple principle of colouring. Sometimes he designed in the taste of the Roman school, as in his picture of S. Stefano, painted soon after his return from Rome; and at others, he imitated the style of Cav^{te} Liberi, particularly in the beauty of his female heads. He had two sons, Giovanni and Stefano Bambini, who painted in the style of their father.

BAMBOCCIO. See PETER DE LAER.

[BAMESBIER, JAN, a portrait painter, was a disciple of Lambert Lombard; he was born in 1500, and died in 1598.]

[BANCK, JAN VANDER, a Dutch portrait painter, who resided a considerable time in London and painted numerous portraits there; some of which were of distinguished persons, and showed great facility in the execution. Too often, however, they seemed to have been hurried, and neglected in the finishing. He flourished about 1740 or 1750.]

BANCK, PETER VANDER. This engraver was of Flemish extraction, but was born at Paris in 1649. He was a scholar of Francis de Poilly, under whose instruction he became an eminent artist. About the year 1674 he came to England with Henry Gascar, the painter, and engraved many portraits of the most eminent persons of his time. His chief merit is his great neatness and the laboured finish of his execution. From his having engraved so many portraits interesting to the history of England, his works will always be esteemed, independent of their real merit as engravings. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Charles II.; after Gascar. 1675.

 Christ praying on the Mountain; after the same.
 The Naval Triumph of Charles II. from the ceiling at Windsor, painted by Verrio, in two sheets.
 Mercury in the Air, bearing the portrait of Charles II. from the ceiling at Windsor; by the same.

He also engraved a set of heads for Kennel's History of England, from the designs of Lutterel. He died in 1697.

BANDIERA, BENEDETTO. According to Padre Orlandi, this painter was a native of Perugia, and from the resemblance of his works to those of Federigo Barocci, it is supposed he was a disciple of that master. He painted history, both in oil and in fresco, and his pictures were in considerable repute. [He was born in 1557, and died in 1634.]

BANDINELLI, BACCIO. This artist was born at Florence in 1497. He was a very distinguished sculptor; and though he was not so successful as a painter, he is yet entitled to our notice, from the greatness of his design, although he did not equally succeed as a colourist. He was extremely jealous of the fame of Michael Angelo, and was ambitious of excelling in both arts, in imitation of that great master. But it is seldom that human nature is endowed with the faculties of that illustrious artist, and it is probable that whatever merit Bandinelli possessed as a painter, was deprived of the tribute to which it might be entitled, by being brought into the lists against so gigantic an adversary. His principal works, as a painter, were the Murder of the Innocents, and the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence. He died in 1559, aged 62. [Both Lanzi and Zani say he was born in 1487, and that he died at the age of 72.]

BANNERMAN, ALEXANDER, an English engraver, born at Cambridge, about the year 1730. He engraved several of the portraits for Lord Orford's Anecdotes of Painting, in England, and some plates for Boydell's collection, among which are:

Joseph interpreting Pharaoh's Dream; after Spagnolet.

The Death of St. Joseph; after Velasquez.
 Children dancing; after Le Nain.

BANNOIS, ———. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as the engraver of a portrait of Queen Elizabeth.

BAPTIST, J. This artist resided at Amsterdam about the year 1720. He engraved part of the plates for a collection of prints published at Amsterdam in that year, entitled Figures de la Bible, from the designs of Picart and others. They are executed in a very indifferent style.

BAPTIST. See MONNOYER.

BAPTIST, J. See GASPARS.

BARA, or BARRA, JOHN, an engraver, born in Holland, about the year 1572. He was in England in the year 1624, and published some plates, dated 1624 and 1627. In his style he appears to have imitated the works of the Sadelers, but he by no means arrived at their excellence. He made no use of the point, but worked entirely with the graver, in a stiff and laboured manner. We have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Christian II. Elector of Saxony; J. Bara, fec. et exc. 1605.

Prince Maurice of Nassau-Orange.

Joachim, Count of Ortenbourg.

Lodowick, Duke of Richmond and Lenox. 1624.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

A Landscape, with Phaëton demanding of Apollo the conduct of his Car; J. Bara, inv. et sc.

Four Landscapes, in three of them the History of Tobit, and in the other Christ and his Disciples going to Emmaus.

A Landscape, with Susanna and the Elders; Joh. Barra, fecit, Londini, 1627.

A Landscape, with two Men carrying the Trunk of a Tree. Susanna and the Elders; H. Goltzius, inv.; Barra, sc. 1598; scarce.

Bathsheba bathing; after a painter whose initials are G. W.

Herodias, with the Head of St. John; after John van Aken; inscribed Quid mater mali, &c.

Some grotesque Ornaments, from Nicasius Rousseel, marked John Barra, sculp. Londini.

BARABE, ———, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved some prints of architectural subjects, from the designs of G. M. Dumont.

BARABBINO, SIMONE, was born near Genoa, about the year 1585, and was a distinguished scholar of Bernardo Castello. His extraordinary talent alarmed the jealousy of his instructor to such a degree, that he expelled him from his academy. He soon afterwards painted a picture of S. Diego, for the Nunziata del Guastato, which Soprani goes so far as to put on a level with his master. Not meeting with the encouragement he merited at Genoa, he established himself at Milan, where he received the tribute due to his ability, which his fellow citizens had denied him. One of the finest works of this painter is the dead Christ with the Virgin, S. Michele, and S. Andrea, in the church of S. Girolamo. [Lanzi says he quitted his profession and turned to merchandise, in which he did not succeed, and that he died in jail. He must have been aged when he died, as Zani says he was living in 1664.]

BARATTI, ANTONIO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence, about the year 1727. He engraved several plates for a volume of prints, from the collection of pictures belonging to the Marquis Gerini, published at Florence, in 1759. He also engraved a portrait, John Bettini Cignarolli; after Rosa.

BARAUDIE, LE. This artist was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1638. He engraved several plates of designs and ornaments for gardens, which were published at Paris by Michael Van Lochon, in 1638.

BARBALUNGA, ANTONIO RICCI, called. This painter was born at Messina, in 1600. He studied under Domenichino, at Rome, and was a successful follower of the admirable style of that master. He painted two pictures at Rome for the church of the Theatines, representing S. Gaetano, and S. Andrea Avellino, which are worthy of the school of Zampieri. [He returned to Messina, which city he ornamented with his works, and is considered as one of the best painters of Sicily. He formed a school there, and left several eminent scholars; among whom were D. Marolli, O. Gabriello, and Agostino Scilla.]

BARBARELLI. See GIORGIONE.

BARBASAN, LOUIS. According to Florent le Comte, he was a monk of the Abbey of Premontre, and engraved the plan and perspective view of that monastery, from a design of F. Bayette, another ecclesiastic of the same order.

BARBATELLI, BERNARDINO, called POCETTI. This painter was born at Florence, in 1542. He was a scholar of Michele Ridolfo del Ghirlandaio. He painted history, but was more employed in ornamental works of fruit and flowers, and sometimes animals, which he designed with great spirit. He was more successful in fresco than in oil painting, and executed some considerable works for the palaces at Florence, where he died, in 1612. [BARBATELLI, better known as POCETTI, was a very eminent artist. After quitting the school of Michele, he went to Rome and studied the works of Raphael and other great masters there. He subsequently returned to his native place, not only a pleasing and graceful figurist, but rich and learned in his compositions; hence he was enabled to adorn his historical subjects with beautiful landscapes, with sea-views, with fruit and flowers, not to mention the magnificence of his draperies and tapestries, which he imitated to admiration. Very few of his pictures on panel or canvass, but many of his frescos, remain in Florence; nor does he yield to many Italian masters in the art. Pietro da Cortona used to express his astonishment that he was in his time less esteemed than he merited; and Mengs never visited Florence without going to study him, diligently searching after his works. It is recorded that he was of a whimsical disposition, and preferred associating with the lower orders of society, and assuming their habits and manners; while he treated the higher with insolence, or contempt. According to the Canon Moreni, he was in his forty-third year in 1591; consequently he was born in 1548.]

BARBAULT, a painter and engraver, who resided at Rome about the year 1760. As a painter he is little known, but according to Basan, he engraved a set of prints of the Antiquities of Rome, and a few etchings, amongst which is the Martyrdom of St. Peter; after Peter Subleyras. [Nagler calls him JOHANN, and says he was a native of Paris.]

BARBE, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp, about the year 1585. It is thought he was instructed in engraving in the school of the Wiericxes, from the great similarity in their style. He went to Italy, to improve himself in drawing, which may account for his being more correct in his design than many of his countrymen. On his return to Antwerp, he engraved several small and middle-sized plates, in a very neat and agreeable manner. Vandyck painted the portrait of this artist, which is engraved by Bolswert.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Annunciation; inscribed Spiritus sanctus.
The Nativity; inscribed Peperit filium.
The Virgin Mary and St. Joseph arriving at Bethlehem; inscribed Et reclinavit eum, &c.
The Virgin suckling the Infant Jesus in a Garland of Flowers; inscribed Beatus venter, &c.
Christ on the Mount of Olives; in diebus, &c.
Christ and the Disciples at Emmaus; Et aperti sunt, &c.
The Crucifixion; Prohe filii, &c.
St. Ignatius kneeling before an Altar.
Four Emblematical Subjects of the Christian Virtues.

AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Repose in Egypt; St. Joseph presenting an Apple to the Infant; after J. B. Paggi.
The Holy Family, with the Infant Jesus embracing St. Joseph; after Rubens; fine and scarce before the name of Rubens.
Twenty-six plates of the Life and Miracles of Father Gabriel Maria, founder of the Annunciades; entitled Theatrum vitam, virtutes, &c., with his Portrait; after Ab. von Diepenbeck.
The Virgin seated on a Throne, holding the Infant, with a Bird; after Franciscus Franck.

[BARBELLO, GIO-GIACOMO, born at Cremona in 1590, died in 1656, is highly extolled by Pasta for his pictures in various churches at Bergamo; and particularly for an altar-piece in San Lazzaro, representing the titular Saint, remarkable for its dignity of character and decision of hand.]

BARBIANI, ANDREA. This painter was born at Ravenna about the year 1680, and is supposed by Lanzi to have studied under P. Cesare Pronti. He painted history in the style of that master, and there are several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Ravenna and Rimini, which prove him to have been an artist of considerable ability. Among his most esteemed productions are the Four Evangelists, in the vault of the cathedral at Ravenna. He died in 1754, aged about 74.

BARBIANI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was a native of Ravenna, and flourished about the year 1635. It is not said under whom he studied, but from his manner it is probable that he was a scholar of Bartolomeo Cesi. He distinguished himself by several public pictures at Bologna. His most reputable works in oil are his two pictures of S. Andrea and S. Giuseppe, at the Franciscans; and his S. Agata, in the church of that name. His best work in fresco is the Assumption of the Virgin, in the dome of the chapel of our Lady del Sudore at Ravenna, which Lanzi says may be looked at with pleasure, even after seeing the Cupola, by Guido, in that city.

[BARBIER-WALBONNE, JACQUES LUC, a French historical and portrait painter, was born at Nismes in 1769. He was a pupil of David. He painted several subjects from Roman history, and others of a less heroic kind; also portraits of the distinguished generals of France.]

BARBIERE, DOMENICO DEL. This painter and engraver was born at Florence, about the year 1506. He was a disciple of Il Rosso, and accompanied that master to France, when he was invited by Francis I. to ornament the palaces of Fontainebleau and Meudon, in which works he was much aided by Domenico del Barbieri. He was also employed after the death of Primaticcio to execute some fresco paintings, after the designs of that master. His merit as an engraver is not very considerable. His plates are sometimes executed entirely with the graver, in a stiff and clumsy style; and his etchings are not more deserving of commendation. They are however valued from their scarcity, and find their place in the portfolios of the curious. This engraver has been sometimes confounded with another artist, called Domenico Barriere, from some resemblance in their names; but the style of the latter is so different from that of Barbieri, that the mistake will easily be discovered. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, "Domenico del Barbieri Fiorentino," and often marked them with the cipher

B and sometimes D. F. We have the following prints by him:

An Angel standing on a Globe, holding two Trumpets; inscribed Domenico del Barbieri Fiorentino.

The Repose in Egypt, with some Angels; marked D. F. The Stoning of Stephen; Domenico Fiorentino.

Christ taken down from the Cross; after Salviati, without the name of the painter marked with his cipher.

Amphiar raising a Storm against Æneas; after Primaticcio, without the name of the painter; inscribed Amphiaro.

Venus, Mars, and Cupid; after il Rosso; marked D. F. A Banquet; after Primaticcio; signed Dom. Fiorentino.

BARBIERI, FRANCESCO, called DA LEGNANO. This painter was born in a fortress called Legnano, in the vicinity of Brescia, in 1623. He was first intended for the profession of arms, but having discovered a great desire of becoming a painter, he was placed under Bernardino Gandini. He did not long continue with that master, but became a scholar of Pietro Ricchi, who had studied under Guido Reni. Under this painter he became a very reputable artist. He painted history and landscapes, both in oil and in fresco; and in all his works showed a ready invention, and a wonderful facility of operation. He died at Verona, according to Orlandi, in 1698.

BARBIERI, GIOV. FRANCESCO. See GUERCINO.

BARBIERI, PAOLO ANTONIO. This painter was the brother of Gio. Francesco Barbieri, called Guercino. He was born at Cento, a village near Bologna, in 1596. The subjects of his pictures are flowers, fruit, and game. He particularly excelled in painting fish, which are represented by him with astonishing fidelity. He died in 1640.

BARBIERI, LUCA. According to Malvasia, this painter was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Alessandro Tiarini. He painted architectural views and landscapes: and in conjunction with Francesco Carbone, (who painted the figures,) executed some considerable works for the palaces and public edifices at Bologna.

[BARCA, (or BARCHI), CAY. GIAMBATISTA, a native of Mantua, but who became a citizen of Verona, flourished about 1650. He is noted by Lanzi and Zani as an artist of great ability. It is uncertain whether he was instructed by D. Feti, for his style was various, but he abounds with pictorial grace and beauty.]

BARCA, DON VICENTE CALDERON DE LA, a modern Spanish painter, born at Guadalaxara, in 1762. He was a scholar of Don Francisco Goya, and distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits, particularly the latter, in which he excelled. His best historical picture is the Birth of St. Norbert, in one of the colleges at Avila. He died in 1794, aged 32.

BARCO, ALONSO DEL, a Spanish landscape painter, born at Madrid, in 1645. He was a scholar of Antolinez, and according to Palomino Velasco, painted landscapes with great reputation, many of which were in the palaces and private collections at Madrid, where he died, in 1685.

[BARDIN, JEAN, a French historical painter born at Montbar in 1732, was a pupil of Lagrenée, the elder; and afterwards studied at Rome. He became a popular artist in France, and was admitted into the academy in 1795. His subjects are partly historical, partly poetical, and sometimes religious. He was the instructor, in the elements, of David and Regnault. He died in 1809.]

[BARDON, MICHEL FRANÇOIS D' ANDRE, an historical painter and engraver, born at Aix in Provence in 1700, and died at Marseilles in 1783. He was a scholar of Vanloo. Heineken mentions several prints engraved by and after him.]

BARDUCCI, V. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of Pascal Paoli, the Corsican General. It is dated 1768.

BARDWELL, THOMAS, an English portrait painter, who died about the year 1773. He painted some portraits of the principal characters of his time, and published a book entitled "The Practice of Painting and Perspective made easy."

BARENTSEN, DIRCK. This painter was born at Amsterdam, in 1534. He was the son of an artist of little celebrity, who taught him the rudiments of design. When he was twenty-one years of age, he went to Italy, and visited Venice, where he had the good fortune to be admitted into the school of Titian, who conceived for him a particular regard, and bestowed on him many marks of friendship. After passing seven years under that great master, he returned to Holland, and met with great success as a portrait painter; and was also employed in some works for the churches. The style he had acquired by a minute study of the works of Titian, was peculiarly favourable to him in his portraits, and in that branch of the art he was reputed the ablest artist of his country at the time in which he lived. One of his principal historical works, was an altarpiece he painted for the great church at Amsterdam, representing the Fall of Lucifer. This picture was destroyed during the religious troubles of his country. According to Van Mander, he died in 1592.

[BARENT DE DOWE, BERNARD, called Il Sor-do; and Dietrich, or Theodore, Barent, his son. There is some confusion respecting these painters, if in reality there were two of the name, flourishing at the same time, and so nearly related. Both names are applied by Italian writers to a favourite disciple of Titian, whose portrait he painted; and the dates are equally unsatisfactory, as the father is said to be living in 1535, and the son to have been born in 1534, and died in 1592. The same date is again applied to the father, and it is said that he died at Amsterdam. The probability is, that it is one and the same person whose works they describe, and that he returned to his own country at the death of Titian, and resumed his baptismal name.]

BARGAS, A. F., a Flemish designer and engraver, who lived at the beginning of the last century. He etched a set of six landscapes, from his own designs, A. F. Bargas inv. et fec.; and a set of four landscapes, after Peter Bout, which are sometimes with the name of Bargas, and sometimes without it. Mr. Strutt supposes there were two engravers of this name, one M. Bargas, and the other A. F. Bargas; but he has been led into the mistake by supposing the M. Bargas, in Basan, was meant as his Christian name, whereas it is merely the initial of Monsieur, often used by Basan.

BARNONE, GIACOMO. This painter was a native of Genoa, and studied under Andrea and Ottavio Semini. He became one of the most promising artists of his country. His drawing was remarkably correct, his execution free and prompt, and the contour of his figures was extremely graceful. The possession of such talents excited the jealousy of a contemporary artist, Lazzaro Calvi, who, as Soprani relates, after inviting him to a repast, mixed a stupefying drug in a goblet of wine, from the effects of which this unfortunate victim never recovered, but thus perished in the prime of life.

BARKER, SAMUEL, according to Lord Orford, this artist was a relation of John Vanderbank, by whom he was instructed in the art, but who, having a talent for painting fruit and flowers, imitated Baptist, and would have, probably, excelled in that branch, but he died young, in 1727.

[BARKER, ROBERT, inventor and painter of Panoramic Views. The first picture of the kind was a View of Edinburgh, exhibited by him in that city in 1788, and in London in 1789, when it did not attract much attention. This picturesque mode of exhibiting on a large scale, however, soon became popular, and is continued by his son to this day. He died in 1806.]

BARLOW, FRANCIS, an English painter and engraver, born in Lincolnshire, about the year 1626, and was the pupil of Shepherd, an indifferent portrait painter. He excelled in representing animals, birds, fish, &c., which he designed with great accuracy; and if his colour and touch had been equal to his drawing, he would have ranked amongst the most eminent painters of those subjects. The landscapes he introduced into his pictures are very pleasing. Hollar engraved a set of thirteen plates, after his designs, entitled "Several ways of Hunting, Hawking, and Fishing, invented by Francis Barlow, engraved by W. Hollar, 1671." These will establish his claim to accuracy in drawing. Part of the plates for Edward Benlow's divine poems, called "Theophilus," published in 1652, were engraved by Barlow. He published a translation of Æsop's Fables, in 1665, with 110 plates, etched from his own designs. There is a print by him representing an eagle in the air, with a cat in his talons, from a circumstance he witnessed in Scotland. He frequently signed his plates F. B., sometimes enclosed in a circle.

[BARNEY, ———, an English flower painter, living about 1830, painted fruit and flowers with considerable skill, well grouped and tenderly coloured, but somewhat deficient in vigour. He also painted scriptural subjects of a small size.]

BARNUEVO, DON SEBASTIAN DE HERRERA, a Spanish painter, sculptor, and architect, born at Madrid, according to Palomino Velasco, in 1611. He was the son of Antonio Herrera, a sculptor, who instructed him in his art, but his genius leading him also to painting, he was placed under the tuition of Alonso Cano, and distinguished himself as a very reputable artist, in painting, sculpture, and architecture. There are many of his works in the churches and convents at Madrid, amongst which, his principal productions as a painter, are the Beatification of St. Augustine, in the great chapel of the Augustine Recolets, and the Nativity, in the church of St. Geronymo. He died at Madrid, in 1671.

BAROCCIO, [or BAROCCI,] FEDERIGO. This admired painter was born at Urbino, in 1528. He was the son of Ambrogio Baroccio, a sculptor of some eminence, and was placed under the instruction of Battista Venetiano, with whom he studied, until he had reached his twentieth year, when he visited Rome. He was favoured with the protection of the Cardinal della Rovere, who received him into his palace, where he painted some pictures in fresco, and the portrait of his patron. After passing four years at Rome, he returned to his native city, where his first work was a picture of St. Margaret, painted for the Confraternity of the Holy Sacrament. This performance gained him great celebrity; and he was invited by Pope Pius IV. to assist in the ornaments in the Belvedere palace, where he painted the Virgin Mary and infant Saviour, with several saints, and a ceiling in fresco, representing the Annunciation. Having finished these, and other works, he returned to Urbino, where he painted a fine picture for the cathedral of St. Lorenzo, at Perugia, of the taking down from the cross. He again visited Rome, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., when he painted two admirable pictures for the Chiesa Nuova, representing the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to Elizabeth, and the Presentation in the Temple, which are considered his best productions, and for the Chiesa della Minerva, a fine picture of the Last Supper. In the works of Baroccio, we admire an elegant taste, and there is great amenity and harmony in his colouring. He seems to have adopted the manner of Correggio, as the model of his imitation; and although he has succeeded in giving a graceful air to his figures, his style must be allowed to partake of something approaching to affectation, and can never be put in competition with the beautiful and touching simplicity of that inimitable painter. We are indebted to Baroccio for some engravings, which, although not very commendable for the delicacy of their execution, possess the higher qualifications of correctness of design and beauty of expression. He has left us the following plates:

The Virgin holding the Infant Saviour; a small plate, of which the lower part is left unfinished.

The Virgin in the Clouds, with the Infant Jesus; marked F. B. V. F.

The Annunciation; on the left of the print a Cat sleeping; fine.

St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.

The Virgin and our Saviour appearing to St. Francis; a large plate, arched. This is his principal plate.

He died at Urbino, in 1612.

BARON, BERNARD, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris, about the year 1700. He was instructed in engraving by Nicholas Henry Tardieu, whose style he followed. He engraved several plates for the Crozat collection, and afterwards came to England, where he resided the remainder of his life, and died in London, in 1762. His plates are executed in a coarse manner, but are not without considerable merit. The following are his principal works:

BARON, JOHN, or BARONIUS, a French engraver, who is sometimes called Tolosano, from his having been born at Toulouse, in 1631. He resided the greater part of his life at Rome, where he engraved several plates of historical subjects and portraits. They are executed entirely with the graver in a neat, but dry manner, and are not very well drawn. The following are his best works:

PORTRAITS.

BARONI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian engraver, who resided at Venice about the year 1720. He engraved some large plates from the paintings of the Venetian masters; among which is a print representing the Crucifixion, with Angels in the air, and St. John and Mary Magdalene at the foot of the Cross. It is executed in a coarse, displeasing style, and the drawing is very incorrect.

[BARRA, or BARA, JOHN, a Dutch painter and engraver. His works are dated from 1598 to 1632, and some of his prints have the word Londini, where he died, according to Walpole, in 1634. His initials, preceded by the cross of Lorraine, are found on prints engraved after Nicolas Roussel, which represent arabesques. Heineken describes several of his prints.]

BARRAS, SEBASTIAN, an engraver, born at Aix in Provence in 1680. According to M. Heineken, the first edition of the collection of Boyer d'Aiguilles contained twenty-two plates in mezzotinto, scraped by this master, and they were replaced in the second edition by plates engraved by Coelemans. These are very scarce. There is a portrait of Lazarus Maharkysus, a physician of Antwerp; marked Ant. van Dyck, pinx., S. Barras, sc.

BARRET, GEORGE, an eminent painter of landscapes, was born at Dublin in 1728, and received his first education in the art in the drawing academy of Mr. West, in that city. Having been introduced by his protector, Mr. Burke, to the patronage of the Earl of Powerscourt, he passed great part of his youth in studying and designing the charming scenery around Powerscourt Park; and he soon after gained the premium offered by the Dublin society for the best landscape. Mr. Barret came to England in 1762, and two years afterwards gained the fifty pounds premium given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. He had the merit of greatly contributing to the establishment of the Royal Academy, of which he was one of the earliest members. He was a chaste and faithful delineator of English landscape, which he viewed with the eye of an artist, and selected with the feeling of a man of taste. His colouring is excellent, and there is a freshness and dewy brightness in his verdure, which is only to be met with in English scenery, and which he has perfectly represented. The landscapes of this estimable artist are to be found in several of the collections of the nobility; but the principal works of Mr. Barret are in the possession of the Dukes of Portland and Buccleugh, and the great room at Mr. Lock's, at Norbury Park, a performance which will ever rank among the most celebrated productions of the art. He died at Paddington in 1784. We have a few spirited and picturesque etchings by him as follow:

A View of the Dargles near Dublin.
 A set of six Views of Cottages near London.
 A large landscape, with Cottages.
 A View of Hawarden Castle; dated 1773.

BARRETT, RANELAGH. This artist is mentioned by Lord Orford as a noted copyist, who, being countenanced by Sir Robert Walpole, copied several pictures of his collection, and others of those of the Duke of Devonshire, and Dr. Meade. He succeeded greatly in copying Rubens. He died in 1768.

BARRI, GIACOMO, a Venetian painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He etched some plates from his own designs, and in 1651 published a book of some reputation, entitled Viaggio Pittorresco d'Italia. There is a slight free etching by him of the Nativity, after Paolo Veronese.

BARBIERE, DOMINIQUE, an ingenious French engraver, born at Marseilles about the year 1622. His principal residence was at Rome, where he engraved a considerable number of plates, in a very agreeable style, after Claude and other landscape painters, as well as other subjects. They are neatly etched in the manner of Stephen della Bella. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, Dominicus Barriere Massiliensis, and sometimes with the cipher B, which is the mark used by Domenico del Barbieri, which has frequently occasioned mistakes, although their styles are extremely different. Among others we have the following by him:

Portrait of John de la Valette; marked D. B.; scarce.
 A set of six Landscapes; Rossi, etc.
 A set of twelve Landscapes; dedicated to Lelio Orsini. 1651.

Seven Views of the Villa Aldobrandini, 1649; Dominicus Barriere Massiliensis.

A Landscape, with the Zodiac; inscribed Vim profert ubi, &c.

A View of Frascati.

Pantana maggiore nel Giardino di Tivoli, with his cipher.

Eighty-four Views and Statues of the Villa Pamphili; Rossi, exc.

Four; entitled Catalfalco e aparato nella chiesa, &c.

Sepulchral Monument of N. L. Plumbini; Dominicus Barriere Gallus, in. exc. del. et scul.

Hercules, after a basso relievo in the Medicean Garden.

A large plate; entitled Circum Urbis Agonalibus, &c.; with many Figures, 1650; Dominicus Barriere, Mass. del. et scul.

Several plates of the History of Apollo; after the pictures by Domenichino and Viola.

There are several other prints by this artist.

BARRODUCCEO, A. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as the engraver of some small plates, representing the liberal arts and sciences. They are executed with the graver, in a dry, stiff style, and the drawing is very incorrect.

BARROSO, MIGUEL, a Spanish painter, born at Consuegra in 1538. According to Palomino, he was a scholar of Gaspar Becerra, and distinguished himself as an architect, as well as a painter. He was employed by Philip II. in the Escorial, where he painted, in the principal cloister, the Resurrection, Christ appearing to the Apostles, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and St. Paul preaching. His compositions are copious, and his design correct, with great intelligence of light and shadow. [Bermudez and Quilliet say that he failed sometimes in vigour and a knowledge of chiaro-scuro; but that his colour was that of Barocccio, and his forms those of Correggio.] He died at Madrid in 1590.

BARRY, JAMES. This eminent artist of the British school was born at Cork in 1741. He was the son of a ship-master who traded from Cork to England, and was intended by his father to succeed him in that calling, but his decided inclination for drawing induced his parents to permit him to follow the bent of his genius; and he was educated at the academy of Mr. West at Dublin, where, at the age of twenty-two, he gained the premium for the best historical work, by his picture of St. Patrick's Arrival on the Coast of Cashel. His merit procured him the patronage of Mr. Burke, by whose kindness he was enabled to travel, and to visit Italy, where he remained four years. During his residence abroad he was made a member of the Clementine Academy at Bologna, on which occasion he painted for his picture of reception, Philoctetes in the Isle of Lemnos. He returned to England in 1770, and the year afterwards exhibited with the Royal Academy, his picture of Adam and Eve, and the following year produced his Venus Anadyomene, a picture which received the meed of general admiration, and has been favoured with the liberal denomination of the least ill executed production of his life. Whatever may have been the singularities or infirmities of Mr. Barry, it is to be wished that the art of painting may never be more degraded by the productions of eccentric absurdity than it has been by this original and daring artist. In 1775, he published an inquiry into the real and imaginary obstruction to the acquisition of arts in England, in answer to the conceited and bigoted criticism of the Abbé Winkelman, who has taken upon him to assert that the English (that nation which has produced a Newton, a Shakspeare, and a Milton) are incapable of attaining any great excellence in the art, from their natural deficiency of genius, and the unfavourable temperature of their climate; an absurdity, which the actual state of painting in England, and the distinguished rank our present excellent artists hold over those of every other nation in Europe, has rendered futile and contemptible. He soon afterwards made his proposal to the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, to paint, gratuitously, a series of pictures, allegorically illustrating the culture and progress of human knowledge, which now decorate the great room of the Society. This immense work he accomplished, without assistance, in the short space of three years, and it is sufficient to prove the capacious stretch of his mind, and the abundance of his invention. In 1777, Mr. Barry was made a Royal Academician, and on the death of Mr. Penny, in 1782, he was elected Professor of Painting. It is to be regretted that this artist's undoubted genius, and loftiness of mind, were accompanied by a fiery and turbulent nature, which frequently hurried him into the most imprudent and outrageous intemperance of conduct. This unfortunate disposition produced many unpleasant dissensions with his co-academicians, particularly with the late lamented and estimable president, and finally occasioned his expulsion from the Academy in 1792. The principal works of Mr. Barry were his pictures in the Adelphi, his Venus before mentioned, his Pandora, and a picture of King Lear for the Shakspeare Gallery. He has engraved many of his works, which may be regarded as the productions of a painter, inattentive to that beauty and delicacy of execution which are looked for in the productions of a professional engraver. He died in 1806.

BARTOLI, PIETRO SANTE. This artist is sometimes called il Perugino, from his having been born at Perugia, about the year 1635. In the early part of his life he practised painting, but abandoned it, to devote himself entirely to engraving, in which he greatly distinguished himself, not only by the merit of his plates in point of execution, but by the number and variety of the works he has left us. His plates are chiefly etched, and his point is extremely free and masterly. He sometimes marked his works with the initials of his name, with an F. for fecit, as P. B. F. and more frequently with an abbreviation of his name, as Petr. Ss. Bart., sc. Romæ. The number of his prints is very considerable, of which the following list comprises his principal plates:

[BARTOLO, DOMENICO, the nephew and disciple of Taddeo, painted in 1436, and greatly improved and aggrandized his manner. His pictures, compared with those of former artists, display much freedom from the old dryness; his design and perspective are better, his compositions more scientific, with great richness and variety, common with the artists of his school. From pictures painted by him, in the Pilgrims' hospital, Raphael and Pinturicchio, while painting at Sienna, took many notions of national costume, and, perhaps, of some further particulars.]

BARTOLOZZI, FRANCESCO. This ingenious and celebrated designer and engraver was born at Florence in 1730. He was instructed in drawing by Hugfort Ferretti at Florence, and learned the art of engraving from Joseph Wagner at Venice. His first productions were some plates after Marco Ricci, F. Zuccarelli, and others, engraved whilst he was in the employment of Wagner. But the theatre destined for the display of his talents was England, where he arrived in 1764. Few artists have reached so distinguished a rank in their profession as M. Bartolozzi, and that, in every species of engraving. His etchings, in imitation of the drawings of the most eminent painters, represent admirably the fire and spirit of the originals, and he was not less successful in the exquisitely finished plates he has produced in the various styles he practised. Indefatigable in the exercise of his art, M. Bartolozzi has left us a prodigious number of plates, and the only embarrassment we experience, is in selecting as copious a list of his works as our limits will permit, without omitting many objects truly worthy of notice. [He died at Lisbon in 1813.]

BARTOLINI, GIOSEFFO MARIA. This painter was born at Imola, in 1657, and studied at Bologna under Lorenzo Pasinelli. He painted history with considerable reputation, and there are several of his works in the public edifices at Imola, which are highly esteemed, particularly a picture representing a Miracle wrought by S. Biagio, in the church of S. Domenico. He was living in 1718.

BARTSCH, ADAM, a modern German engraver, born at Vienna in 1757. He is keeper of the imperial collection of prints, and has engraved several plates, some of which are after his own designs. Among them are some etchings. [He died at Vienna in 1820, according to Brulliot (Nagler says in 1821); he was principal keeper of the imperial and royal gallery at Vienna, and author of that very elaborate, correct, and useful work 'Le Peintre Graveur,' which may be safely pronounced the best account of prints ever published. He also published a Catalogue of the Etchings by Rembrandt and his scholars, which, like the former, is a wonderful instance of accuracy and perseverance. For the former of these works he etched a series of fac similes of unique or extremely rare etchings by Dutch and Flemish artists, in which the touch and spirit of the originals are admirably copied. His son, Frederic de Bartsch, published, in 1818, a Catalogue raisonné of all the prints by his father; they amount to 505 pieces.]

The Holy Family; after Vandyck.

Meleager presenting the Head of the Boar to Atalanta; after Rubens.

BARY, HENRY, an eminent Dutch engraver, born about the year 1626. He appears from his style to have been either a scholar of Cornelius Vischer, or to have formed himself on his manner. We have several plates by him of portraits and various subjects, executed very neatly with the graver, which have great merit, although by no means equal to the works of Vischer. He generally marked his plates with his name, H. Bary, and sometimes H. B. By him we have the following:

BAS, or BASSE, MARTIN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. From the style of his plates, it is very probable that he was brought up in the school of the Wierixes, his engravings are evidently in imitation of their manner. He was chiefly employed in portraits. We have by him the portrait of Edmund Genungs, Jesuit, prefixed to his Memoirs, published 1591. The portrait of Philip Bosqueri, marked Mart. Basse, and a small frontispiece of St. Peter and St. Paul, dated 1622.

BAS, JAMES PHILIP LE, a celebrated French engraver, who has left a considerable number of plates, executed in an excellent manner. He was born at Paris in 1708, was instructed in the art of engraving by N. Tardieu, and was one of the most ingenious artists of his time. He excelled in landscapes and small figures, which he touched with infinite spirit and neatness. He availed himself much of the freedom and facility of etching, which he harmonized in an admirable manner with the graver and dry point. The popularity of his works procured him a number of scholars, whose talents were employed in advancing the plates which he afterwards finished and published with his name. He is however entitled to an honourable rank among the ingenious artists of his country. The number of his plates is very extensive; the following are his most esteemed works:

The Portrait of Robert de Lorraine, sculptor; engraved for his reception into the Academy in 1741.

The Portrait of P. J. Cazes, painter; the same. 1741.

Four—Of the Times of the Day; after Berghem.

Teniers are more than a hundred, and he appears to have copied that master with uncommon success.

[He died in 1782.]

BASAITI, MARCO. This painter was a native of the Frioul, born of Greek parents, and flourished about the year 1510. He was a competitor of Giovanni Bellini, and if he did not equal that master in every respect, there are some in which he surpassed him. He was happier in his compositions, and understood better how to unite his grounds with his figures. In the Chiesa di S. Giobbe, at Venice, is a fine picture of Christ praying in the Garden, painted in 1510; but, according to Ridolfi, his principal work is at the Certosa, representing the Vocation of St. Peter and St. Andrew to the Apostleship. At Sesto, is a taking down from the Cross, which is favourably mentioned by Lanzi.

BASAN, FRANCIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1723. He was a pupil of Stephen Fessard and John Daule. He was principally occupied as a printseller, and published a Dictionnaire des Graveurs in 1767. He engraved the following plates:

Louis XV., with Diogenes; after Le Moine.
Cardinal Prince de Rohan.
Christophe Lemenu de St. Philibert; after Le Fevre.
Carle Vanloo.
An Ecce Homo; after Caravaggio.
St. Maurice; after L. Giordano.

Christ breaking the Bread; after Carlo Dolce.
The Card-players; after Teniers.
Au Incantation; after the same.
The Gothic Songster; after A. Both.
The Female Gardener; after Fras. Mieris.

He also engraved several copies after the scarce prints of Rembrandt.

[BASCHENIS, EVARISTO, a native of Bergamo, born in 1607, or 1617, (for authorities differ,) was a painter of the Venetian school. He was among the first to introduce in Italy what is now termed painting of still-life. He painted musical instruments with much effect; arranging them on tables covered with the most beautiful tapestries, and mingled with various other objects. From these materials he produced pictures with so much skill as quite to deceive the spectator. He died in 1677.]

BASILLI, PIER ANGILO. This painter was a native of Gubbio, born about the year 1550. He was first a scholar of Felice Damiani, but afterwards studied under Christofano Roncalli, whose manner he followed, though in a more delicate style. His fresco paintings in the cloister of S. Ubaldo are much esteemed; and in the church of S. Mazziale is a picture in oil, of our Saviour preaching, with a great number of figures. He died in 1604, aged about 50.

BASIRE, JAMES, an engraver, born in London in 1740; little is known of the circumstances of his life. He engraved the following plates:

Captain Cook; after Hodges; J. Basire, sc. 1777.
Lady Stanhope, as the Fair Penitent; after B. Wilson.
Lord Camden; after Reynolds.
Orestes and Pylades before Iphigenia; after West.
The Field of the Golden Cloth, or the Interview between Henry VIII. and Francis I., after the picture at Windsor, engraved in 1774. The largest print that has been engraved on one plate, about twenty-seven inches by forty-seven inches.

BASSAN, or BASSANO. See PONTE.

BASSANO, CESARE, a painter and engraver, born at Milan about the year 1584. We have no account of his works as a painter, but he engraved the following plates:

The Portrait of Gaspar Assellius; Bassanus, fec.
A Funeral Frontispiece of Fran^{co} Piccolomini; same mark.

The Nativity; no mark.

BASSELLI, DANIELLO. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a print representing Daniel in the Lions' Den; after P. Caton. It is etched and retouched with the graver in a very slight style.

[BASSEN, B. VAN, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He was a Flemish painter of the interiors of churches and other public buildings, which he executed in a very skilful manner, both with regard to perspective truth and lively colouring. The figures in his pictures are frequently by eminent painters of his day, to whom he returned the compliment by supplying their architectural wants. His works have been too much neglected when called by his name, (to many unknown,) but held in esteem when ascribed to artists of reputation. Neither the date of his birth or death is recorded.]

BASSEPORTE, FRANCES MAGDALENE, an ingenious French lady, who distinguished herself by painting subjects of natural history in water colours. She also engraved some plates for the Crozat collection and others. We have by her,

The Martyrdom of St. Fidelio de Sigmaringa; after P. A. Robert.
Diana and Endymion; after a design of Sebastiano Conca.

There are also three books of flowers, drawn from nature, by Mad^{me} Basseporte, engraved by Avril. She flourished about the year 1729. [She died in 1780.]

BASSETTI, MARC ANTONIO. This painter was born at Verona in 1588, and was a scholar of Felice Riccio, called Brusasorci. He afterwards visited Venice, and studied the works of the excellent colourists of that school, particularly Tintoretto, whose style he preferred. On leaving Venice, he went to Rome, where he remained for a considerable time. On his return to Verona, he was employed in painting some pictures for the public edifices in that city. For the church of S. Tommaso, he painted a picture of St. Peter and other Saints. In St. Anastasia, the Coronation of the Virgin. These, with other works particularly specified by Ridolfi, had acquired him the reputation of an eminent historical painter, when he was cut off in the prime of life by the plague, which visited Verona in 1630. [His works were highly prized, but he left very few, as his maxim was, that painting ought not to be pursued by journeymen as a mechanic art, but with the leisure that is bestowed on literature for the sake of the pleasure it affords.]

BASSI, ANTONIO. In the description of the pictures and sculpture of Ferrara, are mentioned several of the works of this painter. In the church of St. Giovambatista are two pictures by him, one representing the Holy Family reposing in Egypt, the other, our Saviour and the Samaritan Woman; and in the church of St. Clemente, the Virgin Mary, St. Ann, and St. Joachim.

BASSI, FRANCESCO, THE ELDER, was born at Cremona in 1642. He acquired the name of il Cremonese da Paesi, from his eminence in painting landscapes, which he touched with great spirit, and were at the same time sufficiently finished. He decorated them with figures and animals, tolerably drawn, and neatly painted. The private collections at Venice possess many of his pictures. He died about the year 1700.

BASSI, FRANCESCO, THE YOUNGER. This painter was born at Bologna in 1664, and was a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli. Although he died at the age of twenty-nine, he left some works of great merit in the public edifices at Bologna. In the church of S. Antonio, is a picture by Bassi, of that Saint taken up to Heaven by Angels, which is greatly admired. He died in 1693. [He was a distinguished copyist and imitator of Guercino.]

[BASTI, DOMINIC DE, born at Ghent in 1782, was an amateur painter of landscapes and cattle, and also of marine subjects, in which he was considered to excel, in consequence of his having made many voyages by sea as a merchant. His pictures are chiefly to be seen in Ghent in private collections; one was purchased by the commissioners for the encouragement of the fine arts, in that city, in 1822.]

[BASTARNOLO, IL, OR FILIPPO MAZZUOLI, a Ferrarese painter, who died about 1590, is described by Lanzi as a learned, graceful, and correct artist. He was not so well skilled in perspective as in other branches, and he injured his reputation, at first, by designing some figures in too large proportion. In his second manner, however, he became more elevated in design, and more studied in his colouring. The foundation of his taste is drawn from the Dossi; in force of chiaro-scuro, and in his heads, it would seem that he owed his education to Parma; in the natural colour of his flesh he approaches Titian; and from the Venetians would seem to have derived those varying tints and golden hues introduced in his draperies. The church of Gesù contains an Annunciation and a Crucifixion by him, both very beautiful altar-pieces. The Ascension at the Cappuccini is a magnificent piece; and an altar-piece of the titular saint, with half figures that seem to breathe, at the Zittle of S. Barbara, is extremely beautiful. The artist was drowned while bathing: he deserves to be known, more generally, beyond the limits of his own country.]

BASTARO, GIUSEPPE DEL. This painter was a native of Rome, and, according to Baglioni, flourished during the pontificate of Urban VIII. There are several of his works in the churches at Rome. One of his most admired productions, is the picture he painted for the church of S. Maria Maggiore, representing the Assumption of the Virgin. In the church of S. Girolamo is a Descent from the Cross, and the Death of St. Jerome.

BASTON, T., an English painter of sea-pieces and shipping, who flourished about the year 1721. Several of his pictures have been engraved by Kirkall, Harris, &c. He etched a few plates from his own designs, among which is a print representing the Royal Anne, with other ships.

BATHON, ———. The name of this artist is affixed to a portrait of Francis Mieris, the painter. [This is a mistake; the artist's name was HIBBERT, he practised at BATH.]

BATLEY, ———, an English engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1770. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits.

[BATTEM, GERHARD VAN, a Dutch landscape painter, who flourished about the year 1650, and lived nearly to the end of the century. It is supposed that he was a pupil of Rembrandt, as some of his pictures bear a resemblance to that master's manner. His subjects are mountainous landscapes with handitti, travellers, and stag-hunts. He painted between 1650 and 1700.]

BATTONI, [OR BATONI,] POMPEO. P. Battoni was born at Lucca in 1702. It is not said under whom he studied, nor do his works exhibit any proof of his having bestowed much attention on the theory of the art. Without possessing much genius or academic learning, his pleasing style of colouring, and a certain agreeable character in the airs of his heads, rendered his pictures exceedingly popular, and his works were held in considerable estimation all over Europe. It was fortunate for the reputation and success of Battoni, that he lived at a period when the arts had fallen to a very low ebb in Italy. Mengs, his only rival, and his superior, was chiefly employed in Spain, and he was the only painter of his time at Rome that possessed the least pretension to merit, and he consequently met with great employment. He was more occupied in painting portraits than historical works, although there are several of his pictures in the public edifices at Rome. In the church of S. Maria Maggiore there is an altar-piece of the Annunciation; in the pavilion at Monte Cavallo are five pictures by P. Battoni, one of which is considered as his best performance, representing Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter; and in the church of S. Girolamo, there is a Madonna, with several Saints and Angels. He died at Rome in 1787. [Lanzi and Nagler give the date of his birth in 1708.]

BAUDET, STEPHEN, an eminent French engraver, born at Blois about the year 1620. He received his first instruction in the art at Paris, and afterwards went to Rome, and appears to have adopted the manner of Cornelius Bloemaert in his earliest plates, which are executed entirely with the graver. He afterwards on his return to Paris altered his manner, and calling in the assistance of the point, he executed his best prints, which bear a strong resemblance to the manner of John Baptist Poilly. He made an excellent choice in the subjects of his plates, which are from the works of some of the most distinguished masters of Italy and France. He was a member of the Royal Academy of Paris, where he died in 1691. The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

BAUDOQUIN, S. R. This amateur engraver was an officer in the French guards, who amused himself with the point. He etched a set of plates from his own designs, representing the military exercise of the French infantry. He also engraved some prints of battles, after the pictures of Charles Parrocel, and a set of small landscapes, after Michau and others.

BAUDUINS, ANTHONY FRANCIS. This artist was born at Dixmude in Flanders in 1640. He first studied painting under F. A. Vandermeulen, but afterwards devoted himself entirely to engraving. His plates are chiefly after the pictures or designs of Vandermeulen, and are etched in a bold free style, producing a good effect. He died at Paris in 1700, aged 60. His works are as follow:

Six Landscapes, with Figures; middle-sized plates.
 Six Large Landscapes; dedicated to Ph. de Champagne.
 Eight Landscapes, with Buildings.
 Two Stag-hunts; one dedicated to the Marquis de Louvois.

BAUGIN, J., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He engraved several portraits, among which is that of H. de la Mothe.

BAUR, JOHN WILLIAM, a painter and engraver of some eminence, born at Strasburg in 1600. He studied painting under Frederick Brendel, and it was not long before he surpassed his instructor. On leaving that master he went to Italy, and passed some years at Rome, where he painted views of that city and environs, with small figures, neatly touched, which were greatly admired. The Prince Giustiniani favoured him with his protection; and he was also patronized by the Duke di Bracciano, who accommodated him with apartments in his palace. In 1637 he left Rome, and went to Venice, where his works were equally admired. He afterwards visited Vienna, and was taken into the employment of the Emperor Ferdinand III., in whose service he died, in 1640, aged 40. His pencil is very neat and spirited, and his colouring warm and glowing. It is to be regretted that he was not more correct in his design. As an engraver, he acquired considerable celebrity, and executed a great number of plates from his own designs, the best of which are those taken from the Metamorphoses of Ovid. They are slightly etched, and finished with the graver. They are very spirited, and resemble the manner of Callot. He marked his plates sometimes with his name, and sometimes with the cipher WB. The following are his principal works:

Portrait of Don Paolo Giordano II., Orsino Duca di Bracciano; oval; dated 1636; scarce.
 A set of Habilliments of different Nations, with his Portrait; eighteen prints.
 A set of Battles; entitled Caprici di varie bataillie; fifteen prints.
 Another set of Battles; fourteen prints, with the title.
 A set of Landscapes, among which are the Four Elements; twelve prints.
 Twenty of Battles, for the History of the Belgic War; by F. Strada.
 The Metamorphoses of Ovid; one hundred and fifty prints, published at Vienna after his death, in 1641.

[BAUR, NICOLAS, born at Harlingen in 1767, was the son of Antony Baur, a portrait painter. He painted landscapes and views of cities, and many houses in Holland are embellished by his works. He also painted moonlight and winter scenes; and was particularly successful in marine subjects. Two of the latter were purchased by the king of Holland, in 1807, and placed in the Museum. He is considered one of the best of the modern Dutch marine painters. He died at Harlingen in 1820; but the catalogue of the pictures at the Museum at Amsterdam says 1822.]

BAUSA, GREGORIO, a Spanish painter, born at Mallorca, a town in the vicinity of Valencia, in 1596. He was a scholar of Francisco Ribalta, and was a reputable painter of history. The principal altarpiece in the church of S. Philippe of the Carmelites at Valencia is by this master, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint. There are also several pictures by him in the monastery of Los Trinitarios Calzados in that city. He died in 1656.

BAUSE, JOHN FREDERICK, a modern German engraver, born at Halle, in Saxony, in 1738. He is stated to have learned the art of engraving without the instruction of a master, and to have formed his manner by an imitation of the admirable prints of J. G. Wille. His plates are chiefly executed with the graver, which he handled with great purity and firmness. His work is of considerable extent. The following are his principal plates, except his portraits, which are chiefly of German characters of little celebrity.

[He died at Weimar in 1814. A list of his works may be found in Nagler and Heineken.]

BAYEU Y SUBIAS, DON FRANCISCO, a modern Spanish painter, born at Saragossa, 1734. He was first instructed by an obscure painter of his native city, and having gained the premium at the Academy, he was allowed a pension, to enable him to visit Madrid, where he entered the school of Antonio Gonzales Velasquez. His merit recommended him to the protection of Charles III., who employed him in the Pardo, and in the palaces at Aranjuez, and in Madrid. He also painted several pictures for the churches. In 1765, he was received into the Academy at Madrid; and in 1788 was made painter to the king. At the Carthusians are some pictures of the life of St. Bruno, which are considered among his best works. He died in 1795. [It should be mentioned to the credit of Raphael Mengs, the principal painter to the king of Spain, that it was owing to his discernment and liberality this artist received the royal notice. Bayeu profited much by the advice and instruction of Mengs. A list of the public places where his principal works are, may be seen in Bermudez.]

BAYEU, DON RAYMON, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Saragossa, in 1746, and was instructed in the art by Francisco. He is principally to be noticed as an assistant to his brother in his fresco works. He died in 1793.

BAZIN, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1636, he was a pupil of Claude Mellan, and established himself at Paris as an engraver and printseller. He worked principally with the graver, in rather a stiff, dry manner, and published several plates, executed by himself and others, chiefly engraved by the young artists he employed. His plates are portraits and historical subjects, of which the following are the principal:

PORTRAITS.

Madame Helyot, an abbess; Bazin, del. et scul. 1686.

BAZZANI, GIUSEPPE. This painter was born at Reggio in 1701, and was a scholar of Giovanni Canti. He possessed a genius superior to his master, which was cultivated by the acquirement of considerable erudition. According to Lanzi, he studied the works which Rubens had painted at Mantua, whose style he followed. Many of his fresco paintings are at Mantua, and in the neighbouring convents, which are composed in a style that does honour to his genius, and painted with great spirit and freedom. He was director of the academy at Mantua when he died, in 1769. [Zani gives 1690 as the date of his birth.]

[BAZZIACALUVE, or BEZZICALUVA, ERCOLE, an eminent engraver of Florence, or Pisa, (for he is described as of both,) flourished about the year 1640. Bartsch describes seven of his prints, and Brulliot others which had escaped the notice of that accurate writer.]

BEALE, MARY. This lady was an eminent paintress of portraits. She was born in Suffolk, in 1632, and was the daughter of a clergyman. Having shown a great propensity for the art, she was placed under Sir Peter Lely, and soon became a proficient. She copied several portraits by Vandyck, by which she acquired a purity and sweetness of colouring by which her portraits are distinguished. Being of an estimable character, and very amiable manners, she was countenanced and employed by many of the most distinguished persons of her time, and lived in great respectability. Her husband was also a painter, but of no celebrity. Mrs. Beale died in 1697.

BEARD, THOMAS. This engraver was a native of Ireland, and flourished about the year 1728. He worked in mezzotinto, principally portraits; among others are the following:

The Archbishop of Armagh; after P. Ashton. 1728.
The Countess of Clarendon; after Kneller.
John Sterne, Bishop of Clogher; after Carlton.

BEATRICE, NICCOLO, an eminent engraver, born at Thionville, in Lorraine, about the year 1500. He went to Rome at an early period of his life, where he must have resided from 1532 to 1562, as appears from his plates. From the style of this artist, it has been conjectured that he was a scholar of Agostino Veneziano, called de Musis. His works are however inferior to those of that master, and are more indebted to the subjects he has selected, than to the merit of their execution, for the estimation they are held in. A number of prints marked with a B on a dye, thus, B have been frequently attributed to this master; but it is much doubted whether they are by him, as they are executed in a very superior style to those prints known to be his.

He usually marked his plates NB, or NBL, the letters N. B. L. F. The number of his prints is considerable, the most of which are comprised in the following list:

M. Heineken has inserted in his Dictionaire des Artistes, after the prints known to be by this artist, the list of those marked with a dye, as before mentioned, which have been attributed to him, but are more probably by Bartel Beham, under whose article they will be found.

BEAU, PETER ADRIAN LE, a French engraver, born at Paris, in 1744. He has engraved several portraits, and other subjects, after different masters, among which are :

BEAUMONT, CAV^{RE} CLAUDIO, was born at Turin in 1694. After studying some time in his native city, he went to Rome, and applied himself to copying the works of Raffaëlle, the Caracci, and Guido. He appears to have had little respect for the Roman painters of his time, except Trevisani, whose manner he imitated, in the vigour of his tints. On his return to Turin, he was employed in decorating the royal palace, where he painted in fresco, in the library, various symbolical subjects, relative to the Royal Family of Sardinia; and in the other apartments he represented the Rape of Helen, and the Judgment of Paris. In the Chiesa della Croce is a fine picture of the Descent from the Cross. The King of Sardinia conferred on him the order of knighthood, in whose service he died, in 1766.

[BEAUMONT, GEORGE HOWLAND, was an English Baronet, and an amateur painter. He was a liberal patron of artists, and was fond of their society. He was a great admirer of Wilson and Claude; and painted in a respectable manner scenes at Coleorton and the groves at Charnwood. He was born in 1753, and died in 1827.]

BEAUVAIS, NICHOLAS DAUPHIN DE. This artist was born at Paris about the year 1687. He learned the art of engraving under John Audran, and his works are held in considerable estimation. BEAUVARLET, JAMES FIRMIN, a celebrated modern engraver, born at Abbeville, in 1733. He went to Paris when young, and was instructed in the art by Charles Dupuis and Lawrence Cars. His first manner was bold and free, and his plates in that style are preferred by some to the more finished and highly wrought prints that he afterwards produced; although it must be confessed, that they are executed with great neatness and delicacy. The following are his principal works :

PORTRAITS.

BECCAFUMI, DOMENICO, called MICARINO. This eminent artist distinguished himself as a painter, a sculptor, and an engraver. He was born at Siena in 1484, and when a boy was employed in watching sheep. Having discovered some disposition for the art, he was taken from that humble situation, and placed under the tuition of an indifferent painter, called Capanna. He afterwards studied under Giovanni Antonio Vercelli, after which he went to Rome, where he applied himself with great assiduity, in studying the works of Michael Angelo and Raffaele. On his return to Siena, he produced several works, both in sculpture and painting, which gained him great reputation, and commenced his celebrated work executed in mosaic, the pavement of the cathedral at Siena, which has been engraved by Andrea Andreani. He also painted several pictures for the churches, both in oil and distemper. As an engraver, we have by him some excellent wooden cuts; and he engraved some plates, both etched and with the graver only, which show the hand of a great master, although they may not be so pleasing to those who are accustomed to look for neatness of handling. He sometimes marked his prints with his name, Micarino, fec., and sometimes with a B, divided in the middle, thus B.

We have the following prints by him :

Paulus III. Pontifex Maximus; without a name. 1515, a plate.
An Old Man standing, and a Young Mau lying down; Micarino, fec.; a plate.
Three Academy Figures; without a name; a plate.

St. Jerome kneeling before a Crucifix; a wooden cut.
Ten subjects of Alchymy, on the first is inscribed Mecarimus de Sinis inventor.

He died in 1549. [Zani denies that he ever engraved on wood; and says (as does Lanzi) that he was living in 1551.]

BECCARUZZI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Conigliano, in the Frioul, and was a disciple of Pordenone, whose manner he followed, and painted with considerable reputation, both in oil and in fresco. Many of his works are in the churches and convents at Trevigi, which are described by Ridolfi. One of his best performances, according to that author, was the picture he painted for the church of the Franciscans at Conigliano, representing St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, with several Saints.

BECCERRA, GASPAS, a Spanish artist of great celebrity, was born at Baiza, in Andalusia, in 1520. He excelled as a painter, a sculptor, and an architect. The patronage bestowed on the arts by Charles V. induced Becerra to visit Rome, for improvement, at a time when Michael Angelo was in the zenith of his fame; and it is said by Palomino, that he had the advantage of studying under that great master. On his return, he was taken into the protection of the emperor, and executed some works in fresco, in the palace at Madrid, which attracted general admiration. He was one of the first reformers of the Spanish school, by introducing a superior style, founded on the great gusto of Buonaroti. Many of his works are in the public edifices at Madrid, Astorga, and Zamora. He died at Madrid, in 1570, aged 50. [It was Philip II. who patronized Becerra, and not Charles V. The designs of Becerra are very rare, and are much esteemed for the great care he bestowed on them; for he justly considered design as the foundation of painting. For a full account of his works in the public buildings, see Bermudez.]

BECHON, J. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1670. He engraved several plates of landscapes, which are executed in a clear, neat style.

BECKET, ISAAC. This artist was one of the earliest engravers of mezzotinto in England. He was born in Kent, in 1653, and was bred to the business of a calico printer; but becoming acquainted with Lutterel, who had made some progress in scraping mezzotinto, he learned from him the process, and executed several plates in that way, of which many are portraits. We have the following by him :

[BEDUSCHI, ANTONIO, a native of Cremona, born in 1576, was a scholar of Campi, whose manner he imitated. He is mentioned by P. Carasi, and two pictures painted by him in his 26th year, are commended for the promise they give of future excellence: one is the Martyrdom of Saint Stephen, and the other a Pietà for S. Sepolcro in Piacenza. The time of his death is not stated, but he was living in 1607.]

[BEECHHEY, WILLIAM, an English portrait painter, born in 1753, was a native of Burford in Oxfordshire. He became an Academician; was patronized by George the Third, and shared in that of the nobility with the most eminent of his contemporaries in the portrait line. He painted, in 1798, a Review of the Horse Guards, in which the portraits of George the Third and the Prince of Wales were introduced, and for which he was knighted. He at one time attempted fancy subjects, but whether that he found his mind was not suited to the regions of poetry, or that the painting of good likenesses of common nature was more profitable, he did not pursue it with any great ardour. He died in 1839.]

[BEECK, JAN, was born at Looz, and was a monk of the convent of St. Lawrence, near Liege, of which he became the abbot in 1509. He is considered, after the brothers Van Eyck, to be the most distinguished among the ancient painters of Liege. He painted the greatest number of the pictures in the church of his convent. He died in 1516.]

[BEECK, PETER VAN, a Dutch marine painter, living in 1681.]

BEEK, DAVID. According to C. de Bie, this eminent portrait painter was born at Delft, 1621. Others of the Dutch biographers assert, that he was a native of Arnheim, in Guelderland. He had the advantage of being a scholar of Vandyck, and became one of his ablest disciples. He was at least the most successful. King Charles I. favoured him with his patronage, and he was appointed to instruct the Prince of Wales and Duke of York in drawing. This artist is said to have painted with unusual promptitude and facility, which being remarked by the king, when sitting to him, occasioned that monarch to tell him pleasantly, that he believed he could paint if he was riding post. After passing some years in England, he visited Sweden, where he was received with distinction by Queen Christina, who appointed him her principal painter and chamberlain. Notwithstanding the flattering protection he received from the queen, his desire to revisit his native country prompted him to solicit permission to return to Holland, which he with difficulty obtained, under a promise to return. His attachment to his country prevented his fulfilling his engagement, and he died at the Hague in 1656.

BEELDEMAKER, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague, in 1636. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he excelled in painting Huntings of the Boar and Stag. His pictures of these subjects are treated with great ability, and are painted with a suitable fire and spirit. [They are chiefly of small dimensions, and are frequently seen in England.]

BEELDEMAKER, FRANCIS, was the son of John Beeldemaker, born at the Hague, in 1669, and was first instructed by his father, but his genius inclining him to a different department of the art, he was placed under the tuition of William Doudyns, an historical painter of some celebrity. Under this master he soon found himself able to venture on travelling, from the resources of his talent, and he determined on visiting Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he was very assiduous in his studies after the great objects of art in that metropolis; and after passing some years in Italy, he returned to Holland, where he met with very flattering encouragement, and was employed in painting historical subjects and portraits, which were much admired. He was admitted a member of the Academy at the Hague. [He died in 1717.]

[BEER, JOSEPH DE, a native of Utrecht in 1550, was a scholar of Francis Floris, and painted historical pictures with some success. He was patronized by the Bishop of Tournay, for whom he painted several pictures that were much admired. He died in 1596.]

[BEERINGS, GREGORY, born at Malines about 1500, and died in 1570. He studied in Italy, and produced some good pictures of landscapes with architectural ruins; but being of dissipated habits, his talents were never fully developed.]

[BEESTEN, A. H. VAN, a Dutch painter of portraits and bassi rilievi, in which it is said that he excelled; but being a man of great modesty, he suffered others to turn his talents to their profit.]

BEGA, CORNELIUS. This artist was born at Harlem, in 1620. He was the son of a sculptor, called Peter Begeyn, and he is said to have changed his family name to Bega, on account of some irregularities of conduct, which had occasioned his father to disown him. Bega was a scholar of Adrian Ostade; and though his pictures are not equal to the admirable productions of that master, they have sufficient merit to rank him amongst the most interesting artists of his country. His pictures, like those of Ostade, represent Dutch peasants regaling and amusing themselves, and the interiors of Dutch cottages. He treated those subjects with a most humorous delineation of character; and his pictures are deservedly placed in the choicest collections. Whatever may have been the impropriety of his conduct in the early part of his life, his death was occasioned by a circumstance which proves that his profligacy had not extinguished the affections of the heart. A young person to whom he was fondly attached, and with whom he was on the point of marriage, was attacked with the plague, which visited Holland in 1664. She was abandoned by every one, from the dreadful effects of the contagion. Bega alone could not be prevailed on to leave her, but continued the most assiduous attention to her, to the last moment. He caught the infection and died, at the age of 44. As an engraver, he is entitled to particular notice, from the charming etchings he has left us, which are executed with great spirit and ingenuity. They amount to thirty-four or thirty-five plates, among which are the following :

An interior of an Alehouse, with three Peasants, one with a Goblet in his Hand.

A Sketch of two Peasants and a Boy.

The interior of a Dutch Cottage, a Man with a Pitcher in his Hand, with another Peasant with a Woman and a Child; fine.

A Man leaning on a Table, and his Wife suckling a Child.

A Company of five Men and Women regaling.

Another Company regaling, a Woman pouring out a Glass of Liqueur.

An assemblage of eight Peasants, of which two are playing at Cards; very scarce.

[BEGARELLI, ANTONIO, called ANTONIO DA MODENA. This artist is not introduced here as a painter, but rather as a designer and modeller, by whom the most eminent of his time, both in painting and sculpture, profited. He was born at Modena in 1499, and was instructed by Giovanni Abati, the father of Niccolo. He exercised his talents chiefly in Parma, Mantua, and other cities. The limits of this work will not permit a detail of all that relates to Begarelli; let it suffice to say that he was associated with Antonio Allegri in the decorations of the cupola at Parma; that these artists were on the most friendly terms, and mutually assisted each other; that Begarelli made the models from which Antonio painted many of his floating figures, and even instructed his friend in the art of modelling. They were nearly of an age, and there was a similarity in their conceptions of the grand and the beautiful. Begarelli survived his friend Allegri many years, and produced numerous figures, larger than life, of which the monastery and church of the Benedictines preserved a noble collection. Vasari praises him for the fine air of his heads, beautiful drapery, exquisite proportions, and his colour like marble. But this praise becomes common-place and insipid, when the voice of Michael Angelo declares, "If this clay were only to become marble, woe betide the ancient statues." Begarelli was excellent in design, and acted as a master both of that and modelling; hence he greatly influenced the art of painting; and to him we are in a measure to trace that correctness, that relief, that art of fore-shortening, and that grace, approaching nearly to Raphael's, of which the Lombard painters boast so great a share. He died in 1565.]

BEGER, LAURENTIUS. According to Professor Christ, this artist was the nephew of Laurentius Beger, the celebrated antiquary, who was librarian to Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg. He engraved a set of twelve anatomical plates, taken from the designs in the book on Anatomy, by Vesalius. He is also believed to have executed the greater part of the plates of antiquities, published by his uncle, entitled Thesaurus Brandenburgicus.

BEGYN, ABRAHAM, a Dutch painter, born in 1650. He painted landscapes and cattle, in the style of Nicholas Berghem, and his pictures of those subjects are very justly admired. His pencil is light and free, and his colouring is very agreeable. His principal residence was at Berlin, where his works were highly esteemed, and, according to Houbraken, he was principal painter to the Elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Prussia. [This is a mistake, it was Adrien Bega who painted at Berlin.] In several of the collections in Holland, the pictures of this master are placed among the most admired painters, and they are held in considerable estimation in this country. [Unfortunately for the artist's reputation in England, his best works are here ascribed to Berghem, and are frequently altered to give a nearer approximation to his handling.]

BEHAM, BARTEL, a German painter, and very eminent engraver, born at Nuremberg, about the year 1496. He was the elder brother of the celebrated Hans Sebald Beham, and, according to Sandrart and the Padre Orlandi, resided chiefly in Italy, and studied under Marc Antonio Raimondi, at Rome and Bologna. Sandrart mentions several of his paintings, which in his time were in the gallery of the Elector of Bavaria, at Munich, and in the collection of the Prince of Neubourg. He is however more deserving of notice as an engraver than a painter, and may be considered as having been one of the most successful of those that have attempted to imitate the fine style of Marc Antonio. His drawing is masterly and correct, and there is a fine expression in his heads. Many of the plates by this master being without any designating mark, has led occasionally to some difficulty and mistake. The prints that bear his signature are marked BB., and are dated from 1520 to 1533. The following are the prints generally attributed to him.

PORTRAITS.

A Child sleeping, with a Skull.

A Woman sleeping under a Tree, with a Child and a Lamb near her, and in the background a Wolf with a Sword in his Mouth, pursuing a Goose; inscribed Der Welt Lauf.

There are some prints marked with a B on a dye, and sometimes with the dye only, which have been by some attributed to Nicholas Beatrici, but are now with more probability supposed to be by Bartel Beham, as they are every way much superior to the usual style of Beatrici, and are much in the manner of B. Beham. They are as follow :

PRINTS WITH THE B ON THE DYE.

Apollo causing Mærcyas to be flayed; after Raffaello.

Christ giving his Charge to St. Peter; after the same.

A Naval Combat.

A Landscape, with Animals lying about a Tree, and at the Top of the Tree a Phoenix setting fire to her Nest.

BEHAM, HANS, or JOHN, SEBALD, a distinguished German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1500. He was the younger brother of Bartel Beham, from whom, according to Sandrart, he received his instruction in the art; this probably was only the case previous to Bartel's going to Italy, at an early period of his life, as his manner bears a greater resemblance to the style of H. Aldegrever. Like that artist, he is classed by the collectors among what they denominate the little masters, on account of their prints being generally small. John Sebald Beham engraved on copper and on wood, and some few etchings have been attributed to him. He possessed considerable genius, and a ready invention. His drawing of the figure is generally correct, and the airs of his heads and turn of his figures, though rather Gothic, have great merit. His copper-plates are executed entirely with the graver, in an uncommonly neat and delicate manner; and his wooden cuts are remarkably free and spirited. In the early part of his life, he lived at Nuremberg, during which time he marked his plates with a cipher, composed of the three letters, H. S. P., and dated from 1519 till 1530. He afterwards resided at Frankfort, when he changed his mark to a cipher composed of H. S. B., and dated from 1531 to 1549. His works on copper are very numerous, of which the following general list is as detailed as the necessary limit of this work will permit, and it is hoped will be satisfactory.

BEINASCHI. See BENASCHI.

BEISCH, JOACHIM FRANCIS. This artist was born at Munich, in 1665. He was the son of William Beisch, a painter of little celebrity, who was a native of Ravensburg, in Suabia, but was resident at Munich, from whom he received his instruction in the art. He excelled in painting landscapes and battles. His best works are in the palaces of the Elector of Bavaria, in whose employment he was for several years; among which are several large pictures of the battles fought in Hungary by the Elector Maximilian Emanuel. With the permission of his patron, he visited Italy, and made many designs from the beautiful views in that country. His landscapes exhibit very pleasing scenery, and he appears to have imitated the tasteful style of Gaspar Poussin, in the arrangement of his pictures. He died in 1748, aged 83. As an engraver, he has contributed several charming etchings to the portfolios of the collectors. We have by him four sets of landscapes, with figures and buildings, amounting together to twenty-six plates, etched with great sprit and facility.

[BEISSON, ETIENNE, an engraver, born at Aix, was a scholar of Wille. He engraved several subjects after the Italian masters for the Galerie du Musée, and Susanna at the Bath after Santerre. He died in 1820.]

BEITLER, MATHIAS, a German engraver, who resided at Augsburg about the year 1616. According to Professor Christ, he engraved several small plates of foliage, which are very neatly executed.

He usually marked his prints with a monogram composed of an M and a B, reversed, M.

BELBRULE, T., a French engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1580. Papillon mentions some cuts of ornamental flowers, very delicately executed by this artist.

BELJAMBE, PETER, a modern French engraver, born at Rouen in 1752. He has engraved some plates of fancy subjects, from the contemporary painters of his country, and a few prints for the collection of the Palais Royal. Among others the following:

Portrait of Pilate de Rosier.

Cupid reposing on the Breast of Psyche; after J. B. Re-naud.

La petite Jeanette; after J. B. Greuze.

The Circumcision; after Gio. Bellini; for the Orleans Collection.

The Adoration of the Magi; after Carlo Cagliari; the same.

The Holy Family; after M. Angelo; the same.

[BELKAMP, JAN VAN, a Dutch artist, who passed the greater part of his artistic life in England, where he died in 1653, and was much employed in copying the pictures in the royal collection. Some are still in the royal collection; and at Drayton there were formerly portraits of Henry VII. and VIII., copied from large pictures by Holbein, which were burnt at Whitehall.]

[BELL, LADY, the sister of J. Hamilton, R. A., received instructions from her brother and Sir Joshua Reynolds. She delighted in copying the pictures of the latter, and was happy in her transcripts. She also copied some pictures from Rubens in Carlton Palace, among which was a Holy Family that gained great applause. She was widow to Sir Thomas Bell when she died, in 1825.]

BELL, WILLIAM. This artist was a native of Newcastle upon Tyne. He came to London about the year 1768, and was among the first of those who entered as students in the Royal Academy. In 1771 he obtained the gold medal, for a picture representing Venus soliciting Vulcan to forge arms for Æneas. He was much patronized by Lord Delaval, for whom he painted two Views of Seaton Delaval, and the Portraits of the family. He died at Newcastle, about the year 1800.

BELLA, STEFANO DELLA. This ingenious artist was born at Florence, in 1610. He was the son of a goldsmith, and he is said to have been intended for his father's profession, but having shown a genius for drawing, he was placed under Cesare Dandini to learn painting; a decided inclination for the art of engraving, induced his father to permit him to become a pupil of Canta Gallina, who was also the master of Callot. He at first imitated the manner of Callot, but soon abandoned it, and adopted a style of his own. No artist has handled the point with more facility and finesse than Della Bella. His execution is admirable, and his touch spirited and picturesque. He designed his subjects with infinite taste, and his plates produce a clear and brilliant effect. It is not surprising that some of his prints are slightly, though spiritedly etched, when we consider that the number of them exceeded one thousand four hundred. He visited Paris in 1642, where he engraved some plates for Henriet, the uncle of Israel Silvestre. The Cardinal Richlieu employed him to make drawings of the siege and taking of the town of Arras, by the royal army, which he afterwards engraved. On his return to Florence, he was appointed by the Grand Duke to instruct his son Cosmo in drawing, with a suitable pension. He died at Florence in 1664, aged 54. The following is a list of his principal works:

BELLANGE, JAMES, a French painter and engraver, born at Chalons about the year 1610. He studied under Claude Henriet, a painter of Nancy, and afterwards went to Paris, where he became a scholar of Simon Vouet. Of his merit as a painter little is known, but as an engraver, he has certainly been treated with unmerited severity by Basan, who says "that he was a bad painter, and a worse engraver." Although he cannot be classed among the ablest artists of his country, his plates, though executed in rather a singular style, possess considerable merit, particularly for their general effect. His point is free and masterly, and he conducted his masses of light and shadow with more than usual intelligence. His drawing is not very correct, and there is an appearance of affectation in the turn of his figures, which is not unfrequently discernible in the works of his countrymen. The following are his principal plates:

The Annunciation.

The Holy Family, with St. Catherine and St. John.

The Adoration of the Magi.

The Resurrection of Lazarus.

The Death of Virginia.

Adonis carrying Diana on his Shoulders.

BELLANGER, J. A. Basan mentions this amateur engraver as having etched some plates from his own designs with considerable taste, intelligence, and correctness, and a few plates after Raf-faëlle, among which are the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, and the School of Athens.

BELLE, CLEMENT-LOUIS-MARIE-ANNE, born at Paris in 1722, studied under Lemoyne, and afterwards in Italy. His subjects are chiefly of a religious kind, with an occasional representation of the poetical. He was an academician and inspector of the royal manufactories at the Gobelins. He died in 1806.

BELLE, AUGUSTIN-LOUIS, son of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1757, and was probably instructed by his father, whom he assisted at the Gobelins manufactory. He painted many pictures, the subjects taken from sacred and profane history, and the ancient poets: he was living in 1831.

BELLE, NICHOLAS SIMON ALEXIS, an eminent French portrait painter, born in 1674, and died in 1734. He was a scholar of F. de Troy, and had much practice in his day.

BELLEVOIS, a painter of marines, sea-ports, and storms at sea. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed, but he was a respectable artist in his department, and his works are to be seen in many of the collections in Flanders. [He resided at Hamburg, where he died in 1684. His style of painting indicates that W. Vaudervelde and Back-huyzen were his models.]

BELLI, JAMES. According to Basan, this engraver was a native of Chartres, but he resided chiefly in Italy. He was probably a painter, from the style of his plates, which are little more than etchings, although his pictures are not mentioned. We have some plates by him after Annibale Caracci, and the following, supposed to be after his own designs:

Jupiter and Juno.

Venus and Adonis.

Hercules and Omphale.

Diana and Endymion; dated in 1641.

BELLINI, JACOPO, an old Venetian painter, born at Venice about the year 1405. He was a disciple of Gentile Fabriano, and, according to Ridolfi, was one of the most reputable painters of the early period at which he lived. That author mentions several of the works of this master in the public edifices at Venice, particularly in the church of the Confraternity of St. John the Evangelist, representing different subjects from the life of our Saviour and the Virgin Mary, which were held in great estimation at the time. He was also an eminent portrait painter, and left several pictures of the principal personages of the republic and others, one of which is particularly noticed by Ridolfi, that of Jacopo Lusignano, King of Cyprus, who was beheaded at Venice. He died in 1470.

BELLINI, GENTILE CAV^{RE}. This painter was the eldest son of Jacopo Bellini, born at Venice in 1421. His first exertion in the art was assisting his father in some works he was employed in for the government, in which he showed such ability, that he was engaged to decorate the great council-chamber at Venice, for which he painted several large pictures representing the most celebrated achievements of the Venetian republic, of which a particular description is given by Ridolfi. These considerable works gained him great reputation. His next productions were some sacred subjects painted for the Confraternity of St. Marco. Some pictures by Gentile Bellini having been carried to Constantinople by some Turkish merchants, were shown to the Sultan by Mahomet II., who applied to the senate of Venice to permit the painter to visit his court, where he was received with particular favour, and painted the portraits of the Sultan and Sultaness, which were regarded as prodigies by the Turks. He was honoured with the order of knighthood, and presented with a gold chain and medal. On his departure to return to Venice, the Grand Signior gave him letters to the republic expressive of his satisfaction, and the senate bestowed on him an honourable stipend for life. He died in 1501.

BELLINI, GIOVANNI, was the younger son of Jacopo Bellini, and the brother of Gentile, born at Venice in 1422. Having learned the first principles of the art from his father, he for some time worked in conjunction with his brother, and assisted him in the works he was engaged in for the council-chamber, but he was not long satisfied with the dry and Gothic style, which at that time prevailed in the art, and by a contemplation of the simple effects of nature, he was the first of his countrymen that attempted in some degree to reform it. His design however still partook of the stiffness and formality of his time. Ridolfi states him to have been the first Venetian who painted in oil, and reports him to have learned it from Antonello da Messina. Many of the works of this master are to be seen in the churches at Venice, as he was very laborious, and lived to an advanced age. Some of his smaller pictures are placed in the collections of this country. Gio. Bellini has the credit of having been the instructor of two of the greatest painters of the Venetian school, Giorgione and Titian. He died in 1512, aged 90. [“ Il Capo maestro della Scuola Venetiana,” was living, according to Lanzi, in 1516. It would appear that he continued to employ his talents to the last, there remaining in the gallery of Santa Giustina of Padua a Madonna bearing that date. In that year he was visited by Albert Durer, who pronounced him the best painter of the time. Mechel also describes a picture in the imperial gallery at Vienna, in which a young lady almost naked is seated arranging her hair before a mirror. At the lower part of the picture is Johannes Bellinus faciebat MDXV. Brandolesi, in his account of the pictures at Padua, mentions another with the date 1516.]

BELLINI, FILIPPO. This painter was a native of Urbino, and flourished about the year 1594. Almost unnoticed in the history of art, he is stated by Lanzi to have possessed uncommon capacity. He was a follower of the style of Federigo Barocccio, and one of the most successful of his imitators; as appears in his picture of the Circumcision in the Basilica of Loreto, and in the Marriage of the Virgin in the dome at Ancona. Amongst his most important works are fourteen pictures of the works of Charity in the Chiesa della Carita at Fabriano, and the Martyrdom of S. Gaudenzio in the Conventuali di M. Alboddo.

BELLINI, GIACINTO CAVALIERE. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Francesco Albano. On leaving the school of that master, he was taken under the protection of the Count Odoardo Pepoli, by whom he was sent to Rome with Francesco Caracci, for the advantage of study. He was not long at Rome before he discovered an ability that recommended him to the patronage of Cardinal Tonti, by whom he was employed for some time, and who was so satisfied with his performances, that, according to Malvasia, he procured him the knighthood of the order of Loreto. He painted in the manner of Albano, and his pictures possess much of the graceful style of that esteemed master. [He was living in 1660.]

BELLINIANO, VITTORE, was a native of Venice, and, according to Ridolfi, flourished about the year 1526. He painted history, and several of his pictures are in the Confraternity of St. Mark's at Venice, and in the churches of the neighbouring towns.

BELLIVERT. See BILIVERT.

BELLOTTI, BERNARDO, a modern painter and engraver, born at Venice in 1724. He was the nephew of Antonio Canal, called Canaletti, the celebrated painter of the views in Venice, by whom he was instructed in the art. In imitation of his uncle, he also painted architectural views and perspectives, in a very picturesque manner. He principally resided in Germany, and has etched, from his own designs, several views in Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna, and other subjects, as follow :

A set of six Landscapes and Views, engraved at Vienna.
A set of twelve architectural Ruins; the same.
Fifteen Views in Dresden.
Eight Views in the environs of Dresden.
Three Views in Warsaw.

He died at Warsaw in 1780.

BELLOTTI, PIETRO, a Venetian painter of history and portraits, born in 1625. He was a scholar of Girolamo Forabosco, under whom he became an excellent colourist. He painted some historical subjects; but was more employed in portraits, in which he was very successful. He died at Venice in 1700.

BELLUCCI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1654. He was a scholar of Domenico Dfinico, and according to the Padre Orlandi painted several altar-pieces for the churches at Venice and Verona. In the church of the Ascension at Venice, is a fine picture by him of the Nativity. [There are pictures by him in the Dusseldorf Gallery, and several of the landscapes of Tempesta are enriched with figures by Bellucci; he died at Trevisa in 1726.]

[BELTRANO, AGOSTINO, and his wife ANIELLA, Neapolitan painters and scholars of Massimo, of whom Aniella was the niece. They are mentioned together, as they painted alike, and jointly prepared many pictures which their master afterwards finished. They were both painters of no common merit, as is shown by many cabinet pictures in oil, and altar-pieces. Some, however, belong to Aniella alone, and are highly extolled; her uncle is suspected of having a considerable share in them, as Guido had in those of Gentileschi. At all events her original designs prove her knowledge of art, and her contemporaries, both artists and writers, do not fail to extol her. She was murdered by her husband in a fit of jealousy, in the year 1649, at the age of 36: he survived until the year 1665.]

[BELVEDERE, L' ABATE ANDREA, born at Naples in 1646, and died in 1732, was a scholar of Ruoppoli, and excelled in painting fruit and flowers. He quitted painting for the study of literature, in which he held a respectable station.]

[BEMBO, BONIFAZIO, a painter of Cremona, who flourished in the 15th century. According to Lanzi he was employed by the court of Milan in 1467. He painted several of the compartments in the Duomo of Cremona, wherein he showed himself an able artist, spirited in his attitudes, magnificent in his draperies, and glowing in his colours.]

[BEMBO, GIAN-FRANCESCO, the brother of Bonifazio Bembo, flourished in the early part of the 16th century. He was of the school of Cremona; his pictures contain very slight traces of the antique, and he resembles Fra Bartolommeo in point of colouring, but inferior in the dignity of his figures and drapery. Lanzi quotes an altar-piece by him at the Osservanti with the date 1524, of which he says that he has not observed any thing in a similar taste, either in Cremona or its vicinity. Rosini has given a print of a votive picture, which has much of the grace and dignity of Raphael in the designs.]

BEMMELL, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1630. He was the scholar of Herman Zachtleeven, and, like his instructor, excelled in painting landscapes. Not satisfied with the confined scenery of his native country, he went to Italy, and passed some years in designing after the most picturesque views in the environs of Rome. On leaving Italy he travelled through Germany, and settled at Nuremberg, where he met with great encouragement. The studies he had brought with him from Italy were an excellent resource to him in the composition of his pictures, and his pleasing manner of painting landscapes, with waterfalls, and enriched with ruins and architecture, made his works much sought after. His pictures have rarely found their way to this country, and are chiefly confined to the collections in Germany. He etched six plates of landscapes which are dated in 1654, and show the hand of a master. He died in 1703, aged 73. [Balkema places his birth in 1620; Bruliot, his death in 1708; perhaps they are both typographical errors.]

BEMMELL, PETER VAN. This artist was the grandson of William Bemmell, and was born at Nuremberg in 1689. He painted landscapes; but his pictures are little known, except in his native city. He etched six plates of landscapes lengthways, published at Ratisbon; J. H. Osterbag, etc. He died in 1723.

BENARD, J. F., a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1672. He engraved several architectural and ornamental subjects for the work published at Paris by John Berrain.

BENASCHI, or BEINASCHI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA CAV^{RE}, a Piedmontese painter, born in 1684. He went early to Rome, where he became the scholar of Pietro del Po; but afterwards studied under Lanfranco, or at least he formed his style from an imitation of the pictures of that master. The principal works of this artist are at Naples, where he painted several ceilings, and other works in fresco. He possessed an inventive genius, and was an able designer. He died in 1688, aged 54. There is an etching by this painter of a Holy Family, after Domenico Cerini, who was his intimate friend. [Lanzi asserts that he was not born until 1636, and that he was not a scholar of Lanfranco, but admits that he trod in his steps.]

BENASECH, PETER PAUL, an engraver, who is said to have been born in London about the year 1744. He was a pupil of Vivares, and, according to Basan, worked some time at Paris, but returned to England. We have several plates by him of landscapes and other subjects, of which the following are the principal:

Peasants playing at Bowls; after A. Ostade.

Fishermen; after Vernet.

Return from fishing; after the same.

A Calm at Sea; after the same.

Morning; after the same.

Four large Landscapes; after Dietricy; engraved in 1770 and 1771. These are his finest prints.

[BENAVIDES, D. VINCENTE DE, a Spanish painter, born at Oran in 1637. He was a scholar of Francesco Rizi, at Madrid; he did not succeed in the figure, but became a good painter in fresco. He was much employed in theatrical decorations; was appointed painter to Charles II. in 1691, and died in 1703.]

BENCOVICH, FEDERIGO. This painter was a native of Dalmatia, but was educated at Bologna, and flourished about the year 1753. He appears to have studied the style of Carlo Cignani, whose firmness of design he approached more than the amenity of his colouring. Correct in his design, vigorous in his light and shadow, and intelligent in the theory of the art, he produced several esteemed works at Bologna, Milan, and Venice. In the church of la Madonna del Piombo at Bologna, is an altar-piece by this master of the Crucifixion of St. Andrew. He was more employed in painting easel pictures than large works, many of which are in Germany, where he resided some years.

BENEDETTI, DON MATTIA. This painter was a native of Reggio, and a scholar of Orazio Talamini. According to Averoldi, he flourished about the year 1700, and was esteemed as a fresco painter. One of his best performances was the ceiling of the church of S. Antonio at Brescia.

BENEDETTIS, DOMINICO DE. This artist was a Piedmontese, born in 1610. He was sent to Naples when young, where he was placed under the tuition of Fabrizio Santafede, and after studying some time under that master, he went to Rome, where he had the advantage of becoming a scholar of Guido, whose graceful and elegant manner he imitated with success. On his return to Naples, he was favoured with the protection of the king, whose palace he ornamented with several pictures, and painted some works for the churches. Dominican mentions, as his most capital work, the Dome of the Chiesa di D. Regina, where he has represented, in the different compartments, subjects from the life of the Virgin Mary, entirely in the manner of Guido. He died in 1678.

BENEDETTO. See CASTIGLIONE.

[BENEDICTO, ROQUE, an historical painter of Valencia, and scholar of Gaspar de la Huerta. The pictures of Benedicto are often mistaken for the work of his master. He was a better colourist than designer. His most distinguished picture is the Miracle of St. Francis de Paul feeding 3000 persons with a small quantity of bread. He died at Valencia in 1735.]

BENEFIAL, CAVALIERE MARCO. This painter was born at Rome in 1684. There are several of his works in that city, which prove him to have possessed very considerable ability. In the academy of St. Luke is a fine picture of Christ and the Samaritan Woman; and in the church of the Stimulate, the Flagellation. In the Palazzo Spada, there is a saloon entirely painted by him, which is considered one of the finest productions of his time, where are also preserved the cartoons for his great fresco work of the dome of the cathedral at Viterbo. He died in 1764.

[BENET, EL PADRE GERONIMO, painted portraits, figures of the Virgin and Christ, to which he gave considerable expression. He died at Valladolid in 1700.]

BENFATTO, LUIGI. This painter was born at Verona in 1551, and was the nephew and scholar of Paolo Veronese, under whom he acquired a bold, vague, and vigorous style of painting, and, according to Ridolfi, supported for some time after the death of Paolo the celebrity of the school, and the splendid system of colouring established by that great master. He distinguished himself by many admired works in the public places at Venice. In the church of St. Nicholas is a grand composition by this painter, representing the Ascension of that Saint to Heaven, attended by a Choir of Angels, and figures emblematical of the virtues of Faith, Hope, and Charity. In the Chiesa di S. Marta are several pictures of the life of that Saint. Many other works of Benfatto are mentioned by Ridolfi. He died in 1611.

BENINI, SIGISMONDO. This painter was born at Cremona about the year 1675, and studied under Angelo Massarotti. He excelled in painting landscapes, in which the degradation in the distances was well observed, and the effects of light managed with intelligence. His pictures are highly finished and very agreeably coloured. His talent was, however, confined to landscape, and when he attempted to introduce figures of his own, it always diminished their value.

[BENNINGS, LIÉVINE, daughter of Simon Benichius, or Bennings, a miniature painter of Bruges, was instructed by her father. Her remarkable talents, it is said, recommended her to the notice of Henry VIII. of England, who invited her to his court, and procured for her a noble and rich husband. The productions of her pencil were equally admired in the reigns of Mary and Elizabeth; with the latter she was in great favour in 1570. The time of her death is not recorded.]

BENOIST, or BENOIT, WILLIAM PHILIP, a French engraver, born at Coutances in Normandy, in 1725. He engraved some portraits, and a few other subjects, executed in a neat style. He resided during the latter part of his life in London, where he died about the year 1780. The following plates are by him :

PORTRAITS.

Galilee Galilei; after F. Villamena.
The President de Montesquieu.
Alexander Pope.
Rosen de Rosenstein, physician.
Sir Isaac Newton.
Blaise Pascal.
Albert Haller.

SUBJECTS.

Jupiter and Juno; after Giuliano di Parma.
Bathsheba bathing; after Bonnier.

[BENOIST, MADAME, whose maiden name was Delaville Leroux, and to whom Desmoustier addressed "Les Lettres sur la Mythologie," under the name of Emilie, was born about 1770. She painted many interesting familiar subjects, and the portraits of several distinguished persons, among which are the Emperor Napoleon, and his wife, Marie-Louise.]

BENSHEIMER, J., a German engraver, by whom we have a set of portraits of the Electors of Saxony. He marked his plates with the initials of his name, J. B.

BENSO, GIULIO. This painter was born at Genoa, about the year 1601, and was a scholar of Gio. Batista Paggi. Soprani states him to have been also an eminent architect. He painted history and perspective, was patronized by the house of Doria, and executed some ornamental works in their palace. His most esteemed performance is the Crowning of the Virgin Mary, painted in fresco, in the church of the Nunziata; a very capital work. There are several of his pictures in oil, in the churches at Genoa, of which that of St. Domenico is much admired. He died in 1668.

BENT, JOHN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1650. He was first instructed in the art by Peter Wowermans, but afterwards became a scholar of Adrian Vande Velde. His style of painting, both in his landscapes, his figures, and cattle, bears a much nearer resemblance to the works of Nicholas Berghem, than either of those masters, and may easily be mistaken for those of that painter. His pictures are frequently met with in the collections in this country; and without being ranked with the works of the artists before mentioned, they are nevertheless deserving of estimation. He died in 1690.

[BENTUM, JUSTUS VAN, a pupil of Godfrey Schalken, born at Leyden in 1670, died in 1727, painted in the manner of his master.]

BENVENUTO, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called L'ORTOLANO. This painter was born at Ferrara, about the year 1490. After studying some time in his native city, he went to Bologna, and became a scholar of Bartolomeo Ramenghi, called il Bagnacavallo. Barotti mentions several of the works of this master in his description of Ferrara, where they are highly esteemed. In the church of S. Nicolo, is a picture by him of the Virgin Mary and infant Jesus, with several Saints, painted in 1520. For S. Maria de Servi, he painted the Nativity, and in S. Lorenzo, he has represented the Adoration of the Magi. He died at Ferrara in 1525.

BERAIN, or BERRAIN, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Paris, about the year 1636. He has etched several plates, mostly from his own designs, in a very neat manner, though rather stiff and formal; among others are the following :

Twelve plates—Of the ornaments of painting and sculpture, which are in the gallery of Apollo in the Louvre.

Three plates—Of ornaments invented and engraved by J. Berain.

The Mausoleum for the Funeral of Maria Anne Christine Victoire de Baviere.

Devices for a Funeral Ceremony; Berain, fec.

BERARDI, FABIO, an Italian engraver, born at Siena in 1728. He went to Venice when young, and learned the art of engraving under Joseph Wagner. He has engraved several plates of historical subjects, and others, chiefly after the modern Venetian painters :

St. Seraphinus worshipping the Cross, half length; frontispiece. 1767.

A Woman sleeping, surprised by a Sportsman; after Piazzetta.

Isaac blessing Jacob; after J. B. Pittoni; F. Berardi Vene, scul.

The Sacrifice of Gideon; after the same; same inscription.

Jacob and Rachel; after J. Varotti.

Agar and Ismael in the Desert; after J. Varana.

Six Views in Venice; after Canaletti; engraved by Berardi and Wagner. 1742.

Four Pastoral Subjects; after Piazzetta.

BERCHEM. See BERGHEM.

BERCHET, PETER, a French painter, born in 1659. He was a scholar of Charles de la Fosse, under whom he studied till he was found capable of undertaking some works in the palaces in France. He came to England in 1681, and met with employment in ornamenting the houses of some of the nobility. His best work is the ceiling of the chapel of Trinity College, Oxford, where he has represented the Ascension. He died in 1720.

BERG, MATHIAS VANDEN, a Flemish painter, born at Ipres in 1615. According to M. Descamps, his father had the management of Rubens's estates in the neighbourhood of Ipres, who took this artist under his protection, and brought him up in his academy. He was an able and diligent designer, but, whether from a want of genius or from having too long accustomed himself to the servility of a copyist, he was unequal to the arrangement of original composition, and is only known by the excellent copies he left of some of the pictures by Rubens. [Balkema says he died at Alkmar in 1687; Brulliot, following Descamps, that he died at Ypres in 1647; and Zani places his death in 1685.]

BERG, NICHOLAS VANDER, a Flemish engraver, supposed to be a native of Antwerp. He etched some plates after Rubens, which he marked N. V. D. Berg; among others,

The Portrait of Justus Lipsius; a middle-sized plate.

The Portrait of a devout Person, with a Crucifix; half length.

BERGE, P. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, of no great celebrity. His principal work was a set of plates for a folio volume of prints, published at Amsterdam; entitled Theatrum Hispaniæ, or Views of the Towns, Palaces, &c. of Spain. They are etched in a decided manner, but formal and stiff. He also engraved some portraits, one of which is a Jew Rabbi, with a Hebrew inscription; inscribed P. V. D. Berge ad vivum del. et fec., and the Triumph of Galatea, after A. Coypel.

BERGEN, DIRK, or THEODORE VAN, a Dutch painter of landscapes and cattle, born at Hærlém, about the year 1645. He had the advantage of being brought up under Adrian Vander Velde, whose charming manner he imitated, and was his ablest scholar. It has been asserted that "his colouring is more glowing than that of his master," with what truth the connoisseur will have little difficulty in deciding. Without approaching in any respect to the exquisite qualities of that admired painter, his works notwithstanding possess considerable merit, and are deservedly placed in the collections of the curious. His cattle, without the correctness of Adrian Vander Velde, are spiritedly touched, and his pencil is free and firm. We regret a blackness in his shadows, which renders the effect of his pictures abrupt and harsh. He died in 1689. [The censure in the last sentence, though in some instances true, is too general. Some of his finest works are little inferior to Adrian Vander Velde, and are often ascribed to that master.]

[BERGEN, NICOLAS VAN, born at Breda in 1670, imitated the manner of Rembrandt; he painted subjects of history, interiors, and conversations. He died at Breda at the age of 29.]

BERGER, DANIEL, a modern engraver, born at Berlin in 1744. He was instructed in the art by his father, who did not arrive at great celebrity. He has engraved several portraits of the Royal Family of Prussia, and other distinguished personages, and also many historical and other subjects, principally after the painters of his country. In 1787, he was appointed rector and professor of engraving of the academy at Berlin. Among others we have by him the following plates:

A Bust of a Man with a gold chain; after G. van Eckhout.
The Virgin and Child; after Coreggio.
The Virgin Mary; after Raffaele.
Servius Tullius; after Angelica Kauffman.
The Death of Major de Kleist; after D. Chodowiecke.
The Death of Schwerin; after J. C. Frisch.

[BERGERET, PIERRE-NOLASQUE, a very distinguished French historical and landscape painter, a native of Bourdeaux and scholar of David. His subjects are of the most interesting kind, whether taken from national histories, or particular facts relating to individuals. Many of his pictures have been placed in the Luxembourg and other royal palaces. The bas reliefs on the column of the Place Vendôme were designed by him; he painted four of the portraits for the hall of the chancellors, and made designs for the medals struck at the Mint. Many of his pictures have been engraved; and some serve as illustrations to the splendid editions of Boileau, La Fontaine, and other French classics. As his death is not recorded, it will be for some one of his countrymen to do justice to his merits when it occurs; but it would be reprehensible to omit in this Dictionary the name of a man so eminent for his fine taste and talents, and who has done so much to commemorate others.]

BERGHEM, sometimes called BERCHEM, NICHOLAS. The family name of this admirable painter was Van Hærlém; he was the son of Peter van Hærlém, a painter of little notoriety, and was born in 1624. He received his first instruction from his father, but was afterwards a scholar of John van Goyen, and lastly of John Baptist Weeninx. The circumstance by which he acquired the name of Berghem, is thus related by the Dutch biographers. During the time he studied under Van Goyen, his father (probably for some indiscretion) pursued him, with an intention of chastising him, into the house of his master, who, perceiving his father's purpose, and being desirous of sheltering his favourite pupil, called out to his other scholars Berg hem, which in Dutch signifies hide him, and his fellow students afterwards called him by that name. His genuine signature on his pictures, drawings, and etchings is generally Berg hem. The pictures he painted in the early part of his life have some resemblance to the works of Weeninx, although touched with more delicacy; and, like the pictures of that master, they represent sea-ports and embarkations. He afterwards formed to himself a different and a more interesting manner, representing landscapes of most delightful scenery, enriched with architectural ruins, and decorated with charming groups of figures and cattle. His pictures of those subjects are superior to any painter of his country, except his contemporary John Both, and there appears to have been some degree of rivalry between those celebrated artists. M. Vanderhulk, the Burgomaster of Dort, a great encourager of art, engaged Berghem and Both to paint each a picture, for which he stipulated to pay them a liberal remuneration, and a certain sum, as a premium, to the artist whose work should be esteemed to be preferable. Berghem, animated by emulation, exerted the utmost effort of his art, and painted a picture of extraordinary beauty, representing a grand mountainous landscape, richly embellished with figures and cattle of every description. The effort of Both was no less successful, and he produced an admirable Italian scene, glowing under the clear atmosphere of that delightful country, and painted with all the charm of pencilling for which he is so distinguished. The competitors produced their works, and their patron pronounced his judgment in terms as honourable to his liberality, as they were creditable to the talents of the artists. He assured them that their admirable performances had deprived him of the possibility of preference, and that, as they had both reached the perfection of the art, they were both entitled to the premium, the prize of fame. The style of Berghem is excellent; he painted with surprising facility, yet his pictures have all the finish that could be wished. Extremely happy in the choice and arrangement of his compositions, he has given a singular grace and beauty to his figures, without departing from the propriety of costume. The distribution of his masses, and his conduct of light and shadow, are masterly and intelligent; and the delicate degradation of his aerial perspective, the light floating of his skies, and the transparency of the water, have never been surpassed by any painter of his country. This celebrated artist has also amply contributed to the portfolios of the curious collector, by the numerous exquisite drawings and etchings he has left us. Of which the latter are executed in a much more finished manner than we are led to expect from the point of a painter. There is a descriptive catalogue of the etchings of Berghem, by Henry de Winter, published at Amsterdam in 1767. The following list comprises his principal plates :

SETS OF PRINTS ETCHED BY BERGHEM.

- Six plates of Cows, with the title, called the Milkmaid ; C. Berghem, fec. et exc. 1634 to 1644.

Eight of Sheep ; in the title print, a woman standing near a rock.
Eight of Sheep and Goats ; in the title print, a man.
Five larger plates upright, one dated 1652 ; all marked Berghem, fec.
Four smaller plates of different animals, lengthways ; marked N. B.

A Landscape, with a Man playing on the Flute, and a Woman sitting ; scarce ; without a mark.
A Landscape, with a Man standing, and a Woman seated suckling a child ; without a mark ; very scarce.

Berghem died in 1683. [The family name was Claas, or Klaas, and his father was called Pieter Claas van Haarlem, that is, Peter Claas of Haarlem, probably to distinguish him from another painter of the same name elsewhere. With regard to Berghem, or rather Berchem, it is difficult to say with certainty how it originated. On his best pictures, where the signature is genuine, it is Berchem it is the manner of joining the letter e to the h (it being carried down and returned with a loop like a g in writing) that has given rise to the mistake. Mr. C. I. Nieuwenhuys, against whose knowledge and judgment of the merits and history of the Dutch and Flemish painters and their works there is no appeal, is decidedly in favour of BERCHEM. (See his account of the lives and works of some of the most eminent painters.) If the dates on the six plates of Cows be correct, he must have commenced etching in his tenth year ; and it may be observed that they are signed C. (that is, Claas) Berghem.]

[BERGMULLER, JOHN GEORGE, was born at Dirkheim in Bavaria, in 1688, and studied under Andrew Wolff. He painted history and portraits ; some of his works are to be seen in the churches at Augsburg, where he resided. He is chiefly known by his engravings, which he made from his own designs.] Among others we have the following :

Four ; the Baptism of Christ, the Transfiguration, the Resurrection, and the Ascension.

The Conception.

The Virgin Mary caressing the infant Christ.

The Death of St. Joseph ; inscribed S. Joseph moriens.

Christ on the Mount of Olivets.

Sancta Catherina Victrix.

St. Sebastian, Martyr.

The Virgin and infant Jesus presenting the Rosary to St. Dominick.

St. Francis kissing the Foot of the infant Jesus.

An emblematical subject on the Misfortunes of the Times ; inscribed Tumultum adduxit tempus.

Justice and Peace ; inscribed Iustitia et Pax, &c.

The Four Seasons. 1730.

Four of the Signs of the Zodiac ; I. G. B. 1730.

Five figures of Women, emblematical of the Virtues.

[He died in 1762.]

BERGUNZONI, LORENZO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1646, and was first a scholar of Gio. Batista Bolognini, but he afterwards studied under Guercino. His first attempts were in historical subjects, in which he had some success ; but having painted the portraits of some persons of distinction at Bologna, he met with such encouragement, that he devoted himself entirely to that department of the art, in which he excelled.

BERKHEYDEN, JOB, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1643. It does not appear that he had any instructor, but by a natural inclination for the art, he employed himself, when young, in making sketches of the environs of Haerlem, and the commendation bestowed on his first essays encouraged him to adopt it as a profession. His genius led him to paint landscapes, and views of the Rhine, which he represented in a very pleasing manner, and his attentive observance of nature enabled him to give an appearance of air and sunshine to his pictures, which produces a very agreeable effect. He decorated his landscapes with small figures, tolerably correctly drawn, and very neatly touched. He sometimes painted village feasts and merry-makings, which are not without considerable merit. In company with his brother, who is the subject of the following article, he travelled through Germany, and was for some time in the employment of the Elector Palatine, for whom he painted several pictures, and was presented with a gold chain and medal. He returned with his brother to Holland, where he met with great encouragement. In the year 1698, he had the misfortune to fall into a canal at Amsterdam, and was drowned.

BERKHEYDEN, GERARD. He was the younger brother of Job Berkheyden, born at Haerlem in 1645. The success of his brother encouraged him to the attempt of becoming a painter, and he was assisted by his instruction. These artists appear to have been bound to each other by the most affectionate attachment, their pursuit of the same profession, instead of producing jealousy or ill-will, seems only to have inspired them with a laudable emulation, and a desire of contributing to each other's celebrity. The pictures of Gerard Berkheyden are faithful representations of select views of the interior of the principal towns in Holland and Germany, painted with great neatness, and well coloured. They are sometimes ornamented with figures by Job Berkheyden, who surpassed his brother in that branch of the art. He died at Amsterdam in 1693.

BERKMANS, HENRY, a Dutch painter, born at Clunder, near Williamstadt, in 1629. His first master was Thomas Willeborts Boschart, under whom he studied some time. He afterwards became a scholar of J. Jordaens. On leaving that master, he painted some historical pictures with reputation, but the encouragement he met with in painting portraits, induced him to forsake a path which promised to lead him to celebrity. Such was the desire of possessing his portraits, that it was with difficulty he could fulfil his engagements. He painted the Count of Nassau, the Admiral de Ruyter, and many of the most distinguished personages of his country. His most capital work is a large picture of the Company of Archers, in the town-house at Middleburg, [where he died in 1690.]

BERLINGHIERI, CAMILLO, called IL FERRA-

RESINO. This artist was born at Ferrara, about the year 1596. He was the scholar of Carlo Bononi, and proved a very reputable painter of history. His works are chiefly at Ferrara and at Venice, where he was called il Ferraresino. In the church of S. Niccolo, at Ferrara, is a fine picture, by him, of the Miracle of the Manna, and in S. Antonio Abate, the Annunciation. He died at Ferrara in 1635.

BERNABEI, PIER ANTONIO, called DELLA CASA. This painter was a native of Parma, and flourished about the year 1550. He was not a scholar of Parmegiano, as has been asserted, but was rather a follower of the style of Coreggio. Although Orlandi contents himself with styling this excellent artist Pittor non ignobile, his great work of the Cupola of la Madonna del Quartiere, proves him to have been one of the ablest fresco painters of his time in Lombardy. It represents a Multitude of the Blessed, a grand composition, copious without confusion; the figures designed in a Coreggiesque style, with great relief, and a vigour of colouring which has still preserved its original freshness. There are other considerable works by this master at the Carmelites, and in other public places at Parma.

[BERNAERTS, NICAISE, was born in Antwerp, according to Nagler, in 1608, and was a scholar of Francis Snyders. The subjects of his pictures are the same as those of his master, and bear a great resemblance to them; indeed some writers affirm that they are very little inferior in execution. It is certain that they have been sold as the genuine productions of Snyders. He died, according to Nagler, in 1678. Zani places his birth in 1593, and his death in 1663; thus both make him of the age of 70.]

[BERNARD, ———, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1680, was a scholar of Solimena, whose manner he studiously followed. He died in 1734.]

BERNARD, B. The name of this engraver is affixed to several plates of biblical subjects, engraved from the designs of Bernard Picart, published at Amsterdam in 1720. They are executed in a very indifferent style.

[BERNARD, JAN, a copyist of Paul Potter and Berghem, born in 1765, died in 1833. He was a member of the Institute, and of the Academy of Fine Arts at Amsterdam.]

BERNARD, OF BRUSSELS. See VAN ORLEY.

BERNARD, SOLOMON, or LITTLE BERNARD, a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1512. He acquired the name of Little Bernard, according to Sandrart, from his diminutive size, but it is reported by others, with more probability, to have been given him on account of the small size of his prints. He executed a number of wooden cuts for the booksellers, which are well designed, and cut with great spirit and neatness. His best prints are those he executed for the Bible which was published at Lyons, at different times, from 1550 to 1580. Besides which we have by him the following :

A set of prints for the Metamorphoses of Ovid; published at Lyons, in 1557.

A set of Medals for the Epitome of the Antiquities of Giacomo Strada, of Mantua; published at Lyons, in 1553.

Thirty-four of the History of Psyche; with Italian verses. Eighteen of Baths; printed at Lyons, in 1572.

A set of prints for the Golden Ass of Apuleus; published at Lyons, in 1558.

A set of vignettes for the French Translation of Virgil; printed at Lyons, in 1560.

The Seven Planets, represented by the Figures of Hea-then Divinities.

Twenty-two of Theatrical Decorations.

A set of oval prints, for a Book of Hymns; printed at Lyons, in 1560.

[According to Brulliot he must have been living in 1598.]

BERNARD, SAMUEL, a miniature painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1615. He was a scholar of Simon Vouet, and made some attempts at fresco painting, but not succeeding to his expectation, he for some time painted miniature, but finally devoted himself entirely to engraving. He engraved several plates, both with the point and in mezzotinto, of which the following are the principal :

ETCHINGS.

Charles Louis, Duke of Bavaria; after Vandyck; S. Bernard. 1657.

Louis Garnier, sculptor and painter.

Philip, Count of Bethune.

Anne Tristan de la Beaume de Luze, Archbishop of Paris; after de Troy.

The Apparition of St. Peter and St. Paul to Attila; after Raffaele.

The Young Astyanax discovered by Ulysses in the Tomb of Hector; after Bourdon.

The Crucifixion; after Ph. de Champagne.

The Virgin Mary, with the dead Christ; after the same.

The Ascension; after the same.

An allegorical subject of Concord.

The Flight into Egypt; after Guido.

MEZZOTINTOS.

The Portrait of Louis XIV.; oval.

Sebastian, le Prestre de Vauban; after F. de Troy.

The Nativity; after Rembrandt.

A Herdsman driving Cattle.

An Ox Market; after B. Castiglione.

The Repose; called La Zingara; after Coreggio.

Basan, and after him Mr. Strutt, have been led into an error, in respect to this artist, in consequence of his having used the point as well as mezzotinto, and have divided his plates between two artists of the name of Bernard; M. Heineken, and M. Huber, however, very satisfactorily prove them to have all been by this engraver.

BERNARDI, FRANCESCO. According to Averoldi, this painter was a native of Brescia, and painted history with reputation. His principal works were in the churches of Santa Croce and S. Giovanni, in his native city. [He was called Bigolaro, was a native of Verona, and a disciple of Domenico Feti.]

[BERNASCONI, LAURA, or LUCIA, a Roman lady, who was a scholar and imitator of Mario Nuzzi, better known as Mario da Fiori. Her works, like those of her preceptor, have lost much of their original beauty, owing to the use of some seductive, but treacherous vehicle that gave brilliancy at first, but in the lapse of years has changed to opacity, giving them a black and squalid appearance. The date of her birth is not exactly stated, but she was living in 1674.]

BERNAZZANO, a Milanese painter, who flourished about the year 1536. He painted landscapes, animals, and fruit, in which he excelled, particularly as a colourist. The figures in his landscapes are generally painted by Cesare da Sesto, a scholar of Leonardo da Vinci. [Wonderful things are related of this artist, parallel with the stories told of Zeuxis, Protogenes, Apelles, and other painters of antiquity.]

BERNIGEROTH, MARTIN, a German engraver, born at Ramelsbourg in the county of Mansfeld, in 1670. He resided at Leipsic, where he engraved a great number of portraits, executed with the graver, in a tolerably neat manner, among which are,

Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Dessau, on Horseback, with a Battle in the background.

Frederick August. II. King of Poland.

He died at Leipsic, in 1733.

BERNIGEROTH, JOHN MARTIN. He was the son and pupil of Martin Bernigeroth, born at Leipsic in 1713. He engraved several plates for the booksellers, but he is most known as an engraver of portraits, which are neatly executed in the style of his father; the principal of which are,

Frederick Augustus III. King of Poland.

Frederick Christian, Prince Reg. Pol.

John Adolphus, Duke of Saxe Weissenfeld. 1745. This is esteemed his best plate.

Sebastian Felix, Baron von Schwannenberg.

Christianus, Prince of Denmark.

John Gottfried Richter, Antiquary.

He died at Leipsic in 1767, aged 54.

BERNYNCKEL, JOHN, an engraver, whose works are little known. There is a small oval print by him, of the Adoration of the Shepherds, after John van Achen, which is not without merit.

[BERRÉ, JEAN BAPTISTE, born at Antwerp in 1777, painted subjects in the manner of Weenix. He settled at Paris, where he painted objects of a higher order. His pictures are esteemed for their great finish and fine execution, and are sought for by amateurs who delight in that style of painting, and obtain large prices. They are to be found in several rich collections. He died in 1828, (according to Balckema,) but Gabet mentions him as living in 1831.]

BERRÉS'YFN, C. V., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. He engraved some plates of landscapes, among which is one representing a woody scene, signed with his name and the above date. It is very scarce.

BERRÉTINO, PIETRO. See CORTONA.

BERRETONI, NICOLÒ. This painter was born at Montefeltro, near Macerata, in 1627. He was the ablest scholar of Carlo Maratti, and painted history with some reputation. One of his best pictures is an altar-piece, in the church of S. Maria de Montesanto, at Rome, representing a subject from the life of St. Francis. He was received into the Academy of that city in 1675, and died in 1682, aged 55.

BERRUGUETTE, ALONSO, an eminent Spanish painter, born, according to Palomino, at Parados de Nava, in Castile. When he had made some progress in the art, the fame of the great Michael Angelo induced him to visit Italy, and he had the advantage of studying under that sublime master. He was the contemporary and friend of Andrea del Sarto, and made such improvement during his stay in Italy, that he returned to Spain an eminent proficient in both painting and sculpture. He also excelled as an architect. The Emperor Charles V. took him under his immediate protection, appointed him one of his painters, and employed him in many considerable works at Madrid, in the palace of the Pardo, and in the Alhambra of Granada, which established his reputation, and for which he was honourably remunerated by his munificent patron. He died at Madrid in 1545. [Berruguette was born in 1480. He was one of the most distinguished and fortunate artists of his day. He was patronized for his merits, both by Charles V. and his son Philip II. He lived respected by his contemporaries, and died rich, at Alcalá, in the year 1561, and was buried with the greatest magnificence at the expense of his sovereign.]

BERTANI, GIO. BATISTA. See GHISI.

BERTAUD, MARIE ROSALIE, a French female engraver, born at Paris, about 1760. She was instructed in the art by St. Aubin and Choffard, and has engraved several plates, the best of which are those after the pictures of Vernet, entitled,

Orage impétueux; an oval plate.

La Pêcheurs à la ligne.

Le Rocher percé.

La Barque mise à flot.

La Pêche au clair de la Lune.

Les Pêcheurs Italiens.

[BERTAUX, DUPLESSIS, a French engraver, somewhat in the manner of Callot. His etchings are numerous, and many of them illustrate Choiseul's Travels in Greece and Italy, and the work on Egypt. He died in 1813.]

BERTELLI, CRISTOFANO, an old Italian engraver, a native of Rimini, in the duchy of Modena, about 1525. We have by him a few plates, executed with the graver, in rather a stiff manner.

The Portrait of Ottavio Farnese, Duke of Parma.

The Conversion of St. Paul; marked Per me Christofano Bertelli.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Sebastian, St. Francis, and St. Roch; after Coreggio.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Augustine, St. Sebastian, and St. Helena, with St. Joseph sleeping; inscribed Per me Christofano Bertelli.

The Virgin and Child, with St. George and other Saints; inscribed the same.

The different ages of Man; Christofano Bertelli, sc.

BERTELLI, FERRANDO. This old engraver was born at Venice, about the year 1525. He engraved some plates after the Venetian painters, and others. By him we have :

A print, entitled Omnium fere gentium, &c. Ven. 1569. Christ curing the sick. Farinati, pinx. F. Bertelli, ec. 1566.

The Crucifixion; after Giulio Romano.

Spechio della vita humana. In Venezia per F. Bertelli. 1566.

BERTELLI, LUCAS. This engraver was probably a relation of the preceding artist. He has engraved several plates after the great Italian painters, and is said to have been a printseller. Some of his prints are very scarce.

A Bust of Hippolita Gónzaga, Daughter of Ferdinand; Lucas Bertelli, ec.

The Israelites tormented by Serpents; after M. Angelo.

The Baptism of Christ; L. Bertelli; with an inscription, Non isti Christum latites, &c.

Christ washing his Disciples' feet; Lucas, sc.

The Flagellation; inscribed Et fui flagellatus, &c. Luca Bertelli.

The Crucifixion; marked M. A. Lucas Bertelli formis.

The Descent from the Cross; Lucas Bertelli formis; fine.

The Four Evangelists; after Cozzie; Lucas Bertelli formis.

The Last Judgment; after J. B. Fontana; Lucas Bertelli formis.

BERTERHAM, or BEXTERHAM, J. Mr. Strutt has noticed this engraver under the two names of Berterham and Bexterham. It is, however, evident that they belong to one and the same artist. He was a native of the Netherlands, and resided at Brussels about the end of the 17th century. He engraved a few plates of devotional subjects, among which is a print representing St. Roch, with other figures, signed J. Berterham, sculp. Brux. 1696, without the name of the painter. It is executed with the graver, in a stiff, tasteless style, and the drawing is very incorrect.

[BERTHELEMY, JEAN-SIMON, an historical painter, born at Laon in 1743, and died in Paris in 1811. He was a scholar of N. Hallé, and painted, in addition to some historical and poetical subjects, which have been engraved, the ceilings of the palace of Fontainebleau, the Luxembourg, and the Museum. He was a member of the Academy, and director of the School of Design.]

BERTIN, NICHOLAS, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1667. His father was a sculptor, who, dying when he was a boy, he was placed under the tuition of John Jouvenet, and afterwards studied under the elder Boulogne. His progress was rapid, and at eighteen he gained the first prize at the Academy, and was sent to Italy for improvement, with the pension of the king, where he remained four years. On his return to Paris, he distinguished himself by some historical works, and was made a Royal Academician in 1703. He was employed by Louis XIV. in the chateau of Trianon, where he painted Vertumnus and Pomona, and other works. His principal performance was the ceiling of the church at Plessis Saint Pierre, in Normandy. In the abbey of St. Germain des pres, is a fine picture by Bertin, representing the Baptism of the Eunuch of the Queen of Candace. This able artist died at Paris in 1736.

BERTOJA, GIACOMO, [or JACOPO.] According to Padre Orlandi, this painter was a native of Parma, and a scholar of Francesco Mazzuoli, called Parmegiano. He painted history, and is stated by that author to have died in 1558. [Orlandi is in error respecting the death of this painter; Padre Affo has shown clearly that Bertoja was living in 1573; and Zani, in a very elaborate note, has collected authorities, not only to establish that fact, but to prove that he died at a very great age, in 1618. Bertoja was not a scholar, but a successful imitator of Mazzuoli; in his lifetime he was called "Parmegiano," and there is very little doubt that many of his easel productions are ascribed to the painter to whom that appellation is now particularly applied.]

BERTOLOTTI, GIOVANNI LORENZO. According to Ratti, this painter was born at Genoa in 1640, and was a scholar of Francesco Castiglione. He painted history with considerable reputation; and his biographer speaks in very favourable terms of a picture painted by him in the church of La Visitazione, at Genoa, representing the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to St. Elizabeth, which is finely composed, and coloured with great clearness and suavity. He died in 1721, aged 81.

BERTRAM, ———, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He engraved several plates, representing views and public buildings, which are executed in a very neat style.

BERTRAM, CHARLES. According to Mr. Strutt, he was the engraver of a frontispiece to a book published by himself in the year 1758, entitled, Britannicarum Gentium Historiæ Antiquæ Scriptores tres; it is from his own design, and is inscribed, C. B. inv. et sc. 1758. It is a very indifferent performance.

BERTRAND, P., a modern French engraver, who was chiefly employed in portraits. Among others, he engraved that of Pope Clement X.

BERTUSIO, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Bologna, and studied under Denys Calvart at the same time with Guido and Albano, and he followed their example, in leaving that master, to place himself in the great school of the Caracci. He painted history, in the manner of Guido, but in endeavouring to imitate the suavity of that esteemed master, his colouring became cold and chalky. His drawing is correct, and the turn of his figures graceful. There are many of his pictures in the churches at Bologna, mentioned by Malvasia. In S. Giovanni, in Monte, is a picture of the Virgin Mary and infant Jesus, with St. Anthony, and other saints. In S. Domenico he has painted the Death of St. Joseph, and in S. Stefano a picture of St. Guigliana. [Bertusio was a native of Faenza. The name is generally written Bertucci, and there were several artists so called both of Faenza and Bologna. Giovanni Batista died in 1644.]

BERVIC, CHARLES CLEMENT, a modern French engraver, born at Paris, in 1756, and received in the Academy in 1784. He was a pupil of J. G. Wille, and has engraved several plates, in the clear finished style of his master. We have by him, among others,

The Portrait of Louis XVI.; engraved in 1790; after Callet; fine.

Jean Sénac de Meilhan, a celebrated Physician; after Duplessis.

Charles Linneus, a celebrated Botanist; after Roslin.

Le Repos; after Lepicier.

La Demande acceptée; after the same.

The Education of Achilles; after J. B. Regnault; very fine.

[He was a capital engraver. The Laocoon and his sons, done by him for the Musée Français, is the best representation of a marble group that has ever been engraved; a fine proof of it has been sold as high as £30. He died in 1822.]

BESENZI, PAOLO EMILIO. This artist was born at Reggio in 1624. He distinguished himself as a painter, a sculptor, and an architect. Although the friend and companion of Lionello Spada, he differed from his style, preferring the graceful manner of F. Albano. His principal pictures are in the church of S. Pietro, which establish his reputation as a painter. He died in 1666.

BESOZZI, AMBROGIO, a painter and engraver, born at Milan, in 1648. He was first a scholar of Gioseffo Danedi, and afterwards studied under Ciro Ferri. He excelled in painting architectural views, friezes, basso relievos, and other works of decoration. He died at Milan, in 1706. He etched two plates,

The Portrait of Coreggio.

The Apotheosis of a Princess; in which the Portrait was by Bonacina, and the other part of the plate by Besozzi; after Cesare Fiori.

[BESSCHEY, or BISCHEY, J. F., was born at Antwerp in 1739. He made copies of Moucheron, Wynants, Pynacker, Gerard Dou, Rembrandt, Teniers, Terburgh, and various others. His small copies of Rubens and Vandyck are admirable; they do not affect to be any thing but what they are, charming reminiscences for those who delight in the art, but have not the means to obtain originals by the masters. He died at Antwerp in 1799.]

[BESTARD, a Spanish painter, who lived at Palma about the end of the seventeenth century. He painted for the convent of Monte Sion there a superb picture, measuring 24 palms in length, and 15 in height, representing Christ in the Desert attended by angels; it is considered as one of the marvels of the city. He also ornamented several other public buildings at Palma, which exhibit proofs of his knowledge of composition, colour, and chiaro-scuro.]

[BETTELINI, PIETRO, a very eminent Italian engraver, was born at Lugano in 1763, and applied at an early age to the study of the art. He received instructions from Gandolfi and Bartolozzi; but in his subsequent works he inclined more to the style of R. Morghen. He is particularly happy in his transcripts of light and elegant forms, and enters with much taste and spirit into the subject he copies. He does not aim at producing brilliant effects, but exercises his graver with care and delicacy, corresponding with the style of the original picture. In those of a sombre or forcible character he is not equally successful. He was held in high estimation by Thorwaldsen, who employed him to engrave some of his finest works both in figures and bassi-relievi. His engraving of the Entombment, by Andrea del Sarto, in the Florence Gallery, exhibits all the beauties of the original, and may be quoted, not only as his capo d'opera, but among the finest examples of art. The following are a portion of his justly esteemed productions: Madonna col devoto, from the picture by Correggio in possession of the king of Bavaria, and Ecce Homo, after the same master; Madonna and sleeping Infant, after Raphael; St. John, after Domenichino; Ascension of the Virgin, after Guido; Magdalene, after Schidone; Sibylla Persica, after Guercino; the portraits of Poliziano, Galileo, and Macchiavelli. He is now employed on the Judgment of Solomon, after Raphael; which will be an addition to his deserved reputation. As a classic engraver whose works will, no doubt, increase in estimation, the rule not to admit living artists in this Dictionary may be violated.]

BETTES, JOHN and THOMAS. These brothers were eminent miniature painters in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by whom they were patronized, and John painted her portrait. [John was a disciple of old Hilliard.]

BETTI, PADRE BIAGIO. This painter was born at Pistoja in 1545, and was a disciple of Daniello da Volterra. Soon after the death of that master, he became a monk of the order of Theatines. His works are principally confined to the monastery of that order at Rome. In the refectory, he painted the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, and in the library, Christ disputing with the Doctors. Baglioni asserts, that he was fifty years a religious, and died in 1615.

BETTINI, DOMENICO. According to Padre Orlandi, this painter was born at Florence in 1644. He was first a scholar of Jacopo Vignali, but afterwards went to Rome, and became a disciple of Mario Nuzzi. His pictures, like those of his instructor, represent fruit, flowers, birds, and fish, which are well painted.

BETTINI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, who etched a few plates, in a slight manner. By him, among others, we have,

Christ appearing to Peter; after Domenico Campelli; marked Pietriss. Bettinus, del. et scul. 1681.

The Martyrdom of S. Sebastian; after Domenichino.

BETTOLI, CAJETANUS. The name of this artist is affixed to an etching representing the Death of St. Joseph, after Marc Antonio Franceschini. It is executed in a free, spirited style, and appears to be the production of a painter.

BEVILAQUA. See SALIMBENE.

BEUCKELAER, JOACHIM. This painter was born at Antwerp, in 1530. He was the nephew of Peter Aertsen, by whom he was instructed. His pictures, like those of his uncle, represent the interiors of kitchens, with dead game, fish, fruit, &c. They were much admired, although M. Descamps states that he was so poorly paid for them, that he lived in poverty. [He painted market-places, fairs, kermesses; and ornamented them with numerous figures. He died in 1570.]

BEURS, WILLIAM. This painter was born at Dort in 1656. He was a scholar of W. Drilenburg, and painted landscapes, portraits, and flowers, with some reputation.

BEUSEKOM, F. VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished from about the year 1640 to 1650. He was principally employed by the booksellers in engraving portraits. Among others, he engraved that of Ant. le Brun, after a picture painted by A. V. Hulle.

BEUTLER, JAMES, a German engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, was a native of Ravensburg, and flourished about the year 1593. The prints he engraved are generally very small, on which account he is ranked among the artists distinguished by the name of the little masters. He usually marked his prints with the initials of his name, I. B. As the mark was occasionally used by other German engravers, particularly James Binck and John Burgkmair, who lived about the same period, it requires great attention to distinguish their works.

[BEWICK, THOMAS, the eminent restorer of the art of engraving on wood, was born at Cherry Burn, in the county of Northumberland, in 1753. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to Ralph Beilby of Newcastle, a copper-plate engraver. He might have had a master of more eminence, but he could not have had one more anxious to encourage his talents, and to point out to him his peculiar line of excellence. It happened that Charles Hutton, (afterwards the distinguished Dr. Hutton of Woolwich,) then a schoolmaster at Newcastle, was preparing his great work on mensuration, and applied to Beilby to engrave on copper the figures for the work; he judiciously advised that they should be cut on wood, that each figure might accompany the proposition it was intended to illustrate. The young apprentice was employed to execute many of these; and the beauty and accuracy with which they were finished led his master strongly to advise him to devote his attention to the improvement of this long-lost art. At the expiration of his apprenticeship, he spent a short time in London and in Scotland, and on his return to Newcastle, entered into partnership with Beilby. About this time, Thomas Saint, a printer of Newcastle, projected an edition of Gay's Fables, and Bewick was engaged to furnish the cuts. One of these, the Old Hound, obtained the premium offered by the Society of Arts, for the best specimen of wood engraving, in the year 1775; but the work was not published until 1779. His success in this and an edition of Select Fables by the same printer, induced Bewick to project the "History of Quadrupeds." This work, after several years of preparation and labour, was published in 1790. In the preparation he was encouraged and patronized by Marmaduke Tonstal of Wycliffe, whose museum of animals, both winged and quadruped, living and dead, was very extensive. In the intervals of collecting materials for this work, Bewick was employed engraving on copper the specimens of natural history in a small quarto volume, entitled "A Tour through Sweden, Lapland, &c., by Matthew Cousett, the companion of Sir G. H. Liddell;" "The Whitley large Ox;" and the remarkable "Kyloe Ox," bred in Mull, which is a very curious specimen of copper-plate engraving, combining the styles of wood and copper, particularly in the minute manner in which the verdure is executed. From the moment of the publication of the "History of Quad-rupeds," Thomas Bewick's fame was established. He subsequently, in conjunction with his brother John, supplied the wood cuts for the elegant edition of "Goldsmith's Traveller and Deserted Village," and for "Parnell's Hermit," both printed by Bulmer. These appeared in 1795, and were allowed to excel every thing of the kind that had before been produced. In 1797 was published the first volume of "British Birds," for which Beilby furnished the written descriptions; the second volume, on "British Water Birds," devolved on Bewick alone, who was assisted in the literary corrections by the Rev. Henry Cotes, Vicar of Bedlington. These were followed by numerous illustrations of publications of the day, in which he availed himself of the talents of the several pupils whom he had instructed, and who have since so eminently distinguished themselves in the same line of engraving; among these were Nesbitt, Harvey, Clennell, Ransom, and Hole. Bewick was indefatigable; he was an early riser; fond of indulging in rustic and athletic sports, which are so prevalent in the north; he was warm in his attachments, and had some humorous peculiarities. He died, as he had lived, a truly honest man, at Gateshead, near the Windmill Hills, in 1828. His brother John, who assisted in some of the publications, was his junior by seven years; he is said, by his biographer, to have been, in some respects, even superior to Thomas, but he died at the early age of 35, his last engravings being some of those in "Somerville's Chace," which issued from the press of Bulmer in 1795.]

BEYLBROUCK, M., a Flemish engraver, who resided in England about the year 1713. He engraved a plate representing the Death of Dido, after Sebastian Bourdon, which was published in London by James Grame, and dedicated to the Duke of Devonshire. It is neatly executed, but in a stiff, formal style, and without much effect. From the resemblance the manner of Gerard Scotin the younger bears to that of Beylbroeck, Mr. Strutt thinks it probable that he received some instruction from him.

BIANCHI, BALDASSARE. This painter was born at Bologna in 1614. He was first a scholar of Giovanni Paderna, but afterwards studied under Agostino Metelli. He passed the greater part of his life in the employment of the dukes of Modena and Mantua, whose palaces he ornamented with a great number of his paintings. Orlandi states, that he had a daughter, LUCREZIA BIANCHI, who also distinguished herself in the art. He died in 1679.

BIANCHI, CAV^{RE} ISIDORO. This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1626. He studied under Pier Francesco Mazzucchelli, called Morazzone, and was one of the ablest followers of his style. He excelled in fresco painting, more than in oil, as is evident in his works in the church of S. Ambrogio at Milan, and in different churches at Como. He was chosen by the Duke of Saxony to finish a grand saloon at Rivoli, which had been commenced by Morazzone; and was left unfinished at his death. He was afterwards made painter to the court, and was knighted in 1631.

BIANCHI, FEDERIGO. This painter was a Milanese. He was a relation and a scholar of Giulio Cesare Procaccini. Padre Orlandi reports, that at the early age of seventeen he painted three works in fresco, in the cloister of the monastery of the Padre Zoccolanti, at Milan. Several other works by this master were in the churches of that city. He was greatly patronized by the duke of Savoy, who held his talents in high estimation, and honoured him with a gold chain and medal.

BIANCHI, FRANCESCO, called IL FRARI. According to Vidriani, this painter was born at Modena in 1447. His works were much esteemed at his time, and are said by that author to have been gracefully designed, and painted with a fine impasto of colour. He also gives him the credit of having been the instructor of Coreggio. He died in 1510.

BIANCHI, ORAZIO, was born at Rome, and, according to Abate Titi, was a respectable painter of history. His best work was the Marriage of St. Joseph and the Virgin Mary, in the church of St. Gioseffo at Rome.

BIANCHI, PAOLO. This artist, who was chiefly employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers, flourished about the year 1670. His plates are neatly executed with the graver, but in a stiff, tasteless style. He engraved some of the portraits for Priorato's History of Leopold, among which are the following:

Cardinal Flavio Chigi, nephew of Alexander VII.
Luigi de Benevides Carillio.

BIANCHI, PIETRO. This painter was born at Rome in 1694, and was a scholar of Benedetto Luti. He had acquired considerable celebrity as a painter of history, when he died young. One of his most esteemed performances is a picture of the Conception, in the church of S. Maria degli Angeli, at Rome.

BIANCHI, SEBASTIANO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1580. He engraved some plates of devotional subjects, which are executed with the graver in a very indifferent style. Among others is a print representing the emblems of our Saviour's Sufferings, with Angels, &c. It is inscribed Sebastiano Bianchi, fec.

BIANCUCCI, PAOLO, was born at Lucca, in 1583, and, according to Lanzi, was a distinguished scholar of Gnido, whose graceful and delicate style he followed. His works bear a near resemblance to those of Sassoferrata. Of his best pictures may be noticed, a representation of Purgatory, in the church of the Suffragio, and an altar-piece of several saints in S. Francesco. He died in 1653.

BIARD, or BIART, PETER. According to Florent Le Comte, this artist was a sculptor. He resided at Paris about the year 1627, and is said to have engraved a set of twelve plates, but the subjects are not specified. He also engraved an emblematical subject, into which he has introduced many figures. It is etched in a bold, spirited style, somewhat resembling that of Antonio Tempesta, and is inscribed Petrus Biard, fecit. 1627.

BIBIENA. See GALLI.

BICCI, LORENZO DI. This old painter was born at Florence, in 1400, and, according to Vasari, was a disciple of Spinello. He painted several works in fresco, in the churches at Florence, of which the most esteemed were, the History of S. Francesco, the Assumption, in the church of S. Croce, and others in S. Maria del Fiore. He died in 1460.

BICHARD, ———, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved some plates representing tombs and buildings, from the designs of G. M. Dumont.

BICKHAM, GEORGE, SENIOR, an English engraver: he was chiefly employed in engraving plates of writing, in which he excelled. We have a few portraits by him, but indifferently executed. Among others the following:

George Shelly, a writing-master; after his own design. 1709.

John Clark, also a writing-master; G. Bickham, senior, scul.

Robert More, another writing-master; same.

Sir Isaac Newton, with emblematical Ornaments; G. Bickham, senior, scul. 1752. Sold by John Bickham, engraver.

BICKHAM, GEORGE, JUNIOR, the son of the preceding artist. He was not more distinguished in the art than his father. He engraved the portraits of his father and himself in a kind of friese, representing a view of Newmarket.

BIE, ADRIAN DE, a Flemish painter, born at Liere, near Antwerp, in 1594. He received his first instruction in the art from Wouter Abts, an obscure artist. At eighteen years of age he went to Paris, where he studied some time under Rodolph Schoof, a Fleming, who was painter to Louis XIII. He afterwards visited Rome, where he remained eight years. In 1623, he returned to Flanders, and was much employed for the churches and in painting portraits. His most esteemed work was a picture of St. Ely, in the collegial church of St. Gommer at Liere. He was the father of Cornelius de Bie, who has celebrated the works of the painters of his country in Flemish verse, under the title of Het Gulde Cabinet der Edele Schilderkonst. [It is supposed that he died in 1640.]

BIE, JAMES. See BYE.

BIESELINGHEN, CHRISTIAN JOHN VAN, a Dutch portrait painter, born at Delft in 1558. Karel van Mander states, that this artist painted a portrait of the Prince of Orange from memory, after his assassination by Gerards. He died in 1600.

BIEVRE, DE. By this artist, who flourished about the year 1766, we have a few prints of portraits, among which is that of Caroline Matilda, Queen of Denmark.

BIGARI, VITTORIO. In the Pittura di Bologna, are mentioned several pictures by this master, in very favourable terms. He was a native of Bologna, and his works are to be met with in almost every public edifice in that city. In the church of the Madonna del Soccorso, is an admired picture by him of the Virgin Mary and infant Jesus, with S. Petronio and other saints. In the palazzo Aldovrandi, [Aldovrandi?] he painted a gallery, in which he represented the principal transactions of that noble family.

[BIGIO, FRANCA, or FRANGIABIOIO, a Florentine painter of architecture, landscapes, and animals. Writers differ much respecting the date of his birth; some place it as early as 1445, others in 1483. There is a nearer agreement in the date of his death, which is placed in 1524 or 1525.]

BIGNON, FRANCIS, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He was principally employed on portraits, which are generally executed with the graver, though he occasionally called in the assistance of the point. His style is neat, but there is a want of harmony in the effect of his prints. Some of his portraits are ornamented with borders, with small emblematical figures, &c. We have by him, Thirty-five Portraits of the Plenipotentiaries assembled at the Peace of Munster.

A set of Portraits of the illustrious Personages of France; engraved in conjunction with Zachary Heince, after the pictures by S. Vouet, in the gallery of the Palais Royal. They are dated in 1690.

BILIVERT, GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Florence in 1576, and was brought up in the school of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli. He finished some of the works left imperfect at the death of his instructor, to whose style he endeavoured to unite the expression of S. di Tito, and something of the splendour of Paolo Veronese. There are several of his works in S. Gaetano and S. Marco, one of the most admired of which is the Elevation of the Cross, considered as his best performance. Another admired work of this painter is the Chastity of Joseph, in the gallery at Florence. [Many copies of this celebrated work are to be found in Florence, and in foreign collections. Amateurs should be on their guard.] He died in 1644.

[BILLONI, GIAMBATISTA, a painter of Padua, born in 1576, and died in 1636. He painted landscapes and portraits, and sometimes attempted history; but his reputation is now confined to his portraits.]

BILLY, or BILLI, NICCOLO and ANTONIO, two Italian engravers, who flourished about the year 1734. They engraved several plates of portraits and historical subjects, executed with the graver in rather a stiff, dry manner. Niccolo engraved some plates for the Museum Florentinum.

Fredericus Zucharus.

Hans Holbein; se ipse pinx.

Pietro Leone Ghezzi; se ipse del.

The Holy Family; after Caracci; half-length figures.

The Flight into Egypt; after Guido.

BILTIVS, FRANCIS. This artist was a native of the Netherlands, and flourished about the year 1650. He excelled in painting dead game, and other inanimate objects, particularly fowling-pieces, pouches, powder-horns, nets, and other implements used by the sportsman. These subjects he represented on a white ground, as if they were attached to the wall, and they are designed and painted with such surprising truth and fidelity, as to become a perfect illusion. [He was living in 1671, as appears by that date and his name on a picture mentioned by Zani.]

[BIMBI, BARTOLOMMEO, a Florentine artist, born in 1648, died about 1725, was an excellent painter of fruit and flowers; he was considered the Mario of his school.]

BINCK, JAMES, an old German engraver, born at Cologne about the year 1504. From the testimony of the German authors, it appears certain, that he was first a scholar of Albert Durer, which is also supported by the resemblance of some of his plates to the works of that master. He afterwards visited Rome, and, according to Sandrart, was a disciple of Marc Antonio, and engraved some plates after the works of Raffaele, under his direction. This artist holds a distinguished rank among the engravers denominated by the name of the little masters, on account of the small size of their prints. His style is very neat, sometimes resembling the works of H. Aldegrever, but his plates evince greater facility in the execution. His drawing is more correct, and there is a more agreeable taste in the turn of his figures. There has existed considerable confusion respecting the marks of the artists of this period, particularly those whose name commences with a B. The works of this master are generally either marked with the letters I. B. or with the cipher IEB. The style of his plates will also distinguish them. The following are his principal prints:

- The Portrait of James (or Jacob) Bink, with a Cap, a Skull in his Cloak, and a Cup in his right hand.
 The Portrait of Lucas Gassel; I. B. 1529. Inscribed Imago ab Jacob Bink ad vivum delineata.

BINET, ———, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several plates, representing landscapes and views; after Vernet, and other masters.

BINNEMAN, WALTER. This artist is supposed to have been a native of England, and flourished about the year 1675. He engraved a few portraits, which are very indifferently executed; among which is that of Robert Chamberlaine, an arithmetician, prefixed to his Accomplant's Guide.

BIORD, PETER. The name of this artist is affixed to an etching representing Cupid and Psyche.

It is executed in a bold, spirited style, and is apparently the production of a painter.

BIRCK, PAUL. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as the engraver of four plates, exclusive of a title, representing the Four Elements, in circles, surrounded with ornaments, which appear to be patterns for goldsmiths. They are executed with the graver in a style resembling that of J. T. de Bry. On the title is the following inscription: Quatuor Mundi Elementa, Elegantibus figuris seu Imaginibus Artificiose expressa. PAULUS BIRCK, F.

BIRCKAERT, or BIRCKART, ANTHONY, a German engraver, who resided at Prague about the year 1680. He engraved some large plates of architecture, with figures, which are executed with the graver in a stiff, formal style, and are inscribed Birckart, sculp. Prag. Basan mentions a print by him representing the Martyrdom of forty Portuguese Jesuits; after Borgognone.

BIRCKENHULT, PAUL. This artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1670. He was a printseller as well as an engraver, and published a set of small plates, representing warlike trophies, with figures, &c. They are executed chiefly with the graver, in a neat, but formal style. The title to these plates is Omnis generis Instrumenta Bellica, and is signed Paulus Birckenhult, sculp. et excudit.

[BIRD, WILLIAM, an English painter, born at Wolverhampton in 1772, served an apprenticeship to a maker of tea-trays, and was employed to embellish them with fruit, flowers, and fanciful designs. At the expiration of his term of service he left Birmingham, and set up a school for drawing at Bristol. By teaching others he improved himself in the knowledge of the art. During the intervals of instruction he made sketches, designs, and compositions for pictures; and it would appear that his progress was due to his own observation and persevering industry; so far he was his own master. He painted humorous and pathetic subjects, which attracted much of public attention, and induced the members of the Royal Academy to enrol his name as an academician. His best pictures, as historical compositions, are the results of the battle of Chevy Chase, which he treated in a manner truly consonant with the old ballad from which the subject is taken, and the surrender of Calais. His chief merit, as an artist, lay in natural and touching representations of homely and social things; history, either sacred or profane, required a spirit more imaginative than he possessed. He had seen the living nature which exhibits the former, but it was necessary that he should conceive the nature which belongs to the latter; in that rare quality he was deficient. He was a kind-hearted man, much respected by his brother artists and all who knew him. He died in 1819, and was buried in the cloisters of Bristol cathedral.]

[BIRKHART, ANTOINE, an engraver, born at Angsbouurg in 1677, died at Prague in 1748. Dlabacz has given a numerous catalogue of his works.]

BISCAINO, BARTOLOMEO, was the son of Gio. Andrea Biscaino, born at Genoa in 1632. He was instructed by his father in the first rudiments of the art, and was afterwards a scholar of Valerio Castelli. From the early indications he gave of uncommon genius, great expectations were formed of his future eminence, and they were not disappointed. Before he had reached his twenty-fifth year, he had painted many considerable works, when his career was unfortunately stopped, by the dreadful visitation of the plague, with which Genoa was afflicted, in 1657, to which his father and himself both fell victims. In the Gallery at Dresden there are three pictures by this artist. He etched several plates, in a free, bold style, resembling in some degree the works of Benedetto Castiglione, but in a more finished manner. His subjects are finely composed and elegantly drawn. He marked his plates sometimes B. B. The following are his most esteemed prints:

Moses in the Bulrushes.
 Susanna and the Elders.
 The Nativity, with Angels.
 The Circumcision.
 The Wise Men's Offering.
 Herodias, with the Head of St. John.
 The Virgin Mary and infant Jesus, with Angels.
 The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus, with St. Joseph.
 The Virgin suckling the Infant, with St. Joseph, and St. John with his Lamb.
 The Virgin adoring the infant Jesus.
 The Virgin with the infant Jesus on her Knee, St. John kissing his Foot, and St. Joseph behind.
 The Virgin, with the infant Jesus standing on her Knee, stretching out his Arm to St. Joseph; half-length figures.
 The Holy Family, with St. John holding a Cross.
 The Repose in Egypt, with Angels in the Clouds.
 The infant Jesus reposing on the Globe.
 St. Joseph, with the infant Jesus; half-length.
 St. Christopher giving his Hand to the infant Jesus.
 St. Christopher, with the infant Jesus.
 Mary Magdalene in the Desert; dated 1656.
 A Bacchanalian subject.

