Wikipedia is like a tree, which is nourished by people's knowledge. If we want it to continue growing, we have to nurture it with new knowledge.

Wikipedia is a living tree, not planted by one, but grown by many. Its roots are buried deep in collective memory, and its branches stretch wide with the diversity of human experience. Each article, each edit, each citation is like a drop of rain, a gust of wind, or a beam of sunlight. Without these, the tree withers; with them, it thrives.

Yet, this tree does not grow on its own. It needs care. It needs gardeners. It needs those who are willing to move from scrolling to cultivating, from consuming knowledge to co-creating it. For every person who dares to edit, to add their voice, to question and improve, the tree grows stronger, greener, fuller.

Some trees are dry, cracked, and barren ,like knowledge left in the hands of the few. But others bloom with blossoms of plural stories, facts checked and rechecked, voices previously unheard. These are the forests we dream of. And they begin when we dare to water the roots.

Because knowledge, like a tree, does not grow in silence. It grows with conversation. With courage. With care. With people like you.

The more we nurture it, the higher it reaches. The more we edit, the more it blooms.
For knowledge grows and blossoms with those who choose to water it.

Lack of care that results in a withered tree

Digital passivity
Youth disconnection intimidation
Vigilance
Untapped potential
Lack of guidance
Silence and lack of feedback
Risk of getting stuck
invisible barriers