BISCAINO, GIOVANNI ANDREA. This painter was a native of Genoa. He painted landscape in a bold and spirited style, but, according to Soprani, the necessity he was under to paint with despatch, to support a numerous family, prevented his bestowing that care and attention which would, under more prosperous circumstances, have rendered them more deserving of our esteem. He died of the plague in 1657.

BISCHOP, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1630. He was a scholar of Ferdinand Bol. He painted history and portraits, in the style of his master, but with very indifferent success. He died in 1674.

BISCHOP, ABRAHAM, son of Cornelius, was eminent as a painter of birds.

BISCHOP, JOHN DE, a designer and engraver, born at the Hague in 1646. He was brought up to the law, and, according to Houbraken, practised in the courts in Holland. His favourite amusement was drawing, and his performances excited the admiration of the artists themselves. He excelled in copying the pictures of the most esteemed masters, in small coloured drawings, very well drawn and highly finished. As an engraver, he is more deserving notice, and he has left a great number of plates, principally etched, and harmonized with the graver, in a free and pleasing manner. There is great relief and richness of effect in his prints. His most important work was a set of prints for a book, entitled, Paradigmata graphices variorum artiphicum, tabulis aeneis. Pars I et II. Hagæ. 1671, fol. The first edition, published by the artist, contains one hundred and two plates. The second, published by Nic. Visseher, the same year, contains one hundred and thirteen plates. This engraver, with a whimsical affectation, latinized his name, and assumed that of Episeopus for Bisehop, on which account he marked his plates with a cipher, composed of the letters J. E. J. E.

Besides the above work, there are other prints by him, among which are:

Christ and the Samaritan Woman; after An. Caracci.
 Joseph distributing Corn to the Egyptians; after B. Breemberg.
 The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; after the same.

He died at Amsterdam, in 1686, aged 40.

BISET, CHARLES EMANUEL, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1633. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he went to Paris when he was young, and met with great encouragement. His pictures were adapted to the taste of that nation, representing gallant assemblies, balls, concerts, and what are called conversations. Notwithstanding his success in that metropolis, the love of his native country brought him back to Antwerp, where he was appointed director of the Academy, in 1674. He designed his subjects with taste, and his pencil is neat and flowing, although his colour is rather cold and grey. His most considerable work is a large picture in the hall of the Society of Archers, at Antwerp, representing William Tell compelled to shoot the Apple from his Son's Head.

BISI, FRA BONAVENTURA, was a monk of the order of St. Francis, at Bologna. He had been instructed in drawing when young, by Lucio Massari, and was celebrated for his copies in miniature from the works of Coreggio, Titian, Guido, &c., many of which were in the cabinet of the duke of Modena. He also etched a few plates after Parmegiano, Guido, &c., and one after his own design of a Holy Family, with St. John and St. Elizabeth, marked F. B. B. F. 1631. He died in 1662.

[BISI, MICHAEL, a celebrated Milanese engraver, whose works do honour to the schools of Bartolozzi, Rosaspina, and Longhi. He first distinguished himself by the publication of the "Pinacoteca del Palazzo Reale, della Scienze delle Arti, &c." In 1819, he undertook a series of engravings from the paintings of Andrea Appiani, in which he was assisted by some of the best scholars of Longhi. His engraving of Venus embracing Cupid, happily expresses the beauties of the original picture. Subsequently appeared, the Virgin and infant Christ enthroned, attended by Saint Anthony and Saint Barbara, after Luini, which he has treated in a brilliant and delicate manner, preserving the beauty and grace peculiar to the master; Andromeda and Perseus, after Guercino; an Adoration of the Virgin, after Sasso Ferrato; and the offering of the Magi, after Gandenico di Ferrara. He also succeeded as a painter of landscapes. It is not ascertained whether he is still living, but his merit entitles him to notice in this Dictionary.]

[BISQUERT, ANTONIO, a Spanish historical painter, born at Valencia, was a scholar of Ribalta. He established himself at Teruel in 1620, as a painter of reputation. He was a good colourist and designer, and infused much sentiment in his pictures, which are chiefly subjects from Romish legends. He also copied Sebastien del Piombo's dead Christ in the arms of the Virgin, attended by the Marys and St. John. He died in 1646.]

BISSOLO, PIER FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Venice, and was brought up in the school of the Bellini. He flourished about the year 1520. Some of his works at Murano, and in the cathedral of Treviso, are compared by Lanzi with those of the elder Palma.

BISSONI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Padua in 1576. According to Ridolfi, he was first a scholar of Francesco Appolodoro, called il Porcia, an eminent portrait painter, and afterwards studied under Dario Varotari. He painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Padua and Ravenna. He died in 1636.

BIZEMONT, ANDRE DE. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1780. He etched several plates, representing landscapes and views, which are executed in a neat, pleasing style.

BIZZELLI, GIOVANNI, a Florentine painter, born in 1556. He was a scholar of Alessandro Allori, called Bronzino. He afterwards went to Rome, where he studied and painted some pictures for the churches. On his return to Florence, he executed several works for the public edifices, which are described by Borghini in his account of the painters and sculptors of Florence. He died in 1612.

BLAGEO, BERNARDINO. Ridolfi describes several works of this painter in the churches at Udine, in the Frioul. He appears to have flourished about the year 1550. The principal altar-piece of the church of S. Lucia at Udine is by this master, representing the Virgin Mary and infant Saviour, with a group of Angels, and St. Lucia and St. Agatha. In Porta Nuova, the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Peter and St. John.

BLACKMORE, JOHN, an English mezzotinto engraver, who is said to have been born in London about the year 1740. We have some well-scraped plates by him, chiefly portraits, after Sir Joshua Reynolds, among which are the following:

Samuel Foote; after Sir Joshua Reynolds. 1771.

W. H. Bunbury, caricaturist; after the same; J. Blackmore, fec.

Henry Bunbury; after the same.

Innocence; Blackmore, fec. 1770. Ryland & Bryer exo.

BLAGRAVE, JOHN, an eminent mathematician, who flourished at the end of the sixteenth, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century. Among his other works, he published, in 1582, The Mathematical Jewel, illustrated with wooden cuts, executed by himself, in a neat style. On the frontispiece is inscribed, "By John Blagrove, of Reading, gentleman, and well-willer to the mathematics, who hath cut all the prints or pictures of the whole, with his own hands." Where he has not put his name at length, it is thus abbreviated, J. Blag. sculp.

[BLAIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French artist, born at Caen in 1654, was a scholar of Monnoyer, better known as Bapteste. He painted flowers and fruit in the manner of his master. He had a delicate pencil and a good eye for colour; he painted insects with great exactness, and finished all his pictures carefully. He died in 1715. There is a disparity respecting his birth, some place it in 1654, others in 1645. It may be a typographical error.

[BLAKE, B., a painter of still life, birds, fish, and other objects of that kind. His works, when carefully painted, are very pleasing, but his circumstances, and, it is with regret added, his mode of living, obliged him to hurry his pictures, and too frequently to repeat them. As they were to a certain degree popular in his day, the dealers held him in thrall to their rapacity, and even injured his reputation by employing others to copy his works. He was also compelled by necessity to make copies of the works of Dutch painters for these patrons, in which he was sometimes so successful as to enable his employers to cheat their customers, retaining to themselves the profits, and leaving the disgrace to the artist when detected. Little of his history is known. He died about the year 1830.]

BLAKE, C. J. This ingenious young lady etched a portrait of her uncle, Sir Francis Blake Delaval. It is dated 1775.

[BLAKE, WILLIAM, an English artist of singularly eccentric genius, whose flights of imagination sometimes astonish by their sublimity, and at others excite pity or contempt by their extravagance or absurdity, was born in London in 1757. His propensity to drawing induced his father, a hosier, to place him as an apprentice with Basire the engraver. While his hand was employed on the mechanical part of his duty, his mind was busy in the regions of fancy, and his wild imaginings came forth sometimes clothed in the language of poetry, sometimes in the combinations of forms that seemed to belong to another state of existence, but all bearing the impress of genius of the highest order. It may be lamented that his genius was not restrained by judgment; but had that been the case, the world would have lost those wonderful exhibitions in his illustrations of "Young's Night Thoughts," "Blair's Grave," "The Book of Job," and other works even more astounding in their conceptions. Such productions were incomprehensible by the many; and even Flaxman and Fuseli, while they admired the power that produced them, were compelled to withhold their approbation. It can hardly be said whether he be entitled to praise or blame for continuing his course, notwithstanding the neglect of his works, and the consequent poverty it entailed. He had his enjoyments in the world of visions, and perhaps of a higher kind than wealth would have conferred. His application was continuous, his labour great, and he looked to futurity for his reward. His published works are now sufficiently known to render description or criticism unnecessary. He died in 1828.]

BLANCHARD, JAMES, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1600. He was first instructed in the art by Nicholas Botteri, his maternal uncle; and when he was 24 years of age, he went to Italy, and passed two years at Rome. He returned by way of Venice, when he was so struck with the beautiful colouring of the great Venetian masters, that he was induced to remain two years in that city. On his return to Paris, his works were greatly admired, and he was certainly the first that established a true and natural style of colouring, in which the artists of his country were very deficient. His chief works at Paris are the two pictures he painted for the church of our Lady, one representing St. Andrew kneeling before the Cross, the other the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the Gallery in the Hotel de Boullion, where he painted thirteen large pictures of subjects from Ovid. He died at Paris in 1638.

Blanchard etched some plates from his own designs and others, among which are the following:

The Holy Family; without his name; Chez Huart.

Another Holy Family, with St. Catherine and St. John; Chez Ciartres.

The Birth of the Virgin; Blanchard, pinx.; Huart, exe.
St. Agnes adoring the infant Jesus in the arms of the Virgin Mary; after Lodovico Caracci; without the name of the engraver.

[BLANCHERI, VITTORE, a scholar of Beaumont, in the latter period of the Venetian school. He flourished from 1736 to 1775. He spent the greater part of his artistic life in the service of the king of Sardinia, and was employed in painting large pictures in the palaces and for the churches.]

BLANCHET, THOMAS, a French painter, born to Paris in 1617. His genius at first directed him to sculpture, but after studying that art for some time under Sarrazin, he was advised to abandon it, on account of the delicacy of his constitution, and to apply himself to painting. He visited Rome, where he became acquainted with Nicholas Poussin, and the famous architect Algardi, who encouraged him in his studies, and assisted him with their advice. He had also the advantage of studying under Andrea Sacchi, by whose instruction he was greatly benefited. Encouraged by the commendations of these great masters, he applied himself with increased assiduity. After passing some years in Italy, he returned to Paris, where his talents were already known. After painting his pictures for the church of our Lady, representing the Vision of St. Philip, and the Baptism of the Eunuch, he was engaged in some considerable works for the town-house at Lyons, which he executed in a manner that established his reputation as one of the ablest historical painters of his country. He was soon afterwards made a Royal Academician, in 1676, and on that occasion painted for his picture of reception, Cadmus killing the Dragon. He died at Lyons in 1689.

BLANCUS, CHRISTOPHER, an engraver, supposed to be a native of Germany, who flourished about the year 1600. He engraved a few plates in the manner of John Muller, but with not much success. We have by him,

A Holy Family, accompanied by Angels; half-length; after Spranger. 1595.

The Portrait of Michael Angelo Buonarroti; Christophorus Blancus faciebat. 1612.

BLANCUS, or BIANCHI, JOHN PAUL. According to M. Heineken, this artist flourished about the year 1682. We have some etchings by him, which are executed in a heavy, indifferent style. Among others, are an emblematical print, after C. Stores, inscribed, Io. Paul. Blancus incid., and Christ praying in the Garden, without the name of the painter, dated 1682.

BLANKHOF, JOHN TEUNISZ, a Dutch painter of sea-pieces, born at Alkmaer, in 1628. He learned the first rudiments of the art from Arnold Tierling, a painter of no reputation, and became afterwards a scholar of Caesar van Everdingen. On leaving that master, he went to Italy, and passed some time at Rome, where the Flemish Society of Painters conferred on him the name of Maat, or comrade. He excelled in painting marines and sea-ports. His best pictures represent storms on the coast of the Mediterranean, in which he combined the truth and nature of the Dutch school with the grand scenery of Italy. He died in 1670.

BLANSERI, VITTORIO. This painter was born at Venice, about the year 1735, and was educated in the school of the Cav^{re} Beaumont. He is considered his ablest scholar, and succeeded him in the service of the court of Turin, in which city are his principal works. Three of his pictures are in the church of S. Pelagio, one of which is particularly admired, representing S. Luigi fainting, supported by an angel. He died in 1775.

BLEAVIT, ———. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as an engraver of portraits. Among others, he engraved that of René des Cartes, the philosopher.

BLECK, or BLEECK, PETER VAN, a Flemish engraver, who came to England about the year 1730. He is supposed to have been the son of Richard Bleck, a painter of portraits. He engraved several plates in mezzotinto, which, without any superior excellency, are clearly scraped, and have considerable merit. He sometimes marked his plates VB.

We have by him,

Richard van Bleeck, painter; se ipse, pinx. P. van Bleeck, junior, fec. 1735.

Rembrandt van Rhyen; se ipse, pinx. Van Bleeck. 1727; with the cipher.

Francis du Quesnoy, called Fiammingo. Sculptor, A. Vanduyck, pinx. P. V. B. I. f. 1751.

Mrs. Cibber, in the Character of Cordelia; the same.

Griffin and Johnson, in the Characters of Tribulation and Ananias; the same.

The Virgin Mary and Infant; after A. Vanderwerf. 1748.

BLECKER, J. G., a Dutch designer and engraver, born, according to M. Huber, at Haerlem, about the year 1600. He etched several plates, both from his own designs and after other masters, executed in a slight and spirited style, of which the following are the principal:

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A Landscape, with Jacob and Rachael; J. G. Blecker, fec.
A Landscape, with Rebecca and the servant of Abraham; the same.

A Peasant, and a Woman riding in a Waggon; the same.
A similar subject.

The Crucifixion; C. P. pinx. I. C. B.

The three last are engraved in the style of Rembrandt.

[BLEKERS, BLEEKER, or BLECKERS, JAN GASPARD, was a native of Haerlem, born in 1608, (according to Balkema and Zani,) painted history and landscape; and is mentioned with commendation in Hoe's Catalogue. The date of his death is not accurately ascertained. It is probable that this is the same artist mentioned in the preceding article, as Zani says he was living in 1643.]

BLEKERS, N——, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about 1635. He painted history, and was patronized by the Prince of Orange, for whom he painted one of his best pictures, representing the Triumph of Venus. Vondel, a poet of his country, has celebrated the works of this painter. [He died at Haerlem in 1682.]

BLES, HENRY DE, an old Flemish painter of landscapes, born at Bovines in 1480. He imitated the style of Joachim Patenier, and painted in the stiff and dry manner of his time. He generally introduced into his landscapes scriptural subjects, with a number of figures neatly drawn. Instead of marking his works with his name, he usually painted an owl in one of the corners. He died in 1550. [This artist is generally called Herri de Bles, or Henrjck met de Bles; by the Italians he was nicknamed "Civetta," because of his mark, an owl. His pictures are very curious, and much esteemed; they are rare in commerce.]

BLESSENDORF, SAMUEL, a Prussian enamel

painter and engraver, born at Berlin in 1670. He designed and engraved several portraits for Puffendorf's History of Sweden. He worked chiefly with the graver, and his plates are very neatly finished. Among others we have by him, Charles XI. King of Sweden.

Charles XII.

Frederick Rodolphus Louis, Baron of Canitz.

Samuel Baron de Puffendorf.

Frederick III., Elector of Brandenburg. 1696.

Frederick William, Prince Electoral.

Frederick William; Adam de Clerc, pinx.

The Portraits of John Frederick of Brandenburg, Margrave of Anspach, and the Margravine, in a Garden; after Gasp. Netscher. 1682; very fine.

BLESSENDORF, CONSTANTINE FREDERICK, the brother of the preceding artist, born at Berlin in 1675. He was a miniature painter and engraver. He worked chiefly for the booksellers. We have by him,

A Frontispiece for Juliani Opera; S. Blessendorf, inv. C. F. Blessendorf, fec.

Portrait of Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg. 1688.

BLEYSWICK, F. VAN, a German engraver, who flourished from the year 1725 till 1746. He engraved many portraits for the publications of his time, which are highly finished, but without much taste. Among others, he executed part of the plates for the collection entitled Portraits Historiques des hommes illustres de Danemark, dated 1746. He also engraved some small landscapes, in which the point and the graver are handled with great delicacy.

[BLIEK, DANIEL DE, OF VAN BLICKE, was a good painter of interiors and exteriors of churches, and other public buildings: he lived in 1656. His manner of painting resembles that of Van Vliet.]

[BLINKVLIET, M. The exact time of this painter's birth is unknown; but he imitated Bergheim so successfully that his works have been ascribed to that master: probably they were contemporaries.]

BLOCK, DANIEL, a painter of portraits, born at Stettin, in Pomerania, in 1580. He was a scholar of Jacob Scherer, a portrait painter of reputation, under whom he soon became a proficient, and ultimately surpassed his instructor. He was employed at the courts of Denmark and Sweden, and passed many years in the service of the Prince of Mecklenburg. He gained a large fortune by the exertion of very reputable talents, of which he was deprived by plunder. He died in 1661.

BLOCK, BENJAMIN. This artist was the son of Daniel Block, born at Lubeck in 1631. He was instructed in the art by his father, and proved a reputable painter of history and portraits. The Prince of Mecklenburg, in whose service his father passed great part of his life, took him under his protection, and sent him to Italy for improvement. He visited Rome, Naples, and Venice, and met with employment as a portrait painter in each of those cities. On his return from Italy, he was invited to the court of Saxony, where he painted the Electoral family, and the principal courtiers. His historical works were altar-pieces for the churches in different parts of Germany.

BLOCK, JACOB ROGER, a Dutch painter, born at Gouda in 1580. He went to Italy when he was very young, and applied himself particularly to the study of architecture and perspective. He made designs of the fine remains of antiquity in the environs of Rome; and, on his return to Holland, painted some pictures composed from those subjects, which were highly esteemed. Houbraken reports, that Rubens, in a journey he made through Holland, visited this artist, and on seeing his works, pronounced him the ablest painter of his country in the subjects he represented. He also excelled in military architecture, and was taken into the service of the Archduke Leopold, whom he accompanied in some of his campaigns, and was killed by a fall from his horse, [in 1632.]

BLOCKLANDT, ANTHONY DE MONTFORT, a Dutch painter, born at Montfort in 1532. He was one of the ablest disciples of the celebrated school of Francis Floris, and painted history in the style of his master. He was much employed for the churches in Holland. Van Mander mentions three pictures, by this painter, in the great church at Utrecht, representing the Birth of the Virgin Mary, the Annunciation, and the Assumption, which were greatly admired in his time. At Gouda he painted the Decollation of St. John, and at Dort several pictures of the Passion of our Saviour. Some of his works have been engraved by Hubert Goltzius and others. His style of design and composition partakes more of the Italian taste than that of his country. He died at Utrecht in 1583.

BLOEM, A. This artist was a native of Germany, and resided at Vienna about the year 1674. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers. He engraved the portraits, views, plans, battles, &c. for a book entitled Istoria di Leopoldo Cesare, published at Vienna in 1674. The plates are etched, and finished with the graver.

BLOEMAERT, ABRAHAM, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Gorcum, according to Houbraken, in 1564; Sandrart says in 1567. The established accuracy of the former has a claim to our belief. He was the son of an architect, who placed him under the tuition of Joseph de Beer, but he seems to have profited most by studying and copying the works of Francis Floris. He painted history and landscapes; his colouring is excellent, but his drawing is very defective, and frequently negligent. One of his best works was a picture painted for the Emperor Rodolphus, representing Niobe and her Children destroyed by the Arrows of Apollo and Diana, and the Feast of the Gods, painted for the Count de la Lippe. He painted several pictures for the churches in Flanders. In the church of the Jesuits at Brussels, is a picture by Bloemaert, representing the Wise Men's Offering; in the cathedral at Mechlin, the Virgin Mary and infant Saviour, with a Glory of Angels; and at Leliendaal, the Nativity. As an engraver, he has a claim to considerable attention. We have by him a number of plates etched in a free, bold, and masterly manner, some of which are in imitation of pen-drawings. But his most esteemed prints are those executed in chiaro-scuro, the outlines of which, contrary to the usual process, are not cut on the blocks of wood, but are etched on copper. These are very spirited, and produce a good effect. His prints are sometimes signed with his name at full length, but more frequently marked Ab. Bl. in., or A. Bl., or thus, A. Bloem. The following are his principal prints:

ETCHINGS BY A. BLOEMAERT.

St. John, with a Lamb.

St. Peter, penitent.

Abraham Bloemart died at Utrecht in 1647, aged 80.

BLOEMAERT, HENRY, was the eldest son of the preceding artist. He painted portraits, but never rose above mediocrity.

BLOEMAERT, ADRIAN. This artist was the second son of Abraham Bloemart, and received his first instruction from his father. He was sent to Italy, where he studied some time. He afterwards visited Vienna, where he met with employment, and ultimately settled at Salzburg, and was killed in a duel. He painted history and portraits with some reputation. M. Heineken attributes to this artist several plates of portraits, although they are without his name.

BLOEMAERT, FREDERICK, was the third son of Abraham Bloemart, born at Utrecht about the year 1600, and distinguished himself as an engraver. He learned the art from his father, and was chiefly occupied in engraving after his designs. We have a number of etchings by him, as well as prints in chiaro-scuro. His principal work was a drawing-book, containing one hundred and seventy-three plates, engraved from the designs of his father. He also executed a few plates entirely with the graver. His prints are sometimes signed A. Bloem. inv. F. B. filius fecit, and sometimes F. B. The following are principally after his father's designs:

Twelve of the Archbishops and Bishops of Utrecht; two of which are by Corn. Bloemart.

Thomas à Kempis.

St. Francis in a Hermitage.

The Body of Leander on the Sea-shore.

BLOEMAERT, CORNELIUS. This very eminent engraver was the youngest son of Abraham Bloemart, born at Utrecht in 1603. He was instructed by his father in the first principles of design, and from a natural inclination for engraving, he devoted himself entirely to that art. His first master was Crispin de Passe, and it was not long before he surpassed his instructor. In 1630, he went to Paris, where he distinguished himself by some plates he engraved for the Temple of the Muses. From Paris he went to Rome, where he fixed his residence, and where he lived the greater part of his life. This esteemed artist signalized himself, not only by the beauty of his graver, but by a talent, unknown before him, of effecting an insensible degradation from his lights to his shadows, and introducing a delicate variety of tints, in the different distances in his subject. Previous to his time, there was a great inattention to harmony, by leaving the lights indiscriminately clear, by which the effect was rendered spotty and incongruous. By this essential improvement he has established his claim to originality, and may be said to have given birth to that admirable style which was afterwards so successfully followed by the great engravers of the French school, Audran, Bandet, Picart, and Poilly. His works are universally admired; they are numerous, and several of them are become very scarce. Some of his prints are marked C. Bl. and others, Corn. Blo., or C. Blo.

BLOEMEN, JOHN FRANCIS VAN, called ORIZONTI. This eminent painter was born at Antwerp in 1656. The pictures of this artist bear no resemblance to the taste of his country, which may be accounted for, by his having visited Italy when he was very young, where he passed the remainder of his life. The name of Orizonti was given him by the Society of Flemings at Rome, on account of the beauty and delicacy with which he painted the distances in his landscapes. His works are well known in this country, and are justly esteemed. Inferior to Gaspar Poussin, he may still be ranked among the able painters of landscape. He made choice of the most interesting views in the vicinity of Rome and Tivoli, which he represented with great truth and even grandeur. In his forms, as well as in his touch, he appears to have imitated the fine style of Gaspar Poussin, and in some of his best pictures (for he is very unequal) he has approached the picturesque beauty of that admirable painter. There is scarcely a palace at Rome that is not ornamented with some of his works. His best pictures are in the pontifical palace at Monte Cavallo, and in the Colonna, Doria, and Rospigliosi palaces. He etched five plates of views near Rome, executed in a bold and masterly style. He died in 1740.

BLOEMEN, PETER VAN, called STANDARD. This artist was the brother of John Francis van Bloemen, and was a native of Antwerp. Following the example of his brother, he went to Italy for improvement. The name of Standard was given him by his countrymen at Rome, from his painting sometimes attacks of cavalry. After passing some years in Italy, he returned to Flanders with the studies he had made from the objects worthy notice in the neighbourhood of Rome. The pictures of this master represent battles, the march of caravans, horse-fairs, &c., ingeniously composed, with a number of figures, horses, and animals, extremely well drawn, and painted with uncommon freedom and spirit. He decorated his landscapes with the ruins of architecture and statues, from the studies he had made in Italy, and his figures are designed in a superior style to the usual taste of his country. He was made director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1699. [He was born in 1649, and died in 1719.]

BLOEMEN, NORBERT VAN. This painter was the younger brother of the two preceding artists. He painted conversation and portraits, but did not arrive at any great eminence in the art.

BLOIS, ABRAHAM DE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished from the year 1690 till 1720. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, by whom he was much employed. Among other plates, he engraved the portrait of Anthony de Leuwenhoek, the celebrated physician, prefixed to his works, published in 1695, which is executed in a neat but formal style. He also executed part of the plates for a work entitled Figures de la Bible, from the designs of Picart and others, published at Amsterdam, 1720.

BLOIS, DE, a mezzotinto engraver, who resided some time in England. We have some portraits by him, among which is that of Eleanor Gwynn.

BLOND, MICHAEL LE, a German engraver, born at Frankfort about the year 1580. He chiefly resided at Amsterdam, and appears to have been principally employed in ornaments for the goldsmiths. In 1626, he published a set of ornaments, foliage, fruit, and flowers, engraved with great neatness. His prints, which are all very small, are executed entirely with the graver in the finished manner of Theodore de Bry. He sometimes marked his plates with a cipher composed of an M and a B, thus, MB. We have the following by him :

St. Jerome, seated at a Desk writing, with an ornamental border; a small circular plate, about the size of a shilling; dated 1610.

Figures dancing, in a small oval, with an ornamental border; signed M. Blondus, 1612.

The Representation of a Marriage; M. Blondus, 1615. Two ornaments for goldsmiths; inscribed Wilhelm van Weelichheit.

A very small plate of ornaments with three Goblets. Six plates numbered, of Arabesque ornaments for Knife-handles; Michael Blondus, fecit; very highly finished.

BLOND, or BLON, JAMES CHRISTOPHER LE. This artist was born at Frankfort in 1670, and was sent early to Italy, where he is said to have been a scholar of Carlo Maratti. At the solicitation of Bonaventura van Overbeek, he accompanied him to Amsterdam, where he was employed for some time in painting portraits in miniature, which were much esteemed. He quitted Holland, and came to England, where he set on foot a project for printing mezzotinto plates in colour, so as to imitate the pictures from which they were engraved. He executed some large plates in this way, and disposed of the prints by a kind of lottery. In 1730, he published a volume explanatory of the process, entitled Il Colorito, or the Harmony of Colouring in Painting, reduced to mechanical Practice, under easy Precepts and infallible Rules. The book was printed in English and French. He soon afterwards projected a plan for copying the cartoons of Raffaele in tapestry, and he made some fine drawings from the originals for that purpose; houses were bought, and great expense incurred, but the scheme failed of success, and Le Blon left England, and went to France in 1737. He was not more successful in that country, and is said to have died in an hospital at Paris in 1741, aged 71. The following are the principal prints he published, which, independent of the novelty of the manner, certainly possess considerable merit :

PORTRAITS.

George II. of England.
The Queen.
Louis XV. of France.
Prince Eugene of Savoy.
Cardinal de Fleury.
The Children of Charles I.

BLONDEAU, JAMES, a French engraver, born at Langres, about the year 1639. He engraved several plates at Rome after the Italian painters, and some plates after Pietro da Cortona, from the pictures by that master in the Pitti palace at Florence. He seems to have imitated the style of Cornelius Bloemaert, without however in any way equalling that fine engraver. He also engraved some portraits, without putting his name on the plates. We have by him the following :

PORTRAITS.

Cardinal Francesco Lorenzo Brancati. 1681.
 Cardinal Fortuna Caraffa. 1686.
 Cardinal Maximilien Gandolfi. 1686.
 Cardinal Opitinus Pallavincini.

BLONDEL, JOHN FRANCIS. This artist was a native of France, and resided at Paris about the year 1740. He published a description of the festivals given by the city of Paris in 1740, on the marriage of Madame Louise Elizabeth of France, with Don Philip, Infant of Spain. The plates, representing the temporary buildings, fireworks, &c., are chiefly engraved by himself. He also etched the plates for some large volumes of Architecture, published by himself.

[BLONDEEL, LANSLOOT, born at Bruges in 1500, died in 1559, painted architectural ruins and conflagrations. His works are marked with a trowel, in addition to the initials of his name, in allusion to his original occupation as a mason.]

BLOOT, PETER. This painter was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1650. He painted drolls, drunken frolics, and the quarrels of the peasantry. So far from attempting, like Teniers, Brower, and Ostade, to reconcile us to the vulgarity of his subjects, by the ingenuity of his compositions, the spirit and delicacy of his pencil, and the beauty of his colouring; he has rendered them doubly disgusting, by the most gross and offensive absurdities; and his characters are outrageously uncomely, grotesque, and extravagant. He died in 1667. [The censure is here carried too far; his works are rare and much esteemed in Holland.]

BLOOTELING, or BLOTELING, ABRAHAM, a very eminent Dutch designer and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1634. From the style of his etchings it is not unlikely that he was brought up under the Visschers. On the inroad of the French into Holland in 1672, he came to England, where he met with encouragement, but did not reside here longer than two or three years. This laborious artist produced a great number of etchings, some plates executed with the graver, and several in mezzotinto. In 1685, he published the collection of gems of Leonardo Angostini, etched by himself. He sometimes signed his plates with his name at length, and sometimes marked them with a cipher, composed of A and B, thus B. The works of this engraver are sufficiently interesting to excuse our giving a more than usually detailed list of them:

[BLYHOOFT, I., a Dutch painter, of whom but little is known; it is supposed that he lived between 1625 and 1700. Two pictures by him are noticed in the Catalogues of Hoet and Terwesten, and, in regard to their merit, compared to those of Netscher. For this reason he is noticed here, as many pictures are ascribed to Netscher that resemble his manner, but are not by him.]

BLYTH, ROBERT, a modern English engraver, by whom we have some spirited etchings from the fine drawings by J. Mortimer. The following are his best plates:

Three, of Studies; in the style of Sal. Rosa and Lairsesse.
 Four, of the same, with inscriptions.

[BOBA, GEORGE, a painter and engraver. Van Mander names him among the disciples of Francis Floris. His name in full, or included in a monogram very small, is found on some landscapes with historical subjects, after Primaticcio; Bartsch gives an account of six.]

lector of academic figures, drawings, models, and sketches after celebrated artists. He was one of the founders of the Academy at Seville in 1660, and continued to support it until his death in 1680.]

BOCANEGRA, DON PEDRO ATANASIO, a Spanish painter, born at Granada, in 1638. He was a scholar of Alonso Cano, but, according to Palomino, improved himself in colouring by studying the works of Pedro de Moya and Vandyck. In the cloister of Nuestra Senora de Gracia, at Granada, is a picture by him of the Conception, and at the College of the Jesuits is one of his most esteemed works, representing the Conversion of St. Paul. He died at Granada in 1688. [He was vain and arrogant, and boasted his superiority to all the artists of his time; but on being challenged to a contest of ability by Mathias de Torres, he slunk from the trial, and left Madrid. His works were, however, much coveted, and no collection was considered complete without a specimen.]

BOCCACCINO, BOCCACCIO, was born at Cremona in 1460, and is said by Pascoli, in his Vite de Pittore Perugini, to have been a scholar of Pietro Vannucci, called P. Perugino. Lanzi observes of this painter, that he was the best modern among the ancients, and the best ancient among the moderns. He has the credit of having been one of the instructors of Benvenuto Garofalo. Vasari asserts that he studied some time at Rome; and in this he is supported by the authority of Cavaliere Antonio Campi, in Le Cronache di Cremona. Some of his works bear a strong resemblance to those of Perugino, particularly his Marriage of the Virgin and la Madonna, with S. Vincenzo and S. Antonio, in the church of S. Vincenzo at Cremona, which have been frequently regarded as the productions of Vannucci. One of his most admired performances is a frieze in the dome at Cremona, where he has represented the Birth of the Virgin, and some subjects from her life. In these Lanzi considers him inferior to Perugino in composition, less beautiful in the airs of his heads, and less vigorous in light and shadow, but richer in his drapery, more varied in colour, more spirited in his attitudes, and perhaps not less harmonious and pleasing in his architecture and landscape. He died in 1518. [It is not certain that he died in 1518, as there are works by him of that date.]

BOCCACCINO, CAMILLO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Cremona in 1511, and was brought up under his father. Educated in the Gothic maxims of Boccaccio, and only permitted the career of a very short life, he however formed to himself a style which was both pleasing and grand; and he was considered as the greatest genius of the Cremonese school. In 1537, he painted in the niches of the cupola of S. Sigismondo the Four Evangelists, so much in the style of Coreggio, that it appears almost incredible, that a young man of twenty-six years of age, who had never frequented the school of that painter, could approach so near to the great gusto of Coreggio, both in the intelligence of perspective, and in foreshortening. Two other works of this painter, at Cremona, are justly admired; the Raising of Lazarus, and the Adulteress before Christ, surrounded by friezes of a numerous group of Angels, finely composed, and designed in the greatest style. This promising artist died in the prime of life, in 1546. [If the elder Boccaccino died in 1518, Camillo could not have received much instruction from him.]

BOCCACCINO, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Cremona, about the year 1680. He studied at Rome, first under Brandi, and afterwards in the school of Carlo Maratti, under whom he acquired a pleasing manner of composing and painting easel pictures of historical subjects, which were well esteemed in private collections, and of which he painted more than of larger works for the churches. He sometimes imitated the style of Albano, and, like that painter, he was fond of treating mythological subjects. He died in 1750.

BOCCHI, FAUSTINO. According to Orlandi, this painter was born at Brescia, in 1659. He was a scholar of Angelo Everardi, called il Fiamminghino. He chiefly excelled in painting battles and skirmishes of cavalry, which he composed with great ingenuity, and touched with a spirited pencil. His figures, though on a small scale, are correctly drawn, and his landscapes are very pleasing. He died in 1742.

BOCCIARDO, CLEMENTE, called CLEMENTONE. This painter was born at Genoa, in 1620. He was a scholar of Bernardo Strozzi, and, according to Soprani, was called Clementone, from the prodigious size of his person. He accompanied Benedetto Castiglione to Rome, where he studied some time, and afterwards visited Florence, where he met with encouragement, and painted his portrait for the Florentine Gallery. His principal works are at Pisa, of which Lanzi distinguishes his Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church of the Carthusians. More ingenious in his compositions, and more correct in his design, than Strozzi, he is inferior to him in the truth and purity of his tints. He died in 1658.

BOCCIARDO, DOMENICO, was born at Finale, near Genoa, about the year 1686, and was a disciple and a follower of the style of Gio. Maria Morandi. Without the possession of much invention, he was a correct designer, and an agreeable colourist. In the church of S. Paolo at Genoa, is a picture by this painter of St. John baptizing several figures.

BOCHOLT, FRANCIS VAN, an old German engraver, who lived soon after the time of Martin Schoen, and Israel van Mecheln. He is said to have been a shepherd at Mons, in Hainault; but it is more probable he was a native of Bocholt, a small town in the bishopric of Munster, where the latter of the above-mentioned artists resided. His prints are chiefly copies after the plates of Schoen and van Mecheln, although he engraved some few plates from his own designs. They are all executed in a laboured, stiff style, and are generally marked F. V. B. The following are by him:

COPIES FROM MARTIN SCHOEN.

St. Anthony carried into the Air by Demons,
St. James reading.
St. Michael and the Dragon.

COPIES FROM ISRAEL VAN MECHELN

The Judgment of Solomon.
The Annunciation.
The Virgin and Child; in an arch.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A Friar struggling with a Girl, who defends herself with her Distaff.
Samson strangling the Lion.
Two Men quarrelling.
St. George and the Dragon, with Francis van Bocholt; in very old characters.

[In Bartsch there are thirty-eight pieces mentioned; and a few have been since discovered.]

BOCKHORST, JOHN VAN, called LANGEN JAN. This eminent painter was born at Munster in 1610. He was of a reputable family, which settled at Antwerp when he was young, and he became a scholar of Jacob Jordaens. Under that able instructor, he became a very distinguished painter of history. There are many of his pictures in the churches in Flanders, which are deservedly ranked among the best productions of the Flemish school. He seems to have taken the works of Vandycck as his model, and some of his best pictures are so much in the style of that admired painter, that they may easily be mistaken for his works. In the church of the Beguines at Antwerp, is a fine picture by Langen Jan, representing the Resurrection, painted entirely in the manner of Vandycck, and not unworthy of that great artist. There is another very fine picture by this master, at the principal altar in the church of St. James, at Ghendt, representing the Martyrdom of that saint. He also excelled as a portrait painter, many of which are only inferior to those of Vandycck.

BOCKLIN, J. C., an obscure German engraver, who executed a set of British portraits for a German edition of the History of England. They are poorly engraved, and the whole are copied from the prints by White.

BOCKMAN, G., a mezzotinto engraver, who, if not a native of England, resided here about the year 1745. He appears to have been also a painter, as he engraved a plate of St. Dunstan, which is signed with his name, with the addition of pinx. et sculp. 1743. We have several portraits by him, among which are the following:

Another Portrait of the same, with his hat on; ad vivum. 1746.

Mary, fourth daughter of George II., consort of Frederick II., of Hesse Cassel; after J. Worsdale.

Philip Yorke, Earl of Hardwicke; after M. Dahl.
Thomas Chubb, the Deist.

BOCQUET, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, mentioned by Basan. He lived about the year 1601. There are two indifferent prints by him:

Adam and Eve; after Raffaello.

St. Bruno kneeling before a Crucifix; after Bon de Boulogne.

BODART, PETER. This artist was a native of Holland, and resided at Leyden about the year 1723. His prints are little known in England. His principal work is a drawing-book, entitled Les Principaux fondemens du Dessain, published at Leyden in 1723. It consists of a great number of plates of heads, hands, feet, figures, and groups, from the designs of Gerard Hoet. They are chiefly etched, in an indifferent style.

BODECKER, JOHN FRANCIS, a portrait painter, born at Cleves, in 1660. He was a scholar of John de Baan, and met with great encouragement in his profession at Amsterdam and the Hague. There is a poorly scraped mezzotinto by this artist of a Boy and a Girl, half figures, with flowers, after his master, J. de Baan.

[BODENEHR, MAURICE, engraver to the court at Dresden, was born at Fribourg in 1665, died at Dresden in 1749. He engraved a suite of thirty-two mythological and poetical pieces after Samuel Botschild, which were published with his name in 1693.

His father, John George, was an eminent engraver, born in 1631, and died in 1704; and his brothers, Gabriel and George Conrad, followed the same profession. Their sons seem to have continued it, for their names are found to a late period, but with no particular distinction.]

BODERECHT, MARK, a German engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1739. He was chiefly employed in portraits, and among others engraved that of John Thomas Rauner, with the above date.

BODEWYNS, N. See BOUT.

BOECE, C. F. See BOETIUS.

BOEHM. See BEHAM.

[BOEHMER, CHARLES WILLIAM, a painter and engraver of Saxony. He was brother-in-law and scholar of Dietricy. There is a series of landscapes and marine subjects engraved by him, with the dates 1744 and 1754, published in 8^o and 12^{mo} with his name, or monogram. The series is rare.]

[BOEKEL, VAN, a pupil of Francis Snyders, painted living and dead animals in the manner of his master. He died in 1673.]

[BOEKHORST, or BOCKHORST, JAN VAN, born at Deutekom in 1661, was a scholar of G. Kneller. He passed some time with that artist in London, and painted portraits in his manner. He also painted battle-pieces and some historical compositions, which are rare. He returned to his own country, where he died in 1724.]

BOËL, CORNELIUS, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1580. He worked chiefly with the graver, in the style of the Sadelers, in whose school it is probable he was instructed. His plates are executed in a clear neat style, and possess considerable merit. He engraved a set of oval plates for the Fables of the Otho Vænius, published at Antwerp in 1608. His most considerable works were eight large plates of the battles of Charles V. and Francis I., after Anto. Tempesta. He was probably in England, as appears from one of his plates, the Frontispiece to a Bible, published by the royal authority in 1611, very neatly engraved, which is signed C. Boel, fecit, in Richmond, 1611. We have also by him, a Portrait of Henry, Prince of Wales, an oval plate, with an ornamental border; and another plate, of the Last Judgment, Cornelius Boel, fecit, without the name of the painter.

BOEL, PETER, an excellent painter of animals, birds, flowers, and fruit. He was born at Antwerp in 1625, and was a scholar of Francis Snyders. Desirous of improvement, he went to Italy, where his works were much admired, both at Rome and at Genoa. On his return to Flanders, he met with great encouragement. Four of his best pictures are at Antwerp, representing the Four Elements. His touch is free and spirited, and his colouring natural. We have some very spirited etchings by Boel of various animals, and a set of six plates of birds of prey, with landscapes, entitled Diversi Uccelli a Petro Boel.

BOEL, QUERIN, or CORYN, was related to the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1622. He engraved several of the plates for the book called Teniers's Gallery, after the pictures in the collection of the Archduke Leopold. We have also some etchings by him, principally after the pictures of the elder Teniers, representing Peasants regaling and merry-makings.

BOETIUS, or BOËCE, CHRISTIAN FREDERICK, a German engraver, born at Leipsic in 1706. He was a pupil of C. A. Wartman, and resided chiefly at Dresden, where he was made professor of the Electoral Academy in 1764. He engraved several of the plates for the collection of pictures at Dresden, published in two folio volumes in 1753 and 1757, entitled Requiel d'Estamps d'apres les plus celebres Tableaux de la Gallerie de Dresde. He also engraved several portraits, and various other subjects. The following are among his best prints:

The Portrait of Boetius; in imitation of a chalk drawing. 1771.

Portrait of Charles Htin; the same.

Portrait of Raffaele Mengs; the same.

Portrait of J. Cassanova; the same.

A Landscape, with a Cow and a Sheep; after C. du Jardy.

A Landscape, with a Monument; after Bremerberg.

The Interior of an Inn; after T. Wylk.

Sportsmen at the Door of an Inn; after Wowermans.

A Woman holding a Pot with Coals, and a Boy blowing; after Rubens.

A Swiss Family kneeling before the Virgin and infant Jesus; after Hobbein; fine.

BOETTGER, JOHN GOTLIEB, a modern German engraver, born at Dresden in 1766. He was a pupil of J. G. Schulz, and has engraved several plates for the booksellers and others, among which we have:

Portrait of F. W. B. de Ramdohr; after Graaf.

Ganymede; after Vogel.

A Vestal; after the same.

Calliope; after Angelica Kaufmann.

BOETTO, GIOVENAL. According to Della Valle, this artist was a Piedmontese, and flourished at Turin, from the year 1642 till 1682. He distinguished himself as a fresco painter, and was principally employed in embellishing the palaces and public edifices at Turin with allegorical subjects, which were ingeniously composed, and designed with taste and elegance. Among his most admired works are twelve frescoes, in the Casa Garballi, representing subjects emblematical of the Arts and Sciences. Lanzi affirms that he excelled as an engraver, but his prints are not specified.

[BOEYERMANS, THEODORE, a pupil of Vanduyck, painted history and portraits. He was a native of Antwerp: his works are correctly designed and agreeably coloured, and show a good knowledge of chiaro-scuro.]

BOGDANE, JAMES, a painter of fowls, flowers, and fruit, of some reputation, in the reign of Queen Anne, by whom he was employed; and there are yet some of his pictures in the royal collection. [He was an Hungarian by birth, and died in 1720.]

[BOILLY, LOUIS-LEOPOLD, a painter of multifarious subjects, was born at Bassée in 1761. He painted nearly 500 portraits; he represented military, domestic, and comic scenes; interiors of ateliers, merchants' shops, banditti, popular amusements, and whatever was suitable to Parisian taste. He engraved also, and produced about 100 pieces. It is said that he had no master.]

BOIS, ELIAS DU. This artist was a native of France, and was chiefly employed in engraving portraits. Among others, he engraved that of the Duke de Sully, which bears the date 1614.

BOIS, MARTIN DU, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1691. He executed some of the plates for the collection of prints from the works of the Italian painters, published by C. Paten, in the year above mentioned. He also engraved frontispieces for books, after Dorigny and others.

BOIS, PETER DU, was probably a relation of the artist mentioned in the preceding article. According to Florent Le Comte, he engraved several plates, representing funeral processions, monuments, &c.

[BOISSARD, ROBERT, an engraver, born at Valence about 1590. He worked in the manner of Theodore de Bry. He used the same mark as René Boivin, but their works should not be confounded.]

BOISSART, ROBERT, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. According to Florent Le Comte, he engraved several portraits, but they are not specified. He is said to have resided some time in England.

BOISSEVIN, L., was a printseller, and is supposed to have engraved the following plates :

Charles I.
Oliver Cromwell,
Franc. Barberini, Cardinal; dated 1623.

BOISSIERE, SIMON DE LA, a French engineer, who also distinguished himself as an engraver. He engraved several plates from his own designs, and after Sebastian Le Clerc. We have by him :

The Death of a Prince, surrounded by his Court.
Forty-one plates of Antique Medals; in the collection of the King of France.

A View of the Palais Royal; in two sheets.
Several plates for the work entitled Traité des Edifices Antiques de Rome; by A. Desgodets, published at Paris in 1682.

BOISSIEU, JEAN JACQUES DE, a French painter, but more celebrated engraver, was born in 1736, and died in 1810. He painted some pictures of similar subjects to those by Ostade, and also some portraits; but he is principally known by the charming etchings he has left us of landscapes and other subjects, both from his own designs and after other masters. His point is remarkably pleasing and picturesque, yet spirited and masterly. The number of his plates is about sixty, which are generally marked D. B., with the date. The following are his best prints :

An Old Man, with a Boy reading; in the manner of Rembrandt.

A Cooper working in a Cellar; the same.

An Italian Landscape, with Women washing.

A Landscape, with Shepherds, by the water-side; after Berghem.

A Landscape, with a Boy driving an Ox; after Ruysdael.
A Forest, with a Cottage, and a Man on Horseback, with Peasants.

Another Forest scene; the companion.

A Landscape, with figures and animals, in the middle a Hill, on which is a Cross, and an old Man kneeling.

A View near Tivoli, with a Man and a Woman mounted on a Mule, driving Cattle through a Rivulet.

The Quack Doctor; after C. du Jardin.

A Landscape, with figures in a Boat, and a Mill; after Ruysdael.

The great Mill, a charming landscape; after the same.

A mountainous Landscape, with a Waterfall; after Asselyn.

A grand Landscape, with a Hermit, at the entrance of a Cavern. 1797.

A pleasing Landscape, with large figures, and two Cows standing in the Water.

The four last mentioned are his most capital plates.

BOIT, ———, an eminent painter in enamel, who resided in England in the reign of Queen Anne. He was a native of Stockholm, though of French parentage, and was bred to the profession of a jeweller, which he intended to follow in this country. He changed his pursuit for that of enamel painting, which he practised with the greatest success. After passing some years in London he went to Paris, where he was countenanced by the regent, and was much admired in a country where they had seen no enameller since Petitot. He died at Paris in 1726.

BOITARD, L——, a French engraver, who chiefly lived in England, and flourished about the year 1760. He engraved in a neat slight style, without much taste, and not very correctly drawn. His best prints are those he engraved for Spence's Polymets, and the Rotunda at Ranelagh, after Pannini. He also engraved some portraits, among which is that of Brown, the soldier who distinguished himself at the battle of Dettingen, and one of Elizabeth Canning. He died in London.

BOIVIN, RENÉ, a French engraver, born at Angers about the year 1530. He engraved several plates in the style of Cornelius Cort, executed with the graver; but we have also some etchings by him. His plates are neatly engraved, but his drawing is by no means correct; some of them are from his own designs, and several after Il Rosso, called by the French Maitre Roux. He sometimes signed his plates with his baptismal name, Renatus, fecit, and sometimes with a cipher composed of an R and

B, thus, B. The following are his principal plates :

Twelve of Philosophers and ancient Poets.

Portrait of Clement Marot; dated 1556.

The same Portrait; without date.

Portrait of John Sebastian Panserus.

Portrait of George Viciellus, Theologian.

Susanna and the Elders.

BOIZOT, MARIE LOUISE ADELAIDE, a French female engraver, born at Paris in 1748. She was instructed in the art by J. J. Flipart, and engraved with great neatness several plates of portraits, and other subjects, among which we have the following :

John Joseph William Bruté, Doctor of Sarbonne; M. L. A. Boizot, del. et fec.

The Emperor Joseph II.

Louis XVI., King of France.

Marie Antoinette, Queen of France.

Louis Stanislaus, Count of Provence.

BOJAN, J. L., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1670. He was chiefly employed by John Berain, in engraving some of the plates for his large work of the Ornaments in the Louvre and the Tuilleries.

[BOKSHOORN, JOSEPH, a portrait painter, born at the Hague, came to London in 1670, where he died at the age of 35. He employed the greatest part of his time in copying the portraits of Vanduyck and P. Lely.]

BOL, CORNELIUS. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1660. He visited England before the fire of London, as he painted views of that dreadful conflagration. He also painted views of Sutton Place in Surrey, Arundel House, Somerset House, and the Tower. He etched some plates representing the sea-ports of Holland, among which is that of the Briel.

BOL, FERDINAND, an eminent painter and engraver, born at Dort in 1611. His family removed to Amsterdam when he was young, where he had the advantage of being educated in the school of Rembrandt. He was a successful imitator of the style of his master, both as a painter and engraver. He painted history and portraits; in the latter he particularly excelled, and some of his best portraits may be mistaken for those of Rembrandt. One of his principal historical works was a picture he painted for the Admiralty at Amsterdam, which is celebrated by the Dutch poet Vondel. There are several of his pictures in the courts of justice in the Town-house at Amsterdam. His etchings are highly esteemed, they are executed in a bold and free manner, and his lights and shadows are very judiciously managed. Although they are not equal in lightness of touch and tasteful style to the etchings of Rembrandt, they possess great merit. The following is a list of nearly the whole of his prints:

PORTRAITS AND HEADS.

- A young Man, with a round Hat; marked, Bol, fec.
An Officer with his Hands on the Hilt of his Sword; Bib, fec. 1643.
A young Man, with a Cap and Feathers; F. Bol. 1642.

St. Jerome in a Cavern, contemplating a Crucifix; F. Bol, f.

[Balkema places his death in 1681.]

BOL, HANS (JOHN), a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Mechlin in 1534. After studying two years under an obscure painter, he travelled through Germany, and passed some time at Heidelberg, where he copied some pictures of the most eminent masters. He afterwards settled at Amsterdam, where his works were esteemed. Van Mander speaks highly of two pictures by this master, representing Dedalus and Icarus, and the Crucifixion. He is however more known as a painter of landscapes and views in the neighbourhood of Amsterdam. He etched several plates from his own designs, in a slight spirited style, which he sometimes marked H. B., and sometimes Hol. We have the following prints by him:

- The Reconciliation of Jacob and Esau; circular.
The first interview between the Servant of Abraham and Rebecca.
Twelve circular plates of the Twelve Months of the year; Ad. Collaert, excud.
A set of twelve Landscapes; H. Bol, inv. Joh. Sadeler, exc.

A set of twelve Landscapes; H. Cock, exc. H. Bol.
A large Landscape, with a Man in a Boat catching a Goose, with several figures.

H. Bol died at Amsterdam in 1593.

BOLDINI, NICCOLO, called VICENTINO, an engraver on wood, born at Vicenza, about the year 1510. His prints are chiefly after Titian; and it is thought that he studied under that master; they are executed in a bold free style. His works are scarce. He marked his prints with the cipher B.

We have the following by him:

- John, Baron de Schwarzenberg; with a border; after Albert Durer.
The Wise Men's Offering; after Titian, with his cipher.
St. Jerome praying; in a landscape; after the same.
St. Catherine, St. Sebastian, and four other Saints; after the same.
A mountainous Landscape, with a Woman milking a Cow.
Venus seated on a Bank, holding Cupid, a Squirrel on the Branch of a Tree; marked Titianus inv. Nicolaus Boldrinus Vicentinus incidebat. 1566.

[The name should be Joseph Nicolas Boldrini, not Boldini. There is some confusion respecting him even in the accounts by the best writers on the subject. Zani is most to be relied on; Huber is quite in error both with respect to the place of his birth and the date.

BOLLMAN, HIERONIMUS, or JEROME. By this artist, who was probably a native of Germany, we have some prints, after Raffaele, and other eminent painters of the Italian school. They are executed in a bold, free, and effective style, and possess considerable merit.

BOLOGNA, LATTANZIO DE. According to Baglione, this painter was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of the Caracci. On leaving that celebrated academy he went to Rome, and was employed by Sixtus V. in painting the ceiling of one of the saloons in the palace of St. John of Lateran. He also painted the ceiling in the chapel of Sixtus V. in the church of St. Maggiore, representing a choir of angels. In S. Maria de Monti, is a fine picture by him of the Flagellation. This painter promised to arrive at a high rank in the art, but being naturally of a weak constitution, which was probably impaired by constant application, he died, much regretted, at the age of 27.

BOLOGNESE, IL. See GRIMALDI.

BOLOGNINI, CARLO. This painter is mentioned in the Abecedario Pittorico of Padre Orlandi. He was born at Bologna in 1678, and was first a scholar of Mauro Aldrovandini. He afterwards studied under Giulio Trogli. He excelled in painting architectural views and perspective, and was much employed at Vienna, where he resided some years. [Zani says Carlo was born in 1662, and died in 1704. He also mentions several others of the same family who were distinguished painters, but of whom very few particulars are recorded.]

BOLOGNINI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, a Bolognese painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1611. He was one of the ablest scholars of Guido Reni. There are several of his pictures in the churches at Bologna. In S. Maria Nuova is a picture by this master, representing the Virgin Mary and infant Jesus, with St. Dominick, St. Eustatius, and Mary Magdalene. In the church of the Servi, the dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary, St. John, and others; and in S. Lucia, the immaculate Conception. This artist etched some plates after the works of Guido, in a slight spirited manner, among which are the following:

The Murder of the Innocents; after Guido.
St. Peter made Head of the Church; after the same.
The Crucifixion; after the picture in the church of the Capuchins at Bologna.

Bacchus and Ariadne; in three sheets; after Guido.

He died at Bologna in 1688. [Zani says he was born in 1612, and died in 1689.]

BOLOGNINI, GIACOMO. This painter was the nephew of Gio. Batista Bolognini, born at Bologna in 1664. He received his instruction in the art from his uncle, and became a reputable painter of history. There are some of his pictures in the churches at Bologna, which are described in the account of the works of art in Bologna. In the church of SS. Sebastiano e Rocco, there is a picture of St. Francis receiving the Stigmata; and in the church of the Purità, the dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary and Mary Magdalene. [He died in 1734.]

BOLSWERT, or BOLSUERD, BOETIUS ADAM, an eminent engraver, born at Bolswert, a town in Friesland, about the year 1580. It is not said by whom he was instructed in the art of engraving; but, in company with his younger brother Scheltius, he settled at Antwerp, as a printseller and engraver. He worked entirely with the graver, and seems to have adopted the free open manner of Cornelius Bloemaert. The plates that he engraved after Rubens are however in a more finished style, and fuller of colour. He sometimes signed his plates

Adams Bolsvert, and sometimes Bolsuerd.

His principal plates are the following:

PORTRAITS AND SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

BOLSWERT, or BOLSUERD, SCHELIUS A. This very distinguished engraver was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Bolswert in Friesland, about the year 1586. He settled with his brother at Antwerp, where he became one of the most celebrated engravers of his country. The plates of this excellent artist are worked entirely with the graver, and it does not appear that he made any use of the point. He engraved many plates after the most eminent of the Flemish masters, but he has particularly distinguished himself by the admirable performances he has left us, after some of the finest pictures of Rubens and Vandyck, which he represented with a judgment and ability that gives them more effect than can well be expected in a print, and appear to exhibit the very character and colour of the paintings. It was not unusual for Rubens to retouch his proofs, in the progress of the plates, with chalk or with the pencil, which corrections, attended to by the engraver, contributed not a little to the characteristic expression we find in his prints; proofs of this description are to be met with in the portfolios of the curious. He engraved with equal success historical subjects, huntings, landscapes, and portraits; and the number of his prints is very considerable. His plates are generally signed with his name, or thus, *B*ols.

The following are his principal prints, of which we have given rather a detailed list:

VARIOUS SUBJECTS, MOSTLY AFTER HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The infant Jesus and St. John playing with a Lamb.
The Virgin Mary, and infant Jesus sleeping.
The Virgin giving suck to the Infant.
The Virgin Mary, with her hands folded on her Breast.
The Virgin Mary with the Infant in the Clouds, with Angels and Cheruhim.
The infant Jesus caressing the Virgin Mary, and St. Joseph holding a Pear.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS, AFTER DIFFERENT FLEMISH MASTERS.

 The Crucifixion, a grand composition, with two Men on horseback, and a figure presenting the Sponge to Christ. On the other side, the Virgin Mary and St. John standing, and Mary Magdalene kneeling and embracing the Cross.

This is considered one of the most beautiful engravings by Bolswert. In the first impressions, which are very scarce, the hand of St. John is not seen on the shoulder of the Virgin: in the second impressions, the hand of St. John rests on the Virgin's shoulder, and the name of Vandyck is changed from the left to the right hand corner of the plate. In the last impressions, the hand was erased, probably to give them the appearance of first impressions, but the trick is easily discovered by the superiority of the first in point of clearness and colour.

These five landscapes are highly esteemed and finely executed.

A set of twenty smaller Landscapes.

A set of twelve Huntings of different animals, of which one is a Lion Hunt, with figures on horseback; very spirited and fine.

BOLTRAFFIO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, a Milanese painter, who, according to Vasari, was a scholar of Leonardo da Vinci. He was a reputable artist, and painted several pictures for the churches and convents at Bologna. One of which was an altar-piece in the church della Misericordia, representing the Virgin Mary and infant Saviour, with St. John Baptist and St. Sebastian, painted in 1506. [The name of this artist was Beltraffio, as appears by his monument at Milan. He was a gentleman, and only employed his leisure hours in painting. The picture in the Misericordia bore his signature with that of his master Vinci, and the date 1500; but both have been erased. It is the only production of Beltraffio placed in public, and is on that account esteemed the more valuable.]

[BOM, PETER, a Flemish artist born in 1530, painted landscapes in distemper. He died in 1572.]

BOMBELLI, SEBASTIAN. This painter was born at Udina in 1635, and was a scholar of Guercino. He afterwards went to Venice, where he studied and copied the works of Paolo Veronese and Tintoretto. He painted history in the early part of his life, but from the lucrative prospect opened to him in portraits, he was induced to devote himself to that branch of the art, although he had already painted some historical pictures of great promise. He visited most of the courts of Germany, where he painted portraits with success. He died in 1685. [Sebastiano Bombelli was so fine a copyist of P. Veronese, that some of his are scarcely to be distinguished from the originals. Boschini says that for imitating the character of P. Veronese he had not an equal, and for portraits he could not be surpassed. He was living in 1716.]

BONACINA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an Italian engraver, born at Milan about the year 1620. He engraved some plates of portraits, and historical subjects, in a neat style, though rather dry and stiff. They are executed entirely with the graver, and he seems to have imitated, without however equalling, the style of Cornelius Bloemaert. We have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

Pope Clement IX.
Guido Visconti.
Hermes Visconti.
Giovanni Batista Conte Truchi.

SUBJECTS.

The Alliance of Jacob and Laban; after Pietro da Cortona.
St. Martin kneeling before the Virgin and infant Jesus; after the same.

BONASONI, GIULIO, an Italian painter and very distinguished engraver, born at Bologna, about the year 1498. He studied painting under Lorenzo Sabbatini, and there are some of his works in the churches at Bologna; particularly in the church of St. Stefano, is a fine picture by him of the Souls in Purgatory. He is however much more celebrated as an engraver than a painter, and in this branch of art had the advantage of being educated by Marc Antonio. Bonasoni has engraved after the works of Michael Angelo, Raffaello, Giulio Romano, Parmegiano, and others, and several plates from his own designs. His prints, with a very few exceptions, are entirely worked with the graver, and although his style is neither so clear, firm, nor masterly as that of his admirable instructor, nor his outline so correct and pure, his works are executed with great facility and considerable elegance, and they are held in no small degree of estimation by the judicious collector. We admire in his prints an excellent distribution of the lights and shadows, and a breadth in the masses that is very masterly. His plates are generally marked with his name, either at length or contracted, as Giulio Bonoso, and sometimes with the initials, B.—I. B. or I. B. F., and also with the cipher \overline{VB} . His work is considerable; the following is a list of his plates most worthy of notice :

[Cumberland's Catalogue of the prints of Giulio Bonasone, is the most accurate that has hitherto been published.]

BONATTI, GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1635, and having shown an early inclination for the art, he was at the age of fourteen taken into the protection of Cardinal Carlo Pio, who placed him in the school of Guercino, under whom he studied three years. He afterwards went to Rome, where he became a scholar of P. Francesco Mola. He was employed in several works for the public edifices. In the gallery of the Capitol are two pictures by this master, one representing Rinaldo and Armido, the other Sisera and Jael. There are other works by him in the Chiesa Nuova, and St. Croce in Gerusalemme at Rome, where he died in 1681.

BONAVERA, DOMENICO MARIA, an Italian engraver, born at Bologna about the year 1650. He learned the art of engraving from his uncle Dom. Maria Cannti. His plates are chiefly etched, and finished with the dry point. He engraved eighteen plates, from the designs of Titian, for a book of anatomy for the use of students. He used a similar cipher to that of Dom. Barriere, and of Dom. Bettini, B. We have the following prints by him :

St. Anne teaching the Virgin Mary to read; after Dom. Maria Cavaniti; Dom. Bonavera, fec.

St. Theresa with the infant Jesus; after the same.

BONCONSIGLIO. See BUNCONSIGLIO.

BONCUORE, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Abruzzo in 1643, and studied at Rome under Francesco Albano. He painted history with considerable reputation, and his pictures are distinguished by great force and vigour of effect, though sometimes heavy in the execution. One of his most esteemed works is an altar-piece in the Chiesa degli Orfanelli, at Rome. He died in 1699, aged 56.

[BONE, HENRY, a celebrated enameller, was born at Truro in Cornwall in 1755. His first employment was with a manufacturer of china at Plymouth; he afterwards employed his talents at Bristol in painting landscapes and groups of flowers to ornament porcelain, by which means he acquired a thorough knowledge of that art, in which he became so eminent. He removed to London, and became distinguished by painting in enamel the Sleeping Girl after Sir Joshua Reynolds. But the works that will give him lasting fame are the Portraits of the illustrious Men and Women of England, which he enamelled after the original pictures in the royal and other collections. These must have cost him much labour, expense, and anxiety; but, unfortunately, little pecuniary reward. Since his death they have been dispersed by auction, and will hereafter be found in the cabinets of tasteful collectors of what is beautiful rather than curious. He was a member of the Royal Academy, and died in 1834.]

BONESI, GIOVANNI GIROLAMO. According to Zanotti, this artist was born at Bologna in 1653, and was a scholar of Giovanni Viani. He painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices at Bologna, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Carlo Cignani. Among his most esteemed productions are the following: St. Francis of Sales kneeling before the Virgin, in the church of St. Marino; S. Tommaso di Villanuova giving Alms to the Poor, in S. Biagio; and the Virgin and infant Christ, with Mary Magdalene and S. Ugo, at the Certosa. He died in 1725, aged 72.

BONFANTI, ANTONIO, called IL TORRICELLA. This painter was a native of Ferrara, in which city there are several of his works in the churches and convents. His most esteemed pictures are the Purification, and Christ disputing with the Doctors, in the church of S. Francesco, and the Holy Family in that of la Santissima Trinità.

BONFIGLIO, BENEDETTO. According to Vasari, this painter was a native of Perugia, and flourished about the year 1503. He was a reputable artist, and is said by that author only to have been equalled, at the time in which he lived, by Pietro Perugino. In the church of S. Domenico at Perugia, is a picture by Bonfiglio, of the Adoration of the Magi, and agli Orfanelli, a fine picture of the Annunciation. [Bonfigli is described by several writers of credit as being one of the best artists of his time. Lanzi says P. Perugino was his scholar. Zani places his birth in 1420. He was living in 1496.]

BONI, GIACOMO, was born at Bologna in 1688, and was a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini, whom he greatly aided in his works, particularly at Rome. He is also said to have studied under Carlo Cignani, whose style is discernible in many of his works, such as the ceiling of S. Maria della Costa at S. Remo, and in that of S. Pietro Celestini at Bologna. He excelled particularly in fresco, and painted a saloon in the Palazzo Pallavicino, which was much admired, and a fine picture of the infant Jupiter. He died in 1766, aged 78.

BONIFACCIO, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Viterbo in 1637, and was a scholar of Pietro da Cortona, at the time that Ciro Ferri and Romanelli studied under that master. He was a respectable painter of history, which he treated in the manner of his instructor, and painted several pictures for the public edifices of his native city: In the Palazzo Braschi, is a picture by this master of the Adulteress before Christ.

BONIFACCIO, or BONIFAZIO, NATALIS, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1590. His plates are principally etchings, which are executed in a free, spirited style. His most considerable works were the plates he engraved for a book published at Rome in 1590, composed by D. Fontana, architect to Pope Sixtus V., concerning the removal of the Vatican obelisks. He has inscribed his name on these plates, Natalis Bonifacius Sibenicensis, fec.

BONIFACIO, called VENETIANO. "This painter," says Ridolfi, "was born in the finest era of Venetian art." He was a native of Venice in 1491, and was a scholar of the elder Palma. The works of Titian, however, had such attraction, that he studied them with the greatest attention, and he formed to himself a style that partook of the excellencies of both. His compositions are abundant and ingenious, and there is an exquisite suavity in his colour that nearly reaches the perfection of Titian. Many of his large works are in the palace of the Government at Venice, which are particularly described by Ridolfi. There are also some admirable pictures in the churches; among others the following: In the church of Padri Serviti, Christ in the midst of the Apostles. In S. Giovanni, the Archangel Michael driving the Evil Spirits from Heaven. In S. Giovanni di Rialto, the Virgin in the Clouds, and below, St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Mark, and in the Sacristy, the Baptism of Christ, and the Sacrifice of Abraham. [Sig. Ab. Morelli has pointed out in his Notitia, the true birth-place of Bonifazio. He was a native of Verona, and not of Venice, notwithstanding the authority of Vasari, Ridolfi, and Zanetti.] This eminent artist died in 1553.

BONINI, GIROLAMO. According to Padre Orlandi, this painter was a native of Ancona, and flourished about the year 1660. He was a favourite scholar of Francesco Albano, and assisted that master in many of his principal works, particularly in the Sala Farnese, and in the palaces at Bologna.

BONISOLI, AGOSTINO, was born at Cremona in 1633, and was first a scholar of Batista Tortioli, and afterwards studied a short time under Miradoro Agostino Bonisoli, a relation, an artist of little note. He was indebted to his natural genius, and his study of the works of Paolo Veronese, more than to either of his instructors. He was more employed in easel pictures of sacred subjects, than for the churches. The only large work by him that is recorded, is a picture in the Conventuali at Cremona, representing the Dispute between S. Antonio and the Tyrant Ezzelino. He died in 1700.

BONITO, GIUSEPPE. This painter was born at Catell' a Mare, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1705. He was a scholar of Francesco Solimene, and was one of the most successful followers of his style. He acquired considerable celebrity as a painter of history, and was much employed as a portrait painter. He was appointed painter to the court of Naples, where he died in 1789, aged 84.

BONNART, ROBERT and NICHOLAS. These engravers were brothers, born at Paris about the year 1646. They were instructed in the art by F. Vandermeulen, and engraved several plates from his designs. We have the following prints by them :

Portrait of Louis XIV.; Robert Bonnart, fec.
 Portrait of the Dauphin Louis; the same.
 Portrait of Claude le Pellatier; Nic. Bonnart, sc.
 The Virgin, with the infant Jesus and St. John, half-length figures; the same; oval.
 The taking of Valenciennes in 1677; after Vandermeulen; engraved by R. Bonnart.
 The taking of Cambray in 1677; after the same.
 The Siege of Douay; after the same.
 The Entrance of the Queen into Arras, two sheets; after the same.

BONNART, JOHN, JUN^r. This engraver was probably related to the preceding artists. In Pe-rault's Cabinet des Beaux Arts, published at Paris in 1690, there is a plate by him of a ceiling ornamented with figures; it is etched in a free, masterly style, and finished with the graver; marked Joan Bonnart, Junior, del. et sculp.

BONNOCIONE, E. The name of this engraver is affixed to a small plate, representing Diana seated in a chariot drawn by Dragons, with a Cupid behind her, after F. Bol. It is slightly etched, in a poor dark style. He flourished about the year 1670.

BONNEAU, JACOB, a French engraver, who resided in England about the year 1741. He was principally employed by the booksellers; and, among other plates, engraved the heads of the American Buccaneers, prefixed to their History, published in London in the above-mentioned year.

[BONNEMAISON, ———, an excellent French painter of portraits and sentimental subjects. He also excelled in lithography, and was one of the best judges of pictures of his time. His countrymen owe him a more extended notice than has been given by Gabet. He died in 1828.]

BONNEMER, FRANCIS. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1670. He engraved several plates after Le Brun, and other French painters, among which is Moses and the Burning Bush.

BONNET, LOUIS, a modern French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1735. He resided some time at Petersburg, where he engraved some portraits of persons of the Russian court. On his return to Paris, he published several plates, executed in imitation of drawings in crayons, of which style he pretended to be the inventor. They are chiefly after Boucher, and other modern French masters.

[BONNINGTON, RICHARD PARKES, a landscape painter, was born at Arnold near Nottingham in 1801. He was a student of Nature, and delighted to observe her workings in all their varieties. He, however, had a full appreciation of his own talents, and not finding them sufficiently estimated in his own country; he went to Paris at the age of sixteen, and obtained the notice which had been withheld at home. He went from France to Italy, where he improved on his earlier manner; but finding the climate not congenial to his state of health, he returned to England, where his reputation had preceded him, and died in 1828. It will be for posterity to judge whether the praise bestowed on his productions has been exaggerated; but posterity should be made aware that many pictures and drawings attributed to this artist, are copies and imitations made to satisfy the avidity of collectors, and amply to remunerate the skill of the copyist and the cupidty of the dealer.]

BONONE, CARLO. This eminent painter was born at Ferrara in 1569, and was instructed in the art by Giuseppe Mazzuoli, called il Bastaruolo, under whom he studied until he was twenty years of age. Contemporary with Ippolito Scarsellino, and unable to equal him in the tenderness of his tints and the beauty of his expression, he endeavoured to rival him in the boldness of his design and the vigour of his colouring. Bent on improvement, he visited Bologna, where the Caracci were then in the zenith of their fame. Their works inspired him with a new idea of his art. After passing some time at Bologna, he went to Rome, where he improved his style of design, by studying after the antique. His predilection for the style of the Caracci drew him again to Bologna, where he copied some of their principal works. He afterwards went to Venice, where the splendid productions of Paolo Veronese appear to have excited the liveliest admiration. The domes of Coreggio at Parma seem to have been not less the objects of his contemplation. In his smaller works he approaches so near to the style of the Caracci, that he was called the Caracci of Ferrara. In his extensive machinal works he exhibits the magnificence and richness of Paolo Veronese. Such are his Feast of Ahasuerus in the Refectory of the Regular Canons at Ravenna; which, in abundant and copious invention, may almost vie with the Marriage of Cana by Paolo, the Feast of Herod in S. Benedetto, and the Miracle at Cana in the Refectory of the Certosini at Ferrara. Many other works by this painter are in the public edifices at Ferrara, and his academy produced some of the principal painters of the Ferrarese school. He died in 1632.

BONONE, LIONELLO, was the nephew and scholar of Carlo Bonone, and flourished about the year 1649. The excellent instruction of his uncle might have enabled him to arrive at celebrity in the art, but his negligence and depravity of conduct prevented his ever going beyond mediocrity. His most creditable performances are two pictures in the chapel of the hospital of S. Maria Novella, representing the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, and the Holy Family.

BONONIENSIS, FR., an Italian engraver, by whom we have some very spirited etchings, executed in a bold, masterly style. They are chiefly from the works of Paolo Veronese, and are usually signed with his name.

BONSER, J. This artist was a native of Holland, and resided at Leyden about the year 1642. He was principally employed by the publishers, for whom, among other book-plates, he engraved some frontispieces, with figures and ornaments. They are executed with the graver, in a very indifferent style.

BONVICINO, ALESSANDRO, called IL MORETTO. This painter was born at Brescia in 1514, and was brought up in the school of Titian, whose style he approached nearer than any of his countrymen. In 1532, when he was only sixteen years of age, he painted a picture of S. Niccolo, in the church of the Madonna de' Miracoli. He afterwards attempted to introduce into his works something of the greatness of Raffaele, and became the author of a very attractive style. An uncommonly graceful turn of his heads, an expression of devotion and fervent piety in his figures, (which generally represent sacred subjects,) a freshness of colour approaching to Titian, are the characteristics of the works of Bonvicino. The portraits of this able artist have been compared to those of Titian. He occasionally painted in fresco, but was less successful than in oil. In the Chiesa di S. Clemente at Brescia, are two pictures by this painter, of S. Lucia, and S. Caterina; a superior production to both is the principal altarpiece, representing the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, with St. Clement and other Saints below. At Milan, is a fine picture by this master of the Conversion of St. Paul, which he has signed with his name, contrary to his usual practice. He died in 1564. [Lanzi is of opinion, that the date of his birth, 1514, is erroneous, as he was painting in 1516. Supposing the date 1514 to be correct, in 1532 he would be 18 years old.]

BOON, DANIEL, a Dutch painter, who flourished in England in the reign of Charles II. He painted drunken scenes and revellings, in which his ambition appears to have been to introduce as much of ugliness and deformity as a mind naturally vulgar could conceive. He died in England in 1698.

BOONEN, ARNOLD, an eminent portrait painter, born at Dort in 1669. He was first a scholar of Arnold Verbuis, but afterwards was instructed by Godfrey Schalcken. He painted a few pictures in the style of the latter, representing subjects by candlelight, but met with such encouragement in portrait painting, that he devoted himself almost wholly to that branch of art. His style was well adapted to succeed in it. An excellent colourist, a faithful designer of his model, and an uncommon facility in his operation, he was soon distinguished as one of the ablest artists of his day. He painted a great number of portraits of the most distinguished personages of his time, among which were Peter the Great, the Elector of Mentz, the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, the Prince and Princess of Orange, the great Duke of Marlborough, and several others. He painted some large pictures for the halls of the different companies at Amsterdam and Dort. He died in 1729.

BOONEN, GASPARD. This artist was the son of the preceding, and painted portraits with some reputation, but in no way equalled his father.

BORCHT, PETER VANDER, THE ELDER, a Flemish landscape painter and engraver, born at Brussels about the year 1540. His works, as a painter, are of no great celebrity, but he applied himself with great assiduity to engraving, and has left a great number of plates, etched in a rough, careless style. He possessed great fertility of invention, but is not very judicious, either in the attitudes of his figures, or in the composition of his groups. He usually marked his plates with the initials of his name P. B. F., or with the cipher RB. Mr. Strutt has been led into an error in stating that this artist flourished in 1622, as will be seen by the dates on some of his prints in the following list. Among his numerous works are:

A set of Landscapes, with subjects from the Old and New Testament.

Rural Enjoyments; Cornelius van Tienen, &c.

The Festival of the Company of Archers; same address.

A Country Wedding; fecit Peirus vander Borcht. 1560.

A Landscape, with the subject of Hagar and Ishmael; dated 1586.

A set of plates for the Metamorphoses of Ovid; one hundred and seventy-eight prints, published at Antwerp; Theodore Galle, &c.

BORCHT, HENRY VANDER, a painter and engraver, born at Brussels in 1583. The troubles in the Low Countries obliged his family to remove into Germany when he was very young, and they settled at Frankfort, where he was placed under Giles van Valkenborg. The Earl of Arundel, passing through Frankfort, found Vander Borcht possessed intelligence and taste for antiquities, sent him to Italy to collect for him, and he remained in the service of that nobleman until the death of the Earl. He was afterwards employed in the same capacity by the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. Vander Borcht painted flowers and fruit, and his pictures were much esteemed. Towards the latter part of his life he resided at Antwerp, where he died in 1660, aged 77. We have a few etchings by this artist, as follow, they are generally marked with the cipher NB.

The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Parmegiano. 1637.

The dead Christ, supported by Joseph of Arimathea, from a drawing by Parmegiano; after Raffaele. 1645.

Abraham at Table with the Angels; after L. Caracci.

The infant Jesus embracing St. John, from Guido's print; after Agost. Caracci.

Apollo and Cupid; after Perino del Vaga; oval.

Twenty-two plates of the Entry of Frederick, Elector Palatine, with Elizabeth, Princess Royal of England, his Consort, into Frankenthal; dated 1613.

BORCHT, JAMES A, an engraver, who executed several of the plates for the Academie de l'espeé, by G. Thibault, published at Antwerp in 1628. He worked entirely with the graver in a style resembling that of James de Gheyn.

BORDIER. See PETITOT.

BORDINO, J. F., an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1604. He engraved the plates for a volume in quarto, entitled, Series et Gesta Pontificum, published in the above year.

BORDONE, PARIS, an eminent painter of the Venetian school, born at Treviso in 1513. He was of a noble family, and after receiving an education suited to his birth, having shown a decided inclination for the art, he was placed in the distinguished school of Titian, under whom he studied some time. Under so able an instructor, and endowed with great natural genius, he gave early proof of uncommon ability, and before he was twenty years of age he painted, for the family of Tiretta, a picture of Meleager and Atalanta, and a Holy Family, which excited universal admiration. His most important work was the dome of the church of S. Vicenzo at Treviso, where he has represented, in six compartments, the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Adoration of the Magi, the Crucifixion, the Ascension, and the Assumption of the Virgin Mary. Ridolfi mentions many other works by this master, in the churches and other public edifices at Venice, Milan, Genoa, and Florence. The pictures of Bordone partake more of the grand simplicity of Giorgione, than the style of his instructor, and he appears to have paid particular attention to the works of that great painter. He also excelled in painting portraits, and his pictures of that description are inferior to no artist of his country, Titian only excepted. He was invited to France by Francis II., where he painted the portrait of that monarch, and of the principal personages of his court. He died at Venice in 1588. [According to Lanzi and Zani, he was born in 1500, and died in 1570.]

BOREKENS. See BORREKENS.

BORGANI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Mantua, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He was a scholar of Domenico Feti. He did not, however, follow the style of his instructor, but imitated, with some success, the graceful manner of Parmegiano. There are several of his works in the churches of S. Pietro, St. Simone, and S. Croce, at Mantua; which prove him to have been an artist of no mean ability; and according to Lanzi, are deserving of more admiration than is generally bestowed on them.

BORGHESE, GIOVANNI VENTURA. This painter was a native of Citta da Castello, and a scholar of Pietro da Cortona. He assisted that master in some of his most considerable works at Rome, and after the death of his instructor, was engaged to finish some of his paintings left imperfect. In the church of S. Nicolo da Tolentino, there are two pictures by this painter, representing the Annunciation, and the Virgin Mary crowned by Angels.

BORGHESI, IPPOLITO, was a native of Naples, and a scholar of Francesco Curia. He flourished about the year 1620, and painted history with some reputation. His most considerable work is an altar-piece in the church of S. Lorenzo at Perugia, representing the Assumption of the Virgin.

BORGIANI, ORAZIO, a painter and engraver, born at Rome in 1580. He was instructed in the art of painting by his brother Giulio Borgiani, called Scalzo; but was more advantaged by assiduously studying and copying the works of the great masters in his native city. The patronage bestowed on the arts by Philip II. of Spain, induced this painter to visit that country, where he passed some years, and met with considerable success, his works being held in great estimation. On his return to Rome, he was patronized by the Spanish ambassador, for whom he painted several pictures, and also was employed in painting for the churches. In S. Adriano a campo Vaccino, and in S. Salvatore del Lauro, are two altar-pieces by this master; and in S. Elena alli Cesarini, is a picture of the Assumption of the Virgin. As an engraver, he has left some plates etched in a bold, free manner, and more finished than is usual in the works of a painter. He usually marked his plates with a cipher composed of an H. and a B. thus HB. or FB. or RB.

We have by him :

The Resurrection, a composition of many figures; marked with the last of the above ciphers.

The dead Christ, in a foreshortened position, with the two Marys and St. John; dated 1615.

St. Christopher giving his Hand to the infant Jesus.

St. Christopher carrying the Infant on his Shoulder.

Fifty-two Bible histories, called Raffaelle's Bible; dated 1615.

[He was born in 1577, and died in 1615. Zani.]

BORGOGNONE. See CORTESI.

BORGOGNONE, AMBROGIO. According to Lomazzo, this artist was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1500. He was a disciple of Vincenzo Foppa, and was one of the earliest of the Milanese painters who attempted to reform the dry and Gothic style which prevailed before him. One of his most considerable works is a picture in the church of S. Simpliciano, at Milan, representing the Martyrdom of S. Sisinio and his companions. [He was a follower of Foppa, and painted in the style now called antico moderno. He painted at S. Simpliciano the histories of S. Sisinio and some accompanying martyrs, which adorn one of the cloisters. The beauty of his youthful heads, variety of countenance, simplicity and elegance of drapery, and an uncommon grace of expression, not met with in this or any other school, entitle Ambrogio to distinction. A Coronation of the Virgin, in the same place, of which Rosini has given a representation, shows how far he was in advance of his age. He was living in 1522, as appears by the date on one of his pictures.]

[BORGONA, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, who flourished from the year 1495 till about 1533. He was a distinguished artist of the time, both in fresco and oil, and produced several works at Toledo, which were held in great estimation. He worked in conjunction with Alvar Perez de Villoldo, Alonso Sanchez, Francois d'Anvers, and other eminent painters. At Avila, he finished the pictures commenced by Pedro Berruguette and Santo-Cruz. He also painted portraits of several cardinals. His colouring and mode of casting his draperies were considered equal to the best masters of the Italian and German schools of the time.]

[BORRAS, IL PADRE FRANCISCO NICOLAS, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Cocentayna in 1530, and studied under Vincent Joanes at Valentia. He painted the great altar-piece of the monastery of St. Geronimo of Gandia, and required for payment to be admitted as one of the order, which was gladly conceded to him. He painted an astonishing number of pictures for this immense establishment, employing the greater part of his life to the purpose of decorating it. Some of his pictures were also at Cocentayna, at Ontiniente, at the Escorial, at Aldaya, and Valentia. He led an exemplary life, and died at the age of 80. A catalogue of his principal works may be seen in Bermudez.]

[BORREKENS, JOHN PETER FRANCIS, born at Antwerp in 1747, painted landscapes, many of which are ornamented with cattle and figures by Ommeganck and other masters. He died at Antwerp in 1827.]

BORREKENS, MATTHEW, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1615. He was chiefly employed in copying the plates of the eminent engravers, particularly Bolswert, and others, for Martin vanden Enden, and other printsellers. He worked entirely with the graver, and appears to have imitated, though without much success, the style of Pontius. We have also some original plates by him of portraits, and other subjects. His principal prints are as follow :

Augustus Carpon, Plenipotentiary of the Duke of Saxony at the treaty of Osahurg; Ans. van Halle, pinx. 1649.

Gerard Schepeler, another Plenipotentiary at that treaty; after the same. 1649.

The Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary, Magdalene, and St. John; after Vandycck; Ant. Vandycck, pinx.; Eras. Quellinus, del.

The immaculate Conception; Rubens, pinx.; M. Vandendenden, exc.

St. Francis Xavier, on a white ground; the same inscription.

St. Ignatius; the same inscription.

St. Barbara, with a Tower on her Head; Rubens, pinx.; Mat. Boreckens, sc.; scarce.

Christ bound, and kneeling, with two Angels holding the instruments of the Passion; after Diepenbeck.

The good Shepherd; after the same.

BORRONI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI ANGELO, was born at Cremona in 1684, and was a scholar of Angelo Massarotti, and afterwards of Roberto le Longe. On leaving those masters, he was taken under the protection of the noble family of Crivelli, and was employed some years in ornamenting their palace. He afterwards painted several pictures for the churches at Cremona and Milan, particularly in the latter city. In the dome at Milan, he painted S. Benedetto, in the act of interceding for the city, of which he is the protecting Saint, which Lanzi says may compete with the best painter of his time. He died in 1772.

[BORSUM, ABRAHAM VAN, painted landscapes, views of cities, animals, and birds. His colouring and chiaro-scuro bear a resemblance to Rembrandt's, but not so artistically applied. His drawings are fine, and highly estimated in Holland; one sold for 400 florins, at the sale of C. Ploos van Amstel's collection.]

[BORSUM, ADAM VAN, lived in 1666. He painted landscapes and animals, and imitated A. Vandermeer and Paul Potter. His colouring is natural, and his pencilling firm, yet free and spirited.]

BORZONE, LUCIANO. This artist was born at Genoa in 1590, and was a scholar of Filippo Bertolotti his uncle. He painted history and portraits, but particularly excelled in the latter. In the church of S. Domenico at Genoa, is a picture by Borzone, of the presentation in the Temple, and in S. Spirito, the Baptism of Christ. Soprani reports him to have been a man of great acquirements, and that his house was the resort of persons of taste and literature. While he was painting the ceiling of the Chiesa della Nunziata at Genoa, he fell from the scaffolding, and was killed, in the year 1645, at the age of 55. He left three sons, Giovanni Batista, Carlo, and Francisco Maria, who were all painters, the last mentioned excelled in painting landscapes in the style of Claude and Gaspar Poussin. Luciano Borzone etched some plates from his own compositions, as follow:

The Portrait of Giustiniani.

St. Peter delivered from Prison.

Prometheus devoured by the Vulture.

Children playing.

A set of devout subjects.

BOS, or BOSCHE, JEROME, a very ancient Dutch painter and engraver, born at Bois le Duc, about the year 1470. He made a whimsical choice of the subjects for his pictures, which are generally grotesque representations of spectres, devils, and incantations, which, however ridiculous, are treated with singular ingenuity. He painted some pictures of a more serious cast, among which were the Flight into Egypt, and Christ bearing his Cross, in the church of Bois le Duc, which Karel van Mander speaks of in very favourable terms. One of his most singular compositions, was a picture representing our Saviour delivering the ancient Patriarchs from Hell. Judas, in attempting to escape with the Select, is seized on by Devils, who are in the Act of hanging him in the Air. The works he has left as an engraver exhibit the same eccentric drollery. His plates are executed in the stiff Gothic style of the early time in which he lived; they are now become scarce, and are sought after by the curious collector. He sometimes marked his prints with his name in length as BOSCHE, and sometimes in Gothic letters

The Temptation of St. Anthony; dated 1522.

The Last Judgment, Christ appears in the Air, seated on a Rainbow, and on each side of him are two Angels sounding Trumpets, with Labels bearing this inscription: Hic est dies quem fecit; Surgite mortui, venite ad judicium. At the bottom of the print are small figures of Men and Devils of all shapes intermixed.

St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus across a River, and a Hermit with a Lantern.

Constantine at the Head of his Army, an Angel showing him the Cross in the Sky.

The Baptism of Christ by St. John.

An assemblage of grotesque figures; inscribed Al dat op, &c.

Another similar subject; inscribed Dese Jeron. Bosch drollen.

BOS, BALTHASAR, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1520. He engraved a middle-sized plate, lengthways, representing the Judgment of Paris, which is probably from his own design, as he adds the word fecit to his name.

BOS, CORNELIUS. See BUS.

BOS, LEWIS JANSSEN, or JOHN. According to Van Mander, this painter was born at Bois le Duc, about the year 1450. He painted flowers, fruit, and plants, which he finished in an extraordinary polished manner. The insects on the plants are curiously drawn, and painted with surprising precision. He also painted small portraits in the same labour-ed style. He died in 1507.

BOS, GASPAR VANDEN, a Dutch painter of seapieces, born at Hoorn in 1634. His pictures of storms and calms, with shipping, are not without considerable merit, for their finish and truth of colouring. He died at the early age of 32, in 1666.

BOS, MARIE RENARD DU, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1770. He was a pupil of Nicholas Gabriel Dupuis, and engraved several plates in the style of his master, after Rosalba, Basseporte, and other artists.

BOSC, CLAUDE DU, a French engraver, who came to England about the year 1712, by the invitation of N. Dorigny, to assist him in engraving the cartoons of Raffaele; but on account of some dispute, he left Dorigny, and engaged to engrave the cartoons for the printsellers. He also undertook the Duke of Marlborough's battles, and sent to Paris for Baron and Beauvais, to assist him in that undertaking, which occupied him two years. He published an English translation of Picart's Religious Ceremonies, in which, part of the plates were engraved by himself, and the others by Scotin and Gravelot. He engraved a plate of the Contenance of Scipio, after Nicholas Poussin, and others after some of the most eminent masters. His manner is coarse and heavy, and his drawing incorrect.

BOSC, J. DU. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1749. Among other prints, he engraved some plates of flowers, which are executed with the graver in a very neat style.

BOSCH, or BOSSCHE, BALTHASAR VANDEN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1675. The only instruction he received was from an obscure artist, named Thomas, whom he soon surpassed. He excelled in painting the interiors of saloons and galleries richly decorated with statues and pictures, with appropriate figures, habited in the mode of the time. He also represented the inside of a painter's room, or the laboratory of a sculptor, wherein the artist was surrounded with the objects of his art, arranged in a very picturesque manner. His pictures became extremely popular, and were bought at large prices. He also painted portraits of a small size with great success, and his reputation in that way induced the Duke of Marlborough, when he was at Antwerp, to have his picture painted by Vanden Bosch. He represented that illustrious personage on horseback; and that the work might be more complete, engaged Peter van Bloemen to paint the horse. The pictures of this master are ingeniously composed, his figures not incorrectly drawn, and his colouring, like most of the artists of his country, is good. He died in 1715.

BOSCH, ELIAS, a German engraver, whose works are little known, though they are not destitute of merit. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, finished style. His name is affixed to a small print, representing the Holy Family, with Angels, after John Van Achen, or ab Ach.

[BOSCH, JACQUES VANDEN, born at Amsterdam in 1636, painted fruit-pieces almost to deception. He died in 1676.]

BOSCHAERT, NICHOLAS. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1696, and was a scholar of Crepu, a flower painter of some reputation, whom he soon surpassed, and became a very eminent artist in that line. His pictures of flowers and fruit are painted with great lightness of touch, are delicately coloured, and are disposed with taste. He was frequently employed in painting flowers and fruit in the pictures of his contemporary artists.

BOSCHI, FABRIZIO. According to Baldinucci, this painter was born at Florence about the year 1570. He was a scholar of Domenico Passignani, under whom he made so great a progress, that at the age of nineteen he executed, in fresco, a considerable work of the Life of S. Bonaventura, which that author reports to have excited the admiration of the artists of his time. One of his best performances was the Martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, painted for the church of the Certosa, at Florence. Another capital picture by him is in the church of the Dominican convent of St. Lucia, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, surrounded with Angels, and the Apostles below. He died in 1642.

BOSCHI, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Florence in 1619, and was the nephew and scholar of Matteo Roselli. He finished some of the works left imperfect at the death of his master, and painted several pictures of his own compositions, for the churches at Florence. His greatest merit, however, consisted in portrait painting, which he practised with great ability. He died in 1675, aged 56.

BOSCHINI, MARCO, was born at Venice in 1613, and was educated in the school of Palma. He did not confine himself to an imitation of the manner of his master, but occasionally attempted the bolder style of Il Tintoretto. One of his most esteemed works is an altar-piece, representing the Last Supper, in the sacristy of S. Girolamo, at Venice. He also distinguished himself as an engraver, and usually signed his name on his plates, Marcus Boschinius. Boschini was also a writer on art, and was the author of La Carta del Navegar pittoresco, published at Venice in 1660.

BOSCOLI, ANDREA, was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1580. He was a scholar of Santo de Titi, and acquired some reputation as a painter of history. His best work is a picture of St. John preaching, in the church of the Teresiani at Rimino. He also painted portraits with considerable success; that of himself is in the Florentine gallery. Florent le Comte says, he engraved nineteen plates, but does not specify them. [He died about 1606, at the age of 56.]

BOSELLI, ANTONIO. This old painter is mentioned with distinction in the Vite de Pittori Bergamaschi, by Count Francesco Maria Tassi, who states him to have been a native of the territory of Bergamo, and to have flourished about the year 1500. He was a sculptor as well as a painter; and many of his works are noticed by that author. In the church of S. Cristoforo at Bergamo, is a picture by this master, representing St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Luke, bearing the following inscription: Hoc opus Antonium scito pinxisse Bosellum, die 23 Februarii, 1509; and in the church of the Augustines is another of his works, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus in the Clouds, and several Saints below. [It is probable that he worked to a much later period, as there are accounts of monies paid to him in 1527; and it is believed that he assisted Pomponio Amalteo, in Friuli, in the years 1534 to 1536.]

BOSELLI, FELICE. This painter was born at Piacenza in 1650, and was a disciple of Gioseffo Nuvolone. For some time he attempted historical painting, in which he was not very successful; but he afterwards adopted a branch of the art more suited to his genius, and became a very reputable painter of animals, birds, and fish. His pictures of these subjects are highly esteemed in his native country, and are to be found in the best collections at Piacenza. [He succeeded so well in copying ancient pictures as to deceive experienced judges: they are numerous, but rarely admitted to be his by the possessor.] He died in 1732, aged 82.

[BOSSAM, JOHN, an English painter, who lived in the reigns of Queens Mary and Elizabeth. Old Hilliard said, that his pieces were equal to any whatsoever, and lamented "that he lived in a time when the arts be not esteemed." He calls him "the most rare English drawer of story-works, in black and white," and says that "for his skill he was worthy to have been serjeant painter to any king or emperor."]

BOSSART, ROBERT, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1595. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Henry Goltzius, from the resemblance in their style, although much inferior to that master. He engraved a set of prints, in which the different nations of Europe are represented by figures, emblematical of what each country was celebrated for. He also engraved a portrait of B. Spranger, dated 1595.

BOSSCHAERT, THOMAS WILLEBORTS. This eminent painter was born at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1613. Having shown an inclination for the art, his parents sent him to Antwerp, at that time the residence of the greatest masters of the Flemish school, and he became a scholar of Gerard Segers, under whom he remained, until he had made great proficiency, and was recommended by his instructor to visit Italy for further improvement. After studying at Rome four years, he returned to Flanders, where he soon gave proof of his ability, in some pictures he painted for the churches in the Low Countries. His style nearly resembles that of Vandyck, both in his historical works and his portraits, in which he excelled. His colouring is extremely tender and harmonious, and the airs of his heads graceful and agreeable. His genius was equal to great compositions, and his works, though placed by those of Rubens and Vandyck, sustain their rank among the most estimable productions of that school. In the church of the Capuchins at Brussels, is a fine picture by Bosschaert, of the Martyrdom of St. Basil; and in the church of St. James at Bruges, is a grand composition, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint, which, in point of colour and design, would not dishonour Vandyck. In the palace called the House in the Wood, at the Hague, is a capital work of this master, representing an emblematical subject of Peace and War. In the year 1646, he was made director of the Academy at Antwerp, and died in that city in 1656.

BOSSÉ, ABRAHAM, a French engraver, born at Tours about the year 1610. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he appears to have formed his style by imitating the least finished plates of Callot. He principally worked from his own designs, although he also engraved after other masters, the number of his plates being very considerable. His plates are etched in a spirited style, with uncommon freedom, and afterwards finished with the graver, in a bold masterly manner. He published a treatise, entitled La manière de graver à l'eau forte, et au Burin, a work which M. Cochin afterwards republished, with additions. The following are his principal works:

The Queen-Mother seated, with the young King and his Brother standing by her.
Bust of Cardinal Richieu.

A Man with a Cloak resting against a Tree; engraved by Bosse and Mellan.

Five of the Senses.
A set of plates for the History of the Maid of Orleans; from the designs of Vignons and others.

BOSSI, BENIGNO, a modern Italian designer and engraver, born in the Milanese in 1727. He was intended to have studied painting under Pompeo Battoni, but the death of that artist prevented it; and he was advised by Mengs and Dietrich to apply himself to engraving. He settled at Dresden, but during the seven years' war he was under the necessity of leaving Saxony, and he went to Parma, where he was favoured with the patronage of the duke. We have the following prints by him:

His own Portrait.

The Presentation in the Temple. 1755.

Forty small etchings of Heads, and other subjects; very spirited.

A set of Vases, and a Masquerade; after Pctitot.

Four of Trophies. 1771.

Four of the Attributes of the Seasons; circular. 1770.

Two of Children.

A set of twenty-nine small plates; after the drawings of Parmegiano.

Allegorical figures representing the Towns in Piedmont. St. Catherine; after the celebrated picture belonging to the family of Sanvitale. The most esteemed plate of the artist.

BOSSIUS, JAMES, an old Flemish engraver, born about the year 1520. He resided chiefly at Rome, and he is supposed to have learned the art of engraving from some of the pupils of Marc Antonio. He worked with the graver in a neat style, but rather stiff, and his drawing is not very correct. His prints, however, possess considerable merit. He sometimes marked his plates with his name at length, and sometimes BB. We have the following by him:

The Portrait of M. Angelo Buonarrotti.

Bust of Othon Truces, Cardinal of Alhani; with a border, and an emblem of Charity; Jac. Bossius Belgia incidit.

Bust of St. Thomas d'Aquinas; Jacob Bossius Belgia incidit.

The Crucifixion; Jacobus Bossius incidit.

St. Peter and St. John curing the lame Man; Jac. Bos. f.

The Statue of Pyrrhus, King of Molossus; after the antique; signed Jacobus Bossius Belgia incidit. 1562.

BOSSU, LE, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He imitated the style of F. de Poilly, but without much success. His graver is heavy and coarse, and his drawing is incorrect. He is said to have resided some time at Rome, where he engraved some plates after the Italian painters, among which is the Resurrection of Lazarus; after Giacinto Brandi.

[BOTELLI, FELICE, a native of Piacenza, born in 1652, studied under Nuvolone, and painted animals, birds, and fish, with great spirit and beauty. He died in 1732.]

BOTET, F. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1750. Among other prints he engraved some plates representing gallant subjects and bambochades, after Charles Anthony Coypel.

BOTH, JOHN and ANDREW. These celebrated painters were brothers, and are noticed in one article, as their histories, as well as their works, are so closely connected, that it would be difficult to do justice to either in a separate account. They were natives of Utrecht, John, the elder, being born about the year 1610. Their father was a painter on glass, from whom they learned the first rudiments of design; but they were afterwards placed under Abraham Bloemaert, with whom they studied, until they found themselves sufficiently advanced in the art to undertake the journey to Italy on the produce of their talents. These brothers seem to have been attached to each other from their infancy by ties of the most cordial affection, and that bond was never broken till they were separated by death. On their arrival at Rome, John Both, inspired by the beauty of the scenes around him, and emulated by the applause bestowed on the works of Claude Lorraine, was not long before he produced some landscapes that received the unqualified admiration of the artists themselves: and Andrew, who had studied the works of Bamboccio, had decorated them with figures, painted in such perfect unison with the landscapes, that it could hardly be believed that they were not by the same hand. The figures in no way intruded on the enchanting effect of the landscape, and the landscape occasionally withheld its attraction, to give value to the charm of the figures. The sympathy of their affections had blended itself with the exertion of their talents; and in their works every thing was warm, tender, and harmonious. The landscapes of Both exhibit the most beautiful scenery; his colour is glowing, yet delicate, and there is a sparkling effect of sunshine in his pictures that has scarcely been equalled. Sometimes we admire the freshness of nature, enlivened by the first beams of the rising sun; at others, the brilliant glow of its meridian splendour; and we sometimes contemplate the rich tintings of evening in an Italian sky. The figures and cattle by Andrew, with which they are enriched, are grouped and designed with great taste and elegance. Independent of the reputation Andrew Both acquired by the charming figures he introduced into the landscapes of his brother, he painted many pictures of his own composition, in the manner of Bamboccio, but more agreeably coloured; they generally represented merry-makings, fairs, and quack-doctors, surrounded by figures, designed with great humour, and full of character: they are highly esteemed. The works of these excellent artists had reached a distinction, even in Italy, that secured to them both fortune and fame, when a melancholy accident cut asunder the tender tie by which they were united, and deprived the world of the combination of their powers. While they resided at Venice, returning home from an entertainment, Andrew unfortunately fell into one of the canals and was drowned, in 1645. John Both did not long remain in Italy after the death of his brother, but returned to Utrecht, where he endeavoured to supply his loss, by having the figures in his landscapes painted by Cornelius Polemburg. He did not survive Andrew Both more than five years, and died at Utrecht in 1650, aged about 40. The admirers of etchings are indebted to these able painters for a few plates, which are executed in so picturesque and masterly a style that we regret they had not more frequently amused themselves with the point. By John Both we have:

- A set of four upright Landscapes; signed J. Both, fec.
- A set of six Landscapes; lengthways; J. B. f.
- A Landscape, with loaded Mules; Both, fec.
- A Landscape, with a Traveller seated, with a Basket; J. Both, inv. fec.

By Andrew Both we have:

- St. Anthony praying, with a Skull; marked B Both, reversed.
- St. Francis, with a Crucifix before him; the same.
- Bust of a Man, in Profile, with a Cap and Feather; marked B.

Two Beggars.

Two of Dutch Merry-makings; A. Both, inv. et fec.

Six Landscapes, numbered; of which the first is marked A. Both.

The Five Senses, represented by grotesque figures.

BOTSCHILD, SAMUEL. This painter and engraver was born at Sangerhausen, in Saxony, in 1640. He painted history with some reputation, and was made painter to the court, and keeper of the electoral gallery at Dresden. He established an academy there for the instruction of the young artists of his country. He etched some plates from his own designs. We have the following prints by him:

The exterminating Angel destroying the Army of Sennacherib; S. Botschild, aqua forti.

Four of allegorical figures.

Four of the Times of the Day.

Two emblematical subjects, one of Hope and Patience, the other Faith and Charity; oval.

Ulysses and Epeus giving the Dimensions of the Trojan Horse.

Hercules, with Cupid spinning.

BOTTALA, GIOVANNI MARIA. This painter was born at Savona in the Genoese, in 1613. According to Soprani, he went to Rome when he was young, and studied some time under Pietro da Cortona. He was taken into the protection of Cardinal Sacchetti, for whom he painted several pictures, of which the most considerable was the Meeting of Jacob and Esau, which were afterwards placed in the Capitol by Benedict XIV. He acquired the name of Raffaellino, from his great veneration for the works of that master, but he never divested himself of the style of P. da Cortona. His other works are in the churches of Naples and Genoa. He died at Milan in 1644.

BOTTANI, GIUSEPPE, was born at Cremona in 1717, but studied at Rome, under Agostino Masucci. He established himself at Mantua, where he gained considerable reputation for painting landscapes, in the style of Gaspar Poussin, into which he introduced figures, in the pleasing manner of C. Maratti. He was made director of the Academy at Mantua. His only work, as a painter of history, worthy of notice, is mentioned by Lanzi, in the church of S. S. Cosmo and Damiano, representing S. Paola taking leave of her Attendants. Its highest claim to merit is, that it is not quite eclipsed by a neighbouring picture, by Pompeo Battoni. He died in 1784.

BOTTICELLI, SANDRO, or ALESSANDRO, an old Florentine painter and engraver, born at Florence in 1437. He passed the early part of his life under a goldsmith, but his love for the art led him to study painting, and he became a disciple of Filippo Lippi. He visited Rome during the pontificate of Sixtus IV., by whom he was greatly patronized, and for whom he executed some considerable works, in the chapel of that pontiff. His principal works at Florence were a Venus Anadyomene, and Venus attired by the Graces; an Assumption, in S. Pietro Maggiore, of which Vasari speaks in the highest terms of commendation. [The picture of the Assumption of the Virgin was painted for Matteo Palmieri, and is now in England. It contains a multitude of figures in the heavens, the Apostles round the tomb from which the Virgin has ascended, and also the figures of Palmieri and his wife kneeling. The landscape exhibits views of Florence and Pistoia. It is worthy of the commendation bestowed on it.] In the Life of Baccio Baldini, it is mentioned, that he engraved nineteen plates of vignettes, from the designs of Sandro Botticelli, for the Inferno of Dante, and Vasari mentions some plates engraved by Botticelli. He also executed a set of twelve plates of Sibyls, and seven of the Planets; a St. Jerome kneeling before a Crucifix, and a St. Sebastian, with the Virgin, inscribed O mater Dei, memento mei, &c. He died in 1515.

BOVADILLA, GERONIMO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Antequera, a small town in the vicinity of Seville, in 1620. According to Palomino, he was a scholar of Francisco Zurbaran, whose manner he followed. He excelled in painting historical subjects, of a medium size, and perspective views. He died in 1680.

BOUCHARD, JOSEPH, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several plates representing buildings and antiquities, which are executed in a neat, finished style.

BOUCHE, MARTIN. This engraver is believed to have been a native of Antwerp, from the inscription on some of his prints. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and was principally employed on portraits. His plates are executed almost wholly with the graver, in a neat but stiff style, and they are not without merit. Among his portraits are:

John Fenwick, a Jesuit, who was executed at Tyburn, 1679.

He engraved several others of the same order, who suffered in England, and represented them with a knife in their breast, indicative of their sufferings.

BOUCHER, FRANCIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1704. He was a scholar of Francis Le Moine, and was the most admired artist of his time among the Parisians. He was appointed first painter to the king, and was favoured with the patronage of the great. Few artists have acquired more reputation during their life-time and met with more flattering encouragement than Boucher. Yet, perhaps, it would be difficult to select one who enjoyed those advantages with less real pretension to admiration, or less legitimate claim to distinction. His merit seems to have been very justly appreciated by an elegant and enlightened critic of his own nation, who appears to have been the first of his countrymen who discovered and exposed the corruptness of his taste, and that of his misguided admirers. "Never," says M. Watelet, "was there an artist that so much misused a brilliant disposition, an extreme facility; never was there a painter who so openly set at nought the truly beautiful, such as it appears in selected nature, such as it was felt and expressed by the sculptors of Greece, and by Raffaëlle; never did any one excite a more general depravity." It will not be denied that he was a perfect master of the mechanism of the art; and if we could be satisfied with mere artificial prettiness, Boucher cannot justly be refused his share of merit. His most successful efforts were his pastoral subjects, but even in them he has been greatly surpassed by his ingenious countryman Watteau. He died at Paris in 1768. We have several slight etchings by Boucher, of which the following are some of the principal:

A small oval plate of the Virgin.

Four of Children playing.

Cupids sporting.

The amiable Villager.

Andromeda.

Twelve of Chinese figures.

Set of twelve figures; after A. Bloemaert.

The Portrait of Watteau.

The Italian troop.

The Player on the Guitar.

La Guinguette.

La Coquette grotesque.

BOUCHER, JOHN. This artist was born at Bourges about the year 1700. He was the elder brother of Francis Boucher, and was also a painter, though of no great celebrity. He etched five plates, among which is the portrait of Anthony Watteau, the painter.

[BOUCHET, LOUIS-ANDRE-GABRIEL, a French historical painter, scholar of David, painted subjects from sacred and profane history, poetry, and portraits. He obtained the first grand prize in 1797, and continued to exhibit until 1819. Gabet does not mention the date of his birth or death.]

BOUCQUET, VICTOR, a Flemish painter, born at Furnes in 1619. He was the son of Mark Boucquet, a painter little known. M. Descamps supposes he must have visited Italy, as his works exhibit a manner that partakes little of the taste of his country. He painted history, and was also esteemed as a portrait painter. His works are distributed in the different churches of the towns in Flanders. They are well composed, and, like most of the artists of his country, are well coloured. In the great church of Newport are two altar-pieces by this master, one of which is particularly admired, representing the Death of St. Francis; and in the town-house there is a large picture by him, considered as his principal work, representing the Judgment of Cambyses. The principal altar-piece in the church at Ostend is by Boucquet: it represents the taking down from the Cross. [He died at Furnes in 1677.]

BOUD, R., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1590. He was principally employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers: among others is a portrait of Henry Goldzius, the painter and engraver, crowned with laurel by Fame. It is executed with the graver, in a stiff, formal style.

[BOUHOT, ETIENNE, an eminent French painter of architectural views, both exterior and interior. His works are numerous, and much esteemed. He obtained many medals from the different places where his works were exhibited. He was born at Bardles-Epoisses (Cote d'Or) in 1780. He was living in 1831.]

BOUJAS, DON JUAN ANTONIO, a Spanish painter, born at Santiago about the year 1672. He was a scholar of Luca Giordano, at Madrid, and proved a very promising artist. The troubles occasioned by the war of the succession obliged him to withdraw himself from Madrid, and he returned to his native city. His principal works are in the churches at Santiago. In the cathedral is a picture of St. Paul and St. Andrew, and in the convent of the Dominicans are two altar-pieces by him. [His name was Bouzas; he died in 1730. He painted easel pictures which bear a resemblance to those of his master.]

[BOUILLARD, JACQUES, a French engraver, born in 1744, was editor of the Collection of the Palais Royal. He engraved classical subjects after Poussin, Caracci, and Guido; also after Le Sueur, Mignard, and Vanloo. He was a member of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and died in 1806.]

BOUILLARD, JOHN, a modern French engraver, who visited England about the year 1795. He did not remain long here, but he published four plates, engraved by himself, after N. Poussin, Le Sueur, and other French painters; among which is Moses treading on the Crown of Pharaoh, after Poussin.

[BOVINET, (ETIENNE?) a good French engraver, who flourished at the commencement of the nineteenth century. His works are after the most eminent Italian, Dutch, and French painters: some are in the "Galerie du Musée Napoleon."]]

BOVINI, FRANCESCO. In the description of the pictures at Ferrara, by C. Barotti, there are mentioned two altar-pieces by this master, in the church of the Oratorio della Penitenza, in that city, one representing the immaculate Conception, the other the Adoration of the Magi.

BOUIS. See BOUVS.

BOULANGER, JOHN. This painter, though a native of France, is better known in Italy than in his own country. He was born at Troyes in 1606, but went to Bologna when he was young, and entered the school of Guido Reni. Under that able instructor he acquired a correct and graceful mode of designing, and a tender and harmonious colouring. His merit recommended him to the protection of the Duke of Modena, who appointed him painter to the court; and he ornamented the ducal palace with several historical pictures, composed and painted in the elegant style of his master. He established a reputable academy at Modena, and had many pupils. He died in 1660.

BOULANGER, MATTHEW. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1680. He is supposed to have been a son of John Boulanger, the engraver. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers, and, among others, is that of Raymundus Vievsens, Med. Doct. It is executed in a stiff, heavy style.

BOULANGER, JOHN, a French engraver, cousin to the preceding artist, born at Troyes in 1613. He seems to have attached himself at first to an imitation of the style of Francis Poilly, but he afterwards took up a mode of engraving which had before been practised by his contemporary, John Morin, but which he greatly improved, of finishing the flesh and naked parts of his figures with dots, instead of strokes, or with a mixture of both, which gave a very soft and mellow effect; but as he finished the draperies and backgrounds with rather a harsh use of the graver, there was a want of union in the effect of his plates. Notwithstanding this defect, his prints have considerable merit, and are justly held in estimation. The following are his principal plates:

BOULLONGNE, LOUIS, the elder, a French painter, born at Paris in 1609. He painted history, and was professor of the Academy, and painter to the king. His principal works are in the church of Our Lady at Paris, where he has painted the Miracle of St. Paul at Ephesus, the Martyrdom of St. Paul, and the Presentation in the Temple. He died at Paris in 1674. He etched three plates, two from his own designs, and the other from Guido, viz.

The Miracle of St. Paul at Ephesus.
 The Martyrdom of St. Paul.
 The Rape of Helen; after Guido.

BOULLONGNE, BON, was the elder son of Louis Boullongne, born at Paris in 1640. [Zani and other writers say in 1649.] He was instructed by his father, and having painted a picture of St. John, which gained him the prize at the Academy, he was sent to Rome for improvement, under the pension of the king, where he remained five years. He afterwards visited Lombardy, and passed some time studying the works of Coreggio and the Caracci. On his return to Paris, he was a candidate for a seat in the Academy, which he obtained in 1677, and painted for his picture of reception, Hercules combating the Lapithæ. Louis XIV. took him into favour, and employed him to paint the staircase at Versailles, under the direction of Charles le Brun. In 1702, he painted in fresco the cupola of the chapel of St. Jerome, in the church of the Invalids. One of his best works is the Resurrection of Lazarus, in the church of the Carthusians. At Versailles he painted Venus and Cupid, and Bacchus and Silenus; and in the palace of Trianon, Juno and Flora, and the Toilet of Venus. He possessed a particular talent of painting, what the Italians call Pastici, or imitations of the style of other masters, without the servility of copies. He died at Paris in 1717. We have a few etchings by this painter.

The Holy Family.
 St. John preaching in the Wilderness.
 St. Bruno.
 Frontispiece for an Almanack; dated 1694.
 A satirical print against the Author of the Mercure Galant; inscribed, Ah ha, galant, vous raisonnez en ignorant.

BOULLONGNE, LOUIS, the younger, was the younger son of Louis Boullongne, and received his instruction from his father. He was one of the most assiduous students of the Academy, and gained the prize for painting when he was eighteen, and was consequently sent to Rome, under the pension of the king, in 1675. He returned to Paris in 1680, and the following year he was received into the Academy; his reception picture was Augustus ordering the Temple of Janus to be shut. Having been appointed painter to Louis XIV., he was employed at Fontainebleau, and in the chateau of Meudon. In the church of Our Lady, at Paris, there are two fine pictures by him, the Purification, and the Flight into Egypt. The works of this painter show that he had profited more by his residence at Rome, than has been usual with the artists of his nation. There is a fine character in his heads, his drawing is correct, and his colour is more vigorous than is generally found in the artists of the French school. He died at Paris in 1734, [in 1733, Zani.] We have the following etchings by him :

The Holy Family, the infant Jesus holding a Bird with a String.

The Holy Family, with St. John.

The Dead Christ, with the Marys and Disciples.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter.

The Martyrdom of St. Paul.

The Flagellation of St. Andrew; after P. Veronese.

St. Bruno.

The Roman Charity.

BOULONNOIS, ESME DE, an engraver, from his name apparently a Frenchman. He was a print-seller, and lived about the middle of the sixteenth century. The prints we have by him are principally portraits, and are entirely worked with the graver, in a neat stiff style. Among others, we have the following portraits :

Christophorus Plantinus Turonensis.

Georgius Buchananus; Esme de Boulonnois, fec.

Lady Jane Grey.

Hans Holbein, painter.

Anthony More, painter.

[BOUMAN, P., a landscape painter, born at Dort in 1764 or 5, painted Views in the neighbourhood of Haerlem, Waterfalls, Winter Scenes, and similar subjects, now so prevalent with the modern Dutch artists. His works are deservedly held in estimation.]

[BOUNIEU, MICHEL-HONORÉ, a French painter of history, was born at Marseilles in 1740, and died at Paris in 1814. His subjects are from sacred and profane history, poetry, and fable. He was keeper of the prints at the Bibliotheque Nationale, and for twenty years professor of design at the school "des Ponts-et-Chaussées."]

BOUNIEU, NICHOLAS, a modern French painter and engraver, born at Marseilles in 1744. He was a pupil of M. Pierre, and was made a member of the Academy at Paris in 1775. Of his works as a painter little is known in this country. As an engraver, he scraped a few mezzotintos, subjects from his own designs, among which are the following :

Adam and Eve driven from Paradise.

Magdalen, Penitent.

Love led by Folly.

The Punishment of a Vestal.

An Allegory on the Birth of the Dauphin.

The Green-house of the Thuilleries.

The Amusement of the Sultan.

BOURDON, PETER, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1703. He engraved a set of plates from his own designs, representing ornaments with figures for goldsmiths and jewellers. They are very neatly executed with the graver, and are inscribed Petrus Bourdon, inv. et fecit.

BOURDON, SEBASTIAN. This eminent painter and engraver was born at Montpellier in 1616. His father was a painter on glass, from whom he learned the first principles of design. When a boy, his uncle conducted him to Paris, where, after studying four years under a painter of little celebrity, at the age of eighteen he went to Italy, and whilst at Rome formed an acquaintance with Andrea Sacchi and Claude Lorraine, whose friendship and instruction he experienced. He is said to have possessed so retentive a memory, that he could copy from recollection a picture that he had once seen. After studying three years at Rome, he went to Venice, where he was particularly attentive to the works of Titian, especially his landscapes, and he adopted the style of that great master, in the excellent works he produced in that way. On his return to Paris, one of his first public productions was his celebrated picture of the Crucifixion of St. Peter in the church of our Lady, which has always been regarded as his most capital work. The reputation this picture procured him brought him into great employment, when his career was interrupted by the civil war of the fronde; and in 1652 he quitted France, and went to Sweden, where he was very graciously received by the Queen Christina, who appointed him her principal painter. He executed several considerable works in Sweden; but the queen having resolved to abdicate the throne, and retire to Rome, and tranquillity being in some degree restored in France, he returned to Paris, where he met with immediate employment. It was at this time that he painted his esteemed picture of the taking down from the Cross, for the church of St. Benedict, and his Martyrdom of St. Protas, for the church of St. Gervais. Bourdon possessed great fecundity of genius, and an uncommon facility. It is to be regretted, that his design is not more correct. He also painted portraits and landscapes. In the latter he particularly excelled; and he appears to have built his style on the landscapes of Titian and Poussin, partaking of the manner of both. As an engraver, he is worthy of particular notice. We have by him a number of plates of various subjects, from his own designs, etched in a free and masterly style, conveying a perfect idea of his manner of painting. His lights and shadows are conducted with great intelligence, and the back-grounds are uncommonly picturesque. His prints are highly esteemed by the judicious collector. The following are the principal :

Jacob returning to his Country in the absence of Laban.

Rebecca meeting the Servant of Abraham.

The Ark sent back by the Philistines to the Beth-shemites; scarce.

The Annunciation.

The Angel appearing to the Shepherds.

Six of the Flight into Egypt, and the Return from thence.

The Holy Family reposing, the infant Jesus feeding a Lamb.

The Holy Family, St. John holding the Foot of the Lamb.

The Holy Family, called the Washerwoman.

The Baptism of the Eunuch.

Christ healing the Sick.

The merciful Samaritan.

A Peasant Woman giving Drink to a Child.

The Fortuneteller.

The Five Senses; five plates.

A set of fourteen subjects, representing the liberal Arts and the Virtues; dedicated to M. Colbert; ovals and octagons.

A set of six large Landscapes; very fine.

A set of six smaller Landscapes; very fine.

Two grand Landscapes; inscribed S. Bourdon, inv., scul., et exc.

The Seven Works of Mercy; dedicated to M. Colbert.

This distinguished artist died at Paris in 1671. [The French writers differ in their accounts of this artist. They place his birth in 1605, 1606, and 1619; and his death in 1662, 1671, and 1673.]

BOURG, LOUIS FABRICIUS, DU, a Dutch engraver, by whom we have some pretty vignettes, and other small compositions, neatly engraved in the style of Bernard Picart.

[BOURGEOIS, CONSTANT, a French landscape painter, engraver, and lithographer. He was living in 1809. Landon mentions him as an artist distinguished for the richness of his compositions and the purity of his style, and describes three of his pictures as being in the manner of G. Poussin.]

BOURGEOIS, SIR FRANCIS. The family of this ingenious artist was originally of Berne, in Switzerland. He was born in London in 1756, and was intended by his father for the profession of arms, to which he was induced by the friendship entertained for the family by the late Lord Heathfield, who offered to procure for his son a commission in the army. He had received some instruction in the rudiments of design from an obscure painter of horses; and though he was not insensible to ideas of martial glory, they were not sufficiently powerful to change the natural bent of his genius; he was a constant attendant at all military evolutions and reviews, but it was rather for the purpose of representing the manœuvres he witnessed with his pencil, than of acquiring a knowledge of military tactics. Some of his juvenile attempts having been shown to Sir Joshua Reynolds and Mr. Gainsborough, those distinguished artists encouraged him to persevere in his pursuit, and their approbation fixed him in a resolution to relinquish all thoughts of a military life, and to devote his attention entirely to the cultivation of an art to which the bias of his genius seemed irresistibly to direct him.

The talents of Mr. Louthembourg were at that time in the zenith of their power, and a congeniality of taste directed Mr. Bourgeois to that celebrated painter as an eligible preceptor, and he readily consented to take him under his tuition. He remained under the instruction of Mr. Louthembourg a sufficient time to acquire a correct knowledge of the true principles of painting, when he resolved to prosecute his studies in the great school of nature, and in contemplating the works of the most eminent masters.

He had scarcely reached the nineteenth year of his age, when he had acquired considerable reputation as a painter of landscapes, battles, and sea-pieces, which were considered as uncommon productions for so young an artist, and as certain indications of future excellence.

In 1776, Mr. Bourgeois set out on a tour through the Netherlands, France, and Italy, and studied with indefatigable assiduity the works of the most celebrated masters of the different schools. When he returned from the continent, he continued the exercise of his talents with increased ardour and reputation, and his exhibitions in the Royal Academy added considerably to the number of his admirers.

When the Prince Primate, brother to the unfortunate Stanislaus Augustus, king of Poland, visited this country, he was particularly pleased with the works of Mr. Bourgeois, and he made him the most flattering offers to induce him to return with him to Poland, which were gratefully acknowledged, though they were politely declined. In 1791, he was appointed painter to the king of Poland, who also conferred on him the honour of a Knight of the Order of Merit, on which occasion he was introduced at our court, and his Majesty was pleased to confirm the title. Sir Francis was elected a royal academician in 1792, and in 1794 was appointed landscape painter to the king.

Sir Francis Bourgeois was the intimate friend of Mr. Desenfans, and devoted great part of his time and attention to assisting that gentleman with his judgment, in the formation of his extensive collection of pictures, which, with a considerable property, were left to him at the death of Mr. Desenfans. He did not survive the liberality of his friend many years, and died in 1811. The valuable assemblage of paintings which he inherited from Mr. Desenfans, he bequeathed to Dulwich College.

The number of his pictures is considerable, and many of them possess distinguished merit. It is however to be regretted, that his various pursuits did not allow his powers to take that extensive range for which they were evidently sufficiently qualified; and in several of his productions a slight and hasty finishing is observable, which diminishes the admiration we should otherwise feel for the ingenuity of his compositions, and the facility of his execution. [Sir Francis Bourgeois was considered as a good painter of the English school in his day; but now his pictures are looked at with indifference.]

BOURLIER, FRANCIS, a French painter, who, according to Basan, etched some plates from his own designs, and after Giulo Romano, and other masters, among which is Moses saved from the Nile, after F. Perrier.

BOUT, FRANCIS, and N. BOUDEWYNS. These painters were natives of Brussels, and flourished about the year 1700. They are joined in one article, as they almost constantly painted in conjunction. At least, the landscapes by Boudewyns are always decorated with the figures of Bout, although the latter sometimes painted pictures entirely of his own composition, representing winter-pieces, and views of the sea-strand, with a number of small figures neatly drawn. The landscapes of Boudewyns are generally views of the country-houses of the nobility in Flanders, with the adjacent scenery, into which Bout introduced figures representing gallant assemblies and merry-makings. The works of these united artists are much esteemed in their own country; and some of their best works have been admitted into the collections in England, where they are however more justly appreciated. [The first named should be Peter Baut, and not Francis Bout; it is uncertain whether the second should be Nicolas or Francis, for he is called by each, or both. The landscapes by Boudewyns are much in the manner of Breughel; there is great truth in the figures by Baut.] Francis Bout has etched a few plates in a slight painter-like manner, which are as follow:

Four Winter Scenes, with Skaters, and a variety of figures.

Two, a Landscape, with a Statue of Neptune, and a View of the Sea-strand in Winter, with a Fish-market.

Two, the Bride conducted to Church; and a Country Market.

BOUTATS, FREDERICK, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1620. He engraved several plates after his own designs, principally portraits, and some after other masters. They are worked with the graver, in a neat style, and are not without merit. We have by him, among others, the following:

PORTRAITS, ETC.

Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy.
 Charles Gaspar, Elector of Treves.
 Queen Christina of Sweden.
 Oliver Cromwell, Protector.
 Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg.
 John George, Elector of Saxony.
 John Baptist Heil, portrait painter; se ipse pinx.
 Daniel van Heil, landscape painter; J. B. van Heil, pinx.
 Leo van Heil, architect; same painter.
 David Ryckaert, painter; se ipse pinx.
 The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John; dated 1655.
 Cavaliers and Ladies playing at Cards; F. Boutats, fecit

BOUTATS, GASPARD, was the younger brother of Frederick Boutats, born at Antwerp about the year 1625. He engraved chiefly for the booksellers, and some few plates after different masters. They are principally etched, and some finished with the graver. The following are by him:

Frontispiece for the Psalms of St. Augustine; Gaspar Boutats, fec.
 The Massacre of St. Bartholomew.
 The Assassination of Henry IV.
 The Decollation of Count Nadasti, Count Corini, and Marquis Francipani.
 A Sutler's Tent; after Ph. Wowermans.

He also etched the plates for a folio volume of Views of Jerusalem, and the surrounding country; after the designs of John Peters.

BOUTATS, GERARD. This engraver was the youngest brother of Frederick Boutats, born at Antwerp about the year 1630. He settled at Vienna, where he was appointed engraver to the University. His prints are chiefly portraits. The following are his principal plates:

Adamus Munds, physician. 1657.
 Antonius d'Aumont.
 Charles Joseph, Archduke of Austria.
 Don Pedro, King of Portugal.
 The Resurrection; Gerard Boutats, scul.; Vienna.

BOUTATS, PHILIBERT, a Flemish engraver, the son of Frederick Boutats, born at Antwerp about the year 1650. His prints consist chiefly of portraits, and are rather neatly engraved. The following are by him:

PORTRAITS.

Pope Innocent XI.
 The Dauphin, Son of Louis XIV.; oval.
 Mary Antonia Victoria, of Bavaria, Dauphiness.
 Elizabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans.
 William Henry, Prince of Orange.
 Christian V., King of Denmark.
 Herman Werner, Bishop of Paderborn.
 John Sobieski, King of Poland; Philibert Boutats, sc.
 Thesis, with the Portrait of the Bishop of Munster.

BOUYS, or BOYS, ANDREW, a French painter and engraver, born in Provence about the year 1680. He was a scholar of Francis de Troy, and practised portrait painting at Paris. He also engraved several portraits in mezzotint, among which are the following:

Andrew Boys and his Wife.
 Francis de Troy, painter.
 Claude Gros, de Boze; And. Boys, pinx. ad vivum, et sc.
 1708.
 Francis René, Marquis de Bellay; Boys, pinx. et scul.
 John Baptist Massillon, Bishop of Clermont; Boys, fec.
 De Marais, famous musician.

BOWER, EDWARD, an English portrait painter in the reign of Charles I. He painted the likenesses of John Pym, General Fairfax, and Lord John Fairfax; the two last were engraved by Hollar.

BOWLES, THOMAS, an English engraver, born in London about the year 1712. He published a set of thirty views of the public edifices in and near London, of which some of the plates were engraved by himself, the others by Foudriniere, Vivares, &c., among which are:

A View of London from the Thames. 1751.
 Somerset House. 1753.
 Greenwich Hospital. 1745.
 The Rotunda at Ranelagh. 1751.
 The Royal Exchange.
 St. Mary-le-Bow.

BOXBERGER, M., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1570. He engraved some plates of historical and devout subjects, which are neatly finished, but in a stiff, formal style.

BOYCE, SAMUEL. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of Edward Russell, Earl of Orford. He died in 1775.

BOYDELL, JOHN. This estimable character, whose enterprising exertions have been so beneficial to the arts in this country, claims a place in a publication of this nature, independent of his merit as an engraver. Mr. Boydell was born at Dorrington in 1719. He was the son of a land-surveyor, who brought him up to his own profession, which he followed, under his father, until he reached the age of twenty, when he accidentally met with Baddeley's views of different country-seats in England, some of which were engraved by Mr. Toms, particularly one of Hawarden Castle, which appeared to young Boydell so exact a representation of a place with which he was well acquainted, that he determined to learn the art of engraving. With this resolution he came to London, when he was twenty-one years of age, and bound himself a pupil to Mr. Toms, the engraver of the plate he had so much admired. Under that artist he applied himself with great assiduity for six years. On leaving his instructor, his first publication was a set of six views near London, which, on account of there being a bridge in each of them, was called the bridge-book. He afterwards engraved many plates of views in England and Wales, which, with others, he published in one volume, at the price of five guineas. This publication may be regarded as the basis on which he raised the structure of his future eminence, and, as he used himself to express it, was the first book that ever made a lord mayor of London. By the profits of this work he was enabled to commence that encouragement to young artists which he afterwards carried to so laudable an extent. The art of engraving was at that time at a very low ebb in England; and the collectors of prints were in the habit of receiving them from abroad. It may be very justly attributed to the zealous and persevering industry of Mr. Boydell, that it was carried to such perfection, as to occasion the works of British engravers to be sought after through every part of Europe, and produced a considerable branch of commerce in objects which had previously been imported from the continent. The distinguished success which crowned the labours of this extraordinary man in the promotion of engraving, served only to excite him to further projects for the advancement of the arts; and he formed an extensive and liberal plan for the encouragement of painting, in his prodigious undertaking of the illustration of Shakspeare, with prints engraved from pictures painted by the most eminent English artists. A project of such magnitude, that it appears almost incredible that it could have been carried into effect by an individual. It is said to have been Mr. Boydell's intention to have bequeathed the Shakspeare Gallery to the public, but the disastrous consequences of the French Revolution, which operated very prejudicially to Mr. Boydell's extensive concerns, made it necessary for him to apply to parliament to dispose of it by lottery. In 1774 he was elected alderman of his ward, and in 1791 served the high office of lord mayor, with great respectability. Mr. Boydell lived to the advanced age of 86, respected and revered by all that knew him. He died in 1804.

[BOYDELL, JOSIAH, nephew of John Boydell, painted a few pictures for the edition of Shakspeare published by his uncle, which were but feebly executed. He was born in 1750, and died in 1817.]

BOYER, JOHN BAPTIST, MARQUIS D'AIGUILLES, a French nobleman, who was procurator-general of the parliament of Aix, in Provence. His love of the arts led him into an intimacy with the principal artists of his time, particularly with Puget, the celebrated sculptor, with whom he went to Italy, and formed a large collection of pictures, sculpture, &c., of which he published the prints in two volumes; six of the plates were engraved by himself. He also amused himself with painting, for which he is said to have had an excellent taste. Some of his plates are executed with the graver, the others scraped in mezzotinto. Among others we have by him:

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after A. del Sarto; with the graver.

Two figures of Christ; on one plate; the same.

Two Landscapes; after Breccourt; the same.

St. John Baptist; after Manfredi; mezzotinto.

Bust of a Man; the same.

BOYERMANS, or BOEYERMANS, THEODORE. This eminent painter has escaped the notice of the biographers of the Flemish artists, although his works, which are found in many of the churches in the Netherlands, have long been the objects of universal admiration. He was a native of Antwerp, and was brought up in the school of Rubens, whose splendid style he followed with great success, and distinguished himself by a correctness of design, and a delicacy and suavity of colouring, which have occasioned his works to be frequently mistaken for the productions of Vandyck. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, and he possessed an intelligent acquaintance with the principles of the chiaro-scuro. Among his numerous works in the public edifices in Flanders and Brabant, the following are deserving of particular notice. In the church of St. James, at Antwerp, is an admirable picture of the Assumption of the Virgin; and in the convent of the Jacobins, the Decollation of St. John. At Mechlin, in the church of St. Peter, an altar-piece of the Virgin interceding for the persons afflicted with the plague; and in the Jesuits' church, at Ipres, is a picture which is regarded as his masterpiece, representing St. Francis Xavier converting an Indian prince. [He was living in 1660.]

BRACELLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Genoa. He was a scholar of Gio Batista Paggi, and painted history in the style of his master. He engraved the plates for an architectural work, published at Rome, by Giacomo Borozzio. They are executed in a neat stiff style. He died young, in 1609.

BRACCIONI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1698. He was first a scholar of Giacomo Parolini, but afterwards went to Bologna, and studied under Giuseppe Crespi. On his return to Ferrara he was employed in painting for some of the churches and convents. In the oratory of the Theatins is an altar-piece by this master, representing the Annunciation; and in the church of St. Catherine there are two pictures, one the Flagellation, and the other Christ crowned with Thorns. According to Barotti, these are his best works. He died at Ferrara in 1762.

BRADEL, JOHN BAPTIST, a modern French engraver, born at Paris about 1750. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, which are executed in a neat style. We have the following plates by him:

PORTRAITS, ETC.

Pope Benedict XIV.

Pope Clement XIV.

Madam Louisa, of France.

Louis Francis Gabriel de la Motte, Bishop of Amiens.

General Paoli.

Prosper John de Crebillon.

John Bart, Admiral.

The Chevalier d'Eon.

An allegorical subject; inscribed Trinus et unus.

A Boy playing on the Tambour de Basque.

BRAED, NICHOLAS, a Dutch engraver, who flourished from the year 1600 till about the year 1630. He engraved several plates from the designs of Henry Goltzius and James Matham. His name is also affixed to a small upright plate, representing Christ before Pilate, after Tintoretto.

BRAKENBURG, RENIER, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1649. He was first instructed in the art by Mommers, a landscape painter, but he afterwards became a scholar of Bernard Schendel, whose style was more suited to his genius. He painted similar subjects to those of his master, representing merry-makings and drunken assemblies. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and well coloured, something in the manner of Adrian Ostade, though greatly inferior. They are painted with facility, although they have the appearance of being very highly finished; and he perfectly understood the management of the chiaro-scuro. His greatest defect is his incorrect drawing of the figure, which he appears not to have studied from nature, but from a vitiated manner. [He was born in 1650, at Haerlem, and died at the same place in 1702.]

BRAMANTE. See LAZZARI.

BRAMBILLA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Piedmont, and flourished about the year 1770. He was a scholar of Cavaliere Carlo Delfino, and acquired no mean reputation as a painter of history. There are some of his works in the churches at Turin, of which the most worthy of notice is a picture of the Martyrdom of S. Dalmazio, in the church dedicated to that saint.

BRAMBINI, AMBROGIO. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1580. Among other works he engraved a large plate, entitled, Benedizione del Pontefi, ce nella Piazza di S. Pietro. The composition consists of a great number of figures, and it is executed in a slight style, somewhat resembling that of A. Tempesta. It is from a design of C. Duchetti, and is inscribed Ambrosius Bram, F.

BRAMER, LEONARD, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1596. It is not known under whom he studied; but he went to Italy when he was young, where he passed the greater part of his life. His works were highly esteemed at Florence and at Venice, where he chiefly resided. He painted historical subjects of a small size, which he ornamented with vases of gold and silver, imitated with a precision bordering on servility. His pencil is however light and spirited, and he was a perfect master of the chiaro-scuro. Two of his most esteemed pictures are, Peter denying Christ, and the Resurrection of Lazarus. He also excelled in painting night-pieces with towns on fire, and caverns with the light coming from above, in the manner of Rembrandt, which has led persons, unacquainted with the time in which he lived, to suppose he was a scholar of that master. Towards the latter part of his life he returned to Holland, and died at Delft, but it is not said in what year. [Not only the persons unacquainted with the times in which he lived, have fallen into the mistake that Bramer was a scholar of Rembrandt, but his biographers have inconsiderately asserted the same. Bramer was born ten years before Rembrandt, and spent the greater part of his life in France and Italy.]

BRAND, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Vienna in 1723. He acquired great celebrity in Germany as a landscape painter, and was made professor of the Imperial Academy at Vienna in 1770. He etched several plates of landscapes, in a spirited style, among which are the following :

Eighteen of Landscapes, Heads, and Animals; numbered and inscribed with his name, John Christian Brand, 1786.

Four Landscapes, with Peasants.

Six other Landscapes, engraved in a different manner.

BRAND, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS. This artist was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Vienna in 1730, and was a member of the Imperial Academy. He painted several historical subjects and landscapes, which are favourably spoken of by the German authors. He engraved some plates, both with the point and with the graver; in the use of the latter he was instructed by Schmutzer. Among others, we have the following by him :

The Breakfast; after Torenolet, F. Brand, fec.

A View near Nuisdorf.

View of the Garden of Schoenbrunn.

Banditti attacking a Carriage.

The Entrance to the Town of Crems.

BRANDEL, PETER, a German painter, born at Prague in 1660. [According to Nagler, he was born in 1668.] He was a scholar of John Schroeter, and in four years surpassed his master. He gave proof of his ability in many pictures painted for the churches and other public edifices at Prague and Breslau. This painter is said to have possessed great readiness of invention, and had acquired an uncommon facility. He died at Kuttenberg in 1739, aged 79.

BRANDENBERG, JOHN. This painter was born at Zug, in Switzerland, in 1660. He was the son of Thomas Brandenburg, a painter little known, by whom he was instructed in the art. On the death of his father he was taken under the protection of the Count of Ferrari, who took him to Mantua, where he was so struck with the fine works of Giulio Romano, that he applied himself with great diligence in studying and copying them. On his return to his native country, he gave convincing proof of the advantage his travels and study had been to him, in several pictures he painted for the churches and convents of the different towns in Switzerland. He painted some pastoral subjects in fresco on the ceiling of the concert-room at Zurich. His historical pictures are well composed, correctly drawn, and vigorously coloured. He also painted some battle-pieces, which were much admired. He died in 1729.

BRANDI, GIACINTO. This painter was born at Poli, near Rome, in 1623. He was first a scholar of Giov. Giacomo Sementi, of Bologna; but he afterwards studied under Lanfranco. In the early part of his life he painted some admirable pictures in the style of that master, but from his love of pleasure and expense, he was frequently obliged to finish his works in a negligent way, for the sake of despatch. In his best pictures we find a great style of composition, a firm and free handling, a fine character in his heads, and even a vigorous colour. This is not however the case with the majority of his pictures, which are frequently feeble in effect and incorrect in design. He was head of the Academy of St. Luke, and was made a knight of the order of Christ. His principal works at Rome are, the Assumption of the Virgin, with St. John Baptist, St. Silvester, and other Saints, painted in the vault of S. Silvestro. At the principal altar of the church of Gesu e Maria al Corso, the Crowning of the Virgin. The vault of the church of S. Carlo al Corso, representing the Fall of Lucifer. In the church of S. Rocco, St. Roch giving the Sacrament to the Pestiferous. He died at Rome in 1691.

BRANDMULLER, GREGORY, an eminent Swiss painter, born at Basle in 1661. He was the son of a member of the council, and his father possessing a collection of drawings and prints, Brandmuller evinced an early inclination for the art by copying some of them, and he was placed under the tuition of an obscure painter named Gaspar Meyer. When he was seventeen years of age he was sent to Paris, and had the advantage of studying under Le Brun, who found sufficient ability in his pupil to intrust him to paint from his designs, in the works he was then engaged in at Versailles, which he accomplished to the entire satisfaction of his master. On his return to Switzerland, he was invited to the courts of Wirtemberg and Baden Dourlach, where he met with great encouragement. His genius was equal to the composition of grand historical subjects, which he treated with nobleness, and painted with great spirit and fire. One of his most esteemed works is a Descent from the Cross, in the church of the Capuchins at Dornach. He also excelled in portrait painting, which he rendered more than usually interesting by the introduction of analogous and historical attributes. This artist is regarded in Germany as one of the ablest painters of his time; and probably would have left behind him a still more brilliant reputation, if his talents had been permitted a longer career, but he died at the age of 30, in 1691.

[BRANDT, ALBERT JONAS, born at Amsterdam in 1788, was a scholar of J. E. Morel, after whose death, in 1808, he passed two years with G. J. J. van Os. He painted dead game, fruit, and flowers. His works are deservedly esteemed. There is a vase of flowers by him in the Museum at Amsterdam, where he died in 1821.]

BRANDT, R., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. His name is affixed to a middling-sized upright plate, from his own design, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Joseph and an Angel. It is etched in a style resembling that of Benedetto Castiglione, but the drawing is incorrect.

[BRANT, N., born at the Hague, was a pupil of G. Netscher, and showed great talent in the manner of his master, but died in the flower of his age.]

[BRAUWERE, PASCHATIUS DE, an engraver of whom little is known. Brulliot describes the only etching known by him; it is, he says, in the manner of Guido, and represents the executioner placing the head of John Baptist in a plate held by the servant of Herodias; these two figures occupy the foreground, and Herodias is behind them speaking to the servant. In the margin is the dedication of Paschatus de Brawwere to Lambert Vossio, under which is seen P. D. B. inv. et incidit, 1631. Brulliot expresses his astonishment that no writer has mentioned this artist.]

BRAY, JACOB DE, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem about the year 1625. He was the son of Solomon de Bray, an obscure portrait painter, by whom he was instructed. Van Mander mentions him as a reputable painter of history, and extols a picture by him at Amsterdam, representing David playing on his Harp, with a number of Priests and Levites. He excelled in drawing on paper with black and red chalk, and his works of that description were much esteemed by the collectors. There is a small wooden cut of the portrait of his father, Solomon de Bray, by this artist; it is very spiritedly executed, and is dated in 1664. He died in 1680, aged 55. [Writers differ so much respecting the dates in the lives of this artist and his son, of the same name, that it is not safe to rest on the accuracy of what is herein stated on those points.]

BREA, LODOVICO. This painter was a native of Nizza in the Genoese state, and flourished about 1500. There are some of his works still to be seen in the churches at Genoa, which have remained nearly as fresh as when they were first painted. In S. Agostino is one of his best works, representing the Murder of the Innocents. His pictures are generally signed with his name, and are dated from 1483 to 1513. According to Soprani, his works are well composed for the time, and his figures tolerably drawn and gracefully turned. His talent was chiefly confined to small pictures.

BREBES, J. B., a French engraver, who executed some plates in a neat style for the work entitled Les Edifices de Rome, after the designs of Ant. Desgodetz, published in 1682. He also engraved some plates after Seb. Bourdon, and other painters, but they are very indifferent.

BREBIETTE, PETER, a French painter and engraver, born at Mante on the Seine in 1596. He is said to have been a painter of some celebrity, but his works in painting are little known in this country. As an engraver, he is entitled to a more particular notice. He was possessed of an inventive genius, and has engraved several plates from his own designs, which are composed in a very agreeable style, and etched in a spirited and masterly manner. He also engraved several plates after other masters. He marked his prints with the letters PB.

in a heart, thus . The following are his principal works:

BREDA, ALEXANDER VAN. This artist was a native of Antwerp. He painted Italian views, fairs, markets with figures and cattle, which were held in some estimation at his time. He lived about the year 1700, and was father to the following artist, who surpassed him.

BREDA, JOHN VAN, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1683, and was instructed in the art by his father. He attached himself to study and copy the works of Philip Wowermans, and was the most successful of his imitators. He visited England with Rysbrack the sculptor, where his pictures became in vogue, and after a residence of a few years, he returned to Flanders amply remunerated for his labours. When Louis XV. made his entry into Antwerp in 1746, he was pleased with the works of this artist, and ordered four of them to be purchased for him; and the example was followed by many of the attendant courtiers, who engaged all the pictures he could finish, which were liberally paid. The works of this painter have little claim to originality, being entirely composed and painted in undisguised imitation of Wowermans, but he never came near his model, either in the purity of his colour, or the exquisite touch of his pencil. His skies and distances are as blue as the admirers of gaudiness can wish them. He died at Antwerp in 1750.

BREDAEL, PETER VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1630. It is not said under whom he learned the art, but he imitated the works of John Breughel, in whose style he painted small landscapes, with figures neatly touched, and well coloured. He passed some time in Spain, where his pictures were much admired. From the objects he introduced into his landscapes, it is very probable he had been in Italy, as they represent the ruins of architecture in the environs of Rome. In 1689 he was made director of the Academy at Antwerp, in which city he died, but it is not known in what year.

[BREE, MATTHEW IGNATIUS VAN, born at Antwerp in 1773, was instructed by W. Schaeken; he afterwards went to Paris. He painted numerous historical pictures, some of which are of large dimensions, and obtained a high reputation in Flanders. His conceptions are frequently poetical, and his compositions graceful, delineated with a light, free, and spirited pencil; but his colouring is rather too florid in some instances. He was first professor at the Academy of Fine Arts at Antwerp, and member of several other scientific establishments. He brought forward some of the most eminent of the living Flemish painters, among which are Wappers, De Keyser, F. Brackeleer, and others of which their country is justly proud. Van Bree died at Antwerp, the 15th of December, 1839.]

[BREE, PHILIPPE JACQUES VAN, scholar of his brother Matthew, was born at Antwerp in 1786. He studied at Antwerp, at Paris, and at Rome. He employed himself on historical, fancy, and architectural subjects. Of the last, the Belgian government purchased his View of the Interior of the Church of St. Peter at Rome, and presented him with a gold medal in addition to the price. He died at Antwerp in 1840.]

BREEMBERG, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1620. His natural disposition led him to study with great assiduity, and he was ranked among the most promising artists of his country, before his departure for Italy, where he lived the greatest part of his life. The environs of Rome are so many living pictures for the contemplation of the artist; and the beautiful sites of Albano, Frascati, and Tivoli, are naturally the haunts of the intelligent landscape painter. This delightful scenery furnished the subjects of his pictures, which he decorated with figures, generally representing some subject of history. There is an elevated style in the arrangement of his works, and he seems to have inhaled the taste of Italy with the atmosphere he breathed. His pictures have nothing of the characteristic vulgarity of his country. His best works are small; when he attempted a larger scale, he is less successful. There is great suavity in his colouring, and his pencil is precious and delicate. He is believed to have died in Italy in 1660, aged 40. Breemberg has etched several plates from his own designs, with great spirit and intelligence; they are highly esteemed, and good impressions of them are now scarce. He usually marked his plates with the initials of his name, with an F. for fecit, thus, B. B. F. One of his plates is marked with the cipher B. We have by him:

Twenty-four of Landscapes, with Ruins, Figures, and Animals; inscribed Verscheiden versfallen Gebowden, with his portrait.

Another set of twelve; entitled Antiquities of Rome.

A Landscape; marked with the above-mentioned cipher. Joseph delivering Corn in Egypt; inscribed Erat James, &c.; B. B. F.

The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; same mark.

[His name is sometimes found on his pictures, B. Breenberg. Zani says he died in 1663.]

BREEN, GIBBERT, or CLAES VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat manner, resembling the style of James de Gheyn, but inferior in every respect, though not without considerable merit. We have the following plates by him:

The Portrait of James I., with the Queen and Prince of Wales.

Six, of subjects, of the Lives of young Libertines; C. V. Breen, f.

A Woman carrying a Basket of Eggs to Market, with a Man with a Basket of Fowls; after Claus Cook.

A Man and Woman walking, followed by a figure of Envy; after the same.

An Ass that is washed, recompenses the trouble by kicking and biting; C. van Mander, pinx. G. v. Breen, sc.

Two young married Persons dissipating their Dower; the same.

The Companion, representing them reduced to Misery; the same.

A Concert; after Sbrassen.

BREGEON, ANGELICA. According to Basan, this ingenious lady was the wife of John Baptist Tillart, a French engraver. She executed some plates with the point and graver, among which is a print representing a Youth drawing, after Carlo Vanloo.

BREKELENKAMP, QUIRINUS, a Dutch painter, who flourished about the year 1650. He was a scholar of Gerard Douw, though he did not attach himself to the high finishing of that master, but adopted a style formed on a mixture of the manner of Douw with that of Rembrandt. His pictures represent the interior of Dutch cottages, with figures. There is a very natural expression in the airs of his heads, his touch is light and spirited, and he was well acquainted with the principles of the chiaroscuro. His works are found in the choicest collections in Holland, and are held in considerable estimation in this country.

BREMENDEN, D. V., an engraver of little notoriety. He worked with the graver in a neat but tasteless style. There is a small plate by him of Ladies and Gentlemen at an Entertainment, after de Væger; and he engraved some plates after A. Vander Venne.

BRENTANA, SIMONE. This painter was born at Venice in 1656, but resided principally at Verona. He formed his style by an assiduous study of the works of Giacomo Robusti, called Tintoretto, whose bold and vigorous manner he preferred to more finished and laboured productions. To the fire of Tintoretto he added something of the dignity of the Roman school. Few of his pictures are in private collections, being chiefly employed by the sovereigns of his time, and for the churches. One of his finest pictures is the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian crowned by an Angel, in the church dedicated to that saint.

BRENTEL, FREDERICK, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1608. His principal work is a set of plates for a book published at Nancy in 1608, entitled The pompous Parade at the Funeral of Charles III., Duke of Lorraine. They are from his own designs, and are etched in a slight, spirited style. [Frederick Brentel, a miniature painter and engraver, was born at Strasbourg in 1590, and died at the age of 61. His works have been attributed to Francis Brun, who flourished from 1550 to 1563, as appears by the dates on his prints. The prints of Brendel are etched with a very light point; and his monogram is found on a series of landscapes ornamented with historical subjects and rich borders, and have the dates 1617 and 1619. There are proofs of these borders without the landscapes and figures.]

BRESANG, HANS, or JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1513. Mr. Strutt has been led into an error in stating that this engraver lived in 1619, as will be seen by the dates of his plates. He was a contemporary of Hans Baldung, as appears from a comparative examination of their style, which bears the nearest resemblance, so much so, as to have occasioned a suspicion that they were the productions of the same hand. If they are not by the same artist, they are certainly marked with the same cipher HB and IEB. They are chiefly wooden cuts, although there are some copper plates attributed to him. The following are generally considered to be by him:

Christ bound to the Pillar, with the cipher 1504.

The dead Christ with the Marys.

The dead Christ stretched on a linen, and supported by Angels.

Christ and the Twelve Apostles. 1519.

The Three Fates, 1513; very scarce.

[See BALDUNG.]

BRESCIA, FRA. GIOVANNI MARIA DA. This old artist was born at Brescia about the year 1460. He was bred a goldsmith, a profession at that time connected with the arts; and, after studying painting and engraving for some time, he became a monk of the order of the Carmelites at Brescia, and painted several pictures for the church of his monastery, and in the cloister some fresco works, representing subjects from the history of Elias and Elisha. He also engraved some plates, which are executed in a manner that appears to be a feeble mixture of the style of Marc Antonio and Andrea Mantegna. We have by him the following plates :

The Virgin and infant Jesus, the Virgin holding a Book. The Virgin and Infant in the Clouds; a circular plate, with a Latin dedication and his name; Fr. Jo. Ma. Brix. Carmelita dicavit. M.D.II.

St. Gregory resuscitating a Youth; inscribed opus Fr. Jo. Mariae Brizensis or. Carmelitarum. M.CCCXC.II. The History of the Emperor Trajan; on a Balcony at the upper part of the plate is seen the Pope, and the words Divus Gregorius; and at the top opus Fr. is Jo. Mariae Brizensis or. Carmelitarum. M.CCCXC.II.

BRESCIA, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, an engraver, who is said to have been brother of the preceding artist. It is probable that he learned engraving in the school of Andrea Mantegna, as his plates are executed precisely in his style, though in a neater and more finished manner. He wanted, however, his correctness of drawing, in which respect he is greatly inferior. The following are his principal plates :

The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; Jo. An. Br.

The Virgin adoring the Infant, St. Joseph sleeping; same mark.

The Scourging of Christ; Jo. Anton. Brizian. 1503.

There are second impressions of this plate; dated 1509.

Hercules and Anteus; Jo. An. Br.

Hercules strangling the Lion; inscribed D. Herc. invicto.

A naked Woman and Child, with a Satyr playing on a Pipe; marked 1507; Jo. An. BX.

A white Horse, the same as that engraved by A. Durer; I. A. Brix. 1505.

A grotesque; below, a Satyr and a Woman; inscribed, Victoria Augusta; Jo. An.

BRESCIA, LEONARDO. According to Barotti, this painter was a native of Ferrara, and flourished about the year 1530. There are many of his pictures in the churches and convents of that city, the most esteemed of which are the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of Il Gesu; the Annunciation, in the Madonna del buon amore; and the Resurrection, in S. Monica. [It is supposed that he died in 1598. Artists of the name of Brescia are very numerous; there are thirty so named in Zani.]

BRESCIANO, GIOVITA, called BRESCIANINO. This painter is said by Cozzando to have been a native of Brescia, and a scholar of Lattanzio Gambarà. He was a reputable painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. He flourished about the year 1580.

BRETEUIL, COMTE DE. This French nobleman was a great amateur of the arts, and, according to Basan, etched several plates after Berghem and other masters.

BRETHERTON, JAMES, an English engraver, who distinguished himself by several etchings and plates in aquatinta, from the designs of H. W. Bunbury, and other masters, as well as from his own compositions. He flourished from 1770 till about the year 1790.

BRETHERTON, CHARLES, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, and was born about the year 1760. At an early age he gave proof of the most promising talents as a designer and engraver. He executed several plates of portraits, views, and landscapes, which possess great merit; and made some charming drawings of his own compositions, one of which, representing Kate of Aberdeen, has been engraved by Mr. Tomkins. This ingenious young artist fell a victim to consumption, in 1783.

BREUGHEL, PETER, THE ELDER, called the DROLL, a Dutch painter, born in the village of Breughel near Breda, in 1510. He was the son of a peasant, and was instructed in the art by Peter Koeck; but he seems to have paid more attention to the eccentric productions of Jerome Bos, than the works of his instructor. He was called the Droll, from the whimsical subjects he painted. On leaving the school of Koeck, he went to France, and afterwards to Italy, where his chief studies were the wildest and most romantic views in the Alps. On his return to Flanders, he settled at Antwerp, where his works were much admired, and he was received into the academy there in 1551. His best pictures represent village feasts and merry-makings, and it is said that he frequently disguised himself as a boor, to mix in those rural amusements, to observe with more accuracy their various characters, which he personified with great humour and pleasantry. He also painted attacks of banditti in wild landscapes, gipsies telling fortunes, and other drolleries. In these subjects he has only been surpassed by D. Teniers. He died in 1570, aged 60. [Balkema says he died in 1566, but is in an error, as there are pictures with the date 1567. He was a mere buffoon in painting; there is no humour in his pictures that will please any but the most ignorant and groveling minds.] This painter has etched a few plates of similar subjects to his pictures :

A large plate of a Kermess, or Village Festival.

Another subject of Peasants regaling; inscribed Kirchmess Barth. Mumper, &c.

The Feast of the Archers, with their Banner flying from the Window of an Alehouse; inscribed Dit is de Gulde, &c.

A Masquerade, known by the name of Valentine and Orson, with his name, and dated 1566; scarce.

A View on the Rhine, with the subject of Dedalus and Icarus; Petrus Breughel, fecit; Roma, 1553. Escud. Hondius.

Another View on the Rhine, with the subject of Mercury and Psyche; same mark.

BREUGHEL, PETER, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, and was called Hellish Breughel, from the eccentric and frightful subjects he painted. He died in 1642. [Balkema says he was born in 1686, and died in 1739; he is in error. The true account seems to be that he was born in 1569, and died in 1625.]

BREUGHEL, JOHN, called VELVET BREUGHEL. This eminent painter was the younger brother of the preceding artist, and was born at Brussels in 1565. His father dying when he was only five years old, he was brought up by the widow of Peter van Aelst, who was his grandmother. He at first applied himself to miniature painting, but was afterwards instructed in painting in oil by Peter Goeckint. The name of Velvet Breughel was given him on account of his being generally clothed in velvet, an expensive habit at that time. He at first painted flowers and fruit, in which branch of the art he had already become celebrated, but on visiting Italy he changed his subjects, and painted landscapes with small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with finesse and spirit. On his return to Flanders, his works were held in the highest estimation, and his pictures were so much admired by Rubens, that he solicited him to paint the landscapes in many of his easel pictures. One of the most esteemed specimens of their united talents was a picture of Adam and Eve in Paradise, in which the figures were admirably painted by Rubens, in one of the finest landscapes of Breughel. It was formerly in the collection of the Prince of Orange, but was taken to Paris by the French. Breughel was of similar utility to Van Balen; and he painted small figures with so much neatness and accuracy, that he was invited to decorate with them the churches of Steenwyck, and the landscapes of Momper. His Views of Flanders are faithful transcripts of the scenery of the country; and his trees, plants, and even the insects, are drawn and painted with the most exact precision. He died at Brussels in 1642, aged 77. We have four small etchings by John Breughel, they are marked J. Sadeler, exc. [It is singular that Balkema should state that Breughel the elder died in 1566, and that his son John was born in 1575. If John was born in 1565, he must have been four years older than his brother Peter. Resta states that John was born in 1569; Brulliot, in 1589; Zani leaves it open, but leans to the latter year. The greater part concur in the year of his death, 1642. A doubt may be expressed of his being called Breughel de Velours, or Velvet Breughel, from his dress; it is more likely that he was called Breughel de Vlours, from being an eminent flower painter.]

BREUGHEL, ABRAHAM, called the NEAPOLITAN. This painter was probably a relative of the preceding artists. He was born at Antwerp in 1672. He painted flowers and fruit, in which he excelled. He was called the Neapolitan from his long residence at Naples, in which city is the greater part of his works. [He died about 1690, according to Heineken and others; in 1710, according to Balkema. Neither can be right if the artist resided a long time in Naples. Balkema says he was named Director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1670, having just said he was born in 1672. No doubt he meant to say that his father Ambrose held that situation.]

[BREÜKELAAR, HENRI, Junior, a modern Dutch artist of great promise, was born at Amsterdam in 1809, and was instructed by C. and J. A. Kruseman. He painted the picture of Van Spyck at the tomb of De Ruiter, and others, which gained him the applause of his countrymen. His works are not numerous, owing to his early death, which occurred in 1839.]

BREYDEL, CHARLES, a Flemish painter born at Antwerp in 1677. He was a scholar of Rysbrack, the landscape painter, under whose instruction he remained three years. He afterwards travelled through Holland and Germany, where he painted landscapes, and views of the Rhine, in the manner of Griffier. He is more reputed as a painter of battles, and attacks of cavalry, which are ingeniously composed, and painted with spirit. He died in 1744.

BREYDEL, FRANCIS, was the brother of the foregoing artist, born in 1679, and was also instructed by Rysbrack. He painted conversations and gallant assemblies, and also portraits of a small size, agreeably coloured and neatly touched. He passed a great part of his life at the court of Hesse Cassel, where his works were much esteemed. He died in 1750.

[BRIGGS, HENRY PERONNET, an historical and portrait painter, who made many attempts in the higher walks of art, but finally settled down to the more profitable occupation of portrait painting. His early productions were of such promise that they induced the Royal Academy to admit him as an associate; at a later period he was elected R. A. His pictures are recognisable both by the drawing and colouring; his figures have too much height and stage action; his colouring frequently dark, and in the manner of Opie. Some of his portraits are considered excellent. He died in 1844, about the age of 51.]

BRIL, MATTHEW. This painter was born in 1550. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Italy during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., by whom he was employed in the Vatican, where he painted in fresco several landscapes in the Loggie, and had a pension settled on him by that pontiff. He would probably have reached a high rank in the list of landscape painters, but he died in the prime of life at Rome in 1584. [One of these dates is wrong, probably the first, as he was 37 when he died.]

BRIL, PAUL. This distinguished painter was the younger brother of Matthew Bril, born at Antwerp in 1554. He was instructed in the art by Daniel Wortelmans, an unnoticed artist, and was himself first employed in painting the tops of harpsichords, which were usually so ornamented at that period. His life would probably have been passed in the obscurity of those humble exertions, had not the fame his brother had acquired in Italy, inspired him with the emulation of equalling him in reputation; and he thought the most probable means of success was to imitate his example, and to follow him to Italy. Warmed by this laudable ambition, he secretly withdrew himself from his home, and set out on his journey to Rome. Passing through France, he was under the necessity of stopping at Lyons to recruit his exhausted finances by the exercise of his talent, and having succeeded, he at length reached Rome, and placed himself under the instruction of his brother. But his best studies were made from the landscapes of Titian, some of which he had an opportunity of copying, and he began to distinguish himself by a style, which, though founded on the great principles of that master, was sufficiently original to be considered as his own. For some time he assisted his brother in his works in the Vatican, and on the death of that artist, the pension of the pope was continued to Paul; and, according to Baglioni, on the succession of Sixtus V. he was engaged in some considerable works in the Sistine chapel, in S. Maria Maggiore, and in the Scala Santa in St. John of Lateran. He was not less patronized by Pope Clement VIII., by whose direction he painted his prodigious work in the Sala Clementina, a landscape of grand scenery, sixty-eight feet wide, in which is introduced the subject of St. Clement with an anchor fastened to his neck, thrown into the sea. He also painted several excellent easel pictures of landscapes, some of which Annibale Caracci did not disdain to embellish with his admirable figures. This eminent artist died at Rome in 1626, aged 72. Paul Bril has etched several landscapes in a masterly and spirited style, four of which are in the set published by his scholar Nieulandt. We have by him the following prints:

Four Landscapes in the set, by Nieulandt.

Two Landscapes; marked Paulus Bril, inv. et fec., &c.
A View in the Campagna, with Ruins; P. Bril, fec.
1590.

Another View in the same; the companion.

[Authors differ with respect to the year of his birth, but the majority is in favour of 1556.]

BRILLON, ———. This artist was a native of France, and, according to Basan, engraved several plates after Watteau and other French painters.

BRINCKMAN, PHILIP JEROME, a modern German painter and engraver, born at Spire in 1709. He was a pupil of J. G. Dathan. His favourite subjects were landscapes, but he also painted history and portraits; in some of the latter he imitated the force and colouring of Rembrandt. He was painter to the court, and keeper of the gallery at Mentz. He has etched some plates in a picturesque and spirited style. The following are his principal prints:

- Philip Jerome Brinckman; se ipse, fec.
- David with the Head of Goliath. 1741.
- The Death of Pyramus.
- The Repose in Egypt; Rembrandt, inv.; Brinckman, fec.
- The Resurrection of Lazarus; Brinckman, fec.
- Mary Magdalene at the Feet of our Saviour.
- Christ and the Samaritan Woman.
- The Presentation in the Temple; P. J. Brinckman, inv. et fec.
- Six pleasing Landscapes; Ph. Brinck., del. et fec.

BRIOT, ANTHONY, a French engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He engraved a set of different habiliments, from the designs of St. Igny.

BRIOT, J.—, a French engraver, by whom we have a few plates executed with the graver, rather neatly, in the style of Wierix. His drawing is very defective; he worked from his own compositions. Among others we have:

- Seven plates of the Virtues.
- A set of small circular plates of the Sibyls.
- A set of plates for Ovid's Metamorphoses.

BRISSART, P. By this artist, who was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1670, we have a large print, representing a bird's-eye view of the royal palace of Vincennes, from his own design. It is etched in a slight, neat style, but without much effect. He also engraved several plates from the works of John Baptist Santerre.

BRIXIENSIS. See BRESCIA.

BRIZE, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter of still life. His pictures represent musical instruments, books, papers, &c., grouped in an ingenious manner, and painted with such uncommon truth, that they become interesting notwithstanding the insignificance of the subjects. He also painted armour, and imitations of bassi rilievi, but his pictures of the former subjects are most esteemed. [He was born at Haerlem in 1635, and died in 1679.]

BRIZZIO, or BRICCIO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1574. He studied at first under Bartolomeo Passerotti, but was afterwards admitted into the school of Lodovico Caracci. He painted history, architectural views, and perspective, and his works of that description were deservedly esteemed. In engraving he was instructed by Agostino Caracci, and he is said to have forwarded some of the plates of that master. His own prints, though nearly equal to Agostino in point of execution, are very inferior in correctness of drawing, and in the beauty of expression. The following are his principal works as an engraver:

- A large Landscape, from his own design.
- St. Roch; after Parmegiano.
- The Holy Family; after Coreggio.
- The Return out of Egypt; after Lod. Caracci.
- Portrait of Cinthio Aldobrandini; after L. Caracci.
- A Frontispiece; inscribed Explicazione del sacro lenzuolo. 1599; after the same; scarce.
- Another Frontispiece; inscribed Tempio al Cardinale Cinthio Aldobrandini. 1579; after the same.
- Another Frontispiece, with the Arms of the Duke of Modena, and in the middle some Children; after the same. 1594; very scarce.

St. Francis kneeling, holding the infant Jesus, and the Virgin Mary in the Clouds; after the same.

The Virgin Mary crowned, with the infant Jesus, and two Angels; after L. Caracci.

The great St. Jerome; the plate left imperfect by Agostino Caracci, finished by F. Brizzio.

Christ and the Samaritan Woman; after Ag. Caracci. 1610.

A Blind man led by a Dog; after Annibale Caracci.

[Francesco Brizio was, up to his twentieth year, employed as a shoemaker's boy. He was gifted with a rare genius; after having acquired a knowledge of design from Passerotti, he became one of the most eminent disciples of the Caracci. In architecture, perspective, and landscape, he surpassed all his fellow-disciples. He approached Lodovico more closely than any other artist. The graceful beauty of his cherubs excites admiration; and here, in the opinion of Guido, he outshone even Bagnacavallo. He died in 1623.]

BRIZZIO, FILIPPO, was the son of Francesco Brizzio, and was a scholar of Guido. In the church of St. Silvestro at Bologna, is an altar-piece by Brizzio, representing the Virgin Mary, with St. John Baptist and St. Silvester; and at the principal altar in the church of S. Guiliano, is a picture painted by him of S. Guiliano crowned by Angels.

BROECK, CRISPIN VANDEN, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1530. He was a disciple of Francis Floris, and painted history with some reputation. He also distinguished himself as an architect. We have a number of prints engraved by him from his own designs, which establish his character as a man of genius and capacity. He engraved both on wood and on copper, and marked his plates with a cipher composed of the letters C V and B, thus  or .

The following are his principal works:

COPPER-PLATES.

- Seven of the Creation, with Latin inscriptions.
- Another set of nine, of the Creation.
- Nineteen of the Life of the Virgin.
- The Crucifixion; in a border ornamented with the Instruments of the Passion.

WOODEN CUTS.

- The Annunciation; a circular print.
- The Visitation; same.
- The Adoration of the Shepherds; same.
- The Adoration of the Magi; same.
- The Circumcision; same.

These five are scarce; they are marked with his cipher. [Brulliot says, he died in Holland at the age of 71; Balkema says, in 1575; Zani places his birth in 1534, but leaves the date of his death open. Brulliot's account is most to be depended on in this instance.]

BROECK, BARBARA VANDEN. This female artist was the daughter of Crispin vanden Broeck, born at Antwerp in 1560, and probably was taught drawing by her father. From the style of her engraving, it is thought she was instructed in that art in the school of John Collaert, who engraved some plates from her father's designs. She worked entirely with the graver, which she handled with great address; and in some of her plates, particularly in that of the Last Judgment, she imitated with success the style of Martin Rota. We have the following plates by her:

- The Holy Family, with Angels; marked with the cipher of her Father, and signed B. filia, sc.
- Samson and Dalilah; Crispin, inv.; B. fecit.
- The Last Judgment; Barbara filia Crispini, sc.; H. Hond., exc.
- Mandonia prostrating herself before Scipio; Barbara, fec.
- Venus and Adonis; B. fil., fec.

BROECK, ELIAS VAN DEN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1657. He was a scholar of Abraham Mignon, and painted flowers and fruit with tolerable success, but never approached the delicate finish of his master. He died at Amsterdam in 1711, aged 54.

BROEDLET, J. VAN, a Dutch engraver of mezzotintos, who flourished about the year 1700. We have by him Cephalus and Procris, after Gerard Hoet.

BROEN, C. DE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1720. He was principally employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers. Among others, we have the portrait of Peter Poicet, after Nicholas Verkolke, which is inscribed C. de Broen, Jun.

BROERS, a Dutch painter of merry-makings and boorish frolics, into which he introduced a considerable degree of low humour and character.

BROMPTON, RICHARD, an English portrait painter, who was a scholar of Benjamin Wilson. He afterwards went to Italy, and resided some time at Rome, where he received instructions from Raphael Mengs. He was introduced to the patronage of the Earl of Northampton, and accompanied that nobleman to Venice, when he was appointed ambassador to the republic. At Venice he painted a picture, representing a conversation piece, in which he introduced the portraits of the then Duke of York, and several English gentlemen then on their travels. The picture was afterwards exhibited at the rooms in Spring-garden in 1767, at which time he returned to England, and for some years practised portrait painting. Not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he went to Petersburg, in the year 1782, where he was well received, and met with much employment. He died in that city about the year 1790.

BRONKHORST, JOHN VAN. This artist was born at Utrecht in 1603. He was brought up under John Verburg, a painter on glass, and practised that branch of the art with great reputation. He executed the fine windows in the new church at Amsterdam. When he was thirty-six years old, he became acquainted with Cornelius Poelemborg, and abandoned glass painting, to imitate the style of that master, and painted several pictures, which were much admired. He etched some landscapes from Poelemborg, and some other subjects from his own designs. [Zani and Nagler say he died in 1680; Balkema, in 1659. An account of eighteen of his prints may be found in Bartsch.]

BRONKHORST, PETER VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1588. He excelled in painting the interiors of churches and temples, which he ornamented with small figures, representing historical subjects. In the town-house at Delft are two large pictures by him, one representing the inside of a Temple, with Solomon pronouncing his Judgment, and the other our Saviour driving the Money-changers out of the Temple. He died in 1661.

BRONZINO, AGNOLO, an eminent Florentine painter, born in 1511. He was the favourite disciple of Jacopo Carrucci, called Pontormo, and assisted that master in some of his most considerable undertakings, particularly in the chapel of S. Lorenzo at Florence, which he was employed to finish after the death of that master. He appears to have studied with attention the great style of Michael Angelo, and there is something of the grandeur of that master discernible in all his productions. His principal works are at Florence and Pisa. He also excelled in portraits, and painted the most celebrated personages of his time, among which were Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch. He died in 1580.

BRONZINO, ALESSANDRO and CHRISTOFANO. See ALLORI.

BROOKING, ———. This eminent English marine painter was born about the year 1720. He is said to have been bred in some department in the dockyard at Deptford; and it does not appear that he had the advantage of receiving any regular education in the art. As a painter of sea-pieces, it will not, however, be denied that he excelled all his countrymen who preceded him, nor has any artist, since William Vandevelde, equalled his productions in that department of painting. Unfortunately for the admirers of art, his merits were scarcely known when death deprived the world of his talents, when he was in the prime of life, and prevented him from acquiring the honour and profit which, by his abilities, he had a just right to expect. He died of a consumption, in the spring of the year 1759, under forty years of age. The following anecdote is given upon the authority of the late Mr. D. Serres, to whom he was well known.

"Many of the artists of that time worked for the shops, and Brooking, like the rest, painted much for a person who lived in Castle Street, Leicester Square, who coloured prints, and dealt in pictures, which he exposed in his shop window.

"A gentleman, who sometimes passed the shop, being struck with the merits of some sea-pieces, which were by the hand of this artist, desired to know his name, but his inquiries were not answered agreeably to his wishes; he was only told, that if he pleased, they could procure any that he might require from the same painter.

"Brooking was accustomed to write his name upon his pictures, which mark was as constantly obliterated by the shop-keeper before he placed them in his window; it however happened that the artist carried home a piece, on which his name was inscribed, while the master was not at home, and the wife, who received it, placed it in the window without effacing the signature. Luckily, the gentleman passed by before this picture was removed, and discovered the name of the painter whose works he so justly admired.

"He immediately advertised for the artist to meet him at a certain wholesale linen-draper's in the city. To this invitation Brooking at first paid no regard, but seeing it repeated, with assurances of benefit to the person to whom it was addressed, he prudently attended, and had an interview with the gentleman, who from that time became his friend and patron: unfortunately, the artist did not live long enough to gratify the wishes of his benefactor, or to receive any great benefit from his patronage."

BROOKS, JOHN, an engraver in mezzotinto, who is said to have been a native of Ireland. He lived about the year 1742. His prints are chiefly portraits. We have by him Hugh Boulter, Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of Ireland, and William Aldrich, Lord Mayor of Dublin; dated 1742. There is also a print of the Battle of the Boyne by him, after Wyck.

BROOKSHAW, RICHARD, a modern engraver in mezzotinto, who has executed some plates of portraits, and other subjects. We have by him, among others, the following:

Louis XVI., King of France.

Marie Antoinette of Austria, Queen of France.

A half-length Portrait of a young Lady holding a Vase; after Sir Joshua Reynolds.

A Portrait of General Paoli.
James Bouverie, Son of the Earl of Radnor; after Sir Joshua Reynolds.
The Enchantress; after Murray.
Return out of Egypt; after Rubens.
Moonlight, a Sea-piece; H. Kobell, pinx.; R. Brookshaw, fec. 1772.
A Storm at Sea; the same.

BROSAMER, JOHN, or HANS, an old German engraver, born at Fulda about the year 1506. On account of the small size of his prints, he is ranked among what are called the little masters. He worked both on wood and copper, and his style resembles that of Aldegrever, though much inferior. He sometimes marked his plates with his name, and sometimes with the cipher FB. The following are his principal works:

COPPER-PLATES.

The Portrait of Martin Luther.
The Portrait of John II., Abbot of Fulda.
Samson and Dalilah; Johannes Brosamer Fuldae degens faciebat, 15 H. B. 45.
David and Bathsheba.

Xantippe riding on Socrates.
Laocoon and his Children. 1538.

A set of wooden cuts, chiefly copied from the work by Holbein, published in 1547; entitled Biblia veteris testamenti artificiosis picturis effigiata. Franckfort, 1552.

BROSTERHUST, JOHN. This artist, who is little known, was probably a native of Holland. Among other prints, he engraved a set of six plates, representing landscapes, views of villages, &c., with the title, Joann. Brosterhust Prædia. They are etched in a tasteful, pleasing style.

BROSTOLONI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, a modern Italian engraver, born at Venice about the year 1726. He is said to have been a pupil of Joseph Wagner. We have the following plates by him:

Portrait of Pope Benedict XIV.; an oval plate.
A Vignette, with the Portrait of Benedict XIV.
St. Theresa in Adoration.
A set of twenty Views in Venice; after Canaletti. 1763.
Another set of twelve large plates; after the same, with the Ceremonies of the Election of the Doge, and his Marriage with the Adriatic.

BROUCK, M. V., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1621. By this artist, who was apparently a painter, we have a small plate representing Mercury and Argus, it is etched in a slight, poor style; and in retouching it with the graver, he has attempted to imitate the style of Cornelius Visscher, but with little success. It is dated 1621.

BROWER, or BRAUWER, ADRIAN. This extraordinary artist was born at Haerlem in 1608. His parents were extremely poor, and his mother supported her family by selling to the country people little works of embroidery done from patterns designed by her son. Francis Hals, an eminent artist of Haerlem, passing by her house, perceived the young Brower drawing these trifling objects with a facility and taste, that induced him to ask the boy if he was desirous of becoming a painter. On being answered in the affirmative, it was agreed, with his mother's approbation, that he should become his scholar. The genius of Brower was not long in developing itself, and he so far surpassed his fellow-pupils, that Hals separated him from his companions, and kept him closely employed in painting small pictures, which were much admired, and readily sold by Hals for large prices. The sordid disposition of the master, instead of encouraging and recompensing as he ought the young painter, from whose ingenious productions he derived such advantage, treated him with increased severity, and entirely secluded him from society, lest he should become acquainted with the value of his talents, and leave him. Adrian van Ostade, who was also a scholar of Hals at that time, found an opportunity of advising Brower to escape from the tyranny and injustice of his master, which he soon after effected, and took refuge at Amsterdam. In a few days he painted a picture of some boors fighting, which he gave to the master of the inn where he lodged, requesting him to endeavour to dispose of it for him. The host returned in a short time, and presented the painter with a hundred ducats he had received for the picture. The astonishment of Brower was extreme; with difficulty he could persuade himself that it was not a dream. Instead of producing in him the effect that might have been expected, of stimulating him to an industrious exertion of those abilities which promised him both fortune and reputation, it unfortunately furnished him with the means of indulging his natural propensity for prodigality and intemperance. He took leave of his host, who saw no more of him for ten days, and on being questioned on his return concerning his money, he cheerfully replied, "Thank heaven! I am disencumbered of it, and I feel myself more at liberty." His life was a continued series of the most whimsical adventures. Being desirous of visiting Antwerp, where his works were already known and admired, particularly by Rubens, he set out for that city at a time when the States-General were at war with Spain, and not having taken the precaution of providing himself with a passport, he was taken into custody as a spy and sent a prisoner to the citadel, where the Duke of AreMBERG was then confined. In vain Brower assured the governor that he was no spy, but a painter. At length the Duke interfered in his behalf, and caused him to be furnished with tools and colours, that he might convince them of the truth of his assertion, and it was not long before he produced a picture of some Soldiers playing at Cards, which he had designed from a group he had seen from the window of his prison. The picture was shown to Rubens, who occasionally visited the Duke, who immediately exclaimed that it was painted by Brower whose works he so much admired, and he exerted himself to procure his liberation, which he soon effected. Rubens invited him to his house, and treated him with the greatest kindness; but the good order and arrangement that presided there were no way suited to the disposition of Brower, who soon withdrew himself from the society of Rubens, and returned to his accustomed habits of debauchery and excesses of every kind, to which he at length fell a victim in his thirty-second year. He died in 1640, in the public hospital, and was buried in an obscure manner; but Rubens had his body removed, and interred with respectful solemnity in the church of the Carmelites. The works of this eccentric artist are admirable; they are extremely scarce, and are justly valued for their uncommon excellence. The personages he painted are indeed of the lowest order; his study was the alehouse, and the frolics of his drunken associates were the subjects of his pictures; but the vivacity of his genius has delineated them with such exquisite truth, life, and character, their passions and movements are so admirably expressed, that we lose sight of the vulgarity of the scene, and are fascinated with the charm of his pencil, and the brilliancy and transparence of his colour. We have a few etchings by Brower, executed with great spirit, and full of character, as follow :

- A company of four Peasants; inscribed T sa vrienden, &c.
- A Woman playing on the Flageolet, and Peasants dancing; inscribed Lustig spell, &c.
- Three Peasants smoking; Wer aent smoken.
- A Peasant sleeping, and others drinking; Brauwver.
- Two of single figures; signed A. Brower.
- A Man and a Woman, with a Monkey smoking; Wats dit, &c.
- A Woman making Cakes; a circular.
- A Woman holding a Stove, and a Man lighting his Pipe.
- Six of Men and Women Peasants.

BROWER, JOHN. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished about the year 1630. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, which possess no great merit. Among others is that of the Emperor Leopold, after W. Vaillant.

[BROWN, MATHER, or MATTHEW, an historical and portrait painter, born in England. He painted the portraits of many of the distinguished English military and naval officers of his time; among which were Elliot, Rodney, and Cornwallis. He also painted some historical and theatrical subjects, from the events of the war in India with Tippoo Saib, and from scenes in Shakespeare. He died in 1810.]

BROWN, ROBERT. According to Lord Orford, this artist was a disciple of Sir James Thornhill, and worked under him on the cupola of St. Paul's. On leaving that master he was much employed in decorating several churches in the city. He painted the altar-piece of St. Andrew Undershaft, and the spaces between the Gothic arches, in chiaro-scuro. In the parish church of St. Botolph, Aldgate, he painted the Transfiguration; for the altar in St. Andrew's, Holborn, the figures of St. Andrew and St. John; and two histories on the sides of the organ. In the chapel of St. John, at the end of Bedford-row, he painted St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist.

BROWNE, JOHN, an eminent English engraver, born at Oxford in 1719. He is one of our distinguished engravers of landscapes. His plates are etched and engraved in a masterly style; and he has made an excellent selection in the subjects of them, which are from the greatest masters. He etched some of the plates which were finished by Woollet. The following are his principal prints :

- A Landscape, with a Sportsman; after G. Poussin; in the Houghton collection.
- A Kitchen; after Teniers.
- The Cottage; after Hobbema. 1773.
- The Waggoner; after Rubens. 1776; fine.
- A Landscape; after the same; from a picture in the collection of the Duke of Montague.
- The Market; after the same; from a picture in the royal collection.
- The Milkmaid; after the same; the same subject; engraved by Van Uden.
- Apollo and the Muses granting Longevity to the Sibyl of Cumæ; after Sal. Rosa.
- Landscape, with a Waterfall; after G. Poussin.

A Landscape, with Procris and Cephalus; after Claude Lorrain.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after Sal. Rosa.
A Landscape, with the Baptism of the Eunuch; after J. Both.

BROWNE, JOSEPH. By this engraver, who resided at Tedbury about the year 1676, we have a portrait of Richard Collins, an officer of Excise, of Bristol. It was prefixed to his Gauger's Vade Mecum, published in 1677, and is now become scarce.

BRU, MOSEN VICENTE. According to Palomino Velasco, this Spanish painter was born at Valencia, in 1682. He was the scholar of Juan Conchillos, and gave great promise of uncommon ability. Before he was twenty-one years of age he had painted several pictures for the churches in his native city, of which that author mentions three in the church of San Juan del Mercado; St. Francisco de Paula, the Baptism of Christ by St. John, and a picture of All the Saints. He died in 1703, aged 21.

BRUGGEN, JOHN VANDER, a Flemish engraver, born at Brussels in 1649. After engraving some plates in Flanders he settled at Paris, and followed the business of a printseller. He engraved several plates in mezzotinto; they are chiefly portraits and drolleries, after Teniers, Brower, and Ostade. He marked his plates with his name, or with the cipher

B. The following are his principal plates;

- The Portrait of John vander Bruggen; after Largilliere.
- The Portrait of A. Vandeyk; se ipse pinx.
- The Portrait of Louis XIV. 1681.
- The Gold Weigher; after Rembrandt.

- A Man leaning on a Table, and a Woman.
- A Man sitting on the Trunk of a Tree, lighting his Pipe.
- Cupid and Psyche.
- A Skull; Memento mori.
- An old Peasant, and a Girl playing on the Flute; after Teniers.
- A Man drinking and a Woman smoking; after the same.

[BRUGGEN, J. TER, a flower painter. Many of his compositions are well arranged and true to nature, but his pencilling is sometimes too heavy for his subjects.]

BRUN. See BRUYN.

BRUN, CHARLES LE. This distinguished painter of the French school was born at Paris in 1619. He was the son of a sculptor, who instructed him in drawing. His father being employed in some works of sculpture for the Chancellor Seguier, that nobleman took the young le Brun under his protection, and placed him in the school of Simon Vouet, where his advancement was so rapid, that at the age of fifteen he painted the picture of Hercules destroying the Horses of Diomedæ, which was in the Orleans collection. When he was two and twenty, his protector sent him to Italy, allowed him an ample pension, and furnished him with a letter of recommendation to N. Poussin. But the genius of Le Brun was more suited to that cast of composition called the great machine, than to the pure and profound style with which he might have been inspired by the counsel of Niccolo. He however assisted him with his advice, and pointed out to him what was most worthy of his attention at Rome. After passing six years in Italy, Le Brun returned to Paris, where the only artist from whom he had to apprehend a rivalry was Le Sueur; but whatever was the merit of that painter, the protection of the chancellor and the court secured to Le Brun every great public work. He was appointed first painter to the king, who presented him the order of St.

Michael, and employed him at Fontainebleau and Versailles. It was at this time that he began his great work of the Battles of Alexander, which have been so admirably engraved by Gerard Andran, and which have secured to him the reputation of one of the greatest artists of his country. Le Brun used this flattering patronage for a very laudable purpose, and he has the credit of having been the principal means of founding the Royal Academy at Paris; by the friendship M. de Colbert bore him, and the favour shown him by Louis XIV., he accomplished that institution. In the church of Our Lady are his two celebrated pictures of the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, and the Stoning of St. Stephen, which are among the most esteemed works of this able painter. Le Brun possessed a noble conception, and an inventive genius; he produced with facility the most abundant compositions, and was a perfect master of the mechanism of the art. He was a correct designer, but occasionally sunk into a mannerist. He wanted the fire, the inspiration of Rubens, and though he sometimes reached a certain degree of elevation, he could never, like Raffaele, ascend to the sublime. He died at Paris in 1690, aged 71. We have the few following etchings by him:

The Four Times of the Day.

An Infant kneeling on the Cross.

BRUN, GABRIEL LE, was the brother and scholar of Charles le Brun, born at Paris about 1625. He never arrived at any great eminence in the art of painting, and although he is more known as an engraver, he never went beyond mediocrity. He engraved several plates after the designs of his brother, and also after Tintoretto, Caracci, and other masters; we have by him, among others, the following:

Portrait of Charles Fevret de St. Mesmin. 1657.

Allegory on the Peace of the Cardinal Mazarine.

Frontispiece for the Memoirs of Vittorio Siri.

The Twelve Apostles; after C. Le Brun.

The Saviour; after the same; on two sheets.

St. Martin; after the same.

St. Anthony; after the same.

A Thesis; dedicated to the Parliament of Normandy; after the same.

BRUN, F., a French engraver, who was probably of the same family with the two foregoing artists. He engraved a few plates, which are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat style, but without taste; among which are the following portraits:

The King and Queen of Bohemia; in one plate.

Leopold, Archduke of Austria.

Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange.

BRUNEAU, LOUIS, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He etched several plates of landscapes, some of which are from his own designs. They are executed in a very pleasing style. It is most probable that he resided some time in London, as some of them were published by J. Tinney, in Fleet Street.

BRUNETTI, SEBASTIANO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and was first a scholar of Lucio Massari; but, according to Malvasia, he afterwards was instructed in the school of Guido, of whom he was one of the ablest disciples. He painted in the graceful manner of his instructor, but his colouring is rather cold and heavy. In the church of S. Maria Maggiore, at Bologna, is a picture by this painter of the Guardian Angel; in S. Giuseppe, a Holy Family, entirely in the style of Guido; and in S. Margherite, Mary Magdalene praying in the Desert. He died young, but it is not said in what year. [In 1649.]

BRUNI, DOMENICO. According to Averoldi, this painter was born at Brescia in 1591, and was a scholar of Tommaso Sandrini. He was a reputable painter of architectural views and perspective. Several of his works are in the churches and public edifices at Brescia, where he died, in 1666.

BRUNI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, born at Genoa about the year 1660. We have by him a plate of the Assumption of the Virgin, after Guido.

BRUNI, GIULIO, a Piedmontese painter, who was educated at Genoa, under Lazzaro Tavarone; but preferring the more pleasing manner of Gio. Batista Paggi, he became his scholar, and proved a very reputable painter of historical subjects. According to Soprani, he flourished about the year 1625, and was at that period in great repute in Savoy, when the wars in that country obliged him to leave it, and return to Genoa, where he died soon after.

BRUNI, ORAZIO, an Italian engraver, born at Siena about the year 1630. He is one of the few Italians who worked entirely with the graver, and appears to have imitated the style of F. de Poilly. He engraved some plates from his own designs, and others from Rutilio Manetti, &c. The following are among his plates:

The Prodigal Son.

The Golden Age.

A set of the Four Seasons.

A set of various Animals.

A Warrior and a Female in a triumphal Car, with Minerva presenting a Sceptre.

BRUNN, A. F. This artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1580. He engraved some plates, which are neatly executed, but in a stiff, Gothic style. Among others, is a print representing Christ standing on a mountain, accompanied by an Angel, with a female figure, emblematical of the church, and Satan and his accomplices appear below. It is inscribed, A. F. Brunn, fecit, by which it may be presumed to be from his own design.

BRUNN, ISAAC, a German engraver, who lived about the year 1615. There is a neatly engraved plate by him of the church at Strasburg, it is signed Isaac Brunn Argentiensis, χαλκογραφος. A. D. 1615. [Several others are mentioned by Brulliot in his Dict. of Mon.]

BRUNN, D. This artist was probably a relative of the preceding engraver. He worked entirely with the graver, in a style that has some resemblance to the manner of Paul Pontius, but very inferior to him. Among other plates by him we have a Bacchanalian subject, after Rubens, and a similar subject with Boys, after Vandyck; signed D. Brunn, Arg^{ta}. sculp. 1628.

BRUNO. See BUONO.

[BRUNO, ANTONIO, a native of Modena or Correggio, painted at Parma in the manner of Allegri, of whom, if he was not a scholar, he was a great imitator. He emulated him in his grace, his nature, his foreshortenings, and his broad lights; but with a far less correct pencil. He was a contemporary of that great genius, as one of his works bears the date of 1530.]

[BRUNORI, or BRUNORINI, FEDERIGO, a pupil of Damiani, followed the Venetian style of painting. His portraits are natural; he was fond of foreign drapery, and coloured with a strong effect. In some of his compositions he availed himself of the prints of Albert Durer. He was living in 1600.]

[BRUSSEL, PAUL THEODORE VAN, a flower painter, born at Zuid-Polsbroek, near Schoonhoven, was a scholar of Jean Augustini, and of H. Meyer of Haerlem. He was first employed in the manufacture of tapestry, but afterwards devoted his attention entirely to nature, and became one of the best fruit and flower painters of his time. His later pictures are his best, and are to be found in some of the richest collections. He died in 1795.]

BRUYN, or BRUIN, ABRAHAM, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1540. He is ranked among the little masters, on account of the general size of his plates being very small. They are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, formal style, and his drawing is far from correct. His works are, however, esteemed for their neatness. His best prints are his portraits, and his small frieses of hunting, hawking, &c. He usually marked his plates with one of these ciphers, ᵀᵇ or ᵀᵇ.

The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

Philip Louis, Elector Palatine.
Anne, his Spouse.
Albert Frederick, Duke of Prussia.
Eleonora, his Duchess.
William, Duke of Juliers.
Mary, his Duchess.

A set of twelve plates of Animals; Ab. de Bruyn fecit. ecc. 1583.
A set of Arabesque Patterns.

The Resurrection of Lazarus; after Crispin vanden Broeck.

BRUYN, or BRUIN, NICHOLAS DE, was the son of the artist mentioned in the preceding article, born at Antwerp about 1570. Although he was instructed by his father in engraving, he did not follow his example, either in the style of his execution, or in the size of his plates. He appears to have studied and to have formed his manner from the works of Lucas of Leyden. His compositions are abundant, but he wanted taste in the selection of his forms. He finished his plates very neatly with the graver; but there is not much effect in his prints, from his ignorance of the management of the chiaro-scuro. Notwithstanding this defect, which was very general at the time in which he lived, his works possess considerable merit. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, and sometimes with one of the following ciphers, ᵀᵇ or ᵀᵇ. The following are his principal works:

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Adam and Eve in Paradise. 1600.
Adam and Eve standing under the Tree of the forbidden Fruit. 1631.

BRUYN, CORNELIUS DE, a Dutch portrait painter and designer, born at the Hague in 1652. His passion for travelling led him to Italy when he was young, where he passed some time at Rome, with Robert Duval, and afterwards went to Venice, where he studied under Carlo Lotti for some years. He painted portraits with success; but is more distinguished by his publication of his Travels through Persia and India, and other countries, with plates from his own designs. [He died at Utrecht, in 1728.]

[BRUYN, T. DE, a native of France or Switzerland, who came to England in 1760. He painted landscapes and cattle, and was skilful in imitating bas reliefs; an example of which may be seen in the chapel of Greenwich Hospital. He died in 1804.]

BRY, or BRIE, THEODORE DE, an eminent German engraver, born at Liege in 1528. He resided chiefly at Frankfort, where he carried on the business of a print and bookseller. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art of engraving, but from his style he appears to have paid particular attention to the works of Sebald Beham. This laborious artist worked almost wholly with the graver, in a neat free style, well adapted to the subjects he made choice of, such as public processions and parades, where a great number of figures are inroduced, which he drew correctly, and gave great spirit and expression to his heads. He usually marked his plates T. B., or with the cipher B.

He engraved the plates for the first four volumes of Boissard's Roman Antiquities; the two last volumes were completed by his sons, John Theodore and John Israel. We have also the following prints by him:

- St. John in the Wilderness; an etching; very scarce.
 A Dance of Cavaliers and Ladies; Hic pudor, &c. de Bry, fec.
 A Dance of Men and Women Peasants; Quantum aula; same mark.
 A Design for a Saucer, a Head representing Pride and Folly, surrounded with grotesque subjects; a circular plate, marked T. d. B. f.; scarce.
 Another Design for a Saucer, a Head of the Duke of Alva, with the Mask of Folly, with grotesque subjects; circular; scarce.
 Another Design for a Saucer, with the Head of William of Nassau, with grotesque figures, indicative of Prudence; circular; scarce.
 A Medallion of Scanderbegus, with Latin Inscriptions, and a border of birds, flowers, and insects.
 The Companion; Domice Scanderbegi Uxor.
 The Nine Muses.
 The Procession for the Funeral of Sir Philip Sidney; invented by Thomas Lant, gent., and graven in copper by Derick or Theodore de Brie, in the city of London. 1578; in thirty-four plates.
 The Procession of the Knights of the Garter in 1756, in twelve plates; dated 1578.
 A set of Portraits; entitled Icones quinquaginta virorum illustrum Fran. 1569.
 The Plates for the Work published at Frankfort in 1593; entitled The brief, true Report of the new-found land of Virginia, published by Thomas Hariot, serjeant to Sir Walter Raleigh, and employed by him in the discovery. Picart copied these plates for his Religious Ceremonies of all Nations.
 The plates for the Latin narrative of the Cruelties of the Spaniards in America; entitled Narratio Regionum Indiarum par Hispanos quondam devastatum verissima Francof. 1598. One hundred and twenty-three plates.
 The plates for his great work; entitled Descriptio generalis totius Indiae Orientalis et Occidentalis, in nineteen parts, contained in five volumes, folio. 1598.

He died at Frankfort in 1598.

BRY, or BRIE, JOHN THEODORE DE, was the elder son of the preceding artist, born at Liege in 1561. He greatly assisted his father in the considerable works in which he was engaged; and with the assistance of his brother John Israel, completed the two volumes of Boissard's Roman Antiquities, which were left unfinished at his father's death. He also added considerably to the collection of Portraits of Illustrious Persons, begun by Theodore de Bry. We have also the following detached prints by him:

- Portrait of Gerard Mercator, geographer.
 Portrait of Daniel Specklin.
 Four, of the Elements; J. T. de Bry, inv. et fec.
 The Marriage of Rebecca; after Balthasar Peruzzi.
 A march of Soldiers; a fricze; after Titian; J. Theodore, fec.

 The Triumph of Bacchus; after Guilio Romano.
 The Venitian Ball; after Theodore Bernard; a circular plate.
 The Golden Age; after the print engraved by N. de Bruyn; after A. Bloemaert.

BRYER, HENRY. This artist was a pupil of Ryland, and became his partner as a printseller. He engraved a few plates, chiefly from the designs of Angelica Kauffman. Among other prints by him, we have a middle-sized upright plate, representing Bacchus and Ariadne; and a large plate, lengthways, of Mars and Venus discovered by Vulcan. For the last he obtained a premium from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts and Sciences.

BUBE, L. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as an engraver on wood, by whom we have a large upright print of the Holy Family, in chiaro-scuro. It is executed in a slight style, but it is very spirited, and manifests the hand of the master. It is from a design of Abraham Bloemaert.

BUCK, SAMUEL, and NATHANIEL. These brothers are sufficiently known by the great number of plates they engraved of views of the antiquities, ruins of churches, castles, &c., in England and Wales. The number of their plates is near five hundred. Samuel Buck died in 1779.

BUCKSHORN, JOSEPH. According to Lord Orford, this artist was a native of Holland. He visited England in the reign of Charles II., and was a scholar of Sir Peter Lely, whose works he copied in great perfection, and some of the portraits by Vandyck, particularly that of the Earl of Strafford, which was in the possession of Watson, Earl of Rockingham. Vertue mentions the portraits of Mr. Davenant, son of Sir William, and his wife, by Buckshorn. He died at the age of 35.

[BUDD, GEORGE, an English artist of whom little is known. He painted portraits, landscapes, and still life. There is a portrait engraved after him by M^c. Ardell, of Timothy Bennett, the patriotic shoemaker of Hampton Wick, who successfully opposed the old Princess Amelia in obtaining a passage through Bushy Park.]

[BUFFAGNOTTI, CARLO ANTONIO, a painter of perspective and theatrical decorations at Bologna and Genoa, about 1690. He engraved a series of architectural subjects, and decorations for the theatre, after F. Bibiena, and others of the same kind after M. A. Chiarini.]

BUFFALMACCO, BUONAMICO. According to Vasari, this old Florentine painter was born in 1262, and was a disciple of Andrea Taffi. Some of his works were preserved in the time of that author in the cathedral at Arezzo. He painted in the dry Gothic style of the immediate followers of Cimabue. He died in 1340, aged 78. [Baldinucci says he was living in 1351. Lord Lindsay, in his Sketches of the History of Christian Art, thus justly and eloquently sums up the history and character of Buffalmacco. "In every way Time's tooth has been busy with his fame, and a mere skeleton, a very ghost of a reputation, is all that remains to Buffalmacco. It is, in truth, in the thin airy atmosphere of the Italian novelists, that his name will survive after every vestige of his works has vanished. From boyhood to hoary age, his pranks and practical jokes were the laugh of Florence, as his conversational flow of fun and humour were the life of Maso del Saggio's shop, the Wit's Coffee-house of the time. But wit and wisdom are seldom mates, and the ashes left by the crackling thorns press heavily on the head on which retribution lays them. It so fared with Buffalmacco. A merry wag, a careless spendthrift, living for the day without a thought of the morrow, and (as the phrase is) 'nobody's enemy but his own,' he drained the cup of pleasure to the lees and found misery at the bottom, dying, at the age of 78, a beggar in the Misericordia, without a paul in his pocket to buy a coffin for his corpse or a mass for his soul,—the type and mirror of a whole class of artists, whose follies and vagaries throw discredit on genius, while a certain kindness of heart renders it impossible not to pity while we blame them."

BUGEY, _____, a French engraver, who was principally employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers; among others, we have that of the Marshal de Broglie on horseback, after Nicholas Loir.

BUGIARDINI, GIULIANO, a Florentine painter, born in 1481. He received his first instruction in the art from Bertoldo, a sculptor, but had afterwards the advantage of studying under Michael Angelo Buonarrotti. He painted historical subjects and portraits; in the latter he is said to have excelled. There is a picture by this master in the church of S. Francesco, at Bologna, representing the Marriage of St. Catherine. He died at Florence in 1536, aged 75. [Lanzi asserts that he was one of the best imitators of Leonardo da Vinci, on a par with Luini, and points out several examples existing at Bologna and elsewhere. Vasari describes him as the fellow student of M. Angelo, the assistant of Albertinelli, and the colourist of some works of Fra Bartolommeo. In Florence he painted many Madonnas and Holy Families, of which he was not a little vain; it would seem with good reason.]

BUISEN, or BUYSEN, A. VAN. This artist was a native of Holland, and flourished from 1700 till about 1725. He was chiefly employed in engraving for the booksellers, and appears to have resided some time in England, as he engraved a plate representing David playing on the harp, for the octavo edition of Cowley's Poems, published in 1700. He also engraved some of the plates for the work entitled Figures de la Bible, from the designs of Picart and others, published at Amsterdam in 1720.

BULLINGER, JOHN BALTHASAR, a Swiss landscape painter, born at Langnau, in the canton of Zurich, in 1713. He was first a scholar of John Simler, but afterwards went to Venice, where he studied two years, under John Baptist Tiepolo. He first attempted historical painting, but his natural genius led him to landscapes, and he became very eminent in that branch of the art. He afterwards passed some time at Amsterdam, where he appears to have studied with attention the works of the best artists of the Dutch school, particularly Both and Berghem, whose manner he imitated. He etched several plates in a free painter-like style, of which the following are the principal:

The portrait of J. B. Bullinger, se ipse fec.

A Frontispiece, with a number of Genii.

Two mountainous Landscapes, with figures.

A set of fifty Landscapes; some from his own designs, and the others after F. Ermels and F. Meyer.

A Head; after Le Brun; engraved for Lavater's Work.

[He died at Zurich in 1793.]

BUMEL, or BIMEL, MICHAEL, a German engraver of little celebrity. He engraved several plates, representing saints, and other devotional subjects, which are executed with the graver, with sufficient neatness, but in a stiff, tasteless style.

[BUNBURY, HENRY WILLIAM, a designer of humorous subjects and caricatures. He was the son of Sir William Bunbury of Mildenhall, Suffolk, and was educated at Westminster school, and at Catherine Hall, Cambridge. His Directions to bad Horsemen obtained for him great popularity, and the praise of Sir J. Reynolds. He died in 1811.]

BUNEL, JACQUES, a French painter, born at Blois in 1558. He studied at Rome, under Federigo Zuccherò, and was one of the most eminent historical painters of his country at the time in which he lived. In the church of the Augustines at Paris, is a fine picture by Bunel of the Descent of the Holy Ghost; and in the church of the Feuillans is his celebrated picture of the Assumption of the Virgin.

BUNNICK, JOHN VAN, a Dutch landscape painter, born at Utrecht in 1654. He was a scholar of Herman Sachtleven, under whom he studied three years, and afterwards visited Italy. He passed some time at Genoa, where he formed an acquaintance with Tempesta, by whom he was assisted in his studies. On his arrival at Rome he found several of the artists of his country, who received him with kindness, particularly Abraham Genoels, and Ferdinand Voet, and in their society greatly improved himself, by designing the fine scenery in the environs of Rome. On leaving Rome he went to Modena, where his works were so admired, that the duke appointed him his principal painter, and he passed eight years in his service. On his return to Holland, he was employed by King William III., then Prince of Orange, to ornament his palace at Loo. He died in 1727.

BUNNICK, JACOB VAN. This painter was the brother of the preceding artist, and painted battle-pieces with some reputation, but was greatly inferior to John van Bunnick. He died in 1725.

BUONACORSI. See VAGA, PIERINO DEL.

BUONAMICI. See TASSI.

BUONAROTTI. See ANGELO, M.

BUONCONSIGLI, GIOVANNI. According to Ridolfi, this painter was a native of Vicenza, and flourished about the year 1497. In the church of S. Cosimo della Giudecca, there is a picture by this master representing the Virgin Mary and infant Jesus, with S. Cosimo and S. Damiano, it is signed with his name, and the above date.

BUONI, BUONO DE. This painter was born at Naples, and, according to Dominici, flourished about the year 1430. He was a disciple of an old Neapolitan painter, called Colantonio del Fiore, whom he assisted in several of his works, and after his death became one of the most reputable artists of his time. There are many of his works in the churches at Naples; one of the most esteemed is a picture in the church of the Restituta, representing St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. He died about the year 1465.

BUONI, SILVESTRO DE, was the son and the scholar of the preceding artist, and was born at Naples about the year 1420. After studying some time under his father, he had the advantage of being instructed by Antonio Solario, called il Zingaro. Under that master he became an eminent painter of history, and was employed in some considerable works for the churches and public edifices at Naples. Among his most admired productions is a picture in the church of S. Pietro Martire, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, and the principal altar-piece in the Restituta, the Virgin and infant Jesus, with several Saints. He died in 1480.

BUONI, or BONIS, FLORIANO. This artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1670. Among other prints, he engraved a plate representing a dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary and St. John, after Guercino. It is executed with the graver in a dark, heavy style. His name is also affixed to a portrait of Guido Reni.

BUONTALENTI, BERNARDO, called DALLE GIRANDOLE, was a painter, sculptor, and architect; and according to Baldinucci was born in 1536. When he was eleven years of age, his parents were ruined by a sudden inundation of the Arno, and he was taken under the protection of Cosmo I., Grand Duke of Tuscan, who caused him to be educated in the best manner. He is said to have been instructed in painting by Salviati and Bronzino, in sculpture by M. Angelo Buonaroti, in architecture by Giorgio Vasari, and to have learned miniature painting under Giulio Clovio. With such advantages it is not surprising that he became eminent. He was more celebrated as an architect than a painter, and was much employed in fortification. He was also a great mechanic, and an excellent mathematician. He died in 1606.

BURANI, FRANCESCO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Reggio, by whom we have an etching of Bacchus sitting near a Tun, with three Satyrs, executed in the style of Spagnoletto.

[BURATTI, GIROLAMO, a painter of Ascoli, lived about 1580. He painted the beautiful picture of the Presipio at the Carità, in Ascoli, and some subjects in fresco, which have been highly commended.]

[BURCH, ALBERT VANDEN, a scholar of Verkolje, and of Adrian Vander Werf, painted portraits. He was born at Delft in 1672.]

BURFORD, THOMAS, an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He scraped some plates of landscapes and huntings, but was best known as an engraver of portraits. We have by him :

Doctor Warburton; after Philips.

The Reverend Roger Pickering, F. R. S. 1747.

Mr. Charles Churchill; J. H. Schaack, pin. 1765.

Vice-Admiral John Norris.

[BURG, ADRIAN VANDER, born at Dort in 1693, was a scholar of Arnold Houbraken, and a good painter of portraits. He also produced some cabinet pictures in the style of his master, and attempted to imitate the manner of Mieris and Metsu. He died in 1733.]

[BURG, THIERRY VANDEN, was born at Utrecht in 1723. He painted landscapes with cattle, views of villages and country mansions, which are in general well represented. He died in 1773.]

BURGH, H., an English engraver, who resided in London about the year 1750. He worked principally for the booksellers, and was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, among which is that of Thomas Bradbury, minister of the gospel, from his own design: it is inscribed, H. Burg. del. et sculp.

BURGHES, MICHAEL, a Dutch engraver, who settled in England on the taking of Utrecht by Louis XIV. He resided chiefly at Oxford; and on several of his plates he added to his name Academiae Oxon. calcographus. From the great number of his prints, it is probable he was employed by the booksellers, as well as for the university. He worked almost wholly with the graver, in a stiff, tasteless style. He has the merit however of having preserved to us many remains of antiquity, which would otherwise have been lost. He engraved the plates for the Almanacks of the College, the first of which, by him, was in the year 1676. His most esteemed prints are his antiquities, ruins of abbeys, and other curiosities. He engraved also several portraits and plates for the classics. The following are his principal prints. He sometimes marked his plates MB.

William Sommer, the antiquary; after Vanduyck.

Franciscus Junius; after the same.

John Barefoot, letter doctor to the University. 1681.

Head of James II.; for an Almanack. 1686.

Anthony Wood; in a niche; his only mezzotinto.

King Alfred; from a manuscript in the Bodleian Library.

Sir Thomas Bodley; in the Corners of the plate are the Heads of the other Benefactors to the Library; William, Earl of Pembroke, Archbishop Laud, Sir Kenelm Digby, and John Selden.

Timothy Hatton, provost of Queen's College.

Doctor Wallis. 1699.

Sir Thomas Wyat.

John Baliol.

Devorguilla, his spouse.

Doctor Ratcliff.

The Visage of Christ; engraved in the manner of Melan, with one stroke.

[BURGT, N. VANDER, a fruit and flower painter, about the middle of the 18th century. It is said that he copied some of Luca Giordano's pictures.]

BURGKMAIR, HANS, or JOHN, a German painter and engraver, born at Augsburg, in 1474. He was the disciple and friend of Albert Durer. In his native city are preserved several of his pictures, which are much in the style of his master, and possess considerable merit. His prints are principally, if not entirely, wooden cuts, and are executed with a spirit and fire that approaches his master. His cut in chiaro-scuro of the Emperor Maximilian I. on horseback, is dated in 1508; and it has been very probably supposed by Professor Christ, that the fine wooden cuts marked I. B., dated 1510, in the old edition of the works of Geyler de Keyserberg, are by this engraver. His prints are very numerous. He sometimes marked them with the initials H. B., and sometimes with the ciphers

HB or IGB. The following is a general list of his prints :

The Emperor Maximilian on horseback; with his name.

The same print in chiaro-scuro; dated 1508; scarce.

Joseph and Potiphar's Wife; H. B.

St. George on horseback; in chiaro-scuro, with the name of Negker.

St. Sebastian, standing in an arch; with his name. 1512.

St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew. 1514.

A young Female lamenting the loss of a Hero that Death is trampling upon; in chiaro-scuro; H. Burgkmair & I. de Negker; scarce.

Hektor von Troy, Gros Alexander, Julius Cæsar; with his name.

Lucretia, Virginia, and Veturia; with his name. 1519.

S. Elena, S. Brigita, and S. Elsbeta.

An Emperor on his Throne giving Audience to a Man.

A set of two hundred and thirty-seven plates for a book, published at Vienna, entitled Der Weyss Koney, or the wise King, giving the principal actions of the Emperor Maximilian I.

A set of thirty-eight plates of the Triumphal Entry of Maximilian I.

[It is now generally admitted that Burgkmair was not a scholar of Albert Durer. There was so little difference in their ages that it is not probable he should be. Besides his manner is essentially different from that master's: he was rather the founder of a school of his own. Recent researches would show that Hans Burgkmair was born in 1472, and that he died so late as 1559.—See Nagler's Kunstler Lexicon for a copious list of his works.]

BURINI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1660, and was a scholar of Domenico Canuti. He proved a very reputable painter of history. Many of his works are in the churches and palaces at Bologna, among which are the following. In the church of S. Tommaso dal Mercato, the Crucifixion. In the sacristy of S. Salvatore, David with the Head of Goliath. In S. Caterina de Saragozza, the Martyrdom of St. Catherine. He also painted a saloon for the Palazzo Legnani, which is very highly spoken of.

[BURKE, THOMAS, an English engraver, born in 1746. He adopted the style of Bartolozzi, in the chalk manner, and occasionally that of Earlom. He engraved chiefly after the works of contemporary artists, particularly Cipriani and Angelica Kauffman. His principal plates are "The Battle of Agincourt," and "King John signing Magna Charta," after Mortimer; the "Night Mare," after Fuseli; a portrait of Mrs. Siddons, and one of Lord North, after Dance. His prints are generally printed in red or brown colours, and are dated from 1772 to 1791.]

[BURNET, JAMES, was born at Musselburg in 1788. At an early age he showed a predilection for painting, and frequented the evening academy of Graham to obtain a knowledge of the elements. He came to London in 1810, and renewed his studies. He found in Cuyp and P. Potter much after his own heart, but in nature more. He was not of the Royal Academy; "The fields were his study, nature was his book." In his sketch-book he noted down beautiful bits of landscape, cattle, and rustic figures pursuing their avocations. These he afterwards embodied in composition, and produced "Cattle going out in the Morning," "Cattle returning home in a Shower," "Crossing the Brook," "Breaking the Ice," "Milking-time," and other beautiful pictures, full of high promise. Unfortunately for the art, his life was but short; he died in the twenty-eighth year of his age, to the regret of all who could appreciate his excellence, and who hoped in him that England would see a painter of her own rivalling the best masters of the Dutch school in the department he had chosen. He was buried in the churchyard of Lee, in Kent, a spot in which he delighted during his life.]

BURNFORD, ———, an obscure English engraver, who was employed in engraving portraits, frontispieces, and other book plates, for the publishers. Among his portraits is that of William Salmon, M. D., prefixed to his Synopsis Medicinæ.

[BURRINI, GIANANTONIO, a Bolognese painter of the schools of Canuti and Pasinelli, born in 1655, died in 1727. He showed a strong predilection for the style of Paul Veronese, and devoted much time to the study of his works. He painted a picture in that manner for the noble Ratta family, which yields to very few in their collection. He continued to paint for some time with care and attention, and produced many good pictures; but afterwards gave way to a greater facility of handling, which, unfortunately for the arts, obtained more disciples than his first manner.]

BUS, or BOS, or VANDEN BOSCH, CORNELIUS, a Dutch engraver, born at Bois le Duc, about the year 1510. He went to Italy when young, as appears from some of his prints engraved at Rome. His style of engraving resembles that of Marco da Ravenna, but is inferior to that artist. His plates are executed with the graver, in a dry formal style. He usually marked them with one of these ciphers,

C.B. CB. CB or Gv. B. The following are his best works:

- The Last Judgment; with his cipher. 1530.
- Lot and his Daughters. 1550.
- David and Uriah. 1546.
- Jesus preaching to the Jews; inscribed Beati qui, &c.
- Venus in her Car. 1546.
- Venus and Cupid coming to Vulcan. 1546.

Combat of the Centaurs and the Lapithæ; in two sheets. 1550.

Death seizing a Monk.

The Equestrian Statue of Marcus Aurelius.

A set of sixteen of Trophies, Arms, and Grotesques; Rome. 1550 to 1553.

Moses breaking the Tables of the Law; after Raffaello. 1550.

Moses presenting the Law to the People; after the same. 1551.

The Triumph of Bacchus; after Giulio Romano; in two sheets. 1543.

The Entombing of Christ; after Francis Floris. 1554.

The Battle of the Giants.

The Descent from the Cross. 1545.

BUSC, ———, an amateur engraver, who Basan reports to have etched several plates, among which were twenty-eight, after Rembrandt; and twenty of heads, &c.

BUSCA, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Milan in 1625, and was a scholar of Ercole Procaccini. In the church of S. Marco, he painted, in competition with his master, a picture of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, which does not shrink from a comparison with the works of Procaccini. This performance, however, he never after equalled. Being much afflicted with the gout, he appears to have been unable to undertake any thing with vigour: he sunk into a mannerist, and contented himself with frequently repeating the same subjects. He died in 1686.

[BUSCATI, or BUSSCAT, LUCA ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter of the 15th century. A Descent from the Cross by him is in the Ercolani Gallery at Bologna, of which Rosini has given an outline. Zani considers him among the eminent of the period, and the print justifies the opinion.]

BUSINCK, LOUIS, an engraver on wood, who was probably of Germany, as he flourished, according to M. Heineken, at Minden, about the year 1630. We have by him some wooden cuts in chiaro-scuro, executed in a very spirited and masterly manner, many of them after G. L. Allemand. He also engraved some blocks from his own designs, of which are the following:

Fidelity, an allegorical piece; from his own designs. 1630.

A half-length figure playing on the Flute; the same. 1630.

A Cavalier; full-length; the same. 1630.

Two of Peasants.

SUBJECTS IN CHIARO-SCURO; AFTER G. L.

ALLEMAND.

St. Peter holding the Keys; half-length.

St. John and St. Matthew.

Judith, with the Head of Holofernes.

Moses, with the Tables of the Law.

A Family of Beggars.

A young Man playing on the Flute.

Æneas saving Anchises from the Fire of Troy.

A Holy Family, on three blocks of wood; one for the outline, the other for the deep shadows, and another for the demi-tints.

BUSO, AURELIO. This painter was a native of Crema, and flourished about the year 1520. He studied under Polidoro da Caravaggio, and il Matrino, and assisted them in several of their works at Rome. He ornamented the palace of the noble family of Benzoni, at Venice, with some friezes and other works, in the style of Polidoro. [He was a scholar of Polidoro, and assisted him in his works, and produced many histories in his native city, in the manner of his master. He died about 1520.]

BUSSE, JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1528. He may be ranked in the class of the little masters, and was probably a disciple of Henry Aldegrever, as he copied some of the prints of that master. He engraved a set of small plates of the Seven Planets, which are marked with the initials of his name, J. B., with the date 1528. Mr. Strutt also attributed to him a small plate, lengthways, representing a man and a woman dancing, with two men playing on musical instruments, on which the name is signed at length, John Busse.

BUTI, LODOVICO, a Florentine painter, who flourished about the year 1600. He was a scholar of Santo di Titi, under whom he showed early marks of ability. On leaving that master, he applied himself to imitate works of Andrea del Sarto, whose manner he adopted with success. Baldinucci mentions several of the productions of this master in the churches and palaces at Florence; and particularly commends his picture of the Ascension in the Ognissanti. But perhaps his most creditable performance is his picture of the Miracle of the Loaves, in the gallery at Florence.

BUTTERI, GIOVANNI MARIA. According to Baldinucci, this painter was a native of Florence, and a scholar of Agnolo Bronzini. Although he painted history with some reputation, his drawing is much less correct than that of his master, and his colouring rather harsh and crude. There are several of his works in the churches and convents at Florence, where he died in 1606.

BUYTENWEG, WILLIAM DE, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Rotterdam about the year 1600. He painted conversations and landscapes with considerable reputation. Some of his pictures have been engraved by G. H. Scheyndel and E. Vandevelde. His principal work, as a painter, was the Triumph of William, Prince of Orange, engraved by C. Kittenstein. He etched some plates from his own designs, in a pleasing style; among which are the following. His usual mark was WB.

- Two of Women going to Market, one with Vegetables, and the other with Fowls.
- Seven of different Dresses of Noblemen; W. B. fec.
- Six of Dresses of Ladies.
- Ten of Landscapes, with Ruins and Figures; Verscheide Landschappes.

[Houbraken designates him Geestige Willem, (William the Gay), and under this appellation he is to be found in the Collection of Catalogues of Pictures by Hoet and Terwesten, as a painter of conversations and familiar scenes. He died in 1640.]

BYE, or BIE, JAMES DE, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1581, where he followed the profession of a print and bookseller. From the style of his plates, it is not improbable that he learned the art of engraving in the school of the Collaerts. He worked wholly with the graver; his execution is neat and firm, and his drawing tolerably correct. He holds a respectable rank among the early engravers of his country. In conjunction with the Collaerts, he engraved some of the plates in the set of fifty, of the Life, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ, after the designs of Martin de Vos. And several of the plates in the Life of the Virgin, from the designs of the same painter, were executed by this artist, together with Philip and Theodore Galle. The following are his principal prints:

- The Medals of the Roman Emperors; in the collection of the Duke d'Archoth. 1617.
- The Portraits of the Kings of France, for the History by Mezeray; fifty-eight plates.
- The Descendants of the House of de Croy; about sixty plates.
- The Portrait of Francis I.; after M. de Vos.
- Christ healing Peter's Wife's Mother; fine; for Collaert's set.
- The Resurrection of Lazarus; fine; for the same set.

BYE, or BIE, MARK DE, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at the Hague about the year 1612. He was instructed in painting by J. Vander Does, and produced some landscapes, with animals, in the style of that master, which are not without merit; but he is chiefly deserving of notice for the excellent etchings he has left us of animals, after the designs of Paul Potter and Mark Gerard. We have by him:

- Three sets, of eight each, of Cows and Oxen; after Potter.
- A set of sixteen of Sheep; after the same.
- A set of sixteen of Goats; after the same.
- A set of sixteen of Lions, Leopards, Wolves, Bears, &c.; after the same.
- A set of sixteen of the Natural History of the Bear; after Mark Gerard. 1664; scarce.

BYLERT, or BYLART, JOHN. According to Descamps, this painter was born at Utrecht in 1603. His father was a glass painter, who taught him the rudiments of design, and without the help of superior instruction, he became a reputable painter of history. His pictures are usually smaller than life; they are ingeniously composed, and are coloured with great vigour and effect. His talents have been celebrated by the poet, Cornelius de Bie, in his Gulden Cabinet.

BYRNE, WILLIAM, an English engraver, born in London in 1743. After studying some time under his uncle, an artist little known, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of Aliamet, and afterwards of J. G. Wille. Mr. Byrne may be justly ranked among our eminent engravers of landscape. His works are considerable, of which the following are the most deserving of notice:

- The Antiquities of Britain; from the charming drawings of Mr. Hearne.
- The Views of the Lakes of Cumberland and Westmoreland; after Mr. Farrington.
- The Scenery of Italy; after the fine designs of Mr. Smith.
- Apollo watching the Flocks of King Admetus; after F. Lauri; the companion to Mr. Wollett's print of Diana and Acteon.
- The Flight into Egypt; in a fine landscape; after Domenichino.
- Evening; a fine landscape; after Claude Lorraine.
- Abraham and Lot quitting Egypt; after Zuccarelli; the figures by Bartolozzi.
- A Sea-piece; after Vernet.
- Evening; after Both; the landscape by Byrne; the figures by Bartolozzi.
- Two Views of Leuben, in Saxony; after Diétricy.
- The Death of Captain Cook; the figures by Bartolozzi.
- The Water-fall of Niagara; after R. Wilson.

Mr. Byrne died in 1805, aged 62.

BYSS, JOHN RODOLPH, a Swiss painter, born at Soleure in 1660. He painted easel pictures of historical subjects in landscapes, in which he attempted to imitate the style of Gerard de Laresse, and affected the finish of Adrian Vanderwerf. He is also stated, by his countryman and biographer, Fnessli, to have painted flower-pieces, in which he equalled John van Huysum. The collectors of those subjects will not have much difficulty in deciding on their respective merits. He chiefly resided at Mentz and Vienna, where he met with great encouragement. He died in 1738.

C

CABEL, or KABEL, ADRIAN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Ryswick, near the Hague, in 1631. He was a scholar of Van Goyen, under whom he studied, until he found himself in a condition to travel from the resources of his talent. His intention was to visit Italy; but in passing through France, he made some stay at Lyons, where his works were so much admired, and so liberally paid, that he was induced to abandon his project, and to settle in that city. He painted landscapes with figures and cattle, and sea-ports, in which we discover little of the taste of his country. His figures are correctly drawn, and his animals are touched with great spirit. He appears to have sometimes imitated the style of Benedetto Castiglione and Salvator Rosa, at others that of the Caracci and P. F. Mola. The pictures of this master are very unequal, as he was not more remarkable for his ability than for the irregular and dissolute habits of his life. We have by Vander Cabel several etchings, executed in a free and spirited style. They are as follow :

A set of six Landscapes, with figures and buildings.

Thirty of Landscapes and Marines.

A set of four mountainous Landscapes, with figures; inscribed A. vander Cabel, fecit. N. Roberti, exc.

Two Landscapes, large plates, with figures.

A large upright Landscape, with St. Bruno, the figure is engraved with single strokes, in the manner of Mellan; rare.

Another, its companion, with St. Jerome; rare.

Vander Cabel died at Lyons in 1695. [The name of this artist was originally Vander Tbou, which he changed to Kabel. The associated painters at Rome called him Corydon and Geestigheid; which is a proof that he studied there, notwithstanding the assertion of Descamps to the contrary. Bartsch enumerates 55 prints by him.]

[CABEL, JAN VANDER, mentioned by Balkema as a painter of horses, cattle, landscapes, with animals and figures; but he does not give any dates.]

CABEZALERO, JUAN MARTIN DE, a Spanish painter, born, according to Palomino, at Almaden, near Cordova, in 1633. He was a disciple of Don Juan Carreño, and painted history with great reputation. His principal works are at Madrid, of which two of the most esteemed are in the church of San Nicola, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, and a picture of St. Ildefonso. He also painted in the church of the Franciscans an Ecce Homo, and the Crucifixion. He died in 1673.

CACCIA, GUGLIELMO, called IL MONCALVO. This painter was a Piedmontese, born at Montabone, in Monserrato, in 1568. He was named il Moncalvo, from his long residence at that place. Although he reached an eminent rank among the painters of his country, it is not ascertained under whom he studied. He first settled at Milan, where he painted some pictures for the churches. He afterwards resided some time at Pavia, and was made a citizen. According to Lanzi, he was not less known at Novara, Vercelli, at Alessandria, and Turin. His style has something of the energy of the Caracci; but it has been observed, by the above-mentioned author, that if he had been educated in the school of the Caracci, it is probable he would have left some of his works at Bologna, and that in his landscapes he would have shown more of the taste of Annibale than of Paul Brill. His manner partakes, altogether, more of the Roman than the Bolognese school. As a fresco painter, his abilities are considerable. In the church of S. Antonio Abate, at Milan, he painted in fresco the titular Saint, with St. Paul, the first hermit, a work which sustains itself, in the perilous comparison, with some of the best productions of the Carlomi. Another distinguished performance in fresco, by Caccia, is the cupola of S. Paolo, at Novara. Of his oil paintings the most effective are, his S. Pietro in the chiesa della Croce; his S. Teresa, in the church of that name; and the taking down from the Cross, in the church of St. Gandenzio, at Novara, which is by many considered as his chef d'œuvre. At Moncalvo, the church of the Conventuali may be considered as a gallery of his works. At Chieri are two fine pictures by this master, of the Raising of Lazarus, and the Miracle of the Loaves, admirably composed, and of the finest expression. He died in 1625. [Caccia instructed, and was assisted by, his two daughters, Orsola Maddelena, and Francesca, who may be called the Gentilesche, or the Fontane of Monferato, where they painted not only cabinet pictures, but more altar-pieces than, perhaps, any other females. The contours of their figures are exactly copied from their father, but they are not so animated. It is said that their manner was so similar, that, in order to distinguish them, the younger, Francesca, adopted the symbol of a small bird; and Ursula, who founded the convent of the Ursulines in Moncalvo, that of a flower. Of the latter her church and Casale also have some altar-pieces, and not a few cabinet pictures with landscapes touched in the style of Paul Brill, and ornamented with flowers. A Holy Family by her in this style, is in the rich collection of the Palazzo Natta. Ursula died in 1678, and her sister at the age of 57, but it is not said in what year. According to Zani they were both Ursulines.]

CACCIANEMICI, FRANCESCO, a Bolognese painter, educated in the school of Primaticcio, and was considered by that master of so promising a talent, that he made choice of him as one of the young artists that accompanied him to France, when he was invited to that court by Francis I. He assisted Primaticcio in his great work at Fontainebleau, and was also employed, in conjunction with il Rosso, in several important works. [He died in 1609.]

CACCIANEMICI, VINCENZIO. This painter was a Bolognese gentleman, who was instructed in the art by Parmegiano. Vasari mentions a picture by this amateur artist, in the chapel of the family of Elefantuzzi, in S. Petronio, at Bologna, representing the Decollation of St. John; and another picture of the same subject, differently treated, in the capella Macchiavelli, in S. Stefano. He flourished about the year 1530. There are a few etchings, marked V. C., which are attributed to this gentleman, among which are:

Diana returning from the Chase.

A Landscape, with a Nymph and Dogs.

They are executed with the graver, in a neat style, resembling that of Æneas Vico. [Zani places his death in 1542.]

CACCIANIGA, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Milan in 1700, and studied at Bologna, in the school of Marc Antonio Franceschini. He afterwards visited Rome, where he established himself, under the patronage of the Prince Borghese, for whom he executed some considerable works in the Palazzo and the Villa Borghese. His principal works are at Ancona, where he painted several altar-pieces and pictures for the churches and public edifices, of which the most esteemed are the Marriage of the Virgin, and the Last Supper.

CACCIUOLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born in the castle of Budrio, near Bologna, in 1635. He was a scholar of Domenico Maria Canuti, and proved an eminent painter of history. He painted several pictures for the churches in Bologna, and was greatly patronized by the Dukes of Parma and Modena: according to the Padre Orlandi, he died in 1675. [Zani places his birth in 1623.]

CAGLIARI, PAOLO, called PAOLO VERONESE. This distinguished painter of the Venetian school was born at Verona, according to Ridolfi, (whose accuracy respecting the artists of his country is most deserving of credit,) in 1532. He was the son of a sculptor named Gabriele Cagliari, but his disposition leading him decidedly to painting, he was placed under the tuition of Antonio Badile, his maternal uncle, at that time one of the most reputable painters at Verona. The genius of Paolo discovered itself at so early an age, that Ridolfi observes of him, that in the spring of life he produced most excellent fruit. The Cardinal Gonzaga engaged him, in concurrence with Domenico Brusascorci, Paolo Farinato, and Batista del Moro, to paint in fresco the dome of the cathedral at Mantua, where he distinguished himself above all his competitors. Verona or Mantua was too confined a theatre for the exhibition of his powers, and he visited Venice, where the senate had engaged some of the principal painters of the time to ornament the palace of the Conservators, promising a gold medal and chain to the artist whose work should be preferred. Paolo Veronese became a candidate, and obtained the prize. Titian was one of the judges, and his rivals themselves seem to have ratified his superiority. The procurator Grimani being appointed ambassador to the Pope, he invited Paolo to attend him to Rome, where he had the opportunity of studying the works of M. Angelo and Raffaele. It does not appear, however, that he either felt, or sufficiently appreciated, the beautiful simplicity of Raffaele and the antique; and perhaps he would have been less successful in his idea of excellence by adopting it, than in following the impulse of his own feelings. The beauties he neglected were undoubtedly of a superior order to those for which he is distinguished: but he might probably have attempted them in vain; and he has acquired a more than usually brilliant reputation, by attaching himself to his own fascinating delineation of sumptuous and magnificent parade. Formed by nature to be the most successful painter of splendid ornament, he was satisfied with so flattering a partition of celebrity, which raised him to a distinguished rank in the tawdry taste of his countrymen. His colour is pure, chaste, and undisturbed; and the reflections of his demi-tints are managed with an intelligence entirely his own. He is said, by M. de Piles, to have succeeded in chiaro-scuro merely by chance, and not by principle; if it be so, he must have been unusually fortunate in his chances, as these successful accidents have happened to him so generally, that they may reasonably be attributed to his perfect knowledge of breadth, and his judicious management of his masses of light and shadow. It must, however, be allowed, that the partiality of his country for ostentatious finery, rather, perhaps, than his own taste, seduced him into an open contempt for the propriety of costume; his draperies, instead of being appropriated to the personages he represented, are the fantastic habits of the Venetian nobles; and in his celebrated pictures of the Feasts of Simon and Levi, he has represented the repast of those individuals with all the sumptuous magnificence of the kings of Persia. The movement apparent in his abundant compositions, exhibits a show of fire and feeling; but it is not the fire that animated Raffaele, that inspired the exertions of M. Angelo, nor the vigorous ardour that glowed in Rubens. The principal works of this surprisingly executive painter, are the four copious and prodigious machines painted for four of the churches at Venice. The first represents the Marriage at Cana; it is upwards of twenty-five feet wide, and consists of an immense assemblage of figures, many of them portraits. It was painted for the refectory of St. Giorgio Maggiore, and is now in the gallery of the Louvre. For this prodigious work, he is said to have received only ninety ducats; but it is well known that it was his practice to receive no remuneration from the convents, beyond the expenses of his colours and canvass. The second, painted in 1570, for the church of S. Sebastiano, represents the Feast of Simon, with Magdalene washing the Feet of Christ. The third, executed for the church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo, is the Saviour at Table, with his Disciples; and the fourth is the same subject as the second, but quite differently treated; it was painted for the refectory of the Padri Servi, but was presented by the republic to Louis XIV. in 1665. The last mentioned is perhaps the finest of his works. This eminent painter has left a few etchings, which, though slight, are very masterly, viz.

The Adoration of the Magi; Paolo Veronese, fec.

Two Saints sleeping; no mark.

There are some other etchings attributed to him; marked P. C., and PA-CAL.

Paolo Veronese died in 1588. [Zani, and other writers of credit, place his birth in 1528.]

CAGLIARI, CARLETTO, was the elder son of Paolo Veronese, and was also his scholar, born at Venice in 1570. He inherited the inventive genius of his father, and with the advantage of his instruction, he painted some pictures before he was eighteen, that gave the most flattering promise of future excellence. On the death of his father, he finished several works left imperfect by Paolo, and had distinguished himself by his own compositions, when he died, at the age of 26, in 1596.

CAGLIARI, GABRIELE, was the younger son of Paolo Veronese. He was instructed by his father, and painted some few pictures and portraits; but not meeting with much success, he quitted the art, and followed commercial pursuits.

CAGNACCI, GUIDO, a Bolognese painter, born, according to Malvasia, at Castel Durante in 1600. He was a scholar of Guido Reni, and painted historical subjects in the style of that master, which, though inferior to him in graceful character and expression, possess a more vigorous colour, and are not incorrectly drawn. He passed great part of his life at Vienna, where he was much patronized by the Emperor Leopold I. His works are better known in Germany than in his own country, though some of his pictures are preserved in the Zambecari Palace at Bologna. He died in 1680.

CAGNONI, D., an Italian engraver of little celebrity, who appears to have been principally employed by the booksellers. His name is affixed to a portrait of Vietor Armiidius III., King of Sardinia.

CAIRO, CAVALIERE FRANCESCO. This painter was born in the territory of Varese, in the Milanese, in 1598. He was a disciple of Pier Francesco Morazzone, and if he did not equal his instructor in force and vigour, he surpassed him in the elegance of his design, and the amenity of his colouring. In the first part of his life he confined himself to the great principles of design, which he had acquired in the Roman school; but the blandishments of Venetian colouring induced him to study the works of Titian and Paolo Veronese, and he adopted an admirable style, which appears to have been built on a mixture of both. He was invited to the court of Victor Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, where he painted some historical works, and many portraits, which, according to Lanzi, were entirely Titianesque. There are several of his works at Milan and Turin; one of his best pictures is his St. Theresa, in S. Carlo at Venice. He died in 1674. [In a MS. quoted by Zani, it is said that he died in 1665.]

CAIRO, FERDINANDO, was born at Casalmonferrato in 1666, and received the first rudiments of design from his father, an unknown artist. He was afterwards placed under the tuition of Marc Antonio Franceschini at Bologna. He painted history, and in conjunction with Giacinto Garofalino, was employed to paint the ceiling of the church of St. Antonia at Brescia, which is favourably spoken of by Averoldi. This promising artist died at Genoa, much lamented, at the age of 26, in 1682. [Lanzi and Zani both say that this artist lived to the age of 77; though one places his death in 1743, and the other in 1748. He had an elder brother, Giuseppe, or Guglielmo, who was born in 1656, and died in 1682, which would make him of the age of 26.]

CAISSER, HENRY DE, a French engraver, who, according to Florent Le Comte, engraved several plates representing funeral processions, monuments, &c.

CALABRESE. See PRETI.

CALABRESE, MARCO. See CARDISCO.

[CALABRIA, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, who was a scholar of Luca Giordano, and an imitator of that master. He painted battle-pieces with spirit. He was in the full exercise of his talent from 1612 to 1625. It is not said when or where he was born or died.]

CALANDRA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was one of the earliest of the mosaicists, who wrought in the Vatican. In the pontificate of Urban VIII., it was found that the dampness of St. Peter's had materially affected the paintings, and it was determined to remove the principal pictures, and to replace them with copies in mosaic, of which the first was executed by Calandra, after the St. Michael of Cesare d'Arpino. The mosaic art was afterwards carried to a much higher degree of perfection by the Cristofori, who will be noticed in their place. [He was born in 1586, and died in 1644, according to Zani; but Passeri says he died in 1648, at the age of 72.]

CALANDRUCCI, GIACINTO. This painter was born at Palermo in 1646. He went early in his life to Rome, where he became a scholar of Carlo Maratti. After giving the most promising essay of his abilities in that city, in his two pictures of St. John Baptist in S. Antonio de Portoghesi, and St. Ann in S. Paolino della Regola, he returned to Palermo, where he painted his most considerable work for the church of St. Salvatore, representing the Virgin with S. Basilio and other Saints, which, according to Lanzi, was not surpassed by many productions of the time. He died in 1707.

CALCAR, or KALCKER, JOHN VAN, was born at Kalcker, in the Duchy of Cleves, in 1499. It is not said by whom he was instructed in his own country, nor at what period he left it, but in 1536 he resided in Venice, and had studied in the school of Titian. According to Vasari, he was one of the most successful imitators of that master, particularly in portraits, in which he approached so near as to mislead the best judges, and even deceived Goltzius. His powers, however, seemed to have been confined to imitation, as he is reported by Sandrart to have copied the works of Raffaele with almost equal success. He was employed by Vasari to make the drawings of the portraits of the painters, sculptors, and architects for his work. They prove him to have been an able designer, and they certainly exhibit nothing of the taste of his country. He died at Naples in 1546.

CALCIA, GIUSEPPE. This painter was a Piedmontese, and according to Lanzi was called Genovesino, which has occasioned him to be confounded with Marco Genovesini, a Milanese, who is noticed in his place. G. Calcia painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Turin and Alessandria. In the church of the P. P. Predicatori, in the former city, is a picture of St. Dominick, and another of St. Thomas; but he distinguished himself more by his cabinet historical pictures, which were gracefully designed and well coloured, one of which is particularly noticed by Lanzi in the collection of the Marchesi Ambrogio Ghilini, of Christ praying in the Garden. He flourished about the year 1675.

CALDARO. See POLIDORO DA CARAVAGGIO.

CALDERARI, GIOVANNI MARIA, was born at Pordenone about the year 1500, and was a celebrated scholar of Gio. Antonio Licinio, called Pordenone. He painted so entirely in the manner of his instructor, that he is said to have produced some works that deceived the most sagacious. At Montereale, and at Pordenone, he painted several considerable works in fresco. He died in 1564. [Zani says he was living in 1570. His works are but little known; probably they are attributed to his master Pordenone.]

CALDWALL, JAMES, a modern English engraver, by whom we have several portraits, and other subjects, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Sir Henry Oxenden de Barham, Bart.

Catherine, Countess of Suffolk.

Sir John Glynne, Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

Sir Roger Curtis.

Admiral Keppel.

John Gillies, LL. D., historian.

David Hume, historian.

Mrs. Siddons and her Son, in the character of Isabella.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Immortality of Garrick; after Carter, the figures engraved by Caldwall, and the landscape by S. Smith. The Fête Champêtre given by the Earl of Derby at the Oaks; after R. Adams, engraved by Caldwall and Grignon.

The Camp at Coxheath; after W. Hamilton.

CALENSE, CESARE. According to Dominici, this painter was a native of the province of Lecce, in the kingdom of Naples. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he attained a reputable rank in the art, by a graceful manner, founded on a correct design, and an intelligence of the chiaro-scuro. In the church of St. John Baptist at Naples is a fine picture by this master, of the taking down from the Cross, with the Marys, St. John, and other figures, full of expression and feeling. He flourished about the year 1590.

CALETTI, GIUSEPPE, called CREMONENSE. This painter was born at Ferrara about the year 1600. He first applied himself to study the works of Dosso Dossi, but he afterwards became an imitator of Titian, particularly in his bacchanalian subjects, with figures smaller than life. In these he approached so near to the glowing tones of that master, that Baruffaldi reports that he had seen many of his pictures in the galleries of the nobility at Bologna, which were believed to be the works of Titian, and he is said to have been able to counterfeit a certain patina, which time gives to painting, and which improves its harmony. His deceptions were, however, frequently discovered by his inattention to costume, and the introduction of the most absurd improbabilities. In his bacchanals, it was not unusual to introduce a modern gambol, or hunting, and, as it is sarcastically observed by Lanzi, "he placed wild boars in the sea, and dolphins in the forests." A genius of that cast was not likely to be much employed on more serious subjects. He has, however, proved himself to have been capable of more exalted exertions, by his picture of the Four Doctors of the Church, and his still more admired production of his St. Mark, both in the church of S. Benedetto at Ferrara, which last is described as designed with correctness and grandeur, and full of fine expression. He died in 1660.

CALIVARI. See CARLEVARIIS.

CALICI, ACHILLE, a Bolognese painter, born about the year 1665. He was a scholar of Prospero Fontana, but preferring the great style of Lodovico Caracci, he became his disciple, and, according to Malvasia, painted the two laterals of the great altar in the church of S. Michele Arcangelo, at Bologna, representing St. Michele, and the Angel Raffaele and Tobias.

CALIGARINO. See CAPPELLINI.

CALIMBERG, GIUSEPPE. This painter was a native of Germany, born about the year 1505, but passed the greater part of his life at Venice. Of his works in that city there remains, according to Lanzi, at the Servi, the Battle of Constantine. His style is not without merit, though rather heavy in execution, and sometimes mannered and dark. He died at Venice in 1570.

CALL, JOHN VAN. According to Descamps, this artist was born at Nimeguen in 1655. He was the son of a surveyor, and is said to have made a considerable proficiency in the art, without the help of an instructor. His first attempts were made in copying the landscapes of John Breughel, Paul Brill, and William van Nieulant, and he studied attentively the principles of perspective and architecture. He afterwards travelled through Switzerland to Italy, and, during a residence of some years at Rome, formed an ample collection of designs from the most picturesque views in the environs of that capital. He returned through Germany to his native country, and established himself at the Hague, where he died in 1703. His drawings are more esteemed than his pictures; they are purchased at considerable prices in Holland, where they are found in the choicest collections. [In the Baron Verstolk de Soelen's collection of drawings, which was sold by auction at Amsterdam in 1847, were three by Van Call, in conjunction with Backhuysen, representing an excursion of Peter the Great on the Y, and views of Amsterdam from the river. The writers of the Catalogue name him Jacques Van Kall;—erroneously it is believed.]

[CALLCOTT, AUGUSTUS WALL, an English landscape and marine painter, was born at Kensington in 1779, and died at the same place in the close of the year 1844. He was brother of the distinguished music composer, Dr. Callcott, and in early life officiated for several years in the choir of Westminster Abbey. He, however, preferred painting to music, and for some time pursued both studies together, until the success of a portrait which he painted under the tuition of Hoppner, in 1799, and which he exhibited, led him to the final choice of painting as his profession. Very little experience, however, showed him that portrait was not suited to his taste, and in 1803 he devoted himself exclusively to landscape painting. He was for many years a large contributor to the exhibitions of the Royal Academy, of which he was a member. His landscapes are generally of small dimensions, and very similar in style, being extensive views, extremely placid, with nothing in them to attract vulgar attention, but fascinating to the refined lover of nature. No comparison, however, can be instituted between his landscapes and those of Claude; they are quite dissimilar in composition and execution; both looked at nature, and each succeeded in his own way. His marine pictures please by their tranquillity; all are beautiful in the selection of objects; but they are sometimes cold and monotonous in colour. His most successful production in figure painting was his picture of Raphael and the Fornarina, exhibited in 1837: it was worthy of the prince of painters, whose amour it represented. Many of his pictures have been engraved, and probably many more will be made familiar to the public by the same means, so that a detailed account of them is not necessary here. He was made a knight in 1837, and appointed keeper of the royal collection of pictures.]

[CALLEJA, ANDRES DE, a Spanish painter, born at Rioja in 1705, was one of those artists who know how to obtain court favour and academic honours; he arrived at both, and, it seems, gained, what ought to be considered more valuable than either, the esteem and affection of his pupils for the care he bestowed on their instruction. But we are told that the principal occupation of his last years was that of restoring the ancient pictures belonging to the king! It would be unjust to visit on him all the iniquities that have been perpetrated on pictures in Spain by the process of restoring; for to such an extent has it been carried, that very few of them, really worth preserving, have escaped. He died in 1782. His best works are in the churches of Sainte Croix, of St. Philippe le royal, the chapel of the Treasury, and the convent of St. Francis.]

[CALLET, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, a French historical painter, born in 1741, and died in 1823. He painted classical subjects, and also circumstances in the life of Napoleon; the portraits of Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and the Count d'Artois. Part of the ceiling of the gallery of Apollo in the Louvre, and that of the Luxembourg, are by him. His pictures are confined to his own country.]

CALLOT, JAMES. This ingenious designer and admirable engraver was born at Nancy, in Lorraine, in 1593. He was the son of John Callot, a gentleman of a noble family, and herald at arms for Lorraine. His parents destined him to a very different profession, but his love for the art induced him to quit his paternal home, when he was only twelve years of age, and being without money or resources, he attached himself to a company of wandering Bohemians, and found his way to Florence. He was taken notice of by some officer attached to the court, who placed him under Cantagallina to learn drawing. After passing some time at Florence, he visited Rome, where being recognised by some persons of Nancy, who were friends of his family, he was prevailed on to return with them to his parents. Meeting with a continued opposition to his desire of following his favourite pursuit, he again eloped, but was followed by his brother to Turin, and brought back to Nancy. His parents, at length, finding it in vain to control so confirmed an attachment, permitted him to visit Rome, for the purpose of study, in the suite of the envoy from the Duke of Lorraine to the Pope. Callot, on his arrival at Rome, gave full scope to the bent of his genius, and he studied drawing with the greatest assiduity, under the tuition of Giulio Parigi. Having become a ready and able designer, he was desirous of acquiring the free use of the graver, for which purpose he placed himself under Philip Thomasin. He was not, however, very successful in the execution of the graver, of which he appears himself to have been sensible, as he soon abandoned it for the point. He went again to Florence, in the time of the Grand Duke Cosmo II., and etched some small plates from his own designs, which had the greatest success, procured him the patronage of the Duke, and brought him into the highest estimation with the public. On the death of Cosmo, he returned to Nancy, where he found a new and liberal protector, in Henry, Duke of Lorraine. In 1628, he went to Paris, where his works were already much admired, and he was employed by Louis XIII. to engrave some of the principal sieges and battles of the French, particularly those of Rochelle and the Isle de Ré. Whilst he was in the highest favour at the court of France, he gave a praiseworthy proof of his loyalty and patriotism. On being required by the Cardinal de Richlieu to make a drawing, and engrave a plate, of the Siege of Nancy, which was at that time taken by the French in 1631, as he had done of those of Rochelle and Ré, he desired to be permitted to decline what he considered as celebrating the humiliation of his country. On the minister's observing, in an insolent and threatening tone, that there were means of making him comply; Callot spiritedly replied, "I will sooner cut off my right hand, than employ it in any thing derogatory to the honour of my prince, or disgraceful to my country." Every one the least conversant in the art of engraving, is acquainted with some of the works of this ingenious artist. They evince the most extraordinary fertility of invention, and exhibit the most surprising variety of style. His greatest merit is in the prints where he has confined himself to very small figures; when he attempted them on a larger scale, his style becomes rather heavy, and loses a portion of that taste and spirit that distinguish his figures of a small proportion. The drawings of Callot are extremely admired, and they possess even more spirit than his prints. He frequently made several designs for the same plate, before he could arrange his subject to his satisfaction; and M. de Watetet asserts that he had seen four different drawings by him, for his celebrated plate of the Temptation of St. Anthony. The number of his prints is prodigious, and amounts to upwards of fifteen hundred. The most complete

[CALOMATO, BARTOLOMEO, a Venetian painter, who flourished from 1650 to 1660; was remarkable for his small pictures, representing civic and rural views, enlivened with figures, well composed, and graceful and lively in expression.]

CALVART, DENIS. This eminent painter, who may be rather considered as a Bolognese than a Fleming, was born at Antwerp in 1555. He had made some proficiency in the art in his own country, when he visited Italy, and came to Bologna with some talents as a landscape painter. To perfect himself in the study of the figure, he first frequented the school of Prospero Fontana, and afterwards became a disciple of Lorenzo Sabbatini, to whom he was of no inconsiderable utility in his works in the Vatican. On leaving Sabbatini, he occupied some time in studying the works of Raffaele, and the other great objects of art at Rome, and returned to Bologna, where he established that celebrated school where Albano, Domenichino, and Guido received their first instruction in the art. An excellent colourist, like the other artists of his country; intelligent in perspective, which he had learned under Fontana; and a correct and graceful designer, from the tuition of Sabbatini; he was regarded at Bologna as the restorer of their school, which had at that period fallen into some degree of decadence, particularly in colouring. There is something mannered in his style, and a certain air in the movement of his figures that is strained and indecorous. The first defect may be attributed to the taste of the preceding age, the other to the effect of his natural disposition, which tradition describes as remarkably fiery and turbulent. He was, notwithstanding, an excellent instructor of the youth of his time, and attended the studies of his pupils with the greatest diligence and assiduity. Of his works as a painter, the most esteemed are, the Holy Family, with St. Roch and St. Sebastian, in the church of S. Giuseppe at Bologna; our Saviour appearing to Magdalene, in S. Giorgio; St. Gregory converting the Heretics, in S. Gregorio; and St. Michael, in S. Petronio. The last is considered his best work. D. Calvart died at Bologna in 1619. [Others place his birth in 1553. His name is differently written by authors, but on his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, he has inscribed 1583, DIONISIO CALVAERT, DE ANTVERSA.]

CALVI, LAZZARO and PANTALEO. These artists were the sons of Agostino Calvi, a respectable Genoese painter, who was one of the first reformers of the old style of his country. Lazzaro was born in 1501, and with his brother Pantaleo was educated under Perino del Vaga. He was twenty-five years of age when he quitted the school of Perino. Although Pantaleo was the elder brother, he contented himself with unobtrusively contributing to the celebrity of Lazzaro, by an exercise of his powers in the ornamental accessories, which formed no inconsiderable part of the attraction of the works which they executed at Genoa, and the different towns of the republic; at Monaco, and at Naples. Lanzi considers, as their principal work, the façade of the Palazzo Doria, (now that of Spinola,) where are represented prisoners, and other figures, in various attitudes, designed in so grand a style, and executed in so fine a taste, that it is in itself a school for the study of drawing. This work of the Calvi is mentioned by Lomazzo in terms of the highest praise, in his Trattato della Pittura. Their picture of the Continnence of Scipio, in the Palazzo Pallavicini, at Zerbinò, exhibits an acquaintance with the nude, which Mengs considered worthy of their master del Vaga. It is suspected by Lanzi that they may have been assisted in some of their best works by Perino, as he is known to have very liberally accommodated them with his drawings and cartoons. The jealousy or ambition of Lazzaro, irritated by the success of some of his contemporaries, prompted him to the commission of the most horrid crimes. He occasioned the death of Giacomo Bargone, a most promising artist, by poison; and he hired assassins to vilify the works of the ablest painters of the time, and to extol his own. It was in the midst of these cabals and atrocities that he was engaged, in conjunction with Andrea Semini and Luca Cambiaso, to paint, in the chapel de Nobili Centurioni, the Birth and Life of St. John the Baptist; and although, in this competition, he exerted his utmost powers, and produced one of his finest works, the preference was given to the performance of Cambiaso, whom the prince, in consequence, fixed on to execute the fresco paintings in the church of S. Matteo. This mortifying discomfiture so disgusted and enraged him, that he determined to abandon the art, and he actually became a mariner, and withdrew himself from painting for twenty years. He returned, however, to his profession, which he continued till he was in his eighty-fifth year. His last works were for the church of S. Caterina, and it is not surprising that, at so advanced a period of life, they were weak, languid, and senile. He lived to the extraordinary age of 105, and died in 1606.

CALVI, GIULIO, called IL CORONATO. This painter was born at Cremona about the year 1570. He was a scholar of Gio. Batista Trotti, and according to Zaist, in his Notizie istoriche de Pittori Cremonesi, painted so much in the manner of his master, that his pictures might have been confounded with the inferior works of Trotti, had he not signed them with his name. He died young in 1596.

CALZA, ANTONIO, a painter of battles, born at Verona in 1653. He studied at Bologna under Carlo Cignani, but his genius leading him to paint animals and horses, and having met with some of the works of Bourgoignon, he resolved to visit Rome, for the purpose of studying under that master, by whose instruction he was greatly assisted. He returned to Bologna, where he painted battle-pieces and landscapes with great success, and had a number of scholars and imitators, his pictures being much in vogue. [Zani places his birth in 1653, and his death in 1725; Guarienti says he died in 1714; Oretti, that he was born in 1636 and died in 1738.]

CAM, F. VANDER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1750. He executed some plates in mezzotinto, representing scriptural subjects.

CAMASSEL, ANDREA. This painter was born at Bevagna in 1601. He first studied under Domenichino at Rome, but afterwards attached himself to the school of Andrea Sacchi. His powers, as an historical painter, are evident in many of the public edifices at Rome. His conceptions are noble and elevated, his colouring is tender and harmonious, and his pencil is free and flowing. In the Palazzo Rondinini, is his Battle of Constantine with Maxentius, and in the battisterio of the Lateran, the Triumph of Constantine; but he is still more to be admired in his Assumption of the Virgin in the Rotonda, and his Pietà at the Cappucini. He died in 1648.

CAMBIASO, or CANGIAGIO, GIOVANNI, a Genoese painter, born in the valley of Polcevera, near Genoa, in 1495; he was a disciple of Antonio Semini, and a contemporary of Pierino del Vaga and Pordenone, and like them was one of the first reformers of the antique dry style that preceded them.

CAMBIASO, or CANGIAGIO, LUCA. This eminent painter was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Genoa in 1527, and received his instruction in the rudiments of art from his father. Born with the genius of a painter, he soon outstripped his instructor; and when he was fifteen, produced works that had the appearance of maturity, and sufficient indication that he would prove one of the most distinguished painters of his country. Prompt and bold in his design, yet selected by Boschini as an example of correctness, his drawings are the admiration of the judicious, and notwithstanding their multiplicity, hold a high rank in the portfolios of the curious. He possessed a fecundity of invention that gave a novelty to every thing he produced, and he shows his powers in foreshortening in the most daring variety. Far from shunning, he appears to have courted, and conquered, the most arduous difficulties of the art. He visited Florence and Rome, where he increased his natural conception of grandeur, by contemplating the works of Michael Angelo and Raffaele. In his first performances he appears to have been led away by the ardour and vivacity of his genius, and his early works have something of the extravagant and gigantesque. It was usual for him to paint, both in oil and in fresco, without having prepared either drawing or cartoon. In his better time, he checked this impetuosity, and it was in the middle of his life that he produced his most esteemed works. His picture of the Martyrdom of St. George, in the church dedicated to that Saint, is considered by some as his best performance, from the admirable expression in the head of the martyr, the ample and ingenious composition, and the judicious conduct of the chiaro-scuro; but others prefer his S. Benedetto, and his S. Giovanni Batista, at Rocchettini; and above all, his Rape of the Sabinians, at the Palazzo Imperiali, at Terralba, near Genoa. Every thing pleases in this work; the sumptuous architecture, the beauty and spirit of the horses, the modest reluctance of the women, the impassioned ardour of the men, and the appropriate minor accessories with which he has accompanied and accomplished his subject, form an assemblage of perfection that has rarely been surpassed. It is said that Mengs, on seeing this picture, declared he had seen nothing out of Rome that approached so near to the beauty of the loggie of the Vatican. Philip II., apprized of his talents, invited him to Madrid in 1583, and employed him in the Escorial, where he painted the ceiling of the choir, representing the Assemblage of the Blessed, an immense composition, which is highly applauded by Lomazzo, but not equally estimated by Mengs, which will not be thought extraordinary by those who are acquainted with the candid liberality of the critic, and are aware of his ambition of being considered the Rafaele of Spain. Cambiaso died at the Escorial in 1585. [He is also called Luchetto da Genova.]

CAMBIASO, or CANGIAGIO, ORAZIO, was the son and scholar of the preceding painter, and when Luca was invited to Spain, he accompanied his father. After the death of Luca, Philip II. continued to employ him, and settled on him a liberal pension.

CAMERATA, GIUSEPPE, a Venetian painter in miniature, and an engraver, born at Venice about the year 1724. He was the son of G. Camerata, a painter of some reputation, who had studied under Gregorio Lazzarini. He learnt the use of the graver from Giovanni Cattini, and in 1751 was invited to Dresden, to assist in engraving the plates for the gallery, where he was made principal engraver to the court. We have by him several plates, not only from the pictures in the Dresden gallery, but from his own designs, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Marco Foscarini, Doge of Venice.
Simone Contarini, Procurator of St. Mark.
Sebastiano Bombelli, Pictor celeberrimus.

[Nagler says he was born in 1718, and died in 1803.]

CAMILO, FRANCISCO. According to Palomino, this painter was the son of Domenico Camilo, a Florentine who had settled in Spain. He was a native of Madrid, and a scholar of Pedro de las Cuevas. He proved a reputable painter of history, particularly in his colouring, which is sweet and tender. One of his most esteemed works is in the church of the Capuchins at Alcalá de las Henares, representing St. Mary of Egypt before the Virgin, with a number of Saints and other figures, which Palomino says would alone establish his fame. Of nearly equal merit is his San Carlos Borromeo, in the Padres Minores at Salamanca, and his Descent from the Cross, in San Justo. But his most celebrated performance is his Nuestra Señora de Belen, in the church of San Juan de Dios, at Madrid, which Palomino emphatically says, is without limit in perfection. He died in 1671, in the prime of life.

CAMPAGNOLA, GIULIO, a painter and engraver, born at Padua, and flourished about the year 1500.

He excelled in miniature, and also painted a few pictures in oil, that approached some steps towards the modern style. We have the following plates engraved by this artist:

Ganymede taken up to Heaven, by the Eagle of Jupiter.

This plate is engraved in the manner of Marc Antonio, and though he has not been unsuccessful in point of execution, he is very inferior in the drawing: inscribed Julius Campagnola Antenoreus, fec.

St. John the Baptist holding a Cup; also with his name.

It is deserving of remark, that this print is engraved in a peculiar manner for the time. The background is expressed by dots, apparently executed with the dry point, and the outline of the figure is put in with a deeply engraved stroke, finished within with dots. The execution of this plate affords a reasonable presumption, that this style of engraving, which has been generally considered of modern date, is of some antiquity. [There has been much discussion, and some acrimonious controversy, respecting this artist. See Zani, Encyclopaedia, part I. vol. v., and Otley's Inquiry into the Origin and early History of Engraving. Bartsch describes eight prints by Giulio Campagnola; Otley, note.]

CAMPAGNOLA, DOMENICO, was the son of the preceding artist, and flourished about the year 1543. Bred in the school of Titian, Domenico soon attained a proficiency that even roused the jealousy of his master. His fresco paintings in the Scuola del Santo lose little of their merit by a comparison with the works of his admirable instructor, and in his oil pictures in that of the S. M. del Parto, he wrestles with him more equally. In the compartments of the ceiling, in which he has represented the Evangelists and other Saints, he appears (says Lanzi) to have aspired to a grandeur above Titian, and to have marked the naked with a more daring and unrestrained outline. Ridolfi speaks highly of his merit as a painter of landscapes, which he says are in the fine style of Titian, and little inferior to those of that master. Domenico Campagnola holds an eminent rank as an engraver, and his etchings, and wooden cuts, are executed in a style that shows the hand of a great master; the major part of them are after his own designs. He sometimes marked his plates D. C., and sometimes

DO.

THE FOLLOWING ARE HIS ETCHINGS.

[The following is a list of the prints by Domenico Campagnola, as given by Otley; which will be found to differ very materially from that given above:

1. Christ healing the sick Man at the Pool of Bethesda.
2. The Resurrection of Christ.
3. The Descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost.
4. The Assumption of the Virgin.

6. The Decollation of a Female Saint.
7. Venus naked, seated upon a Bank in a Landscape, and turned towards the right.

11. St. Jerome seated naked at the entrance of a Hovel, with the Lion at his feet.
12. A Dance of twelve Cupids, two of them with Tamboourines.

Otley observes, "there exist also with the name of Domenico Campagnola, a small number of wood prints; but there appears reason to believe that they were engraved by others after his designs."

CAMPALASTRO, LODOVICO, a painter of Ferrara, in which city there are several of his works. In the church of S. Crispino, the Nativity, the Repose in Egypt, and the Adoration of the Magi; and in S. Lorenzo, St. Francis of Assisi.

CAMPANA, PIETRO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Soria in 1727. He learned the use of the graver from Rocco Pozzi, and lived the greater part of his life at Rome and Venice. We have the following prints by him:

St. Francis of Paola; after Seb. Conca.

St. Peter delivered from Prison; after Mat. Preti.

Portrait of P. da Cortona; from the picture in the Florentine Gallery.

Portrait of Bernardino Barbatelli, called Poccetti.

[He died in 1765.]

CAMPANA, TOMMASO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and, according to Masina, a scholar of Guido. That he did not disgrace his instructor is evident, from his two pictures in the cloister of St. Michel in Bosco, at Bologna, representing subjects from the life of St. Cecilia.

CAMPANELLA, AGOSTINO. This artist was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1770. He engraved several plates representing historical and biblical subjects. They are executed with the graver in a neat style, but the drawing is not very correct.

CAMPANELLA, ANGELO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Rome about the year 1748. He engraved the statues of the twelve Apostles which are in the church of St. John of Lateran; and some of the plates for Gavin Hamilton's Schola Italica, one of which was the Presentation in the Temple; after Fra. Bartolomeo. [He died in 1815.]

CAMPANNA, PEDRO. This painter was born at Brussels in 1503, but went to Italy when he was very young. He has been generally accounted among the disciples of Raffaele; but that could hardly have been the case, as Raffaele died in 1520, when Campagna was only seventeen years of age. He, however, certainly attached himself to the Roman school; and if he had not the advantage of being instructed by Raffaele, he at least formed his style from an attentive study of his works. In the year 1530, he resided at Bologna, and on the occasion of Charles V. visiting that city, he was of sufficient celebrity to be selected to paint the triumphal arch under which the emperor passed. He was invited by that monarch to visit Spain, where he resided many years, and distinguished himself by several important performances. His principal works are at Seville, in the cathedral of which city is his celebrated picture of the Purification, and another of the Nativity. In the church of San Lorenzo is his Descent from the Cross. Campagna acquired in Spain both riches and fame, and died at Brussels in 1570.

CAMPBELL, J. This artist was probably a native of Scotland. He flourished about the year 1754, and engraved a few plates after Rembrandt, in which he imitated the style of that master with considerable success.

[CAMPER, PETER, a celebrated professor of anatomy and surgery, was also an amateur painter. He succeeded in copying the works of Carlo Lotti and other Italian masters, as also those of Honthorst. He took lessons from Karel de Moor, and produced some cabinet pictures in the manner of that master; but most of his productions have the marks of imitation rather than originality. He published a work very useful to young students in painting. He was born at Leyden in 1722, and died at the Hague in 1789.]

CAMPHUYSEN, THEODORE RAPHAEL, a Dutch painter, born at Gorcum in 1586. He was a scholar of Dietric Govertze. He painted small landscapes, with ruins, and views of the Rhine, with boats and small figures, neatly drawn, and spiritedly touched. He frequently represented these subjects by moonlight, with a pleasing and natural effect. [This is the account generally given of Theodore Raphael Kamphuisen, or Camphuisen. Some have supposed him to have been a pupil, or at least an imitator, of Paul Potter, and so close is the resemblance in their manner of painting, that a picture by Camphuisen was exhibited in the Louvre, in 1814, under the name of Potter, and was claimed and restored to the gallery at Hesse Cassel, in 1815, where it still remains under the same name, though it is in fact the work of the former. Balkema states that Kamphuisen quitted the profession of a painter at the age of eighteen, for the study of Theology, and became a minister of the Reformed church. Others say that he practised his profession only till he was eighteen, when he became tutor to the sons of Lord Nieupoort, which nobleman afterwards made him his secretary. Balkema says he died in 1626. This at once disposes of the supposition that he imitated Paul Potter, who was born in 1625. Again, it is said that he lived to an advanced age: this would tend to support the opinion that he made Potter his model, when his early love of the art returned upon him on seeing the works of that master, so congenial to his own feeling; but where are the proofs of these being facts? Füssli and Zani both say that he had a son named Hermann, who flourished from 1650 to 1670; and a landscape painter, J. C. Kamphuisen, is also named, but no particulars are given of him. There are several pictures in England known as the works of Kamphuisen, or Camphuisen, but which cannot be by Theodore

Raphael Camphuisen, as they are evidently of a later date than 1626, and have no analogy to those of P. Potter. They represent well-wooded landscapes, generally with a stream through which peasants are passing with a cart and horse carrying their produce to market. They are admired for the sparkling lights which the artist introduced, playing on the rippled water, or by the splashing caused by the horse and vehicle, and for the depth and richness of their tone. In these many have imagined that they discovered some resemblance to Paul Potter, probably relying on the erroneous tradition; but in what respect, it would be difficult to satisfy an unprejudiced connoisseur. It is desirable that the author should be ascertained, as no writer on the subject of pictures has before noticed him.]

CAMPI, GALEAZZO. This painter was born at Cremona in 1475, and is stated by Vasari to have been a disciple of Boccaccio Boccacino. This is however very reasonably doubted by Lanzi, on the ground that his pictures, which remain in the churches at Cremona, are in a very different style, and even more dry and Gothic than those of Boccacino, as is evident in his picture in S. Sebastiano, of the Virgin and Infant, with S. Rocco, which bears the date of 1518, when he must have reached his best time, where he appears to have been a feeble follower of the style of Perugino, possessing a tolerably good colour, but weak in chiaro-scuro, meager in design, and insipid in expression. His best work seems to have been his own portrait, which is in the gallery at Florence. [On the portrait is inscribed his age, 53, and the date 1528.]

CAMPI, GIULIO. This reputable painter was the son of Galeazzo Campi, born at Cremona in 1500. Giulio, like Lodovico Caracci, may be regarded as the founder of the most celebrated school of his country. His father, not considering himself competent to cultivate, by his own instruction, the marked genius that he discovered in his son, sent him to Mantua, to be educated under Giulio Romano. In that school he studied with great application, and his advancement was commensurate with his assiduity. A great style of architecture, grandeur of conception, energy of character, and a commanding facility, were the acquirements with which Campi left the school of Giulio Romano, to study at Rome the works of Raffaele, and the beauties of antiquity. Nor was he inattentive to the blandishments of colouring, which he studied in the works of Pordenone and Titian. Milan, Cremona, and Mantua possess his most considerable works. The church of S. Margherita, at Cremona, is almost entirely ornamented with his pictures. The dome of S. Girolamo, at Mantua, the Descent from the Cross, in S. Grismondo at Cremona, give ample testimony of the vigorous powers of this distinguished painter. He died in 1572.

CAMPI, ANTONIO CAVALIERE, was the younger brother of Giulio, a native of Cremona, and flourished about the year 1586. He was instructed by his brother, and distinguished himself both as a painter and an architect, but excelled particularly in the latter. He executed several works, both in oil and in fresco, at Cremona and Milan. His best pictures are St. Paul resuscitating Eutychus, which is engraved by Agostino Caracci, and the Nativity, in the church of S. Paolo, at Milan. He was less successful in his fresco paintings, in which he vainly attempted to follow the great style of Coreggio. He was undoubtedly a man of genius, spirited and resolute, but he wanted judgment and discretion.

CAMPI, VINCENZIO, was the third son of Galeazzo Campi, and was brought up in the school of his brother Giulio. His chief merit was in painting portraits and still-life, although he attempted some historical subjects, in which he was very inferior to his brothers. He died in 1591.

CAMPI, BERNARDINO. This painter was of the same family as the three preceding artists, born at Cremona in 1522. He was intended for the profession of a goldsmith, but on seeing the copies of two of the tapestries, designed by Raffaello, which had been copied by Giulio, he determined to change his pursuit, and to study painting under his relative. He remained with Giulio some time, but afterwards went to Mantua, where he frequented the school of Ippolito Costa. When he was nineteen years of age, he commenced professor, and it was not long before he displayed the superiority of his genius. During his studies under Costa, at Mantua, he was not inattentive to the works of Giulio Romano, in that city, in which he discovered all that could inspire the mind of a student with the sublimity of conception, and dispose it to receive the grandest impressions. The beauty and simplicity of Raffaello had made him embrace every opportunity of studying from the drawings and prints after that master. One of his protectors conducted him to Parma and Modena, that he might become acquainted with the style of Coreggio; and on his return to Cremona, he proved how much he had profited by it, in his great work in the cupola of S. Gismondi. Compared with Giulio Campi, Bernardino will be found less bold, but more correct; not so grand, but possessed in a more refined degree of ideal beauty, and of that sensibility of expression which reaches the heart. St. Gismondi, at Cremona, is the theatre of his triumph. Nothing can be imagined more simple, and more conformable to the finest taste in the best era of the art, than his St. Cecilia with St. Caterina, and a Choir of Angels. But, above all, he has distinguished himself by his prodigious work in the cupola of that church, in which he has represented an assemblage of all the blessed, of the Old and New Testament, each with appropriate symbols, a composition with which his biographer Lamo does not hesitate to assert, few productions in Italy will bear a comparison, for abundance of invention, grandeur of style, variety of character, and the admirable harmony that reigns through the whole. This immense work is of stupendous dimensions, and though the figures are seven braccia high, such is his judicious management of the point of view, that they only appear of the size of nature. He completed this great work in the surprising short space of seven months. He died about the year 1592.

CAMPIDOGLIO. See ANGELO.

CAMPIGLIA, GIO. DOMENICO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Lucca in 1692. He studied at Florence, under Tommaso Redi and Lorenzo del Moro; and at Bologna attended the school of Gioseffo dal Sole. He painted some historical subjects at Florence, and several portraits, among which was his own, which is placed in the gallery. He particularly excelled in drawing after the antique marbles, and was much employed at Rome and Florence, in making drawings for the engravers. He etched himself several plates, and among others the following portraits of artists:

Giovanni Domenico Campiglia.
Giovanni Lorenzo Bernini.
Giulio Romano.

Salvatore Rosa.
Leonardo da Vinci.
Giovanni Antonio Razzi.

[According to Nagler, he died in 1763.]

CAMPINO, GIOVANNI, was a native of Camerino, about the year 1590. This painter is a remarkable, if not a solitary instance, of an Italian migrating from his country to study the art of painting. Sandrart, however, assures us, that he went to Antwerp, and placed himself as a student under Abraham Janssens, a contemporary of Rubens, with whom he remained some years, and returning to Italy settled at Rome, where he attached himself to the works of Caravaggio, whose manner resembled, in many respects, that of his Flemish instructor. He painted some pictures at Rome with sufficient success to procure him an invitation to the court of Spain, where he was employed, according to Sandrart, by the King, [and died there in 1650.]

CAMPION, CHARLES and TERSAN DE, two French amateurs, brothers, by whom we have several plates, some of which are executed with the graver, and some etched. They lived at Paris about the year 1770.

[It should be Charles Campion, Comte de Tersan; his brother's name was Joseph André. Charles was born at Paris in 1744, and died about 1816: he was an ecclesiastic. Of Joseph but little has been said: it is probable that he worked conjointly with his brother, as they were both amateurs, and employed themselves in the art merely for amusement. The etchings by Charles are marked C. C. and C. P. C. de T.]

CAMPOLLO, PLACIDO. According to Hackert, in his Memorie de Pittori Messinesi, this artist was born at Messina, in 1693. He studied at Rome, under Sebastiano Conca, where he was more indebted for his advancement to his designs from the antique marbles, and his contemplation of the works of Raffaello, than to the precepts of his instructor. On his return to Sicily he distinguished himself as a painter of history, particularly in fresco. One of his principal works is the ceiling of the Galleria del Senato, at Messina, which is admired for the ingenuity of the composition, and the correctness of the design. He died of the plague in the fatal year 1743.

[CAMPROBIN, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter of animals, fruit, and flowers, flourished about 1660. His pictures of the latter kind are to be seen in several churches at Andalousia; those which he considered his best are signed Pedro de Camprobin Pasano fecit.]

CAMU, LE, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1746. He engraved a print of the Temple of Arts, from the design of G. M. Dumont.

CANAL, ANTONIO, called CANALETTI. This celebrated painter of perspective views was born at Venice in 1697. He was the son of a scene painter, and was himself employed for some years in painting decorations for the theatre, an occupation, which from necessary despatch, and variety of contrivance, secured to him great readiness of hand and promptness of invention. Aspiring to a higher walk in the art, he visited Rome, and passed some time in designing the grand remains of antiquity in that metropolis and its vicinity. He returned to Venice, where the interior views of that city furnished him with the most picturesque and interesting subjects for his works, which he treated with an intelligence of perspective, and a conduct of aerial tint, that approach to illusion. Such was his extraordinary facility, that the number of his pictures is immense, and yet they have the appearance of being carefully finished. There is scarce a collection without its pair of Canaletti's. It ought, however, to be observed, that he had several scholars who painted similar subjects so neatly, that they have been sometimes mistaken for his works, particularly F. Guardi. But the intelligent observer will not find it difficult to distinguish the genuine works of Canaletti by a superior lineal precision, and a peculiarly brilliant effect of light. He died in 1768. [The name by which he is generally known should be written Canaletto, not Canaletti. His works are sufficiently known to make comment on them unnecessary; but there are hundreds attributed to him that are spurious.]

CANAL, BERNARDO, was the nephew of the preceding artist, born at Venice about the year 1724. After receiving the instruction of his uncle he visited Rome, where he painted some pictures in the style of Canaletti. He afterwards went to Germany, where he conceitedly assumed the title of Count Bellotti, by which name, according to Mr. Heineken, he is best known in that country, where his works, as a painter of perspective, and architectural views, are much admired, particularly at Dresden, where he passed great part of his life. He has etched several plates of views of that city and the neighbourhood, which are executed with neatness and spirit, and produce a good effect. He died at Warsaw in 1780.

CANALE, GIUSEPPE, a modern Italian designer and engraver, born at Rome in 1728. He was instructed in engraving by Jacob Frey, and also frequented the school of the Cavaliere Benefiale. In 1751, he was invited to Dresden, to assist in making the drawings and engraving the plates of a part of the pictures in the gallery; he was appointed engraver to the court. We have by him the following prints:

PORTRAITS.

Maria Mattia Perini; after M. Benefiale.

 Maria Josephina, Queen of Poland.

CANE, CARLO. This painter was born at Gallarate, a small town in the Milanese, in 1618, and was first instructed by Melchiore Gillardini, but he afterwards studied under the Cavaliere Morazone. He imitated the works of the latter with success, and became a painter of history of some note, particularly in fresco. His best works are his S. Ambrogio, and his S. Ugo, painted in fresco in the Certosa, at Padua. He also painted landscapes and animals, which he touched with great spirit. He died at Milan in 1688. [Lanzi observes that Carlo Cane, of Trino, painted in 1600, as we learn from Giovanni Andrea Irico in his account of Trino, who cites two altar-pieces dated the said year, with the name Trinensis. Orlandi mistakes in saying he was born in the Milanese, 1618, and died at the age of 70.]

CANINI, GIOVANNI AGNOLO, was born at Rome in 1617, and was a scholar of Domenichino, but afterwards frequented the school of Barbalunga. He painted history with no inconsiderable reputation, and was received into the academy at Rome in 1650. In the church of S. Martino a monti, at Rome, are his two pictures of the Martyrdom of Stefano and St. Bartolomeo. He was also employed by the Queen of Sweden in some considerable works. He died in 1666.

CANO, ALONSO. This celebrated Spanish artist has been called, with some propriety, the Michael Angelo of Spain. He distinguished himself as a painter, a sculptor, and an architect, in all of which branches he excelled, and it is not easy to determine in which he was most conspicuous. According to Palomino, he was born at Grenada in 1600, the son of Miguel Cano, an eminent architect, who brought him up to his own profession: but the genius of Alonso was not to be confined to the limit his father had prescribed to him. He applied himself to the arduous art of sculpture, in which he made a surprising progress in a little time. He afterwards visited Seville, and placed himself under Francisco Pacheco, a painter in some celebrity, with whom he remained eight months; and afterwards studied under Juan del Castillo, then considered one of the greatest painters in Spain. He executed many works for the public places at Seville that excited astonishment, as the productions of a young artist of little more than twenty years of age. He was so noble-minded, and conceived so elevated an idea of his art, that he would receive no remuneration for his early works, declaring that he then considered himself unfinished and deficient, that he worked for practice and improvement, and could not in conscience receive any recompence for such unworthy objects. At a more advanced period of his life, he produced many admirable compositions. In the church of Santa Maria at Madrid, is a celebrated picture by him, representing a subject from the life of S. Isidoro; a Saint Francis, in Santiago; and in San Miguel two pictures of S. Caterina and San Joseph. Many other excellent works by this painter are to be seen in the Imperial college, and other public situations in Madrid, which sufficiently establish his fame as one of the greatest painters of his country. The numerous monuments of his ability as a sculptor and an architect, are not noticed, as beyond the limit of this publication. He died at Madrid in 1676. [Palomino is wrong in both his dates of the birth and death of Alonso Cano. He was born the 19th of March, 1601, and died the 5th of October, 1667. His works are numerous, and are to be found in all the principal churches and convents of Cordova, Madrid, Grenada, Seville, and indeed throughout Spain. See an ample account in Cean Bermudez, Diccionario Historico, &c.]

CANOT, PETER CHARLES, a French engraver, born in 1710. He came to England in 1740, where he resided the remainder of his life. He engraved a great number of plates of landscapes, marines, and other subjects, many of which have great merit. Some of his best prints are those he engraved after the marines and sea engagements, painted by Mr. Paton; besides which, the following are his most esteemed plates:

- A slight Breeze; after Backhuysen.
- A fresh Breeze; after W. Vanderveelde.
- A Calm; after the same.
- A Storm; after the same.
- Returning from Market; after Berghem.
- The Farm-yard; after P. de Laer.
- The Amorous Topper; after D. Teniers.

- Sunrise, a marine; after the same.
- Two pastoral subjects; after Rosa da Tivoli.
- Two views of Westminster Bridge and London Bridge; after Scott.
- Seven of Fox Huntings; after Wootton.

[He died in 1777.]

CANTAGALLINA, REMIGIO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence in 1582. He frequented for some time the school of the Caracci, though he does not appear to have distinguished himself as a painter. He was instructed in engraving by Giulio Parigi. His pen drawings possess great merit, and are highly esteemed. We have a number of plates by him of landscapes, theatrical decorations, and triumphal entries. This artist has the credit of having been the instructor of Callot and Stefano della Bella. The following are his principal prints. His mark is

- The immaculate Conception; after Callot.
- A set of four landscapes; dated 1609.
- A set of six landscapes.
- A set of twelve landscapes; octagon; marked with his cipher.
- A set of six landscapes; with his cipher; dated 1624.
- A set of plates of the Scenes of an Opera; after the designs of Giulio Parigi.
- A set of plates, called the Palazzo della Fame; dated 1608.

[He died about 1630.]

CANTABINI, SIMONE, called SIMONE DA PESARO. This eminent painter and engraver was born at Pesaro in 1612. He was instructed in design by Gio. Giacomo Pandolfi, and afterwards studied under Claudio Ridolfi. But the works of Guido Reni were at that time so much the objects of admiration, that, although he had gained already no little celebrity by his picture of S. Pietro, painted for a chapel at Fano, near that where was placed Guido's picture of Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, he resolved to become a student in the school of Guido, where he remained until his insolence and malevolence, not only to his instructor, but to Domenichino and Albano, obliged him to quit the school of Guido and Bologna, and to shelter himself in Rome, where he employed some time in studying the works of Raffaele. On his return to Bologna, not finding a residence there agreeable to him, he went to Mantua, where he was taken into the service of the Duke, and was employed to paint his portrait. But whether he had not been accustomed to that department of art, or from some other cause, he was entirely unsuccessful. This disappointment, preying on a disposition naturally morose and irritable, is supposed to have occasioned his death in 1648. Baldinucci considers Cantarini as another Guido; but although his merit is undoubted, and though he is allowed to have approached nearer to him than any other of his imitators, he has little claim to originality; and all we admire in his best works, many of which possess great beauty, he is evidently indebted for to his great model. As an engraver, the etchings of Cantarini are in very high estimation. They are very masterly and spirited; but in them his imitation of the etchings of Guido, is even more apparent than in his paintings, and it would not be easy to distinguish them, if the plates by Guido did not show a superior marking of the figure, particularly in the extremities. The following are his principal prints:

- Adam and Eve eating the forbidden Fruit.
- The Repose in Egypt; falsely marked G. Renus, in. & fec.
- Another Repose in Egypt, with the Head of the Virgin in profile, with St. Joseph sitting near her.
- Another Repose in Egypt, with the Head of the Virgin in front, with St. Joseph in the distance; very fine.
- The Holy Family, with St. John.
- Another Holy Family, with St. John and three Angels; marked S. C. da Pesare, fec.
- The Virgin Mary, with a Glory, and the infant Jesus; marked S. C. da Pesare, fec.
- The Virgin, with the infant Jesus holding a Bird by a String.
- The Virgin sitting in the Clouds, with the infant Jesus.
- The Virgin, with a Glory, crowned by two Angels.
- Christ bearing his Cross, with Joseph of Arimathea.
- St. John the Baptist in the Wilderness, holding his Cross, and a Cup.
- St. John in the Wilderness, sitting on a Stone.
- St. Sebastian, with an Angel presenting the Palm of Martyrdom.
- The great St. Anthony of Padua kneeling before the infant Jesus.
- The little St. Anthony of Padua.
- St. Benedict curing a Demoniac; after Lod. Caracci.
- The Guardian Angel leading a Child.
- Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, doing homage to Cardinal Borghese; fine; it was for some time believed to be by Guido.
- The Rape of Europa; fine, and scarce.
- Mercury and Argus; fine, and scarce.
- Mars, Venus, and Cupid; after Paolo Veronese.
- Venus and Adonis.
- Fortune, represented by a Female, with her Foot on a Globe; after Guido Reni; marked G. Renus, in. & fec.

CANTI, GIOVANNI. This painter was a native of Parma, and flourished about the year 1700. According to Lanzi, he principally resided at Mantua, where his battle-pieces and landscapes were sought after for the private collections. He also attempted historical subjects, but never went beyond mediocrity, and seemed to expect to make up for every other requisite by promptness, and facility of execution. He died in 1716.

CANTOFOLI, GINEVRA. This lady artist was a native of Bologna, and, according to Malvasia, was instructed by Elisabetta Sirani. She painted history with some reputation. In the church of S. Procolo, at Bologna, is a picture by her of the Last Supper; in La Morte, S. Apollonia; and in S. Giacomo Maggiore, is her best performance of S.

Tommaso di Villanuova. [Zani places her birth in 1618, and her death in 1672.]

CANUTI, DOMENICO MARIA. "Among the disciples of Guido, (says Lanzi,) few have attained more reputation than Dom. Maria Canuti." He was born at Bologna in 1620, and after studying under Guido until he was able to fly on his own wings, he was employed in several works for the public edifices at Rome, Padua, and Bologna. In the church of the P. P. Olivetani, is an extraordinary picture by him of the Descent from the Cross, represented by moonlight, called the Notte del Canuti. In S. Bernardino is a fine picture of the Virgin, with S. Marta, and S. Antonio of Padua; and in the sacristy is the Madonna and Bambino, in the Clouds, with a Glory of Angels, of which he has left an etching. In the Palazzo Pepoli, at Bologna, are two saloons entirely painted by Canuti, which are deservedly admired. This painter etched several plates in the manner of Guido, but in a neater and more finished style, though less spirited in the execution. We have by him :

The Portrait of Lodovico Caracci; Canutus, sc.

Ditto, Agostino Caracci; same mark.

Ditto, Annibale Caracci; the same.

The Virgin in the Clouds, with Christ standing by her.

St. Roch, as well as the preceding; after his own design.

St. Francis praying; after Guido—Dom. Ma. Canuti, fec.

[He died in 1684.]

[CAPANNA, PUCCIO. This artist flourished in the 14th century, and was esteemed one of the most successful followers of Giotto. It is a question whether he was of Florence or Assisi; Vasari and Lanzi report for Florence; Baldinucci and Zani incline to Assisi. An example of the beautiful simplicity of his style of composition, and truth of expression, may be seen in Rosini's work, plate xxi., representing the Entombing of our Lord.]

CAPELLANI, ANTONIO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Venice about 1730. He was a pupil of Wagner, and engraved several plates both at Venice and Rome. The greater part of the portraits for the new edition of Vasari, published by Bottari at Rome, in 1760, are by this artist. He also engraved several plates for the Scuola Italica Pictura, under the direction of Gavin Hamilton. The following are his principal prints :

The Portrait of Michele Angelo Buonarroti.

The Drawing School; after Dom. Maiotto.

Diana and Endymion; after the same.

Apollo and Daphne; after the same.

The Creation of Eve; from the Sistine chapel; after M. Angelo.

Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; the same.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Coreggio.

The Repose in Egypt; after Baroccio. 1772.

View of the Portico of the Villa Albani; after Panini.

CAPITELLI, BERNARDINO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Siena about the year 1617. He was first a scholar of Alessandro Casolani, and afterwards was instructed by Rutilio Manetti. His works as a painter are little known, but we have several plates by him, which are etched, and some of them finished with the graver in a dark, tasteless style; among which the following are the principal :

The Portrait of Alessandro Casolani; B. Capitelli, fec.

S. Anthony of Padua, and his Miracles; B. Capitelli, fec. 1637.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Coreggio.

The Repose in Egypt, the Virgin giving drink to the infant Jesus; after Rutilio Manetti.

Ceres drinking in the Cottage of the old Woman. The same subject which Count Goudt engraved after Elsheimer.

A set of twelve plates of the Life of St. Bernard of Siena, with the title; Bernardus Capitellus Senensis.

A set of friezes and bassi-rilievi, among which is the Aldobrandini Marriage from an antique painting.

[His birth must have been much earlier than 1617, as he worked from 1622 to 1637. Bartsch has given a description of 43 pieces by him, and others have been discovered since. Bryan has passed an unjust censure on this artist; perhaps from having seen only some of his inferior works. Zani classes him BB.]

CAPODORO. See PAGAGNINI.

CAPOLONGO, ANTONIO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished about the year 1480. He was a scholar of Giovanni Bernardo della Lama; and, according to Dominici, painted the principal altarpiece in the church of S. Diego at Naples, representing the Immaculate Conception, with S. Francesco d'Assisi and S. Antonio da Padua, which is highly spoken of by that author. In the church of S. Niccolo is the Virgin and Infant, with a Glory of Angels and several Saints.

[CAPPELLA, SCIPIO, a scholar of Solimene, who excelled in copying his master's pictures, which, when retouched by him, passed for originals.]

[CAPPELLE, JAN VANDER, an eminent Dutch painter of marine subjects and river views, is supposed to have been born about 1635. Though he produced many pictures of great excellence, none of the Dutch writers on the works and lives of their painters notice him or his works. Many of his pictures have been brought to England, and their merit justly appreciated. From the manner of painting which he adopted, the period at which he flourished may be conjectured. His first pictures induce the belief that he studied the works of William vande Velde, for they recall to mind the pictures of that master, not as copies or imitations, but as painted on the same principles: others bear a resemblance to De Vlieger and Dubbels; and some appear to have been painted with all the genius of Rembrandt, so surprising is their effect, and with the glow and warmth of Cuyp. He was a great colourist, and may be classed among the most celebrated painters of marine subjects of the Dutch school. Like Vanderneer and Isaac Ostade he also painted landscapes, generally under the aspect of Winter, with numerous figures skating on frozen lakes or rivers. These varied resemblances mark the period of his practice, and those well acquainted with his works will acknowledge that he must have been a contemporary of all the great artists above named. There are pictures with his name, J. V. Cappelle, but none known with a date. A very beautiful specimen was in the possession of Lord Charles Townsend, representing a river scene, the entrance of the Brill; a Dutch dogger with passengers is approaching, and a boat with others is passing before it; on the left is the jetty of the harbour; in the distance, the sea, with a man-of-war and other vessels sailing in various directions. The effect of day-light presents that singular appearance sometimes seen after a shower at sun-set, the driving clouds producing strong shadows over the water, and is strikingly imposing. This description is given as being characteristic of many others of the master. Some of his pictures, however, appear rather too hazy and cold in colour to be pleasing to those not acquainted with the atmosphere of Holland; perhaps they have suffered by time, or injudicious cleaning, and what is called restoration; others are now attributed to him that are not worthy of his pencil. His real pictures, in fine condition, are worthy of places in the richest collections of the Dutch masters, and obtain high prices in commerce.]

CAPPELLI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO. This painter was born at Brescia in 1664. He was first instructed by Pompeo Ghiti; he afterwards visited Bologna, where he studied some time under Lorenzo Pasinelli, and finally went to Rome, where he frequented the school of Batista Gauli, called Baccici. He painted history, and his works in fresco were held in considerable estimation; they are chiefly in the public edifices at Brescia. [Zani is of opinion that he was born in 1669, and died in 1741.]

CAPPELLI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Sassuolo, in the Modenese, and was educated in the school of Coreggio. According to Vidriani, he chiefly resided at Bologna, where however he has not left any work of notoriety in the public edifices, being chiefly employed for private collections. Lami mentions a picture by him in the church of S. Sebastiano in his native town, representing the Virgin Mary with several Saints, in which the impasto and relief were worthy of the hand of his great instructor. [He was also called Cacciamemici. He flourished from 1535 to 1586. He must not be confounded with another Francesco Cacciamemici, who was of the school of Primaticcio, and lived about the same period.]

CAPPELLINI, GABRIELE, called IL CALIGARINO. This painter was originally a shoemaker, from which circumstance he acquired the name of il Caligarino. He was a native of Ferrara, and is said to have been induced to attempt painting, and to become a scholar of Dosso Dossi, from being complimented by that artist on the elegant shape of his shoes. In the Pitture e Sculture di Ferrara, by Cesare Barotti, are mentioned some of his works, and he is there extolled for the boldness of his design and the sobriety of his colour. In the church of S. Francesco at Ferrara, is a picture by this master of St. Peter and St. James, and in S. Giovannino, the principal altar-piece is by him, representing the Virgin and Infant with several Saints.

CAPPELLINO, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, was born at Genoa in 1580, and studied painting under Gio. Batista Paggi, of whose manner he was a successful imitator. His style is less noble than that of Paggi, but he possessed other qualities of the art that render his works interesting, as is evident in his Death of St. Francis, in S. Nicolo at Genoa, and his S. Francesca Romana in S. Stefano. He died in 1651.

CAPRIOLO, ALESSANDRO, an Italian engraver, of whom little is known. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and his plates are executed with the graver in a formal, stiff style. He engraved the portraits for a work, entitled, Ritratti di cento Capitani illustri. [His name was Aliprando, not Alessandro; he was of Trent, and flourished about 1580. His works have been confounded with those of Cornelius Cort, to whom the best have been attributed, and Capriolo has been judged on the demerits of the "Ritratti di cento Capitani illustri." He marked his prints with the letters ac, cursive letters, very small and closely connected; these, it is conjectured, have been mistaken for cc, and his style of engraving having a close resemblance to that of C. Cort, has assisted the mistake. It is time that justice should be done to an artist of great talent. The inquirer will do well to consult Zani on the subject, parte I. vols. v. and vi., and parte II. vol. iii., in the notes.]

CAPURRO, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Genoa, and was a scholar of Domenico Fiasella. On leaving that master he went to Naples and Rome, where he attached himself to the works of Spagnoletto, whose strong and vigorous style was then admired. He was employed some time at the court of Modena, and, according to Soprani, died at Genoa, in the prime of life, of a malignant fever. [He flourished about 1690.]

CARACCI, LODOVICO. This distinguished painter, the principal founder of the school that bears the name of his family, was born at Bologna in 1555. He was placed in the school of Prospero Fontana, which was then in some repute. From the extraordinary powers to which he afterwards attained, it appears almost incredible that his first attempts should have been so feeble and unpromising, that his instructor advised him to renounce the art, and to adopt another profession. His apparent dulness, and the difficulty with which he seemed to operate, occasioned his fellow students to confer on him, in their mockery, the nick-name of the Ox. It was soon after evident that this tardiness did not however proceed from a deficiency of genius, but was the effect of a profound reflection. He considered promptness and vivacity, as the rock on which so many of his contemporaries had split, and he was convinced that in an art, where so much depends on the mind, an attentive and serious application is infinitely more advantageous, than a premature and dangerous mechanical facility. He consulted nature in every thing, and by a constant study of her beauties, he insensibly acquired that correctness and simplicity which so peculiarly distinguish his style. Having derived all the improvement he could from the works of art in Bologna, where it had at that time fallen into some degree of decadence, he visited Venice, where he attached himself to the study of the works of Titian and Tintoretto. At Florence, he copied the works of Andrea del Sarto, and at Parma made his principal studies from the grand productions of Coreggio. On his return to Bologna, he was desirous of retrieving the art from the degradation into which it had fallen, almost throughout Italy; from the depraved and impoverished style that had been practised in the schools of Sabbatini at Rome, of Passignani at Florence, of Procaccini at Milan, and of Fontana and Passerotti at Bologna. The prevailing system of those masters was as notorious for its negligent facility, as it was removed from the truth and simplicity of nature; and it was by the powers and energy of Lodovico, assisted by his relatives Agostino and Annibale, that the art was rescued from a state of languor and debility, which threatened its entire annihilation, and placed on the proud and transcendent elevation to which they raised it. This innovation and reform was not, however, effected without considerable opposition and difficulty. All the painters of Bologna formed a league against the new style of the Caracci. Their works were criticised with unmerited severity, and they were accused of being as deficient in accuracy as in elegance. At length the extraordinary merit of their productions triumphed over cabal, and they succeeded in establishing that celebrated academy, in which the talents of Albano, Guido, and Domenichino, and their other able disciples, were afterwards accomplished. In this great school, Lodovico may be truly called the fons ingeniorum. The style of this great painter has been considered by some of the best judges in the art, as that which approaches nearest to perfection. "His breadth of light and shadow," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "the simplicity of his colouring, and the solemn effect of that twilight that seems diffused over his pictures, is better suited to the grave and dignified subjects he generally treated, than the more artificial brilliancy of sunshine which enlightens the pictures of Titian." The principal works of Lodovico are at Bologna, among the most important of which are his fresco paintings in the palazzi Magnani at Zampieri, in which he was assisted by Agostino and Annibale. In the cloister of S. Michele in Bosco, he painted, with the assistance of his scholars, thirty-seven pictures of the lives of S. Benedetto and S. Cecilia, and a fine fresco of the Last Supper. In S. Martino Maggiore is his celebrated picture of S. Girolamo, and his more famous Limbo or Purgatory, which is considered as one of the greatest examples of the sublime. In S. Domenico, is his picture of S. Domenico and S. Francesco, in the simplest and grandest style of the art, with an almost imperceptible effort of light and shadow, yet of sufficient and surprising relief, and an indescribable sanctity in the expression of his heads; forming a whole, that Malvasia styles una Grandezza che mai piu. His Carità in the ceiling is painted in a style so tender, graceful, and lovely, that it may be cited as a model of beautiful expression. Contrasted with this, are his two pictures in the Certosa, of Christ crowned with Thorns, and the Flagellation; exhibiting powers more male and vigorous, capable of expressing the awful and terrific. In the same church was his most esteemed work in oil, representing St. John preaching, now in the gallery in the Louvre. [The picture in the Louvre, of St. John preaching, is attributed to Annibale, by the writers of the Catalogue.] By Lodovico Caracci we have a few engravings from his own designs, they are first etched in a free and masterly style, and finished with the graver. He generally marked his plates with the initials L. C. or L.O. C. We have by him the following:

- Samson overcoming the Lion; L. C. G.
- The Virgin and infant Jesus, with four Angels, half-length.
- The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus, half-length; Lod. Car., inv. f.
- The Holy Family, where the Virgin is washing Linen; L. C., f.

- Another Holy Family under an Arch.
- The Frontispiece to the Poems of Cesare Rimaldi.
- A Thesis, with the Arms of Bonfigliovoli, with Mercury and Hercules.

This great artist died in 1619.

CARACCI, AGOSTINO. Agostino was the cousin of Lodovico Caracci, and the elder brother of Annibale, born at Bologna in 1558. He was intended by his father for the business of a goldsmith, a profession then nearly connected with the art of engraving, and at the age of fourteen he had engraved some plates in the style of Cornelius Cort, when Lodovico persuaded him to study painting. He became a scholar of Prospero Pontana, and he afterwards studied under Bartolomeo Passerotti. Agostino not only discovered a happy disposition for the art of painting, but distinguished himself by his study of the sciences, and of poetry. These acquisitions were of infinite advantage in many of the great works which were afterwards produced by the united powers of the Caracci. On leaving the school of Passerotti, Agostino, together with his brother Annibale, passed some time at Parma, where they studied with attention the works of Correggio and Parmegiano. He afterwards went to Venice, where he had an opportunity of perfecting himself in engraving under Cornelius de Cort, by whose instruction he became one of the most distinguished engravers of his country. Excellent as a designer, he frequently corrected the defects in the drawing of the pictures he engraved, for which he sometimes received the thanks, but more usually the reproaches, of the painter. On his return to Bologna, emulated by the reputation Annibale had already acquired, he devoted himself to painting with indefatigable assiduity, and, assisted by the instruction of Lodovico, his advancement was such that he was engaged in all the considerable works in which they were then employed in the palazzi Magnani and Zampieri. It was at this time that he painted his celebrated picture of the Communion of St. Jerome, for the Certosa at Bologna; now placed among the other robberies in the gallery of the Louvre. [It is now in the gallery at Bologna.] Annibale being soon after engaged to visit Rome, to paint the Farnese Gallery, he was accompanied by Agostino, whose resources and poetical genius were of the most essential service in the composition of those fabulous subjects, to which the unlettered mind of Annibale would have been inadequate.

These aids were not sufficiently appreciated by Annibale, whose vivacious and turbulent disposition produced continual dissensions, and Agostino was obliged to abandon him, and to leave Rome. He went to Parma, where he was employed by the Duke to paint the great saloon of the Casino, the finishing of which he did not long survive. The principal works of Agostino are, his Communion of St. Jerome before mentioned; in S. Bartolomeo di Reno at Bologna, is his fine picture of the Nativity, with two laterals of the Adoration of the Magi, and the Circumcision; and in S. Salvatore, his admirable Assumption. At Rome, the pictures he painted in the Farnese Gallery were, the Triumph of Galatea, and Cephalus and Aurora.

As an engraver, Agostino Caracci is to be ranked among the most celebrated artists of Italy. The correctness of his design is only equalled by the beauty of his execution, and his plates would have nearly reached perfection, if he had paid more attention to the effect of the chiaro-scuro. They appear to have been executed entirely with the graver, in a bold, free style, nearly resembling that of his instructor, Cornelius de Cort. The expression of his heads is admirable, and his extremities are marked with the greatest care. His plates are very numerous, they are generally marked with the initials A. C. or AUG. F. or Agos. C., and sometimes with his name abbreviated. They are not difficult to be ascertained. The following are his principal prints:

Agostino Caracci died in 1602. [He died in 1601, at the age of 43, as appears by the inscription in the cathedral at Parma, where he was buried.]

CARACCI, ANNIBALE. This great artist was the younger brother of Agostino, and the cousin of Lodovico Caracci, born at Bologna in 1560. He had received from nature the genius of a painter, which was cultivated with the greatest care by Lodovico, under whose instruction his advancement was so rapid that it surprised his instructor. Endowed with more energy than Agostino, he appears to have sought the difficulties of the art only for the glory of surmounting them, and animated by the fire of an enthusiastic imagination, he grasped at a grandeur which less vigorous stamina were incapable of reaching. Having made considerable proficiency, he was recommended by Lodovico to visit Parma, to study what had been his own favourite model, the works of Coreggio. It was by his admiration of the wonderful productions of that great master, and his long study of them, that he acquired the boldness of design, the admirable choice in the turn of his figures, the great and simple foldings of his drapery, and the daring variety of foreshortening, for which his works are so justly admired. He afterwards improved himself in colouring by the study of the works of Titian, Tintoretto, and Paolo Veronese. On his return to Bologna, he assisted Lodovico in his undertakings in the palaces of Magnani, Favi, and Zampieri. His fame soon after reached Rome, and he was invited by the Cardinal Farnese to ornament the gallery of his palace, in which he was assisted, as has been stated, by Agostino. The great powers he possessed previous to his visiting Rome, were now restrained, and corrected by a contemplation of the works of Raffaelle, and the established beauties of antiquity; always retaining in his mind the grandioso of Coreggio, and supported in his energy by the great example of Michael Angelo.

The Farnese Gallery occupied Annibale eight years of the prime of his life, to which the abilities of Lodovico and Agostino also contributed. For this immense work, by which he ennobled the art, and immortalized his fame; a work, in which the learned Poussin (no mean authority) declared he had surpassed, in that style, not only himself, but every painter who preceded him; the generosity of his princely employer liberally remunerated him with five hundred crowns; almost as much as the wages of his valet de chambre. It is not to be denied, that the powers of Annibale would have developed themselves in this great work with more classic purity, and a more refined taste, if the ardent vivacity of his mind had been polished by a cultivated education. Averse to literary studies, and consequently ignorant of history and the fable, he was obliged to have recourse to the acquirements of others, and the natural result was, that he could not feel the poetry of his subject so sensibly, or correctly, as if it had emanated from his own mind. It is only in the works of the enlightened artist that we can expect to find united the sublime poet and the transcendent painter. Annibale was in complete possession of his art, when the subject did not go beyond the limit of his comprehension.

His excellence as a painter of landscape ought not to be unnoticed, in which he did not confine himself to the backgrounds of his historical subjects, but painted several in which the figures are only accessory, to which we have nothing in the art superior in grandeur of scenery, in the choice of forms, in aerial tints, and in spirited execution. The principal works of Annibale at Rome are, the Farnese Gallery, and in the chapel of the palace, the Miracle at Cana. In S. Francesco da Ripa, is his fine picture of the dead Christ supported by the Virgin; and in the Madonna del Popolo, an admirable Assumption. At Bologna, in the church of the Madonna di Galiera, the Annunciation; in S. Francesco, the Assumption; and in Corpus Domini, a grand picture of the Resurrection. In the gallery at Dresden is an admirable picture by Annibale, formerly in the collection of the Duke of Modena, representing St. Roch distributing his wealth to the poor; an abundant and admirable composition of a group of paupers, of both sexes, exhibiting all the "variety of wretchedness," in infirmity, disease, and indigence; snatching with grateful, but eager anxiety, the charitable donations of the Saint, expressed with all the feeling and sentiment of which the art is capable. The most celebrated easel picture by Annibale, was in the Orleans Collection, now in the possession of the Earl of Carlisle. It represents our Saviour taken down from the Cross, extended in the lap of the Virgin, who is fainting, Mary Magdalene deploring the death of her divine Master, whilst Mary [the wife] of Cleophas, and another of the holy women, are succouring the mother of Christ. Of the beauties of this admirable production, any description that could here be attempted would be quite ineffectual; it must be seen to be felt. The awful manner in which this solemn subject is represented, fills the mind of the beholder with the most affecting emotions. It has been very finely engraved by Roulet.

Annibale Caracci died in 1609.

By the hand of this great artist we have about twenty plates, partly etched, and finished with the graver, in which the great master is strongly marked. They are,

- The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; oval.

CARACCI, FRANCESCO, was the younger brother of Agostino and Annibale, born at Bologna in 1595, and was brought up under Lodovico Caracci. Proud of his technical connexions and education, he audaciously attempted to oppose the academic celebrity of Lodovico, to whom he was indebted for every thing he knew, by setting up a rival establishment, and had the insolence to have written over his door, This is the true school of the Caracci. Not meeting with the success he expected, he left Bologna, and went to Rome, where he died, in 1622. His works at Bologna are, the Death of the Virgin, with the Apostles, in S. Maria Maggiore, in which Lanzi says he was assisted by Lodovico; and St. Roch and the Angel, in the church of S. Rocco. We have a few plates from the point of this artist, from the designs of Lodovico and Annibale, as follow:

The Virgin and infant Jesus, inscribed, Diapara imago a dno Luca pict. &c.

Sir Charles Borromeo kneeling.

An Angel with wings, pointing to a skull.

Four Busts of illustrious women; Semiramis, Lucretia, Artemisia, and Portia.

He sometimes marked his plates, F. C., and sometimes with the cipher FC.

CARACCI, ANTONIO, called IL GOBBO, was a natural son of Agostino Caracci, born at Venice in 1583, and was educated under Annibale, whom he accompanied to Rome when he went to paint the Farnese Gallery. With the advantage of Annibale's instruction, and endowed with natural genius, he soon became an able designer, and was taken into the protection of Cardinal Tonti, who employed him to ornament his chapel in S. Bartolomeo nell' Isola, where he painted, in fresco, several pictures of the life of the Virgin, and the passion of our Saviour. In the chapel of S. Carlo Borromeo, he painted that saint communicating the persons afflicted with the plague. One of his esteemed performances, is a frieze in one of the apartments of the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo, which is much admired. He was gratefully attached to Annibale, whom he attended in his last moments, and honoured with a splendid funeral in the church of the Rotonda, near the tomb of Raffaëlle. Antonio was of a slender constitution, and did not survive his thirty-fifth year. He died at Rome in 1618.

CARACCIUOLO, GIAMBATISTA. This painter was born at Naples about the year 1580. He first studied under Francesco Imperato, but quitted that master to become a scholar of M. Angelo Caravaggio. For some time he followed the vigorous style and powerful light and shadow of that painter, but the fame of Annibale Caracci drew him to Rome, where he devoted himself entirely to the study of his works in the Farnese Gallery. On his return to Naples, according to Dominici, he painted several pictures for the public edifices so much in the style of Annibale, that they might be mistaken for his works. Of these, the most esteemed are, his St. Cecilia, in the church of S. Maria della Solitaria; S. Antonio da Padua, in S. Niccolo; the Death of the Virgin, and the Assumption, in S. Anni di Lombardi; and his S. Carlo, in S. Agnello. He died at Naples in 1641.

CARAGLIO, or CARALIUS, GIOVANNI GIACOMO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Verona about the year 1512. He studied the art of engraving at Rome, and from the style of his execution, he is generally considered as a disciple of Marc Antonjo Raimondi. His drawing is very correct; he gave a fine expression to his heads, and his extremities are marked in a masterly manner. Caraglio holds an eminent rank among the engravers of his country. He was much employed in the graving of gems, and executed several medals, by which he gained great reputation at the court of Sigismund, King of Poland. He is sometimes called Jacobus Veronensis, which name he sometimes inscribed on his plates, and sometimes marked them with the cipher C. The following are his principal plates:

[For a full account of the Caracci, see Malvasia. It

The Virgin and Infant, under an Orange Tree; Jacobus Veronensis.

The Virgin kneeling, with the Infant and St. Ann.

The Holy Family; after Raffaele; the same subject as the fine print by Edelinck.

Another Holy Family; after Raffaele; with St. Elisabeth.

A Battle; R. J. Jacobus Ver., fec.

The Rape of the Sabines; after Rosso; unfinished.

[He flourished as an engraver on copper, from 1526 to 1551. Aretino, in his Cortigiana, printed in 1534, says, "E non niego che Marcantonio non fosse unico nel burino, ma Gianiacobo Caralio Veronese, suo allievo, lo passa non pure aggiugni fino a qui, come si vede ne le opere intagliate da lui in rame." At the latter part of his life he returned to Italy, and settled on his own estate near Parma, where he died, it is supposed, about 1570.]

CARAVAGGIO, POLIDORO CALDARA, called DA. This distinguished painter belongs to the school of Lombardy by birth, but to that of Rome by his education. He was born at Caravaggio in the Milanese in 1495. His parents lived in the greatest indigence and obscurity, and after passing his youth in misery and want, he was obliged to leave his home in search of employment, and on his arrival at Rome, was engaged as a porter by the artists who were employed in the Vatican, under Leo X., to carry the mortar for the plaster of their fresco paintings. Whilst he was occupied in this humble station, he observed with great attention, with what facility Maturino, and Giovanni da Udina, executed the designs of Raffaele; and, inspired by his natural disposition for the art, he made some attempts, which attracted the notice of Raffaele, of whom he afterwards became one of the most illustrious disciples. His assiduous application in studying the ancient statues, and bassi-relievi, was such, that in a little time he appeared to have imbibed the true spirit of the Grecian sculptors; the same perfection of design, the same purity of form, appeared in all he did. This scrupulous attention to the antique, rendered him little sensible to the charm of colouring, and, indeed, for some time he entirely neglected it, contenting himself with representing in chiaro-scuro, the designs he had composed from his studies of the beauties of antiquity. Such was his excellence in these productions, that he was selected by Raffaele to paint the friezes which accompanied the works of that master in the apartments of the Vatican; and they were in no way unworthy of being placed with the sublime productions of that illustrious artist. From the models he consulted, Polidoro was a strict observer of the propriety of costume. The trophies with which he accompanied and embellished his works, are truly antique; and by the variety of his attitudes, the simple cast of his draperies, the admirable expression of his heads, the grandeur and copiousness of his compositions, and the elevation of his ideas, he appeared to have restored the purest era of Athenian art. In colour, almost entirely a monochromist, he was the first of the Roman school that attempted the magical effect of chiaro-scuro in the management of the masses of light and shadow. It was the custom at Rome, in the time of Polidoro, to ornament the exterior of the principal houses and palaces with the works of eminent artists, executed in a style called by the Italians "agrafitto," expressed by hatchings on the plaster, in the manner of engraving. In works of that nature, Polidoro, and his friend Maturino, were much employed; and it is greatly to be regretted, that their exposure to the weather and the ravages of time, have deprived the art of these valuable productions, of whose beauty we may form some judgment from the prints which have been engraved from some of them, by Cherubino Alberti, Henry Goltius, and Gio. Batista Galestruzzi. Polidoro was in the full possession of celebrity and success, when Rome was taken by storm, and sacked by the Spaniards, in 1527. He took refuge at Naples, where he was most kindly received by Andrea da Salerno, whose acquaintance he had made at Rome, and who was the means of procuring him immediate employment. After passing some time at Naples, he went over to Sicily, where his first employment was painting the triumphal arches which were erected at Messina, on the occasion of Charles V.'s return from his expedition to Tunis. His next work was his celebrated picture of Christ bearing his Cross, a grand composition of many figures, painted in oil, with a beauty and harmony of colouring which proved that he was capable of distinguishing himself even in that department of art when the subject admitted of it. The remainder of his history it is painful to relate; Rome being restored to tranquillity, he was desirous of returning to the emporium of art, which he had been forced to abandon by the most imperious necessity. Preparatory to his departure from Sicily, he had drawn his money from the bank; tempted by which, he was murdered by his servant, a Sicilian, in 1543, in his forty-eighth year. The principal works of Polidoro da Caravaggio, are his friezes and other ornaments in the Vatican. In the garden of the Palazzo Bufalo at Rome, the Fountain of Parnassus; and in the court of the same palace, his history of Niobe, and some grand compositions of Naval Combats. In S. Silvestro a Monte Cavallo, two subjects of the Life of Magdalene, with a very beautiful landscape. At Naples he painted St. Peter and St. Paul, in the church of S. Maria delle Grazzie, and several pictures in S. Angelo, in Pascheria. At Messina, his celebrated work of our Saviour bearing his Cross.

CARAVAGGIO, M. A. See ANGELO.

CARAVOGLIA, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was a native of Piemont, and flourished about the year 1673. He is said to have been a scholar of Guercino, but this Lanzi disputes, observing, that his lights are less lucid, and the shadows less deep, than those of the genuine followers of Barbieri. Notwithstanding this languor, his pictures please, by a modest union of colour which presides in his works, which are further estimable for their invention and design. His best production is the Last Supper, in the church of Corpus Domini, at Turin.

CARBAJAL, LUIS DE, a Spanish painter, born at Toledo in 1534, and was a disciple of Don Juan de Villoldo. He was one of the many eminent painters employed by Philip II. in the Escorial. Part of the principal cloister is painted by Carbajal, where he has represented some subjects of the Life of the Virgin; and the altar-piece of the Infermeria is also by him, representing the Nativity. There are several of his pictures in the churches of Madrid and Toledo. He died at Madrid in 1591. [Carbajal was employed at the Pardo in 1613. He was one of the most eminent painters in Spain, of his day. Bryan was led into error by following Palomino. See Cean Bermudez.]

[CARBONI, BERNARDO, or GIOVANNI BERNARDO DI ALBARA, born at Genoa in 1614, was a scholar of Andrea di Ferrari, and obtained a great reputation in his day, both as an historical and portrait painter. In the latter it is said that he painted much in the manner of Van Dyck. He died in 1683, though some say in 1667.]

CARBONI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Alessandro Tiarini. He was, notwithstanding, so great an admirer of the works of Guido, that he imitated the graceful and elegant style of that master. His best works are at Bologna. In S. Martino Maggiore, is the Crucifixion, with St. Theresa and other figures; in S. Paolo, the Entombing of Christ; and in the church of the Padri Servi, the Decollation of St. John. [He died in 1635.]

CARDENAS, BARTOLOMEO DE. According to Palomino, this painter was a native of Portugal in 1547, but visited Madrid when he was young, and became an artist of considerable reputation. He painted the principal part of the cloister of the convent of Nuestra Señora d'Atocha, at Madrid. He resided the latter part of his life at Valladolid, where he painted several pictures for the churches, particularly in the cloister of the convent of San Pablo. He died at Valladolid in 1606. [According to Cean Bermudez, he was a scholar of Alonso Sanchez Coello, and one of the best artists in Spain, of the period in which he lived.]

[CARDENAS, JUAN DE, son of the preceding, was an eminent painter of fruit and flowers. He resided at Valladolid about 1620.]

CARDI, LODOVICO, called CIGOLI, an eminent painter of the Florentine school, born at the Castle of Cigoli, in Tuscany, in 1559. He was first a scholar of Alessandro Allori, but was afterwards instructed by Santo di Titi, whose academy was then the most reputable at Florence. He was, however, more indebted to his studies after the works of M. Angelo, Andrea del Sarto, and Pontormo, than either of his masters. After travelling through Lombardy, he returned to Florence, and was received into the academy; his picture of reception was Cain slaying Abel. He was employed by the Grand Duke in some works for the Palazzo Pitti, where he painted Venus and a Satyr, and the Sacrifice of Isaac. His protector sent him to Rome, where he was engaged to paint a picture for St. Peter's; on which occasion he represented St. Peter healing the Lame Man at the gate of the Temple; an admirable picture, which was considered by many as one of the finest works in the Vatican, after Raffiello's Transfiguration, and the Communion of St. Jerome, by Domenichino. Baldinucci gives him the credit of having approached nearer to the style of Coreggio than any artist of his time; but, as Lanzi observes, this will not be credited by those who have ever beheld the works of Baroccio, Schidoni, and the Caracci, in imitation of that sublime master. Without comparing this painter with the chief of the Lombard school, it may perhaps be a sufficient homage to his talents to state, that he profited, like an able artist, of the great style of Coreggio, as it relates to chiaro-scuro, and the grandeur of design; but that he was always at a distance from the admirable impasto and variety of colouring, the impressive tenderness of expression, and the daring display of the sotto in su, which distinguish the works of Coreggio.

The principal productions of Cigoli at Rome, are his celebrated picture of St. Peter Curing the Lame, in St. Peter's, which has been much injured by damp; a St. Jerome, in S. Giovanni de Fiorentini; and in S. Paolo, out of Rome, the Conversion of St. Paul; at Florence, a fine picture of the Stoning of Stephen, in the convent of Monte Domini; S. Alberto, in S. Maria Maggiore; and the Trinity, in the church of Santa Croce. In the Florentine Gallery is a fine picture of Mary Magdalene, and his celebrated Ecce Homo.

This eminent artist engraved two plates in a slight, neat style, which show the hand of a great designer, particularly in the expression of the heads, which is admirable.

Mary Magdalene washing our Saviour's Feet at the Table of Simon the Pharisee; marked C. C I V.

The Conversion of St. Paul.

Lodovico Cardi died in 1613. [He painted many easel pictures of Saints, (particularly Francis,) Hermits, and Magdalenes at devotion, which are remarkable for the expression of fervour, contrition, and abstinence. These are generally wrought up to a high degree of finishing, almost to Dutch minuteness in the accessories. A print of the picture of the Stoning of Stephen, now in the Florentine Gallery, may be found in Rosini's work, plate cxxx.]

CARDISCO, MARCO, called IL CALABRESE. This painter was a native of Calabria. It is not certainly known by whom he was instructed, but, according to Lanzi, he has been considered a scholar of Polidoro da Caravaggio. He was an artist of considerable estimation, and a particular account is given by Dominici of his works. At Naples, in the church of S. Pietro ad Aram, is a Descent from the Cross; and in another chapel of the same church, a much admired picture of a Pietà, with two laterals of S. Pietro and S. Paolo; but his most esteemed work is in the church of S. Agostino, representing that saint disputing with the heretics, which picture Vasari, by mistake, has stated to be at Aversa. He flourished from the year 1508 till 1542.

CARDON, ANTHONY, THE ELDER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1766. He was a native of Brussels, and passed some time at Naples, where he engraved some plates for Mr. Hamilton. The following prints are also by him:

The Portrait of George Prince of Wales. 1766.

The Portrait of the Chevalier Verhulst.
Le Bain rustique; after A. Watteau.
Le Contrat de Marriage; after the same.

CARDON, ANTHONY, THE YOUNGER. We have recently had to regret the death of this ingenious engraver. He was the son of the preceding artist, born at Brussels in 1773, and was instructed in the art by his father. During the troubles in the Low Countries, at the time of the Belgic insurrection, Mr. Cardon took refuge in England, in the year 1790, when he was only seventeen years of age. He brought with him an introduction to Mr. Colnaghi, whose discernment discovered the rising talent of the young artist, and he gave him immediate employment. In a few years he became eminent from the plates he engraved for some of the most respectable publications that have appeared since that time. He also engraved several detached prints and portraits, in a very pleasing and admirable style. Mr. Cardon had risen to a distinguished rank in public estimation, when he fell a victim to a too assiduous application to his profession. Among his numerous plates may be particularly noticed:

Catherine of France presented to Henry V. of England at the treaty of Troyes; after Stothard.
Salvator Mundi; after Carlo Dolce.

[He died in 1813.]

CARDONNEL, ANTHONY DE. This artist, who flourished about the year 1790, has etched several plates, representing ancient buildings in Scotland.

CARDUCCI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was born at Florence in 1560, and was brought up in the school of Federigo Zuccherò. He assisted that master in the great cupola at Florence; and whilst he was yet very young, painted two pictures for the church of the Jesuits, representing the Immaculate Conception and the Nativity. When Zuccherò was invited to the court of Madrid by Philip II., he prevailed on Carducci to accompany him, and he assisted in the great works he executed in the Escorial. In conjunction with Pellegrino Tibaldi, Carducci painted the famous ceiling of the library. A great portion of the fresco paintings in the cloister of the Escorial is by this master, which were so much admired by the king, that he rewarded him with two hundred ducats, independent of his salary. His principal work, and which above all others established his reputation in Spain, is his Descent from the Cross, in the church of S. Phelipe el Real, at Madrid, a picture of an admirable composition, which was held in the highest estimation. After the death of Philip II., Carducci continued some years in the service of his successor, Philip III., by whom he was engaged to paint a gallery in the palace of the Pardo. The subject was to have been the principal events of the life of Charles V. It was begun by Carducci, but he died before he had made any great progress in the work, in 1610. [Zani places his birth in 1561, and his death in 1608. This and the following artist are named Carducho by Spanish writers.]

CARDUCCI, VINCENZO, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Florence in 1568. He was instructed in the art by his brother, and at his request joined him in Spain, when he was in the employment of Philip III. After the death of Bartolomeo, that monarch engaged him to finish the gallery in the palace of the Pardo, which had been begun by his brother. Instead of the life of Charles V. he adopted the history of Achilles, and finished the work to the entire satisfaction of his patron, and was made king's painter during the reign of that monarch, and also to Philip IV., his successor, by whom he was employed in many considerable works. His pictures are to be seen in all the cities of Castile, in Salamanca, Toledo, Segovia, and Valladolid. His works in the churches of Madrid are, the Great Chapel in the convent of La Encarnacion. In the convent del Rosario, the Angel instructing Joseph in his dream to fly into Egypt, and San Antonio de Padua. In the refectory of the Franciscans, St. John preaching. His last picture was a St. Geronimo, in the church of Alcala de Henares, which he did not live to finish, as appears by the inscription: Vincentius Carducho Florentinus hic vitam non opus finit, 1638. He was the author of a work, entitled Dialogos de las excelencias de la Pintura; printed at Madrid, 1633, [which Bermudez pronounces the best work in the Castilian language on the subject.]

CARIANI, GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Bergamo about the year 1510. Conte Tassi, in his Vite de Pittori Bergameschi, is extremely indignant with Vasari, for not having noticed this excellent artist; and it appears from that author, as well as from the authority of Lanzi, that he was a painter of great merit. In the church of S. Gottardo, at Bergamo, is a very celebrated picture by Cariani, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus in the Clouds, supported by Angels, and a Choir of Cherubs over her head. A most elegant and graceful composition, and coloured with great amenity and sweetness. He also acquired considerable celebrity as a portrait painter. [He must have been born much earlier, as there are pictures by him with the dates 1514 and 1519. He was a follower, if not a disciple, of Giorgione.]

CARLEVARIIIS, LUCA, a painter and engraver, born at Udina in 1665. He painted landscapes, sea-pieces, and perspective views; his pictures are little known, except in Venice. We have by him a set of a hundred neat and spirited etchings of views in Venice, which give an exact representation of the principal places in that city. He died at Venice in 1729. [He is also called Luca di Cà Zenobrio, having been patronized by the Zenobri family, who possessed many of his pictures.]

[CARLIER, J. GUILLAUME, born at Liege in 1640, was a scholar of Doufflet, and B. Flemael. His pictures are to be seen in the St. Petersburg and other foreign galleries. He died in 1675.]

CARLIERI, ALBERTO. This artist was born at Rome, according to Orlandi, in 1672. He was first a scholar of Gioseffo de Marchi; but afterwards was instructed by Padre Andrea Pozzo. He excelled in painting architectural views, which he embellished with very beautiful historical figures.

CARLISLE, ANNE, an English paintress, who lived in the time of Charles I., and is said by the noble author of the Anecdotes, to have been admired for her copies of the works of the Italian masters. She also painted portraits. Mrs. Carlisle died about the year 1680.

CARLONI, GIOVANNI, a Genoese painter, born in 1590. He was the son of a sculptor, who placed him under the tuition of Pietro Sorri; and he afterwards frequented the school of Domenico Passigiani, at Florence. In that academy he became an able painter in fresco; and on his return to Genoa, was much employed, and acquired a distinguished reputation. His celebrity was not confined to Genoa, he gave proofs of his ability both at Rome and at Florence. He assisted his younger brother in the great fresco work in the cathedral of the Guastato at Genoa, and was invited to Milan to paint the ceiling of the church of the Theatins, which he did not live to finish; it was completed by his brother. He composed his subjects with facility, was a correct designer, and a master of foreshortening. The airs of his heads, though somewhat mannered, are not without grace; and he united the intelligence of the chiaro-scuro with a vigorous colour, perhaps more glowing than chaste. He died at Milan in 1630.

CARLONI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This eminent painter was the younger brother of Giovanni Carloni, born at Genoa in 1594. He was also educated under Passignani, at Florence, and afterwards joined his brother in the great works he was employed in at Genoa. The principal deposit of their united exertions is the cathedral of the Guastato, at Genoa, in which the three naves are painted in fresco, by Giovanni Batista, assisted by his brother. In the middle and principal nave, he has represented the Adoration of the Magi, the Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem, the Resurrection, the Ascension, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the Assumption of the Virgin. A magnificent work, in which he has introduced all that could be conceived by a rich and fertile imagination. Novel and copious in his compositions, his figures are of the most graceful contour, his heads expressive of all the variety of animation and beauty, with a vagueness, lucidity, and brilliancy of colouring, that astonishes and charms. In the same church he painted the Presentation in the Temple, and Christ preaching to the Pharisees. Gio. Batista lived to the advanced age of 86, and died in 1680.

CARLONI, ANDREA, was the son of Gio. Batista Carloni, born at Genoa in 1639. After receiving the instruction of his father for some time, he visited Venice, where he studied for a few years, and returned to Genoa. His first productions were some pictures at Perugia, and the Life of S. Feliciano, in the church of that Saint at Foligno. These, inferior in grace and colour to the works of his father, less happy in composition, and less elegant in design, were painted in a free, resolute, and vigorous style, with a mixture of the Venetian colouring. He went afterwards to Rome, where he changed his manner entirely, for one more noble and elevated, and so superior to his first, that Lanzi mentions it as an instance of the fallacy of forming a judgment of the merit of an artist by a partial view of his performances. "To judge of Carloni (says that author) by his works in the church del Gesu, at Perugia, we could with difficulty be persuaded that he was capable of producing those admirable pictures at Genoa, which Ratti numbers among the Genoese works of art most worthy of remembrance." He died in 1697.

CARLONI, CARLO, a painter and engraver, who was probably of the family of the preceding artists. Fuesslin, in his Lives of the Swiss Painters, observes that the family of Carloni, so fruitful in able artists, although generally ranged among the Genoese painters, may be legitimately claimed as originally of Switzerland. Carlo Carloni was born near Como, in the Milanese, in 1686. He was the son of a sculptor, who destined him for the same pursuit, but he preferred painting, and was placed under the care of Giulio Quaglio. He afterwards studied at Rome, until he was twenty-three years of age, when he visited Germany, where he met with great encouragement. Of his works as a painter little is known further than that he is said to have possessed an inventive genius and great facility. As an engraver, he has left us the following plates, mostly from his own compositions:

The Conception of the Virgin.

The Holy Family, with St. John kissing the Foot of Jesus.

S. Charles Borromeo communicating the Pestiferous.

The Death of a Saint.

An allegorical subject of Opulence, for a ceiling.

Another subject for a ceiling, a Figure with a Crown.

A Group of Children, with a Basket of Flowers.

He died in 1775.

CARMONA, EMANUEL SALVADOR, an eminent Spanish engraver, born at Madrid about 1740. He visited Paris when young, and became a pupil of Charles Dupuis. In a few years he made so great a progress, that he was received into the academy at Paris in 1761. He afterwards returned to Spain, where he continued to give proof of his respectable talent. The following are his principal plates:

The Portrait of Francis Boucher. 1761; his reception print at the Academy.

The Portrait of Colin de Vermont. 1761.

The Portrait of the Marshal de Broglio.

An allegorical subject, in honour of Charles III. of Spain; after Solimani.

Joseph, a Carmelite Monk; after Velasquez.

The Virgin and Infant; after Murillo; half-length.

The Virgin and Infant; after Vandyck.

The Angels appearing to Magdalene; after Guercino.

St. John Baptist in the Desert; after Mengs.

Mary Magdalene in the Desert; after the same.

CARNIO, ANTONIO. This painter was a native of Portogruaro, a district of Friuli, the son of an artist little known, by whom he was instructed in the elements of the art. He afterwards studied at Venice the works of Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese. According to Lanzi, Friuli has not produced a greater genius than Carnio since the time of Pordenone. The composition of his historical subjects is ingenious and novel, and his design lofty and bold. His colouring, especially in his carnations, is tender and harmonious. Some of his best works at Udine have been much injured by retouching. The best preserved is his S. Tommaso di Villanuova in S. Lucia. He painted many easel pictures and portraits for the private collections at Udine. He was living in 1680.

CARNOVALE, DOMENICO. According to Virriani, this artist was a native of Modena, where he flourished about the year 1564. He excelled in painting architectural views, with figures, which he introduced with great propriety. He was also a reputable architect. [A specimen of his style may be seen in Rosini, plate xciii. Wonderful things are related of his skill in architectural painting, and of the illusion produced; the parallels are to be found in like stories recorded of Zeuxis and Parrhasius.]

CARNULI, FRA. SIMONE DA. This painter was a Franciscan monk of Genoa. He flourished about the year 1519, and painted several pictures for his convent, two of which possessed great merit, representing the Last Supper, and the Predication of S. Antonio; they are dated in 1519. His manner is not quite divested of the dryness that prevailed at his time with respect to his figures; but he painted architectural views and perspectives with small figures, which are estimable for their aerial perspective and degradation of tint.

CARO, FRANCISCO LOPEZ, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1592. He was a disciple of Pablo de las Roelas. He painted several pictures of the victories of Charles V. in the palace of the Pardo, and was an eminent painter of portraits. He died at Madrid in 1662.

CARO, FRANCISCO, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Seville in 1627, and was first instructed by his father, but he afterwards entered the school of Alonso Cano. His principal works, according to Palomino, are the pictures of the Life of the Virgin, in the chapel of San Isidoro, and his celebrated Porciuncula, in the church of S. Francisco at Segovia; works which exhibit no ordinary talent, and sustain the reputation of the school of Cano. He died at Madrid in 1667.

CAROSELLI, ANGILOLO. This painter was born at Rome, according to Baldinucci and Orlandi, in 1573, and became a scholar of M. Angelo Caravaggio. To the vigorous colouring and boldness of effect of his instructor, he added a grace and elegance not to be found in the works of that master. He was more employed in easel pictures and portraits than in large works, of which he painted several for the Cardinal Gessi, and other galleries at Rome. He possessed an extraordinary talent of copying with astonishing precision the works of the most celebrated artists, and in painting pasticci in imitation of their style. His large works in the churches are the Martyrdom of St. Placido, and St. Gregory celebrating Mass before a concourse of people in S. Francesca Romana; and S. Vincenslao in the pontifical palace of the Quirinal. He died at Rome in 1651. [Zani places his birth about 1585, and his death in 1653.]

CAROT, ———. According to Mr. Strutt, this artist resided at Rome about the year 1585. He engraved a small upright plate, representing St. Francis holding a Cross. It is etched in a bold, spirited style, and appears to have been the production of a painter.

CAROTTO, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, a Veronese painter, born in 1470. He was first a scholar of Liberale Veronese, and afterwards studied under Andrea Mantegna. His advancement under the latter was such, that Lanzi asserts, that Mantegna disposed of his pictures as his own. That author describes some of his works as more harmonious, and in a grander style, than those of Andrea, particularly in his large picture of S. Fermo at Verona, and his altar-piece degli Angioli in S. Enfemia. He was much patronized, and employed by the Visconti di Milano, and at the court of Monferrato, where there are several of his easel pictures and portraits. He died in 1546.

CAROTTO, GIOVANNI, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, by whom he was instructed. As a painter, he never went beyond mediocrity, and that in an impoverished style of his brother. As an architect and a designer of the ruins of antiquity, he acquired considerable reputation, and was the instructor of Paolo Veronese in the elements of architecture.

CARPACCIO, VITTORE, an old Venetian painter, who, according to Ridolfi, flourished about the year 1500, and painted several pictures in competition with the Bellini, for the churches and public places at Venice. Although, in his early pictures, he had something of the hard and dry manner of his time, in the course of his life he made considerable progress in the softening of his tints, and in the expression of his heads. His principal work was painted, in concurrence with Bellini, in the great council-chamber of the Ducal palace, which was destroyed by fire in 1576. In the Oratorio di

S. Orsola, are some pictures of the life of that Saint. In the chapel of the Compagnia de S. Girolamo, is the Communion of St. Jerome. At Ferrara, in S. Maria del Vado, is the Death of the Virgin, surrounded by the Apostles. [There are works by him dated 1519, and Zani says he was living in 1522.]

CARPACCIO, BENEDETTO. Lanzi thinks this painter was the son or nephew of the foregoing artist. At Capo d'Istria, in the church of the Rontonda, is a picture of this master, of the Coronation of the Virgin, which, for beauty of colouring, expression, and intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, does not yield to many pictures of the time. It is dated in 1537. In the Osservanti is another of his pictures, with the date of 1541.

[CARPENTERO, JEAN CAROL, born at Antwerp in 1784, studied under Vanden Bosch, and M. Van Bree. He painted historical pictures, and landscapes with cows and sheep: in the latter subjects he made Ommeganck his model, and such as find their way to England are generously attributed to that master by the importers. It is a compliment to Carpentero, though it robs him of his reputation without enriching Ommeganck.]

CARPENTIER, ADRIAN. This artist was a native of Switzerland. He settled in England about the year 1760, as a portrait painter; and from that time, till the year 1774, was a frequent exhibitor with the Society of Artists in Spring Garden. One of his best performances was a portrait of Roubilliac, the sculptor, from which there is a very good mezzotinto print by David Martin. He died about the year 1778, at an advanced age.

CARPI, UGO DA, a painter and engraver, born at Rome about the year 1486, and flourished in the beginning of the sixteenth century. He is generally regarded as the first inventor of that species of engraving on wood, which is known by the denomination of chiaro-scuro, in imitation of drawings; which was afterwards carried to such perfection by Baldassare Peruzzi. This ingenious contrivance is performed by using different blocks; one for the outline and darkest shadows, another for the lighter shadows, and a third for the demi-tints. The prints by Ugo da Carpi, though slight, are masterly and spirited, and exhibit an excellent resemblance of the designs of the artists from whom they are taken. They are, for the most part, after the works of Raffaele and Parmegiano. The following are generally attributed to him:

Jacob's Ladder; after Raffaele.

David with the Head of Goliath; after the same.

The Murder of the Innocents; after the same.

Christ preaching on the Steps of the Temple; after the same.

Elimas struck with Blindness; after the same.

The Death of Ananias; after the same.

The Descent from the Cross; after the same.

The dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin; after the same.

St. John in the Wilderness; after the same.

Æneas carrying his Father Anchises; after the same.

A Sibyl reading in a Book, with a Child holding a Torch; after the same.

Hercules strangling Anteus; after the same.

Raffaele and his Mistress; after the same.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Sebastian and St. Nicholas; after Parmegiano.

St. Peter and St. Paul; after the same.

St. Jerome sitting with some Books; after the same.

A Satyr, sounding the Water with his Flute; after the same.

[Bartsch describes 52 attributed to this master.]

CARPI, GIROLAMO DA. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1501, and was educated under Benvenuto Garofolo. On leaving the school of that master, he passed some time at Bologna, where he was much employed in portrait painting. He afterwards visited Parma and Modena, where he was so fascinated with the works of Coreggio and Parmegiano, that he applied himself to study and copy them with great assiduity. He is not however to be considered only as a copyist. He painted many pictures, of his own composition, for the churches at Ferrara and Bologna, that place him in a most respectable rank in the art. At Ferrara, in the cathedral, are three pictures by him of the Madonna, S. Giorgio, and S. Maurelio. At the Carmelites is his picture of S. Girolamo; and in S. Maria del Vado one of his finest works, representing a Miracle wrought by S. Antonio da Padoua. At Rovigi, in the church of S. Francesco, is his picture of the Pentecost, and at Bologna are his two most celebrated productions, one in S. Martino Maggiore, of the Adoration of the Magi, the other in S. Salvatore, of the Madonna and Bambino, with S. Catherine and other Saints. In the two last he displays a mixture of the Roman and of Lombard styles. He died in 1556.

CARPINONI, DOMENICO, a Bergamese painter, born at Clusone, in the Valle Seriana, in 1566. He was sent to Venice when young, and became a scholar of the younger Palma. In the early part of his life, he was occupied in copying the works of Palma and Bassano, he afterwards painted some pictures of his own composition, which, according to Tassi, are vigorously coloured, and tolerably correct in design. In the principal church of Clusone, is a picture by him of the Birth of St. John Baptist, and a Descent from the Cross. In the Chiesa di Monesterolo, in the Vallè Cavallina, is a picture of the Transfiguration. And at Lovere, in the church of the Padri Osservanti, the Adoration of the Magi. He died in 1658.

CARPINONI, MARZIALE, was the grandson of the preceding artist, born at Clusone in 1644, and, according to Tassi, was taught the first principles of the art by his father, an artist of little note, but afterwards had the advantage of the instruction of his grandfather. He was afterwards sent to Rome for improvement, where he frequented the school of Ciro Ferri. He painted history with no small reputation, and was employed for the churches of his native town and the vicinity. In the great church at Clusone, is a Nativity by this painter, and the Baptism of Christ by St. John; and in the cathedral at Bergamo, S. S. Domneone and Eusebia. He also painted several pictures for the churches in Brescia. He died in 1722.

CARPIONI, GIULIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1611. He was a scholar of Alessandro Varotari, called Paduanino, and, like his master, followed the splendid style of Paolo Veronese. He was superior to his fellow student Maffei, in vigour, expression, and invention. He painted history and bacchanals, and also sacred subjects of a small size, many of which are to be seen in the churches in the Venetian states. His subjects of the fable are placed with distinction in the private collections of his country, and are touched with a spirit, and coloured with a beauty of tinting, which his master would not have disavowed. He died in 1674. [His easel pictures of bacchanalian subjects are more analogous to N. Poussin than any other master.]

CARPIONI, CARLO, was the son of Giulio Car-pioni, and was educated by his father, in whose style he painted a few pictures, but distinguished himself more as a painter of portraits. In the council-chamber at Vicenza, and in the convent of the Padri Servi at Monte Berico, there are some groups of portraits of magistrates, which to the verity of resemblance add the arrangement of an ingenious and elevated invention.

CARRARI, BALDASSARE, was a native of Ravenna, and flourished about the year 1511. Lanzi places him among the scholars of Niccolo Rondinello. His principal work is, what that author styles his most celebrated picture of S. Bartolomeo, in the church of St. Dominico at Ravenna. When Julius II. visited that city in 1511, on seeing that work, he declared that the altars of Rome did not at that time possess a finer picture.

CARRÉ, FRANCIS. This painter was born in Friesland in 1630. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he was of sufficient estimation to be appointed first painter to the Stadtholder William Frederick. He excelled in painting landscapes and village festivals, which are little known, except in his own country. He died at Amsterdam in 1669. [Most writers place his birth in 1636.]

CARRÉ, HENRY, was the elder son of the preceding painter, born at Amsterdam in 1656. After studying the art under Juriaen Jacob and Jacques Jordaens for some time, the Princess of Orange gave him a commission in her regiment, and he served some years in the army, and was present at the siege of Groningen in 1672. He returned however to the art, and exercised his talents at Amsterdam with success and reputation. In the chateau of Ryswick, he painted a saloon with landscapes, decorated with figures and animals, well drawn and spiritedly touched. He died in 1721.

[CARRÉ, ABRAHAM, born at the Hague in 1694, was the son of Henry Carré. He painted portraits in small, and was an excellent copyist of the works of more distinguished Dutch masters; in which occupation he was much employed by the dealers, who sold them for originals.]

CARRÉ, MICHAEL. This painter was the younger brother of Henry Carré, born at Amsterdam in 1666, and was first instructed by his brother, but afterwards became a scholar of Nicholas Berghem. He did not profit as much as might have been expected from the precepts and example of that excellent master, preferring, from an unaccountable depravity of taste, the greatly inferior style of Gabriel vander Leew. He is said, by Houbraken, to have resided some time in England, and that his works were not popular. He is not, however, mentioned by Lord Orford in the Anecdotes. He was a landscape painter of some celebrity, and on the death of Abraham Begyn, was invited to the court of Berlin by the King of Prussia, and was appointed one of his principal painters. He returned to Holland after the death of the king, and resided chiefly at Alkmaer, where he died in 1728. The principal merit of this artist was an uncommon facility and boldness of pencil, well suited to the style of painting he was mostly employed in, the decoration of halls and large apartments. One of his best works is a saloon at the Hague, where he has represented in large landscapes with figures, the history of Jacob and Esau. [Some of his easel pictures, landscapes with cattle, are very good, and are to be found in many respectable collections.]

CARRENNO, DON JUAN, an eminent Spanish painter, born, according to Palomino, at Abiles in Asturias in 1614. He studied at Madrid under Pedro de las Cuevas, and improved himself in colouring by frequenting the school of Bartolomé Roman. His talents recommended him to the patronage of Philip IV., who employed him in some important fresco works in his palaces. Besides his commissions from the king, he painted a number of pictures for the churches, and Palomino gives a long account of his works at Madrid, Toledo, Alcalá de Henares, Segovia, and Pamplona. At Madrid, in conjunction with Francisco Ricci, he painted the celebrated Cupola of San Antonio de los Portugeses, and a fine picture of Magdalene in the Desert, in the convent of las Recogidas. He was also a distinguished portrait painter. The colouring of this excellent artist was in a tone between Titian and Vandyck, and in tenderness and suavity he was perhaps superior to any painter of his country except Murillo. He was continued painter to the court under Charles II. He died at Madrid in 1685. [His proper appellation is Don Juan Carreño de Miranda.]

CARRETTI, DOMENICO. According to Averoldi, this painter was a native of Bologna. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but during a long residence at Brescia, he painted many subjects of history in easel pictures for the private collections. He also was employed for the churches. The most esteemed of his works, is a picture of the Virgin with the infant Jesus, and St. Theresa, in the church of S. Pietro in Oliveto.

CARRERA. See ROSALBA.

CARRUCCI. See PONTORMO.

CARS, LAURENCE, a French designer and engraver, born at Lyons in 1702. He was the son of an obscure engraver, by whom he received some instruction, but he went young to Paris, where it was not long before he distinguished himself. Cars may be considered as one of the best French engravers of the eighteenth century, in the kind of subjects he selected. His best plates are those he has engraved after Le Moine, and particularly the print of Hercules and Omphale. His work is extensive, the following are his principal plates :

[His birth is placed by different writers in 1669, 1701, 1702, and 1703: he died in 1771.]

[CARTER JOHN, an antiquarian draughtsman and engraver, who published Specimens of ancient English Sculpture and other Antiquities. He was persevering in his pursuit of objects relating to the "olden times," and, in addition to his own publications, the periodicals of the day, particularly the Gentleman's Magazine, abound with his communications. All his productions have the character of accuracy, and may be referred to as good authority of the styles of the periods from whence they are taken. He had many peculiarities, but on the whole was a harmless and inoffensive drudge. He died in 1817, in his 70th year, and was buried at Hampstead.]

CARTER, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He was a scholar of Hollar, and was a successful imitator of his style. It is very probable that he assisted Hollar in the prodigious number of works in which he was engaged, as his name, or mark, is only affixed to a very few prints. His plates are sometimes marked W. C. In Ogilby's translation of Homer, the vignettes, and other ornaments, were engraved by Carter.

CARTWRIGHT, WILLIAM, an English engraver of portraits and other book-plates. His name is affixed to a portrait of Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, after Holbein. It is inscribed, Celarif. Gu. Cartwright.

CARWITHAM, J. This artist was a native of England, and flourished about the year 1730. He engraved several plates for the publications of his time, being chiefly employed by the booksellers. His prints are sometimes executed with the graver only, others are etched, and finished with the graver, in a style resembling that of Bernard Picart. Among others, we have a middling-sized plate by him, representing the Laocoon, after the antique marble, dated 1741. He also engraved a variety of frontispieces, among which is an emblematical one, from a design of B. Picart, with the date 1723.

CASA, NICHOLAS DE LA, an engraver who flourished towards the end of the sixteenth century. From an inscription on one of his plates, he appears to have been a native of Lorraine. He worked entirely with the graver. We have by him,

The Portrait of the Emperor Charles V.; oval, with a border, copied from Æneas Vico; inscribed N. D. la Casa Lotaringus, fec.

The Portrait of Baccio Bandinelli.

[Zani says he worked in 1640; and is inclined to believe that he is the same with Nicolo Beatrice: there are others of the same opinion.]

CASALI, ANDREA, a modern Italian painter and engraver, born at Civita Vecchia about the year 1720. He is said to have been a scholar of S. Conca. He visited England about 1748, and was employed in ornamenting the seats of several of the nobility. He etched some plates from his own designs, and one from Raffaele; among others we have by him,

The Virgin and Infant; after Raffaele.

Edward the Martyr.

Lucretia lamenting her Fate.

The Princess Gunhilda, or Innocence Triumphant.

[His pictures are generally of a large size; the figures in theatrical taste, but well coloured.]

CASALINI, LUCIA, an eminent paintress of portraits, born at Bologna in 1677. She was a scholar of Giuseppe dal Sole, and at first attempted some historical subjects, but was more successful in portraits, in which she gained great reputation. Her portrait, by herself, is in the Florentine Gallery. She died in 1762.

CASANOVA, FRANCESCO. This painter was born in London in 1732, of Venetian parents, who sent him to Venice when he was young, and he became a scholar of Francesco Simonini, a painter of battles. Like his master, he took the pictures of Bourgogne for his model, and became a painter of considerable celebrity. Besides battle-pieces, Casanova painted landscapes, with figures and cattle, marines and pastoral subjects. After passing some years at Dresden, he went to Paris, where he met with great encouragement, and was received into the academy. Among the pupils of Casanova at Paris, was the late ingenious Mr. de Louthembourg. He afterwards went to Vienna, where his pictures were greatly admired. Bassan states, that he etched some plates from his own designs. [He died in 1805.]

CASAUBON, FREDERICK, a German painter, born at Solingen in 1623. He received his first instruction in the art at Amsterdam, and afterwards went to Paris, where he became a scholar of Charles le Brun. From France he visited Italy, where he passed some years, and lived in intimacy with Niccolò Poussin, whose style he attempted to imitate. Towards the latter part of his life he came to England, and not finding employment as an historical painter, he applied himself to portraits, the only branch of the art then encouraged. He died in London in 1690.

[CASEMBROODT, or CASENBRODT, ABRAHAM, a Dutch painter, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He was a long time in Sicily, and particularly distinguished himself at Messina, as a landscape and marine painter: in the latter he generally represented storms. He also painted historical subjects, three of which, the Passion, are in the church of S. Giovachino at Messina. There are some etchings by him of sea-ports and marine views.]

CASOLANI, ALESSANDRO, was born at Siena in 1552, and was a disciple of Cavaliere Roncalli, under whom he became a very reputable painter of history. His compositions are ingenious and copious, his figures well drawn, and gracefully disposed. His works are principally in the churches at Siena. It is no slight proof of this artist's merit, that Guido Reni, on beholding his picture of the Martyrdom of S. Bartolomeo, at the Carmelites, exclaimed, Costui veramente pittore. There are also several of his works at Naples and Genoa. He died in 1606, [in which year one of his pictures is signed and dated.]

CASOLANI, ILARIO. This painter is called Cristofano by Baglioni, but Mancini, who wrote during his lifetime, and Lanzi, who follows that authority, call him Ilario. He was the son of Alessandro Casolani, and was also brought up in the school of Cavaliere Roncalli. He assisted his father in some of his fresco paintings, and, after his death, finished the Assumption in the church of S. Francesco, left imperfect by Alessandro. He painted several pictures for the churches at Rome, both in oil and in fresco, but was superior in the latter. In S. Maria in Via, he painted the Trinity. In the Madonna de Monti some pictures of the Life of the Virgin, and in the vault, the Ascension. He died at Rome in the prime of life.

CASSANA, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, was born at Genoa in 1611, and was a scholar of Bernardo

Strozzi. He painted history and portraits, but was more eminent in the latter, of which he painted a great number at Venice, where he chiefly resided. He passed some time at the court of the Mirandola, where he painted a S. Girolamo in the dome of the church, and other creditable performances. He was the father of a family of artists, who all distinguished themselves. He died in 1691.

CASSANA, NICCOLO. This painter was the eldest son of the preceding artist, born at Venice in 1659. He was instructed by his father in the rudiments of the art. He chiefly excelled in portrait painting, in which he became very eminent, although his historical pictures in the gallery at Florence, of which the Conspiracy of Cataline is the most esteemed, proved that he possessed great merit in that department. He came to England in the reign of Queen Anne, whose portrait he painted, as well as those of several of the nobility. He did not live long to enjoy this success, and died in London in 1713. [He was the second son of Giovanni Francesco; his brother Giovanni Agostino was born in 1658.]

CASSANA, ABATE GIOVANNI AGOSTINO, was the younger brother of Niccolò, born at Genoa in 1658, and was instructed by his father. He painted portraits with some reputation, but preferred painting animals and subjects, in the style of Benedetto Castiglione. His pictures of that description are found in the collections at Florence, Venice, and Genoa. He died in 1720. [He was the elder brother of Niccolò.]

CASSANA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was the youngest brother of the two preceding artists. He excelled in painting fruit, flowers, and still-life.

CASSANA, MARIA VITTORIA. This paintress was the sister of the three preceding artists. She painted small pictures of devout subjects for private collections, which were much esteemed. She died in 1711.

CASSENTINO, JACOPO, an old Florentine painter, born soon after the year 1270. He was a disciple of Taddeo Gaddi, and painted in the Gothic style of that master, as appears from the traces of his works remaining in the Chiesa di Orsan Michele at Florence. To this painter has been attributed the first foundation of the academy at Florence in 1350. For the chapel of the academy, he painted a picture of St. Luke painting the Portrait of the Virgin. He died in 1356.

CASSIANI, PADRE STEFANO, called IL CERTOSINO. This painter was a native of Lucca, and flourished about the year 1660. He was called il Certosino, or the Carthusian, from his being a monk of that order. He painted in fresco the cupola of the church of the Carthusians at Lucca, and two altarpieces, representing subjects from the life of the Virgin, and several other works in the churches of his order, in Pisa, Siena, and other places, which are very reputable performances, in the style of Pietro da Cortona.

CASSIONE, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver on wood, who flourished at Bologna about the year 1678. He executed several of the cuts representing the portraits of the painters, for the work entitled, Felsina Pittrice, by Carlo Cesare Malvasia, published at Bologna in the above-mentioned year.

CASTAGNO, ANDREA DEL. This painter, whose memory is rendered infamous by his atrocious crimes, is still interesting to the art by his extraordinary merit. He was born at Castagno, a village in Tuscany, in 1409. His parents were extremely poor, and he appears to have discovered an uncommon disposition for the art, without the help of an instructor, until his untutored essays excited the surprise and admiration of all that saw them, and recommended him to the protection of Bernardetto de Medici, who procured him the assistance of the best masters, at that early period, in Florence. He was some time under Masaccio, and at length became one of the most distinguished painters of his age. He was in the possession of a high reputation when Domenico Venetiano visited Florence, who had learned the new method of painting in oil and varnish, from Antonella da Messina, till then unknown in Tuscany. The novelty and splendour of the new mode of colouring was extremely admired; and Castagno, by a pretended friendship for Domenico, was the only person to whom he communicated the secret. To be the sole possessor of so valuable a discovery, was a temptation his ambition could not resist, and his principles were not proof against the most atrocious means of securing it. He conceived the horrid project of assassinating his rival, which he effected, and escaped suspicion. He survived this murder a few years, and practised his ill-acquired art with great success. Tormented by remorse and terror, he made a full confession of his guilt previous to his death, which happened in 1480, at the age of 71. The best of his remaining works are in the church S. Lucia de Magnuoli, at Florence, and in the monastery degli Angeli, a Crucifixion, with many figures, painted on a wall. [Manni, in a note to Balducci, says that Castagno died in 1477, at the age of 51, consequently he was born in 1426. Zani seems to countenance this.]

CASTEELS, PETER, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp in 1684. He painted birds, fowls, flowers, and fruit. He came to England in 1708. His paintings have not much to recommend them, and were greatly inferior to a contemporary artist of our own country, Luke Cradock. As an engraver he has more merit. In 1726, he published a set of twelve plates of birds and fowls, etched from his own designs; and some other plates from his pictures, which possess considerable merit. He died in 1749.

[CASTEL, ALEXANDER, a Flemish landscape and battle painter, some of whose pictures are in the galleries at Munich, Schleisheim, and Lustheim. He died at Berlin in 1694.]

CASTELLI, ANNIBALE. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1605. He was a scholar of Pietro Faccini, and by imitating his manner, he fell into the same defect that is discernible in the works of that master. By loading and tormenting his carnations, he disturbed his outline, and his figures became heavy and incorrect. His best work is the Raising of Lazarus, in the church of S. Paolo, at Bologna.

CASTELLI, or CASTELLO, BERNARDO. A Genoese painter, born in 1557. He was a scholar of Andrea Semini, and an imitator of Luca Cambiasi. In endeavouring to acquire the facility of the latter, he fell into all his defects, and abandoned nature for manner and despatch. An able designer, his works would have approached nearer to perfection if he had taken the trouble of studying them. He was copious, and ready in invention, perhaps, because his judgment was not difficult to satisfy. His principal works at Genoa, are S. Diego and S. Girolamo, in the church of S. Francesco. In S. Ciro, Christ disputing with the Doctors. At the Capuchins, four pictures, St. Francis receiving the Stigmata, the Crucifixion, S. Antonio da Padona, and S. Clara. At Rome, in the basilica of S. Peter's, St. Peter walking on the Sea. He lived in habits of intimacy with the principal poets of his time, and made the designs for Tasso's Jerusalem, which were engraved by Agostino Caracci. He died in 1629. [He was also an eminent miniaturist; and is praised by Marino, the poet, for the skill and accuracy of his representations of various insects.]

CASTELLI, or CASTELLO, VALERIO, was the son of Bernardo Castelli, born at Genoa in 1625, and was a scholar of Domenico Fiasella. He did not, however, follow the style of either his father or instructor, but made choice of prototypes more suited to his genius, by studying the works of Procaccini at Milan, and of Coreggio at Parma; from whose example, and a graceful manner of disposing his figures, which was natural to him, he formed a style which may be called entirely his own. His design is sometimes not the most correct, but his works are judiciously composed, harmoniously and vigorously coloured, with an admirable conduct of the chiaro-scuro. In his fresco paintings he nearly approaches the excellence of Carloni, as is evident in the Cupola of the Nunziata at Genoa, and in S. Marta. In the church of S. Maria del Gerbino, is his picture of the Conception, with two laterals of the Marriage of the Virgin, and the Presentation in the Temple; and in the ceiling, in fresco, the Crowning of the Virgin, with a choir of angels. In the church of the Benedictines, the Annunciation. At the Franciscans, the Conversion of St. Paul. The ceiling of the Augustines represents the Descent of the Holy Ghost. Valerio Castelli also excelled in painting battles, and subjects of profane history, in which he seems to have followed the style of Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese. Several of these are in the palaces at Genoa. He died in 1659.

CASTELLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called IL BERGAMASCO. This eminent painter was born at Gandino, in the Valle Seriana, in the Bergamese, in 1500. He was called il Bergamasco, to distinguish him from a Genoese painter of the same name, who was a scholar of Luca Cambiasi, and excelled in miniature. When he was young, he was intrusted to the care of Aurelio Busso, of Crema, who had been a scholar of Polidoro da Caravaggio, by whom he was taught the first principles of the art. That painter took him with him to Genoa, and after some time left him in that city, unprotected and abandoned, but considerably advanced in the art, by his studies after the best masters of that school. He had the good fortune to attract the attention of a Genoese nobleman, Tobia Pallavicino, who took him under his protection, and sent him to Rome to visit the works of the great masters, and supported him in his studies, until he arrived at great proficiency in painting, sculpture, and architecture. On his return to Genoa, the first essay of his talents was decorating the palace of his protector, and some fresco paintings in the church of S. Marcellino. In the monastery of S. Sebastiano, is his justly celebrated picture of the Martyrdom of that Saint, by which he acquired great reputation. Whilst he was in the full possession of the public favour, Luca Cambiasi returned to Genoa, after completing his studies at Florence and Rome, when a liberal and laudable emulation seems to have taken place between these artists, honourable and advantageous to both. They were employed, in conjunction, by the Duke Grimaldi, in the Nunziata di Portoria, where Castelli represented in the ceiling of the choir our Saviour sitting as the judge of the world, surrounded by angels, some bearing the instruments of his passion, and others displaying a scroll, inscribed Venite Benedicti, painted with a beauty of colour, and a splendid effect of light emanating from the figure of Christ, that dazzles the beholder. Luca Cambiasi painted the laterals, representing the fate of the Blessed and the Reprobate, which, though possessed of great merit, are eclipsed by the transcendent powers of Castelli in composition and expression. On visiting his native country, emulous of leaving something worthy of his fame, he undertook his great work of the Saloon in the Lanzi palace at Gorlago, where he has represented some of the most interesting subjects of the Iliad, composed and executed with a grandeur that resembles the great style of Giulio Romano. Towards the latter part of his life he was invited to visit Spain by Charles V., and was employed by that monarch in the palace of the Pardo, which he ornamented with some subjects from Ovid, and in several other works. He died at Madrid in 1570. [Zani says he was born in 1490; and Füssli that he died in 1570, aged 80.]

[CASTELLI, or CASTELLO, FABRICIO, was the son of Il Bergamasco, and employed by Philip II., in conjunction with other painters, to decorate parts of the Escorial. One of the subjects on which they were employed was the victory gained by John II. over the Moors of Granada; it was copied from a painting by Dello on a canvass 130 feet in length, which was found in an armoire of the Alcazar de Segoria, and is a most curious composition. He also painted at the Pardo, where he executed several frescos; and he coloured forty-eight busts of Saints executed by Juan d'Arfe for the Escorial. He was considered an artist of great talent. He died at Madrid in 1617.]

CASTELLO, AVANZINO, DA CITTA DI, was a native of the Ecclesiastical States, born in 1552, and visited Rome when he was young, where he became a scholar of Niccolo Pomarancio. During the pontificates of Sixtus V. and Clement VIII. this painter was held in great esteem, and employed in the loggie of St. John of Lateran. He also painted many pictures for the churches at Rome, of which Baglioni gives a particular account. Among his best works may be considered his pictures in S. Paolo, out of Rome, representing the Miracle of the Serpent in the Isle of Malta; the Decollation of St. Paul, and his taking up into the third heaven. He died in 1629.

CASTELLO, CASTELLINO. This painter was born at Turin in 1579, and was a scholar of Giovanni Batista Paggi, under whom he acquired a correct and elegant style of design. His picture of the Pentecost, in the church dello Spirito Santo at Genoa, gained him great reputation. He was also a very eminent portrait painter; and Lanzi reports, that when Vandyck visited Genoa, he particularly admired the style of Castello, and they reciprocally painted each other's portraits. He died in 1649.

CASTELLO, FELIX, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1602. He was a scholar of Vincenzo Carducci, and painted history with some reputation. His principal works are in the church of the Capuchinos de la Paciencia, at Madrid. He died in that city in 1656. [Felix Castello studied first under his father, Fabricio, and afterwards under Carducho. He was eminent as an historical and battle painter; and was considered to be one of the best of his time. There are, or were, at Madrid, two capital pictures representing the taking of a Castle by Don Fadrique de Toledo, and Spanish soldiers swimming to an attack, under the command of Don Baltazar Alfaro. Carducho was so pleased with the manner in which his pupil prepared his masses in the composition of these pictures, that he requested permission to paint the head of Don Fadrique in the first, and which he did in a very beautiful manner. Castello's handling is large, his compositions superb, well understood, and spiritedly executed.]

CASTELLO, FRANCESCO DA. This painter was born in Flanders, of Spanish parents, in 1586. He visited Rome when he was very young, for the purpose of study, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. He painted history, generally of a small size; and his pictures were much in vogue. He also painted some works for the churches at Rome. In S. Giacomo degli Spagnuoli, is an altar-piece representing the Assumption of the Virgin, with a glory of angels, and the apostles below; and in S. Rocco di Ripetta, a picture of the Madonna and Bambino, with St. Nicholas and St. Julian. He died at Rome in 1636.

CASTELLUCCI, SALVI. This painter was born at Arezzo in 1608, and was brought up in the school of Pietro da Cortona at Rome. He was a successful imitator of the facile and pleasing style of Pietro. There are some of his large pictures in the churches at Arezzo, which are admired for their freedom of hand and agreeable colour. He was much employed in painting easel pictures for the private collections. He had a son, Pietro Castellucci, who painted in his style, but was inferior to his father. He died in 1672.

CASTIGLIONE, GIOVANNI BENEDETTO, called BENEDETTO. This eminent artist was born at Genoa in 1616. After studying some time under Gio. Batista Paggi, he entered the school of Gio. Andrea de Ferrari. He had made great progress under that master, when Vandyck visited Genoa, who favoured him with his friendship and advice. Advantaged by the instruction of that admirable painter, he acquired the chaste and tender tinting, and the flowing pencil, by which his works are characterized. [This may be doubted, as Castiglione was too young, when Vandyck visited Genoa, to attract notice as an artist.] He afterwards visited Rome, Florence, Parma, and Venice; in each of which places he left proofs of his ability. Although Benedetto is distinguished throughout Europe by his easel pictures, representing landscapes with figures and animals, he was not incapable of moving in a higher walk of art, as is evident from his fine picture of the Nativity in S. Luca, and his Magdalene and St. Catherine, in the church of the Madonna di Castello, at Genoa. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, and animals. In his historical works he appears not to have had in view the ideal beauty which is found in the great masters of the Roman school, nor to have attempted the elegance of form, the purity of contour, or the nobility of expression, which form the essence of historical painting. He was however completely successful in the style which he seems to have preferred, of pastoral subjects, the march of caravans, and troops of animals. His pictures of that description are distinguished by a clear and vigorous colour, a lively and spirited touch, and an admirable effect of chiaro-scuro. His figures and animals are grouped in the most picturesque manner, and his landscape is always of appropriate and pleasing scenery. The latter part of his life was passed in the service of the Duke of Mantua, who accommodated him with apartments in his palace, and treated him with great liberality and munificence, and he there painted some of his finest works. As an engraver, Benedetto is deserving of particular notice. He has left us about seventy plates, executed with all the taste and spirit that are seen in his pictures. They are etched, and sometimes a little assisted with the graver; of a most masterly effect of light and shadow, and may be compared with Rembrandt, della Bella, and the most admired engravers in that style. The following are his principal prints, which are frequently marked with the cipher BC.

- Portrait of Agostino Mascardi.
- Portrait of Antonio Pignolesale.

Benedetto Castiglione died in 1670.

CASTIGLIONE, FRANCISCO, was the son of the preceding artist, and painted landscapes, with figures and animals, in the style of his father, but never rose above mediocrity.

CASTIGLIONE, SALVATORE. This artist was the brother of Gio. Benedetto Castiglione, by whom he was instructed in the art, and painted landscapes and pastoral subjects in the style of that master. We have by him a highly finished etching, representing the Resurrection of Lazarus, [with his name abbreviated (Cast) and the date 1645.]

CASTILLO, AUGUSTIN, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1565. Palomino does not state by whom he was instructed; but he painted several pictures for the churches at Cordova, in which city he chiefly resided, some of which are almost entirely perished from damp and neglect. Among his best works is the Conception, in the church of Nuestra Señora de los Libreros, and some pictures in the convent of San Pablo. He died in 1626. [His instructor was Luis Fernandez; in the cathedral at Cadiz is the Adoration of the Magi by him, said to be his finest work.]

CASTILLO, JUAN DEL, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Seville in 1584, and was a painter of considerable merit. He had the advantage of being educated under Luis de Vargas, by whose instruction, and a natural disposition for the art, he proved a distinguished painter of history. His principal works are at Seville and Granada. He was the instructor of some of the greatest artists in Spain. Murillo, the celebrated Alonzo Cano, and Pedro de Moya, were his scholars. He died at Cadiz in 1640. [He was instructed by Luis Fernandez: Luis de Vargas died in 1568, sixteen years before Juan was born. Bryan was misled by Palomino, who abounds with errors.]

CASTILLO, Y SAAVEDRA, ANTONIO DEL. This eminent Spanish painter was the son of Augustin del Castillo, born in 1603, by whom he was instructed in the elementary principles of the art. After the death of his father he became a scholar of Francesco Zurbaran, an artist at that time in great repute. In the cathedral at Cordova there are many pictures which bear ample testimony of this painter's merit; and if his colouring had been equal to his composition and design, few artists of his country would have surpassed him. This is evident in his pictures of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in that church. In the convent of San Francisco at Cordova, is a picture by Castillo, representing a subject from the life of that saint, which he painted in competition with Juan de Alfaro, whose practice it was to mark his pictures, Alfaro, pinxit. To show his contempt for the vanity of his rival, he inscribed his picture Non fecit Alfaro. In 1666, he visited Seville, where he had not been since his youth. At that period Murillo was in the zenith of his fame, and his works were the objects of universal admiration. On seeing the pictures of that great master, he was so struck with their extraordinary beauty and his own inferiority, that he exclaimed, Ya murio Castillo! and from that time sunk into a despondency, which hastened his death. He died in 1667.

[CASTILLO, JOSEF DEL, a modern Spanish painter and engraver, born at Madrid in 1737, and died there in 1793. His early promise of excellence induced the minister of state, Josef de Carbajal, to send him to Rome in 1751, at his own expense, to study the works of the great masters under Corrado Giacinto. On his return to Madrid in 1758, the king gave orders to his principal painter, Mengs, to employ the young artist. Mengs did so, by employing him on pictures for the royal tapestries, and in painting mystical pictures for the cells of the royal convent of Salesas; and also several portraits of Charles with the mantle of the order of Toison d'or. Castillo made drawings for the edition of Don Quixote, published by the Academy at Madrid; he engraved the Disciples at Emmaus, after Cerezo, and the Flight into Egypt, and others, after Giordano, and made small copies of the frescos in the Retiro for the engravers. His productions are to be met with in Madrid, at the Escorial, and in various churches, convents, and hospitals.]

CASTREJON, ANTONIO. This Spanish artist was born at Madrid in 1625. He was most celebrated for historical subjects of a cabinet size, although he painted several larger works for the churches, which possess great merit. In the church of San Miguel is a picture by him of St. Michael triumphing over the Dragon of the Apocalypse; and in San Gines the Presentation in the Temple, and some subjects of the life of the Virgin. He died at Madrid in 1690.

CASTRO, GIACOMO DI. According to Dominici, this artist was born at Sorrento, about the year 1597. He was a scholar of Gio. Batista Caraccioli; but he afterwards received some instruction from Domenichino, when that master visited Naples to paint the great chapel of the treasury. There are some of his works in the churches at Sorrento, of which one of the most esteemed is the picture of the Marriage of the Virgin. He died in 1687.

[CASTRO, PETER DE. Of this artist's life very little is known; but he was an admirable painter of what are called subjects of still-life, such as vases, shells, musical instruments, &c. These he arranged in a skilful manner, and coloured with the truth of nature, and added great force by his knowledge of chiaro-scuro. His works are often seen, though his name is little known. He died in 1663.]

CATALANI, ANTONIO, called IL ROMANO. This painter was born at Bologna about the year 1596, and was educated under Francesco Albano. He was a close imitator of the pleasing style of his master, and painted several pictures for the churches at Bologna, although he was more employed on easel pictures for the private collections. In the church of La Madonna del Grada, are four pictures of the patron Saints of the City, in four niches; and in the church del Gesu, St. Peter healing the Lame at the porch of the Temple.

CATALANI, ANTONIO, THE SICILIAN. This painter was born at Messina in 1560. Lanzi is of opinion that he studied at Rome, and formed his style from the works of Federigo Barocccio, where he acquired that harmony of colour and softness of effect which are seen in his works. Such is his large picture of the Nativity in the church of the Capuchins at Gesso. He died in 1630.

CATENA, VINCENZIO, a Venetian painter, who flourished about the year 1500 [to 1530, when he died.] He was either a disciple of Giorgione, or formed himself by studying the works of that master. He painted portraits with great reputation, but was more esteemed for his easel pictures of historical subjects. He was also employed for the churches at Venice. His best works are in S. Simeone Grande, alla Carità, and in S. Maurizio. They possess merit, but retain something of the dry and Gothic. [He died in 1530. His reputation was so great that, when Raphael died, and Michael Angelo was growing infirm, M. A. Michiel wrote from Rome to Antonio di Marsilio at Venice, recommending Catena to be on his guard, "as danger seems to be impending over all very excellent painters."]]

CATENARO, J. B., a painter and engraver, of whom nothing more is known than that he had lived in London and at Madrid. He etched the portrait of L. Giordano, signed J. B. Catenaro, pinx. Madridi et Londini, sculp. We have also by him a Woman seated in a landscape, with Children, and Apollo surrounded by Cupids; from his own designs.

[CATESBY, MARK, was born in England in 1679, and visited America in 1712. He remained there seven years studying the botany of the country. He then returned home, but, being encouraged by the friends of science, made a second visit to the colonies, and took up his head-quarters at Charleston, South Carolina, from which place he made excursions to the interior, through Georgia and Florida. An Indian was generally his companion, who carried his materials for drawing and painting, and such specimens of natural history as he collected. He returned to England in 1726, and studied the art of etching, that he might engrave the plates for his intended publication, which he did from his own paintings. The work is entitled "The Natural History of Carolina, Florida, and the Bahama Islands," and is illustrated with figures of birds, beasts, fishes, plants, &c. This ingenious man was a fellow of the Royal Society, and died in 1749.]

CATHELIN, LOUIS JACQUES, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1736. He was one of the best pupils of Le Bas. We have several plates of portraits, and various subjects, chiefly after the modern painters of his country, which are very neatly engraved. Among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

L'Abbe Terray; after Roslin; his reception plate at the Academy.

Louis XV.; after L. M. Vanloo.

Joseph Vernet, painter of marines; after the same.

Henry IV. of France; after a drawing by Cochin.

Jean Jacques Balechou, engraver; after Arvanou.

Mary Theresa, Empress of Germany; after Dureux.

Joseph II., Emperor; after the same.

M. de Marmontel; after Cochin.

Louis Joseph Bourbon, Prince de Condé.

Equestrian Statue of Louis XV.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Death of Lucretia; after Pellegrini.

Latona revenged; after Ph. Lauri, begun by Balechou, and finished by Cathelin.

Erigone; after Monsiau.

A Waterfall, with Fishermen; after J. Vernet.

A set of Four, of the Times of the Day; after the same.

CATTI, PASQUALE, DA JESI. According to Baglioni, this painter flourished at Rome during the pontificates of Gregory XIII., Sixtus V., and Clement VIII. He was employed in the loggie of the Vatican, where he painted the Passion of our Saviour, and some friezes in the Sala Clementina. In S. Maria Trastevere, the chapel of the Cardinal Altemps is painted by Catti, representing subjects from the life of the Virgin. He died at Rome in the pontificate of Paul V., aged 70.

CATTANIO, COSTANZO. This painter was born at Ferrara in 1602. He was first a scholar of Ippolito Scarsellino, but afterwards frequented the school of Guido, at Bologna. This artist is stated by Lanzi to have been of so boisterous and quarrelsome a disposition, (which that author remarks was not unfrequent among the painters who lived at the time of M. A. Caravaggio,) and was so frequently engaged in broils and outrage, that he passed the greater part of his life in a state of contumacy or exile. The turbulence of his nature evinced itself in many of his works, which generally represented soldiers and banditti, painted in a hot and menacing tone of colour. That he could occasionally divest himself of this ferocity, when the solemnity of the occasion required it, is evident from his pictures of the Flagellation, and the Ecce Homo, in the church of S. Giorgio, at Ferrara; his Christ praying on the Mount in S. Benedetto, and his Annunciation in S. Spirito, have something of the grace and suavity of Guido. He died in 1665.

CATTAPANÌ, LUCA, was born at Cremona about the year 1570, and was instructed in the school of the Campi. He distinguished himself by an uncommon facility. Many of the works of his master were copied by him, with a precision that might deceive the most experienced. Of his own compositions, the most meritorious was his picture of the Decollation of St. John, in the church of S. Donato at Cremona. He painted some works in fresco, but was not so successful as in oil. [One of his pictures is signed Luca Catapan, 1597.]

CATTINI, GIOVANNI, [or GIO. FRANCESCO,] a modern engraver, born at Venice in 1730. He has engraved some antique statues which are at Venice, and a set of fourteen disgusting large heads, from Piazzetta. He also engraved some other portraits of Venetian nobles, and Francesco Zuccarelli, painter, [and some of the statues in the Giustiniani Gallery, in the manner of Claude Mellan, with a single stroke.]

CAVAGNA, GIOVANNI PAOLO. This painter was born at Borgo di San Leandro, in the Bergamese, in 1660. His inclination for the art led him to Venice at the period when Titian was in the zenith of his fame; and, according to Tassi, he had the advantage of studying for a short time in the school of that great master. On his return to Bergamo he finished his studies under Gio. Batista Moroni, a distinguished painter, and acquired an admirable impasto of colour, and a firm pencil. He appears to have adapted the style of Paolo Veronese; and his best works, both in oil and fresco, resemble those of Paolo. He particularly excelled in painting old men and children, as is evident in his picture of the Assumption, with a glory of Angels and the Apostles, painted in fresco, in the choir of S. Maria Maggiore, at Venice. He was not less successful in his oil pictures of the Nativity, and Esther before Ahasuerus, in the same church. His Crucifixion, in S. Lucia, is one of the vaunted works of art at Venice. He died in 1627.

CAVAGNA, FRANCESCO, called CAVAGNUOLO, was the son of the preceding artist, and flourished about the year 1625. He painted history in the style of his father, but never rose above mediocrity. His best work is in the church of the Padri Zoccalanti del Romacolo, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus in the Clouds, with S. Lodovico and S. Caterina. He died young, in 1630.

CAVALLERISI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an Italian engraver, born near Brescia, about the year 1530. He flourished at Rome from 1550 to 1590. His style of engraving resembles that of Æneas Vico, although inferior to him. Many of his plates are copied from other prints, and are executed in a stiff, tasteless style, and incorrectly drawn. They are etched, and finished with the graver. He was very laborious, and his plates amount to near 350. The following are those most worthy of notice, which are sometimes marked with the cipher CB.

The Frontispiece, and Heads of the Popes, for the Vite de Pontefici.

The Prints for the book, entitled Beati Apollinaris Martyris, &c.

Thirty-three plates of the Ruins of Rome; after Dosseus. 1579.

Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Trophæ; after Nic. Circignano.

Christ among the Doctors; supposed from his own design. The Last Supper; the same.

The Image of the Virgin of Loretto. 1566.

A Sea-fight against the Turks; for the book of Ciacioni.

The Virgin, called "The Silence;" after M. Angelo.

The Conversion of St. Paul; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after the same.

The Miracle of the Leaves; after the same.

Christ appearing to St. Peter; after the same.

The Battle of Constantine with Maxentius; after the same.

The Murder of the Innocents; after the same.

Susanna and the Elders; after Titian. 1586.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after A. del Sarto.

The Descent from the Cross; after Daniello da Volterra.

The Virgin and Infant in the Clouds; after Livio Agresti.

The Elevation of the Cross; after the same.

CAVALLINI, PIETRO. This old painter was born at Rome in 1279. He was a disciple of Giotto, and like him practised the mosaic art as well as painting. La Guida di Roma mentions some of his works still existing; and that of Florence by Cambiagi; commends a picture by him of the Annunciation; but his most considerable work is at Assisi, representing the Crucifixion; a curious and venerable relic of the dry and Gothic style, prevalent at that early period of the art. He died, according to Lanzi, in 1344. Vasari says in 1364. [A print of the celebrated Crucifixion may be seen in Rosini's work, plate xxi. Vasari says Cavallini died in 1364, at the age of 85, consequently he was born in 1279. When the date of his birth, as thus given by Vasari, is disproved, and it is shown to have been at a much earlier period, it will be time enough to discuss the question respecting his being the architect of the shrine of Edward the Confessor, in Westminster Abbey, and of the crosses to the memory of Queen Eleanor. It is true that many of Vasari's dates are not to be relied on; but the circumstance of Cavallini being a disciple of Giotto (if he were so) is of much weight, when compared with other matters connected with the question. Even the date given by Lanzi and Manni will hardly suffice, if Cavallini died at the age of 85. As a great reputation is involved in the result, the question deserves further investigation.]

CAVALLINO, BERNARDO. This painter was born at Naples in 1622. He was a scholar of Massimo Stanzioni, and was certainly the ablest of the many artists that studied under that master. His progress was so rapid that it excited the jealousy of his instructor. His talent was in painting historical subjects of an easel size, in which he became one of the most esteemed painters of the Neapolitan school. The collections at Naples possess many of his works, in sacred and profane history, finely composed in a Poussinesque style, full of character and expression, with a colour in which he seems to have imitated the brilliancy of Rubens. There is nothing slight or neglected in his pictures, and nothing was wanting to his fame but a longer continuance of life, which he imprudently shortened by intemperance and debauchery. He died in 1656. [Zani places his birth in 1612, and his death in 1654].

CAVALLUCCI, ANTONIO, was born at Sermo-neta in 1752, and was perhaps the most admired painter of the modern Roman school, after Mengs and Pompeo Batoni. His most esteemed pictures are, St. Bona distributing his Wealth to the Poor and taking the religious Habit, at Pisa; S. Francesco da Paolo, in the Basilica di Loretto; and his celebrated picture of Venus with Ascanius, in the Palazzo Cesarini at Rome. He died in 1795.

CAVARAZZI, BARTOLOMEO, called CRESCENZI. This painter was born at Viterbo about the year 1590, and was a scholar of Cavaliere Roncalli, called Pomarancio. He had made great progress under that master at Rome, when he was taken into the protection of the noble family of Crescenzi, from whence he acquired the name of Crescenzi. He painted many pictures for his patron, and was also employed for the public edifices at Rome. In the church of S. Andrea della Valle, is a picture by him of S. Carlo kneeling with a Choir of Angels. In S. Orsola, he has represented that Saint, with the Legend of the eleven thousand Virgins, and in the Convent of St. Anna, the Virgin and infant Jesus with St. Ann. He died at Rome in the prime of life, in 1625.

CAVAZZA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, a painter and engraver, born at Bologna about the year 1620. He studied under Cavedone and Guido, and painted some pictures for the public places at Bologna. In the Nunziata, are several Saints painted in fresco by this master. He has engraved the following plates from his designs :

The Crucifixion.
The Resurrection.
The Death of St. Joseph.
The Assumption of the Virgin.

CAVAZZA, PIER FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1675, and was a scholar of Domenico Viani. He painted history, and was employed for the churches at Bologna. In S. S. Sebastiano and Rocco, is the Conception, and St. Sebastian, and St. Roch. In S. Colombano, S. Niccolo, and S. Giovanni Batista; and in S. Giuseppe, the Nativity. He died in 1733. [Zani designates him a copyist and imitator.]

CAVAZZONI, FRANCESCO, was born at Bologna in 1559, and was first a scholar of Bartolomeo Passerotti, but afterwards frequented the school of Lodovico Caracci. Less distinguished than Guido and Domenichino, he held a respectable rank amongst the followers of that great school. His works are chiefly at Bologna. The principal of which are, Magdalene at the Feet of Christ, in S. Madalena di via S. Donato; the Crucifixion, in S. Cecilia; and St. John preaching, in S. Giovanni in Monte. [He was living in 1612.]

CAVE, F. MORELLON LE, a French engraver, who was a pupil of Bernard Picart, and flourished about the year 1730. He resided some time in England, and engraved some portraits, chiefly for the booksellers. We have by him, William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland.

John Locke.
Dr. Edward Pooke, prefixed to his theological works.
His own Portrait.

CAVEDONE, GIACOMO. This eminent but unfortunate painter was born at Sassuolo in the Modenese, in 1577. Driven, when a boy, from his home by the severity of his father, he sought a subsistence by becoming a page to a nobleman, a great lover of the art, who possessed a valuable collection of pictures. The young Cavedone had employed himself in his moments of leisure, in copying some of them with a pen; which appeared to his master such extraordinary efforts of untaught nature, that he showed them to Annibale Caracci, and introduced the young artist to him, who encouraged the youth to persevere, and gave him some of his drawings to copy. He soon afterwards received him into his school. The advancement of Cavedone under such an instructor was surprising. On leaving the school of Caracci, he went to Venice, where he applied himself to study the works of Titian, and acquired that admirable style of colouring in which he may be said to have surpassed every other painter of his school. On his return to Bologna, he commenced the display of his talents with such eclat, that some of the pictures he painted for the churches were esteemed almost equal to the works of Annibale. At this period of his life his design was elegant and correct, and his colouring so tender, and at the same time so vigorous, that it is recorded by Lanzi, that Albano, on being asked by a stranger, if there were any pictures by Titian at Bologna, replied, "No, but there are two by Cavedone in S. Paolo, which amply supply the want of them, and are even painted con piu bravura." He possessed an uncommon facility, and a promptness of operation, which, notwithstanding, had nothing of the appearance of negligence. In his fresco works he was singularly harmonious, using little variety of tints, but so admirably appropriated to that style of painting, that Guido adopted him as a model. Such was the celebrity Cavedone had acquired, when, by that transition of circumstances to which human life is liable, he sunk not only to mediocrity, but at last, the painter, who in the prime of his career promised to be the honour and support of the art in his country, was reduced to the miserable necessity of painting ex voti, for subsistence. Superstition had charged his wife with witchcraft, and that absurd accusation plunged him into the deepest affliction. The loss of an only son, who had shown the most marked and promising disposition for the art, filled the cup of his affliction. He sunk into a childish and stupid despondency, and died in the horrors of wretchedness and want, in 1660, aged 73. The principal works of Cavedone are, his fine pictures of the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Paolo at Bologna. In the Ospitale di S. Francesco, the Holy Family, with St. John and St. Francis. In S. Michele Arcangelo, the Last Supper. In S. Salvatore, the Four Doctors of the Church. But his most distinguished production is in the church of the Mendicanti di dentro, representing S. Alo, and S. Petronio, kneeling before the Virgin and Infant, with a glory of angels; a picture in which he appears to have assembled the greatest beauties of the art; an admirable composition, an enchanting colour, truth and expression in the heads, a grand and simple cast of the drapery, forming one of the most attractive objects of art, even in a city so rich as Bologna. [As a proof of the great merit of Cavedone, it is related that a picture by him, the Visitation of the Virgin, in the king of Spain's chapel, was mistaken by Colonna, Rubens, and Velasquez, for the work of Annibale Caracci. A similar mistake, of daily occurrence, was made with regard to the picture of S. Alo, in the church of the Mendicanti. Cavedone died suddenly, in one of the streets of Bologna, where he begged his bread.]

CAUKERKEN, CORNELIUS VAN, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1625. He engraved several plates of portraits, and other subjects, from Rubens, Vandyck, and other Flemish painters. They are executed with the graver, in a stiff, laboured style, but are not without merit. The following are his best prints :

PORTRAITS.

Peter Snayers, painter of battles; D. van Heil, pinx.
Robert Van Hoek, painter; Gon. Coeques, pinx.
Peter Meert, portrait painter; C. Caukerken, fec.
Charles Vandenhoseh, Bishop of Bruges.
Charles II. King of England, the figure by Caukerken, the rest by Hollar.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin; after An. Carracci.

The dead Christ, with the Virgin, Magdalene, and St. John; after Vanduyck.

The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after Vanduyck.

Charity, with three Children; after the same.

The Roman Charity; after Rubens.

St. Ann, with the young Virgin Mary; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Lievinus; after the same. The best impressions are before the name of de Hollander.

A Woman suckling an Infant; after A. Diepenbeck.

CAULA, SIGISMONDO. This painter was born at Modena in 1637. He was a scholar of John Boulanger, but finished his studies at Venice, after the works of Titian and Tintoretto. Besides his altar-pieces, he painted cabinet pictures for the private collections. His best production was his large picture of the Plague, in the church of S. Carlo, painted with great vigour and expression. In the latter part of his life he became more languid in his colouring and execution. [He painted in 1682 and 1694.]

CAUSE, H., a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. We have some portraits by him, among which is that of Cardinal Ferdinand d'Adda. He also engraved some plates representing views of castles, buildings, &c., which possess considerable merit.

CAXES, PATRICIO. This painter was a native of Arezzo. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed, but he was an artist of sufficient celebrity to be invited to Spain by Philip II., who employed him in the palaces at Madrid. He was appointed to paint the Queen's Gallery in the palace of the Pardo. On this occasion he made choice of the Chastity of Joseph, a subject not the most appropriate for the ornament of the apartment of a princess. It was destroyed with many other valuable works of art, in the conflagration of that palace. He died at Madrid in 1625. [Patricio Caxes, after serving Philip II. and Philip III. during forty-four years, died at an advanced age, in 1612, in extreme poverty; but the king being informed of the state of destitution in which he had left his widow and eight children, munificently assigned them two reals a day for one year! Five pence a day for one year to the widow and eight children of an artist, who had spent a life in embellishing the palaces at Madrid, has been cited as a trait of royal generosity! Caxes translated Vignola on the Five Orders of Architecture into Spanish, and for which he engraved the frontispiece and plates.]

CAXES, EUGENIO, was the son and scholar of the foregoing artist, born at Madrid in 1577. He assisted his father in several of his works for the court, and was made painter to Philip III., in 1612. He was continued in that situation by Philip IV., who succeeded to the throne in 1621, and painted the portrait of the King, as well as some historical works in the palaces. He was also much employed for the churches and convents; who, following the example of the court, gave very liberal encouragement to the arts. In the church of San Martin at Madrid, are his two pictures of the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi. In the monastery of San Augustin Calzada, is a fine picture of St. Joachim and St. Ann. He painted several works in fresco, in conjunction with Vincenzio Carducci, in the palace of the Pardo. It is remarkable that almost all the works of this artist, except those in the churches above mentioned, were destroyed by fire. The convent of San Philipe at Madrid, where there were many of his performances, was burnt in 1718, and the palace of the Pardo was consumed by the same dreadful element. He died in 1642.

CAYLUS, ANNE CLAUDE PHILIPPE, COMTE DE, a celebrated French amateur, who has etched an infinite number of plates, in which he is more distinguished for his zeal than his talent. His plates, after the drawings of Bouchardon, were finished by Fessard and his pupils; and the set of gems from the designs of the same artist, were terminated by Le Bas. They deserve attention, however, as preserving the subjects of the masterly sketches of the most celebrated painters. The extraordinary number of his prints, show that he must have devoted to them the greatest part of his life. Besides some portraits, the following are his works most deserving attention:

A set of about Two Hundred Plates, after the Drawings in the Collection of the King of France.

A set of ten Antique Gems, from drawings by Edme Bouchardon, etched by C. de Caylus, and terminated with the graver by Le Bas.

A set of six Mythological Subjects; after Bouchardon; etched by C. de Caylus, and terminated with the graver by Fessard.

A set of Thirty Heads; after Rubens and Vanduyck; from the Crozat Collection.

A set of fifty grotesque Heads; after Leonardo da Vinci.

A set of fine Sketches; after della Bella.

He published a Recueil d'Antiquités Egyptiennes, Etrusques, Grecques, Romaines, et Gauloises, in seven volumes; of which the last volume appeared two years after his death, in 1767. Count Caylus was born at Paris in 1692, and died there in 1765. [The arts and artists are under the greatest obligations to Count Caylus; he spent his life and fortune in their service. No man of modern times ever did so much for both: his name should never be mentioned but with veneration.]

CAZES, PETER JAMES. This painter was born at Paris in 1676, and was a disciple of Bon Boullogne. He painted history with considerable reputation, and executed several works for the church of Notre Dame, and for the choir of St. Germain-des-Pres, which prove him to have been an artist of no mean ability. He died in 1754.

CECCARINI, SEBASTIANO. This painter was born at Urbino about the year 1700, and was a scholar of Agostino Castellacci. He painted history at Rome with reputation during the pontificate of Clement XII. The surporta of the church of S. Urbano in Campo Carleo, representing that Saint, and the principal altar-piece of the same church, are by Sebastiano; as is the picture in the capella degli Svizzeri in the Quirinal. But his best works are at Fano, where he chiefly resided; of which are, his S. Lucia at the Augustines, and several subjects of sacred history in the public palace. He died in 1780, [according to Lanzì.]

CECCHI, GAETANO. This artist was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1770. He engraved some plates of historical subjects, after the Italian painters, which are etched, and finished with the graver, in a style which does him considerable credit.

CECCHI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, a modern Florentine engraver, born at Florence about the year 1748. He engraved several portraits for the work entitled "Serie degl' uomini illustri," and for the Life of the Marchesi di Pombal; we have also by him the following plates after various Italian painters:

The Vocation of St. Andrew to the Apostleship; after L. Cardi.

The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; after P. da Cortona.
 The Martyrdom of St. Vitalis; after F. Baroccio.
 The Stoning of Stephen; after the same.
 The Entombing of Christ; after Daniello da Volterra.
 Catiline's Conspiracy; after Salvator Rosa.

[He was living in 1812.]

CECIL, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1630. The partiality of Evelyn for his countryman has induced him to place this artist on a level with the greatest artists of his time; a period which was distinguished by some of the greatest engravers of France, particularly Nanteuil, and at which engraving was at a very low rank in England. However undeserving of this flattering character, his plates are not without considerable merit. They are neatly executed, entirely with the graver; and chiefly consist of portraits from his own designs. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Queen Elizabeth on Horseback.
 Walter Curle, Bishop of Winchester.
 William Cecil, Lord Burleigh.
 Edward Reynolds, Bishop of Norwich.
 Thomas Kidderminster of Langley, 1628; scarce.
 John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury.
 Sir John Burgh, killed at the Isle de Rheé; this print is very scarce, as it is thought the plate was altered, and the title changed for that of Gustavus Adolphus, and inserted in Scudery's Curia Politia.
 John Weaver, prefixed to his Funeral Monuments. 1631. A small whole-length of Arctie, the King's Jester.
 Sir John Hayward, Knt. LL. D.
 The Frontispiece to Ambrose Parry's Works. 1634.
 The Frontispiece to Devout Meditations. 1629.
 The Frontispiece to Lord Bacon's Sylva Sylvarum.

CELESTI, CAVALIERE ANDREA. This painter was born at Venice in 1637. He was a scholar, though not an imitator, of Matteo Ponzone. To a fertile invention he added a vagueness of style, and a flowing outline that resembles Paolo Veronese. His colouring is clear, brilliant, and tender. Sometimes from the defective priming of his canvass his pictures have lost something of their original freshness, and in the demitints appear to have in some degree perished, by which the harmony of the effect is somewhat diminished. He painted history both in large and in easel pictures; and sometimes conversations and pastoral subjects. His principal historical works are in the church of the Ascension at Venice, of which the most esteemed is the Adoration of the Magi, and in the Ducal palace a picture of a subject from the Old Testament, which is highly esteemed. He died in 1706. [He painted the most beautiful views about Venice, and other cities of Italy, in a large size, and also in small. His selections are choice and elegant; his colouring rich; his skies luminous and clear; his buildings and other objects well relieved; and every part agreeable to the eye. He was fond of using a purplish tint, not unlike the manner of Rubens, of which he was sometimes too profuse, particularly in his carnations. His landscapes are scarce, and are highly prized.]

CELIO, GASPARO CAVALIERE, was a native of Rome, and, according to Baglioni, was a scholar of Niccolo Circignani, called dalle Pomarancio. There are several of his works in the churches at Rome, of which the most esteemed are, in S. Giovanni Laterano, St. Michael discomfiting the rebel Angels; in S. Carlo a Catinari, St. Charles Borromeo; in the Medicanti, St. Francis receiving the Stigmata; in the gallery of the Palazzo Mattei, Moses passing the Red Sea. He died at Rome in 1640. [He was born in 1571.]

CERCEAU, DU, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. He engraved a set of plates representing Ornaments à-la-Mode, which are neatly executed with the graver, but without much taste. They are from his own designs, and are inscribed, Inventé et gravé par Du Cerceau.

CERESA, [or CEREZI,] CARLO. This painter was born at Bergamo in 1609, and was educated under Daniello Crespi, an able painter of Milan. In a short time he acquired a style of design and colouring nearly approaching the merit of his master. A tasteful arrangement of his figures, great suavity of colour, an agreeable expression in his heads and forms, which appear to be drawn from the best models of the art. Such are the characteristics given by Tassi of the works of this estimable painter. His works are chiefly in the churches at Bergamo. In the cathedral, is his picture of S. Vincenzio carried up to Heaven by Angels. In the cupola of St. Francesco, four of the Prophets. One of his finest pictures is the Resurrection, in the church of S. Pietro. He was also a very eminent portrait painter. He died in 1679.

CEREZO, MATTEO, a Spanish painter, born at Burgos in 1635. He went to Madrid when young, and frequented the school of Don Juan Carreño. After establishing his reputation, by some pictures for the churches at Madrid and Valladolid, he was employed, in conjunction with Francisco de Herrera el Mozo, painter to Philip IV., in some of the works he was engaged in for the king. The most esteemed picture of Cerezo, is Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; which, in the inflated language of his Spanish biographer, Bermudez, is equalled to Titian. He died in 1685. [The language of Bermudez respecting Cerezo is by no means inflated; the artist's works deserve all the commendations he has bestowed on them: he was called the Van Dyck of Spain.]

CERQUOZZI. See ANGELO, M.

CERRINI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, called IL CAVALIERE PERUGINO. He was born at Perugia in 1606. He frequented the school of Guido for some time, and became a graceful and elegant designer, with an expression in his heads that occasioned some of his works to be taken for those of his instructor. His best production is in fresco in the Cupola of la Madonna della Vittoria, representing St. Paul taken up into Heaven. He died in 1681. [According to Pascoli, he was born in 1609.]

CERVA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1550. According to Lanzi, he was a scholar of Gaudenzio Ferrari. The only work of this artist, mentioned by his biographers, is described as one of the finest pictures at Milan. It represents the Incredulity of St. Thomas. The animated expression of the heads, the great style of design, and the harmonious effect of the whole, place this artist in a high rank among the painters of the Milanese school.

CERVELLI, FEDERIGO, was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1690. He was a scholar of Pietro Ricchi, called il Lucchese, whom he equalled in the freedom of his pencil, and surpassed in the correctness of his design, and the impasto of his colour. One of his best works is at the Scuola di S. Teodoro, representing a subject from the life of that Saint.

CERVETTO, GIOVANNI PAOLO, was born at Genoa about the year 1630. According to Soprani, he was a scholar of Valerio Costelli, whose vigorous style he imitated with great success, but died young, in 1657.

CERVI, BERNARDO. This painter was a native of Modena, and a scholar of Guido. He possessed an extraordinary genius, and, in the judgment of his excellent instructor, would have reached a high rank in the art, had he not been cut off in the prime of his life by the plague, which visited Modena in 1630. His principal works are his frescos in the dome at Modena, in the churches of which city there are some altar-pieces by him. [There is a print by him, the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, with his name abridged, and the date 1628.]

CESARI, CAVALIERE GIUSEPPE, called d' ARPINO. This eminent painter was born at the castle of Arpino, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1560. He was the son of a very humble artist, who earned a miserable pittance by painting ex voti, and who taught his son what he knew of the art, with the sole view of succeeding him in that kind of manufacture. The young Cesari employed what leisure moments he had, in improving himself in drawing, and, at the age of thirteen, obtained his father's consent to go to Rome in search of employment. Arrived in that capital, he was under the necessity of offering his services to arrange the pallets of the artists who were then employed in the Vatican under Gregory XIII. He had been some time in that servile situation, when he took an opportunity, in the absence of the painters, to sketch some figures on the wall, which excited the surprise and admiration of every one, particularly Fra. Ignazio Danti, the superintendent of the works of the Vatican. He acquainted the Pope with so extraordinary a circumstance, who immediately took the young artist under his protection, and placed him in the school of Niccolo Pomarancio. The instruction of that master was not calculated to correct a disposition naturally given to the extravagant and capricious, encouraged as it was by the prevailing taste of the time for seductive glitter and ostentation. This depraved feeling was then in vogue, and Giuseppino, in a short time, was regarded as the most distinguished painter at Rome. His works possess an appearance of grandeur in the composition, lightness and facility in the design, and an alluring dexterity of execution; and his admirers were not disposed to look for sublimity of conception, purity of contour, an elevated expression, or harmony of effect. He was a perfect master of the arts of intrigue, and had the talent of exalting the merits of his own productions, whilst he vilified and depreciated the works of others. Clement VIII., who succeeded to the papal throne, continued to him the favour and protection he had experienced from his predecessor, and conferred on him the knighthood of St. John of Lateran. Abusing a natural facility, and yielding to the fire of an unrestrained imagination, Cesari appears to have skimmed the surface of the art, without venturing to dive into its depth. Finding that he could satisfy the popular expectation, without the labour of study, he did not think it necessary to consult nature or the best models of antiquity. By straining the attitudes of his figures, he expected to give them animation and movement; and when he attempted expression, he fell into distortion and grimace. Those of his works in which these defects are least discernible, are such as admit of bustle, and require a crowded composition. Such are his battle-pieces and processions, in which the horses are drawn with great spirit, and his readiness of invention is surprising. With all his deficiencies, he enjoyed, during his life, a celebrated rank among the artists of his time, and his school was one of the most frequented in Rome. As he lived to the age of eighty, it is not surprising that his style should vary considerably in the different parts of his long life, or that his last works partook of the languor and feebleness of age. His works at Rome are numerous; among the principal are, the Cupola of S. Prassede, representing the Ascension, with the Virgin and the Apostles; the Assumption of the Virgin, in S. Giovanni Grisognono. But his most celebrated performance is the saloon, called by his name, in the Campidoglio, where he has represented in fresco the history of Romulus and Remus, the Combat of the Horatii with the Curiatii, the Battle of the Romans and Sabines, and the sanguinary Conflict between the Romans and the Veii. Cesari died at Rome in 1640. [Cesari's birth is placed by several writers of credit in 1568. Whether he was dubbed a Knight of St. John of Lateran, or del Abitò di Cristo, by Clement VIII., or received other royal honours, is of very little importance; his example had a very pernicious influence on art.]

CESARI, BERNARDINO, was the brother and scholar of Giuseppe Cesari, whom he assisted in many of his works. He also painted several pictures of his own composition in the churches at Rome, entirely in the style of his brother. In S. Carlo a Catinari is a picture by him of Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene. For Clement VIII. he painted a large fresco work in St. John of Lateran, representing the Emperor Constantine in a Triumphal Car, with many figures. He died at Rome in the prime of life during the pontificate of Paul V.

CESI, BARTOLOMEO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1556. He was first a scholar of Gio. Francesco Bezzi, called Nosadella, but afterwards studied the works of Pelegrino Tibaldi. Contemporary with the Caracci, and not unfrequently painting in competition with them, he preserved their esteem by the amiability of his mind, as much as he excited their emulation by the display of his talents. Careful and correct in his design, without timidity; happy in the choice of his forms, and delicately tender in the purity of his tints; his works appear to have been the model from which Guido chiefly formed the suavity and elegance of his style. His powers are more extensive in his fresco works than in his oil paintings, although he has displayed an uncommon excellence in both in his numerous pictures in the public edifices at Bologna. His principal works in that city are in S. Giacomo Maggiore; the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds with a Glory of Angels, St. John, St. Francis, and St. Benedict; in S. Martino, the Crucifixion; in S. Domenico, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost; in the Certosa, are his fine pictures of Christ praying in the Garden, and the Descent from the Cross. His most celebrated production is his set of ten fresco pictures in the Palazzo Favi of subjects from the life of Æneas. He died, according to Baldinucci and Lanzi, in 1629.

CESI, or CESI, CARLO, a painter and engraver of the Roman school, born at Antrodoco, in the Roman state, in 1626. He was brought up at Rome, in the school of Pietro da Cortona, and was employed with some of the best artists of his time in several public works during the pontificate of Alexander VII. He painted history, and his works are held in considerable estimation. In the Quirinal, he painted the Judgment of Solomon, and others of his works are in S. Maria Maggiore and in the Rotonda. Carlo Cesi was also an engraver of some eminence; we have by him several plates, after the Italian painters of his time. His plates are etched and terminated with the graver, in a free, masterly style. His drawing is generally correct, and his prints have the effect of the works of a painter. The following are his principal works as an engraver:

The Virgin and infant Jesus with St. John; half-length. St. Andrew led to Martyrdom, prostrating himself before the Cross; after Guido.

The Frontispiece to the book entitled Discorsi della Musica.

Sixteen plates from the Pamphili Gallery; after P. da Cortona.

Forty-one plates of the Farnesian Gallery; after An. Caracci.

Eight plates of the Chapel Buongiovanni; after Lanfranco.

Carlo Cesi died in 1686.

CEPESDES, PABLO, called in Rome CEDASPE. This distinguished personage and excellent artist was born at Cordova about the year 1535. He was educated in the clerical seminary, was thoroughly acquainted with the Oriental and classical languages, and spoke fluently most of the modern ones. His learning and merit raised him to the rank of a dignitary of the church. As a painter he stands among the most eminent that his country has produced. To perfect himself in this art, he travelled twice to Rome for the purpose of contemplating the works of the great masters, particularly those of Michael Angelo Buonarroti, and even at Rome distinguished himself by several works in the public edifices. In the Trinità de Monti, he painted the Annunciation and the Nativity, and in the vault of the same chapel, several subjects of the life of the Virgin. Whilst at Rome, he formed a close intimacy with Federigo Zuccherò, and when that painter was afterwards applied to by the bishop of Cordova to paint a picture for his cathedral, Zuccherò declined executing the commission, giving as his reason, that whilst Cespedes was in Spain, they need not send to Italy for painters. His works are chiefly at Cordova. In the cathedral is his fine picture of the Last Supper, so much extolled by Palomino, for the admirable discrimination of character in the Christ and the different Disciples; in the same church, the Virgin and Infant with St. Anne; and in the Jesuits' college of Santa Catalina, is the Martyrdom of that Saint with a Glory of Angels. As a colourist, he was one of the greatest artists of his country; and his Spanish biographer ventures to assert, that in this respect he sometimes approaches the beauty of Coreggio. This eminent personage was no less remarkable for his modesty and humility, than for the extent and variety of his acquirements. He died at Cordova in 1608. [According to Bermudez, Pablo de Cespedes was born in 1538. He was buried in the cathedral at Cordova, and his epitaph, there inscribed, sums up his acquirements:

Paulus de Cespedes hujus almae
Ecclesiae porcionarius, picturae,
Sculpturae, architecturae, omniumque
Bonarum artium, variarumque
Linguarum peritissimus, hic situs est.
Obiit anno Domini M.DC.VIII.
Septimo kalendas sextilis.

For a fuller account of this great man, see Cean Bermudez, Diccionario Historico, &c., tom. i. and v.]

[CHALON, Louis, a landscape painter, supposed to have been born in Holland about 1687: some pictures by him are mentioned in catalogues of

1724. He painted views on the Rhine, enlivened with figures, in a very artistical style, and an agreeable tone of colour. He died at Amsterdam in 1741.]

CHAMBERLAIN, MASON, an English portrait painter, who had the reputation of being very successful in his likenesses. He was one of the original members of the Royal Academy. He died in 1787.

CHAMBERS, THOMAS, an English engraver, born in London about the year 1724. He engraved many plates for Messrs. Boydell's collections, and several portraits of artists for Lord Orford's Anecdotes. They are executed with the graver, in a firm, but not a pleasing style. The following are some of his best prints:

A Concert; after M. A. Caravaggio.

Raffaello's Mistress; after Raffiuello.

The Holy Family; after B. Murillo.

St. Martin dividing his Cloak; after Rubens.

St. Peter and St. John healing the Sick; after S. Bourdon.

Jupiter and Antiope; after Casali.

Helen Forman; after Vandyck.

The Good Man at the Hour of Death; after Hayman.

The Wicked Man; the companion; after the same.

The Death of Turanne; after Palmieri.

[CHAMBERS, GEORGE. This excellent painter of shipping was the son of a poor seaman of Whitby in Yorkshire, where he was born at the close of the last century. He was sent, at the age of ten years, to sea in a small trading sloop, in which he served as cabin boy for two years. He was afterwards bound apprentice to the master of a brig which traded in the Mediterranean and Baltic Seas. During this apprenticeship he gave evidence of the talent for which he was subsequently distinguished, by making sketches of various descriptions of shipping for the amusement and gratification of the seamen. His master, Mr. Storr, was induced by these efforts to cancel his indentures, and Chambers worked his way home in another vessel, with the determination of becoming a painter of ships. Arrived at Whitby, he knew no better way of making himself acquainted with colours than by apprenticing himself to an old woman who kept a painter's shop. But, while he was plodding his way in the business of a house painter, he took lessons of a drawing-master of Whitby, of the name of Bird, and employed his spare time in painting small pictures of shipping, for which he found, at his humble prices, a ready sale. He carried on this life for about three years, when, being anxious to try his fortune in London, he again entered the seafaring life, and worked his way as a fore-mast man in a trading vessel to the metropolis. In London he obtained an introduction to Mr. Thomas Horner, the very man to take an artist of talent by the hand, who employed him for seven years, to assist in painting the great Panorama of London at the Colosseum, in the Regent's Park. At the completion of this work he was engaged as scene painter at the Pavilion Theatre. Here he attracted the notice of Admiral Lord Mark Kerr, who became his sincere patron, and procured him an introduction to King William the Fourth, who received him with the unceremonious frankness of a man, who regarded the merit more than the condition of the artist. He was now likely to reap the fruits of his persevering industry, and to establish his fame and fortune together; but a constitution originally very weak, and much shattered by a seafaring life, was unable to bear the incessant application his mind would subject it to: his strength gave way, and he fell into a disease which proved fatal to him. He died in 1840. His pictures are now appreciated by collectors, and obtain good prices. His best productions are his naval battles, in which he is excellent, though in the colouring there is perhaps too much redness pervading every thing, the smoke in particular. There are in the hall at Greenwich Hospital three battles by him; the Bombardment of Algiers, the Capture of Portobello, and a copy of West's picture of the Destruction of the French Fleet in the port of La Hogue.]

[CHAMORRO, JUAN, a Spanish painter of history, was a scholar of F. Herrera the elder, and became president of the academy at Seville in 1669. He contributed to the support of that institution till 1673. The pictures of the Four Doctors of the Church, and those which represent circumstances in the life of the Virgin, which were in the convent of Mercy, at Seville, sufficiently attest his ability and industry, and place him among the good, and above all among the laborious artists of that school.]

CHAMPAGNE, PHILIP DE. This painter, though born at Brussels in 1602, went to France when he was very young, and having resided there the remainder of his life, he is generally regarded as of the French school. He had not the advantage of the instruction of any eminent painter, and the greatest assistance he received was from Fouquieres, the landscape painter, who lent him some of his drawings. When he was nineteen years of age, he left Brussels, with an intention of visiting Italy, and arrived at Paris in 1621. He there met with such encouragement, in painting portraits and landscapes, that he abandoned his project of visiting Rome, and remained at Paris. Niccolo Poussin arriving from Italy, admired the works of Champagne, and an intimate acquaintance took place between them. In a short time he acquired such celebrity, that he was appointed superintendant of the works of the queen, and for some time was one of the most admired and most occupied artists in Paris.

Champagne has the merit of a precise imitation of nature, without choice, and without animation. He gave a correct representation of the precise form of his subject, but it was devoid of life and movement, and totally divested of that sensibility of expression which feeling alone can inspire. His colour, like the other painters of his country, is excellent. To have reached an elevated rank in the art, Champagne wanted that sacred fire which nature had denied him.

He excelled in portrait painting, and the picture of himself placed in the gallery of the academy, which has been so admirably engraved by Edelinck, is not unworthy of the first artists in that department. Among the best works of Champagne, are his pictures at the Carmelites at Paris, representing the Nativity, the Adoration of the Magi, the Circumcision, the Assumption of the Virgin, the Raising of Lazarus, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, with his reception picture in the academy, of St. Philip in Meditation. He died at Paris in 1674.

CHAMPAGNE, JOHN BAPTIST, was the nephew and scholar of the preceding artist. With the advantage of his uncle's instruction, and some years' study at Rome, he never went beyond mediocrity. Some of his pictures are in the churches at Paris, and in the lower apartments of the palace of the Tuilleries. He was however professor of the academy when he died, in 1688, aged 43.

CHANGE. See DUCHANGE.

CHANTRY, JOHN, an English engraver, who worked chiefly for the booksellers. His plates are executed with the graver in a formal, stiff style.

Vertue mentions the following portraits by him:

James I.
Charles II.; three prints.
James Fitzroy, Duke of Monmouth.
John Selden.
Edward Leigh, M. A., of Magdalene College, Oxford.
1660.
Thomas Whitaker, physician to Charles II.
The Portrait of Selden.
Gething, a writing-master.

CHAPERON, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Chateaudun about the year 1596. He studied painting under Simon Vouet, and went to Rome for improvement, but he never made any proficiency in painting, his talents led him to engraving. He remained at Rome several years, and in 1636 published his set of fifty-two plates from the works of Raffaele in the loggie of the Vatican, called Raffaele's Bible. Several artists have engraved those admirable productions; in all of them we look in vain for the noble character and purity of design of their great author; perhaps Chaperon's production is the least faulty of those that have appeared. We have, besides that work, the following plates by him, which he sometimes marked N. C. F.; some are from his own designs:

The Portrait of N. Chaperon, with the Bust of Raffaele.
The title to the Bible of Raffaele.
The Portrait of Henry IV.; below, in basso relievo, the King wounded by Du Chatel; after Freminet; scarce.
Another Portrait of Henry IV., with a Battle below.
The Virgin suckling the Infant, falsely called after Titian.
The Holy Family; Guerinani, ecc.
Bacchus and Venus, 1639; Chiartres, ecc.
A Man giving Drink to Bacchus.
Bacchus, with a Man carrying a Child.
Satyrs, with Women and Children.
A Bacchanal, with a Child pouring out Wine to a Bacchante.
Another Bacchanal, with Silenus riding on a Goat.
Young Bacchanalians, one riding on a Goat.
Another Bacchanal. 1639.

[Zani places his birth in 1599, and his death in 1647.]

[CHARDIN, JEAN BAPTISTE SIMEON, a French painter of conversation pieces, and a variety of other subjects, which he represented with truth, simplicity, and neatness of finish. He has been styled "The painter of the passions of the soul;" and his countrymen, formerly, compared him to Metsu, in what particular it would be difficult to say. He was born in 1669, or 1701, and died in 1779.]

CHARPENTIER, PIERRE FRANÇOIS, a French engraver in aquatinta, born at Blois in 1730. By this artist we have several prints after the French painters, &c., as follow:

The Education of the Virgin; after Boucher.
Cupids playing with the Graces; the same.
The Death of Archimedes; after Ciro Ferri.
The Shepherdess; after Berghem.
The Shepherd reposing; after the same.
The Descent from the Cross; after C. Vanloo.
Astranax torn from the arms of Andromache by order of Ulysses.

[He is also called Pierre-Etienne, and François Philipe. Zani places his birth in 1739.]

CHASTILLON, LOUIS DE, a French painter in enamel and miniature, and an engraver. He was born at St. Menchould in Champagne, in 1639. In the execution of his plates he appears to have been an imitator, though not a very successful one, of the fine style of G. Audran. His prints are not without merit, though greatly inferior to his model. We have by him the following plates:

The Adulteress before Christ; after S. Bourdon.

The Conversion of St. Paul.

The Seven Sacraments; after the pictures by Poussin, painted for the Cavaliere del Pozzo, a little varied from those in the Orleans collection.

St. John in the Isle of Patmos; after Poussin.

The Fates spinning the Destiny of Mary de Medicis; after Rubens.

Three Books of Prints; two of the Fountains at Versailles, and one of the Pavilions at Marly.

[He died in 1734.]

CHATEAU, or CHASTEAU, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1680. We have the following plates by him :

A Young Lady, with a Mask in her Hand; half-length; after Santverre.

A young Lady in a Spanish Dress; half-length; after the same.

Summer, represented by a female figure; half-length; after P. vanden Berge.

Venus and Adonis; after L. Silvestre.

Daphne and Apollo; after the same.

Rinaldo and Armida; after the same; finished by J. Audran.

CHATEAU, or CHASTEAU, WILLIAM, a French engraver, born at Orleans in 1633. After learning the elements of design at Paris, he went to Rome, and became a pupil of John Frederick Greuter. His first productions were some plates for the portraits of the Popes. He afterwards engraved several prints after N. Poussin and some of the Italian painters, a part of which are entirely executed with the graver, in the style of Poilly and Bloemaert; the others he advanced considerably with the point, which he handled with spirit and taste. It is to be regretted that he did not always follow that manner, as more picturesque and free. His prints of that description have great merit. The plates he engraved at Rome he generally marked Guilielmus Castellus Gallus. After passing several years at Rome he returned to Paris, where he was employed and patronized by M. de Colbert, until his death, in 1683. The following are his principal works :

A set of Portraits of the Popes.

Portrait of M. de Colbert; oval.

Portrait of the Bishop of Ruette. 1670.

The Repose in Egypt; from Coreggio.

The Virgin, with the infant Jesus, embracing a Cross.

The Life of St. Theresa.

The miraculous Draught of Fishes; after Raffaelle.

The Baptism of Christ by St. John; after Albano.

Paul restored to sight by Ananias; after P. da Cortona.

The Stoning of Stephen; after An. Caracci.

The Assumption of the Virgin; after the same.

Christ appearing to St. Peter; after the same.

The Repose in Egypt; after Coreggio.

The Holy Family, with St. John; after C. Maratti.

The Miracle of the Manna in the Desert; after N. Poussin.

Christ curing the Blind; after the same.

St. Paul taken up to Heaven; after the same.

The Preservation of the Young Pyrrhus; after the same.

The Death of Germanicus. 1663; after the same; fine.

The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Noel Coypel.

The Holy Family; after the same.

CHATEL, FRANCIS DU. This painter was born at Brussels in 1625, and was a favourite scholar of David Teniers, the younger, whose style he followed in some of his pictures, representing village festivals; but he is more known for his small family portraits, and conversations in the manner of Gonzales Coques; and his pictures are not unfrequently taken for those of that master. His drawing is correct, with an excellent colour, and a neat and spirited touch. His most considerable work is a large picture in the Town-house at Ghent, representing Philip IV. of Spain receiving the oath of fidelity from the States of Brabant and Flanders; a composition of an infinite number of figures, ingeniously grouped, and touched with such neatness and truth, that it has often been thought a work of Gonzales. [The picture at Ghent represents the Marquis de Castel Rodrigo, governor of the Low Countries, receiving the oaths and homage of the States to Charles II. of Spain, then only five years old; it is dated 1666. A second picture by this master was, a few years back, presented by the king of Holland to the academy at Antwerp; and such is its near approach to Teniers, that it is (even there) ascribed to him. Du Chatel died in 1679.]

CHATELAIN, J. B. [JOHN BAPTIST,] an ingenious English designer and engraver, born about the year 1710. This artist was endowed with an extraordinary capacity; and if his application had been equal to his genius, few would have equalled him in the branch of art to which his natural disposition directed him. He had a peculiar talent for designing landscapes, either from nature or his own fancy, which he did with a readiness that was altogether surprising. Unfortunately, from his idle and dissolute course of life, he seldom exercised his abilities until compelled by necessity. The drawings and plates he has left us make us deeply regret the irregularity of his conduct, which has limited our gratification to a much smaller number of his admirable productions, than his uncommon facility, under more regulated habits, would have secured to us. He has engraved some landscapes from his own designs; but the greater part of his works are from the pictures of Gaspar Poussin and other masters, for the collection of landscapes, published by Mr. Boydell in 1744. The following list comprises most of his works :

The Four Times of the Day; etched by Chatelain; afterwards finished in mezzotinto by Houston.

Nine, eight landscapes after Gaspar Poussin, and one landscape after Rembrandt.

Eight Views of the Lakes in Cumberland and Westmoreland; after Bellers.

Eleven different Views; after Marco Ricci.

Three grand landscapes; after Cortona, N. Poussin, and F. Bolognese.

[It is supposed that he died in 1771.]

CHAVEAU, FRANCIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1618, [more correctly 1613.] He studied under Lawrence de la Hyre. He painted small pictures in the style of that master, but not meeting with much success, he devoted himself entirely to engraving. His first attempts were with the graver, but he soon quitted it for the point, with which he could express, with convenient celerity, the effusions of a lively and fertile genius. This expedition was requisite in the great number of plates he engraved for the booksellers, in which, if we do not find a polished execution, we discover force, fire, and ingenuity. His smaller plates are much in the manner of Sebastian le Clerc, which are his best performances. He is supposed to have produced nearly three thousand plates, most of which were for the different publications of books in which he was employed. He died at Paris in 1676. The following are his principal works :

SETS OF PRINTS.

Les Delices de l'Esprit; fifty plates, designed and engraved by Chaveau.

Nineteen plates for the History of Greece.

Many plates for Ovid's Metamorphoses; by Benserade.

The Bible History; many plates.

Several plates for Tasso's Jerusalem.

The same for the Fables of La Fontaine.

Twenty-one plates for the poem of Clovis.

Twelve plates for the Pucelle d'Orleans. Two hundred and forty-three medals; the collection of F. Orsini.

DETACHED PRINTS AFTER HIS DESIGNS.

The Annunciation.
The Repose in Egypt.
The Virgin and Infant, with St. John.
The Crucifixion.
The Mystery of the Sacrament. 1676; in two sheets.
Meleager and Atalanta; circular.
Venus and Adonis; the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after Titian; the same subject that is so finely engraved by Masson, called the Table-cloth.
A Concert; after Domenichino; also engraved by Picart.
Twenty-two plates of the Life of St. Bruno; after the pictures by Le Sueur, in the Carthusians at Paris.
The Nativity; after L. de la Hire.
The Holy Family; after the same.
Meleager presenting the Head of the Boar to Atalanta; after the same.
The Triumphal Arch for the Place Dauphine; after Le Brun.

[M. L'Advocat says he engraved more than 4000 plates with his own hand, and that about 1400 pieces have been engraved by others after his designs. There are strange discrepancies in the date of this artist's birth among the writers on the subject; but 1613 seems to be the most authentic. Basan, who ought to have been the best informed, is furthest from the mark.]

CHEDEL, QUINTIN PIERRE, a French designer and engraver, born at Chalons in 1705. He was much employed in engraving for the booksellers at Paris, and the number of his plates is very considerable. They are etched with great spirit, and sometimes finished with the graver in a style of unusual ability. Among his numerous works the following are the most deserving of notice:

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

A set of six Landscapes; dedicated to Madame de Pompadour.
Six plates of Battles; dedicated to Count Turpin de Ceissé.
The Village Wedding, and the Village Feast.
Two Landscapes with Ruins, called "Ruines de Cames."
SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.
Four, Attacks of Cavalry; after Vandermeulen.
Four, Landscapes with Ruins; after Boucher.
Two, Sea-pieces with Fishermen; after A. Willaerts.

CHEREAU, FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, born at Blois in 1680. He was a pupil of Gerard Audran, and has distinguished himself by the beauty of his graver, and the correctness of his design, particularly in his portraits, some of which are admirable. His portrait of Louis Pécourt has not been surpassed by many, even in that branch of the art in which his countrymen excelled. The number of his plates is considerable, of which the following are the most esteemed:

F. Chereau died at Paris in 1729.

CHEREAU, JACQUES, was the brother and pupil of the preceding artist, born at Blois in 1694. He engraved portraits and history, and was little inferior to his brother. He did not engrave many plates, having quitted the graver to follow the business of a printseller. His prints are deservedly esteemed. He was in England, but not meeting with much encouragement, he returned to France, and died at Paris in 1759. The following are his best works:

PORTRAITS.

George I. King of England; Jac. Chereau, fec.; engraved in London.

[Others say he was born in 1687, and died in 1776.]
CHERON, ELIZABETH SOPHIA. This lady was the daughter of an enamel painter, born at Paris in 1648. She learned the elementary principles of design from her father. In a short time she distinguished herself by some portraits, whose merit was not confined to a perfect resemblance. A fine tone of colour, a tasteful design, and a commanding facility of pencil, distinguished the works of this estimable paintress. Her talents were not limited to portraits; she painted several historical pictures, which were placed in the first collections at Paris. Le Brun proposed her as a candidate for the honours of the Academy in 1676, and she was received with distinction. This ingenious artist engraved both with the point and the graver, and executed some plates after a set of designs she made from some select antique gems, and other subjects. The collection of gems consisted of twenty-four plates, three of which she engraved, the others were executed by C. Simonneau, B. Picart, J. Audran, and others. She died at Paris in 1711. Besides her three plates of the gems we have by her,

The Descent from the Cross; after the Abbé Zumbo.
St. Cecilia, Magdalene, St. Austin, St. John, and St. Paul; after Raffaele.
A drawing-book of thirty-six prints.

CHERON, LOUIS. This painter was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1660. He went to Italy when he was very young, and passed some years at Rome, studying particularly the works of Raffaele. On his return to Paris, he was employed to paint two pictures for the church of Notre Dame, representing the prophet Agabus before St. Paul, and Herodias with the Head of St. John. His design is correct, but his colouring is cold and feeble, and his composition tame and inanimate. The religious troubles that existed at that time in France obliged him, being a Calvinist, to leave the kingdom, and he came to England, where he was employed by some of the nobility, particularly the Duke of Montague, for whom he painted some ornamental works. He died in London in 1713. This artist engraved some plates from his own designs. They are etched with spirit and taste, and well drawn. We have by him,

St. Peter curing the Lame at the Gate of the Temple.
The Death of Ananias and Sapphira.
The Baptism of the Eunuch by St. Philip.
Hercules reposing after his Labour; fine.
Twenty-three subjects for the Psalms of David; translated by his sister.

[Zani and Nagler both say he died in 1723, which is no doubt the correct date; as he engraved some of the ornamental pieces to the edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, published in 1720.]

CHERPIGNON, ———, a French engraver, by whom, among other prints, we have a plate representing the Holy Family, in which the Virgin Mary is seated, with the infant Jesus asleep in her lap, and St. Joseph is leaning on a large stone behind her; after a picture by Laurent de la Hève. It is etched in a free, spirited style, and retouched with the graver in a masterly manner.

CHEVILLET, JUSTUS, a German engraver, born at Frankfort on the Oder in 1729. He was first a pupil of G. F. Schmidt, but afterwards went to Paris, where he was instructed by J. G. Wille. He engraved several plates of subjects, principally from the French artists, in a neat style. We have by him, among others, the following prints:

The Portrait of Simeon Chardin; from a picture by himself.
Portrait of M. le Noir; after Greuze.
La Santé portée, and la Santé rendue; after Terburg.
A Girl sewing, and another spinning; after Heilmann.
A young Girl caressing a Bird; after a drawing by Wille.
The young Coquet; after J. Raoux.
The dangerous Beauty; after Santverre.
The Death of General Montcalm; after Watteau.

CHIAPPE, BATTISTA. This painter was horn at Novi in 1723. After studying some time at Rome, he settled at Milan, where, according to the Cavaliere Ratti, he painted some pictures which gave promise of great ability. His best work was in the church of S. Ignazio di Alessandria, representing that saint, with a glory of angels, grandly conceived and composed, the figure of the saint commanding and majestic, and of a fine expression. This artist died in the midst of a flattering career in 1765; and with him, says Lanzi, perished the last remains of Genoese art.

CHIARI, FABRIZIO. This painter and engraver was born at Rome, according to Orlandi, in 1621. He was employed in some fresco paintings in the palaces at Rome. We have some etchings by this artist, after N. Poussin, executed in a scratchy but masterly style, among which are,

Mars and Venus, in a landscape; Fabritius Clarus, 1635.
Venus and Adonis; signed Nicolaus Pussinus, in. f.
This etching has been attributed to N. Poussin, but it is by Chiari.
Venus and Mercury, with Children.

[If the print above mentioned be by him, he must have commenced engraving very early. He died in 1695.]

CHIARI, GIUSEPPE, was born at Rome, in 1654. He was a scholar of Carlo Maratti: after the death of that master, he finished some of his works left imperfect. His cabinet and easel pictures are preferable to his large works, although he painted several frescos in the palaces of Colonna and Barberini; the ceiling in S. Maria di Montesanto, and an altar-piece in S. Maria del Suffragio, representing the Adoration of the Magi. In the Spada Palace are four pictures by him of subjects from Ovid. He died in 1727.

CHIARINA, MARC ANTONIO, was born at Bologna in 1652, and was first a scholar of Francesco Quaino, under whom he remained four years; he afterwards studied under Domenico Santi. He excelled in painting architectural views, in which the figures were sometimes introduced by Sigismondo Caula. He was much employed by the nobility at Bologna, Modena, and Milan; and his pictures were in great estimation. [He died in 1730.]

CHIAVEGENO. See MAINARDI.

CHIAVISTELLI, JACOPO, a Florentine painter of perspective and architectural views, born in 1621. He first studied under Fabrizio Boschi; but he received his best instruction from M. Angelo Colonna. He painted chiefly in fresco, and was employed in several works at Bologna and Florence, particularly in the palace of the Grand Duke. He died in 1698. [Zani places his birth three years earlier.]

CHIMENTI. See EMPOLI.

CHIRINOS, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1564. He was a scholar of Louis Tristan, and, according to Palomino, painted, in conjunction with Bartolome de Cardenas, the greater part of the pictures in the Convent de Nuestra Señora de Atocha, at Madrid. He died in 1620. [Bermudez says he was a scholar of Il Greco, and not of Louis Tristan.]

CHISBOUT, ———, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. He etched a plate, representing Dutch Boors playing at cards, which was published by Peter Drevet, the elder. It was probably from his own design, as he has signed it, Chisbout, fecit.

[CHODOWIECKI, DANIEL NICOLAS, a very prolific and celebrated German engraver and designer, was born at Dantzie in 1726. His father was a drug merchant, and intended his son for the same trade; but, as he had some knowledge in miniature painting, he taught his son all he knew in that art, intending it only as a relaxation after the hours of business. The young Chodowiecki, however, made it his principal study; and as his father died prematurely, leaving him and his mother in straitened circumstances, he hoped to find a resource by adopting miniature painting as a profession. Being too young, and not sufficiently advanced in the art, it was deemed necessary to apprentice him to a grocer, with whose business he was fully employed, and had no time to devote to his favourite pursuit but such as he stole from the hours of rest in the night. His master failing in business, he was sent to an uncle at Berlin, to serve the remainder of his apprenticeship. He was then in his seventeenth year. He attended his uncle to the fairs, as book-keeper, and at his leisure employed himself in painting the lids of snuff-boxes, in order to assist his mother. He sold these to the shopkeepers of Berlin; and his uncle soon perceived that his talent could be made a source of emolument if he learnt, in addition, the art of enamelling. He renounced painting snuff-boxes, and devoted himself entirely to his new studies. Some of his productions attracted the attention of the Academy of Painting at Berlin, and he was employed by that society to make designs, and engrave the figures for their Almanac. This he accomplished with so much spirit that it brought him into general notice. From this time his path to fame and emolument was clear. He produced a series of twelve pieces of the "Passion of Jesus Christ;" these were of a small size, but so delicately finished, and at the same time executed with such spirit, that artists and amateurs were all desirous of being acquainted with the author. In 1767 he published a print entitled "Les adieux de Calas," in which he represented, in a most pathetic manner, the misery of that unfortunate family when the father was about to be led to execution, a victim to ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance. Of this print, which caused a great sensation, only one hundred proofs were taken; it is of rare occurrence, and is prized by collectors. He was now so fully occupied with making designs and engraving, that he was compelled to discontinue painting. Numerous works followed; and every publication in Germany, susceptible of embellishment, put his talents in requisition. He designed and engraved the plates for Lavater's work on Physiognomy, Klopstock's Messiah, for Don Quixote, for editions of Shakspeare, Voltaire, La Bruyere, La Fontaine, Gessner, Lessing, and many more. As he was well read in history, he gave in his illustrations true representations of the costumes and manners of the times to which they related. His works are too numerous to particularize in this Dictionary, but a complete catalogue may be found in Heineken, or in Nagler's Kunstler's Lexicon. He died at Berlin in 1801, being director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences of that city.]

CHOFFARD, PETER PHILIP. According to Basan, this artist flourished at Paris about the year 1767. He engraved several vignettes, and other book plates, for the editions, published at that time, of La Fontaine's Tales, and the Metamorphoses of Ovid. We have also by him the following :

A View of the Bridge of Orleans; after Desfriches.

The Cascade of Brunoy; after Grouvelot.

Two sets of Flower-pieces; after Bachelier.

CHOPY, ———, a French engraver; his name is affixed to a small plate, representing the Baptism of Christ by St. John. It is executed with the graver, in a laboured, indifferent style.

CHRIEG, or CHRIEGER, CHRISTOPHER. Pappillon attributes to this artist, who was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1572, a large print, representing the Sea-fight at Lepanto, of which he gives the following description. "It is a magnificent engraving on wood, containing more than three hundred vessels and galleys. The combatants, which are exceedingly numerous, are distributed with great judgment. The dreadful confusion of the vessels on fire, or sinking to the bottom, cannot be represented in a superior style. It is cut on two blocks of wood, in the form of an oval, about two feet long, by sixteen inches in height. In the upper part of the oval are represented the arrangement of the Christian force and that of the Turks, and below three Christian chiefs dividing the spoil, and the destruction of the Turkish fleet. It is inscribed Christoph. Chrieg. Alt. inci., and was published at Venice in 1572, by Cesare Vecelli, a relation of the celebrated Titian, who is supposed to have made the design."

[CHRISTOPHSEN, PETER, an artist who flourished from an early part to the middle of the fifteenth century, as appears by a picture of the Virgin with the infant Jesus, Saints Jerome and Francis, formerly in the collection of Mr. Aders at London, on which was inscribed "Petrus XPR. me fecit, 1417." He is called Pietro Crista, by Vasari. In the gallery of the Berlin Museum, inscribed with his name, is a portrait of a young girl, favourably distinguished by its simple and beautiful execution, as well as by the peculiar form of the countenance. Another picture, of the year 1449, is in the possession of Herr Oppenheim, at Cologne.—St. Eligius, who, as a goldsmith, sells a wedding-ring to a bridal pair. As no particulars are recorded of this artist, it can only be conjectured that he belongs to the school of the Van Eycks: the researches now going on in Germany will probably discover more of his works and something of his history.]

CIAFFERI, PIETRO. This painter was born at Pisa, and flourished, according to Lanzi, about the year 1654. His talent was painting marines and sea-ports; subjects which his residence at Leghorn enabled him to study from nature. His pictures are highly finished, and ornamented with small figures, neatly touched and correctly drawn. He also painted architecture and perspective views. His works are principally at Pisa, and Leghorn, where they are esteemed.

CIALDIERI, GIROLAMO, was born at Urbino in 1593, and was a scholar of Claudio Ridolfi. He painted several pictures at Rome for the churches. His best work is the Martyrdom of St. John, in S. Bartholomeo. Lanzi describes him as possessing great facility of hand and amenity of colour, and commends his style of painting landscape, and his knowledge of architecture, which he was fond of introducing in the back-grounds of his pictures. [He flourished about 1640.]

CIAMBERLANO, LUCA. This artist was born at Urbino about the year 1580. In the early part of his life he applied himself to the study of civil law, in which he had taken a doctor's degree, when he abandoned the study of jurisprudence to devote himself to painting and engraving, particularly the latter. He resided chiefly at Rome, where he executed a great number of plates from his own designs, as well as after the works of the most celebrated Italian painters. His plates are entirely executed with the graver, which he handled with neatness and intelligence, and his design of the figure is tolerably correct. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, and sometimes marked them with the cipher Ⓒ. Among others, are the following :

Thirteen plates of Christ and the twelve Apostles; after Raffaele.

St. Jerome dead, lying upon a stone; after the same.

Christ on the Mount of Olives; after A. Casolani.

Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene; after Federigo Baroccio, inscribed, Lucas Ciamberlanus, Urbinas I. V. Doctr. del. et sculp. 1609.

Christ appearing to St. Theresa; after Carracci. 1615.

[He flourished from 1603 to 1640. Bartsch has given a list of 114 pieces by him.]

CIAMPELLI, AGOSTINO. This painter was born at Florence in 1578. He was educated under Santo di Titi, and acquired an ability that distinguished him among the painters of his time at Rome. Inferior to his instructor in invention, less masterly in composition; his ideas were graceful, and he was a correct designer, with a brilliancy of colour unusual in the Florentine school, though sometimes vitiated by too powerful a predominancy of the red. In the Chiesa del Gesu, are two of his finest works in fresco, the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, and in the ceiling a Glory of Saints and Angels. In S. Prassede he painted in oil, for his patron the Cardinal de Medici, the Crucifixion; and in S. Stefano di Pescia, is his celebrated picture of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elisabeth, with two laterals. He was also an eminent architect, and had the superintendence of some of the improvements at St. Peter's. He died in 1640.

CIARPI, BACCIO, was born at Florence in 1578, and was a scholar of Santo di Titi. He proved a reputable painter of history, of which he gave proof in his works in the Chiesa della Concezione of the Capuchins of Rome. This painter was the instructor of Pietro da Cortona. He died in 1642.

CICERI, BERNARDINO. This painter was born at Pavia in 1650, and was one of the ablest scholars of Carlo Sacchi. He afterwards passed some time at Rome; and on his return to his native city, met with encouragement in painting historical pictures of a small size; and also was employed for the churches.

CIEZAR, MIGUEL GERONIMO, a Spanish painter born at Granada. He was a scholar of Alonso Cano, and painted history with reputation. According to Palomino, his best works are in the convent del Angel, and in the hospital del Corpus Domini, at Granada. He died in 1677. [This and the following should be CIEZA, not CIEZAR.]

CIEZAR, JOSEPH DE, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Granada in 1656. He painted history, landscapes, and flower-pieces. Of the first, his principal productions are in the church of S. Francisco de Paula at Madrid. He died in 1696. [Bernandez says 1692. There was also a Vincent Cieza, son of Miguel, whose works are confounded with those of his father; he died about 1701.]

CIGNANI, CARLO, a distinguished painter of the Lombard school, born at Bologna in 1628. He was of an honourable family, and his first essays in the art were some drawings he attempted after the pictures in his father's collection. He was first placed under the tuition of Batista Cairo, but he afterwards entered the academy of Francesco Albano, and became the most celebrated of his disciples. After leaving the school of Albano, he visited Rome, Florence, and Parma, studying the works of Raffaele and Coreggio. Whilst at Rome, he painted two pictures for the church of S. Andrea della Valle, subjects from the life of that saint; and a picture in the basilica of St. Peter's, which has perished from damp. On his return to Bologna, he was employed by the Cardinal Farnese, to ornament the great saloon of the palace at Bologna, where he painted his celebrated work of the Entry of Pope Paul III. into Bologna, and the Passage of Francis I. through that city. Cignani acquired a distinguished reputation, and consequently did not escape the shafts of envy. His rivals, unable to prejudice his fame by the exertion of their talents, had recourse to the meanness of slander, and even had the malevolence to injure and destroy several of his works. He was the founder of the Clementine Academy at Bologna, of which Clement XI. appointed him the head, and conferred on it his name. Hitherto, Cignani had not executed any grand machine, which might place him in a situation to compete with the great artists that had preceded him, when he was called upon to undertake the Cupola in la Madonna del Fuoco at Forli, a prodigious work, which occupied him near twenty years; and such was the attachment of his academy, that they followed him to Forli, where his school was continued till his death. The powers of Cignani were more profound than prompt; he conceived his subject with facility, but he was difficult in finishing it to his satisfaction. His picture of the Flight into Egypt, painted for the Conti Bighini, occupied him six months. Though his works always seem finished, they have nothing of the appearance of labour. In his design, he emulated Coreggio, without arriving at the grandeur and vagueness of contour that are peculiar to his unrivalled model. In his colouring, he resembles rather the suavity of Guido, than the tender blending of Coreggio. Like the Caracci, he possessed a faculty, by means of extraordinary relief, of making his figures appear larger than they really are. He excelled in painting women and children, in which, to something of the grace of Albano, he added a more elevated character. The principal works of Cignani, at Bologna, are, the Nativity, painted in fresco, in S. Giorgio; the Virgin and infant Jesus enthroned, and below, St. John Baptist, St. Charles, and St. Theresa, in the cappella Davia, in S. Lucia; in S. Michele in Bosco, four subjects of sacred history, in ovals, supported by angels of extraordinary beauty, esteemed among the most admirable productions at Bologna. But the great monument of his fame is the Cupola at Forli, which Lanzi considers as the grandest picturesque effort of the eighteenth century. The subject, like Coreggio's Dome at Parma, represents the Assumption of the Virgin; an immense composition, of that superior merit and attraction, that the more it is contemplated, the more it delights. This eminent artist died at Forli in 1719. [A favourite picture of Adam and Eve, which Cignani painted for his own use, but parted with to Cardinal San Cesario, was, a short time ago, in England, and could not meet with a purchaser; the King of Holland, with more discernment, has added it to his collection. The pictures of "Charity," and "Joseph solicited by the wife of Potiphar," are among the best known, in foreign countries, of his works: the last he repeated, and other artists have increased the number.]

CIGNANI, FELICE, was the son and scholar of Carlo Cignani, born at Bologna in 1660. Under the able instruction of his father, and endowed with a natural disposition for the art, he became a painter of considerable ability. Enriched by an ample fortune, left him by his father, he appears to have exercised the art rather as his inclination prompted him, than as a regular professor. In the church of the Carità at Bologna is a picture by him of the Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Joseph, and St. Anthony of Padua; and at the Cappuccini, a much-admired picture of St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. He died in 1724.

CIGNANI, PAOLO, was the nephew and scholar of Carlo Cignani, born at Bologna in 1709. Lanzi mentions in favourable terms a picture by this painter at Savignano, of St. Francis appearing to St. Joseph of Copertino. The subject is represented by candle-light, of a fine effect, and the figures well designed, in the style of the antique. He died in 1764.

CIGNAROLI, GIOVANNI BETTINO. This painter was born at Verona in 1709 [in 1706]. He first studied under Santo Prunati at Venice, but was afterwards a scholar of Antonio Balestra. He may be ranked among the best painters of the modern Venetian school. Although he was invited to several of the courts in Italy, he preferred a residence at Venice to the temptations that were held out to him. He received commissions for many of the churches and principal galleries. At Pontremoli is an admirable picture by him of St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. Lanzi extols as one of his finest pictures, the Flight into Egypt, in S. Antonio Abate, at Parma. The grave and dignified beauty of the Virgin, and the angelic character of the cherubs, that are their guides, partake of the charming expression of Carlo Maratti, although unequal to that master in union of effect and the harmony of colouring. His back-grounds are ingeniously composed of well-chosen architecture and pleasing landscape, and his subjects, usually devout, are enlivened by groups of cherubs and angels, which he introduced with the happiest effect. He died in 1770.

CIGNAROLI, MARTINO. This painter was a native of Milan, but studied at Verona, in the school of Carpioni, under whom he became an able artist in landscapes of an easel size. He flourished about the year 1718. [He was born, according to Zani, in 1649, and died in 1726.]

CIGNAROLI, SCIPIONE, was the son of the preceding artist. After receiving his first instruction from his father, he went to Rome, where he became a scholar of Tempesta, and was a successful imitator of the style of that master, and of the works of G. Ponssin and Salvator. His pictures are chiefly at Milan and Turin.

CIMABUE, GIOVANNI. The arts, which had continued to degenerate among the Romans from the reign of Nero, appear to have perished with the Colossus of the Roman empire, and to have been totally lost in the succeeding dominion of barbarism. If they preserved a degraded existence in a miserable asylum in Greece, they owed it to the piety of the people, rather than the protection of the government. The artist was employed, not honoured. The exercise of his talent procured him a wretched subsistence, by colouring what were called images, rudely stained, for the purposes of public worship, which were chiefly admired for the gold and precious stones with which they were ornamented. It was, however, to Greece, where the art had languished in that state of decrepitude, that Italy was indebted for the origin of what is called the modern school. Although its renovation has been generally attributed to Cimabue, it is sufficiently proved by the Italian writers on art, that painting was practised at Pisa, Florence, and other parts of Italy, nearly two centuries before him. It is, however, universally admitted, that he was the first that rescued the art from the gross and barbarous state in which it was previously practised.

Giovanni Cimabue was of a noble lineage, born at Florence in 1240. He is stated by Vasari to have learned the art from some Greek painters, who were employed in the church of S. Maria Novella. This is, however, very reasonably doubted by other writers; and Lanzi observes, that at the time of Cimabue, the Greeks knew less of painting than the Italians. He is supposed by others to have been a disciple of Giunta Pisano, who is stated by Morrona, in his Pisa Illustrata, to have painted some pictures for the churches of Assisi, about the year 1230, and who P. Angelo asserts to have been instructed by some Greeks about the year 1210. Juncta Pisanus ruditer a Græcis instructus primus ex Italis artem apprehendit circa an. sal. 1210. Whoever was his instructor, he has the credit of being the first painter who threw a light on the art. It was, indeed, but a feeble gleam, but it appeared luminous, as succeeding to total obscurity; and his productions, however impotent they appear in a more advanced state of the art, were considered as prodigies at the time. That such was the reputation he acquired, is evident from the fact that, on finishing a picture of the Virgin for S. Maria Novella, his fellow citizens carried it in triumphal procession, with the sound of trumpets, to the church for which it was destined. It is by the stimulating impulse of popular honours that genius is fostered in its infancy, nourished in its growth, and strengthened to maturity. Public indifference is the suffocation of talent. If the rude essays of Cimabue had not met with admirers, Florence would probably never have produced a Michael Angelo. Few of the works of Cimabue have outlived the ravages of time. In the church of Santa Croce, at Florence, is still preserved a picture of St. Francis, painted when he was young; and in S. Stefano, a very superior performance, representing S. Cecilia. He died in 1300. [The date of his death is not certain: Zani says he was living in 1302. Much might be added to the article, but to very little purpose, as but little of his work remains. Rosini, who has given a print of the Virgin and Child by him, (plate IV.) may be consulted; and other modern writers, who are endeavouring to dissipate the mists that envelope the earlier histories of painting. A dictionary is not the place for such discussions; they belong rather to the history of the art.]

[CIMAROLI, GIAMBATISTA, DA SALÒ, a Venetian landscape painter, who flourished from 1718 to 1733. His pictures are not uncommon in England, though his name is but little known. It is conjectured that Zuccarelli may have taken lessons from him, as his early pictures have some resemblance to those of Cimaroli, with less warmth. The cattle and figures introduced are of the same character. In England, his name and works are confounded with those of the Cignaroli.]

CINCINNATO, ROMULO. This painter was born at Florence about the year 1525, and was a scholar of Francesco Salviati. In 1567, he was invited to Spain by Philip II., where he passed the greater part of his life. He was employed in the Escorial, where he painted in fresco a part of the great cloister, and in the church two pictures representing St. Jerome reading, and the same saint preaching to his disciples; as well as two subjects from the life of San Lorenzo. In the church of the Jesuits, at Cuenca, is one of the most esteemed works of this master, representing the Circumcision. He painted some mythological subjects in fresco, in the palace of the Duke del Infantado, at Guadaxajara. He died in 1600.

CINCINNATO, DIEGO and FRANCESCO, were the sons of the preceding artist, and were instructed by their father. Diego was sent to Rome by Philip IV., where he painted for that monarch the portrait of Urban VIII., by whom he was knighted, and presented with a gold medal and chain. He was principally engaged, as was his brother Francesco, in painting portraits. [Diego died in 1626, and Francesco in 1635.]

CIPRIANI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This elegant painter and designer was born at Florence about the year 1728. He is said by Lanzi to have formed his style by studying the works of Antonio Domenico Gabbiani, a Florentine painter, who flourished a few years before him. His first public works were two pictures painted for the Abbey of S. Michele at Pelago, one representing S. Tesauro, the other St. Gregory VII. He went to Rome in 1750, where he passed two or three years. From Rome he came to England, whither his reputation had preceded him. It was at a period when the talents of Mr. Bartolozzi, as an engraver, were in their prime, and the union of their abilities soon became distinguished through every part of Europe. Perhaps few instances have occurred in which the exquisite exertions of the designer have been so happily supported by the taste of the engraver.

Mr. Cipriani executed few large works in painting; the most considerable of them are at Houghton; but he has left an infinite number of admirable drawings, which may be ranked among the happiest efforts of that art. The character and works of Mr. Cipriani have been so faithfully and so amiably described by Mr. Fuseli, that the author has taken the liberty of inserting it. "The fertility of his invention, (says that gentleman,) the graces of his composition, and the seductive elegance of his forms, were only surpassed by the probity of his character, the simplicity of his manners, and the benevolence of his heart." He was one of the members of the Royal Academy at its foundation in 1769. Mr. Cipriani has engraved a few plates, some of which are after his own designs. Among others we have the following:

PORTRAITS.

Algernon Sidney.
Edmund Ludlow, parliamentary general.
John Locke.
John Milton.
Thomas Hollis, prefixed to his memoirs.
Andrew Marvell.

[These were done for Mr. Thomas Hollis, to be inserted in his Memoirs. On them is inscribed, "Drawn and etched by J. B. Cipriani, a Tuscan," &c. At the foundation of the Royal Academy, Cipriani was employed to make the design for the diploma which is given to the academicians and associates on their admission, and which was finely engraved by Bartolozzi. For this work the academicians presented him with a silver cup, at the same time acknowledging the assistance they had received from his great abilities in his profession. The original drawing was afterwards sold by auction for thirty-one guineas, and bought by Mr. Baker, a private collector.]

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Mother and Child; from his own design.
The Death of Cleopatra; after B. Cellini.
The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after Gabbiani; oval.

He died in London in 1785.

CIRCIGNANI, NICCOLO, called DALLE POMARANCE, [or IL POMARANCIO.] This painter was born at Pomarance, in Tuscany, in 1516. Baglioni, without saying by whom he was instructed, states, that he visited Rome when he was young, in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., by whom he was employed in the great saloon of the Belvedere. He lived the greater part of his life at Rome, where there are many of his works in the churches. In S. Stefano Rotondo, is the Martyrdom of that Saint. In il Tempio del Gesu, there are two chapels entirely decorated by Niccolo; in one, he has painted several subjects from the lives of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the other, the Nativity. In S. Antonio, the Crucifixion. The Cupola of S. Pudenziana is also by this master. He died in 1588. [This is not correct, as he was painting in 1591.]

CIRCIGNANI, ANTONIO, was born at Pomarance in 1560, the son and scholar of the preceding artist, whom he assisted in many of his works. After the death of his father, he resided some years at Città Castello, where he painted some of his best pictures, of which the most admired was the Conception, in the Conventuali, which Lanzi describes as partaking of the styles of Baroccio and Roncalli. He returned to Rome, according to Baglioni, in the pontificate of Urban VIII., and was employed for several of the churches. In la Madonna della Consolazione, he painted some subjects of the life of the Virgin; in S. Maria Transpontina, the church of the Carmelites, several pictures of the life of S. Alberto. He died in 1620.

CITTADINI, PIER FRANCESCO, called IL MILANESE. This painter was born at Milan in 1616, [or 1613,] and was brought up in the school of Guido. He possessed powers for the higher walk of art, as is evident from the proofs he has given in the churches at Bologna. His Stoning of Stephen, Christ praying in the Garden, the Flagellation, and the Ecce Homo, in the church of S. Stefano, and his S. Agata, in the church of that saint, are productions not unworthy a disciple of Guido. Yet, whether he was allured by the encouragement given to the painters of ornamental cabinet pictures, or from his own caprice, this able artist descended to the humble imitation of still-life. Many of his pictures of dead game, fruit, and flowers, are in the collections at Bologna, where he died in 1681.

CITTADINI, GIOVANNI BATISTA and CARLO, were the sons of the foregoing artist, and painted animals, birds, fruit, and flowers, in the style of their father. They resided chiefly at Bologna.

CITTADINI, GAETANO. This painter was the son of Carlo Cittadini, and was instructed by his father. He excelled in painting landscapes of a cabinet size, with small figures, correctly drawn and spiritedly touched. His works were held in estimation both at Rome and Bologna. He lived about the year 1725.

CIVALLI, FRANCESCO, was born at Perugia in 1660, and was a scholar of Gio. Andrea Carloni. On leaving that master he went to Rome, where he studied some time under Batisti Gaudi, called Baccici. He was a respectable painter of history; but his chief merit was in portrait painting, in which he excelled. He died in 1703.

CIVERCHIO, VINCENZO. This painter was a native of Crema, in the Venetian state. He distinguished himself as a painter, an engraver, and an architect. In the cathedral at Crema is a picture by him of the Annunciation. Formerly there was a celebrated work of this master in the council-chamber at Crema, representing Justice and Temperance, which at the time that Crema was taken by the French, Ridolfi says, was so highly esteemed, that the victors sent it to the king of France. He painted in the public palace the portraits of the most illustrious persons of the city, which are particularly described by Ridolfi. He flourished from about 1500 till 1535, in which year, according to Lanzi, he was living.

CIVOLI. See CARDI.

[CLAESSENS, ANTONY, of Bruges, a follower of the Van Eyck school, and said to have been a scholar of Quintin Metsys, flourished at the latter part of the 15th century. Two of his pictures are preserved in the Academy of Bruges, and were formerly in the Town House; they represent the Judgment of Cambyses; in the one he causes an unjust judge to be seized, and in the other, orders him to be flayed. Both are compositions with numerous figures correctly drawn and well coloured. There is also in the Town House of Bruges a capital picture by him, the Feast of Ahasuerus.]

[CLAESSENS, LAMBERT ANTOINE, born at Antwerp in 1764, commenced his artistical career as a painter of landscapes; but he abandoned the palette and exercised his talent as an engraver, in which he excelled. He practised in London, Paris, and Amsterdam, and died in 1834. He studied under Bartolozzi, and engraved after Giorgione, Rubens, G. Dou, Rembrandt, De Koningk, Ostade, and other eminent painters.]

CLAESSEON, ARNOLD, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1498. He was a scholar of Cornelius Engelbrechtsen, whose manner he at first imitated; but on seeing the works of John Schoorel, he changed his mode of designing, which was neither correct nor agreeable, and adopted the style of that master. He painted history, and composed his subjects with surprising facility. Van Mander speaks in very favourable terms of two pictures by this master at Leyden, one representing the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary, Magdalene, and the Disciples; the other, Christ bearing his Cross. He died in 1564. [By Dutch and Flemish writers he is called Aart Klaassoon, or Aartgen Van Leiden. He received but small remuneration for his works; and when Franz Floris endeavoured to draw him to Antwerp, he refused to leave his native place.]

CLARET, WILLIAM, an English portrait painter, who flourished about the year 1680. He was a scholar of Sir Peter Lely, and copied many of the pictures of that master. Of his own productions, one of the most successful was a portrait of John Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater, of which we have a mezzotinted print by R. Thomson. He died in 1706.

CLARKE, JOHN, an engraver, who flourished at Edinburgh about 1690. We have by him the following portraits:

A Medallion of William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange.

Sir Matthew Hale.

George, Baron de Goertz.

Andrew Marvell.

Doctor Humphrey Prideaux.

Seven small Heads on one plate; Charles II., and his Queen, Prince Rupert, Prince of Orange, Duke of York, Duke of Monmouth, and General Moncke.

CLARKE, JOHN, another engraver of the same name, mentioned in the Anecdotes, who resided in Gray's Inn. He engraved a portrait of Rubens, and a print of Hercules and Dejanira.

CLASENS, D., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. His name is affixed to a coarse etching, representing the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John and an Angel; after Procaccini.

CLASERI, MARCO. This artist was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1580. He engraved several wooden cuts, among which are the Four Seasons, and the Four Ages of the World. They are middling-sized prints, lengthways.

CLASSICUS, VICTORIVS. According to Florent Le Comte, this artist was a sculptor and an architect. He is said to have engraved some plates from the paintings of Tintoretto. There is a small portrait of Il Tintoretto, engraved in a style resembling that of Cornelius Cort, inscribed Alessandro Victorio Classico, sculp., which is probably by the same artist.

CLAUDE. See LORRAINE.

CLEEF, or CLEEVE, JOAS [or JOOST] VAN, called SOTTO CLEEF, was born at Antwerp about the year 1500, and was instructed in the art by his father, William van Cleef, a painter, of whom little more is known than that he was received into the Academy at Antwerp in 1517. He was an excellent colourist; and though it does not appear that he ever was in Italy, his pictures are composed and designed more in the style of the Italian than the Flemish school. He painted some altar-pieces for the churches in Flanders, which were much applauded; and he became so intoxicated with conceit of his merit, that his vanity nearly deprived him of his senses: Cleef came to England with the confident hope of the most brilliant success, and was introduced to King Philip by his countryman, Sir Antonio More. But, unfortunately for his expectations, some of the fine pictures of Titian had arrived before him, and Philip was too much charmed with the beauties of the Venetian, even to do justice to the undoubted merit of the Fleming. Finding his prospects thus blasted, he became furious, and vented his rage on Sir Anthony, as the cause of his disgrace. Many ridiculous and eccentric circumstances are related of this whimsical personage. But with all his absurdity, he must be allowed the merit of an excellent artist. In the cathedral at Antwerp is a picture by Cleef of St. Cosmus and St. Damien. By the catalogue of the pictures of James II., it appears there were two by Van Cleef, the Nativity, and the Judgment of Paris. He died in 1536, in the prime of life.

CLEEF, HENRY VAN, was born at Antwerp in 1510. It is not known under whom he studied; but he went to Italy when young, and returned to his native country a very reputable painter of landscapes. His pictures are distinguished by an uncommon lightness of touch, and an excellent tone of colour. The back-grounds of the historical works of Francis Floris are frequently painted by this artist, and are harmonized with the figures with great intelligence. He was received into the Academy at Antwerp in 1535. Henry van Cleef distinguished himself as an engraver. We have several plates by him of landscapes and views near Rome, which he sometimes signed Henricus Clivensis, fecit, and sometimes marked with the cipher . They are as follow :

- A Bull-fight at Rome, before the Farnese palace.
- A Landscape, with Figures in a Cave, cooking.
- Another Landscape, with Figures at Table in a Cave.
- A set of six Landscapes, with Latin titles.
- A set of four Views in the vicinity of Rome.

There is a publication of the different views by this artist, consisting of thirty-eight plates, entitled Henri a Cleve Ruinarum, ruriumque aliquot delineationes executæ, per Galleum. [He died about 1589.]

CLEEF, MARTIN VAN. This painter was the brother of the preceding artist, and was a disciple of Francis Floris. He painted history, and was employed for some of the churches, but was more esteemed for historical pictures of an easel size, in which the landscapes and back-grounds were painted by his brother Henry. [He is called the master of the Ape, because he sometimes introduced the figure of an ape (in allusion to his name) as his mark. He died about 1570.]

CLEEF, JOHN VAN. This eminent painter of the Flemish school was born at Venloo in Guelderland in 1646. After receiving some instruction from Primo Gentile, he entered the school of Gaspar de Crayer, at Brussels. Under that estimable artist, the young Cleef made a surprising advancement, and in a few years was able to assist his master in the immense number of works in which he was engaged for the churches in the Low Countries. On the death of de Crayer, van Cleef was intrusted to complete the unfinished works left by his master, and was considered one of the ablest artists of his country, and immediately received many commissions for the churches and convents, where he has given satisfactory proof of the respectability of his talents. Without being an imitator of de Crayer, he followed the same simple purity of colour, and was equally correct in his design, in which he discovers something of the Italian gusto. His great practice gave him an uncommon facility; and his compositions are distinguished by judgment and taste. His works are very numerous in Flanders and Brabant; the most esteemed of which are at Ghent. In the church of St. Nicolas is a fine picture of Magdalene at the feet of Christ. In St. Michael, the immaculate Conception, with Adam and Eve in the lower compartment of the picture; an ingenious composition. In St. James's church is a fine picture of the Assumption. But his most admired work is in the chapel of the Convent of the Black Nuns, representing Sisters of that order administering succour to a group of Figures afflicted with the Plague. It is an admirable picture, in drawing and colour approaching the excellence of Vandyck. He died at Ghent in 1716.

[CLEIN, JOHANN, an engraver on copper and wood, was a native of Nuremberg, and flourished from 1478 to 1520. In an octavo volume, entitled Hortulus Animæ, printed in 1511, there are 67 small wood engravings attributed to him. The letters J. C., with a small shield between them, are said to be his marks; but the same are applied to Johann, or Jan, Culmbach, and to Jan de Cologne. Another mark, which is at the end of the book above mentioned, is also supposed to be his; but it appears rather to belong to a printer. It is a dark tablet with a double cross and two pellets; at the lower part of the cross is a circle in which are the letters I. C. (See the table of Monograms.) The same uncertainty seems to prevail among writers respecting this artist as with regard to Culmbach and others of the period. See Bartsch, Brulliot, and Nagler.]

CLEMENTONE. See BOCCIARDINI.

[CLENNELL, LUKE, an English painter, and engraver on wood, of extraordinary genius and talent, the son of a farmer near Morpeth, in Northumberland, was born in 1781. His early disposition for drawing, and neglect of other studies or pursuits, induced his friends to place him with the celebrated Bewick, in whose art he soon showed great skill. But he did not confine himself to mere engraving; he exercised the pencil, and produced several works that attracted public attention, and gave promise of future excellence as a painter. Among these was the Arrival of the Mackerel Boat, and the Day after the Fair, in which he gave a happy delineation of rustic character, and showed great knowledge of colour. His picture of the decisive charge by the Life-guards at the battle of Waterloo, established his reputation as a painter of genius; but its excellence was auxiliary to the melancholy termination of his existence. In consequence of the sensation produced by that energetic exhibition of heroism, he was selected to paint the entertainment given by the city of London to the allied sovereigns, nobles, and generals who had shared in that memorable battle. The honour was fatal to his health and life. The vexations he had to encounter from vanity, caprice, and supercilious arrogance, affected his mind, and he ended his days, without completing the work, in a lunatic asylum, in the 59th year of his age. He was skilful in composition, and in seizing the true points of character; had great power of execution, was free and spirited in his pencilling, and was well acquainted with all the essentials in the practical parts of the art.]

CLERC, JOHN LE. This painter was born at Nancy in 1587. He studied in Italy, and imitated the style of his instructor Carlo Saracino, called Veneziano, with such success, that his pictures have been frequently taken for those of his master. Le Clerc etched some plates from the designs of Veneziano, particularly the Death of the Virgin, which has been incorrectly attributed to Guido. It is dated 1619, and is executed in a masterly style. He died in 1633. [Zani places his birth seven years later.]

CLERC, SEBASTIAN LE. This admirable designer and engraver was born at Mentz, in Lorraine, in 1637. He was the son of a goldsmith, who taught him the principles of design, and sent him to Paris, with the intention of obtaining him a situation in the corps of engineers, but by the advice of Le Brun, to whom he had been introduced, he devoted himself entirely to the art of engraving. In a short time he so far distinguished himself, that his merit became known to M. de Colbert, who engaged him in the service of the king, with apartments in the Gobelins, and a pension of one thousand eight hundred livres. The style of Le Clerc is excellent; he generally advanced his plates with the point to a state which left for the graver only what was necessary to render them more agreeable and more precious. In his best prints, the forms of his figures are elegant and correct, the expression of his heads noble and characteristic, and his draperies are simple and suited to his forms. The landscapes, buildings, and other accessories, are executed with exquisite taste. He appears to have formed his style from Le Brun, which he dignified by a study of the works of Raffaele. If the execution of Le Clerc is inferior to that of de la Bella in the playful charm of the point, it possesses a judicious firmness, suited to the nobler subjects he has engraved. His work is one of the most extensive in the art, and amounts to nearly three thousand plates, [Zani says four thousand, almost all of his own invention,] a great part of which, of course, consists of vignettes, titles, frontispieces, and other ornaments. The following is an ample list of his prints, comprising all his most esteemed works :

Le Clerc also engraved twenty-four medals, struck on various occasions. This laborious and ingenious artist died in 1714.

CLERC, or KLERCK, HENRY DE, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1570. From the resemblance of his style to that of Henry van Balen, it is very probable he was a disciple of that master. He painted history, and there are several of his works in the churches in the Low Countries; but his small pictures of historical subjects are more esteemed, in which he may be compared to Rottenhamer and Van Balen. At Brussels, in the church of St. James, is a picture by de Clerc, of the Crucifixion. In the church of Notre Dame, is a very charming picture of the Holy Family; and the Resurrection.

[CLERISSEAU, CHARLES LOUIS, an architect and designer in water colours, was born at Paris, and accompanied Robert Adams to England, where he remained some time, and made the drawings for the "Ruins of Spalatro, &c.," which was published in 1764. On his return to France, he published

"Antiquities de France," "Monumens de Nimes," and other works; and was appointed, in 1783, architect to the empress of Russia. He is, however, best known to the world by his fine drawings of the remains of ancient architecture, in water colours, which are held in high estimation. He died at Paris in 1820, in his 99th year.]

[CLEVELY, JOHN, an English marine painter, was born at London about 1743. He was brought up in the dock-yard at Deptford, but afterwards became a lieutenant in the navy, and accompanied Lord Mulgrave in his voyage of discovery to the North Pole. He also went with Sir Joseph Banks to Iceland. He sometimes painted in oil, but generally in water colours. Many of his drawings have been engraved. He died at London in 1786.]

CLEYN, or KLEYN, FRANCIS DE. This painter was born at Rostock, and was in the employment of Christian IV., king of Denmark, for some time. He afterwards went to Rome for improvement, where he passed four years, and acquired a talent for designing grotesques, by which he afterwards distinguished himself. He came to England in the reign of James I., and was taken into the service of the King, who first employed him in designing historical and grotesque subjects for the manufacture of tapestry, established at Mortlake under the patronage of that monarch. He was pensioned by the King, which he continued to receive under Charles I. until the civil war. He was also employed in ornamenting the mansions of several of the nobility. Some of the best preserved works of Cleyn are in Holland House; where he painted a chamber, with a ceiling, and small compartments on the chimneys, which bear some resemblance to the style of Parmegiano. Francis de Cleyn etched some plates resembling those of Hollar, which he sometimes signed with his name, and sometimes with the initials F. C., or F. K. We have by him,

A set of five Plates of the Senses, with grotesque ornaments.

The Seven Liberal Arts; F. Cleyn, fecit. 1645.

A hook of ten Plates of grotesque ornaments.

He died in 1658.

CLOCHE, G., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1616. According to Abbe Marolles, he engraved some plates representing views; among which is that of the city of Rennes.

CLOCK, NICHOLAS, or CLAAS, a Dutch engraver, born at Leyden about the year 1570. According to M. de Heineken, he was a disciple of Francis Floris. His style resembles that of Cornelius de Cort, without being nearly equal to that master. We have by him the following prints:

The Four Elements; represented in half-length figures. 1597.

The Judgment of Midas; after Karel van Mander. 1589.

CLOSTERMANS, JOHN. This artist was born at Osnaburg in 1656. He was the son of a painter, who taught him the rudiments of design. In 1679 he went to Paris, where he was employed by de Troyes to paint his draperies. He came to England in 1681, and was for some time occupied in the same manner by Riley. After the death of that artist, Clostermans got into employment, and painted the portraits of several of the nobility, though he was a painter of very limited merit; but at that period the art was in a very low state in England. He died in London in 1710.

CLOUET, or CLOWET, PETER, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1606. After having learnt the rudiments of the art in Flanders, he went to Italy, and at Rome became a pupil of Spierre, and Bloemaert. On his return to Antwerp, he engraved several portraits and subjects after Rubens. They are executed with the graver in a firm, clear manner, resembling the style of Pontius, but not equal to that master. His plates, particularly those after Rubens, are considerably esteemed. We have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Peter Aretino.

Thomas a Kempis.

The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; after Vanduyck. Vanduyck has etched the same subject.

A Company of Cavaliers and Ladies at Table, said to be the family of the Duke of Newcastle; after Diepenbeck.

[He died in 1668.]

CLOUET, or CLOWET, ALBERT, a Flemish engraver, who was the nephew of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp in 1624. Following the example of his uncle, he visited Italy in the early part of his life, and became a pupil of Cornelius Bloemaert. Among his first productions were some plates of portraits of painters, for the Vite de Pittori, &c., by Bellori, published at Rome in 1672. He also engraved several portraits for the work entitled, Effigies Cardinal. nunc viventium, published at Rome by Rossi. At Florence he engraved after some of the pictures in the Palazzo Pitti. His plates of historical subjects are executed in the neat and finished style of Cornelius Bloemaert. In his portraits he sometimes imitated the manner of Mellan, and at others that of F. de Poilly. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Niccolo Poussin, in Bellori.

Anthony Vanduyck; the same.

CLOVIO, GIULIO GIORGIO. This extraordinary artist was a native of Croatia, in 1493. After learning the rudiments of design in his own country, he went to Rome, and entered the school of Giulio Romano. His first efforts in the art, were attempts to follow the strides of his great master on the grand scale of his historical productions; but his instructor, perceiving in him an extraordinary ability in designing small figures, with a taste, an accuracy, and a firmness that gave grandeur to miniature, advised him to devote himself to a branch of painting which he has ennobled by his inimitable talent, and has acquired a reputation that ranks him with the great, at a period which immediately succeeded the most distinguished epocha of Roman excellence. In his design of the figure, extraordinary as it may appear, he evinces something of the greatness of the Roman school, and of M. Angelo; and the naturalist will find every insect delineated with astonishing correctness, although on so diminutive a scale that they require the use of an optic. His works were confined to the sovereigns and princes of his time, in whose libraries were found books embellished with his miniatures, painted with extraordinary force and beauty of colouring, with the most correct design. The most extraordinary work of Clovio, is the procession of Corpus Domini, at Rome, painted in twenty-six pictures; which occupied the artist nine years. At Milan, the Cistercians possess a picture by Clovio of the Descent from the Cross, of his own composition, that breathes all the gusto of the golden age of Roman art. He died in 1578. [He was also called Macedo, or Macedone, because his ancestors, it is supposed, were of Macedonia. A description of his works would fill a large volume, and would be incredible without ocular proof.]

COBLENT, [or COBLENTZ,] HERMAN, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1576. It is probable he was a pupil of the Collaerts, from his style; which resembles the neat, finished manner of those artists. He marked his plates with a cipher composed of H. C. F. ICF. We have by him,

Four, of the Four Evangelists.
Lucretia under an Arch.

A set of the Heathen Deities, single figures under Arches.
A Man seated at a Table, and a Woman behind him.

COCSETTI, PIETRO PAOLO. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1725. He engraved some plates of architectural subjects, which are executed in a slight, indifferent style.

COCHET, or COGET, [JOSEPH] ANTHONY, an engraver, probably a Fleming, who lived about the year 1650. By him we have,

Time crowning Industry and punishing Idleness; after Rubens.
The Portrait of David Beek, the painter; with others.

COCHIN, NICHOLAS, a French designer and engraver, born at Troyes in Champagne, about the year 1619. He settled at Paris, where he engraved a great number of plates, many of which are in the style of Callot, of whom he is supposed to have been a pupil. Like that artist, he succeeded better in small figures than in larger ones. His work is considerable, of which the following are the most deserving of notice:

Melchizedeck and Abraham.
Abraham sending away Agar.
The Children of Israel passing the Red Sea.

Pharaoh and his Host swallowed up in the Red Sea.

Moses breaking the Tables of the Law.

The Adoration of the Magi.

The Repose in Egypt.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness.

The Conversion of St. Paul.

The Temptation of St. Anthony.

Part of the plates for a folio volume of Plans and Views of Camps, Towns, Battles, &c., under Louis XIV., published by Beaulieu, 1645.

Part of the plates for the Entry of Louis XIV. and his Queen into Paris. The whole consisted of twenty-two plates.

A Procession, with the Flags, &c., taken at the Battle of Fourcroy.

Ten plates of the History of Judith.

Eleven plates of subjects from the New Testament.

Sixteen plates of the Martyrdom of the Apostles, &c.

Six plates of Battles, in the style of Callot.

[Zani says his name was Natalis, not Nicholas, and that he died in 1695. See the next article.]

COCHIN, NOEL, or NATALIS, a French engraver, supposed to have been a relation of the preceding artist. He etched some plates in a coarse, heavy manner, amongst which is a Holy Family, after Titian; and a Miracle wrought by St. Anthony. He also engraved the plates for a volume of prints from select pictures, with a description of them, published by Caroline Catherine Patin, entitled Tableaux selectæ ac explicatæ a Carola Catherina Patina, Parisina Academica. Batavi, 1691. [As this artist is also called Natalis, and the dates correspond with the preceding, it has caused some confusion in the accounts of each. Nagler says this artist died in 1695.]

COCHIN, CHARLES NICHOLAS, THE ELDER, a French designer and engraver, born at Paris in 1688. He studied painting until he was nineteen years of age, when he devoted himself entirely to engraving. We have several plates by this artist, engraved with taste and spirit, and correctly drawn, particularly when his figures are of a medium size. The following are his principal plates:

The Portrait of J. Sarazin, sculptor; engraved for his reception at the Academy in 1781.

The Portrait of Eustace le Sueur, painter; also for his reception.

Alexander and Roxana; after a drawing by Raffaele; in the Crozat collection.

A set of Fifty-two plates of the History of Languedoc; after the same.

Several plates; after Watteau and Lancret, &c.

[He died in 1754.]

COCHIN, CHARLES NICHOLAS, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1715. He received his instruction in the art from his father, and became a very eminent designer and engraver. In 1749 he accompanied the Marquis de Marigny in a tour through Italy, and in 1758 published his reflections on the works of painting and sculpture, in the different cities he had visited, which was very favourably received. He engraved an immense number of plates, and his work extends to upwards of one thousand five hundred prints; many of which are frontispieces, vignettes, and other ornamental works, executed with such taste and judgment, that, if he had engraved nothing more important, would have established his reputation. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

[A detailed catalogue of his works was published by Jombert in 1770, and copied by Heineken into his Dictionary, with the addition of some executed after 1770. Cochin was the author of several literary works, chiefly relating to the arts. He died in 1788; or, according to some, in 1790.]

[COCHRAN, WILLIAM, born at Strathern in Clydesdale, in 1738, received his first instruction at the Academy of Painting at Glasgow, founded by the two celebrated printers, Robert and Andrew Foulis; he afterwards went to Italy and studied under Gavin Hamilton. On his return to Glasgow he practised portrait painting both in oil and miniature, in which, it is said, his drawing and likenesses were accurate. Some pieces from fable, executed by him when at Rome, are to be found in Glasgow. He was a modest artist, and never exhibited his works, or put his name to them. He died at Glasgow in 1785, and was buried in the cathedral, where a monument was erected to his memory.]

COCK, or KOCK, JEROME, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1498. In the early part of his life he abandoned painting, and applied himself to engraving and the business of a printseller. We have several plates by him after his brother Matthew, Peter Breughel, and without much effect. He sometimes marked his plates H. Cock, fecit; and sometimes with the cipher IEI.

The following are his principal works:

[Zani and Nagler say that Jerome Cock was born in 1510, and died in 1570.]

COCK, or KOCK, MATTHEW. This painter was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1500. He was one of the early Flemish painters of landscapes, and one of the first of his countrymen who reformed the art from the stiff and Gothic style that existed before. Several of his landscapes were engraved by his brother Jerome, and possess considerable merit for the time. He died at Antwerp in 1554. [Füssli, Zani, and Nagler say he died in 1565.]

COCK, JOHN CLAUD DE, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. His name is affixed to an etching representing the Martyrdom of a Saint. It is executed in a bold, masterly style, and appears to have been the production of a painter. It is inscribed, Joan. Claud de Cock, fecit.

COCKSON, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. He engraved several portraits in a neat, stiff style. His plates are sometimes marked with the cipher T. We have by him the following portraits, &c.:

[COCLERS, LOUIS BERNARD, was born at Maestricht in 1740. He was instructed by his father, Jean Baptiste Coclers. He passed three years in Italy, and then returned to his father at Liege, where he painted a number of portraits, and also at Maestricht, Nimeguen, and Dort: he ultimately established himself at Leyden. In the last city he devoted his time to painting cabinet pictures in the manner of Gerard Dou, Mieris, Metsu, Schalcken, and other great masters of the Dutch school. In 1787, he left Holland and went to Paris, where he remained several years; he again returned and resided at Amsterdam, where he painted portraits and cabinet pictures, which he exhibited from the year 1808 to 1813. One of his pictures is in the Museum of that city. He died at Liege in 1817. It is also said that he was an engraver; and Rigal, in his Catalogue, mentions twenty-five pieces by him.

CODA, [or CODI,] BENEDETTO. This painter was a native of Ferrara, about the year 1460, and was a disciple of Giovanni Bellini. According to Lanzi he resided chiefly at Rimini, where he painted some pictures for the churches, which prove him to have been an able artist. His principal works are, the Marriage of the Virgin Mary with St. Joseph, in the dome at Rimini; and his picture of the Rosary, in the church of the Dominicans. He died about the year 1520. [There is a picture by him with the date 1520.]

CODA, [or CODI,] BARTOLOMEO, was the son of the preceding painter, and flourished about the year 1528. He was instructed in the art by his father, whom he surpassed. In the church of S. Rocco at Pesaro, is a fine picture by this master, bearing the above date; which Lanzi says in every respect bears the character of the golden age of the art. It represents the Virgin and Infant enthroned, with a Choir of beautiful Cherubs, with St. Roch and St. Sebastian. [Bartolomeo flourished in 1543; he was called da Rimini, as was also his elder brother Francesco, who painted in 1533.]

CODAGORA, VIVIANO. This painter was brought up in the Academy at Rome, and flourished about the year 1650. He excelled in painting the architectural Ruins near Rome, and perspective views of his own composition. He has been frequently confounded with Ottavio Viviani of Brescia, who painted similar subjects, but in a style very inferior to the works of this artist, both in the correctness of the perspective, and the general effect of his pictures. Codagora cast a tone over his buildings that exactly represented that which time has thrown over them, and his pictures are decorated with figures by some of the best artists of his time, particularly Domenico Gargiuli of Naples; who, according to Lanzi, most frequently painted the figures in his pictures, in which there was a graceful and harmonious accordance, that appeared the produce of the same hand. The collections at Naples possess many of their joint works.

[CODDE, CHARLES and PETER. These artists were probably brothers, and are placed together in consequence of the discrepancies in writers concerning them. Balkema says Charles was born at the Hague in 1640, and painted landscapes in the manner of John and Andrew Both, and Nicolas Berchem, and that he died in 1698. This account Nagler applies to Peter. Füssli and the Immerzeels do not mention Charles. Balkema says Peter painted assemblies of soldiers, and other conversation pieces, and that one of his most beautiful subjects was in the Lormier collection: no other particulars are mentioned by the above-named writers.]

COECK, or KOECK. See KOECK.

COELLO, ALONSO SANCHEZ. This painter was a native of Portugal, born in 1515. He resided chiefly in Spain, and was employed in the Escorial by Philip II.; Palomino has erroneously stated him to have been a scholar of Raffaele, as he was only five years of age when that great painter died. He received some instruction from Antonio Moro, and when that artist left Spain, Coello succeeded him in the favour of the king, whose portrait he painted several times, and those of the principal personages of the court, so much to the satisfaction of the king that he called him the Titiano Portugues. His works in the Escorial represent different saints at their respective altars, and do great credit to his talents. Many of his pictures perished in the palace of the Pardo, when it was burnt. His chief performance is in the church of San Geronimo at Madrid, it represents the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; on the right of the Saint is the figure of our Saviour, and on the left the Virgin Mary. The design is grand and bold, it is extremely well coloured, and of a powerful and masterly expression. He died in 1590, lamented by Philip, and regretted by his contemporary artists. Lopez da Vega wrote his epitaph.

COELLO, CLAUDIO. This painter was of Portuguese parents, but was born at Madrid; in what year is not ascertained. He was instructed in the art by Francisco Rizi, but his greatest improvement was in studying the works of Titian, Rubens, and the other great painters in the royal collection. He was made painter to Philip IV., by whom he was employed in the Escorial. Coello never travelled out of Spain, and his extraordinary talents are only known in that country, where he is considered as one of their most distinguished painters. Many excellent specimens of his ability are to be seen in the churches and convents at Madrid, Saragossa, and Salamanca. But his principal work is the famous altar-piece in the sacristy of San Lorenzo, in the Escorial; its subject is the Colocazion de las Santas Formas. It is an immense composition, and occupied the painter seven years. In the crowd of personages that form the procession, are the portraits of the King, and the principal persons of the court; painted with the utmost precision, yet executed in a bold and masterly style, and there is a majestic solemnity in the arrangement of the whole, suited to the grandeur of the subject. It is a very extraordinary performance, and holds its rank even by the side of the works of Titian and Rubens. He died in the year 1693. [The picture of the Collocation of the Host, represents the ceremony which took place in 1684, in the presence of Charles II. and his officers of state: it contains upwards of fifty portraits, and was completed by Coello in about three years. Bermudez says that he knew how to combine in his compositions the design of Cano, the colour of Murillo, and the brilliant effects of Velasquez. He pronounces him the last of the Spanish painters, as from the time that Luca Giordano was called into Spain, the art declined to its ruin.]

COELMANS, JAMES, [or JACOB,] a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1670. He was a pupil of Cornelius Vermeulen; after engraving some plates in his native city, he was engaged by M. de Boyer d'Aguilles, to undertake the plates from the pictures of his collection. They consisted of one hundred and eighteen prints, and form the principal works of this artist, of which the following are the most esteemed:

PORTRAITS.

Donna Olympia Maldachini, niece of Innocent X.; after Gu. Cesari.

[COELN, WILHELM VON, or William of Cologne, a celebrated old German painter of the latter part of the fourteenth century, called also Meister Wilhelm. The exact date of his birth is not known, but the place appears to have been Herle, a village near Cologne. He was settled in Cologne, with his wife Jutta, as early as 1370; and there is a passage in the Annals of the Dominican monks at Frankfurt, which testifies his great reputation: it says,—“In that time, 1380, there was at Cologne a most excellent painter, to whom there was not the like in his art; his name was Wilhelm, and he made pictures of men which almost appeared to be alive.” Of the works attributed to Meister Wilhelm, the following are the principal:—the picture over the tomb of Cerno von Falkenstein, in the St. Castors-Kirche at Coblenz, painted in 1388; the large altar-piece of the church of St. Clara at Cologne, which is now in one of the chapels of the cathedral; it is in twenty-six compartments, illustrating the life and passion of Christ: the Sancta Veronica, formerly in the Boisserée collection, now belonging to the king of Bavaria, and in the Pinakothek at Munich, and of which there is a beautiful lithograph by Strixner; and a Crucifixion, and a half-length Madonna and infant Christ, in the Wallraf Museum at Cologne. Other pictures are conjectured to be by him, but it is very uncertain, as they are also attributed to his scholar, the no less celebrated Meister Stephan: among these is the Dom-bild, or Cathedral picture, which was formerly the altar-piece of the chapel of the Rath-haus of Cologne, but is now in the cathedral. It was painted in the year 1410, and is considered to be the most valuable picture of the old school of Cologne. Albert Durer, in a note of his journal, ascribes it to Meister Stephan, of whom, unfortunately, there are no records that may be implicitly relied on. The best accounts of both masters, and the pictures attributed to them, will be found in Dr. Franz Kugler's History of Painting, part ii.; a work deserving recommendation for its fidelity, and very superior to those of tourists in general; and in the philosophical book of Alfred Michiels, “Etudes sur L'Allemagne,” in which the splendid poetical descriptions of the remaining pictures of the older masters of Germany, almost compensates the loss of their other works, for he has exhausted the language of panegyric.]

COENRADT, LAWERS. This artist, who flourished about the year 1690, engraved part of the portraits for the collection of Cardinals, published by Rossi. They are very indifferent performances.

[COGELS, JOSEPH CHARLES, a landscape and marine painter, born at Brussels in 1786. He studied at the Academy of Dusseldorf; and, after spending some time in France, returned to Belgium in 1806, and was admitted a member of the Royal Society of the Fine Arts at Ghent. In 1810 he went to Munich, where he was employed by the king and queen in painting cabinet pictures for their private collections, and for the gallery at Schleisheim. In 1817 he was made a member of the Academy at Antwerp. He, however, established himself at Munich, and was an honorary member of the Academy there. He died in 1831. He is sometimes called Cogels Mabilde.]

COIGNARD, S., an engraver of little note, only known by some indifferent portraits, among which are the following:

John Dryden.
Sir Christopher Wren.
George Parker, astrologer.

COIGNET, GILES. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1530. He was some time under a painter, called Antonio Palermo, then resident at Antwerp, and afterwards went to Italy. After visiting Rome and Naples, he returned to the Low Countries, where he was much encouraged. He was admitted into the Academy at Antwerp in 1561. The troubles that existed at that time under the Prince of Parma, obliged Coignet to leave his native country, and take refuge in Holland, where he remained several years. He painted historical subjects of an easel size, but was more successful in landscapes, in candle-light subjects, and moonlights. He finally settled at Hamburg, where he died in 1600.

COLA, GENARRO DI, an old Neapolitan painter, born in 1320. He was the disciple of Maestro Simone, a friend and companion of Giotto, and painted in his style. The principal works remaining of this ancient artist are, the altar-piece in the church of S. Maria della Pietà, representing the Mater Dolorosa with the dead Christ, and Angels holding the Instruments of the Passion; and in a chapel of the same church, Magdalene penitent. In the tribune of S. Giovanni a Carbonara, the Annunciation, and the Nativity. Many other works by this painter are mentioned by Dominici. His style, like that of the painters of his time, is laboured and dry, but not without expression. He died in 1370.

COLBENSCHLAG, or COLBENIUS, STEPHEN, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1610. He resided principally at Rome, where he engraved several plates from the works of the Italian painters; among others are the following:

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Domenichino.
The taking down from the Cross; after An. Caracci.

[Brulliot says he was born at Salzboung in 1591; and Nagler, that he died at the age of 92.]

COLE, HUMPHREY, an old English engraver, who flourished about the year 1572. He engraved a map and a frontispiece for Parker's Bible, published in 1572, in which he has represented the portrait of Queen Elizabeth, with the Earl of Leicester as Goliath and the Lord Burleigh as David.

COLE, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1720. He was much employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved some portraits, and other book plates; among which is a head of James Puckle, prefixed to his dialogue, called the Club. He also engraved several plates of monuments, and a copy from the print by Martin Rota, representing the Last Judgment, after M. Angelo Buonaroti.

[COLEYER, or COLIER, EVERT, a native of Leyden, flourished about 1691, as appears by a picture of still-life, with his name and that date. He also painted conversations, some of which are mentioned in the catalogues of Hoet and Terwesten.]

COLIGNON, FRANCIS, a French designer and engraver, born at Nancy about the year 1621. He was a pupil of Callot, and studied the works of della Bella and Silvestre. He engraved some of the plates of the conquered towns in the reign of Louis XIV., published by Beaulieu. We have also several plates from different masters, and from his own designs. His best works are views of buildings, with small figures, in the style of Callot, which he executed with great spirit and freedom. We have by him, among others, the following prints :

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Buildings at Rome under Sistus V.

A View of Malta with its ancient Fortifications.

SUBJECTS AFTER OTHER MASTERS.

COLLAERT, ADRIAN, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1520. After having learnt the principles of the art in his own country, he visited Italy for improvement, where he passed some years. On his return to Flanders, he engraved a great number of plates, executed in a neatly finished style, but with a certain degree of dryness. His drawing is correct, and his heads expressive. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher AC. The following are his principal plates :

COLLAERT, HANS, OR JOHN, was the son of the preceding engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1540. After being instructed by his father for some time, he followed his example in visiting Italy, where he passed some time. He assisted his father in many of his works, and engraved a great number of plates, which are executed in the style of Adrian, but with more taste and less stiffness. He must have lived to a great age, as we have plates by him dated from 1555 till 1622. He sometimes signed his plates with his name Hans Collaert, fecit, sometimes with the initials H. C. F., and sometimes with the cipher ICF. The following are his prints most worthy of notice :

COLLANTES, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1599. He painted history and landscapes, and excelled particularly in the latter, which are painted in a bold and masterly manner, in the style of Rubens, richly coloured, and of very romantic scenery. Of his historical works, the principal are San Geronimo, and a picture of the Resurrection, in the Bueno Retiro. He died in 1656.

COLLEONI, GIROLAMO. This painter was a native of Bergamo, born, according to Tassi, about the end of the fifteenth century. Most of the works of this able artist, in his own country, were formerly in the church of S. Antonio dell' Ospitale at Bergamo, but were destroyed at the time the church was rebuilt. In the church dedicated to S. Erasmo, at S. Borgo Canale near Bergamo, is preserved one of his most esteemed works, painted in 1538. This picture is described by Tassi as one of the most admirable productions of Bergamese art. It represents the Virgin and Infant, with Mary Magdalene, St. John, and S. Erasmo. Lanzi mentions a picture by Colleoni, of the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the Carrara Gallery, which was thought by the best judges to be a work of Titian, until the inscription of Hieronimus Colleo, 1555, was found on it. Not meeting with the distinction he merited in his own country, and disgusted at the encouragement given to inferior talents of foreign growth, he determined to leave it; but, previous to his departure, Tassi asserts, that he painted in one night on the façade of a house, a very beautiful horse, and inscribed under it, Nemo propheta acceptus in patria sua. He went to Spain, where he met with due encouragement, and was employed in the Escorial.

COLLET, LOUIS. This artist was a native of Paris, and flourished about the year 1610. He engraved a set of plates of ornaments for goldsmiths and jewellers, from the designs of Giles Legaré, which are executed with the graver in a very neat style.

[COLLET, JOHN, an English artist, born in London in 1725, was a scholar of Lambert, the landscape painter. He painted subjects of humour, somewhat in the manner of Hogarth, approaching him only in vulgarity and caricature. In pieces wherein he did not attempt to imitate that genius, and confined himself to simple objects, he showed considerable merit in the representation of the characters and costume of his time. Several of his pictures have been engraved, and there are some etchings by himself. He died in 1780.]

COLLIN, RICHARD, a German designer and engraver, born at Luxembourg in 1626. He went to Rome when young, and became a scholar of his countryman, Sandrart. He engraved some of the plates for the Academia of that author. On his return from Italy he resided at Antwerp and Brussels, where he engraved several portraits and other subjects, in a neat, laboured style. The following are his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Jane Bickerton, Duchess of Norfolk.
 Sir Godfrey Kneller; for Sandrart's Academia.
 John Zachary Kneller; for the same.
 Artus Quellinus, sculptor; after E. Quellinus.
 John Philip van Thielen, flower painter; after the same.
 Joachim Sandrart. 1679.
 Bartheleme S. Murillo, painter; se ipse, pinx.
 Christian Albert, Prince Bishop of Lubeck. 1654.
 Anna Adelhildis, Wife of the Prince of la Tour and Tassis. 1682.
 A set of forty portraits of the Saints of Mount Carmel.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Esther before Ahasuerus; after Rubens.
 Christ bearing his Cross; after A. Diepenbeck.
 St. Arnold; after the same.

COLLINS, JAMES. By this artist, who flourished about the year 1715, we have some prints, representing views of buildings, among which is a large plate of a prospect of the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury.

COLLINS, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1682. He engraved some very indifferent copies from the grotesque figures published by the Bonnarts, at Paris, called Scaramouch and his Company of Comedians. We have also some portraits by him; and the Funeral Procession of George, Duke of Albemarle.

COLLINS, WILLIAM, was the son of a picture dealer and cleaner, a native of Ireland, and a man of ready wit, but best remembered by his 'Life of Morland,' the painter. His distinguished son (the subject of the present notice) was born in London in the year 1788; and was twenty-one in the year 1809, when he sent his first works, 'Boys at Breakfast,' and 'Boys with a Bird's Nest,' to the Royal Academy Exhibition. He became thenceforward a constant exhibitor at the Royal Academy: sending, in 1810, 'Cottage Children Blowing Bubbles,' and 'Boys Bathing—a Morning Scene,' in 1811, 'A Country Kitchen,' (now in Mr. Sheepshanks's collection,) and 'The Weary Trumpeter, or Juvenile Mischief,' in 1812, 'Children Playing with Puppies,' in 1813, 'The Disposal of a Favourite Lamb,' in 1814, 'The Blackberry Gatherer,' and 'Bird-Catchers—Morning,' one of the best of his early works, now at Bowood, the seat of the Marquis of Lansdowne. In 1815 he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy; and exhibited in the same year 'The Reluctant Departure,' 'A Harvest Home,' and 'Half-Holiday Muster.' He now enlarged his range of subjects, commencing a series of pictures connected with the habits and haunts of fishermen on the coast; of which the first, 'Shrimp Boys at Cromer,' was exhibited at the Academy in 1816. The following year, he sent 'The Kitten Deceived,' and 'Fishermen coming Ashore before Sunrise,' in 1818, 'Scene on the Coast of Norfolk,' in 1819, 'Morning—Fishermen on the Look-out' (Sir Robert Peel's picture, now at Drayton Manor). In 1820, he was elected a Royal Academician: presenting, when he received his diploma, a picture called 'Young Anglers,' and exhibiting, the same year, 'Capstern at Work drawing up Fishing Nets,' and 'River Scene—Cottage Girl buying Fish.'

For the next sixteen years he was a constant exhibitor at the Royal Academy, sending occasionally five, and never less than three pictures to the Exhibition. A mere catalogue of titles will recall many of the pictures to the recollection of our readers. In 1821 he exhibited, 'Scene in Borrowdale, Cumberland,' 'Dartmouth, Devon,' and 'Morning—on the Coast of Kent.' In 1822, 'Scene near Chichester,' 'Clovely, North Devon,' 'Woodcutters—Buckland on the Moor, Devon,' 'Scene at Bayham Abbey.' In 1823, 'Fish Auction on the South Coast of Devonshire,' 'Scene in Borrowdale,' and 'Walmer Castle,' the seat of the Earl of Liverpool, an early patron of the painter. In 1824, 'Stirling Castle,' 'The Cherry Seller,' (Sir R. Peel's picture, now at Drayton Manor), 'Children of H. Rice, Esq.,' and 'Buckland on the River Dart.' In 1825, 'Buying Fish on the Beach, Hazy Morning,' 'Fishermen getting out their Nets,' (now at Drayton Manor,) and 'Kitley, Devon.' In 1826, 'The Young Shrimp Catchers,' 'Children Picking Hops,' and 'Fishermen leaving Home for the Night.' In 1827, 'A Frost Scene,' (now at Drayton Manor), 'Buying Fish,' and 'Children examining the Contents of a Net.' In 1828, 'Doubtful Weather,' 'Taking out a Thorn,' 'Scene in Freshwater Bay, Isle of Wight,' and 'Scene at Folkstone.' In 1829, 'Scene in a Kentish Hop Garden,' 'Fisher Children,' 'The Morning after a Storm,' 'Summer—Moonlight,' and 'Prawn Fishing.' In 1830, 'Les Causeuses,' 'Muscle Gatherers—Coast of France,' and 'Waiting the Arrival of Fishing Boats—Coast of France.' In 1831, 'The Venturesome Robin,' 'The Morning Bath,' and 'Shrimpers—Evening.' In 1832, 'Rustic Civility,' (children opening a gate, a charming picture,) 'Skittle Players,' and 'Fisher Boys.' In 1833, 'Returning from the Haunts of the Sea Fowl,' 'Scene on the Coast of France,' and 'The Stray Kitten.' In 1834, 'Cottage Hospitality,' and 'The Morning Lesson.' In 1835, 'Children Launching a Boat,' 'The Mariner's Widow,' 'Welsh Peasants crossing the Sands to Market,' and a favourite scene again—'Cromer, on the Coast of Norfolk.' In 1836, 'Sunday,' (engraved by Reynolds, and sold at Dr. Knott's sale for 200 guineas), 'Leaving Home,' and 'Happy as a King,' a boy on the top of a gate, sold at Mr. Knott's sale for 230 guineas.

The years 1837 and 1838 were passed by Mr. Collins on the continent; Wilkie advising him to change his style and try the effect of novelty on the public. Some of his letters written at this period are before us at the present moment. In one to Wilkie, he says, "What a wretched thing it is to find that the more fit one may become for the society of the old masters, the more one suffers in the company of the new;" and in another to the same great artist, written from Rome, 14th January, 1837, he says, "Strange to say, which I suppose proves that I am not a great man, the Raffaelles in the Vatican, and the Frescos of M. Angelo, so far from disappointing me, surpassed not only all I have ever seen, but all I had ever conceived of these truly inspired men."

The Royal Academy Exhibition of 1839 contained the first produce of Collins's continental tour, 'Poor Travellers at the door of a Capuchin Convent, near Vico, Bay of Naples,' 'A Scene near Subiaco—Roman States,' and 'Naples—Young Lazzaroni playing the Game of Arravoglio.' These in some measure prepared the public for still loftier attempts; though the surprise was pretty general when it was found that an old favourite had deserted his sea-shore scenes and shrimp-catchers for subjects of a sacred character. In 1840, Collins exhibited three works—'Our Saviour with the Doctors in the Temple,' (now at Bowood,) 'Ave Maria—scene near Tivoli,' and 'The Passing Welcome—Naples.' These were followed, in 1841, by 'The Two Disciples at Emmanus,' (sold at Mr. Knott's sale for 145 guineas,) 'The Peace-Maker,' (sold at the same sale for 260 guineas,) 'Lazzaroni—Naples,' 'Scene taken from the Cave of Ulysses at Sorrento,' and 'Ischia—Bay of Naples.' In 1842, by 'Welsh Guides—Llanberis, N. Wales,' 'Prayer,' 'Wilkie's last Residence at Kensington,' (now in Mrs. Hunter's possession,) 'Sorrento—Bay of Naples,' 'Villa d'Este, Tivoli,' 'Scene at Aberystwith,' and 'Dominican Monks returning to the Convent—Bay of Naples.' In 1843, by 'The World or the Cloister,' 'A Windy Day—Sussex,' 'A Sultry Day—Naples,' 'The Virgin and Child,' and 'A Girl of Sorrento—Spinning.' In 1844, by 'Morning—Boulogne,' 'Seaford, Sussex,' 'The Catechist,' and 'A Patriarch.' In 1845, by 'Undercliff, Isle of Wight,' 'Cromer Sands, coast of Norfolk,' 'Fetching the Doctor,' (recently engraved,) 'Prawn Fishing—Coast of Sussex,' and 'Antonio.' In 1846, (the last year in which he lived to exhibit,) by 'Hall Sands—Devon,' 'Shrimpers Hastening Home,' 'Early Morning,' and 'Meadfoot Bay, Torquay.' The picture of Meadfoot Bay, one of the last of his works, was commenced at Torquay in the autumn of 1845. To the writer of this imperfect sketch, (who enjoyed the pleasure of Mr. Collins's acquaintance, and who saw him for the last time at Meadfoot Bay,) the painter expressed the renewed delight which he felt in the scenery of his native country, and how much more congenial to his sympathies he felt Meadfoot Bay and Cromer Sands to be than all the fine landscapes which he had seen abroad. [This truly English artist died in February, 1847.]—From the Athenæum.

[COLOMBANO, ANTONIO MARIA, a painter of Correggio, who flourished from 1596 to 1616. Fifteen pictures by him, some of large dimensions, are mentioned by Pungilione in his Life of Antonio Allegri. The subjects are incidents in the life of the Virgin and the infancy of Christ.]

COLOMBEL, NICHOLAS, a French painter, born at Sotteville, near Rouen, in 1646. He was a scholar of Eustache le Sueur, and afterwards visited Italy. Although this artist studied several years at Rome, he does not appear to have at all divested himself of the taste of his country. His style is completely French. He was received into the Academy at Paris in 1694. One of his best works is Orpheus playing on the Lyre, in the King's Menagerie. He died at Paris in 1717.

COLOMBINI, COSIMO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1754. He engraved, among other things, several of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino. [He engraved a great part of the portraits of painters in that work: he marked some thus ℞.]

COLONI, [OR COLONIA,] ADAM, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1634. He painted landscapes with figures and cattle, in which he imitated with success the style of N. Berghem; he also excelled in village feasts, and some of his pictures of fire-pieces are of a good effect. This artist resided a great part of his life in England, and died in London in 1685.

COLONI, [OR COLONIA,] HENRY ADRIAN, was the son of the preceding artist, and the brother-in-law of Vandiest, by whom he was instructed. He sometimes painted the figures in Vandiest's landscapes, and also painted landscapes in imitation of the style of Salvator Rosa. He died in London in 1701.

COLONNA. See ANGELO.

COLTELLINI, MICHELE. This painter was a native of Ferrara, and flourished about 1517, the date found on some of his pictures. From the similitude in their styles, Lanzi conjectures that he was brought up in the school of Lorenzo Costa, though he is superior to that master in the airs of his heads. His principal works are at Ferrara. In the sacristy of the Augustines, is a picture of St. Monica with four saints of the order; in S. Andrea, the Virgin and Infant, surrounded by Saints; and in the church of S. Maria della Rosa, St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.

COLYN, MICHAEL. According to Florent Le Comte, this artist is said to have been a native of Antwerp. He engraved some plates of architectural subjects, among which is a view of the Exchange at Amsterdam.

COLYNS, DAVID. This painter was born at Amsterdam about the year 1650. He painted historical subjects of a small size, into which he introduced an infinite number of figures, which he grouped with great ingenuity. His pictures are touched with spirit and fineness. Houbraken extols, in high terms, two pictures by this master at Amsterdam, one representing Moses striking the Rock, the other the Israelites fed by the Miracle of the Manna.

COMBES, PETER, an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished about the year 1700. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits, among which is a small whole length of Master Charles More, son of the Bishop of Ely; after Kerseboom.

COMIN, JOVAN, [OR JAN.] This artist, who flourished about the year 1630, engraved some of the plates for the collection of antique statues, which are in the Giustiniani Gallery. They are executed with the graver in a stiff, tasteless style.

COMODI, ANDREA, a Florentine painter, born in 1560. He was the scholar and friend of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli. He is rather to be considered as a Roman than a Florentine, as he went to Rome when he was young, in the pontificate of Urban VIII., and resided there the greatest part of his life. His principal works are, Christ bearing his Cross, in the Tribune of S. Vitale; in S. Carlo a Catinari, the principal altar-piece, the Titular Saint kneeling; in S. Giovanni in Fonte, the Baptism of Christ by St. John. He painted a number of Madonnas, which Lanzi says are distinguished by the smallness of the neck, and a certain air of virgin modesty, which is peculiar to him. One of the most admired of these is in the Corsini Palace.

In the early part of his life he was a successful copier of the works of Raffaele. He died at Florence in 1638. [Comodi was an enthusiastic admirer of the works of Correggio, and studied them thoroughly. He copied and re-copied, in a skilful manner, all that he could procure; among which were many of the Virgin Mary, to whom he was most devoted. These were mistaken at the time, even by the learned in art, for the originals. Such being the case two centuries ago, how diffident should we be in pronouncing judgment on the originality of his works in the present day.]

[COMPE, JAN TEN, born at Amsterdam in 1713, was a scholar of Dirk Dalens. He painted landscapes, river scenes, views of cities and villages, and subjects of similar character. He represented different views of the Hague, which he ornamented with figures and animals. His best pictures approach those of Berkheyde and Vander Heyden. His view of the New Market at Amsterdam sold for 2000 Dutch florins at public sale. He died in 1761.]

CONCA, SEBASTIANO CAVALIERE. This painter was born at Gaeta in 1676, and was educated in the school of Francesco Solimene. Under that master he acquired a competent ability in design, and a great facility. In the early part of his life he was much occupied in portrait painting. Desirous of seeing Rome, and ambitious of distinguishing himself in a more elevated branch of the art, he visited the metropolis of Italy, with his brother Giovanni, when he was between thirty and forty years of age, and for five years changed the pencil for the portecrayon, and was occupied in drawing after the antique, and the works of the great masters. The progress he had made under Solimene, improved by his studies at Rome, enabled him to produce some pictures which attracted the notice of Clement XI., who employed him in decorating his church of S. Clemente with several works in fresco, which gave so much satisfaction to his patron, that he conferred on him the order of knighthood, and procured him every great public undertaking, at that time, at Rome. For this flattering success, he was, however, more indebted to the state of decadence into which the art had then sunk at Rome, than any particular or original merit of his own. He possessed a fertile invention, great velocity of pencil, and a colour that enchants more by its brilliancy than its truth. In his attempts to be pleasing he sunk into the pretty, and although he evidently aimed at grandeur, he never could divest himself of the littleness to which nature had confined him. Perhaps he has been too harshly treated by the surly criticism of Mengs, who observes, "that by introducing at Rome the mannered style of Solimene, and a system less excellent than expeditious, he put the finishing stroke to the ruin of painting." The principal works of Conca at Rome are, the Assumption of the Virgin in S. S. Martino e Lucca, and the Giona at S. Giovanni Laterano. In the hospital at Siena, his picture of la Probatia; at Loretto, S. Niccolo; at Ancona, S. Saverio; and at Foligno, S. Agostino. S. Conca died at Naples in 1764. [Zani places his birth in 1680, and his death in 1770: Füssli says he died in 1764, aged 85, which would place his birth in 1679. It was not fair in Mengs to say that Conca put the finishing stroke to the ruin of painting: Conca was born and died before him.]

CONEGLIANO, GIOVANNI BATISTA CIMA, called IL. The family name of this painter is Cima, but he is generally known by that of il Conegliano, a town near Treviso, in the Venetian states, where he was born. He flourished about the year 1495, and, according to Ridolfi, was one of the most successful followers of the style of Giovanni Bellini. Equal to that painter in colour and expression, he perhaps yields something to him in softness and mellowness. One of his best works was formerly in the dome at Parma, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus receiving the Homage of St. John Baptist, and other Saints. A performance of sufficient merit to attract the rapacity of French spoliation, and is now in the museum of the Louvre. In the church of S. Giovanni at Venice, is a fine picture by Cima, of the Baptism of Christ. He had a son, Carlo Cima, who painted in his style. [According to Zani, Cima Conegliano painted from 1489 to 1541. He considers him in some respects superior to Bellini. He mentions a most superb picture by Conegliano, which was in the church of San Niccolò in Carpi, representing Christ taken down from the Cross, and surrounded by the Marys, St. John, Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, and other holy persons: it originally belonged to Alberto Pio, prince of Carpi, who esteemed it as one of his most precious gems, equal to the works of Raphael or Michael Angelo. Rosini has given a print (plate 86) of a picture by Conegliano in the gallery of Parma, the subject of which differs slightly from that in the Louvre: it is very beautiful. He also painted portraits, smaller than life, some of which are in England.]

[CONEY, JOHN, a very eminent architectural designer and engraver, was born at Ratcliffe Highway, London, about the year 1786; he was apprenticed to an architect, but never followed the profession. He commenced making pencil drawings of the interior of Westminster Abbey, and other buildings called Gothic, as early as at the age of fifteen; these he sold to dealers, and other casual customers, at very small prices. In 1815, he published his first work, a series of eight views of the exterior and interior of Warwick Castle, drawn and etched by himself. Shortly afterwards he was employed by Mr. Harding to draw and engrave the fine series of exterior and interior views of the Cathedrals and Abbey Churches of England, to illustrate the new edition of Dugdale's Monasticon, edited by Sir Henry Ellis. These plates occupied a great portion of his time for fourteen years, and are executed with consummate skill. In 1829, he commenced the engravings of "Ancient Cathedrals, Hotels de Ville, and other public buildings in France, Holland, Germany, and Italy;" all of which were designed from the several objects by himself. This work was intended to be comprised in twelve parts, but only eight were published, not meeting with the public encouragement to which it was entitled. Mr. Charles Heathcote Tatham wrote the necessary descriptions. In 1831, Mr. Coney commenced a similar series of the "Architectural Beauties of Continental Europe," for which Mr. H. E. Lloyd wrote the descriptions. This handsome work consists of 28 large plates of remarkable edifices in France, the Low Countries, Germany, and Italy, and 56 vignettes, all drawn and etched by himself. In addition to these laborious undertakings, he executed numerous pencil drawings, and also in colours, by private commissions; and necessity often compelled him to part with many to picture-dealers and print-sellers. A View of the Interior of Milan Cathedral was published after his death for the benefit of his widow; and he was employed by Mr. Cockerill the architect, to engrave a very large View of Rome, and another plate as a companion to it, neither of which has been published. As an accurate architectural designer he has never been surpassed; his drawings, of what is called the Gothic, exhibit all the minutest details without the appearance of labour, yet with a neatness that is truly surprising. The works of this industrious, but too little rewarded artist, are now beginning to be appreciated as they deserve; and he, who in his life-time felt the mortifications of neglect, or of supercilious patronage, will be rewarded with posthumous fame. He died near Camberwell in 1833.]

CONGIO, CAMMILLO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Rome about the year 1604. In 1630, he engraved some plates for the Galleria Justiniana. He also executed some of the engravings for Tasso's Jerusalem, after the designs of Bernardo Castelli. We have by him some prints after different Italian masters, which he generally marked CC. F. His works most worthy of notice are:

The Annunciation.

The Adoration of the Magi.

Hercules combating the Hydra.

A Frontispiece entitled, Diversi ornamenti capriciosi.

The Creation of Angels; after Caravaggio.

Frontispiece to the Ædes Barbarinæ; after Guido Ubaldo Abbati.

An Assembly of Saints; after Gasparo Celio.

CONINCK, KONINCK, [or KONING,] CORNELIUS, a Dutch designer and engraver, born at Haerlem about the year 1624. He has engraved several portraits of celebrated personages of the sixteenth century, executed with the graver in a firm and clear style. Among others by him we have the following:

Lawrence de Coster, the celebrated printer; after J. V. Campen.

Martin Luther; C. Koning, fec. et exc.

Dierk Philius; C. Koning, scul. exc.

Adrianus Tetrodius of Haerlem; P. Grebber, inv.

[The date of his death is not known.]

CONINCK, or KONINCK, SOLOMON, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1609. He was first placed under the care of David Colyns, he next became a scholar of Nicholas Moyaert; but he appears to have formed his style more from studying the small pictures of Rembrandt, than either of those masters. He painted historical subjects of a small size, which are well composed, and admirably coloured, partaking of the richness and glow of Rembrandt, in a clearer tone. His pictures are placed in the choicest collections in Holland, and some few of them have found their way to this country, where they sustain themselves among the most esteemed masters of the Dutch school. We have some charming etchings by S. de Koninck, which, like his paintings, are in the fine style of Rembrandt. The following are his principal plates:

The Bust of an old Man with a Beard; S. Koninck, 1628.

Bust of an old Man in an Oriental Costume, nearly a profile; S. Koninck.

Small Bust of an old Man with a Fur Cap; Sal. Koning, invent.

An old Man sitting in a Chair, seemingly praying, without his name; very fine.

Bust of a venerable old Man, three quarters, with a Beard, without his name; very fine.

A Landscape, with some Cottages, and a Tower in Ruins; S. Koninck, 1663.

[The time of his death is not accurately ascertained; Balkema says 1668, but there is reason to suppose that it occurred some years later. His name was

Salomon Koninck, not Coninck, nor Koningh. The inattention of authors to the right spelling of the names of painters is a source of much confusion. But it must be added that the old painters were themselves very capricious in matters of orthography.]

[CONINGH, or KONING, JACOB, born at Haerlem in 1650, was a scholar of Adrien Van de Velde, and painted landscapes with figures and animals in the manner of his master, and sometimes not much inferior to him. One of his pictures is in the Museum at Brussels.]

CONINGSLOO See COONINXLOO.

[CONJOLA, CHARLES, a landscape painter in water colours, born at Manheim in 1773, and died at Munich in 1831. His views are principally of the mountainous parts of Bavaria and the Tyrol.]

CONRAD, or CONRADUS, ABRAHAM, a Dutch designer and engraver, who flourished about the year 1650. His plates consist chiefly of portraits, part of which are from his own designs. They possess great merit, and some of them are successful imitations of the style of Lucas Vostermans. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Christopher Love.

Jacob Triglande, professor of Theology at Leyden.

Thomas Maurois of Canterbury, ecclesiastic at Amsterdam; D. Boudringhen, pinx.; A. Conradus, fec.

Godefroid Hotton, Pastor of the French Church at Amsterdam; after H. Mermans; very fine.

The Flagellation; after A. Diepenbeck.

The Crucifixion; after the same.

[CONSTABLE, JOHN, an English landscape painter, was the son of a miller, and born in 1776. He was a pupil of Farington, and a student of the Royal Academy. His mode of painting was peculiar; he neither imitated the ancient masters, nor the modern; whether he really copied nature time will discover. The singularity in his pictures makes them striking. His skies are clouded, and his clouds turbulent; they are charged with thunder, lightning, and rain; and when the shower falls, instead of verdant freshness, his trees and meadows are covered with fleeces of snow. These appearances his admirers consider the proofs of strict attention to nature;—that they truly exhibit her gloomy grandeur;—and that the scattered lights are sparkling touches of genius distributed with a masterly hand. All this may be so; it is useless to dispute on a matter of taste: it will be for connoisseurs fifty years hence to decide on the merits of Constable's pictures. His favourite subjects were views of water-mills, landscapes after a shower, boats threading locks, lake scenery, moon-lights, views of Hampstead Heath, with impending thunder-clouds, or downright torrents of rain. Two of his best pieces, a View in Suffolk, and another in Essex, have been engraved in mezzotint by D. Lucas, as decorative prints, and have a striking effect; and many others, on a small scale, to illustrate an account of his life and works by Leslie. Mr. Constable was a Royal Academician; and in private life was much esteemed for the good qualities of his head and heart. He died suddenly, and without pain, on the 30th of March, 1837. Some students, to do honour to his memory, purchased one of his landscapes after his death, and presented it to the National Gallery, where it may be seen.]

CONSTANTINI, or CONSTANTINO, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1619. We have an etching by him, representing a Bacchanalian subject, surrounded with a grape vine, in the form of a border. It is executed in a slight, free style, somewhat resembling that of Guido, though less masterly, and appears to have been the work of a painter.

CONTARINI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Venice in 1549. He was a contemporary of Palma, and an exact follower of the principles of Titian. Contarini was a perfect master of the sotto in su, as is seen in his picture of the Resurrection in S. Francesco di Paola. He appears to have been much engaged in painting easel pictures of mythological subjects, which he had learning enough to treat with propriety. He passed some years at the court of the Emperor Rodolphus II., by whom he was knighted. In the church della Croce at Venice, is a fine picture by Contarini of the Crucifixion; but his principal work was formerly in the Ducal palace at Venice, now among the plunder of the French, in the gallery of the Louvre, representing the Virgin and the infant Jesus seated on a Throne, with St. Mark and St. Sebastian, and the Doge Marino Grimani kneeling. Contarini was a very eminent painter of portraits, in which he followed the chaste and simple style of Titian. He died in 1605.

CONTE, JACOPINO, [or JACOPO,] DEL, a Florentine painter, born in 1510. He was brought up in the school of Andrea del Sarto. Few of his works are to be met with in Florence, as he went to Rome when he was young, and resided there until his death. He was a respectable painter of history; but is still more distinguished for his excellence in portrait painting, of which he executed more, and of more distinguished personages, than any artist of his time. According to Baglioni, he visited Rome during the time of Paul III., and he painted his portrait, and that of every pontiff that succeeded him until Clement VIII., in whose pontificate he died. His principal historical works at Rome are, St. John preaching, and the taking down from the Cross, in S. Giovanni Decollato, the church of the Florentines. In the Madonna del Popolo, the dead Christ, with several figures. At the Cappucini á monte Cavallo, a Pietá, and St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. He died at Rome in 1598.

CONTI, CESARE and VINCENZIO. These brothers were natives of Ancona, but went to Rome during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., by whom they were employed, as well as by his successors, Sixtus V., Clement VIII., and Paul V. Cesare was esteemed for his grotesque ornaments, and Vincenzio painted the figures. Some of their works are in S. Maria Trastevere. In S. Spirito in Sassia, is the history of S. Giacomo del Zuechi; in S. Cecilia de Trastevere, St. Agnes, and the Martyrdom of Santo Urbano.

COGHEN. See KOOGHEN.

[COOKE, HENRY, a portrait painter and copyist, who flourished in 1640, as appears by several portraits painted by him in that year for the worshipful Company of Ironmongers, and now in their Hall. They are probably copies of older pictures, as the personages they represent were dead long before the time these were executed; with the exception of Sir James Campbell, who sat to the artist. The following extracts from the Records of the Ironmongers' Company will show the period of Henry Cooke's practice:—

“April 29, 1640. Henry Cooke, painter, having made two pictures, the one of Mr. Thomas Michell, and the other of Mr. Thomas Lewin, who were good benefactors to the Company, demanded for the same £5 a piece, but the Courte doe not hold them to be so much worth, yet they will further enquire what other Companies payes for the like worke.”

“July 9, 1640. The Wardens are appointed to pay unto Henry Cooke, for five pictures more of benefactors, at 3*l.* 5*s.* a piece, is 16*l.* 5*s.*, and the Court agreed with him to make two pictures more of the King and Queenes Majesties of the same size as the others are, for which they will also pay him 3*l.* 5*s.* a piece.”

The portraits of the king and queen's Majesties (Charles I. and Henrietta Maria, which the worshipful Court rated at the same price as those of their benefactors) no longer grace their Hall. As they were no doubt copied from pictures by Van Dyck, and Cooke was a clever hand at that work, they are probably rejoicing under the more famous name, and gracing more aristocratic walls. In a very pretty Catalogue of the above-mentioned pictures, compiled by an ingenious gentleman of the Company, Henry Cooke is said to have been a pupil of Salvator Rosa: this is a mistake; the Henry Cooke who was a pupil of Salvator Rosa, was born in 1642, and may have been a son of the portrait painter.]

COOKE, HENRY, an English painter, born in 1642. He went to Italy and studied under Salvator Rosa. He returned to England, and was employed in the reign of King William to copy the Cartoons of Raffaele, which Graham says he did “in turpentine, a manner of his own.” He painted the choir in New College, Oxford. He died in 1700. [It is said that he committed a murder and fled from England; that after a time he returned and was employed by King William to repair the Cartoons, and that he likewise finished the portrait of Charles II., at Chelsea College; and that he tried portrait, but gave it up.]

COOL, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. His name is affixed to a middling-sized upright plate, representing Christ bearing his Cross, with St. Veronica, and other figures, after Martin de Vos. It is executed entirely with the graver, in a coarse, stiff style.

COONINXLOO, GILES, a Flemish painter of landscapes, born at Antwerp in 1544. He was first instructed by Leonard Kroes, but afterwards became a scholar of Giles Mostaert. He travelled through France to Italy, and on his return to Flanders, was much employed in painting landscapes, in which the figures were frequently added by Martin Van Cleef. Cooninxloo was esteemed one of the ablest artists, in the branch that he followed, of the time in which he lived. His touch is spirited and light, and his colour clear and agreeable. [He died at Antwerp in 1609.]

COOPER, SAMUEL. This eminent miniature painter was born in London in 1609, and, with his brother Alexander Cooper, was instructed in the art by his uncle Hoskins, whom he soon surpassed. He was the first artist of his country that gave a strength and freedom to miniature, which approached to the vigour of oil painting. The purity of his tints, the beauty of his carnations, and his loose and flowing manner of painting the hair, render the heads of his portraits models worthy of imitation; but to the head his merit is almost entirely confined. When he ventured to express more of the figure, his drawing is defective, and his execution undetermined. According to Lord Orford, Cooper visited the court of France, where he painted several pictures, for which his widow received a pension during her life. The works of Cooper were deservedly admired during his life, and they are still placed with distinction in the cabinets of the curious. He died in London in 1672. [Cooper painted some of the most illustrious men of his time; particularly Oliver Cromwell and John Milton. The portrait of the latter was recently discovered, and is now in possession of the Duke of Buccleuch. His Grace owes it to the country to have it engraved; the more especially as that formerly in Sir Joshua Reynolds' possession, and engraved by Caroline Watson with his sanction, is not the portrait of the divine poet, but one of his great contemporaries. It was for the court of England Cooper painted the pictures for which his widow was promised a pension, which was not paid. This widow was sister to the mother of Alexander Pope. Cooper was buried in Old St. Pancras church.]

COOPER, ALEXANDER, was the brother of Samuel Cooper, and was a scholar of his uncle Hoskins. Although greatly inferior to his brother, he painted portraits, both in oil and in miniature, with some reputation. He also succeeded in painting landscapes in water colours. Not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he went to Flanders, where he passed some time, and afterwards visited Sweden, where he was made painter to the Queen Christina.

COOPER, RICHARD, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1762. His plates are chiefly portraits, of which the following are the principal:

The Children of Charles I., with a Dog; after Vandyck.
Henrietta Maria, his Queen.

William III.

Mary, his Queen.

Frederick, Prince of Wales, and his sisters.

Francis Bacon, Lord Keeper and Chancellor.

Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford.

George Jefferies, Justice of King's Bench and Chancellor.

Sir John Napier, inventor of Logarithms.

Allan Ramsay, Scotch poet.

Andrew Allen, painter.

[He also engraved Annibale Caracci's picture of the dead Christ and Marys. It is conjectured that he was a native of Edinburgh, and born about 1730.]

[COOPSE, PETER, a Dutch painter of marine subjects, in the manner of Backhuizen and Van de Velde. His pictures are generally of a small size, well composed, full of subject, and vigorously painted. There is a picture by him in the Gallery at Munich, which is attributed to Backhuizen in the Catalogue, though the name may be discovered on it: in England the dealers are more cautious; they remove it. It is but recently that his own countrymen have discovered his merit as a painter in oil, or they would have given some account of him. Ploos Van Amstel has given fac similes of some of his drawings in his collection.]

COORNHAERT. See CUENHAERT.

[COOSEMANS, ALEXIS, a painter of fruit and inanimate subjects, flourished in the Netherlands about 1630.]

[COPELEY, JOHN SINGLETON, born at Boston in America, in 1737, was first known in England as a painter, by exhibiting a Boy and Squirrel at the Academy, in the year 1760; and also by several portraits, which spread his reputation both in England and America. He, however, determined on visiting the glories of Rome, and after some stay there, he came to England, and by the influence of West was introduced to the Royal Academy. He painted several very interesting pictures relating to events in English History; among which are the Assassination of the Duke of Buckingham; Charles signing Strafford's Death Warrant; the Five Impeached Members brought back in Triumph to Westminster; the Speaker thanking the Sheriffs for protecting the Impeached Members; the House of Commons visiting the Army at Hounslow; the Siege of Gibraltar, and many others. But his best, perhaps, are the Death of Major Pierson, and the Death of Chatham; the latter in the National Gallery. He was a great painter among the English artists of his day, and is not to be judged by the present standard; being, in a manner, self-taught, he achieved much more than many who had received academical instruction. He lived, from the time he settled in England, at a house in George Street, Hanover Square, where he died in 1815. It may add lustre to his name to record that he was the father of that profound lawyer, and eminent statesman, Lord Lyndhurst.]

COPPA, CAVALIERE ANTONIO. See GIAROLA.

COPPA, STEFANO. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished at Rome about the year 1776. In conjunction with Giuseppe Perini, he executed the plates from the antique statues in the Clementine Gallery. He also engraved a print of the Ascension, after Gio. Lanfranco.

COPPENS, AUGUSTINE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He engraved some plates representing views of ruins, and architecture, which are executed in a neat, finished style.

COQUES, GONZALES. This eminent painter was born at Antwerp in 1618. He received his elementary instruction from David Ryckaert the elder, but he owed the distinguished name he afterwards acquired, to the excellent disposition with which nature had favoured him. His first subjects were conversations and gallant assemblies; but the extraordinary reputation Vandyck had acquired by his admirable portraits, inspired him with the ambition of distinguishing himself in a similar walk in the art, though on a different scale. He attempted to paint portraits of a small size, and to give them the correctness and simple character of nature, which we admire in the portraits of Vandyck. His success was equal to his merit. His single heads, and his groups of family portraits, were esteemed superior to every artist of his time, Vandyck alone excepted, and his engagements became so numerous, that few individuals could procure his pictures. He was employed by the principal potentates of his day. Charles I., the Archduke Leopold, and the Prince of Orange, were desirous of possessing his works. To those who have not seen the pictures of this extraordinary artist, it will be difficult to give an idea of the beauty of his style. Although his heads rarely exceed the size of an inch and a half, they have all the breadth, freedom of touch, and animated character of the portraits of Vandyck. The heads and hands are designed with the utmost correctness; his colouring has the freshness, and his draperies the ease, that we admire in the works of that master. In regarding them, we lose sight of the scale on which they are drawn, and they assume the size of life. He was peculiarly happy in the composition and arrangement of his family portraits, and the accessories with which he accompanied them, in which he displayed great taste and elegance. This excellent artist died in 1684. [The compositions of this master are few in number, and are extremely valuable: there are but 46 described in Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. 4. and Suppl., though, no doubt, there are many more, which time will bring to light. It is supposed that as he was wealthy, he painted more for pleasure than profit; but of this there is no proof. He painted landscapes skillfully, and dogs and other animals beautifully.]

CORBUTT, CHARLES, an English mezzotint engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. We have several portraits, and a few other subjects, scraped by him, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

PORTRAITS.

Major General James Wolfe.

Francis Arouet de Voltaire.

John James Rousseau.

William Romaine; after F. Cotes.

Lady Charlotte Johnstone; after Reynolds.

Garrick, between Tragedy and Comedy; after the same.

Anne Bastard, of Kitley, in Devonshire.

A Flemish Conversation; after Brower.

The old Rabbi; after Rembrandt.

CORDIER, V. This artist was a native of Abbeville, and flourished about the year 1760. His name is affixed to a plate representing a fountain, from a design of G. M. Dumont.

CORDUBA, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, by whom we have a set of plates of the principal fountains which are in the gardens at Rome, into which he has introduced several small figures, in the style of Callot. They are etched with considerable spirit. He had received some mark of distinction, as he signs his plates, Eques, Franc. Corduba del. et scul.

COREGGIO. See ALLEGRI.

COREGGIO, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1652. He was a scholar of Francesco Gessi, and painted history with some reputation. His works are chiefly confined to the churches at Bologna. In S. Procolo is a Madonna in the Desert; in the Nunziata, the Madonna de Loretto; and in S. Maria de Servi, the Virgin and Infant, with St. Luke and other saints.

CORENZIO, BELISARIO, was a native of Greece, born, according to Dominici, in the province called Accaja, in 1558. He was instructed in the rudiments of the art by an unknown painter, who was so loud in his praise of the Venetian artists, that Belisario burned with impatience to visit Venice, that he might be advantaged by the contemplation of those extraordinary productions, of which the description had so much excited his curiosity. He accordingly went to Venice in 1580, when he was twenty-two years of age, and became a disciple of Tintoretto. He could not, perhaps, have made a more judicious selection in the choice of his master, as they appear to have been perfectly congenial in their technical conception of the excellence of the art, and to have endeavoured to arrive at it by similar exertions. Endowed with extraordinary powers of invention, and gifted by nature with an almost unexampled facility, he is said by Lanzi to have been equal to the exertions of four painters in point of despatch. This incredible readiness he has displayed in the immense picture of the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, in the refectory of the Benedictines, which he finished in forty days. He was occasionally led away by the fire of an unusually ardent imagination, but when he could govern and moderate this enthusiasm, he is not very inferior to the greatest masters of the Venetian school. After passing five years at Venice, he visited Naples, where he painted many admirable works for the churches and public edifices, of which a particular account is given by Dominici. He painted a few pictures in oil, but his powers seem to have been better adapted to the great machinal subjects that require to be executed in fresco, in which he is bold, varied, and occasionally beautiful and correct. His principal works at Naples are the ceiling of the capella de Catalani, in S. Giacomo, where he has represented, in nine compartments, the life of the Virgin, full of grace and beauty; in the angles he has painted four Sibyls. In the church della Trinità degli Spagnuoli, the Virgin crowned by the Trinity, with two laterals, of the Visitation, and the Presentation in the Temple. He died in 1643.

CORIOLANO, CRISTOFANO, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg about the year 1540. M. Heineken states, that the family name of this artist was Lederer, which he exchanged in Italy for that of Coriolano. He engraved on wood, and was a very able artist. In the Life of Marc Antonio, Vasari assures us that Maestro Cristofano Coriolano, after executing at Venice an infinite number of fine things, engraved in wood the portraits of the painters, sculptors, and architects, after his, Vasari's, designs, for his Lives of the Painters, first published in 1568. They are very masterly performances. He also engraved the greater part of the figures in the Natural History of Ulysses Adrovandus, as well as the frontispiece and cuts, after the designs of Titian, for the Cours d' Anatomie, of Andrea Vesalio. He died at Bologna in the commencement of the seventeenth century. [Titian means Cesare Vecellio; and Zani doubts whether Cristoforo Coriolano does not also mean Cristoforo Chriegher, who was the intimate friend of Vecellio: it is merely a dispute about names.]

CORIOLANO, BARTOLOMEO, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Bologna about the year 1585. He was first instructed by his father, but afterwards entered the academy of the Caracci, where he became an able designer and engraver on wood. He usually confined himself to two blocks for his cuts; on one he cut the outline and the dark shadows, like the hatchings of a pen; and on the other block the demi-tint; these he managed with great judgment, and his prints have a fine effect. His drawing is masterly and spirited, and his heads of a fine expression, characteristic of the great school in which he was educated. He dedicated a set of his prints after Caracci, Guido, &c., to Urban VIII., who recompensed him with the order of knighthood of Loretto, and a pension. There are a few of his cuts executed in chiaro-scuro, in which he used three blocks. Among others we have by him the following prints:

St. Jerome in meditation before a Crucifix; after Guido.

Herodias, with the Head of St. John; after the same.

The Virgin, with the Infant sleeping; after the same.

The same subject in chiaro-scuro; very fine.

The Virgin and Infant sleeping; after F. Vanni.

Peace and Abundance; G. R.; B. C. sc. Roma.

A Sibyl.

Jupiter fulminating the Giants; Victoriam Jovis; after Guido; a capital print, in four sheets. 1647.

The Seven Ages, transported to Bologna, a Thesis.

He had a daughter, Theresa Maria Coriolano, who etched a small plate of the Virgin, half-length, with the infant Jesus. [Zani places his birth in 1599, and his death in 1676: he says he was the second son of Cristoforo.]

CORIOLANO, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Bologna about the year 1590. He studied painting under Gio. Lodovico Valesio, but did not distinguish himself much as a painter, although he was employed for some of the churches at Bologna. In S. Anna, are two pictures of S. Niccolo, and S. Bruno; and in the Nunziata, an Altar-piece of St. John, St. James, and St. Bernard. As an engraver, he is entitled to more consideration. He worked both on wood and copper; but his wooden cuts are greatly preferable to his engravings. Among his best works are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Vincenzo Gualdi.
Fortunatus Licetus.
The same Portrait in wood.
Joannes Cottunius.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Image of the Virgin; J. B. Coriolanus, sc.
The miraculous Image of the Virgin; painted by S. Luke, held by three angels; after Guido.
Christ crowned with Thorns; etched in imitation of a wooden cut; after L. Caracci; fine.
Cupid sleeping; in chiaro-scuro; after Guido.
Triumphal Arch in honour of Louis XIII.; Il Coriolano, fec.
Twenty-seven plates of emblematical Subjects; after Paoli Macchi; the whole set, Paoli Macchi Emblemata, consists of eighty-three plates; the rest are by O. Gatti and A. Parasini.

He also engraved a number of theses and frontispieces. [According to Zani he was the eldest son of Cristoforo, born in 1589, and died in 1649.]

CORNARA, CARLO. This painter was born at Milan in 1605, and was a scholar of Camillo Procaccini. He did not produce many works, but they were designed with an excellent taste, particularly his easel pictures, which were highly esteemed. One of the best of his public works is his picture of S. Benedetto at the Certosa at Pavia. He died in 1673.

CORNEILLE, MICHEL, THE ELDER, a French painter, born at Orleans in 1603. He was a scholar of Simon Vouet, in whose style he painted several works for the churches, and was one of the twelve original members of the Royal Academy at Paris. Corneille, the elder, etched several subjects after Raffaello, the Caracci, and others; among which are the following:

The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth; after Raffaello.
The Murder of the Innocents; after the same.
Christ appearing to Magdalene; after the same.
The Virgin suckling the infant Jesus; after L. Caracci.

[He died, it is supposed, at Paris, in 1664.]

CORNEILLE, MICHEL, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the foregoing painter, born at Paris in 1642, and was instructed by his father. Having obtained the prize when a student at the Academy, he was consequently sent to Italy for improvement under the pension of the king. His studies at Rome were prosecuted with great assiduity, where he adopted the works of Annibale Caracci, as the model of his imitation. Soon after his return from Italy he was received into the Academy, when he painted for his reception the model of the picture he afterwards executed for the church of Notre Dame, of the Vocation of St. Peter and St. Paul to the apostleship. He was employed by Louis XIV. at Versailles, Trianon, and Fontainebleau; and painted in one of the chapels of the Invalids, the Life of St. Gregory, in six pictures. This artist etched a great number of plates, which are deservedly the admiration of the collectors. They are executed in a daring and masterly style; his compositions are grand and ingenious, and his drawing extremely correct, in the great manner of the Caracci. The following are his principal works:

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Deity appearing to Abraham.
Abraham journeying with Lot.

Abraham discomfiting the Army of the confederate Kings.
Abraham setting out with his son Isaac for the Sacrifice.

These four plates having come into the possession of a printseller at Rome, named Rossi, he put the name of Raffaello on them; they are now scarce.

Samson and Dalila.
The Conception of the Virgin.
The Annunciation; in two plates.
The Nativity.
The infant Jesus in the Manger.
The Flight into Egypt.
The Vocation of St. Peter and St. Paul to the Apostleship.
St. Francis kneeling before the Cross; fine.
Christ and the Virgin appearing to St. Francis.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Marriage of St. Catharine; after L. Caracci.
The Virgin and infant Jesus in a Landscape; after Agostino Caracci.
Jacob wrestling with the Angel, in a Landscape; after An. Caracci.
St. John preaching in the Desert; after the same.
St. Jerome in a Landscape; after the same.
St. Francis receiving the Stigmata; after the same.
Silenus, a Satyr, and a Faun, in a Landscape; after the same.
Abraham sending away Agar; after the same.

[He died in 1708.]

CORNEILLE, JOHN BAPTIST, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1646. He was also instructed by his father, who sent him to Italy. After passing some years at Rome he returned to Paris, and was received into the Academy in 1676. Inferior to his brother in the correctness of his design, he was still a reputable painter, and gave proof of his talent in several public works at Paris. In the church of Notre Dame, he painted St. Peter delivered from prison. At the Carmelites, Christ appearing to St. Theresa. He also engraved several plates from his own designs, and some after the Caracci. They are etched with great spirit, and some of them finished with the graver. The following are his best plates:

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Bust of Michael Angelo.
Susanna and the Elders.
St. Augustine in the midst of his Disciples.
St. Bernard.
Christ appearing to St. Theresa and St. John.
The Bust of Monsieur, crowned by Victory.
Apollo and Cupid; a medallion.
Apollo and Daphne; the same.
Mercury in the Air.
Diana and Calisto.

SUBJECTS AFTER CARACCI.

St. John in the Wilderness; after An. Caracci.
Christ with the Samaritan Woman; after the same.
Two Landscapes, with St. Francis.

[He died in 1695. Nagler, by a misprint, says he was born in 1664.]

CORNELISZ, or CORNELUS, LUCAS, called THE COOK, an old Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1493. He was the son of Cornelius Engelbrechtsen, and, according to Van Mander, was instructed by his father. The little encouragement the art experienced at that time in his native country, obliged him, for the support of a numerous family, to exercise the occupation of a cook, and eventually induced him to visit England in the reign of Henry VIII., by whom he was employed, and was made painter to the king. Van Mander mentions some of the works of this master at Leyden; among others, the Adulteress before Christ. Of his works in England, his sixteen pictures of the Constables of Queenborough Castle, at Penshurst, are the most considerable; and though few of them could be original paintings, they possessed great merit. [It is said that he died in 1552. There has been much useless discussion respecting him.]

CORNELISZ, JAMES. This painter was born at the small town of Oost-Sanen, in Holland, about the year 1470. Some of his historical pictures are described by Van Mander, who speaks of them in very favourable terms, particularly a picture of the Circumcision, in the great church at Haerlem, painted in 1517, and a Descent from the Cross, at Alkmaer, the back-ground of which was painted by John Schoorel, who was his scholar. He died at Amsterdam, at an advanced age.

CORNELISZ, LAMBERT, a Dutch engraver, who was chiefly employed for the booksellers in engraving portraits. Among others, we have by him the portrait of Tycho Brahe, the Astronomer. [See the note to Van Assen.]

CORNISH, ———. This name is affixed to a slight etching, representing the portrait of Dr. Charles Rose, a Scotch clergyman. It was probably the production of an amateur engraver, who was a member of the University of Oxford, as it is inscribed Cornish, Oxon.

CORONA, LEONARDO, was the son of a miniature painter, born at Murano in 1561, and, according to Ridolfi, was first instructed by Rocco da S. Silvestro, a painter of little note, who occupied him in copying; but he afterwards improved himself by studying the works of Titian and Tintoretto. His acquaintance with Alessandro Vittoria, an eminent sculptor, was also of the greatest use to him, who, Lanzi says, gave him chalk models for the better management of the chiaro-scuro, and assisted him in his esteemed picture of the Annunciation in S. S. Giovanni e Paolo; and his more admired work of the Assumption in S. Stefano, painted with a greatness of style that approaches to Titian. In S. Fantino, is his picture so much applauded by Ridolfi, of the Crucifixion, in which he treads so closely on the heels of Tintoretto, as to be little short of the excellence of that master. He died in 1605. [It is said that he copied the works of Titian so exactly, that connoisseurs mistook them for the originals.]

CORONELLI, P. This artist was a native of Venice, and flourished about the year 1716. He engraved the plates for a work entitled Roma Antica Moderna del P. Coronelli cosmografo pubblico, ad uso de suoi Argonauti in Venezia, 1716. They consist of views of buildings, &c., and are etched in a slight, indifferent style.

CORRADI. See GHIRLANDAIO.

CORREA, DIEGO, a Spanish painter, of no great repute, who flourished, according to the date on some of his pictures, in 1550. In the convent of the Bernardines at Val-de-Iglesias, are some of the works of this master, representing the Passion; and at Placenzia, in the convent of S. Vicencio, are two pictures of subjects from the life of the Virgin.

CORSO, NICCOLO. This painter was a native of Genoa, and flourished about the year 1503, the date inscribed on some of his works. His pictures are chiefly in the cloister and refectory of the monastery of the P. P. Olivetani, at Quarto, near Genoa, of which the most esteemed is a subject from the life of S. Benedetto. Soprani extols this painter for the fecundity of his ideas, the fine expression in his heads, and above all, for the vivacity and firmness of his colouring, which if it could be divested of a little hardness, this artist would rank among the ablest of the Genoese painters of his time.

CORSO, GIOVANNI VINCENZO, was born at Naples about the year 1490, and was first under the tuition of Giovanni Antonio Amato, but afterwards studied at Rome, under Pierino del Vaga. Most of the works of this artist in the churches at Naples have been damaged and retouched. The best preserved are his admired picture of Christ bearing his Cross, with many figures, in the church of S. Domenico Maggiore, and the Adoration of the Magi in S. Lorenzo. [He was ten years older than Picirino del Vaga; he may have worked with him, but not as his scholar. There are some errors in the dates respecting this artist.]

CORT, CORNELIUS. This excellent engraver was born at Hoorn in Holland, in 1536. It is probable that he was first instructed by Jerome Cock, for whom, in the early part of his life, he executed several plates, which were published with the name of his master. After having engraved a considerable number of subjects from the Dutch and Flemish painters, he went to Italy, and first settled at Venice, where he resided in the house of Titian, and engraved some of the finest works of that great painter. He afterwards visited Rome, where he established a school, and executed many of those estimable works which are the delight of the judicious collector. The art of engraving had hitherto been nearly confined to small plates; and it was Cornelius de Cort that opened the way to a more important walk of the art. It was under this able artist that Agostino Caracci acquired his admirable use of the graver. The plates of C. Cort are entirely executed with that instrument, in a bold, open, and masterly style. His drawing is correct and tasteful; and his backgrounds, particularly his landscapes, are managed with great skill and finesse. M. Heineken has given a complete catalogue of the works of this esteemed artist, of which the merit will justify our giving the following ample list of the most interesting.

Cornelius Cort died at Rome in 1578.

[CORT, HENRI DE, born at Antwerp in 1742, studied landscape under Antonissen, and figures under G. Herreyns: in his landscapes, however, previous to his settling in England, the figures and animals were painted by Ommeganck and P. Van Regemorter. His landscapes are much in the Italian taste, with views of cities and ancient ruins, pleasingly coloured and neatly finished. He resided many years at London, where he died in 1810.]

CORTE, VALERIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1530. Under the guidance of Titian he became an eminent painter of portraits, and with that ability he settled at Genoa, where he met with great encouragement, but ruined himself by the folly of alchymy. He died in 1580.

CORTE, CESARE, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Genoa in 1554, and was instructed by his father. According to Baldinucci, he was one of the most reputed portrait painters of his time, and also painted history with considerable success. He visited France, where he was much employed, and is said, by Baldinucci, to have been in England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, although he is not mentioned in Lord Orford's Anecdotes, where he painted the Queen, and several of the nobility. His best historical works are at Genoa. In the church of S. Pietro, the titular Saint at the feet of the Virgin, coloured with great chasteness and delicacy. In S. Francesco, the Altar-piece of the Chapel of the Prince Massa, representing Mary Magdalene; and in the church of S. Maria del Carmine, are two pictures by him of St. Simeon and St. Francis. [The best authorities place his birth in 1550, and his death in 1613.]

CORTE, JUAN DE LA. According to Palomino, this painter was born at Madrid in 1587. He excelled in landscapes, battle-pieces, and perspective views. He also painted small pictures of subjects from sacred history. He was painter to Philip III., and was continued in that situation by his successor Philip IV. There are several of his pictures in the Bueno Retiro and el Saloncete. He died in 1660. [Bermudez says he was born in 1597, and that he finished his studies in the school of Velasquez. His pictures were much coveted in Spain.]

[CORTE, GABRIEL DE LA, the son of Juan de la Corte, was born in 1648. Without the aid of a master he practised flower-painting by copying the works of Mario and Arellano. He arrived at such a degree of excellence that Antonio de Castrejore and Mathias de Torres employed him to paint garlands of flowers to surround their mythological subjects. He died at Madrid in 1694.]

CORTESE, JACOPO, called IL BORGOGNONE. This celebrated artist was born at St. Hippolyte, in Franche Conté, in 1621. He was the son of an obscure painter, who taught him the rudiments of design. At the age of fifteen he went to Milan, where he formed an intimacy with a French officer, who prevailed on him to enter the army, which he followed for some time; designing on every occasion the marches, the attacks, and skirmishes of which he was a witness. After three years' service he quitted the military profession and returned to painting. At Bologna he became acquainted with Guido and Albano, and his intimacy with those distinguished artists was of great advantage to his progress. He at length visited Rome, where his first attempts were some historical works, amongst which were Magdalene at the feet of Christ, in the church of S. Marta; and in il Gesu, the Murder of the Innocents and the Adoration of the Magi. The natural bent of his genius discovered itself on his seeing the admirable Battle of Constantine by Giulio Romano, in the Vatican; and from that time he devoted himself to a branch of the art which he has carried to a perfection unknown before or after him. Michael Angelo della Battaglia, having seen some of his works, with a liberality not always found in a rival, was one of the most zealous publishers of his fame. Whilst he was in full possession of popular esteem, a circumstance occurred which occasioned his retirement from the world. His wife, with whom he had not lived on the best terms, died suddenly; and malevolence suspected and accused him of having poisoned her. This cruel accusation determined him to abandon society, and he took refuge with the Jesuits, of which body he soon afterwards became a member. But neither the gloom of a monastery, nor the affliction of his mind, could subdue his ardour or impoverish his talent. The battle-pieces of Borgognone are composed with a fire and painted with a vigour peculiar to himself. His touch is admirable and of extraordinary facility, his figures and horses are drawn with all the spirit requisite in the attacks of the fiercest combatants fighting for honour and for life; and (as Lanzi expresses it) "in beholding his pictures we seem to hear the shouts of war, the neighing of the horses, and the cries of the wounded." It is to be lamented that many of his works have blackened since they were painted. Four of the finest of his pictures are in the Palazzo Pitti, at Florence. We have some etchings of battles by Cortese, executed with uncommon spirit, and with a masterly effect of light and shadow; among which are the following:

A set of Eight Battles; Giac. Cortese, fec.
A set of Four Battles; J. C.

He died at Rome in 1676.

CORTESE, GUGLIELMO, also called IL BORGOGNONE, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at St. Hippolyte in 1628. He went to Rome whilst he was young, and became a scholar of Pietro da Cortona. He did not however follow the style of that master, but appears to have preferred the more regulated sobriety of C. Maratti, in his compositions and the expression of his heads. He sometimes seems to have wished to resemble Guercino in the strength of his relief, and his azure back-grounds. His works most deserving of notice, are a Madonna, and several Saints, in the Trinità di Pellegrini; the Battle of Joshua, in the palace of the Quirinal, in which he was assisted by his brother; and the Crucifixion of St. Andrew, in S. Andrea a monte Cavallo. He died at Rome in 1697. [According to the foregoing dates he would have been 69 years old when he died; but he died in 1679, and so was only 51.]

CORTONA, PIETRO BERRETINI, DA. This distinguished painter was a Florentine, born at Cortona in 1596, on which account he is generally called Pietro da Cortona. He is usually considered of the Roman school, as he went to that capital at the age of fourteen, (as Lanzi says,) "with little more than a well-disposed inclination for the art." He was instructed at Rome by Baccio Ciampi, but was more advantaged by his studies of the works of Raffaello, and Polidoro da Caravaggio. The first productions of Cortona that excited attention, were two pictures, painted, whilst he was yet very young, for the Cardinal Sacchetti, representing the Rape of the Sabines, and one of the Battles of Alexander. These extraordinary performances for so young an artist attracted the notice of Pope Urban VIII., who commissioned him to paint a chapel in the church of S. Bibiena, where Ciampelli, an artist of reputation, was at that time employed, and who regarded with contempt the audacity of so young a man venturing on so important a public undertaking; but he had no sooner commenced the work than Ciampelli was convinced of his ability. The success of that performance procured him his celebrated work of the ceiling of the grand saloon, in the Palazzo Barberini; which is considered one of the greatest productions that have been executed by the most distinguished machinists. The richness of the composition, the perfect intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, the harmony of the colour, and the splendour of the style, render it one of the most perfect specimens of the ornamental. Of this great work it has been observed, that the drawing is not the most correct, and that his draperies have not the appearance of nature; but the acknowledged beauties of the work are so agreeable and seductive, that it is impossible to contemplate it without admiration. P. da Cortona travelled through Lombardy, visited Venice, and returning by way of Florence to Rome, he was engaged by the Grand Duke Ferdinand II. to paint the saloon and four apartments in the Palazzo Pitti; where he represented the Clemency of Alexander to the Family of Darius; the Continece of Cyrus; the Firmness of Porsenna; the History of Massinissa; and other subjects. He did not entirely finish the works he had projected for the Grand Duke. Disgusted by the intrigues of some artists, jealous of his reputation, he left Florence abruptly, and could never be prevailed on to return. They were finished by Ciro Ferri. On his arrival at Rome he continued to be loaded with commissions, and employed by Alexander VII., who conferred on him the order of the Golden Spur. The works of Berretini exhibit a most fertile invention and an uncommon facility of operation. His figures are not designed with scrupulous correctness, nor are the heads of his females strictly beautiful; but they have always a grace and loveliness that charm in spite of those deficiencies. If his colouring is not always chaste, it is constantly agreeable, and possesses much of what the Italians call Vaghezza. His powers were particularly adapted to the great works that require to be executed in fresco, to which he gave a brilliancy and force nearly approaching to oil painting. It may be said, that, like other great machinists, he sometimes crowded his compositions with figures unessential to his subject; and that he was more intent on seducing the eye by splendid confusion, than satisfying the judgment by costumed and characteristic propriety. It is however generally admitted, that his style is broad and facile, that his compositions are copious and ingenious, and that if he does not always address himself to the mind, he fascinates the eye by a grand and imposing spectacle. The principal works of Cortona at Rome are, the saloon in the Barberini palace, and a gallery in the Pamphili; the cupola and the vault in the tribune in the Chiesa Nuova; the Conversion of St. Paul, at the Cappuccini, one of his distinguished works. In the church of the Conception, a fine picture of St. Paul healed by Ananias. At Florence are his celebrated fresco works in the Palazzo Pitti. He died at Rome in 1669.

CORVINUS, JOHN AUGUSTUS, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1724. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and principally engraved views and buildings, in a neat but stiff style. By him there is a set of ornaments for ceilings, after designs by Carlo Maria Pozzi; most of the plates for a work entitled Representatio Belli ob successionem in Regno Hispanico, published at Augsburg, are by this artist; and several of churches, &c., at Vienna, for another book published at Augsburg, by John Andrew Peefel, 1724. [Zani says he was born in 1682, and died in 1738.]

COSCI. See BALDUCCI.

COSIERS, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1603. He was a scholar of Cornelius de Vos, and proved a very reputable painter of history. There are many of his works in the churches in Flanders; they are judiciously composed, and his attitudes are well chosen and natural. His drawing is tolerably correct, and his colouring vigorous, though a little too brown. In the back-grounds of his pictures he frequently introduced architecture, which he treated in a masterly manner. The following are among his best works. At Brussels, in the church formerly of the Jesuits, the Nativity; and at the Beguinage, the Martyrdom of St. Ursula. At Mecklin, a grand composition of the Crucifixion; and the Presentation in the Temple. He was director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1639, [and died in 1652. His proper name is Jean Cossiers.]

COSIMO, PIETRO. See ROSSELLI.

COSSALE, or rather COZZALE, GRAZIO. This painter was a native of Brescia, and flourished about the year 1605. It is said by Cozzando, in his Ristretto della Storia Bresciana, to have possessed an uncommon readiness of invention, and in his larger works appeared to have imitated the prompt style of Palma, without having sunk into his manner. His principal works are, the Adoration of the Magi, in the church delle Grazie, at Brescia; and the Presentation in the Temple, in Le Miracoli. This artist was unfortunately killed by his son.

[COSSIAU, JOHANN JOST D., a landscape painter, born at Breda, but in what year is uncertain, as three writers of credit give three different dates, 1654, 1664, and 1666. Füssli says he died in 1732, in his 78th year; and Nagler, that he died in 1734. His manner of treating his landscapes is Italian, and he endeavoured to imitate the style of Gaspar Poussin. His pictures are well composed, and are enriched with buildings and cattle. Some of them are in the Gallery at Dusseldorf, and in various collections in Germany. Zani calls him Dottor Giuda.]

COSSIN, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Troyes about the year 1633. We have by him some portraits, and a few subjects after various masters, executed with the graver in a style that has not much to recommend it. The following are by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XV., King of France, as large as life.

Valentine Conrat, of the French Academy.

Francis Chaveau, engraver.

Charles John, Count of Koenigsmark; after Dahl.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin Mary; after Le Brun.

St. John Evangelist suspended over a Cauldron of boiling Oil; after the same.

The Stoning of St. Paul at Lystra; after Champagne.

The School of Athens; after Raffaello; large plate.

COSTA, LORENZO, THE ELDER. This painter was a native of Ferrara, and was a disciple of Francisco Francia, as appears from his inscription on the picture of the family of Gio. Bentivoglio, Laurentius Costa Francie discipulus, and from the great similitude in their style, which is evident in their numerous works in the churches at Bologna. He flourished from the year 1488 to 1530. Without entirely equalling his instructor, he may be ranked among the most eminent painters of his time. His most esteemed works at Bologna are, in the church of S. Maria Mascarella, the Resurrection, a composition of many figures; in S. Giacomo Maggiore, in the capella Bentivoglio, that Family kneeling before the Virgin and Infant seated on a Throne. In S. Petronio, S. Girolamo and other Saints; and the Madonna and Bambino, with S. Sebastiano, S. Girolamo, and S. Giorgio; considered as two of his best works. At Ferrara, in the Certosa, a Pietà; and in S. Guglielmo, the Assumption of the Virgin. [He was living in 1535.]

COSTA, IPPOLITO, is said to have been the son of the preceding artist, born at Mantua. He flourished about the year 1538, and, according to Orlandi, was a scholar of Girolamo da Carpi. Baldinucci reports him to have studied under Giulio Romano, which is supported by a resemblance in their style. He was the instructor of a very able artist, Bernardino Campi, and also initiated into the art his brother Luigi Costa.

COSTA, LORENZO, THE YOUNGER. This artist appears to have been the grandson of Lorenzo Costa the elder, and the son of Ippolito, or of Luigi Costa. He is mentioned by Vasari, as a coadjutor of Taddeo Zuccherò, about the year 1560. In the Guida di Mantua, by Cadioli, there are many pictures indicated under the name of Costa without particularizing their baptismal names, which makes it almost impossible to identify their works. With Lorenzo Costa the younger, the last branch of this family, expired the great principles of Mantuan art.

COSTANZI, PLACIDO, was born at Rome in 1688, and painted historical subjects. Of his large works, the most esteemed is his S. Camillo, in S. Maria Madalena; in which he has aspired to the imitation of Domenichino. He also painted in fresco the tribune in S. Maria in Campo Marzio, and was much employed in painting figures in the landscapes of other artists, particularly in those of Gio. Francesco van Bloemen, called Orizonti. He died in 1759.

COSTER, ADAM DE. This painter was a native of Antwerp, and is supposed to have been a disciple of Theodore Rombouts. He painted history and portraits with considerable reputation; but he particularly excelled in painting gallant assemblies and festivals, which are ingeniously composed, and coloured with great force and vigour. We have a fine print, engraved by L. Vorsterman, after a picture, representing a concert, painted by A. de Coster.

COSTER, D., a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1700. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers; and, among other plates, engraved a portrait of Francis Hals, the painter, after Vandyck.

[COSWAY, RICHARD, a very eminent English painter in water-colour miniatures, and in oil, was born at Tiverton in Devonshire, in 1740. He came early to London, and soon distinguished himself by his drawings from the antique in the Duke of Richmond's gallery, which Cipriani and Bartolozzi pronounced admirable. In 1771 he was elected a Royal Academician. He continued to progress in public favour, and for a considerable time maintained the ascendancy in his particular branch of art, miniature, and bade defiance to all attempts at rivalry. In his oil paintings he aimed at the manner of Correggio; and there are in existence some that, for beauty of design and sweetness of expression, would not discredit that thrice-honoured name. His widow retained three till the time of her death. He painted all the beauty and fashion of his day: he was particularly distinguished by the notice of the Prince of Wales, then the leader of the gay world, and Cosway painted him as a gentleman, and not as a coxcomb or an actor. Accounts of Cosway have been published abounding with scandalous and humorous anecdote; they have, however, lost their interest, and do not merit to be recorded here. Cosway was fond of collecting pictures, drawings, prints, and other objects of art: his house in Stratford Place was like a dealer's magazine, being filled with the miscellaneous articles that are found in such depôts. After his death all was disposed of by auction. He died the fourth of July, 1821.]

COTES, FRANCIS, an English portrait painter, born about the year 1725. He was a scholar of George Knapton. Lord Orford mentions some of his works in oil and in crayons, the latter of which he compares to the portraits of Rosalba. He died in the prime of life, of the stone, in 1770. [He was a very eminent painter with crayons, and one of the first members of the Royal Academy. His brother Samuel was also a crayon painter: he died in 1818.]

COTIGNOLA, FRANCESCO DA, called ZAGANELLI. This painter resided chiefly at Parma, and flourished about the year 1518. He was the scholar of Niccolò Rondinello. Vasari commends him for his colouring, though inferior to his instructor in design and composition. His celebrated picture of the Resurrection, at Classe, and his esteemed work of the Baptism of Christ, at Faenza, are productions that do honour to his country. He also painted an admirable picture of the Madonna surrounded by Saints, at the Osservanti at Parma. [The last-named picture was painted in conjunction with his brother Bernardino, who was an artist of considerable ability. Crespi is in error in making these two artists one, under the name Francesco Bernardino.]

COTIGNOLA, GIROLAMO MARCHESI, DA. The family name of this painter was Marchesi. He was born at Cotignola in the Bolognese, about the year 1475, and was a scholar of Francesco Francia, and, according to Vasari, was one of the most eminent portrait painters of his day. He also painted history, and there are some of his pictures in the churches at Bologna and the vicinity, that prove him to have been a very reputable artist in his time. His design partakes of the dry, stiff manner of his day, but his colouring is good, and the expression of his heads superior to most of his contemporaries. In the church of S. Giuseppe at Bologna is one of his best works, representing the Marriage of the Virgin. [Two pictures, formerly in the Solly collection, show that Girolamo Cottignola was a really great painter: the one is dated 1512, and represents the Ascension of the Virgin; the other, dated 1528, St. Peter and Pope Gregory in converse, attended by two angels; the Virgin and Child, surrounded with angels, above. There is a remarkable alteration of manner in the second picture, indicating the extraordinary influence of the works of Raphael on the painters of the period. Girolamo Cottignola is supposed to have lived till 1550.]

COTTA, JACOPO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about the year 1600. His name is affixed to an etching representing the Meeting of Isaac and Rebecca, after Storer. It is executed in a poor, tasteless style, and incorrectly drawn.

COTTART, PETER. According to Florent Le Comte, this artist was an architect, and flourished in the seventeenth century. He etched some plates of vases and ornaments, which are executed in a bold, coarse style. His prints are usually marked with the monogram .

[COUCHET, FRANÇOIS-LOUIS, a French designer and engraver, born in 1782, has produced numerous works relative to the battles and trophies of the French armies in Italy and Spain, partly from his own designs, and partly from those of others. He engraved many of the plates for the Orleans Gallery, and for Denon's grand work on Egypt; and sixty, from his own designs, for Norwin's History of Napoleon. He was appointed in 1824 engraver of the battles and huntings of the Duke of Angoulême, since when there is no further account of him.]

COULET, ANNE PHILIBERT. This ingenious French lady has engraved several plates of very pleasing landscapes and marines, which are charmingly etched and finished with the graver, in a delicate and agreeable style. We have by her the following:

- The "Rendez-vous à la Colonne;" after Berghem.
- The Departure of the Boat; after Vernet.
- The Fortunate Passage; after the same.
- The Fine Afternoon; after the same.
- The Fishermen throwing their Nets; after the same.
- The Neapolitan Fishermen; after the same.
- Rural Pleasures; after Loutherbourg.
- The Companion; after the same.
- Going to Market; after Van Goyen.

COURBES, JOHN DE, a French engraver, born about the year 1592. He was principally employed for the booksellers. He appears to have been in England, as we have by him the portrait of Sir Philip Sydney, and that of Mary, Countess of Pembroke.

COURTOIS. See CORTESE.

COURTOIS, PETER FRANCIS, a French engraver, who resided at Paris about the year 1760. He engraved some plates from the designs of St. Aubin, and others, but died in the prime of life.

COUSE, J. This artist, if not a native of England, resided here about the year 1750. He engraved a plate of a view of Berkeley Castle, from a drawing by the Countess of Berkeley, and some other prints, which are neatly executed, and possess considerable merit.

COUSIN, JEAN. This artist may be regarded as the founder of the French school, as previous to his time the painters of his country confined themselves to portrait painting. He was born at Soucy, near Sens, about the year 1530. His first occupation was glass-staining, of which he has been very unaccountably stated to have been the inventor. His principal work, as a painter, is a picture of the Last Judgment, which was formerly in the convent of the Minimes at Vincennes, now in the gallery of the Louvre. It is a grand composition, and the design is more in the taste of Parmegiano than the French style. The windows of the church of the convent were also painted by him. Of his performances as a painter on glass, the windows of the choir of the church of St. Gervais at Paris are considered his best works. They represent the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, Christ with the Woman of Samaria, and Christ curing the Paralytic.

COUSINET, ELISABETH. See EMPEREUR.

COUSSIN, H. According to Basan, this artist was a native of France, and resided at Aix, in Provence, about the year 1760. He etched several plates after Puget, Rembrandt, and other masters.

[COUTANT, JEAN-LOUIS-DENIS, a French engraver, born at Argenteuil in 1776, was a scholar of Mechel of Basle, and was chiefly employed on subjects of natural history. Among his principal productions are the plates for the great work on Egypt; for the travels of the Baron de Humboldt in the Cordilleras; the fossil bones by Cuvier; for the great work on the Anatomy of the Brain by Professor Langenberg of Gottingen, and others of a like kind. He also engraved the plates for Captain Freycinet's Voyage round the World. The date of his death is not ascertained.]

COUVAY, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Arles, about the year 1622. He worked almost entirely with the graver, in a bold, coarse manner, not unlike the style of Villamena. He sometimes marked his plates . We have by him the following:

Louis XIV. on Horseback, preceded by Fame; after J. Bourdon.

The Virgin and Infant; after Raffaelle; Dilectus meus, &c.

St. John in the Desert; after the same.

St. Benedict, tempted by the Demon, presenting a Crucifix; after Guercino.

The Virgin; after Blanchard.

Magdalene; half-length; after Le Brun.

The Ascension; after J. Stella.

The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew; after Poussin; fine.

Mary, Queen of Scotland; the Execution seen through the Window.

A set of small prints, called Les Tableaux de la Penitence; after J. Chaveau.

COVYN, [or COUVEYN,] RENIER and ISRAEL. These two brothers were natives of the Netherlands. The elder, Renier, painted market women, with dead game, vegetables, fruit, &c. Israel, the younger, attempted history, but was more successful in portraits. Neither of them went beyond mediocrity.

COXCIE, MICHAEL, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1497. He was for a short time a disciple of Van Orley, but went to Italy when he was young, and applied himself to studying the works of Raffaelle, with whom he was contemporary. He passed several years at Rome, where he painted some pictures for the church of S. Maria della Pace. On his return to Flanders he was much employed, and there are many of his works in the churches at Brussels and Antwerp, that establish the respectability of his talents. His pictures are finely composed, and there is something of the Roman school in the style of his design. His female figures are more graceful and elegant than is usual in the artists of his country. He has been accused of taking some of his compositions from the designs of Raffaelle. The excellent use he has made of the plagiarism will almost excuse it. At Brussels, in the collegiate church of St. Gudule, is a fine picture by Coxcie of the Last Supper; and in Notre Dame, the Death of the Virgin. In the abbey of St. Gertrude is a picture of the Crucifixion, much in the style of Raffaelle. At Antwerp, in the cathedral, is the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian. He died at Antwerp in 1592.

COYPEL, NOEL, a French painter, born at Paris in 1628. He was first placed under the tuition of an artist, named Poncet, at Orleans; but at the age of fourteen he became a scholar of Guillerier, under whom he acquired sufficient ability to be employed by Charles Errard, who was charged with the superintendance of the works at the Louvre. It was not long before he distinguished himself, and he was received into the Academy in 1659. His picture of reception was Cain slaying Abel. It was about the same time that he painted his celebrated picture of the Martyrdom of St. James, in the church of Notre Dame. He was now regarded as one of the ablest artists of France, and was appointed by the king director of the French Academy at Rome. He visited the metropolis of art in 1672, and presided at the Academy with great reputation for three years. It was during his residence at Rome that he painted his four easel pictures for the king's cabinet, representing Solon taking leave of the Athenians, Trajan giving public audience to the Romans, Ptolemy ransoming the Jews, and Alexander Severus distributing Corn to the Roman People. These pictures were publicly exposed at Rome in the Rotonda, and gained him great reputation. They are now placed in the gallery of the Louvre. He appears to have imitated in them the style of Poussin and Le Sueur. After three years' residence at Rome, Coypel returned to Paris, and was employed in several fresco paintings in the Tuilleries. He executed his last work at the advanced age of 78. It was the Vault of the Sanctuary at the Invalids, and may be considered as one of his best productions. He died in 1707. Noel Coypel has etched the following plates:

The Virgin caressing the infant Jesus.

The same subject; larger.

The Holy Family.

COYPEL, ANTOINE, was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Paris in 1661. His father instructed him in the art, and conducted him to Rome when he was appointed director of the French Academy there. But neither the chefs d'œuvres of Rome, nor the example of his father, could inspire him with a feeling for the truly grand and beautiful. He preferred the style and counsel of Bernini to the study of Raffaele and the Caracci; and to confirm him in the depravity of his taste, he returned to Paris at the age of eighteen; that is to say, he left Rome precisely at the time that he should have gone there. He was only nineteen when he painted his picture of the Assumption, in the church of Notre Dame, and at twenty he became a member of the Academy at Paris. He was taken into the employment of the court, and became one of the most popular painters of his country. It is curious to compare the criticism of two of the most esteemed of the French biographers, respecting the works of this painter. "No artist," says M. D'Argenville, "possessed the poetry of the art in a higher degree than Antoine Coypel. Formed by nature for the grandest compositions, the fertility of his genius displays itself through all his works. He was graceful in the airs of his heads, painted children in the greatest perfection, and was, above all, attentive in expressing with propriety the passions of the soul." A less favourable judgment is pronounced by M. Watelet: "Because," says that writer, "he was equal to the production of a great machine in the theatrical style, he was conceived to possess the poetry of the art; because he gave to his heads a physiognomy purely French, they are thought to be beautiful. His coquetry is called grace, a grace to be learned of the dancing-master. He consulted the comedian Baron for the attitudes of his most exalted characters, and travestied a hero of antiquity into a puppet of the theatre."

Antoine Coypel cannot however be denied to possess those qualities which are found in the artists most admired in his country, qualities which perhaps were necessary to the gratification of national feeling, and the acquisition of popularity. His principal works at Paris are, Christ among the Doctors, and the Assumption, in the church of Notre Dame; at the Carthusians, Christ curing the Blind at Jericho. He was much employed in decorating the royal palaces, and was made principal painter to the king in 1715. He died at Paris in 1722. We have by A. Coypel several etchings, executed in a finished but masterly style; among which are the following:

Melchisedec presenting the Bread to Abraham.
Judith; half-length; finished by Simoneau.
The Baptism of Christ.
Eccc Homo; finished by Simoneau.
The Virgin and Infant, in an oval.
The Virgin suckling the Infant.
St. Cecilia; Cantabo Domino, &c.
Cupid conquering Pan.
Bacchus and Ariadne; finished by G. Audran; very fine.
The Triumph of Galatea; finished by Simoneau; fine.
The Head of Democritus.
The Portrait of le Voisin, broke on the wheel for poisoning; two plates, large and small.

COYPEL, NOEL NICHOLAS, was the brother of the preceding artist, and the younger son of Noel Coypel, by a second marriage, born at Paris in 1692. He received his first instruction from his father, whom he had the misfortune to lose when he was fifteen years of age. It does not appear that he had the advantage of seeing Italy; he studied from the best works of art in his own country, and became of sufficient celebrity to be received into the Academy in 1720, when he was twenty-eight years of age. His picture of reception was Neptune carrying off Amymone. His best works are, the ceiling of the chapel of the Virgin in St. Saviour, and the altar-piece in the same chapel, representing the Assumption. There are several other works of this artist in the churches at Paris. He died in 1735. We have the following four plates etched by this master;

St. Theresa, with several Angels.
The Triumph of Amphitrite.
Jupiter and Antiope.
A young Woman caressing a Dove; afterwards finished by N. Edelwinck.

COYPEL, CHARLES ANTOINE, was the son of Antoine Coypel, born at Paris in 1694. He was instructed by his father, whose style he followed in a very humble imitation. He quitted historical subjects to paint bambochades, and found himself even inadequate to that branch. His best works as a painter are his portraits; that of Adriana le Couvreur has been admirably engraved by Drevet the younger. C. A. Coypel etched some modish subjects, which were only interesting at the time. He died at Paris in 1752.

COZENS, JOHN. This artist was the son of Alexander Cozens, a Russian by birth, who established himself in London, as a landscape painter and drawing-master, about the year 1770. He followed the same profession, but with great ability and elegance. He produced some drawings, which possessed extraordinary merit, executed in a style which was afterwards adopted and improved by the ingenious Mr. Girtin. He died in 1799. [His drawings are held in great estimation by all real connoisseurs.]

COZZA, FRANCESCO. This painter was a Calabrian, born at Istilo in 1605. He went early in his life to Rome, and became a scholar of Domenichino, to whom he attached himself by the most marked affection, and, according to the Abate Titi, finished some of the works of that master after his death. He was received into the Academy at Rome in 1650. One of his best works is the Vergine del riscatto, in the church of S. Francesca Romana a Capo alle case at Rome. He died in 1682.

COZZA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, was born at Milan in 1676. Whilst he was yet young he settled at Ferrara, where he was much employed for the churches. Without great correctness of design, he possessed a copious invention, and an unusual facility of handling. Of his numerous works at Ferrara, the following are the principal. In the cathedral, the Immaculate Conception; at the Ognisanti, the Holy Family; in S. Lucia, the Annunciation; and in S. Guglielmo, the Assumption of the Virgin. He died at Ferrara in 1742.

COZZA, CARLO. This painter was the son of the preceding painter, born at Ferrara about the year 1700. He was instructed by his father, in whose style he painted several pictures for the churches of his native city. In the Chiesa Nuova, is a picture by him of the Annunciation; in S. Lucia, S. Antonio Abate; and in S. Matteo, S. Francesco da Paola. He died at Ferrara in 1769.

CRABETH, DIRK and WOULTER. According to Vanmader, these brothers were natives of Gouda. They were the most eminent painters on glass of their time, and flourished about the year 1560. Their principal works were the windows of the great church at Gouda, which have been considered as the most extraordinary performances in that branch of art. On the four windows are represented the Nativity of Christ, Our Saviour driving the Buyers and Sellers from the Temple, the Death of Holofernes, and the Destruction of the Temple of Heliiodorus. They are dated in 1560, 1564, 1566, and 1567.

CRABETH, FRANCIS, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1500. It is not said under whom he studied, but he painted history in the style of Lucas of Leyden. In the church of the Recoletts at Mechlin, the picture of the principal altar is by this master. It represents the Crucifixion, and on the two folding doors he has painted two subjects from the Passion of our Saviour. He died at Mechlin in 1548.

CRABETJE. See ASSELYN.

CRADOCK, LUKE, an English painter of birds, dead game, and animals, in which he particularly excelled. He was born at Ilchester, about the year 1660, and served an apprenticeship to a house-painter in London. Without the help of an instructor, he became a faithful delineator of birds and animals, which he painted with a freedom and a fire, that entitled him to more distinction, and a more liberal remuneration, than he received during his life. After his death, as has too frequently been the case with the works of many ingenious artists, his works were sold at three or four times the price he received for them when living. He died in 1717.

CRAESBECKE, JOSSE. Craesbecke, the pot companion and scholar of Adrian Brouwer, was born at Brussels in 1608. He was bred a baker, and had settled at Antwerp in that capacity, at the time that Brouwer visited that city. A conformity in their habits of debauchery brought them acquainted, and Brouwer became his inmate on quitting the protection of Rubens. Craesbecke forsook his oven, and became the disciple of his friend, and it is surprising that a person who had never practised the art until he had reached the age of thirty, should have arrived at a proficiency, which, though greatly inferior to his instructor, is sufficient to range him among the ingenious artists of his country, particularly as a colourist. He painted similar subjects to those of Brouwer, very unequal in character and the fineness of touch, and marked with greater vulgarity. Many eccentric vagaries are related by the Flemish writers of Craesbecke and his friend Brouwer. He died in 1688.

CRAMER, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1670. According to Van Gool, he was for some time a scholar of William Mieris, but afterwards studied under Karel de Moor, whose manner he followed. He painted subjects taken from private life, and portraits in small. His pictures of that description are seen in the best collections in Holland, and are deservedly admired. He died in 1710.

CRANACH, or KRANACH, LUCAS, a German painter and more celebrated engraver, born at Cranach, in the bishopric of Bamberg, in 1472. He was a contemporary of Albert Durer, and painted history and portraits, in the stiff and formal style that prevailed previous to the commencement of its reformation by Durer. He is worthy of more particular attention as an engraver. We have but a few of his works on copper, and those are designed and executed in the dry and Gothic style of his paintings, but his wooden cuts are deservedly esteemed by the curious collector. Some of his prints are in chiaro-scuro, and are also sought after. He sometimes marked his prints with the arms of Saxony, or with a dragon with a ring in its mouth, which is the crest, to show he was painter to the Elector, and sometimes the cipher CL. or CL.

The following are his principal prints:

COPPER-PLATES.

The Portrait of John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, with an Angel holding a Crown of Laurel; very scarce. The Portraits of Frederick and John, two Electors of Saxony; half-length, one holding a Chaplet. 1610. Christianus II., Danorum Rex. &c. Martin Luther, in the Habit of a Monk. Adam and Eve, after their Fall, 1509, with the arms. Christ tempted in the Wilderness, L. C. W.; very scarce. Christ in the Clouds, surrounded by Angels; below, a half-length of the Elector.

WOODEN CUTS.

The Bust of John Frederick, Elector of Saxony. Half-length of an Elector, with a Book, before a Crucifix; marked with the dragon, 1552; scarce. The Bust of Martin Luther, in the Habit of a Monk. D. Martin Luther; full-length. Philip Melancthon; the same. The Emperor Charles V.; the same. The Emperor Ferdinand; the same. John Frederick, Elector of Saxony; the same. John William, Duke of Saxony; the same. Adam and Eve in Paradise. 1509. The Annunciation. St. John preaching in the Wilderness. 1516. The Passion of our Saviour; in fourteen prints; entitled Passio D. N. Jesu Christi, &c., 1509; very fine. The Twelve Apostles; very fine. Paris dying on Mount Ida, visited by the three Goddesses, 1508; fine. M. Curtius plunging into the Gulf. The Great Tournament. 1509. The Little Tournament. 1509.

CUTS IN CHIARO-SCURO.

St. George and the Dragon. St. Christopher carrying the infant Jesus. 1507. Venus and Cupid.

Lucas Cranich died in 1553. [He was born in 1470, and his family name was SUNDER, that of Cranach he took from the place of his birth. He entered early into the service of the electoral house of Saxony, and was court painter to the three electoral princes, Frederick the Wise, John the Persevering, and Frederick the Magnanimous. With the first he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1493; with the last he shared his five years' imprisonment after the fatal battle of Mühlberg in 1547. He was burgomaster of Wittenberg, and lived on intimate terms with Luther and Melancthon. His works are extensively dispersed, particularly in the Saxon states; he painted many altar-pieces from sacred history, and in symbolical representations: that at the city church of Wittenberg is one of his best. As a portrait painter he takes a high place, and is distinguished by his simple and faithful adherence to the forms of nature. Some of his best portraits are to be found in his altar-pieces; others, as independent pictures in various galleries and collections. The most important collection is in the Berlin Museum; among them the fine portrait of George, Duke of Saxony, is very simple, yet dignified, and its warm colouring very good. Another is singular in conception; it represents the Elector of Mayence, Albert of Brandenburg, as St. Jerome in the brilliant dress of a Cardinal, studying in the solitude of a forest, surrounded by all kinds of fine and noble animals. He was very skilful in the delineation of beasts and birds, of which he has left an excellent example in the drawings to the Prayer Book, in the court library at Munich; the first part of which was ornamented with borders by Albert Durer, and the latter by Cranach. Though the works of Lucas Cranach had great influence on art, as may be seen in the numerous imitations which they called forth, yet few of his scholars, properly so called, are known: the best of them was his son, Lucas Cranach the younger, who appears to have formed his style on that of his father and of Albert Durer, as is evident from the different peculiarities in his works, which remind us sometimes of the one and sometimes of the other. He has, however, a grace and sweetness peculiarly his own, which are seen in his glowing, but somewhat too rosy colouring. He died in 1586. An enumeration of his principal works, of sacred subjects and portraits, may be found in Dr. Kügler's book. The elder Cranach was one of the partners in the erection of the first printing press at Wittenberg. For descriptions of many of his pictures, the inquirer is referred to Dr. Kügler's Hand Book, part ii.; and for a full list of the engravings ascribed to him, both on wood and copper, to Bartsch, (Peintre Graveur) who, however, denies that Cranach ever engraved on wood. Cranach did not use the flying dragon on his pictures to denote that he was painter to the court of Saxony, but as his own crest by patent of nobility, granted to him by the Elector Frederick.]

CRANSE, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1480. He painted history, and was received into the Academy at Antwerp in 1523. Vanmader speaks highly of a picture by this master in the church of Our Lady, representing Christ washing the Feet of his Disciples.

CRAYER, GASPARD DE. This eminent painter was born at Antwerp in 1582. He was first instructed in the art by Raphael Coxcie of Brussels, an artist of little repute, whom he soon surpassed. Taking for his guide the works of the able artists of his country, and indefatigable in his study after nature, he gave early proof of his ability in some public works which attracted the notice of the court of Brussels, and he was engaged to paint the portrait of the Cardinal Ferdinand, the Governor-General of the Low Countries, to be sent to his brother, the King of Spain. This work gave so much satisfaction, that he was appointed painter to the court, with a considerable pension, and was also employed in painting for the churches and public edifices. If Crayer had only looked for emolument, this flattering patronage, and the applause of the great, would have satisfied his ambition, and secured his fortune by fixing him at the court. But solely intent on excelling in his art, and desirous of that repose and tranquillity so essential to his studies, he renounced his situation at Brussels, and sought the retirement he longed for, by removing to Ghent. This retreat did not diminish the reputation he had acquired, and he continued to receive commissions from every part of the country. It was at this time that he painted his fine picture for the refectory of the abbey of Afflegem, which is considered as one of his most celebrated works. It represents the Centurion dismounting from his Horse to prostrate himself before Christ. It was this admirable picture that procured him the flattering homage of Rubens's applause, who, on beholding it, exclaimed aloud, "Crayer, nobody will surpass you." The churches of the principal cities in Flanders and Brabant are decorated with a surprising number of the works of this master, who occupied a long life in unremitting assiduity. The biographers of the Flemish painters have not hesitated to place this estimable artist on a level with Rubens and Vandyck. Although this high compliment may be rather strained, he is undoubtedly entitled to the next rank after them, among the ablest artists of that school.

His compositions are learned and judicious; rejecting every thing of superfluity and ostentation, he attached himself to the higher faculties of correctness and simplicity. Less daring than Rubens, he is always correct; and although he never soared to the flight of that aspiring genius, his works evince both grandeur and dignity. His colouring is chaste and tender, resembling in his carnations the clear tinting of Vandyck. Among the numerous works of this industrious artist, the following are the principal: at Brussels, in the church of Notre Dame, Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene; at Ghent, in the cathedral, the Assumption; in St. Michael, the Descent of the Holy Ghost; in the church, formerly of the Jesuits, a fine picture of the Resurrection. Gaspar de Crayer died in 1669.

CREDI, LORENZO DI, called SCIARPELLONI. This painter was born at Florence in 1452. He was a disciple of Andrea Verocchio at the time that Lionardo da Vinci studied under that master. Both the scholars surpassed their instructor, and, although Credi was very inferior in genius and invention to Lionardo, he was not without a certain merit in the graceful and expressive manner in which he painted Madonnas and Holy Families, of which many are preserved in the collections at Florence. They were admired for the beauty of the colouring, the expression in the heads, and very pleasing back-grounds. His most considerable work is the adoration of the Magi, in the church of S. Chiara at Florence. He was a very successful copyist of the works of Lionardo, and other great masters. He died in 1530. [Lorenzo di Credi was an excellent painter. His Birth of Christ, formerly in the monastery of Santa Chiara, but now in the gallery of the Academy at Florence, (see Rosini, plate ciii.) is one of the best works in that capital collection for expression, colouring, and execution. His capo d'opera, however, in the opinion of Vasari, is the picture of Madonna and Child, with Saints Julian and Nicolas, painted for a chapel of the convent of Castello, but now in the Louvre, and in excellent preservation. There is some uncertainty about the age of this great painter: his birth is stated by different writers in 1452, 1453, and 1454. Vasari says he died in 1530, aged 78; but it is known that he was living in 1536, though at that time ill and bed-ridden. He should rather be called an imitator than a copier of Lionardo da Vinci.]

CREED, CAREY, an English engraver, who published, in 1730, a set of plates of the statues and busts at Wilton, which possess considerable merit.

CREMONA, NICCOLO DA. This painter was a native of Cremona, and flourished about the year 1518. According to Masina, he was a respectable painter of history. In S. Maria Maddalena Monache, at Bologna, is a picture by this master of the Descent from the Cross; dated in 1518.

CREMONESE. See CALETTI.

CREMONESE, GIUSEPPE, was born at Ferrara in 1610. Without the help of an instructor, he applied himself to study the works of Dosso Dossi and Titian, and formed to himself a style which bears a resemblance to both. There are several of his works in the churches at Ferrara, of which the most esteemed are in S. Benedetto, the Four Doctors of the Church; in S. Niccolo, S. Cosmo and S. Damiano; and at the Cappucini, S. Carlo. He died in 1660. We have several etchings by this master from his own designs, among which are the following:

Samson and Dalila.

David, a whole length, with the Head of Goliath.
 David, half-length, with the same.
 St. Roch kneeling.
 A Bishop of the Order of St. Bernard kneeling.
 The Figure of a naked Female.

[Zani says he was born about the year 1600.]

CREMONIENSIS, ANTONIO, an Italian engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1560. Among other prints, he executed a cut representing Mutius Scævola burning his hand, in the presence of Porsenna. It is executed on a single block, without any cross hatching.

CREMONINI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. According to Malvasia, this artist was a native of Cento, and flourished about the year 1600. Although he chiefly distinguished himself as a painter of perspective, he acquired considerable reputation by his pictures representing wild and ferocious animals. He also painted history with not less success; and there are several pictures and altar-pieces in the churches at Bologna, which prove him to have been an artist of great ability; among which, the following are the most worthy of notice: in the church of S. Francesco, the Annunciation, and the Death of St. Francis; and in S. Maria della Vita, the Assumption of the Virgin. Gio. Batista Cremonini was one of the first instructors of Guercino. He died in 1610.

[CREPIN, LOUIS-PHILIPPE, a French marine painter, born in 1772, was a scholar of Regnault and Hubert Robert; he also had lessons from Joseph Vernet, and followed very successfully the manners of those masters. He was fond of representing engagements between French and English vessels of war, particularly where the former fought under great disadvantage. He painted many other subjects of more general interest, which will be esteemed when the battles are forgotten. He painted in water and body colour, and etched in aqua fortis and aqua-tint in the English manner.]

[CREPU, NICOLAS, born in Holland in 1680; died at Antwerp in 1742. He was an officer in the Spanish service, which he quitted at about the age of 40, and devoted himself to flower painting, in which he showed considerable talent. He composed well, and painted with a light and free pencil: his works were highly esteemed by his contemporaries.]

CREPY, or CRESPI, JOHN and LOUIS, two indifferent French engravers and printsellers. John, the father, born at Paris about 1650; and Louis, the son, about 1680. They engraved some portraits, and copied some prints after G. Audran, &c. We have also the following by them:

Mary Magdalene; Crepy, inv. et fecit.
 The Nativity; after Albano; their best print.
 The Descent from the Cross; after Carlo Cignani.
 The Holy Family; after Le Brun.
 The Presentation in the Temple; after the same.

CRESCENZI. See CAVAROZZI.

CRESPI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Cerano, a small town in the Milanese, near Novara, in 1557, and is frequently called il Cerano. He descended from a family distinguished in the art, who educated him for the learned professions; and he was a student of great promise in the sciences and Belles Lettres. A strong attachment to painting, however, induced him to follow the art in which his family had acquired its celebrity. He visited Rome and Venice, and established himself at Milan, where he was patronized by the Duke, Cardinal Federigo; was made director of the Academy, and employed as an architect, a sculptor, and a painter. In his works as a painter are found many beauties, accompanied by unaccountable defects. His style is free and spirited, and his colouring harmonious; but his design is occasionally conceited and absurd, from an affectation of the grand and the graceful. Of these deficiencies we have evidence in his pictures in the Chiesa della Pace, where his drawing of the naked is heavy and tasteless, and the movement of his figures distorted by the violence of their attitudes. His merits, however, must be allowed to outweigh his infirmities, and some of his works may be compared to the best productions of the Milanese school at his time. Such is his picture of the Baptism of S. Agostino, in S. Marco, which disputes the palm with Giulio Cesare Proccacini, and in the judgment of some is superior. Soprani, in the Life of Sinibaldo Scorza, says this artist excelled in painting animals and birds, of a cabinet size. He died in 1633.

CRESPI, DANIELLO, was born at Milan in 1590, and was first a scholar of Gio. Batista Crespi, called Cerano; but afterwards studied under Giulio Cesare Proccacini. Although he did not survive his fortieth year, he undoubtedly surpassed his first instructor; and, according to Lanzi, in the opinion of many, was equal to the latter. He is one of the able artists of the Milanese school, though little known, except in his own country. To an acute and penetrating genius, and an uncommon readiness of hand, he added a judgment that enabled him to take advantage of the excellencies of those that had preceded him, and to avoid their defects. Although he never frequented the school of the Caracci, he appears to have approved and adopted their principles and their practice. In the expression of his heads he is varied, yet select; and is particularly admired for the fervid devotion expressed in the character of his saints. His colouring is excellent, both in oil and in fresco, and partakes of the strength, as well as of the amenity, that we admire in Titian. The most esteemed works of this artist are the taking down from the Cross, in the Chiesa della Passione at Milan; and his celebrated suite of pictures of the Life of S. Bruno, at the Certosa. This able painter was unfortunately carried off, in the prime of life, with all his family, by the plague, which visited Milan in 1630.

CRESPI, GIOVANNI [or GIUSEPPE] MARIA, called IL SPAGNUOLO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1665. He was called il Spagnuolo by his fellow students, on account of the finery of his dress. He was first a scholar of Canuti; but afterwards passed some time under Carlo Cignani. He appears to have preferred the style of Federigo Baroccio to that of either of his instructors; and he copied and studied the works of that master with great assiduity. Desirous of discovering and establishing a novel mode of operation, he adopted a flimsy method of colouring, without solidity, and consisting chiefly of glazing, which has occasioned many of his works to be now almost obliterated. He had a particular talent for caricature; and some of his compositions of that kind are full of humour and eccentricity. He was for some time in the employment of the Grand Duke Ferdinand, for whom he executed several works in the Pitti palace. There are many of the pictures by this master in the churches and palaces at Bologna, of which the following are the principal: in the Palazzo Sampieri, is the Last Supper; in the church of S. Maria Maddalena, the Annunciation; in S. Nicolo, the Temptation of St. Anthony; in S. Salvatore, St. John preaching; and in S. Maria Egiziaca, the Crucifixion. Gio. Maria Crespi has etched several plates from his own designs, among which are the following :

The Murder of the Innocents.

Two plates of the Resurrection, in the style of Rembrandt.

The Miraculous Crucifix of Pistoja.

St. Anthony ; in the manner of Rembrandt.

St. Pascal.

Five of the Trades ; in the style of S. Rosa.

A Shepherd and Shepherdess.

He died at Bologna in 1747. [He was a great copyist of the works of the older Italian masters, particularly of Coreggio, Baroccio, and the Caracci ; many of these have, no doubt, been sold as originals. In his own compositions he was a careless painter, using any oils or colours indifferently. Mengs terms him the destroyer of the Bolognese school ; his pernicious example having tempted many of the painters of his time to imitate the facility of execution, by which he had obtained profit and praise from ignorant patrons. Several of his pictures are in the gallery at Dresden, including the Seven Sacraments which he painted for Cardinal Ottoboni, and an Ecce Homo, which, with all its faults, is a masterly performance. An account of his life, with an apology for his faults, as an artist, was published by his son, the Canon Luigi Crespi, in an additional volume to the Felsina Pittrice of Malvasia.]

CRESPI, or CRESPI, ———, an Italian engraver of little celebrity, who, according to Basan, flourished in the beginning of the eighteenth century. Among other prints, he engraved a plate, representing the taking down from the Cross ; after Carlo Cignani.

CRESTI. See PASSIGNANO.

CRETI, DONATO. This painter was born at Cremona in 1671. According to Lanzi, he was educated at Bologna, under Lorenzo Passinelli, whose style he blended with an imitation of the works of Simone Cantarini da Pesaro, and formed a manner which has little claim to originality. His colouring is distinguished by a hardness and crudity, occasioned by his never properly blending his tints. He resided chiefly in Bologna, where he painted several pictures for the churches. In S. Pietro is an altar-piece of S. Carlo Borromeo asking Charity for the Poor ; in S. Domenico, S. Vincenzo Ferreri resuscitating a Child ; in S. Luca, the Crowning of the Virgin, one of his best works ; and in the Mendicanti, an admired picture of the Adoration of the Magi. In the Palazzo Pubblico, he painted four pictures of the Life of Achilles and other works. He died at Bologna in 1749. [On the altar-piece in the church of S. Luca, fuori di Bologna, is inscribed, "Do" Creti f. d'anni 71, e vissuto sempre infermo, avendo per 36 anni continui perduto il sonno, e quasi successivamente da un giorno all'altro, onde ridotto in delirio, non potendo ritrovare riposo nè notte, nè giorno. Osservator cortese pensate, e compatite." Let this dreadful state of affliction qualify all censure.]

[CREUTZFELDER, JOHANN, born at Nuremberg in 1570, was a scholar of N. Juvenel, and painted portraits in a highly finished manner : he died, according to Doppelmayr and other writers, in 1636. Zani calls the artist to whom the above dates apply, John George ; and quotes a John Philip, who flourished about the same period ; he next names John, who was living in 1660 : all of them being portrait painters. It is a doubt with Nagler whether the three names do not apply to one person ; the initials on the known portraits of Creutzfelder are, however, JC with a date, one of which is 1631.]

CRISCUOLO, [or CRISCIUOLO,] GIOVANNI FILIPPO, was born at Gaeta about the year 1495, and was first a scholar of Andrea da Salerno, but he went to Rome when he was seventeen years of age, where he studied under Pietro Perugino, and attached himself to the works of Raffaele. On his return to Naples he was employed for the churches and public edifices, and painted several pictures, which are mentioned in favourable terms by Dominici, particularly an altar-piece in the church of S. Maria delle Grazie, representing the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, and below St. John Baptist and St. Andrew ; and in S. Maria del Rosario, the Adoration of the Magi. He died at Naples in 1584. [There was another painter of the same name, who lived about the year 1670.]

CRISCUOLO, [or CRISCIUOLO,] GIOVANNI ANGELO, was the younger brother of the preceding artist ; and although he showed an early inclination for the art, his father would not permit him to make it his profession, but obliged him to follow the business of a notary. On the death of his father, the reputation his brother had acquired induced him to abandon his occupation ; and he placed himself under the tuition of Marco da Siena, by whose instruction he became a reputable artist. Dominici describes many of his works in the churches at Naples, among which is an altar-piece in the church of S. Stefano, representing the Martyrdom of that Saint ; and in Monte Calvario, a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with St. Jerome ; the latter is dated in 1572. [The exact time of his death is not known ; some say about 1580.]

CRISPI, SCIPIONE, a Piemontese painter, born at Tortona, who flourished, according to Lanzi, from the year 1592 till 1599. It is uncertain by whom he was instructed ; but he was an artist of considerable merit, as is evident from his picture of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in the church of S. Lorenzo, at Voghera, and an altar-piece at Tortona of S. S. Francesco and Domenico, which is dated 1592.

CRISTOFORI, FABIO and PIETRO PAOLO. These artists, father and son, are deserving notice for the perfection to which they have carried the Mosaic art. By them were executed in the Basilica of St. Peter, from the originals, the Communion of St. Jerome, after Domenichino ; the St. Petronilla, after Guercino ; and the Baptism of Christ, after Carlo Maratti, and other works.

CRISTONA, GIOSEFFO, [or GIUSEPPE,] was born at Pavia in 1664, and was a scholar of Bernardino Ciceri. He excelled in painting landscapes and views of the vicinity of Rome, from designs he had made during a long residence in that city, which, according to Orlandi, were greatly in vogue in his time. [He signed one of his pictures, G. Crastona, 1705.]

CRIVELLARI, BARTOLOMEO, a Venetian engraver, born in 1725. He was a pupil of Joseph Wagner, for whom he executed several plates, after Gherardini, Tiarini, and Trepolo. We have by him the following :

The Portrait of Christian, Electoral Prince of Saxony.
The Portrait of the Archduchess Ann of Austria.
Three Plates from the Life of S. Pietro Petronio.
Four Plates of musical and gallant Assemblies ; after Niccolo del Abate.

The Canonization of St. Alexander Saul; after M. Bartoloni.

CRIVELLI, CARLO. According to Ridolfi, this old painter was a native of Venice, and was a disciple of Jacobello [del Fiore.] He flourished from about the year 1450 till 1476. By this venerable artist there remain two pictures in the church of S. Sebastiano, at Venice, representing S. Fabbiano, and the Marriage of S. Catherine. [Some pictures by this master have recently been brought to England, by which he will be better known than by the meagre accounts that have been given of him. In the late Edward Solly's collection was one representing the Annunciation; it bears the following inscription: Libertas Ecclesiastica Opus Caroli Crivelli Veneti, 1486. Every part of the picture is rich in birds, fruit, flowers, and architectural decorations. It was purchased by Mr. Labouche: it ought to have been bought for the nation. Crivelli, or Crivilli, must have been an industrious painter, and of great repute in his day, as his name occurs repeatedly in the Guides and Catalogues. Lanzi mentions three of his pictures, an altar-piece at San Francesco di Matelica, with the inscription, Carolus Crivellus Venetus miles pinxit; another with his name at the Osservanti, in Macerata; and a third, with the date 1476, in the possession of Cardinal Zelada. He sums up his artistic character by saying, "He is an artist more remarkable for his force of colouring than for his correctness of design; and his principal merit consists in those little history-pieces in which he has represented beautiful landscapes, and given to his figures grace, motion, and expression, with some traces of the colouring of the school of Perugia. Hence his pictures have occasionally been taken for the productions of Pietro, as in the instance of that in Macerata." A painter of beautiful landscapes, who gave to his figures grace, motion, and expression, and whose altar-pieces were attributed to Pietro Perugino, must not be ranked as an ordinary artist.]

CRIVELLI, ANGELO MARIA. This artist was a native of Milan, and, according to Orlandi, painted animals and huntings with surprising truth and spirit, and was considered one of the ablest painters of his country of those subjects. [He was a painter who flourished in the early part of the eighteenth century; he was called Crivellone.]

CROCE, BALDASSARE, was born at Bologna in 1553. It is not ascertained under whom he studied; but, according to Baglioni, he visited Rome during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., by whom he was employed in the Vatican. He painted with great power and freedom, both in oil and fresco. His principal works at Rome are the cupola of the Cappella di S. Francesco in the church del Gesu. The vault of the choir in St. John of Lateran; and the history of Susanna, in the church of her name. He died at Rome in 1628.

[CROME, JOHN, of Norwich, was born in 1769. As he showed an early disposition for art, his parents placed him as an apprentice with a coach painter, which enabled him to learn the use of pencils and colours. At the intervals of his ordinary business, he attempted to represent scenes from nature, and selected those in the vicinity of his native city. These, however, chosen by the eye of an artist who fully appreciated their picturesque beauties, failed to make a corresponding impression on his contemporaries. The termination of his apprenticeship compelled him to the election of being an artist or an artisan: his predilection induced him to choose the former, but, by the advice of a judicious friend, he added that of a teacher of drawing. This was fortunate, as it enabled him to make money, and at the same time to pursue his darling object of landscape painting without the fear of want. It also procured him patrons, and his productions began to be appreciated by his countrymen, and by degrees his reputation reached to the metropolis. He may be considered as a true pupil of nature. His landscapes are not compositions by rule; they are accurate representations of what he saw, but selected with just discrimination of the objects. A quiet piece of forest scenery, a verdant valley with a stream, an old fantastic tree, a winding hedge-row, a ruined cottage, are component parts of most of his pictures. His trees and herbs are studied with the care of a botanist, and each has the peculiar character that belongs to it. Norwich is indebted to him for the introduction of a school of painting; and several of his pupils have followed up his style since his death, which occurred in 1821.]

CROOCK, HUBERT DE, an ancient German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1490. His name is affixed to a large cut, representing the Trinity. It is neatly executed, but in a stiff, formal style. Albert Durer engraved the same subject, but in so superior a manner, that the print by Croock may be presumed to be a copy coeval with the original. Besides the name, it is marked with the monogram

[CROOS, A. VAN, called THE YOUNGER, (to distinguish him from his father, who was also a landscape painter,) painted landscapes and views of cities much in the manner of Peter Molyn, and also marine subjects and river scenes analogous to those of Van Goyen. His pictures are dated 1643 to 1667. It is supposed that he resided at the Hague, because many of his drawings represent views of the environs. The Dutch writers give no particulars of his life. His father's pictures are small woody landscapes on panel, carelessly designed and indifferently coloured: some have the date 1631. There was also another landscape painter of the name of Croos, (N.) of whom there is no further record.]

[CROSS, MICHAEL, a painter employed by Charles I. to copy some of the fine pictures in Italy, who, it is said, contrived to abstract a Madonna by Raphael from the church of St. Mark, at Venice, and left his copy instead. The picture was sold with the rest of the royal collection, and, it is said, was purchased by the Spanish ambassador, together with the twelve Cæsars by Titian, for the king of Spain. Charles certainly knew nothing of the theft; nor can it be supposed that he mistook it for a copy.]

CROSS, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1648. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits and plates for the booksellers, which are mostly from his own designs, and are almost entirely executed with the graver. We have by him, among others, the following:

PORTRAITS.

- King Richard III.
- Francis Bacon, Lord Keeper and Chancellor.
- Sir Robert Cotton Bruce, Bart.
- Joseph Hall, Bishop of Exeter.
- George Webbe, Bishop of Limerick.

- Jonas More, Mathematician; after Stone. 1649.
- Thomas Doolittle, Minister of the Gospel.

Robert Dingley, Master of Arts.
 John Gadbury, Astrologer.
 Christopher Love, Pastor of St. Ann's, Aldersgate. 1651.
 Edward Leigh, M. A. Philol. 1650.
 John Richardson, Bishop of Armagh. 1654.
 Philip Massinger; Poet.
 Francis Roberts. 1675; Presbyter, A. M.
 Thomas Wilson, Minister of St. George, Canterbury.
 Thomas Fiddell of Furnival's Inn.
 Richard Brome, Poet. 1654.
 Samuel Clarke, Pastor of St. Bennet Finck.
 Vincent Wing, Astronomer.
 A Frontispiece to White's Rich Cabinet. 1684.

CRUG, LOUIS. See KRUG.

CRUGER, THEODORE and MATTHIAS. See KRUGER.

CRUYL, LEVINUS, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Ghent about the year 1640. He designed the views of the most interesting objects in and near Rome, enriched with figures and animals, touched with spirit, and in a pleasing style. Several of his drawings have been engraved by Giulio Testa; and we have by him some very interesting etchings from his own designs. He generally marked his plates Cruyl. The following are by him:

A set of Twenty-three Plates of Ancient and Modern Rome; L. Cruyl del. et scul. 1665.
 A set of Architectural Views of Roman Ruins, &c. 1667. He also etched some of the Triumphs of the Roman Emperors; after Andrea Mantegna; in ten plates.

CRUYS, THEODORE VER, a Dutch engraver, who resided chiefly in Italy. He flourished about the beginning of the last century, and engraved some plates from the pictures of the Florentine Gallery; some views of sea-ports, after Salvator Rosa; and several portraits. His plates are etched and re-touched with the graver, in a very indifferent style.

CUERNHERT, DIRK, or THEODORE, VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1522. He is more distinguished as a religious controversialist than an artist. We have by him a few plates executed with the graver, in a slight, careless style. He has, however, the credit of being the instructor of Henry Goltzius. His works are the following:

The Descent from the Cross; after L. Lombard.
 Joseph explaining his Dream; after M. Hemskeerck.
 Joseph interpreting the Dreams of the Prisoners of Pharaoh; after the same.
 Job reproached by his Wife; after the same.
 Balaam and his Ass; after the same.
 The Elector of Saxony appearing before Charles V.; after the same.
 The Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, before Charles V.; after the same.

[He resided at Haerlem, but died at Gouda in 1590. Heineken and Huber have given catalogues of his engravings, but they are far from being complete.]

CUEVAS, PEDRO DE LAS, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1558. According to Palomino, he painted several pictures for private collections, in which he was more employed than for the public edifices. He was, however, more estimable for the celebrity of his academy than his works as a painter. Some of the most distinguished painters of the time were educated in his school. Such as Josef Leonardo, Antonio Pereda, Antonio Anias, and Don Juan Carræno. He died at Madrid in 1635.

CUEVAS, EUGENIO DE LAS, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, born at Madrid in 1623. He was chiefly employed in painting portraits in small, in which he gained great reputation at the court of Spain; and was appointed by Philip IV. to instruct his son Don Juan of Austria in drawing. He died at Madrid in 1667. [Bermudez says he was born in 1613. He was not only a painter, but a poet and musician.]

CULMBACK, HANS, [OF JAN.] According to Florent Le Comte, this artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1517. He is said to have been a disciple of Albert Durer, and engraved both on wood and copper. Among other prints by him, we have one representing a Soldier armed, conversing with a Country Woman; dated 1517, and marked with the initials H. V. C. [The great diversity of opinion respecting Hans Culmbach, or Kulmbach, and his works, among writers who should be the best informed on the subject, renders it difficult to say any thing of them not liable to controversy. The best authorities to consult are Bartsch, Zani, Heineken, Brulliot, and Nagler.]

CUNEGO, DOMENICO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Verona in 1727, [and died at Rome in 1794.] He engraved several portraits of the Royal Family of Prussia; and was afterwards employed by Mr. Hamilton to engrave some of the plates for his Schola Italica. Cunego afterwards came to England, and engraved some plates for Mr. Boydell's collection. He worked principally with the graver, in a clear, neat style. Among many others we have the following by this artist:

PART OF THE SUBJECTS FOR THE SCHOLIA ITALICA OF G. HAMILTON.

Three subjects of the Creation, from the Sistine Chapel; after M. Angelo.

Raffaello's Mistress, called la Fornarina; after Raffaello.
 Galatea; after the picture in the Barberini palace; after the same.

Ganymede; after Titian.

A Head of Magdalene; after Guido.

The Prodigal Son; after Guercino.

The Birth of St. John Baptist; after L. Caracci.

Galatea, part of the Farnese Gallery; after Agost. Caracci.

Apollo and Silenus; after An. Caracci.

St. Cecilia receiving the Palm of Martyrdom; after Domenichino.

SUBJECTS AFTER DIFFERENT MASTERS.

Portrait of Raphael Mengs; se ipsum pinx.

The Virgin and Infant; after Mengs.

Five sheets of the Paintings by Mengs, in the Library of the Vatican.

Five of the History of Achilles and Hector; after G. Hamilton.

The Virgin and Infant; after Coreggio.

The Entombing of Christ; after Raffaello.

Six, the Annunciation, the Visitation, the Nativity, the Circumcision, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Presentation in the Temple; after Domenichino.

Rinaldo and Armida; after Guercino.

A set of thirteen plates of Ruins; after Clerisseau. [And numerous others, chiefly after Italian masters.]

CUNEGO, ALOYSIO, was the elder son of the preceding artist, born at Verona in 1757. He chiefly resided at Leghorn. We have by him a few plates, of which the following are the principal:

The Statue of the Apollo of Belvidere.

St. Margaret; after Guercino.

The Persian Sibyl; after the same.

Mary Magdalene; after Guido.

CUNEGO, GIUSEPPE, the younger son of Domenico Cunego, born at Verona in 1760, and, with his brother, was instructed by their father. By this artist we have the following plates of landscapes:

Four Italian Landscapes, with figures; after F. de Capo.

Eight Landscapes; after the pictures by Gaspar Pous-sin, in the Palazzo Colonna.

[CUNNINGHAM, EDMUND FRANCIS, the son of a Scottish gentleman, and supposed to have been born at Kelso about the year 1742. After the affair of 1745, his father, who, it would seem, was an adherent of the Pretender, withdrew to Italy, and there his son imbibed a love for painting, and sedulously applied to the study of it as a profession. He copied the works of Coreggio, Parmegiano, and other great masters, and attained a high degree of excellence. In Italy he assumed the name of Calzo, or Calze, by which he is best known in foreign parts. He visited France, Prussia, and Russia, and every where met with patronage; but the fortune which he gained by his talents he wasted by his dissipation: he was always involved in difficulties. He died poor at London, it is supposed about 1793 or 1795.]

CUNYNGHAM, DOCTOR WILLIAM. This gentleman resided at Norwich, about the year 1559. He was the author of a book entitled A Cosmographical Glass, which was embellished with several plates, and a large plan of Norwich, some of which were engraved by himself.

CUQUET, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Barcelona in 1596. According to Palomino, his works are confined to the churches and convents of his native city, of which the principal were some pictures of the life of St. Francisco de Paula, in the cloister of the convent of that name. He died in 1666. [The industrious Restorers, who for some time overran Spain, have destroyed the greater part of his works.]

CURIA, FRANCESCO. This painter was born at Naples in 1538. According to Dominici, he was a scholar of Gio. Filippo Crisicuolo; but afterwards visited Rome, where he studied the works of Raffaele, and the other distinguished masters. On his return to Naples, he painted many pictures for the public edifices. He distinguished himself by the grandeur of his compositions, the fine expression of his heads, and a vagueness of colouring that approaches to nature. His most admired work is in the Chiesa della Pietà, representing the Circumcision. It is an admirable composition of many figures, painted in a great style, and is considered by Lanzi as one of the finest pictures at Naples. He died in that city in 1610.

CURRADI, or CURRADO, FRANCESCO, was born at Florence in 1570, and was brought up in the school of Batista Naldini. According to Lanzi, this artist was unremittingly occupied during a long life, until he reached his ninety-first year, in painting, and in the instruction of his numerous pupils. He painted history, and some of his large works are in the churches at Florence, of which the altar-piece of S. Saverio, in the church of S. Giovannino, is esteemed one of the best. But he chiefly excelled in historical subjects of an easel size, of which two of his finest pictures are in the gallery at Florence, representing Magdalene, and the Martyrdom of S. Tecla. His works are composed with taste and judgment, his design is correct, and his heads are full of expression. In his colouring, like most of the Tuscan painters, he is more to be admired for its sobriety than its vivacity. He died in 1661. [He is sometimes called Gianfrancesco di Bellos guardo.]

CURTI, BERNARDINO. This artist was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1645. He engraved some portraits, among which is that of Lodovico Caracci. We have also by him a middle-sized plate, representing an emblematical subject after Luca Ferrari.

CURTI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, born at Bologna about the year 1603. He worked principally with the graver, in a neat, clear style, resembling the manner of Cherubino Alberti, but very unequal to that artist in drawing. Besides some portraits, we have the following by him:

Two Busts of the Virgin and St. Catherine, on the same plate.

The Virgin teaching the infant Jesus to read; after Guercino.

The Marriage of St. Catherine; after D. Calvert.

Venus directing Vulcan to forge the Arms for Æneas; after Caracci.

Hercules combating the Hydra; after Guercino.

The infant Christ sleeping; after Guido; etched and finished with the graver.

[He died about 1670.]

CURTI, GIROLAMO. See DENTONE.

CUSTOS, or CUSTODIS, DOMINICK. This artist was the son of Peter Baltens, born at Antwerp about the year 1565. At an early period of his life he settled at Angsbourg, where he assumed the name of Custos, and formed a considerable establishment as a printseller. He engraved several plates, executed with the graver, sufficiently neat, but in a formal, stiff style.

A set of the effigies of the German Emperors, A. D. 1601. Fourteen, entitled Effigies piorum ac doctorum aliquot virorum, &c. 1594.

Twenty-eight Plates, entitled Tirolensium principum comitum genuina Icones. 1599.

Sixty-four Portraits of the Fugger Family. 1593; scarce.

SEPARATE PORTRAITS, AND SUBJECTS FROM VARIOUS MASTERS.

Dorothea Lotharingæ Dux.

Pope Sixtus V.

Rodolphus II. Emperor.

Four Plates of the Prodigal Son; D. Custodis inv. et fec.

Judith, with the Head of Holofernes; after J. van Ach.

[He died in 1612.]

CUSTOS, DAVID, was the son of the preceding artist, by whom we have a few plates of landscapes coarsely etched, but not without merit. The following are by him:

A set of Views in the Low Countries.

A small Landscape, with Boors playing at Nine-pins.

CUYLENBURG, a Dutch painter, of little reputation. [His name was Abraham Van Cuylenburg; he was born at Utrecht in 1639. His figures are abortive imitations of Poelenburg, but dealers are so kind to him, as to ascribe them to that master; robbing the one without enriching the other.]

CUYP, or KUYP, JACOB GERRITZE, called OLD CUYP. This painter was born at Dort about the year 1580, and was a scholar of Abraham Bloemaert. His pictures generally represent views in the neighbourhood of Dort, with figures and cattle, which, though rather dry and hard in the pencilling, are not without merit for a natural and simple tone of colouring. The works of this artist would probably have been held in higher estimation, had they not been so much surpassed by the extraordinary productions of his son. His pictures are little known out of Holland. He was one of the founders of the Academy at Dort in 1642. [He also painted battles and encampments; and some of his portraits are excellent. Writers differ with respect to the date of his birth; Balkema places it in 1578, and Immerzeel in 1575.]

CUYP, or KUYP, ALBERT. This charming painter was the elder son of the preceding artist, born at Dort in 1606. He had no other instructor than his father; but he was endowed with a genius that wanted little more assistance than the incipient rudiments of the art. He acquired the chaste and exquisite style, for which he is so particularly admired, by a close and vigilant attention to nature, under all the vicissitudes of atmosphere and season. His pictures frequently represent the borders of the Maes river, with shepherds and herdsmen attending their cattle. These subjects he has treated with an enchanting simplicity, that may be truly said to be peculiar to him. Whether he wished to exhibit the dewy vapour of morning, ushering in the brightness of a summer day, the glittering heat of noon, or the still radiance of evening; nature is perfectly represented. It is not, perhaps, giving him more merit than is due to him, to assert that no painter had surpassed him in the purity of his aerial tint. Tuned to the harmony of colour, like the ear of the musician to sound, his eye appears to have been incapable of a discordant tone; every object is enveloped in the air of the moment he wished to describe. Cuyp was not confined to landscapes and figures; he painted with equal success sea-pieces and views of rivers, with boats sometimes sailing with a fresh breeze, sometimes at anchor in sultry calm; in which the brilliancy of a sunny sky is reflected in the water with a transparent lucidity of colour that is undecipherable. Among his most surprising productions are his frost-pieces, with figures amusing themselves on the ice. It is difficult to form an idea of the interesting and exquisite manner in which he has treated those subjects, or the surprising effect he has given to that gilded glow which nature not unfrequently assumes at that season. He excelled also in horse-fairs and skirmishes of cavalry, which he painted with infinite spirit. He was not less happy in his pictures of moonlight; in which the admired works of Vanderneer are eclipsed by a superior and a more delicate degradation of light. He also painted portraits, the interior of churches, fruit, flowers, and may be called the most universal painter of the fertile school to which he belongs. His pencil is uncommonly broad and facile, with an unusual plumpness of touch, and a crispness of surface which is peculiar to him, if we except the works of Rembrandt, to which those of Cuyp bear some analogy in the richness of colour and the intelligence of light and shadow. The pictures of this excellent artist are more frequently to be met with in England than in any other country; and it may not be unworthy of remark, that it is within the recollection of the author, that his pictures were held in no great estimation on the continent. It was the discrimination of the English collectors, and their ardour to possess his works, that first brought them into the reputation they now hold even in his own country. Albert Cuyp has left a few small etchings of cows, which, though not executed with much delicacy or care, evince the hand of the master. They are very scarce. [The date of his death is not correctly known: he was living in 1672. His pictures are now selling at enormous prices; from one to two thousand guineas is common, and even higher sums have been given.]

CUYP, or KUYP, BENJAMIN, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Dort about 1615. He did not follow the manner of his brother, but attached himself to an imitation of the vigorous style of Rembrandt. He painted small historical pictures, which, in force of colour and intelligence of light and shadow, resemble the works of that great master. His pictures cannot be admired for the correctness of the design nor the expression of the heads, which is not without vulgarity; but they are well coloured, with a fine effect of the chiaro-scuro. [Balkema says he was the nephew and scholar of the elder Cuyp, and was born in 1608. His pictures may be considered as coarse attempts at the manner of Rembrandt.]

D

DA, ABRAHAM, an engraver, who was probably of Germany, as he appears to have imitated the style of Theodore de Brye. There is a plate by him of the Last Supper, executed with the graver in a neat, stiff style; it is inscribed Abraham Da, fecit; from which it may be presumed it is from his own design.

DACH, JOHN. According to Van Mander, this painter was born at Cologne in 1566. He was the scholar of an obscure painter named Barthelemy. On leaving that master he went to Italy, and returning by way of Vienna, he was received into the service of the Emperor Rodolphus II., for whom he painted several pictures, and was sent by that monarch to Italy, to collect objects of antiquity, and to make drawings from the most celebrated statues. He died at Vienna at an advanced age. [This is probably the same with Jan van Achen, who died at Munich in 1618, according to Balkema; as he is noticed under both names by Zani, who places his birth in 1556, and his death in 1600.]

DADDI, BERNARDO. This old painter was born at Arezzo; and is stated by Baldinucci to have flourished about the year 1355, at which date he was received into the company of painters at Florence. He was a disciple of Spinello Aretino. Some of his pictures are still preserved in the churches at Florence; one of the least injured by time is at S. Giorgio. He died at Florence in 1380.

DADDI, COSIMO. This painter was a native of Florence, and flourished about the year 1614. He was a scholar of Batista Naldini, and painted history with considerable reputation. Several of his works in the churches are noticed in the posthumous publication of Baldinucci, particularly a picture of the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, at the monastery of S. Lino, at Florence; and some subjects from the Life of the Virgin in the choir. In the church of St. Michael is an altar-piece, representing that Archangel discomfiting the rebel Angels. He died of the plague in 1630. [Zani says his name was Dati and not Daddi; he painted in 1588.]

[DAEL, JAN FRANZ VAN, a native of Antwerp in 1764, practised his art chiefly in France, as a fruit and flower painter, in which he became eminent. His style is in the manner of Van Huysum, and Van Spaendonck. He was patronized by the empresses Josephine and Marie Louise, and received the cross of honour from Napoleon, and a gold medal from Louis XVIII. He died at Paris in 1840, and was buried in the cemetery of Père la Chaise near to his friend Van Spaendonck.]

[DAELE, JAN VAN, a Dutch landscape painter, born in 1530, and died in 1601, excelled in representing mountainous and rocky scenery. Balkema erroneously names him Cornelius.]

DAGIU, FRANCESCO, called IL CAPELLA. According to Tassi, this painter was born at Venice in 1714. He was a scholar of Gio. Batista Piazzetta. In 1744 he was made an associate of the Academy at Venice, and in 1756 an academician. He painted history, and was chiefly employed for the churches at Bergamo, and in the state. One of his best pictures is St. George and the Dragon, in the parochial church of S. Bonate. He died in 1784.

DAHL, MICHAEL, an eminent portrait painter, born at Stockholm in 1656. He received some instructions from Ernstraen Klocke, an esteemed Swedish artist, and painter to the crown. At the age of twenty-two Dahl came to England, but did not at that time remain here longer than a year; he continued his travels in search of improvement through France to Italy, where he studied some years. Whilst at Rome, he painted the Portrait of the celebrated Christiana, Queen of Sweden. In 1688 Dahl returned to England, where he found Sir Godfrey Kneller rising to the head of his profession; and he had merit to distinguish himself as no mean competitor. Queen Anne sat to him; and he was favoured with the patronage of Prince George. He lived to the advanced age of 87, and died in 1743.

DAIGREMONT, M., a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1670. He engraved some of the plates for the Book of Ornaments of Painting and Sculpture, in the Louvre and the Thuilleries, published by John Berain. He also engraved several of the views of Versailles.

DALEN, CORNELIUS VAN, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1620. He was called the younger, to distinguish him from his father, who was a printseller and publisher. He was instructed in engraving by Cornelius Vischer, whose style he followed for some time. His prints occasionally resemble those of A. Blooteling, and at other times those of Pontius and Bolswert. He worked entirely with the graver, which he handled in a bold and free manner; and his plates discover considerable taste and intelligence. We have by him several very interesting portraits, and a few historical subjects. He usually marked his prints with his initials C. D. The following are by him:

DALENS, DIRK, or THEODORE, a Dutch landscape painter, born at Amsterdam in 1659. He was the son of William Dalens, an artist of little celebrity, who taught him the first lessons in the art. The principal works of Dalens are large landscapes, painted with a free and firm touch, and very agreeably coloured, which decorate the saloons of some of the principal houses at Amsterdam. He also painted some cabinet pictures of landscapes, with figures, which are deemed worthy of being placed in the collections in Holland. He died in 1688.

[DALENS, THIERRY VAN, called the young, born at Amsterdam in 1688, was a painter of landscapes with cattle and figures, enriched with ruins, in the manner of Pynacker, which he executed with great ability. He is said to have followed the manner of his father, who was a good landscape painter, and also excelled in painting birds and still life. There is, however, some confusion in the accounts of these artists, as to chronology and subjects, there being three, all called Theodore, Thierry, or Derick. See VAN DELEN.]

DALL, NICHOLAS THOMAS. This artist was a native of Denmark, and settled in London, as a landscape painter, about the year 1760. He was much employed in painting some excellent scenes for Covent Garden theatre, and his engagements in that branch of the art prevented him from painting many easel pictures. In 1768 he obtained the first premium given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. for the best landscape painting. He was chosen an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1771, and died in 1777.

DALLAMANO, GIUSEPPE. This painter, born at Modena in 1679, is a remarkable instance of the progress that untutored genius has sometimes made in the art without the help of a master. Dallamano is stated by Lanzi to have been hardly removed from an idiot; ignorant even of the alphabet, and unassisted by professional instruction, he reached an excellence in painting architectural views, which surprised the most intelligent judges. Many of his works are in the collections at Turin, of which the best are in the royal palace. He died in 1758.

DALLEVIA, A., an Italian engraver, who resided at Venice about the year 1686. Among other prints, he engraved a set of plates representing triumphal processions, published at Venice in 1686, entitled, Giuochi Festivi e Militari. They are executed in a coarse, indifferent style, and are inscribed A. Dallevia, sculp.

DALMASIO, LIPPO SCANNABECCHI, called LIPPO DALLE MADONNE. This old painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished from 1376 till 1410. He was a disciple of Vitale da Bologna, and was called Lippo dalle Madonne from the beautiful character he gave to his heads of the Virgin. His works are distinguished from the Gothic style of the time in which he lived, by a softer blending of tint, and a less formal folding of his drapery. He was certainly superior to his contemporaries in the expression of his heads, which were so beautiful that Malvasia reports, that Guido declared that nothing short of inspiration could have enabled him, at that early period, to have given so much majesty and sanctified sweetness to the character of our Lady. Malvasia and Tiarini assert, that some pictures by this master in S. Petronio and S. Procolo, at Bologna, were painted in oil. This circumstance, as well as other authorities, bring into further doubt the already questioned authenticity of the discovery of oil painting by John van Eyck of Bruges, in 1410. [In the Gentleman's Magazine for August, 1841, appeared the following notice, under the head of "Fine Arts:—" "BOLOGNA. In the ancient palace of the Podestà, which stands in the middle of the 'Piazza Maggiore,' a quantity of pictures of extraordinary antiquity have been discovered; marked with the name of Lippo Dalmasio, a painter who flourished before Antonella of Messina, and before, as has been generally believed, the invention of oil painting. The analysis of the material with which these pictures are painted proves that they are in oil. The Academy of Fine Arts has instituted a committee to examine into this discovery, and to make an exact report on the subject."]

[DAM, ANTHONY VAN, born at Middleburg, painted marine subjects of large dimensions. He flourished about the middle of the last century.]

[DAM, GAUTIER, born at Dort in 1726, was a scholar of Schouman, whose manner he followed for some time, but ultimately became an imitator and copyist of Cuyp and Backhuysen. He died at Dort in 1785 or 1786.]

DAMBRUN, ————. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several plates after the French painters, representing conversations and musical parties, which are neatly executed with the graver.

DAME, GILES LA. Florent Le Comte mentions this artist as the engraver of several plates, representing Holy Families, and other devotional subjects, in which he imitated the style of Claude Melan, but not very successfully.

[DAMERY, JACOB, a painter of fruit, flowers, and vases, was probably a native of Liege. He went to Rome when young, and, it is believed, remained there till his death, which occurred in his fifty-sixth year. There are engravings by him with the date 1657.]

[DAMERY, SIMON, born at Liege in 1597, went to Italy and distinguished himself as an historical painter. He died at Milan in 1640.]

[DAMERY, WAUTIER, or WALTER, born at Liege in 1614, was a scholar of P. da Cortona. He painted history and landscape. After being some time in Italy he visited Paris, and returned to his own country, where he died in 1678.]

DAMIANI, FELICE. This painter was a native of Gubbio, and flourished from the year 1584 till 1606. He is by some supposed to have been educated in the Venetian school, and his picture of the Circumcision, in S. Domenico, partakes of that style; but in general his works evince more of the Roman taste, which he probably acquired under Benedetto Nucci. One of his esteemed works is the Decollation of St. Paul, at Castel Nuovo, in Recanati; the expression in the head of the Martyr is admirable, the drawing correct, and the colouring brilliant and harmonious. It is dated 1584. About twelve years afterwards he decorated two chapels in the church of Madonna de Lumi, at S. Severino, with pictures representing the Life of the Virgin and the Infancy of Christ. But his most admired production is the Baptism of S. Agostino, in the church dedicated to that saint at Gubbio; a grand composition of many figures, finely grouped, with an admirable expression of piety in the heads, and enriched with noble architecture, painted in 1594. [He was living in 1616.]

DAMINI, PIETRO, was born at Castelfranco in 1592, and, according to Ridolfi, was a scholar of Gio Batista Novelli, who had been educated in the school of Palma. Such was the extraordinary expectation occasioned by the early display of his talents, that some writers have not hesitated to affirm that he would have equalled Titian if he had not died young, an assertion, which, as Lanzi observes, may be regarded as an hyperbole. There are many of his works at Castelfranco, Vicenza, Crema, and particularly at Padua, in which city, in the church of Clemente, is his picture of Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter; and in the church of il Santo, his most celebrated work of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary and St. John, a picture of extraordinary beauty, and of the most harmonious colour. In the cloister of the Padri Serviti, at Vicenza, he painted several pictures of the Life of S. Filippo, the founder of their order. The style of Damini is vague and elegant, but he is by no means uniform. He appears to have frequently changed his manner, in search of greater perfection; and his last works are evidently his best. He had acquired a distinguished reputation when the staves of Venice were afflicted with the plague in 1631, to which contagion he fell a victim. He had a brother, DAMINI, GIORGIO, who was an excellent portrait painter, as well as of historical subjects of a small size, who was carried off by the same dreadful calamity.

DANCE, NATHANIEL. See HOLLAND.

DANCKERT, or DANCKERS, CORNELIUS, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1561. He established himself at Antwerp as a printseller, where he engraved several plates of portraits, and other subjects, which are not without considerable merit. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden.
Jacob Wassenaer, Lord of Obsdam.
Cornelius de Wit, with a Battle in the back-ground.
John Calvin; oval.
John Casimir, Count of Nassau.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

Four, of Figures on Horseback, called the Monarchies; representing Nimus, Cyrus, Alexander, and Cæsar, with emblematical ornaments.
Seven, of the Planets, with Emblems.
The Seven Wonders of the World, with the same.
Twelve, of the Sibyls; full-length.
Twelve, of Animals and Birds.
Sixteen Views in Holland.
One hundred Subjects from the Old Testament; four on each plate, twenty-five plates.
A set of Prints of the Ruins of Rome.
Meleager and Atalanta; an etching; after R. Picou.

DANCKERT, or DANCKERS, DANCKER. This engraver was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1600. He succeeded his father in his establishment of a print-seller, and surpassed him in his talent as an engraver. His plates are sometimes only etched, but more frequently finished with the graver. We have by him a considerable number of plates after Berghem, Wowermans, and other painters. And he also engraved some portraits, and other subjects, from various masters. We have by him:

The Portrait of Charles II., King of England.
The Departure of Charles II. for England at the Restoration.
Venus and Cupid, with a Satyr; after Titian.

VARIOUS PRINTS AFTER BERGHEM.

Hawking, called Het Vinkebaantjé.
A Stag Hunt, called De Hartenjagt.
Four, of Landscapes and Figures, in one of which is a Man passing a Bridge. These are considered his best prints; after Berghem.

Four smaller plates, of Landscapes and Figures.

Six middle-sized plates, in the title print a Shepherd riding on an Ox playing on the Flute, and a Shepherdess dancing.

Four large plates of Landscapes; on the title print is inscribed, Danckert Danckerts, fec. et aec.

A set of fine Etchings; after Wouermans.

[There were several artists of the name of Danckers, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century; but the accounts of them are very confused. Balkema mentions a Jan Danckers who painted a picture bearing date 1648. Henry, it is also said, made copies of Titian and Palma.]

DANCKERT, or DANCKERS, HENRY. This artist was most probably of the same family, although born at the Hague about the year 1630. He was bred an engraver, but afterwards was recommended to study painting, and went to Italy for improvement. On his return to Holland he acquired some reputation as a landscape painter, and was invited to England by Charles II., who employed him in designing views of the royal palaces, and of the sea-ports of England and Wales. In the collection of James II. there were twenty-eight landscapes and views by this master. He engraved a few plates, as follow:

The Portrait of Charles II.; after A. Hanneman, inscribed, Henr. Danckers, Hagæ Batavus, sculp.

A large View of Amsterdam and the Y, with Shipping; in three sheets.

A set of Views of the Palaces and Sea-ports in England.

DANCKERT, or DANCKERS, JUSTUS, an engraver of the same family, by whom we have the following plates:

The Portrait of William III., Prince of Orange, afterwards King of England.

The Portrait of Casimir, King of Poland.

Seven plates of the Gates of Amsterdam.

DANCKERT, or DANCKERS, JOHN. This artist was a native of Holland, and resided at Amsterdam about the year 1657. He painted history with some reputation, and etched a few plates, among which is a print representing Venus reclining on a couch; after Titian.

DANDINI, CESARE. This painter was born at Florence about the year 1595. He was first a scholar of Francesco Curradi, but afterwards studied under Domenico Cresti, called Passignano, and Cristofano Allori. Under these masters he acquired a tolerable correctness of design, and an agreeable tone of colouring. One of his best works is a picture of S. Carlo, with other saints, in one of the churches at Ancona. He also painted easel and cabinet pictures, which were admired for their neatness and finish. He died in 1658.

DANDINI, VINCENZIO, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Florence in 1607. After receiving some instruction from his brother, he went to Rome, where he studied some time under Pietro da Cortona, whose style he followed. He was an eminent painter of history, and, according to Orlandi, was made principal of the Academy at Rome, on which occasion he painted a large picture which gained him great reputation. He returned to Florence, where he executed several works for the churches. In the Chiesa di Ognissanti is an admired picture of the Conception. He was employed in the palaces of the Grand Duke; in one of which he painted a ceiling, representing Aurora with the Hours, much in the style of Pietro da Cortona. He died at Florence in 1675.

DANDINI, PIERRO, was the nephew of the preceding artist, and the son of Cesare Dandini, born in 1646. Having lost his father when he was only four years of age, he was taken under the protection of his uncle, who instructed him in the principles he had himself adopted of the style of Cortona. He afterwards travelled through great part of Italy, and improved himself by studying the great masters of the Venetian and Lombard schools. On his return to Florence he was patronized by the Grand Duke Cosimo III., for whom he painted many works in oil and in fresco. It is to be lamented, that the avarice of this artist led him into a slight and negligent manner of finishing his works; to which he was the more easily tempted by the possession of uncommon facility of execution. Lanzi mentions, as one of his most important works, the Cupola of St. Mary Magdalene, at Florence. In the church of S. Maria Maggiore is a picture of S. Francesco; and in the church of the Servi monks is an altarpiece representing a Saint of their order officiating at the altar. He died in 1712.

DANEDINI, OTTAVIANO, was the son of the preceding artist, and painted history in the style of his father. Some fresco paintings in the cloister of S. Spirito, a picture of several saints in S. Lorenzo, and his works in the church of the Magdalene at Pescia, evince the respectability of his talent.

DANEDI, GIOVANNI STEFANO, called MONTALTO. This painter was born at Treviglio, in the Milanese, in 1608, and was a scholar of Cavaliere Morazzone. During a long residence at Milan, he painted a great number of pictures for the churches of that city, and in the state. One of his best works is the Martyrdom of S. Gjustina, in S. Maria in Pedone. He died at Milan in 1689.

DANEDI, GIOSEFFO, called MONTALTO, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Treviglio in 1618. When young he went to Bologna, where he entered the school of Guido Reni. On leaving that master he settled at Turin, where he executed some works for the public edifices. Towards the latter part of his life he joined his brother at Milan, where he was much employed. In the church of S. Sebastiano is a fine picture by this master of the Murder of the Innocents. He died in 1688.

DANET, JOHN. See DUVER.

DANET, LEON. See DAVEN.

[DANIELL, THOMAS, a member of the English Royal Academy, commenced his artistic career as a painter of English landscape scenery, with some attempts at poetical composition. At the age of 35, he went to India with his nephew, William Daniell; they were absent about ten years, gathering materials for their great work of "Oriental Scenery," which was published in 1808, in 6 volumes, the whole of which, with the exception of the volume of "Excavations," was executed by William. He seldom painted any but Indian subjects. His death occurred in 1840, at the age of 91 years. The works of William Daniell are so blended with those of his uncle Thomas, that they may be considered, artistically, as one, though some give the preference to the latter. William died in 1837, aged 64.]

[DANKS, FRANCIS, surnamed the Tortoise, was born at Amsterdam in 1650, where he died in 1703. He painted history and portraits, and showed considerable talent in modelling and sculpture.]

DANNOOT, PETER, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1690. He engraved a plate representing the Head of Christ crowned with Thorns, after Rubens, and a Portrait of Perc Mastriple.

[DANTE, GIROLAMO, an Italian painter, mentioned by Zanetti and Lanzi as a scholar of, and assistant to Titian in some of his less important works. It is said that in copying the originals of his master, he attained so high a degree of excellence, that such of his pieces as were retouched by Titian bid defiance often to the judgment of those who are considered exact connoisseurs. He also produced works of his own design; the altar-piece attributed to him at San Giovanni in Olio reflects credit on so great a school.]

[DANTI, PADRE IGNAZIO, a Dominican, employed by Pope Gregory XIII. to decorate the walls of the Vatican with geographical delineations of ancient and modern Italy. He was born in Perugia, of a family devoted to the fine arts, and was a man of superior knowledge and judgment. The pope having determined to complete the continuation of the gallery of Raphael in conformity with the original plan, and to paint four subjects in every arcade of the gallery, all from the New Testament, Danti was employed by him to superintend the work; it being found, by experience, that the entire abandonment of a design to the direction of practical artists is injurious to its execution; for there are few that, in the choice of their inferior assistants, are not governed by influence, avarice, or jealousy. The selection, therefore, was reserved to Danti, who, to an excellent practical knowledge of the art of design, united moral qualities that insured success; and under his direction the whole work was regulated and conducted in such a manner that the spirit of Raphael seemed to be recuscitated in the precincts of the Vatican.]

DANTI, TEODORA. This lady is mentioned in the Vite de Pittori Perugini, by Liono Pascoli, who states her to have been born at Perugia in 1498. She painted small pictures, in imitation of the style of Pietro Perugino. She died in 1573.

[DANUS, MIGUEL, a Spanish historical painter, born at Majorca, studied first at Valentia, and afterwards in Italy in the school of Carlo Maratti. After an absence of several years he returned to his own country, where he painted, in the manner of his master, the pictures in the cloisters of the convent of the Secours at Palma; and others which are to be found in the collections of the inhabitants of Majorca.]

DANZEL, JEROME, a modern French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1755. He was a pupil of Flipart, and has engraved several plates in a firm and neat style. He was received a member of the French Academy. We have by him the following prints:

- An old Man, half-length; after Rembrandt.
- A Flemish Merry-making; after Tilborgh.
- Venus and Adonis; after J. Bethon.

- The Roman Charity; after N. N. Coypel.
- Vulcan presenting to Venus the Arms of Æneas; after Boucher.
- The Rape of Proserpine; after Vien.

DARET, PETER, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1610. After receiving some instruction in engraving, he went to Rome in search of improvement, where he passed a considerable time. He engraved a great number of plates; they are chiefly executed with the graver, and are not without merit in point of neatness, though very deficient in taste and correctness of drawing. His work extends to upwards of four hundred prints, among which are the following. He frequently marked his plates D.

PORTRAITS.

- Bust of Alexander the Great, with an explication from Flutarch.
- Pope Alexander VII.

He also engraved one hundred small plates for a work entitled, La Doctrine des Mœurs, after the designs of Otho Vœnius, 1646; and a great number of portraits for a publication entitled, Tableaux historiques où sont gravés les illustres François, et Etrangers de l'un, et l'autre sexe, par Pierre Daret, et Louis Boissevin, published in 1652 and 1656.

DARGENVILLE, ANTHONY JOSEPH DEZALIER, a French amateur and writer on art, who resided at Paris about the year 1750. He was the author of a work entitled Abregé de la Vie des plus fameux Peintres, published first at Paris in quarto, in 1755. According to Basan, he etched several plates of subjects and landscapes, from his own designs.

DASSONVILLE, JACQUES, a French engraver, born near Ronen in 1719. We have by this artist about fifty etchings, in the style of A. Ostade, and although they are by no means equal to the playful point of that master, they are not without considerable merit.

DAUDET, JOHN BAPTIST, a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1737. He was the son of a print-seller, who sent him to Paris, where he became a pupil of J. G. Wille. We have some landscapes and marines, neatly and spiritedly engraved by him, as follow:

- Two Landscapes, with Figures and Cattle; after Berghem.
- An Italian Landscape, with Figures and Cattle; after Both, and Berghem.
- A Stag-hunt, etched by Dunker, and finished by Daudet; after Wouvermans.

- Two, of Roman Ruins; after Dietricy.

DAVEN, LEON, sometimes called DARIS, or DANET. The place of nativity of this engraver has not been satisfactorily ascertained. All that is precisely known of the circumstances of his life is, that he distinguished himself as an engraver at Rome and Florence about the year 1540, and that he accompanied Francesco Primaticcio to France, and engraved some plates after the works of that master at Fontainebleau; he had previously executed several plates after the pictures of that great painter before he visited France, and appears to have been particularly attached to him. His works are chiefly etched in a broad, bold, and singular manner; they possess however considerable merit, and are esteemed by the judicious collector. His plates are frequently marked with the initials L. D. The following are his principal prints:

DAVID, CHARLES, a French engraver, born at Paris about 1605. It is not ascertained by whom he was instructed, but he ranks as a very respectable artist among the engravers of his time. His plates are executed with the graver in a clear, firm manner, and his drawing is tolerably correct. His prints are held in considerable estimation. He usually marked his plates C. D. F. or C. D. The following are by him:

He engraved a considerable number of plates in the same style as his brother, many of which are portraits. The work of the two brothers consists of about two hundred and twenty prints. Jerome marked his plates sometimes with the letters H. D. F. or with the ciphers DF or HD. We have by him:

This artist is noticed by Ver-tue as the engraver of a plate from a model of a Fountain, with the Statues of Queen Anne, the Duke of Marlborough on Horseback, with River Gods, intended to have been erected at the Conduit in Cheapside. The print is inscribed Opus Equitis Claudii David, comitatus Burgundice.

[DAVID, JACQUES-LOUIS. This very eminent French historical painter was born at Paris in 1748, and was a scholar of Vien, whom he accompanied to Rome, on his appointment to the directorship of the French Academy in that city. He there made numerous studies of the antiques and the works of the old Italian masters. He returned to France in 1780, and distinguished himself by many classic productions. Louis XVI. commissioned him to paint a picture; and the subject he chose was the return of Brutus to his house after the condemnation of his sons. He took an active part in the revolution, and narrowly escaped the fate that befell many of the leaders. Having regained his liberty, he applied himself solely to his art, and produced some of his best works. Napoleon held him in high esteem, and he added to the emperor's glory by a flattering representation of him in his celebrated passage of Mount Saint Bernard, and other grand scenes of his reign. When the Bourbons returned, David was banished. Obivion and Pardon, which preceded them, were found to be words of equivocal or no meaning, as in the mouth of Charles II. of England. David retired to Brussels, where he received all the homage due to his great talents. He continued to paint till his seventy-eighth year, and produced many fine works during his exile. The government refused his family the sad favour of bringing his body to France for interment; but the artists and people of France honoured his memory, and still consider him the great restorer of painting in that country.]

DAVID, LODOVICO ANTONIO. This painter was born at Lugano in 1648. After studying some time at Milan, under the Cavaliere Cairo, and Ercole Procaccini, he went to Bologna, where he entered the school of Carlo Cignani. He was a painter of some eminence, and gave proof of his ability in the churches and convents at Milan, and at Venice. In the church of S. Silvestro, in the latter city, is a picture of the Nativity, more resembling the finished style of Camillo, than the other Procaccini. He also painted portraits of many of the distinguished persons of his time.

DAVID, LOUIS. According to Professor Christ, this engraver flourished at Venice about the year 1667. We have by him an upright plate, of the Taking down from the Cross, engraved in a clear, neat style. It is marked with the cipher D.

DAVIS, EDWARD LE, an engraver, stated in the Anecdotes to have been a native of Wales. He appears to have flourished about the year 1670. He was articled as a pupil to Loggan, but not being treated to his satisfaction, he fled from his indenture and went to France. On his return he engraved some portraits and other subjects, which have not much to recommend them independent of the interest excited by the characters they represent. We have by him :

An Ecce Homo; after Caracci; very scarce.
A Holy Family; after a basso-relievo by Algarði.

DAULLÉ, JOHN, an eminent French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1703. He received some instruction from his fellow citizen Robert Hequet, an artist little known, and afterwards went to Paris, where his merit was not long unnoticed, and he was received into the Academy in 1742. He engraved several plates of portraits, with historical and other subjects, which are chiefly worked with the graver in a clear and firm style, and which entitles him to the rank of one of the ablest artists of his time. The following are his principal plates :

PORTRAITS.

Catherine, Countess of Feuquieres, Daughter of P. Mignard, holding the Portrait of her Father; P. Mignard, pin. J. Daullé, sc.
Hyacinth Rigaud, painter; engraved for his reception at the Academy in 1742.
Margaret of Valois, Countess of Caylus; after Rigaud.
Charles Edward Stuart, son of the Pretender; 1744; scarce.

John Baptist Rousseau; after J. Aved.
John Mariette, engraver; after Pesme.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Diogenes with his Lantern; after Espagnoletto; the same.
The two sons of Rubens; after that painter; the same.

[He died at Paris in 1763.]

[DAWE, GEORGE, an English portrait painter, and a member of the Royal Academy, spent much of his artistic life in Russia, where he painted, it is said, about 400 portraits of the chiefs and leaders of the Russian army, who had, with the assistance of the snow, vanquished Napoleon. He had painted, before he left England, some pictures of a higher grade, one of which, "a Mother seeking her Child in an Eagle's Eyrie," attracted great attention. He made much money by his expedition to Russia, but did not live to enjoy it; for he died six weeks after his return to England in 1829. His portraits are reckoned good likenesses of the persons, but not expressive of character.]

DAWE, PHILIP, an eminent English engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1771. He engraved several subjects after H. Morland, and among other portraits by him we have those of Mrs. Yeates, in the character of Electra, after Cotes; and Admiral Sir Charles Hardy, after Hudson.

DEAN, JOHN, an English engraver in mezzotint. He was a pupil of Mr. Valentine Green, and has scraped several plates of portraits and other subjects in a very respectable style. The following are among his best plates :

PORTRAITS.

James, Earl of Abercorn; after Gainsborough.
James Caulfield, Earl of Charlemont; after Livesy.
George Vernon, Lord Vernon; after Gainsborough.
The Son of Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, when a child, as St. John; after Reynolds.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Four Evangelists, after Rubens and Jordaens.
St. Anthony of Padua; after Murillo.

DECKER, CORNELIUS, a German engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, resided chiefly at Nuremberg. He appears to have been much employed by the booksellers, and executed several plates in a coarse, harsh style. They are principally etched from his own designs; among his best prints are those engraved for Athanasii Kercheri Turris Babel. He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher

D.

DECKER, FRANCIS. It is surprising that this painter has not been noticed by any authority, although his pictures are to be met with in almost every collection, and possess great merit. He was a native of Holland, and painted landscapes in a very pleasing and natural style, resembling the charming productions of Ruysdael, without the servility of an imitator. From the appearance of his pictures, it is probable that he lived about the same time.

DECKER, I. DE. Mr. Strutt mentions this artist as the engraver of a small copy of the print representing the Treaty of Munster, engraved by Suyderhoef, after Terburg, in which he attempted to imitate the style of the original, but with no great success.

[DECKER, or DEKKER. There are no less than nine artists of this name enumerated by different writers, with admirable confusion, in apportioning their respective works. The distinguishing names are Adrien, Coenraet, François, Jan, Jacques, Cornelius, Charles, Custos, and Paul. Some call the landscape painter Coenraet, others Charles, or Henry, each saying that his pictures resemble those of Ruisdael; Custos and Francis are said to have painted grotesque subjects; Adrien is said to have been a scholar of Everdingen; Jan, a painter of interiors, conversations, and landscapes in the manner of Murant; and Paul, an architect and engraver. The Dekker with whose works we are best acquainted in England, is the one who, without being an imitator or copyist of Ruisdael, painted similar views on a small scale, and also weavers' workshops. It is probable that he was the scholar of Everdingen; Adrien Ostade and Adrien Van de Velde have ornamented some of his landscapes with figures and cattle. The works so ornamented Balkema ascribes to Conraet, and says that engravings by him have been discovered, signed Haerlem, 1685. Brulliot, after Heineken, says Charles was an engraver, and flourished about the commencement of the 18th century, and he calls the painter Cornelius.]

[DÉCLOCHE, N., a painter of Liege, who lived about the middle of the 18th century. He painted battle-pieces in a spirited manner; and also sacred subjects, two of which are in the church of St. Jacques at Liege.]

[DEFRANCE, LEONARD, born at Liege in 1735, was a scholar of J. B. Coclers; he painted historical pieces of large and small dimensions, also landscapes, game, fruit, flowers, and architecture. He was the first professor of design to the Academy at Liege, established by Prince Velbruck, and afterwards filled the same situation in the school of the central department of Ourthe. He died in 1805.]

DEHNE, J. C., a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1723. He engraved several portraits for the work entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published at Nuremberg. We have also by him a great number of plates, representing, in the most ludicrous manner, the gods, goddesses, heroes, &c. of antiquity.

DELARAM, FRANCIS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. He was contemporary with Elstracke and the Passes, and engraved several plates in the neat but formal style which was prevalent at that time. His portraits are the best of his works, and they are now become scarce. The following are his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

King Henry VIII.
Queen Mary, holding a Paper.
Queen Elizabeth.
James I.; as large as life.
Henry, Prince of Wales, son of James I.
Frances, Duchess of Richmond and Lennox. 1623.
Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland. 1619.
James Mountagu, Bishop of Winchester.
Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland.
John, Bishop of Lincoln, with Angels playing on Musical Instruments, and six Latin verses; a curious print.
Sir Henry Mountagu, Chief Justice of the King's Bench.
Sir Horatio Vere, with an armed Soldier on each side.
John Abbot, Bishop of Salisbury.
Sir William Segar, principal Herald at Arms.
Sir Thomas Gresham, holding a Globe.

George Withers, poet, 1622; Nec habeo, nec carco, nec curo.

Frontispiece to Withers's Preparation to the Psalter. 1619.

————— to the Seven Golden Candlesticks. 1624.

————— to Nero Caesar, or Monarchie depraved. 1627.

[DELCOUR, JAN GILES, a painter of Liege, was a scholar of B. Flemael, but went to Italy to study the works of the great masters. He made copies of some of Raphael's pictures, which were considered excellent. These are said to exist at Liege, where there are also some original pictures by him in the churches. He died in 1694.]

DELEN, DIRK, or THEODORE, VAN. This painter is introduced by M. Descamps, among the artists born about the year 1635. He was a native of Heusden, and was instructed by Francis Hals, under whom he studied some time, but his prevailing taste for architecture and perspective led him to a particular application to those branches, and he became a very eminent painter of views of churches, temples, and palaces, both interior and exterior. His pictures of that description are frequently decorated with figures by some of the most eminent of his contemporaries, particularly by Van Harp, which is no small addition to their value. The works of this master, with the advantage of similar assistance, are found in many distinguished collections. [There is much uncertainty respecting the exact time of this painter's birth and death. His name is written Daelens, Dalens, Delins, by different biographers, and he is confounded with Dalens the landscape painter.]

DELFINO, CARLO, a French painter, with an Italianized name, who, according to Lanzi, flourished at Turin about the year 1664, and was painter to the court. He was also employed for the churches, but his works are in no great estimation, abounding with the most ridiculous absurdities. In the church of S. Carlo, is an altar-piece by him, described by the above author as a most ludicrous composition.

DELFOF, A., a Dutch engraver, who, according to Basan, flourished about the year 1760. We have by him,

A Landscape, with Figures and Animals; after Berghem.

A Sea-port, with Shipping; after the same.

Several Views in Flanders, with Boors; after D. Teniers.

DELFT, or DELPHIUS, WILLIAM JAMES, a Dutch portrait painter, but more celebrated engraver. He was born at Delft in 1580, and received his first instruction in design from his father, Jacob van Delft, a portrait painter of little celebrity. He practised some time in the style of his father, but having attempted to engrave some plates after the portraits of Mirevelt, whose daughter he had married, his success was such as to induce him to abandon painting, and devote himself entirely to the graver. He handled that instrument with uncommon freedom and clearness, and his heads are finely drawn. The plates he executed in the earlier part of his life are more neatly finished than those he afterwards produced, but the latter are engraved in a bold open style, producing a fine effect. His plates are sometimes signed with his name, at others he used a cipher, composed of a G. and a D.

thus, . Although Delft has engraved several English portraits, and assumed the title of engraver to the king, it does not appear from Vertue that he was ever in England. The following are his principal portraits:

Charles I. of England; after D. Mytens.
Henrietta Maria, his Queen; after the same.
George Villars, Duke of Buckingham; after Mirevelt.
Michael Mirevelt, painter; after Vanduyck.

PORTRAITS AFTER MIREVELT.

Jacob Cato, poet and philosopher.
Hugo Grotius, Syndic of Rotterdam; fine.
Three fine Heads of William, Maurice, and Henry,
Princes of Orange.
Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden.
Frederick, King of Bohemia, Elector Palatine. 1632.
Elisabeth, Queen of Bohemia. 1630.
Wolfgang William, Duke of Bavaria.
Gaspar, Count de Coligni. 1631.
Louisa, Countess de Coligni. 1627.
Florentio, Count of Culenborch. 1627.
Catherine, Countess of Culenborch. 1636.
Philip William, Prince of Orange. 1628.
Marc. Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalatro.
Sir Dudley Carleton, Ambassador at the Hague.
John Olden Barnevelt. 1617.
Abraham vander Meer.
Hans de Ries.
Jacobus Triglandus, Professor in the University of Leyden. 1636.
Felix de Sambix, famous writing-master of Antwerp.

DELFT, or DELPHIUS, JAMES WILLIAM, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Delft in 1619. Having been instructed in the art of painting by his grandfather, Michael Mirevelt, he followed him in the excellent style of treating those subjects, and became eminent as a portrait painter. He also distinguished himself as an engraver, in which he was instructed by his father. A set of oval portraits, without the names of the painters, is generally attributed to this artist; among which are the following:

Frederick Henry, Prince of Orange, Count of Nassau
Katzenellenbogen.
Louis XIII. King of France.
Philip III. King of Spain.
Philip IV. King of Spain.
Ambrosius Spinola.
Vladislas IV. King of Poland.

[DELGADO, D. JUAN, a Spanish painter, established at Madrid about the commencement of the 18th century. He painted the picture of S. Francis Xavier in the Hermitage of Notre Dame, near the bridge of Segovia. He was a good colourist, but somewhat of a mannerist.]

[DELGADO, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Orgaz, where he painted in 1529 two large pictures on wood for the Hermitage of the Conception. One represents the Virgin surrounded by Saints, and the other a Descent from the Cross: they are both in the style of the 15th century.]

DELIBERATORE, NICCOLO, called NICCOLO FOLIGNATE. This painter was a native of Foligno, and, according to Lanzi, flourished from the year 1461 till 1480. The few of his works which have been preserved retain something of the Gothic style that had existed from the time of Giotto, nearly two centuries before him. The Abate G. Colucci, in his Antichità Picene, notices a picture in the church of St. Francis at Cagli, painted by N. Deliberatore in conjunction with Pietro di Mazzaforte in 1461, for which they were paid one hundred and fifteen golden ducats, a considerable sum for that time. Another picture is mentioned by Lanzi at Camerino, in the church of S. Venanzio, representing the Crucifixion, with several figures painted on a golden ground; it is inscribed opus Nicolai Fulginatis, 1480.

DELMONT, DEODATO, a Flemish painter, born at St. Tron, near Antwerp, in 1581. He was of an ancient family, and was educated suitably to his birth. His inclination for the art induced his parents to introduce him to the school of Rubens, whom he had the good fortune of accompanying in his journey through Italy. These advantages were not neglected by the young Delmont, and he became an eminent painter of history. He was for some time employed at the court of Nieubourg, and also received some commissions from the king of Spain. In the churches of the Low Countries he has left several proofs of his ability. At Antwerp, in the cathedral, is a picture by this painter of the Transfiguration; in the church of the Jesuits, was formerly an altar-piece of Christ bearing his Cross; and in the convent, called Facons, the Adoration of the Magi. He died in 1634.

DELSENBACH, JOHN ADAM, a German engraver, who flourished at Vienna about the year 1721. He engraved several portraits for a work entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published at Nuremberg. He also engraved part of the plates for the History of Architecture, with Views of the most famous Buildings in the World, after the designs of J. H. Fischers, published at Vienna in 1721. Part of the views of the principal buildings in the city and suburbs of Vienna are by this artist.

[DEMARNE, JEAN-LOUIS, born at Brussels in 1744, was a scholar of Briard, and a member of the ancient Academy of Painting at Paris. His works consist of landscapes with animals, village festivals, incidents in humble life, and sometimes battles, fairs, and moonlights. They are all treated in a very interesting and pleasing manner; rich in colour, and display great artistic skill. The greater part of his pictures are to be found in foreign countries, particularly in Russia, although most of them were painted in France. He died in 1829.]

DENANTO, FRANCESCO, an engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1530. Among others, we have a large wooden cut by him, representing Christ healing the lame Man. It is executed in a spirited, tasteful style, and is probably from a design of his own, as it is inscribed, Franciscus Denanto de Sabaudia, f.

[DENEYN, PETER PIETERZ, a scholar of Esais Vandevelde, born in 1597, painted landscapes and battles.]

[DENIS, or DENYS, SIMON, born at Antwerp in 1750, was a scholar of Antonissen. He quitted his country and resided in Italy, where he painted landscapes and cattle, in which he excelled. His pictures are much coveted, though he is accused of using too much yellow in his colouring. He is very accurate in his botanical representations. He died at Naples in 1815.]

DENNEL, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1741. He was a pupil of Beauvarlet, and has engraved several plates in the style of that artist; among which are the following:

The Triumph of Galatea; after L. Giordano.
Pygmalion enamoured of his Statue; after Lagrené.
The Triumph of Painting; after the same.
Painting cherished by the Graces; after the same.

DENNER, BALTHASAR. This laborious painter, whose works surprise by the toilsome servility of their finish, as much as they disgust by a total absence of all that is estimable in the art, was born at Hamburg in 1685. After being instructed in drawing by an obscure painter at Altona, he went to Berlin in 1707, where his works were admired by Frederick II. The Duchess of Wolfenbutel invited him to her court in 1720, where he painted her portrait; from thence he went to Hanover, where he met with such encouragement that he visited London in the reign of George I. It does not appear that he remained long in England, as he left it in 1728; and it reflects no discredit on the taste of the country that he did not receive sufficient encouragement to induce him to remain here longer. The only productions of this mechanic in the art, that have any claim to notice, are his heads of old men and women, which still find collectors among the admirers of patient and persevering precision. He died in 1747. [Brulliot mentions a B. Denner, an engraver, who published a work after C. Meyer in 1683, the subjects of which he quotes, but gives no particulars of the artist.]

[DENON, BARON DOMINIC VINCENT, born at Chalons in 1747, was one of the train of artists, literary men, and scientific characters, who accompanied Napoleon Buonaparte to Egypt; where he alternately wielded the pen and the sword, and, it is said, with equal dexterity. His great work on the Egyptian expedition, the numerous drawings for which were made by himself, is alone sufficient to immortalize his name. Napoleon was warmly attached to him, gave him the superintendence of the Museums, and consulted him on all matters connected with the fine arts. He died at Paris in 1825, universally beloved for his good qualities, and admired for his talents and the purity of his taste.]

DENTONE, GIROLAMO CURTI, called it, was born at Bologna in 1576, and was first a disciple of Lionello Spada, but finding that his genius directed him rather to perspective than the design of the figure, he quitted that master, and applied himself to study from the noble edifices erected from the plans of Giacomo Baroccio, called Il Vignola. He afterwards went to Rome, where he improved his taste, by contemplating the magnificent vestiges of ancient architecture in that capital. He was a perfect master of the chiaro-scuro, and gave to his works so surprising a relief, that they have the appearance of perfect illusion. There are many of his works in the palaces and public edifices at Bologna, in which the figures are painted by the most distinguished of his contemporaries. He died in 1632.

DENYS, JAMES, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, according to M. Descamps, about the year 1647. He was a scholar of Erasmus Quellinus the elder, but at an early age he went to Italy, where he studied the works of the most eminent masters, and where he passed the greater part of his life. His merit recommended him to the patronage of the Duke of Mantua, in whose employment he passed several years. He afterwards was invited to Florence, where he painted several historical pictures for the Palazzo Pitti, and the portrait of the Grand Duke, with those of the principal personages of the court. These works gained him the esteem of his patron, who presented him with a gold medal and chain. After fourteen years' absence, he returned to his native country, and was received with the most honourable distinction. He did not long survive his return to Antwerp, where he died in the prime of life. The style of Denys, both in his historical works and his portraits, resembles that of Vandyck, with something more of the Italian taste, though inferior to him in the purity of his colouring.

DÉODATE, ———. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of Sir Theodore Mayerne, physician to James I. and Charles I.

DEQUEVAUVILLER, FRANÇOIS, a modern French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1745. He was one of the best pupils of J. Daullé, and has engraved some plates of landscapes in a neat, pleasing manner. Among others, the following:

Noon, a Landscape with figures; after Berghem.
Evening, the companion, the etching by Weisbrod; after the same.

A Landscape, with Cattle; after D. van Bergen.

A View of Landeck; after C. Brand.

A View on the Adige; after the same.

A Landscape, with Ruins; after F. Decker.

The Bathers; after C. Poelenburg.

DERSON, N., a French engraver, who appears from the inscription on one of his prints to have been of Reims in Champagne. We have by this artist, a plate of the fine front of the church of Notre Dame at Reims, neatly etched and finished with the graver, with several figures spiritedly touched in the style of Callot. It is inscribed N. Derson, Reim. sculp. 1625.

DERVET, CLAUDE, a painter and engraver, born at Nancy, in Lorraine, in 1600. He was a scholar of Claude Henriet, and living in habits of intimacy with his fellow citizen Callot, he adopted the style of that master, and engraved a few plates entirely in his manner, of which two are said to be after the designs of Callot, viz.

Charles IV. Duke of Lorraine on Horseback, with Military Attributes; on one of the Cannons is inscribed C. Dervet, fec. 1628.

Pallas on Horseback, holding a Battle-axe.

DERYCK, PETER CORNELIUS. This painter was born at Delft in 1568, and was a scholar of Hubert Jacobz, usually called Grimani. Having acquired some knowledge of design under that master, he visited Rome and Venice, and passed some years in the latter city studying the works of Giacomo Bassano, whose style he imitated with success. He died in 1630.

DERYKE, WILLIAM, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1635. He was bred a goldsmith, but quitted that business to study painting, and made some proficiency in history and portraits, though he never reached any eminence. He visited England in the reign of King William, and died in London in 1697.

DESANI, PIETRO. This painter was born at Bologna, according to Malvasia, in 1595, and was a disciple of Lionello Spada, under whom he became a very reputable painter of history. He resided chiefly at Reggio, where there is scarcely a church or a public edifice that does not contain some of his works. Among the most esteemed are, a picture of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary, Magdalene, and St. John, in the Chiesa del Corpo di Christo, and a St. Francis receiving the Stigmata in the church of the Padri Zoccolanti. The compositions of Desani are masterly, and his design correct; but there is a crudity and hardness in his colouring that gives his pictures a disagreeable effect. He died in 1657.

DESPLACES, LOUIS, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris in 1682. He engraved a considerable number of plates, which possess great merit, some of them are in the style of Gerard Audran, and though he is unequal to that distinguished artist, his design is correct, and his works evince an excellent taste. His best prints are those after Jouvenet. He worked with the point and the graver. The following are his principal works:

SUBJECTS ENGRAVED FOR THE CROZAT COLLECTION.

Jupiter and Danaë; after Titian.

Paul Veronese between Virtue and Vice; after P. Veronese.

Wisdom accompanying Hercules; after the same.
Christ washing the Feet of his Disciples; after G. Mutiano.
The Adoration of the Magi; after Guisio Romano.
The Triumph of Titus and Vespasian; after the same;
very fine.

The Crucifixion; after An. Caracci.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter; after Il Calabrese.

The Purification; after Tintoretto.

Diana and Acteon; after Carlo Maratti.

The Rape of Helen; after Guido.

The Birth of Adonis; after C. Cignani.

The Roman Charity; after Le Brun.

Hercules combating the Centaurs; after the same.

Christ curing the Sick; after Jowenat.

The Elevation of the Cross; after the same.

The taking down from the Cross; after the same.

St. Bruno praying; after the same.

Venus prevailing on Vulcan to forge the Arms of Æneas; after the same.

The Triumph of Venus; after Ant. Coypel.

Cupid taking Refuge with Anacreon; after the same.

Æneas saving his Family from the Burning of Troy; after the same.

DESPORTES, FRANCIS, an eminent French painter of huntings and animals, born at Champagneul, in Champagne, in 1661. He was a scholar of Nicasius Bernaert, a Flemish painter then resident at Paris, who had studied under Snyders, and who died before his disciple had made any great progress in the art. Without the assistance of further instruction, he applied himself with great assiduity to the study of nature, not only in animals and landscape, but in perfecting himself in the design of the figure after the model of the academy. Desportes was not satisfied, as is frequently the case with artists in that branch, with painting the animals, and leaving to others the more important part of the picture. He painted the hunters, as well as their game, and his figures are well drawn, and full of character. He was much employed by Louis XIV. in the palaces of Versailles, Fontainebleau, and Meudon, and was made painter to the king with a pension. In 1699, he became a member of the academy at Paris. M. D'Argenville asserts, that he accompanied the Duc D'Aumont in his embassy to England, where he painted several pictures, but he is not mentioned in the Anecdotes. He died in 1743. [Although he is not mentioned in Walpole's Anecdotes, there is no doubt of the fact that he painted in England.]

DESUBLEO, or SOBLOE, MICHELE. According to Lanzi, this painter was a native of Flanders, but came young to Bologna. He was educated in the school of Guido Reni. He painted some pictures for the churches at Bologna, particularly in Gesu e Maria, which partake of the style of his master, with something of the vigour of Guercino. He resided a great part of his life at Venice, where there are several of his works, the most esteemed of which is an altar-piece in the church of the Carmelites, representing some Saints of that order.

DEUTSCH, NICHOLAS MANUEL, an old engraver on wood, born at Berne in Switzerland, and flourished about the year 1518. There are some wooden cuts by him from his own designs, in a free, slight style. He marked his prints with a cipher composed of N. M. D. joined together thus NMD.

with a dagger underneath. We have by him,
A Figure of a Woman standing; to the cipher he has added VON BERN.

A composition of several Female Figures, with the cipher; dated 1518.

DEUTSCH, RODOLPHUS MANUEL. To this engraver, who was probably the son of the preceding artist, and who flourished about the year 1548, Professor Christ attributes some wooden cuts, marked with a monogram composed of the letters R. H. M.

D. thus, RMD. with a dagger. They are executed in a free, spirited manner, and possess great merit. Sometimes the initials H. H. are found on prints marked with the above cipher, which has given rise to a supposition that Hans Holbein executed some cuts in conjunction with this artist. Several of his prints are dated in 1548. Mr. Strutt mentions some small prints of animals, and one of three figures conversing, in a landscape.

DEVIS, ARTHUR, was born at Preston in Lancashire, about the year 1708, and was the pupil of Peter Tillemans. He painted in a variety of ways, sometimes portraits, but mostly in small whole-lengths and conversation pieces. He was an exhibitor at the Society's Rooms, in the Strand, in 1761, but never joined either the Chartered Society or the Royal Academy. He lived in Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, where he supported the character of a respectable artist. He died in 1787.

[DEVIS, ARTHUR WILLIAM, an English historical and portrait painter, was born in 1762, and received his first instructions in painting from his father. He made rapid progress in the art, and obtained, at an earlier age than is usual, a medal from the Royal Academy, and, what was of more importance, the good opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds. In his twentieth year he was appointed draughtsman, by the East India Company, to accompany Captain Wilson in the Antelope in a voyage round the world. The vessel was wrecked, and he sustained many hardships. He afterwards went to Bengal, where he continued the exercise of his art, and painted the picture of Lord Cornwallis receiving the two sons of Tippoo Saib as hostages. He returned to England in 1795, and painted for Mr. Alexander Davison two historical pictures; the one representing the detection of Babington's conspiracy, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and the other, Archbishop Langton showing Magna Charta to the Barons, at Bury St. Edmund's. The portraits in this picture are not of the actual descendants of the barons, but of noblemen of distinction who were desirous of being so represented. He also painted for the same gentleman an excellent portrait of Nelson. He painted the scene of the death of Nelson on board the Victory. His last picture was one commemorative of the death of the Princess Charlotte. His life was one of vicissitudes and difficulties, and was terminated by a stroke of apoplexy in 1822. Devis, as an historical painter, was equal, if not superior, to any of his day, had circumstances conduced to bring his powers into action. His picture of the detection of Babington's conspiracy was painted in competition with the most eminent members of the Royal Academy, B. West, Northcote, Copley, Smirke, Tresham, Wilkie, and others; and, unquestionably, was the best in composition, delineation of character, truth of colour, and management of chiaro-scuro. His portrait is in the composition.]

DE WIT. See WIT.

DEYNUM, JOHN BAPTIST, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1620. He excelled in painting historical subjects and landscapes in distemper, and was an eminent miniature portrait painter.

DEYSTER, LOUIS. This painter was born at Bruges in 1656, and was a scholar of John Maes, a respectable artist of that city. He afterwards visited Italy, where he studied six years at Rome and Venice. On his return to Flanders he painted many pictures for the churches of his native city, which distinguished him as one of the ablest painters of his time. His compositions are judicious, and his design more correct than is usual in the artists of the Flemish school. His colour is glowing and transparent, with a freshness in the carnations resembling Vandyck. In the church of St. James at Bruges, are three fine pictures by Deyster, representing the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, and the Death of the Virgin. In the church of St. Anne, in the same city, is another esteemed work by him of the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian. He died in 1711.

DEYSTER, ANNE. This paintress was the daughter of Louis Deyster, born at Bruges in 1696. She acquired some reputation in painting landscapes, and executed some historical works for the churches in the style of her father. She died in 1746.

DIAMANTINI, GIUSEPPE CAVALIERE, a painter and more eminent engraver, who was a native of Romagna about the year 1660. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but he resided chiefly at Venice, where he distinguished himself by several works, both as a painter and an engraver. In the church of S. Moise is a picture by him of the Adoration of the Magi, well composed, and painted with great facility. He was more employed for private collections than for the churches, and must have devoted a great part of his time to engraving, as he has left us a considerable number of plates, of which the greater part are etchings. They are executed in a free style, with considerable taste, and his design is graceful, and tolerably correct. The following are his principal prints, which are frequently marked Eques Diamantinus, in. f.

The Holy Family, with St. John holding a Cross.

Hagar in the Desert; oval.

The Marriage at Cana; after P. Veronese.

The dead Christ, supported by an Angel.

The Death of Dido; octagon.

Venus, Ceres, and Apollo.

Mercury and Flora.

The Fall of Phaeton.

Mercury and Argus; octagon.

Venus and Adonis; the same.

Another Venus and Adonis; different composition.

Mars and Venus.

Diana and Endymion.

The Sacrifice of Iphigenia.

Boreas carrying off Orythia.

Justice and Peace.

Eight emblematical subjects of different sizes.

DIAMER, H. F., a Flemish engraver, by whom we have a set of biblical subjects etched in the manner of Sebastian le Clerc. There are also a few portraits by him, among which is that of Albertus Miræus, after Vandyck.

[DIAS MORANTE, PEDRO, was a good designer, and painted small figures, birds, animals, and ornaments, with exquisite taste. He flourished about 1630, but no particulars of him are recorded, except that he published a work entitled Instruccion de los principios, and that he was denounced to the Inquisition as a Sorcerer, because he wrote with both hands.]

[DIAZ, DIEGO VALENTIN, a Spanish painter of history and architecture. He painted several important pictures for the church of S. Benoit, and the convent of S. Francis; but the work which did him the greatest honour was the perspective he painted for the house of Mercy, or hospital for orphans, at Valladolid. The architecture is in the finest style, and the statues which he introduced are admirably executed. Diaz accumulated considerable wealth, the greater part of which he left for the support of this hospital, which he founded, and where he was buried in 1660. His portrait, and that of his wife, are placed above his tomb.]

DICKSON, J., an English engraver, who resided at Oxford about the year 1660. He engraved a portrait of Edward Parry, Bishop of Killaloe, prefixed to his Antidote against the Prosperity of the Wicked, and the Afflictions of the Just, published in 1660. It is now become scarce.

DIELAI. See SURCHI.

DIEPENBECK, ABRAHAM. This eminent artist was born at Bois-le-Duc in 1607. With the advantage of a classical education, and brought up under Rubens, he was nurtured in a genial soil, and, like his great instructor, he treated with equal success subjects of history and the fable. His first pursuit in the art was painting on glass, and he produced some works in that branch which are highly esteemed, particularly the windows in a chapel in the cathedral of Antwerp, where he represented the works of Mercy, and some others in the church of the Dominicans, representing the Life of St. Paul. He abandoned glass painting soon after his return from Italy, whither he went in search of improvement, and devoted himself to oil painting and designing. From his inventive genius, and his uncommon facility, he was much employed in designs for the publications of his time, particularly for the celebrated work of the Temple of the Muses, in which he has discovered a readiness of invention, and a clear conception of his subjects, which are alone sufficient to establish his reputation as one of the most ingenious artists of his country. In the church of the Carmelites at Antwerp is a fine picture by this master, representing the Virgin in the Clouds, with St. Ely; and at the Recollets there are some pictures by Diepenbeck, that are said by Descamps to be equal to Vandyck. This painter was in England in the reign of Charles I., and was much employed by the Duke of Newcastle, for whom he made the designs for the book on horsemanship. He died in 1675.

DIEPRAAM, ABRAHAM, a Dutch painter of drolleries and drunken frolics. He was a scholar of Henry Martin Rokes, called Zorg, although he did not follow the style of that master, but attached himself to an imitation of the works of Adrian Brower, in which he was not very successful.

DIEST, ADRIAN VAN. This artist was born at the Hague in 1655. He was the son of a painter of sea-pieces, by whom he was instructed in the art. When he was seventeen years of age he came to London, and was employed by Granville, Earl of Bath, for whom he painted several views and ruins in the west of England. He also painted portraits, but did not meet with much encouragement, although his pictures, particularly his landscapes, possess considerable merit; as a proof of which Lord Orford states, that there were seven pictures by Van Diest in Sir Peter Lely's collection. He etched several landscapes from his own designs, in a slight, masterly style. Van Diest died in London in 1704. [Unfortunately for his reputation, he is generally known by his worst pictures, which are frequently found in old houses, on wainscots, over doors, executed in a hasty manner, with much mountainous back-ground. His better pictures, as if ashamed of their brethren, have changed their name.]

DIETEL, CHRISTOPHER, and F. A. These artists, who were probably brothers, resided at Vienna. They engraved conjointly a set of plates, representing the principal fountains at Rome.

DIETRICH, or DIETRICY, CHRISTIAN WILLIAM ERNEST, an ingenious modern German artist, born at Wiemar in Saxony in 1712. He learnt the incipient principles of art from his father, an un-noticed artist, and was afterwards a scholar of a landscape painter named Thiele. He established himself at Dresden, where he was patronized by the court, and was sent to Italy in 1742, where he passed some time at Rome and Venice. His studies in Italy do not appear to have had much influence on his style, which remained entirely German. His chief talent consisted in a successful imitation of the works of Rembrandt, Ostade, Poelenburg, Salvator Rosa, &c., particularly as a colourist, in which he greatly excelled. As an engraver, Dietricy has a considerable claim to notice; he has left us a great number of etchings, executed in a very neat and spirited style, which, like his paintings, are in imitation of the above-named masters. His work extends to near two hundred prints, several of which are now become scarce, as he frequently destroyed the engraving, after having taken off a certain number of impressions, to make use of the plate again. The following are his principal prints:

SACRED SUBJECTS.

- Lot and his Daughters; scarce.
- Abraham going to sacrifice Isaac, 1730; scarce.
- The same subject differently composed; very scarce.

- About Thirty-six Plates of Landscapes, in the styles of Berghem, Breemberg, Claude Lorraine, Ruysdael, and Salvator Rosa, and in his own manner.

DIETZSCH, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1710. His pictures of landscape were admired in his time in his own country, and he has left some plates of landscapes etched in the style of Waterloo, which, though more finished, are very inferior to that master in picturesque simplicity. We have by him the following plates:

- The Portrait of Coreggio.
- That of Raffaele.
- Sixteen Landscapes in the manner of Ruysdael and Waterloo.

DIETZSCH, JOHN ALBERT, the brother of the preceding artist, engraved about twenty plates of views of Nuremberg and the vicinity, published in 1760. [He also painted battle-pieces, landscapes, fruit, flowers, and portraits. He was born in 1720, and died in 1782. Some of his landscapes have been engraved by Prestel.]

DIRICKSEN, D., a German engraver, who resided at Hamburgh about the year 1690. He was principally employed by the booksellers, and engraved some portraits in a neat style, resembling that of the Passes. Among others, is that of Hadrrianus a Mensicht, with an ornamental border, with some Latin verses.

DISCEPOLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Lugano in 1590. He was usually called il Zoppo di Lugano, from his being a cripple. Although he was for some time a scholar of Camillo Procaccini, he did not adopt the style of that master. Lanzi states him to have been one of the best and chastest colourists of his time. Several of his works are in the churches at Milan, of which his picture of Purgatory in S. Carlo is particularly esteemed. Lugano, and Como, also possess some of his works; in the church of S. Teresa, in the latter place, is a picture of that Saint, which is much admired. He died in 1660.

DITMER, or DITMAR, JOHN, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about the year 1574. He is said by Mr. Huber to have engraved some plates after Martin de Vos, and other Flemish masters, but he does not specify them. We have by him a print after Michael Coxcie, representing Christ seated in the Clouds, surrounded by Angels holding the Instruments of the Passion, with the animals symbolical of the Four Evangelists, dated 1574.

DIXON, JOHN, an eminent English engraver in mezzotint, who flourished about the year 1770. We have several fine portraits engraved by him, after Sir Joshua Reynolds and other masters; among which are the following:

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- William Beckford*, Lord Mayor of London; ad vivum del. 1771.
- Henry, Duke of Buccleugh*, with Lady Mary Scot fondling a Dog; after Gainsborough. 1771.
- Mr. Garrick* in the character of Richard III.; after N. Dance.

PORTRAITS AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

- Mary, Duchess of Ancaster*.
- Francis Conway*, Earl of Hertford.
- William, Duke of Leinster*. 1775.
- Henry Herbert*, Earl of Pembroke.
- The Countess of Pembroke, with her son, Lord Herbert.
- Charles Townshend*, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

DOBSON, WILLIAM. This painter, whom King Charles I. styled the English Tintoretto, was born in the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, in 1610. He was placed as an apprentice to Robert Peake, a portrait painter and picture dealer, who was afterwards knighted by Charles I. From this master's instruction he was not likely to profit much, but he procured him the means of copying some pictures by Titian and Vandyck, by which he acquired an excellent principle of colouring, and great freedom of hand. On leaving his master, Dobson appears to have lived in indigence and obscurity until Vandyck, passing a shop on Snow-hill, perceived a picture exposed for sale in the window, which had sufficient merit to excite his curiosity to discover the painter, whom he found at work in a miserable garret. The well-known liberality of Vandyck soon relieved him from his wretched situation; he afterwards introduced him to the king, and zealously recommended him to his Majesty's protection. On the death of Vandyck, Dobson was appointed serjeant painter to the king, whom he accompanied to Oxford, where he painted his portrait, that of Prince Rupert, and several of the nobility. The melancholy fate of that amiable monarch was followed by the overthrow of arts and elegance, and Dobson, who was imprudent and expensive, became involved in his circumstances, and debauched in his course of life; in which distressed condition he died in 1646. Of the painters of his time, Dobson appears to have approached nearest to the excellence of Vandyck. His portraits are faithful transcripts of nature, and although he was not equally successful in his historical pictures, the few of them that he painted are not without considerable merit. One of his best works in history, is the Decollation of St. John, at Wilton. Several portraits by Dobson are in Northumberland House, at Chatsworth, in Devonshire House, and other mansions of the nobility. [Why Dobson should be called the English Tintoretto is difficult to imagine, as his manner of painting bears no resemblance to that artist's. It is an appellation that only tends to mislead.]

DOCENO. See GHERARDI.

DOES, ANTHONY VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at the Hague in 1610. We have by him several portraits, and a few other subjects, executed with the graver in the style of Paul Pontius, of whom it is not improbable he may have been a pupil. Although inferior to that artist, his best plates have considerable merit. He engraved several of the plates for a work entitled Portraits des hommes illustres dans le 17^{me}. siecle, published at Amsterdam, some of which are dated in 1649. The following are also by him :

PORTRAITS.

Ferdinand, Cardinal-Infant of Spain, Governor of the Low Countries, on Horseback; in the background is the Battle of Nortlingen; after A. Diepenbeck.

Gerard Coch, Senator of Bremen; after A. van Halle.
George Wagner, Questor of Eslingen, Plenipotentiary at the peace of Osnaburg; after the same.

The Marquis of Castello Rodrigo; after Rubens.

Francis de Mello, on Horseback; in the background a Battle.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Magdalene; after Vandyck.

A Miracle wrought by St. Francis; after A. Diepenbeck.

The Virgin and Child; after Eras. Quellinus.

The Holy Family; after the same.

DOES, JACOB VANDER, THE ELDER. This painter was born at Amsterdam in 1623. After being instructed for some time by Nicholas Moyaert, he visited Paris, when he was twenty-one years of age, and afterwards proceeded to Italy. He designed with attention the views in the vicinity of Rome, and the pictures of Peter van Laer, called Bamboccio, being then in great estimation in Italy, he attached himself to the style of that master, and painted similar subjects with considerable success. After passing some years at Rome, he returned to Holland, where his works were admired for a more elevated taste than was usual in the artists of his country. Vander Does is said by Descamps to have been of a morose and melancholy disposition, and he observes, that his works partake of the gloominess of his character. It is certain that his pictures are generally painted in a darker tone than nature admits in the subjects he treated; they would otherwise claim our admiration by the choice of his scenery, the correct design of his figures and animals, particularly his sheep and goats, which are touched with a precision and beauty of pencil which has hardly been surpassed. He died at Amsterdam in 1673. We have by Vander Does several small landscapes, with cattle and animals, etched in a free and masterly manner.

DOES, SIMON VANDER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Amsterdam in 1653, and was instructed in the art by his father. His pictures, like those of the elder Vander Does, usually represent landscapes, with figures and cattle, painted in a clearer and more agreeable tone than those of his father; he also painted small portraits and domestic subjects, finished in the style of Gaspar Netscher. This artist is said by Houbraken to have visited England, where he did not remain longer than a year; he is not however noticed by Lord Orford. Simon vander Does etched a few plates of landscapes with cattle, neatly finished. He died in 1717.

DOES, JACOB VANDER, THE YOUNGER, was the second son of Jacob vander Does, born at Amsterdam in 1654. After receiving the instruction of his father, and Karel du Jardin in landscape, he quitted that style to apply to historical painting under Gerard de Lairesse, in which he made great progress, and produced some pictures which promised great celebrity, if he had not been cut off in the bloom of life at the commencement of a brilliant career. [He died at Paris in 1691.]

DOESBURGH, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. He engraved a plate representing Admiral van Tromp engaging the English fleet. We have also by him several prints of the old Roman customs; they are etched and finished with the graver in a very indifferent style.

DOFIN, OLIVIER, a French engraver, mentioned by Basan, who says he resided at Bologna, where he died in 1693. He etched several plates after the works of the Caracci and other masters.

DOLABELLA, TOMMASO. This painter was a native of Belluno about the year 1580, and according to Ridolfi was a scholar of Antonio Vasilacchi, called Aliense. He excelled in painting portraits, and was invited to the court of Poland by Sigismond III., where he painted the royal family, and several of the nobility, and was favoured with the particular protection of that monarch. He painted a few historical subjects, but is more celebrated as a portrait painter.

[DOLCE, or DOLCI, LUZIO, of Castel Durante in the state of Urbino, who flourished in 1589, is commended for his altar-pieces and other pictures in the churches there. It is said that he was employed by the duke of Urbino to paint at the Imperiale. He executed many works at Rome, as well as Castel Durante, and studied and resided in the former city for some time. There are few particulars recorded of him, though he is mentioned with great commendations by several writers of judgment.]

DOLCI, CARLO, or CARLINO. This painter was born at Florence in 1616, and was a scholar of Jacopo Vignali. Without the possession of much genius or invention, he excited considerable interest by a number of pleasing and highly-finished pictures, chiefly confined to devout subjects, and most frequently representing heads of our Saviour, and of the Virgin. These are not so much admired for particular beauty of character, as for a soft and tranquil expression of devotion in the patient suffering of Christ, the plaintive sorrow of Mater Dolosa, or the compunction of a Saint in penitence. Subjects of that description he has treated with great delicacy and tenderness. The general tone of his colouring is well appropriated to the character of his subjects, nothing is harsh or obtrusive, all is modest, placid, and harmonious. He generally painted in a small size, though there are some pictures by him as large as life at Florence, of which the principal are, the St. Anthony, in the Florentine Gallery; the Conception, in the collection of the Marchesi Rinuccini; the Evangelists, in the palace of the Marchesi Riccardi; and the St. Sebastian, in the Corsini palace. There is a fine picture of Christ breaking the Bread, in the collection of the Marquis of Exeter at Burleigh. His small pictures of heads of the Madonna are more numerous, and are highly valued by the admirers of polished and laborious finishing. He died in 1686. [There are many repetitions of his small pictures by his pupils, Loma and Mancini, and his daughter Agnese. The two Madonnas in the cabinet of the Grand Duke, and his martyrdom of S. Andrew, in the possession of the Marquis Gerani, have been often copied. There are many of his pictures in England, besides that at Burleigh, and they obtain very high prices in public sales.]

DOLCI, AGNESE. She was the daughter of the preceding artist, and arrived at some degree of excellence in copying the works of her father. She also painted some pictures of her own composition, but never approached the merit of Carlo.

DOLEND, BARTHOLOMEW, a Dutch engraver, born at Leyden about the year 1566, and is presumed to have been instructed in engraving by Henry Goltzius. He worked entirely with the graver, in an open, clear style. We have by him several plates, some of which are from his own designs. He occasionally marked his prints with his name, but more frequently with one of these ciphers,

BD.  B. Among others, we have

by him the following:

Jonas in the Sea, swallowed by the Whale; circular.

Jonas thrown back on the Sea-shore; the same.

A Dutch Merry-making; after his own design.

Adam and Eve taking the Forbidden Fruit; after C. Van Mander.

Christ appearing to Magdalene; B. Dolendo, inv. et fec.

The Holy Family; after M. Cozzie.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness.

Pyramus and Thisbe; after Crispin vanden Broeck.

Jupiter and Ceres; an allegorical subject; after B. Spranger.

The Assumption of the Virgin.

DOLEND, ZACHARY. This artist was also a native of Leyden, a contemporary, and probably a relation of the preceding engraver, whom he surpassed, both in the style of his graver, and in the correctness of his design. He is said, by Mr. Huber, to have been a disciple of James de Ghein. There are some portraits by this master, which are not inferior in neatness to those by J. Wierix: his plates are frequently marked with a cipher composed of Z. and D. thus, ZD. We have by him, William, Prince of Orange; half-length, in Armour; Z. Dolendo. 1581.

Andromeda chained to the Rock; finely drawn; from his own design.

Adam and Eve embracing, whilst Eve receives the Apple from the Serpent; after B. Spranger.

The Contenance of Scipio; after A. Bloemaert.

The Virgin and Infant, with Two Angels; after J. du Ghein.

The Crucifixion; after the same.

St. Martin dividing his Cloak with two Beggars; after Spranger.

A Set of small Plates of the Gods and Goddesses; copied from the larger ones by Henry Goltzius.

DOLIVAR, JOHN. This artist is said by Huber to have been born at Saragossa in 1641. He studied engraving at Paris, and engraved some of the plates of ornamental and decorative subjects for Bervain's Ornaments. He was also employed in the set of the little conquests of Louis XIV. His works are compared with those of Le Pautre and Chaveau, though inferior to both.

DOLLE, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who was chiefly employed in portraits for the booksellers. He flourished about the year 1630, and worked chiefly with the graver in a stiff, tasteless style, and his portraits are sought after rather on account of their scarcity, than their merit as engravings. We have by him the following portraits:

Sir Henry Wotton, Provost of Eton.

Mark Francke, Master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge.

John Cosin, Bishop of Durham.

George Villars, Duke of Buckingham.

Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln.

John Milton.

Robert, Earl of Essex.

Samuel Botley, Short-hand Writer.

[DOMENECH, ANTONIO, a painter of Valencia, and scholar of Padre Nicolas Borrás, whom he assisted in several of his works, and whose manner he so closely imitated, that even at Valencia, where the productions of Borrás may be supposed to be well known, the works of Domenech are attributed to him.]

DOMENICHINO, DOMENICO ZAMPIERI, called. This celebrated painter is introduced under the name of Domenichino, by which he is generally known, rather than that of his family, Zampieri, for the facility of reference. Domenico Zampieri was born at Bologna in 1581, and was placed, when young, under the tuition of Denis Calvart; but having been treated with severity by that master, for having been discovered copying a drawing by Annibale Caracci, he prevailed on his father to remove him from that school, and to permit him to enter the academy of the Caracci, where Guido and Albano were then students. It was the practice of that celebrated seminary to excite the emulation of the pupils by proposing prizes for the best drawings, and one of those occasions occurred soon after Domenichino became their scholar. Fearful and unambitious, without hope of success, he was obliged, like the other pupils, to offer his design; and whilst his fellow students gave in their works with confidence, regarding him with an air of conscious superiority, Domenichino approached with timidity, scarcely daring to present his drawing, which he would gladly have withheld. Lodovico Caracci examined the whole, and pronounced Domenichino the successful candidate. This triumph, instead of rendering him confident and presumptuous, only served to incite him to greater assiduity. He contracted an intimacy with Albano, and on leaving the school of the Caracci, they visited together Parma, Modena, and Reggio, to contemplate the works of Coreggio and Parmegiano. On their return to Bologna, Albano went to Rome, and was soon afterwards followed by Zampieri. The Cardinal

Agucchi was the first that favoured him with his patronage, employed him in his palace, and commissioned him to paint three pictures for the church of S. Onofria, representing subjects from the life of S. Jerome. Whilst at Rome, Domenichino was a frequent visitor of Annibale Caracci, who was then engaged in his great work of the Farnesian Gallery, and he was intrusted by that master to execute a part of it from his cartoons. He painted from his own designs in the loggia in the garden, the Death of Adonis, when Venus springs from her Car to succour her unfortunate Lover. The health of Annibale becoming daily more impaired, he was under the necessity of renouncing many commissions which were offered him, and which he had the satisfaction of procuring for his scholars. It was by his recommendation that Guido and Domenichino were engaged by the Cardinal Borghese to paint the celebrated frescos in S. Gregorio, of which the Flagellation of S. Andrea by the latter is so justly admired. The Cardinal Farnese employed him in some works in fresco, in a chapel in the Abbey of Grotto Ferrata, where he painted several subjects from the life of S. Nilo, one of which, representing the cure of a demoniac, may be compared with the finest productions at Rome. He was employed about this time by the Cardinal Aldobrandini to decorate his villa at Frascati, where he painted in fresco ten pictures of the History of Apollo, which gained him great reputation. The next work of Domenichino, was his well-known production of the Communion of St. Jerome, painted for the principal altar of S. Girolamo della Carità. This admirable performance was considered as the finest picture at Rome, after the Transfiguration by Raffaëlle; its beauty and celebrity were sufficient to mark it for one of the first objects of French spoliation, and it is now one of the principal attractions of the Gallery of the Louvre.* The distinguished reputation Domenichino had acquired had already excited the jealousy of some of his contemporaries, and it was now increased by the applause bestowed on these celebrated productions. Lanfranco in particular, one of his most inveterate enemies, pretended to assert, that his Communion of St. Jerome was little more than a copy of the picture of the same subject by Agostino Caracci, at the Certosa at Bologna, and he engaged his scholar, Perrier, to make an etching from the picture by Agostino. But this stratagem, instead of confirming the plagiarism, discovered the calumny; as it was evident that there was no other resemblance in the compositions than what must necessarily be the case in the pictures of two artists treating the same subject, and that every essential part, and all that was admired in the work, was entirely his own. If it had been possible for the exertions of modest merit to have repelled the shafts of slander, the pictures he immediately afterwards painted, representing subjects from the life of St. Cecilia, for the church of S. Lodovico, might have silenced the attacks of envy and malevolence; but they only tended to increase the alarm of his competitors, and to redouble their injustice and malignity. Disgusted with these continued cabals, he determined to leave Rome, and return to Bologna, where he passed a few years in the tranquil exercise of his talents. It was at this time that he painted his admirable picture of St. Agnes, for the church of that Saint; and the Madonna del Rosario; both engraved by Gerard Audran, and now among the spoils of the French Museum. The fame of Domenichino was not to be suppressed by the infamy of intrigue, and Pope Gregory XV. invited him back to Rome, and appointed him his principal painter and architect to the Pontifical palace. The Cardinal Montalto engaged him to paint the vault of S. Andrea della Valle, where he represented the Four Evangelists with Angels, which have long been the admiration of Italy, and which, even in the poor engravings which we have of them, are the study and delight of the artist. Domenichino was called to a new triumph in the chapel of Cardinal Bandini, in the church of S. Sylvestro in the Quirinal, where he painted four pictures, which may be considered among his finest works; representing Esther before Ahasuerus; Judith with the Head of Holofernes; David playing on the Harp before the Ark; and Solomon and his mother Bathsheba seated on a throne. He painted about the same time the Four Cardinal Virtues, in the angles of S. Carlo Catenari; which have been finely engraved by Gerard Audran. Of his subjects of the Fable, one of the most admired is the chase of Diana in the Palazzo Borghese, which has been finely engraved by R. Morghen. He painted landscapes in an admirable style; they are justly held in the highest estimation, and are generally enriched with his beautiful figures. Domenichino died in 1641. It had been foretold by his friend and patron, the Cardinal Agucchi, that the merit of Domenichino would not be duly appreciated till after his death; and it is certain that posterity has done justice to the talents of this extraordinary painter. He is universally esteemed the most distinguished disciple of the Carracci; the Count Algarotti even prefers him to those great masters, and Niccolò Poussin considered him the first painter after Raffaëlle. The distinguishing excellence in the works of Domenichino is expression, in which he has stood unrivalled since the time of Raffaëlle. His design, like that of the great painter just mentioned, is pure and grand, his heads full of grace and beauty, and his compositions are studied and appropriate. His forms are selected from the most perfect models, designed with elegance and correctness, and impressed with the character that peculiarly belongs to them. The backgrounds of his pictures are frequently enriched with noble architecture, in which he excelled. It has been remarked, that in his oil paintings there is an appearance of dryness, and a want of effect; but this is not always the case, as appears in the Communion of St. Jerome, in the Martyrdom of St. Agnes, and in his St. Cecilia, which are painted with a full pencil, and admirably coloured. In fresco few painters have equalled him.

DOMENIQUE, JOHN. This artist was a native of France, but resided chiefly at Rome, where he died in 1694. He was a scholar of Claude Lorraine, and was a successful copyist and imitator of the works of that master.

[DOMER, DOOMER, or DEMER, JAN, or JACQUES, a Dutch artist born in 1647, and who flourished about 1680. He is better known by his drawings than by his pictures in oil. His manner approximates to that of Rembrandt, and it may be believed that his dark landscapes have been ascribed to the latter. His compositions are simple, but strikingly true.]

[DOMINGO, D. LUIS, a painter and sculptor, born at Valencia in 1718, was a scholar of Hipolito Robira in painting, and of Bantista Balaguer in sculpture. The convent of S. Domingo possessed several pictures by him, among which was a Saint Louis, that did honour to his talents. He died at Valencia in 1767. His works in sculpture are to be seen in several churches in Valencia.]

DOMINICI, BERNARDO, a Neapolitan painter, and writer on art, who flourished about the year 1740. He studied landscape painting under Joachim Francis Beisch, a German artist, who passed some time at Naples, and attached himself to the clear and finished style of that master. He also painted what are called Bambociate. In 1742 and 1743, he published, in two volumes, Vite de Pittori, Scultori, ed Architetti Napolitani, printed at Naples.

DOMINICI, FRANCESCO. This painter was a native of Trevisi, and flourished about the year 1530. Ridolfi commends a work by this master in the dome of the Banca della Compagnia della Madonna, at Trevisi, representing the Procession of a Bishop and several Canons. He also excelled as a portrait painter, but did not survive his thirty-fifth year.

DONALDSON, JOHN. This artist was born at Edinburgh in 1737, and distinguished himself as a miniature painter, both in enamel and water colours. In the year 1765, and again in 1768, he obtained the premiums given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. for the best picture in enamel. He occasionally amused himself with the point, and etched several plates of beggars, after Rembrandt, which possess considerable merit. He died in 1801.

DONDUCCI, GIOVANNI ANDREA, called IL MASTELLETTA. This painter was born at Bologna in 1575, and was first a scholar of the Caracci; but he did not long remain under their tuition. His impetuous disposition disdaining the control of academic precision, he attempted to establish a new style, founded on a spirited and graceful design, in imitation of the works of Parmegiano, which he particularly admired, and a promptness of execution which was natural to him. The novel manner of Donducci was not without its admirers; and he was employed in a great number of works for the public edifices at Bologna, where are his principal works. He also painted landscapes, which were entirely in the style of the Caracci, and were much esteemed, particularly at Rome. Annibale advised him to establish himself in that city, and to devote himself to those subjects; a counsel by no means agreeable to Donducci. The following are among his principal works at Bologna. In the church of the Madonna delle Grazie, two pictures of the Death and the Assumption of the Virgin; in S. Procolo, the Adulteress before Christ; in the Refectory of the Franciscans, the Last Supper, one of his best works; in the Mendicanti, the Flight into Egypt, with a fine Landscape. His most admired performance is his S. Irene drawing the Arrow from the Breast of St. Sebastian, at the Celestines. He died in 1655.

[DONGEN, DIONYSIUS VAN, born at Dort in 1748, was a scholar of J. Xavery, at the Hague. He painted landscapes and cattle in the manner of his master for some time; but having removed with his parents to Rotterdam, he studied the works of Paul Potter, Cuyp, Wynants, and other masters, which, with a constant attention to nature, caused a sensible alteration in his style. His works found ready purchasers among the English, French, German, and other visitors, as well as his own countrymen. He died at Rotterdam in 1819.]

DONI, ADONE, or DONE. This painter was born at Assisi in 1472, and was a disciple of Pietro Perugino. His style retains but little of the Gothic manner of his master, and his portraits, according to Lanzi, are sometimes surprising for their truth and vigour of colouring. In the church of S. Francesco, at Perugia, is a picture by this master of the Last Judgment; and some of his works are in the Chiesa degli Angeli, at Assisi. [There is an error in the date, as Doni painted in 1476; Zani says he was living in 1484.]

DONNE, W., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1680. Among other prints, he engraved a plate representing Venus and Cupid, in a landscape, with other figures in the distance, after A. Elsheimer. It is etched in a slight, poor style.

DONNET, S. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a print representing a man seated reading a book. It is a very indifferent performance.

DONNINI, GIROLAMO, was born at Coregio in 1681, and studied first at Modena under Francesco Stringa, afterwards under Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole, at Bologna, and ultimately at Forlì, under Carlo Cignani. He was chiefly employed in easel pictures, although he occasionally painted larger works for the churches. In the Madonna di Galiera, at Bologna, is an altar-piece representing S. Antonio di Padona. There are some of his works in the churches of the Romagna, and at Turin, which are not unworthy of a scholar of Cignani.

[DONZELLI, PIETRO and POLITO, two brothers, painters of the Neapolitan school, who flourished in the middle of the fifteenth century. According to Zani, Polito was born in 1405, and died in 1468; and Pietro was born in 1412, and died in 1470. They were scholars of Solario, and painted some large subjects in the refectory of S. Mario Novella, and in the palace of Poggio Reale, for Ferdinand, king of Naples, which in style resembles that of their master, except that their colouring is softer. They distinguished themselves in their architectural ornaments, and in painting friezes and trophies, and subjects in chiaro-scuro, in the manner of bassi rilievi, an art which it is supposed they were the first to practise. They acquired a great reputation by their paintings both in fresco and in oil. Pietro painted portraits also, which had all the force of nature; and a few years ago, on the destruction of some of his pictures on a wall, in the palace of the dukes of Mantalona, some heads were removed with the greatest care, and preserved for their excellence.]

[DOORNIK, JAN VAN, a painter of Leyden, who, it is said, painted pictures in the manner of Wouwermans. He also painted history and portraits. It is not ascertained exactly at what period he lived.]

DOORT, P. VAN, a Dutch engraver, who worked entirely with the graver, and was a humble imitator of the style of Cornelius Cort. Among others, we have a print by him representing the Holy Family, in which St. Elizabeth is presenting an Apple to the infant Christ, after Bernardino Passari.

DORBAY, ———, a French engraver, who flourished towards the end of the seventeenth century. He engraved, among other plates, some views of the Royal Palaces in France, which are executed in a neat, pleasing style.

DORIGNY, MICHAEL, a French painter and engraver, born at St. Quintin in 1617, and was brought up under Simon Vouet, whose daughter he married. He painted history in the style of his master; and some of his pictures are in the castle of Vincennes. He is, however, more known as an engraver; and we have several plates etched by him in a bold, spirited style; but there is a considerable degree of harshness in the effect of his prints, from a heavy darkness in his shadows, which is very disagreeable. The following are his principal plates, which are after the pictures of Simon Vouet :

The Holy Family; dated in 1649.

The Nativity.

The Adoration of the Magi; in four sheets; in the manner of a frieze.

Jupiter giving Apollo the conduct of the Chariot of the Sun.

Apollo killing the Python.

Peace descending on the Earth.

Venus at her Toilet.

Venus, Cupid, and Hope, plucking the Feathers from the Wings of Time.

Mercury and the Graces.

The Rape of Europa.

A Set of Six Bacchanalian subjects; from his own designs.

Michael Dorigny died at Paris in 1665.

DORIGNY, LOUIS, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1654. His father died when he was only ten years of age, and he was placed under the tuition of Charles le Brun. On leaving that master he went to Italy, where he passed the rest of his life. He resided chiefly at Venice and Verona; in both which cities he gave proof of his ability as a painter both in oil and in fresco. As an engraver, we have about forty etchings by him, which are executed in a free, painter-like style.

A set of thirty-two Plates, with the Title; from his own designs, engraved for an Italian edition of the Pensées Chrétiennes, by Pere Bouhours.

Six subjects from Ovid's Metamorphoses.

Five Emblems of Horace.

A View of the Amphitheatre at Verona.

The Descent of the Saracens at the Port of Ostie; after Raffaële.

He died at Verona in 1742.

DORIGNY, SIR NICHOLAS. This celebrated French engraver was the younger son of Michael Dorigny, born at Paris in 1657. He was brought up to the bar, and followed that profession until he was thirty years of age, when he turned his thoughts to the arts, and visited Italy, where he remained twenty-eight years. He first attempted painting, but was advised by his brother to devote himself to engraving. His first plates were executed with the point; and if we were to judge of his talent by his early prints, his reputation would be very short of that which he acquired by a union of the point and the graver in his latter productions. He took for his model the admirable works of Gerard Audran; and although he by no means equalled that celebrated artist, either in the great style of his drawing, or in the picturesque effect of his light and shadow, his prints will always be esteemed both for their merit as engravings, and the importance of the subjects he made choice of. In 1711 he was invited to England to engrave Raffaële's Cartoons, which were finished in 1719, on which occasion he was knighted by King George I. Whilst he was in England he painted some portraits of the nobility, but with no great success. He returned to France in 1724, and died at Paris in 1746. The following are his principal prints :

Nine plates of the Seven Planets, and the Creation of the Sun and Moon; after the paintings by Raffaële, in the Chigi chapel, in la Madonna del Popolo.

The Cartoons; after Raffaële; in eight plates, including the title.

Twelve, of the History of Cupid and Psyche, and the Triumph of Galatea, including the title; after the paintings from the designs of Raffaële in the little Farnesian Gallery.

The Transfiguration; after Raffaële.

The taking down from the Cross; after Daniello da Volterra.

St. Peter and St. John healing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple; after L. Cigoli.

The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; after Domenichino.

St. Petronilla; after Guercino.

St. Francis kneeling before the Virgin and Infant; after Caracci.

St. Catherine in Meditation; after Carlo Cignani.

St. Peter walking on the Sea; after Lanfranco.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Charles Borromeo and St. Liborius; after B. Lamberti.

The Trinity; from the picture by Guido Reni in the church of la Trinità dé Monti.

The Adoration of the Magi; after Carlo Maratti.

The Birth of the Virgin; after Carlo Maratti.

The Virgin and Infant, with St. Charles and St. Ignatius; after the same.

Eight plates of the paintings in the Cupola of St. Agnes; after Ciro Ferri.

[DORN, JOSEPH, a painter of Bavaria, born in 1759, studied in the galleries of Munich, Vienna, and Dusseldorf. He has copied to deception the cabinet pictures of Francis Mieris, Gerard Dou, Terburgh, Vander Werff, and others. It is uncertain whether he be still living; but this notice of him may serve as a caution to amateurs some years hence.]

DOSSI, DOSSO, and GIOVANNI BATISTA. These painters were natives of the vicinity of Ferrara. According to Baruffaldi, Dosso was born about the year 1490, and was for some time a disciple of Lorenzo Costa. He afterwards visited Rome and Venice, with his brother Gio. Batista, where they passed eleven years, studying the works of the greatest masters, and formed a style which may be called their own, and which, although not totally divested of the Gothic, is distinguished by originality of invention, and great harmony of colour. Dosso excelled in painting figures, in which Gio. Batista was less successful; but he distinguished himself as a painter of landscape, in which Lomazzo considers him little inferior to Gaudenzio, Pordenone, and even to Titian. The brothers were much employed by Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara, and by his successor Ercole II. They painted the cartoons for the tapestries in the dome at Ferrara, and for those in the church of S. Francesco, and in the Ducal palace at Modena. Dosso Dossi excelled in portraits as well as historical subjects, and painted that of Ariosto, who employed him to make designs for his Orlando Furioso. That poet has celebrated the names of the Dossi by enrolling them with those of Leonardo da Vinci, M. Angelo, Raffaële, and Titian. There are several of the works of Dosso Dossi in the churches at Ferrara. In the Certosa, a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with St. John, and two saints. In the church of S. Maria del Vado, is his celebrated picture of St. John in the isle of Patmos. In S. Agostino, a fine picture of the Crucifixion, with the Virgin, St. John, and St. Augustine. His best preserved works are those at Dresden, of which Lanzi particularly notices that of the Four Doctors of the Church. Dosso Dossi died at Ferrara in 1560. [Zani says he was born about 1474, and quotes from Pungilione that he painted a large picture in 1512. From other circumstances, however, it would seem that Dossi and Correggio were nearly of the same age; and that is in favour of Baruffaldi.]

DOSSIER, MICHAEL, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1684. We have a few plates by this artist, executed with the graver in a neat style, resembling that of P. Drevet. We have by him the following prints :

The Portrait of John Baptist Colbert, Marquis de Torci; after Rigaud. 1711.

The Marriage of the Virgin; after Jouvenet.
 Christ curing the Blind at Jericho; after Nic. Colombel.
 Christ driving the Money-changers from the Temple;
after the same.
 Mary Magdalene washing the Feet of Christ; after the same.

Vertumnus and Pomona; after Rigaud.

DOUDYNS, WILLIAM, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1630. He was of a distinguished family, and followed the art rather as an amateur than a professor; but with a zeal that enabled him to reach a reputable rank among the painters of his country. After receiving some instruction from an obscure artist, named Alexander Petit, he travelled to Italy, where he passed twelve years, studying the best productions of the art, and acquired a correctness of design and an elevation of taste, which distinguishes his works. On his return to Holland, he executed several fresco paintings, particularly ceilings, in which he excelled from his perfect knowledge of foreshortening. Some of his works of that description are in the town-house at the Hague. Two of his most admired easel pictures were in the possession of M. van Heteren, representing Time discovering Truth, and Wisdom triumphing over Vice and Intemperance. He was one of the founders of the Academy at the Hague, of which he was appointed the Director. He died in 1697.

DOUET, ———, a French engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1530. Papillon notices a wooden cut, executed by him, representing the Virgin Mary and the infant Christ, after Andrea del Sarto.

[DOUFFLEST, GERARD, born at Liege in 1594, studied for some time at Antwerp in the school of Rubens, and afterwards in Italy. He composed and designed with good taste, and his historical pictures are much esteemed. Two of them were purchased for the Dusseldorff Gallery at the sum of 19,000 florins. The name is variously written by different authors; Doufflest, Doufflet, Duffeit; and the dates are as variable. Zani says he was born in 1571, and flourished in 1640; Füssli, that he flourished in 1630; and Balkema, that he died in 1660.]

DOUGHTY, WILLIAM, an English artist, who flourished about the year 1760. He was a native of York, and practised portrait painting with some success in a provincial situation. We have by him a few etchings and mezzotintos of portraits, among which are the following:

Thomas Beckwith, the Antiquary of York.

Thomas Gray, the Poet.

Admiral Keppel.

Mr. Mason, the Poet.

Miss Palmer, the niece of Sir Joshua Reynolds, the present Marchioness of Thomond.

Doctor Samuel Johnson.

DOUVEN, JOHN FRANCIS. This painter was born at Ruremonde, in the Duchy of Cleves, in 1656. His father dying when he was young, he was placed under the care of a painter of Liege, named Gabriel Lambertin, who had studied in Italy, and had formed a collection of studies and drawings, which were of great utility to the progress of his pupil. On leaving that master he was taken into favour by a Spanish nobleman in the service of the king of Spain, then resident at Ruremonde, who possessed a valuable collection of the Italian school. He was permitted to copy and study them, and they were a mine of instruction to the young artist. His first essays were in historical subjects; and he would probably have distinguished himself in that branch, but the flattering invitation he received from the Elector, induced him to visit Dusseldorff, where he painted the portrait of that prince, and the principal personages of his court. These were so generally admired, that he was appointed principal painter to the Elector. This success seems to have bent his future pursuits chiefly to portrait painting; and his talents were employed at almost every court in Germany, where he received many honourable marks of favour and distinction. He was also patronized at the court of Tuscany, where the Grand Duke placed his portrait in the Florentine Gallery. He occasionally painted easel pictures of historical subjects, which were correctly drawn and well composed. In the French Museum are two pictures by Douven, representing Susanna and the Elders, and the Holy Family. He died in 1727. [Balkema says he died in 1724.]

DOUW, GERARD. This extraordinary artist was born at Leyden in 1613. He was the son of a glazier, who, perceiving his inclination for drawing, placed him with a glass painter, named Kowenhoorn, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of the art. At the age of fifteen he became a scholar of Rembrandt, and three years passed under that admirable painter enabled him to dispense with further instruction. In that excellent school for colour and effect, he became a perfect master of harmony, and of the chiaro-scuro. The bold and vigorous style of Rembrandt, in his best time, had less attraction for Douw, than the more finished and more feeble productions of the early part of his life. He conceived a project of combining the rich and glowing colouring of Rembrandt, with the polish and suavity of extreme finishing; and he adopted a mode of uniting the powerful tones, and the magical light and shadow of his instructor, with a minuteness and precision which so nearly approaches to nature as to become perfect illusion. Although his pictures are wrought up beyond those of any other artist, there is still discernible in his works a spirited and characteristic touch that evinces the hand of the great master, and a breadth of light and shadow which is only to be found in the most intelligent productions of the art. The fame acquired by Gerard Douw is a convincing proof that excellence is not confined to any particular style or manner; and perhaps his talents would have remained unnoticed and unknown, if he had attempted to distinguish himself by a bolder pencil, and a more executive facility. So truly it may be said, that there are no positive rules by which an artist is bound, in order to assure himself celebrity. Every intermediate style, from the daring and impetuous handling of Tintoretto, to the patient finishing of Douw, may conduct the painter to distinction, provided he adapts his manner to the character of the subject he proposes for his model; and that he may obtain the applause and admiration of the judicious, whether it is in the perfect representation of the human figure in its most beautiful form, or in the just and delicate delineation of a rose or a butterfly. The first pictures he painted were small portraits, and although they were extremely admired for their resemblance, and the beauty of their finish, the length of time he employed on them disgusted his models. This will not appear surprising, when we find that he was occupied five days in finishing the hand of a lady who sat to him. He therefore abandoned portrait painting for fancy subjects. In these he has surpassed every painter of his country, although the number of Dutch artists who have excelled in that particular style is so considerable.

Every object in his pictures is terminated with the most minute scrupulosity, without diminishing the general effect, of which he preserved the unity by a masterly management of light and shadow. His colouring is admirable, and loses nothing of its purity by the apparent labour of his finishing. His pictures are generally confined to a few figures, and sometimes to a single one; and when he attempted a more considerable composition, he was less successful in his effect. The works of this master have ever been zealously sought after by the curious collector, and no pictures of similar subjects have ever been purchased at such considerable prices. They were always particularly admired in France; and the Revolution does not appear to have altered their taste, as they have been the objects of their plunder wherever they were to be met with. The French Museum contains no fewer than seventeen pictures by Gerard Douw, among which is the celebrated picture of the Dropsical Woman, formerly in the possession of the king of Sardinia at Turin. He died in 1674.

DOYEN, LE, a French engraver of little reputation, who lived at Paris about the year 1666, and executed some plates for the booksellers in a poor, formal style, among which are some prints of ornaments, and the plates for a book entitled Figures des differents Habits des Chanoines reguliers en ce siecle, published at Paris in 1666.

DRAGHI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was born at Genoa in 1657. He was a scholar of Domenico Piola, whose promptness and facility he imitated and acquired. He resided at Parma and Placenza, where there are several of his works. They discover something of the design of the Bolognese school, with the taste of Parmegiano. Although he painted with great despatch, he cannot be accused of negligence. To a brilliancy and gaiety of effect, he unites a judgment in the turn and relief of his figures that is masterly, particularly in his oil pictures. At the Franciscans at Placenza, is a picture by him of the Martyrdom of St. James. The dome of S. Agnese, in the same city, is by this master; and in the church of S. Lorenzo, a picture of the Titular Saint. At Genoa there are some of his easel pictures in private collections. He died in 1712.

DRAPENTIERE, JOHN. This engraver, from his name, was probably a native of France. He was in England about the year 1691, and was employed by the publishers in some plates of portraits and frontispieces, which are executed with the graver in a neat, but tasteless style. The following portraits are by him:

William and Mary, when Prince and Princess of Orange.
John Graham, Viscount Dundee.
Thomas White, Bishop of Peterborough.
Benjamin Calamy, Prebendary of St. Paul's.
Henry Cuttes, of the Middle Temple; scarce.
Sir James Dyer, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.
Peter Perkins, Mathematician.
Daniel Burgess. 1691; Dissenting minister.
Benjamin Keach, Anabaptist Minister.
Elias Keach.
John Todd, A. M.

He also engraved a satirical print of a Lady shaving a Gentleman; inscribed Le Beau service.

[DREVER, ADRIEN VAN, a Dutch landscape and marine painter, who flourished about 1673, passed the greater part of his artistic life in England. A picture by him has been engraved by J. Boydell.]

DREVET, PETER, THE ELDER, an eminent

French engraver, born at Lyons in 1664. He was first a pupil of Germain Audran, but afterwards finished his studies at Paris. His works are chiefly confined to portraits, and are executed entirely with the graver, of which he possessed a masterly command. His stroke is firm, although his plates are very highly finished, and his drawing is correct. We have by him the following prints:

PORTRAITS.

Charles II.
James Francis Edward Stuart, called the Old Pretender.
Clementina Sobieski, his Consort.
James Fitzjames, Duke of Berwick.
Oliver Cromwell.
Louis XIV., a full-length; after H. Rigaud.

Philip V., King of Spain; after the same.
Louis, Dauphin of France; after the same.

SUBJECTS OF DEVOTION.

The Entry of Christ into Jerusalem; after A. Dieu.
The Crucifixion; in two sheets.

Peter Drevet, the elder, died at Paris in 1739.

DREVET, PETER, THE YOUNGER. This celebrated engraver was the son of the preceding artist, and was born at Paris in 1697. He had the advantage of his father's instruction, and at the age of thirteen produced a plate which was the surprise and admiration of the time. The works of this excellent artist are executed with the graver; and although he may have been surpassed in boldness and freedom, he has hardly been equalled in the precious finish and clearness of his stroke. His celebrated portrait of Bossuet may be considered as one of the finest specimens of that style of engraving. That of S. Bernard is scarcely less admirable. The following are his principal works:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XV., when young, conducted by Minerva to the Temple of Glory; after Ant. Coypel.
Louis, Duke of Orleans; after Charles Coypel.
Francis de la Mothe Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray; after Vivien.
Francis Paul de Villeroy, Archbishop of Lyons; after Santerre.
Claude le Blanc, Minister of War.
William, Cardinal Dubois, Archbishop of Cambray; after Rigaud.
J. B. Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux; full length; after the same; extremely fine.
Samuel Bernard; the first impressions are before the words Conseiller d'Etat; very fine.
Isaac James de Vertamont, Bishop of Conferans; after de Troy.
Rene Pucelle, Abbé and Counsellor of the Parliament; after Rigaud.
Nicholas Peter Camus, first President of the Parliament of Rouen; after Jouvenet.
Robert Cotte, first intendent of Buildings, &c.; after Rigaud.

Mademoiselle le Couvreur, in the Character of Cornelia; after Charles Coypel; fine.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after H. Rigaud.
The Holy Family; after Ant. Dieu.
The Entry of Christ into Jerusalem; after the same.
Adam and Eve after their Transgression; after A. Coypel.
The same subject; smaller; very highly finished.
Abraham going to sacrifice his son Isaac; after the same.
Abraham's Servant meeting Rebecca; after the same.
The Annunciation; after Coypel.
The same subject; smaller.
The Crucifixion; after the same.
The Presentation in the Temple; after Louis de Boullogne. This is esteemed his best historical print.
Christ in the Garden of Olives, with Angels; after J. Restout.
The Resurrection; after J. André.

Peter Drevet, the younger, died at Paris in 1739.

DREYET, CLAUDE. This artist was the cousin-germain of Peter Drevet the younger, born at Lyons in 1710. He was instructed by his relation, and engraved some plates of portraits in a high finished style, which possess considerable merit. The following are by him:

PORTRAITS.

Henry Oswald, Cardinal d'Auvergne; after Rigaud.
Charles Gaspar William de Vintimille, Archbishop of Paris; after the same.
Philip Louis, Count de Sinzendorf; after the same.
Peter Calvairac, Abbot of Pontignan; after A. le Prieur.
Madame le Bret, in the character of Ceres; after Rigaud.
He died at Paris in 1768.

[DRIELST, EGBERT VAN, born at Groningen in 1746, practised under several masters; the last were H. Meyer of Haerlem, and J. Cats of Amsterdam. He particularly studied the works of Hobbema, Ruysdael, and Wynants, and compared them with nature. By this course his pictures approached nearer to the manner and taste of the great masters of the preceding century than to those of his own time. The subjects he represented were well-wooded landscapes, with farms and cottages, which he ornamented with figures and animals, correctly designed. He was fond of the picturesque effects of ruined hovels, old broken and uprooted trees, and barren heaths. These he depicted with a thorough knowledge of light and shadow, and with a colour suited to the objects. Sometimes, however, there is a certain degree of negligence, or inattention, to be observed in his pictures; but he never appears to be a mannerist. He died in 1818.]

DRILLENBURG, WILLIAM, a Dutch landscape painter, born at Utrecht in 1625. He was for some time a scholar of Abraham Bloemaert, but left the style of that painter to imitate the charming landscapes of John Both. Although he never approached the excellence of that master, his pictures are said, by Houbraken, who was his scholar, to possess great merit.

DROESHOUT, MARTIN. This engraver, probably a Dutchman, resided in England about the year 1623. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and engraved some portraits, which, if they cannot be admired for the beauty of their execution, are valued for their scarcity. We have by him the following portraits:

James Hamilton, Marquis of Hamilton.
Thomas Coventry, Lord Coventry.
John Donne, Dean of St. Paul's.
Helkiah Croke, M. D.
William Shakspeare, prefixed to his works in 1623.
John Fox, the Martyrologist.
John Howson, Bishop of Durham.
Lord Mountjoy Blount, afterwards Earl of Newport.

He also engraved some plates for Haywood's Hierarchy of Angels, and the Death of Dido for Stapylton's Virgil.

DROESHOUT, JOHN, an engraver, who, from the date at which he flourished, was, perhaps, a relation of the preceding artist. We have by him a few portraits, frontispieces, and other works for the booksellers. Among which are,

The Portrait of Richard Elton; prefixed to his Military Art.

The Portrait of Joan. Danesy; engraved for his Paralipomena; in 1639.

[DROLLING, MARTIN, a native of Oberbergheim in 1752, practised his art chiefly in Paris. He was a painter of familiar subjects of general interest, which he treated with great truth and beauty, both in the sentiment and in the colouring. His works were popular during his life, and are likely to continue so by their merit and their size. He died at Paris in 1817.]

[DROOGSLOOT, JOOST CORNELISZ, a painter of Utrecht, who flourished from 1616 to 1660. He painted historical subjects and landscapes. He gave to the hospital of St. Job, at Utrecht, in 1628, a picture of Job and his friends, the landscape part of which is said to be very beautiful: in 1638 he was named regent of the hospital. There is a portrait of him, painted by himself, in the manner of old Teniers; he is seated at his easel, and his atelier is furnished with pictures: it bears date 1630, and he appears about 50 years of age. As J. C. Droogsloot painted landscapes, village scenes, and kermesses, and is classed with very respectable painters of the period, by writers on whose judgment reliance may be placed, he must not be confounded with Nicholas Droogsloot, whose works of a like nature are known in England, and which rank among the lowest of his country.]

DROOGSLOOT, NICHOLAS. This painter was born at Dort in 1650, and is supposed to have been a scholar of Henry Mommers. He painted village wakes and rural assemblies, which are distinguished by a disgusting vulgarity of character, which is not compensated by the agreeable tone of his colouring, or the spirit of his pencil. His works are little known, except in his own country. [His works are well known in England, but held in very little estimation. He died in 1702.]

[DROSSAERT, a Dutch painter of landscapes with ruins and stag hunts, who lived in the 17th century.]

DROST, N., a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam about the year 1625. He was brought up in the school of Rembrandt, and afterwards had the advantage of visiting Italy, where he improved his style of design, by studying the works of the great masters of the Roman school. Houbraken speaks highly of a picture by Drost representing St. John preaching in the Wilderness. [His name and the date of his birth are differently given by writers of equal credit. Nagler calls him Van Terle, W. ?—Balkema says he was born in 1636.]

DRUEFKEN, ———. This artist was a native of Germany. He is mentioned by Evelyn, in his Sculptura, as an engraver on wood, who usually marked his prints with a cluster of grapes. Among other cuts, he executed one representing the King of the Boors in Hungary eaten alive by the rebels whom he had seduced.

DRUYVESTEYN, ARNOLD JANSSE, a Dutch amateur painter, born at Haerlem in 1564. Karel van Mander speaks in very favourable terms of his talent as a painter of landscapes, with figures, although he practised the art for his amusement, being of an opulent and distinguished family. He died in 1617.

[DUBBELS, HENRY and THIERRY, are mentioned by Balkema, as being found in the Catalogues of Hoet and Terwesten, but without any information as to their family, or the time in which they lived. He speaks of a river-scene painted in the manner of W. Van de Velde, of a Winter-piece with Skaters, which was sold in 1773 under the name of Peter Dubbels; and another, sold in Vander Linden Slingelandt's sale, by Henry Dubbels. And this is all he could collect among his countrymen, respecting artists who may claim rank with the best of their school, as marine painters. In the incidental notices that occur of Henry Dubbels, he is by some called the master of Backhuysen; by others, the scholar; the probability is in favour of the former. His works bear little or no resemblance to those of Backhuysen or Vander Velde, except in their subjects; they are more analogous to those of Van de Capelle. Several pictures by Dubbels have passed through the hands of the writer, and many under his observation, which would warrant the highest encomiums for artistic skill. Mr. Vander Hoop, of Amsterdam, possesses one of great excellence, which he purchased a few years ago in England; many others are to be found in rich collections in this country, which proves that his merit has been appreciated, though, unfortunately for his reputation, it has been under a different name.]

[DUBBELS, JAN, a scholar of Backhuysen, painted marine subjects in the manner of his master; he was living in 1715.]

[DUBOIS, CORNELIUS, a landscape painter, who followed the manner of Jacob Ruysdael, lived about 1647. His mark is also found on pictures more in the style of Saffleven than Ruysdael.]

DUBOIS, EDWARD. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1622, and was a scholar of an obscure artist, named Groenwegen. He afterwards went to Italy, and was for some time in the employment of Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy. In the reign of King William he came to England, and painted landscapes and portraits, with little success. He died in London in 1699.

DUBOIS, SIMON, was the younger brother of the preceding artist. After studying some time in Holland, under P. Wowermans, he came to England, where he painted a few pictures of battles and landscapes with cattle; but portrait painting being the only branch which was encouraged at that time, he was under the necessity of adopting it, though by no means suited to his genius or inclination. He painted the portrait of Lord Chancellor Somers, by whose recommendation he was employed by several of the nobility. S. Dubois died in 1708.

[DUBORDIEU, PETER, who lived about 1650, painted portraits in the manner of Mireveldt, several of which have been engraved by Suyderhoef, Natalas, and Matham. See BOSCH.]

DUBOSCH. See BOSCH.

[DUBOURG, LOUIS FABRICIUS, an historical painter, born at Amsterdam in 1693, and died there in 1775. He was a scholar of Lairese and Jacques Van Huysum. After producing several beautiful pictures, some of which may be seen at the Westerkerk, and the New Church at Amsterdam, he quitted the palette for the graver. His collection of pictures and drawings was sold at Amsterdam in 1776.]

DUC, or DUCQ, JOHN LE, a Dutch artist, born at the Hague in 1636. He learned the principles of the art under Paul Potter, and for some time imitated the style of that admired painter of animals. He afterwards changed his style, and painted corps de gardes, assemblies of officers, and card-players. His pictures of this description are more frequently met with than his cattle-pieces, which are very scarce. He had acquired the reputation of an able painter, when he abandoned the art, and followed a military life. Le Duc etched a few plates from his own designs, among which is a set of eight prints of dogs, very neatly and spiritedly executed. [Jan Le Ducq was director of the Academy at the Hague in 1671; he etched many other subjects besides those of dogs, of which an account may be seen in Nagler's Kunstler's Lexicon, and in Brulliot's Dictionary of Monograms. He died, according to Balkema, in 1695.]

[DUCCI, VIRGILIO, a scholar of Albano, flourished about 1660; he imitated the manner of his master, and painted two pictures of Tobias, in the chapel of the Duomo of Cetta di Castello, which are said to be done in an elegant and graceful style.]

[DUCCIO, BUONINSEGNA, also called NUTINI, a Siennese artist, painted from 1282, and died about 1340. He was a contemporary of Giotto, and perhaps the most eminent. His style does not resemble Giotto's, but appears rather in advance. Lanzi is in error when he says that it approaches the Greek manner; but is right when he states that his large picture of the Virgin and various Saints, for which he received three thousand gold florins, is the most copious in figures, and among the best executed productions of the age. He designed, and wrought in mosaic, the pavement of the Duomo of Siena, part of which remains perfect, and represents the death of Absalom. Rosini has given an outline of a portion of it; and that writer's researches will throw considerable light on the works of this neglected but superior artist, and also correct some of the chronological errors of Cieognara and others respecting him.]

DUCHANGE, GASPAR, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris in 1662, and received into the academy there in 1707. Duchange may be ranked among the ablest artists of his country, particularly for the mellowness and harmony with which he has combined his etching with a tasteful management of the graver. His plates, after Coreggio, are peculiarly expressive of the admirable style of that painter. He lived to a very advanced age, and the number of his works is considerable. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Francis Girardon; after Rigaud; for his reception into the academy in 1707.

Charles de la Fosse; after the same; for the same occasion.

[DUCK, JACOB LE, was master of the associated body of painters of St. Luke at Utrecht, in 1626. He gave a picture, representing a musical reunion, to the hospital of S. Job in that city. He painted conversations in the taste of Jan Le Ducc, but with less delicacy of touch and finish; nevertheless of great beauty. It is probable that he was the father of Jan Le Ducc, although there is a difference in the spelling of their names; a circumstance not uncommon with artists of the period.]

[DUCROS, PIERRE, an eminent painter in oil and water colours, was born in Switzerland in 1745, and died in 1810. He lived for a considerable time at Rome, and painted views of that city and the environs. He executed twenty-four views of Sicily and Malta, and various others, in a masterly manner. He left numerous drawings made by him during his sojourn in Italy, some of which are of large dimensions.]

DUDLEY, THOMAS, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1678. He was a pupil of Hollar, and though greatly inferior to that celebrated artist, his prints are not without considerable merit. We have by him, among others, the following:

PORTRAITS.

Richard Russell, Bishop of Portleago.

James Sharpe, Bishop of St. Andrews.

Titus Oates.

He also engraved a set of twenty-seven plates for the Life of Æsop, published by Barlow.

DUETECUM, or DOETECUM, JOHN and LUCAS A. These artists, who flourished about the year 1559, were natives of Germany, and are supposed to have been brothers. They engraved, conjointly, several large prints, representing the pompous funeral of the Emperor Charles V. They are etched in a bold, masterly manner. John a Duetecum engraved also an ornamental frontispiece for a book of perspective, by John Tridmanus Trisius.

DUETECUM, or DOETECUM, BATISTA, was probably related to the two artists mentioned in the preceding article, and flourished about the year 1610. He engraved a set of plates, representing the various habits and manners of the Indians. They are executed entirely with the graver, in a stiff, indifferent style.

DUFLOS, CLAUDE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1678. It is not said by whom he was instructed, but his style resembles that of Francis Poilly. We have by this ingenious artist a great number of plates, executed principally with the graver, although he occasionally called in the assistance of the point. His prints are very neatly finished, and his drawing tolerably correct. The number of his plates is very considerable, of which the following are the most deserving of notice:

PORTRAITS.

Philip, Duke of Orleans; after R. Tourniers.

John Francis Paul de Gondy, Cardinal de Retz.

Denis Francis de Chavigny, Bishop of Troyes.

This laborious artist died at Paris in 1747.

DUGHET. See POUSSIN.

DUGY, _____, a modern French engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several slight prints, after the pictures of Francis Boucher, and other masters.

[DUIVEN, JAN, born at Gouda in 1600, was a scholar of Wautier Crabeth, and had a great reputation as a portrait painter. He died in 1640.]

DULLAERT, HEYMAN. According to Houbraken, this artist was born at Rotterdam in 1636. He was the son of a dealer in pictures, and having shown an early inclination for the art, he was placed in the school of Rembrandt. Under that able instructor his progress was such, that in a few years some of his small pictures were painted so much in the style of his master, as to be mistaken for the works of Rembrandt. He generally painted cabinet pictures, of historical subjects and portraits, which were deservedly admired for harmony of colour, a vigorous touch, and a masterly effect of light and shadow. He died at Rotterdam in 1684.

DUNKARTON, ROBERT, an English mezzotinto engraver, born about the year 1744. He scraped several plates of portraits and historical subjects, of which the following are the principal:

PORTRAITS.

George, Lord Littleton; after Mr. West.

Jonas Hanway; after E. Edwards.

Doctor Arne; after W. Humphrey.

Miss Horneck; after Sir Jos. Reynolds.

John Elliot; after N. Dance.

[DUNKER, BALTHASAR ANTOINE, landscape painter and engraver, born at Saal, near Stralsund, in 1746;—died at Bern in 1807. He was more distinguished as an engraver than as a painter. His works are after Roos, Vander Does, Hackaert, and Schutz; costumes and manners of the French before the Revolution; illustrations of books and other miscellaneous subjects, of which an account may be found in Huber and Nagler.]

[DUNKER, PHILIP HEINRICH, son of the preceding, was also an engraver, and a painter in water colours. In both pursuits it seems that he was a copyist, as his drawings are after Kobell, Roos, Weenix, and others, and his engraving after a picture by Demarne is traced to one by Geisler. He died in 1836.]

DUNSTALL, JOHN. This artist lived in London about the year 1660. He engraved a few portraits and other plates, which are etched and finished with the graver in imitation of the style of W. Hollar. In 1662, he published a book of birds, beasts, flowers, fruit, &c., from his own designs. Among others, we have the following portraits by him :

Mary, Queen of James II.
King William and Queen Mary.
Samuel Clarke, prefixed to his "Puritan Divines."
Jacobus Usserius.

[DUPLESSI-BERTAUX, JEAN, a very prolific French designer and engraver, flourished about the end of the last century. His prints are well known; Rigal enumerates 650 in his catalogue.]

DUPONT, GAINSBOROUGH. This artist was the nephew of the celebrated Thomas Gainsborough, and painted portraits and landscapes in imitation of the style of his uncle. His principal work is a large picture representing the portraits of the Trinity Masters, which is in their court-room on Tower-hill. He died in 1797. [He also painted landscapes with architectural ruins, in which he imitated N. Poussin.]

DUPUIS, CHARLES, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1685. He was a pupil of Gaspar Duchange, and engraved several plates of portraits and historical subjects. They are etched with taste, and finished with the graver in a free, masterly style. His drawing is correct, and his heads are full of expression and character. The following are his plates most worthy of notice :

PORTRAITS.

Louis XV.; after Ranc.
Henry of Lorraine, Duke de Guise; after Dumoustier.
Nicholas Coustou, sculptor; after Le Gros.
Nicholas de Largilliere, painter; after Gueulain.

Rinaldo and Armida; after the same.
The Passage of the Rhine; after Le Brun.

Charles Dupuis was a member of the French Academy, and died in 1742.

DUPUIS, NICHOLAS GABRIEL, was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1696, and was also instructed in the art of engraving by Gaspar Duchange. Although not equal to his brother, he possessed great merit, and was admitted a member of the Academy in 1754. He engraved several portraits and historical subjects, in the style of his brother. We have by him the following prints :

PORTRAITS.

The Equestrian Statue of Louis XV. erected at Bourdeaux; after Le Moine.
The same, from that erected at Rennes; after the same.
C. F. Paul de Normand de Tournehem, Director General of the Arts; after L. Toqué.

The Death of Lucretia; after Guido.
Æneas saving his Father Anchises; after C. Vanloo.
A Nymph and Satyrs; after L. Cheron.

He died at Paris in 1770.

[DUPREEL, ———, an engraver of whom no particulars are related, but whose works are to be found in the Musées Français, de Florence, and Napoleon, and in other publications of a like kind.]

[DUQUE CORNEJO, D. PEDRO, painter, engraver, architect, and sculptor, was born in Seville in 1677. It is not known by whom he was instructed in painting. The pictures which he painted for the Chartreuse of S. Marie de las Cnevas, and for the monastery of S. Jerome de Buena-Vista, are not without merit. He had a ready invention, and produced numerous designs, which are much esteemed at Seville, as are also his etchings. He died at Seville in 1757, and was buried with great pomp. His works, as a sculptor and carver in wood, are to be seen in the cathedrals and churches of Seville, Cordova, Granada, and elsewhere.]

[DUQUEYLAR, PAUL, an historical painter, born at Digne in 1771, was a scholar of David. Most of the subjects painted by him are taken from the classic poets and ancient historians, and are of an elevated character. The Judgment of Minos, and story of Belisarius, both painted at Rome in 1804, are described by Kotzebue in his recollections of Italy. The time of his death is not recorded.]

DURANT, J. L. This artist, if not a native of England, resided in London about the year 1690. He was a very indifferent engraver, and was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved a variety of book ornaments and portraits. Among the latter is that of Mary, Queen of William III., after Kneller.

[DURANTE, COUNT GIORGIO, born at Brescia in 1683, and died in 1755. He was eminent in painting flowers and birds, and his works were eagerly sought after, no less for their exact imitation than for the taste of composition, and the truly beautiful and picturesque attitudes in which they were drawn. They are rarely met with out of Brescia, though several noble Venetian families possess a few specimens, but the best of all is to be seen at the royal court of Turin.]

DURELLO, SIMON, a German engraver, who flourished about the year 1674. He engraved some of the portraits for the work entitled, Istoria di Leopoldo Cesare, published at Vienna in 1674.

DURER, ALBERT. This distinguished artist, if he may not be considered as the founder of the German school, is at least entitled to the credit of having been the first that attempted to reform the taste of his country from the rude and barbarous style that immediately preceded him. Albert Durer was born at Nuremberg in 1471. He was the son of a goldsmith, who instructed him in the first elements of design, and purposed bringing him up to his own profession; but the decided inclination of his son for the study of the arts and sciences, induced him to permit him to pursue the object of his wishes, and when he had reached the age of fourteen, it was his intention to place him under the tuition of Martin Schoen at Colmar, the most eminent artist of his time in Germany; but the death of that master prevented it, and he became a disciple of Michael Wolgemut, under whom he applied to painting and engraving for some years. He cultivated at the same time, with great assiduity, the study of perspective, the mathematics, and architecture; in all of which he excelled. In his works as a painter he discovers a fertile invention, a design more precise than graceful, an excellent colour, and a polished finishing. We could desire in them a more select choice of forms, a more elevated expression in his characters, less formality in his outline, and more amenity in the blending of his tints. It has been observed of this celebrated artist, that he would have equalled the greatest masters of Italy if he had visited Rome, and had the advantage of studying the beauties of antiquity, by which his design might have possessed as much of beauty and elegance as it does of anatomical precision. Costume, which had been entirely neglected by the artists of his country, was also little regarded by Albert, whose figures are universally habited in the mode of Germany. The paintings by this master are in the most distinguished situations, particularly in the Imperial collection, and at Munich. Of these the most celebrated are, the Adoration of the Magi; the Crowning of the Virgin; Adam and Eve, as large as life; the Crucifixion, a grand composition, one of his most esteemed works; and many others. As an engraver, Albert Durer is deserving of particular notice. Born in the infancy of the art, he carried engraving to a perfection which has since been hardly surpassed. If we merely consider his command of the graver, as well as the remarkable neatness and clearness of his stroke; he will appear an artist of extraordinary merit, not only for the time in which he lived, but at any period of the art that has succeeded him. It appears natural that, even with the possession of extensive powers, an artist, without the advantage of models worthy of imitation, can merely find, in his own resources, the means of improving his art to a certain degree; and that it can only be brought to perfection by the progressive concurrence of the exertions of succeeding ability. Albert Durer may be cited as an exception to this general rule. If we do not discover in his plates the boldness and freedom which is desirable in large historical works, we find in them every thing that can be wished for in subjects more minute, and more finished. Although the art of engraving has since had the advantage and experience of three centuries, it would perhaps be difficult to select a more perfect specimen of executive excellence than his print of S. Jerome, engraved in 1514. He etched a few plates, but they are not equal to his engravings. We have by him several wooden cuts, which are executed in a free, spirited style, resembling his masterly pen-drawings. Although he was well acquainted with the anatomy of the human figure, and occasionally designed it correctly, his contours are neither graceful nor pleasing; and are never entirely divested of the stiff formal taste that prevailed at his time, both in his figures and drapery. The prints by Albert Durer are numerous, and many of them are extremely scarce and very valuable. They frequently bear the date of the year in which they were engraved, and are generally marked with one of the following ciphers, . As his plates executed with the graver are the most esteemed, we shall first give an account of the most important of them :

Albert Durer died at Nuremberg in 1528. [It is now pretty clearly ascertained that Albert Durer did not execute any of the engravings on wood. Zani and Adam Bartsch are decidedly of this opinion. The latter adduces satisfactory reasons to show that the designs only were by Durer, and that the mechanical operation of cutting was intrusted to workmen eminent in that line. This decision of Bartsch extends to Hans Schaufelin, Hans Burgmaier, Hans Balduin Grün, Altdorfer, Lucas Cranach, and others.]

DURET, PETER, a French engraver, living at Paris when Basan published his Dictionnaire des Graveurs in 1767. He engraved several plates of landscapes, &c., principally after the Dutch masters; among others we have by him:

A View in Holland; after Ruysdael.

Two Moonlight subjects; after Vanderveer.

The Country Blacksmith; after Ph. Wouermans.

An Italian Sea-port; after Vernet.

DURNO, JAMES, an English painter, born about the year 1752. He first studied under Andrea Casali, and afterwards was instructed by Mr. West. The early productions of this artist gave promise of great ability, which did not however answer public expectation. He went to Italy in 1774, where he died in 1795. Mr. Durno painted two pictures for the Shakspeare Gallery.

DURR, JOHN. This artist was a native of Germany, and flourished about the year 1625. He was an engraver of little repute, and worked chiefly for the booksellers, for whom, among other book plates, he engraved some portraits, particularly those of H. J. Ernest and his family, and J. Zimmer; the latter is dated 1625.

DUSART, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Haerlem in 1665. He had the advantage of being instructed by Adrian van Ostade, whose style he followed with considerable success. His works, like those of Ostade, represent Dutch Peasants regaling and merry-making. Although not equal to his master in the richness of his tones, and the harmony of his effect, his colouring is clear and agreeable; his compositions are ingenious, and his touch very spirited. There is a great inequality in the works of Dusart; his best pictures are deemed worthy of being placed in the choicest collections. We have by this artist some very spirited etchings, and a few plates in mezzotinto, which are full of humorous character. The following are his best prints:

PLATES IN MEZZOTINTO.

An old Man playing on the Violin, with a Dutch Peasant regaling.

A Girl confessing to a Monk.

A Dutch Boor reading a Paper, and holding a Bottle.

The Monkeys regaling.

An Indian dancing with a Girl.

A Girl dancing with a Tea-pot in her Hand.

Twelve plates of the Months of the Year.

[He also engraved, in mezzotinto, the Five Senses, of which a detailed account may be found in Bruliot's Dictionnaire des Monogrammes.]

ETCHINGS.

The Interior of an Alehouse, with Boors regaling.

The Great Fair. 1685.

The Little Fair. 1685.

The Amorous Cobler.

The Village Surgeon. 1695.

The Village Physician. 1695.

The Inside of a Dutch Alehouse, with Peasants drinking, and a Man playing on the Violin; with an inscription beginning, Rusticus ex animo, non pulvis Hypocrita gaudet.

A Village Festival; C. Dusart, pinx.

He died at Haerlem in 1704.

[DUTTENHOFER, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, a German engraver, born in 1778, is chiefly known by his landscapes after Claude, Poussin, Caracci, P. Brill, and various views in the Tyrol. He also copied Woollet's print of "Solitude," after Wilson. He was one of the artists employed on the Musée Napoleon.]

DUVAL, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1644. After receiving some instruction from Nicholas Weilling, he visited Rome, and became a scholar of Pietro da Cortona, whose style he followed with some reputation. On his return to Holland, he was employed by King William at Loo, and was made Director of the Academy at the Hague; of which he painted the ceiling of the principal saloon, which is spoken of as a work of considerable merit. He attended the king to England, but it is not said how long he remained here. He died in 1732.

DUVAL, PHILIP, a French painter, who flourished about the year 1672. He was a scholar of Charles le Brun, and afterwards studied at Venice. He came to England in the reign of Charles II., and painted some historical subjects, one of which, for the Duchess of Richmond, represented Venus receiving from Vulcan the Arms of Æneas. Of this performance, the noble author of the anecdotes observes, that the head-dress of the goddess, her bracelets, and the Cupids, had more the air of Versailles than Latium. It was dated in 1672. He died in London in 1709.

DUVENEDE, MARK VAN. This painter was born at Bruges in 1674. He went to Rome when he was very young, and became a scholar of Carlo Maratti, in whose academy he studied four years.

There are several of his pictures in the churches and convents of his native city, of which the most esteemed is the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence in the chapel of St. Christopher. He died in 1729.

DUVET, or DANET, JOHN, an old French engraver, born at Langres in 1510. He is sometimes called the master of the Unicorn, from his having sometimes engraved that animal in his allegorical subjects. He flourished at Paris in the reign of Henry II. of France. He generally marked his plates I. D. or with one of these ciphers,  or .

The following plates are by him:

The God Mars; I. D. 1530.

The Marriage of Adam and Eve; Johannes Duvet, fec.

Moses with the Patriarchs.

A set of twenty-four plates, of the subjects of the Apocalypse.

[Bartsch and Zani have clearly proved, by the inscription and date on a print, the first of the series of subjects for the Apocalypse, that John Duvet was born in 1485: "Joh. Duvet aurifab. Lingon. annor. 70. has historias perfecit, 1555." Bartsch enumerates forty-five prints by this artist.]

[DUYNEN, ISAAC VAN, a native of Dort, lived about 1670; he painted sea and river fish very successfully.]

[DYCK, DANIEL VANDEN, a native of Flanders, who studied in Italy, and became painter to the duke of Mantua, who made him keeper of his gallery. He was accounted a good portrait painter, and also in his historical subjects not without merit. Besides painting, he amused himself with the graver, after his own designs. He died in 1729.]

[DYK, FLORUS VAN, an historical painter, born in 1600, and died in 1649. He is better known as a painter of fruit and flowers, in which he excelled.]

[DYXHOORN, PETER ARNOU, born at Rotterdam in 1810, and died there in 1839. He was a scholar of M. Schouman, and J. C. Schotel; he painted marine subjects and river scenes in a very able manner.]

E

EARLOM, RICHARD. Although it is unusual in works of this nature to introduce the living artists of our country, yet, as this distinguished engraver has, for some years, discontinued the exercise of his talent, and as his prints are so interesting, so generally admired, and occupy an important place in the portfolios of the collectors, it is hoped that the following list of some of his principal plates will not be unacceptable to the public, nor offensive to their venerable author.

We are indebted to Mr. Earlom for a very interesting work, published by Boydell, entitled, Liber Veritatis, comprising two hundred plates, executed in the style of the original drawings, by Claude Lorraine, which are in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire. [He died in 1822.]

ECHARDT, or ECCARDT, JOHN GILES. This painter was a native of Germany, but visited England about the year 1740, where he became a pupil of John Baptist Vanloo. He was much employed as a portrait painter, about the time that Sir Joshua Reynolds returned from Italy. We have a print of Mrs. Woffington, the actress, engraved by Faber, from a portrait painted by Echartd; and another of Doctor Conyers Middleton, engraved by the same artist, from a picture by this painter, who Mr. Strutt has erroneously mentioned as the engraver.

ECKMAN, or ECKMAN, EDWARD, a Flemish engraver on wood, born at Mechlin about the year 1610. He has engraved some wooden cuts, which are admired for the neatness of their execution, and the correct drawing of his small figures. He appears to have taken the prints of Callot for his model, and has copied some of them in wooden cuts with surprising delicacy and spirit, particularly his plate of the Fire-works on the river Arno. He also engraved after Businck and Abraham Bosse. According to the Abbé de Marolles, the work of Eckman consists of upwards of a hundred prints.

ECKSTEYN, GEORGE DAVID, a German engraver, who resided at Nuremberg about the year 1721. He engraved part of the portraits for the work entitled, Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum; published in 1721.

EDELINCK, GERARD. This admirable engraver was born at Antwerp in 1627, and received his instruction from Cornelius Galle, under whom he acquired sufficient ability to be invited to Paris by M. Colbert in 1665, where he was taken into the service of Louis XIV., who settled a pension on him, and he was accommodated with apartments at the Gobelins. He was received into the Academy, and was soon after knighted by the King. This extraordinary artist worked entirely with the graver; and his execution is at the same time both bold and finished. His style is more precious than that of Bolswert and Pontius, without being less picturesque; and he possessed a profound acquaintance with what is called colour, in engraving. His plates, though exquisitely finished, discover nothing of labour or littleness. The size and the number of his prints evince the most surprising facility. On the slightest glance of his Magdalene, after le Brun, we perceive neatness, effect, and expression; on a closer examination, we are surprised at the boldness of his stroke, and that freedom of touch which gives the appearance of life and reality. The pictures of le Brun, under the graver of Edelinck and Gerard Audran, appear to have been the works of an accomplished colourist, and assume perfections, in which they were really deficient. In the plates of Edelinck there is nothing of negligence or mediocrity, every object is perfectly finished, and his heads are distinguished by the most lively expression. The uncommon merit of this excellent artist will justify an ample detail of his principal works.

Alexander entering the Tent of Darius; after Mignard; engraved by Edelinck and P. Drevet.

This eminent artist died at Paris in 1707.

EDELINCK, JOHN, was the brother of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1630. He joined his brother at Paris, where he engraved several plates in imitation of the style of Gerard. Although very unequal to the works of his brother, his prints are not without considerable merit. He engraved several of the statues in the garden at Versailles. We have also by him:

The Portrait of Isbrandus de Diemerbroeck, famous anatomist; after Romyn de Hoghe.

The Deluge; after Alessandro Veronese; very fine.

This plate so nearly resembles the fine style of Gerard Edelinck, that it is supposed that he was greatly assisted in the execution of it by his brother.

EDELINCK, NICHOLAS. This artist was the son of Gerard Edelinck, born at Paris about 1680. Although he had the advantage of his father's instruction, and of travelling to Italy, he never rose above mediocrity. He engraved some portraits, and a few plates for the Crozat collection. We have, among others, the following prints:

PORTRAITS.

Gerard Edelinck, engraver to the King; after Tortebat.

The Cardinal Julius de Medici; after Raffaele.

Philip, Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, on horseback; after J. Ranc.

EDELING, J. This artist was a native of Holland. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers, among which are those of J. Deimerbroeck, and Timon van Geissel.

EDEMA, GERARD. This painter was born at Friesland about the year 1652. He was a scholar of Aldert van Everdingen, and, like his master, painted landscapes with rocks and waterfalls, chiefly from views in Norway. At the age of eighteen he came to England, where he met with encouragement, and made voyages to Norway and Newfoundland, to collect subjects for his pictures among those wild scenes of nature, for which he appears to have had a romantic predilection. The figures in his landscapes are generally painted by John Wyck. Although the pictures by Edema are painted with spirit, and are interesting in their scenery, they possess little of the chaste and simple colouring, and the picturesque touch, which distinguish the landscapes of Everdingen. He died at Richmond in 1700.

[EDEMA, NICOLAS, born in Friesland in 1666, went to Surinam to paint the landscapes, plants, and insects of that country. He became a good landscape painter, as his views are after nature, with a good tone of colour, and a spirited touch. He died at London in 1722.]

[EDRIDGE, HENRY, an English miniature painter, was born in 1768. He was apprenticed to Pether, the mezzotint engraver and landscape painter, but his excellence was in miniature portraits, which he executed in black lead and Indian ink, and subsequently in water colours. He was an Associate of the Royal Academy, and died in 1821.]

[EDWARDS, EDWARD, an English artist born in 1738, was employed by Boydell to make drawings from the old masters for his publications, and by the Society of Antiquaries for the same purpose. He painted for Boydell's Shakspeare a subject from the Two Gentlemen of Verona; he painted also arabesques, and published 52 etchings. He never arrived at distinction, except that he was appointed teacher of perspective in the Royal Academy in 1788, which situation he held to his death, which occurred in 1806. He was the compiler of the "Anecdotes of Painters," intended as a supplement to Walpole: in his facts he was too accurate to please his contemporaries, and consequently the work and its author were much derided.]

EECKHOUT, ANTHONY VANDEN, a Flemish painter of flowers and fruit, born at Bruges in 1656. He accompanied his relation, L. Deyster, to Italy, where he remained several years. He afterwards went to Lisbon, where he met with great encouragement, and married a lady of fortune; after which he painted little but for his amusement. He was killed by an assassin when taking the air in his carriage.

EECKHOUT, GERBRANT VANDEN, was born at Amsterdam in 1621, and was educated in the school of Rembrandt. By the instruction of that eminent painter he acquired an excellent style of colouring, and a competent acquaintance with the principles of light and shadow. On leaving his master he gained great reputation as a portrait painter; and it is, perhaps, in that character that he has the strongest claim to our approbation. His best productions are those he painted on leaving the Academy of Rembrandt, some of which bear a near resemblance to those of his instructor; but he afterwards sunk into manner and tameness. In his historical works we find the defects of his master in design and characteristic propriety rather increased than diminished; and this impoverishment is not supported by the magic of Rembrandt's colouring, nor his admirable conduct of the chiaro-scuro. His design is not of a superior choice to that of his master; and his pencilling, compared with the gigantic touch of Rembrandt, is tame and spiritless. His notions of costume are more absurd, if that be possible, than those of Rembrandt; and the only character in his pictures deserving of admiration, is a harmony of colour which seems to be inseparable from the school in which he was brought up. Although at a fearful distance from the works of Rembrandt, his pictures are admitted into the collections of the curious. One of his best productions is our Saviour among the Doctors, in the Electoral collection at Dusseldorp. There are a few etchings by Gerbrant vanden Eeckhout, among which are:

A Bust of a young Man, in an Oriental Dress; marked G. V. D. 1646.

The Portrait of Cornelius Tromp.

He died in 1674.

EGMONT, JUSTUS VAN. This painter was born at Leyden in 1602, and was sent to Antwerp to be educated in the school of Rubens. He assisted that master in several of his works, particularly those which he painted for the churches at Mechlin. On leaving the academy of Rubens he went to Paris, where he was appointed painter to Louis XIII. and XIV., and executed several considerable works in conjunction with Simon Vouet. Van Egmont was one of the twelve elders at the establishment of the French Academy of painting and sculpture, in 1648. He died at Antwerp in 1674.

[EGOGUI, AMBROGIO, a painter of Milan, and imitator of L. da Vinci; of whom there remains at Nerviano a fine altar-piece, executed in 1527.]

EIMMAERT, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, born at Ratisbon, and flourished about the year 1680. We have by him some small etchings of ruins, buildings, and vases, ornamented with figures, which are executed with neatness, and have considerable merit. He also engraved some plates for Sandrart's Academia. [There were three artists of this name, each eminent in his day. The eldest flourished to the end of the 16th century; the second, his son, was born in 1603, and died in 1663; the third, who was son of the second, was born in 1637, and died in 1705. The name is variously spelt, Eimart, Eimmart, Eimaert, and Eimert.]

EISEN, FRANCIS. This engraver was born at Brussels, but resided chiefly at Paris, where he flourished about 1750. He etched a plate from the picture by Rubens, of Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, which was in the church of St. Gudule at Brussels. [He was born in 1700, and died in 1777.]

EISEN, CHARLES, the son of the preceding artist. He etched some few plates of the Virgin, a St. Jerome, St. Ely preaching, &c. He designed many of the small portraits and vignettes for La Vie des Peintres, par J. B. Descamps, published at Paris 1751 to 1763. [He was born in 1722, and died in 1778.]

[EISENHOUT, ANTOINE, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished at Rome about 1590, but who was living in 1619. It appears that he has been miscalled Eisenhart by Christ, and that some of his works have been ascribed to other masters. Brulliot refers to some attributed to Lucas Ciambelani by Bartsch, which he conjectures should be given to Eisenhout.]

[EISMANN, JEAN ANTOINE, a German painter, who established himself at Verona, was born in 1604, and died in 1698. He painted landscapes, battles, perspectives, and marine subjects. There are some pictures in the Dresden Gallery under the name of Leismann, or Lismann, which are supposed to be by him. He adopted his pupil Carlo Brisighella, who took the name of Charles Eismann, and who painted the same subjects as his master. Hence there is some confusion in the accounts of both. The name is sometimes erroneously written Luismon.]

[EKELS, JAN, born at Amsterdam in 1722, was a scholar of Thierry Dalens, the younger. He painted views of cities in the manner of Jan Ten Compe. His pictures are generally of a small size, and are highly finished, with a good effect of light and shade. He died at Amsterdam in 1781.]

[EKELS, JAN, the younger, was born in 1759, and was instructed by his father. He made rapid progress in the art, and painted interiors, conversations, familiar scenes, and portraits, chiefly of the cabinet size. His pictures are distinguished by a light, free pencil, and a vigorous tone of colour: they are not numerous, as he cultivated the art more as an amateur than a professor, and died at the age of 34.]

ELBRUCHT, JOHN VAN. This painter was born at Elburg, near Campen, in 1500. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but he established himself at Antwerp, where he was received into the Academy in 1535. In the cathedral of that city is a picture by this master, representing the Miraculous Draught of Fishes. He not only painted history, but excelled in landscapes and sea-storms. [Elbrucht, Elburgh, or Elburcht, surnamed Kleyn-Hansken, or Little John, was born in 1500, and died at Antwerp, according to Balkema, in 1546. M. Le Brun appears to have fallen into a mistake respecting him, as he says he was born in 1660, and died in 1732. His style of painting is sufficient to show that is an error.]

ELDER, WILLIAM. This artist was a Scotchman, but resided in London about the year 1680. He was one of the engravers who were employed by the booksellers; and we have a few plates of portraits by him executed with the graver, among which are the following:

His own Portrait, with a Fur Cap.

The same, with a Wig.

William Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury.

John Pearson, Bishop of Chester.

Ben Jonson, prefixed to his Works in 1692.

Sir Theodore de Mayerne, physician.

Admiral Russell.

Sir Henry Pollexfen, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

John Ray, naturalist.

Richard Morton, M. D.

George Parker, astrologer.

Charles Snell, writing-master.

ELIAS, MATTHEW. This painter was born near Cassel, in French Flanders, in 1658. His parents were extremely poor, and he was employed when a boy in attending cattle, in which humble situation he was noticed by a painter of Dunkirk named Corbeen, tracing objects on the ground. The artist, struck with the singularity of the circumstance and the evident disposition of the boy, prevailed on his mother to intrust him to his care. After instructing him for some time he sent him to Paris for improvement, where he met with employment, and resided several years. On the death of Corbeen, he settled at Dunkirk, and painted some altar-pieces for the churches in that town and the neighbourhood. He died in 1741.

ELLIGER, or ELGER, OTTOMAR, THE ELDER, was born at Gottenburg in 1633, the son of a physician, who, finding in him a strong inclination for the art, sent him to Antwerp, at that time the residence of so many able artists, where he became a scholar of Daniel Segers. He painted flowers and fruit in the highly-finished style of his master, and arrived at sufficient ability to be invited to the court of Berlin, where he was appointed painter to William Frederick, Elector of Brandenburg. The pictures of this artist are almost entirely confined to Germany, where they are held in considerable estimation. [He died in 1686.]

ELLIGER, or ELGER, OTTOMAR, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Hamburg in 1666. After being instructed in the first elements of the art by his father, he was sent to Amsterdam, where he became a scholar of Michael van Muscher, a painter of small portraits and conversations, under whom he studied a short time, but being ambitious of distinguishing himself in a higher walk of art, and the works of Gerard Lairese being then in high reputation, he entered the school of that eminent master, whose instruction enabled him in a few years to dispense with further assistance. Elliger painted historical subjects in the style of Lairese, which were judiciously composed and correctly designed. Like his instructor, he was particularly attentive to the propriety of costume, both in the character and habiliments of his figures, and in the style of his architecture, which he introduced into his pictures with great judgment and effect. His principal works are at Amsterdam. He was employed by the Elector of Mentz, for whom he painted the Death of Alexander, and the Marriage of Peleus and Thetis. He died in 1732.

ELLIOT, WILLIAM, an English engraver, born at Hampton Court in 1727. He engraved several landscapes, which were admired for the taste and freedom of his point. His best prints are from the landscapes of the brothers Smith, of Chichester. This ingenious artist died in the prime of life in 1766. We have by him the following plates:

A Landscape with Cattle; after Rosa de Tivoli.

A View near Maestricht, with Cattle; after A. Cuyp.

A Landscape with the Flight into Egypt; after Poelmeburg.

A large Landscape; after G. Smith.

A set of four Landscapes; after the Smiths.

A set of six of Horses; after T. Smith.

Two Landscapes, Spring and Summer; after van Goijen.

The Portrait of Helen Forman, second wife of Rubens.

ELLIS, WILLIAM, an eminent English engraver of landscapes and views. He engraved some plates in conjunction with William Woollet; and we have several charming prints by him from the designs of Paul Sandby and Thomas Hearne.

ELMER, STEPHEN, an English painter of dead game and objects of still-life. He represented those subjects with great fidelity, and with a very spirited pencil. This artist principally resided at Farnham in Surrey, where he died about 1795.

ELSHEIMER, or ELZHEIMER, ADAM. This eminent painter was born at Francfort in 1574. He was the son of a tailor, who placed him under the care of Philip Offenbach, who, though a reputable artist, was soon surpassed by his disciple. Finding no further means of improvement in his own country, Elsheimer went to Rome, where he studied the works of the great masters, and in a short time his pictures were held in general estimation. He was called by the Italians, il Tedesco. The pictures of Elsheimer generally represent small landscapes decorated with subjects of history, which are distinguished by the beauty of their finishing, and their faithful representation of nature. He possessed so extraordinary a memory, that it was sufficient for him to have seen a view once to draw it with the most surprising precision. It was thus that he made a design of the Villa Madama from memory, in which nothing was omitted, the trees and buildings were drawn with the most scrupulous exactness, and the particular shadows of the different objects were represented according to the precise hour he meant to describe. The merit of the works of Elsheimer consists in an excellent taste of design, an admirable disposition of his objects, a neat and spirited touch, a precious finish, and a lively and harmonious colouring. The scenery in his landscapes is of a happy choice, and the effect in his moonlight pieces and torchlights is managed with great intelligence. The extreme patience and labour with which he finished his pictures was such, that the prices he received for them never sufficiently repaid him for the time he employed on them. If the unfortunate painter had been paid for them a fourth part of what they have produced since, he might have lived in affluence instead of the state of indigence and distress in which he passed the greater part of his life. His only benefactor was Count Goudt, who purchased some of his choicest pictures, and has engraved seven of them in a highly-finished manner, well adapted to the style of the pictures. His finest work was the Flight into Egypt, which is now in the French Museum. Adam Elsheimer is said to have etched several plates of similar subjects to his pictures, but perhaps the only one that is really authenticated is the young Tobit leading his Father. He died in 1620.

ELSTRACKE, REGINALD, or RENOLD, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and his plates, which are executed with the graver, are almost entirely confined to portraits. These are more sought after for their scarcity and their connexion with English history, than for their merit as engravings. When he did not sign his plates with his name, he marked them with the initials R. E. The following are by him :

PORTRAITS.

James I.
Queen Elizabeth.
Mary Queen of Scots, with Attributes; one of his best prints.
The same, with Lord Darnley.
Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk.
Robert, Earl of Essex.
Gervase Babington, Bishop of Worcester.
Sir Julius Cæsar, Keeper of the Rolls.
Sir Thomas More.
Sir Philip Sidney.
Thomas Sutton, founder of the Charter House.
Edmund, Lord Sheffield.
John, Lord Harrington.
William Knollis, Viscount Wallingford.

He also published a volume of portraits, entitled BAZIAIOLOGIA; or, the true and lively Effigies of all our English Kings, from the Conquest to the present Time, 1618. Of which the title and the portrait of William the Conqueror were engraved by himself.

[ELST, PETER VANDER, a scholar of Gerard Dou, painted half-length figures, as seen by candle-light.]

[ELZEVIER, ARNOULD, a Dutch painter of landscapes and conflagrations, flourished about the middle of the 17th century.]

EMELRAET. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1612. He went to Italy when young, and passed several years at Rome. On his return to Antwerp, he distinguished himself by painting large landscapes in a superior style, and was engaged by the ablest historical painters to introduce his landscapes as the background of their pictures. In the church of the barefooted Carmelites at Antwerp, are some capital landscapes by Emelraet, painted in a grand style, and of a fine effect.

EMERY. See HEMERY.

EMMETT, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1710. Among other prints, he engraved a large view of the interior of St. Paul's church. It is executed with the graver in a neat, clear style.

EMPEREUR. See LEMPEREUR.

EMPOLI, JACOPO CHIMENTI DA, a Florentine painter, born in 1554. He was a disciple of Tommaso Manzuoli da S. Friano, whose style is discernible in all his works. His pictures possess an elegance of design, and a graceful impasto of colouring, which distinguish the productions of his master. The Abate Moreni speaks in favourable terms of his fresco works in the Certosa, and in the monastery of Boldrone at Florence, but a fall from the scaffolding obliged him afterwards to confine himself to oil-painting. One of his best pictures is his S. Ivo, in the Florentine Gallery, which, from its pleasing and graceful effect, is more generally admired than works of higher pretensions. He died in 1640.

ENDLICH, PHILIP, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about the year 1700. He was a pupil of Bernard Picart, and was chiefly occupied in portraits, which are neatly executed with the graver. Among others, we have by him the following :

PORTRAITS.

Henry, Count of Meens.

John Taylor, a celebrated English oculist. 1735.

John Philip d'Almeria, Governor of the Isle of St. Martin.

John Gosewyn E. Alstein, ecclesiastic of Amsterdam. 1738.

John Noordbeck; the same.

Peter Hollebeck; the same.

Leonard Beels; the same.

ENFANT. See LENFANT.

ENGELBRECHT, CHRISTIAN and MARTIN, two printsellers and engravers, who resided at Augsburg, and flourished about the year 1721. Christian Engelbrecht, conjointly with J. A. Peefel, engraved some ornamental works for goldsmiths, after A. Morrison; and some views for the History of Architecture, published in 1721, by J. Bernhard. Martin Engelbrecht executed some plates after Rugendas and other masters; and some prints for Ovid's Metamorphoses.

ENGELBRECHTSEN, CORNELIUS. This old painter was born at Leyden in 1468. The pictures of John Van Eyck, the alleged inventor of oil-painting, being at that time the object of curiosity and admiration, Engelbrechtsen applied himself to study the works of that master, and is said by Van-mander to have been the first artist of his country that painted in oil. The paintings by this master which escaped the troubles of that country, were preserved with great care in the church of Our Lady, at Leyden; representing the Crucifixion; the Descent from the Cross; Abraham sacrificing Isaac; with some small pictures of the Life of the Virgin: these were well composed, and of a less Gothic style of design than was usual at the early period at which he lived. His most capital production was an altar-piece, painted for the Epitaph of the family of Lockhorst, in the church of St. Peter's at Leyden, representing the Adoration of the Lamb, a composition of a great number of figures. He died in 1533.

ENGELRAEMS, CORNELIUS, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1527. He excelled in painting historical subjects in distemper. His best work is in the cathedral church of St. Rombouts at Mechlin, representing the Seven Works of Mercy: a grand composition. There are several of his pictures in Germany, where he passed some years. At Hamburg, in the church of St. Catherine, is a large altar-piece by Engelraems, of the Conversion of St. Paul. He died in 1583.

ENGLISH, JOSIAS, an English amateur engraver, who, according to Lord Orford, resided at Mortlake, where he died in 1718. We have by this gentleman, an etching of Christ with the Two Disciples at Emmaus, after Titian. In 1654 he etched a set of small upright plates of the Gods and Demigods. His best performance is a neat and spirited etching of a half-length of a Man regaling, holding a Flask in one Hand, and a Goblet of Wine in the other; a Lobster and other eatables on the Table before him: inscribed Fr. Cleyne, pinx. Anno 1656. Josias English, fecit, with six verses beneath:

Troth 'tis a merry fellow, &c.

[ENS, or ENSO, GIOSEFFO, a Venetian painter, who flourished about the year 1660. He painted what are termed Capricci, representing allegorical fictions, in which are introduced sphinxes and monsters in grotesque shapes, or what might be more properly called sick men's dreams, or the wanderings of a wild imagination. They were common at the time in Italy, and had their admirers. He was made a chevalier of the holy cross by Urban VIII., and afterwards painted some altar-pieces at Venice, which are extremely beautiful.]

EPICIE. See LEPICIE.

EPISCOPUS. See BISHOP.

EREDI, BENEDETTO, a modern Italian engraver, born at Florence in 1750. He engraved, in conjunction with J. B. Cecchi, nine plates of the Monument of Dante, with his portrait. We have also by him the following plates:

PORTRAITS.

Federigo Zucearo; after the same.

Angelo Bronzino; Florentine painter.

Annibale Caracci.

SUBJECTS.

The Transfiguration; after Raffaele.

The Adulteress before Christ; after Angelo Bronzino.

The Death of Lucretia; after Luca Giordano.

EREMITA, DI MONTE SENARIO. See STEFANESCHI.

ERMELS, JOHN FRANCIS, a German painter and engraver, born near Cologne in 1641. He resided at Nuremberg, and painted for the church of S. Sebald in that city a picture of the Resurrection; he was more successful however as a painter of landscapes, in which he imitated the style of John Both. We have by him a few etchings of landscapes, executed with spirit and taste. He died at Nuremberg in 1693. [His etchings are after Waterloo, Breenberg, &c. Unless there was another of similar name and manner, etchings with the date 1697 must be ascribed to this artist. See Huber, Brulliot, and Zani.]

ERRAR, J. We have by this artist some etchings of landscapes, after Waterloo. They are marked with the initials of his name.

ERTINGER, FRANCIS, a German engraver, born at Wyl in Suabia, about the year 1640. He resided chiefly at Paris, where he engraved several plates, which are not without merit. His best prints are the following:

PORTRAITS.

J. F. de Beughem, Bishop of Antwerp.

N. Machiavel.

Gabriel du Pinau.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The History of Achilles, in eight Plates; after Rubens: the same subjects have been since engraved by Baron. Twelve Prints from the Metamorphoses of Ovid; after the miniatures of Joseph Werner.

Ten Plates of the History of the Counts of Thoulouse after Raymond le Fage.

The Marriage at Cana in Galilee; after the same.

Several Views of Towns; after Vandermeulen: some of which are in the manner of Callot.

A set of Friezes of Bacchanalian subjects; after R. le Fage.

[ERVEST, JACOB, a scholar of Adam Elsheimer, painted marine subjects, and naval combats.]

ES, JAMES VAN. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1570. He excelled in painting flowers, birds, and fish, which he represented with great truth and nature. His shell-fish in particular were touched with infinite spirit. His colour is excellent; and his pictures are finished with great care and transparency. [There is considerable difference between writers of almost equal authority, respecting the dates of the birth and death of this artist. Some place his birth in 1556, and his death in 1621; others say he was born in 1570, and conjecture that he died in 1630.]

ESCALANTE, JUAN ANTONIO, a Spanish painter, born at Cordova in 1630. He was a scholar of Francisco Ricci, and is said by Palomino to have been a very reputable painter of history. Several of his works in the churches at Madrid are highly commended by that author. In the church of S. Miguel is an esteemed picture by Escalante of S. Catalina; and in the church del Espiritu Santo, is an altar-piece of the dead Christ, with other figures, painted in the style of Titian. He died in 1670. [It should be said rather, that he imitated the style of Tintoretto, as he made him his model both in composition and colouring.]

ESPAGNOLETTO. See RIBERA.

[ESPANA, JUAN DE, or JUAN EL ESPAÑOL, resided in Italy from 1500 to 1520. He studied under Perugino at the same time as Raphael. His ordinary residence was at Spoleto, and it is there, as also in other cities, that his works are to be found, and which are attributed to a contemporary of Raphael, without ever mentioning the name of the artist, although he always signed his pictures.]

ESPINOSA, JACINTO JERONIMO DE. According to Palomino Velasco, this painter was born in the vicinity of Valencia in 1600. He was a scholar of Francisco Ribalta, under whom he acquired a boldness of design and a vigour of colouring; that resemble the style of Guercino. His best pictures are in the churches at Valencia, particularly in San Estevan, the chapel of San Luis Belthran, and in the convent of the Predicadores. The principal altar-piece in the church of the Carmelites is by this master, representing the Transfiguration. He also painted many easel pictures for private collections. He died at Valencia in 1680. [He was a very industrious painter, and his works in the churches of Spain are numerous. Cean Bermudez enumerates about eighty, and the places where they are to be found.]

[ESQUARTE, PABLO, a Spanish painter, who, after studying at Valencia, went to Venice and became a disciple of Titian. He had a great talent for portrait painting, and perhaps excelled in other departments, as the Duke de Villa Hermosa employed him to ornament his palace and country residence. He died rich, through the munificence of the Duke.]

[ESSELINS, JACOB, is said to have been a pupil of Rembrandt, but his works do not corroborate the assertion. His pictures represent villages on the banks of rivers, woody landscapes, buildings with magnificent fountains, stag-hunts, and shipping pieces, painted in a clear tone of colour, and with figures spiritedly touched. The exact dates are not recorded.]

ETLINGER, GEORGE, a German engraver on wood, who resided at Bamberg. There is by him a wooden cut representing Bishop Blaize, enclosed in a border, ornamented with symbols of the Gospel. It is executed with great spirit, and signed George Etlinger, z. Bamberg, f.

EVELYN, JOHN. This English gentleman claims a place among the amateur artists of his country, as the engraver of five small plates of his journey from Rome to Naples, which, according to Lord Orford, were etched about the year 1649. In the General Dictionary he is stated to have etched some other plates, among which are a view of his own seat at Wootton, and another of Putney. Mr. Strutt attributes to Mr. Evelyn an etching of the portrait of William Dobson, the painter, an oval plate, inscribed, Vere effigies Guibelmi Dobson, Armiger, et Pictor Regiæ Majestatis Angliæ, in aqua forti per J. E. He observes that the letters J. E. are frequently cut off, on which account the plate has been by some supposed to be by Dobson himself. Mr. Evelyn was the author of one of the earliest English publications on the subjects of engraving, entitled Sculptura.

EVERDINGEN, CÆSAR VAN. This painter was born at Alkmaer in 1606, and was a scholar of John van Bronkhorst. He painted history and portraits; and was also an eminent architect. One of his most esteemed works was in the principal church at Alkmaer, representing the Triumph of David. He gained great reputation by a picture he painted of the Portraits of the Company of Archers, for their hall of assembly. His design was tolerably correct, and his colouring natural and vigorous. [He died in 1679.]

EVERDINGEN, ALBERT VAN. This eminent painter was the younger brother of Cæsar van Everdingen, born at Alkmaer in 1621. He studied successively under Roland Savery and Peter Molyn, both of whom he greatly surpassed. He excelled in painting rocky landscapes, represented in a very interesting manner. The talents of Everdingen were not, however, confined to subjects of that description; he painted sea-pieces and storms with surprising effect; and represented the agitation of the waves "contending with the skies," with an awful and terrific fidelity. In a voyage he made to the Baltic, he was shipwrecked on the coast of Norway, where he was under the necessity of remaining some time, until the vessel was repaired. He employed this interval in designing the trackless and romantic wilds of that uncultivated country. These studies furnished him with admirable subjects for his pictures, in which the grand forms of his rocks, and the picturesque effect of his waterfalls, are designed with a taste, and painted with a spirit, that entitled him to the appellation of the Salvator Rosa of the north. His colouring is simple and pure, his touch broad and facile, and it is evident that every object in his pictures was immediately designed from nature. The small figures with which he embellished his landscapes are correctly drawn, and very neatly touched. The admirers of etchings are indebted to this excellent artist for a number of plates executed in a free and masterly style, which are highly esteemed. His prints of landscapes amount to about a hundred, of which eight of the largest and most finished are very fine. He also engraved a set of fifty-six small prints for a book, published in Germany, called The Cheats of the Fox. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, at other times with the initials A. V. E. He died in 1675. [For a copious list of his etchings, see Bartsch, or Nagler.]

EXIMENO, JOACHIN, a Spanish artist, born at Valencia in 1674. He painted fruit, flowers, birds, fish, and objects of still-life, which he represented with great fidelity. He died in 1754. [His works are classed by Bermudez with those of his father, with whom he painted in conjunction. Their pictures were much esteemed by amateurs of the time, and four of large size are in the church of Our Lady of the Pillar at Valencia.]

EXSHAU, S., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. His prints are chiefly imitations of the works of Rembrandt, which are not without merit. Among other plates we have the following by him:

A Bust of an old Man, with a round hat; Rembrandt, inv. C. Exshau, fec. 1758.

A Head of an old Man, with a Beard; same inscription and date.

Joseph and Potiphar's wife; Rembrandt, pinx. Exshau, fec. aqua forte; scarce.

St. Peter's Bark in the Storm; same inscription; scarce.

A Girl carrying a Basket of Cherries, with two Boys, each having a Gun; after Rubens.

EYCK, HUBERT and JOHN VAN. These brothers were born at the small town of Maeseyk, on the Maes; Hubert, the elder, in 1366, and John in 1370. They were the sons of an obscure painter, of whom we have no particular account, by whom they were instructed in the rude and Gothic principles to which the art was at that early period confined. The city of Bruges was at the time of these artists the most flourishing and commercial in Europe; and they established themselves there, where they may be said to have been the founders of the Flemish school. The mode of painting previous to the time of John van Eyck (who is frequently styled John of Bruges) was with gums, or a preparation called egg-water, to which they applied a kind of varnish, which required a certain degree of heat to dry. It is reported by Karel van Mander, that John van Eyck, having finished a picture with great care, and which had occupied him a long time, placed it to dry in the heat of the sun, when the board on which it was painted split. His mortification at seeing the fruit of so much labour thus destroyed, urged him to attempt to discover, by his knowledge of chemistry, some process which would not in future expose him to so distressing an accident. In this research he is said to have discovered the use of linseed or nut oil, which he found the most siccative; and it was for some time generally believed that it was to this circumstance that the art was indebted for the discovery of oil-painting, in the year 1410. The authenticity of this discovery, however, has not only been disputed, but it has been proved by several of the writers on art, that oil-painting was practised long before the pretended discovery by van Eyck in 1410. A monk, named Teofilo, sometimes called Ruggiero, who lived in the eleventh century, wrote a book entitled, De omni scientia artis pingendi, in which he gives instructions for the preparation and use of oil in painting. Lib. i. c. 18, Accipe semen lini et exsicca illud in sartagine super ignem sine aqua, &c. He afterwards continues, Cum hoc oleo tere minimum sive cenobrium super lapidem sine aqua, et cum pincello limes super ostia vel tabulas quas rubricare volueris, &c. And in c. 22, he adds, Accipe colores quos imponere volueris terens eos diligenter oleo lini sine aqua, et fac mixturas cultuum ac vestimentorum sicut superius aqua feceras, et bestias, sive aves, aut folia variabis suis coloribus prout libuerit.

Bernardo de Dominicis, in his Lives of the Neapolitan painters, mentions several pictures painted in oil by the artists of his country, previous to the period of the pretended discovery by van Eyck, some of them as early as the beginning of the fourteenth century. He describes a picture by Pippo, or Filippo Tesauro, painted in oil, which was formerly in the church of S. Lorenzo, at Naples, representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. James and St. Sebastian, signed with the name of the painter, and dated 1309. It was still preserved in the time of that author, who wrote in 1742, in the collection of Sig. Girolamo F. Calzolojo. The same author mentions two pictures painted in oil by Maestro Simone, a disciple of Tesauro, in the church of S. Chiara, representing S. Lucia and S. Dorotea. This painter died in 1346. He further describes some pictures painted in oil by Gennaro di Cola, in the church of S. Maria della Pietá. That painter died in 1370.

In a treatise on the subject of the invention of oil-painting, published in 1781, by Mr. Raspe, the celebrated antiquary, it is very satisfactorily proved that oil-painting was practised long before the time of John van Eyck. It appears therefore certain, that the use of oil in painting was known at an earlier period; but it was probably in a very imperfect manner, and by a very tedious process; and that John van Eyck is still entitled to the credit of having brought the practice to perfection.

The brothers van Eyck generally worked in conjunction, until the death of Hubert, and their pictures were held in the highest estimation at the time in which they lived. Their most considerable work was an altar-piece, with folding-doors, painted for Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, and placed in the cathedral at Ghendt. The principal picture of this curious production represents the Elders worshipping the Lamb, a subject taken from the Apocalypse. On one of the folding-doors is represented Adam and Eve, and on the other St. Cecilia. Although the composition contains upwards of three hundred figures, it is finished with surprising care and exactness; and though the colouring is somewhat crude, there is great truth and character in the expression of the heads. This curious and interesting production is now in the Gallery of the Louvre. In the sacristy of the cathedral at Bruges is preserved, with great veneration, a picture painted by John van Eyck, after the death of his brother, dated in 1436, representing the Virgin and Infant, with St. George, St. Donatius, and other saints. John van Eyck died in 1441. [The reader must not rely on the correctness of the dates given in this article, as to the birth and death of these two celebrated brothers, Hubert and Jan Van Eyck; for, in this respect, great obscurity pervades almost every account of them hitherto published. It is a question whether Jan was not the elder, and there are probabilities in favour of that supposition. If the real family name could be discovered, it would serve to unravel some of the intricacies in which their history is involved. Maas-Eyck, their birth-place, has entailed on them the appellation Van Eyck, but it may be reasonably supposed that they had a more distinctive patronymic. The confusion so often found in accounts of Italian artists, proceeds from the same cause. If three, or more, Antonios, born in one city, or principality, become eminent as artists, they are all designated from the place; and, if the dates approximate, in process of time the works of one are ascribed to the others, or all to one, though there may be an apparent difference. The contest between the Italian, German, and Flemish writers for the precedence of painting in oil has given rise to much learned controversy, and led to very industrious researches and investigations of documents to throw light on the subject; when documents have failed, conjectures have been adopted to supply their place. As these investigations would naturally have reference to dates, it might be expected that every event in the life of Jan Van Eyck, and of his brother Hubert, would have been brought under consideration; few, however, have been recorded, and those few are to be found, incidentally, in writers, whose object was not the point in question. The accounts that appear, at present, most entitled to credence, place the birth of Jan Van Eyck at an earlier period than 1370. Zani inclines to about 1350, but leaves it open for future discovery. Kugler, whose account of and critical remarks on the works of the German and Flemish painters are so correct, places the birth of Hubert in 1366, and that of Jan in 1400, an interval of thirty-four years; a circumstance in which he differs from all former writers. Facio, who wrote in 1456, and died in 1457, speaks in high terms of Jan Van Eyck, under the name Johannes Gallicus, and Montfauçon (Les Monumens de la Monarchie Française, tom. iii.) gives an inscription from a manuscript Bible of the date 1372, wherein it is said, "Johannes de Brugis Pictor Regis prædieti fecit hanc picturam propria sua manu." The inscription is written on a book with miniatures, which the artist, on his knees, is presenting to Charles V. of France. Charles at this time commanded in Flanders. In the work recently published by the Count A. Raczynski on "the Arts in Portugal," the following notices occur. "It is almost certain that Jan Van Eyck went to Portugal in the suite of the embassy sent to solicit the hand of Isabella, the daughter of John the First, for the Duke of Burgundy." "In 1428 Don John had sent two ambassadors to France to treat with the Duke of Burgundy, Philip III., surnamed the Good, respecting his marriage with the Infante Isabella. In the same year the Duke, on his part, sent an embassy to demand her hand." Among the distinguished persons who formed the ambassadors' suite, is noticed MAITRE JEAN, valet de chambre du Duc de Bourgogne, fameux dans l'art de la Peinture. "At the time the embassy arrived at Lisbon (Dec. 28, 1428) the court was at Estremoz. The envoys went there, and while they treated of the marriage, maître Jean, since the celebrated Jan Van Eyck, made a magnificent portrait of the Infante Dona Isabella." The Count gives also the following extract from a manuscript, in Spanish, written in the 15th century:—"And conjointly the said ambassadors had the portrait of the said lady Infante Dona Isabella painted to the life by a man called JEAN DE YEL, moça da camara dudit monseigneur de Bourgogne, excellent maître dans l'art de la peinture." Dr. Kugler, in his notice of the Van Eycks, says, "In Philip the Good, who, in the year 1419 assumed the government as Duke of Burgundy and Count of Flanders, Jan found a noble patron, and was made by him one of his privy council." A dictionary is not the proper place to discuss the foregoing apparent discrepancies, and unless Johannes Gallicus, Johannes di Brugis, Maître Jean, and Jean de Yel be different persons from Jon Van Eyck, it will be found difficult to reconcile them with the generally received accounts of the artist's life. The Count Raczyński has promised a work to be entitled "A History of the Art from paintings in Manuscripts," which will, no doubt, throw considerable light on the subject. He is well qualified for the task by his love of art, his adherence to truth, his zeal, and talents to elucidate a matter at once obscure and intricate, although it may have baffled the researches of the most intelligent and industrious of his predecessors. Respecting the celebrated altar-piece at Ghent, it should be noted that it was painted for Jodocus Vyts, who placed it in the church of St. Bavon; it is not in the Louvre now, but is unfortunately divided, part being at Ghent, and part at Berlin. For a minute and accurate description of the several subjects of this wonderful production, the reader is recommended to peruse the very valuable work lately published by Lord Lindsay, entitled "Sketches of the History of Christian Art," (part 3, letter 8,) a work in which he will find knowledge, judgment, and a right feeling of the intellectual beauties of art expressed in elegant language. Two prints of the upper and lower compartments of the altar-piece are to be found in Passavant's work, taken from an old copy painted for St. John's church at Ghent. Dr. Nagler's Kunstler-Lexicon, now in the course of publication, contains a very full account of the pictures of Van Eyck, and many interesting particulars relating to them, which may be gratifying to the curious.]

EYCK, GASPAR VAN. This artist was born at Antwerp in 1625. He excelled in painting marines and sea-fights, particularly between the Christians and Turks, in which M. Descamps observes that the fire and smoke of the cannon were admirably represented, and his small figures well drawn, and very neatly touched.

EYCK, NICHOLAS VAN, is supposed to have been the brother of the foregoing artist; and, according to the above-mentioned author, painted skirmishes and attacks of cavalry with great spirit. His pictures were highly esteemed at Antwerp, where he chiefly resided.

EYCKENS, PETER, called THE ELDER, was born at Antwerp in 1599, and died in 1649. He painted history, in which it is said that he excelled. Some confusion has arisen in consequence of there having been another historical painter of the same name.]

[EYCKENS, JOHN and FRANCIS, were sons of Peter Eyckens the elder, and born at Antwerp in 1625 and 1627: they were instructed by their father, but preferred painting fruit and flowers to historical subjects, and their productions were held in estimation. John died in 1699, and Francis in 1673.]

EYCKENS, PETER, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1650. It is not said by whom he was instructed; but he was an eminent painter of history, and his works hold a respectable rank among the estimable artists of his country. He was chosen director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1689. The compositions of Eyckens are ingenious, the conduct of his subjects is judicious, and his design is tasteful and correct. The foldings of his draperies are broad and simple, and the backgrounds of his pictures are embellished with architecture and landscapes, of pleasing scenery. His principal works at Antwerp are, the Last Supper, in the church of St. Andrew; St. Catherine disputing with the Pagans, in the cathedral; and St. John preaching in the Wilderness, in the church of the convent called Bogaerde. At Mechlin, in the church of the Jesuits, were two of his most admired works, representing St. Francis Xavier baptizing a Pagan King, and the same saint resuscitating a dead person.

[EYK, ABRAHAM VANDER, was a contemporary of William Mieris, and finished his pictures in the manner of that master.]

[EYNDEN, FRANZ VAN, born at Nimeguen in 1694, studied under Elias Van Nymegen at Rotterdam. Aided by the counsels of Chevalier Vander Werf, he painted Arcadian scenes, which he executed in the manner of Jan Van Huysum, but not with equal perfection. His skies and distances are serene and delicate, and the clouds illumined by the sun are pleasingly reflected in the waters. His scenes are skillfully varied, and the different kinds of trees characterized with a neat and masterly touch. His figures are also well painted, and disposed with judgment. He seldom signed his pictures, unless required to do so by the purchaser. He died at Nimeguen in 1742.]

EYNHOEDTS, REMOLDUS, or ROMBAUT, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about the year 1605. He engraved several plates after the works of Rubens, Cornelius Schut, and other painters of the Flemish school; and executed some of the prints for Teniers's gallery. They are etched in a slight, dark style; and his drawing, though not very correct, is bold and masterly. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

- The Four Doctors of the Church, with St. Clara holding the Sacrament.
- The Virgin and infant Christ, surrounded with Saints.
- St. Peter and St. Paul.

- The Martyrdom of St. George; after the same.
- The Ascension; after the younger Palma.

F

FABER, JOHN, THE ELDER. This artist was a native of Holland, but came to England about 1695. He drew portraits on vellum with a pen, but was more employed here in scraping mezzotinto. We have a number of portraits by him, which, though not to be admired for the excellence of their execution, are interesting to the English collector. His most considerable works were :

The Portraits of the Founders of Colleges at Oxford and Cambridge.

The Heads of the Philosophers ; after Rubens.

The Portrait of Doctor John Wallis, the celebrated mathematician ; after Kneller ; one of his best prints.

Humphrey Lloyd, of Denhigh, antiquary. 1717.

He died at Bristol in 1721.

FABER, JOHN, THE YOUNGER. This eminent engraver was the son of the preceding artist, born in Holland, but was brought to England when he was only three years of age. He greatly surpassed his father as a mezzotinto engraver, and was esteemed the ablest artist of his time in that branch, after John Smith. He engraved a great number of portraits, many of which are very fine. To him we are indebted for,

The Beauties of Hampton Court ; after Kneller.

The Portraits of the eminent Personages of the Kit-cat Club ; after the same.

Charles II. in his robes, seated ; after Lely. 1750.

Caroline, Queen of George II.

The Children of Frederick, Prince of Wales ; after Dupan.

Sir Isaac Newton ; after Vanderbank. 1726.

Michael Rysbrack, sculptor ; after the same.

Enoch Seeman, painter ; after the same.

George Lambert, landscape painter ; after the same.

With many others. He died in 1756.

FABER, PETER, a French engraver, who resided at Lyons about the year 1621. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved several plates, in a neat style, but without much taste. His name is affixed to an ornamental frontispiece to the second volume of a work entitled Operis Moralis, &c., published at Lyons.

FABRI, GIOVANNI, a modern Italian engraver, who resided at Bologna. He executed some plates with the graver, in a neat but formal style, among which are,

The Nativity ; after Francesco Francia.

The Death of St. Benedict ; after Cavedone.

FABRIANO, GENTILE DA. Mr. Pilkington has dated the birth of this painter in 1332, and his death in 1412. He, at the same time, says he was a disciple of Giovanni da Fiesole, who was born in 1387. Lanzi, without ascertaining his birth, informs us that he began to distinguish himself among the painters who were employed in the dome at Orvieto in 1417. He afterwards went to Venice, where he was employed in ornamenting the public palace, and, according to Ridolfi, was rewarded by the republic with a pension, and allowed the privilege of wearing the Patrician gown. He also painted an altar-piece for the church of S. Felice, representing St. Paul and St. Anthony. He visited Rome in the pontificate of Martin V., where he was employed in St. John of Lateran, and painted a Holy Family for the church of S. Maria Maggiore. Several of his works are at Urbino and Perugia. At Florence, in the church of S. Niccolo, is a subject by him from the life of that Saint. And in the sacristy of la Trinità, the Adoration of the Magi, dated in 1423. He died at the age of 80, but it is not said in what year. [As neither the date of his birth, nor that of his death, has been satisfactorily ascertained, it is impossible to say with certainty what was his age. He was a contemporary, if not a pupil, of Beato Angelico, and their works, in some instances, have a great resemblance to each other. There were two other painters of the name of Fabriziano, who flourished about the same period ; Antonio, by whom there is a Crucifixion with the date 1454, and Giuliano, whose works are not dated.]

FABRICIUS, CHARLES, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1624. He painted portraits and perspective views, and had acquired considerable reputation, when he was killed by the blowing up of the powder magazine at Delft in 1654.

FABRIZZI, ANTONIO MARIA. This painter was born at Perugia in 1594. He went to Rome when he was very young ; and is said by Pascoli to have commenced his studies under Annibale Caracci, whose instruction he was deprived of by the death of that great master, when he was only fifteen years of age ; and it does not appear that he sought the aid of any other instructor. The impetuosity of a too fervid imagination, left to itself, without the control of a master, hurried him into inaccuracy and negligence. His works, however, evince ingenuity in composition, and great freedom of hand. He died in 1649. [Zani says he was living in 1656.]

FACHERIS, AGOSTINO. This artist is noticed by Tassi in his Lives of the Bergamese Painters, who describes a picture by him in the church of the Santissima Trinità at Borgo, S. Antonio, representing St. Augustine with two Angels. It is signed Augustinus Facheris, fecit. 1528.

FACHETTI, PIETRO, was born at Mantua in 1535, and, according to Baglioni, visited Rome when he was very young, in the pontificate of Gregory XIII. Although his first essays in historical painting were not without merit, having painted the portraits of some of the nobility, they were so much admired, that there was scarcely a person of distinction at Rome, of either sex, whose portrait he did not paint. His pictures had not only the merit of perfect resemblance, but were designed in a grand style, and admirably coloured. He lived in great reputation at Rome, to an advanced age, and died in 1613. [Fachetti was also an engraver. Bartsch mentions, with high commendation, two prints by him ; one a Holy Family after Raphael, and the other Christ bearing the Cross, which he believes are all that exist of the master. This, however, may be doubted, as even these two have been scandalously appropriated by Nicolo van Aelst, who has erased the name of Fachetti and substituted his own.]

FACINI, PIETRO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1560. He did not discover any genius, or disposition for the art, until he was arrived at the age of maturity ; and it is reported by Malvasia, that being in the habit of visiting the academy of the Caracci, though not for the purpose of study, one of the pupils drew a caricature of him, which excited the mirth and ridicule of his fellow students. On the drawing being shown to Facini, he took a piece of charcoal, and, without any previous instruction or practice, sketched a satirical likeness of the person who had ridiculed him, that astonished every one present, particularly Annibale, who persuaded him to study the art, and took him under his particular tuition. His improvement was so rapid, that Annibale is said to have become jealous of him, which was increased when Facini, on leaving their school, met with employment and applause from the public, and even established an academy in opposition to the Caracci, which, for a short time, was respectably frequented. The delusion did not, however, last long; and it was soon discovered that his design was neither correct nor tasteful, his figures uncouth and disproportioned, and the character of his heads without expression or beauty. His colouring was admirable, in which he resembled the freshness of Tintoretto, and occasioned Annibale to declare, on seeing his picture of the Martyrdom of S. Lorenzo, in S. Giovanni de Monti, that in his carnations he seemed to have mixed his colours with human flesh; che macinasse fra colori le carni umane. The principal works of Facini, at Bologna, are the picture of S. Lorenzo, before mentioned; the Crucifixion, in S. Benedetto; in S. Francesco, an altar-piece, with the Marriage of St. Catherine in the upper part, and below, the four Guardian Saints of Bologna; and in S. Paolo, the Crucifixion of S. Andrew. He died in the prime of life in 1602. [Zani places his birth two years later. It is supposed that he also engraved. Bartsch attributes three prints to him, which are without name or mark. Brulliot mentions several others, and gives the monogram.]

[FACIUS, GEORGE SIGMUND and JOHN GOTTLIEB, brothers, engravers, were born at Ratisbon in 1750. Both studied at Brussels, where their father held the office of Russian consul. In the year 1776 they proceeded to London, in order to work for Boydell's establishment, and completed a great number of plates, which for selection and execution are considered valuable by foreigners. They worked chiefly as etchers, and the impressions are either black, brown, or in colours. They both died about the latter part of the last century, but the exact date is not ascertained.]

FACTOR, FRA. NICOLAS. See FATOR.

FAENZA, MARCO. See MARCHETTI.

[FAES, P———, an eminent painter of flowers and fruit, in the manner of Van Huysum. He flourished towards the latter part of the 18th century, as appears by the dates on his pictures that have come under the writer's notice. He was probably a native of Holland, though Balkema does not notice him. His pictures are tastefully composed and delicately pencilled, but are somewhat deficient in vigour and chiaro-scuro; they are, however, so true to nature in other respects, that, as they are better known, they will hold a distinguished rank with the works of those masters who have practised in the same department of art in modern times.]

FAES, VANDER. See LELV.

FAGE, RAYMOND DE LA, an ingenious designer and engraver, born at Toulouse in 1648. Without the help of a master he produced some pen drawings, little more than outlines, which are the objects of the admiration of the most intelligent. His figures are elegant and graceful, and their action bold and spirited. He possessed a fertile invention, and a commanding facility of execution. During his residence at Rome, where he passed some years, he lived in habits of intimacy with Carlo Maratti. On his first visit to that artist, he is said to have found him at his easel; when Maratti, with Italian courtesy, offered him his pencils and pallet, which he declined, observing that he was not a painter. I am happy, said Maratti, that you are not; for if you could paint as well as you draw, I should have abandoned the art. He etched himself some of his designs; and several others have been engraved by Audran, Vermeulen, Simonneau, Ertinger, &c. The following are by him:

The Brazen Serpent; R. la Fage, fec.

The Fall of the Angels.

Jupiter and Semele.

Juno and Æolus.

A Bacchanalian; a large plate.

A Dance of Children.

Several friezes, &c.

He died in 1690. [Basan says he was born in 1640, and Benard in 1648; Huber and Ross say 1654; Zani and Nagler say 1656, and that he died in 1684.]

FAISTENBERGER, ANTHONY. This painter was born at Inspruck, in the Tyrol, in 1678. He had no abler instructor than an obscure artist, named Bouritsch, who lived at Saltzburg, or Passau. He, however, had an opportunity of studying some of the works of Gaspar Poussin, by which he formed to himself so grand a style of painting landscape, that on seeing his pictures, it would be supposed that he had visited Rome. His landscapes are of very interesting scenery, embellished with architectural ruins, and refreshed with waterfalls. The forms of his trees are grand and picturesque, and his leaving is light and spirited. He was invited to visit Vienna by the Emperor of Germany, by whom he was employed for several years, and where are his best performances; although he has given proofs of his ability at Wiemar, and other parts of the empire. As he was not successful in drawing the figure, he was assisted in that branch by Graaf and van Bredael. He had a brother, JOSEPH FAISTENBERGER, whom he instructed in the art, and who assisted him in some of his works. He died at Vienna in 1722.

FAITHORNE, WILLIAM, THE ELDER. This very eminent engraver was born in London, but in what year is not known. [Nagler says in 1620; Zani, 1629.] He was a pupil of Robert Peake, a painter and printseller, who was afterwards knighted by Charles I. He worked under Peake three or four years, until the breaking out of the civil war, when the troubles of the times extinguishing all attention to the arts, Peake took up arms for the king, and Faithorne was persuaded by his master to accompany him into the service. At the taking of Basinghouse, where Peake had the rank of lieutenant-colonel, Faithorne was made a prisoner, and was for some time confined in Aldersgate, during which interval he resumed his profession, and, among other plates, engraved a small head of Villars, Duke of Buckingham. With much difficulty the solicitation of his friends procured his liberation, on condition of his leaving the country. He retired to France, where he became acquainted with Robert Nanteuil, by whose judicious instruction he made great improvement. Soon after the year 1650, he was permitted to return to England, and established himself as an engraver and printseller, near Temple Bar, and carried on a considerable trade in Italian, Dutch, and English prints. Some time after, in 1680, Faithorne quitted his shop, and retired to a more private life in Printinghouse Yard, Blackfriars, where he continued to engrave, and painted portraits in crayons, which he had learned at Paris. The life of this able and industrious artist is said to have been shortened by vexation and uneasiness, occasioned by the indiscretion and misfortunes of his son, which brought on a lingering consumption, of which he died in 1691.

The works of this excellent engraver consist chiefly of portraits, and they are by much the best of his performances. They are executed almost entirely with the graver, in a clear, free style, admirably adapted to portraits. Previous to his journey to Paris, he had adopted the Flemish and Dutch mode of engraving; but on his return from France his style was greatly improved. In his historical prints he discovers a deficiency and incorrectness of drawing; and it is not, certainly, from them that we can form a just estimation of his great ability. Many of his portraits are of an admirable execution, clear, brilliant, and full of colour. His plates are extremely numerous, some of them exceedingly scarce, and very valuable. When he did not fix his name to them, he marked them with a cipher composed of two F's. FF. The following are considered as his best portraits. A more general list of his prints will be found in Lord Orford's Catalogue of Engravers.

- SUBJECTS BY FAITHORNE AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.
 A Holy Family; after Simon Vouet.
 A dead Christ; after Vanduyck.
 The Last Supper; without the painter's name.
 The Scourging of Christ; after Diepenbeck, inscribed Faithorne, sculp. Antwerp, 1657.
 The Marriage at Cana in Galilee.

The last four prints were engraved for Taylor's Life of Christ.

W. Faithorne, the elder, died in 1691.

FAITHORNE, WILLIAM, THE YOUNGER, the son of the preceding artist, was instructed in the elementary principles of design by his father, but practised a different branch of engraving, being chiefly engaged in scraping portraits in mezzotinto.

His merit in that line would have secured to him both profit and reputation; but neglecting his business, he became necessitated and distressed, and occasioned his father so much affliction, that it is said to have hastened his death. He did not outlive his thirtieth year. The following are esteemed his best portraits:

- Thomas Flatman, holding a Drawing of Charles II.
 Mary, Princess of Orange; after Hanneman.
 Sir William Read, oculist to Queen Mary.
 Queen Anne, when Princess of Denmark.
 George, Prince of Denmark.
 John Dryden.
 Frederick, Duke of Schomberg; after Dahl.
 Sir Richard Haddock; after Clostermans; one of his best prints.
 John More, Bishop of Ely.
 The Princess of Hanover.
 Charles XII. of Sweden.
 Mrs. Plowden, with a Garland.

[If the accounts that he was born in 1656, and died in 1686, be correct, it is difficult to suppose that he hastened his father's death, who survived him for five years.]

FALCIERI, BIAGIO. This painter was born at St. Ambrogio, near Verona, in 1628. He studied at Venice, under Cavaliere Pietro Liberti; and his style exhibits much of the fire and fertility that characterizes the Venetian school, of which he has given an example in a large picture in the church of the Dominicans at Verona, of the council of Trent; in the upper part he has represented St. Thomas vanquishing the Heretics. He died in 1703.

FALCINI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, by whom we have some wooden cuts; after Raffaello, and other masters. They are executed on three separate blocks, one for the outline, another for the demi-tint, and the third for the dark shadows. He marked his prints with the cipher FF. [Brulliot instances two prints with a different mark. Falcini flourished from 1604 till about 1630.]

FALCK, JEREMIAH, a designer and engraver, born at Dantzic in 1629. He was instructed in engraving at Paris, under Chaveau, and became a very reputable artist. On leaving France he passed some time in Holland, where he executed several plates for the celebrated cabinet of Reynst. From Holland he visited Sweden, where he passed some time. He engraved with equal success portraits and historical subjects, both of which have great merit. The following are among his best works:

PORTRAITS.

- Christina, Queen of Sweden; after D. Beck.
 Peter Gemhichi, Bishop of Croatia; after the same.
 Leonard, Count de Torstenson. 1649; after the same.
 Axel, Count d'Oxenstiern; after the same; J. F. Stocholmia, fec., 1653.
 Adolphus John, Prince Palatine; after the same.
 Charles Gustavus, Prince of Sweden; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

- The Four Evangelists; half-lengths, oval, without the name of the painter.
 A Concert of Music; after Guercino; for the cabinet of Reynst.
 The Cyclops; after M. A. Caravaggio; for the same cabinet.
 A Man and Woman singing; after J. Lys; for the same.
 St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after A. Bloemaert; for the same cabinet; J. Falck, Polonus, scul. 1661; fine.

[Brulliot says he died in 1709, in which Nagler agrees; and the latter gives a list of his works, but none dated later than 1661.]

FALCKENBOURG, FREDERICK VAN. By this artist we have a few plates of portraits, and other subjects, etched in a slight, scratchy style; marked F. V. F. [He was also a landscape painter at Nuremberg, and died about 1623.]

FALCO, AGNOLO. The name of this artist is affixed to a rude, coarse etching, representing a landscape, into which is introduced the story of Apollo and Daphne. Though it is very indifferently executed, and incorrectly drawn, it appears to have been the work of a painter, and is from his own design.

FALCO, JUAN. See CONCHILLOS.

FALCONE, ANIELLO. This painter was born at Naples, in 1600, and was a scholar of Guiseppe Ribera, called Lo Spagnoletto. He distinguished himself as a painter of battles and skirmishes of cavalry, which he composed and designed with great fire and animation. He was equally correct in the drawing of his figures and horses, and their various movements are expressed with the most characteristic propriety. His touch is bold and free, and his colouring vigorous and effective. He was not less successful in his easel pictures than those of a larger size; and his best works were esteemed little inferior to the admirable productions of Borgognone. Aniello Falcone was one of the masters of Salvator Rosa. He died in 1665. [He is also called Angelo; in Bartsch and Nagler may be found copious lists of engravings attributed to him.]

FALCONET, PETER. This artist was a native of Paris, and the son of Falconet the sculptor, who executed the equestrian statue of Peter the Great, at Petersburg. He visited this country, and resided some years in London, where he obtained considerable employment. He painted historical subjects and portraits. His name stands in the catalogues of the exhibitions from 1767 to 1773, soon after which he returned to France.

FALDA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Valdugia, in the Milanese, about the year 1640. It is not said by whom he was instructed; but his style bears a great resemblance to that of Israel Sylvester. We have by him several designs and engravings of the select views of the churches, and other public places at Rome, embellished with figures, neatly drawn, and his plates are etched in a tasteful manner. In 1676, he engraved a View of the City of Rome, in twelve sheets. The following are by him:

Two Views of the Piazza Navona.

Two Views in Rome; the Basilica of St. Peter's, and the Fountain of St. Peter's.

A large plate of St. Peter's, and the Buildings round it; Gio. Batista Falda, del et scul. Roma, 1662; rare.

A View of the Interior of St. Peter's, on the occasion of the beatification of St. Francis of Salis.

A View of the Castle of St. Angelo, with the Statues on the Bridge; by Bernini.

FALDONI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Ascola, [Zani says of Asolo, not of Ascola.] in the Marca di Trevisano, about the year 1690. He first studied landscape painting, under Antonio Luciano; but his pictures are little known. He afterwards applied himself to engraving, and imitated the style of Giles Sadeler. The manner of Mellan was afterwards adopted by him, in which he was very successful; and several of his prints are deservedly admired. He engraved a set of portraits of the Doges of Venice, and the Procurators of St. Mark; beside which, we have the following prints by him:

PORTRAITS.

Marco Ricci, painter; after Rosalba.
Antonio Maria Zanetti, engraver; after the same.
Luca Carlevarius, painter and engraver.
Sebastiano Ricci, painter.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A Holy Family, with Angels; after Seb. Ricci.
The Conception; after the same.
The Nativity; after P. da Cortona.
David playing on the Harp before Saul; after G. Camerata.
David flying from the Wrath of Saul; after the same.
Part of the Drawings by Farmegiano for the collection published by Zanetti, in two volumes.

[FALENS, CHARLES VAN, was born at Antwerp in 1684, and died at Paris in 1733. He painted hunting-pieces, and other subjects, analogous to those of Philip Wouwerman; but only so far resembling that master's works, that they appear to be borrowed from them. Some of his pictures are very pleasing, painted with considerable spirit, and well coloured, and would be more esteemed if they had less the appearance of being imitations of Wouwerman, as it leads many to suppose them to be copies, which they are not.]

FALLER, JOHN. The name of an obscure artist, mentioned by Florent le Comte as the engraver of some plates, representing ornaments, grotesque figures, &c.

FANO, BARTOLOMEO and POMPEO DA. These painters, father and son, flourished at Fano about the year 1530. According to Lanzi, they painted, in conjunction, a picture of the Raising of Lazarus, for the church of S. Michele, in that city, dated 1534, in which he observes, that it is surprising to observe how little they had attended to the reformation and improvement which had been almost generally adopted by other artists of their time. It is painted in the Gothic style of the middle of the preceding century. Pompeo, however, after the death of his father, attempted the more modern taste, and painted some pictures which gained him considerable reputation. Pompeo da Fano was one of the instructors of Taddeo Zucchero.

FANTETTI, CESARE, a designer and engraver, born at Florence about the year 1660. He resided chiefly at Rome, where he engraved several plates, after his own designs and other masters. Conjointly with Pietro Aquila, he engraved the plates from the paintings by Raffaele, in the Vatican, called Raffaele's Bible, of which thirty-seven are by Fantetti, the remainder are by P. Aquila, and are superior, particularly in drawing. He also engraved the following prints:

Christ praying in the Garden; after L. Caracci.

A Charity, with three Children; after Ann. Caracci.

Latona insulted by Niobe; after the same.

Flora surrounded by Cupids; after Ciro Ferri.

The Death of St. Anne; after Andrea Sacchi.

Some pieces, and other subjects, from various Italian masters.

FANTUZZI, or FONTUZZI, ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Viterbo about the year 1520. It is thought that he learned the principles of design under Primaticcio. The plates which we have by him are etched in a bold style; they are dated from 1540 to 1550, and are chiefly from the works of Primaticcio. He frequently marked his plates with the cipher AF. His prints are scarce, of which the following are the principal:

Silenus supported by two Bacchantes, and environed with several Satyrs; after il Rosso. 1543.

The Dispute of the Muses with the Pierides; after Primaticcio.
 Alexander and Roxana; after the same; circular.
 The Festival given by Alexander to Thalestris; after the same. 1543.
 Jupiter directing Minerva to dismiss Venus, Cupid, and Psyche; after the same. 1543; oval.
 Titan reposing in the Bosom of the Ocean; Bologna, inventor. 1544.
 The four Cardinal Virtues.

[There appears to be an error in the date of his birth, it must have been earlier. Several writers of credit say that he was originally a pupil of Parmegiano, and on the death of that great painter he joined Primaticcio, and went with him to Fontainebleau. It is also said that he and Antonio da Trento are one and the same engraver; this is as stoutly contested by others of equal credit. When Zani, and Bartsch, and Brulliot, and Nagler are the contesting parties, it requires some hesitation in pronouncing a decision. Zani, who opposes the supposition, seems, however, to have the best of the argument. The curious are recommended to consult each of them for his own satisfaction. Nagler gives a good list of his works.]

FANZONE, or FAENZONE, FERRAU. This painter was born at Faenza in 1562, and, according to the Ab. Titi, studied at Rome under the Cavaliere Vanni, where he painted several fresco works in St. John of Lateran, the Scala Santa, and in the church of S. Maria Maggiore. There are, however, some pictures at Ravenna, particularly a Deposition from the Cross, in the church of the Dominicans; and a Probatica, at the Confraternita di S. Giovanni, which partake so much of the fine style of Lodovico Caracci, that he has been supposed to have been educated in his academy. His design is grand and correct, with great amenity in his colouring, and a fine impasto. He died in 1645.

FARELLI, GIACOMO, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1624, and brought up under Andrea Vaccaro. In the early part of his life he gave promise of considerable talent, in a picture of S. Brigida, in the church of that saint; but he afterwards changed his style, in endeavouring to rival some of the followers of Domenichino, in which he was totally unsuccessful, and he sunk in the public estimation. He died in 1706. [Zani places his birth ten years later.]

[FARGUE, PAUL CONSTANTINE LA, a modern Dutch painter, born at the Hague. His pictures are generally small, representing views of the environs of his native city, and are of a pleasing character. His drawings are, however, more esteemed than his paintings in oil. He had considerable skill in copying the works of the older Dutch masters. It is not said in what year he was born, but he died at Leyden in 1782.]

[FARGUE, MARIA LA, sister of the preceding, also practised painting. The subjects are various, well composed, beautifully coloured, and highly finished.]

FARIAT, or FARJAT, BENOIT, a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1646. He was taught the elements of the art by William Chateau, whose style he at first adopted; but he afterwards went to Rome, and acquired a greater command of the graver, and a better taste of design, though he is not always correct. We have by him some portraits, and various subjects from the Italian masters; the following are the most esteemed:

PORTRAITS.

Cardinal Federigo Coccia; after L. David.
 Cardinal Cornaro; after the same. 1697.

Cardinal Tommaso Ferrari; after the same. 1695.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family, with St. John; after Albano.
 The Holy Family, with St. John presenting a Cross; after P. Cortona.
 The Marriage, or, according to others, the Crowning of St. Catherine; after Agostino Caracci.
 The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. John presenting him some Fruit; after Annibale Caracci.
 The Temptation of St. Anthony; after the same.
 The Communion of St. Jerome; after Domenichino.
 The Death of Francis Xavier; after Gio. Bat. Gaulti.
 The Marriage of the Virgin and St. Joseph; after C. Maratti.
 The Baptism of Christ; after the same.
 The Race of Atalanta; after P. Lucatelli.

[He was living in 1718, as appears by a print after Angelo Rossi; Nagler says he died in 1720.]

FARINATO, PAOLO, DEGLI UBERTI. This distinguished painter was born at Verona in 1522. He was for some time a disciple of Niccolo Goltino, but afterwards studied at Venice the works of Titian and Giorgione. To judge from the great style of his design, it would be thought that he had been brought up in the school of Giulio Romano; and it is certain that he studied for some time, at Mantua, the works of that master. Few of the Venetian painters have equalled him in that respect. It has been said that he was not so successful in his colouring, which has been thought by some to be occasionally too brown. It is, however, the opinion of the most intelligent, that there is a solemn and quiet harmony in his tints, which retains and charms, and which quits the eye with regret. Lanzi observes, that on leaving Verona, he was dissatisfied with himself for not having visited the whole of the works of this great painter in that city, so much of grandeur and of beauty he had discovered in those he had seen. Among the principal works of Farinato, at Verona, may be ranked the following: St. Michael discomfiting Lucifer, in S. Maria, in Organo. In the same church, two large pictures representing the Mothers presenting their Children to Herod, and the Murder of the Innocents. In S. Tommaso is a S. Onofrio, in which the figure is treated from the Torso of Belvedere, and the whole design shows an acquaintance with the antique rarely found among the painters of the Venetian school. One of his finest works is the taking down from the Cross, in the church of the Cappucini. This eminent artist continued to paint with undiminished vigour and intelligence, to a very advanced age; and in his seventy-ninth year produced his celebrated work of the Multiplication of the Loaves, in the church of S. Giorgio, a grand composition, of many figures, which he signed, PAULUS FARINATUS DE UBERTIS, FECIT; ÆTATIS SUÆ LXXIX. [And prefixed A. D. 1604.]

We have several etchings by Paolo Farinato executed in a free, bold, and masterly style. He frequently marked them with his name, and sometimes with the initials P. F. or P. V. F., the V. for Verona. Among others we have the following by him, from his own designs:

St. John; marked Paolo Farinato, f.
 St. Jerome kneeling, leaning on a Bank; P. F.
 Mary Magdalene seated, with a Book and a Crucifix; signed Paul Farinat, f.
 The Virgin, with the infant Jesus and St. John.
 Angels holding the Instruments of the Passion.
 Venus caressed by Cupid. 1566.
 A Charity, with three Children.
 Venus and Cupid at the Forge of Vulcan.

P. Farinato died in 1606. [Zani places his birth rightly in 1525; Brulliot, by a misprint, in 1552.]

The latter says he marked his prints with the figure of a snail, in addition to his name or initials.]

FARINATO, ORAZIO, was the son and the disciple of the foregoing artist, and flourished about the year 1615, as appears by the date on his picture in S. Francesco da Paola. During his short career in the art, he gave proof of uncommon ability, and promised to reach an elevated rank among the artists of his country, but he died in the prime of life. His principal work was the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the church of S. Stefano at Verona, which Lanzi says may be compared with the greatest of the Veronese painters, Paolo Veronese only excepted. He etched a few plates from the designs of his father, which are frequently confounded with those of P. Farinato; among which are the following:

The Finding of the Cross, with St. Francis and other figures; P. F., in.; Ho. P. V., fec.

The Destruction of Pharaoh's Host; Ho. F. F., f.; Paul Fa. V. I.

The Holy Family, with St. John.

FARINGTON, GEORGE, an English painter, born in the county of Lancaster, in 1754. He was educated under Mr. West, and obtained the prize in the Royal Academy for the best historical picture. This promising artist afterwards went to India, where he would undoubtedly have acquired both fame and fortune, but he died in the prime of life in 1788.

[FARRER, NICOLAS, an English portrait painter, born at Sunderland in 1750; was a pupil of Pine, and friend of Sir Joshua Reynolds and Northcote. He painted the portraits of the Duke of Richmond and family, by whom he was patronized. His portraits, without being imitations, bear a strong resemblance to Sir Joshua's manner, and have sometimes been mistaken for that master's work. His grandson, Mr. Farrer, the eminent picture dealer, has been frequently amused by having his grandfather's portraits brought to him to authenticate as the work of the great English painter. He died in 1805.]

[FARRINGTON, JOSEPH, an English landscape painter, born in 1742, was a scholar of R. Wilson. His works are chiefly views of the scenery of Westmoreland and Cumberland, which have been engraved by Byrne, Powney, Medland, and others. He was a member of the Royal Academy, and died in 1821.]

FASOLO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO. This painter was born at Vicenza in 1528, and first studied under Batista Zelotti, but the brilliant reputation of Paolo Veronese induced him to enter the school of that distinguished master, under whom he became a very reputable painter of history. In the church of S. Rocco at Vicenza, is a fine picture by Fasolo, representing the Pool of Bethesda; a grand composition, with various groups of diseased and crippled, conducted in a style that would not have disgraced P. Cagliari; in the church of the Padri Servi, is another fine picture by this master, of the Adoration of the Magi. Ridolfi commends three pictures by him, of subjects from Roman History, representing Mutius Scævola before Porsenna, Horatius defending the Bridge, and Marcus Curtius leaping into the Gulf. He died in 1572.

[FASSIN, NICOLAS HENRI JOSEPH DE, born at Liege in 1728, was a scholar of Coelers. He studied at Antwerp and in Italy, and afterwards resided for some time at Geneva. He painted a landscape for the Empress of Russia, for which he was handsomely rewarded, and many others which are to be found at Liege. His biography has been written by the advocate Van Hult, and published with a list of his pictures. He died at his native city in 1811.]

FASSOLO, BERNARDINO. This painter was a native of Pavia, and flourished about the year 1518. That date is inscribed on a picture of the Virgin and Infant, which, according to Lanzi, was formerly in the Palazzo Braschi at Rome, but is now in the Gallery of the Louvre. This picture is so entirely in the style and character of Lionardo da Vinci, that it has been conjectured that he was his disciple. Except Bernardino Luini, no artist has so nearly approached the beauty of Lionardo. [The picture referred to is inscribed "Bernardinus Faxolus de Pavia faciebat anno 1518."]

FATOR, FRAY NICOLAS. According to Palomino, this painter was a native of Valencia, born in 1522. The early part of his life was devoted to literature, and he is said to have distinguished himself as a Latin poet, previous to his studying painting. Whilst he was yet very young, he became a Franciscan monk of the convent of S. Maria de Jesus. His pictures are almost confined to the church of his monastery, the principal of which are, St. Michael discomfiting Lucifer, the Scourging of Christ, and the Virgin and Infant. He died in 1583.

FATTORE, IL. See PENNI.

FAVA, CONTE PIETRO, a Bolognese nobleman, who distinguished himself not only as a patron of art, but as a practitioner. He was born at Bologna in 1669, and was the protector and friend of Donato Creti and Ercole Graziani. Lanzi numbers him among the scholars of Pasinelli, and among the members of the Clementine Academy. He chiefly studied the works of the Caracci, whose style he preferred to every other. In the church of S. Tommaso dal Mercato at Bologna, is an altar-piece by him of the Virgin and Infant, with S. Alberto, S. Paolo, and other saints; and Lanzi mentions two pictures at Ancona, of the Adoration of the Magi, and the Resurrection, as very extraordinary performances for a dilettante. He died in 1744.

FAUCCI, CARLO, an Italian engraver, born at Florence in 1729. He was a pupil of Carlo Gregori, and on leaving that artist, engraved several plates for the collection of the gallery of the Marquis de Gerini. He afterwards visited England, and engraved some plates for Mr. Boydell. Among others, we have the following prints by him:

The birth of the Virgin; after P. da Cortona.

The Adoration of the Shepherds; after the same.

The Martyrdom of St. Andrew; after Carlo Dolci.

The Crowning of the Virgin; after Rubens.

A Bacchanalian subject; after the same.

Cupid; after Guido.

[In Nagler will be found a more extensive list of his works, many of which are after masters of much higher rank than C. Dolci and P. da Cortona.]

FAVENNES, J. DE. This artist was a native of France, and resided at Paris about the year 1760. Basan mentions him as the engraver of a plate representing the pleasures of Summer, after A. Watteau.

FAYRAM, ———, an English landscape painter, who flourished about the year 1740. We have by him some slight, coarse etchings, representing views about Chelsea and Battersea, and also one of the Hermitage in Kew Gardens.

FEBRE, or FEBURE. See FEVRE.

[FEDDES, PETER, called VAN HARLINGEN from the place of his birth. He was born in 1588, and painted portraits, and what are called conversation pieces, and musical parties. Some of them have been engraved; one of which represents a lady seated at a table, and a cavalier playing on the guitar. He died in 1634.]

FEHLING, HENRY CHRISTOPHER. This painter was born at Sangerhausen in 1653. He was a relative of Samuel Botschild, who instructed him in the art, and accompanied him to Italy, where he studied some years. On his return to Germany he settled at Dresden, where his talents recommended him to the protection of the Elector of Saxony, who appointed him his painter; and on the death of Botschild made him inspector and keeper of the Gallery. He painted some ceilings for the palaces of the Elector, which were much admired. He died in 1725.

FEI, ALESSANDRO, called DEL BARBIERE, a Florentine painter, born in 1538. He first studied under Ridolfo Ghirlandaio, afterwards under Pietro Francia, and ultimately was instructed by Tommaso Manzoli di S. Friano. According to Borghini, he was a reputable painter of history. His invention was fertile and prompt, adapted to the great works he executed in fresco, which he embellished with architecture in a grand style. He was more attentive to correctness of design, and character in expression, than to colouring. His works are to be found in the churches and public edifices at Florence, Pistoja, and Messina. One of his most esteemed pictures is the Flagellation, in the church of S. Croce at Florence.

FELICE, SIMONE, an Italian engraver, who, in conjunction with Gio. Bat. Falda, engraved a collection of prints, entitled Le Giardini di Roma. They are very neatly executed, with small figures, spiritedly designed, and are in no way inferior to the productions of Falda.

FELTRO. See MORTO DA FELTRO.

FEMINIA, GABRIEL, a Spanish painter, who flourished at the commencement of the eighteenth century. He had the reputation of being the best landscape painter of his time in Spain.]

FERABOSCO, MARTINO. This artist was a native of Italy, and resided at Rome about the year 1620. He engraved the plates for the work entitled Architettura della Basilica di S. Pietro in Vaticano, published at Rome in 1620. They are entirely executed with the graver, in a slight, formal style.

FERABOSCO. See FORABOSCO.

FERDINAND, LOUIS, a French painter of portraits, and an engraver. He was the son of Ferdinand Elle, one of the instructors of N. Poussin, whose baptismal name he adopted. He painted portraits with great reputation, and was a member of the French Academy. Independent of his talent as a painter, he etched several plates, in a spirited and tasteful style, and the prints for a book, entitled Le Livre original de la Peinture, printed at Paris in 1644. We have also by him the following plates:

Portrait of a Lady; after Vandyck.

Nicolas Poussin, pictor; V. E. pinxit; L. Ferdinand, fecit.

A set of six friezes; after L. Testelin.

A set of six, of groups of Children; after the same.

[And several allegorical and mythological subjects; after Primaticcio.]

He had a brother, Peter Ferdinand, who etched a few plates, among others, St. Potentiana; after Coreggio.

FERG, PAUL FRANCIS. This painter was born at Vienna in 1689, the son of an obscure artist, who placed him under the tuition of a painter, called Baschueber, less capable, if possible, of instructing him than himself. After passing three years under that unworthy instructor, he applied himself to study the works of Callot, whose ingenious productions were of great utility to his advancement. He was afterwards instructed in the design of the figure by Hans Graaf, and in landscape by Orient, a very reputable artist in that branch. His reputation soon spread through Germany, and he was invited to the court of Dresden, where he passed some years, and his works were much admired. He visited England in 1718, where his pleasing style, and the agreeable subjects of his pictures, brought him into immediate employment. Ferg passed twenty years in this country, and might have lived in affluence and respectability, but an imprudent marriage involved him in difficulties, and kept him in continual indigence. He is reported to have been found dead in the street, near the door of his lodging, according to the Anecdotes, about the year 1738; M. Descamps, in 1740. The landscapes of Ferg are of very agreeable scenery, enriched with architectural ruins in a very picturesque style, and bear some resemblance to the works of Berghem. His small figures are correctly drawn, and very delicately touched. We have a set of eight neat and spirited etchings by Ferg, of ruins and figures, called Capricci fatti per F. F. [Ferg's best pictures are of small dimensions, painted generally on copper; it would be difficult to point out in what respect they resemble Berghem.]

FERGIONE, BERNARDINO, a painter of marines and sea-ports, who, according to Lanzi, flourished at Rome about the year 1718.

FERGUSON, WILLIAM. This artist was a native of Scotland. After learning the first rudiments of his art in his own country, he passed some years on the continent. On his return to his native country, he acquired some reputation in painting dead game and still-life. He died about the year 1690. [Some of his smaller pictures are so excellent that they are frequently attributed to Weenix, to whose works they bear strong resemblance.]

FERNANDEZ, ANTONIO, DE ARIAS. This painter was a native of Madrid, but in what year is not known. He was a disciple of Pedro de las Cuevas, and gave such early proof of extraordinary talent, that at the age of fourteen he painted the picture of the principal altar in the church of Carmen Calzada at Toledo. By the time he reached his twenty-fifth year, he was considered one of the most eminent artists in Spain. Among his best works are noticed, by Palomino, eleven pictures representing the Passion of our Saviour, in the Augustine convent of S. Phelippe, and the Baptism of Christ, in the church of San Gines. Fernandez possessed great facility, and was an excellent colourist. He died at Madrid in 1684.

FERNANDEZ, FRANCISCO, was born at Madrid in 1604, and brought up in the school of Bartolomeo Carducho. This painter is said by Palomino to have been one of the most ingenious artists of his time. He was employed by Philip IV. in several considerable works in the palaces at Madrid. In the convent de la Victoria is a fine picture by this master of the Death of St. Francisco de Paula. He was killed in a quarrel by Francisco de Baras in 1646. [He was a scholar of Vincencio Carducho, not of Bartolomeo.]

[FERNANDEZ DE LAREDO, JUAN, one of the best fresco painters of his time in Madrid, where he was born in 1632. He studied under Francisco

Rizi, whom he assisted in his works at the Retiro. He painted many pictures for the churches at Madrid, where he died (desgraciadamente) in 1692.]

FERNANDEZ, LUIS, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1594. [Bermudez says in 1596.] He was a scholar of Eugenio Caxes, and was a reputable painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. Palomino mentions a chapel in the parochial church of Santa Cruz, painted in fresco by Fernandez; and several pictures in oil, representing subjects from the Life of the Virgin. He died in 1654.

FERRACUTI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO. According to Lanzi, this artist was a native of Macerata, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He chiefly painted landscapes, particularly winter-pieces, which were much esteemed in his time.

FERRADA, CRISTOBAL, a Spanish painter, born at Anieva, in the principality of the Asturias, in 1620. He had acquired some ability from the instruction of an unknown artist, when he became a monk of the order of S. Maria de las Cuevas. He continued, however, to exercise his art, and painted some pictures for the altars of his monastery, and the cloister of S. Miguel, at Seville. He died in 1678.

FERRAJUOLI, NUNZIO, called DEGLI AFFLITTI. According to Orlandi, this painter was born at Nocera de Pagani, in the Neapolitan territory, in 1661. After studying some time under Luca Giordano, he went to Bologna, where he became the scholar of Giuseppe del Sole. His first efforts were in historical painting; but his genius decidedly led him to landscape. The above-mentioned author compares and equals him with Gaspar Poussin and Claude Lorraine, an eulogium, which is rather to be attributed to the friendship that existed between them, than the real merit of the painter. His style of landscape is, however, very agreeable, resembling that of Albano.

FERRAMOLA, FIORAVANTE. This painter was a native of Brescia; and, according to Zamboni, in his Memoirs of Brescian art, was an artist of considerable reputation, when that city was stormed and sacked by Gaston de Foix in 1512. His talent recommended him to the favour and protection of the French conqueror. His works in the churches at Brescia hold a respectable rank among the artists of his country; one of the most admired is his picture of St. Jerome, in the church of S. Maria delle Grazie. He died in 1528.

FERRANTINI, GABRIELLO, called DAGLI OCCHIALI. He was a native of Bologna, and was brought up in the academy of Denis Calvert. He flourished about the year 1588, and was a respectable painter of history, both in oil and in fresco. Several of his works are in the churches at Bologna, of which the following are the most esteemed. In S. Benedetto, S. Francesco di Paola; in S. Mattia, a fine picture of S. Girolamo; in La Carità, St. Francis receiving the Stigmata; and in the church of the Padri Servi, the Descent from the Cross and the Birth of the Virgin.

FERRARA, ANTONIO DA. This painter was a native of Ferrara, and flourished about the year 1500. He was a disciple of Angiolo Gaddi; and, according to Vasari, painted history with reputation at Urbino, and Citta di Castello.

FERRARA, ERCOLE DA. See GRANDI.

FERRARESINO. See BERLINGHIERI.

FERRARI, GAUDENZIO, or GAUDENZIO MILANESE. This painter was born at Valdugia, in the Milanese, in 1484. Orlandi states him to have been a disciple of Pietro Perugino; but Lanzi, from the authority of Lomazzo, says he first studied under Stefano Scotto, and afterwards under Bernardino Luini. His greatest improvement was, however, derived from an attentive study of the works of Lionardo da Vinci. One of his first performances was the dome of the principal church at Novara. In the early part of his life he visited Rome, and became a coadjutor of Raffaello, particularly in his pictures of the History of Cupid and Psyche, in the Palazzo Chigi, called la Farnesina. Lomazzo considers him as one of the most distinguished assistants of that illustrious painter, after Giulio Romano and Perino del Vaga. By his residence at Rome, and his technical connexion with Raffaello, he acquired a grandeur of design and a vagueness of colouring, unknown before to the Milanese painters. Among his principal works may be noticed the cupola of S. Maria, near Saronno, which is compared by Lomazzo to that of S. Giovanni, at Parma, by Coreggio, though confessedly inferior. He undoubtedly possessed an extraordinary fertility of invention, and a greatness of style, which resembles that of Giulio Romano, although the subjects they treated are so widely different. His works are not so distinguishable for a correct delineation of muscular anatomy, as for a choice of difficult and uncommon attitudes, which are bold and striking, where the subject admits of it. Another of his admired productions is his S. Cristoforo, in the church of that saint at Vercelli, in which, though he is not equal to the grace and beauty of Raffaello, he exhibits much of that character. In the same church are some subjects of the Life of Christ and Mary Magdalene, in which he has introduced several groups of beautiful angels. In the Conventuali, in the same city, is a fine picture of the Conversion of St. Paul, which Lanzi says approaches nearer to the sublime production of M. Angelo of the same subject, in the Cappella Paolina, than any thing he had seen. At Milan, in the Chiesa delle Grazie, are some pictures of the Passion of our Saviour, painted in competition with Titian. This eminent painter died in 1550.

FERRARI, GIOVANNI ANDREA DE. According to Soprani, this painter was born at Genoa in 1598. He was first a scholar of Bernardo Castelli, but he afterwards studied under Bernardo Strozzi. His principal historical works, are his picture of Theodosius, in the church del Gesu, at Genoa; the Nativity, in the dome of the same city; and in a church at Voltri, his most esteemed production, representing the Birth of the Virgin, a composition of many figures, extolled by Lanzi, who observes, that although this artist is little noticed or applauded by Soprani in his Lives of the Genoese Painters, he merits the rank of one of the ablest of that school. He died in 1669.

FERRARI, GREGORIO DE, a Genoese painter, born at Porto Maurizio in 1644. He was a disciple of Domenico Fiasella, called il Sarzana, whose manner was not conformable to the genius of the scholar, which aimed at a style more grand and free. He went to Parma, where he studied with attention the works of Coreggio, and made a faithful copy of the great cupola. He devoted himself entirely to the style of that admirable painter, whom he sometimes resembles in the airs of his heads, and in particular figures, although greatly inferior in composition and in his colouring, which is occasionally languid, particularly in his fresco works. His design is generally negligent and incorrect. Of his works mentioned by Cavaliere Ratti, the most esteemed is his St. Michael, in the Madonna delle Vigne at Genoa; and there are some of his pictures in the Palazzo Balbi, in the same city. He was much employed at Turin and Marseilles. He died in 1726.

FERRARI, ABATE LORENZO. According to Ratti, this painter was the son of the preceding artist, born at Genoa in 1680. He was instructed in the art by his father, whom he surpassed in the correctness of his design, and, like him, he imitated the grace and suavity of Coreggio. In aiming at delicacy he occasionally fell into languor. This is not, however, always the case. In his works in the Doria Palace, he has emulated the vigour of the Carloni, and is little inferior to them. In the Palazzo Carega is a gallery by him of subjects from the Æneid, which was his last work. Lanzi observes, that he was a painter of more merit than celebrity. He died in 1744.

FERRARI, LIONARDO, called LONARDINO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a scholar of Lucio Massari. Although he is chiefly noticed by Malvasia as a painter of drolleries and carnival festivals, he acquired no little reputation by his historical works, of which there are several in the churches at Bologna. In S. S. Gervasio e Protasio, is a picture of the Virgin of the Rosary, with Mary Magdalene, and other saints. In S. Francesco, the Death of St. Joseph; and in la Madonna della Neve, St. Anthony of Padua.

FERRARI, LUCA DE. This painter was born at Reggio, according to Tiraboschi, in 1605. He had the advantage of studying under Guido Reni; and in the airs of his heads, and the elegant movement of his figures, he reminds us of the graceful style of his instructor. One of his most esteemed works is his Pietà, in the church of S. Antonio, at Padua; full of character and expression, and admirably coloured. In compositions which require a multiplicity of figures he is less successful, as appears in his picture of the Plague, at the Dominicans, painted in 1630. He died in 1654.

FERRARI, ORAZIO. This painter was born at Voltri in 1606, and was a scholar of Gio. Andrea Ansaldi, under whom he became a considerable painter of history. His merit recommended him to the patronage of the Prince of Monaco, who employed him for some years. Soprani mentions with distinction his picture of the Last Supper, in the church of S. Siro at Genoa, which is alone sufficient to establish his reputation. This artist was high in the public esteem when Genoa was visited by the plague in 1657, which carried off a great number of the inhabitants, with this painter and all his family.

FERRATO, SASSO. See SALVI.

FERRETTI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, DA IMOLA. This painter was called da Imola, though born at Florence in 1692. He was a scholar of Gio. Gioseffo del Sole, and painted history with considerable reputation. His works are principally in the churches of Florence, Pisa, and Bologna. He also painted the cupola of the Filippini, at Pistoja. One of his best pictures is the Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew, in the church dedicated to that apostle at Pisa.

FERRI, CIRO, was born at Rome in 1634, [or 1638,] and was the most distinguished scholar of Pietro da Cortona, whose style he imitated with a servility that renders it sometimes difficult to identify his works from those of his instructor, from which they only differ in their inferiority in elegance and effect. He was patronized and employed by Prince Borghese and Pope Alexander VII., for whom he executed several works. The Grand Duke Cosimo III. invited him to Florence to finish the great fresco works which were left imperfect by P. da Cortona, in which he was so successful, that they appeared to be the production of the same hand. His principal works at Rome are the Conception, in the church of St. Mark; in S. Ambrogio della Massima, the principal altar-piece, representing St. Ambrose healing a sick person, one of his most esteemed pictures; in the gallery at Monte Cavallo, are two pictures by C. Ferri, of the Annunciation, and a subject from the life of Cyrus. The cupola of St. Agnes was his last work, which he did not entirely complete; it was finished by his scholar Corbellini. At Florence there are several of his works in the Palazzo Pitti, besides those he finished which had been begun by P. da Cortona. He died in 1689.

FERRONI, GIROLAMO, a painter and engraver, born at Milan about the year 1680. [Zani says 1687.] It is not said who was his first instructor in the art; but at an early period of his life he painted the Death of St. Joseph, for the church of S. Eustorgio, at Milan; and afterwards visited Rome, where he entered the school of Carlo Maratti. We have some tasteful etchings by this artist, after C. Maratti, among others the following:

Joshua stopping the Course of the Sun.
Deborah celebrating the Victory over Sisera.
Jael slaying Sisera.
The Chastity of Joseph.
Judith with the Head of Holofernes.

FERRUCCI, NICODEMO. This painter was a native of Florence, and the favourite disciple and friend of Domenico Passignano, whose spirited style and facility of execution he emulated. He accompanied that master to Rome, and assisted him in his most important undertakings. He chiefly excelled as a fresco painter; and many of his works are in the public edifices at Florence and Fiesole. He died in 1650.

FERTÉ, M. DE LA, a French amateur, who, according to Basan, for his amusement etched several small plates of landscapes, from the designs of F. Boucher, and other masters.

[FESELE, MELCHIOR, an historical painter, of whose works there are specimens preserved in the galleries at Munich, Schleisheim, and Nuremberg; they are rich in composition, with a great number of figures highly finished, and in a taste quite peculiar. He died in 1538, as appears by the inscription on his tomb in the church of the Franciscans at Ingolstadt.]

FESSARD, STEPHEN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1714. He was a pupil of Edme Jaurat, and proved an artist of sufficient merit to be appointed one of the engravers to the king. We have by him a considerable number of plates, neatly etched, and finished with the graver, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Hortensia Mancini, Duchess of Mazarin; after Ferdinand.
Mary Magdalene de Lavergne, Countess de la Fayette; after the same.
J. P. de Bougainville, of the French Academy; after C. N. Cochin.
The Marquis de Mirabeau; after Vanloo.
The Duke de Choiseul; after the same.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Diana and Acteon; after Giacomo Bassano; for the Crozat collection; one of his best prints.
St. John Baptist, with other saints; after Coreggio.

The Holy Family, with St. Charles Boromeo; after Scarsellino.

The Four Liberal Arts, personified by Children; four plates; after C. Vanloo.

Jupiter and Antiope; after the same.

Jupiter and Leda; after J. B. Pierre.

The Birth of Venus; after F. de Troy.

Jupiter and Leda; after the same.

The Triumph of Galatea; after Bouchardon; etched by Count Caylus, and finished by Fessard.

The Triumph of Bacchus; after the same; etched and finished by the same.

The Nativity; after Boucher.

A Flemish Festival; after Rubens.

Psyche abandoned by Cupid; after Le Moine.

FETI, DOMENICO. This painter was born at Rome in 1589, and was first a scholar of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli; but he afterwards studied at Mantua the works of Giulio Romano. His style of colouring is vigorous, and of a powerful effect; and the characters of his heads full of expression. The works of this master, which are chiefly easel pictures, are scarce. Four of his most esteemed productions are in the Palazzo Corzini at Florence, representing Christ praying in the Garden, our Saviour presented to the people by Pontius Pilate, the Crowning with Thorns, and the Entombing. Lanzi speaks highly of a picture by Feti in the Academy at Mantua, representing the Miracle of the Loaves. He was much patronized by Cardinal Ferdinando Gonzaga, afterwards Duke of Mantua, who appointed him his principal painter. This able artist was unfortunately addicted to intemperance and excess, to which he fell a victim, at Venice, in the prime of life, in 1624.

FEVRE, CLAUDE LE, a French painter and engraver, born at Fontainebleau in 1633, and successively the scholar of Eustache le Sueur and Charles le Brun. The latter advised him to attach himself to portrait painting, in which branch of the art he was one of the most eminent artists of his country. According to M. de Watelet, he joined to the merit of resemblance that of truth, a correct design, and an excellent colour. He visited England in the reign of Charles II., but he appears to have been little known to Graham or Vertue, from whom the noble author of the Anecdotes takes his authority. [He painted portraits and landscapes. He died at London in 1675.]

FEVRE, ROLAND LE, called of Venice. According to M. D'Argenville, this artist was born at Anjou in 1608. He painted portraits and gallant subjects, and visited England in the reign of Charles II., where he was employed and patronized by Prince Rupert.

FEVRE, VALENTINE LE, a Flemish engraver, born at Brussels, who flourished about the year 1680. During a long residence at Venice he engraved a number of plates, after the works of Titian and Paolo Veronese. They are etched in a slight, feeble manner, but evince the hand of the master, and from the correctness of the design, give a faithful idea of the style of those eminent painters. These were published in Venice in 1680, in a large folio volume, entitled, Opera selectiora quæ Titianus Vecellius Cadubriensis, et Paulus Calhiari Veronensis inveniunt et pinxerunt; quæque Valentinus le Fevre Bruxellensis delineavit et sculpsit.

FIALETTI, ODOARDO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1573. After studying for some time under Gio. Batista Cremonini, at Bologna, he went to Venice, where he entered the school of Tintoretto. Lanzi observes, that to avoid a competition with the Caracci, he resided the remainder of his life at Venice, and painted several pictures for the public edifices, of which he particularly notices the Crucifixion, in the Chiesa della Croce. Boschini mentions thirty-eight pictures by this painter, in the different churches at Venice. Odoardi Fialetti has etched a great number of plates from his own designs, and after other masters. They are executed in a masterly style, and his design is both graceful and correct. He usually marked his plates with the cipher . We have the following by him :

A long frieze, with Tritons, Sirens, &c.

Four, Venus and Cupid, Diana hunting, the God Pan, and a Man holding a Vase; after Pordenone.

Twenty plates, called the Pastimes of Love, entitled Scherzi d'Amore espressi da Odoardo Fialetti, pittore in Venezia.

A set of Plates of the Costume of different nations, and of the different religious orders.

The Marriage at Cana in Galilee; after Tintoretto.

[And many others enumerated by Bartsch and Nagler.]

He died at Venice in 1638.

FIAMMINGO, ARRIGO. This painter was a native of Flanders. His family name is not known; but he is called by the Italians Fiammingo, on account of his country. According to Baglioni, he visited Rome in the time of Gregory XIII. and was employed by that Pontiff in the Vatican. In the church of S. Maria Maggiore, he painted for the Sistine chapel the Resurrection, which is spoken of by that author in favourable terms. In la Madonna degli Angeli, is a picture by this master of our Saviour and Mary Magdalene in the house of the Pharisee, a grand composition, of many figures; and in the same church is a fine picture of St. Michael discomfiting the rebel Angels, designed in a grand and noble style. Many other works of this painter are in the public edifices at Rome, where he died, during the pontificate of Clement VIII., at the age of 78.

FIAMMINGO, ENRICO, another Fleming, called, from indolence or conceit, by the Italians Fiammingo. He first studied under Gioseffo Ribera, called Spagnoletto; but he was afterwards a scholar of Guido. Lanzi mentions some works by this artist in the church of S. Barbaziano, at Bologna, which he considers equal to the imitations of Guido by Francesco Gessi, though darker in tint. [It is difficult to distinguish the Fiamminghi in the Italian writers, they are so numerous. Zani names no less than sixty-four.]

FIASELLA, DOMENICO, called IL SARZANA. This painter was born at Sarzana, in the Genoese state, in 1589. After passing some time in the school of Giovanni Batista Paggi, he went to Rome, where he studied attentively the works of Raffaele. During a residence of ten years at Rome he was employed in several works conjointly with Domenico Passignano, and Cavaliere d'Arpino. On his return to Genoa he painted a great number of pictures for the churches in that city. His powers were equal to the noblest compositions; and his design partakes of the grandeur of the Roman school. As a colourist he is superior to the generality of the Genoese painters. Soprani mentions with distinction many of his works, particularly a picture of S. Bernardo, in the church of S. Vincenzio, at Piacenza, in which he approaches the great style of Raffaele. In the Dome of Sarzana he painted the Murder of the Innocents, a grand composition; and in the church of S. Agostino, at Genoa, a fine picture of S. Tommaso di Villa nova. He distinguished himself also as a portrait painter. He died in 1669. [He studied, and in some measure imitated, the works of Raphael, A. del Sarto, Guido, Carravaggio, and the Caracci. His Madonnas are prepossessing, but deficient in ideal expression.]

FICHERELLI, FELICE, called FELICE RIPOSO, was born at Florence in 1605, and was a scholar of Jacopo Empoli. According to Lanzi, this painter acquired the name of Felice Riposo, for his singular taciturnity; for which he was not more remarkable than for his uncommon indolence. This inertness is the more to be regretted, as the few works he has left us are distinguished by an elegance of design, a morbidezza, and a harmony of colour that charm. Such is his picture of Adam and Eve driven from Paradise, in the Palazzo Rinuccini, and his S. Antonio, in the church of S. Maria Nuova, at Florence. His copies after A. del Sarto have been mistaken for the works of that master. He died in 1660.

FICQUET, STEPHEN, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1731. He acquired great reputation by a set of small portraits he engraved of distinguished literary characters of France. They are executed with extraordinary neatness and delicacy, and are very correctly drawn. One of his best plates is a portrait of Madame de Maintenon, after Mignard, now become very scarce. He also engraved several of the plates for La Vie des Peintres Flamands, &c., in four volumes, by M. Deschamps, of which those of Rubens and Vandyck are very highly finished. The following are among his best prints:

- J. de la Fontaine; after Rigaud.
- J. J. Rousseau; after Aved. 1763.
- J. F. Regnard; after Rigaud.
- F. A. de Voltaire; after de la Tour. 1762.
- P. Corneille; after Le Brun.
- J. de Crébillon; after Aved.
- J. B. P. de Moliere; after Coppel.
- René Descartes; after F. Hals.
- M. Montagne; after Dumoustier. 1772.
- De la Mothe le Vayer; after Nanteuil.
- De la Mothe Fenelon; after Vivien.
- J. J. Vadé; after Richard.

[He died in 1794.]

FIDANZA, PAOLO, an Italian engraver, born at Rome about the year 1736. We have by him a few plates after Raffaëlle and Annibale Caracci, but very indifferently executed. Among others the following:

- The Mount Parnassus; after Raffaëlle.
- The Miracle of the Fire extinguished, called the Mass of Bolsena; after the same.
- The Descent from the Cross; after Annibale Caracci.
- St. Peter and St. Paul appearing to St. Francis; after the same.

FIESOLE, FRA. GIOVANNI DA, called ANGELICO, an old Florentine painter, born at Fiesole in 1387. He is said by Mr. Pilkington to have been a disciple of Giotto; but that is evidently erroneous, as that painter died in 1366. According to Lanzi, his first effort in the art was illuminating Missals, and other works, in miniature, in which he appears to have been instructed by a Dominican monk, of which order he became a religious, in 1407, when he was twenty years of age. What remains of his works retains much of the Gothic style of Giotto, both in the air of his heads and in the formal foldings of his draperies. He was, nevertheless, one of the most eminent artists of his time. Lanzi mentions as one of his best productions, a picture of the Birth of St. John Baptist, in the Florentine gallery. Another of his esteemed works is Adam and Eve driven from Paradise, in S. Maria de Pazzi. He died in 1445. [The reader is advised not to be contented with the foregoing meagre, dry, and imperfect account of the life and works of Beato Frà Angelico. It would occupy too much space in this Dictionary to give a full account of this extraordinary artist and his divine productions; but the few who may be desirous of being acquainted with particulars, will be well recompensed by referring to the pages of Lanzi, (Storia Pittorica, tom. i.), Rossini, (Storia della Pittura), the Count de Montalembert, (Du Vandalisme et du Catholicisme dans l'Art), and to Lord Lindsay's recently published work on Christian Art (Letter vi.): the last is particularly recommended as containing a full and most eloquent description of many of his pictures. It is also probable that Angelico was living in 1452.]

FIGINO, AMBROGIO. This painter was a native of Milan, and flourished about the year 1590. He was a scholar of Giovanni Paolo Lomazzo, and not only distinguished himself in portrait painting sufficiently to be celebrated in the poetry of Marino, but was eminent for his historical works. In these he is more remarkable for the correctness and elegance of his figures than for the number of them, as appears in his S. Ambrogio in S. Enstorgio; and his S. Matteo in S. Raffaele, at Milan. He approached nearer to the fine style of Gaudenzio Ferrari, than any other of the Milanese painters. His Assumption in S. Pedele, and his admired picture of the Conception in S. Antonio, are among the most estimable productions of that school. [He was one of the most successful imitators of M. Angelo in his designs, which are consequently in the highest repute.]

FILIPPI, CAMILLO. This painter was a native of Ferrara, and flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century. According to Barrotti he was a disciple of Dosso Dossi, and painted history with some reputation. In the church of S. Maria del Vado, at Ferrara, is a picture by this master representing the Annunciation; and in that of Il Gesu, another of the Trinity. Baruffaldi states his death to have happened in 1574. Soprani says in 1585.

FILIPPI, SEBASTIANO, called BASTIANINO, and sometimes GRATELLA, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Ferrara in 1532, and was first instructed in the art by his father. When he was eighteen years of age he went to Rome, where he had the advantage of being admitted into the school of M. Angelo Buonaroti, and, according to Lanzi, became one of the most assiduous and most cherished disciples of that great master. Pursuing, without relaxation, his route in the Terribil Via, in which his sublime instructor had been his precursor, he acquired an elevation of thought, and a grandeur of style, that approached nearer to Buonaroti than any painter of his time. This is evident in his principal work of the Last Judgment, in the cathedral at Ferrara, a prodigious performance, which he is said to have completed in three years, and in which he discovers a combination of the highest qualities of the art. Energy and originality of thought, grandeur and correctness of design, a continued variety in his groups, are the characteristics of this extraordinary production. Barotti, in his Pitture e Sculture di Ferrara, informs us that this surprising work was believed to be painted in oil, and that, under that supposition, some inexperienced persons had been employed to clean it; by whom it was so much injured, that the figures which originally appeared as living flesh, now seem to be of wood. There are, however, many of his works in the churches at Ferrara in a state of perfect preservation, which sufficiently prove him to have been a sober and harmonious colourist, though generally in a subdued tone. He is stated by Lanzi to have acquired the name of Gratella from his having been the first of the Ferrarese painters who practised the squaring of large works, in order to reduce them to a smaller size, with more precision; a mode he had adopted from M. Angelo. Whether it was the effect of indolence, or the hurry occasioned by an impatience of gain, it is surprising that, with the possession of such inventive powers, he should so frequently repeat himself. In the churches at Ferrara there are no fewer than seven pictures of the Annunciation, differing little from each other in the composition. Among his best works may be noticed his Martyrdom of S. Caterina, in the church dedicated to that saint. In S. Maria de Servi, the Adoration of the Magi; and in the Certosa, a grand picture of S. Cristofano, entirely in the great style of M. Angelo; in S. Benedetto, a dead Christ supported by Angels; and at the Capuccini, the Virgin and Infant, with St. John. In the cathedral is a picture of the Circumcision, which is supposed to have been painted before he went to Rome, as it resembles the slighter style of his father, rather than the vigour that distinguishes his later works. This eminent painter died at Ferrar in 1602.

FILIPPI, CESARE, was the younger son of Camillo Filippi, born at Ferrara, and was instructed by his brother. He excelled in painting grotesques in the ornamental style; although he sometimes attempted historical subjects, which are very feeble imitations of the style of his brother. Such is his picture of the Crucifixion in the church della Morte.

FILICUS, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Boisle-Duc in 1660. He was a scholar of Peter van Slingelandt, and painted in the very highly finished manner of his master. His pictures, like those of Slingelandt, represent conversations, or subjects taken from private life, and small portraits. His works, without possessing the extreme polish of those of his instructor, have great merit, and are found in the best collections in Holland. [Balkema calls him Filius, and says he died in 1719; Zani says his name was Fielius, not Filius; or properly Jan Fil.]

FILLEUL, GILBERT, a French engraver, mentioned by Basan. He flourished about the end of the seventeenth century. We have by him some plates after le Brun, Simpol, &c.

FILLEUL, PETER, was the son of the preceding artist. He engraved some plates for the Fables of La Fontaine; and a middle-sized print of the Carriers, after Wowermans.

FILLIAN, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1676. He was a pupil of the elder Faithorne; and it is conjectured that he died young, as so few plates by him exist. He worked in the style of his instructor. We have by him the following:

The Portrait of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex.

That of William Faithorne his master; after a print by him.

The Head of Paracelsus.

The Frontispiece to Heylen's Cosmography.

FILOCAMO, ANTONIO and PAOLO. These brothers were natives of Messina, and are noticed by Hakert in the Memorie de Pittori Messinesi. They were educated in the school of Carlo Maratti, at Rome; and, on their return to Messina, established an academy, which was much frequented. They executed conjointly several works, both in oil and in fresco, in the former of which Antonio was very superior to Paolo. Their principal works are in the churches of S. Caterina di Valverde, and S. Gregorio, at Messina, where they both died of the plague in 1743.

FINIGUERRA, MASO. The invention of taking off impressions on paper from engraved plates has long been the subject of dispute between the Italians and the Germans, who both lay claim to it. Vasari decidedly attributes this discovery to Maso Finiguerra, a Florentine goldsmith and enameller, who flourished about the year 1460, and accounts for the invention in the following manner. Having engraved some figures on a silver plate, which he intended to enamel, in order to try the effect of his engraving, he cast upon the plate some liquid sulphur, when the dirt, or black, which had lodged in the traces of the graver, adhered to the sulphur, and produced the effect of a print or pen-drawing. He afterwards succeeded in taking off a complete impression, by filling the strokes with a black composition, and passing a roller over the plate placed on damp paper. The Germans rest their pretensions to an earlier invention of this art, on the existence of plates by their artists, bearing dates prior to the time of Finiguerra. Sandrart mentions a print with the date 1455, and marked with the cipher

N. On this obscure topic, perhaps the most authentic and rational opinion is that of the ingenious and laborious Baron Heineken, who, on the subject of this disputed pretension, observes that, "According to Vasari, and others, his countrymen, it was the goldsmith Finiguerra who invented this art, about the year 1460; and perhaps he was not mistaken, if he speaks of Italy alone. It is very possible that the art of engraving should have been long practised in Germany, and unknown in Italy. The Italians, those of Venice excepted, had very little correspondence with the Germans. For this reason, Finiguerra might discover this art, without knowing that it had already been discovered in Germany. All merchandises of Germany were sent to the Italians by way of Antwerp to Venice, who were better acquainted with the people of the Low Countries than the other provinces. For this reason Vasari supposed that Martin Schoen, who was born at Culmbach, in Germany, was a Fleming, and always styles him Martin of Antwerp."

Maso Finiguerra is said to have communicated his discovery to Baccio Baldini, from whom it passed to Sandro Boticelli. Of the works of Finiguerra little is known with certainty. M. Huber gives a particular description of twenty-four prints in the possession of M. Otto, at Leipsic; certainly of the earliest productions of the Italian engraving, which have been judged by M. Heineken to be original; and that opinion is strengthened by the circumstance of their having been formerly in the collection of the celebrated Baron de Stosch, who met with them during a long residence at Florence. They chiefly represent subjects of the fable, and are well preserved. [The priority of the discovery of taking off impressions on paper from engraved plates is now conceded to the Italians. Zani and Ottley have fully established the claim of Maso Finiguerra, and Bartsch admits it. Zani, who had the honour of first bringing into notice the print of "The Coronation of the Virgin," taken from a Pax executed by Maso Finiguerra in 1452, conjectures that he was born in 1418; Ottley supposes that he was born in 1410, and that a print in his possession was executed in 1445. For a description of this print see his History of Engraving, vol. i. p. 304. Zani describes another which he found in the cabinet of M. Borduge, of "The Virgin and infant Jesus seated on a throne, surrounded by Angels and Saints." Among the prints of the Cavalier Seratti, sold at London in 1816, by Mr. Stanley, were two by Maso Finiguerra, "The Epiphany," and "The Crucifixion:" the latter of a large size, measuring twelve inches and one-eighth high, and eight inches and three-quarters wide. This is now in the British Museum. The Epiphany is in the collection of the Duke of Buckingham. The sulphur of the Coronation of the Virgin is in the British Museum, to which it was bequeathed by the late Mr. Thomas Grenville. This also belonged to Seratti, and was purchased by Mr. Grenville of Mr. Stewart, the gentleman who brought it with the prints from Malta, for the sum of £300. It should be recorded that SERATTI died in obscurity at Malta.]

FINLAYSON, J., an English engraver, born about the year 1730. He engraved in mezzotint several portraits, and a few plates of historical subjects. Among others we have the following by him :

PORTRAITS.

The Duchess of Gloucester; after Reynolds.
 Lady Charles Spencer; after the same.
 Lady Elizabeth Melbourne; after the same.
 The Earl of Buchan; after the same.
 Miss Wynyard; after the same.

 Duke of Northumberland; after Hamilton.
 Miss Metcalfe; after Home.
 Signora Zamperini, in la buona Figliuola; after the same.

SUBJECTS.

Candaules, King of Lydia, showing his Queen coming out of the Bath to his favourite Gyges; after his own design.
 A Collier, with his Pipe; after J. Weeninix.

FINOGLIA, PAOLO DOMENICO. This painter was a native of Orta, in the kingdom of Naples, and flourished about the year 1640. He was brought up in the academy of Cavaliere Massimo Stanzione; and is commended by Dominici as a correct and expressive designer, and possessed of great fecundity of invention. His principal works were the Vault of the chapel of S. Genarro, in the Certosa at Naples, and some pictures in the Capitol. He died in 1656.

FIORAVANTI, an Italian painter of still-life and inanimate objects. He excelled in painting vases, fruit and flowers, and musical instruments, which he represented with great exactness and fidelity.

FIÒRE, COLANTONIO DEL. According to Dominici, this old Neapolitan painter was born in 1354. He was a disciple of Francesco Simone, the son of Maestro Simone, and painted several altarpieces for the churches at Naples; some of which were still preserved at the time of the above-mentioned author. One of his earliest productions is in the church of S. Antonio; it is signed with his name, and is dated 1375. The centre of the picture represents the Coronation of the Virgin, after her Assumption, on one of the laterals is the Ascension, and on the other the Descent of the Holy Ghost. His most esteemed work is his picture of St. Jerome extracting a thorn from the Lion's foot, in the church of S. Lorenzo; painted when he was near eighty years of age, in 1436. He died in 1444.

[FIÒRE, JACOBELO DEL, a Venetian painter, who flourished from 1401 to 1436. His father, Francesco, was very eminent in the art, but he surpassed him, and rose to a high degree of celebrity. He made himself known in 1401 by producing an altar-piece at San Cassiano di Pesaro, and another in 1409, both bearing his name, which he wrote Jacometto de Flor. He afterwards painted a much nobler work, the Coronation of the Virgin, in the cathedral of Ceneda, extremely rich in figures; in-somuch as to have deserved the name of the "Painting of Paradise," in a MS. of the lives of the Bishops of that place, which is preserved in the episcopal residence, and declares the work to have been executed ab eximio illius temporis pictore Jacobello de Flore, 1432, at the expense of the bishop Ant. Correr. Few artists of the time equalled him in his power of conferring a certain grace and dignity on his figures, as large as the life, and a vigour and ease rarely to be met with. He would appear to more advantage in modern times if his figures had been less loaded with ornaments, and in particular the draperies glowing with gold lace, according to the custom of his age.]

FIorentino. See STEFANO.

FIORI, MARIO DA. See NUZZI.

FIORINI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This painter was a native of Bologna, and flourished about the year 1588. He is chiefly known as a coadjutor of Cesare Aretusi; in conjunction with whom he painted several pictures at Bologna and Brescia. In the church of S. Afra, at Brescia, is a picture by him of the Birth of the Virgin. At the Padri Servi, at Bologna, is a picture of the Mass of S. Gregorio, painted in conjunction with C. Aretusi.

FIRENS, PETER, an indifferent French engraver, who, according to Basan, resided at Paris about the year 1640. He engraved some portraits; among others, that of Henry the Fourth of France. He copied, in a stiff, clumsy manner, the Hermits, after Sadeler. There are some other prints by him, after S. Vouet, C. Vignon, and others, very poorly executed.

FISCHER, A., a modern engraver, who, Basan says, executed a print of the Carriers, after Wowermans. It is the same subject that is engraved by Fillen.

[FISCHER, ANNE CATHERINE, a German lady, who excelled in painting flowers in distemper and in oil. She was married to Benjamin Blok in 1664.]

FISCHER, JOHN. To this artist, who, in Sandrart's Academia, is mentioned as an engraver on wood, are attributed the cuts for the Bible printed at Strasburg in 1606.

FISHER, EDWARD, an English mezzotint engraver, who flourished about 1765. We have by him a number of portraits, chiefly after Sir Joshua Reynolds, which possess great merit. Among others are the following:

PORTRAITS AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The Earl of Bute, when Lord Cardiff.
 Lady Eliza Keppel; full length; very fine.
 Lady Sarah Bunbury; the same; very fine.
 The Marquis of Rockingham.
 Hugh, Earl of Northumberland.
 Elizabeth, Countess of Northumberland.
 Granville Leveson Gower, Earl Gower. 1765.
 George, Lord Edgcumbe, Vice Admiral. 1773.
 Viscount Downe.
 Lady Elizabeth Lee; full length.
 John, Viscount Ligonier, on horseback.

Augustus Keppel, afterwards Lord Keppel. 1759.
 Augustus Hervey, afterwards Earl of Bristol.
 Lady A. and Lady Jemima Yorke, Daughters of Earl Hardwicke.
 The Hon. George Seymour Conway. 1771.
 Lawrence Sterne, Prebendary of York.
 Doctor Armstrong.

PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Frederick, Archbishop of Canterbury; after N. Dance.
 Richard, Lord Bishop of London; after the same.
 William, Earl of Chatham; after Brompton.
 Doctor Franklin; after Chamberlin.

[Some of his engravings are dated as late as 1777.]

[FITTLER, JAMES, an eminent English engraver, was born in 1758, at London. He distinguished himself by numerous works after native and foreign masters, of different subjects and character; and book illustrations by him abound. His best engravings are considered to be Lord Howe's Victory, and the Battle of the Nile, both after Loutherbourg; the portrait of B. West; the plates in Forster's British Gallery; and others in Dr. Dibden's Aedes Althorpianæ. The last work was published in 1822; and it does not appear that he has published any of importance since.]

FLAMEN, ALBERT, a Flemish painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He painted landscapes, fishes, birds, &c., but his pictures are little known in this country. We have by this artist some charming etchings of the above-mentioned subjects, executed in a spirited and masterly style. He sometimes marked his plates with his name, and sometimes with the cipher AB.

We have by him,

Two sets, of twelve each, of Fresh-water Fishes, with back-grounds of landscapes, &c.

Two sets, of twelve each, of Sea Fishes, with marine back-grounds.

A set of seven Landscapes, with small figures.

A View of Port à l'Anglois, near Charenton.

A View of Conflans, on the side of Jureilly.

A View of Pernay, on the side of Corbeil.

A View of Marcoussi, on the side of Mont Cheri.

An Encampment at the end of the Fauxbourg St. Victor, near the Horse-market; very fine.

[Rigal gives a catalogue of 322 pieces by him; Bartsch mentions only 152.]

FLAMEN, F. This artist was probably of the same family with Albert Flamen. He was a native of Flanders, but resided at Paris about the year 1660. Among other prints, he etched a set of four plates of Views on the River Seine, after the designs of Israel Silvestre.

[FLAMENCO, JUAN, (that is, John the Fleming), mentioned by Bermudez as a painter, who resided in the Monastery Certosa di Miraflores from 1496 to 1499, and painted the altar-pieces there. He was paid for his labours the sum of 53,545 maravedis, besides his maintenance for the three years. On the right-hand, or gospel side of the altar, he represented various passages in the life of "John the Baptist," which were well treated, with good colouring, and much expression, in the style of Lucas Van Leyden; that on the left, or Epistle side, is much deteriorated, and it can only be seen that it represented "The adoration of Kings." To this account may be added,

FLANDES, JUAN DE, mentioned also by Bermudez, who painted eleven pictures in the cathedral of Palencia, which he began in the year 1509, under an engagement to complete them in three years, for the sum of 500 gold ducats. There is great probability that the admirable JOHN HEMLING is the painter intended by these two appellations. Zani, under the name Fiammingo, notices "Maestro Giovanni, detto Giovanni de Flandes;" he marks him BB., and says that he was working in 1496 and 1509. Now, this corresponds with both of the foregoing accounts. It was to the Monastery Certosa di Miraflores that John II., in 1445, presented the celebrated portable chapel painted by Roger de Bruges, known as the travelling chapel of the emperor Charles V., and now in the king of Holland's possession. This, until the right master was pointed out by Mr. C. I. Nienwenhuys, was attributed to John Hemling; no doubt the circumstance of his having painted in the monastery so long, assisted the belief that it was by him. It may be observed, that the subjects of the pictures painted at the monastery are precisely those on which John Hemling exercised his pencil. See the article JOHN HEMLING.]

[FLAMENCO, MIGUEL EL, (Michael the Fleming), another Flemish painter mentioned by Bermudez, said to have been first a scholar of Rubens, afterwards of G. A. Ferrari at Genoa, and lastly to have studied under Cornelius Wael. From the styles of these three masters he formed one peculiarly his own, and painted pictures that entitled him to consideration, and portraits in the manner of Van Dyck. From Genoa he passed into Spain, where he was much esteemed for his ability and merit. It is added that he died there about the middle of the 17th century, and that his pictures have been attributed to masters better known. It may be suspected that this Miguel Flamenco means Michael Cozzie, who was a scholar of Bernard Van Orley, and painted much in Spain; notwithstanding the statement that he studied under Rubens, Ferrari, and Wael; as writers, when they name artists after their country instead of their family, fall into strange errors, and create much confusion.—The error, in this case, commences with Soprani, and is perpetuated by Bermudez. There are about seventy artists enumerated by Zani under the general head "Fiamminghi," but known by other names in Flanders and in Holland. No wonder there is much confusion when they are noticed by Italian and Spanish writers.]

FLATMAN, THOMAS, was born in Aldersgate Street, in 1633, and was educated at Winchester school. From thence he went to New College, Oxford; but leaving the university without a degree, he removed to the Inner Temple, where, in due time, he became a barrister. It does not appear that he ever followed the profession of the law, but having a turn for the fine arts, he indulged his inclination, and gained some reputation as a poet and a painter in miniature. We are informed by the noble author of the Anecdotes, that Mr. Tooke, master of the Charter-house, had a head of his father by Flatman, which was so well painted, that Vertue took it for Cooper's; and Lord Oxford had another portrait by him, marked with his initial F., which was so masterly, that Vertue pronounced Flatman to be equal to Hoskins and next to Cooper. It is certain, that he excelled more as a painter than a poet. And Grainger asserts, that one of his heads is worth a ream of his Pindarics. He died in 1688.

[FLEGEL, GEORGE, a painter of subjects of still-life, was born at Olmutz in Mbravia about 1563; he resided at Francfort, where he died in 1638. He painted fruit, flowers, fish, vases, glasses, and other inanimate objects, which, taken severally, had merit, but with little taste in their arrangement as compositions.]

FLEISCHMANN, A. C., an obscure German engraver, who was employed by the booksellers at Nuremberg. He engraved some portraits for a book entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published in 1626.

FLEISHBERGER, T. F., a German engraver, who, like the preceding artist, worked for the booksellers. He engraved an ornamental frontispiece for a book called Gregorii Horsti opera Medica, printed at Nuremberg in 1660; and a portrait of G. Horstius, the author.

FLEMAEL, BERTHOET. This painter was born at Liege in 1614. His parents, who were very poor, placed him, when a boy, under the care of a musician; and he had made considerable progress in that art when he turned his thoughts to painting. He received some lessons in design from an obscure artist, but was afterwards instructed by Gerard Douffleit, an historical painter, who had studied at Rome. Under this master he acquired sufficient ability to venture on visiting Italy on the produce of his talent. On his arrival at Rome, he was unremitting in his studies after the works of the best masters; and it was not long before he was noticed for the readiness of his invention and the freedom of his hand. The Grand Duke of Tuscany invited him to Florence, and employed him in ornamenting one of the galleries of his palace. After passing some years in the service of that prince, he visited Paris, where he was patronized by the Chancellor Seguier, who employed him in some of the apartments at Versailles. He also painted the cupola of the Carmelites at Paris, where he represented Elijah taken up into Heaven, and Elisha receiving the Mantle of the Prophet. In the sacristy of the Augustines he painted the Adoration of the Magi. Notwithstanding this flattering encouragement he quitted Paris, and returned to Liege in 1647, after an absence of nine years. His first work after his return to his native city was a grand composition of the Crucifixion, painted for one of the chapels of the collegiate church of St. John. This performance gained him great reputation; and he was employed in several considerable works for the churches at Liege. In 1670 he was invited to return to Paris, and painted the ceiling of the king's chamber of audience, in the palace of the Thuilleries, representing an emblematical subject of religion. He was made a member, and afterwards professor, of the Royal Academy at Paris, and was high in the estimation of the public. The love of his native country induced him, however, to return to Liege, where he continued to exercise his talents, under the protection of Henry Maximilian, Prince Bishop of Liege, until his death, in 1675. Bertholet Flemael possessed an inventive genius, and had acquired by his studies in Italy a great style of composition, and a correctness of design that partake of the grandeur of the Roman school. He was an excellent colourist; and in his historical subjects was a strict observer of the propriety of costume. He excelled in architecture, with which he embellished the back-grounds of his pictures with taste and intelligence. The principal works of this painter at Liege are the Elevation of the Cross, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of the Dominicans; the Crucifixion, in the Convent of the Nuns of the Sepulchre; the raising of Lazarus, in the Cathedral; and the Conversion of St. Paul, in the church dedicated to that apostle.

FLESHIER, B. This artist is mentioned by Lord Orford as a painter of sea-pieces, landscapes, and fruit. His pictures may be supposed to have possessed considerable merit, as some of them were thought worthy of being placed in the Collection of King Charles the First, and in that of Sir Peter Lely.

FLETCHER, A. This artist is mentioned by Basan as the engraver of some views of Rome, after Canaletti.

FLETCHER, HENRY, an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1729. He engraved a print of Bathsheba and her Attendants at the Bath; after Seb^m. Conca, and some portraits, among which is that of Ebenezer Pemberton, minister of Boston, prefixed to his sermons.

FLEUNER, PETER. There is a wooden cut, executed in a very bold, spirited style, representing an emblematical subject, apparently the Procession of Gluttony, with the name of this artist at length, and dated 1549.

FLEUR, NICHOLAS WILLIAM DE LA. According to Florent le Comte, this artist was a native of Lorraine, and flourished about the year 1639. He chiefly resided at Rome, where, among other prints, he engraved a book of flowers, consisting of twelve plates, with a title, representing his portrait, surrounded with flowers.

FLINK, GOVAERT. This painter was born at Cleves in 1614, of which city his father was treasurer. It was the wish of his parents to bring him up to mercantile pursuits, and with that view he was placed with a merchant at Amsterdam; but his desire of becoming a painter induced him to seek every opportunity of becoming acquainted with the artists, and he was more frequently to be found in their painting-rooms than in the counting-house. He heard the remonstrances of his master with silent respect, but they were of little avail in extinguishing his love for the art; and his father, finding it impracticable to control so marked a disposition, was at length persuaded to allow him to follow a profession for which he had shown so decided a propensity. He was first a scholar of Lambert Jacobs, a painter of little celebrity, under whom he remained some time; but he afterwards entered the school of Rembrandt, and with the advantage of that master's instruction, became one of the ablest disciples of that distinguished colourist.

G. Flink painted historical subjects and portraits; and in both he was one of the most successful and most employed artists of his country. The magistrates of Amsterdam engaged him in many considerable works for the Stadthouse; and he painted the portraits of some of the most illustrious personages of his time, particularly the Elector of Brandenburg and the Duke of Cleves. Prince Maurice of Nassau, Stadtholder, favoured him with his protection, and employed him in many important works. The pictures of this master, without equalling Rembrandt in the richness and harmony of his tint, or the magical conduct of his light and shadow, are to be admired for a sobriety and purity of colour, and the studied and judicious arrangement of his compositions. One of his best works is Solomon praying for the Gift of Wisdom, in the council-chamber at Amsterdam; and in that of the Burgomasters is another fine picture of Marcus Curius refusing the Treasures of the Samnites. It is said by Descamps, that on seeing some of the portraits of Vandyck, he renounced that branch of the art, and confined himself to historical painting. The burgomasters of Amsterdam had commissioned him to paint twelve large pictures for the town-house, of which he had finished the sketches, when he died in 1660.

FLIPART, JEAN CHARLES, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1700. He engraved some plates, which are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, finished style, but without much effect. We have by him :

The Portrait of René Choppin ; after Jamnet.

The Virgin and Infant ; after Raffaele ; for the Crozat collection.

Christ praying on the Mount of Olives ; after the same ; for the same collection.

Mary Magdalene, penitent ; after Le Brun.

Apollo and Daphne ; after R. Houasse.

FLIPART, JEAN JACQUES, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Paris in 1723, and was instructed in the art of engraving by his father, whom he greatly surpassed. His plates are partly etched, and finished with the graver, and possess great merit. We have by this estimable artist, among others, the following :

The Portrait of J. B. Greuze, painter ; after a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Holy Family ; after Giulio Romano ; in the Dresden collection.

Adam and Eve, after their fall ; after C. Natoire.

Venus presenting the Arms to Æneas ; after C. Natoire.

A Sick Man surrounded by his Children ; after Greuze.

Twelfth-Night ; after the same.

A Sea-storm at night ; after Vermet.

A Sea-storm by day ; after the same.

Christ curing the Paralytic ; after Dietricy.

A Bear-hunting ; after C. Vanloo.

A Tiger-hunting ; after F. Boucher.

The Combat of the Centaurs and Lapithæ.

FLODING, PETER, a Swedish engraver, who resided chiefly at Paris. He engraved several plates, both with the graver and in aquatinta. Among others, we have the following by him :

The Portrait of Alexander Roslin, painter ; after himself.

Apollo and Daphne ; after F. Boucher.

Soldiers guarding a Prison ; after the same.

A Girl sleeping, with a Dog by her ; after J. B. Deshais.

FLORIANO, FLAMINIO, a Venetian painter, who imitated the style and copied the works of Tintoretto with success. One of his best performances is a picture of S. Lorenzo, in the church of that Saint.

FLORIGORIO, BASTIANO. According to Ridolfi, this painter was a native of Udine, and flourished about the year 1533. He was a disciple of Pelegrino da S. Daniello, and painted history with reputation. His fresco works at Udine are almost entirely perished, but of his oil-paintings, remain a picture of St. George and the Dragon, in the church of S. Giorgio ; and in the refectory of the Padri di S. Pietro Martyre, our Saviour at table with his Disciples.

FLORIMUS, JOHN, an obscure engraver, mentioned by Florent le Comte. His works consist principally of portraits. We have also a frontispiece to a collection of antique heads by him. It is a composition of several figures, and is executed with the graver, in a neat, stiff style.

FLORIS, FRANCIS. The family name of this eminent Flemish painter was de Vriendt ; he was born at Antwerp in 1520, and, until he was twenty years of age, studied sculpture under his uncle Claude de Vriendt. His love of painting induced him to change the chisel for the pallet, and he became a scholar of Lambert Lombard, from whose instruction he derived great advantage. He afterwards visited Italy, where he studied attentively the works of Michael Angelo and the antique. After passing some years at Rome, he returned to Flanders, with an ample collection of drawings he had made from the objects most worthy of admiration. His first productions exhibited a grander and more correct design, and a superior style of composition to what had before been witnessed by his countrymen, and he was styled by the honourable appellation of the Raffaele of Flanders. He was particularly patronized by the Counts of Hoorn and Egmont, and was received into the Academy at Antwerp in 1559. With the possession of such powers, and favoured with the public esteem and encouragement, the exertion of his talents insured to him the road to fortune and fame, which he lost by an unfortunate propensity to intemperance and excess ; and it is surprising, that under such a derangement of conduct, he was able to produce the many important works which are mentioned by van Mander. He possessed an uncommon facility of invention, and a surprising freedom of hand, of which the author above mentioned gives a striking example. When the Emperor Charles V. made his entry into Antwerp, Floris was engaged to paint the triumphal arches ; and he is said to have finished seven figures as large as life, with different attributes, in one day. And on a similar occasion, when Philip II. visited the Low Countries, he painted in a few hours a large picture representing Victory, with several figures of Slaves, and the attributes of War and Peace. Of this subject he etched a plate, which is dated in 1552. His design is bold, though not always correct ; his colouring is clear and brilliant, and he gave great roundness and relief to his figures. Among the principal works of Francis Floris, are the Last Judgment, in the church of Notre Dame, at Brussels ; in the cathedral at Antwerp, a fine picture of the Assumption ; and in the chapel of St. Michael, was formerly his most esteemed work of the Fall of the Rebel Angels. It is now in the gallery of the Louvre. He died in 1570.

FLOS, DU. See DUFLOS.

FO, [G. R.] This artist was a native of Switzerland, and flourished about the year 1551. Papillon speaks of him as an excellent engraver on wood, and a contemporary of Hans Holbein. He executed the cuts for the History of Animals, by Conrad Gesner, published at Zurich in 1551. He also engraved the coins and medals of the Roman Emperors, by the same author, published in 1559.

[FOGOLINO, MARCELLO], an artist of the Florentine school, who practised chiefly at Vicenza. But little that is authentic is known of him ; even his name has been corrupted, through negligence, by the few writers who have noticed his works. He was an historical painter and engraver, and flourished in the fifteenth century. For a long time he was supposed to be the engraver who marked his plates R. B. T. A., or ROBETTA : Zani has exploded that supposition. It may be conjectured that Heineken was unacquainted with his works, as he writes the name Fogellino, although three of his prints, the Statues, signed MARCELLO FOGOLINO in Roman capitals, were in the Royal collection at Dresden. Bartsch honestly confesses that he had not seen them ; and mentions another in which there is a female seated caressing an infant, and a piece of beautiful architecture. In the collection of Richard Cosway, which, after his death, was sold by auction by Mr. Stanley, there was a small print representing a riposo of the Virgin and Child, in a landscape with architectural ruins, and Joseph drawing water from a well, with the name in full, MARCELLO FOGOLINO; it was purchased by Messrs. Woodburn, and is now in the British Museum. Mr. Otley says, that he once possessed a small print, bearing his name, representing the Nativity: and these seem to be all at present known. Fogolino must, however, have been an artist of high repute in his day. Boschini speaks of the picture of the Adoration of the Magi, at Vicenza, by Marcello Fogolino, which he says was painted before the time of Gian. Bellini, (prima che vivesse Gio. Bellini,) and he calls it a most precious work. It still exists in that city, in the church of San Bartholomew, as Reichard mentions it in his Guide des Voyageurs en Italie. Lanzi, referring to it, after mentioning the works of Jacopo Tintoretto at Vicenza, says, "It is yet more highly honoured by an Epiphany painted in San Bartholomew by Marcello Fogolino, an artist commemorated by Ridolfi under the name of Giovanni Batista Fogolino, who flourished at the period of the two Montagna. He must, however, at that time, have been far advanced in years, if it be true that the era of his birth preceded that of Gian. Bellini." He adds, "His manner is undoubtedly original, so much so that I find nothing resembling it either in Venice or elsewhere; it embraces great diversity of countenance and costume, skillful gradations of light and shade, with landscape and perspective, and is remarkable for ornament, and the finish and smoothness in every part. It was fully entitled to render its author the father of a new epoch in the history of art; if, indeed, we are to believe him to be, which does not sufficiently appear, as ancient as has been affirmed." Lanzi thinks that he was a pupil of Mantegna. In Rosini there is an engraving (plate 97) of a Chorus of Monks, after a picture by Fogolino, which is excellent in design, arrangement, and expression.]

FOKKE, SIMON, a Dutch engraver, who resided at Amsterdam about the year 1744. He was a pupil of J. C. Philips, and was chiefly employed for the booksellers in small portraits and vignettes, which he executed with neatness, and was more successful than in his larger plates of historical subjects. He engraved part of the portraits for a work entitled, Portraits Historiques des Hommes Illustres de Danemarck, published in 1746. We have also by him, among others, the following:

The Portrait of Simon Fokke; after his own design.

A View of the Port of Leghorn; after Vernet.

A View near Narni, in Lombardy; after the same.

A Landscape, Winter; after P. Breughel.

A View of the Y, near Amsterdam.

Two small plates of Animals.

The Prodigal Son; after Spagnoletto; in the Dresden collection.

Jacob keeping the Flocks of Laban; after the same; same collection.

The Death of Dido, a burlesque; after C. Troost.

FOLER, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1526. He was a contemporary and friend of Paolo Veronese, whose splendid style he followed with some success in his colouring, though very deficient in his design, particularly in his large works. In his easel pictures, this inferiority is less discernible, and they possess considerable merit. Among other works by this master, Ridolfi notices the following; in the church of the Abbey of S. Gregorio, three pictures of the Assumption of the Virgin, the Scourging of Christ, and the Crucifixion; in S. Barnaba, the Birth of the Virgin; and in S. Caterina, Christ praying in the Garden, and the Resurrection. He died in 1616. [According to the foregoing dates, he would have been 90 years old when he died. Zani says he was born in 1530, and died in 1626, so that he would have been 96.]

FOLKEMA, JACOB, a Dutch engraver, born at Dockum, in Friesland, in 1692. He engraved several plates after the designs of Picart, and many portraits and vignettes for the booksellers. He also executed some plates of historical subjects, which are not equal to his other works. He had a sister, ANNA FOLKEMA, who painted miniature, and engraved some few plates, about 1715. By Jacob Folkema we have, among others, the following:

An Emblematical Subject on the Death of the Prince of Orange.

Time discovering the Bust of F. Rabelais, with figures and satirical and emblematical attributes: a curious print.

The Martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul; after N. del Abate.

PORTRAITS.

Michael Cervantes de Saavedra; after C. Kori.

John Ens, Professor of Theology at Utrecht; after Colla.

Petrus de Mastricht, Professor of Theology at Frankfort; after the same.

Humphrey Prideaux, Dean of Norwich; after Seeman.

Suethlagins, Pastor at Amsterdam; after Anna Folkema.

[According to Zani he died in 1767.]

FOLLI, SEBASTIANO. According to the posthumous work of Baldinucci, this painter was a native of Siena, and flourished about the year 1608. He was a scholar of Alessandro Casolani, and distinguished himself by several fresco works in the churches at Siena, particularly the cupola of S. Marta, and some pictures of subjects from the Life of S. Sebastiano, in the church of that saint, painted in competition with Rutilio Manetti, to whom they are in no way inferior. He visited Rome, and was employed in some considerable works for the Cardinal de Medici, afterwards Leo XI.

[FOLO, GIOVANNI. This very eminent engraver was born at Bassano in 1764, and died at Rome in 1836. He studied in Volpato's school at Rome, but subsequently he chose Raphael Morghen as his model. In his earlier productions there appears something of hardness and dryness of style, from which even his beautiful engraving of the "Madonna de' Candelabri," after Raphael, is not altogether free; but this defect is wholly avoided in the "Mater dolorosa," after Sassoferato. Here the engraver has succeeded in expressing the character of the original picture, and diffused over the copy the same harmony of light and shade, and delicate colouring, that are the pleasing characteristics of the master. Folo merits the name of a great artist; he seeks rather to preserve grandeur of character than to produce a work that is merely pleasing to the eye by elaborate execution. His strokes throughout are powerful and firm; yet in subjects requiring amenity of treatment, he varies his manner so as to give a corresponding delicacy, as may be instanced in his Adam and Eve. The Saint Andrew, after Domenichino, is considered, by many, as his masterpiece; it is a very valuable engraving, delicately and forcibly executed. Folo's style was not suitable for small subjects, as may be conjectured from the medallion of Pius VII.; his productions are for the most part of a large size. He was a member of the academy of St. Luke at Rome. Nagler gives a good list of his works, which are after paintings and sculptures of the most eminent masters, such as Raphael, M. Angelo, Titian, N. Poussin, Guido,

Rubens, Caracci, Thorwaldsen, Canova, and others of celebrity.]

FONBONE, a French engraver, of little celebrity. Among other subjects he engraved some of the plates for the large set of the Views of Versailles in 1715.

FONTAINE, E., a French engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1681. Among other cuts, we have a print by him representing the figure of Christ, standing upon a pillar. It is a very indifferent performance, and is inscribed E. Fontaine, sculptsit. Anno 1681.

[FONTAINE, PIERRE LA, born at Courtrai in 1758, painted interiors of churches in the manner of Steenwyck and Peter Neefs. His imitations of those masters were so exact that they passed, with many, for originals. To the profession of an artist he joined that of a dealer in pictures, and found the latter the more profitable. He brought many fine pictures to England, for which he obtained large prices. His own works are much esteemed by those that know them; and also by those who think them to be by Steenwyck or Neefs. He died at Paris in 1835.]

FONTANA, ALBERTO. This painter was a native of Modena, and flourished about the year 1540. He was a fellow student with Niccolo del Abate, under Antonio Begarelli, and in conjunction with his co-disciple, painted the pannels of the Butchers' Hall at Modena; a work which Scannelli, in his Microcosmo della Pittura, says appears to have been the production of Raffaello, though he erroneously ascribes it entirely to N. Abate. There is certainly a great similarity in their style; but, although Alberto Fontana resembles Niccolo in the airs of his heads, he is always unequal to him in his design, and there is something red and heavy in his colouring. He died in 1558.

FONTANA, CESARE. This artist was a native of Italy, and flourished about the year 1620. He engraved several plates representing funeral processions and cavalcaades. [Zani says he was living in 1660.]

FONTANA, DOMENICO MARIA, was born at Parma about the year 1540, and learned the art of engraving at Bologna, and engraved several plates from his own designs, as well as after other masters. We have by him:

The Flight into Egypt, with a mountainous Landscape. The Sabine Women making Peace between the Romans and the Sabines.

St. John preaching in the Wilderness.

Mount Calvary, with a Latin inscription.

Christ going to Calvary. 1584.

[There must be error in the foregoing dates, as applied to D. M. Fontana, who was living in 1651, as appears by an engraving with his name and that date. There was a painter of the name Sebastian Fontana, a son of the Cavalier Domenico Fontano, who flourished about 1590; but it does not appear that he ever engraved, nor have his works, as a painter, been much noticed.]

FONTANA, VERONICA. This lady was the daughter of the preceding artist, and was instructed in design by her father and Elizabeth Sirani. She executed some neat wooden cuts, principally small portraits. [She was born in 1596, and was living in 1675, according to Zani. Brulliot mentions the portrait of Andreini, the poet, by her, published in 1620.]

FONTANA, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was born at Verona about the year 1524. He was a designer as well as an engraver, and etched several plates from his own designs, in a free, masterly style; among other prints we have the following by him:

A set of middle-sized plates, of subjects from the Æneid. St. Peter Martyr; after Titian.

The Battle of Cadore, between the Imperialists and the Venetians; after the same.

The Crucifixion.

Twenty-eight subjects from the Life of Romulus; dedicated to Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria. 1573.

FONTANA, PROSPERO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1512, and was a scholar of Innocenzio Francucci, called da Imola. He attached himself, however, more to the style of Giorgio Vasari, preferring his expedition and facility to the diligent and careful finishing of Francucci. He is more incorrect and negligent than Vasari, and to him Lanzi attributes the principal cause of the decadence that took place in the Bolognese school at his time, until it was reformed by the Caracci, who were, notwithstanding, educated in his academy. He possessed fecundity of invention, boldness of design, a cultivated mind, and every requisite to form a great machinist; but his love of luxury and expense induced him to gratify those propensities, so fatal to the reputation of an artist, by despatch and hurry, for the sake of gain. At Citta di Castello he painted a saloon in the Palazzo Vitelli, representing the principal achievements of that noble family, which he finished, according to Malvasia, in a few weeks. Similar hasty productions by him are at Rome, in the Villa Giulia, and in the Palazzo di Toscana, in Campo Marzio. His best work at Bologna is the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Maria delle Grazie, which exhibits a grandeur, a facility, and a splendour, that approaches the style of Paolo Veronese. This is one of his best works, which he has signed with his name in golden letters. In the same church is a fine picture of the Annunciation; in la Morte, a Deposition from the Cross; and in S. Giovanni Batista, a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with S. Catarina, S. Paolo, and S. Agostino, one of his most copious compositions. He was also an eminent portrait painter, and distinguished himself at Rome in that branch in the pontificate of Julius III. and three of his successors. He died at the advanced age of 85, in 1597. [The Deposition from the Cross is said by Rosini to be in the Academy of Bologna; an engraving from it is in his Storia della Pittura, plate 156.]

FONTANA, LAVINIA. This eminent paintress was the daughter of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1552, and was instructed in the art by her father. In the churches at Bologna there are some pictures by this lady, painted in the style of Prospero Fontana, of which the most worthy of notice are the Crucifixion, in La Madonna del Soccorso; the Miracle of the Loaves, in il Mendicanti; S. Francis da Paolo resuscitating a dead Person, in la Morte; and the Annunciation at the Cappuccini. Her greatest merit was, however, in portrait painting, which she practised at Rome with the greatest success. She first visited that capital, according to Baglioni, during the pontificate of Gregoria XIII., whom she painted, and the portraits of many persons of distinction; and was considered one of the ablest artists of her time. Lanzi says she possessed a suavity of pencil (particularly after having seen the works of the Caracci) which is admirable; and some of her portraits might have passed for the works of Guido. She died at Rome in 1614.

FONTANIEU, M. DE, a French amateur engraver, who etched for his amusement a few small plates of animals, &c., some of them are dated 1760.

FONTEBASSO, FRANCESCO, a Venetian painter and engraver, born at Venice in 1709. He received his first instruction in the art at Rome, but he afterwards studied at Venice, under Sebastiano Ricci. His works as a painter are little known. As an engraver, we have by him :

The Virgin appearing to St. Gregory, who is praying for the Delivery of the Souls in Purgatory; after Sebastiano Ricci.

A set of seven fantastical subjects; from his own designs. [He died in 1769.]

FONTEBUONI, ANASTAGIO. This painter was a native of Florence, and was educated in the school of Domenico Passignano. According to Baglioni, he visited Rome in the pontificate of Paul V., where he painted some pictures for the churches, which Lanzi observes should not remain unnoticed. In S. Giovanni de Fiorentini, are two admired pictures of the Birth and the Death of the Virgin, which are considered his best works; in S. Maria, in Selci, the Annunciation. The Vault of S. Giacomo de Spagnuoli is painted by Anastagio. This promising artist died young. [He flourished from 1600 to 1620.]

FONTENAY, JOHN BAPTIST BLAIN DE, a French flower painter, born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1654. He was a scholar of John Baptist Monnoyer, and had some merit in painting flowers and fruits, with vases, ornamented with bas-relief. Louis XIV. employed him for some time at the Gobelins. He died at Paris in 1715.

FONTUZZI. See FANTUZZI.

[FONTYN, PIERRE, born near Dort in 1773, was instructed in his art by Pierre Hofman and Guillaume Van Leen. He painted portraits and interiors with figures, scenes of joviality and domestic enjoyments. He died in 1839.]

FOPPA, VINCENZIO. This old painter was a native of Brescia; and is regarded as the founder of the Milanese school. He is said, by Ridolfi, to have flourished about the year 1407; but Lanzi disputes his having lived at so early a period, as he had found a picture of the Crucifixion by this master in the Cararra gallery at Bergamo, inscribed Vincentius Brixiensis, fecit, 1455. And he is stated by Zamboni, in his Memorie di Breseia, to have died in 1492, as appears by the inscription on his tomb in the church of S. Barnaba, at Brescia. Lomazzo states him, erroneously, to have been born at Milan; and bestows on him the absurd and extravagant eulogium, "that he traced his figures from the sculpture of Lysippus; that from his writings Bramante learned perspective; that his book was of great utility to Raffaelle, Polidoro, and Gaudenzio, and that Albert Durer was a plagiarist of his inventions.

The works of V. Foppa evince a correct design of the nude, an excellent colour, with great truth and character in the expression of his heads. His best productions are his pictures of the Trinity, and S. Orsola, in S. Pietro Oliveto, at Brescia; and the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in S. Maria di Brera, at Milan. [The curious inquirer who is desirous to reconcile the discrepancies in the accounts of this old master, is recommended to peruse note 84, parte i. Tom. IX. of Zani.]

FORABOSCO, or FERABOSCO, GIROLAMO. This painter is said, by Orlandi, to have been a native of Venice, though claimed by the Padouese as one of their citizens. He was a contemporary of Boschini, who gives to this master, and to the Cavaliere Liberti, the first rank among the Venetian painters of the time. He was more employed for private collections than for the churches, and was much engaged in portrait painting, in which he particularly excelled. Zanetti, in his Pittura Veneziana, says that Forabosco possessed a noble and penetrating genius, that he united suavity with finish, and elegance with force; that his works were studied in every part, particularly his heads, which appeared speaking. He was living in 1660.

FORD, M., an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished about the year 1760. He engraved several portraits: among others, William Stanhope, Earl of Harrington; after Du Pin.

Henry Singleton, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland.

FORE, LE, an obscure French engraver, who was chiefly employed in engraving portraits for the booksellers. Among others are the following: Henry de Mausses and Nicolaus de Netz, Episc. Aurelianensis, &c.

FOREST, JOHN, a French landscape painter, born at Paris in 1636. He was instructed in the first rudiments of the art by his father, an artist little known. He went afterwards to Italy, and at Rome became the scholar of Pietro Francesco Mola. After studying the works of that master for some time, he applied himself to an imitation of the grand landscapes of Titian and Giorgione. On his return to France, he was esteemed one of the ablest landscape painters of his country, and was received into the Academy at Paris in 1674. From an unfortunate process he made use of in the preparation of his colours, some of his pictures have since become dark, but his touch is spirited, and the scenery of his landscapes is grand and picturesque. He died at Paris in 1712. [His name was Jean Baptiste Forest.]

FORLI. See MELOZZO.

FORMELLO, DONATO DA. This painter was a native of Formello, in the Duchy of Bracciano. He was a disciple of Giorgio Vasari, and, according to Baglioni, visited Rome early in the pontificate of Gregory XIII. He greatly surpassed the style of his instructor, as is evident in his fresco works in a staircase in the Vatican, of subjects from the Life of St. Peter. This artist gave promise of extraordinary ability, but he died young.

FORNAVERT, J. P., an obscure engraver, who was chiefly employed by the booksellers. Mr. Strutt mentions a frontispiece to a book of devotion by this artist, representing Moses and Aaron, with the Four Evangelists. It is neatly executed with the graver, in a stiff, formal style.

FORNAZERIS, JACOB DE, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1615. He resided at Lyons, and appears to have been principally employed for the booksellers, though his plates are executed in a style very superior to the generality of artists of that class. He engraved several frontispieces, which he generally embellished with small historical figures, correctly drawn. His plates are very neatly executed with the graver, though in a formal style. We have the following frontispieces, among others, by him:

To the Biblia Sacra Lugduni. 1606; in quarto.

————— Tabula Chronographica; Lugduni. 1609; in folio.

————— folio.

To the Praxis Fori Pœnitentialis Lugduni. 1616; the same.

To the Commentaries of J. Fernandus. 1622; the same.

[He is probably the same as Fornazori, who engraved portraits in the manner of Grandhomme.]

FORRESTER, J., an English engraver, who flourished about the year 1760. He resided some years in Italy, where he etched several plates of landscapes, which are executed in a neat, pleasing style.

FOSSATO, DAVID ANTONIO, a Venetian painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1620. His works as a painter are little known; but he etched several plates of landscapes and historical subjects, after various masters, of which the following are the most worthy of notice:

Diana and Calisto; after Solimene.

The Family of Darius before Alexander; after P. Veronese.

Jupiter fulminating the Vices; after the same.

Rebecca and the Servant of Abraham; after A. Bellucci.

The Vocation of St. Peter to the Apostleship; after the same.

A set of twenty-four Views of Venice, and landscapes; after Marco Ricci.

He sometimes marked his plates with the cipher

AD. [Brulliot says he flourished about 1743, and quotes the twenty-four landscapes after Marco Ricci, who died in 1729.]

FOSSE, CHARLES DE LA, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1640. He was educated under Charles le Brun, and having gained the prize at the Academy, he was sent to Italy to study, with the pension of the King. He appears to have been less sensible of the sublime beauties of the Roman school, than the seductive colouring of the Venetian, and by studying the works of Titian and P. Veronese, he returned to Paris one of the most accomplished colourists of the French school. He was immediately taken into the service of Louis XIV., and was first employed in painting four pictures for the apartments in the Thuilleries. His next work was the chapel of St. Eustache, where he painted in fresco Adam and Eve, and the Marriage of the Virgin. He painted at Versailles the Sacrifice of Iphigenia; the infant Moses saved from the Nile; and in the chapel the Resurrection. At Marly, a picture of Bacchus and Ariadne; and at Trianon, Apollo and Thetis. These works brought him into great repute; and he was received into the Academy at Paris in 1693. His picture of reception was the Rape of Proserpine. La Fosse visited England in the reign of James II., and was employed in ornamenting the mansions of some of the nobility, particularly the Duke of Montague, for whom he painted two ceilings, of the Apotheosis of Isis, and an Assembly of the Gods. His principal work at Paris is the Cupola of the Invalids, which is fifty-six feet diameter, representing St. Louis before the Virgin, and Christ with a glory of Angels, and in the angles, the Four Evangelists. In the choir of Notre Dame he painted the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi. Although the genius of La Fosse was equal to great and copious compositions, his design is neither elegant nor correct; and though he is considered as one of the best colourists among his countrymen, he is very distant from the verity and clearness of Titian or Vandyck. He died at Paris in 1716.

FOSSE, JOHN BAPTIST DE LA, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1721. He was a pupil of Stephen Fessard, and was employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved several book plates, particularly for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and for Fontaine's Fables. We have also several portraits by him after the designs of Carmontel, among which are the following:

The Duke of Orleans on horseback.
The same, with his Son, the Duke de Chartres.
M. Rameau.
The Abbé de Chauvelin, 1757.
The unfortunate Calas Family.

FOUCHIER, BERTRAM DE, a Dutch painter, born at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1609. He was sent to Antwerp when very young, where he became a scholar of A. Vandyck. When that master left Antwerp to visit England, Fouchier returned to Holland, where he studied under John Bylart, at Utrecht. He afterwards went to Rome, where he met with encouragement during the pontificate of Urban VIII. He remained at Rome three years; and would probably have acquired a distinguished reputation in that capital, if he had not been implicated in a quarrel, which obliged him to quit Rome. The fame of the Venetian painters drew him to Venice, where he particularly attached himself to study the works of Tintoretto. After an absence of eight years he returned to Holland, where he soon found that neither the style he had acquired in Italy, nor the subjects of his pictures, were agreeable to the taste of his countrymen. He therefore abandoned historical painting, and applied himself to paint similar subjects to those of Ostade and Brower, representing assemblies of peasants and drunken frolics, which were admired in his time, and are still to be found in the collections in Holland. He died in 1674.

FOUQUIERES, JAMES. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1580, where he received some instruction from Josse Momper, and afterwards studied under John Brèughel, though he adopted a style of landscape painting different, and very superior to either of those masters. In this branch of the art he arrived at an excellence that induced Rubens occasionally to employ him to paint the back-grounds of his pictures. He afterwards visited Italy, where he greatly improved his style, by studying the works of Titian, whose fine landscapes were the particular objects of his admiration. On his return to Flanders, he was invited to the court of the Elector Palatine, whose palace he ornamented with some considerable works. In 1621 he went to Paris, and was employed by Louis XIII., in the great gallery of the Louvre. His pictures were so much admired by that monarch, that he conferred on him the honour of knighthood. This mark of distinction is said by M. D'Argenville to have rendered him so vain and ridiculous, that he afterwards never painted without his sword by his side. He became so proud and overbearing, that his insolent conduct to Nicholas Poussin, who was employed by the King at the same time in the Louvre, was the means of depriving France of the talents of that admirable painter, who left Paris in disgust, and resided at Rome for the remainder of his life. Fouquieres was, notwithstanding these foibles, a distinguished painter of landscapes; his pencil is free and firm, and his colour, both in oil and in fresco, is clear and fresh, though occasionally cold, and partaking too much of the green. The figures with which he embellished his landscapes are correctly drawn, and touched with great spirit. He died at Paris in 1659.

FOUR, N. DU. This artist was a native of France, and flourished about the year 1760. Among other prints, he engraved several small plates, after Weiotter, and other masters.

FOURDRINIÈRE, PETER, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1730. He chiefly resided in London, and engraved several plates for the embellishment of books, plays, and pamphlets. He also executed some large plates of architectural views, which are his best performances, some of which were for a large folio volume of the Villas of the Antients, published by Robert Castell in 1723. He also engraved some of the plans and elevations of Houghton Hall.

FOURNIER, ———, a French engraver, of little note, who executed part of the plates for a small folio volume, entitled Les Tableaux de la Pénitence.

[FOURNIER, (ISAAC?) a native of France, and scholar of De Troy, who passed the greater part of his artistic life in Holland. He painted the portraits of many distinguished persons of his time; among others, those of the Duke of Cumberland and Admiral Anson. He died in 1754.]

FOURNIER, ISABE. According to Florent le Comte, this artist was painter to Henry IV. of France. He is also called Fornaceriis, and is said to have engraved some plates, but the subjects are not specified. He flourished about the year 1590.

FOUTIN, J. This engraver was probably a goldsmith, as the only prints known by him are some plates of ornamental foliage, with grotesque heads, figures, &c. They are signed J. Foutin, a Chasteaudun, and dated 1619.

FRAGONARD, HONORE, a modern French painter and engraver, born at Nice in 1733. He studied at Rome under the pension of the king, and soon after his return to Paris was received into the Academy, in 1765. He painted historical subjects and bacchanals with some reputation. By this artist we have several etchings from his own designs, and after various masters, among which are the following:

- The Circumcision; after Tiepolo.
- The same subject; after Seb^a. Ricci.
- Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after the same.
- The Last Supper; after the same.
- St. Roch; after Tintoretto.
- The Conception; after the same.
- Four Bacchanalian subjects; after his own designs.

[He also painted conversations, and subjects of French manners, of a small size. He died in 1806.]

FRAISINGER, CASPAR, an engraver of Ingolstadt in Bavaria, who flourished about 1600. Bartsch gives his mark (P. Gr. t. ix. p. 584) among the anonymous engravers, and describes two prints by him, with the date 1591; Brulliot has discovered three others with the names in full, Caspar fraisinger, and Caspar fraisinger Ingolstaty, 1599. Malpé (t. i. p. 265) mentions several other pieces which, according to Brulliot, are by this artist, and ascribes them to George Frenzel: this is a double error, as the artist he means was called Gregory Fentzel, and his manner of engraving, and signature, are quite different.]

FRANCESCA, PIETRO DELLA, DA BORGO S. SEPOLCRO. This old painter, sometimes called Pietro Borghese, was born at Borgo S. Sepolcro, in the province of Umbria, in 1398. At the age of fifteen he had made great proficiency in the mathematics and other studies, when he turned his thoughts to painting. He was taught the incipient principles of design by some obscure artist; but he was principally indebted to the genius with which nature had endowed him for his attainments in the art. He first distinguished himself at the court of the Duke of Urbino, where he only painted some small pictures, which, Lanzi observes, are not the usual commencements of a great master. He visited

Rome in the pontificate of Nicholas V., by whom he was employed in the Vatican, where a large picture by him still remains, representing that pontiff, with several cardinals and bishops; in which there is a truth of character in the heads that is superior to the artists of his time. At Arezzo are shown some of his works, in the choir of the Conventuali, which prove how much the art had advanced from its infancy in the time of Giotto. If he had possessed the grace of Masaccio, he would nearly have equalled that master. At Borgo S. Sepolcro, in the public palace, is a picture of S. Lodovico by this master; and in the church of S. Chiara the Assumption, with the Apostles, in which, though there remains some degree of Gothicity and stiffness in the design, yet, in the colouring and in the airs of the heads, it evinces the dawning of that great style which was afterwards improved by his scholar Pietro Perugino, and was perfected by Raffaello. According to Vasari, he became blind in his sixtieth year, in 1458, though he lived to the age of 86, and died in 1484.

FRANCESCHI, PAOLO, called PAOLO FIAMMINGO. This painter was born in Flanders in 1540, but went young to Venice, where he became a scholar of Tintoretto, and resided in that city the remainder of his life. He principally excelled in painting landscapes, although he sometimes painted historical subjects. In the church of S. Niccolo de Frari, at Venice, are two pictures by this master, of the Descent from the Cross, and St. John preaching in the Wilderness, which are commended by Ridolfi. He was employed by the Emperor Rodolphus II., for whom he painted several landscapes, and other subjects. He died at Venice in 1596.

FRANCESCHIELLO. See DE MURA.

FRANCESCHINI, BALDASSARE, called IL VOLTERRANO. According to Baldinucci, this painter was born at Volterra in 1611. He was called Il Volterrano Giuniore, to distinguish him from Daniele Ricciarelli da Volterra, and first studied under Matteo Rosselli, but he afterwards became a scholar of Giovanni de S. Giovanni. He is said to have excited the jealousy of that master, who, having engaged him as his coadjutor in some works in the Palazzo Pitti, after witnessing his capacity, thought it prudent to dismiss him. He was one of the most distinguished fresco painters of his time, in which he was more employed than in easel pictures. The fire of an ardent genius was tempered by reflection and decorum, and his natural taste of design was strengthened and varied by his study of the best works of the schools of Parma and Bologna. The praise bestowed on this eminent artist by his biographers, is considered by Lanzi rather parsimonious than extravagant, as will be evident to whoever considers his ingenious invention; the correctness of his design, so rare in machinists; his perfect knowledge of foreshortening; the spirited movement of his figures; and the quiet harmony of his colouring. The cupola of the Capella Niccolini, in the church of S. Croce, at Florence, surprises even the admirers of Lanfranco. That of the Nunziata is equally admirable; and the vault of a chapel in S. Maria Maggiore, representing Elias, is so finely foreshortened, that it reminds the spectator of the celebrated S. Rocco, of Tintoretto. Proportionate qualities shine in his oil pictures; such is his S. Filippo Benizzi, in the Nunziata at Florence; his S. Giovanni Evangelista, in the church of S. Chiara at Volterra; and his S. Carlo Borromeo, communicating the Pestiferous, in the Nun-ziata at Pescia. He is highly respectable in his easel pictures, of which there are many at Florence and Volterra, particularly in the Palazzi Maffei and Sermolli. He died in 1689.

FRANCESCHINI, CAVALIERE MARC ANTONIO. This eminent painter, whom Lanzi styles one of the heads of the new Bolognese school, was born at Bologna in 1648. From the academy of Gio. Batista Galli he passed into that of Carlo Cignani, of whom he became the most assiduous assistant, and the most particular friend; and this attachment was increased by his marrying him to his cousin, the sister of Quaini. Cignani distinguished him above all his scholars, keeping him apart from his fellow students, furnishing him with select models for the design of the nude, and directing him in the use to be made of them in his compositions. By a constant study of the best productions of art, under the eye of Cignani, he acquired the tasteful choice and grandeur of his instructor, to which he added a certain vaghezza of colour, and a novelty of style entirely his own. Rich in ideas, facile and prompt in his operation, his powers were peculiarly adapted to the functions of a great machinist. His colouring is clear, without coldness, and his compositions are copious, without confusion. The principal works of M. A. Franceschini, at Bologna, are a ceiling in the Palazzo Ranuzzi; a fine picture of the Annunciation at the Institute; the Death of St. Joseph, in the church of Corpus Domini; St. John in the Isle of Patmos, in la Carità; and St. Francis di Sales kneeling before the Virgin and Infant, in la Madonna di Galeria. At Rimini, in the church of the Augustines, is a fine picture of S. Tommaso da Villanova giving Alms to the Poor. This eminent artist continued the exercise of his talents with little apparent diminution of his powers, until he reached the advanced age of eighty-one. His picture of the Founders of the Order, at the Padri Servi at Bologna; and his Pietà, at the Agostini at Imola, painted when he was near eighty, have no appearance of feebleness or senility. He died in 1729.

FRANCESCHINI, GIACOMO, was the son and scholar of the foregoing artist, born at Bologna in 1672. He painted history in the style of his father; and there are some of his pictures in the churches at Bologna. In S. Maria Inconronata, is a picture of S. Usualdo, St. Margherita, S. Lucia, and S. Cecilia; in S. Simone, the Crucifixion; and in S. Martino, S. Anna. He died in 1745.

FRANCESCHINI, DOMENICO, an indifferent modern Italian engraver, by whom we have a slight etching of the Amphitheatre of Flavius; dated 1725.

FRANCESCHINI, VINCENZIO. This artist was probably a relation of the preceding engraver. He executed part of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino; published in 1748. They are usually marked with the initials of his name, V. F.

FRANCESCHINO. See CARACCI FRANCESCO.

FRANCESCHITTO, [or FRANCISQUITO.] Lanzi states this painter to have been a native of Spain, and a scholar of Luca Giordano, who was accustomed to assert that the disciple would surpass his master. He accompanied that painter to Italy, on his leaving Madrid; and at Naples gave proof of the prediction of Luca, in a picture he painted for the church of S. Maria del Monte, representing S. Pasquale, with a beautiful choir of Angels, and a grand landscape. This promising artist died young at Naples.

FRANCHI, ANTONIO. This painter was born at Lucca in 1634, though domiciliated at Florence.

He was a scholar of Baldassare Franceschini, called Il Volterrano, and was a reputable painter of history. His picture of S. Giuseppe di Calassanzio, in the church of the Padri Scolopi, is admired for the correctness of its design, and the vigour of its effect. In the parochial church of Caporgnano at Lucca, is his most capital work of Christ giving the Keys to S. Peter. He was employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, for whom, as well as for private collections, he painted several easel pictures. He wrote a book on art, entitled La Teorica della Pittura, printed, after his death, in 1739. He died in 1709.

[FRANCHI, LORENZO, the younger, was born at Bologna about 1563, and was instructed by Camillo Procaccini; after leaving that master he attached him to the manner of the Caracci, whose works he copied, or imitated in small. He became eminent in this way; but the masters he chose for his models have the reputation of the performance, and the name of Lorenzo is scarcely recognised out of his own country. He died about 1630.]

FRANCIA. See RAIBOLINI.

FRANCISQUE. See MILE.

FRANCK, CONSTANTINE. This painter was born at Antwerp about the year 1660. He excelled in painting battles and sieges; and though his pictures of those subjects may not be equal to the works of Vandermeulen, they possess great merit. His most capital performance was a picture representing the Siege of Namur by King William, in which he had introduced the portrait of that monarch, and of the principal generals that attended him. The town was seen in the distance, and the encampment was between the principal group of figures and the city. This picture was much superior to his usual productions, which are sometimes rather dry and hard.

[FRANCK, HANS, one of the early engravers on wood, and who assisted in the work of the Triumph of the Emperor Maximilien, after Hans Burgknaier. He is supposed to be the same Jan Franck who lived at Nuremberg, and worked for Albert Durer.]

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, JEROME. This Flemish painter was born at Herenthals, near Antwerp, about the year 1544, and was a disciple of Francis Floris. He afterwards visited France in his way to Italy, and passed some time at Paris, where he was employed by Henry III., whose portrait he painted, and was appointed painter to the King. He afterwards went to Rome, where he studied for some time. On his return to Flanders, he established an academy, and after the death of Francis Floris, the scholars of that master placed themselves under the tuition of Jerome Franck. In the cathedral at Antwerp is a picture by this master representing one of the miracles of St. Gomer, signed H. F. F. 1607. The principal altar-piece in the church of the Cordeliers at Paris, representing the Nativity, is by Jerome Franck. It was painted in 1585. [Brulliot says he was born in 1542; and Zani, that he died in 1620.]

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, FRANCIS, called THE ELDER. This painter was the younger brother of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1546, and was also instructed in the art by Francis Floris. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was received into the Academy at Antwerp in 1581. His most esteemed work was an altar-piece in the cathedral at Antwerp; the principal picture representing Christ amidst the Doctors; and the two folding-doors, the Baptism of St. Augustine, and the Miracle of the Widow of Sarepta. His easel pictures are preferable to his larger works; they are well coloured, and touched with great freedom and effect. He died at Antwerp in 1616.

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, AMBROSE, was the youngest brother of Jerome Franck, born at Antwerp about the year 1549, and, as well as his brothers, studied under Francis Floris. He painted history, and some of his pictures are in the churches of the Low Countries. In the cathedral at Antwerp there is an altar-piece representing the Martyrdom of St. Crispin, and a picture of St. Luke painting the Portrait of the Virgin. [The majority of writers on the subject place his birth in 1544.]

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, SEBASTIAN. This painter was the elder son of Francis Frank, called the Old, born at Antwerp in 1573. He was a disciple of Adam van Oort, and at first distinguished himself in painting battles and skirmishes of cavalry. He afterwards painted landscapes, into which he introduced subjects from sacred history. In these he was one of the most esteemed artists of his time. Some of his best works are in the collection of the Elector Palatine, one of which is highly valued, representing the works of Mercy.

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, FRANCIS, called THE YOUNGER, was the younger son of Francis Franck the elder, born at Antwerp in 1580. He was instructed in the art by his father, whose style he followed for some time. He afterwards visited Italy, and resided chiefly at Venice, where he studied the works of the great colourists of that school. After an absence of three years he returned to Antwerp, and was received into the Academy there in 1605. He painted several pictures for the churches at Antwerp; one of the most esteemed of his works is our Saviour disputing with the Doctors in the cathedral. Cornelius de Bie dates his death in 1642.

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, JOHN BAPTISTE, was the son of Sebastian Franck, born at Antwerp in 1600. He received his first instruction from his father, and for some time followed his style, which he afterwards improved, by an attentive study of the works of Rubens. His first efforts were historical subjects; but he adopted a mode of representing the interiors of saloons and galleries, embellished with pictures and statues, &c., with gallant assemblies of figures and conversations. His works of that description were painted with great beauty of colouring, and a very spirited touch. They were greatly sought after, and were placed in the choicest collections. He possessed a talent of imitating the peculiar touch and style of each master in the small pictures he introduced into his galleries, so exactly, that it was easy to point out the original painter. [It was the possession of this talent that induced so many contemporary artists to solicit his assistance to decorate their pictures with small figures, both in landscapes and interiors. Many of Peter Neef's are so ornamented.]

FRANCK, JOHN ULRICH, a German designer and engraver, born at Kaufbeuren, in Suabia, in 1603. He resided chiefly at Augsburg, where he etched several plates, after his own designs; among others, we have the following by him:

A set of four Battles of Cavalry; Hans Ulrich Franck, 1643.
The Meeting of David and Abigail.
Alexander and the dying Darius. 1644.

FRANCK, JOHN. This engraver was the son of the preceding artist, and engraved several portraits for the booksellers, of which are some of those in the Priorata Hist. Leop. In conjunction with Susanna Sandrart and J. Meyer, he engraved a set of the gardens and fountains in the vicinity of Rome.

[FRANCK, FRANCIS FREDERIC, another son of John Ulrich, was a portrait painter, as would appear by several engraved by Kilian bearing his monogram, three FFF interlaced, and the date 1683.]

FRANCKALLS, BAPTIST, an obscure engraver, mentioned by Florent le Comte, who says he excelled in engraving tournaments, theatrical scenes, and magnificent decorations.

FRANCO, BATISTA, called IL SEMELEI. This eminent painter and engraver was born at Venice in 1498, where he was instructed in the first rudiments of the art. He went to Rome when he was young, and attached himself to an attentive study of the works of Michael Angelo Buonaroti. He also copied at Florence every production of that great master, in pictures, sculpture, and drawings. By his constant contemplation of these admirable objects, he became one of the ablest designers of his time, although he was less successful in colouring. Vasari considers, as some of his best works, the frescos he painted for a chapel alla Minerva at Rome, of some subjects from the Evangelist. He painted in fresco the choir of the Metropolitan church at Urbino, and a picture in oil representing the Virgin and Infant between St. Peter and St. Paul, painted, according to Lanzi, in the best style of Florentine art, though there is something of stiffness in the figure of St. Paul. In the sacristy of the cathedral at Osimo, are several easel pictures of the life of our Saviour, which are regarded as rarities, as he seldom painted in small. As an engraver, Batista Franco is deserving of particular attention. It is not certainly known from whom he learned the use of the graver; but it has been supposed that he was instructed by Marc Antonio Raimondi; and this conjecture is strengthened by a near resemblance between the style of B. Franco and that of Giulio Bonasone, who was unquestionably a disciple of Marc Antonio. His plates are worked entirely with the graver, though some of them have the appearance of being assisted with the point. They are executed in a free, bold, but agreeable style. His masses of light and shadow are broad and masterly; and his design exhibits the grandeur and correctness of the great model from which he formed himself. He generally marked his plates B. F. V. F. for Batista Franco Venetus, fecit. The following are his principal plates:

Moses striking the Rock.
Abraham meeting Melchisedeck.
Abraham sacrificing Isaac.
The Israelites gathering Manna in the Desert.
The Captive Kings brought before Solomon.
The Adoration of the Shepherds, with Angels in the Clouds.
The Virgin and Infant, with St. John.
St. John the Baptist.
St. Jerome holding a Skull.
Christ disputing with the Doctors.
The Entombing of Christ by the Disciples.
Simon the Magician before the Apostles.
The Cyclops at their Forge.
Hercules and Dejanira.
The Donation made to the Church by the Emperor Constantine; after Raffaele.
A Bacchanalian subject; after Giulio Romano.
The Triumph of Bacchus; after the same.
The Deluge; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.

This artist died in 1561. [Bartsch enumerates above 100 pieces by him, among which is one with the date 1563. Zani says he was living in 1566; and Vasari says he died in 1580. It is also a question whether he was born at Venice or Udine, in 1498 or 1510: he calls himself of Venice.]

FRANCO, GIACOMO, an Italian designer and engraver, who was probably a relation of the artist mentioned in the preceding article. He was born at Venice about the year 1560. His style of engraving resembles that of Agostino Caracci; it is free and masterly; his design is correct, and there is a fine expression in his heads. The following prints are the most worthy of notice:

Part of the plates for an Edition of Tasso's Jerusalem, published at Genoa in 1590; after the designs of Bernardo Castelli; the rest were engraved by Agostino Caracci.

Habiti delle Donne Venetiane; published in 1626.

A collection of portraits of the Great Men; dated 1596.

St. Jerome; J. Franco Roma, sc.

The Crucifixion; signed Giacomo Franco, fec.

Hercules between Virtue and Pleasure; from an antique basso relievo.

FRANÇOIS, LUCAS. This painter was born at Mechlin in 1574. It is not mentioned by whom he was instructed in the art; but he painted history with considerable reputation, and was also much employed as a portrait painter. He passed the early part of his life at the courts of France and Spain, and was appointed painter to both those monarchs. After an absence of six years he returned to Flanders, where he painted several altar-pieces for the churches, which are deservedly admired. At Tournay, in the abbey of St. Martin, is a fine picture by this master of St. Placido and St. Maurice; and in the church of St. Catherine, at Mechlin, the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence. He died at Mechlin in 1643.

FRANÇOIS, PETER. This painter is miscalled, by Mr. Pilkington, Lucas François the Young. He was the son of the foregoing artist, born at Mechlin in 1606. For some time he studied under his father, and followed his style in his large historical works; but he afterwards entered the school of Gerard Segers, whose academy was then in great repute, and adopted a mode of painting history and portraits of a size smaller than life, which were greatly admired for the beauty of the colouring, and the neatness of his pencil. The Archduke Leopold invited him to his court, where he was favoured with the esteem and patronage of that prince. He was also solicited to visit Paris, and met with the most flattering encouragement. He rendered himself extremely acceptable to the Parisians, by his accomplishments as a man of the world, and his knowledge of music. After passing four years in France he returned to Flanders, where he continued to exercise his talents with great success. Peter François was ingenious in his compositions, a firm and correct designer, and his colouring is clear and seductive. In the church of the Nuns of Bethenian, at Mechlin, are two pictures by this master of subjects taken from the history of their order. He died in 1654. [He had a younger brother called Lucas, born at Malines in 1615, who painted history and portraits, and resided a considerable time in France: the remarks on the one will apply to the other.]

FRANÇOIS, SIMON, a French painter, born at Tours in 1606. Without the help of a master, he had made some progress in the art, when he went to Italy, where he studied some years. At Bologna he became acquainted with Guido Reni, whose portrait he painted. On his return to France he settled at Paris, where he painted the portrait of the young Dauphin so much to the satisfaction of the court, that he looked forward with confidence to the acquisition of fortune and fame. In these flattering expectations he was however disappointed, and died in obscurity at Paris in 1671.

FRANÇOIS, JOHN JAMES, a modern French engraver, born at Nancy in 1717. He is said to have been the first that engraved at Paris in the style representing drawings made in crayons, for which he received a pension of 600 livres from the king. He also executed some small plates of portraits with the graver. The plates for the History of the Modern Philosophers, by Saverien, were engraved by this artist. Among others, we have by him the following prints:

Louis XV., King of France.

His Queen.

Peter Bayle; after Carle Vanloo.

Desiderius Erasmus; after Holbein.

Thomas Hobbes; after Picrre.

John Locke; after Vien.

Nicholas Malebranche; after Bachelier.

The Dancers; after F. Boucher.

A March of Cavalry; after Parocel.

He died at Paris in 1786. [Brulliot and Zani say that he died in 1769, and both call him John Charles. Zani maintains that he was the original inventor of the manner of engraving to imitate chalk drawings, and quotes a letter, addressed to M. Severin in 1740, in proof.]

FRANCUCCI. See IMOLA.

FRANGIPANE, NICCOLO. This painter is believed by some to have been a native of Padua, by others of Udine. He flourished from the year 1565 till 1593; and though his works are not mentioned by Ridolfi, his talents are highly worthy of notice, from the proofs he has left of his ability. At Padua, in the church of S. Bartolomeo, is a fine picture by him of S. Francesco, painted in 1588; and at Pesaro, an altar-piece of S. Stefano. But his most admired work is his Assumption, in the church of the Conventuali, at Rimini, of which Lanzi speaks in the highest terms. [Some of his works are dated 1597.]

FRANQUAERT, JAMES, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1596. He received a liberal education from his parents, who were of great respectability, and having shown an early inclination for the art, he was sent to Italy to study painting and architecture, where he remained some years. On his return to Flanders he was appointed principal painter and architect to Albert and Isabella, then governors of the Low Countries. He was greatly esteemed by those illustrious personages, who employed him in several public works, both in painting and architecture. The church of the Jesuits, at Brussels, was built on his plan, which he ornamented with some of his pictures. He died at Brussels at an advanced age. [Balkema says he was born in 1577, and died in 1652.]

FRANS, NICHOLAS. This painter was born at Mechlin in 1539. It is not said under whom he studied; but he was a respectable painter of history. In the collegiate church of Our Lady at Mechlin, is an altar-piece by this master, representing the Flight into Egypt; and in the church of Hanswyck, near Mechlin, are two pictures by him of the Visitation and the Annunciation. His drawing is correct, and he was an excellent colourist.

FRANSSIÈRES, J. DE, a modern French engraver of little celebrity. He engraved part of the plates for a set of Turkish habits, published at Paris in 1714, by M. de Ferriol.

FRARI, FRANCESCO. See BIANCHI.

FRATE, IL. See PORTA.

FRATELLINI, GIOVANNA. This celebrated paintress was born at Florence in 1666. The early disposition she showed for the art recommended her to the notice of the Grand Duchess Victoria, who took her under her protection, and had her instructed in drawing and music, by the best masters. She was afterwards taught miniature painting by Ippolito Galantini, and finished her studies under Ant^o. Domenico Gabbiani. She painted historical subjects and portraits in oil, miniature, and in crayons, but chiefly excelled in the latter, in which she is no way inferior to the celebrated Rosalba. Her reputation soon spread throughout Italy. She painted the portraits of Cosmo III.; that of his grand duchess, her patroness; the principal nobility of the court; and the most illustrious personages of Italy. One of her best works is in the Ducal gallery at Florence. It represents her painting the portrait of her son. This distinguished lady died at Florence in 1731.

FRATELLINI, LORENZO MARIA. This painter was born at Florence in 1690. He was the son of the lady mentioned in the preceding article, by whom he was instructed in the elementary principles of design. He afterwards studied under A. Domenico Gabbiani, who had been the instructor of his mother. Under that master he acquired a ready and correct manner of designing, and became a promising painter, both in history and portraits; but he died in the prime of life, in 1729.

[FREEBAIRN, ROBERT, an English landscape painter, was born in 1765; he was for a short time with Richard Wilson, who died before his education was completed. He afterwards went to Italy, where he remained about ten years. But where nature has denied the gift, neither master nor country will supply the deficiency. He never rose above mediocrity. His pictures are simply pleasing, never striking. On his return to England he met with several patrons, and as he was slow in performance, it is probable they were the chief purchasers of his works. He died in 1808. There are about forty prints of Italian and English Scenery published by him.]

[FREEZEN, JEAN GEORGE, a painter of fruit and flowers, was born at Palts, near to Heidelberg, in 1701. He first studied under Jean Van Nikkelen, and afterwards under Philip Van Dyck, of whom he became one of the best scholars. He was patronized by the Duke of Hesse, and was appointed historical and portrait painter to the court of Cassel.]

FREMINET, MARTIN. This artist was born at Paris in 1567. He was the son of an obscure painter, who taught him the rudiment of the art, and without any better instruction he acquired sufficient ability to produce his picture of St. Sebastian, in the church of S. Josse, at Paris. He afterwards went to Italy, and arrived at Rome at the time when the artists were so divided between the styles of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, and Cavaliere Giuseppe Cesari. He formed an intimacy with the latter, without preferring his style. The works of M. Angelo Buonaroti were the particular objects of his admiration. Freminet visited Florence, and afterwards Parma, where he studied some time the works of Parmegiano. After passing fifteen years in Italy he returned to Paris, in the reign of Henry IV., who appointed him his painter, and employed him in the chapel at Fontainebleau. He had scarcely commenced that undertaking when the King was assassinated. His successor, Louis XIII., continued him in his employment, and conferred on him the Order of St. Michael. Freminet possessed a ready invention, was a bold, rather than an elegant designer, and was perfectly acquainted with anatomy and perspective. In attempting to imitate the great style of Buonaroti, he fell into the outré and extravagant; and the movement of his figures is strained and violent. The ceiling of the chapel of Fontainebleau is his most considerable work; it represents subjects from the Old and New Testament, among which are Noah and his Family entering the Ark, and the Annunciation. In the angles he has represented the Sibyls, designed in the tasteful style of Parmegiano. He did not long survive the finishing of the chapel, and died at Paris in 1619.

FRERES, THEODORE, a Dutch painter, born at Enkhuysen in 1643. He was of an ancient and opulent family, who gave him an education suited to his birth, and, among other accomplishments, he was taught drawing, for which he showed so strong a predilection, that his parents acceded to his desire of visiting Italy, and he passed several years at Rome, studying after the antique, and the best productions of modern art. He returned to Holland with a large collection of drawings he had made in Italy, and distinguished himself by several historical works; among which were the ceiling of a public hall at Amsterdam, and some pictures in one of the palaces of the Prince of Orange. In his studies in Italy he appears to have been more attentive to the purity and correctness of design than to the blandishments of colouring, in which he is less successful. His compositions are ingenious and tasteful. He is said by his Dutch biographer to have been invited to England by Sir Peter Lely, who promised to introduce him to the King, but finding on his arrival that the situation he expected was filled by Antonio Verrio, he returned to Holland. He is not, however, mentioned in the Anecdotes. He had just finished some considerable works in the Town-house at Enkhuysen when he died, in 1693.

FRESNE, CHARLES DU, a French amateur engraver, who, according to Basan, engraved a few plates for his amusement; among which is,

The Interview between S. Nil and the Emperor Otho III.; after Domenichino.

He lived about the year 1680.

FRESNOY, CHARLES ALPHONSE DU. This distinguished personage is perhaps more celebrated for his poem on the art, than for his merit as a painter. He is, however, from both, entitled to particular notice in a publication of this nature. He was the son of a respectable apothecary, born at Paris in 1611, and was destined by his father to the study of physic, who, with that intention, gave him the best education in his power. His progress in his studies was more than usually promising; he soon became well versed in the classics, and at an early period of his life showed a marked genius for poetry. His love of painting was not less conspicuous; and when he was eighteen years of age, he ventured to express his desire of adopting it as a profession, though he was aware of the opposition that would be made to his wishes, from the known predilection of his parents in favour of a medical life. Finding it impossible to vanquish prejudices so deeply rooted, he determined to pursue the bent of his inclination, though at the risk of incurring the utmost displeasure of his parents. He accordingly placed himself under the tuition of Francis Perrier, and afterwards entered the more reputable school of Simon Vouet. After studying under those masters about three years, he formed the project of visiting Italy, although without any other resources than what he could derive from the exercise of his talent. On his arrival at Rome, his first attempts were views of the buildings and architectural ruins, in the vicinity of that city; which, though not without merit, he had great difficulty in introducing to public notice. A stranger in that great metropolis, young and destitute, deprived of all assistance from his family, he found it difficult to subsist. He languished at Rome for two years, in that state of indigence and obscurity, when Peter Mignard, who had been his fellow student under Vouet, arrived for the purpose of study. The meeting of the young friends, in a foreign country, was most cordial, and from that moment they formed the bonds of a constant attachment, which existed during the remainder of their lives. Mignard, who was more successful, divided with his friend the earnings of his art; and although he possessed a greater facility than du Fresnoy, he was frequently assisted by the profound reflections of his friend, and his perfect acquaintance with the theory of the art, of which he has given ample proof in his excellent poem. The Cardinal of Lyons employed them in copying the select works of Annibale Caracci, in the Farnese gallery; and they were most assiduous in their studies after Raffaele and the antique. Felibien has given a particular account of his works at Rome, of which the following are the principal: the Ruins of Campo Vaccino; a young Athenian visiting the Tomb of her Lover; the filial Piety of Æneas; Mars finding Lavinia sleeping on the Banks of the Tyber, one of his best pictures; the Birth of Venus, and that of Cupid. In 1753 he left Rome, to return to France, by way of Venice, and was so struck with the works of Titian, that he wrote to his friend to rejoin him in that city, where he remained eighteen months. During his residence at Venice, he painted some pictures, in which his improvement in colouring showed how much he had profited by his studies after Titian. In 1656, he returned to Paris, where he painted, among other works, a picture of St. Margaret, for the church dedicated to that saint, and four landscapes in the Hotel d'Amenonville, in which the figures were painted by his friend Mignard. The remainder of his life was employed in preparing his poem for publication, which, however, did not appear till three years after his death. He died at Paris in 1665.

FREY, JAMES. This eminent engraver was born at Lucerne, in Switzerland, in 1681. After learning the principles of design he went to Rome, when he was twenty-two years of age, where he received some instruction from Arnold van Westerhout, and had afterwards the advantage of studying in the school of Carlo Maratti, at the same time with Robert van Audenarde. His progress was rapid; and he was soon regarded as one of the ablest artists at Rome. His drawing is correct and tasteful; and he was a perfect master of harmony and effect. He etched his plates with spirit, and worked over the etching in a firm and masterly style. Few artists have approached nearer to the style of the painters from whom they engraved than Frey. The number of his prints is considerable, of which the following are the principal:

James Frey died at Rome in 1752. [He is better known by his Italian name Giacomo Frey; though there is another engraver of the same name, but of inferior talent.]

[FREY, JOHN PETER DE, an engraver of distinction, was born at Amsterdam in 1770, and was instructed in the art by Lauwers. Deprived by nature of the use of his right hand, he had the courage to pursue the art with his left, and by industrious application surmounted every difficulty. He became distinguished in his profession as an able designer, and for the boldness of his graver. He every where exhibits fine and well exercised talent. He settled at Paris. Joubert, writing in 1821, says, in his Manuel de l'Amateur d'estampes, that the portrait of Dr. Du Bois, which is dated 1818, was his last work; this is not correct, as there is a print of the Count de Hauterive with the date 1827, and he was employed in 1830. It is not ascertained whether he is still living; but no doubt his artistic pursuits have terminated. He engraved many prints after Rembrandt, Plink, G. Dow, and other masters of that school, which are held in estimation; particularly the Anatomical Demonstration, the Family of Tobias, the Presentation in the Temple, and the Ship-builder and his Wife; all after Rembrandt.]

FREZZA, GIOVANNI GIROLAMO, an Italian engraver, born near Tivoli in 1660. He was instructed in engraving at Rome by Arnold van Westerhout. His plates are etched with care, and very neatly finished with the graver, but without much force or effect. We have, among others, the following by him.

The Gallery of the Verospi Palace; seventeen plates; after the frescoes by F. Albano.
 A set of ten plates, including the title; after the nine pictures by Niccolo Beretoni, in the church of la Madonna in Monte Sauto, at Rome.

The Twelve Months; after Carlo Maratti. The same subjects are engraved by Poilly.

Pallas; after the same; for the same collection.

FRIANO, TOMMASO DI SAN. See MANZUOLI.

FRIDERICH, JAMES ANDREW, a modern German engraver, who lived about the year 1760. He engraved some plates of Hussars, and other horsemen; after Rugendas. [He died in 1751, at the age of 68.]

[FRIES, ERNEST, born at Heidelberg in 1801, died in 1833. He studied at Munich, and is reckoned among the best of the modern German landscape painters. Several of his most beautiful landscapes are in possession of the senator Jenisch at Hamburg, and one in the collection of M. de Mitchels at Heidelberg.]

FRIQUET, DE VAUROSE. Basan mentions this artist as a painter, and a scholar of Sebastian Bourdon. He engraved several plates after the works of his master.

FRISIUS, JOHN VREDEMAN, an old Dutch engraver, born at Leuwarde, in Friesland, in 1527. He was also an eminent architect, and was employed to erect the triumphal arch for the entry of Charles V. into Antwerp. We have a book of monuments by him, entitled Cenotaphiorum, tumulorum et mortuorum Monumentorum, published at Antwerp in 1563, by Jerome Cock. The plates are etched and finished with the graver, with considerable intelligence.

FRISIUS, JOHN EILLART. This artist was probably related to the preceding engraver. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved some plates of portraits. Among others,

Henry IV., King of France; scarce.

Henry of Nassau, Prince of Orange; scarce.

FRISIUS, SIMON, an eminent Dutch engraver, who was apparently of the same family as the two preceding artists. He was born at Leuwarde, in Friesland, about the year 1590, and is regarded as one of the first that brought etching to perfection. Abraham Bosse, in his treatise on the art of engraving, &c., observes, that the first artist to whom he was indebted for intelligence, was Simon Frisius, whom he thinks entitled to great credit, as being one of the first that handled the point with freedom and facility. His etchings are bold and masterly; and in his hatchings he approaches the neatness and strength of the graver. The prints of Frisius are scarce, and are much esteemed. The small figures which he occasionally introduces into his landscapes, are correctly drawn. He frequently marked his plates with the initials S. F. fecit, and sometimes with the word fecit only. The following are his principal works:

A set of twelve small heads of female Saints and Sibyls; marked fecit; after his own designs.

A set of portraits; after Henry Hondius.

A set of twelve plates of Birds and Butterflies; after Mark Gerard.

Twenty-five Views and Landscapes; after Matt^r Brill, entitled, Typographia Variorum Regionum, aeri incisa a Simone Frisio, ab J. Vischerio excusa. 1651.

A mountainous Landscape on the Sea-coast, with figures; marked Henry Goltzius, inv. Simon Frisius, fec.

A Landscape, with a Tower. 1608; Henry Goltzius, inv.

A Landscape, with the story of Tobit and the Angel; P. Lastman, inv. S. Frisius, fec. aqua fort.

A Landscape, with the Flight into Egypt; Hondius, inv. S. Frisius, fec.

A Landscape, with two pastoral figures; marked S. Frisius; highly finished, and very scarce.

FRITS, or FRITZ, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1635. He painted incantations, spectres, and other eccentric absurdities, in the style of Jerome Bos. [He died in 1682.]

[FRITSCH, DANIEL, a German painter, who lived at the latter part of the 16th century. He copied, or imitated, the works of Lucas Cranach, as appears by a picture in the church at Tempelhof, near Berlin, mentioned by Dr. Kugler, supposed to be by that master, but which, on cleaning, was discovered to be the work of Fritsch, and painted in the year 1596. Kugler describes it as the work of Cranach, and says its date is 1506, and observes, that in power of colouring it is inferior to the later works of the master, but is distinguished by the excellence and individual truth of the heads. He corrects the mistake in a note.]

FRITZSCH, CHRISTIAN. This engraver was a native of Hamburg. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, for whom he engraved some portraits, among which are,

Pope Benedict XIV.

John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough.

[FROMANTIQU, HENRI DE, a painter who, it is said, excelled in flowers, birds, and objects of still-life. He was born at Nimeguen in 1630, and was living in 1680. In the gallery at Saltshal is a beautiful flower-piece by him. It is also said that he painted in the manner of Rembrandt; and that Wouwerman gave him his daughter in marriage, with a large portion. This last circumstance, if authentic, would be confirmatory of his artistic talent; but the fact may be doubted, as Wouwerman never became rich by his profession, and died of chagrin at finding his works so much neglected.]

FROSNE, JOHN, a French engraver, born at Paris about the year 1630. He was principally employed in engraving portraits, of which the Abbé de Marolles had collected forty-three. He also engraved part of the large ornamental plates for the collection of Views, &c., by S. de Beaulieu. We have, among others, the following portraits by him:

Claude Baudry, Abbé de la Croix; after Le Bon. 1657.

Louis de Lorraine, Duc de Joyeuse.

Henry d'Orleans, Duc de Langueville.

Nicholas Dauvet, Comte de Desmarez; after Stresor.

Nicholas Potier, President of the Parliament.

M. Dreux d'Aubray.

FROYEN, ———, the name of an obscure and very indifferent engraver, which is affixed to a print representing the head of our Saviour. It is executed entirely with the graver.

FRUTET, FRANCISCO. This painter was a native of Flanders, though he principally resided at Seville. He flourished about the year 1548. It is not known by whom he was instructed in the art. His style of design bears little resemblance to that of his country, and exhibits a grandeur of form, and an elevation of character, that partake of the Roman school. His most admired performance is in the chapel of the Hospital of St. Cosmo and St. Damian at Seville. In the centre picture he has represented the Crucifixion; on the inside of the folding-doors Christ bearing his Cross, and the Entombing; on the outside, the Virgin and Infant, with St. Bernard.

FRUYTIERS, PHILIP. This painter was born at Antwerp in 1620. He first painted historical subjects in oil, and had given proof of considerable ability in an altar-piece, representing the Virgin and Infant seated on a Globe, with a Choir of Angels, painted for the cathedral, when he quitted oil painting for distemper and miniature, and was the most celebrated artist of his time in those branches. His colouring is excellent, and his compositions evince a ready invention. His works were greatly esteemed by Rubens; and it is no slender proof of his merit, that he was employed to paint the portraits of that great master and his family, which he executed entirely to his satisfaction. Fruytiers etched some plates in a very masterly style; they are principally portraits. [Balkema says he was born in 1625, and died in 1677.]

FRYE, THOMAS, an English portrait painter and engraver in mezzotinto, born about the year 1724. He was a respectable artist, and painted portraits with success, both in oil and in miniature. He also scraped several plates of portraits in mezzotinto, most of which are as large as life. Among others, are the following:

- His Majesty George III.
- The Queen.
- His own Portrait.
- That of his Wife.
- The celebrated Miss Pond.

[FUENTE, JUAN LEANDRO DE LA, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Granada from 1630 to 1640. Although not mentioned by Palomino nor Pons, he was an artist of distinguished merit. He followed the manner of the Bassans both in subject and treatment, and his colouring is quite of the Venetian school. His pictures are to be found at Granada, Seville, and Madrid.]

FUESSLI, JOHN CASPAR. This painter was born at Zurich in 1706. He studied for some time at Vienna, under John Kupetsky, and became an eminent painter, particularly in portraits. After residing some years at Rastadt, in the quality of painter to the court, he returned to his native city, and practised his art with reputation. He painted a series of magisterial portraits, which have been engraved in mezzotinto by Valentine Daniel Preisler and others. To this estimable artist we are indebted for the lives of the Swiss painters, in three volumes, with portraits and vignettes, designed and engraved by himself. He died in 1781.

FUESSLI, MATTHIAS, a Swiss painter, born at Zurich in 1598. He was a scholar of Gothard Ringgli, and afterwards studied in Italy. He painted battles, the plundering of towns, and conflagrations. He died in 1665.

[FÜGER, HENRI, born at Heilbronn in 1751, died at Vienna in 1818. He painted historical subjects and portraits, in which he followed the principles of Raphael Mengs. He was appointed director of the Imperial Gallery in 1806, and under his superintendance the Academy of Vienna became so attractive that it was frequented by a majority of the artists of Germany. Some of his works exhibit elegance of form and an agreeable colour; but he is very unequal, as may be seen by those at the Imperial Gallery, which are not his best. He is, however, considered, by German writers, among the most eminent artists of his time. Brulliot calls him Frederic Henri, and mentions two prints engraved by him; one representing Moses and Aaron, and the other Jupiter and Juno.]

FULCARUS, or FURCK, SEBASTIAN, a German engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, was a native of Goslar, as the name of that town is inscribed on several of his prints. In the early part of his life he resided at Rome, where he engraved some plates, as early as 1612. From 1620 to 1630 he was established at Frankfort on the Maine. He engraved many portraits, chiefly for the booksellers, among which are those of the Columna family. He worked principally with the graver, though we have a few etchings by him. When he did not sign his plates with his name, he marked them with the cipher S. We have, among others, the following prints by him:

The Last Judgment; after M. Angelo Buonarroti. On the tombstone, at the left-hand corner, his cipher is marked, in the first impressions of the print; and when he had retouched the plate he added the inscription, Sebastian. Fulcarus reinciditque.

St. Sebastian; a half figure.

An ornamental Frontispiece to the works of Gul. Fabricius, dated 1646. It is etched in a very spirited style, and is signed S. Furck, f.

He also engraved some plates from Titian, and other masters.

FULCO, GIOVANNI. This painter was born at Messina in 1615. After having learned the first principles of design in his native city, he went to Naples, where he entered the school of Cavaliere Massino Stanzione. He is said by Hakert, in his Memorie de Pittori Messinese, to have been a firm and correct designer, and to have excelled particularly in the representation of children. Many of his pictures have been destroyed by the earthquakes, to which his country is subject. Of those that remain are his fresco works, and a picture in oil of the Birth of the Virgin, in the chapel of the Crucifixion, at the Nunziata de Teatini, at Messina. He died about the year 1680.

FULLER, ISAAC, an English painter, who flourished in the reign of Charles II. Of his family, or instructor in his own country, nothing is known; but he studied some years under Francis Perrier, at Paris. He wanted invention and imagination to succeed in historical painting; and his works of that description have little claim to notice. This will be readily admitted by whoever has seen his miserable performance at Magdalene and All Souls colleges, at Oxford, though Mr. Addison wrote a Latin poem in praise of the former. He had, however, a correct delineation of the model before him, which enabled him to succeed better in portrait painting; many of which, independent of a strong resemblance, are bold and masterly. His own portrait, which is in the gallery at Oxford, though eccentric, is touched with great force, and full of character. Fuller etched some plates for a drawing-book, called Libro da disegnare; and in conjunction with Tempesta and Henry Cooke, etched the plates for the Moral Emblems, by Cæsar Ripa; they are very indifferently executed. Mr. Strutt miscalls this artist John. He died in London in 1672.

FUMACCINI. See SAMACCHINI.

FUMIANI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO. This painter was born at Venice in 1643, though he was educated at Bologna. After acquiring an excellent style of design and composition in that distinguished school, he returned to Venice, where he studied for some time the splendid and ornamental principles of Paolo Veronese. With such advantages, it was expected that he would have distinguished himself; but in his best works there is a coldness and languor in his colouring, a feeble arrangement of light and shadow, and a want of expression, unusual in the school in which he was brought up. Lanzi considers his picture of Christ disputing with the Doctors, in the church of La Carita, as his best performance. He died in 1710.

FUMICELLI, LODOVICO. This painter was a native of Treviso, and flourished about the year 1536. It is not certainly known whether he was a scholar of Titian or not; but Lanzi regards him as one of the ablest and most memorable of his imitators. In 1536 he painted the principal altarpiece of the Padri Eremitani at Padua, representing the Virgin and Infant seated in the clouds, with S. Agostino, S. Jacopo, and Santa Marina below; which, according to Ridolfi, is designed and coloured in a style worthy of the greatest masters. In the church of the Padri Serviti, at Treviso, he painted a picture of S. Liberale and S. Caterina, with two laterals, representing S. Sebastiano and S. Filippo, the founder of their order. It is to be regretted, that the offer of an advantageous situation in the engineers tempted him to abandon painting.

FUNGAI, BERNARDINO. This painter was born at Siena, and flourished about the year 1512. His style retains something of the dry, stiff manner which preceded him, though not more than many of his contemporaries. Among the works of this master which remain, are the Virgin and Infant, with several Saints, at the Carmine at Siena, painted in 1512, and the Crowning of the Virgin, at Fonte Giusta.

FURINI, FRANCESCO. This eminent painter is styled by Lanzi the Guido and Albano of the Florentine school. He was the son of a respectable portrait painter, born at Florence in 1604, and was first instructed by his father. He afterwards studied under Passignano and Roselli; and on leaving their schools, visited Rome, where the works of Guido were so much the objects of his admiration, that he attached himself to an attentive study of them, rather as a rival than an imitator. Of his large works in the churches, the most admired are at Borgo S. Lorenzo, near Florence, representing St. Francis receiving the Stigmata and the Conception of the Virgin. But he acquired the high reputation in which he is held, by his admirable easel pictures, which are found in the first collections in Florence, and are in the highest estimation. He drew with elegance and correctness, particularly the delicate forms of women and children, and he generally made choice of those subjects in which they could be introduced with the happiest effect. Such is his picture of the Three Graces, in the Palazzo Strozzi; and that of Nymphs carried off by Satyrs, in the Casa Galli. Lanzi observes, that he sometimes painted Magdalenes, which were not much more veiled than his Nymphs. This elegant artist died in the prime of life, in 1646. [Zani places his death in 1649.]

FURNIUS, PETER, a Flemish designer and engraver, who resided at Antwerp about the year 1570. He was a contemporary of the Galles and the Sadeliers, who engraved some plates from his designs. His style of engraving bears a near resemblance to that of those artists. Though he drew the figure correctly, in attempting to imitate the great style of Michael Angelo Buonarroti, he fell into affectation and extravagance. He worked entirely with the graver in a slight, feeble manner. His plates are sometimes marked with the cipher P. Among other prints we have the following by him:

A set of six plates of the Parable of the good Samaritan. The Martyrdom of St. Felicia; P. Furnius, in. et fec.
The Escape of Clelia, with other subjects from the Roman History; marked P. Furnius, fecit.

[FUSELI, HENRY, for so he chose to write his name after he arrived in England, was the son of John Caspar Füessli of Zurich in Switzerland, and born in 1745. He came to England at an early age, with the intention of making literature, and not art, his pursuit; but having shown some of his drawings to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who spoke very favourably of them, he decided thenceforth to devote himself to painting. In 1798 he exhibited his illustrations of Milton, and made the full extent of his genius known to the public. His other performances are numerous, and are subjects from the higher order of poets, or writers of wild and wonderful fictions; though he could represent the pathetic or ludicrous with equal felicity. His lofty imaginings were set down by matter-of-fact people as extravagancies; but such critics may be left to admire Dutch boors, and the other commonplaces of mechanic artisans, and indulge their taste in the surprising truth of pictures of still-life; the poetry of art is not for them. His knowledge of anatomy was extensive, but it must be admitted that, in some instances, it was too ostentatiously displayed. For twenty years he worthily filled the offices of professor of painting and keeper of the Royal Academy. Fuseli was a scholar, and enjoyed the friendship of his most eminent literary contemporaries; and his domestic character was truly estimable. He died in 1825. John Knowles, his executor, has published an account of his life and works, and of many other matters, in 3 vols.: he says that Fuseli was born in 1741, though Fuseli had altered that date, in a former publication, to 1745; others say that he was 87 when he died, which would place his birth in 1738. As an artist Fuseli was truly original, he had no precursor, nor is it likely that he will soon have a follower, with the same stamp of genius: a mere imitator would be contemptible.]

FYT, JOHN, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1625. He excelled in the representation of every species of animals; but in dogs he is perhaps without a rival. It is impossible for art to approach nearer to nature than in the pictures of Fyt of that description. His touch is without manner, or the formality of practice; it is loose, spirited, and playful, but peculiarly characteristic, and full of energy. Such was his extraordinary merit, that he was courted by the greatest painters of his time to embellish their works, with the additional attraction of his admirable animals. Rubens, Jansens, Crayer, and Jordaens, employed him in that way, which is the more flattering to his talent, as the great painter first mentioned particularly excelled in painting animals of every description. His works are placed in the choicest collections. We have by Fyt some admirable etchings, executed in the bold and spirited style of his pictures; they are as follow:

A set of eight of Dogs and other Animals; marked Jo. Fyt. 1640.

A set of seven of Dogs, of different species, with backgrounds of landscapes; dated 1642; inscribed Johannes Fyt, pinx. et fecit.

A set of eight small plates of a Cart, a Horse, a Dog, Foxes, Goats, and three of Cows. These are very scarce.

[Lanzi mentions a Gio. Fyft di Anversa, who resided for some time at Venice, and was employed in the Caso Sagredo, and in that of Contarini: this is a mistake as regards Jan Fyt, as will be shown in a subsequent article. Fyt died in 1671.]

G

GAAL, BARENT, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1650. He was a scholar of Philip Wowermans, until the death of that master in 1668, when he found himself capable of dispensing with further instruction. He painted hunting parties, battles, horse-fairs, and similar subjects to those of his instructor. Though very inferior to Wowermans in correctness of drawing, and the sweetness and polish of his pencil, the works of Gaal are not without considerable merit in the truth of his colouring, and his intelligent management of light and shadow. He frequently painted the figures, &c. in the landscapes of Isaac Koeke, a scholar of Jacob Ruysdael. [He died in 1703.]

[GAAL, PETER, was born at Middelbourg in 1770, and received his first instructions from his father, under whom he made some progress; he afterwards became a pupil of Schwieckhardt, at the Hague. After visiting London, Paris, and several places in Germany, he settled in his native city, where he painted portraits, landscapes, animals, live and dead game, and subjects of ordinary life. His compositions are distinguished by a superior mode of treatment and lightness of pencilling. Some of his pictures are of large dimensions; two of that description were exhibited at Amsterdam in 1808, one representing General Monnet, with several Officers of his Staff, in full uniforms; and the other, Cattle and Sheep of the natural size. He died at Middelbourg in 1819.]

[GAAL, THOMAS, born at Termonde in 1739, fixed his residence at Middelbourg, and was one of the founders and directors of the Academy there. He painted portraits, birds, and flowers. J. Perkois, J. H. Koekkoek, and S. de Koster were his pupils. He died in 1817.]

[GAAST, MICHEL DE, was born at Antwerp in 1510, and became a member of the body of painters in 1558. All his pictures represent the ruins of ancient Rome, ornamented with animals and figures.]

GABBIANI, ANTONIO DOMENICO. This painter was born at Florence in 1652, and after studying some time under Justus Subtermans and Vincenzo Dandini, the Grand Duke Cosimo III., having been made acquainted with his promising talent, took him under his protection, and sent him to the Florentine Academy at Rome, where he frequented the school of Ciro Ferri. After passing three years at Rome he visited Venice, and improved his style of colouring, by the example of the great painters of that school. Pascoli is not deserving of credit, who, in his life of Benedetto Luti, ranks this artist among the ordinary painters of his time. Lanzi regards him as one of the most correct designers of the age in which he lived; and Mengs mentions with distinction some of his drawings he had seen in the possession of Signor Pacini, which he commends for their elegance and facility. His colouring is occasionally languid; but this is not often the case; and his carnations are generally tender and true. His greatest deficiency is in the choice and folding of his draperies, which are frequently formal and heavy. He was invited to the court of Vienna, where he painted the portraits of the Emperor and the King of the Romans; and some historical subjects for the Imperial gallery. On his return to Florence he painted several altarpieces for the churches, particularly a fine picture of the Assumption, and a Repose in Egypt; and his celebrated picture of S. Filippo, in the church of the Padri dell' Oratorio. In his easel pictures he generally selected subjects in which he could introduce children, in which he excelled; and in his works of that description he is little inferior to those of Gio Batista Gaulli. They are placed with distinction in the Florentine gallery, and in the principal palaces of that city. He continued to paint until he was seventy-four years of age, and was killed by a fall from a scaffold in 1726.

GABBUGIANI, BALDASSARE, a modern Italian engraver, who engraved some of the plates for the Museo Fiorentino, published at Florence, in ten volumes.

GABRIELLI, CAMILLO. This painter was a native of Pisa, and was a scholar of Ciro Ferri. Lanzi states him to have been the first that introduced the style of P. da Cortona among his countrymen. He painted some oil pictures at the Carmelites, and for private collections; but he was more distinguished for his fresco paintings, which were much esteemed. His principal work was the great saloon in the Palazzo Allicata.

GABRIELLO, ONOFRIO. This painter was born at Messina in 1616. After studying six years in his native city, under Antonio Ricci, called Barbalunga, he went to Rome, and entered the school of Pietro da Cortona. He afterwards visited Venice, in company with his countryman Domenico Maroli. On his return to Messina, he was much employed for the churches, for private collections, and in portraits. He was in great repute when the Revolution, which took place in 1674, obliged him to quit Sicily, and he settled at Padua, where he resided several years, and was usually called Onofrio da Messina. Some of his best works are in the church of S. Francesco di Paola at Messina, and in the Guida di Padoua are mentioned several of his pictures in the public edifices and in private collections, particularly in the Palazzo Borromeo. He died in 1706.

[GABRON, WILLIAM, a native of Antwerp in 1625. He was a good painter of fruit and flowers, and excelled in the representation of gold and silver vases, porcelain, and ornaments of a like kind. He died at Antwerp in 1679.]

GADDI, GADDO. This old Florentine painter was born in 1239. He was the contemporary and the particular friend of Cimabue and of Andrea Taffi; and from this intimacy may be traced the first dawn of excellence in the Mosaic art. In his works as a painter he at first retained something of the Greek style, united with that of Cimabue; but he afterwards went to Rome, where he improved his manner, and was employed in the Mosaic works in the Façade of S. Maria Maggiore. He also painted some pictures, of which Lanzi mentions one in the Florentine gallery, of the Crucifixion, which is a respectable performance for the time. He died in 1312.

GADDI, TADDEO, was the son of the foregoing painter, born at Florence in 1300, and was first instructed in the art by his father; but he afterwards became the favourite disciple of Giotto. Vasari, who had seen his works at Florence, when they were in a state of more perfect preservation, states him to have surpassed his master in the expression of the heads, and in the delicacy of his colouring; an opinion, which the ravages of time render it impossible now to approve or contradict; although several of his works yet remain, particularly in the church of S. Croce, which appear entirely in the style of Giotto. More originality and a better taste are discernible in his works in the Capitolo degli Spagnuoli, where he painted in competition with Lippo Memmi. In the vault are some subjects from the life of our Saviour, and in the refectory the Descent of the Holy Ghost. According to Baldinucci, he was living in 1352. [According to Zani, he was living in 1365. Two subjects by Taddeo Gaddi are given in Rosini's work, "Storia della Pittura Italiana," which exhibit a beautiful simplicity in their compositions, and gracefulness in forms and attitudes. One represents the Birth of the Virgin; the other, Religion, Arts, and Sciences, in the persons of the most eminent in each department. The first is in the church of S. Croce, and the other of S. Maria, at Florence. See also, Lord Lindsay, letter iv., "History of Christian Art."] GADDI, ANGILO, was the son of Taddeo Gaddi, born at Florence, according to Baldinucci, in 1324. He was instructed in the art by his father, whose style he followed without alteration or improvement. In the church of the monastery of S. Pancrazio, at Florence, is a picture of the Virgin and Infant, with several saints, which was well composed and coloured for the time; and in the church of the Conventual, the finding of the true Cross. He died in 1387. [Zani places his birth in 1314, which, if he was the son of Taddeo, must be an error, and he says that he was living in 1394. Il Padre Finesco says that Angiolo was the son of Zanobio, and not of Taddeo, and that he died in 1378, at the age of 63.]

GAELEN, ALEXANDER VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1670. He was a scholar of John van Huchtenburg, and, like his master, painted battles and subjects of the chase, which he treated with great fire and spirit. Whilst he was a pupil of Huchtenburg, he had an opportunity of improving his touch, by copying the works of Wowermans, Berchem, and other eminent masters, as his instructor was a dealer in pictures as well as a painter; and he was perhaps more indebted to this circumstance, than to the lessons of Huchtenburg. He soon found himself able to dispense with further instruction, and he resolved on visiting other countries in search of improvement. He went to Germany, where he passed some time at Cologne, in the employment of the Elector. After a few years passed in Germany he returned to Holland, and not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he did not long remain there, but determined to visit England, whither some of his pictures preceded him. He accordingly came to this country in the reign of Queen Anne, and he is said, by Van Gool, to have painted a picture of her Majesty in a coach drawn by eight horses, and attended by several of the nobility. He is also stated to have painted for a nobleman three pictures, representing two of the principal battles between the Royal Army and that of the Commonwealth in the time of Charles I., and the Battle of the Boyne. No mention is however made of this artist in the Anecdotes. He died in 1728. [Balkema says he died in 1723.]

GAETA, DA. See PULZONE.

GAGLIARDI, CAVALIERE BERNARDINO. This painter was born at Citta di Castello, in 1609. Although he was a scholar of Avanzino Nucci, he pursued a different path after he had made a journey to Rome, where he was particularly struck with the works of the Caracci and Guido. In the dome at Castello, he painted the Martyrdom of S. Crescenziano, a work of considerable merit in effect, but deficient in other respects. He appears to more advantage in his two pictures of the history of the young Tobit. But his best performance is his picture of S. Pellegrino, with two laterals, in the church of S. Marcello at Rome. He died in 1660. [Zani places his birth nine years earlier.]

GAGLIARDI, BAROLOMEO. According to Orlandi, this artist was born at Genoa in 1555, and is said to have been a painter of some reputation. We have several plates by him, both etched and finished with the graver, among which is a large print representing an emblematical subject. It is executed in a style resembling that of Cherubino Alberti, though very inferior.

GAGNIERES. See GANIERES.

GAILLARD, ROBERT, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1722. We have by this artist a considerable number of plates of portraits, historical and other subjects. He also engraved landscapes in a style that does him great credit. The following are his best prints.

GAILLARD, DE LONJUMEAU, P. I., a French amateur engraver, who etched several small plates for his amusement. Among others, a set of views of the Antiquities of Aix. They are dated 1750.

GAINSBOROUGH, THOMAS. This eminent English painter was born at Sudbury, in Suffolk, in 1727. Endowed with an intuitive disposition for the art, without the help of technical instruction, he reached an excellence which has seldom been equalled by those who have had the advantage of a regular graphical education. It has been aptly observed of him, "that nature was his teacher, and the woods of Suffolk his academy." He was little more than thirteen years of age when he left his native place; and before he was sixteen he established himself in London as a portrait painter. His success was commensurate with his merit; and though his genuine and rational admirers will not be disposed to accede to the inflated and inconsiderate eulogium of a zealous, but imprudent biographer, who asserts, "that his portraits will pass to futurity with those of Vandyck," they will ever be admired for a striking resemblance, expressed perhaps with less of effort than any other painter, and evincing a dexterity of handling, and an intelligence of colour and effect, that may be said to be peculiar to himself. But it is well known to those who had the advantage of his acquaintance, and have survived him, that he never wished to rest his reputation on his works of that description. It is in his chaste and picturesque delineation of English landscape, so exquisitely exhibited in his admirable pictures of our domestic scenery; the bewitching embellishments with which he has decorated them, of groups of cottage children; the charming rusticity of his husbandmen, their horses and their cattle; and the characteristic simplicity of the whole, that the transcendent merit of our interesting countryman is peculiarly conspicuous. It will not be unacceptable to the lovers of art, to be made acquainted with the remarks of Sir Joshua Reynolds on these extraordinary faculties of Mr. Gainsborough. "This excellence (says that enlightened critic) was his own, the result of his particular observation and taste; for this he was not indebted to the Flemish school, nor indeed to any school; for his grace was not academical or antique, but selected by himself from the great school of nature." It has been observed, "that his landscapes approach nearer to those of Rubens than to any other master; and that his trees, fore-grounds, and figures, have more force." Mr. Gainsborough's claim to originality renders nugatory the first part of this ill-judged compliment, which degrades him into an imitator; and it would not have been consonant with his feelings, that his title to distinction should have been founded on the artificial basis of his superiority to Rubens. The same mistaken zeal and untutored judgment has led his indiscreet advocate to equal his skies with the "brilliancy of Claude." A more judicious panegyrist would have steered clear of this uncouth comparison, which is as inapplicable to his style, as the atmospheres they painted were foreign to each other. The private worth of Mr. Gainsborough is so faithfully and so amiably described by the author alluded to above, that it is with heartfelt satisfaction that it is here inserted. "While we lament him as an artist, let us not pass over those virtues that were an honour to human nature; that generous heart, whose strongest propensities were to relieve the genuine claims of poverty. If he selected, for the exercise of his pencil, an infant from the cottage, the tenants of the humble roof generally participated the benevolence of the painter." Of Mr. Gainsborough it may be truly said, "he had a tear for pity, and a hand open as day to melting charity." He died in 1788. [Gainsborough's earlier landscapes are imitations of the manner of Wynants; they have the same clayey and sandy grounds, and a similar arrangement of objects to that which is seen in the smaller pictures of that eminent master. He had a second manner, more original and more English, but rather heavy. His last manner may be seen in the picture at the National Gallery.]

GALANINO, BALDASSARE ALLOISI, called. This painter was born at Bologna in 1578, and was brought up in the school of the Caracci, to whom he was related. He was little inferior to the ablest of his fellow students; of this he has given proof in several of his works in the churches at Bologna, particularly his admired picture of the Visitation in la Carità, so highly commended by Malvasia; and the Virgin and Infant, with St. John and St. Francis, at the Osservanza. He visited Rome in the pontificate of Urban VIII., where, according to Baglioni, he was much employed in painting portraits of the most illustrious personages of his time, which were admired for the force and truth of their colouring, and for their extraordinary relief. He also painted some works for the churches at Rome, of which the principal was the great altar-piece in the church of Gesu e Maria, representing the Coronation of the Virgin. He died at Rome in 1638.

GALANTINI, IPPOLITO, called IL CAPPUCINO, and sometimes IL PRETE GENOESE. He was born at Genoa in 1627, and was for some time a scholar of Giovanni Batista Stefaneschi. Early in his life he became a monk of the order of the Capuchins, on which account he was called Il Cappucino, and also Il Prete Genoese. He was sent as a missionary to India, where he passed several years, and on his return to Europe painted several pictures for the churches of his order. One of his best works is the picture of the Tribute Money, in the Florentine gallery. He died in 1706.

GALASSI, GALASSO. This painter was born at Ferrara about the year 1380. It is not known by whom he was instructed, and but few of his works have survived the ravages of time. At Bologna, in the church of la Madonna di Mezza Ratta, are preserved some pictures of the Passion of our Saviour, with the date 1404. The design is stiff and Gothic, though minutely finished, and not ill coloured. In the sacristy of la Madonna delle Rondini, is a small picture of the Virgin and Infant, with several saints; and in the Palazzo Malvezzi, the Annunciation.

GALEOTTI, SEBASTIANO. This painter was born at Florence about the year 1676. He first studied under Alessandro Gherardini, but went afterwards to Bologna, where he became a scholar of Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole. He possessed a ready invention, and was a good designer; and his powers were well adapted to fresco painting, in which, according to Ratti, he executed some considerable works in the Chiesa della Madalena, at Genoa. Few of his works are to be found in his native city; from which it appears that he was not held in so much reputation there, as in Upper Italy. There are several of his works at Piacenza and Parma, and particularly at Turin, where he was made Director of the Academy, in which capacity he died, in 1746.

GALESTRUZZI, GIOVANNI BATISTA. This artist was born at Florence in 1618. He studied painting under Francesco Furini, and afterwards went to Rome, where he was received into the Academy of St. Luke, in 1652. Of his works as a painter little is known, but he acquired considerable celebrity as an engraver. He was the friend of Stefano della Bella, whose style he imitated, and, according to Huber, finished some of the plates left imperfect at his death. He etched a great number of plates, of which there is a catalogue by Giacomo Rossi. The following are among his principal works:

Paris receiving the Golden Apple from Mercury; after An. Caracci.

St. John the Baptist in Prison; after Batista Ricci.

The Apotheosis of the Emperor Claudius. 1657; rare.

Several sets of Friezes and Bas-reliefs; after Polidoro da Caravaggio.

A set of Antique Gems, with explanations by Leonardo Agostino; published at Rome in 1657 and 1659.

Six plates, representing the Mausoleum of Cardinal de Mazarin; from the designs of the Abbé Elpidius Benedictus. 1661.

GALIMARD, CLAUDE, a French engraver, born at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1729. He passed some time at Rome; and on his return to France became a member of the Academy at Paris. We have by him several plates after de Troy, Subleyras, and Sebastian Bourdon. He has also engraved a number of ornaments for books, of which fourteen frontispieces and vignettes, after Cochin the younger, are particularly described by M. de Heineken. The following are also by this artist :

The Bust of Nicholas Vleughel; after M. A. Slotz; Claudius Galimard, Parisinus, incidit. 1744.
The Queen of Sheba before Solomon; after J. F. de Troy.

GALIZIA, FEDE. This lady was a native of Trento, in the Milanese, and flourished about the year 1616. She was the daughter of Annunzio Galizia, a miniature painter, resident at Milan, from whom she received her instruction in the art. She painted history and landscapes, in a pleasing and finished style, resembling that of the Bolognese school, anterior to the Caracci. One of her best historical pictures is Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, in the form of a Gardener, in the Chiesa della Maddalena at Milan.

[GALLARDO, MATEO, a Spanish painter, who resided at Madrid in 1657, had the reputation of being a good professor. There is a figure of Christ, signed with his name, and several of the Virgin, of the size of life, which for suavity of colour, and fine impasto, entitle him to notice.]

GALLE, PHILIP, an eminent engraver, born at Haerlem in 1537. He was the origin of a family of artists, who became conspicuous in the art of engraving. Philip Galle established himself at Antwerp as an engraver and printseller. He possessed considerable capacity; his design was not incorrect, and his command of the graver shows considerable facility, though, like the other engravers of his time, there is a want of harmony and effect in his plates. The number of his prints is considerable. He generally marked them with one of the ciphers PG or RP. The following are his principal plates :

PORTRAITS.

Joannes Calvinus.
Martinus Lutherus.
Hulrius Swinglius.
Billilaldus Pirehmeyer.
Thomas Morus.

These are part of a set of portraits of celebrated persons of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

GALLE, THEODORE, was the elder son of the foregoing artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1560, and was instructed in the use of the graver by his father. He afterwards went to Rome, where he improved his style of drawing by studying the antique, and engraved several plates after the great masters. His plates are more neatly finished than those of his father, but there is still a degree of stiffness, and a want of effect in the management of the light and shadow. The following are his principal works :

The Portrait of Justus Lipsius; oval, in a frame ornamented with allegorical figures; with six Latin verses. St. Jerome kneeling, in a Grot.
A set of emblematical subjects; entitled Litis abusus, &c.; scarce.
A set of plates of the Life of St. Norbert; published at Antwerp.

GALLE, CORNELIUS, THE ELDER. This artist was the younger son of Philip Galle, born at Antwerp about the year 1570, and was also taught engraving by his father: He followed the example of his brother in visiting Rome, where he resided several years, and acquired a correctness of design, and a freedom and facility of execution, which are discernible in his plates, in which he greatly surpassed his father and brother. After engraving several plates at Rome, from the Italian masters, he returned to Antwerp, where he carried on the business of a printseller, and engraved many plates, after the works of his countrymen and his own designs. Previous to his going to Italy, he engraved some plates in the dry, stiff style of his father, viz.,

A part of the plates of the Life of Christ; after Martin de Vos; published by Collaert.
A set of plates of the Life of the Virgin Mary; after Stradan.
A set of plates of the Life of St. John Baptist; after the same.

The following are his most esteemed prints :

GALLE, CORNELIUS, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Antwerp about the year 1600, and was instructed in the art by his father. It does not appear that he had the advantage of studying in Italy, which may account for his drawing being less correct than that of his father or his uncle. He worked entirely with the graver; and though he did not equal Cornelius Galle the Elder, in the freedom and clearness of his style, his plates possess considerable merit, particularly his portraits, which are, perhaps, the best of his works. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

[GALLEGOS, FERNANDO, a Spanish painter, born at Salamanca about the middle of the 15th century, according to Bermudez, but if, as that author says, he died in 1550, it is probable that his birth was, as stated by others, in 1475. It is said that he studied under Albert Durer, but it is more likely that Berruguete was his master; and he only followed the taste which then prevailed in Europe. Some of his pictures bear so strong a resemblance to those of Albert Durer, that acknowledged connoisseurs have mistaken them. His best picture is an altar-piece in the chapel of St. Clement at Salamanca. The Count A. Razinski, in his work on "The Arts in Portugal," says there are many of Gallegos's pictures there, and repeats that he imitated Albert Durer. Neither Palomino nor Bermudez mention the circumstance of his having painted in Portugal.]

GALLENDORFER, SEBALD, an old German engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1494. He executed some small wooden cuts for a book, entitled Archetypus-triumpantis Romæ, published in 1494, at Nuremberg.

GALLI, GIOVANNI MARIA, called BIBIENA. This painter was born at Bibiena, in the Bolognese state, in 1625. He was called Bibiena from the place of his nativity, which surname was continued to his numerous offspring, who distinguished themselves in the art. Giovanni Maria Galli was a scholar of Francesco Albano, whose graceful style he followed with considerable success. Malvasia mentions him in very favourable terms. Of his large works, in the churches at Bologna, the following are the most esteemed. The Ascencion, in the Certosa; St. Anne, in la Carità; S. Andrea, in S. Biaggio; and S. Francesco di Sales, at the Padri Servi. He died in 1665. [Zani places his birth in 1620.]

GALLI, FERDINANDO, called BIBIENA, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Bologna in 1657. His father dying when he was only eight years of age, he was placed in the school of Carlo Cignani, who, finding the genius of his pupil led him to architecture and perspective, rather than the design of the figure, recommended him to devote himself to that particular department, in which he was eminently successful, and became the most distinguished master of his time in the ornamental and decorative branches of the art. There was scarcely a sovereign in Europe that did not invite him to his court; and it was only in the employment of princes that the splendour and grandeur of his ideas could have found scope for their development. He was much engaged for the Dukes of Parma and Milan, and was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Charles VI. The public festivals on all occasions of victories, the triumphal entries of princes, &c., were celebrated under the direction of Bibiena, and were more sumptuous and magnificent than had before been witnessed in Europe. To him the theatre is indebted for the best improvements in its scenery, and the illusive enchantment of its decorations. But his talents were not confined to theatrical ornaments; he painted many admirable pictures of architectural and perspective views, which are placed in the principal galleries in Italy, and are highly esteemed for the grandeur of their ordonnance, and his perfect intelligence in the conduct of the light and shadow. In these, the figures are usually painted by his brother Francesco. He published a book on civil architecture, entitled Direzione a giovane studenti della Architettura Civile Bologna. 1725. According to Crespi, he died in 1743.

GALLI, FRANCESCO, called BIBIENA, was the younger brother of Ferdinando Galli, born at Bologna in 1659, and was first a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli; but he was afterwards instructed in the school of Carlo Cignani, under whom he became a correct designer, and generally painted the figures in the pictures of his brother. He was also well acquainted with the principles of architecture and perspective; and painted similar subjects to those of Ferdinando, though inferior to him in the elevation of his ideas and the facility of his execution. He passed three years at Rome, and was employed at Genoa, Naples, Mantua, and Verona. He was invited to Madrid by Philip V., who appointed him his principal architect. He died in 1739.

GALLI, ALESSANDRO, ANTONIO, and GIUSEPPE, the sons of Ferdinando Galli, distinguished themselves at several of the courts of Europe in the decorative style of their father.

GALLINARI, PIETRO, called PIETRO DEL SIGNOR GUIDO. This painter was a native of Bologna, and a favourite scholar of Guido Rheni. He acquired the above title from his master's partiality to him. He painted a few historical pictures, which are said to have been touched on by Guido. He died young in 1664.

[GALLIS, PETER, an amateur painter of flowers, fruit, and objects of still-life. He was born in 1633, and lived at Enkhuysen, where he died in 1697.]

GALLO, BERNARDO, an Italian engraver, who, according to Orlandi, in the Abecedarium Pittorico, engraved a set of plates for the Old Testament, another for the New Testament, and a set for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published at Lyons in 1559. He generally marked his prints B. G.

GALLOCHE, LOUIS, a French painter, mentioned by M. Watelet. He was born at Paris in 1670, and was a scholar of Louis Boullogne, but afterwards studied in Italy. He painted history with some reputation. In the church of Notre Dame at Paris, is a picture by him of the Departure of St. Paul for Jerusalem; and at the Royal Academy, Hercules restoring Alceste to her Husband. He died in 1761.

GALVAN, DON JUAN, a Spanish painter, born at Loesia, in the kingdom of Arragon, in 1598. According to Palomino, he went to Rome for improvement, where he remained some time, and on his return to Spain resided chiefly at Saragossa. Several of his works are in the churches of that city. He painted the cupola of Santa Justa y Rufina, and a picture of the Trinity for the bare-footed Carmelites; but his principal work was the Birth of the Virgin, in the cathedral at Loesia. He died at Saragossa in 1658.

GAMBARA, LATTANZIO. This painter was born at Brescia, according to Ridolfi, in 1541. Zamboni says, in 1542. He was the son of a tailor, who, driven by necessity from his native city, had taken refuge at Cremona, and supported himself and son in a scanty subsistence, by the exercise of his trade, which he destined him to follow. The disposition of the boy inclined him to a different pursuit, and he employed all his leisure moments in sketching, for which he was not unfrequently severely chastised by his father. These quarrels, and their cause, came to the knowledge of Antonio Campi, a painter of Cremona, who interested himself in favour of the youth; and, on examining his drawings, found they discovered a lively and decided genius, and prevailed on his father to intrust him to his care. He studied in the school of the Campi for six years; and when he was eighteen years of age, he was placed under the tuition of Girolamo Romanino, and became his favourite disciple. He entertained a high opinion of his talents, and ultimately gave him his daughter in marriage. He surpassed his father-in-law both in the correctness of his design, and in the grandeur of his compositions. To the great principles he had acquired under the Campi, he added the charm of Venetian colouring, in which he approached the rich tones of Pordenone. Select in his choice of the most beautiful forms, they are always gracefully varied, according to his subject. His attitudes are spirited and appropriate, even in the most arduous difficulties of foreshortening, and the relief of his figures deludes the eye. Such are the characteristics attributed by Lanzi to this distinguished painter. In the Corso de Ramai at Brescia, are three fine fresco paintings by him of subjects from the fable; but these are less surprising than his admirable works in the cloisters of the Benedictine Fathers of S. Eufemia at Brescia. They represent Moses and the Brazen Serpent; Cain slaying Abel; Samson and Dalilah; Judith with the Head of Holofernes; Jael and Sisera; and a Deposition from the Cross. The most studied of his works are his fresco in the dome at Parma, representing subjects from the Life of our Saviour, which captivate even in the neighbourhood of Coreggio. Of his oil pictures, the most admired are the Birth of the Virgin, in the church of S. Faustino and S. Giovita at Brescia; and a Pieta, in S. Pietro at Cremona. It is painful to state, that the art was deprived of this great painter at the age of 32, by a fall from a ladder, in 1574. [Zani places his birth about 1534.]

GAMBARINI, GIOSEFFO. This painter was born at Bologna in 1680, and was a scholar of Lorenzo Pasinelli, until the death of that master, when he entered the school of Cesare Gennari. He followed the style of that master in his colouring and his facility of hand, and copied some of his works. Finding himself unequal to the dignity of historical painting, he abandoned it, and applied himself to subjects taken from ordinary life, in which he was more successful. There are, however, some of his works in the churches at Bologna; in S. Maria Egiziaca, is a picture of that saint; and at the Osservanza, S. Caterina Vigri's Entrance into Bologna.

GAMBERUCCI, COSIMO, a Florentine painter, who flourished about the year 1610, and was a scholar of Batista Naldini. He did not arrive at great celebrity in the art, although respectable in some of his works in the churches at Florence, particularly his picture of St. Peter curing the lame Man, in S. Pietro Maggiore, which has something of the taste of the school of Caracci. He also painted easel pictures, which are found in the collections at Florence.

GAMMON, JAMES, an English engraver of no great reputation, by whom we have a few portraits, executed in a stiff, formal style, which, from their mean and tasteless attitudes, were probably from his own designs. Among others, we have the following by him:

Richard Cromwell.
Sir Toby Matthews.
Catherine de Braganza.
Edward Mascal, the painter.

GAMPERLIN, an old engraver on wood, who flourished about the year 1510, and chiefly resided at Strasburg. He executed a set of twenty-two wooden cuts for the Life of our Saviour, printed by John Knobnouch in 1507. They are neatly cut, but very incorrectly drawn. He has written the names of the different figures over their heads, as was not unusual at the time. [Nagler says this is the same artist as URSUS GRAF, and gives a copious list of his works. Bartsch and Brulliot differ respecting him, but are both worth consulting on the subject. The book with the wood cuts was printed by Knoblauch (not Knobnouch) of Strasburg.]

[GANDIA, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, celebrated for his pictures of architecture and perspective views. He lived about 1720.]

GANDINI, GIORGIO, called DEL GRANO. This painter was a native of Parma, and flourished about the year 1535. He was sometimes called del Grano, the family name of his mother. Orlandi not only states him to have been a disciple of Coreggio, but asserts that his pictures were occasionally touched on by that master. The Padre Zapata, in his description of the churches of Parma, ascribes to this painter the great altar-piece of S. Michele, which had erroneously been attributed by Rota, in his Guida di Parma, to Lelio Orsi. This picture, according to Lanzi, is distinguished by a beauty of colouring, a relief, and a sweetness of pencil, that would do honour to the ablest artist of that school. Coreggio had been engaged to paint the tribune of the dome of that church, but died before it was commenced; and the commission was offered to Gandini, who also was prevented by death from executing it. He died young, in 1533.

GANDINI, ANTONIO, was a native of Brescia, and had the advantage of being educated under Paolo Veronese, whose style he followed, together with something of the manner of Palma. He possessed a fertile invention, and was a correct designer, as is apparent in his principal work of the Crucifixion, in the old dome at Brescia. He died in 1613. [Zani and Lanzi place his death in 1630; and the latter says that he also imitated Vanni, and that he was vast, varied, and ornate in his compositions.]

GANDOLFI, GAETANO, a modern Italian painter, born at S. Matteo della Decima, in the Bolognese, in 1734. He painted several pictures for the churches at Bologna, and other cities in Italy, of which the most esteemed are, the Assumption, in the ceiling of S. Maria della Vita; and the Marriage at Cana, in the refectory of S. Salvatore, at Bologna; and the Martyrdom of S. Pantaleone, in the church of the Girolimini at Naples. We have by this artist an etching of the Nativity, after the picture by Niccolò del Abati, in the Palazzo Leoni at Bologna; it is signed Niccol. del Abati, pinx. Gajet Gandolfi, fec., and is executed in so masterly a style, that we regret he did not oftener exercise the point. He died in 1802.

GANDY, JAMES, an English portrait painter, mentioned by Mr. Pilkington. He was born in 1619, and is said to have been instructed by Vandyck. He went to Ireland, under the protection of the Duke of Ormond, and painted many portraits of the nobility and gentry, which are said, by the above author, to have been very little inferior to Vandyck, either for expression, colouring, or dignity. He died in 1689.

GANIERES, JOHN, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about the year 1650. He engraved a few plates after Blanchard, Valentine, &c., but was more employed in portraits. His plates are executed with the graver in a stiff and tasteless style. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIII. of France; an oval, with ornaments. 1640.
Cardinal Flavio Chigi.
M. de la Melleraye. 1679.

SUBJECTS.

Magdalene, penitent; after J. Blanchard.
A Boy sleeping, with a Skull near him. 1640.

GANTREL, STEPHEN, a French engraver born at Paris about the year 1626. We have by this artist several plates of portraits and historical subjects, executed in a neat style, and which possess considerable merit. The following are his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV. of France; as large as life; Stef. Gantrel, fec.
Sebastiano Pisani, Bishop of Verona; same mark.
A. Bruneau, President de la Tournelle; after la Dam.

J. L. de la Bourdonnaye, Bishop of Lyons; after Fontaine.

M. Poncet de la Riviere. 1682.

Louis Berrier, Counsellor to the King. 1674.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Rod of Moses, changed into a Serpent, devouring the Rods of the Magicians of Pharaoh; after N. Poussin.

The Israelites passing the Red Sea; after the same.
The Israelites dancing round the Golden Calf; after the same.

The Descent from the Cross; after the same.

St. Francis Xavier restoring an Indian to life; after the same.

St. Gervais and St. Protas before the Pro-Consul; after le Sueur.

St. Benedict kneeling; after Phil. de Champagne.

St. Francis supported by an Angel; after Caracci.

The Head of Christ; after le Brun.

GARBIERI, LORENZO, called IL NIPOTE. According to Malvasia, this painter was born at Bologna in 1580, and was brought up in the school of Lodovico Caracci, of whose great style he was one of the most successful imitators. Less expressive in his heads, but grand in his choice of forms; correct in his attitudes, and studied in his compositions. Naturally of a dark and gloomy turn of mind, he selected the most austere and melancholy subjects; and his pictures generally represent the most tragical and terrible events, massacres, martyrdoms, pestilence, and death. To the style of the Caracci, he added something of the vigorous light and shadow of Caravaggio. Such are his pictures in the church of S. Antonio at Milan, which Santagostini, in his Guida di Milano, has attributed to the Caracci. In S. Paola de Barnabiti, at Bologna, he painted the Plague of Milan, with S. Carlo Borromeo communicating the diseased; with a Penitential Procession. At the Filippini at Fano, is an admirable picture of St. Paul resuscitating the dead Youth, painted with such power and expression, that it excites both terror and devotion. In S. Maurizio at Mantua, is his celebrated Martyrdom of S. Felicità, and the seven Virgins, which, though less robust and vigorous than the Miracle of St. Paul, exhibits such an abundant imagination, such a variety of horror, that it forms one of the most affecting spectacles that the art has produced. At Bologna, in the church of S. Lodovico, is a fine picture of the Death of St. Joseph; and at the Capuccini, the Crucifixion. He died in 1654.

GARBIERI, CARLO, was the son and scholar of the preceding artist, and painted historical subjects in the style of his father. In the church of S. Giovanni in Monte, at Bologna, is a picture by him of the Death of St. Mary, of Egypt; and in S. Paolo, that Saint taken up into Heaven.

GARBO, RAFFAELINO DEL, a Florentine painter, born in 1476. He was a disciple of Filippino Lippi, the son of Filippo Lippi, whom he soon surpassed, and for some time gave promise of extraordinary ability. He accompanied Filippino to Rome, when he was employed in the capella della Minerva, and painted in the vault some beautiful Angels, which were more admired than the principal work by his master. On his return to Florence, he painted for the church of Monte Oliveto, a picture of the Resurrection, in which the graceful airs of the heads, the characteristic expression of the numerous figures, and the beauty of the colouring, exceeded any production of the time. Another fine picture, painted in the early part of his life, is in the church of S. Salvi, which is highly commended by Moreni in his Memorie Istoriche. In the midst of this promising career, he found himself oppressed with a numerous family, which the scanty remuneration he received for his works, rendered it difficult to support. He sunk into a state of inertness and despondency, and his latter performances were feeble, languid, and pusillanimous. He died in 1534. [His true name was RAFFAELLINO KARLI, as appears by a picture painted by him in 1501, so signed. Zani places his death in 1524. Rosini has given a print of the Resurrection of Christ, from the picture in the Academy at Florence, (plate 104,) which justifies the praise bestowed on the artist, but the figures are not numerous, being only seven. Probably that above mentioned is the general resurrection.]

[GARCIA, FERRER, (the licentiate Don Pedro,) though an ecclesiastic, exercised the profession of a painter at Valencia and Madrid, about the middle of the 17th century, and obtained a great reputation, especially in perspective. He painted Crucifixions, one of which bears date 1632, and the usual religious subjects. His collection of pictures by the great masters, as well as his own performances, was sold at his death for a large sum.]

[GARCIA, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter at Murcia, at the commencement of the 17th century, as is learnt by the inscription on an altar-piece in the chapel de los Velez, in the cathedral of that city. The picture represents St. Luke writing, and is spoken of in terms of great commendation.]

[GARCIA HIDALGO, (Don Joseph,) a Spanish painter, who wrote notes of his life, but omitted to state where and when he was born. From circumstances it is conjectured that he was a native of Murviedro, and born about 1650. He was named by the artists of the day "el Castellano." He studied the antique at Rome, and the works of the great masters, under the direction of Hyacinth Brandi. Pietro da Cortona, Salvator Rosa, and Carlo Maratti assisted him with their counsels; but the indifferent state of his health obliged him to return to Spain, where he attached himself to Carreño, and, though far advanced in the art, worked as a young pupil. He obtained great credit at the court, and was much employed by Philip V., who made him his principal painter in 1703, and shortly after Chevalier of the order of S. Michael. In 1711, he finished the twenty-four pictures of the life of S. Augustine, for the convent of S. Philippe le Royal, wherein he displayed great intelligence in the art, particularly in composition. In the latter part of his life he retired to the convent of S. Philippe, and died there. He took great interest in the advancement of the art, and published several works on anatomy and painting for the benefit of the students. His works are at Madrid, Valencia, Siguenza, Sant Jago, and Guadalaxara.]

GARDNER, THOMAS, an English engraver, who lived about the year 1735. He chiefly worked for the booksellers, and engraved a set of plates for the Book of Common Prayer, paraphrased by James Harris in 1735.

[GAREMYN, JEAN, an artist of Bruges, was born in 1712, studied under Louis Rooms and Matthias de Visch. He painted numerous altar-pieces for the churches at Bruges and Courtrai; and others for private persons at Brussels and Ghent. His pictures are highly esteemed by his countrymen for the warmth of their colouring, and the facility of their execution. He designed and executed several of the plates for the Chronicles of Flanders, in 4 vols. folio, published in 1736. He painted several pictures in imitation of the manner of Rembrandt and of Teniers, which are held, by the Brugeois, in great estimation. His works in various departments of painting are numerous. He died in 1799.]

GARGIUOLI, DOMENICO, called Micco SPADARO. This painter was born at Naples in 1612, and was a fellow student with Salvator Rosa, in the school of Anniello Falcone. Next to Salvator he was the ablest of his disciples, and distinguished himself as a landscape painter; though he painted some historical pictures for the churches at Naples, particularly in the Certosa. He was much employed in decorating the architectural views of his friend Viviano Codagora, with a number of small figures, in the style of Callot and della Bella, which were correctly drawn, and touched with great spirit. He died in 1679.

[GARNERY, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a French painter of portraits, architectural views, and subjects of fancy, was born at Paris in 1755, and was living in 1831. His earlier portraits are said to be in the Flemish style; and his fancy subjects (not to say historical) are interesting.]

[GARNERY, AMBROISE LOUIS, son of the preceding, painted marine subjects, most of them representing occurrences within the last thirty years, and some of extraordinary events; such as an English frigate captured by an American, the battle of Navarino, (ordered by the government,) and the Duke and Duchess de Berri embarked in English frigates on their return to France. He also engraved and published "Views of the Ports and Coasts of France."]

[GARNERY, AUGUSTE, second son of Jean François, studied under Isabey, and painted chiefly in water colours. Besides numerous portraits, he has produced several historiette pictures that are interesting, and made designs for vignettes, and for the great work on Egypt.]

GARNIER, ANTHONY, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about the year 1650. He etched his plates in a bold style, and finished them with the graver. Though not executed with much delicacy, they are not destitute of merit. He engraved some of the paintings by Primaticcio, at Fontainebleau, and a set of twelve plates, after the pictures by the same painter, in the chapel de Fleury. He also engraved some plates after N. Poussin and M. Angelo Caravaggio, and the following after J. Blanchard:

The Holy Family
Charity.
St. John Baptist.
St. Sebastian.

He usually marked his plates with the cipher AG.

[GARNIER, ETIENNE BARTHÉLEMY, a portrait and historical painter, born at Paris in 1759. His subjects are chiefly from the ancient poets, and circumstances relating to the popular monarchs of France, such as Dagobert, Henry IV., and Napoleon. In 1828, he was an unsuccessful competitor with Horace Vernet for the directorship of the School of Rome, but was compensated by the decoration of the Legion of Honour, and a pension of two thousand francs. He was living in 1831.]

GARNIER, NOËL, an ancient French engraver, who flourished about the year 1560. He engraved some wooden cuts, and is said to have been one of the earliest artists that made use of the graver in France. His plates are very rudely executed, and appear to have been the productions of a goldsmith. He engraved some grotesque ornaments, and a set of forty-eight figures, representing the Arts, Sciences, Trades, &c. There is also a plate by him of several naked men fighting, bearing some resemblance to the style of Sebald Beham, though very inferior; it is marked noe 8 on a tablet. [He is called "the master of the knot." Zani doubts that he ever engraved on wood. Brulliot gives two specimens of his monogram, very different from the preceding. One is a bird resembling a goose flying, with a tablet, on which are N and G united by a knot; the other, simply a tablet with the letters united in a more flourishing manner. See plates of Monograms.]

GAROFALO, BENVENUTO TISIO, called. The family name of this painter was TISIO. He was called Garofalo, from his usually painting a gill-flower [or clove pink] in the corner of his pictures. He was born at Ferrara in 1481, and received the first part of his education under Domenico Panetti; but he afterwards studied under Boccaccino Boccacci, at Cremona. Not satisfied with the instruction of those masters, he went to Rome, where he had the advantage of passing two years in the school of Raffaele. In 1507, he left Rome, and returned to Ferrara, where he was employed by the Duke, and for the public edifices. The works of Garofalo approach the beautiful style of Raffaele in the expression of his heads, and in the correctness of his design. His colouring is distinguished by warmer tones and more vigorous shadows. The heads of his old men are noble and venerable, and his Madonnas are graceful, and tastefully attired. In the churches at Ferrara, there are several of the large works of Garofalo, both in oil and in fresco; and his small pictures are found in the choicest collections at Rome, Bologna, and throughout Italy. In the church of S. Domenico, at Ferrara, is a fine picture by him of St. Peter Martyr; in S. Francesco, the Murder of the Innocents, esteemed one of his best works; and in S. Giorgio, his most capital performance, representing the Adoration of the Magi, painted in 1520. This eminent painter is deservedly placed at the head of the Ferrarese school. He continued to exercise his talent until his sixty-ninth year, when he became blind, and died in 1559. [A fine specimen of his easel pictures is in the National Gallery, entitled "The Vision of St. Augustine."]

[GARVEY, EDMUND, a landscape painter, who lived at the latter part of the last century. Very little is recorded respecting his history; but it is supposed, from his connexion, that he was of an Irish family. He imitated Richard Wilson, to a certain extent, in his manner of painting; neat, but rather dry. He left many small pictures at his death, which were sold by auction in 1816.]

GARZI, LUIGI, or LODOVICO. According to Pascoli, this painter was born at Pistoja in 1638, [Zani says 1640,] and until he was fifteen years of age studied under S. Boccali, in his native city. In 1653 he went to Rome, where he entered the school of Andrea Sacchi, of whom he was the favourite disciple, and became one of the most eminent painters of his time. He was the contemporary and rival of Carlo Maratti, and though less successful than that master, he is little inferior to him in the correctness of his design and the elegance of his forms. His compositions are ingenious and abundant; and his facility of hand was equal to his invention. In his style, he appears to have united with the sobriety of Sacchi something of the splen-dour of Pietro da Cortona. After having painted several pictures for the public edifices at Rome, he was invited to Naples, to paint the vault of the church of S. Caterina del Formello, with the angles; and two saloons in the royal palace. In the dome at Pescia, he painted an immense picture of the Assumption, which is considered his most capital performance. Of his works at Rome, the principal are the cupola of the Capello Cibo, in S. Maria del Popolo; the Marys at the tomb of our Saviour, in S. Marta; and his celebrated picture of the Prophet Joel, in St. John of Lateran. He died in 1721.

GARZI, MARIO, was the son of the preceding painter, by whom he was instructed in the art. He painted history, in the style of his father, and was an artist of very promising talent, but died very young. Two of his pictures are noticed in the Guida di Roma, by Pascoli.

GARZONI, GIOVANNA. This lady was a native of Ascoli, but resided chiefly at Rome, where she distinguished herself as a paintress of flowers, and portraits in miniature. She flourished about the year 1630. At Florence she painted the portraits of some of the illustrious personages of the house of Medici, and some of the nobility. She died at Rome in 1673, and bequeathed all her property, which was considerable, to the Academy of St. Luke, where a marble monument is erected to her memory.

GASCAR, HENRY, a French portrait painter, who visited England in the reign of Charles II. He was greatly patronized by the Duchess of Portsmouth, and met with so much encouragement, that he is said to have realized above ten thousand pounds, during a residence* of a few years. His best portrait was that of Philip, Earl of Pembroke. He scraped a few miserable mezzotintos, after his own pictures; among which is the portrait of the Duchess of Portsmouth, and that of James II. when Duke of York.

GASPARINI, GASPARE. This painter was a native of Macerata, and flourished about the year 1585. He was a disciple of Girolamo di Sermonetta, whose style he followed, though in a less finished manner; as appears in his two pictures in the church of S. Venanzio, at Fabriano, representing the Baptism of Christ and the Last Supper. He is seen to more advantage in his picture of St. Peter and St. John curing the Lame, in the same church, a grand composition, in which he seems to have imitated the style of Raffaele. In the church of the Conventuali, in his native place, is a fine picture of St. Francis receiving the Stigmata.

GASPARINI, SEBASTIANO. In the Descrizione delle pitture d'Ascoli, by Orsini, is noticed a painter of this name, who painted several pictures in fresco, in a chapel in the church of S. Biagio, in that city.

GASPARS, JOHN BAPTIST. This artist was a native of Antwerp, and was a scholar of Thomas Willeborts Bosschaert. He visited England during the civil war, and was much employed by General Lambert. After the Restoration he became an assistant to Sir Peter Lely, and afterwards to Sir Godfrey Kneller. He drew well, and excelled in making designs for tapestry. The portrait of Charles II. in Painter's Hall, and another of the same prince, in the hall of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, were painted by J. B. Gaspars. He died in London in 1691.

[GASSEL, LUCAS VAN, of Helmond, was a good landscape painter. It is supposed that he resided chiefly at Brussels, where he died at an advanced age. His portrait by Jacob Binck, is in the collection of "persons who died before 1572," engraved by Jean Wierix.]

[GASSIES, ———, a French historical and general painter. The pictures exhibited by him from 1810 to 1827 embrace a great variety of subjects, historical, poetical, allegorical; landscapes, marine views, interiors of churches, and striking scenes on the coasts of England and France. They are to be found in the collections of some of the best patrons and amateurs of painting in France.]

GAST, MICHAEL DE, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1520. He appears to have passed the early part of his life in Italy, as the greater part of his pictures represent the ruins and vestiges of ancient Rome, which he embellished with figures and cattle. He was received into the Society of Painters at Antwerp in 1558.

[GASULL, AUGUSTIN, an historical painter of Valencia, studied at Rome under Carlo Maratti. He was distinguished for the excellence of his colouring, of which all his pictures, both public and private, bear testimony. His St. Andrew, St. Stephen, la Vierge de l'Espérance, and the S. Joseph, which he painted for the church of S. John del Mercado, at Valencia, are much admired; and there are many pictures by him in several other churches of the same city. He died at Valencia at the commencement of the 18th century.]

GATTI, BERNARDO, called SOJARO. The place of nativity of this painter has been the subject of dispute among the writers on art; some assert that he was born at Pavia, and others that he was a native of Vercelli. Lanzi prefers the authority of the Cavaliere Antonio Campi, who was his contemporary, and published his Cronache di Cremona in 1575, the year in which this painter died, who decidedly proves him to have been a native of Cremona, where his family was established. He was the ablest disciple of Coreggio, and approached nearer to the great style of his instructor than any of his pupils. In his works, he proves how nearly the beauties of that admirable painter may be imitated, without the servility of a copyist. Parma, Piacenza, and Cremona are rich in his works. His Reposo, in the church of S. Sigismondo, breathes the very spirit of Coreggio; his affecting sweetness and grace, the expressive sensibility of his characters, the surprising illusion of his relief, are discernible in this celebrated picture. Similar characteristics distinguish his Nativity, in S. Pietro, at Cremona; and perhaps, above all, his admired Pietà, in the church of La Maddalena, at Parma. He succeeded Pordenone in the work left unfinished by that master, in the tribune of S. Maria di Campagne, at Piacenza; where, according to Vasari, the whole appears to be by the same hand. One of his most considerable works is the Cupola della Steccata, at Parma, which Lanzi considers an extraordinary performance in every part, in which the Madonna is of the most captivating beauty. In the refectory of the Padri Lateranensi, at Cremona, is his great work of the Miracle of the Multiplication of the Loaves, an abundant and copious composition of many figures, larger than life, admirably varied in the heads and attitudes, and conducted with a beauty of colour, and a harmony of effect, which make us overlook some slight defects in the aerial perspective. This distinguished painter died in 1575. [Zani says he was a native of Pavia, and a citizen of Cremona. In the cupola at Piacenza is inscribed, "Bernardinus Gatti Papiensis, 1553;" and in another place, "Bernardinus Gattus, cui cognomen Soiaro, Auctor 1602." If Campi is to be implicitly relied on, there must have been a second Bernardino, called Soiaro. In Rosini will be found a print of the Nativity, (plate 121,) admirable in composition, characteristic expression, and beauty.]

GATTI, GERVASIO, called SOJARO. This painter was a native of Cremona, and flourished from the year 1571 till 1631. He was the nephew of the preceding artist, by whom he was conducted to the same fountain of which he had himself drunk with so much advantage. The works of Coreggio, at Parma, were the constant objects of his study and contemplation. The advantage he had derived from those resources appeared in his first picture of the Martyrdom of S. Sebastiano, painted for the church of St. Agatha, at Cremona, in 1578, which Lanzi describes as designed with all the purity of the antique, with a beauty of colouring equal to the greatest masters of the Lombard school. In the church of S. Pietro is a fine picture of the Death of St. Cecilia, with a glory of angels, truly Coreggiesque, partaking so much of the fine impasto and relief of his uncle Bernardino, that it might have been mistaken for a work of his, had he not signed it with his name. He had undoubtedly seen the works of Caracci, and their style is discernible in some of his latter pictures, particularly in S. S. Pietro e Marsellino. He was also an excellent portrait painter, in which he was much employed.

GATTI, URIELE. Lanzi conjectures that this painter was a brother of the foregoing artist. He flourished about the year 1601, as appears from the date inscribed on a picture by him of the Crucifixion, in the church of S. Sepolero, at Piacenza; it is signed Urial de Gattis dictus Sojarus, 1601, and is painted with a fine impasto of colour, and no despicable pretensions to grace, but the style is little, and it is feeble in the chiaro-scuro.

GATTI, GIROLAMO, was born at Bologna in 1662, and was a scholar of Marc Antonio Franceschini. Several of his works are in the churches and palaces at Bologna. In S. Maria Incoronata, is a picture of S. Agostino, S. Petronio, and S. Gregorio, interceding for the Souls in Purgatory; in the church of La Natività, the Presentation in the Temple; and in the public palace, Charles V. crowned by Pope Clement VII. He died in 1726.

GATTI, OLIVIERO, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Parma in 1598. He was a native of Parma, and a scholar of Gio. Lodovico Valesio, and probably was instructed in engraving by Agostino Caracci, from the resemblance in their style, though greatly inferior to that eminent artist. Of his works as a painter little is known; but he engraved several plates, some of which are after his own designs, which possess considerable merit. He was received into the Academy at Bologna in 1626. We have the following prints by him, among others:

St. Francis Xavier kneeling on the Sea-shore, and taking up a Crucifix, which is floating on the water; after his design.

The Virgin caressing the infant Christ; after Garbieri.

St. Jerome, with a Crucifix; after Agos. Caracci.

An emblematical subject, representing an Armorial Bearing, supported by two River Gods, with an armed figure, standing alone, surrounded by Jupiter, Hercules, Neptune, Apollo, and Minerva; after L. Caracci.

A set of four small plates, representing the Deity forming the World, the Creation of Adam, the Sacrifice of Abraham, and Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after Pordenone.

A Drawing-book; after the designs of Guercino.

GATTI, TOMMASO. This painter was born at Pavia in 1642. He was a scholar of Carlo Sacchi; but he afterwards went to Venice, where he studied the works of the great masters of that celebrated school. On his return to Pavia he painted several pictures for the churches with reputation.

GAVASIO, GIOVANNI GIACOMO. This painter was a native of the valley of Brembana, in the Bergamese state, and flourished about the year 1512. The Conte Tassi mentions two pictures by this master, which he asserts rank him among the ablest artists of his time. One, in the sacristy of S. Alessandro, at Bergamo, representing the Madonna and Bambino, with a glory of angels, painted in the style of Giovanni de Bellino, with an inscription, Io. Jacobi Gavatii de Poscantu opus 1512. The other, in the collection of Signor Carlo Apiani, at Bergamo, the Virgin and Infant, with St. Joseph and St. Elizabeth, signed Jacobus Gavatus de Bergamo, P.

GAVASIO, AGOSTINO, was probably the son of the preceding artist. The author above mentioned notices a picture by this master in the parochial church of S. Giacomo, at Piazzatore, in the valley of Brembana, of the Virgin and Infant; signed Augustinus de Garazzis Civ. Berg. pinxit anno 1527.

GAVASSETTI, CAMILLO. This painter was a native of Modena, and flourished about the year 1625. It is not said by whom he was instructed; but he is mentioned by Tiraboschi as an eminent historical painter, whose merit was greater than his celebrity. His principal works are at Piacenza, where he is better known than at Parma or Modena. At the presbiterio, or parsonage of S. Antonio, at Piacenza, is a fresco work, representing a subject from the Apocalypse, grandly composed, and spiritedly painted, with great suavity of colouring, which was esteemed by Guercino the finest work of art in that city. [Zani quotes his death in 1628.]

GAUCHER, CHARLES, a modern French engraver, born at Paris in 1740. He was first a pupil of Basan, and afterwards was instructed by J. P. le Bas. He engraved several plates of portraits, and other subjects, in a neat, finished style, of which the following are the principal :

PORTRAITS.

Maria Cecilia, Ottoman Princess, daughter of Achmet III.; after his own design.

M. du Paty, celebrated Advocate; after Nolte.

GAULLI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, called BACICIO. This eminent painter was born at Genoa in 1639. After acquiring the incipient principles of the art in his native city, he went to Rome, where, by studying the works of the best masters, aided by the counsel of Bernini, he soon rose into repute. Nature had endowed him with great celerity of invention, which, joined to uncommon facility of hand, qualified him to distinguish himself as a great machinist; and he could not have made choice of a branch of the art so suited to his talents. The great vault of the church del Gesu, at Rome, representing

St. Francis Xavier taken up into Heaven, is one of his most considerable works; the grandeur of the composition, his knowledge of foreshortening, the unity and harmony of the effect, and his intelligent management of the brilliancy and degradation of the lights, render it one of the vaunted ornaments of Rome. It is, however, to be admired as a whole, rather than in the local tints, and the individual design of the figures, in which he is not always correct. He possessed the talent of always adapting his style to the character of his subject. In his picture of St. Anne kneeling before the Virgin and Infant, with a beautiful group of Angels, in the church of S. Francesco a Ripa, he exhibits every thing that is cheerful, pleasing, and graceful. Contrasted with this is his Death of S. Saverio, in S. Andrea a monte Cavallo, which he has treated in an austere style, with all the solemnity and pathos which the subject requires. In the church of St. Agnes he painted the angles of the dome, and such is their force and brilliancy, that the neighbouring works of Ciro Ferri are nearly eclipsed by them. He also painted portraits with distinguished reputation; and he is stated by Pascoli to have painted seven different pontiffs, and a great number of the great personages of his time. He is said to have etched a plate of the portrait of Cardinal Celio Piccolomini. He died in 1709.

[GAULT DE SAINT GERMAIN, PIERRE MARIE, born at Paris in 1754, painted religious and historical subjects, some of which are of large dimensions; and also portraits of many celebrated persons, among whom are Voltaire, Mademoiselle Clairon, Crebillon, and Stanislaus, king of Poland. He wrote "An Account of the Lives and Works of Lionardo da Vinci and Nicolas Poussin;" "Guide des Amateurs for the Italian, Spanish, Flemish, and Dutch Schools;" and other works relative to painting, in which he displays much knowledge and judgment. He was living in 1831.]

GAULTIER, or, as he sometimes signs himself, GALTER, LEONARD, a French engraver, who flourished about the year 1610. We have by him several very highly finished plates, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Crispin de Passe. They are executed entirely with the graver, with great precision, but in a stiff, formal manner. He must have been very laborious, as the Abbé de Marolles possessed upwards of eight hundred prints by him, many of which were after his own designs. They consist of portraits, and various subjects, of which the following are the most worthy of notice. They are sometimes signed with his name, and sometimes with the cipher GF.

The Last Judgment; copied from the print which Martin Rota engraved; after M. A. Buonaroti.

GAULTIER, J., a French engraver, little known, who was probably a relation of the preceding artist, as the few prints we have by him bear a resemblance to his style. Among others, he engraved some small plates of emblematical subjects, which are not without merit.

GAULTIER, PETER, a French painter and engraver, who flourished about the year 1730, and chiefly resided at Naples. He etched the following plates, after Francesco Solimene:

David and Bathsheba.

The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth.

GAUW, G. This artist is mentioned by Mr. Strutt as the engraver of a singular plate of the Head of Mercury; after J. Mathan; engraved in imitation of a pen-drawing.

GAYWOOD, ROBERT, an eminent English engraver, who flourished about the year 1660. He was a pupil of Wenceslaus Hollar, whose style he imitated, though he never approached the excellence of that master. The most interesting of his works are his portraits, of which he engraved several, which are highly esteemed by the collectors. Among others, we have the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Mary, Queen of Scots, with a Crucifix in her hand.

He also engraved the picture of Venus reclining, with a Man playing on the Organ; after Titian, from the picture formerly in the collection of Charles I., now in the collection of the Earl of Cholmondeley; and

A set of eight plates of Birds; after F. Barlow.

A set of Animals; after the same.

A set of Lions and Leopards; after Rubens.

[GEDDES, ANDREW, a portrait painter, and an associate of the Royal Academy, was born at Edinburgh about the year 1789. He was the son of David Geddes, an auditor of excise, and was educated at the High School and University at Edinburgh. He showed an early predilection for the fine arts, but did not commence his career as a professed artist until after the death of his father. He entered the Academy about the same time that Haydon, Jackson, and Wilkie were students there. In 1814 he took a residence in London for his artistic pursuits, and about this time painted the portraits of David Wilkie, Henry Mackenzie, (the author of the Man of Feeling;) Dr. Chalmers, and other persons of note. The approbation which these portraits elicited induced him to put down his name as a candidate for the honours of the Royal Academy; but he was unsuccessful, and did not apply again for ten years. In 1818 he painted a picture of the Discovery of the Regalia in Scotland, in which he introduced the portraits of several of the most distinguished men of his native city, among them Sir Walter Scott. In 1823 he visited the continent, and passed some time in Italy, Germany, and France. On his return he made an excursion into the higher realms of art, and painted an altar-piece for the church of St. James, Garlick-hill, and a picture of Christ and the Woman of Samaria. It is said that he was skilful as an etcher in the manner of Rembrandt, but, as he did not publish his productions, it cannot be here affirmed whether it was merely as an amateur copyist of that master's works, or from original conceptions. For the last four years of his life he laboured under consumption, which terminated fatally in May, 1844.]
